While I share the hon. member's concern, I have to tell him that what is encouraging is that month over month there has been a decline in bankruptcies. Business bankruptcies have declined by roughly 100 and personal bankruptcies have declined by over 1,100 for a total of 1,133 fewer bankruptcies in December than in November.

I realize that does not provide a whole lot of comfort, but I think we should take some encouragement in the fact that the incidence of bankruptcies is on the decline. With some of the initiatives that have been announced and an increase and improvement in confidence, that will be reduced further still.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister. We seem to have heard this song before.

Last February the then Minister of Finance said the recession would be over by June. In August of last year the current Minister of Finance said that we were well on the road to recovery.

The 62,000 Canadian consumers who were forced into bankruptcy in 1991 have completely lost faith in this government's ability to either predict or manage the Canadian economy.

Given these cold, hard facts, is the Prime Minister now prepared to endorse and fully accept the five-point recovery program put forward by the Leader of the Opposition?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what the member chooses to overlook in the substance of his question is the fact that when we compare 1981 to 1991 we see that the number of businesses in Canada almost doubled. In 1981 there were 780,000 businesses. Today there are 1,730,000. The aggregate numbers are up but indeed the percentages are down.

The hon. member talks about whether we are in recovery or we are still in a recession. The Canadian economy grew by 3.3 per cent in quarter 2 and quarter 3. It slowed down in quarter 4, largely because of the serious deterioration in the economy of the United States and of other industrialized nations. All industrialized nations have revised their growth figures downward for 1992. That is not a Canadian phenomenon; it is a world phenomenon.

AIR TRANSPORT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Last week the chief negotiator at the open skies talks announced he was retiring. This came after the departmental task force released its report in which it rejected the concept of open borders for air services. This happens at a time when there is public concern about the future of Canada's airlines. Could the Minister of Transport clearly explain his government's position regarding the open skies negotiations and the financial problems expected by Canadian carriers?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I may point out to the hon. member that there is absolutely no connection between the decision of the federal negotiator, Mr. Harris, to resign his position and the report that was released last week. We embarked on these bilateral negotiations with the United States in order to increase the amount of transborder air traffic between Canada and the United States. We are pursuing this policy, and we are convinced that by improving the situation for Canadian carriers, we will in fact improve their financial situation.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the minister is surely aware of the widespread apprehension among the public and airline employees in particular about the uncertain future facing the Canadian airline industry.

Surely the government should be willing to state clearly now, for the public, what it views as being in the national interest with respect to this industry and how it intends to ensure that the national interest is served in the months to come.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the federal government's position on this matter has always been the same. At the present time, some rather unfortunate things are happening in the aviation industry throughout the world.

• (1450)

However, our position has not changed. It is in the best interests of consumers and the travelling public in this country to have two airline companies that are in the best possible shape, and that is what we want to achieve in the months to come.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was able to raise in this House some questions about the draft bracketed agreement between Canada, the United States and Mexico regarding a proposed free trade agreement.

The draft bracketed agreement is confirmed to be in existence by the press secretary of Carla Hills and also by the press secretary of the Mexican Ambassador to Canada.

Although this draft bracketed document has been kept secret from the Canadian people, it has come to my attention that there are proposals in that draft bracketed treaty that would seriously affect the viability of Canadian automobile manufacturing and indeed Canadian auto parts manufacturers.

I now ask the Minister for International Trade if he is prepared to table the document in this House that has been made available to Mexican politicians and to tell this House and all Canadians, particularly those in Ontario and Quebec, that their jobs will not be at risk because of these negotiations going on?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me say that I have not been keeping this matter a secret. I do not know where my hon. friend has been. I have referred to this text on a number of occasions.

This, I should say to my hon. friend, has not been made available to members of the Mexican Congress as I think he was saying yesterday.

The final point that I make is that there is nothing in the automotive chapter in the agreement. We have yet to come to a set of negotiations on which we can base a chapter on the automotive industry.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I know that the minister does not wish to misinform the House, but it is my information that the Mexican government, through its negotiator, Mr. Blanco, has shared with members of the Mexican Congress the draft bracketed treaty which Carla Hills' office acknowledged exists.

During the discussions leading up to the free trade discussions with Mexico, United States and Canada, the government's negotiator, Mr. John Weekes, said that full consultation would take place with all Canadians including labour and including manufacturing sectors.

This document is in existence. It is being discussed by Mr. Blanco with Mexican senators. Why is the document being kept secret from Canadians? Why is it not tabled in front of members of this House who are responsible for at least being aware of what this government is selling us out on?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as I have said on many occasions, there is a draft text that has been developed. It has been consolidated. There are now a number of differences that have come to light between the three countries in that text. That is why it is called a bracketed text, because those differences are in brackets. This I have made clear on many occasions and I am sorry that my hon. friend has not been aware of those.

I also say to my friend that we have had full discussions with the SAGITs, the sectoral advisory groups on international trade, plus the International Trade Advisory Committee, as well as the provinces, in developing negotiating positions that we have on this.

As my hon. friend is aware, I am going to be appearing before the external affairs committee on trade and I would be happy to discuss the matter further at that time with him.

NATIONAL PARKS

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, on July 14, 1988 Treasury Board directed the Ministers of Public Works, Environment and Transport to address the question of which department should be responsible for making expenditures on highways in national parks.

My question is to the President of the Treasury Board. When will this decision be finalized so that highways throughout the national park system can be given the attention they deserve?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Wild Rose is very right. There have been ongoing discussions between the three Departments: Transport, Environment parks service, and Public Works.

I can tell her that a number of scenarios have been established and we are now presently looking at them. We have to reconcile this with a lot of other pressures in the system. The discussions are ongoing and I should be able to come back to her soon.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Agriculture. The government was committed to defending the four pillars of Quebec agriculture and to reinforcing GATT article XI. The minister even said that he would rip up his shirt and put his seat on the line if any of these five components were affected. On January 13, Canada's ambassador to Geneva accepted the Dunkel report which destroys those four pillars and abolishes article XI. How can the minister justify this betrayal, this outright breach of promise?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised at the comments of the hon. member for Lac Saint-Jean. He ought to know that our position in January was the same as it was on December 20. We still support strengthening and clarifying GATT article XI. It is a vital measure that has allowed our marketing boards to operate for years.

The Canadian position was a joint effort. We prepared that position with Canadian farm leaders. I have on many occasions met with farm producers, even in the hon. member's riding, where I had a chance to visit quite often. I have met practically all the producers in his riding. Quebec producers especially are in a position to know that we defend the interests of Quebec producers and that we will continue to do so. There is nothing to be worried about on that score.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): What matters, Mr. Speaker, is the final position. And the final position is that this government accepted the Dunkel Report, while expressing some mild disappointment about parts it found less palatable. Mr. Speaker, the minister knows perfectly well this about-face will dismantle crop insurance and the mechanisms for setting prices for milk, eggs and poultry.

The minister knows perfectly well this will cost farm producers in Quebec at least $350 million over the next six years. So tearing up his shirt is just not enough, and the minister should tell the House what he intends to do to save thousands of Quebec producers from disaster.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as far as about-faces are concerned, I think the hon. member is quite knowledgeable on that score. I don't need any lessons from him.

Mr. Speaker, Canada's position has not changed. Canada did not accept the Dunkel report. When the hon. member says what he said just now, he is mistaken. I don't think he did it on purpose. He was probably misinformed. We are defending the interests of farm producers, Mr. Speaker, and we will continue to do so. And I think the hon. member should stop spreading information which, as he knows perfectly well, does not reflect the real situation, Mr. Speaker.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. During the Oka crisis in 1990, the regional director at the time signed a letter committing the government to acquiring the properties located in the Jardins d'Oka and south of Highway 344. Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister realizes my constituents are upset because they have yet to receive a formal proposal for dealing with the serious psychological and financial problems they experienced as a result of the invasion of their property and land by masked warriors.

Could the minister confirm he is about to submit proposals to these owners and to the municipality of the village of Oka? And when will he do so?

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to compliment the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau for the diligent work she has done, together with the Minister of State for Indian Affairs, to seek a solution to this very difficult problem.

I can confirm that indeed a very creative proposal has been brought together by our officials and is presently being discussed among the four parties to an agreement with respect to the land issues at Kanesatake and Oka. I believe this proposal will be of great benefit to the land owners she speaks of and to the Mohawk community at Kanesatake.

As soon as the preliminary discussions are completed, further details will be forthcoming.

HOME OWNERSHIP

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

In the Montreal area, the total number of housing starts has dropped 15 per cent, compared with last year. Yesterday the government co-opted a proposal made by the Leader of the Opposition when it announced that it was reducing the downpayment required to buy a first house from 10 to 5 per cent.

Is the Minister of Finance willing to implement another component of the Liberal platform that would allow Canadians to use up to $7,500 of their Registered Retirement Savings Plan for the purchase of a new home?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will admit that the government has already taken a large number of very positive measures, more than were taken by the Liberal government when it was in power several years ago during another recession.

I suggest he look at the interest rate levels we have today which have given us our lowest mortgage rates in 20 years. That is a positive contribution.

Dropping inflation plus the measure announced by my colleague yesterday are pointing us in the right direction.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, Jean Cantin, director general of the Association de la construction du Québec for the Montreal area, said that the option of using RRSP funds for the purchase of a first home would have a far greater impact than reducing the initial downpayment from 10 per cent to 5 per cent.

Considering the extent of the recession, Mr. Speaker, is the government prepared to commit itself to introducing legislation that would allow Canadians to buy their first home with the money they put in a retirement savings plan?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had paid attention to the results of the conference of finance ministers in Quebec City a few days ago, he would have heard my colleague, the Minister of Finance, point out that we were going to give this matter active consideration.

Perhaps the hon. member would care to recall some of the comments on this use of RRSPs, which were intended to help Canadians save enough money for their retirement. We must be very careful about the way this money is used. Other provinces have told us they had a housing surplus.

We are now looking at all these factors, and we will let you know what we decide in due time.

HIBERNIA

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The seriousness of the economic recession is evident in every community throughout the country. We have had the recent announcement of Imperial Oil laying off 1,700 workers and just minutes ago we learned that Gulf Canada Resources is pulling out of the Hibernia project because of the bad economic environment.

I want to ask the minister of energy whether or not he can confirm this particular information and if he can assure this House that every step will be taken to ensure that the Hibernia project will proceed without any delay whatsoever.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for the question.

I can confirm that Gulf Canada Resources served notice of withdrawal to the other three members of the consortium as well as the Governments of Canada, Newfoundland and Labrador at approximately 1.30 p.m. today.

I want to assure the hon. member and this House, as well the premier of Newfoundland, and my counterpart in Newfoundland that the Government of Canada intends for the project to go head. As the hon. member and the House know, we as Canadians are standing behind the project with over $1 billion in grants and over $1.6 billion in guarantees and loans.

There is a structure in the unanimous agreement of the consortium, a method or a mechanism, whereby it will continue putting money into the project. It is the government's intention that the project continue.

FORESTRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and concerns layoffs in the Atlantic provinces.

The government's economic policies have ravaged the forestry industry in my riding, resulting in 300 layoffs in Atholville and 400 layoffs expected for the Dalhousie mill. The Government of New Brunswick has unveiled a strategy to help the forestry industry. What new measures does the government intend to take to solve the problems in the natural-resource sector, and when?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the forestry industry has indeed experienced a downturn not only in Canada but throughout the world. Commodity prices have been seriously depressed. As well there is reduced demand.

This is an issue that will be helped to some extent by the reduction of interest rates. I believe the lower burden of debt servicing will be helpful. My latest indication is that there does appear to be some upturn around the corner.

The housing initiatives that were announced south of the border and the housing initiatives that are being taken here in Canada will obviously provide some help in that regard.

I do not underestimate the seriousness of the problem and I can assure the hon. member that we are taking that matter seriously.

POINTS OF ORDER

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my point of order refers to the second part of an answer during Question Period by the Minister for International Trade. The minister referred to a document. At first he did not acknowledge it existed but then he began to refer to it.

I want an explanation of the rules of this House on whether or not the minister, once referring to that document and perhaps alluding to quotes from it, is obliged by the rules of this House to table the document in the House.

Mr. Speaker: I can assist the hon. member, and I will hear the minister in a moment. If the minister is reading from a document then of course the general rule is that he would be required to table it.

I will hear the minister.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I want to take issue with what my colleague has just said. I have never in this House not acknowledged that that text did exist. I have said on a number of occasions outside this House that the text did exist.

I am sorry that my friend is not reading the newspapers and understanding what is going on around him.

Mr. Barrett: My point of order is not a dispute over whether or not the document exists. I have always maintained it exists.

My point of order is once a reference is made to it by the minister, is he obliged to make that document available to all the parliamentarians?

Mr. Speaker: The point the hon. member is making is an interesting one. I have said that if the minister reads from the text of the document then the general rule is that it be tabled. If the minister, on the other hand, makes some reference to some document somewhere, the same does not apply.

MEMBER FOR RICHELIEU—PARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, my question is whether you have taken a position on the words "hypocrite" and "stupid" which the Prime Minister used last November. If you have made a decision, I would like to know what it is.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member asks whether the Speaker has made a decision on a matter of concern in this House before Christmas, more specifically in October. The ruling was brought down yesterday.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

TABLING OF REPORT OF VISIT TO CZECH AND SLOVAK FEDERAL REPUBLIC

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When the House took recess at one o'clock, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell had the floor. We are now on ten-minute speeches, without questions or comments.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity this afternoon to take part in the debate on a bill whose purpose is to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, this is the government's second attempt to amend this legislation. The first time, the matter ended up in the Canadian courts, and unfortunately, the government won its case. However, although according to the courts the government was acting well within what was permissible under the Constitution, that does not mean it was the right decision. In fact, the opposite is true.

We are going through a very difficult period in this country. We are now in a recession that is worse than the one we had in 1982, and one remembers what the Conservatives had to say about that one at the time. Unlike 1982, the 1991 recession started here in Canada. This is a recession we created ourselves here in this country, or at least most of it, because the world-wide recession occurred several months later.

The Tory government opposite was trying to slow down our overheated economy with its economic policies, but it did this so drastically that the economy went into reverse, and now the engine is stalled, and we still haven't found a way to get it started again.

Today, in one of his questions in the House of Commons, the hon. member for Dartmouth mentioned the bankruptcy rate in Canada. I think he told us there had been about 62,000 personal bankruptcies in this country. I know this is a concern not only for my colleague from Dartmouth and every Liberal member in this House, but also for all Canadians who are going through these rough times.

One of the regions in this country worst hit by the recession, Mr. Speaker, is my own province of Ontario, where we have two main problems. First, the Tory government opposite and, of course, the provincial NDP government. What a nightmare it is, Mr. Speaker, to have such a government in Queen's Park. They are almost as bad as the people across the floor of this House, which is hard to beat. I must say, however, that Mr. Rae and his friends are on their way there, very close to succeeding as a matter of fact. This is something you understand, Mr. Speaker, I am sure.

The Premier of Ontario announced a few days ago that the province was in such dire straits that the socialist government of Ontario might have to cut social programs. Can you imagine such a thing, Mr. Speaker? At any rate, I will let Mr. Rae come to terms with his conscience over the next few days. Meanwhile, we could at least support its economy by granting Ontario its fair share of the Canada Assistance Plan, bearing in mind that the bill before us would limit to 5 per cent the increase in transfer payments to this province. That, of course, is a maximum.

In my riding, Mr. Speaker, the unemployment rate reaches 15 and 18 per cent. My colleague from Stormont—Dundas was telling me earlier that, in the Cornwall area, it would be closer to 18 per cent. That is terrible. The riding of my colleague from Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke is no better off, and the situation is as bad, if not worse, in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, as all hon. members must know by now, considering how many times I have raised this issue in this House.

Last night I had the opportunity to meet in Hawkesbury, with the Advisory Committee on Employment for Prescott County, and its members were telling me how bad unemployment was in their region. Considering that people have little hope of finding work in the near future, what is going to happen when their unemployment insurance benefits run out, now much faster than before thanks to Bill C-21 passed by the government opposite? These people will go on welfare, or "on the dole" as we commonly say in Hawkesbury. That is when the Canada Assistance Plan comes into play by providing the funds for welfare. Traditionally, counties or regional municipalities paid 20 per cent, the province 30 per cent and the federal government 50 per cent.

Now, with the cap on increases for the three provinces of Alberta, B.C. and Ontario, in my province of Ontario the provincial government will have to bear a larger share of the Canada Assistance Plan. What is going to happen, then? Other things are going to suffer. The provincial government might cut school funding. It will cut in various places and with the NPD in power at Queen's Park, we can expect anything in the months to come.

Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, Canadians will have to do with less and less. The number of individuals living below the poverty level will increase, and all that as a result of the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan.

[English]

I remember that day last year. I believe it was last August 15 when the government won before the courts the so–called right to impose these limitations on increases to the Canada Assistance Plan. Just because it won that right in the courts does not mean that the government is morally correct in what it is doing. I could think of other words to describe this government, but in the new spirit of co–operation I will not use them in this House. I will just think them.

Here is what a few others had to say. Lise Corbeil Vincent of the National Anti Poverty Organization said of that day last summer that it was a very black day for the poor. She said further: "The poor will become more and more defenseless than ever as the already meagre level of government supports are cut further".

Viola Robinson of the Native Council of Canada added: "Many native Canadians already living in Third World conditions will only suffer more as cost cutting continues to be more important than human lives". That expresses what is going on and what this government is up to.

There is still time. The Conservative backbenchers across the way could use this new year and be more objective and less partisan than they have been in the past. They could look at this objectively and say no to this bill: "We will not put up with the Minister of Finance's nonsense".

We will not stand for this. We want the poor in Canada to have a decent living. We want those poor people who are living in the three provinces affected not to have further cutbacks imposed upon them.

That is what the government could do now. We are all holding our breath for the day when the vote will come, several days hence, because many of my colleagues have important remarks to make about this issue.

When the vote comes I hope that I can count on all Conservative members to repent, to change their minds and to vote with us in the opposition to defeat the bill in question rather than to support the Minister of Finance and his wrong ideas. They could represent their constituents, for a change, instead of representing the government.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House to oppose this legislation which is designed to place a cap on Canada Assistance Plan payments to the so–called have provinces.

Since 1984 when the current government took over, many of those have provinces have been operating on the margin. It is hard to characterize them as have provinces any more largely as a result of the policies of this government. This bill in conjunction with the other limitations imposed on transfer payments and other series of mean–spirited Tory policies have reduced many of those provinces to become unable to service the needs of those who require the services of the provincial treasury. I am thinking of students, the sick and the poor.

It is not unusual for Tory governments and for governments of this stripe to focus their attack on those who can least afford to share the burden: the poor, the sick, those who have very low incomes, and also those who are not responsible for the depression and for the economic circumstances that this country finds itself in.

We pointed out before in this House that the real fault and the real problem of the debt and the deficit do not lie with the poor, the people who are in receipt of the Canadian government programs. Statistics Canada has already told us, and perhaps it bears repeating in this House, who is responsible for the problems that Canada is experiencing with the imbalance between its revenues and its expenditures. It is not the poor. It is not the beneficiaries of social programs and government programs.

The real culprits who are responsible for creating the deficit have been demonstrated in the Statistics Canada report. That report showed that 44 per cent of Canada's deficit problems are due to tax concessions to the rich, the very rich and to profit-making corporations.

You can trace back through the years the increase in those tax concessions to those corporations with the growth of the deficit. That is where the problem lies.

Statistics Canada also said that 50 per cent of our debt problem and our deficit problem lies with the high interest rate policy that was followed by both the Liberal and the Tory governments over the last 10 or 15 years. That has created 50 per cent of our debt problem in this country.

Interest rates have now come down. Unfortunately, the people in Canada who are in the middle class—the workers in Canada—have been bled dry so they can not even afford to borrow money to kick-start the economy again. Fifty per cent of the problem of this country's debt and deficit are due to the high interest rate policies pursued by successive Liberal and Tory governments.

What percentage of the problem is attributable to social programs and to government programs? According to Statistics Canada it is 6 per cent.

I cannot understand why this government continues to look through the wrong end of the telescope and why it continues to attack those social programs and government programs rather than dealing with the real culprits who created the debt in the first place. These are the tax concessions that were granted to the rich and to large corporations and, of course, the high interest rate policy of the federal governments, Liberal and Conservative. That does not come from the NDP. It does not come from labour. It comes from Statistics Canada, the government's own statistics-gathering and analysing agency. That is where that information comes from. Why does the government not take a look at the advice provided by the people who were paid to give it advice and provide it with information and statistics?

I will tell you the reason. It is because this government is not driven by accurate information; it is driven by ideology. That is why it is looking through the wrong end of the telescope and that is why it is focusing its attack on social programs, transfer payments, things like health care, education and programs for the poor in this country. Dealing with those programs is not going to solve the problem of the deficit.

Look at what has happened in this period between 1982 and 1992. I watched a program called The Compton Report on one of the national networks coming out of the United States. It pointed out that between 1982, when the recession was in full force down in the United States, and 1992, when again it is in full force, the wealthiest 1 per cent of people in the United States doubled their income.

They were able to double their income through easy tax policies granted to them by the Reagan government and by the Bush government. The wealthiest 1 percent were able to double their income. For them, there was no recession. Recessions for us are boom times for the very wealthy. That is because of the programs that are brought in by Liberal and Tory governments, both in Canada and the United States.

We have to start looking through the other end of the telescope and identifying the real culprits. That is, we have to start taxing those who have never experienced a recession. We have to be getting the revenues back from them so we can start paying down the deficit.

I found an article in our Quorum magazine a few days ago which talks about the entertainment tax credit for business people in this country. It seems that one of my Liberal colleagues got in touch with the Revenue Canada people and he discovered such things that are given tax credits in this country are the pleasures of escort services, which are deductible as a legitimate business expense, the masseuses and lavish booze parties.

Companies can claim all of these things as entertainment expenses and deduct them from their income taxes. For those large companies, we are paying for escort services, we are paying for masseuses and we are paying for booze parties on their behalf.

It is quoted in this article that Phil Jolie of the tax department's audit branch has told The Sun that anything— escort services, a car, a trip to a hockey game, all of these kinds of things—can be deducted as entertainment expenses for business purposes. I am told that these kinds of entertainment expenses cost the people of Canada $1 billion a year in terms of tax credit.

Imagine, we are talking about allowing those kinds of services which amount to one-thirtieth of the total deficit in this country. We are told by the government when it makes an attack on these social programs that everybody has to sacrifice a little bit.

Why do we not make those business people sacrifice the odd escort service, the odd masseuse, the odd trip to the hockey game, paid for at government expense to the tune of $1 billion so that we can reduce our deficit by 30 per cent? That would be a beginning; that would demonstrate some sacrifice on the part of those people who, as I pointed out, have never experienced a recession along with the rest of us in this country.

Tory governments deal with depressions and recessions in precisely the wrong way, by going about a cost-cutting program, a restraint program. I think it is instructive if you look back in British Columbia during that period from 1983 to 1986 when the premier was Bill Bennett and his two most important advisers were Kim Campbell and Norman Spector.

That government at that time went through a process of cost-cutting that eliminated human rights legislation, that eliminated support for families, that eliminated all sorts of programs that were directed to improve the lives of ordinary people. Unfortunately, the government at that time said the reason it was doing this was to try to prevent the deficit from going up. In fact, those kinds of mean-spirited cost-cutting programs resulted in the deficit in British Columbia increasing and the debt of the province increasing rather than going the other way.

It is time we learned a little bit from history rather than having Tory and Liberal governments constantly copying history and making the same mistakes. I call on all members of this House to defeat this legislation and let us start attacking the real culprits who have created the deficit and the debt in this country in the first place.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be given the opportunity on behalf of constituents in my riding to speak for the allotted 10 minutes on Bill C-32.

This bill emanates from the February 26, 1991 federal budget which essentially limits the federal contributions to three particular provinces in terms of social assistance, federal-provincial shared social assistance programs, namely to British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

In terms of the financial consequences of this particular bill, it will mean that cumulatively over a five-year period those three provinces will suffer in the neighbourhood of some $2.135 billion in losses. In my province alone, estimated this year it will be close to $1 billion.

I would like to say just a few things in the permitted time. First, there seems to be a mind set in this government, in this capital, and Ontario being one of the three provinces, I will speak for my own province. There seems to be a prevailing attitude that somehow it is oblivious to the serious economic winds that are prevailing in the province of Ontario.

There is a feeling that somehow there is the belief that this province is somehow a fat cat province. I am not saying that it is clearly down and out or that it is even on its knees, but there seems to be an absence of reality that when we look at Ontario, or when we look at metropolitan Toronto, there is another tale to the economic realities.

I am just wondering whether anyone on that side of the House of Commons recognizes the record number of job losses, the record number of plant closures, the record number of people who are going from full-time work to part-time.

Does anyone recognize the record number of older workers who are being displaced and have nowhere to go? No one wants to invest or has less of an incentive to invest in a worker who may not be by any means old but 50 or 55 years old, who still has a mortgage to pay and an education for children to pay before retirement age, in terms of no adjustment programs for plants affected by the free trade.

What I am saying is that the economic picture of Ontario is not very healthy. At the same time we have a government that is very resistant to any kind of national stimulus. We had the announcement yesterday that the government has agreed to one of our proposals to go from a 10 per cent down payment when it is federally insured to a 5 per cent down payment. That is one aspect that is good, but it is only one aspect of many which should be implemented.

But the message basically is that government wants to stand back and hope that the market adjusts itself or that somehow it will be a consumer-led recovery.

When we and our colleagues are out in our ridings we know that it will not be a consumer-led recovery because people do not have the confidence nor the certainty to either invest or to spend that extra dollar. If they are doing anything, they are saving those dollars in their mattresses for a rainy day that is even worse than today. We cannot blame consumers, particularly given the strangulation of taxation at all levels that those consumers, those Canadians, are feeling right now.

Perhaps it is not going to be a consumer led recovery. Perhaps the Government of Canada does not wish to enter into stimulating the economy so that people can be put back to work, so that people can come off unemployment or welfare, so that revenues can increase. If we are not to have any economic blueprint, we on this side of the House are saying that the bare necessity, for goodness sake, is for the Government of Canada at least to maintain its commitment to funding social assistance programs that can assist those three provinces and the Canadians living in them.

If the government were to come through with a federal assistance package that would stimulate jobs, that would speak to some kind of adjustment programs for Canadians displaced by such things as the many plant closings in Ontario's backyard, if the government were to come through with some kind of retraining program for our young on one end of the spectrum and for our older workers on the other, perhaps some people in this House of Commons could begin to understand and rationalize why because of the national purse some of the moneys for social assistance can be moderated somewhat.

We are speaking of reducing federal transfer payments to the provinces to help Canadians with a number of social programs. At the same time the government is not willing to move on the economic front as its citizens, business and bank presidents are urging. You cannot have an attack on your social assistance programs while you are also standing pat and doing basically nothing in terms of federal economic stimulus.

I would prefer to have the stimulus and a reduced infrastructure for social assistance. Why? Because I find that there would be a greater dignity if Canadians were to go back to work, if Canadians would be offered jobs, if Ontario can once again begin to export its goods, if the displaced worker can be retrained for a job of tomorrow. I would rather prefer that initiative than having to argue on the floor of the House of Commons today for Ontario to get its federal dollars so that Canadians can be assisted through these dark times. I would rather argue for putting Canadians back to work.

We have argued month in and month out. We are having a First Ministers' Conference. We will be having a federal budget. I hope there will be some answers, practical answers, pragmatic answers, for putting Canadians and Canada back to work.

I am also saying that in the interim, before any real national initiatives, this purported national government has an obligation to its citizens, a contract with its citizens. A program was started in 1966 for a very good reason. The reason is that while you work you pay your dues in a variety of ways and deductions are put back into our social service infrastructure for a rainy day.

It is not only raining in Ontario and across the country, but it is pouring. Canadians in record numbers are becoming increasingly in need. All of us know that our riding offices—at least it is the case with mine in Ontario—are virtually being turned into unemployment offices. For the first time the middle class citizen is coming to our offices and we have to make calls to the food bank, the North York Harvest Food Bank, to provide at least a shopping basket for the weekend. These are not individuals who are irresponsible or feeding off the so-called trough. They are decent, hard-working Canadians who have never seen a day like they are seeing today. I am not saying this for dramatic purposes in the House of Commons; it happens in our offices week in and week out.

What is the message we can construe from that? The message I get is that they want this economy humming again and, if the government cannot or will not do that, then it should at least have a basic dignified commitment to a social infrastructure and a social net that will allow Canadians to land on their feet, to be prepared to survive and to be able to address the future with some degree of dignity and confidence.

It cannot take away the social programs and at the same time not stimulate the economy. That is not national leadership. It is an abdication of leadership of the worst kind.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to rise and speak on the debate of Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

The Canadian Assistance Plan is a program that was created back in 1966 to permit the federal government to enter into some cost-sharing agreements with provincial governments for the provision of social assistance and for social welfare services for Canadians in need.

What does this bill really mean? It reaffirms that this government has failed to learn that it has to consider, along with the country's economic and financial deficits, the tremendous social debt and deficits we also face. It cannot ignore one in favour of the other as this government has done. It cannot abandon its social targets and social policy goals in order to accommodate some sort of blind, narrow-minded view that the deficit should be our strait-jacket. This government has made the mistake of not forging a balanced approach.

Another interesting thing is that so far the government has allowed only 17 minutes of debate at third reading of the bill. None of my 46 colleagues from Ontario in the Conservative government has spoken in defence of this bill; nobody from Alberta and nobody from B.C. They would be up here defending this bill if they really believed in Bill C-32.

Deficit reduction alone is not going to answer many of the real needs of this country on job training, on education and on research and development. Deficit reduction is not a policy that improves the skills of one member of our work force, nor does deficit reduction feed people waiting in line at food banks. For these challenges we need other policies: strong social policies on things like child care and balance with economic policies. If we are to build a caring and compassionate Canada, we need those policies.

This government mistakenly believes we have the luxury in this country of waiting for the deficit to go down before we help the million and a half unemployed. We do not have that luxury.

This government mistakenly believes that if it sits idly by watching the deficit the line-ups at the food banks, as my colleague just mentioned, will disappear. They are not. They are growing longer.

This government mistakenly believes that blindly paying attention only to the deficit will somehow magically stop children from having to go to school hungry each morning. It will not.

What does this government say to the thousands of people thrown on to the unemployment line since free trade came in? "Sorry, we can't deliver the massive adjustment programs promised by the Prime Minister because we are watching the deficit". That answer is really not good enough. I say we simply do not have the luxury of playing which comes first, the deficit or the strengthening of the social safety net, a tradeoff this government is making every day.

While this government is focused blindly on just the financial deficit facing this country, what about the social deficit we face? One and a half million are unemployed. Thousands of more lay-offs are being announced every week from CP Rail to Air Canada, and today 1,700 at Exxon. Manufacturing plants are being shut down all across the country, moving to the U.S., and now the prospect of more moving to Mexico also looms.

I simply say again deficit reduction is not a social policy. Deficit reduction has obviously failed at making Canada a more just society. Just recently Statistics Canada realized and confirmed that despite world-wide prosperity while this government has been in office, the economic and financial well-being of middle-income Canadian families increased less than 1 per cent. Is that what the Prime Minister meant by imposing prosperity on every region of the country?

The government's narrow-minded focus on the deficit can disappear on notice it seems. Two days after this bill which cut social benefits for the neediest of Canadians was first introduced, the government found $236 million for a science project in B.C. on the eve of an election. In the same week it announced it would move 200 Public Service jobs to Saskatchewan, again on the eve of an election.

For those Canadians who will suffer as a result of Bill C–32, this government's encouragement to belt–tightening while it locates hundreds of millions of dollars for chosen projects is really hard to believe.

Canadians are still a compassionate people. Their commitment to a caring, compassionate society remains. Their belief in equality of opportunity remains. Only their government has abandoned these traditions in the name of a narrow–minded short–sighted preoccupation with a deficit at the expense of a more balanced social economic and financial agenda.

The government uses the rhetoric of equality to mask an agenda that widens the gap between rich and poor through archaic tax changes and the slow elimination of programs. This is unacceptable.

In the end, what is Bill C–32? It is one more instalment on the Tory agenda which Canadians have been living with for seven years. It is an agenda which has as its main focus a sort of blind narrow–minded preoccupation with the financial debt and deficit, ignoring the social debt and also the deficit. It is one where market forces alone are supposed to carry the day and where survival of the fittest replaces the goal of a caring compassionate Canada and a more just society.

The result has been an era in Canada when tremendous social and infrastructure needs have been ignored. Quite simply, the issue we face today is one of restoring the sense of balance between economic and social goals on the national agenda. We cannot ignore the financial debts and deficits we face as a country, but neither can we focus on them exclusively and ignore the tremendous social debt and deficits we also will face as a country.

The message is that we in Canada have always had a balanced agenda focused on the long–term and in the national interest. We still need an agenda in this country which maintains the social contract by pursuing social policy goals along with economic policy goals.

In the end I hope Canadians will agree that deficit reduction is but one challenge we face and it is one goal among many.

A fair and equitable social policy agenda at the same time will keep our children fed, housed, and healthy. That will boost families, make our cities more liveable, and our hospitals and schools better able to provide services. A more balanced agenda will help prepare our work force for tomorrow and will do these things in balance with economic objectives.

In the end I believe Canadians will agree that deficit reduction fails miserably as constructive social policy or as a social policy of any kind.

I also think that Canadians agree that you cannot substitute deficit reduction for policies that actually help people. People are suffering from unemployment after seven years under this government. There were hundreds more in Montreal in recent weeks lining up at food banks. There are those needing clothing for their families, and those who must send their children to school hungry in the morning.

Are these the images of Canada that most Canadians think about each day? I dare say it is not, but it is another side of the reality being faced in this country every single day.

In the end I fear this government will never learn that you cannot pursue deficit reduction alone at the expense of all other policies: policies for the family, for the worker who needs retraining, for the single mother who would like to work but also needs child care. This government mistakenly believes you can, as a country, throw out your social policy goals whether it be on child care, services to the poor, or adjustment programs needed because of free trade. You simply cannot do this and be left at the end of the day with the kind of Canada we have been trying to build for more than a century.

The Canadian people look to their national government to reflect their concerns and respond to their needs. That is why they were elected. Unfortunately Bill C–32 not only fails to reflect the true needs of Canada, it also reaffirms this government's failure at balancing deficit concerns, our economic and financial debt and deficit with social concerns.

This government would do well to consider a more civilized approach, one that takes account of deficit concerns but also accepts its social responsibilities. I would recommend that the government take its ideological blinders off, withdraw Bill C–32 and go back to the drawing board so that Canadians might again be able to look to their national government as a true reflection of values that we all share as a people. We need a more equitable society where economic as well as social concerns are part of the national agenda.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Assistance Plan was the legal implementation of an agreement reached between the provinces on one hand and the federal government on the other. It was an agreement that recognized something that one of the early leaders of our party, Mr. M. J. Coldwell wrote about in a little pamphlet called Am I my Brother's Keeper?. Over the decades, Canada has been one of the leaders among world nations in saying that we are indeed our brother's keeper. We have been in the forefront in bringing in new legislation and programs to try to help those less fortunate than ourselves.

Members of Parliament should be very much aware of that history and record and very anxious to maintain our reputation among world nations, quite apart but in addition to wanting to help those among us who are not able to help themselves.

We all know some of these people. In every one of our ridings there are individuals who need some help from the rest of us. We cannot do it individually, so we do it collectively and through our governments.

The legislation before us now, Bill C–32, limits the amount the federal government will increase payments to certain provinces to 5 per cent. Where did that figure come from? Why 5 per cent? Why not 4 per cent? Why not 6 per cent? Why not 40 or 60 per cent? It is simply because the Minister of Finance of the day was trying to balance his budget. What about the budget of the people who are in receipt of social assistance?

This plan was the federal government's recognition and acceptance, public confession if you like, that it has some responsibility for people being on welfare in the first place. Certainly there are some who will always be there. Unfortunately, in times like this when there are a lot of people receiving social assistance, history seems to show that the longer they are on social assistance the longer they will remain there. When it goes from one generation to another, it is likely to go for further generations unless something is done to break that cycle. The way to break it is not by cutting back.

The provinces mentioned in this legislation, British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, had booming economies at one time. Whose fault is it that the economy is not booming today? We all remember the Conference Board of Canada saying that for the first time in the history of Canada we are experiencing a made in Canada recession. It is a recession that was made by this government to further its own monetary policies, regardless of the cost to individuals, provinces, corporations in those provinces, and workers in those industries.

The government was determined, as part of its plan, to keep the value of the Canadian dollar up, and keep interest rates up in the hope that it could control inflation.

The people bothered by inflation were not the people on the lowest rung. They were barely getting by and inflation generally hit goods that were not of most interest to them.

These people are hurting more now and they are also hurting in what used to be called the have provinces. As someone said earlier, when those provinces were booming there was an inclination for people to travel to B.C., Alberta and Ontario because those were the best places to look for jobs. It did not always work.

I recall being in Newfoundland and hearing the story about the chap who went to Toronto because he heard there was work there. He stayed there for 15 months and then returned home. He never found a job. His statement to his fellows was: "I guess I must have been there in the wrong season".

It was not always easy to find work in those provinces, but certainly for a time they were the best places to go if you were looking for a job. People did flock to all three provinces and the population increased there. When the government tightened the screws and managed to create a made–in–Canada recession, there were far more people there going on social welfare than had ever been the case. The higher population loaded a greater share of the cost of looking after our brothers on those provinces.

The federal government created this mess by manufacturing this made-in-Canada recession. It is not fair for the government to wash its hands of the problem and say those provinces can afford to look after these people within their borders. At one time they might have been able to pay for the social programs, but they cannot now. It is not fair to those provinces, but more than that, it is not fair to the individuals involved. The governments within those provinces in particular are the ones that are hurting. The word is spreading across the country, of course. One wonders where the federal government is going to go next in this matter of cutting back on social assistance.

The governments in those provinces are having to keep down the rates of welfare paid to people on social assistance. They are cutting back on social assistance programs generally, which makes it even more difficult for them to survive. It is not only hurting their chances today, but spoiling their chances of improving their position at any time in the future, even when the economy does turn around.

The government is concerned about the cost of these programs. What about the cost of what we are doing to these individuals? What are we doing to our country when we increase the number of people depending upon social assistance who may never get out of that net again? That is hurting us. Can we afford not to look after those people properly? I suggest not.

Some of my colleagues have mentioned different ways the cost could be met. It is a relatively small amount. It is a lot of dollars in total but it is a relatively small amount that the federal government is saving by holding back on the money that is going to these provinces.

There are ways in which the government has let up in other areas. The government has let up, for example, in the way of taxing capital gains. The government has cut back on the rate of income tax being paid by the highest income earners. Of all people, they are getting the break. The government has given more tax breaks to people in the highest incomes by increasing the amount of money that they can put into RRSPs. They can pay tax on it some day in the future with the possibility that the government will give them further relief somewhere down the road.

It seems to me the government is making it easier for the people in the highest income brackets, while pleading poverty when it comes to helping those most in need.

We are our brother's keeper. The government has created this recession and has a responsibility to do something to make it easier for the people in the lowest levels of our society. Government created this mess and has a responsibility to do something positive. Cutting back, as we are, to those who most need help is not the way to go. It is setting a poor example in our whole community. It is building up problems for the future, not just for the individuals and the families of those concerned, not just for the children who far outnumber any other single group in the total social assistance group, but for us as well. When they suffer, can we really go around and pretend that all is well with us?

Canada has had a good reputation. More importantly, we have looked after those who need help most to some level. We could do better and we should do better. Any money that is given to people to help them survive is spent within Canada. It is not spent on holidays abroad. It is not spent on purchases of expensive imported goods.

• (1600)

The money turns over and over within our own country. We can finance it, we can do it, we must do it, we owe it to ourselves to make sure that we look after those in our own community who cannot look after themselves. We are our brother's keeper.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the question one must ask itself today is why did the federal government wait until 1991 to control the growth of transfer payments to the richest provinces?

As early as 1987, Ontario was experiencing a full employment situation and was beginning to generate an increasingly stronger inflation which led to the recession that we now have. Following a long study on the nature of unemployment in Canada, the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre said: "The main conclusion of our study is that, except for Ontario, the unemployment rate in 1987 is well above that which could explain a mismatching of vacancies and individual unemployed workers. In other words, there are still enormous possibilities for growth outside Ontario, to reduce unemployment through economic expansion".

What did the federal government do in 1987? The federal government capped equalization payments for the poorer provinces. It must be mentioned that since the Conservative Party was elected, transfer payments from the federal government have increased by 8 per cent in Ontario and by 3.5 per cent in Quebec. At a time when Ontario still had full employment, the federal government was still supporting the economy of that province by adding hundreds of millions in transfer payments while it had decided, as early as 1987, to cap the equalization payments to provinces that could still create jobs and that needed those jobs. Since Ontario enjoyed full employment, it was obvious that to promote economic expansion in that province would necessarily fuel inflation. That inflation would have to be controlled some day and, of course, it was controlled in an excessive way.

Today, a province that was prosperous before, namely Ontario, finds itself in a relatively catastrophic situation from a budgetary point of view. For this year only, the federal government just cut $3 billion in transfers, when we are in a recession and when the unemployment rate stands at 10 per cent. How can you explain that this government did not take appropriate action as early as 1987? If it had, the inflation rate would have been much lower in Ontario and we could have implemented an expansion policy elsewhere, as well as create the necessary jobs. Whether in the maritimes or in Quebec, there were still great possibilities for expansion because the unemployment rate was high.

Rather, the government immediately reduced the transfer payments to the poorer provinces and then waited, probably because Mr. Peterson was a friend, until the situation got out of control. Why do this in 1991 when, on the contrary, we should promote economic recovery? Mr. Speaker, the reason is simple: The federal government has no room to manoeuvre. The federal government is no longer able to stimulate the economy and to dissipate this gloom among consumers. The only option left now for the federal government is the one it is implementing, that is to discourage even more those who have lost their jobs and to make the budgets of the provinces unbearable. In the next few weeks, we will have a chance to see the federal budget. We can indeed expect the deficit to be contained now. Why will the federal deficit be contained? For a very simple reason: Because with legislation like this and previous decisions to limit equalization payments and payments to the provinces for health services, the federal government has transferred its deficit to the provinces.

From now on, the federal deficit can be controlled, but people will not feel any better about it. The provinces will have to pick up the slack. They will have to overtax and do what they have started to do, pass the buck to the municipalities, which will also have to raise their taxes.

In his New Year's message, the Prime Minister told us that Canadians are taxed enough. So of course the federal government won't impose any new taxes. Of course the federal government has done everything to ensure that the provinces and municipalities will have to tax in future.

People who live in Montreal or any community in Quebec will soon receive their municipal tax bills. Wait till they see the percentage increase. The Government of Quebec, of course, will pass this bill on to the municipalities because it has been burned by the federal government's refusal to maintain the tax agreements it had made.

Today a parliamentary committee on financing health services began in Quebec City. A shortfall of $200 million to $400 million is expected next year if health services are to be funded at their present level.

The federal government's cuts in transfer payments alone amount to $1 billion. Of course, spending must be limited across the board. The deficits must be limited. When the federal government passes this deficit on to the provinces, it does not solve the problem for the public. People have to live somewhere. Quebecers will have to pay more to Quebec or to their municipal government. That does not solve the problems, Mr. Speaker.

The federal government's drastic measures take much more from the provinces than from itself. Transfers to the provinces make up 22 per cent of the federal budget, but cuts to the provinces account for 33 per cent of the federal spending reductions.

Give Quebecers the choice now: Do you want to cut health services or the military budget? That's not hard, the answer is obvious. However, we do not have that choice. We do not have the choice because the federal government has decided to cut health care in an underhanded way, despite the fiscal agreements with the provinces. On the contrary, the minister of health goes around saying, "We want to maintain national standards." He is sure that everyone must have services, but they do not pay anymore—the provinces do.

For us in Quebec, there is a simple solution for that: We want our own military budget. We want to be a real sovereign country that controls its total budget and can administer all its taxes and the people will be able to decide on a clear vision. Do you want to cut defence? Do you want to cut health care? Do you want to cut international travel? At present, it is a total mess with shared jurisdiction. You can announce generous intentions, as Ottawa does, fine health care standards that others pay for.

The Prime Minister, who adoringly follows President Bush, should at least take a passage from his latest speech. Mr. Bush asked Congress to stop giving member states of the American federation any mandate without the money to carry it out.

We have the opposite situation in Canada. National standards are to be raised. The federal government wants to increase its power with a little politicking, to give itself a good image; it will impose very high standards for health care, but the provinces will have to pay, the municipalities will have to pay.

You cannot make rational decisions or pass responsibility on to the citizens if one government can impose standards and another government has to pay.

Of course, we agree that in the present Canadian context, as long as we are in it, it is unacceptable for federal transfers to the richest provinces to continue to grow as rapidly as in the past—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I must tell the hon. member that his time has now expired. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Stormont—Dundas.

[English]

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to join in the debate today on Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

When the CAP was first introduced in 1966 by the Liberal government of the day, it facilitated a cost-sharing arrangement between the federal, provincial and territorial governments in order to provide welfare and other forms of social assistance for Canadians in need.

The plan enables the federal government to provide financial support for the provisions of social assistance and institutional care for Canadians across the country, as well as the provision of welfare services designed to lessen, remove or prevent the causes and effects of poverty, child neglect and dependency on public assistance.

By helping the provinces assist the needy, Canada Assistance Plan ensures a social safety net for those who need it. That makes CAP a cornerstone of Canada's social security system.

[English]

The Canada Assistance Plan helps many Canadians. In times of poor economic conditions and especially during the current recession, demands placed upon provincial and municipal governments to deliver social programs and services are increasing steadily. However, instead of stepping in to provide additional help, the federal government in its 1990 budget froze for two years any increase in federal Canada Assistance Plan contributions to provinces which do not receive any equalization payments. The provinces affected by this decision are Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

In its 1991 budget, the federal government indicated it will extend its cap on the Canada Assistance Plan for another three years. It is this extension which Bill C-32 seeks to implement.

Canadians must surely be wondering just what kind of federal government we do have. At such a serious time in our country's economic history, the government has decided to further restrict federal social welfare assistance. Part of the government's rationale for capping CAP is that the three provinces concerned are considered to be the richest in Canada. It is truly amazing that the government is ignoring the fact that approximately 50 per cent of Canada's poor families and 54 per cent of all welfare recipients reside in these provinces.

Another Conservative reason for the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan is that we have to cut federal spending and reduce the deficit. I want to make it very clear that we in the Liberal Party find such logic totally unacceptable. We cannot support the government's decision to transfer the burden of the federal debt squarely on the backs of Canada's poor.

I believe the government is abandoning its responsibilities to the poor and disadvantaged of Canadian society. The government has gone so far as to single out these people on the basis of where they reside in Canada. Accordingly, this government seems to believe that the poor in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia have an easier life than those in other parts of the country. Being poor or being in need of social assistance is still the same hardship, irrespective of where you live.

Canadians have witnessed this government's previous attack on unemployment insurance. It has withdrawn its UI contributions and established a system whereby employees and employers pay higher UI premiums and workers have to have more weeks of work in order to achieve less UI benefits.

Canadians have also witnessed this government's reductions to Canada's health care system and post–secondary education. Now Canadians are witnessing the government once again turning its back on the needy.

There is nothing on the horizon to suggest that anything this government will put forward will be a positive step to address the social and economic problems that are besetting the country.

Once again, it will be Canada's poorest, most dependent citizens who will suffer the most from the government's extension of the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan.

According to the government's own figures, over the five years of the 5 per cent ceiling on the CAP, the three affected provinces will lose over $2.1 billion in federal transfers. It is difficult to determine how this revenue loss will be replaced by the provincial and municipal governments in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. Certainly social services and welfare programs will be adversely affected. As a matter of fact, some will be eliminated altogether.

In my riding of Stormont—Dundas, the child abuse centre in Cornwall was forced to close in September of last year, due in part to the inability of the provincial government to adequately fund it. A heavy demand is being placed on the city of Cornwall's welfare and social service agencies. At the present time, there are 2,027 individual welfare cases in the city. These cases directly affect a total of 3,537 people as of January 31. Unemployment in Cornwall is nearly at the 20 per cent level and this has had a severe impact on the welfare rolls.

In addition, I recently received a letter from Reverend Allen Tysick who is the director of the Matilda Resource Centre in Dundas county. Reverend Tysick's centre is one of the few operations in this rural section of my riding which offers assistance to the needy. In his letter, the Reverend writes that the ruling government, having the complete power to overturn longstanding social policies, traditions and Canadian culture at will, erodes the very social fabric of Confederation.

He goes on to say: "I ask you on behalf of the poor in your riding to yell at the top of your lungs that the direction of the federal government in relation to the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan is unjust and totally unacceptable".

In conclusion, the objectives of Bill C–32 proves once again that this government has lost touch with the people of Canada. With this bill, the government has indicated to Canadians and especially to the poor just how far it is prepared to go in order to achieve its objectives.

The people of Canada will not forget this callous and totally unacceptable attack on the social welfare services in three of Canada's provinces.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in the debate on this Draconian measure, I have several points to make about the serious implications of this bill in my own riding of Kingston and the Islands where the government's disastrous economic policies have caused recent economic turmoil.

The figures I have and would like to present to the House concerning the economic situation in Kingston are mirrored across the province of Ontario and are obviously ones that cry out for assistance instead of the kind of bill that we are being asked to pass today.

From the Labour Market Information Report published by the Canada Employment Centre in Kingston, I would like to quote some figures about welfare caseloads in the city itself. It is estimated that in Kingston one of every 25 people is collecting welfare benefits. This does not include those receiving family benefits or unemployment insurance. In 1989, Kingston's welfare payments totalled $5.2 million. In 1990, the figure was $8.6 million and in 1991, it will be approximately $14 million by the end of December.

It is predicted that this upward trend will continue with an estimated further 60 per cent growth in caseloads over the next year. This could bring welfare payments over the $26 million mark by the end of 1992, compared to only $5.2 million in 1989. The welfare caseload in this area is up about 140 per cent compared to last year, with the provincial average being slightly higher.

In the light of conditions like that, the fact that the federal Parliament is being asked to pass a bill to cap the transfer payments to provinces which are experiencing this massive growth in welfare costs is absolutely amazing. What is more astounding is that this Parliament has already been asked to pass another bill by this government which helped create this situation. That was Bill C–21 which the government says is such a wonderful thing.

Part of the reason for the increase in welfare caseloads is because so many people are no longer able to collect unemployment insurance because of the shortened periods in payments and the longer qualification periods.

If you look at the welfare caseloads in Kingston, you will see that already they are far higher than they ever were during that much talked about recession of 1981–82 of which the Minister of Finance is so keen to remind Canadians. He talks about it as though it was a great disaster. We know that the current recession is worse.

In a community where the official unemployment rate is at 10.2 per cent as of December of this year, as I have already indicated, the welfare rolls are at their highest in the last decade, one would think that the government would take some action to alleviate the situation instead of causing deeper distress, but it does not. Let us look at the record of the provincial government because that is how we see how the other party that sits in this House would act when it is confronted with a similar situation.

Day after day the New Democratic Party members rise to condemn the government, as we have, for bringing in this kind of measure. They, like us, opposed Bill C–21 and said it was wrong and very bad. But the moment their colleagues get into office in Toronto they start acting exactly the same way. It is a most unbelievable thing.

We know that the premier of Ontario received his tutelage in socialism here in this House. He was a member of this House and I presume talked to his colleagues in caucus from time to time and learned something about the tenets of the party's approach. Yet they took office in Ontario and we hear these criticisms today of this freeze on transfers to the province of Ontario for welfare. In Toronto we see the government apply a 1 per cent increase to the municipalities. The municipalities pick up a large part of the cost of welfare in Ontario, in case the members who are here from British Columbia and Saskatchewan do not know that, and the fact is that those payments are now at 1 per cent from the provincial government in Toronto.

The province of Ontario recently published a statement "Ontario Fiscal Outlook". The premier went on television and I quote him. He said: "Today we told municipalities, hospitals, colleges, school boards and universities that they are being held to the lowest increase ever". Those were his words: "the lowest ever". Yet they were given by the NDP premier of Ontario.

An hon. member: It is because of the Liberal deficit.

Mr. Milliken: There we have the help. The hon. member for wherever it is says it is because of the Liberal deficit. Does that not just sound like the people across the way? Every day the Minister of Finance stands up in answer to questions and says: "The reason we are in this trouble is because of the Liberal deficit. Seven or eight years ago when we took office we could have solved it. We did not and it is because of the Liberal deficit".

When Bob Rae took over, Ontario was doing just fine, thank you very much. The deficit was very small. It was grossly inflated by the premier of Ontario by adding in a whole bunch of charges he felt he should stick in, in one year to make it look bigger. It was effectively a balanced budget that he was left with when he took office.

An hon. member: Shame on you.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says shame on me. I have some figures here that back up every statement I am making.

Ontario's revenues throughout the Liberal years, and I do not like to be too partisan in this, grew by 12, 8, 14 and 11 per cent, enormous increases because the province was booming. In 1990 it grew by 4.2 per cent. In 1991, the first full socialist year in Ontario, it declined by 1.5 per cent. Tory times are hard times. NDP times are worse.

I want to go back to the figures I have to deal with here. A 1 per cent increase has been given to the municipalities by the NDP government in Ontario and they are blaming the Liberal deficit. The Conservatives here blame the Liberal deficit for a freeze. They are saying the reason they have to go through this freeze on the transfers to provinces is because of the Liberal deficit. They have been in office seven years. The NDP has been in for a year and a half in Ontario. They have had lots of time to solve the problems. The difficulty is they are not taking any steps to do so. I have additional evidence.

I want to quote from an outstanding socialist thinker, Mel Watkins, a University of Toronto economics professor and NDP activist. He must have received a lot of support from the hon. member who was heckling me a moment ago.

In The Globe and Mail on Saturday, January 25, he had this to say. He said in an interview, and I quote: "Austerity policies should be avoided like the plague. I do not know what the point is of having a social democratic government if it does the same thing that any other government would do". Well, he made a mistake. It is not the same as any other government would do, it is the same as a Tory government would do. That is what it is.

What we see here is the Tories doing exactly the same thing as the NDP does and the NDP doing exactly the same thing as the Tories do. There is no difference between these two parties. Why vote for one instead of the other? As soon as they get into office they do the same thing.

They talk a great line when they are in opposition. The Tories spoke the same line in opposition that the NDP members are speaking today, but when they get into office in Ontario, we see that they behave in exactly the same way. It is a shocking thing that the Canadian people are hoodwinked by these parties when they are in opposition.

The Liberal Party is one of generosity and spirit. Sure, other members complain about the deficit and they all complain that they have to fix it after we leave office, on very phony grounds in the case of the province of Ontario, but the fact is that we display a generosity of spirit that makes this country grow as the growth in the figures in the Ontario revenue prove. They grew enormously throughout the period of Liberal administration and I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that has been the practice in Canada generally.

We do not have problems today that are different from the past, but what we do have is a meanness of spirit displayed by the freeze in this bill, this cap on CAP. It is displayed in the 1 per cent freeze, 2 per cent next year and 2 per cent the year after that has been imposed by the New Democratic Party government in Ontario. When you look at those combinations of self-interest, the effort to protect the one group each represents instead of trying to do something generous for the whole population, you really see the difference between the Liberal Party and the way it operates in government, and the Tory and NDP members who act exactly the same.

Protect the group that you feel you owe your protection to and then forget everybody else, cut them all to the bone. Cut the poor to the bone, help your business friends. Cut the poor to the bone, and help your union friends. That is what the New Democratic Party is trying to do in Ontario. That is what the Tory government is trying to do in Ottawa. Mr. Speaker, we need a Liberal government in the worst way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before recognizing the hon. member for Kamloops, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Halifax—Goods and Services Tax; the hon. member for Calgary Northeast—Croatia; the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond—Unemployment Insurance; the hon. member for Don Valley East—The Constitution; the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie—Hibernia.

The hon. member for Kamloops now has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in today's debate on Bill C-32 which is called a cap on CAP.

It is important that we understand just what is occurring here, particularly those folks who are watching on television and listening to the debate today. We are dealing with a very cruel piece of legislation, a piece of legislation that is, if you like, attacking the victims of the recession. We do not have to elaborate. Everyone in the country is aware of the tremendous economic downturn that we have experienced for the last number of years, the deep recession that we are struggling through these days and in some parts of the country, it is very, very close to depression-like conditions.

There appears to be a sense of hopelessness across the country because the government does not seem to be doing anything about getting us out of this recession. It has announced, of course, that it simply plans to stay the course and do essentially what it has been doing. People across the country are saying that it is not enough, that it is certainly not adequate and we have to change course.

On top of all of that—I want to elaborate here on what is a very pessimistic and gloomy history—the government now plans to introduce legislation to make things even worse, particularly for those people who are suffering the most. I am thinking of those families and individuals who are now dependent upon various social service programs, dependent on welfare. The government is now saying that it is not going to contribute as it has in the past to these programs. It is going to offload its responsibility on to the backs of the provinces and on to the backs of municipal taxpayers.

Over the years, the Canada Assistance Plan has been a shared program, a 50/50 program where 50 per cent of the cost of social programs came from the federal government and 50 per cent came from the provincial governments and so there was, in the Canadian spirit, a sharing of responsibility to provide for those folks very seriously in need.

The government a few years ago decided to get out of the sharing business and say: "We are not going to continue 50/50 cost sharing. We are going to reduce our share of the financial cost". It introduced Bill C-69 which capped the payments from the federal government at 5 per cent each year. If the costs went up 20 per cent or 30 per cent, the government said: "Tough beans, the provincial governments have to pick up the tab".

This 5 per cent cap, which applied to British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, now through this particular bill, Bill C-32 which we are debating today, extends this principle until 1995. The costs of welfare are escalating in Ontario, Alberta, British Columbia and throughout the country generally, and the government says: "We are not going to in those provinces contribute as we traditionally have".

British Columbia as a result is having to accept hundreds of millions of extra dollars in costs because of the provincial government reneging on its traditional commitment. Let us face it, the number of people dependent on social services is increasing by the day as a result of the free trade agreement and the goods and services tax and other federal government programs. The newspaper today said that in this year alone this particular bill is going to add to the provincial taxpayers in Ontario $900 million in additional costs. That is almost $1 billion in this one year alone.

In the province of British Columbia, it will result in hundreds of millions of dollars over the next handful of years that traditionally would have been borne by the federal government. Now the government is saying: "British Columbia taxpayers, you have to pay twice. You have to pay now through the normal tax dollars but also special additional funds coming from provincial taxes".

The British Columbia government thought that this was actually not even constitutional and that the federal government did not have the right to break this 50/50 cost sharing. As a matter of fact, the British Columbia Court of Appeal ruled recently that the federal government did not have the authority to unilaterally alter the Canada Assistance Program agreement.

That is what the court in British Columbia said: the Government of Canada did not have the right to unilaterally break this ongoing tradition, this ongoing agreement of 50/50 spending. This is very serious because the government obviously is continuing. This has gone to further courts, but I will save that for another time.

The point is the following. This Canadian spirit of sharing in the cost of helping those in desperate need in many cases now has been abrogated by the federal government. It is getting out of the business of caring and sharing.

Let us also recognize, and I appeal to my Conservative friends opposite, that the greatest victims of this particular legislation will be the children of Canada. Today, unfortunately, 1 million children in this country are living in poverty. As a result of this legislation, their lives are going to be made even tougher and will result in more children living in a state of poverty in our country. I think that members should be aware of this. I only assume that my Conservative friends opposite have not read this legislation because I cannot imagine anyone supporting legislation that would impose more suffering, more cruelty, on those children already living in poverty in this country. This is exactly what Bill C-32 does.

We have had a number of witnesses who appeared before the committee examining this legislation. We have the long list of their testimony, pages and pages. Every single witness, every single group, every single individual who is expert in the area of social assistance said to the Government of Canada: "Do not proceed with this legislation because it is so cruel and it will punish those people who are the victims of these difficult economic times".

When every single witness says that, when every single witness had the same piece of advice for the government, to simply ignore that is the height of irresponsibility. No wonder the people across Canada feel that this government does not care any more. No wonder 88 per cent of Canadians said that they do not care for this government, that they have lost faith in this government. The government simply ignores every single witness who appeared before the committee on this piece of legislation.

I was originally going to go through and simply read out some of the critical points that all of the witnesses made about this legislation, but obviously time does not permit and I think most members will have read this anyway. Particularly, I would encourage the members of the government to make sure they read these points because, for example, it points out that child care is under attack as a result of this legislation. For poor families desperately relying on child care this is going to make child care an even more serious issue because it is going to reduce funds available.

In closing, I want to simply say that a lot of people have suggested that we have got to cut back in social services because they are the areas that have added to our debt or have been causing our debt. I want to simply draw to the House's attention a new Statistics Canada study which shows that the large increase in the federal debt over the past 15 years was not caused—I emphasize not caused—by increases in program spending, as the government has repeatedly alleged. Instead, most of the increase was caused by corporate tax breaks and high interest rates. They are the culprits and we should be, if you like, closing off some of the major corporate tax loopholes so that we do not continue seeing tens of thousands of profitable corporations, in some years even including the banks of Canada, not paying their fair share of income taxes.

As Statistics Canada tells us, it is not the social programs that have caused our debt, it is the corporate tax breaks and the incredible high interest rates which have caused the high interest payments on our debt.

Let us at this last moment, this eleventh hour, acknowledge the fact that this legislation before us is painfully cruel legislation, and that it will hit the victims of the recession, those who have suffered most, even more. If for no other reason, let us be compassionate in this eleventh hour and vote against this legislation when the opportunity comes to ease some of the pain and suffering that Canadians are experiencing from coast to coast to coast.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the issue before the House is another example of this government's endless cuts to the social safety net in Canada. In the 1989 budget the government announced that it would be limiting the growth of spending under the Canada Assistance Plan. In that budget the government said that it would not provide increases above 5 per cent for the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario. In the last budget it extended it to a five-year period for the cutbacks.

The Canada Assistance Plan is a program which was set up under Lester Pearson in 1966 and was part of the Liberal Party's commitment to the well-being of Canadians in need. The program provided money to all provinces on a 50/50 cost-shared basis to cover general welfare programs in the provinces. This was a bold move designed to strengthen the social safety net in Canada. The program came out about the same time as our first national medicare plan, another important advancement for Canadians.

Since this government came to power in 1984, it has systematically attacked Canadian social programs. In its first budget this government tried to deindex seniors' pensions. A lot of thanks and praise must go to Canadian senior citizens. They stood up against the Minister of Finance and stood up against the Prime Minister and were able to convince the government to withdraw that legislation.

In 1986 the government started to change the funding for post-secondary education and medicare under the Established Programs Financing agreement. By the end of this decade the government will have saved about $100 billion through its changes to Established Programs Financing. In 1989 the government instituted the claw-back on old age pensions and family allowances, taking them back if your income was too high. This government did this without providing inflation protection to those affected.

Last year the government started its attack on the Canada Assistance Plan.

All of us here remember the Prime Minister's famous comment about how our social programs were a sacred trust. We all know now what the Prime Minister means by a sacred trust, unfortunately. Now the government would have us believe that the provinces affected by this cut can well afford to pick up the slack, but I do not think that is the case.

The country is still in the grips of a recession which this government has created. Provincial government deficits are up across the land and the governments can ill afford the extra borrowing required to make the difference. From what I understand, welfare cases are up over 50 per cent in Toronto over last year.

A strong argument can be made that the federal government is directly responsible for those large increases in the welfare rolls.

Last year, the government forced through its changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act with Bill C-21. The bill reduced the unemployment insurance that people could collect, and after the unemployment insurance ran out they had no other alternative but to resort to the welfare rolls.

The members opposite would normally suggest to the people on welfare that they go out and get a job. Where do they go and get a job? Through the combined affects of the free trade deal, the government's high dollar and high interest policies, businesses are forced to leave Canada for the United States where the cost of doing business is lower.

Some people would suggest that I, as a member of Parliament from Prince Edward Island, have nothing to worry about. My constituents are not affected. That might be true right now, but what will happen next year?

We know that the government promises are not worth the paper they are written on. We know that next year it will possibly put the cap on CAP on three or four more provinces. In the next year, hopefully to God it will not be here.

The Canada Assistance Plan was a federal-provincial agreement, a contract signed between Ottawa and the provinces. According to the agreement signed, the federal government could only amend or cancel the plan with the consent of the province involved. After the first attack on CAP last year, the Canadian Council on Social Development said: "These requirements are important because CAP was established through federal-provincial collaboration and trust. By acting unilaterally, the government has betrayed this trust".

If the federal government has broken its promises with three provinces, as I said before, then certainly nothing is stopping it from breaking its promises with the other seven provinces. Since the Conservatives came to office in 1984, there have been a litany of cuts to our social programs, programs that our people depend on.

I challenge the government to justify its cuts. The Prime Minister should consider the young student who has possibly worked all summer to gain enough money to pay the tuition and then finds out, when it is time to go to college, that because of the cap on CAP tuition is higher and he or she cannot afford to attend university. This is cutting off the poorer people.

The government should consider the senior citizen or anybody else in the country waiting for a hip replacement. They might be waiting for three or four months and suffering. Possibly a doctor goes in and explains that because there is a shortage of funds, they will have to wait for another one or two months. This is just not acceptable.

The government should explain to the fish plant worker who is getting three, four or five weeks less unemployment what she or he is supposed to do when the unemployment runs out. It should possibly explain to the woman on welfare in Toronto why her cheque does not go as far just because we could only afford 5 per cent.

These are the questions the government will have to answer if it is to justify CAP. This move by the government will endanger all Canadians, regardless of where they live.

As I stated earlier, the government has broken the spirit of trust and co-operation that existed between the federal government and the provinces. For the first time in the history of CAP, the government has acted unilaterally to change the contract.

While the court says that Ottawa is not legally bound to the agreement, it is morally obliged to keep its part of the bargain. This time when the country faces so much turmoil, I think it is very unfortunate the federal government would break a deal, break the trust with the provinces. Trust is something that we need between Ottawa and the provinces.

The country is going through tough times. The problem is the federal government puts it on the backs of the provincial governments and the provincial governments put it on the backs of the municipalities. In the end, it is the poor who suffer. For example, we have a large number of children in this country now who are in hospitals suffering from malnutrition. It is certainly not the wealthy. It is the poor children.

Possibly the mothers have to substitute the proper formula for something they can afford to buy. I certainly believe that most people in this country would find that totally unacceptable. Also, as I stated before, these are the children who cannot get to university. In fact, these are the people who will end up waiting and waiting in line to get medical treatment.

This is just not acceptable and I would ask the government members to please find a place in their hearts to look at this cap on CAP, withdraw this legislation and let us in this nation take care of our poor.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I feel privileged, but I also feel very saddened to be rising to speak to a piece of legislation that in fact entrenches wrong-headed thinking and the wrong direction this government has undertaken in the last number of years. Many in this House and in Canada will remember that as his last public act as leader of the New Democratic Party, the Hon. Ed Broadbent introduced a motion to this House calling for the elimination of child poverty by the year 2000.

Ironically, there was unanimous support for that resolution in this House and yet the largest single group of Canadians to be affected by this piece of legislation to continue the capping of the Canada Assistance Plan will be children. They are the largest single group receiving social assistance. Why should children be on the receiving end of this mean-spirited legislation that the government is introducing? Why should they be the first to take the brunt of the attack of restraint that this government is introducing? Children are powerless. They are unable to defend themselves.

In fact, there are several sectors of society that have not yet felt the government's restraint. One of them is the portion of big business enjoying incredible tax breaks. Yet today we are introducing and debating a capping of the Canada Assistance Plan for the have provinces, three provinces in this country and it will be children who are most affected.

Mr. Milliken: They are debating the same thing in Toronto, too.

Ms. Langan: How will removing money from social assistance help children to escape poverty? How will that help us to eradicate poverty by the year 2000? It is particularly ironic that Canada ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child in December, since Bill C-32 will have an absolutely devastating effect on the health and well-being of Canadian children who rely on social assistance. The UN convention reads: "States parties recognize the right of every child to a standard of living adequate for the child's physical, mental, spiritual, moral and social development".

Canada's social assistance rates ensure none of the above, and the federal government is cutting the funding back even more. Canada is one of the world's wealthiest nations, and yet there are close to 1 million children in this country living in poverty.

We are second only to the United States in the level of child poverty in the industrialized world. These children are being asked to pay for the loopholes that are being offered to major corporations. I ask you, is this just?

The hon. member for Kingston was most sanctimonious about his party, the Liberal Party, and its role in protecting Canadians from cuts. I would like to remind the hon. member that the Liberals were the first to break the agreement between the provinces during the Trudeau era by going from matching health care funds to block funding, and they did the same with post-secondary education. I would suspect that the hon. member might want to either review his history or rethink what he says in this House. The hon. member might also want to remember the six-and-five, the anti-inflation board, the AIB, after promising before an election that they would not impose wage controls. I would ask the hon. member to reconsider his remarks.

How can this government call provinces with huge deficits like British Columbia and Ontario have provinces?

The hon. member for Kamloops made some references to the federal off-loading measures that this legislation has provided and what the effect will be on those governments. In fact, federal off-loading will cost British Columbia over $1.1 billion in 1991-92. That is $1.1 billion that could be going into children's mouths, housing and education. It could ensure that the children in British Columbia do not go to bed hungry.

Over the period 1991-92 to 2000-01, the negative impact on the economy of British Columbia by federal government off-loading measures will be $32.7 billion. You can feed a lot of hungry kids on $32.7 billion.

The federal arguments are that the provinces are simply being asked to do their fair share, but that is not valid. Cuts in transfers to provinces account for 46 per cent of the federal expenditure control plan, for example, even though provincial transfers make up only 20 per cent of federal government program spending.

Future public sector spending pressures will rest mainly in the areas of provincial responsibility such as health care, education and social services. Provinces are not being adequately funded to meet their growing responsibilities and yet this government is continuing to cut.

I would like to note that since 1967 the federal government has provided funding for provincial expenditures on income assistance and other social services for persons in need through the CAP, but in 1990 the federal government started to nick away at the have provinces. The federal government is reintroducing this legislation and yet two of those provinces have large deficits left behind by outgoing governments and there has been no review.

In the have province of B.C., the average family income is less than the average family income in Canada and yet we are considered to be a have province. I would like to know what kind of rationale creates this kind of policy development. It seems to me that we have to ask why the federal government feels the need to off-load to the provinces.

Failure on the federal government's part to exercise prudent fiscal management has caused a serious debt-load in this country. The federal government wants to avoid visible and direct association to those severe measures it needs to implement to restore financial help by dumping it onto the provinces. The provinces will then have to collect the funds that are necessary and the Tories can walk away saying: "Those guys increased your taxes. We are clean. We are pure".

Canadians are not going to be fooled. Canadians do care about hungry children. Canadians do care about what this government is doing to those provinces, particularly the Canadians in those provinces. This government should stop and think about the impact. Quite frankly, it sounds very simplistic, but this government should be ashamed of itself.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I believe I have 10 minutes allotted to me. I will not have time to complete this evening so I will resume debate the next time we come to this bill.

It is appalling to me that Bill C-32 is brought once again to this House and that the government has not realized that its priorities are all cockeyed when it suggests that it would reduce its deficit on the backs of those most vulnerable and hurting in our society.

Bill C-32 proposes to cap the federal government's contributions to the three supposedly richest provinces, British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario for three more years. This just does not match with the reality, especially as it exists today in Ontario and in my riding of Northumberland.

It said in the paper today that the cap on welfare is costing Ontario $900 million this year. The additional pressures of the need for social assistance have risen 17 per cent this year and yet our government persists in bringing forth this legislation to the House which would reduce government commitment to a 5 per cent cap on the Canada Assistance Plan.

The plan provides assistance, as I said before, to those most vulnerable in our society. The largest portion of the Canada Assistance Plan goes to those who are in need of social assistance or welfare. Almost 40 per cent of those welfare recipients are children. The government thinks it is penny wise, but to my view it is absolutely pound foolish.

Many studies have been done to show that if we neglect to provide the basic, essential needs for children, our costs today and in the future will continue to escalate.

It has been shown that children who are raised in poverty are early school dropouts. They have emotional and psychological problems, are prone to delinquency, and therefore accrue court costs to the government. Because of poor health from malnutrition they are a burden on our health system. Because they drop out of school and do not get adequate training and education, they become unemployment insurance statistics and statistics of social assistance programs as well. Not providing additional support to those most in need in our society is pound foolish in my point of view.

Besides those programs that occur in provinces and in my riding of Northumberland to help those on social assistance or welfare recipients, additional funding goes to our seniors. Those who are most in need are indigent seniors who reside in homes for seniors. Funds go to those programs that support the handicapped, abused women and children who not only live in poverty but are abused and in need of institutional support.

I would like to quote from some statistics. With regard to children, in my riding of Northumberland this past year, social service informs me that in 1984 they handled 590 cases of children needing assistance for protection. In 1991 that total had risen to 959 cases, an 88.4 per cent increase. In 1984 there were 82 cases of children who were taken from their parents and put under care. In 1991 there were 135 cases, a rise of 64 per cent. The actual days in care in children's services since 1986 has risen by 36.15 per cent. Child abuse cases have risen from 64 in 1984 to 243 in 1991, an increase of 279 per cent.

The police departments in my riding say that it is not drugs and alcohol that are the cause of increased traffic through their offices. It is violence that comes from family violence and a lot of that family violence is attributed to our economic situation today where families have such difficulty in providing for basic needs and maintaining a home, a car, any semblance of life with dignity. It erupts very often in family violence.

The director of the children's services agency in my riding attributes much of the increase in his case load in my riding of Northumberland directly to the recession, not alone to the recession but in large part to the impact of the recession.

In my riding over the Christmas holidays the social services agencies in the Northumberland County building had to hold special clinic days in which they had to find a large room, set up desks and have those who were requesting social assistance help file through because their normal procedure of interviews with social workers was just not adequate for the seriousness of the existing situation. The number of recipients of social assistance or welfare has risen very dramatically.

These people are in need. They are not people who are abusing our social welfare assistance. In my own office, day after day after day, I have cases of people who have never been unemployed in their lives coming into my offices desperate and destitute, unable to continue for lack of resources. They are the people who are finding themselves with much loss of dignity in many cases lining up at the welfare offices in my riding.

Your heart goes out to these people and you feel that again this government is being extremely pound foolish in trying to address the problems that exist in our country today in terms of the economy. It loads the burden of trying to accomplish something positive in this country on the backs of those who are least able to cope, our poor and those in need of social assistance and funding under the Canada Assistance Plan.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 36, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam) moved that Bill C-293, an act to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Canada Labour Code and Public Service Employment Act (whistleblowing), be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

She said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I introduce this piece of Private Members' Business, the act to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Employment Act (whistleblowing).

The purpose of this bill is to provide appropriate sanctions against retaliatory discharges by public sector employers of employees who report or blow the whistle on serious misconduct by their employers. In protecting employees acting in good faith, this bill would recognize that there are times when it is in the public interest to encourage employees whistleblowing, particularly when the public health and safety are an issue.

It is also important to note that this bill not only covers public sector workers, but because it would be an amendment to the Canada Labour Code, it would in fact protect all workers under federal jurisdiction.

The amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act in this bill would amend the act so that it would be discrimination for an employer to punish an employee who, in good faith, disclosed illegal or unethical conduct by an employer. The act would be further amended to provide for the Canadian Human Rights Commission to investigate and report on a complaint.

The Canada Labour Code would be amended by stipulating that retaliatory measures for whistleblowing shall be considered unjust dismissals for the purpose of the code.

The Public Service Employment Act would be amended so as to stipulate that an employee is not necessarily guilty of disloyalty for disclosing matters through a complaint to the Human Rights Commission.

This bill is not about establishing mechanisms whereby workers would seek revenge on their employers. In fact, it is just the opposite. It is to protect workers from the revenge of their employers. An independent assessment of complaints by the Human Rights Commission would quickly separate the vengeful or frivolous from the serious complaint.

This bill is not about encouraging workers to skirt the existing avenues available to them to address their concerns such as normal recording procedures or grievance procedures. The mechanism in this bill would act as an adjunct to what already exists. It is the last resort and when all else fails and every other avenue open has been exhausted, then this bill provides the protection for the employee to blow the whistle.

What this bill attempts to do is to remove from workers the untenable choice they are currently faced with of either turning a blind eye to wrongdoing or sacrificing their careers and jobs. What we are talking about in this bill is protecting workers who blow the whistle on their employers for wrongdoing.

Whistleblowing is a practice whereby workers disclose situations where they know about or suspect the involvement of other employees, the organization or an area of the organization in illegal, unethical or unacceptable activities. It is not so much a mechanism to expose wrongdoing, but rather it is the establishment of safeguards and procedures whereby honest workers have an outlet to discuss their concerns.

By establishing an outside reporting mechanism, in this case the Human Rights Commission, workers who are unable or unwilling to discuss issues which they regard as improper with their employers will be protected from reprisal as well as having someone else offer an independent and impartial assessment of their concerns. The purpose here is not to turn workers into work place cops, but when faced with issues such as discrimination, harassment, fraud, malfeasance or cover-up, workers need and deserve the confidentiality and security of an independent agent in order that they can be secure in the knowledge that their concern would be dealt with seriously and impartially.

What is desired is the right of ethical employees to work in an ethical environment.

In the public sector it is the job of politicians, in particular opposition politicians, to oversee and scrutinize the operation of government. Indeed, in our system of government it is our duty to do this.

We do not expect, nor does this bill anticipate public sector workers to do our job for us. What it would allow is public sector workers to fulfil the responsibility they are charged with knowing that if they report wrongdoing they can do so without fear of losing their jobs.

This bill is not about enlisting public sector workers in the cause of opposition politicians. It is about ensuring that public sector workers, all workers, can do their jobs with the knowledge that the best interest of the employees and the public is being served at all times.

There is ample evidence to demonstrate that workers suffer emotional and physical turmoil in attempting to deal with their knowledge of fraud, conflict of interest, rampant waste, pollution violations or other forms of illegal or unethical conduct.

It was reported in The Ottawa Citizen not too long ago that workers have been fired for reporting illegal activity on the part of their employer and they have no recourse even when their allegations have been proved true and the employer fined. The corporation pays the fine and it is back to business as usual, but the worker has still gone down the road losing his or her job and that is a tremendous damage to one's career for being honest and open.

An American study found that in the absence of any protection, 90 per cent of whistleblowers lost their jobs, 26 per cent sought psychiatric or medical care and 10 per cent attempted suicide. This is a horrible price to pay for being honest and expecting honesty from one's employer.

We have a case right here in Canada, and I am sure there are innumerable cases, but I would like to cite one that has certainly been before the media a considerable amount in the last number of years. That is the case of Dr. Pierre Blais. He was a research scientist at the bureau of medical devices.

He prepared an article for a U.S. medical journal raising questions about the breakup of polyurethane foam on the Meme breast implant. A version of Dr. Blais' 1986 article on the breast implant appeared in a September 1988 issue of Transplantation Implantation Today, a Canadian journal.

In January 1989 Dr. Blais learned that the polyurethane foam used in the Meme was first developed for use in industrial products such as air conditioners and carburetors. On January 6 bureau scientists recommended to the bureau and asked the Meme manufacturer to voluntarily remove the implant from the market until its safety could be documented. It was overruled by Health and Welfare officials higher up the bureaucratic ladder and instead Surgitek was invited to submit data.

In January 1989, Dr. Blais wrote a strong letter to his department superiors strenuously recommending the Meme be removed from the market. In March 1989, Dr. Blais was ordered to sign an edited version of his memo. On March 6 he signed the edited memo. On March 9 he was instructed by his immediate superior to destroy his original memo and report. In July of 1989 stating unsuitability for employment in the Public Service, Dr. Blais was in fact issued an immediate dismissal notice.

Now subsequent events have in fact vindicated Dr. Blais, and yet Dr. Blais is still not in the employ of the federal government nor does he have any means to become employed again by the federal government.

He is a man whose career was on the line and in his case he has overcome that. But that is not the way we want people who work for us to be treated when they raise serious concerns.

A survey published in Industry Week magazine noted that 25 per cent of its readers said that their boss had requested them to behave in a manner they considered unethical. Most simply swallowed hard and did what was asked of them as they felt that they had no choice but to comply. This bill would give workers that choice.

If we take a look at the whole concept of whistleblowing legislation, we really are asking for public sector workers or workers under the jurisdiction of the federal government to have the right to report wrongdoing by their employer without fear of reprisal and knowing that their jobs are secure.

It also provides that the reporting would be done through the Human Rights Commission. We are not suggesting that public sector workers go out and make unfounded statements in the public that could be very damaging to Canada. We are suggesting that there be a forum under the Human Rights Commission where that worker could go and take his or her complaint. It would be independently assessed by the Human Rights Commission. After the independent assessment and if it were found that there was validity to the complaint, the worker would not find himself or herself subject to dismissal for having blown the whistle.

It is very interesting that the United States has this type of legislation in place. It has not resulted in irresponsible actions being taken by American workers. We are saying that it is very important legislation. It is very important for us as lawmakers to ensure that the people who work for us and on behalf of Canadians have the ability and the vehicle through which they can raise concerns of wrongdoing by employers.

In 1986 the Ontario Law Reform Commission, in its report on political activity, public comment and disclosure by Crown employees, concluded that government employees should not have to rely on the limited common law public interest defence alone if they are disciplined for whistleblowing but rather should be given statutory protection. That is what this legislation seeks to do.

This type of legislation should complement, not compete with, the other obligations public sector workers have to their employer, including confidentiality. It is very important that it be understood that we are not suggesting workers violate confidentiality in a public way. We are suggesting that there be a vehicle to protect confidentiality and to protect the worker's obligation to report a wrongdoing.

This type of legislation would enhance the accountability of the public sector, federal jurisdiction workers and government to provide another instrument by which government action could come under public scrutiny. After all, this is very much what Parliament is about. We have a responsibility to be subject to public scrutiny as do the departments and the people who work for us.

Federal jurisdiction employers like airlines, rail transport and truckers have a responsibility to be scrutinized for the public good and for the protection of the public, certainly in the area of the environment.

In closing, I would ask the hon. members from the other parties to consider this legislation very seriously. As parliamentarians I believe we should take pride in those who labour on our behalf and on behalf of the Canadian public. At the same time we should protect those honest workers who feel duty bound to point out wrongdoing by their employer but are unable to so today because of lack of legislative protection.

I would urge hon. members to support this bill so that Canadian workers under federal jurisdiction would be protected in carrying out their duties.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C-293, a bill to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Employment Act. This bill proposes what in common parlance is known as whistleblowing legislation.

This matter has been aired in this Chamber a number of times in recent years as a result of private members' bills and motions. Therefore not a lot new can be said that would in any other way add or clarify what has already been said. Indeed, in 1986 a bill almost identical to the one now before the House was tabled, was debated at length and was not passed.

I would like to say at the outset that I applaud the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam for this expression of concern for efficiency and effectiveness in federally regulated institutions and particularly for the implied concern for the health and safety of workers employed therein. I share her concern and would be eager to support any measure that would contribute to the improvement of safety in Canadian work places.

Every year in this country about a thousand workers die and many more are seriously injured as a result of work place accidents and employment related illnesses. In addition to the pain and suffering that results, these accidents and illnesses take many billions of dollars out of the economy in the form of lost wages, lost production, equipment damage and compensation payments.

If Bill C-293 offered even a partial solution to this serious problem, I would gladly support it. Unfortunately the bill before us does not offer such a solution. If passed, Bill C-293 might obstruct an effective existing procedure under the Canada Labour Code for preventing potentially hazardous working conditions. It might even create an atmosphere of confrontation and hostility in certain work places, which could be itself a threat to worker safety.

I would like to explain how such a situation could arise by describing what happens under the present legislation when, in the words of Bill C-293, an employer is engaging in or is about to engage in conduct that would endanger the public health or safety.

In most such cases, under federal jurisdiction the employee would be protected by the right to refuse dangerous work provision of the Canada Labour Code. If an employee has reasonable cause to believe that a particular work process or condition could be dangerous to himself, herself or to any other employee, the employee has the right to refuse to do the work without being subject to any discriminatory treatment because of the refusal.

In certain cases these conditions could have public safety implications. For example, a truck driver being required to drive in excess of the maximum permissible hours may pose a threat to employee and public safety. There are already clearly established steps that must be taken when an employee refuses to do dangerous work.

(1) The employee must inform the employer of the refusal to work and the reason for it and also report the incident to the work place safety and health committee or representative.

(2) The employer must then investigate the condition along with the safety and health representative or a member of the committee.

(3) If the condition is not corrected to the satisfaction of the employee, a safety officer is called in to investigate the complaint.

(4) If the employee still is not satisfied that the condition is safe or has been corrected, the matter may be referred to the Canada Labour Relations Board for adjudication.

Throughout this process the employee is protected from any discriminatory treatment, including dismissal because of the refusal to work in dangerous conditions. What is more, the Canadian Labour Relations Board has the authority to make the employer reinstate an employee who has been dismissed for this reason, rescind any disciplinary action and repay any wages the employee may have lost because of the employer's discriminatory action.

Furthermore, under the Canada Labour Code an employee who complains to the Minister of Labour about any irregular working conditions imposed by the employer may request that his or her identity be kept secret. In short, the intent of Bill C-293 in so far as it concerns the issue of work place safety in federally regulated institutions is already being met by existing legislation. The passage of Bill C-293 would not offer further protection to workers in these circumstances. In fact, it could even lead to confusion as to what process takes precedence.

This government takes very seriously its responsibility to improve safety and health in Canadian work places and over recent years has been implementing a policy to ensure that employers and employees comply with the occupational safety and health regulations that have been drafted into law. Fundamental to this compliance is the recognition that occupational safety and health is the joint responsibility of employers and employees. Mandatory joint health and safety committees have been established because we believe that whatever their differences at the bargaining table, employers and employees have a common interest in making their work place safer and thus more productive.

It is not assumed that all employers are model employers and that there are accordingly swift and strong measures that can be taken against employers when warranted. However, employers are given credit for acting responsibility in this area of common concern. It is recognized that it is the people who work in an establishment, employers and employees together, who are best able to ensure the health and safety of that establishment. Only an atmosphere of co-operation will help to ensure safer work places and less secretive management.

Bill C-293, if enacted, could well result in a hardening of attitudes that could work not for but against the speedy resolution of health and safety related problems in the work place. Instead of the co-operative resolution of work place concerns, this bill proposes resolving such matters before the Human Rights Commission quasi-judicial board with labour and management pitted against each other as adversaries. In my opinion this could only lead to more confrontation, less co-operation, less sharing of information on safety and health matters, and therefore greater secrecy and suspicion and more dangerous working environments for Canadians.

For these reasons I cannot support this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I would also appreciate an opportunity to speak to Bill C-293.

[English]

I listened to the member from Elk Island with great interest. I was hoping that at some point he would get around to talking about the bill. Perhaps time ran out and he was not able to do that. Maybe in another incarnation at some other date he will be able to talk about the bill we are in fact debating today.

I cannot say that the bill has absolutely nothing to do with what the member talked about because there are one or two lines in the bill which come somewhat close, I suppose, to the issue referred. Again, it is only in a very general way.

This bill provides protection for people who are trying to act in the best public interest. That is what it has to do and little or nothing else. It provides for means to protect people who are employees of the public sector and who feel morally bound to protect the interests of the public.

There is always a difficulty for anyone who is a public servant. Who is the boss? The person who is a supervisor or the public, the taxpayers who are footing the bill? What happens when the two come in conflict?

Whose side does that employee who sees something wrong take, the side of what is good and proper or the side of the boss, when they believe in good conscience that those two sides are different from one another?

I think as a general principle all of us who represent the public interest in this House should believe in our conscience that it is not the side of the boss you take, it is the side of the public because it sent us here. That is a fundamental principle of our democratic system.

In order to provide that kind of accountability and those means, we need a bill such as this. Are there flaws in this bill? Probably. There are flaws in government bills all the time. That is not the issue. We can send this bill to committee and if we do not like it, we can defeat it there. However, I think in principle, I like it. I like some of the things it stands for.

If an employee, someone working for a Crown corporation, someone working in a government department, sees the boss bringing home the refrigerator that belongs to the office, what does he or she do? It is a question which should be of import to all of us.

As the member who proposed this bill said quite clearly earlier today, there are the general common law principles that apply, but they are clearly insufficient. Why should someone who is defending the public interest in good conscience have to then defend themselves in courts and everywhere else for having taken what was right to start with? That is the difficulty with the absence of any kind of law that protects whistleblowers, which is what we call people affected by this bill, people who denounce wrongdoing in good conscience, having the firm conviction that what they are reporting was a wrongdoing to start with.

On behalf of the Liberal caucus, last fall I put out a document entitled Public Sector Ethics. One part of the document refers to just that. I am the party's critic for public sector ethics. My colleague from Nepean is our critic for human rights and she, I know, has very important remarks to make with regard to this bill as well.

I quote from this document:

"Considering the government's recent problems in connection with action taken by public servants, it is imperative to implement a policy that provides effective protection for public servants who expose cases of waste, corruption and bribery. Public sector workers should be able to blow the whistle on this type of misconduct in the Public Service, without fear of retaliation".

[English]

If someone has a vendetta against the boss or against a colleague and he or she invents or concocts an alleged wrongdoing in order to get another person in trouble, that person should be properly chastised and reprimanded for doing so. That applies with or without such a law anyway.

What we should all want as Parliamentarians is to ensure that we have the laws to best protect the public interest. Other jurisdictions, the United States for one and possibly others, have such laws to protect the people who denounce wrongdoing.

As someone who has received—how should I put it—a number of brown envelopes in my years in public office, I know darn well that the reason those envelopes are brown and come in under my door early in the morning, or are sent overnight now in the anonymous fax mechanism which is the new brown envelope system in this country, is that people do that because they want to denounce something that is wrong.

As parliamentarians we have to verify those facts, but it is strange to note that approximately 95 times out of 100 the information that is provided to us is accurate. It is dead on. People are reporting things which they believe to be incorrect and most of the time are incorrect when they do report it.

Even without that protection now people are largely providing information that is accurate, except that without that protection you do not have to be a genius to know that many people cannot and will not report incidents of wrongdoing simply because of their own personal fear. I do not blame them for having that fear.

If you are a civil servant or a sole support parent in the Public Service or elsewhere with two or three children at home and you see wrongdoing and you know that your conscience tells you that you should report it, your conscience also tells you that you have to put bread on the table. If you do report it and get caught and lose your job, then where are you? Then where is your loyalty toward your own family?

There are sometimes conflicting interests and it is our duty to protect the public interest. That is the reason this bill should proceed and go to committee.

If the member for Elk Island or anyone else thinks that the bill has to be corrected at that point, there is ample opportunity to do so at that time, but it should go ahead, in my opinion.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of my colleague's bill, Bill C-293, an act to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Employment Act.

At the outset I want to say that I was amazed by the remarks of the hon. member for Elk Island, who was not even talking about this bill. This does not talk about health and safety. This talks about everything else but health and safety in terms of providing the opportunity for workers to blow the whistle if they believe that actions of their employer, whether that employer is the Government of Canada or is covered under federal jurisdiction, are wrong.

In other words, without the fear of loss of job, loss of income, loss of ability to support their family, they can say to the appropriate authorities, not over the radio, not through television and not in the newspaper, that there is something happening here that is totally unacceptable.

A number of years ago I worked with an individual by the name of Bob Norborn who was a quality assurance inspector at Fleet Aerospace. He put his job on the line because he felt that the quality of the inspections, the quality of the products going into aircraft that were being flown by Canadians as well as others, was less than what it should be. As a result of his actions, as a result of his bravery, he lost his job. He received death threats. He received harassment and eventually he had to leave his own community to find employment elsewhere.

Workers in this country need some protection and my colleague's bill provides the basis for that protection. It may not be perfect. Heaven knows every time the government brings forward legislation it never comes out the same way it started because it learns through the committee process. What we are encouraging this House to do is adopt the concept in principle and send it off to committee for further study, for fine-tuning, and then we will see whether it is acceptable in a new revised form, or the same form, to the House.

There are other areas that we have to keep in mind. A worker in a shipyard who is told by his employer to dump environmentally unfriendly chemicals into the water should have the ability to report that without fear of losing his job. A health care worker employed by the federal government should have the ability to say he does not think the packaging on that shipment of blood to be shipped from the hospital to a lab is safe and there is a danger to those who come in contact with it, that is, passengers in commercial buses in the winter months when blood samples going from clinics or hospitals to laboratories over hundreds if not thousands of miles are stored in the travelling compartments, not in the holds underneath, but up on the racks above the passengers. A health care worker should have the ability to report that without fear of losing his job.

The same can be said for flight attendants, for pilots who are being told to do things in a way that jeopardizes their lives and the lives of their passengers, not in a traditional health and safety issue context, but in the fact that someone has not de-iced those wings. I believe very shortly we will have a report from the Dryden inquiry that will show the systemic reasons why that crash occurred. In part it was because of the pressure on the employees to go past the fine line.

Another example, and I realize I do not have all that much time, is that late last fall after Nationair locked out its flight attendants and decided to continue to fly, questions were raised by myself and others about the safety of that airline using unqualified, quickly trained personnel to replace the experienced crews being locked out by the company.

I received an allegation from a flight attendant who found herself having to travel back on Nationair from where she was on vacation because that was the only way she could return. She observed a number of things that she felt were safety violations. She came to me and I reported those in writing to the Minister of Transport and asked him for an investigation because at the same time there was a Department of Transport inspector on that flight. There was a question as to whether he was observing the same things that she was.

The minister has since, as of February 3, got back to me and outlined his response. What I find interesting, and it relates to this whole question of whether employees need some kind of protection, is that on January 14 my leader got a letter from the president of Nationair, Mr. Robert Obadia, which says: "As you probably know by now all of Mr. Angus' allegations were found totally false by Transport Canada".

I get my answer today from the Minister of Transport and it is dated February 3. Nationair's letter is three weeks ago. It is no wonder that employees in the federal sector want some assurances because how did Nationair know what was going to be in the minister's letter?

An hon. member: Three weeks ahead of time.

Mr. Angus: Three weeks ahead of time. Another reason, Mr. Speaker, why workers whether they be federal employees under the direct jurisdiction of either the Government of Canada or the Crown corporations, or workers in the private sector who come under federal jurisdiction need some kind of protection. They need some mechanism where they can go and say: "Look, I do not like what is happening. I am scared out of my wits that someone is going to be injured or someone is going to be hurt because of the actions of my supervisor or of my company," and they need that protection.

As my colleague said in her presentation in this House, it is not an automatic assumption, it is not an automatic publicizing of the allegations, it is a process that can be used to determine if what the individual is suggesting is occurring or is about to occur is fact.

I want to say in closing that the members on the government side should take a look at some of the other elements in government policy that provide for this very thing. In transport, when someone in the industry believes a safety violation is occurring, or a violation of the regulations of the act is occurring, there is a special phone number that they can call anonymously to report it, whether it is lack of de-icing, whether it is falsification of logs, whether it is falsification of maintenance reports. Any of those kind of possible violations can be reported.

All we are asking for is to give a similar mechanism to other workers in the federal Public Service, in the federal jurisdiction.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I too am delighted to stand in the House and speak to Bill C-293, which is an act to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Canadian Labour Code and the Public Service Employment Act on whistleblowing.

I, as the human rights critic for the Liberal Party, feel quite strongly about this bill. I commend the member from the New Democratic Party for bringing it forward. Its purpose is to protect employees who in good faith report or blow the whistle on the serious misconduct of their employers. In this case the employer is the federal government.

The essence of this legislation has been called for over the past number of years and Canadians from coast to coast have grown more concerned with the conflict of interest in public sector ethics as they have seen a dramatic rise in the allegations of misconduct. Public sector misconduct is directly related to public cynicism toward politics, the employees of the federal government and the politicians who are elected to this House of Commons.

Canadians have demanded better public policy to thwart incidences of abuse of public trust. Whistleblowing is but a small part of a much needed complete overhaul of legislation dealing with public sector ethics, but it is a very important step. As an example, in the United States there has been growing support for the protection of employees who act in the public interest by disclosing conduct by their employers that constitutes a breach of law or regulations.

Ten states within the United States of America have already initiated legislation that allows employees to whistleblow. Although all employees need whistleblowing security, the Public Service by its nature is even more susceptible to employer abuse. In the public sector, employees are working directly for those who pay their salaries, namely, the Canadian taxpayer and therefore have that much more responsibility to protect their interest to their fullest capacity.

Essentially, measures are needed to protect whistleblowers because whistleblowing can very easily become part of their jobs. Legislation such as that before us today is the starting point for bringing protection to those who know firsthand of government abuses. In protecting employees, this bill would recognize that there are times when it is in the public interest to encourage employee whistleblowing as long it is done in good faith. The Liberal opposition places public sector ethics high on the agenda. We have called for an effective policy to protect public servants who expose waste, corruption, graft and similar situations.

Public servants must be able to report illegal or unethical behaviour they encounter on the job without fear of reprisal. The Public Service Alliance of Canada has been calling for such protection for some time. Before the last federal election, they issued a questionnaire to all three of the major political parties. One question asked about whistleblowing. The Conservative Party responded that "adequate mechanisms are in place within the Public Service".

As the union representing for the most part non-management public servants, it is well aware not only of the misconduct that takes place, but of the retribution that can result when an employee feels compelled to report the waste or corruption or even the risk that results from that misconduct.

Following the forced back-to-work order that this government imposed on the PSAC workers last September, an abhorrent action in itself, the Public Service workers did in fact implement a whistleblowing system. Unfortunately, as it was in the interest of management for this system not to work, many public servants were afraid to use the service for fear of recrimination and reprisal. The incidents of misconduct that were reported, despite this fear, are evidence of just how necessary such a reporting system is.

As my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell mentioned, quite often we, as members of Parliament, will receive via under the door the unmarked envelope with such indications of misconduct within the Public Service. The public sector work in areas that have a direct impact on the health and safety of Canadians. They are involved in meat and food inspection, transportation inspection, airport protection and environmental concerns. They must be free of the fear of recrimination.

The Public Service Alliance of Canada, in its questionnaire to all three major political parties, asked this very question. But the number of reported cases of wrongdoing in this government over the last few years is testament to the fact that there is a dire need for stronger measures.

I would like to mention one case in particular with Health and Welfare where a certain employee raised questions on the Meme breast implant and the dangers it posed to Canadian women and he was fired from his job. As it turns out now, we all know that he was correct in that assumption.

Of course, whistleblowing protection should not be allowed to contravene the basic common law principle that an employee owes his or her employer the general duties of loyalty, good faith and, in appropriate circumstances, confidentiality.

For instance, an employee should not be able to publicly blow the whistle without first using every internal means available to bring an end to the misdeed that is being reported. It is imperative that safeguards are also maintained for the employer. Concrete evidence of wrongdoing that affects public health and safety must be evident. This sort of legislation must not be used as a means of getting back at a manager in cases of personality conflict or as a means of airing personal grievances. If managers are to do their jobs properly, they must feel secure that they will not be brought up before the Human Rights Commission if, with just cause, they reprimand an employee for his or her misdeed.

I have already said that I support this bill in principle. However, I do question one aspect of its implementation. The bill states that an employee, with reasonable grounds for believing that the employer is engaging in or is about to engage in conduct that would be illegal or contrary to public health or safety, may file a complaint with the Human Rights Commission.

When the Ontario Law Reform Commission presented its proposals for whistleblowing legislation in 1988, it called for the establishment of an office of special counsel. This counsel would be an independent office that would investigate each complaint, decide whether there was just cause to blow the whistle and, if the whistle was blown, would protect the employee.

The Human Rights Commission should most certainly protect victims of discrimination due to whistleblowing. However, misconduct should not be reported to them but to a body formed expressly for that purpose.

It is not just the employees of the federal public sector who need to be protected. Also in the case of the federal body, we do not have an ombudsman where any person may go and try to correct a wrong. This is a very badly needed area within our federal system. I for one would certainly support an omnibus bill that would give anyone within the Canadian public the right to question what is happening in the Parliament of Canada.

I appreciate the opportunity of speaking on this bill in the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to deal with a subject that is certainly dear to some people's hearts, but I have to say it is not dear to the hearts of very many Canadians. What I refer to is the general suffering from our goods and services tax.

In this country today we have the world's most complicated tax system. This is passing strange when we recall that this government said that tax reform is essential to the well-being of the nation; tax reform, not tax penury.

We have heard from this government that harmonization with the provinces is essential to provide a fair tax. When he was referring to a GST for Canadians, the then Minister of Finance also said that harmonization would be the order of the day. However, we see that the gap between what was said and what was done is very large and this gap is very noticeable to very many Canadians because many of them are falling into this gap.

A few examples from the long rolls of misery caused by the GST are a two-tiered tax system, expensive to collect, nearly impossible to amend; a made-in-Canada recession, complete with an intractable economic malaise; the deindustrialization of our most prosperous province and regional development a joke and an empty shell.

Small business has it right; small business has referred to the GST as a national tax tragedy. Compelling words from that sector which was supposed to benefit the most from the new era of tax harmony. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business survey estimates that compliance costs are in the neighbourhood of $10 billion. In general that $10 billion comes out of the pockets of the small business person, the man or the woman who runs a store, sells a product, the person trying to make a decent living in tough times, the person trying to make any living in tough times.

Big business did not have to pay for the system from which it has richly profited, and big business did not have to go out and assume the burden of the accounting costs or the other compliance fees; it already had the resources to do that. Did the government ever think of the corner store owner who used to do his or her own accounting until this bureaucratic behemoth was dropped into his or her lap.

Did the government ever think of someone in the service industry or the tourism industry or the transportation industry? Did the government think about cab drivers? I am sure that every member of this House at one time or another has to take taxies, and I can tell you and any of the government members opposite that if you want to know what the average Canadian thinks about this pernicious tax, come and take any taxi in the great city of Halifax. Let them know that you are a member from the government side and you will hear in words succinct and clear what the people of Halifax and Nova Scotia think about the GST. You will hear what they think you should do with it and you will hear why this government is held in such disrepute by ordinary Canadians trying to make a living, trying to survive, while their government appears to them to be systematically out to frustrate and defeat all their efforts.

Mr. Speaker, it is a shame and a scandal and the government has ,to act to make life a little simpler for ordinary Canadians.

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the former speaker's constituents and the people in Nova Scotia will be happy to learn that the replacement of the manufacturers' sales tax—which this government did—was at the urging of all three political parties in all the committees which sat prior to the implementation of the GST.

She could spend her time to much more constructive advantage if she spent a little time talking to other Conservatives, Liberals and NDPs in the provincial legislatures. She could talk to our Conservative premier in the province of Nova Scotia and perhaps urge him to meld the tax with the federal tax. If she is really sincerely interested in saving taxpayers a lot of money she should do more to get the two taxes melded and therefore save 50 per cent.

She has already been advised by the minister responsible for the GST that the figures given by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business are a sham. I would refer the hon. member to Hansard of November 6 in which he makes those points, but I do not have enough time to repeat them.

Having said all that, it does not go unnoticed that our government now is getting letters back, as I am, from businessmen who find out that they like to get the GST back on their trucks and their cars and their phone bills and their heat and their rent and all of the things that they got no refund on when they paid the old manufacturers' sales tax.

There is a positive feeling out there despite the views of the member from Nova Scotia. There are positive views out there of the advantages of the refunds on the GST to businesses, and there are advantages out there to the tax credits given to those less fortunate and unable to pay the GST. I know senior citizens who pay no GST because their tax credit exceeds their purchases.

I think that she deserves to give this House more respect and spend more time lobbying the provinces and have the taxes melded to save 50 per cent of the GST.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my concern is with regard to the premiums under the Unemployment Insurance Act which small business people must pay as well as employees.

On October 29, 1990, the then Minister of Finance stated: "If there is any shortfall, this will be made up by the government". He promised that the government would finance the deficit until the end of 1992 without raising the premiums. By 1993, it is supposed to be self-financing from the contributions paid by employers and employees.

That particular undertaking by the former Minister of Finance, who is presently the Minister for International Trade, has not been adhered to. The fact is that this undertaking by the government opposite has been broken time and time and time again. We are now in the midst of a major economic recession which has hit every community throughout this country. It is demonstrable in every region of the country. The economy is in a terrible recession, and what happened on January 1, 1992? The government across the way increased premiums for business people, employers and employees by some 14 per cent.

This may not appear to be a lot, but we are in the midst of a deep, biting recession today in Canada. There are increased costs for employers, and I make special reference to small businesses in this country. In my own constituency I think of all of those businesses in the service sector, the professions and anyone who has a job. Many of them do not have a job. The employees must also contribute substantially in this time of recession, thereby taking much needed money away from consumers, out of the economy, depriving Canadians and business from flourishing.

I hope the minister or the parliamentary secretary responding for the minister will give serious consideration to my request to have this particular measure revoked. It adds nothing to consumer confidence in this country. It adds nothing in terms of exacerbating the successes, if any, of small business in this particular recession. The government has adopted a very very negative measure with this increase in the premiums for unemployment insurance.

The Government of Canada has broken its commitment to the people of Canada time and time again. In the last number of years the unemployment insurance premiums have risen not by 14 per cent, but by 24 per cent. I ask the parliamentary secretary responding on behalf of the minister to give serious reflection, and in view of the present state of the economy, remove this increase for unemployment insurance premiums so that Canadians will have greater confidence and more cash in their hands. This would stimulate a very very weak economy.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked whether the government intends to increase the premium rate for unemployment insurance.

I have said in the past, and I shall repeat now, that the Unemployment Insurance Act specifies a process for determining the appropriate premium rate. That process requires the Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission to review the status of the UI Act and make a recommendation. The government will make its decision on the basis of the commission's report, the current economic climate, the fiscal situation and the financial integrity of the account. In short, the government makes a responsible decision based on all the relevant considerations once the review process is completed. The government refuses to look at the opposition's recommendation to make hasty or ill-informed decisions.

As the government stated in its last budget, the UI program is one of the most important elements of Canada's social safety net. It recognizes that the account must be maintained in a healthy condition. This means the rates will eventually have to be adjusted in a manner to ensure the fiscal integrity of the account.

HOUSING

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, do you remember just how you felt when you signed the offer to purchase on your home? Well, I do. I felt happy, excited, thrilled, but most of all I felt scared, darned scared because I really did not know if I was going to be able to afford to pay for that home. You and I are not alone and were not alone in feeling that way because most Canadians feel scared when they buy their home. They feel scared as to whether or not they are going to be able to purchase it or whether they will be able to finance it or find a mortgage for it.

That makes sense because in fact one third of all homeowners in this country could not have arranged a mortgage for their home if it had not been for something called mortgage insurance. One third of all of the homes in Canada were built with the help of mortgage insurance. The only mortgage insurance available right across this country was provided by the federal government under the National Housing Act through the federal government's housing agency, CMHC.

Now, according to the cabinet's constitutional proposals, the federal government is going to get right out of housing altogether and hand it over exclusively to the provinces and the territories. If they do that, who is going to provide for the mortgage insurance which helped to build one third of all the homes in Canada? Certainly not the private sector. They will provide mortgage insurance in Toronto but they will not provide mortgage insurance in Calgary or Edmonton. Perhaps the provinces and territories will provide it. Perhaps we are going to have 10 provincial mortgage insurance funds and two territorial mortgage insurance funds instead of the one national fund that we have now. Perhaps, but do not count on it.

Who is going to provide for the home repair program that we have now for low income senior citizens? It is a program that is provided right across our country by the federal government. Who is going to provide for the urban and off-reserve remote housing for native Canadians that is presently provided right across Canada by the federal government through their housing agency, CMHC?

Who is going to maintain the 640,000 homes for low income seniors, for the working poor families, for disabled Canadians that form an essential part of our national social safety net?

If the federal government intends to get right out of housing and give it to the provinces exclusively, does it also intend to provide the provinces with more funding or with further taxing powers in order to enable the provinces to maintain the present national housing programs? If it does not provide more money and taxing powers, is it likely that the provinces are going to accept that housing responsibility?

Well, it is time to start talking about the facts. Mr. Minister, let us stop kidding the troops.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the federal government does not intend to promote, and I do mean promote, any reduction in support for housing in Canada, but rather to recognize exclusive provincial jurisdiction in the housing field.

The proposal that the government put forward would retain federal responsibility for aboriginal people and for research and development.

[English]

In any case, it must be underlined that these are proposals that were put forward for discussion by Canadians. There has been opportunity for considerable public debate before the parliamentary committee and in the constitutional conferences. We hope that advice will emerge from the committee.

• (1820)

Depending on the views of Canadians, the government intends to discuss this matter with the provinces, including financial arrangements which may be necessary to enable provinces to carry out this responsibility. It would be premature to speculate on the outcome of discussions at this time.

HIBERNIA

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my concern is with the Hibernia project. I notice the latest development today is that Gulf Canada is pulling out of the Hibernia project. I suspect that is going to cause some concerns to the government and to all Canadians, perhaps.

The positive offshoot might be that there might be more Canadian content in the project.

It was suggested to me that 50 per cent to 60 per cent of the equipment and materials and products would be of Canadian content. The minister told me personally it would probably be in the vicinity of 60 per cent to 75 per cent.

My concern would be whether the percentage of Canadian content is skewed by the labour component which we certainly endorse and accept. We want people from Newfoundland to go to work. We appreciate that.

To test the waters, I went to St. John's to find out exactly why Algoma Steel lost a steel plate contract to a firm in Belgium when we feel that we are most definitely competitive in this product line. Our bid was so dramatically higher than that of the Belgian firm that we thought it had to be a case of dumping. We still believe that to be true.

Nevertheless, I was quite impressed with the people I met in St. John's, the government relations individual, the legal counsel, the project manager of contracts and the business manager. I met with all of them. I was very impressed and I think they are doing their level best.

At this time it is out of government control. It is at arm's length with deciding who shall get these contracts.

Without being too parochial I had concerns at first that only Algoma was concerned. But I have since had calls from other manufacturers, manufacturers that have spent as much as $100,000 and did not even get on the pre-qualifying bidding for the project. That has to concern everybody in Canada, but especially Canadian manufacturers who anticipated they would get some good solid contracts. Anyone who has spoken to me has suggested any other country would make darn sure that it would be extremely well represented and would gather the expertise so that it could export that expertise later on for other megaprojects across the world.

We believe that Canada has not been afforded that opportunity and many Canadian firms have been shut out simply because they could not gear up. They could not meet the very severe specifications of the project, which again we accept because they have to be very severe and stringent because of the safety concerns on the project.

Did this Belgian company buy or did it dump product into this country? Did it buy this initial contract so that it could qualify for all other steel contracts? The officials told me that they would rather deal with just one company than with all companies.

Algoma has suggested to ISTC, Industry, Science and Technology, that it should initiate a dumping investigation. That investigation I was told would take a week. Here we are a couple of months later. The investigation is not complete. I am not sure who is investigating.

Steel producers tell me they are in this together. They are concerned and they are saying Canada must be more involved, more representative of the firms that are losing these contracts. There is great concern out there and steel producers are in no financial position right now to proceed with these dumping charges. It is time consuming. It is very costly and they are asking the government for help. They need the help. The government must step in because they are just too cash strapped.

We are suggesting that the government has been too passive in this and we remain concerned about the Canadian content which is a target, not a regulation of the project.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to respond to the concerns that have been raised by the hon. member about Canadians not receiving sufficient benefits on the Hibernia project.

Like all Canadians, I am disappointed when Canadian companies are not successful in winning Hibernia contracts, but members should also be aware that literally dozens of Canadian companies have won contracts to supply Hibernia projects. Of the over $400 million in expenditures of the projects to date, over 70 per cent have been Canadian goods and services. This is in excess of the 55 per cent to 60 per cent of Canadian content targeted by the project set out by the Hibernia agreement.

Members also should be aware that local content for the first oil and gas development project in the North Sea was only at 25 per cent to 40 per cent. By international standards, Canadian companies are therefore doing better than their Norwegian or British counterparts in similar points of development of the offshore development.

The Hibernia project is providing substantial employment benefits to Canadians. At the end of December, something in the order of 2,400 people are directly employed on the project. Eighty-three percent of these are Canadians. Over 600 were employed in Montreal designing the top side for the project and an additional 1,100 were working the bow arm in the Newfoundland building, the construction site of the Hibernia platform. Another 416 are employed in St. John's managing the project.

While many Canadians are benefiting from the Hibernia project, I am aware that some industries have been disappointed that they were unable to make major Hibernia contracts. The steel industry is one. I can tell the member that the government and the Canadian Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board are aware of the industry's concerns and we are working with the industry to ensure that its contracts are addressed at the time and moment. For example, Canadian steel producers are very much in the running for a contract to supply 70 tonnes of reinforcing steel for the project.

PENSIONS

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of my constituents in Beaver River and all Canadians to demand that the Conservative government immediately rescind the disgraceful scheme that gives members of Parliament and senators access to the most generous pension plan in the country.

From the outset the Reform Party has opposed this excessive plan that allows any member, no matter the age, to receive at least $23,390 a year after just six years in this Chamber. No Canadian citizen, no private sector worker, receives anywhere near the equivalent pension benefit. This must be stopped.

The Conservatives have failed to bring the deficit under control. The government must find the courage to reduce spending, starting with cuts to our own pensions. This is an outrage to ordinary Canadians whose tax bill has increased year after year under the Conservatives.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the government has a vested interest in maintaining these pensions because many of its members may be replaced, in fact by Reformers in the next election. Nonetheless this offensive pension scheme must be stopped and stopped now.

SRI LANKA

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, today I want to again address an urgent issue, the plight of the Tamil people.

For 13 years the Tamils have been suffering at the hands of the Sri Lankan government. The time has come for their torment to stop. Canada must help put an end to the human rights abuses of the Tamil people.

Economic blockades that have lasted for 19 months must also end. Medical supplies are not getting through to the people who desperately need them. This is an urgent issue and Canada must take a leadership role in ensuring the peace, safety and respect of human rights for the Tamil people.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, supply management is one of the main pillars of Canadian agriculture. Our 20–year old milk quota system has been the most important factor in maintaining the family farm.

For the first time farmers could look forward to enjoying a stable income from work that kept them busy seven days a week.

As a result, it became more attractive for young people to take over the family farm. The system is a sensible one, based on the spirit of co–operation and mutual benefit that is so important to farm communities across the country.

Today this spirit of co–operation is threatened by the appalling negligence and complacence of a government that failed to stand firm at the GATT talks, and thus abused the trust of our farmers.

EASTERN TOWNSHIPS

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you, as a history buff, would be interested to know that in a day or two we will be celebrating an important 200th anniversary in the history of my riding and my region.

It was on February 7, 1792 that Sir Alured Clarke, Lieutenant Governor of Lower Canada, launched his now famous proclamation on behalf of the King of England, addressed to all those wishing to settle on Crown lands in the Province of Lower Canada. This proclamation granted concessions and letters patent to thousands of Loyalist settlers from the United States.

This led to the founding of a number of townships named Brome, Sutton, Farnham, Bolton, Potton, Stanbridge, Magog, and so forth, names that still designate a number of municipalities in my riding, which together form what we call the Eastern Townships.

I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the descendants of those Loyalists, those pioneers who gave my part of Quebec the distinctiveness it still has today.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, the GATT negotiations are coming to a close. The very future of Quebec's dairy, egg and poultry industries is at stake.

GATT article XI protects our supply management system. It is now clear that the government has failed utterly in its efforts to have this clause clarified and reinforced.

Throughout the agricultural sector in Canada—not just in Quebec—uncertainty will replace price stability. In other words, the pillars of our agricultural policy are threatened.

After the free trade disaster and the GST, Quebec and Ontario farmers are about to become the next victims of this government's destructive policies.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs bet his shirt that he would stand solidly with our Canadian farmers. Mr. Speaker, we don't want his shirt. We want him to really stand up for our agricultural sector.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, family violence is a subject that appalls all caring people. It has largely been addressed up to now by dealing with the consequences rather than with the causes and the cures.

In 1985, under the leadership of Senator Muriel McQueen Fergusson, a charitable trust foundation was established in Fredericton to fund research into the causes, incidences and forms of treatment of family violence, and to promote and sponsor effective public education programs to counter widespread ignorance of the problem.

Over the past two years, working with the University of New Brunswick, the Fergusson Foundation is well advanced toward the creation of a national research centre for the study of family violence. It will be located within the Faculty of Arts at UNB. The purpose of its activities will be to increase our knowledge of the social and psychological dynamics which contribute to family violence.

This initiative leads and complements the government's plan to establish such research centres on family violence right across Canada. Hopefully the leadership of the Fergusson Foundation will be recognized by the selection of UNB as one of those national centres.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, February is Black History Month. Every year, all Canadians are invited to look into the contribution of black Canadians to the development of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, many Canadians are still unaware of the history of this community in our country. Blacks have played a very significant role in the development of the maritimes, and they have done so for over two centuries. Too often their contribution has been overlooked.

[English]

Black History Month gives Canadians the opportunity to discover their neighbours. It gives all of us a chance to share in each other's history. I urge all of us to take the opportunity to acknowledge the contribution of black Canadians through participating in Black History Month activities throughout the country.

TAXATION

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, a very unfortunate situation has been occurring all over Canada in the last week. Canadian citizens have been going to their local post offices to obtain a copy of this year's income tax form. Although the forms are there, people have been denied access to them. The justification for this inconvenience has been that because all the forms are not available in both official languages at all post offices it is against the law to give them out.

• (1410)

Even though the Delta citizens who have requested the forms only need them in English, they have to endure the inconvenience of waiting and making a return visit.

Likewise, Montrealers who have requested the forms in the French version must return again when the choice is available, possibly next week. The situation is ridiculous.

At a time when we are attempting to bring resolution to our nation's unity crisis, silly red tape such as this only compounds an already serious problem.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, the government in its lifetime has done its best to ruin the Canadian economy and attack the living standards of Canadian veterans and senior citizens.

It has clawed back the old age pension, increased board and lodging charges to veterans in long-term care and cut back on the Veterans Independence Program.

The government has recently asked all departments to come up with cost cutting ideas. The Minister of Finance and President of the Treasury Board have indicated that some social programs may be cut. Some Conservative MPs have openly called for the end of our universal health care system. The federal Conservatives sound like the Reform Party, which wants to cut all government departments by 15 per cent.

Even as the government develops a long-range plan for Veterans Affairs, the department is reducing staff and centralizing the war veterans allowance program in Charlottetown. Some operations of the DVA will soon be taken over by Health and Welfare Canada.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs must answer two questions: Is the government considering the amalgamation of veterans affairs operations with one or more other departments and is the government considering making the war veterans allowance, disability pension and other DVA benefits taxable? The veterans of Canada want to know.

OIL INDUSTRY

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the Imperial Oil retrenchment announcement is certainly of concern to Sarnia—Lambton as this is the home of a major Imperial refinery.

There are, though, new petrochemical facilities that can be built by this company and others in Canada and in Sarnia—Lambton.

These facilities are very capital intensive and I submit that our government must work toward making capital write-off more attractive to attract the building of these major world scale facilities.

This change, along with the participation by the province of Ontario tax-wise, will put Sarnia—Lambton in a competitive position for these new North American builds that could bolster the economy of my constituency in a very major way.

DR. ROBERTA BONDAR

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, today during development week I would like to add my sincere congratulations to Dr. Roberta Bondar to those of my colleague from Algoma.

Last week she very eloquently reminded us that we are all one family on a single planet. There are no political borders drawn on the surface of the earth. Pollution touches all of us equally. We all share the same water, air, and sunshine.

I am sure this government will not forget to honour Dr. Bondar, whether by a commemorative stamp, an Order of Canada, or some other tribute.

As well I urge all Canadians to take the opportunity to congratulate this outstanding world scientist in person when she shares her experiences on a planned speaking tour of Canada.

HOME OWNERSHIP

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, 5 per cent down payments for first-time home buyers announced by the government on Monday will not only increase home ownership but should also generate and create thousands of jobs.

Traditionally new housing construction has led the way out of a recession and toward economic recovery. Because housing is labour intensive and has a high Canadian content, it also has large spin-off effects including increased demand for lumber, building materials, engineering, roads, sewers, furniture, appliances and transportation.

Each new housing start generates 2.04 person-years of employment. CMHC estimates that 5 per cent down payments will allow up to 200,000 Canadian households to buy a home.

Five per cent down payments will not get us entirely out of the recession all by itself but it will most certainly help.

SUPPLY MANAGEMENT

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, the response from the Minister of Agriculture to one of his own caucus members last Monday when he asked for a strengthening of article XI in GATT seemed less than enthusiastic.

If our negotiators at GATT sign away the farmer's right to continue to operate under effective supply management, these farmers will consider their contract with this government to have been broken with severe consequences.

Canadian dairy farmers will be demanding the same level of subsidy that United States dairy farmers receive at a cost of $550 million to Canadians. The approximately $410 million owed by our dairy farmers to the Farm Credit Corporation will be in jeopardy.

Moving away from the supply management system to tariffication would be a very expensive decision. Destroying the livelihood of 36,000 dairy farmers and 2,300 poultry farmers in Canada is something which would have a severe negative impact on all Canadians.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for several days the media have again been reporting on the ozone layer over the Arctic and northern Quebec.

The Liberals opposite hardly cared about that situation in the 1980s. It was only under the Conservative government that the first environmental treaty, the Montreal Protocol, was signed in 1987.

Canada is now four years ahead of the timetable it set for reducing ozone depleting substances and these have indeed been cut by 45 per cent since 1986.

Mr. Speaker, this performance proves that the Conservative government is maintaining its leading role in this struggle and I know that the Hon. Jean Charest, our Minister of the Environment and the member from Sherbrooke, is sensitive to the problem of northern Quebec.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

There is an economic crisis throughout the country, but the government is paralyzed. Petro-Canada and Esso are laying off thousands of people; Pascal has closed down; Sears reported losses for the first time in its history; 5,200 companies went bankrupt in Quebec in 1991. The GST is a disaster for the Canadian economy, but the Minister of Finance continues to talk about positive signs in the economy.

When will the government recognize that there is a deep economic crisis which requires emergency measures right away?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated to the House and to the hon. member before, we have a sluggish recovery under way primarily because of the world situation.

The United States economy how slowed dramatically. The economies of all the industrialized nations of the world have slowed dramatically. Canada is an exporting nation and relies on exports for 25 per cent of its economic activity. Three million jobs are directly related to exports. As the economy of the world recovers, so will the Canadian economy recover.

In the meantime, we will be taking every step possible to expedite that process. Essentially what we have done is put the fundamentals in place, that is bringing down interest rates, keeping them down and bringing down inflationary pressures to reduce the cost of doing business, which will make Canada more competitive and provide long-term growth and future prosperity.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance should talk to people who have lost their jobs in gas stations across this country. He should talk to people in pulp mills who are no longer working. He should talk to the farmers who are hanging by their fingernails awaiting the results of the GATT negotiations. He should walk through any shopping mall in this country and see stores boarded up.

Does the minister understand that if he wants to meet his fiscal target, he has to take immediate constructive action to put Canadians back to work? He has to admit that his government policy on the GST has been one of the nails in the coffin of the Canadian economy.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether we are getting another policy version on the GST from the Liberal Party or not.

If one were to check with the Manufacturers' Association, one would find that one of the promising features that is on the horizon is the benefits of the GST. Without the GST, the manufacturing sector's competitive position would be further deteriorated. The hon. member should recognize that. She should be encouraging her provincial colleagues to harmonize with the GST so we could have a harmonized GST right across the country in order that the benefits could accrue to all manufacturing sectors right across the country.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in my province alone, if this government does not do something, there will be no manufacturing left. Thirty per cent of the manufacturing capacity of Ontario has disappeared as a result of this government's policies.

Will the minister at the very least admit that his GST has contributed to the recession we are facing across this country, and will he modify his GST policy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should be fair when she throws around those false allegations. If she were to look at the reality of things—

Ms. Copps: Talk to the GM workers.

Mr. Mazankowski: Well, exactly. General Motors Corporation is laying off 75,000 people, not because of the GST. The IBM Corporation is laying off thousands of people, not because of the Canadian GST. This is a restructuring problem that has to take place. That is what is creating a more severe problem in terms of recovery. It is not only occurring in North America. It is occurring around the world. The hon. member should recognize that.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. A national public works program as proposed by the Liberals will not increase the deficit. It is not an artificial make work scheme. It is a cost shared program that will create 100,000 badly needed jobs.

If this government does not invest in the competitive infrastructure, we will be spending more money in the long term for repairs and upgrading.

I want the Minister of Finance to explain to Canadians how improving competitiveness, creating 100,000 jobs and increasing government revenues will increase the deficit.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is again consistent with Liberal past policies, expecting us to spend our way out of this recession. That is a valid position to take, but I disagree with the hon. member. So do a few other people.

For example, I was attracted to the statement by Mr. Jim McCambly, president of the Canadian Federation of Labour. In the latest edition of Maclean's, Mr. McCambly is quoted as saying that while the economy shows few signs of recovery, Ottawa and the provinces should resist the temptation to inject billions of dollars into massive new public works programs that would spur construction activity and create jobs for unemployed workers.

I quote: "It is not easy to say these things when a lot of my own members are unemployed. But we cannot look at quick fixes. We have to look at the long term for the sake of our kids". He went on to say: "There are no free lunches. We all have to pay our own way".

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, this government cannot deny that a public works program will create jobs. It cannot deny that the proposal has been supported by every provincial and municipal government across this country. It cannot deny that public sector investment will leverage private sector investment.

Therefore, I ask the Minister of Finance when he will stop playing politics with this issue and introduce this program.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not playing politics with this issue, the hon. member is. When he says that all provincial governments are in favour of a massive public works program, that is absolutely false.

As a matter of fact the NDP premiers, especially the two from western Canada, are of the same view, that you cannot spend your way out of this recession.

I ask the hon. member if he is really serious. He is talking about billions of dollars. I ask him if he is giving me advice to drive the deficit up further still or is he asking for more taxes. If he is asking for more taxes, who does he want me to tax?

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, more than 2,000 people lost their jobs in Canada. Esso and Consolidated Bathurst announced massive layoffs. Two thousand jobless people will need $25 million in unemployment insurance.

How will the government pay for it? By raising taxes or increasing the deficit?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing more indicative of the problems that are faced in other jurisdictions, particularly in the United States, in terms of a recession than the plight of our forest products sector which is so heavily dependent on foreign markets.

In the case of Consolidated Bathurst, I understand that it is a management-union problem. I am informed that some discussions are going on. I like to be confident that a resolution can be found to that problem and the mill can keep operating.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker, for the Minister of Finance. There is little good news for Canadians today. We see that job prospects are again down by 50 per cent for Canadians. The lack of a full employment policy on behalf of this government is costing the Canadian taxpayer $30 billion a year in welfare payments and unemployment insurance. The cost of unemployment grows every day.

As I said in my earlier question, 2,000 more unemployed means an additional increase of $25 million in unemployment insurance.

How does the government plan to address the deficit caused by its policies that are creating unemployment? Raising taxes, increasing the deficit, or will it get people back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that we have a deficit that costs some $43 billion annually to service. That is the harsh reality. That takes about 35 or 36 cents out of every revenue dollar that we take in from the Canadian taxpayer.

What the hon. member is suggesting is that we continue to add to that burden of debt. That is not the position of this government. The position of this government is to ratchet down the deficit and start paying down the debt so it will not be left as simply a responsibility to be shouldered on the backs of future generations.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary for the minister, Mr. Speaker. It is the current generation of young people and children, where poverty is increasing, who are paying the deficit now. What they need is help now.

I say to the minister that here is the deficit of Canada. Here is a list of the over 400,000 jobs that have been lost across Canada in the last year and a half. This is the deficit to Canada. This is the result of this government's policies.

Will the Minister of Finance be prepared to bring in a full employment budget in February and give some hope to Canadians that they need now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, just so I can be absolutely clear and follow the hon. leader's logic, is she suggesting that 36 cents of the revenue dollar that we collect is not enough to go to pay the interest on the debt? Does she want to increase it to 40 cents or 50 cents? Is that what she wants?

I will tell you what she will have. She will have the IMF knocking on our door.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: This country will not only lose its economic viability; it will lose its sovereignty. That is something that this government is fighting and we will continue to fight it.

HIBERNIA

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The prolonged high Canadian dollar and high interest rates, 33 new federal taxes since 1984, including the GST, have contributed in major ways to the recession that Canadians are suffering from coast to coast. The recession has hit particularly hard our natural resources sections, including oil and gas.

Will the minister give us his assurance today that the Hibernia project will proceed on schedule?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member that when the government came into power, what the oil and gas sector wanted more than anything else was the removal of the national energy plan. That was universal throughout the system. This government has changed the national energy plan. That has been happening. In respect of the Hibernia project, the government, as I stated yesterday in the House and in other venues, as well as the report of the other three members of the consortium, is committed to the continuation of Hibernia. The consortium has the responsibility of restructuring and I look forward to an early meeting with them.

I want the project to go forward and I believe everyone else does as well. I appreciate that members opposite have the same purpose.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

I found some comfort in his words and I am sure a lot of people did, but there is, I can assure you from my experience last night, a lot of concern and scepticism about the future of this project for reasons that I am sure the minister would understand.

It is my understanding that the company that pulled out, Gulf Canada, still has a financial commitment to the project and, as I understand it, will continue to have that commitment for another eight months to the tune of around $100 million in rough estimates.

Since this project is so critical to the economy of Newfoundland and, indeed, in times of recession to the economy of the country, I ask the minister to tell me what contingency plans the government has beyond the eight-month time frame to ensure the success and the continuation of this critical megaproject.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to take every opportunity to assure the hon. member, members opposite and particularly the citizens of Newfoundland and Labrador that the government is committed for the project to continue.

The provision that the hon. member mentioned was a provision whereby at the time of negotiation of Hibernia, there was a company that wanted to have the ability to withdraw from the project at any time without any penalty. We insisted that there be a penalty. That issue is the 243 days that was triggered as of yesterday.

There are now two things in the contract. First, the consortium has to restructure and then come to us with its plan. Obviously we cannot wait very long because of the indecision. I say to the hon. member that I am willing to go to St. John's. I have mentioned that to the Government of Newfoundland and I say it to the House today. We can remove some of that indecision. I appreciate it is a difficult situation.

Second, as I have said to the hon. member, if some of his colleagues want to have a further briefing today, I stand ready to do that as well.

STONE CONSOLIDATED PULP AND PAPER MILL

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I know the Prime Minister understands one industry communities from personal experience.

The announced closure of the Stone Consolidated Pulp and Paper Mill at Bathurst will result in the loss of as many as 1,500 jobs in an area that has been badly hit by the recession and by lengthy strikes. For more than 70 years that pulp mill has offered stable jobs and has strengthened the economy of the region.

What is the Prime Minister prepared to suggest to the workers and the people of Bathurst today as to help they can expect from this government during this time of crisis?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I said in my earlier response that the closure was brought about by some difficulties between management and the union. It is not an area where we would have any reason to intervene. I am told that discussions are ongoing. The premier of New Brunswick is prepared to offer the companies some concessions that would bridge some of the difficulties.

I would hope that the hon. member would join with me in being hopeful that the problem can be resolved in an amicable fashion.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Employment and Immigration who also knows how important a major industry can be for a region's economic and social well-being. First of all, Bathurst, like Edmonston, has been a pulp and paper town for a long time. What kind of programs does the government intend to put in place to help plant workers, loggers, truckers and owners of logging equipment who are directly affected by the closing of Stone Consolidated Bathurst? People need a glimmer of hope. When can they expect some details on adjustment programs?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I share the hon. member's concern for people in the Bathurst area who are faced with the decision made by the company. I had a meeting with Premier McKenna two weeks ago, and we discussed the situation in Bathurst again the other day. We agreed to make sure that the adjustment programs we have for helping workers in this kind of situation truly reflect the needs of the region. We agreed to continue to co-ordinate our efforts in this respect, but we still hope that the company and the union will be able to find a solution that will allow Consolidated Bathurst to continue its operations.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Prairie Canadians watched our government go to the GATT talks on agriculture subsidies understanding that regional development programs like the Crow rate system were exempt from definition as a subsidy. That assurance is still in the main body of the GATT proposal. However, I note that an annex, 7-E, has been added to the Dunkel proposal which may make the Crow subject to subsidy reduction commitments.

What, if anything, has the Government of Canada done to remove that sentence from the annex and leave our Crow rate subsidy as an exempt regional development program?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): I am very pleased that the hon. member now is aware of what is in the Dunkel text. Some of his colleagues in the province of Saskatchewan have not made the effort to read what is in the Dunkel text.

Canada has suggested that regional development, when we argue for regional development, should be exempt in the GATT talks. We have continued that discussion since the Dunkel text came out. I think the hon. member understands that when it is written into a text, and the definition of export subsidies is defined in a text, the Canadian people, particularly the farmers in western Canada who would be impacted, should have that information.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Yes, I agree they should indeed. My text, like the ones I presume Saskatchewan got, did not have the annex. We have it now.

Some groups close to the government party in the west are urging the issuing of a bond or annuity to buy out the Crow policy which at 8 per cent would have a present value of more than $9 billion. Will the minister tell us if this is in fact the government's intention and, if so, where it will get the funds?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): As the hon. member is aware, when agriculture ministers met in Kananaskis last July, a decision was made to have a series of talks called transportation talks throughout the Canadian Wheat Board and, indeed, throughout Canada to discuss how the money that the people of Canada, through the taxpayers of Canada, some $720 million, was being used in agriculture. Was it the best way to use it, as a status quo, in paying the railroads, or were some of the other options that had been debated an alternative that producers should talk about?

One member says no, and I understand why. I can understand that there are other things that people are not discussing. That includes pooling, MCRs, and further activity in enhancing our system of handling in the west. The talks are ongoing.

The member asks a question that is based on something that may not happen, that may not be a route that would be taken by the government or the producers particularly. I think it is inappropriate to attempt to answer it.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Dairy and poultry farmers face the destruction of their farms, their homes, their livelihood, unless the government is willing to fight to maintain and strengthen article XI in the GATT negotiations going on this month.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to meet with the heads of Japan and the other five countries that support Canada's position to maintain and strengthen article XI so as to issue a joint declaration calling on the GATT negotiators to maintain a strengthened article XI in the new GATT agreement.

Is the Prime Minister willing to meet with those people and prepare such a declaration?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already met with Jacques Delors, the President of the European commission. I have had lengthy meetings with President Mitterrand and President Bush, and I had lengthy conversations just before Christmas with Ruud Lubbers, the Prime Minister of Holland who is also Chairman of the European commission. In the course of these very lengthy conversations we set forward again the importance of article XI to Canadian producers and, indeed, the importance of these producers to the social fibre of Canada, how they have evolved as part of our country and the importance of this to all Canadians, in Ontario, across the country, in Quebec and elsewhere.

• (1440)

We have made the case very vigorously and very strongly. I have made it personally time and time again. I look forward to meeting with the producers. I look forward to meeting with other European and world leaders precisely on this point, to hammer home again the vital importance of this to our producers and our producers to us as a country.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Since the Dunkel report has come out, Canadian dairy and poultry producers are extremely concerned that they are going to lose this vital industry that provides nearly 100,000 jobs.

I am asking the Prime Minister if between now and the end of this month he would be willing to meet with President Bush and President Delors again to seek their support so that this vital industry, employing nearly 100,000 people, can be maintained and that the Canadian dairy farms and poultry farms may be maintained as well. Is the Prime Minister willing to meet with them?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to meet with whomever and to go anywhere to advance the cause of these agricultural producers.

I spoke to President Bush on Saturday in regard to this and to other matters. I have constant meetings and ongoing conversations in following up initiatives taken up by the Minister of State for Agriculture.

I expect to be meeting soon with agricultural producers in this area, pursuant to which we will no doubt have other meetings to advance the cause of our dossier in the international GATT negotiations.

I have met with everybody from Art Dunkel to President Bush, to President Mitterrand and to the president of the European commission. We had a meeting with Jacques Delors that lasted in excess of three hours precisely on this point. We made the case, chapter and verse, about its importance not only to the nation but to each individual producer. We are going to make it again.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

As the minister is aware, the Conference of Women in Trades, Technology and Operations is winding up today in Ottawa. Its proposal to create a national data bank allowing women in non-traditional occupations to network with employers has been on the minister's desk for over a year now.

Will the minister agree to meet with representatives of this organization today to explain why his government is backing away from its commitment?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on my way to the House today I received the representation of the national co-ordinator.

As the member knows, we are reviewing the request for funds from the women in trades and technology group. No decision has yet been taken on the request, but I should be able to render a decision soon.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

If the minister is truly committed to employment equity with regard to women, and if his government is truly committed to putting some of the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians back to work, can he explain why this worth-while proposal has been sitting on his desk for over a year?

If he is truly committed to employment equity, I ask him: Will he meet with representatives of the organization today and follow through on his commitment to fund this worth-while project?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it seems necessary to have the member acknowledge that there are 900,000 more women working today in Canada than there were in September 1984. That is quite an accomplishment.

The hon. member is discussing one particular case, a group seeking funds. I have indicated that we are reviewing the request for funds and I should be able to make a decision soon.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and concerns the latest events at the GATT talks. Considering the serious concerns of farmers about the agricultural proposals, can the Prime Minister give us the assurance that Canada will continue to defend the same position at GATT, against GATT director Arthur Dunkel?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, indeed our position has not changed and will not change. We are still asking that the multilateral trade negotiations clarify and strengthen article XI of the GATT.

On this issue, all hon. members are well aware of some comments made by certain individuals from Quebec who, for partisan, petty and dishonest reasons, try to misrepresent the position of the Canadian Parliament and government. Those people would like to play politics to the farmers' detriment.

The fact is that we met with Jacques Delors for hours to put forward the Quebec producers' case. I met with President Mitterrand and the Dutch Prime Minister, Mr. Lubbers, to emphasize, on behalf of all members of this House, the importance of this issue for our Canadian and Quebec producers and to say that the current Canadian policies do not constitute trade distorting subsidies that lead to unfair competition. I stressed that those policies made good sense nationally and internationally and added that our producers needed those policies to be vigorously defended. That is precisely what I have done, as Prime Minister of Canada, and it is also what all members of this House, except a few, have always done.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the Prime Minister that he has not convinced Canada's dairy farmers. At meetings throughout the country dairy farmers have been warned that the government is about to abandon marketing boards.

The gloves are off. From B.C., from Ontario and from Quebec, thousands of farmers are preparing to storm Parliament Hill unless they get an unconditional commitment from this government and this Prime Minister.

I want to ask the Prime Minister on behalf of Canada's farming community: Will he give his unconditional and unequivocal commitment to retain Canada's marketing boards and to stop any plans for tariffication?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had the pleasure and the fight of putting questions of agriculture and trade distorting subsidies at the G-7 summit in Tokyo in 1986. We have fought the cause of the farmers of Canada, and indeed the consumers of Canada, now for some six or seven years.

In the process of doing that, we have over a period of seven years increased our Canadian assistance to farmers by 650 per cent.

Mr. Lapierre: Where?

Mr. Mulroney: My friend asks: "Where?" Everywhere including Quebec, I want to tell my hon. friend. This government has been fair and extremely supportive of farmers.

With regard to the problems that have developed in respect of article XI, we have maintained a very vigorous defence of these proposals and we will continue to do so. We are one of 108 countries that are signatories of the GATT. Our share of international trade is somewhat slightly in excess of 3 per cent, leaving 97 per cent in the hands of other signatories by and large of the GATT. It is a difficult challenge.

We have been unswerving in our commitment to the interests of Canadian farmers in this regard. We shall continue with the support of all members of the House, or by and large all members of the House, to defend the interests of Canadian farmers. But we need your support on this because we know there are people here who like to trivialize—they sit in the backbench over there—for their own partisan—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap.

[Translation]

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, as we know, Quebec supplies 45 per cent of Canada's milk production. Therefore this issue is very important economically and also for national unity.

[English]

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether at this time he is going to take his gloves off, whether he is going to get tough with the American bullies at GATT, and whether he is going to tell them enough is enough. Is he going to say to them that Canada's marketing boards are here to stay? Will he do it?

• (1450)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Yes, and then I am going to declare war on them.

An hon. member: You are trivializing the issue.

Mr. Mulroney: Trivializing the issue? We are trying to deal with an extremely sensitive and difficult issue. My hon. friend says I am going to go down to the United States and say: "You are going to do this". We are dealing in a multilateral context in Geneva, not in the United States. The United States supports some of our positions. Japan supports some of our positions. Europe supports some of our positions. We are trying to bring together a coalition that brings together support for article XI and the position of Canadian farmers.

I would tell my hon. friend that unless he has some recent experience, the idea of arriving at the GATT with the United States or the Europeans or the Japanese with gunboat diplomacy in international commercial relations does not work. If we had 97 per cent of the world trade and the other partners 3 per cent, perhaps it would.

We are approaching this with firmness in the honourable traditions of Canadian diplomacy and we are defending this with every amount of vigour that we possibly can. I know my hon. friend will stand in the House, acknowledge that, and say: "Yes, we will support the initiatives of the Government of Canada because they are right; they are right for the farmers and they are right for Canada".

RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

We already know that CN and CP Rail must dispose of certain abandoned rail lines. Several non-profit organizations wish to obtain them to make into bicycle paths for the enjoyment of thousands of cyclists.

Can the minister explain the federal government's position on the disposal of CN properties between Farnham and Granby? Also, can the minister intercede with the authorities of Canadian National so that the current moratorium on the sale of these properties can be extended for a few months?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Brome—Missisquoi for this question, which gives me the opportunity to tell her that I am in complete agreement with the representations made by some 60 towns, I believe, to use the CN lands as bicycle paths in her beautiful riding. I think that is a wonderful use for them.

She can count on our constant support and rest assured that we will take all the time necessary to convince the few municipalities that have not yet embarked on this project, to make sure that they all have time to do so, because it is important that this project be implemented as smoothly as possible.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Across Canada deadly chemicals are being released every day from old damaged and abandoned air conditioners and refrigeration units. Community leaders are on the front line of trying to stop the destruction of the ozone layer and they have asked for the government's help.

Will the minister then, knowing the seriousness of the situation, act immediately? Will he do as the environment committee recommended and bring in programs with the provinces and the municipalities so this can stop immediately?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, let me update the member. We are doing that. In fact we have been ever since we put together the Montreal protocol in 1987. It is under this government that the protocol came together. We set a time frame in the protocol. We then went faster than the time frame that was set in the international convention for the year 2000. We were set to go for 1997.

I am here today to say to the member that we are ready to go further. We think that we can eliminate CFCs by 1995, a good part of them. We are going to push other countries within the international framework to go even further than that.

Furthermore, we are going to do it in co-operation with the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment and the provinces with which we have had a great deal of success in dealing with environmental issues.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians take this problem very seriously; it appears far more seriously and concrete than the minister. This is an emergency.

In 1990 the minister promised that if provincial regulation and voluntary actions did not produce results, Canada would regulate. I did not hear that word from the minister today.

Now that the minister knows this laissez-faire attitude is not working, will he bring in the regulations under the Environmental Protection Act now?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that we be as precise as possible about what we are talking about here. The member refers to the fact that there are chemicals going into the atmosphere, but the recent NASA report seems to say that the cause of this ozone depletion would be relative to the recent eruption of Mount Pinatubo, which is a natural cause.

To put things in perspective, it is important to point out that it is not only man-made chemicals that we are talking about here; it is a natural cause. We are talking about a potential 30 per cent to 40 per cent reduction in the ozone layer. Our scientists, who are world-class, by the way, seem to think that it may be in the area of 15 per cent.

All of that being said, we take this problem very seriously. We have always, always taken this problem very seriously. I will examine the issue with the provinces of whether it is not necessary to regulate and, if we come to the conclusion that is what we need, that is what we will do.

THE CONSTITUTION

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

The last constitutional conference on a renewed Canada will be held in Vancouver the weekend of February 14. I want to ask the Prime Minister how he can justify the conclusion of public debate on the Constitution without having a conference on aboriginal affairs, in light of the overwhelming interest and support of Canadians across this country.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to answer on behalf of the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

I think the hon. member will acknowledge that almost all members in this House have taken very seriously the processes we have put forward. We have very actively sought to include as many people as possible in this process, including the aboriginal communities. In fact we put forward a proposal by which they could participate in some conferences, but I regret to report that only two of the aboriginal communities reported that they were favourable to that. In those circumstances we did not think it was appropriate to go forward.

That being the case, we are still ready to look at any mechanisms that will ensure aboriginal people, as all segments of Canadian society, have their say in this very important debate about the future of our country.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

In previous conferences there were no provisions for aboriginal people. They in fact hijacked the process to get input. There was unanimous consent by the organizations to have a conference on aboriginal affairs.

Having said that, I have in my possession letters from the national organization leaders who would like to have designated the fifth and final conference as an aboriginal conference on aboriginal constitutional agenda.

Will the government reconsider its position and have that conference designated as an aboriginal conference, or will it deny the will of the public again?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, I would want to make sure that I verify with him the exact nature of the communication.

My information in regard to the question raised is that the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, following meetings with the aboriginal leadership, offered to them that one of these conferences be devoted exclusively to questions of aboriginal concern. My information is that that was rejected.

Ms. Blondin: No, he rejected it.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says that the minister rejected it. My information is that the minister did not reject it.

Ms. Blondin: Your minister is lying to you.

Mr. Speaker: That is a completely improper suggestion. I think we are going to have to go on.

Some hon. members: Withdraw, withdraw.

MINING

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Mining exploration in Quebec has been in a free fall for several months and the Quebec Prospectors' Association is attempting once again, before the budget is tabled, to convince Ottawa to restore tax incentives in Canada.

Can the minister tell us today if he intends to implement new measures to revitalize mining exploration in Canada and in Quebec?

• (1500)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to thank the hon. member for the continuing effort he has engaged in, in support of the mining industry, a very important industry in Canada, worth some $25 billion and some 400,000 jobs. I share the concern he has expressed.

There have been meetings with the mining associations. My understanding is that there is an interdepartmental process ongoing which involves Finance, Energy, Mines and Resources, Employment and Immigration, and Industry, Science and Technology to consider the very worth-while suggestions that have been advanced by the associations.

Mr. Speaker: I want to bring a matter to the attention of the House and also the hon. member for Western Arctic.

While the Prime Minister was answering a question that was put to him by the hon. member for Western Arctic, she very clearly said that his minister had lied to him, meaning the Right Hon. Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

I moved immediately to the next member because I was watching the clock, but that is a completely improper allegation. I know the hon. member did not have the floor, but that makes no difference; it was clearly heard. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw.

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my remarks.

PRIVILEGE

REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege relates to the tabling in the House of a report by the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs on June 19, 1990. The committee at that time made certain recommendations to the House and to the government relating to an apology, compensation and recognition of the contribution of the Inuit people who had been transferred from northern Quebec to the community of Grise Fiord up in the High Arctic.

Under Standing Order 109, the committee then called for a response by the government within the prescribed 150 days. As the Speaker will recall, in response to the committee report on November 19, 1990, the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs tabled what he called The Hickling report which contained the government's response to our committee's recommendation. It totally supported the government's position, no apology, no recognition, no compensation.

My problem is in the way the minister described the The Hickling report and its consultant in tabling the report. First, he called the consultant independent and in fact the consultant who did the study, Bud Neville, was a former employee of the Department of Indian and North Affairs between 1957 and 1971, slightly after the time that the relocations took place. The person who did the report was anything but independent.

In addition, he called the consultants themselves, the Hickling consultancy, independent whereas in fact that group had received, according to questions we had answered in the House, over $20 million in government funding.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but the hon. member has sought the floor on a question of privilege. The hon. member may very well have a complaint about what a minister said or did not say, or may have considerable argument about whether or not the person who did the report or others who may have been involved were independent or not independent. That is clearly a matter of debate.

As I say, I treat the matter as a serious matter. The person who did the report and others who may have been involved were independent or not independent. That is clearly a matter of debate. I think it is a serious matter. I wonder if the member could help me in pointing out exactly how this is a question of privilege because I do not see it at the moment.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, if I finish my remarks I think you will see that there is a prima facie case that the privileges of the House have been violated.

It was also explained to us at the time that the consultant had been selected after consultation with the Makivik Corporation. I am told that no consultation took place. In fact the minister or his department presented Makivik with the names of three proposed consultants, two of which Makivik rejected out of hand because they felt that they would be totally biased. They indicated they did not know who the third one was or what his record was. The very fact that they did not know was accepted by Indian affairs as consultation and, in fact—

Mr. Speaker: Again I take nothing away from the merits or otherwise of the debate which the hon. member is well into now, but I think I would be straining the patience of the House if I allowed this to continue.

The hon. member may want to reconsider his position and bring the matter before the Chair again but at the moment I have to say that is not a question of privilege. It is very much a question of debate. It may be a question for the committee but the hon. member is not making out a question of privilege. I would ask him to reconsider his position.

PRIVILEGE

CUSTOMS TARIFF—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I have a judgment to give on a question of privilege.

I would like to advise all hon. members that I am now ready to rule on a question of privilege raised on Monday, February 3, by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River concerning the failure of the Minister of Finance to table an Order in Council pursuant to section 59(5) of the Customs Tariff. The Chair has reviewed this serious issue and thanks the hon. member for his succinct explanation of the case.

[Translation]

As I said during the statement, I would also like to thank the Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt for their interventions.

[English]

In his presentation, the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River correctly pointed out that the Customs Tariff required that an Order in Council respecting the elimination of tariffs on certain plywood and related products under the free trade agreement be tabled in the House of Commons by the Minister of Finance on April 21, 1989 at the latest. This Order in Council was finally tabled on December 12, 1991, some 32 months later. The hon. member did note, however, that this document was registered and published in the Canada Gazette of January 18, 1989, thus being placed in the public domain. He also stated that he was confident that the minister's failure to comply with the law was not intentional. The basis of his complaint was that the non-observance of a legal obligation established for the collective benefit of members of the House amounts to a contempt of the House. Summarizing his argument the hon. member asked:

> In short, does the omission to table a document legally required to be tabled impede or obstruct the House and its members in the discharge of their functions, or does it have the tendency to do so?

This is the question directed to the Chair.

[Translation]

The first point that the Chair wishes to highlight is that Speakers do not interpret or enforce matters of statutory law. There are many precedents to this effect.

• (1510)

On June 19, 1978, a question of privilege was raised respecting the late tabling of the Postmaster General's annual report. In rejecting claims that the failure to respect the law constituted a breach of privilege, Speaker Jerome warned the House that the authority of the Chair did not extend to the determination of questions of law.

On two occasions—March 27, 1981 and February 10, 1983—Speaker Sauvé confirmed this principle in denying claims for the Chair to intervene in cases similar to the one raised by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River. In each of these situations, the government had failed to live up to its statutory responsibility to table documents within a specific period of time. In response, Madam Speaker ruled that the Chair had neither the responsibility to interpret the law nor the authority to compel the government to obey it.

These precedents served to highlight the restrictive nature of the Chair's authority with respect to legal questions. However, while the matter raised on Monday may stem from a statutory requirement, the main thrust of the issue is not of a legal nature, but rather a procedural one. As the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River so aptly stated, "This is a question of fact rather than a question of law". In the manner of his presentation, the situation is different from earlier cases.

Another key element raised by the hon. member relates to the failure of government officials to act on demands for the tabling of this Order in Council. As he explained in his submission:

> It is far too common for public servants to treat tabling requirements as a matter of little or no consequence with the result that over the years, members of this House have repeatedly had to raise the issue of non-compliance with such requirements. The failure of the minister's officials to advise him of his obligations is all the more inexcusable in this case in that the non-tabling of the order was drawn to the attention of an assistant deputy minister in the minister's department in a letter from one of the counsel to the joint committee for the scrutiny of regulations dated May 8, 1989. Officials of the same department were reminded of this on subsequent occasions prior to December 12, 1991.

That is all a quote from the hon. member but I think it very clearly puts his case.

Therefore, in light of the notices given to the department and its failure to comply with the letter of the law, the hon. member claims that a contempt of the House has occurred and that this case should be dealt with as an offence against the authority and dignity of the House.

[Translation]

The Chair wishes to address some other remarks of the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River. The member stated that the purpose of tabling documents in the House "is to require documents to be laid before it in circumstances where it determines that the formal transmission of a document is necessary for members of Parliament to properly discharge their responsibility of holding the executive accountable for its actions". Tabling either by the front door or the back door, whether at the discretion of a minister or because of a legal requirement, is an action of the House and as such it is recorded in the Votes and Proceedings, the official record of the decisions of the House.

It is through tabling that members are officially apprised of the existence of a document. Thus when we include in legislation provisions for tabling, it is not done lightly but is done for a serious purpose.

[English]

The tabling of documents, as specified in our rules, is one of the procedures on which hinges the ability of members to discharge their functions. In particular, with the reform of the rules in 1982, all reports, returns and papers to be laid before the House in accordance with the requirements of the statute are automatically referred to a standing committee pursuant to Standing Order 32(5). Thus, a failure to table any required document has the effect of impeding such committees from carrying out their mandate "to examine and inquire into all such matters as may be referred to them by the House" as stipulated by Standing Order 108(1).

Our capacity as elected representatives is to be ever vigilant and to protect the interests of our electors. The statutory laws which are in force, those which have been adopted by Parliament as a whole, are meant to be respected and serve no purpose if they are ignored. To quote the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, "a right which cannot be enforced is no right at all". The fundamental question that remains to be answered is whether the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade has been interfered with because it had to wait 32 months before being formally seized of the Order in Council.

The Chair has reflected seriously upon this matter. I have examined very carefully the circumstances surrounding this particular case and the argument presented by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River. I note that the hon. member stated that the correspondence in question has been between counsel for the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations and officials from the Department of Finance. It appears that the matter relating to the punctual tabling of these types of Orders in Council lies more appropriately with the committee, at least at the present time. If the committee senses that a contempt has occurred it is within its power to report this fact to the House. Once the House is in receipt of such a report, it can take appropriate action.

Until the Committee has reported on this matter, it could be argued that the House should not be dealing with the particular circumstances of this case. It may be that the Committee is in the process of taking some action or that it is contemplating doing so in the future.

In the view of the Chair, this would be an appropriate way of dealing with this matter for the moment, since the committee has already initiated work in this area and may want to continue its review of this matter. As a result of its work, the Committee may want to report to the House recommending an action for the House to take or it might want to report on what it sees as a contempt, at which time the matter may once again come before the House. Without the benefit of the committee's view on this whole matter, I am reluctant to rule that prima facie a contempt of the House exists at this time.

[English]

I wish to add however a cautionary comment. Since 1985 Standing Order 32(5) was amended to read as follows:

> Reports, returns or other papers laid before the House in accordance with an act of Parliament shall thereupon be deemed to have been permanently referred to the appropriate standing committee.

I have to say—I think I probably speak for the House—those responsible to meet any deadlines for the tabling of documents in the House of Commons provided for in the Statutes of Canada should reflect carefully about the possible consequences of any delay. I thank hon. members for their assistance in this matter.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I begin my remarks by saying that I am not questioning the ruling of the Chair. What I am seeking is some sense of clarification so that I and members in the House will fully understand the consequences of this particular decision. I ask the guidance of the Speaker in directing me to either the proper authorities or reviewing the facts. I did not have a chance to read the documents since the Speaker is the only one who has them.

Am I to understand that when there is an obligation on the part of the member of this House to table a document and there is a breach of that obligation which affects the rights and privileges of all members of Parliament, not just members of Parliament from one particular party, that amounts to a non-compliance by the minister in question?

My question for the Speaker is if these elements have been answered in the affirmative—yes, there was an obligation; yes, there was a breach; yes, the privileges of the member have been breached because he was not able to get the document—that would seem to me to be non-compliance. I ask the Speaker's guidance here. I know it is not an interpretation of law, but would that not be the equivalent of a breach of the privileges of this House? I seek the guidance of the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond seeks the guidance of the Chair. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond also makes a very cogent argument. Perhaps he would have been happy to make that argument a few days earlier.

Whether the hon. member did or not, if the hon. member considers carefully what the Chair said, I think it would be very unwise for anyone to take from the judgment that I have just given that the deliberate refusal to file documents that are to be filed under statute law to committee or to this House would necessarily be treated as not a contempt of the House. If one looks also very carefully at what the Chair has said, I think I have made it clear that I would be prepared to hear further from the committee in question. If there is any need for a further caveat to any assumption that any deliberate refusal to proceed with a mandate of law in filing documents to this House or to these committees, it would be very foolish to assume that the Chair in all circumstances would be mute.

I do not think I need any further comment from hon. members.

Mr. Dingwall: Would the Chair entertain a question?

Mr. Speaker: I listened very carefully to the hon. member and there are, of course, skilful ways to extend an argument past a judgment. I tried to make it very clear. If hon. members will look carefully at what I said and if those who serve ministers in departments will look very carefully at what I said, I do not think there will be too much doubt in anybody's mind that consequences could indeed be very serious.

At the moment I suggested that the committee might look at it again. Depending on what the committee decides, I may hear the matter further.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

21ST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 21st report of the Standing Committee on House Management pursuant to Standing Order 104. If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in this report later this day.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PUBLIC SERVICE NATIONAL WEEK ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-328, an act respecting a national week of the Public Service.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mrs. Catterall: Very briefly, this bill is presented because Canada has developed as a result of a very dynamic and flexible partnership between the public sector and the private sector a partnership that is even more crucial as we face the difficult economic times in this country and the challenges of the future.

The bill is presented in recognition of the value of the services provided by public service employees, acknowledges their contributions, and asks that the third week of the month of June every year be known as Public Service National Week.

Mr. Speaker: Mrs. Catterall moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

CONCURRENCE IN 21ST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if the House gives its consent, I move that the 21st report of the Standing Committee on House Management, presented to the House earlier this day, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

SPECIAL DEBATE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the various parties and members of the House respecting a special debate process regarding the Constitution.

I believe you will find consent for the following motion:

That notwithstanding any Standing Order of this House, on February 6, 10, 11 and 13, 1992, upon the completion of the adjournment debate, or at the ordinary hour of daily adjournment if no adjournment debate is held, the House will continue to sit until 10 p.m. for the sole purpose of allowing members to make presentations on the results of discussions they have had with their constituents on the constitutional issue;

That, for the purposes of this special debate, the question before the House shall be "That this House do now adjourn";

That no member be permitted to speak more than once under the provisions of this order and for a period not to exceed 10 minutes; that members be permitted to table any document which supports their verbal presentation; and that all such presentations and documents be deemed referred to the Standing Joint Committee on the Government of Canada's proposals for a renewed Canada;

That, under the provisions of this order, the Speaker not entertain any dilatory motions or quorum calls; and

That under the provisions of this order, when no member rises to speak, but no later than 10 p.m., the Speaker shall adjourn the House until the next sitting day.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity to read and to hear the motion that was put forward. We are of course totally in favour of having members of this House make their views known on the subject of the Constitution. I simply want to submit this to you, Mr. Speaker. Every evening there should be at least two spots for members of the Bloc Quebecois and the independent members to make their comments before this House since we were not allowed to sit on the special joint committee. You could also benefit from our experience. With that in mind, we would be very happy to give unanimous consent, provided of course we are guaranteed full participation in the debate, which we were denied in the special joint committee.

• (1530)

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his indication of consent. It is difficult for me to assure him a guaranteed two spots per evening, but I do want to indicate to him very clearly that we will co-operate in every way to make sure that they have a full opportunity to participate and if in fact on one of the evenings there are four or five slots, they are welcome to take those as well.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would gladly give our consent to the motion, but I have just a point of clarification to the parliamentary secretary of the government House leader.

In terms of the tabling of documents, they were deemed to have been referred to the Standing Joint Committee on the Government of Canada's Proposals for a Renewed Canada. I presuppose that after the tabling of those documents there will be the appropriate indexing of those documents so that if constituents or others wish to find out in fact where their documents have been, they will be cross-referenced appropriately under the joint standing committee. Is that correct?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for raising that point because it is a very important and valid one.

First of all, I want to indicate that they would become documents of the committee the same as any other documents and therefore under their referencing process.

One of the things that I think is very important that we want to be very clear on, is that we are not asking that these documents be treated as Hansard documents and thus have to be put through the whole translation process, but that the members would be able to table their documents in the language of their choice and they would then become the documents of the committee and cross-referenced as such.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to lend my voice in terms of support of this motion and to say that it seems to me this is a very appropriate use of the House to permit an opportunity for members of Parliament, wherever they happen to live, who have taken time to hold various forms of assemblies or meetings in their constituencies, to be able to report on behalf of their constituents.

I join in this new approach to House time with considerable enthusiasm.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I share the thoughts and was most interested when the hon. parliamentary secretary stood. I was not quite sure what type of motion was coming. I was glad to hear the contents of the motion. I did not get all the dates, but I gather this starts tomorrow night and then goes for several other nights. I will read it tomorrow.

I certainly do want to compliment the parliamentary secretary as one of the hardest working members in this House.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nowlan: No, no. I say that. I do not always agree with what he does and I perhaps sit over here because of that, but I want to compliment him. I do share the views of the member for Kamloops that this is the proper procedure, to try to get more of a collegial, non-confrontational situation in this House with all the problems that we do have, especially on a subject like this. I share some of the concerns of my friends from the Bloc Quebecois, but certainly with the time of 6.30 to ten o'clock on the days enumerated, with 10 minutes each, that gives a good focus and members who wish should certainly have the opportunity to participate.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I hope not to take much more time of the House. I have here a couple of travel motions that are necessary to change dates for committee travel that we had as a House previously approved, and also a reference to a committee.

I move:

That notwithstanding the order made on December 3, 1991, the Subcommittee on Arms Export of the Standing Committee of External Affairs and International Trade be authorized to travel to Winnipeg and Victoria from March 23 to 27, 1992 instead of February 10 to 14, 1992.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if I can, I will just proceed seriatim so that we save the time of the House.

I move:

That, notwithstanding the order made December 12, 1991, the Standing Committee on Public Accounts be authorized to travel to Washington, D.C. from February 25 to 27, 1992 instead of February 9 to 12, 1992.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That, notwithstanding any order or practice of this House, the annual report of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991, which was deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs on February 3, 1992, be deemed referred as well to the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development.

Mr. Speaker: On the same point, does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House? Is it agreed?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary apparently does not have the unanimous consent of the House.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, I have to refuse unanimous consent. We have not been consulted in any way. We would appreciate next time around to be consulted so that we from the Bloc Quebecois know ahead of time what is going on and decide on our course of action. For the time being, the answer is no.

PETITIONS

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions this afternoon. One is from a number of residents of the North Thompson Valley in British Columbia who indicate their opposition to the intention to dam the North Thompson River and divert some of the water into the California area. They are asking the Government of Canada to state categorically that our river water is not for sale in this fashion to the Americans.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, a number of constituents from the Kamloops region of British Columbia are concerned about the rumours of RCMP cutbacks. They are asking that we ensure the RCMP obtain proper funding so it will be able to fulfil its mandate and role as the only police force for communities across British Columbia and remain as a viable symbol of Canadian unity.

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36. I have the signatures of several thousand people who feel that there are serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system. Many vulnerable persons have little protection under the current system. It is women, children and disabled persons who are at particular risk.

These petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and they request that the government amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have two petitions to present to the House today.

The first petition is from a number of residents of my riding, in particular from Penticton through the Okanagan Valley, with respect to the rural communications matter. They urge the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's present bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies' long distance service and also urge the Minister of Communications to hold local hearings in our communities before deciding the fate of the telecommunications system in Canada.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): The next petition is from a number of residents throughout my riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

While the subject has been somewhat dealt with in recent developments involving the Solicitor General and the RCMP in various provinces, they are still concerned about the continuation of RCMP services within the province of British Columbia and urge the government to consider restoring proper funding to the RCMP so it can continue to fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible police force for communities across British Columbia and remain as a viable symbol of Canadian unity.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is an honour and a privilege to present a petition on behalf of hundreds of residents of the riding of Elk Island in Alberta calling upon Parliament to amend the Income Tax Act such that child related benefits and deductions for child care are fair and equitable to all family structures based on financial need and irrespective of child care choice.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to introduce a petition signed by constituents in the Ottawa area who are appalled at the fact that they are paying more for gasoline than those in any other part of Ontario.

• (1540)

They would like the federal government to examine ways to correct this injustice by amending the Competition Act.

TAXATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions with which I shall deal briefly.

The first concerns the Income Tax Act and points out that receipted day care can be deducted for certain families, while there are no options available for families who choose other alternatives.

The petitioners also point out a contradiction between married couples and common law couples. They would hope that married couples would enjoy the same kind of benefits. They feel that this difference in treatment is unfair and point out that the legislation is piecemeal, contradictory and disorganized. The petitioners want some changes.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is from more than 150 students from the University of Winnipeg.

The petitioners point out that education ought to be available to all Canadians who have the will and the ability to pursue post-secondary education opportunities, not just those who have the financial means.

The petitioners point out that the government talks about competitiveness and productivity, but they—

Mr. Speaker: Under the rules hon. members will have to rise. I would ask the hon. member to put his petition as briefly as possible.

Mr. Duhamel: The petitioners would like the current legislation rescinded so that financing to post-secondary education is not removed.

Mr. Speaker, I have another petition on education from students from Brandon making the same points.

As well, they deplore the 3 per cent administrative fee on student aid. They feel that the current government legislation is inappropriate and does not lead to additional competitiveness and increased productivity.

UKRAINE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my fourth and second last petition has been delayed for a number of reasons.

The petitioners call upon the government to recognize the independence of Ukraine. Of course, we know that has now been achieved, as have full diplomatic relations. We wish the Ukrainian people well.

JUSTICE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my final petition is on behalf of a number of constituents who are reacting to the murder of Nina de Villiers.

This petition now has over 200,000 signatures. The petitioners point out that violence of any type is unacceptable and call upon the government to change the various pieces of legislation such as the Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act, as well as the Criminal Code of Canada with respect to violent crimes.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition by residents of my riding of Scarborough—Agincourt against the proposed Canada—U.S.—Mexico agreement.

My constituents have no faith in the government. In 1988—

Mr. Speaker: The rule says that the member presenting a petition may briefly describe the petition. The rule makes it very clear that the member is not supposed to get into debate. The reason is that no other member can rise. I would ask the hon. member to let the House know what the petitioners are asking for.

Mr. Karygiannis: Mr. Speaker, the petitioners in my riding are asking that this proposed Canada—U.S.—Mexico free trade agreement be stopped so Canadians can get back to work.

JUSTICE

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I too have the honour, the privilege and the duty to present to this House a petition certified correct by the clerk of Petitions.

The petition contains signatures in addition to the some 200,000 signatures already presented to this House of Commons. The petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, my first petition supports the previous petitions that have been tabled.

The petition calls upon Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I have two other petitions, both of which urge the Minister of Employment and Immigration to issue ministers' permits for spouses and dependent children of persons who have been determined to be convention refugees and allow them to be reunited in Canada through inland processing.

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Cardigan, Prince Edward Island, who work or have a great interest in the fishing industry. The petitioners wish to indicate the slip for the wharf at Graham's Pond, Prince Edward Island, is in a state of disrepair; whereas it is the responsibility of the government to maintain basic public facilities, wherefore, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the government to ensure all necessary repairs be made to the slip at the small craft harbours facility at Graham's Pond, Prince Edward Island.

JUSTICE

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I rise, like my colleagues, to present two petitions from a number of constituents from my riding who are appalled at the circumstances which led to the death of Nina de Villiers. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass legislation which will ensure that such violent crimes never happen again.

It has been stated many times in this House that there is a need for more stringent legislation and we hope the House will address itself to that.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by residents of the national capital region who ask the government to deal with the cost of fuel in the national capital region.

As you very well know, several studies showed that the price of gasoline was much higher in the national capital region than in other places in Canada.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would really like the government to deal with this matter and set it right.

[English]

JUSTICE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have a petition from residents of the greater Toronto area whereby they cite failures in the criminal justice system and the correctional system which have put ordinary Canadians at greater risk to their safety and their lives. They ask the government to enact reforms to the Criminal Code, the Parole Act and the Corrections Act.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by many people who live in Ottawa, Arnprior, Richmond, Nepean and other cities and towns in the Ottawa Valley. They complain that gasoline prices are considerably higher in the Ottawa region than in southern Ontario.

The petitioners humbly ask Parliament to urge the government to correct this injustice done to motorists in the Ottawa area.

Question No. 198—Mr. Peterson:

Since the implementation of the Postal and Courier Remission Orders of 1986 to date (a) what is the total number of shipments received into Canada under these provisions free of all federal tax and duty (b) what is the total value of these shipments (c) what is the total loss of federal revenues from these tax and duty-free imports?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue):

(a) Customs and Excise does not maintain detailed statistical data (i.e. volumes, values and remitted revenues) on the Postal and Courier Imports Remission Orders. However, it is estimated that, in 1991, 27 million parcels were released under the Postal Imports Remission Order (PIRO) and 2 million parcels under the Courier Imports Remission Order (CIRO).

(b) Assuming an average value of $20 per parcel, and deducting 4.5 million gifts sent by mail, the total value of PIRO shipments in 1991 would be $450 million and the value of CIRO shipments would be $40 million.

(c) Assuming an average combined duty and tax rate of 12%, the total revenue remitted in 1991 under PIRO would be $54 million and under CIRO it would be $4.8 million.

These orders were originally introduced in 1986 as a cost saving measure for the government in respect of the processing of very low valued postal and courier importations. At that time, it cost the department approximately $10 to process, classify and collect duties and taxes on such shipments. Therefore, it was determined that for the vast majority of transactions involved, the cost of collecting significantly exceeded the revenue lost. In keeping with government priorities of fiscal responsibility and administrative efficiency, $40 was chosen as the appropriate limit at that time.

The government has established an interdepartmental committee to investigate fully and make recommendations respecting the effect these orders are having on the Canadian mail order industry.

Is the government aware that the United States government is not eliminating its existing customs user fees as specified in Article 403 of the Canada–United States Free Trade Agreement and, if so, what action is the government taking to ensure American compliance with Article 403 of the FTA?

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Under article 403 of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement (FTA), each party to the agreement is prohibited from introducing customs user fees with respect to goods originating in the territory of the other party. In addition, the U.S. undertook to eliminate existing customs user fees on goods originating in Canada. In that regard, the U.S. is phasing out its merchandise processing fee on schedule and will eliminate it entirely by January 1, 1994. The removal of this fee is an important achievement of the FTA, as it will save Canadian exporters an estimated $400 million in the 1990–94 period and an estimated $200 million a year thereafter.

Question No. 202—Mr. Bellemare:

With respect to the goods and services tax, (a) how much money has been collected by the government from January 1, 1991 to December 31, 1991, or to the date at which this question is answered, whichever comes first (b) what portion of the funds collected during that period was applied to the reduction of the national debt?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): With respect to the goods and services tax:

(a) For the period January 1—March 31/91 (1990–91 fiscal year), net GST revenues collected amounted to $2.573 billion.

For the period April 1—November 30/91 (1991–92 fiscal year), net GST collected amounted to $9.603 billion. (Government of Canada: Financial Results, November 1991, published by the Department of Finance: These are the most recent published revenue figures.)

(b) The debt servicing reduction bill (C–21), currently referred to the House of Commons finance committee, provides for the establishment of the Debt Servicing and reduction account. All GST revenues net of the applicable rebates and credits, net proceeds from the sale of Crown corporations and gifts to the Crown identified for debt reduction will be credited to this account. Revenues in this account will be used only to pay interest on the public debt and ultimately public debt.

Question No. 205—Mr. Bellemare:

With respect to the manufacturer sales tax from January 1, 1990 to December 31, 1990, (a) how much money was collected by the government (b) what was the total value of the costs related to the administration of that tax?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): With respect to the manufacturers' sales tax:

(a) From January 1, 1990, to December 31, 1990, the net federal sales tax collected totalled $17.3 billion.

(b) From January 1, 1990 to December 31, 1990, the costs related to the administration of this tax totalled $66.9 million.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have given notice for an emergency debate. I wish to ask leave to move adjournment of the House for the purposes of discussing a matter of urgency, namely that immediate steps must be made by the government to preserve Canada's supply management farm marketing boards. They are now under serious threat at the GATT negotiations in Geneva. I further ask that the government deal with the entire crisis facing the agrifood industry and the family farm in Canada.

At stake here is a $10.2 billion industry for our farm commodities of dairy products, eggs, poultry and others, and also some 97,000 jobs. The very secure supply of domestically produced dairy and poultry products is at stake. The viability of our most successful and productive farm sectors is at stake.

More important, the viability of literally thousands of communities across Canada is at stake, and that is why I ask for this emergency debate.

• (1550)

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday you were not in the chair. I made reference to the fact that with regard to Standing Order 52 and applications made pursuant to that order, I wanted to avail myself of the opportunity to put a few comments on the record with regard to the discretion that the Speaker has in terms of determining whether or not there ought to be a debate under this particular provision.

I would like to proceed at this time if I may. My points are fairly brief and succinct and I would like to put them to the Chair before the Chair makes a decision with regard to this application.

Mr. Speaker: I certainly do not want to cut off discussion on a matter of interpretation of any rule. My difficulty now is that I have an application in front of me and the rule is very clear. There is to be no argument and the matter is to be put forward succinctly, as the hon. member for Algoma has done.

I do not know that it would be appropriate or proper, since I have now heard the application and have not yet ruled, to hear discussion on how the rule might or might not be interpreted. I am certainly prepared to hear that on another occasion, but I wonder if the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond can satisfy me that I ought to hear a discussion now on the rule in front of me when the application under the rule is before me. That is my difficulty.

I will hear the hon. member further.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, it certainly would be my preference to speak before the Chair makes a decision. However I perfectly understand the dilemma the Chair is in. If the Chair wishes to proceed with making a decision on this particular application, I would be only too happy to wait and then offer my particular views on the interpretation that I have with regard to Standing Order 52.

Mr. Speaker: All right. I think we are also going to have a limited debate on the order and I would now like to ask the consent of the House to do so.

Mr. Dingwall: It is a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, it is a point of order in one sense but how long does it go on?

I am going to make the ruling now on this matter.

First of all, the hon. member for Algoma is not the only member who has brought the matter to the attention of the Chair this week. The matter has received a certain amount of attention in the Chamber and certainly today.

There is no question that the matter is a serious one. I am not inclined to say today that it meets the question of emergency which I have to look at.

I am going to say to the hon. member for Algoma that I will continue to pay very close attention to what was said. Not accepting the application today does not mean that the member is precluded from bringing it up at another time.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond rises on a point of order and I know that he wants to get into a discussion as to what this order means. Perhaps I could ask the hon. member how long he expects to be on this matter.

Mr. Dingwall: Well, Mr. Speaker, I expect, since it is now six minutes to four, that I would be no longer than five minutes, and possibly three minutes, with regard to a point of order which I believe is close to the heart of Standing Order 52, which is the discretion exercised by the Chair.

I thought the Speaker might want to entertain some thoughts that we in the Official Opposition have regarding a very important matter.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as I am sure you are aware, this issue was raised yesterday or the day before by way of a forewarning by the House leader for the Liberal Party.

I indicated at that time I had some concerns because it sounded to me like he was entering into a debate about a particular Standing Order and possible changes or interpretations of it. I continue to have those concerns because if it is a matter of a change to the Standing Orders, then we have a number of vehicles that are available for that, such as the management committee.

I am quite concerned, Mr. Speaker, that we get into a debate that I am not sure is really a proper debate via a point of order. I think there are other vehicles by which we could discuss it, and we certainly would be happy on this side to discuss it with him. I, personally, would be quite prepared to discuss it with the hon. member and the Speaker and whoever else might be interested in this subject.

Mr. Speaker: My sense of things at the moment is that it would be better at least if the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and the parliamentary secretary discuss the matter. They might want to indicate to me if they wish to pursue the specific question of the order itself at an appropriate time.

My disposition against getting into a discussion now is that it is going to be very difficult to have a discussion on this order without it being tied to the decision which I have just had to make. I think it would be better for the House if that did not take place at this moment.

I would ask the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond if he would like to consider his position and perhaps give me some indication tomorrow morning if he wants to pursue the matter.

Mr. Dingwall: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I wish to proceed tomorrow at the first opportunity with regard to this particular provision. I believe it is a legitimate point of order and what better place to raise a point of order than in the House with colleagues opposite. It would take four or five minutes and may in some circles be of some assistance to the Chair. It is not an attempt to perform or put forward a dilatory motion in any respect. It is a legitimate attempt to raise a point of order on a very important procedure in this House, namely emergency debates pursuant to Standing Order 52.

So, yes to the question as raised by the Chair. Tomorrow would be fine, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member immediately after Routine Proceedings tomorrow. I appreciate his co-operation. I am also cognizant of what the hon. parliamentary secretary has said.

With respect to the order, the difficulty that the Chair has with the order is that there is very little guidance to the Chair. There is the element of emergency. It has to be clearly understood that often, as a consequence, matters that are very serious may not necessarily get accepted. I will hear the hon. member tomorrow. I am sure the hon. parliamentary secretary or others may have some comments which may assist us. However, and I know the hon. member will keep this in mind tomorrow, I am bound by the rules as they appear in front of me. If changes are to be made, then of course that is a matter for members to agree upon.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION ACT

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)) moved that Bill C-48, an act to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to lead off the debate on Bill C–48. This bill contains amendments to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act that will expand the range of options available to the government for dealing with troubled financial institutions. These amendments will give the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation the authority to arrange and carry out the sale of troubled federally regulated financial institutions to a healthy institution.

At the outset I would like to say that one of the things we discovered when we went back to our ridings and talked about what goes on in the House, whether it be Question Period or debates in the House of Commons, is that we as parliamentarians take for granted that those who are watching us on television know what we are talking about.

Therefore, if I might for just a brief second explain that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, which is a Crown corporation under the responsibility of the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization, provides insurance for depositors, for people who invest their money in financial institutions. It provides insurance coverage of up to $60,000 for each depositor.

Today we are talking about and I will be speaking on amendments to the act which allow the CDIC, the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation, some methods of further ensuring the safety of the deposits of Canadians in financial institutions. That is what we are going to be talking about today.

I am sure that hon. members will recall that we first proposed some restructuring of the financial institutions in a blue paper on financial sector reform.

My colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is here today. I believe that she as Minister of State for Finance, started that process. I am pleased that she is here today to see that the reform she started is carrying on.

That proposal followed a report from then Mr. Justice Bud Estey who examined the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank failures. As a result of that examination, Judge Estey concluded that existing procedures and powers for dealing with failing institutions needed to be enhanced.

Major elements of the reforms set out in the blue paper have already been considered and endorsed by this House. It is now time to complete this process of reform and give speedy passage to this remaining piece of legislation.

[Translation]

Major elements of the reforms set out in the blue paper have already been considered and endorsed by this House. It is time now to complete the process of reform already begun and to give speedy passage to the other amendments contained in the bill.

[English]

As the federal deposit insurer, CDIC can be exposed to substantial potential losses when the financial difficulties of a member institution lead to the erosion of the institution's capital. This bill adds to CDIC's capacity to control exposure to loss by giving CDIC the necessary means and procedures to act in a timely manner to restructure a failing institution. The result will be a more cost effective deposit insurance system. Participants in this system, including depositors and CDIC member institutions, stand to benefit.

The quick resolution of difficulties which may arise at deposit taking institutions holds an additional benefit for depositors. The period of uncertainty and speculation which can be created by the prospect of a failing institution can be avoided if action is promptly taken. This bill makes it possible to deal more effectively with failing institutions and reduce disruptions in Canadians' financial dealings.

Before describing these new measures more fully, allow me to take a moment to note the ways in which the federal government can deal with a deposit taking institution in serious financial difficulty.

If this troubled financial institution lacks the financial resources needed to solve its difficulties, it generally faces one of two prospects. One is liquidation; the other is the sale or merger of its operation with a healthy institution.

In liquidation the institution is broken up and its assets are sold. The sale proceeds go toward paying the institution's liabilities.

On the other hand, if a buyer or merger partner is found, the institution's business can be preserved and liabilities will be paid as they come due.

Madam Speaker, a deposit taking institution's branches and the relationships formed between the institution and its customers are among its most important assets.

[English]

When a troubled deposit-taking institution is closed and subsequently liquidated, its relationships with customers, both depositors and borrowers, will be cut off and the value of the branch network reduced. If the institution's branches are well established, this may mean not only a disruption of many people's financial affairs but also may considerably reduce the net worth of the institution by destroying its value as a going concern.

Preserving maximum value in a troubled deposit taking institution is in the best interest of the institution's depositors and creditors and the deposit insurer. However, once a deposit taking institution's capital falls below a certain level, shareholders may find themselves in a position in which they have little left to lose by the institution's further decline. At this stage declines in the value of the assets of the institution will be borne more and more by the creditors of the institution, its uninsured depositors and the deposit insurer. This can lead to a situation in which the shareholders' ability to block a sale or merger can be used to extract payment from CDIC or public authorities.

Though the shares of the institution have little or no value at this point, CDIC may find that it has to pay shareholders more than the true value of the shares to get them to agree to a transaction which preserves the value of the failing institution.

Bill C-48 contains measures to deal with this situation and gives federal authorities more control over the cost of resolving serious financial difficulties which may arise. The measures in this bill accomplish this goal while still respecting the rights of shareholders.

The restructuring process vests all ownership rights in the troubled institution in CDIC and makes CDIC responsible for managing the institution's restructuring. As sole shareholder, CDIC can approve any restructuring proposal. This could include the sale of the shares of the institution to one or more buyers, an amalgamation of the institution with another, or the sale of its assets and liabilities. Shareholders and subordinated debt holders will be compensated for the value of their shares and debt claims.

CDIC's use of the new restructuring measures will be guided by the pursuit of the objectives set out for CDIC in its act. These objectives are to provide deposit insurance, to promote high standards of business and financial practices, to promote the stability and competitiveness of the financial system in Canada, and to pursue these objectives for the benefit of depositors and in a manner which minimizes CDIC's exposure to loss.

These objectives provide assurance that the competitiveness and stability of the financial system, as well as the cost to CDIC, will be prime factors in determining how to resolve financial difficulties which may arise at CDIC member institutions.

The new powers granted to CDIC in this bill are appropriate, given the risk that CDIC bears and given the need to take decisive action when serious financial difficulties arise.

Nevertheless, these powers require that they be balanced by measures which ensure that shareholders and holders of subordinated debt are treated fairly.

The restructuring provisions in this bill accomplish this in two ways.

First, there is a set of conditions precedent which must be considered before a financial institution restructuring process can be ordered. These conditions and the series of approvals required will prevent premature or arbitrary use of the power to restructure troubled deposit taking institutions.

Second, shareholders and subordinated debt holders of an institution that is restructured will be compensated according to the value remaining in the shares or debt. This is assured by their right to request that an independent assessor be appointed to determine what fair compensation is.

These safeguards are very important features of this bill.

Now let me take a few moments to describe in greater detail how they will work.

Before the authority to restructure a troubled financial institution can be used, certain conditions must be considered and a detailed procedure involving the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Minister of Finance and the federal cabinet must be followed.

The first step is the superintendent's judgment of the financial condition of the troubled institution. Specifically the superintendent must determine that the institution has ceased or is about to cease to be viable and that there is no regulatory power that the superintendent can use to restore or preserve the viability of the institution. The superintendent must then report to CDIC on the condition of this institution.

I might say that these two organizations do co–operate greatly and meet together with myself, the minister responsible, on a monthly basis to review the situation with our financial institutions.

CDIC must in turn decide whether it is appropriate to recommend to the Minister of Finance that the troubled institution be restructured. In making this decision, CDIC must be satisfied that a restructuring is consistent with the objectives set out in its act.

If CDIC recommends a restructuring of the troubled institution, the minister must assess the financial condition of the institution question and be satisfied that it has ceased, or is about to cease to be viable. Only then may the minister recommend to the Governor in Council that a restructuring order be made.

The assessment of the institution by the superintendent and the minister will be guided by criteria which will be set out in the act for owners and operators of financial institutions.

Put simply, the criteria will describe an institution that is no longer capable of continuing on its own. Evidence of this condition may include the institution's excessive dependence on financial assistance to sustain its operation, the loss of the public's and depositors' confidence, substantial impairment of capital, and the institution's inability to pay its liabilities.

These criteria give clear guidance to all concerned that the restructuring authority provided in the bill should only be used when the condition of the institution warrants.

The conditions which must be considered before an institution can be restructured are coupled in the bill with measures to ensure that when an institution is restructured, shareholders and subordinated debt holders will be treated fairly.

Most important among these are the measures dealing with compensation. Where the shares and subordinated debt of a restructured institution have value, their holders will be offered compensation from CDIC. If 10 per cent or more of a class of shareholders or subordinated debt holders feel that CDIC's offer is too low, they will have the option of seeking the appointment of an independent assessor to determine what is fair compensation.

The assessor, who will be a judge, will have full powers to hear evidence and will be given broad terms of reference for determining the appropriate level of compensation. If, for example, the assessor finds that a higher level of compensation should be paid then CDIC will be required to pay.

We have tried to strike a balance in this bill between the objectives of economic and financial stability on one hand and respect for the normal property rights of shareholders and subordinate debt holders on the other. I am confident, after working on this bill for some time, that we have achieved such a balance.

I would like to turn now to some other features of this bill. The bill contains a small number of amendments which are not directly related to the financial institution restructuring process. The first of these is aimed at improving the flow of information about deposit insurance to customers of financial institutions. Until the existing CDIC act, employees of CDIC member institutions could not provide even the most basic information about deposit insurance to customers. The amendment will improve this situation by allowing CDIC member institutions to provide their customers with more information regarding deposit insurance. This is an important step toward improving the public's understanding of deposit insurance coverage and, I might add, is welcomed by the industry.

The second amendment provides for an increase in CDIC's borrowing limit from the Consolidated Revenue Fund to $6 billion. The last increase was in 1987 when the limit was raised to $3 billion. Since then, insured deposits in our financial institutions in Canada have grown by 50 per cent. The proposed increase will accommodate this growth and cover anticipated increases in insured deposits over the next few years.

Other amendments are of a more technical nature but are nonetheless important for CDIC's operations. These amendments will give CDIC greater flexibility to make by-laws to promote a common standard of business practice and conditions of insurance coverage among the member institutions.

The amendments contained in this bill will permit the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation to carry out its mandate more effectively. The process set out in this bill for the restructuring of federal deposit taking institutions will contribute to the health and stability of the financial system and help control the cost of the deposit insurance system.

Other changes in Bill C-48 will support the important goals of achieving common standards of business and financial practices and providing the public with greater access to information on deposit insurance. I look forward to the participation in the debate of colleagues from the opposition benches. They have been afforded and have taken up the offer to be briefed by departmental officials. I hope their questions and concerns have been answered to their satisfaction.

I look forward to the debate. I believe that once the bill is carefully examined, all parties will see its wisdom and ensure its passage in a reasonable period of time.

I understand that consultations have been taken with the opposition parties and therefore I move:

> That pursuant to Standing Order 73(3), Bill C-48, an act to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Motion agreed to.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I have listened with interest to the hon. minister and his comments regarding the amendments to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, Bill C-48, that we have before us this afternoon.

First of all I want to say that we in the Liberal Party will be supporting this legislation at second reading. Its purpose is to give the federal government the power to try to save a failing bank or trust company by seizing the assets of the institution and either restructuring the company or arranging a merger with a healthy institution.

At present, one of the problems with the present legislation is that the regulator does not have the power to intervene early enough in some cases to protect the shareholders, consumers and the debt holders.

I said that we on this side of the House will support this legislation at second reading, but there are a number of issues that we will want to address when this legislation goes to committee.

One of those issues is how to prevent regulators from using their new powers arbitrarily. In other words, we want to make sure that they do not abuse this power by moving too quickly or prematurely to take over the assets of a trust company or a bank.

On the other hand, we do not want to see banks or trust companies go under. People lose money: creditors, depositors, and shareholders.

As well, many people would be laid off. In this industry the banks and trust companies employ over 400,000 Canadians across this country. The importance of keeping Canadians at work becomes even more important when we are in a recession as we are today where we have 1.5 million Canadians unemployed.

We want to be very cautious about giving these regulators the massive powers outlined under Bill C–48. We will spend a lot of time in committee studying it very closely.

I believe that the alternative to this would be worse, in other words if we did not pass this legislation. The situation that we presently have is that the regulators do not have the power to intervene early enough in some cases to protect our consumers, our depositors and our shareholders adequately.

I see no reason to hold up the second reading of this legislation. Before I begin discussing Bill C–48, I would like to put this legislation in historical context.

In 1985, I am sure that we all recall the two western banks that failed: Canadian Commercial and the Northland. That prompted an inquiry by the government. In August 1986, the Hon. Mr. Justice Willard Estey submitted his report. In that report he argued that the public would be well served if regulators had the power to force a bank or a trust company that is facing bankruptcy or insolvency, to restructure or to merge with another financial institution.

Mr. Justice Estey proposed that the regulator would have the responsibility by statute to recommend which course of action—liquidation or a merger or restructuring—would be appropriate in the circumstances and to seek the authority of the Minister of Finance to proceed. That was in August of 1986.

In December 1986 the government produced a blue paper. It looked as though it was going to move very quickly on the recommendation of Mr. Justice Estey, but all we received was a blue paper.

In that paper they proposed the recommendation that if an institution, a bank or a trust company is faced with insolvency, the federal cabinet would have the power to give control of the institution to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

According to the blue paper, conditions would be set out. In other words, it would be very clear as to when they would have the power to do this. Also, it would be spelled out how the creditors and the shareholders would be compensated. That was back in 1986 and here we are six years later, after that blue paper, and the government has finally tabled this recommendation and this legislation we have before us, Bill C–48.

The question is: Why did the government wait for six years? That is a question that is very difficult for me to understand because this is something that is extremely important to the financial industry.

I want to detail some of the main points of Bill C–48, paying particular attention to the restructuring process. That is the main thrust of the bill. Of the 20–page bill most of it is devoted to this restructuring.

Before I do that, I want to take a minute and talk about the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation which was established in 1967 to provide insurance for depositors who put their money into banks or trust companies. That insurance covers up to $60,000. Really, it is an insurance for deposits or for people who put their money into banks and trust companies in this country and, therefore, it helps to promote the stability of the Canadian financial system.

The Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation is financed by the premiums that are paid by the banks and trust companies that belong to this corporation. It does insure over 150 Canadian financial institutions.

The Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, as well as insuring deposits, guarantees loans to unhealthy financial institutions and it prescribes the standards of sound business and financial practice for financial institutions.

Of course, working closely with this corporation is the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, because he has to inspect and regulate the federal financial institutions that are under this corporation.

This restructuring process, as I mentioned, really provides that a bank or a trust company that is facing bankruptcy or insolvency can be seized by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation which will then restructure or merge it with a healthy institution.

In order to ensure that these special powers are used appropriately, in other words that they are not used unjustly and the corporation does not act prematurely, the legislation sets out a lot of conditions. For example, the corporation must get a report from the Superintendent of Financial Institutions stating that the financial institution is no longer viable.

Then the corporation has to take that report to the Minister of Finance and convince him that the institution must be seized, that they can arrange a rescue package and that it has a potential buyer or merger partner.

• (1630)

Before the finance minister can agree or disagree he must hear from the directors of the financial institutions so that they have their opportunity to put their case before the minister.

If the minister still agrees with the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation then the corporation takes over the institution and the shareholders and the debt holders are offered compensation, if there is any value left in the institution.

Each individual shareholder and debt holder can decide whether he or she going to take that compensation. If over 10 per cent reject the offer, an independent assessor will be appointed who determines whether the offer was fair and, if not, what the amount of money should be.

That is a summary of the restructuring process. Certainly it is not perfect, but it does try to strike a balance on the one hand between the need for decisive action to save a failing financial institution. As I said, presently and in the past the regulator has not had the power to go in there in some cases as quickly as he probably should have. It tries to strike a balance between the need for decisive action to save a financial institution and on the other hand the need to respect the rights of that institution's shareholders and debt holders. That is not an easy balance to find. However I think this legislation has come up with a reasonable balance. It is one that we will be looking at very closely in the committee.

There are some other elements in the bill as well. For example, other measures include that the corporation's line of credit will be increased to $6 billion from $3 billion. That is money which the corporation lends at market prices to carry out such duties as financing a merger or compensating depositors or shareholders or debt holders. Since 1987 the level of deposits of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation has increased by more than 50 per cent. That makes it necessary to increase this line of credit.

Another important measure contained in this bill will mean that bank and trust company staff will be able to tell their customers which products are insured under Canada deposit insurance. As it presently stands, Madam Speaker, if you go into a bank or a trust company and you want to find out what particular products are insured under Canada deposit insurance, they cannot tell you. All they can do is give you a pamphlet. Sometimes those pamphlets are very confusing. Sometimes it is very difficult to know just exactly what is included, what you can have insured up to $60,000.

This is a very important step. It is going to make it much more convenient for customers because they will be able to ask personnel at the bank or the trust company and receive an answer as to yes, it is insured or no, it is not insured.

This legislation affects banks and trust companies. It is interesting to read their comments on how they feel about regulators getting this massive power which seems to give Draconian powers to the federal government through the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

For example, the trust companies association president, John Evans, said on February 3 in The Globe and Mail: "We are encouraging the government to proceed and get this through. Our sense is there is some urgency. This bill provides the powers the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation needs to come to a quick resolution of problem institutions".

The Canadian Bankers' Association is on record as saying that it agrees with the concept of this legislation. It would prefer a more comprehensive review of the role and operations of the corporation. It notes that in 1985 the Wyman report recommended sweeping changes to the corporation which would, among other things, result in higher insurance premiums for riskier financial institutions. In other words, the riskier a financial institution was, the higher the premium it would have to pay.

This legislation appears to be reasonable. We will have to examine it in detail in the committee. However, one of the things that is not reasonable is the fact that this government took six years to bring in this legislation, from the time of the blue paper in 1986 which first described the process we are now discussing in this Bill C–48. Now we have the legislation before us and the government wants to pass it by the end of the month.

What I am saying is that the government has taken six years to take the recommendations from the blue paper and incorporate them into legislation, but it wants it passed by the end of the month.

The question is: Why did the government not come forward sooner with this legislation? Why did it take six years on a matter of such obvious importance to the Canadian financial institutions? The customers of at least one financial institution might have been better off if the government had not taken its time in introducing Bill C–48.

The financial papers today are reporting almost daily how the sale of 48 branches of Central Guaranty Trust to National Bank is being held up by creditors and possibly by shareholders and how the regulator is against the sale.

While these negotiations continue behind closed doors, the customers of Central Guaranty live in uncertainty over what is going to happen to their institution.

On a broader level, why is the government not acting on the broad recommendations of the 1985 Wyman report? The federal government commissioned the report, yet seven years later it is still on the shelf gathering dust.

A third problem with the government's approach is that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation has no power to seize a provincial incorporated institution that might be on the verge of bankruptcy, even though it insures the deposits of the institution.

Of course the reason for this is that the government has made practically no progress in harmonizing its financial regulations with those of the provinces.

During the sweeping financial reforms that we dealt with last fall in this House and in the finance committee, we heard trust companies, banks and insurance companies pleading with the government to talk to the provinces to come to some agreement on harmonizing financial regulations.

• (1640)

At the moment, these companies often have to deal with 11 regulators and 11 sets of rules. This means incredible duplication and red tape and, of course, the cost of that. We can imagine the cost of dealing with 11 regulators and 11 sets of rules, but the cost really is passed along to the customers.

In a speech last week, the Canadian Bankers' Association president, Helen Sinclair, said the overlap of federal and provincial powers is costly and confusing. She said: "This is very important. When rules differ, confusion reigns".

Certainly we in the Liberal Party have been pressing the government time after time to speed up talks with the provinces on harmonization for financial institutions.

I just want to conclude my remarks on Bill C–48 by restating my party's initial support for the second reading of this legislation. It will help to protect the stability of the Canadian financial system and will not infringe unreasonably on the rights of shareholders and debt holders.

Some work still needs to be done. We will need to consult with the financial services industry to hear their detailed concerns and also their recommended improvements.

The government certainly needs to step up its harmonization talks with the provinces.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, as you discuss the thrust of the bill being debated before Parliament today with people, their eyes usually glaze over and they think that it is another banking bill that really does not concern them. They have a tendency to not want to listen.

You must consider the background of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, the reasons for its existence, and what has happened in the United States over deregulation, and now with the new banking regulations. We have seen some of the problems, particularly through the 1980s, in our trust companies and closely held banks. It is very clear that the banking legislation and this legislation before us affects every one of us.

What is the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation? I think the minister touched on it briefly, but it is interesting and I think it will be worth while in my remarks to touch on it a little bit more for those who are watching and read from the corporate profile of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

It states:

> The objects of the Corporation are to provide insurance against the loss of part or all deposits, to be instrumental in the promotion of standards of sound business and financial practices for member institutions, and to promote and otherwise contribute to the stability and competitiveness of the financial system in Canada. These objects are to be pursued for the benefit of persons having deposits with member institutions and in such a manner as will minimize the exposure of corporations to loss.

To fulfil its objects, CDIC may, among other things, acquire assets from a member institution; make or guarantee loans to a member; make or cause to be made inspections of member institutions; prescribe standards of sound business and financial practices for members; and act as a liquidator, receiver or inspector of a member institution or subsidiary thereof.

This particular object of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation I think is one that most of us in this House agree with. Certainly in my party, we agree with the object of the protection and the ability of such an institution to move in and insure the deposits, particularly those of our minor depositors, shareholders and debenture holders.

My friend from the Liberal Party has pointed out the problem of harmonization which I will touch on later.

There are, I believe, 35 provincially incorporated financial institutions that are also covered by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. Yet CDIC does not have the same power to move in as it does with federally instituted organizations. I identify this as a potential problem for the whole situation concerning Canadian deposit insurance.

If we look at the bill now before the House, I believe the principle of the bill will assist all depositors and will assist banks and financial institutions in overcoming a problem that they have run into over the last little while.

To demonstrate the problems they have run into over the last little while we only have to note the failure of the Canadian Commercial Bank the Northland Bank, the Mercantile Bank, the Continental Bank, and Principal Trust. They affected each and every one of us and made us realize that we have to go a step further than we have so far to try to protect our financial institutions.

The Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation was instituted in approximately 1967 and is used by many banks. Over that period of time we can see some problems arising, as demonstrated by a recent article by Karen Howlett, financial reporter for The Globe and Mail, on February 3 of this year. She tells us that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation ran up a deficit of $642.6 million as of December 31, 1990 as a result of rescuing several companies in the eighties, and that does not include Standard Trust Co. which collapsed last year costing the agency more than $1 billion, the single most expensive bailout in CDIC's 25—year history. CDIC provided another $445 million in loans and guarantees for last month's rescue of the First City Trust Company.

She goes on to say: "The troubled state of many companies is also fuelling debate in the industry over how CDIC finances its bailouts. The agency collects premiums from the industry, one–tenth of one per cent of the total insured deposits, for a total of $271 million in 1990". She says that most of the burden has fallen to taxpayers. CDIC borrowed about $1.2 billion from the government's consolidated revenue fund as of December 31, 1990.

Under this bill, as has been pointed out by the minister and my friend from the Liberal Party, the government is extending the CDIC's ability to borrow from the consolidated revenue fund, by extending its limit from $3 billion to $6 billion in order to support what has been an increasing burden within the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

I would suggest that, given what we went through just prior to the Christmas season with our four major banking bills and the breakdown of the four pillars of the banking institution within Canada, with this bill we are going to reap some of the unfortunate costs of those pillars falling.

As my friend from Nickel Belt has said in speaking on the banking acts, the Hulk Hogans, the wrestlers of the banking community, are now turning into the sumo wrestlers of the banking community. Where there were a number of Hulk Hogans there will now be one, two or three major sumo wrestlers who will slowly take over the banking community as a result of what we have seen occurring. The breakdown of those pillars gives those large banks, in particular the five major banks within Canada and some of the other major trust companies and insurance companies, the ability to take over those smaller banks, those smaller closely held financial institutions, and those smaller trust companies that cannot make it in a deregulated system.

To some extent the changes within this bill are a reflection of the problems that we have predicted within the banking legislation. They will lead potentially to the large ones taking advantage of the system we have set up to gobble up some of the smaller failing trust companies, some of the smaller failing closely held financial institutions, once again proving that the larger will become larger and the smaller financial institutions will cease to exist.

It seems to me in the interests of the larger financial institutions to sit and wait and use the merger terms to be set out within this legislation to their benefit, to wait until the share structure goes down to buy up the shares of the financial institutions with the blessing of CDIC and use an injection of funds from the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation to assist in refinancing and restructuring within that merger.

That is one of the problems I see with this legislation.

The advantage of the legislation is also within that same section in which the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation has the ability to ensure that shareholders and dividend holders do not take advantage of the system. When certain conditions occur, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, the Minister of Finance, and the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation can take certain actions to ensure that they can take over the ownership of that company—in other words, the ownership of that financial institution that is in trouble and is no longer a viable institution—thereby ensuring that shareholders who perhaps have nothing to lose by letting the company go down further and hold out for a higher amount of money for their shares will be stuck with accepting a deal with the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and will be assured of only receiving the value of the shares. That is a positive.

That perhaps insures depositors' savings, as we have seen in the past with the takeover by the Bank of Hong Kong of the Bank of British Columbia in which a merger was worked out. Although I believe it cost $240 million to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, it in fact saved a failure of a bank that was having problems, a provincially incorporated bank that was having problems, and would perhaps have failed with the result that depositors could not have got their money out.

As one who has lost money to uninsured deposits within certain financial institutions, I applaud what has been called a minor part of this particular bill which ensures that the financial institutions are able to notify their customers properly whether the deposit they have made in the institution is properly insured.

It is often in talking to people since I have been a member of Parliament and prior to that in my past occupation as a lawyer, where I have found out that many people, often seniors with small amounts of money, would deposit the money in financial institutions or in trust companies where they felt that they would get a better return on their money only to find out, often too late as in the case of some of the trust companies and financial institutions that have failed, that they were not insured by CDIC.

This is a positive step in ensuring that the CDIC member institutions will be able to provide their customers with more information with respect to deposit insurance. I applaud this move, as will people within Canada.

Let me move quickly, Madam Speaker, to what the Superintendent of Financial Institutions will be looking at in trying to see whether or not a financial institution is still viable. In looking to see whether a merger or sale of the company is viable, the CDIC and the Superintendent of Financial Institutions will look at whether that company has ceased or is about to cease to be viable, whether it is independent and relies to an excessive extent on loans to sustain its operation or has lost the confidence of the depositors and the public and whether it has regulatory capital or is about to become substantially deficient.

Under section 39.1 and throughout, it sets out the various steps that will be taken once that comes. There are 12 particular steps. I will not go through them all but I will highlight a couple of them. First of all, the troubled federally regulated institution reports major losses and OSFI, the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, will explore with the company measures to strengthen the institution. When it is deemed that there is an appropriate situation for restructuring, CDIC may recommend to the minister that a restructuring order be made, vesting the shares and the subordinated debt of that institution in the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

CDIC will inform the shareholders and the subordinated debt holders of the fact that this particular step has been ordered and they will offer compensation to indicate that there will be no compensation to be offered. The shareholders and subordinated debt holders can accept or reject CDIC's offer and those who accept the offer are entitled to the amount offered and are not party to any assessment procedure which may take place.

If fewer than 10 per cent reject CDIC's offer, all shareholders and subordinated debt holders will receive the compensation offer. If there are 10 per cent more of the class that reject the offer, then an independent assessor is appointed. I think that is a positive step.

This idea is to ensure that there are not the major losses that we have seen in the past in shoring up, even though it may cost CDIC some capital and some money to get it going. Certainly the losses will be substantially fewer than the potential losses in things such as the Principal Trust, Northlands Bank, et cetera.

I referred earlier to the matter of harmonization. It certainly is a question that has arisen time and again with the banking legislation and I suggest, as has my friend from the Liberals, that in this particular case once again we are running into the problem with the harmonization between provincially regulated institutions and federally regulated institutions.

In this particular case, even though there are 35 provincially regulated financial institutions that are insured under CDIC, the financial institution restructuring process that is one of the major thrusts of this amendment cannot be brought to bear on the provincially instituted institutions. This legislation fails totally to address that particular issue. The paper put out by the government at our briefing session simply says: "Will CDIC's power under the FIRP legislation extend to provincial deposit taking institutions? Can CDIC take over a provincial led institution? The answer is simply no. Only federally regulated deposit taking institutions will come under the new legislation".

Without that harmonization, once again we have the uncertainty of the depositors, the uncertainty of the shareholders and dividend holders. Most people do not know whether the institutions they are depositing their life savings in are federally or provincially regulated institutions. They see a big building. They go in, the people are nice and they deposit their money. They say: "Is my money safe here?" "Oh, yes, we are all covered". They go away thinking their money is totally insured and they do not have a problem. It is not until we have a failure and these people who have worked for years and years and saved toward their retirement find out that they are totally without insurance and are left without their life's savings.

I would suggest it is not a very nice feeling for many of these people who have lost funds through some of these failures in western Canada, to have worked their lifetime and seen that security dissolve when they thought they were insured. They thought that once they deposited their money with an institution there was some expectation that it would make money and assist them in their retirement years.

Some agreement with the provinces must be looked at to ensure that it falls under FIRP and is regulated more closely by the CDIC legislation.

Another thing I would like to point out is that the relationship between CDIC, the insurance function and OSFI, the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, the regulatory function, is not clear. As my friend from Nickel Belt has often pointed out, we know that OSFI and CDIC have a close working relationship, but is that working relationship that of Siamese twins or is it of a Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde nature? Under this legislation it appears that the Office of the Superintendent of Finance Institutions is losing ground to CDIC.

The other issue is the wish to know who controls CDIC. With the expansion of CDIC's board we have the chartered banks being allowed as part of the regulatory body. Perhaps with more of those senior officials being from the banks, that representation may skewer exactly where we should be going.

I suggest that the legislation in principle is good legislation which can be supported by this party. However, there are some changes that must be made during committee work that will make it better for shareholders, dividend holders and depositors as well as the institutions that are covered by CDIC.

In conclusion, I simply say we can support the bill at second reading. Hopefully the government will pay attention to projected changes that we will make.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on this particular bill. As has been indicated by my colleague from Malpeque, we will be supporting this legislation as it goes through second reading and look forward to studying it in committee. This legislation is long overdue, particularly when you look at the fact that Mr. Justice Estey submitted a report a number of years ago.

We have been waiting for that report for a long period of time in order to see something take place. I believe the date was in 1986.

The bulk of the recommendations that Mr. Justice Estey made are now encompassed in this legislation. One wonders why all of a sudden we are in this hurry-up mode when it has been roughly five years since those recommendations have been made.

The problems have existed for a number of years, and the government could have acted quickly if it wanted to. We might have averted some of the problems had the government taken the time to move quickly. Instead, we see it going the other way, waiting and crisis management.

Now we are facing another crisis management situation dealing with Central Trust. The shareholders are about to vote and we are rushing legislation off to committee and looking for ways to plug the holes in the dike, rather than having good, constructive legislation. For that reason we want to co-operate because I think there is a benefit from this legislation. It is just unfortunate that this benefit could not have been around earlier to help others.

As my colleague from Malpeque has said, the main purpose of this bill is to block the system where shareholders can do things to their advantage and to the disadvantage of depositors and other players in the system. That is one of the major intents of the legislation.

On its face, it is good legislation. The problem that we face under the existing situation is that as soon as the Superintendent of Financial Institutions starts to investigate an institution, it is like announcing the death-knell of that institution. Depositors start to flee that financial institution for fear of losing their life savings or any investment in that institution.

Once the media carries the news that such and such a financial institution is shaky, that the superintendent is looking at it, that there are grave concerns as to its viability and all of those types of comments, then that institution is in trouble.

In every case, I believe, they have ultimately failed in some way and either have been bought out or, as in the case of Central Trust, some financial institution has come and cherry picked. They pick the best parts of it and leave the dregs for those minor shareholders and players who will ultimately suffer the greatest loss.

In that sense, this legislation is a positive step. It will allow the superintendent to come in and take the steps necessary to preserve the assets and perhaps even to preserve the company. Obviously that is a good and sound approach.

In that sense we are certainly not opposed to that measure. It becomes a measure that falls half way between the extreme of letting a company go down the drain, taking all the depositors and deposit insurance guarantees that have to be paid as a result of that along with them.

The other extreme is to have the superintendent force that situation by acknowledging they are involved in an examination of the company. This strikes a bit of a middle ground.

The problem is that it is done very quickly. In some sense, I am sure people will say that is a good idea and will preserve the institution. As we go through the scenario of things that could take place, it is almost like a Friday afternoon and Monday morning type situation. Everything is going to be done over the weekend.

The depositors and shareholders are not going to feel very pleased about that because it is so quick. A lot of it is going to be done quickly behind the scenes and not up front. One has to wonder whether the superintendent and the deposit insurance organization has been given too much power. What kind of controls will be on them?

Literally they can move on Friday and put together a deal over the weekend. People will find out about it on Monday morning. That to me does connote some problems because of the speed in which that could take place. It is almost the speed in which this legislation has now been brought forward, because of the impending situation with National Bank cherry picking the good assets of Central Trust and leaving the dregs for others.

We on this side obviously want to co–operate with the government because we do see the benefits of this legislation. In the specific case of dealing with the institution that we hear about, this legislation could have some benefits to all of the players. Many small investors have put money in that organization, not just depositors. Grant it, they take the risk. Any time one buys stock on the stock market and is involved in that process one takes some risk. Many small investors with RRSPs and other investments are involved and run the risk of losing a portion of their RRSP or their investment because of decisions that might be taken.

This legislation will move in a positive sense by trying to control this situation. The bill allows CDIC to go around the major shareholders and allows a situation where the majority of smaller shareholders might benefit otherwise. It might be to the exclusion of different categories of shareholders so that the rich shareholders will benefit and the others will not.

There is a positive side to this legislation. That is why we are anxious to see it move on to committee. But we do have some concerns. When one looks at the legislation it does seem to be protecting shareholders and allowing a financial institution to stay viable. It really does not seem to be doing anything for depositors. As soon as there is a concern about a financial institution, the depositors move very quickly to take their resources out, which really precipitates the demise of that financial institution. If we could find ways to give the depositors a sense of confidence and a sense of trust, maybe these financial institutions would not be in the same circumstances and the same difficulty.

There is nothing in this legislation that deals with that. There is nothing in this legislation that gives confidence to the depositors. It essentially deals with the big financial institutions that are shoring up a financial institution in trouble. It deals with some of the major shareholders. It does not deal with the little shareholders and it really does not deal with the depositors.

The area of harmonization has been referred to earlier and I think it bears repeating. We saw it when we considered legislation on financial institutions, banks, trust companies, insurance companies, credit unions, caisses populaires and the like. There is a dangerous situation in this country as it relates to financial institutions, that two levels of jurisdiction are regulating financial institutions. Helen Sinclair probably said it best when she said: "When rules differ, confusion reigns".

This is what we are actually seeing here with financial institutions. As we go through the constitutional debate, I am sure there will be more pressing problems and issues. If there were some way to develop some harmonization with our financial institutions then it would all be to the better.

This legislation will only deal with federal institutions. There are many provincial institutions that will not be touched by it. Therefore we still run the risk of seeing another Principal Group or another Northland Bank–type situation.

We have to go back and grapple with the issue of harmonization and deal with it.

We also have to take a look at the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and CDIC taking over this new role as this legislation comes to the fore. Do they have the resources and the people in place to deal with what is involved? They will move very quickly. They will try to put together new deals very rapidly, as I said over the weekend. Do they have the resources to know how to put that together and the background to see that it is actually going to take place?

I confess that all politicians, except for the Speaker, of course, tend to talk about things we know very little about. From the little I know they run a lean mean machine at the OSFI office.

I am not sure whether they, working with CDIC, are going to have those resources to put into place. That is what will come out of our committee discussions to ensure that is the case and that the department, as well as CDIC, will have the resources to deal with this situation.

The other thing which I think is an obligation arising out of the committee study of this particular matter is that we have to try to ensure as much as possible that things are not done behind people's backs, that the system appears to function so that everyone has a say and everyone knows as much as possible what is going on. Again, the committee is going to have to look at that aspect of it to make sure that they do not go to bed one night and wake up the next morning to find out that they are now a shareholder in another organization and it is an organization that they did not want to be associated with.

In conclusion, we on this side are supportive of this legislation because we think that it will provide some benefits to Canadians and to people who invest in financial institutions and people who are depositors in those institutions. But there is still much to be done. We have to restore the confidence of Canadians in our financial institutions. They have been sorely tested.

All we have to do, and I digress, is to consider that banks are making profits in the vicinity of $3 billion or $4 billion while the rest of the country is going to hell in a hand basket. We wonder about financial institutions and what is actually going on and why there is that kind of resource and that kind of profit taking going on in financial institutions and yet others are allowed to get into the types of problems that we see. I think there is an obligation on the financial institutions themselves to be contributors to this process and to make sure that it works.

We on this side will be supporting the legislation to go to committee. We look forward to working with the different organizations that are involved in making this legislation better legislation.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present a number of petitions with thousands of names of people from rural Canada who are petitioning this government to zero rate water for potable supply.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, when the GST came in unfortunately it put a tax on water in rural Canada. These Canadians, in fact Canadians throughout Canada, want this government to take the GST off water.

GUYANA

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 based on the human rights violations in Guyana. I must say that this petition was generated by a couple, Mr. and Mrs. Erb, who spent some time in Guyana and observed firsthand the problems in its elections. They urge the Government of Canada to consider making conditional any future development assistance to Guyana on the holding of fair and free elections by May 30, 1991.

PUBLIC SECTOR WORKERS

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present some petitions signed primarily by residents of the Prince George, B.C. area but other parts of British Columbia as well. The petition calls upon Parliament to respect the collective bargaining rights of public sector workers and also expresses concern about the further contracting out of jobs in the public sector.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of the residents of the city of Penticton, British Columbia, who are outraged at the possibility and the notice that they have had that their post office will be closed.

Almost one-half of the members of the community of Penticton are petitioning Parliament through me, stating that Canada Post is closing and privatizing post offices. Canada Post will be closing the Penticton post office on February 10, 1992 and converting this post office to a commercial service centre only for commercial use.

The petitioners are asking Parliament to stop this closure and the privatization of postal services and to ensure that the citizens and taxpayers of Penticton, British Columbia have a full service post office which is directly run by Canada Post Corporation.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and indeed a privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from the North Thompson valley in British Columbia who are concerned about the intentions of a Vancouver-based company with connections in Los Angeles to build a dam and divert the North Thompson River partly into the United States.

The petitioners are asking that the Canadian government state categorically once and for all that the rivers of Canada are not for sale.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, residents of Kamloops, British Columbia and two or three of the surrounding rural areas are concerned about the inadequate funding for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The petitioners are concerned about the increasing level of lawlessness as they define it in their communities, and they are asking that the federal government take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that the RCMP is properly funded.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present a petition concurrent with that presented by my colleague from Kamloops.

A number of my constituents from the city of Nelson, the villages of New Denver and Silverton, and the communities of Winlaw and Hills refer to the fact that Multinational Resources has announced the intention to dam the North Thompson River at Belmont to divert water to the Salem–San Diego, California area.

The petitioners urge the Government of Canada to state categorically that it will not permit our freshwater rivers to be dammed and diverted into the U.S.A. and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

PUBLIC SECTOR WORKERS

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, the second petition that I am very pleased to present, especially in view of some current events outside of this House, is a petition signed by some 137 of my constituents from virtually every community within my riding.

The petitioners point out that in recent months, the federal government was violating terms of its collective agreements with its own employees by contracting out the work of Public Service workers. Their belief is that the federal government was violating the human rights of its workers by not paying equal pay for work of equal value.

The signatories to this petition urge the Government of Canada to obey its own laws in future and to bargain in good faith to the loyal and hard-working, and world-respected public servants who are employed by the Government of Canada.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to introduce a petition to this House on behalf of Canadians who are urging the government to take action when it comes to the thousands of refugees who are in Canada and who are trapped in the backlog.

Many of these refugees are suffering from personal and economic hardship. As their future is being decided, their families abroad are really in a very difficult situation.

These petitioners call on the government to step up its actions when it comes to refugees and at the same time exercise compassion.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege to rise this morning in this House and present a petition of 50 signatures by Canadians who are upset at the price of gas.

The petitioners want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that gasoline prices are higher than they believe they should be.

• (1020)

Some provinces have eliminated the vehicle licence fees for parts of the provinces so that gas disparity can be overcome.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to correct this injustice to motorists.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my gallant and hon. colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception has presented a petition along the same lines as the one I have.

It is signed by numerous residents of the Ottawa region, including Old Chelsea, Quebec; Smith Falls, Ontario; Ottawa, Ontario; and Gatineau, Quebec. These petitioners are opposed to the high gas prices being charged in this region, particularly the differences between here and southern Ontario. They call upon Parliament to urge the government to correct this injustice for Ottawa area motorists.

Question No. 182—Mr. McGuire:

With respect to the recent crash of the CC130 Hercules near Alert, N.W.T., were CH113/113A Labrador helicopters sent from Gander, N.S., Greenwood, N.S., and Trenton, Ont. to the crash site, and, if so (a) where were these helicopters at the time of the rescue of the survivors (b) what type of helicopter was used to transport the survivors (c) does the government intend to replace the CH113/113A in the next few years?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): As part of the response to the crash of a CC-130 Hercules aircraft near Alert, N.W.T., CH-113/113A Labrador helicopters were sent from Gander Nfld, Greenwood, NS, and Trenton, Ont.

a) At the time that the CH-135 Twin Huey rescue helicopter arrived at the crash site (see b below), the disposition of the three Labrador helicopters was as follows:

(1) The Labrador from Gander was unserviceable in iqaluit (Frosbisher Bay) NWT as a result of mechanical problems encountered while en route to the crash site;

(2) The Labrador from Greenwood was back in Greenwood as it was forced to return due to weather; and

(3) The Labrador from Trenton was flying to the crash site and was approximately 3 hours south of Eureka, NWT, over Ellesmere Island.

b) The helicopter used to evacuate the survivors was a CH-135 Twin Huey from 408 Squadron, CFB Edmonton, which had been transported by a CC-130 Hercules to Alert as part of the Major Air Disaster Response Plan.

c) The fleet of CH-113/113A Labrador helicopters is scheduled to be replaced by up to 15 new Search and Rescue helicopters between 1998 and 2001.

Question no. 192—Mr. Mifflin:

With respect to the LLADS (Low Level Air Defence System), in the statement of requirement (a) what is its purpose (b) what is it designed to defend and against whom (c) what is the total project cost of the Program in 1991 (d) how much has been spent and how much equipment does this represent (e) what is the planned spending on this project (i) in future years (ii) how much equipment does this represent (f) what is the projected annual PO and M cost?

Hon. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): a) The original purpose was to provide a modern and effective air defence capability for the Canadian Forces personnel and equipment assigned to NATO. The purpose is now being adjusted in line with Government policy announcement of last September. The air defence equipment will now serve to protect Canadian Forces personnel and equipment in newly defined roles and tasks, such as the potential expeditionary commitments of a land brigade and two squadrons of CF-18 aircraft.

b) LLAD is designed to protect army formations (such as brigades) or vital assets (such as airfields, aircraft, or other installations) against a low level air threat. This threat could come from high performance aircraft, helicopters or other aerial vehicles.

c) The Treasury Board approved total project cost was $1.135M, though it is anticipated that the project will be completed significantly under this original budget estimate.

d) Previous years' expenditures total $495M and an additional $170M has been budgeted for this fiscal year (FY 91/92). These sums represent the bulk of prime mission equipment, large stocks of ammunition and logistic support, as well as infrastructure and project management costs. Specifically, it includes delivery of:

a. all Skyguard Fire Control Units (10);

b. all 35mm Twin Guns (20);

c. 18 of 36 ADATS launch Control Equipment;

d. operational and logistic stocks of 35mm ammunition;

e. an initial lot of ADATS missiles;

f. the bulk (over 90%) of logistic support for the Twin Gun and Skyguard Fire Control Units;

g. a small percentage of logistic support for ADATS; and,

h. related construction.

e) Eighteen ADATS units are being assembled and tested and remain to be delivered along with the bulk of spares, test equipment and other support items needed to maintain ADATS throughout its life. Planned expenditures for future years are estimated at approximately $350M.

f) It has been estimated that the operating and maintenance cost for the entire gun system (Twin Gun and Skyguard Fire Control Units) and ADATS would have been approximately $55M per year for the original fielding and operating plans. Obviously, if the future force structure operates a smaller percentage of these two equipment fleets, then adjustment to the O&M estimates will be reflected accordingly.

Mr. Cooper: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

MOTIONS UNDER S. O. 52

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that yesterday the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond on behalf of his party raised a point of order with respect to the rule which governs the Speaker and the House relating to emergency debates.

I indicated at that time it probably would be in the interests of the situation if the matter was heard briefly this morning and I will hear the hon. member in just a moment. .

I should indicate that the hon. member for Algoma, I understand, has an application and I will hear that subsequently. I will hear the point of order first.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today, as I have on two previous occasions to speak on this particular matter. I will deal very briefly with Standing Order 52 and a number of the subsections which are contained therein and also the wide latitude which is given to the Chair in determining whether or not a subject matter is deemed under that particular provision of the Standing Orders.

I read for the Chair paragraph 387 from the sixth edition of Beauchesne's where it says:

> From time to time, this procedure has been referred to as "an emergency debate"; this however is not exclusively the case. Standing Order 52 gives considerable discretion to the Speaker in deciding if a subject is a proper matter to be brought before the House in this way. The Standing Order is clear that the question be specific and must require urgent consideration. It must deal with a matter within the administrative competence of the Government and there must be no other reasonable opportunity for debate. But most decisions based on these conditions are bound to be subjective and few clear cut decisions can be made. In making his ruling, the Speaker may, on occasion, take into account the general wish of the House to have a debate.

I wish to share with the Chair that in the past, members of the government, and I believe the Chair has alluded to this in statements it has made, that somehow, if an emergency debate was granted it would take away from "the timely business of the government". As we all know, the government has a legitimate right to set the agenda of House business.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, to members of this House that this is not the case. Because the sitting hours of the House have changed, in no way will the granting of a debate under the provisions of Standing Order 52 interfere with the business of the government which it so rightly puts before this House.

The second point is this. In the past members have tried to interpret this provision as a means or as a tool for opposition members to cause delay, using it as a dilatory tactic on behalf of the opposition to impede the government in whatever initiatives it has before the House. That is not the case at all, Mr. Speaker. As I said in my first remark, it in no way interferes with the government and its agenda and in no way could it be deemed or interpreted as a dilatory tactic.

The third point I raise for your consideration, Mr. Speaker, is the concept of reform, the reform which was talked about in the McGrath report which was tabled in this House. The McGrath report reflected the views of the House that more special debates ought to be held. The McGrath report made reference to having more special debates on a variety of subject matters.

Fourth, if this particular provision was granted on a more timely basis, and that in no way reflects upon the previous decisions of the Chair, it opens the possibility for all members of Parliament, not just those in the Official Opposition or independent members, but members of all other parties in this House, to have ample opportunity to participate in special debates.

A number of members, particularly the government House leader and myself, as well as the House leader for the New Democratic Party, have talked about reform. We have seen some reforms in this House over the last 12 months. But what better way is there for this Parliament to reform itself than to have debate on subject matters which members of Parliament feel important?

I give the example, if I may, in concluding, of the debate that is being requested with regard to supply management. It was requested on Monday, it was requested on Tuesday and it was requested on Wednesday by both the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party. That is a substantial number of members who believe that this matter is sufficiently important to have a debate. It is not a frivolous item; it has profound effects on the supply management system in Canada. It is of great interest, not only to those who are direct investors in the supply management system across the country but I believe it is also of great concern to a lot of Canadians. I think this would be a good example, in the spirit of reform that we at least have talked about in this Chamber, that perhaps the interpretation and discretion as exercised by the Chair may wish to take those thoughts into consideration.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, it is not a dilatory tactic. It does not interfere with the business of the government in any way whatsoever. It is of sufficient importance that two parties in this House and other members have spoken to this particular issue and have requested it. It is in keeping with the concept of reform maybe not to the letter of reform, but certainly in the spirit of reform, and it would provide an avenue for all members of Parliament to make that claim to the Chair.

I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to raise those points. I believe I have kept within the timeframe I indicated to you yesterday, that I would be no longer than five minutes on an issue which I believe is important, not only for our deliberations here today, but indeed in the subsequent weeks and months ahead.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on the same point, I wish to add two or three short comments to the points made by my hon. friend.

I want to begin by suggesting right from the beginning that in no way are my comments to be taken as a criticism of past decisions that Speakers have made regarding debates under Standing Order 52. After all, one of the restrictions is that it must be a genuine emergency. What we are asking, Mr. Speaker, is for you to perhaps place a slightly different interpretation on that term "genuine emergency" than has been placed on it in the past. Perhaps we could have an undertaking to work on a definition in the future.

I simply want to say that Parliament means "to speak" and if there is one thing that has become clear over the last little while, whether it is the Spicer report or what we hear from our constituents, it is that they want us to speak on issues of relevance to them.

We have an opportunity to speak to legislation but often that is part of the ongoing business of the country. Often people feel that it is not necessarily a priority in their minds but something that is obviously very important and what we must do. Of course, we are always held to the relevancy of the bill or motion before us.

There is also the fact that during Question Period, which is the other obvious opportunity, we are restricted in making very short statements in a matter of seconds and, of course, during questions, you are always reminding us that this is not a forum for debate, but in fact a forum to pose a question. So we are limited there.

What we are doing tonight as a result of all-party agreement is providing some hours to allow members of Parliament, in a sense, to report back on behalf of their constituents as to their views and concerns regarding the constitutional proposals. I think it is a very positive and very progressive initiative that the House has taken.

There is a growing sentiment that people want us to respond to the important issues of the day. They want to see this institution being responsive to what I think we would all agree are critical issues facing the country. My hon. friend, the House leader for the Official Opposition has mentioned the matter of supply management. We agree that this is a critical issue confronting us. I suspect that all members of the House, from whatever region, from whatever political party, acknowledge the fact the decision that will soon be made regarding the whole matter of marketing boards and supply management programs is very critical.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you would look at this obviously and say: "Is this a genuine emergency?" We look back at precedents and are reminded that when the Tiananmen Square incident occurred, we agreed it was an emergency and we had a debate that night. However, when we had the major cutbacks to VIA Rail or the collapse of the fishery, they were not considered immediate emergencies and consequently, there were no emergency debates around these issues in spite of requests from various members and rightfully so. In no way am I criticizing the decision because I think when you saw that although these were serious issues and members would have liked to have made comments, they were not genuine emergencies at that particular moment.

I would like to add my voice to that of my colleague and say we have to find some way to provide an opportunity that will not jeopardize the House time in its efforts to do business because I think that we acknowledge the fact the government has an agenda; the business of the land must be conducted. Perhaps loosening up on our interpretation of the emergency debate will allow this institution to be more responsive to the concerns and needs of the country, to provide members of Parliament with an opportunity to be more responsive in reflecting the views of their constituents on critical issues of the day.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having a chance to participate in this discussion on something that I think is most important. These are very critical times for our country. We feel the pressure in the country as members of Parliament. I suspect running up to the next number of months, to the next general election, those tensions will be perhaps even extended and expanded. I think we need a way to let off a little steam, to diffuse some of the anxiety and tensions that build up in here, Mr. Speaker, when, in a House that was designed for us to speak, so few people actually have an opportunity to speak on behalf of their constituents on issues of the day.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take much time but I do want to respond for a moment to the comments of my friends across the aisle.

The House leader for the Liberal Party makes four very clear and concise points which I have to say without repeating them I basically agree with. His points are valid ones. We want to see this sort of thing happen. We want to see discussion and debate among members of Parliament. But I want to draw a line here.

As you well know, and other members of this House know, we have a process in here essentially of the usual channels of discussions that go back and forth to create opportunities for dialogue, debate and how we are going to handle legislation. That process I have to say in 90 to 95 per cent of all cases works very effectively. Occasionally it fails, and that is bound to happen in a partisan institution such as the one all of us here participate in.

But the point I want to make is this: Looking at Standing Order 52, emergency debates, my hon. friend the Liberal House leader read citation 387 of Beauchesne in its entirety. I will not repeat the whole thing but I want to focus on one phrase. The Standing Order is clear that the question be specific and must require urgent consideration.

What my friends are arguing is that in fact what the Speaker should do is reinterpret the word "urgent", re-examine and loosen up what is considered an emergency to thereby create another opportunity for debate. My argument is that would be an abuse of this rule because this rule is designed for a very specific purpose of emergency or urgency.

We can arrive at somewhat the same results by a different process and one that is more in keeping with our traditions and is safer for the institution. That is, Mr. Speaker, if you were to do as my colleagues are advocating, to broaden the scope, in a sense the Speaker would then replace the usual channels that we try to exercise in this House.

My argument is that through the process of usual channels we can create more opportunities for debate on matters that are significant, matters that are important, but not necessarily an emergency, not necessarily urgent in the sense that they have to be dealt with or solved at this particular moment.

The House leader for the New Democrats indicated a motion that we had passed unanimously in this House yesterday to create exactly such an opportunity on the issue of the Constitution. I have to say in the spirit of reform and the McGrath task force that was referred to earlier, that is in fact what we want to accomplish. We need to see more of those. On both sides of the House members want to participate in these issues.

My argument is this: Very simply, if the Speaker were to take it upon himself or herself to reinterpret the word "emergency" or "urgency" as it has applied to this particular rule, it puts the Speaker in somewhat of a vulnerable position and is a role best left to the usual channels.

I want to signal that role is one that I think we should be looking at in the spirit of generosity and in terms of the mood and tone we are trying to bring into the House of Commons. That is one of a serious institution which has contained in it serious people who want to seriously address serious issues. It is one where we set aside our gamesmanship from time to time and really get down and give our members on both sides of the House an opportunity to discuss this issue.

Mr. Dingwall: I say through the Chair to my hon. colleague this is not intended to cause the debate undue delay. I do want to say to my colleague, as he well knows, there are a number of elements the Chair must consider before making an adjudication with regard to Standing Order 52.

I would just like to share with him:

> —the Speaker shall have regard to the extent to which it concerns the administrative responsibilities of the government or could come within the scope of ministerial action and the Speaker also shall have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means.

Those are the elements that the Speaker is directed to consider.

• (1040)

I appreciate the intervention of the parliamentary secretary because I see again another sign of wanting to co–operate and to facilitate our desire to speak on substantive, important matters.

I do not want the hon. member opposite to leave the Chamber today with the impression that somehow we are trying to say to Mr. Speaker that we want him to have a new definition of a particular word. We do not want to get into debating the etymology of a particular word.

The hon. member, as well as the Chair, must understand that in the evolution of time what may have been an emergency a year ago may not be an emergency today. What is a genuine emergency today, three weeks from today may in fact not be. It becomes a very subjective test as opposed to an objective test.

I believe, and as my colleague alluded to earlier, the Chair has exercised prudent judgment in the past and will continue to do so. I do not think the comments of my colleague opposite should be interpreted by any member as that the Chair ought to be restricted to a strict literal interpretation of a particular word. The Speaker must have some discretion as the rules allow him to have discretion in the interpretation of that particular phrase.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): I intend to be quite brief. I just want to rise to participate in this debate because although I have not been here as long as many of my colleagues who have spoken already, during the three years that I have sat in this Parliament I think there have been no more than five emergency debates and I am being generous using the number five.

Certainly, some of them had been arranged by agreement between the parties after refusal by the Chair to allow debate on the basis, I presume, that it was not an emergency.

In other words the rule has been interpreted in a most restrictive manner. The comments that are being made today and with which I know my colleague the parliamentary secretary agrees, indicate that this has been the case.

In my comments I want to suggest to the Chair that perhaps a fair way to look at it is to see the opportunities for members to engage in debates on public issues of urgent importance. I suggest to the Chair that they are really very restricted.

There is Question Period, obviously, which is not really intended to be a debate.

There are the Standing Order 31 statements which are again not debate, and then there is the late show. But the difficulty with the late show is that the questions raised are normally raised weeks after they have been raised in Question Period. The sense of urgency is lost in most cases and the opportunity to debate the issue on the same day it was raised in Question Period is rare. It almost never happens. It is usually deferred for weeks and weeks because of the pile up of applications waiting to be heard in that particular forum.

Therefore, the emergency debate route, Standing Order 52, is really one of the very few opportunities, aside from supply days which the opposition must give up on its own and, of course, they are not always available, on which matters of urgent public importance can be discussed in this House.

It is my submission that if Parliament is to be relevant to the people of Canada who put us here, to discuss public issues in the fullest sense, it must have discussion and debate, not to resolve anything, not to solve a problem but to discuss it and possibly to come to some resolution later. At least if there is a discussion and an airing of the grievance, an airing of the problem then that should happen under Standing Order 52.

With the changes in the rules that have meant that the business of the House is no longer set aside for the purpose of a Standing Order 52 debate, then there is no inconvenience to the government aside from the inconvenience of having a debate.

In other words, the Speaker in allowing the debate to take place is not setting aside the business of the House. We are simply adding to the hours of the sitting of the House to have that debate take place. That is a crucial distinction that was not the case in the 1950s and 1960s and I ask the Chair to bear it in mind in the interpretation of this rule.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, just very quickly I want to emphasize that we have a Standing Order which is for a specific purpose.

First, I am very concerned that what we are doing here is pushing the Chair into a role which I do not think this particular Standing Order wants.

Second, I think we have to be very careful here. In a sense, we are moving into a veiled criticism of decisions and the process by which we have operated. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, the rulings have been good. They are rulings we should support quite comfortably and completely, and we have a process called usual channels that we work out of.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the matter raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, commented upon by the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I have listened also very carefully to the comments of the hon. parliamentary secretary who has in the past years been very much involved in attention to the orders of this place and also to some steps in the reform of the orders of this place.

First of all, I want to say to hon. members that I do not take this intervention and this discussion in any way as a criticism of past Speakers, or past rulings, or myself. I want that clearly understood.

Also, it should be clearly understood by all hon. members and the public who is watching that sometimes we are criticized for not proceeding in a civilized way. This has been an example this morning of proceeding in a very civilized way.

I am cognizant of the mention made on both sides of the Chamber of the special arrangements that were done, as the hon. parliamentary secretary says, "through usual channels", in order to have additional debating time for all hon. members with respect to the serious matters of the Constitution. I certainly must say as your Speaker that the comments made in support of that on both sides of the House are proper and should be supported.

The difficulty that the Speaker is in under this order is that until perhaps a recommendation comes out of the members management committee and is supported by members of the House, until there is a more or a different interpretation of the word "emergency", the Speaker is still bound by that word.

Now, having said that, there are a number of things that go into a Speaker's mind when the Speaker is trying to determine whether there is clearly an emergency or whether circumstances are changing from day to day, either building toward an emergency or sometimes diminishing the emergency. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond commented upon that.

Comment has been made that there have been times in the past where, working through the usual channels that the hon. parliamentary secretary mentioned, what might not have been in the strictest and narrowest interpretation an emergency debate, was, nonetheless, acceded to by both sides of the House. This was out of a general feeling that it was in the public interest and the interest of this place that a debate take place.

I am also conscious of the fact, as the hon. parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands pointed out, that after the reform committee's recommendations were—not, by the way completely accepted on this, but partially—accepted the old difficulty of a Speaker interfering with the Orders of the Day to have an emergency debate is gone. That is in the past because, as has been properly pointed out, an emergency debate would take place after Orders of the Day are concluded, except on a Friday.

Now the best approach I can take is to consider carefully what has been said. It is very difficult to ask a Speaker to unilaterally change the rules. But in determining what is an emergency, the Speaker, as has been pointed out, looks at a number of things. What may not have been an emergency at one point may become one. What might be building to an emergency might not be needed to be treated as an emergency for a number of reasons: one, because circumstances change, another might be because there is another opportunity to debate it, which is one of the things that a Speaker does have to take into account.

I want to say to all hon. members on both sides that I take the exchange which has taken place this morning as a constructive one, and I hope that I will be able to deal with this rule as wisely as you would want a Speaker to.

Obviously, if the rule was changed, there would be other considerations. It might make it easier to rule a debate. That has to be balanced off against what the parliamentary secretary is properly putting up, and that is the process of usual channels, which is a very important aspect of how this place operates.

I will consider what has been said and it may very well be that we could have a further discussion on the matter.

I also want to say something else, and I know that the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond appreciates this. This is a bit unusual. It might be said that this is not a point of order in the usual manner. It may not be. It does not arise out of something that just happened on the floor of the House or out of Question Period, but it does address one of our orders, one of our rules, and the interpretation that ought or ought not to be given to it. I think that carried on briefly and with the civility which has been so manifest here this morning, it is probably a helpful thing.

I am going to hear the hon. member for Algoma. I know we have to deal with the specific matter which has been the subject of some discussion already this week, and I will hear it again.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the motion or the request under Standing Order 52 was to ask leave to move adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgency, namely that immediate steps must be taken by the government to preserve Canada's supply management marketing board system which is now under serious threat in the GATT negotiations and, further, that the government must deal with the entire crisis facing the agrifood industry and the family farm in Canada.

It would be hard to exaggerate the fear, the concern and the anguish facing some 35,000 or 45,000 dairy and poultry farmers across the country today. They meet in rallies. They write letters to members of Parliament. They demand a commitment from the government that the government will act in every possible way. The personal level of the problem is: Will these people survive under the proposals that have been made? They think not.

That is the human level, the important level, but in macroeconomics it is important too. It is a $10 billion group of producers. It is a secure domestic supply for those commodities which are marketed under supply management.

It is 100,000 jobs, but beyond that it is just the viability and the survivability of literally thousands of rural communities across Canada.

I ask leave of the House for an adjournment debate on this urgent matter.

Mr. Speaker: As I have said, the matter has been before the House for several days. I think I made it very clear yesterday, in rejecting the hon. member's application, that that did not foreclose other applications.

As I mentioned yesterday, I was listening very carefully to the exchange in Question Period, both the questions and the answers. I shall do the same today and I shall reserve on this application until after Question Period.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 4, consideration of the motion of the Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the hon. member for Northumberland had the floor. She has two minutes remaining in debate.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I was commenting on the disastrous impact of the capping of the Canada Assistance Plan in my riding of Northumberland.

The fact is that since 1990 costs for providing social assistance have risen almost three times. At the moment our county has a $400,000 deficit which will have to be borne by municipalities levying extra taxes on the backs of property owners.

As we know, our constituents are faced with more than enough taxes right now and simply cannot sustain that. The estimated caseload in Northumberland for this coming year is 20,496 over last year's number of 9,994.

I would like to conclude my remarks with a quote from one of the many letters I have received from constituents who are really fed up with government cutbacks as a way to deal with our deficit. This one comes from the retired associate minister of Trinity United Church, Cobourg, Ontario.

He writes: "If this were wartime money would be immediately forthcoming. Everyone would be working. No one would be hungry. Industry would be humming in the interests of killing one another".

"Deficit? Whoever heard of a deficit in wartime? Who gave a fig about what we spent last year in the gulf war? The moment the war ended, here we go again. We have to bring down the deficit. We have to cut back. We have to balance the budget, and we are being manipulated to think that the deficit is the enemy to the exclusion of everything else".

"What about child poverty, a horror if there ever was one, or families falling apart because of no work, or suicides of the unemployed or of the homeless in the midst of a Canadian winter? Why can't governments, either federal or provincial institute public works programs to repair roads, sewers and sidewalks or do research into alternate sources of energy? There are all kinds of things needing to be done and all these people just waiting to be put to work. Why can't governments use their power and their imagination to pull us out of our economic woes? If governments can do it in wartime with no problem, why not in peacetime?"

"Please be ensured of our enthusiastic support of any such programs you might initiate. We are all sick and tired of cutbacks and more cutbacks. Surely there is another road you can take".

I present that on behalf of the constituents in my riding of Northumberland and citizens across this country who take great exception to the continued cap on our Canada Assistance Plan which benefits those most in need in our country.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I also welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate on Bill C-32. The bill will have a significant impact on the constituents of my riding of Cochrane—Superior.

We are going through very difficult times in this country. We are in a made-in-Canada recession and the attempt by the government to revive the economy has been a total failure.

Its obsession to control inflation resulted in artificially high interest rates which caused the recession. The strategy prevented small businesses from borrowing in order to modernize, expand and build up a reasonable inventory. Of course manufacturers and suppliers really suffered in the process and many workers had to be laid off.

The retail chain of Sears has recorded its first deficit since 1950. The Sears company officials stated that this is the worst recession since the Great Depression. When one looks at the current statistics of 1.4 million unemployed Canadians and 2.2 million Canadians on welfare, it explains the anxiety and the despair in the population in general.

What does the government do? It introduces Bill C-32, an act to lock in the federal government's contribution under the Canada Assistance Plan to 1990 levels. Mr. Speaker, you cannot tighten the belt when there is no longer a waistline.

To make matters worse, we are now feeling the effects of Bill C-21 which has cut the qualifying period of UIC from 50 weeks to 42 weeks. Because of this recession, unemployed workers cannot find work and are therefore inflating the welfare rolls. This has a tremendous impact on the financial capacities of municipalities to maintain their services and programs as taxpayers' dollars are directed to welfare budgets. Business leaders in the country are now leaning toward a more liberal approach. They believe that the government's single-minded war against the deficit has actually created a much worse situation. In fact its ill-advised economic policies have brought the economy to a halt.

During a recession the government should temporarily relax its stand on reducing the deficit to preserve jobs and keep the economy rolling as smoothly as possible.

Business leaders are also favouring cutting personal income taxes instead of sales tax reductions. The government would profit by raising individual tax credits. Such action would result in people having more disposable income.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell you just how the bill and all the other Tory measures have affected the residents of my riding of Cochrane—Superior.

Northerners have had to put up with the cancellation of the northern tax allowance, the high cost of fuel, massive cuts in social services, and cuts in transportation such as the frequency of passenger train service and jet service to Toronto. The government's high dollar policy has affected the lifeblood of Cochrane—Superior. Its casualties in the forest, mining, and tourism industries have demoralized northerners. The exodus of our precious youth to opportunities in the south paints a very grim picture for our future survival.

We find ourselves between a rock and a hard place in Ontario. On one side we have the NDP government of Ontario which introduced cuts. On the other side we have the Conservative federal government which is proposing to put a cap on transfer payments to the provinces of B.C., Alberta, and Ontario.

This means that these provinces will once again have to pick up more of the cost if services are to be maintained at the current level. My province of Ontario is not in the best economic health and northern Ontario is in an even more desperate situation.

In light of the current economic situation I find it incredible that we are asked to support such a bill to cap the transfer payments to these provinces. To cap payments at a time when the number of welfare recipients is at an all-time high makes absolutely no sense.

One of the areas that has already suffered and will be further affected is the northern health travel grant. This grant provides financial assistance for transportation and accommodation to patients requiring specialized medical attention in southern Ontario.

Last year the province lowered the number of kilometres required to qualify and allowed companion grants. The northern health travel grant office has received twice as many claims as before. Because of a lack of funds, the department has not increased its staff. As a result, instead of receiving the reimbursement within six weeks, it takes four months.

I have received numerous complaints from constituents. For example, a constituent has to make a trip to Ottawa every month at a cost of approximately $400 per trip but he only receives $280 from the travel grant. If it takes four months to process his claim, he will receive three reimbursements in one year. In the meantime 12 claims will have been submitted.

In my view these people are being penalized because they are ill. I must stress the seriousness of this problem and emphasize that such a situation will be further aggravated if Bill C-32 becomes law.

This bill to cap transfer payments does not hold much hope for the education system in my riding. Stress and anxiety already permeate our region to such a level that this additional pressure is totally unwarranted. In my home town, the Kapuskasing and District Board of Education has three public schools that are in dire need of major repair. The high school was built in 1956, Eastview Public School in 1961 and Diamond Jubilee Public School in 1927. The cost of operating and maintaining these facilities is astronomical. Logic dictates that a new public school be built. With the adoption of Bill C-32, it will only make it more difficult for the province to finance this project. Each and every Canadian has the right to a decent environment for learning.

This government really lacked foresight in introducing this bill at this time. I am sure you have noticed that not too many PC backbenchers have expressed their views on the bill because they simply do not agree with it. However, there is still time to say no to Bill C-32. They can say it to their finance minister.

Canadians need help, food and jobs. It is time that the Tories attach a human face to very depressing statistics. We need to kick-start the economy. We need incentives, not belt tightening.

I would like to conclude by saying that I strongly oppose this legislation. I fail to see how Bill C-32 will in any way help the people in my riding of Cochrane—Superior. As a result of the cutbacks in transfer payments, the provinces will have to cancel programs. Bill C-32 will only create more hardship for the unemployed and welfare recipients and cause serious headaches for hospital and education boards. It is a regressive bill which will undermine the provinces' capacity to fulfil the basic needs of our society.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, among some of the more regrettable actions by this government in pursuit of its ideological path, regardless of the realities that the people of this country are faced with, this particular policy is the most damaging of all. Not only is it a restriction of the historical attempt of a central government to keep a sense of balance and fairness among the provinces through the federal government's role of being the impartial central fiscal agency in making sure that fairness takes place, but psychologically the government is putting a damper on any attempt that we must make under these circumstances to raise ourselves up by our own bootstraps.

The phenomenon of cut and run as exemplified by this capping policy by this federal government is Thatcherism and Reaganism at its very worst.

Although there is a great gap between the Official Opposition, the Liberal Party, and the New Democratic Party, there has been a history of that party with this party, and indeed with some people known as red Tories when they shared a sense of what the common purpose of government is in good times and in bad.

On those rare occasions when we put aside our philosophical differences in the interests of meeting national emergencies, this instrument called Parliament, and whoever was the majority in government, was used successfully to help the people of this country overcome the crisis.

That is sadly lacking at this moment. What may have been the purpose of this particular government in putting the cap in originally some months ago is no longer possible to substantiate under today's circumstance. There is not a community in this country that is not suffering grievously from a lack of employment, a lack of a mixed economy and frankly a lack of leadership from the federal government in ensuring that some prime pumping money is available.

We are now beyond the point of exacerbating the differences that we must do as politicians between the political parties. The people of this country no longer want us to play those necessary roles as we must do in differences of opinion and philosophy. What they want is some action and action now before this whole country is put at risk.

As we go through the debate on constitutional matters, people feel this country is not working. People are concerned that we are spinning our wheels here in Parliament while the country is going to Hades in a hand-basket. I think it is important to seriously reconsider the necessity of keeping the CAP, listen closely to members of this House about alternative programs and, regardless of their political ideology, give them sincere consideration. In the past I have spoken at length about using RRSP funds in a municipal bond concept to refinance the rebuilding of roads, sewers and sidewalks in this country. Money on this same program would have been available if the capping had not taken place. No one holds the monopoly on ideas, but the problem is the government holds the monopoly on freezing its mind in an openness to the ideas.

I do not wish to go over again the proposal I made about municipal bonds. The Vancouver Sun newspaper printed in detail an op-ed article that I wrote on this and I will be happy to distribute this proposal that was printed in The Vancouver Sun.

Today I would like to raise another proposal. The former Liberal administration under Pierre Elliott Trudeau raised as a possibility the co-operation of those provinces involved with the energy industry, which is now suffering so grievously. Under the National Energy Program there was an attempt to have a cohesive energy policy in this country, albeit there were vast differences of opinion and disagreement. The province of Alberta did not like the national energy policy. Certainly the province of British Columbia did not like parts of the national energy policy, but at least there was a discussion about the use of that valuable resource here in Canada and for offshore markets.

Because of the free trade agreement, some restrictions now exist about our being masters in our own house and shaping our own destiny in energy. I would like to raise one specific opportunity that exists for us to create jobs by using natural gas and extending our options in markets.

Currently we are nationally tied in with selling natural gas exclusively into the United States. There is no money available because of these caps to start experimenting with other possibilities.

The one program I want to suggest as a job creation program and a revenue-flowing instrument for the federal government is the sale of liquefied natural gas offshore into the Asian market. Since this idea was proposed with provincial-federal co-operation back in the early 1970s, the major opposition to it was the fact there were limited reserves of natural gas. Currently and happily, there is a great confirmed reserve of natural gas in this country.

If we eliminated the capping and gave some options in this regard to the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia and perhaps the territories, we could begin to sign offshore contracts for liquefied natural gas to be carried in Canadian ships manufactured in Canadian shipyards. Those markets could be exploited both privately and publicly for these sales.

For the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia and for the hard-pressed oil and gas sector, both private and public—what is left in Petro-Canada that is public—it would mean an opportunity led by this government to create jobs and bring in offshore investment in an industry that is deeply in need of a lift.

I am proposing four firm contracts by provincial governments under federal auspices for sales of natural gas into Korea, Japan, Taiwan and perhaps exploring the market into Hong Kong, but that is questionable. There is a need in those countries I mentioned for this consistent, variable energy supply.

In getting caps, governments are not permitted to initiate the kind of aggressive sales action that is necessary to follow through on this idea. That is why I am opposed to the capping.

Two ships built with the capacity to carry liquefied natural gas which only has an 8 per cent loss in conversion would provide $50 million immediately to the shipyards of western Canada. I say this without bias or favour to the shipyards in my own riding. On the east coast of Canada, another $50 million would also be made available.

Subject to the contracts of the sale of the LNG, we would demand at least 60 per cent of the carrying capacity. Those ships would be built here in Canada. We would demand 75 to 80 per cent of the maintenance of an LNG fleet to be able to provide jobs on a consistent basis. By capping the shares of the federal government to the provinces, the initiation of this kind of work has become curtailed.

I present, in a spirit of non-partisanship, at a time of national emergency around our economy, yet another idea of bold leadership that is needed.

I appeal to the government to understand that the people of this country want leadership, a government with will and a government with purpose. The current government only offers Canadians through this kind of legislation cuts, cuts and cuts with no hope whatsoever of alternate plans. I am disappointed to have to say that that is exactly what we are getting.

We Canadians are better than that. We can rise above our partisan differences on an occasion, as difficult as it may be for me, but this time this crisis demands that kind of leadership. Frankly, I think the Tories are exhausted. Their batteries are run down. They cannot provide this kind of leadership. The only option is either cancel this kind of legislation or, for God's sake, call an election.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, since this is my first opportunity to speak on a piece of legislation in this House this year, I would like to say a happy New Year to all of my constituents in Ottawa Centre as well as all Canadians across this great land.

Like the vast majority of the members of this House, I had the opportunity during the past two months to speak with many of my constituents, some of whom are quite upset about the policy of the federal government, many of whom are upset at the policy of the provincial government and those who are upset at both of them at the same time.

Along with that, I have met some very interesting groups of constituents who were not complaining. They were not complaining at all. As a matter of fact, they were making suggestions during these tough economic times. I thought I would make a habit of bringing forward those suggestions to the attention of the House of Commons every time I have a chance.

One of the suggestions that I was very impressed by was made by Brian Weatherdon of St. Andrew's church. I met with Brian not too long ago. He brought to my attention a suggestion and an idea that I thought was worth while sharing with my colleagues in the House of Commons and, as well, with Canadians across this land.

St. Andrew's church in Ottawa is just two blocks from Parliament Hill. It has initiated a family nutrition program. A group of five to seven persons meets once a month with a facilitator to learn ways of purchasing and preparing food in order to maximize the family's nutrition based on current income. I will be speaking a little down the road about the current family income.

This program is a most creative method of diminishing the effect of child poverty and to reduce present requirements on the food bank system. Participants in this program will share their newly-learned skills with families and friends. The effect will be multiplied. As this program develops, several groups will be formed to receive this training. The total effect of this program will be dramatically increased over time.

This program was developed out of a local community partnership, the Ottawa Emergency Food and Clothing Centre which proposed the idea adopted by St. Andrew's church and the Ottawa Centretown Community Health Centre which provides staff time to train participants.

In my view, the family nutrition program is an effective community response to a fast-growing problem in communities across Canada. It is proceeding with no cost to the federal budget at all. If programs such as these were to be adopted by the Department of National Health and Welfare, or were to be initiated and operated by that department, it would cost a lot of money. If the department would endorse such an initiative and promote it as an effective program to be operated by community agencies across Canada, it is probable that many groups would soon operate similar programs at minimal cost to the Government of Canada.

This is one program that was initiated by a non-governmental, non-profit organization in my riding. I am very proud of their initiative and what they have been doing over the years for my community and for the population at large.

This came about the same time that the Ottawa-Carleton Food Coalition project issued its annual report dated January 1992, entitled The Hunger Crisis in Ottawa—Carleton. Being the nation's capital, probably in the minds of many people outside of this region hunger would not be a problem here, or they might think that we are shielded, for whatever reason.

This is only to indicate some of the findings of this report. It was clearly stated, contrary to the belief of many people that those who go to the food banks might be working or might have some income, that in excess of 75 per cent of the people going to food banks in our region are in fact receiving social assistance in one way or another. Of the balance, 10 per cent are receiving some disability pension and 5 per cent are on unemployment. There is a very small percentage of people who are working who use the food bank. That percentage in our region is only 5 per cent. Five per cent of the people who are using food banks are full-time workers.

Even if we are to work in isolation at the food banks and we are to look at the income of a single parent family with two children and compare their income to the poverty line, we see the monthly income for a single parent with two children amounts to approximately $1,213, while the poverty line at the federal level is $1,952. Even though we have one of the most progressive social programs in North America, families who receive that assistance are not making any bread at the end of the month and have to rely on food banks in order to support themselves.

We have a national problem that needs national attention. The government has been reshaping and working on various ideas that deal with educating the work force and creating employment. It is timely for the government to put its brakes on when it comes to the transfer payment measures it is in the process of taking with Bill C-32 which will cap transfer payments to provinces such as Ontario where this year alone the impact would be in excess of $900 million.

The vast majority of people who are on social welfare are between the ages of 14 and 49. Over 52 per cent of people receiving social assistance programs are between the ages of 30 and 39. There is a crisis of national proportions which requires national attention.

We are opposed to the bill as it is before the House for third reading. We call on the government to withdraw the bill. It is untimely. It will hurt those who need our assistance and support the most.

The initiative by St. Andrew's church is great for the community. It requires the support, endorsement and promotion by different levels of government. I would like to echo what my colleagues have said about this piece of legislation. It is ill-timed. It will hurt the people of Canada. It will not address the socioeconomic problems that we have to deal with and address.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to say that I appreciate being given the opportunity to make comments today about the government's plan to amend the Canada Assistance Plan which will essentially take money out of the hands of my constituents and indeed out of the hands of rural Canadians.

For a fairly long time we have been debating this issue. Many important points have been made by my colleagues. Many people in my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk have come to me personally to talk about this bill. They are afraid of this bill. We have been told throughout Canada that Canada's poor citizens will suffer most because of this bill. Basic necessities such as food, shelter, clothing, utilities and household supplies will be denied to many Canadians because of this bill.

Services provided for the poor such as dental care, services provided for disabled persons, foster homes for abused children, safe housing for abused women and subsidized child care for low income families are inevitably going to be cut back because of this bill.

We will have a situation where the people who can least afford this kind of government restraint are the people who are going to suffer because of it. While the rich get richer because of this government's economic policies, the poor will inevitably have to pay the price.

This is just not fair. Given these terrible economic times, I cannot think of a worse or more inappropriate time to bring in such a piece of legislation. It seems to be a lack of common sense and a lack of real compassion for what is happening in Canada, especially rural Canada.

Is it not obvious to the government that the recession has put many Canadians out of jobs? Some are just temporary. More and more people are going to need financial assistance from the federal government. This is certainly not the best time to introduce such legislation.

The Canada Assistance Plan has been an integral part of federal-provincial relations for almost 30 years and has been a reflection of the co-operation and the co-ordination between all levels of government in this country. In fact, it is one of those programs that binds this country together. It is one of those programs that really identifies us as Canadians and not as North Americans.

More important, it is the reflection of the Canadian values of caring, sharing and compassion that built this great country. It has been a constant since Confederation where the principle of equalization was spelled out within the Constitution. It is the principle that is holding through to these recent constitutional discussions. It is the one thing, which at the constitutional meetings that all Canadians have discussed, that is, the whole situation with equalization.

However, we seemed to have moved into a whole new era of fiscal federalism within this country. We still have our sacred Canada Assistance Plan but the limits on the transfers to the provinces have essentially gutted the program and have reduced benefits to those people who need them the most.

The importance of the programs under the Canada Assistance Plan is that it tries to deal with the whole issue of poverty, in fact, it tries to eliminate poverty. Indeed, the major problem that we have in this country is child poverty.

Of greater importance though, it attempts to lessen, remove or prevent the causes of this poverty. It is not just a matter of sending out welfare cheques, it is a matter of providing services to help people overcome these hard economic times. The government's decision to cap social assistance transfers to Ontario will unfortunately perpetuate this vicious cycle of poverty.

I would like to take this opportunity to put the issue into a rural context because rural Canada is often forgotten when decisions are made by governments which try to address these issues. It seems at times that this government has forgotten that there are poor in rural Canada.

We are in a unique position in rural Canada, and indeed, in Haldimand—Norfolk, my riding. The problems are twofold, Mr. Speaker.

First, the agricultural sector is facing its worst attack ever in the history of this country, as many farmers are moving away from the family farm and trying to move into other areas. The government has to realize that many of the problems with rural farming have to deal specifically with their own economic policies in Canada.

The second problem facing my riding is that southwestern Ontario is deindustrializing. More and more jobs throughout southwestern Ontario, especially in the manufacturing plants in the region, are being lost as these plants shut down and move to the United States. We will not get into the debate about why this is happening, although free trade does come to mind.

Increasingly in rural Canada we need a government to support us. Many of these people are facing economic hardship for the first time in their lives and they really do not know how to deal with the situation. They are applying for social services and welfare for the first time in their lives. They are scared, they are worried and they do not know where their future is going to lead them.

What do they do when they lose their jobs and see no hope at all for the place they live? They move away and as a result, unfortunately, the rural infrastructures begin to disappear.

When the government pulls these funds out of rural areas, the burden is inevitably put on the local tax base. The Minister of Finance is constantly saying: "What would you have me do, increase taxes or increase the deficit?" I tell the minister that what he is doing to my local constituents is increasing their local tax base.

If he has not gone to his own riding, I will tell him that in my own riding, people are sick and tired of paying taxes. This program is going to put more of a tax burden on them. Frankly, whatever level it is where you pay taxes, you are inevitably going to have to pay taxes because of this bill.

The effects of the decrease in Canada Assistance Plan payments on my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk will be far reaching. Rural ridings in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario really have a lot at stake. The Minister of Finance would say that they can best bear the extra burden of this. Why should the federal government transfer this burden of national debt or the federal deficit on to the backs of the poor in rural Canada, in rural Ontario? Why should people who have just lost their farms or their jobs suffer because the province of Ontario has to bear this extra burden?

Obviously people should not have to. So let us stop putting this debate in terms of provinces or in terms of levels of government, let us start putting this debate in terms of people. People have a right to know why the government is doing this. During these tough economic times they need this government assistance.

This is why I question the government's timing of this issue. Why is it so intent on passing such a piece of legislation? I ask the government to reconsider this bill given the hard economic times.

I would like to conclude by saying that I am not trying to be partisan. I am not disagreeing with the government just for the sake of disagreeing. In fact, this bill, by limiting the increase in federal contributions to the Canada Assistance Plan until 1995 for the provinces of Ontario, B.C. and Alberta, is a bad idea at the worst possible time. I am sure many members on the other side of the House agree with that. It is going to affect a portion of our society that does not deserve any further hardship, including those misfortuned as a direct result of this recession.

It would seem the proud Canadian values of caring, sharing and compassion are disappearing on that side of the House. I implore the government, I implore members within its own caucus to talk to the Prime Minister and ask him to reconsider, to withdraw this bill and at the very least allow Canadians the right to tell him that this is a bad bill at the wrong time.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise on behalf of my party and speak on Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan. I want to speak on behalf of the constituents of my riding of Prince George—Bulkley Valley who, in many cases in the research that I have done on the Canada Assistance Plan, have told me some of the difficulties and problems that are resulting from this legislation that has been introduced by this government.

In the short time that I have I would like to outline some of the concerns we have with the legislation and point out where the impact will be felt the most.

Bill C-32 is a two-page bill. It is amazing how much damage two pages of paper can actually do in legislative form. As most members of this House know, Bill C-32 allows for the extension of the 5 per cent limit on the Canada Assistance Plan for the provinces of B.C., Alberta and Ontario. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that Bill C-69 capped at 5 per cent the federal funding increases until 1992. Bill C-32 extends the cap to 1995.

Most people are not familiar with the way the federal government has worked to try to build that caring and sharing society, and are probably not aware of just what kind of work the Canada Assistance Plan does. In fact, CAP is really the only mechanism that the federal government has where it funds social assistance and social services across the country.

We talk about transfer payments and government assistance. It is in that never-never land of a host of different programs. In many cases people are not aware of the tremendous impact programs like CAP have across the country. The unfortunate part, of course, is that this government desires to off-load its social responsibilities and fiscal responsibilities. The new government in British Columbia has, according to the information I have been provided, estimates that the cuts in Bill C-32 will amount to something like $1.2 billion over the next five years.

The new government is reviewing the state of the finances before the next session of the legislature which will likely be some time in March. That government is finding out the rough financial situation it is in with the departure of the Social Credit government. It did not just clean off the shelves, Mr. Speaker, it took the shelves as well. The safe is empty. The Socreds are running around wondering just exactly what went on and, of course, the public of British Columbia is wondering as well. The onerous debt forced on the people of British Columbia by Social Credit is now being forced on those people by this government with its cuts to the CAP program.

CAP provides for 50/50 cost-sharing between the federal government and the provinces for social services. The breaking of this agreement represents a withdrawal of the commitment by the federal government to Canada's social programs. That clearly sets a dangerous precedent for the future of all federal-provincial agreements.

I have been corresponding on a regular basis over the last year with the city of Prince George. It has a delivery mechanism for assistance to community groups that provide valuable services to our residents. It provides funding from the Canada Assistance Plan. I thank His Worship Mayor John Backhouse for the discussions we have had and also, of course, the officials at Prince George city hall.

I think the people of that community will be very surprised to learn not only what the contribution is that the federal government is making in this case to three particularly important organizations, but also what is going to be the outcome now that this government is going to put a cap on CAP. Do I have to tell these organizations and the city of Prince George that the Scrooges and the Neanderthals of the Conservative Party have decided that the services being provided by the Cerebral Palsy Association of B.C., which runs the very well and highly acclaimed child development centre in Prince George, the St. Patrick's House Society and the Canadian Paraplegic Association will be affected?

Those three organizations have been helped by the Canada Assistance Plan. Unless there is a change of heart by members of the Conservative Party, what do we tell these groups that have done this work? We will have to tell them that the assistance they are now receiving will be cut back. They will obviously be looking to the Government of British Columbia to help where it can. Of course, that government is dealing with a tough financial situation as well, as I already mentioned. A report is due soon which will show exactly how this government and the former government of B.C. ravaged the accounts of the Government of British Columbia.

The Cerebral Palsy Association, which finances the child development centre, has just over $11,000 in applications pending for fiscal 1989-90, 1990-91. St. Patrick's House Society, which receives upward of $30,000, has an application pending, as does the Paraplegic Association. We have made a contribution, Mr. Speaker.

The Government of Canada has gone into these communities with this program and the help of the local governments and said: "We can help. We can help make a better society, a more caring society". I challenge the Conservatives to come with me to the child development centre and tell the parents and the children that they are taking away some of the money from that centre and they will not be able to continue to operate as they had before. That is the kind of thinking that this government has not done. It has not thought about what the implications are of this particular legislation. It is going to force these community groups and local governments to continually struggle for more funds and assistance to deliver these much-needed programs.

Why is it? It has been argued by many and I think there is certainly a consensus growing in the country that this government does not have a vision for Canada. I am afraid to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in fact it does have a vision for Canada. It is one that certainly is not shared by the vast majority of Canadians right now.

It is an agenda that has been rejected on the whole in the United States, certainly in the U.K. and other parts of central and eastern Europe where people are struggling to come to grips with the battle between the conservative point of view represented by the government and in some cases former communist governments. There is a struggle for social democracy that will deliver services and government to people so that they can actually have government programs and government services that people recognize and respect.

I do not think that is a vision that this government shares. It is a hard line, market-driven vision of Canada that rejects people who need help. This legislation, Bill C-32, really does just that.

The government has not paid attention to the impact it is going to have in all of our communities. I say every member of Parliament should check with their local societies and governments and ask them what they think of this legislation. The view will likely be unanimous. It is a bad bill and it should be thrown out and defeated in the House today.

Thank you very much for this time, Mr. Speaker, to really bring forward what I think are the serious faults with this legislation. I have mentioned a number of important directions that I think social policy should take in this country, directions that this government has rejected. Hopefully in the next election the Canadian public will reject this government as well.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this bill because the intent behind it really makes me institutionally angry as well as personally angry. I very much object to the thrust of this bill.

Bill C-32 on which I am speaking really goes back to Bill C-69, which was approved by this House and which indeed limited the contribution to social assistance and social programs, among other things, for the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta, the richer provinces if you like. I am speaking in the context of the over-all reduction by the government of transfers to the provinces, looking at all the 14 different kinds of transfers, EPF payments, equalization payments, and those kinds of payments which are part of our Canadian heritage of being a country in its totality, which I think is not a bad way to look at the country these days. Also, it really allows the country to be more equal from one end to the other.

I am very concerned about this bill, as I was about Bill C-69, because what this is essentially doing is hitting the lower and middle-income classes that can least afford it.

The transfer payments that I am most concerned about have been spoken about on many occasions by my colleagues from Newfoundland and Atlantic Canada. The tremendous hardship it has caused our constituents has been just another blow in the negative cascading effect of one blow after the other.

I consider myself a responsible parliamentarian, like my colleagues. I am very conscious of the fact that the national debt in 1984 was $168 billion. Seventeen per cent of that was owned by offshore concerns. In other words, we owe that money to people outside of Canada.

Today, some seven years after the government came to power, it is $400 billion. I do not want to get into a long discussion about blaming one or the other. I am just quoting the facts. It is now $400 billion. Almost 40 per cent of that is owed to outside Canadian concerns, the United States, Japan and Saudi Arabia. We have lost control of our economy.

On top of that, at a time when the government knew there was a recession coming, and many eloquent and learned speeches have been made in the House on the subject, the government introduces a goods and services tax when the advice from everyone from this side of the House and I think probably a few from that side of the House as well was: "For goodness sake, if you have to do it, this is not the time to do it on the backs of 32 tax increases in six years. Now you are going to hit the consumer with this. You are going to hit essentially the middle and lower income class because their expense on consumable products is much higher than those in the higher income bracket".

There are some aspects of this I want to highlight. I remember in 1984 Prime Minister Mulroney saying that social programs in Canada are a sacred trust. In the last three years we have been gnawing away at these social programs.

The government introduced Bill C-69, which cut the transfer payments, the equalization payments and reduced the CAP. Now this bill extends it to 1995. We have increased unemployment insurance payments. We have reduced the benefits associated with unemployment insurance. The insurance inputs from employers and employees have increased by more than 50 per cent in two years.

When you buy something in my province of Newfoundland right now, you automatically add 20 per cent. People cannot even afford to buy what it is they are buying. On top of that they have to add 20 per cent. On top of this, because of the reduction in transfer payments, education and medical care are being reduced. These are programs that Canadians have taken for granted. This was a national heritage. In the United States and other countries people look at you as a Canadian and say: "Boy, do you ever live in a great country". If you come from the province of Newfoundland, I think it is even better. They say: "Are you ever lucky to come from Newfoundland, that delightful part of Canada".

As Newfoundlanders and as Canadians we were always very proud to tell our foreign friends: "Yes, we have a pretty good system. We have a caring country where the richer provinces look after the poorer provinces a little bit".

An hon. member: More than a little bit.

Mr. Mifflin: Okay, more than a little bit maybe.

The point is that the richer provinces look after the poorer provinces. There is no other euphemism for it. I do not mind saying that I come from a poorer province. I am very proud of the fact that I come from that province. The poor aspect of it I do not think changes the degree of citizenry or the honour involved in being a citizen of this country.

Without getting too side-tracked on this, one of the universal advantages of being a Canadian was that there was a belief in Canada that your country looked after you. If you did not have a job, you got unemployment insurance. If you were sick, you did not have to worry about having a big fat wallet or a big credit in your Visa account to go to a doctor. If you had hard times and somehow lost your job or got laid off, there was a welfare system to look after you. It was a pretty good system. I hate to say as the thread of the speech I am giving here now that that is all changing.

The word I am getting from my constituents is: "We know times are pretty tough. We are not sure what you can do to change it, but for heaven's sake hang on to what we have now. Hang on to the lifelines". People no longer expect that they are going to get the safety nets they had before. The record in the last couple of years does not speak well for that.

They are afraid they are going to lose unemployment insurance totally. They are afraid they are going to lose medicare. They are afraid that the welfare payments are not going to be enough. They are scared and I do not want to add to that.

The government is saying: "The debt is too high. Therefore we are going to have to take money away from the provinces". What it is really saying is: "We are going to take money away from middle and low income Canadians". Many of them are sitting in this House in the galleries. There are the staff. I do not think that is fair and I do not think it is right.

I was on business in the United States last week and had the happy occasion to be in the company of my colleagues from the United States who are senators and congressmen. I can stand and say in this House that I probably met close to 20. The outstanding thing that I remember is that not one of them spoke to me without saying: "Hey, you're from Canada. Tell me all about your medicare system".

They are worried in the United States. They have 37 million people who have absolutely no insurance whatsoever. What happens is that people get aches and pains and they do not go to doctors because they cannot afford to go. So the aches and pains get worse. By the time they have to go, it is either too late or the bill is astronomical.

The cost for the average person for medical care in the United States is around $3,500. They spend $800 billion on medical care. If you look at that on an average per capita basis, my friends in the medical profession tell me it is astronomical. Those 37 million people are worried.

One of the congressmen said this to me as I sat and discussed mutual problems with him: "You know, the economy is a big problem right now and so is medicare, but if this country is as good as we think it is, the economy will pick up. Maybe it will happen this summer, maybe in the fall, maybe next year. Who knows? It will pick up though. We have to believe that". The problem of medicare in the United States is not going to go away. It will be there when the economy has started to improve.

I find it passing strange that we would try to emulate our cousins south of the border in many areas. I am looking at things like free trade and other aspects where we are trying to set up a level playing field. Yet in the area of medicare, they are trying to emulate us and we are throwing away the system. They are trying to do what we did years and years ago.

Drawing my remarks to a close, I am very upset about this bill. Getting back to the Canada Assistance Plan, I think in 24 years this program has served to support Canadians in building a social welfare system which competed with any in the world. It was enshrined as part of Canadian legislation and gave Canadians a great sense of belonging. This legislation is now taking away that great advantage that Canadians had and will take away a little part of being a Canadian at a time when we can least afford it.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on Bill C-32 which proposes to put a cap on federal contributions to Ontario, B.C. and Alberta through the Canada Assistance Plan.

I would like to speak on this bill from two perspectives, as a member of Parliament from the Hamilton area which will be especially hard hit by the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan and as a critic for disabled persons for they will also be very hard hit by this legislation.

I have recent statistics on the welfare caseload in the regional municipality of Hamilton—Wentworth. In one year the number of welfare recipients increased from 18,000 to 26,000. I would like to point out that this problem is directly due to this government's economic policies. Many of these people are on welfare because their unemployment insurance has expired and they cannot find another job. Many of them lost their manufacturing jobs in the first place because of the Conservative free trade deal. Some lost their jobs because the GST killed their small businesses. Some lost their jobs in the retail or hospitality industry because of the cross-border shopping which has drastically increased since the GST.

The government helped these people lose their jobs, raised the UI premiums, cut back the benefits of UIC to force them off of UI sooner and now it is cutting back on social assistance. It is the trickle down theory of poverty and it is a disgrace. Since the NDP government in Ontario has been on a wild spending spree, it is finding that it cannot afford to pay for fair welfare benefits that will actually allow people and families to live in dignity.

Between the social Neanderthals in Ottawa and the economic Neanderthals in Queen's Park, it is a wonder there are any jobs left in Ontario.

I will say that the bungling of these two governments is certainly a good thing for the re-election chances of my Liberal colleagues and myself. It is certainly no comfort to the homeless and the unemployed and the hundreds upon hundreds of children lining up at food banks every day.

The government says it is capping the CAP because Ontario is a wealthy province. I would invite the members opposite to come to Hamilton and meet the steel workers who have lost their jobs or walk down the streets and see the stores and other businesses that are boarded up because they have gone bankrupt. Let me tell you these people do not think Ontario is a wealthy province any more. The government forgets that Ontario in relative terms has been hit harder by this recession than the other provinces.

Of course the Minister of Finance keeps telling us that the government's economic policies are all directed toward deficit reduction. They are "a necessary restructuring". I would like the minister to explain that to the kids in the food bank line up: "Sorry kids. I know you don't have enough food to eat but it is a 'necessary restructuring'. I am sorry you don't have a winter coat or decent shoes but it is a 'necessary restructuring'. I am sorry your parents cannot find jobs but it is a 'necessary restructuring'."

Somehow I do not think these kids will find that a very convincing explanation. Neither do I.

I would like to point out the devastating impact that this bill will have on thousands of disabled people throughout this country. Government members like to point with pride to the amendments to Bill C-18 and say: "Look, we are giving disabled persons $65 million". However, these are the same members who are voting in favour of Bill C-32 which will remove more than $2 billion from Canada Assistance Plan payments. These government members voted for legislation that will cut home care for disabled persons, that will cut health care for disabled persons, that will cut rehabilitation programs for disabled persons, that will cut funding for residences for disabled persons and will cut employment services for disabled persons.

I would hope that the members opposite would recognize that many disabled persons in this country live in poverty and are going to be seriously hurt by this bill.

Government members also point to the Prime Minister's announcement in Winnipeg of $31 million a year in programs for the disabled. These same members seem to forget that more than a year ago they voted for Bill C-69 which slashed social program funding by billions of dollars and slashed Established Programs Financing by billions of dollars. These same members seem to forget that they voted to cut the jobs strategy fund by $100 million and voted to cut social housing by $411 million. They seem to forget that they voted to reduce cash transfers to the provinces for medicare.

This government has cut social programs by billions upon billions of dollars. These programs are the very ones which disabled persons rely on to help them obtain proper accommodation, help them get out of poverty and help them live in a maximum degree of dignity and freedom.

The government has undermined all the major programs which disabled Canadians need in order to succeed. I have to wonder how these government members can sleep at night, knowing what they have inflicted on these people who are among the most vulnerable in our country.

In the last budget speech the Minister of Finance had the nerve to say: "This government has done more than any other to improve the opportunities and to enable Canadians with disabilities to participate more fully and more fairly in the workplace in their communities and at home".

Contrast those words of the minister with the words used by the Canadian Cerebral Palsy Association when commenting on this legislation to cap the CAP: "The extraordinary suffering which it imposes on poor and disabled Canadians cannot be justified".

That is what disabled Canadians think of this legislation. The suffering which it imposes cannot be justified. That is what most of us think of this legislation. It cannot be justified.

I cannot support this bill. My party will not support this bill. Most Canadians will not support this bill.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it seems that most occasions when we rise in the House of Commons these days, we have to qualify whether or not it is a privilege to be getting up and speaking. I certainly have to put that qualification on my remarks today because of the subject matter.

The whole situation in the country has been so devastating that to be talking about putting any kinds of restrictions on the amount of assistance which Canadians get from their federal government in a program which is as long established as this is is absolutely unconscionable.

I guess there are three questions we would ask ourselves on three particular areas at least. The first is why is this happening? Why is the federal government doing this? I think in the first case we would ask this question because of its philosophical antipathy toward the very people who receive the assistance from the Canada Assistance Plan.

The government has this image of people on welfare. Certainly the Canada Assistance Plan is designed to assist most people who are on welfare. It has this image in its mind of young, strapping, well-muscled people who are simply too lazy to work. That being the case, they have no compunction whatsoever about putting on these kinds of restrictions.

The fact of the matter is that most of the people on assistance in Canada are not as these people envision them to be. Most of the people in Canada who get social assistance are children, which says a lot about how knowledgeable this government is on the conditions of the citizens of Canada, regardless of what age they may be.

Another large group of people who receive assistance are the elderly. If you add these two groups together, you find well over 75 per cent of the people who receive social assistance are the elderly or children.

It is interesting to speak of children. We all know and certainly the government is fond of saying that our youth is the future of our country. If it really believed that, it certainly would not be doing what it is doing.

I think it is interesting to look at some of the figures surrounding the matter of children and their plight in Canada today. One in six of the children in Canada are poor. A million children in Canada live in poverty. There is not enough time in a 10–minute speech in Parliament to be able to cover all the topics. I am not going to cover the whole matter of food banks.

We certainly all know the situation in the communities across Canada. In the rural communities, where one would hardly imagine that the situation could become so bad, people have to avail themselves of food banks. Food banks are becoming a commonplace occurrence in the rural areas as well.

Certainly we have this devastating effect on the children of our land and the elderly particularly. There are others such as disabled people who, through no fault of their own, mostly because of systemic and institutional biases in our society against them, are not able to make a living in our land. There is certainly no other reason in most cases that is not possible.

We ask ourselves another question. The second question is why is the government putting this cap on the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario? It has the perception there that these are the three richest provinces in the country.

The provinces look at the debt, I suppose, per capita or the deficit per capita and they see that they are not anywhere near as bad as the federal government is. We will get into why the debt per capita on the federal side is as enormous as it is later. It looks at these three provinces and says: "Their debt is not as serious as ours".

An hon. member: It is soon going to be that bad in Ontario.

Mr. Fisher: That may very well be, but having succeeded a Liberal government which was doing exactly what the Conservative government has been doing federally, it is hardly any wonder.

In any event, the federal government looks at these three provinces and says: "We cannot let them get away with this. We are going to have to punish them for being, even giving them the benefit of the doubt, marginally good managers of the economy, and for not being in debt as seriously as the federal government is."

I am not going to go into great detail in all cases, but look at British Columbia and the condition of the people who receive social assistance in that province. Remember that most of these people are children and the elderly and others as well, and they are addressed here. Look at a single employable person, as they say, in British Columbia on social assistance for a lot of reasons, and we will get into some of those later. They receive social assistance to the tune of $5,900, approximately.

Look at the poverty level, as determined by the Canadian government's own report, the National Council on Welfare. It has that wonderful Canada symbol with the Canadian flag on it. We certainly have to take its numbers as being gospel. It still leaves a deficit for a single employable person in British Columbia of $6,823. A disabled person receives in welfare $8,204, but the poverty level is the same as for a single employable person, $12,727, leaving a deficit for a disabled person in British Columbia of $4,523.

A single parent with a child, and these are certainly among the most impoverished people in our land, would receive $11,687, but the poverty level for this group of people is almost $16,800, meaning that they are $5,000 short of even being at the poverty level. These are all negative figures.

There are a lot of working poor in our land who receive social assistance. A couple in British Columbia is receiving social assistance of $15,000—which sounds like a lot I suppose to the members across the way who still think that $500 a month back in the days when they were young was a lot of money and are suffering under the guise that $25,840 is the poverty level—leaving a deficit in British Columbia for people with two children of almost $10,800.

I am not going to go into detail for Alberta and Ontario, but the deficits for a single employable in Alberta is almost $9,000 a year; in Ontario it is almost $5,500. Single parents, suffer a deficit in relation to the poverty level—they do not even get up to the poverty level in Alberta—of $6,546; in Ontario it is almost $2,300. Again, the couple with two children in Alberta fall short of the poverty level by $10,000; in Ontario, by almost $6,400.

We ask ourselves a third question: Why, at least in the government's rationalization of the scheme of things, is it doing this? It is saying, in addition to the fact that it has to get some of this money out of the rich provinces, that it simply does not have any money. The federal deficit has to be addressed.

The national debt has to be addressed. We have to ask ourselves how it got itself into this mess in the first place and why on earth should the elderly and the children of our land be the ones hit with the major responsibility of trying to bail the government out of something it created in many different ways, not the least of which were the tremendous benefits in tax relief which it gave to corporations, most of them multinationals. It was pointed out earlier that they were tremendously foreign-owned. The government also gave some benefits in tax relief to some of our national institutions such as the banks.

We have a situation in which the government has impoverished the land and now is trying to get the citizens to build the country up. I guess we are supposed to lift ourselves up by our bootstraps.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party opposes Bill C-32. We have opposed it at every stage of the legislative process.

Before I indicate some of the reasons the Liberal Party opposes Bill C-32, following the NDP member I cannot help but ask myself how hypocritical it is of the New Democratic Party here in Ottawa to be critical of this government when its friend and comrade in Queen's Park is doing just as much damage to the economy in Ontario as this Conservative government is doing in Ottawa.

Comrade Bob Rae at Queen's Park has developed a fairly negative relationship with business in the province of Ontario. He leads an anti-business government. I was going through some press clippings today and here are some of the headlines. We will see whether these headlines are conducive to a good business relationship in Ontario in order to create the jobs that are necessary.

One headline: "Ontario Business Gears up to Battle Rae's Labour Laws; Business Finds Solidarity in War of Ideologies".

What is business upset about in the province of Ontario? Yes, it is upset. I notice Bob Rae's comrades here in Ottawa are getting a little antsy and are not permitting me to speak, but I will try to ignore them.

Business is concerned about the proposed labour laws in Ontario. I would like to quote Catherine Swift, the chief economist of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, a very reputable organization in Canada. She says: "We are dealing with an organized labour government. If there is one issue they will go to the wall on, it is this one".

Speaking on behalf of business, and let us not forget that it is business that creates jobs, it is business that provides the opportunities for people to create wealth in this country. She goes on to say: "We are going to oppose these reforms to the bitter end. This is the major battle we are going to have with this government".

At a time when we have in the province of Ontario 509,000 people on the unemployment roll at an unemployment rate of 9.7 per cent, hundreds of thousands of people on welfare, this socialist government at Queen's Park has decided to bring in this legislation in order to satisfy its union boss friends, the union bosses who are telling Bob Rae and the provincial cabinet what to do. It is bringing in this labour legislation which has totally turned off business.

According to Norman Stewart, a vice-president of Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited, the NDP government's current labour law proposals, if implemented, would scare off investment and result in massive job losses.

We are dealing with an NDP caucus here in Ottawa that speaks out of one side of its mouth while comrade Bob Rae at Queen's Park is doing so much damage to the provincial economy in Ontario that it really behoves the federal NDP members here to call their friend at Queen's Park and say: "Bob Rae, back off. Back off. Create a positive climate for business in the province of Ontario in order to ensure that we can start rebuilding its economy".

As the employment critic of the Official Opposition, I have had the duty over the last number of weeks to examine very closely the unemployment situation on a national basis. We all know, as a result of the six weeks we have had in our ridings, that the country is literally on its knees. Canadians are suffering. Not only are they losing their jobs, but they are losing their homes, their cars, their businesses, their dignity. This government simply does not realize the extent of the hardship and suffering.

There are 1.42 million Canadians who are unemployed. We have to think about that—1.42 million. That is 1,420,000 Canadians "officially unemployed". There are several hundred thousand more who have dropped out of the labour market and who are no longer looking for work. That is a lot of people who are suffering.

On top of that, there are over 2 million Canadians on welfare. In the province of Ontario, as I indicated, there was a 9.7 per cent unemployment rate in December. The January unemployment rate will be out tomorrow and there is every indication that the unemployment rate will rise. There are 509,000 people unemployed in the province of Ontario. There are 1.2 million Canadians collecting unemployment insurance. Last year the total cost of the delivery of unemployment insurance was over $20 billion; $20,378,000,000.

As far as it is concerned on the international scene, Canada ranks second in unemployment of the OECD countries. Only Ireland is higher than Canada, with an unemployment rate of 16.4 per cent. In metro Toronto, 78,000 jobs were lost last year; 26,000 workers in Ontario lost their jobs in permanent layoffs of 50 or more employees.

That is the background. What does this government intend to do? With Bill C-32 it intends to limit the amount of federal transfer payments under the Canada Assistance Plan to "the country's three richest provinces, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia". When you are poor, you are poor and it really does not matter whether you are poor in metropolitan Toronto or if you are poor in St. John's, Newfoundland. Regardless of where you live in this country if you are poor, you are poor. The suffering is the same. The pain and anguish are the same.

This government has decided in its warped wisdom to reduce its deficit on the backs of the disadvantaged in Canadian society. When we talk about the people who are affected by the provisions of Bill C-32, it is not the wealthy, not the middle class, but the poor, the disadvantaged, those on welfare, those children living in poverty, the disabled, the elderly.

The government says: "We have a mandate to reduce the deficit, to reduce the debt". It does not tell Canadians that in the seven years it has been in office this government has more than doubled the national debt. It has the unmitigated audacity to blame the previous Liberal administration for the difficulties this government finds itself in.

With this particular bill, the government now wants to restrict the level of federal assistance that will flow to those three provinces, Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario. As I indicated, there are 509,000 people in the province of Ontario unemployed, 124,000 in Alberta and 168,000 unemployed in the province of British Columbia. As far as those on welfare, 917,000 people in the province of Ontario are on welfare, 156,000 in Alberta, and 244,000 in British Columbia. The suffering exists in those provinces as well as the other provinces in Canada.

I note that there is but one minute left in my remarks. I was about to go into the history of the Canada Assistance Plan. Some members were around back then and know the work that Lester Pearson and the Liberal government did some 25 years ago to bring in the Canada Assistance Plan that has served to help needy Canadians in a very significant way. With regret, it is the Conservative government that intends to cut back.

We will fight this bill. We will continue to vote against this bill. We urge the government to implement the Liberal recovery plan that was announced by the Leader of the Official Opposition a few days ago. The government has taken a cross-your-fingers, hands-off approach to the Canadian economy, allowing hundreds of thousands and millions of Canadians to continue to suffer. As Liberals, we will not put up with it.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House today is of the greatest gravity, certainly to the province of Ontario and, I am sure, equally to the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta because at this time Ontario is facing the worst financial crisis since the 1930s.

It looks that much worse because of the unparalleled prosperity that occurred in our province between 1983, the last recession, until the fall of 1990. Clearly we are in an incredible financial bind in the province of Ontario.

This bill that we are talking about today, because of the mechanisms that are in place in the province of Ontario, goes directly to the taxpayers in every constituency across the province.

A speech by Mr. Rae a week or so ago indicated that municipalities and boards of education and other agencies are going to be limited to a 1 per cent increase this coming year. He has no prescription for changing the economic circumstances of the province of Ontario but he has a deficit of at least $9 billion, perhaps $13 billion. He came on the television and said: "This is the problem", and did not set out any prescription for solving it.

That situation comes right back to Bill C-32 because it was the government's initiative in the budget a year or so ago to cap the Canada Assistance Plan, a program that was brought in, as the hon. member from Toronto, our critic on employment mentioned, by Mr. Pearson and his government in the period 1963 to 1968. We undertook to provide half of the funding for general welfare assistance, child support and most forms of assistance in this country.

In seven out of the ten provinces of this country, the provincial government and the federal government share those general welfare costs on a 50/50 basis. In the province of Ontario that is not the case. In Ontario, the province picks up only 30 per cent, the federal government picks up 50 per cent and the local municipalities are saddled with the other 20 per cent. This 20 per cent, in prosperous times, is manageable but in the current devastating situation which we face, especially in northern Ontario, it is a burden that simply cannot be borne.

I wrote to the premier of Ontario several months ago and asked that he apply, as he had committed to when he was in opposition, to sharing equally the welfare costs, as is done in seven of the ten provinces. I received a letter from the premier on January 13 in which he expressed concern for the local municipalities saying that their expenditures have doubled during the past year.

Clearly that is the case in Algoma district where we have had massive lay-offs in the uranium mines in Elliott Lake, where we have had massive lay-offs in the steel industry in Sault Ste. Marie, where the forest products industry is suffering with lay-offs and temporary shutdowns and so on. Unfortunately, in the premier's response to me, he indicates that they do provide some assistance when the unemployment goes beyond 3.5 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, we are saddled this coming winter with welfare rolls that are reported by our family and social services board to approach 15 per cent. So you can see that the criteria of the provincial government of 3.5 per cent, a great deal of it will be applied between that and the 15 per cent.

What we have here with the off-loading on to the province of Ontario when it is facing the worst economic crisis since the 1930s and the province breaking its commitment to the municipalities which it made when it was in opposition to disentangle the general welfare assistance, the assistance for single parent mothers, for foster homes, for essential living services, for disabled and handicapped people, dental care for poor families, subsidized child care for low income, safe houses for abused women. All those things are provided for under the Canada Assistance Plan and the provincial government is really not living up to that commitment. The premier of Ontario goes on and says: "The Ontario government recognizes the current financial arrangement between the province and municipality government lack accountability and simplicity". That is certainly clear. The arrangements, the regulations need to be simplified.

"We are committed to a disentanglement process to find better ways", the premier says, "to deliver our community services." He goes on to say: "A joint steering committee composed of six municipal representatives appointed by the Ontario Association of Municipalities, OAM, and six of my cabinet colleagues are helping to realign provincial-municipal roles and responsibilities. The Minister of Municipal Affairs, David Cook, chairs the committee."

What we need is not more study by this committee but action, action that will divide those responsibilities for general welfare assistance equally between the federal and provincial governments. Bill C-32 is just exacerbating the situation. The costs are skyrocketing in Ontario and instead of sharing on a 50/50 basis, the federal government is welshing on the commitment made when the Canada Assistance Plan was set up by Mr. Pearson back in the 1960s to share equally between the province and the federal government.

Likewise, if that was being done fairly by the federal government, it would ease the burden for the province to carry out its responsibilities in sharing the cost equally between the federal and provincial governments for local welfare. Welfare costs have doubled and tripled in many municipalities at a time when many of the local ratepayers are facing unemployment themselves and difficulty in paying their municipal taxes, while at the same time the government of Ontario has put a cap of one per cent on grants to school boards. This offloads more on the local municipal ratepayers.

The government should withdraw this bill. I am sure everybody agrees with that because they realize how important the local ratepayer is in this whole chain of taxation from the municipal and federal level.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand here in this House and debate third reading of Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

Through this legislation the government will cap the Canada Assistance Plan transfers to the three provinces, Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario. I have spoken before on this in the House of Commons and the absolutely abysmal ramifications that this legislation, if passed, will have on Canadians living in those three provinces who are being discriminated against.

Here in the nation's capital as far back as in April 1990, when the government first announced the cap on CAP, the social services committee of the Ottawa-Carleton Regional Council brought the following recommendations forward in an attempt to cut the federal government off at the pass:

That the province of Ontario be advised not to pass on federal revenue losses to the municipalities;

That the province continue to implement SARC reforms;

That the federal government be requested to retract its discriminatory capping policy with respect to the Canada Assistance Plan as it relates to the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta;

That the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton express in writing to the leaders of the three federal parties and to the local members of Parliament its opposition to the proposed limits to the increase of federal contributions to programs to alleviate and to prevent poverty under the Canada Assistance Plan; and

That the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton request that the Federation of Canadian Municipalities undertake a federal lobby campaign to intercede in consideration of the proposed legislation to reduce the share of federal contribution under CAP to the three provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

These recommendations are still good today so I will not repeat my previous speech. I would really hope that the government will listen this time. It did not the last time, especially as the evidence shows more and more strongly that this government's economic policies simply do not work and are not working for Canadians.

During the debate at second reading in September, I mentioned that the three affected provinces will lose $2.135 billion in federal transfers over the five-year period through 1995-96. These numbers are from the government's own estimates. These provinces during these hard economic times cannot afford to lose this money. And certainly the province that I know the best is the province of Ontario and we all know that Ontario is being hit very, very hard in this recession.

The Canadian economy is mired in its worst economic crisis since the great Depression. The Conference Board of Canada is reporting a new low in consumer and business confidence. In September 1991 Canada registered its first merchandise trade deficit in 15 years. In the first 10 months of 1991 Canada's merchandise trade balance fell by $2.6 billion compared to the same period in 1990.

Some analysts are forecasting a double-dip recession. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association has gone even further by stating:

> —the Canadian economy is hovering on the brink of a 'triple-dip' recession. Trade, employment and shipments data for October and November point to a serious decline in export production during the fourth quarter of 1991.

Let us look at all of this in human terms. There was a record number of bankruptcies in Canada last year. Our oil and gas industry is in a shambles. More than 1,700 people are facing lay-offs at Imperial Oil. Thousands of jobs in manufacturing have simply vanished forever in Ontario. Unemployment opened the year 1991 at 9.3 per cent and closed the year at 10.3 per cent. Today, more than 1.4 million Canadians are unemployed. Many workers have lost their jobs permanently. Even worse, many lack the necessary skills to be competitive in the job market; 40 per cent of Canadians have difficulty with basic writing and arithmetic.

Even the employed are suffering. This past Tuesday the Conference Board of Canada told us how Canadians who are lucky enough to be working are living in mortal fear of losing their jobs. There are 2.2 million Canadians on welfare and one million children live in poverty. Two million Canadians including 700,000 children relied on food banks in 1991, a very telling statistic. And there are now more food banks in Canada than there are McDonald's restaurants.

As the federal government transfers less and less to provincial and municipal governments, they are increasingly being forced to shoulder the debt and are having to cut into the bones of their budgets to provide the necessary welfare to these 2.2 million Canadians.

I might add that as everyone in Canada knows, a municipality's only means of raising money is through property tax and grants from the provincial and the federal government and any revenues that might be earned through services at the local level. They cannot put on a 7 per cent GST; they cannot put on a provincial sales tax; they are at the mercy of the province and the federal government. Municipalities are the ones who have to pay the welfare costs. Those at the local level accept that everyone has the right to food and housing.

Providing social services is the essence of the Canada Assistance Plan. It is absolutely essential. Once a Canadian has reached the level of qualification for welfare, once all other means of support have been exhausted, the government has no right, in fact, it is obliged to provide assistance to that person.

What this government is doing with this legislation is forcing the provinces and the municipalities to do more and more with less and less. More, not fewer Canadians are being forced onto welfare by this government's economic policies. If the government callously rams through Bill C-32, less money will be available to reinforce the very bottom of the social safety net.

There are also other side effects of the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan. Hundreds of towns and cities across Canada have infrastructure projects on their books waiting for adequate funding. Our necessary streets, sewers, landfills, et cetera, are crumbling around us. What will be left of our urban infrastructure if we do not soon act?

The Liberal Party advocates that we be involved in the cost-sharing program—the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipal governments—to improve and to update the infrastructure in Canada.

The Liberal Party also advocates the use of RRSPs to finance first-time homes. This proposal would also help stimulate the housing market. The maximum allowable withdrawal would be limited to $7,500. The direct cost of such a program to the taxpayers of this nation is absolutely zero.

Another proposal of our plan calls for a shared-cost infrastructure program and I mentioned this before. Funding for these projects would be shared, one-third, one-third, one-third. The federal share would be $1 billion. Between one-half and two-thirds of the jobs created in these projects would be in construction and manufacturing and 90 per cent of the materials required are manufactured right here in this country of Canada.

Studies have shown that the net cost to the federal government after considering increased tax revenues and decreased UI and welfare payments would be $300 million. What an investment this government would have for $300 million. The $1 billion up front cost would be funded through reduced debt-service payments which have resulted from lower than expected interest rates.

I would like to talk briefly again about my own area of the nation's capital. There is a report put out by the Social Planning Council of Ottawa-Carleton entitled, "The Other Side of Fat City: Child Poverty in Ottawa-Carleton".

I get a little sick and tired of hearing some members of this House talk about Ottawa as being fat city. We know that the most vulnerable members of our society, pre-schoolers, have the highest rate of child poverty. We know that one out of six children under five years is poor in Ottawa-Carleton, one out of six children.

We know that 29 per cent of all single-parent families in Ottawa-Carleton are poor. Single mothers have a poverty rate of 33 per cent. We know that there are 5,725 single mothers in Ottawa-Carleton. We know that 47 per cent of all poor single mothers are in the labour force. I know in my city of Nepean, which is considered to have above average income, that there are 2,120 poor children.

For the government to pass this bill it is going to have a tremendous drastic effect on the poor in this nation. Where is the conscience of this government? I plead with them not to pass this bill.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, once again I rise to challenge the government bill, Bill C-32, that would seriously restrict Canada Assistance Plan payments in three provinces: Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta.

As viewers who may be listening to speeches today will know, the Canada Assistance Plan is a very important program in Canada. It really symbolizes the nature of Canada where we really care about each other and we traditionally have assumed responsibility federally and provincially for the costs of social programs.

Canada Assistance Plan has then been a method by which the federal government reimburses provinces 50 per cent of the costs of all social services. This means of course that it is not just the cost of welfare and social assistance payments, but it is for other social programs that are equally important, such as child care services, especially for children with special needs.

The Canada Assistance Plan helps to share the cost of centres for battered women and the federal government would reimburse 50 per cent of the costs. It also helps special programs for troubled young people. I know in downtown Vancouver now we have a great concern and youth workers are needed to work with young people, including immigrant youth.

Care for the elderly, programs for seniors, all these kinds of things can be cost-shared under the Canada Assistance Plan.

If the provincial governments and in turn the municipal governments only have a 50-cent dollar to cover the cost of those programs, what choice do they have? They are going to be forced to cut many, many of these programs. It is starting already with the threat of this bill and the cutbacks in transfer payments.

The federal government not only is penalizing three provinces very unfairly and in my opinion breaching an agreement that is a national trust, but it is also cutting back on the federal responsibility in practical ways to pay for social programs.

Canada, as many speakers have said, has always prided itself on being a nation that cares and shares.

• (1250)

Higher income people should pay more, perhaps, toward the costs of social programs right across the country. That is not a large cost. It is not as large a proportion of our budget as people may think.

What is the government doing? It is proposing in this bill to penalize the three provinces that are facing great economic hardship and are in danger of becoming impoverished just as much as some of the poorer provinces in the country. It is cutting back on their Canada Assistance Plan payments from the federal government.

Why is this? It is hard to justify that in these kind of times the government would be penalizing people and through the provincial cutbacks will be hurting the people who are hurt most and least able to defend themselves in this country and they are the poor.

The government has the rationale of course, that by cutting transfer payments to these three so-called rich provinces, which are not rich at all these days, this will help to pay for the deficit. What would help to pay for the deficit would be to get people back to work and get them paying taxes.

Another thing that it could be doing and which we have proposed repeatedly is to have tax reform which would mean that corporations and wealthier Canadians would pay a higher proportion of taxes. Why should the lowest-income people in the country be the ones who are penalized for the federal deficit?

I would like to quote just one statistic here. Stats-Canada has shown that spending on social programs is responsible for only 6 per cent of the national debt. Tax breaks to wealthy individuals and corporations is responsible for 44 per cent of the debt. There you have it.

What the federal government should be doing is having tax reforms that would bring in the money to help with the deficit which we all recognize is a serious problem. It should not take social services away from poor people, children and families who are struggling.

This is not surprising. This is part of the Conservative philosophy; it is part of the philosophy of the trade deal with the United States. It is part of the so-called free market approach to things which is laissez-faire, that you must reduce social programs. We must bring our programs down to the very low level playing field which is common in the United States.

Canadians do not want that. I think that over and over again, we have seen in these constitutional forums and so on that Canadians think social programs are very important. They are the things that make us Canadian. We are proud of them and we think the federal government should be improving them, not cutting back by this kind of capping of CAP.

What impact will Bill C-32 have more specifically? I just want to say in my province of British Columbia, it is a very heavy burden. It is totally unfair. Our new NDP government in British Columbia has discovered that there is a secret deficit which was not made public, a $1.7 billion deficit. When the books are probably all finished, it will probably be closer to $2 billion.

I am told that 67 per cent of this deficit in British Columbia is caused by the loss of federal transfer payments. This federal government is creating that deficit, the very government that says it is against deficits. Its cuts to Established Programs Financing and the Canada Assistance Plan are responsible to a very large degree for this debt.

I should say that our new finance minister, Mr. Glen Clark, who happens to be the MLA for Vancouver—Kingsway has predicted that the total Canada Assistance Plan cut to British Columbia over five years will add another $1.2 billion to the deficit.

No matter how you look at it, that is putting a terrible burden on provinces that are struggling with economic hardship and whose people are suffering unemployment.

Ontario, of course, no longer is the rich industrial province that it was. We all feel very strongly for what Ontario is going through these days with the recession and now de-industrialization, plant closures and massive job lay-offs.

The federal government is hitting on Ontario the hardest and it is doing it in, I must say, a punitive way that has a very strong political component to it. When it is down there and in economic crisis with terrible rates of unemployment, the federal government, instead of increasing funds for social service programs, is again cutting them drastically. It is inconceivable that we could be doing this, especially when we can get funds from the sources that I mentioned.

This is a huge burden for provinces, Alberta as well. The only thing they can do then is to cut social services and cut funds for job creation that should be there, and have their debts increased.

The federal government has abrogated its responsibility under the Canada Assistance Plan. For many years this has been a federal cost-shared program and it is something that I am sure Canadians would want to maintain.

The impact on families, of course, is the real tragedy because as this shift down the line with cuts from provinces to municipalities and others, then non-profit agencies cannot provide the services because they simply will not have the funds to do it.

So we have more people on welfare without support services, wage-earners who are getting increasingly depressed and people who are employable and have worked all of their lives on welfare for the first time. The sense of failure and hopelessness that goes along with this soon makes people unemployable in the future. They have no money for their kids. There is stress on marriages and they break up. Young people are not getting the chance they should have for the future.

No matter how we look at this bill, it is grossly unfair. I think we should have something in our Constitution that will prevent this kind of unilateral failure or cuts by government to provinces.

We feel very strongly that this bill should not be supported. It means that social assistance rates will remain below the poverty level. I must say the National Council on Welfare says the social assistance rates right now average 56 per cent of the poverty line. The only alternative that provinces have is to cut support services.

In closing, I would just like to say that we believe instead of cutting CAP to these three provinces, the government should be reforming taxes to help with the deficit. It should be putting people back to work by having a more positive economic strategy in co-operation with provinces.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in the debate on Bill C-32, particularly as a member of Parliament—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is getting awfully close to one o'clock. Maybe we should call it one o'clock so we will not break up the hon. member's speech.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the 16th Olympics are about to begin in Albertville, France. One hundred and forty-five of Canada's finest athletes are eager to give their best.

Canada proudly supports the noble tradition of these games. Over the years, this support has led to the development of a strong Canadian sport system, a system that allows us to send impressive teams like the one now in Albertville.

Competing for one's country in the spirit of goodwill and fair play is a great accomplishment for any athlete. Within this international arena, our athletes demonstrate not only their own determination and dedication, they also reflect the values cherished by the nation they represent, Canada.

The Olympic Games serve to ignite our national pride, bringing Canadians from every cultural and linguistic background together as we cheer on our athletes. Without a doubt, all Canadians who actively support our athletes, whether they be coaches, administrators, sponsors, parents, friends or the fans and spectators who cheer them, are an important part of Canada's team.

I know that all hon. members will join me in applauding Canada's team, in wishing our Olympic contenders all the best over the next couple of weeks.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the dairy farmers of Prince Edward Island are very afraid of what will happen at the GATT in the coming weeks and months. There is great pressure from many countries, especially the United States, to bring to an end our supply management system and marketing boards.

The outcome of the agricultural talks at GATT could mean the end of our price guarantees and support for producers in the dairy, egg, chicken and poultry sectors. Not surprisingly, thousands of farmers in this country are lobbying hard to ensure that the federal government does everything it can on the international scene to protect supply management.

Like never before, the Prime Minister must use any influence he has with the Americans and others to protect the family farms and ensure the stability of rural Canada.

THE MONARCHY

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, today marks the 40th anniversary of the accession of Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth II to the throne in 1952. Our Queen unites Canadians of every ethnic background or origin.

Her Majesty has reigned over Canada longer than any other monarch since Confederation. How lucky we are to have, as Queen of Canada, a figure who has truly become the first lady of the world.

When leaving California for British Columbia in 1983, the Queen told an American reporter: "I am going home to Canada tomorrow." The Queen will again be home in her capital of Canada to preside at the 125th anniversary of Canadian Confederation on July 1.

As loyal Canadian subjects of Her Majesty, it is appropriate for members of this House to join with Canadians in all walks of life to take note of this auspicious anniversary of Her Majesty's accession.

EASTERN TOWNSHIPS

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is the 200th anniversary of the opening up to settlement of the eastern townships in Quebec.

On February 7, 1792 the Lieutenant-Governor of the newly formed colony of Lower Canada rose in the Parliament in Quebec City and announced that the Crown lands in that area would be surveyed and divided into townships. In the next year, surveyors began work and produced the map which we know today with, because of the context of the time, English name places like Ascot, Orford and Eton.

Professor John Rittenhouse, historian at Bishop's University, remarked recently that in contrast to the French and American revolutions, the proclamation of the townships is an example of how our country was built. "In Canada, we do it administratively", he said. "It was a question of trying to put together a country."

It is also worth noting that despite its English beginnings, English and French speaking persons have lived together harmoniously in the townships, or l'Estrie as some prefer to say, for 200 years. That is a good example for all Canada at this time in our history.

Like many Montrealers, I have the privilege of getting to the townships from time to time, so it gives me particular pleasure to highlight the 200th anniversary of the establishment of the townships.

I know that all members join me in extending best wishes to the townshippers.

EDUCATION

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the headlines in The Toronto Star today read: "Ontario schools doing poorly in testing". Canadians will now look to find fault somewhere if not everywhere. When our students fail we all fail.

Beth McGuire of the Ontario Federation of Home and Schools says: "This is not the time to be bashing the education system, we should instead be celebrating the success of some of our outstanding students."

I am proud to rise in the House to recognize two of our outstanding graduates, both of whom were born, raised and educated in Sault Ste. Marie.

Roberta Bondar was the first Canadian woman to travel into space aboard the NASA space shuttle and completed her experiments with consummate skill and professionalism.

Dr. Robert Korneluk, as head of a research team, has isolated the genetic defect believed to be the cause of muscular dystrophy, a most significant medical breakthrough.

Let us praise, let us promote, let us respect the accomplishments of Roberta Bondar and Robert Korneluk, two scientific pioneers who have contributed not only to a better Canada but to a better world.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT WEEK

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, from February 3 to February 7, International Development Week gives us an opportunity to learn more about the developing world. Various activities are being organized across the country by schools, non-governmental organizations and community groups, to make us better acquainted with African, Asian and Latin American countries.

This year's theme stresses the fundamental link between development and the environment. Mr. Speaker, our future depends on whether we are prepared to act jointly to seek national and international solutions to global problems, especially those that concern the environment.

We all have a role to play in our respective communities, and I would urge all Canadians to do their share in preserving our environment and supporting our government in its international development activities.

JOB DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of the municipalities of Glace Bay, Waterford, Dominion, Cape Breton county, Louisbourg and Richmond county, all communities within the federal district of Cape Breton—East Richmond that call upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration to provide more funding under the job development program.

At the present time the level of unemployment in my constituency as well as in eastern Nova Scotia is exceptionally high. It is very important that the Government of Canada allocate sums of money to provide these individual Canadians in that particular area with some semblance of hope for their economic future.

With high unemployment, unprecedented welfare rolls, unprecedented use of food banks, the morale and spirit of the people who live in that particular area of the country is at an all-time low.

I call upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration to act expeditiously to assist those municipalities and the residents of those communities.

COLGATE-PALMOLIVE CANADA INC.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, last month Colgate-Palmolive Canada Inc. announced the closing of its Wicksteed Avenue facility in Toronto. This followed hard on the heels of the announced closing of its New Westminster, British Columbia facility and its long-time manufacturing plant at 63 Colgate Avenue in Toronto.

As a result of these decisions, Colgate-Palmolive no longer manufactures any of the following products in Canada: ABC and Arctic Power laundry detergents; Ajax cleaners; Palmolive dish soap and Electric dishwasher soap; Irish Spring and Palmolive bar soap; Javex bleach; Fleecy fabric softener; and Scrub and Shine liquid cleaners. In fact, the only product Colgate-Palmolive will continue to make in Canada is Colgate dental cream.

There is a message in this for all of us who are truly concerned about plant closings and manufacturing job losses. Buy Canadian. Clean your teeth with Colgate dental cream but do not wash with Palmolive soap.

GUN CONTROL

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, we heard that the product Dye Witness will now be a prohibited weapon. Dye Witness is an aerosol can filled with green paint. It is not dangerous to your health and is used mainly by women as a defence against eventual attackers. Thanks to Dye Witness, the attacker is dyed green for a week.

Mr. Speaker, I was flabbergasted that a weapon as inoffensive as Dye Witness could be taken off the market overnight, when we have not yet succeeded in banning military and paramilitary weapons. In fact, we are still waiting for the regulations on gun control.

When will the minister finally table the regulations Canadians want, so they can protect themselves and their children against the free circulation of firearms?

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, we are presently in the crucial stages at the GATT talks in Europe.

Canada ranks second to lowest in the cost of a typical food basket among western nations and the quality of our products is second to none.

Under the current GATT negotiations, Canada is calling for the reduction of export subsidies and the clarification of article XI. Should article XI not be clarified and even worse, replaced with tariffication, the supply management system as we know it would be weakened to the point where eventually it would not protect these sectors at all.

On Tuesday morning, representatives from the five supply managed sectors pressed their point here in Ottawa. In a market analysis they conducted, they predicted decreases in revenue each year and half of the farms disappearing in some sectors if tariffs replace the quantitative import restrictions we now have. This is what the future holds for us if the Dunkel proposals go ahead.

• (1410)

On behalf of the food production sector, I urge the government and the country's representatives at the GATT talks to stand their ground with regard to article XI. Canada has too much to lose.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Father Alfred Couturier and Mr. Gilles Bourgeois, of Amos, and Mr. Léo Lacroix, of Barraute, in Abitibi, recently wrote to me to tell me that they found it unfair that married couples paid a "marriage tax" in 1989 that amounted to $570 per couple, on average, and as much as $980 in some cases. The Income Tax Act has not changed since then. They think that the government is thus penalizing married couples, when it should encourage marriage and family stability.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Health and Welfare to act as soon as possible to remedy this situation which is unfavorable to Canadian family life.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in B.C. more jobs were lost because of the free trade agreement. The Department of Employment and Immigration has given work visas to foreign workers to dismantle the Wolverine copper tubing plant in New Westminster. The equipment is being shipped to Korea.

Section 15 of the trade deal permits foreign workers to do anything from pipefitting and welding, to crane operating and truck swamping. Now Canadians are even being deprived of the job of dismantling the plant where they already lost 200 jobs. Where does this end?

Three years ago, the Bureau of Competition reversed its own decision and allowed a Canadian copper tubing plant to be sold to U.S. interests. These owners then shut the doors and 200 jobs were lost.

Last night on B.C. TV news it was revealed that a U.S. based contractor had been hired six months previously to dismantle this plant, even though the company was encouraging an employee buyout.

After all that has happened to the many Canadian workers who have lost their jobs, must they now stand back helplessly as the government allows foreign workers to enter Canada, pack up Canadian jobs and ship them away?

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with members of the House the results of a survey I conducted recently in my riding of Halton—Peel.

I asked all constituents to respond to 14 simple questions, to give me comments on the government's policies and also on our political system. To my amazement, more than 4,000 households took part in the survey, allowing me to write a lengthy report.

The results of one question will be of interest to members. I asked if MPs should always vote in this House according to their constituents' wishes or should an MP listen to all views and then vote as he or she thinks best.

People indicated they think the MP should widely consult and inform the public. By a margin of more than two to one, they told me that an MP should vote in this House as he or she thinks best. The message seems clear. People want MPs who think and lead and who are not just trained seals.

SMALL AND MEDIUM-SIZED BUSINESSES

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, small and medium-sized businesses are the engine of our economy. Quebec has 25 per cent of the small businesses in Canada, but unfortunately, it recorded 38.6 per cent of Canada's business bankruptcies in 1991.

Last February 26, the then Minister of Finance, in presenting his budget, said: "This budget sets out a plan for economic recovery—a strong, confident recovery". What a disaster his forecast was.

The present Minister of Finance should implement the Liberal economic recovery program to help the remaining businesses avoid bankruptcy and to create lasting employment and give Canadians hope.

MEDICAL RESEARCH

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I rise to congratulate a Canadian scientist and his colleagues for their work.

It was announced yesterday that a major breakthrough into a better understanding of one of the world's most commonly inherited neuromuscular diseases has been made by a Medical Research Council of Canada scientific team. The landmark finding was made in collaboration with scientists from three other countries.

The Canadian team, headed by Dr. Robert Korneluk of the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario here in Ottawa has located the site of the defective gene responsible for myotonic dystrophy. The research was done in collaboration with scientists in the Netherlands, Great Britain and the United States.

MRC, the major federal agency funding medical research in Canada, provided more than $400,000 in support of Dr. Korneluk's research. The research was also supported by the Muscular Dystrophy Association of Canada and its U.S. counterpart. On a world-wide basis, the disease affects about one in 800,000 people.

In closing, I am proud the Government of Canada has supported this important research and I wish to reiterate my commitment to medical research by this government.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT WEEK

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, with the end of the cold war the United Nations is now reorganizing its priorities. An unprecedented meeting last week of the Security Council heads of government has given rise to fears by Third World countries that their concerns are being given low priority in the United Nations.

The issue of most concern to the south is economic development. What it sees is the rich industrialized north focusing primarily on the economic needs of eastern Europe and on political issues.

Canada should show its commitment to International Development Week by using its high standing in the United Nations to bring together Nordic countries, France, Australia and the non-aligned movement and others, to ensure that the pressing economic concerns of developing countries are given high priority at the United Nations.

Canada should lead the way in ensuring that the United Nation focuses on strategies that the developing countries themselves articulate which will end hunger, disease and illiteracy. By doing that the UN will ensure a healthier, more equitable and politically stable world for all.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance keeps talking about the economic crisis as a restructuring problem. I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister how he intends to restructure the situation facing people lined up at food banks in this country. What is he going to do to restructure the situation so 700,000 children do not have to line up at 1,300 food banks? What is he going to do to restructure the fact that one in ten of the people living in homeless shelters across this country are children?

Are they part of the restructuring problem, and what is his solution?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the record on help to children by this government—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. McDermid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I believe the record on help that this government has given to children over the years speaks for itself.

I might say to the hon. member that there is a commitment by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, there is a commitment by the Prime Minister of this country, and there is a commitment by the Minister of Finance to take a look at the situation as to the affairs of young people, children. I am sure that she will hear some news in the not too distant future in that regard.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The Minister of Finance is so intent on defending failed policies that he has closed his mind to constructive alternatives. Yesterday he went on the attack against the idea of a national shared-cost public works program. I hope the Acting Prime Minister will take a more constructive attitude.

The FCM today has written to the Prime Minister asking that a national public works program be placed on the agenda of the First Ministers' Conference next Monday.

Will the Acting Prime Minister today, along with the Prime Minister, announce that the federal government will launch such a program? Or, at the very least, will he use the opportunity of the First Ministers' Conference next week to explore this much needed idea with the premiers across this country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of Canada has made it very clear to the premiers that he is prepared to sit down and discuss any item that might be of benefit to Canada.

At the same time he is aware of the fiscal restraints that we have in this country, that all provinces have, that all provincial premiers including the New Democratic Party premiers are talking about now, that they have to cut costs and they have to watch their expenditures because, as Premier Harcourt of British Columbia said, we cannot spend our way out of a recession.

I might say to the hon. member the other thing we have to remember is that the Liberal plan is asking for a billion dollars from the federal government, a billion dollars from provincial governments, and a billion dollars from municipal governments, all coming from one person, the taxpayer, the guy who pays the buck. There is only one person who pays all three billion dollars. I am not sure that municipalities are prepared to go to their taxpayers today and ask for another billion dollars.

Ms. Copps: I would like to know who the minister thinks is currently paying unemployment insurance and welfare benefits, because it is those same people who would prefer to pay money to put people back to work.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): My supplementary question is for the Minister for International Trade. Yesterday, the Prime Minister claimed that he had done everything to settle the matter of article XI of GATT. Following the latest negotiations on the Dunkel report in December, we know that the Prime Minister has failed totally on the GATT issue. Can he tell us today how he will change his negotiating policy to give back some hope to farmers across Canada who now believe that they will lose their livelihood?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member is referring to when she makes that outrageous statement.

What the Prime Minister has done on a consistent basis, whether it is in meeting with the farm leaders and expressing his solid commitment behind their position or in statements he has made in meetings with President Delors of the European Community, President Bush, President Mitterrand and Prime Minister Lubbers at the time when he was the head of the European commission, is stated the position of the Government of Canada, that we are in support of the strengthening and the clarification of article XI because that is the best way that we can support the supply managed system that is so important to our producing farmers.

That is the position of the government and that is the position the Prime Minister has consistently stated.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of state.

The Federation of Canadian Municipalities again today, as it has for the past four years, called on this government to invest in this competitive Canadian infrastructure. I might add that not one province, not one municipality, has refused to participate in the shared-cost infrastructure program.

The projects are ready and they can be implemented in 30 days. It is not going to have an effect on the deficit; it is deficit neutral. It will save on the unemployment insurance. It will save on welfare costs. It will rejuvenate the economy and create thousands of jobs.

When will this government stop making excuses and start investing in Canadians?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to hear the Liberals come up with this revolution, this great new policy.

I believe back in 1981 or 1982, or maybe a little earlier, the federal government under the Liberals participated in municipal infrastructure programs. They were the ones who cancelled them because they said they did not serve a useful purpose.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, isn't it interesting that this minister thinks creating jobs is revolutionary?

This program has the backing of economists, provinces, municipalities and the private sector, including the chairman of the Bank of Montreal who said that helping Canadians without work made good business sense. John Redfern, chairman of Lafarge Canada Inc., said: "An efficient infrastructure is necessary in order to maintain a strong economy".

I ask the minister again: Why won't this government act now and introduce a program that will strengthen the Canadian economy?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter of debate. I would say to the hon. member that in bringing in a program like this we are not creating jobs. We are making work. They are not meaningful jobs. They are not long-lasting jobs. They are not jobs that will contribute to the economy in the long run.

That is our goal. That is what we want to do and I think that is what people want. They want full-time meaningful work, not a handout for a few months' work.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Indicators continue to show that Canadians have a lack of confidence in the Canadian economy. This week 70 per cent of Canadians polled show that they did not even have the confidence to make a major purchase. No confidence means no jobs. No jobs mean over three million Canadians unemployed and a $30 billion expenditure by taxpayers to support unemployment.

How does the government plan to pay for this rising cost of unemployment? Does the government plan to raise taxes or raise the deficit to cover the cost of unemployment?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, we have within the fiscal framework been able to help in a number of areas over the last short period of time.

I remind the hon. member that we helped the agricultural community this year with some $800 million. We helped the transportation industry, the truckers, the railways and the airlines, which maintained jobs and helped the economy of Canada.

We helped preserve jobs at de Havilland and we did that within the fiscal framework. We helped with the book publishing industry which was announced by my colleague just recently and was well received by the book publishers. As a matter of fact last night they publicly thanked the government for the help at a gathering that the hon. member for Hamilton East was at, as well as a number of others from the House.

We helped with equalization payments with the provinces that receive equalization payments. There has been a tremendous—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we should go on to the next question.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The government is not helping by slashing the CAP payments to maintain the kinds of social health services the provinces need to help their people. There are some concrete things this government can do and it is refusing to recognize them.

Today the Federation of Canadian Municipalities presented a proposal for a national municipal infrastructure program, a program that would create 63,000 jobs every year it is in effect, that would generate new revenues and that would give a massive boost to our economy.

Will the government show that it really wants to get Canadians back working and support this program in its new budget?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I can tell my hon. friend that first of all her statement on slashing CAP is just not true. There is no restriction on CAP increases for the seven provinces and there is a 5 per cent increased cap on CAP for the three other provinces. We are not slashing; we are actually increasing CAP.

If the hon. member were fair and honest with the House, I am sure she would have put her question in a little different manner.

As far as the association of municipalities is concerned, it has made the same proposal to the Minister of Finance for the last number of years. Ever since the Liberals cancelled the program it has made this proposal. Every year we look at this proposal. We will look at the proposal again. We will always give it consideration in the context of the over-all plans of the government and within the fiscal framework of the government of which we always have to be mindful.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I remind the minister that they cannot build an economy on a crumbling infrastructure. I do not know what there is to look at. If we are going to be prosperous, if we are going to compete, we need an infrastructure in our communities to make it possible to do that.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, unemployment and welfare are expensive. It costs taxpayers a lot of money and leaves all those people without hope. I received the following letter from an unemployed man: "I cannot sleep at night. I do not know where I will find money so I can eat. It is hard to keep hope for the future when one cannot survive from day to day".

When will the government give these people a little hope? When will it stop saying that unemployment costs nothing?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the government has never said that unemployment does not cost. We know it does. But there are different ways of getting out of the problem. The socialists would have us spend our way out. Well, some of them; not all of them. The new premier of British Columbia says that you cannot spend your way out of a recession. He says you have to have the basic right to be ready to grasp the opportunity which is coming now because we are coming out of a recession and the signs that are showing are good.

• (1430)

We have been able to help the economy and the provinces through means that were announced by the Minister of Finance last week and, I might say, well accepted by them. There is a budget coming up later on, in the not too distant—

Mr. Speaker: I think we will really have to move on.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Although it took a week, Mr. Speaker, we appreciate the NDP's support of the Liberal public works program.

My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Canadian agriculture has a huge stake in the GATT negotiations and the so-called Dunkel report has prompted grave concerns in the supply management sector.

The government should share with us what it knows about the possible effects of the Dunkel proposals on supply management. We take it that the government has already completed an impact study. Would the government table that document in the House this afternoon? After all, Canadians deserve to know the contents of that study. The life of an industry is on the line.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member well knows, the Government of Canada is also concerned about the impact of the Dunkel report and has made those views known directly to Mr. Dunkel, to some of the other contracting members of the GATT, as well as to the members of the farm community.

We have shared with the farm community, at its request, a study that has been done on what the levels of the tariff equivalents might be were the Dunkel proposal in effect. That was done at the request of the farm community. It has not requested an impact study so that work has not been done.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister.

I have good reason to believe that copies of an impact study have already been given to government members. Since these issues affect farmers and Canadians in general, will the minister table in this House all matters related to the GATT talks and their impact on the agricultural industry?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture made this very clear, and we will mention it this afternoon, because—for the hon. member's information—the federal-provincial conference on agriculture is scheduled to start in about half an hour.

Incidentally, the marketing board community and Canadian farm leaders did not ask for a specific impact study on these factors. They even asked us to leave the tariff system alone.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, if Canadian farm leaders say they wish to discuss these aspects, we will of course consider doing so. So far, however, we have had no requests for a study of the impact of tariffs on marketing boards, Mr. Speaker.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Finance. His boss the Minister of Finance said, according to Canadian Press, that he would be "a monkey's uncle if anyone can find money in the federal budget to finance a cut in the GST". Mr. Speaker, you had better break out the bananas for the minister.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I say this because Matthew Barrett, chairman of the Bank of Montreal, says that because of lower interest charges the government does have the money either to spend or cut taxes to get the economy moving.

I ask the acting minister: Will the government bring forward a full program to get the economy moving and to create jobs without further delay and certainly no later than the next budget?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): I know my hon. friend fairly well, Mr. Speaker. I am surprised that he did not look into the figures that Matthew Barrett brought out before he stood in the House and supported them, because the figures that Mr. Barrett used were erroneous.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McDermid: As a matter of fact they were totally erroneous, and you will see that very clearly when the accounts are in. But I must say to the hon. member that I will make a deal with Mr. Barrett. If he renegotiates every one of the mortgages his bank has with the people who hold the mortgages on homes and reduces the interest rates for them so that money could go back into the economy, then maybe we will take another look at it here.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I will leave the acting minister to deal with someone who I would have thought to be his friend and supporter, the chairman of the Bank of Montreal.

If the acting minister and his government are sticking to the view that low interest rates alone are the basis for economic recovery, can he explain why for the second week in a row his government is supporting increases in the bank rate by the Bank of Canada and along with it an unnecessary propping up of the Canadian dollar? Why is he supporting this foolish course of action?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member may know, if he has been reading the financial papers, a brokerage company in the United States gave some advice based on false information that it should sell the Canadian dollar.

The bank moved last week to prevent a run on our Canadian dollar, which I think was a prudent thing to do. As a matter of fact it did that when the hon. member sat on the Treasury benches back when—Heaven forbid he should ever get there again—he was in government.

I might also point out that the bank rate today did increase but by only four one-hundreths of a penny. It is a levelling off period and a cooling off period and I think the bank made the right decision.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a copy of a confidential proposal on telecommunications services submitted by the United States at the current GATT negotiations. The proposal would throw open Canada's doors to unfettered foreign competition and investment into our telecommunications market. It would strike a binding agreement for full market access and national treatment for domestic and international long distance services.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister what action Canada has taken to turn back this looming and portentous threat of American takeover of our Canadian telecommunications industry.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to comment one way or the other on some speculative proposal. We are right now in the fairly intense stages of negotiations on reduction of tariffs and also on the various offers for service.

We have our own position on this. Other countries have their own positions. We are putting forward those positions based on the advice we have received from our industry. It is on that basis we believe the position we have is a strong one and will be supportive of the interests of our domestic industry.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, annex 1404 of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, which I also have in my hand, currently protects Canada's telecommunications industry from foreign competition. This new proposal is clearly a way for the United States to skirt the FTA provisions and gain access to Canada's telecom market.

Will the Prime Minister advise whether a similar proposal has been put forward by the United States in the new round of trilateral negotiations or will he advise whether he is once again selling Canada out?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member always resorts to some excessive language at the end of his question. Unfortunately it undermines the whole intention and impact of the question.

I would say to my hon. friend that the negotiations in NAFTA have not progressed that far. As I said in my previous answer, we are consulting very closely with the telecommunications industry, as well as with other industries, in support of any positions we put forward in the NAFTA negotiations. The positions that will be taken will be very much supportive of the strength we have developed in that industry.

VALUE OF THE DOLLAR

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Our high dollar is one of the reasons why jobs are being lost, including 15 per cent of the jobs in the manufacturing sector during the past three years. The Minister of Finance has always maintained that we could not manipulate the value of the dollar. Today, however, the minister admitted that the government was manipulating the value of the dollar upwards. Are you giving us a high dollar to destroy more jobs in this country?

• (1440)

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): No, Mr. Speaker. The dollar has fallen some 4 cents in the last few months.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, our interest rates are still more than double those of our principal competitor and our dollar is knocked down to a level where not any business person in this country is happy with it.

There can be only two explanations for stepping in today. This government is either driving the dollar up and is deliberately manipulating it so we will have a high dollar, or else this government thinks that our economy is so hot that it has to put the brakes on it. This means more lost jobs, more plant closures.

Will the minister tell us who, other than our foreign competitors, does this government think it is helping with its high interest rate–high dollar policy?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, this government has neither.

AIR TRANSPORT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. On Tuesday, he said, and I quote:

> It is in the best interests of consumers and the travelling public in this country to have two airline companies that are in the best possible shape, and that is what we want to achieve in the months to come.

[English]

My question is this: Does this mean that the minister does not accept, under any conditions, the proposals of Air Canada that would ultimately lead to a merger of the two Canadian airlines?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will understand that the Minister of Transport cannot accept any proposal that has not been made to him yet.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister would answer this question: Is he or the government prepared to ensure that in the next few months Air Canada does not engage in any anti-competitive practices such as predatory pricing which might lead to further destabilization of the airline industry in Canada in order to precipitate the acceptability of such a proposal?

Mr. Speaker: The minister may wish to answer the question. It is getting awfully close to hypothetical.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, again I think the hon. member will agree that we have a very efficient Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that is overseeing this matter.

TAXATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. For several months we have been working with the Conservative member for Calgary North, who proposed a new federal tax strategy for families. His proposals are a response to concerns expressed by families, family and religious organizations and federal members. Could the minister give us the assurance that his department will give careful consideration—before the budget—to this new strategy that would help improve the financial situation of married couples with children and that of single parent families in this country?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was extremely concerned about family issues and a family caucus was organized within our government, led by the member for Calgary North who has done an excellent job. He has made certain suggestions to the Minister of Finance which I can assure all members of the House will be given very careful consideration for the upcoming budget.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Polls released today indicate that 85 per cent of Canadians want a made-in-Canada solution to the financial problems facing Air Canada and Canadian Airlines.

Will the Minister of Transport commit himself and his government to finding a made-in-Canada solution? Will he further commit himself to not raising the threshold of foreign ownership in any Canadian airline or in any Canadian transportation entity? Will he make that commitment?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will remember I have said for many months, whenever either of the two airlines make a proposal to salvage the industry and salvage the competitive nature of the aviation industry in Canada, that we would look at it.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, while I recognize that the minister has not received any formal proposals from anyone, he must be aware that there have been discussions between officials of the airlines and the Government of Canada. He must realize that Canadian is desperately seeking some solution. He also knows that the CEO of American Airlines was in Toronto this week.

Will he make a clear indication to the people of Canada that he will not deviate at any time for any reason from the 25 per cent maximum foreign ownership prescribed in the National Transportation Act?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Maybe I have not been clear enough, Mr. Speaker. We will look at any proposal that will ensure that we maintain a viable, efficient and secure airline industry in Canada.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Given that Canadians shop more and more across the border in the United States, does the minister intend to launch a buy Canadian campaign or to announce some other measure to counter the disastrous effects of cross-border shopping?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises an interesting question.

Yes, I have seen the newspaper article about it. I must point out that a study published this year showed that Canadians' major expense items—housing, transportation, education, health—cost less in Canada than in the United States if the broader picture were considered and not just the price of a quart of milk or a pound of butter.

So I think that a campaign to make Canadian consumers aware of the importance of buying at home and particularly, Mr. Speaker, of participating in the prosperity and competitiveness initiative of the industry and employment ministers will make Canadians realize that if we are more competitive, the Canadian market will be more active and consumers will gain thereby, Mr. Speaker.

OIL INDUSTRY

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Is the minister aware that Gulf Canada, which just pulled out of its $1 billion commitment to Hibernia, has now made a similarly large commitment to an oil project in Siberia? Will the minister confirm what Revenue Canada told Gulf, namely that it could deduct 100 per cent of its costs in Siberia over 10 years from its taxable income in Canada?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, Gulf Canada, along with Brit Gas, has a deal in Siberia. The expenditure profile, as I have been given to understand, is about $250 million Canadian of which Gulf owns half. It could result in the kinds of figures that the hon. member has mentioned. Gulf got its first oil out last week, I believe Thursday to Friday night.

That being the case, I remind the hon. member that what he said about the write-offs for Canadian companies investing in foreign oil or gas plays is correct. That dates back to 1971. In 1971 a provision was put into the Income Tax Act whereby there is a write-off against Canadian tax. This is not unique to the oil and gas industry, but it is a provision of the Income Tax Act for Canadian companies investing and earning profit outside Canada.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, that answer should be taken with a large dose of Siberian salt. It was the Liberal government that brought in the PIPs and encouraged companies to invest in Canada. It was this government that cancelled them and beefed up the foreign provisions.

Is the minister also aware that Petro-Canada, which just announced substantial cuts in this country and was trying to sell some of its shares in the Hibernia project, has now committed itself to a major oil development in Burma, and that the Department of National Revenue has informed it that it too can deduct 100 per cent of all of its costs in Burma whether the project succeeds or not?

Will the government explain to the people of Canada why in this time of recession it is encouraging the flow of Canadian money to places like Burma and Siberia? Canadians would like to send this government to Siberia.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, some of us came from Siberia so we could help this country. Some of our family members came out of Siberia as prisoners only two years ago. I do not think I need even jocular comments about Siberia or some of the contributions that were made.

I say to the hon. member that he can go back to the PIPS agreement. If he looks at PIPS, he will find that for every $1 that was invested by Canadians and others in Canada, the Canadian taxpayer paid $1.04 to $1.05 and actually lost money.

If he wants to see the success of the program, I remind him of Dome and the costs on Dome. I remind him also about tax provisions which have come to be known in jocular verbiage as the little Egypt bump. There were all kinds of examples where the Canadian taxpayer because of that kind of program lost great amounts of money. It did not help us either in reserves or in building a Canadian industry.

The fact of the matter is he can say what he will, but I go back to this simple point: this provision dates back to 1971 when I think it was his party that was in power.

TOBIQUE INDIAN RESERVE

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs.

There is a serious problem at the Tobique Indian Reserve, New Brunswick, where sewage treatment facilities are apparently inadequate and raw sewage has been flowing into the Saint John River system.

I understand that the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs has been aware of this problem for many months but no corrective action has yet occurred.

What steps are being taken to stop this unacceptable environmental damage and when can effective results be expected?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised a very serious problem, one which concerns me deeply.

Apparently raw sewage is being allowed to overflow from the Tobique Indian Reserve into the Saint John River, threatening the health of hundreds of thousands of residents both on reserve and in downstream communities.

It is important that the House know that a capital financial agreement, a five-year financial plan signed in 1990, provided a $1.2 million allocation for the construction of a sewage treatment plant out of a total capital budget of almost $6 million. That money has not been allocated for the purpose for which it was intended. I have instructed my officials to meet with the chief and council immediately to ensure that the conditions of the funding arrangement are lived up to.

EAST TIMOR

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Last night CBC's Journal aired a documentary exhibiting the historic and ongoing brutality of the Indonesian government against the East Timor people. The Indonesian government's own report of the November 12 killings is unsatisfactory and subsequent reports of retaliation against the witnesses must be investigated.

I have asked this question before. I repeat it: Will the government insist that the UN make an independent investigation of the East Timorese killings and the subsequent abuses against the East Timorese?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as you know, I have told the House before that the day after this event I raised it with the foreign minister of Indonesia with whom I was meeting in Seoul, Korea and expressed Canada's condemnation even at that early stage before we had all the facts.

In the meantime, I know that Canadians have found the information that has come forth, not just because of the video last night but as the news has come out about the incident, as reprehensible as does this government.

We cut our aid to Indonesia as a result of that. Some other countries did do it but have since reinstated it. We have not made any change in our policy toward Indonesia at this stage.

I am encouraged that the Secretary-General of the UN will be sending a special envoy to Indonesia and we will look for some results from that meeting.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): My supplementary question is for the same minister, Mr. Speaker.

In 1975, Indonesia illegally invaded and took control of the independent country of East Timor. Since then, the Canadian government's reaction has been terribly quiet.

Will the government today join the European Community in asking the new Secretary-General of the United Nations to call a negotiating session between the parties directly concerned, such as Portugal, Indonesia and representatives of the government of East Timor?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government supports the United Nations in the steps which still have to be made with respect to the special envoy who was sent to Indonesia by the United Nations. The Secretary-General agrees to send someone. After that, perhaps we could go on to the other steps.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to whomever is answering on behalf of the Minister of Finance.

All the government will know that when the GST was introduced the Prime Minister and the government promised that it would not be charged on the necessities of life. Now the Minister of Finance has imposed the goods and services tax on water on 26 communities across Saskatchewan, and he has done so retroactively.

I would like to ask the minister this: Will the government keep its promise and axe the tax on water?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I am not sure what the hon. member is talking about. If he had given me notice before Question Period, I would have looked into it for him and got him an answer.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the people of Saskatchewan and Yukon know about it and they are complaining about the imposition of this tax.

We on this side of course are opposed to the GST and would scrap it. But the government has at least always admitted that it would examine the concerns about the effectiveness and the administration of the tax.

I wonder if, in response to the minister's question, he might go on to commit himself to at least looking at the implications of this tax and perhaps consider scrapping it.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is a little confused. The short answer to his specific question is no.

The answer on the water is also no because we are not taxing water. What the hon. member is referring to is the delivery of water, and he should know that individual—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I know hon. members would want to allow the minister to give his response to the question. The hon. minister.

• (1500)

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, if they would only listen, I am trying to explain as best I can. I would be very happy to offer them a briefing by officials to show them in detail specifically how this is being dealt with from an administrative standpoint, because those companies that deliver water can opt to operate under the same conditions as municipalities which are exempt or get a rebate on the GST.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean. Just one question, please.

REFERENDUM ON THE FUTURE OF QUEBEC

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

Today's Le Soleil reported an incredible statement by Claude Beauchamp, president of the Regroupement Économie et Constitution, who objected to a referendum on the future of Quebec, and I quote: "The risk is far too great that voters would reject an agreement. A referendum is a complex instrument. A referendum entails a risk, and the risk is that it would be defeated".

This federal spokesman from Quebec seems to be afraid Quebecers will speak out. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister to dissociate himself from these undemocratic remarks and to state once and for all that the future of Quebec will not be decided on by politicians behind closed doors, but by the people of Quebec.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member could arrange to get in touch directly with Mr. Beauchamp. I am here to answer questions about the Canadian government's policies. Or else, if he does not want to speak to Mr. Beauchamp directly, perhaps he could write a book and ask Mr. Beauchamp to read it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader.

Would he indicate to the House the business we will be having for tomorrow, Monday, Tuesday, and the remaining parts of next week? Would he also indicate whether or not there would be some degree of co-operation on his part, as exhibited by his parliamentary secretary earlier this day, in perhaps having a special debate with regard to the whole supply management system in Canada which is presently under negotiation under the provisions of GATT?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in response to the business question, today I would hope we would complete third reading of Bill C-32 respecting the Canada Assistance Plan and, if completed, we would call for third reading Bill C-35, the Miscellaneous Statutes Act.

Friday we would expect to complete third reading on Bill C–35 and upon its completion the government would call Bill S–2, the Tax Convention Act, for second reading.

On Monday it would be my intention to call for second reading Bill C–26, Public Service 2000, and on Tuesday to continue second reading hopefully to completion of Bill C–26.

Next Wednesday I would intend to call an allotted day or an opposition day.

In terms of the general question, as I have said to the hon. member on many occasions, I feel that we could probably use our time in a more fitting way on many occasions around here to discuss subjects of interest and of some import if we could find some way to accommodate it within the constraints of time in terms of getting the legislation through, in terms of recognizing that we have opposition days on which the opposition can choose the subject matter and in fact from time to time schedule debates in the evening for special subjects as we have done, for example, with regard to the constitutional question tonight, next Monday, Tuesday and Thursday.

I would hope that we could get together and discuss to see whether it really is necessary to have three full days, for example, on Bill C–32 at third reading, which is a long way through the process. Perhaps we could cut that down to two days and have the third day allocated to subject matter of interest, or we could do that on similar bills.

I am always available for that kind of accommodation, but it is very difficult for me to agree to a process that says the government will continue in essence, figuratively, to get down on its knees and say: "Please allow us to pass this legislation", then in addition open up extra time for special debates of the opposition's choosing. There is just not enough time on the calendar. I would love to co–operate. I think we can co–operate. If we agree, there has to be a little give and take on both sides.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate to the House that there has been a good deal of co–operation among all parties with regard to the debate which will be taking place this evening on constitutional renewal to give members an opportunity to put their concerns before the House and thereafter table documents with the committee. I want to thank the government House leader, who has been very co–operative in that process.

I also want to say to the hon. member that my question was not intended to interfere or delay the activities of the government which has the sole right in setting the agenda in terms of legislation for this House. We are not suggesting that. In view of the comments, and he might want to take some time to discuss with his Parliamentary Secretary, under the provisions of either Standing Order 52 or some other arrangements, debates could take place later in the evening on subjects that a good majority of members of Parliament find to be important, ones which affect their constituents and are important for the country.

This is not to mean this in a partisan way. I just point out to the government House leader that, as he knows, we are in a difficult economic situation and there are issues that all Canadians would like to see us debating on the floor of this House of Commons. On the other hand, we would avail ourselves as opposition parties to select some of those subjects which can be debated under provisions of allotted days, opposition days. I suggest quite sincerely to the government House leader that there is a menu of economic issues out there which will require the special attention and co–operation of the government in order to debate it in what I believe is a very sincere way to try to find some solutions in order to put Canadians back to work.

That is the spirit in which I ask the question. Perhaps later this day or perhaps next week we might be able to pursue those discussions with the government House leader and his parliamentary secretary to arrive at some sort of accommodation for the government in its dealings here.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a short comment regarding the points raised by my hon. friend, the opposition House leader, and ask the minister a question.

First of all, I want to say to the minister that it is appropriate that we take some days to debate important legislation. I think that Bill C–32 is one of those pieces. As a result we could move expeditiously on other pieces of legislation like C–35 and S–2. I think we can come to an accommodation without any difficulty.

I simply want to indicate again my enthusiasm and my willingness to move expeditiously through the usual channels to see if we can facilitate arriving at ways and means of allowing additional debates on important and topical issues.

I have two questions. One concerns the budget. February is the normal time when we look forward to a budget. I wonder if the minister can give us some indication of what would be an appropriate time, or his best guess at this time, for a budget to be presented in the House. Since we are indicating the business coming up, I believe the government House leader indicated that next Wednesday would be an allotted day. Perhaps to provide for ease of preparations and planning, since it is an opposition day and will be a New Democrat sponsored motion, we will be indicating that we will be putting forward a motion on the protection of marketing boards and the opposition to tariffication to debate and we are likely to vote next Wednesday.

Mr. Andre: In terms of the budget, as the hon. member knows, in 1984 when this government was elected we did establish the practice of bringing down the budget at the same time as the spending estimates.

To us it makes sense that they come down together and not be separated by many months, as used to be the case. The taxes and the spending ought to be related. It is our hope to keep that pattern. The specific date I cannot give the hon. member at this point.

I welcome the news that the hon. member has indicated that his party would like to discuss this important subject of GATT and marketing boards next Wednesday. By putting it to a vote, I have to remind the House that as an allotted day, the motion is a motion of confidence. That forces the government to vote in opposition to the motion, whatever it might say, because allotted days were designed as a substitute for challenging the estimates.

Every motion and every vote is a confidence vote, so in advance I have to say that we will probably support the tenor of the motion because we are very much supportive of marketing boards. Very clearly, our position at GATT is completely consistent with the position that the producers have suggested we take. There is no space between us and the producers on this matter.

If a motion is put forward to that effect on an allotted day, we may have to vote against because it is a confidence motion. That is one of the other nuances of our rules that perhaps we should be looking at, but that is the effect of calling for a vote.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has identified a problem that we are confronted with from time to time.

As he knows and I think much to our pleasure, the House is master of its own destiny. With unanimous consent we can agree to virtually anything we want in terms of proceeding with business.

It would be my intent at the appropriate time next week, after consultations with members, to put the question that we seek unanimous consent so that we will not consider the vote next Wednesday to be a vote of confidence.

I think that would be a way, if I can help the hon. minister, to get around this dilemma.

Mr. Andre: Without carrying on this debate on the floor of the House of Commons, that does not help the government as the hon. member knows.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): My question is also to the government House leader.

As the minister is well aware, I wrote to him and raised in the House the issue of the royal commission on election expenses and election financing. Presumably it will be reporting to the government very soon and presumably to the public at an early date.

I wonder if the government has made any arrangements for the House of Commons to deal with and study the proposed legislation that will be part of that royal commission's report.

Mr. Andre: I have not yet. I have had some preliminary discussions with House leaders opposite and will be making a firm proposal in that regard shortly, perhaps even tomorrow.

The report of the royal commission will be distributed one day next week. The only reason for not knowing that day is in the interests of all Canadians having access to it at the same time. It needs to be transported around the country.

As soon as I have established when that can be done, I will announce to the House the release of the report and how it is going to be treated.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to take this opportunity to put a question to the government House leader on House business.

With respect to the commitment that the government made some six years ago to amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act a commitment which has been reiterated in a couple of Speeches from the Throne, I would like to ask the government House leader if he can indicate to the House when the government intends to bring forward these long overdue amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act.

These are amendments which affect the physically and mentally disabled in the area of reasonable accommodation. They are amendments which affect the lesbian and gay community in the area of sexual orientation. When will the government finally move forward on these long overdue amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act?

Mr. Andre: This question period usually deals with the business for next week and it will not be next week.

POINT OF ORDER

STATEMENT PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to comment upon statements and remarks made earlier in this House by the member for Calgary Southwest.

Last evening, the Canadian Genetic Disease Network announced that Dr. Robert Korneluk of the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario, one of the network's 23 principal investigators, has isolated the genetic defect responsible for myotonic dystrophy.

This is one of a series of genetic discoveries in Canada. The last three have been made by members of this specific network, created in 1989, the network of Centres of Excellence.

In this case, the network provided $450,000 to that research.

Mr. Speaker: I think all members would have no disagreement with what the hon. minister is saying and what the member for Calgary Southwest said earlier today and also what the member for Sault Ste. Marie said about the discovery and the scientist who made the discovery. My difficulty is procedural.

The hon. minister is getting very close to a minister's statement. If the House wishes to allow the minister to proceed, I would let him.

Mr Riis: Although it obviously is not a point of order, it is an important issue to which I think all sides would wish to make a comment. May I suggest as a way out that for tomorrow under Routine Proceedings, at the time of ministerial statements, the minister take some time and make a proper statement and that would allow others to make a response as well.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the proposal that has just been made. Certainly our party would want to join in any such statement. We were not given any prior notice that this would be coming up at this particular time.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my strong voice for that approach. This is a non-partisan issue and I think all sides of the House must participate in the tribute and appreciation.

Mr. Winegard: I would be happy to do that except tomorrow at this time I will be speaking to members of the research community about this particular incident.

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated to the hon. minister, and he has certainly seen the response, there is a disposition in the House to extend congratulations from all members, obviously. If the minister cannot be here, he may want to make some other arrangement with another minister, but it really is a very appropriate circumstance for a minister's statement.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): At one o'clock when the House adjourned, I was pointing out that for me, particularly as a member of Parliament from British Columbia, it is a pleasure to be able to participate in this very important debate on the government's proposed cutbacks on basic and fundamental financial support to the people of British Columbia.

Late last year, the Vancouver city caucus of elected representatives met in the city of Vancouver. The Vancouver city caucus is a group of elected representatives, chaired by the mayor of Vancouver, Gordon Campbell, and is made up of members of city council, the school board, provincial elected representatives and all five of the federal members of Parliament from the city of Vancouver.

At that city caucus meeting, we heard from speaker after speaker that one of the most critical issues facing the city of Vancouver and the people of British Columbia was the cutback by this Conservative government on the commitments it had made under the Canada Assistance Plan.

We know that the British Columbia Court of Appeal ruled that this particular attempt to betray a commitment that had been made to the people of British Columbia was illegal. Unfortunately, that decision was reversed by the Supreme Court of Canada.

• (1520)

One of the major reasons that we in the New Democratic Party so strongly support a social charter, a charter that sets out the fundamental values that shape this country in economic, social and cultural terms, is that hopefully such a charter and the existence of such a charter would prevent this kind of betrayal from taking place.

We are seeing the people of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario particularly the victims of Bill C-32, being punished for the bankrupt economic policies of the Conservative government.

We have seen a series of these policies, whether it be the trade deal or other. I remember very well during the election of 1988 when the Conservative Prime Minister travelled across the land saying: "There are going to be hundreds of thousands of new jobs created by the trade deal". Members of this House will remember that.

Instead of creating new jobs in this country the trade deal resulted in the destruction of hundreds of thousands of jobs right across this land. As well, we have seen the erosion in social services and the attacks under way on marketing boards in this country. As a result of the trade deal there is now the suggestion that Canada should go even further, that we should enter into a trade deal with the United States and Mexico.

That would be the end of any kind of manufacturing sector in this country. The cheap labour in the Maquiladora zone in Mexico obviously would be a magnet which would result in the effective shutting down of Canadian industry.

What we see in Bill C-32 is part of a trend by this Conservative government to off-load its responsibilities as a national government on to provincial governments. We have seen the impact of that in the province of Ontario in which the New Democratic government of Ontario has very courageously said that it will not be the poorest and the most vulnerable to pay the price of this government's economic policies.

We are seeing it in British Columbia where since 1982 some $1.1 billion has been off-loaded as a result of the policies, both of the Conservative government and of the previous Liberal federal government. This amounts to some 67 per cent of the estimated 1991-92 budget deficit of $1.7 billion. It is the victims of this government's economic policies who are being asked to pay the price.

We know that as unemployment insurance benefits run out, people turn in despair to welfare. That is the only thing they have left. I have met with many of the employees of Versatile Pacific Shipyards in my constituency, men who have worked there for 25, 30 or 35 years and are proud of the work they do. Yet, as a result of this government's economic policies, Versatile Pacific has thrown these people out of work. Their unemployment insurance has expired and now they are on the welfare rolls. This government's policies mean that there are going to be less and less funds available to help those who are most desperate and who are most in need. Who are they? They are children. The people most affected by these policies, by this cap on the CAP, are children. We know that children are the greatest recipients of social assistance.

We know that this government's policies will mean that the Prime Minister's promises at the United Nations children's summit are very hollow when the policies that attack children result in even more poverty and result in more line-ups at food banks.

We know that shelters for battered women are funded under the Canada Assistance Plan, and funds for these shelters are being cut back. We know that the already desperate circumstances of people living with AIDS, people with HIV, are being made worse as a result of the cutbacks in the Canada Assistance Plan. Some members of this House will remember the government promising with great fanfare a national child care program. Where is it? It is nowhere to be found. Another casualty of this government's appalling economic policies.

What are the alternatives? The government is clearly saying that it does not have enough money. The fact of the matter is that if this government would bring in a fair tax system, it would have the revenues necessary to ensure that the scourge of children living in poverty is put to an end. The poverty of women, particularly single parents, could be put to an end.

The member for Mississauga asks what kind of taxes we are talking about. I will tell the member for Mississauga. In 1986 there were 89,000 corporations which paid not one penny in income tax despite the fact that they recorded collective profits of $22 billion.

I will tell the hon. member that the Canadian banks have had one of the most successful records in history in this country. Are they paying their fair share in taxes? No way.

Instead of attacking children and instead of attacking the poorest and the most vulnerable in Canada, why does this government not get tough with the banks, with the wealthy, with the corporate elite who for too long have not paid their fair share? In fact from 1986 to 1989 corporate taxes went down 20 per cent under Conservative government policies and their profits in that same period of time went up by 34 per cent. Where is the fairness in that?

This is the same government that brings in policies cutting back on the Canada Assistance Plan which is a plan that was brought into existence to ensure that the poor, the most vulnerable, those living on social assistance were entitled to live with some decency, some dignity and some sense of economic security. This government's policies are attacking that.

We know as well that this government's policies have resulted in an erosion of the quality of health care and post-secondary education in British Columbia. The cutbacks under the EPF, the Established Programs Financing Act, under Bill C-69 and other programs have meant that the share of the federal government in post-secondary education and health care has declined dramatically. In fact the cash component under this Conservative government is going to disappear entirely within the next decade.

I see it in my own constituency. I see the effect of these cuts at the B.C. Institute of Technology, at Simon Fraser University, on students attending Douglas College and others. There are programs which are victims of this government's attacks under the EPF and the Canada Assistance Plan.

Surely it is time that Parliament said to this government that enough is enough. The gap between the rich and the poor in this country is increasing. The number of people on social assistance in British Columbia and elsewhere is going up instead of down and this government is cutting back on its fundamental obligations under the Canada Assistance Plan to ensure that those programs are properly funded.

In conclusion, I want to say again that we as New Democrats reject this bill and the approach of this government which is victimizing those who are poorest and most vulnerable. We know it is happening at the international level as well. I see it happening in the city of Vancouver and in the province of British Columbia. It is time for a new government which puts people first instead of banks and the corporate elite.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I know the Speaker wants to pursue something which arose this morning and he will be in the House momentarily. I will recognize the hon. member for Mississauga South but I will tell him that he may be interrupted momentarily.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I do not intend to speak long or completely, but I want to point out that the obligation of government is to use the resources that we collect from the people of Canada to pay the bills of Canada.

This bill rations that money.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

AGRICULTURE—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member would do a courtesy to the Chair to let me interrupt him. It does not happen often but I have to deal with another matter.

There was an application made earlier today for an emergency debate by the hon. member for Algoma. As members know, the consequence of discussions earlier this afternoon related to the usual Thursday afternoon question and an allotted day has been set for next week. The hon. member for Kamloops has indicated that the subject of the application for the emergency debate will be the subject of the allotted day debate. This was brought on immediately today by the hon. member for Algoma and had been brought on earlier in the week by others, including the hon. member for Mackenzie. As a consequence, I would of course be bound by the stricture on the Speaker that in cases where there is an application for an emergency debate and there is another available opportunity for hearing it, it would not be appropriate to go ahead with the order.

Clearly the debate on Wednesday on the subject matter of the application puts that stricture on the Speaker and I do not need to deal further with the application for the emergency debate.

Throughout this entire matter I thank all hon. members and I thank the hon. government House leader this afternoon for his disposition of the matter.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-21, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, when I was speaking earlier, I suggested that the job of government is to take the scarce resources that government can raise in taxation and try to manage those scarce resources as best as possible.

This bill increases the transfer of money to the Canada Assistance Plan by 5 per cent over and above what it would normally be. Bear in mind that inflation is now likely to be 1 per cent or 2 per cent this year. Possibly it could be as high as 3 per cent, but in most cases it is likely to be more like 2 per cent or less. This is a very substantial and real increase in the transfer of money from a government coffer that is exceedingly poor.

Anyone who reads the material coming available will know that tax revenues in the country are off about $8 billion, yet this government is still able to make a very substantial increase in transfers to provincial governments to solve problems.

The Canada Assistance Plan is a vital and important program for Canada to try to look after those people who for want of a job, for want of opportunity, for want of education, for want of many things have difficulty in looking after all of their responsibilities themselves. That there are a lot of people in our country who need help is taken for granted.

What we have to do as government is ration our scarce reserves and this bill attempts to do that in a realistic fashion. I am indeed surprised that the opposition would filibuster this bill as it has now for three days to try to hammer home some point to throw all caution to the wind and just pay and pay and pay without paying attention to the fact that this bill makes a substantial increase over and above inflation. This is a real increase in the amount of scarce money that can be applied.

The previous speaker spoke of Versatile Pacific and how that company went broke. A lot of companies have gone broke. They have had to restructure and they cannot make it together. Corporate profits in this year are as low as they have been historically since the very worst time in the Great Depression. It is less than 5 per cent on average. The effect is that proposals to beat up business by the New Democratic Party are only proposals designed to force on more unemployment.

Mr. Milliken: That is what they are doing in Ontario.

Mr. Blenkarn: Indeed that is what they are doing in Ontario. Their whole game in Ontario was spend the system broke. We did not have $341 billion of outstanding market debt. If we were not using 35 per cent or 36 per cent of the tax revenues we receive just to pay interest, perhaps we would have more money to make those transfers that are obviously needed. What we need to have is some sensibility from this House of Commons.

I think it is the responsibility of members to stand and speak not of the problems but of the solutions. The suggestion of a solution to beat up on corporate taxes by grabbing and taking and making sure that companies cannot exist and go broke is really not much of a solution. It only adds to the problem.

Adding to the debt only adds to the problem because the debt must be carried. It is about time we had some solutions other than the cry of demand and the complaint of cutback. There is no cutback here. There is a substantial increase of transfer over and above inflation at a time when government revenues are suffering and suffering greater than they have for a long period of time.

It is time we had some responsible comment from the New Democratic Party members and not crazy rhetoric. They ought to know better and if they do not know better then the people of Canada ought to listen closely to them and see what a wreck they are making of Ontario and maybe they will make the same wreck of their province of British Columbia. Who knows? I can say to you, Madam Speaker, that you cannot spend yourself rich.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, this is the third time I am speaking on this bill. This is something I do not usually do. I feel if you have spoken once on the subject, you have had your say. The damages that this bill will do to our country are so great, however, I feel that I must speak even a third time. Somehow this government is not listening.

I would not mind if the government did not listen to the Official Opposition of this House. I would not mind if this government would not listen to the New Democratic Party. But I do mind, and I am angry as hell, when this government has stopped listening to Canadians. It has stopped listening to Canadians coast to coast to coast.

The government members experienced this during the winter break just as we did. I am sure they took the opportunity as I did to go and visit the businesses in their area and talk to the people in their area. They would get the true picture of what this country has come down to after seven years of Tory government. I used to hear: "Tory times are tough times". I certainly believe it now.

I canvassed the businesses along some of the main streets in Toronto: King Street, Queen Street, Dufferin and Dundas. It is a little scary to see five or six stores closed. The windows are boarded up. Some are for lease and some for sale because of the damage of the recession. It is scary.

I looked up a small business that employed 50 people. It was a firm which imported fabric from Pakistan and Poland to make napkins and tablecloths. During the 1988 election that company warned me: "Mr. Flis, if the government brings in the free trade agreement, I will not survive". Out of interest I went to this firm to see how it was doing and to compliment the firm. I went there. The doors were closed. The firm did not survive the free trade agreement.

The businesses which are hanging in tell me they have lost 30 to 50 per cent of their revenues over last year.

I ask what the cause is. What is happening? Why are you losing business, why are you going under? Some who are still in business say they are just hanging in, but if this recession lasts much longer, they are going under as well.

I think the minister led Canadian businesses astray when almost a year ago he said that the recession was over. People built up their hopes. "Oh, well, if the recession is almost over I think I can hang in there. I will invest a little more, et cetera". A year later the recession is not over. The government fooled the people.

Getting back to the causes, one cause was the mismanagement of this government; the second cause was the free trade agreement; the third cause was the GST; and then just an over–all frustration. Many businesses would tell me to tell the government to stop taxing them to death. They felt it was the over–taxation that was killing their businesses.

I said to them that we have a great country here, we have built in certain social safety nets, we have an excellent medicare system, an excellent education system. Someone has to pay for that. The government has to get revenue to pay for these things. What is your solution? Again, their solution was to stop taxing them to death. They want the government to put money into people's pockets, quickly, now, not a year from now. They also said build up confidence. The people who have the money are afraid to spend it. They are afraid to spend it because they do not know whether they will have a job next week or next month. The people who have the money are not spending it because of the lack of confidence created by this government in this country. The ones who do not have the money cannot spend something they do not have.

It was very rewarding for me to talk to people from all walks of life, going into the garages and seeing how hard the mechanic was working over his motor, going into the back of the restaurants to see how hard the people were working just to make ends meet. Some people would apologize because their hands were soiled and they did not want to shake hands with their MP. I said they never had to apologize for dirty hands. It is those kinds of hands that built this country to what it is today.

I offer the government what I heard on the streets during the winter break, and I am sure it is what the Conservative members heard also. As I said earlier, they have stopped listening.

From there my assistant and I then dropped in to one of our larger Canada employment offices right on Bloor Street. Another frightening picture was to see the Canada employment office packed with people just before Christmas. They were lining up for various things, unemployment insurance, lining up because someone lost a social insurance number and was making application, lining up because of Canada Employment and Immigration disputes or conflicts.

Again, it was revealing to talk to these people while they were standing in line. They had a certain amount of satisfaction and security because they were lining up to apply for their unemployment insurance. Many of them spoke to me with almost fear on their faces because they were afraid of what would happen to them when their UI revenues would run out: "Mr. Flis, what am I going to do when I exhaust my UI? I want to work. I have tried 200 firms. No one will take me." That is when the fear starts coming in. What will happen when that safety network of UI and then social assistance runs out? This is where panic sets in, this is where psychological depression sets in.

My constituency office, like many members' offices, has become an employment agency. People who have been working 10 years, people who have had businesses and are now unemployed are coming to their member of Parliament and asking: "Mr. Flis, can you help me get something? I will take any work, but I will not go on welfare".

Many Canadians are so proud that they will not go on welfare. They want to help themselves. They want to work. Again, this government is not allowing this.

Following this kind of talking and listening to the people in Parkdale—High Park, I brought all of their concerns to the three-day caucus meeting the national Liberal caucus had in Ottawa prior to the opening of the House of Commons on February 3.

Each member shared what he or she heard from people in their ridings. Based on what we heard, the Liberal Party came up with a five-point economic recovery plan. I will not waste the time of the House to repeat it because it has been repeated over, over and over here.

We are pleased that the government already implemented one of our recommendations, the 5 per cent down payment, et cetera. We are just waiting and hoping that it will implement the other four, especially the infrastructure one. If it does not, the doom and gloom will lead to violence and civil disobedience.

I just want to share with this House that the people in Parkdale—High Park have called in the Guardian Angels, some from the United States, to come and help them supervise the streets. They feel that the streets are not safe any more.

I disagree with them. I object. I go on public record. I object to any Guardian Angels coming in and telling us how to supervise our streets. In metropolitan Toronto we have the best police force in Canada. People feel secure with its supervision, its policing. We do not need any Guardian Angels from any U.S. city.

We have nothing to learn from United States cities. Our cities are still relatively safe and pleasant places to live. I hope the government will listen to our five-point economic recovery plan.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I want to just put a few words on the record as they relate to this bill.

The general thrust of the Government of Canada is to cut existing programs, programs that affect our education, our health and our social security. I would like to put on the record that the Government of Canada has a double standard here.

Over the past year, the Government of Canada has given up more income than I have seen since I became a member of Parliament several years ago.

Let me put on the record two incredible changes that took place in the Income Tax Act. In the past year, the law was changed in relation to deferred taxes that were supposed to be paid to the Government of Canada.

An hon. member: What are deferred taxes?

Mr. Baker: The hon. member wants to know what a deferred tax is.

• (1550)

I am going to explain to the hon. member exactly what happened and he will remember exactly what I am talking about.

Back in 1972 the Liberal government changed the law in relation to moneys that were collected through what was then called the estate tax, which imposed a sliding tax on wealthy, rich inheritances. That was replaced by a capital gains tax.

Mr. Blenkarn: You stopped the loophole.

Mr. Baker: If the hon. member listens he might learn something. The capital gains tax was brought in to replace the estate tax. It was 50 per cent of the rate charged on normal income. There was a provision in the law at that time to protect the Government of Canada against the moneys that would have normally been paid on capital gains but not moneys that were held in private trusts. The rule was called the 21-year rule. Now the hon. member knows what I am talking about. Now he knows what I am going to say.

The 21-year rule was that although a trust never dies, although a trust goes on indefinitely, regarding the capital gains that were held in those trusts, the taxes that would have normally been paid, that were paid by every small businessman in this country, that were paid by every construction man in this country, by everybody who built houses, who contributed something to the economy, they all had to pay up on their capital gains tax. They all paid up because the law is the way it is in Canada and nobody is disputing it. There was a provision that there would be a 21-year period and then those capital gains that had piled up, those taxes that would have normally been paid, were in a private trust and they could not be collected, but at the end of 21 years they would come due to the Government of Canada.

We can imagine how much money is in private trusts in Canada.

An hon. member: Very little.

Mr. Baker: The hon. member says very little in private trusts. He should read the Department of Finance's breakdown for 1986. The end of the 21 years is the end of this year and all of those taxes that were normally paid on capital gains would have accumulated and would be payable on the 21st year. Do you know what the Government of Canada did in this Chamber? The hon. member does not like hearing it.

Mr. Blenkarn: It stopped the alternation of the trust.

Mr. Baker: It altered the rule. It threw out the 21-year rule. It threw it out. What did it replace it with? It said: "Those taxes can be further delayed and they become payable with the death of the youngest member of that family". By any estimate, the hon. member would ask how many years that would put off the taxes—30 years, 40 years, 60 years; massive sums of money due the Government of Canada from people who have so much money that they just do not have to move it, they can tuck it away in private trusts.

The Government of Canada changed the law and said: "You do not have to pay that now". Out goes the 21-year rule because it is up at the end of this year 1972 and 21 makes 1993.

My time is short but I will make reference to one other thing that really bothers me. It concerns the change to section 67.5 of the Income Tax Act that deals with what qualifies for a deduction in entertainment. Do you know what the Government of Canada did? Did anybody ever look at why we have such a substantial increase in the amounts of money claimed under entertainment deductions on income tax returns?

Normally it goes this way. If you entertain a person for business purposes and you are trying to sell a product or you are trying to sell your business, certain costs are legitimate. For example, people can write off the cost of their expensive meals. They can write off the cost of their big booze parties if they wish. They could have written off the cost of their yachts up to 1987. They can write off many things that in the normal running of a business is recognized by the business community as being a legitimate expense.

Consider what the Government of Canada did last month in December. There were tax lawyers and accountants asking National Revenue: "Does this qualify? Does that qualify? How far can I go here? Can I buy a helicopter?" What did the government do in answer to all the accountants and tax lawyers in Canada who had a legitimate concern? The tax lawyers and the accountants needed to know. They needed to have some direction. The general rule was if it was not listed as an exemption in the Income Tax Act then you could claim it. They kept saying: "How far can we go?" The Government of Canada determined it in December of this year. It brought in a change to the act and said that you can go as far as the Criminal Code of Canada.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Baker: It said it was closing a loophole. So you ask a question.

An hon. member: In practice.

Mr. Baker: In practice does an escort service count as a legitimate deduction? What is the reason for this substantial increase in the entertainment deductions?

The Government of Canada says that you can go as far as the Criminal Code of Canada in taking money from the public purse. It has our poor taxpayers pay the bill and says to them: "You pay the GST so that we can pass along this money to certain people who spend money on booze and escort services".

The Government of Canada should be thoroughly ashamed of itself and explain to the Canadian people why it did it.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, it is always difficult to follow the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls. His eloquence never fails to amaze me. It must be something in the maritime blood indeed.

I would like to add a few of my comments with regard to Bill C–32. I do honestly believe that this is a bad piece of legislation. This is an immoral piece of legislation. This is legislation that should never be.

Bill C–32 allows for the extension of the five per cent limit on the funds available through the Canada Assistance Plan for the provinces of Alberta, Ontario and British Columbia, which is my home province. Everyone will remember of course that some time ago Bill C–69 capped at 5 per cent the increases for federal funding assistance until 1992. The bill we have before us, Bill C–32, extends that cap up to the year 1995.

The Canada Assistance Plan is really the only mechanism or means through which the federal government funds social assistance and social services to the provinces. By extending the cap or the limit on the increases to the three provinces I have named, B.C., Alberta and Ontario, this government has been making the economic downturn significantly worse in those provinces. This is particularly so for the unemployed and those Canadians who are off unemployment insurance and require the assistance that is available through the Canada Assistance Plan.

This is the wrong way to go. We are hurting our lowest income people, those who can least afford it and are least able to defend themselves. It is simply unjust in a society such as ours that we take this kind of direction that is evidenced in this government's fiscal policies particularly with respect to this bill before us.

I want to say that every single witness who came before the finance committee on this legislation urged the government to withdraw this bill because of its harmful impact.

In British Columbia, despite the fact that we have just had a recent election of a new government, social assistance recipients cannot afford to eat a decent meal. I know it is doing all it can to reverse this trend. Welfare payments to a family of four in British Columbia fell short some $18.30 a month for food alone. That means no money for toiletries, for transportation, for clothing or for recreation,. There is not even the basic allowance to put food on the table. This bill has made things that much worse for those people.

Families and children rely on the Canada Assistance Plan which this bill wants to handicap. To those people the Canada Assistance Plan is a virtual lifeline. It is largely through no fault of their own, but as some people are simply being victimized by the economic consequences in this country, their means of livelihood has become welfare.

What this government has done is it has introduced measures in the name of fiscal restraint that says the rich provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario can afford to pay the extra money that should be going to the Canada Assistance Plan. They can afford to make up the shortfall. The federal government will withdraw the extra funding. Freeze it. Put a cap on it and the provinces can make up the shortfall.

This bill is symbolic of the philosophical direction that this government has taken. It is wanting to devolve these kinds of services such as the Established Programs Financing for post-secondary education and health care and the Canada Assistance Plan. Those are the kinds of important funding mechanisms that allow the provinces to provide the quality social programs that they have been providing. The government is withdrawing from its funding support of those mechanisms. That is simply wrong. Canadians do not agree with that kind of direction that the government is taking.

I want to say that as a result of this cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, Ontario alone this year fell $900 million short. It was $900 million short.

An hon. member: Is that not next year?

Mr. MacWilliam: My colleague says that it is next year. I believe that the figures are estimated over the fiscal year. We may be talking fiscal and calendar years.

Nine hundred million dollars is an incredible amount of money when you think about it. One of the reasons that the government in Ontario has had such a tough time in dealing with its rising deficit is because this federal government has pulled the plug on poor people and unemployed people in the province of Ontario. It has pulled the plug and the Ontario government has had to try to make up that shortfall.

I want to turn to a report that comes from the Government of British Columbia on the cost of the federal off-loading to British Columbia as a result of the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan.

These off-loading measures have really gone back over quite a few years as a result of the combined policies of the previous Liberal administration and now this administration. The combined effect will be some $1.1 billion in extra provincial payments that the province of British Columbia has to make good on by 1991-92.

This is an equivalent of some 67 per cent of the budget deficit that British Columbia is experiencing in the current fiscal year. This is 67 per cent of the deficit of $1.7 billion. It is just as a result of the fact that this government is not maintaining and honouring its legislative commitment to the people of British Columbia.

I want to add also that if these current off-loading measures that are going on through this kind of legislation continue in the first year of the next century by the year 2000, the fiscal impact on the province of British Columbia will be some $32.7 billion.

The B.C. report also notes that the Canada Assistance Plan is there to assist not governments but people. By withdrawing its fiscal support, this government is neglecting the people of British Columbia not the Government of British Columbia. It is trying to do the best it can to make up for the shortfall that has been caused by this government's insensitivity.

In 1991-92, $166 million will be lost to British Columbia due to the 5 per cent growth ceiling of the past legislation. As a result of this legislation which extends that freeze, it is going to make a shortfall in the Canada Assistance Plan alone by some $1 billion in 1994-95.

I know my time is limited, but I want to say on behalf of the citizens in my province of British Columbia and the citizens of my constituency of Okanagan—Shuswap that the government through this legislation is abandoning the less fortunate individuals not only in British Columbia but also throughout Canada.

The legislation is wrong. It is immoral and it should be withdrawn.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—Fisheries; the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan—Fisheries; the hon. member for Nepean—Indonesia; the hon. member for Cape Breton—Highlands—Canso—Rail Passenger Service; and the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell—Canada Post.

[English]

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, I also wish to participate in Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, third reading.

• (1610)

I would like to outline some of the concerns that I see within my own riding. This is the second time I have risen and spoken on this situation that the government is creating. I want to also make a few comments with regard to what the member for Mississauga South had to say because he does chair the finance committee and I know the background he has. It appears that he seems very biased in his comments toward the corporations and has very little concern for the well-being of the unfortunates and the people who need the help the most.

During the 1988 election campaign, the free trade agreement was the big thing that the government was talking about. There is no doubt in my mind, and all of the people I have talked to throughout not only my riding but across the country, that the actions this government is taking with regard to Bill C-32 and the capping of our social programs is an attack on the universality of our social programs.

The Prime Minister during the last election stated that our social programs were a sacred trust that would be protected by his government and the free trade agreement would not affect them. The actions this government is taking have everything to do with the free trade agreement. The cutbacks we have seen in the unemployment insurance and the changes to the unemployment insurance, the changes with regard to the various equalization payments, post-secondary education and those kinds of things are seen as subsidies. This government is starting to set the wheels in motion to affect those very programs. To be capping the Canada Assistance Plan during these economic times—at Christmas I went out and visited the food banks throughout my riding and saw the line-ups—you should be ashamed of yourselves. Every one of your members should be standing up here and saying: "My goodness, we have serious economic times and this is not a time to attack the people who need the help the most".

I want to refer to some things that are going to be happening. I want to alert the people before the government brings in the budget. I saw an article on February 5: "The Canadian Manufacturers' Association makes a push for $2 billion in tax breaks". It is lobbying the federal government. It goes on: "Up to $2 billion a year in tax breaks to business should be contained in the upcoming federal budget, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association said yesterday".

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association's pre-budget submission also called on the Minister of Finance to chop social spending because of Ottawa's hefty debt.

My goodness, we have seen the amount of unemployed. We have seen the food banks and the problems they are having trying to serve these people. Here we have the Manufacturers' Association coming to the federal government and requesting $2 billion extra, but cut social programs. It will be interesting to the Canadian people to see what this government does with that request because we do know it is closely associated with this government and this government lends a very close ear to its proposals.

At the same time, in the same paper I read: "Too poor, lowest income disabled missed the tax breaks". While these kinds of tax breaks are being made available to large corporations which the member for Mississauga South seems to defend and help as a way of dealing with it, more than one-quarter of severely disabled Canadians earn so little that they get nothing from the federal disability tax credit. The finance department admits in a report contained under the Access to Information: "We estimate that 26.5 per cent of the severely disabled population are unable to claim any amount of tax credits because they have no federal tax payable".

Is it any wonder that the Canadian people are starting to question the actions of this government?

We see the unemployed lining up and trying to obtain their unemployment insurance benefits and finding out under the new legislation that they have been cut back on their eligibility. We see the social assistance programs being cut back, the funding to the post-secondary education programs being cut back with no way to try to support those kinds of things. This government sits here and says nothing, and does nothing to try to alleviate those kinds of things.

The major platform of Ed Broadbent, our leader in the 1980s, during the 1980 election, the 1984 election, and the 1988 election, in which I was also involved, was federal, provincial, municipal programs to spur our economy. The Liberals had a one-day meeting here in Ottawa three or four days ago and came up with the idea that it is their idea.

I want to say that it is an excellent idea because what we have here is a proposal that we can work with the municipalities as federal, provincial and municipal governments to invest in our municipalities during times of depression, to upgrade our sewer systems and our various systems to bring them on stream. It is an investment. It is not a debt. That is an investment that we are going to have to carry out to meet the environmental problems that we have across Canada. It would meet the needs of many of these people under the Canada Assistance Plan. They are there in those communities throughout Canada and they could be employed in a meaningful way which everyone of them I am sure wants to be.

This government came in and said it is not going to address those problems, it is going to cap it so less is available. It will ensure that the programs brought in are more concerned with what happens to the interest rate and what happens to the Canadian dollar. It is more concerned with that than with the people it represents.

That is not good enough and the Canadian people are not going to accept that. Enough misery has been added to the Canadian people with the goods and services tax, with the various programs that have been cut back. They have had enough and it is time that this government changed its direction and not wait until just before the election and then come out with a bunch of goodies to try to change the devastation it has caused across this country.

I heard the member from GANDER—GRAND FALLS state in his question this afternoon that this government should go to Siberia. I think that many people here would agree. In my view maybe we should not put that kind of stress on that country which has enough problems already.

Let us make sure that we get the government out of here because it has done enough damage.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, in rising to speak to Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, before I get into the substance of my remarks I want to comment briefly on the earlier interjection during the debate by the hon. member for Mississauga South.

He had the temerity to suggest that Bill C-32 was a piece of legislation which would increase the government's contribution by 5 per cent. He knows better.

The government is putting a limit on an agreed upon increase at a time when as a result of the government's policies, of which he is a member and a supporter, those welfare lines and social assistance lines are climbing out of proportion to the norm.

• (1620)

The member for Mississauga South and his Conservative colleagues are saying to the increasing numbers of people who are being forced to line up in soup lines, in food bank lines and in social assistance lines, after the first five people: "Sorry, the rest of you 95 are out of here, even though we are responsible in large part for putting you in this line-up."

How that member can suggest that is offering something by this legislation I will never know. The hon. gentleman can be pretty clever at times, but he is a little off base this time around.

Bill C-32 allows for the extension of the 5 per cent limit on the Canada Assistance Plan for the provinces of Alberta, B.C. and Ontario. Bill C-69 capped at 5 per cent the federal funding increases until 1992 and Bill C-32 extends the cap up to 1995. The Canada Assistance Plan is the only mechanism by which the federal government funds social assistance and social services.

Like one of my colleagues previously, I want to comment just briefly on how this and similar measures by this Conservative government have cost many of the citizens of my home province of British Columbia very dearly.

Recently, on February 4, the Government of British Columbia released a brief produced by the B.C. Minister of Finance and Corporate Relations concerning the financial toll of federal cuts to transfer payments, the Established Programs Financing for health and post-secondary education and the Canada Assistance Plan and other programs. The paper details the actions of past Liberal and Conservative federal governments and the impact they have had on the B.C. budget.

The combined effect on B.C. of off-loading measures implemented since 1982 will be $1.1 billion in 1991-92, which is equivalent to 67 per cent of the estimated 1991-92 budget deficit of $1.7 billion. If the current off-loading continues to the first year of the new century, the negative fiscal impact on B.C. will be $32.7 billion.

Regarding the Established Programs Financing, the action taken earlier, the impact of Liberal and Tory changes over the years to the EPF funding formula, will result in B.C. losing $6.8 billion by the end of 1994-95.

Regarding the Canada Assistance Plan, the B.C. report notes that Canada Assistance Plan benefits are used to assist people, not governments. In 1991-92, $166 million will be lost to B.C. due to the 5 per cent gross ceiling and more than $1 billion will be lost by 1994-95.

With those kinds of figures, it is no wonder many people in western Canada, particularly in the province of British Columbia, are wondering just what is in it for them. It does not lead to the kind of understanding that there ought to be when we are attempting to form a new Constitution and a new relationship between the various parts of Canada.

The government has introduced these measures in the name of fiscal restraint and says that it is only the rich provinces that are affected and can afford the cap. The fact is that 50 per cent of Canada's poor live in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. The people in these provinces are as poor as those anywhere else in Canada. If you are poor, you are poor.

The very provinces that are affected by the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan are attractive provinces for those looking for work to move to, but when work is not available many of them must go on social assistance, placing an even larger burden on the welfare rolls in those provinces proportionately to those going on the welfare rolls in others.

A June 1991 Statistics Canada study shows that the large increase in the federal debt over the past 15 years was not caused by increases in program spending, as the Conservatives have alleged. That study examining the growth of the federal debt from $56 billion in 1974-75 to over $400 billion at the end of 1989-90 concludes: "It was not explosive growth and program spending that caused the increase in deficits after 1975, but a drop in federal revenues relative to the growth of the GDP and rising debt charges".

To go on: "Broadly speaking, government program spending as a share of gross domestic product did not rise significantly from 1975—in fact, it moderated compared to the preceding 10 years. Excluding unemployment insurance, which is intended to be self-financing over the business cycle, social program spending has not increased relative to GDP over the last 16 years".

In spite of the claims made by Conservatives and members on that side of the House, who tend to give weight to the mythology that it is program spending, especially social program spending, that has been largely to blame for the federal debt and use the backlash created by those kinds of statements to support their current cuts in social programs, particularly programs like the Canada Assistance Plan, facts from Statistics Canada show demonstrably that it is simply not true.

This is just one example of the social and fiscal irresponsibility on the part of successive federal governments, both Liberal and Conservative. Bill C-32 is just another example of how this government has decided to place the burden of paying off the debt on the shoulders of those who can least afford it.

An hon. member: Just like the NDP is doing in Ontario.

Mr. Kristiansen: Madam Speaker, some member keeps referring to Ontario. There is a big "O", a big zero, at the beginning of Ontario and I would suggest that is where that member is. If you had taken the zeros who managed to create a terrible debt burden at a time when the economy was still growing out of Ontario, nobody would have the kind of problems in Canada that we currently have.

Another problem this government is now attempting to deal with, in a rather mischievous way, stems from the ever growing debt burden that has been created since the end of the Second World War, and it was not a result of program spending. As I said before, it had much more to do with the perversions in the tax structure the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party were responsible for over many years.

For example, in 1950 direct tax revenue from both the personal and corporate sectors was approximately equal, and together they covered some three-quarters of current federal expenditures. By 1988 personal taxes had risen from 35 per cent to 47 per cent of government expenditures and corporate taxes had declined from the 1951 high of 40 per cent to only 9 per cent of government expenditures, as shown on the accompanying chart. I will supply that to Hansard. In other words, the corporate sector has managed to curtail its relative tax liability by almost 75 per cent since 1950. In 1988 terms, if the corporate sector tax contribution had matched that of personal taxpayers instead of a budget deficit of $30 billion, Ottawa would have realized a surplus of some $18.5 billion. In other words, the government could have targeted the cause but it did not. Now the poorest Canadians are paying the price.

In conclusion, I would like to point out that Bill C-32 is just another attack by the Tories on social programs which the government claims it is making in the name of fiscal restraint. It is clear that this move is about politics, not money. These political moves amount to more breaks for the Tories' wealthy friends and a consequent life of poverty and hunger for millions of Canadians who are being squeezed and broken by the weight of high taxes with a tattered social safety net beneath them.

In my own riding of Kootenay West—Revelstoke people are suffering. This government is making it worse. It is time it had a second thought, retreated, withdrew this bill and turned its policies around to give some hope to the people of Canada.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Friday, November 22, 1991, consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre), that Bill C-35, an act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I will only be speaking for a short time on this bill because, as our House leader said in previous debate, this bill is basically a technical bill in which we are cleaning up loose ends on several other bills that have been through committee and through the House. These basically are just minor modifications.

I wanted to speak to this bill from the point of view of someone who is not a lawyer. Sometimes when I listen to debates in this House I think most Canadians get a feeling that they do not understand what it has to do with the problems and priorities of the marketplace.

As we said earlier this week on our first day back, the number one issue, the number one concern in this country today is trying to get people back to work. Then we see a bill like this on our legislative agenda in which we are addressing over 60 to 70 different statutes. There is absolutely nothing in this bill that addresses the priorities of the population at large.

Earlier today the government House leader said that he would be prepared to listen to recommendations from the opposition side for using this national Chamber for debate on matters of special importance. I think that was a major breakthrough. It is the first time I have heard that kind of accommodation from the government House leader. Quite frankly, it is part of the reason why I will not be spending a lot of time on this bill. He has addressed my concern that we should spend very little time on technical bills like this because they do absolutely nothing to address the priorities of the economic agenda which is so important and which the people of Canada want us to address today.

Also, as I was going through some of the amendments that were being addressed in this bill, some of the statutes that were being repealed, I see things in here like the Canadian Unity Information Office which is finally being abolished. I see things like the final memory of Lotto-Canada, the final memory of many of these railway institutions from region to region, coast to coast. I am reminded once again of what makes my vision or my feeling of this country different from the government side.

I have always believed in a strong national government. It is from national programs that we develop a national will and a sense that binds us as a country.

As I was going through the index of all the amendments that are being made, I saw further examples and memories of how we have basically dismantled so many things in this country in the last few years. I think it is one of the reasons that we have a problem of unity in this country today. It is because we have fragmented the country so much.

I had intended to speak a little longer on this bill but I was so pleased to hear the government House leader's offer today that we would extend the hours of this House for special issues related to the economy. Out of respect to him, I am going to cut my remarks short so that we can move on with this bill quickly and get on to more important business.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I have had a chance to look at this bill and I certainly appreciate the comments of my colleague from across the floor and the comments of my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood.

I did expect him to have his comments shortened, but I did not appreciate that they would be as short as they were. He and I had discussed this very briefly.

I would ask him if there are sections in this particular housekeeping bill, which really it is, that cause him any grief or any concern. There are a couple of things perhaps that might want to be debated in the House and I just wondered if there are any areas here that struck him as being outstanding or anything that is other than a housekeeping issue.

Mr. Mills: I want to say to my colleague that the technical aspects of this bill are so basic that I sometimes wonder why we even waste the taxpayers' money in bringing these minor amendments that have absolutely no effect on the basic thrust of the policy of government.

After reviewing this bill, I cannot justify spending any more time on this bill than I have because to me, it is not what Canadians want us to be debating right now. They do not want us to be debating about whether a clause should be in column one or column two, or whether the word "minister" should be in line one or line ten.

There is a natural tendency when a bill comes from the government side, and especially when it is an omnibus bill like this one where there are close to 200 different amendments, that we think that maybe the government is trying to pull one over on us.

You look through it and ask: "My goodness, what exactly does this mean?" I have checked with the researchers and there is absolutely nothing in this bill that will change the policy thrust or the direction of any of the bills that it is related to.

My problem with this bill is that on our first week back, why would the government put this on the agenda? Is there absolutely so much lack of creativity in legislation over there or other legislation pending that we cannot put something in this House to debate that will help put Canadians back to work?

People do not want us standing here in this House today debating whether a clause should be in subsection (b) or (c) or (d). They just do not want that. They want us to talk about the real suffering, the problems that are facing people in terms of meeting their mortgage payments, preserving their jobs and trying to figure out ways to get this economy going again.

The quicker that we can get on with this bill and get on to something that is more relevant to the economy the better off we are all going to be and the more respect we will bring to this House.

Mr. Mifflin: Madam Speaker, once again I applaud my colleague for his sincerity and his directness on this particular aspect.

I see people nodding their heads, but there is something here that I want to talk about. I want to draw it to the member's attention in case he had not seen it. I think I have a few moments to discuss this.

It is clause 24 of the Canada Pension Plan. This clause, for those of you who have a copy of the bill, is an amendment that will permit the Commissioner of Review Tribunals rather than the minister to extend the time for appeals under this section.

That may sound like a very innocuous type of amendment. But as all of us here are members of this House and receive requests from our constituents, I cannot begin to tell you how many applications I have had for reviews of pensions, particularly from people who have been disabled.

Quite frankly, I have been surprised and truly disappointed over the attitude of those who are involved in reviewing pensions. Here is the chronology. Somebody who is clearly permanently disabled, cannot find work, and is under a doctor's care makes application for a Canada pension, a disability pension and in almost every case unless the documentation is 110 per cent, the answer is no. It is easier to say no than to say yes. We all face this.

Then there is a long procedure, at a time when the constituent has no source of income, is undergoing a doctor's care and is in a very dismal economic situation from a morale viewpoint, and the bureaucracy is saying to the constituent and family: "Well, we do not think so".

There is more documentation, there are more visits to doctors, more substantiations on why the disability is permanent and why the work cannot take place and the appeal process goes on. I have been involved in constituent cases that have taken over two years. The answer comes back finally, yes.

One of the control mechanisms we have in this is that for the tribunal to extend the time of an appeal, which is long enough now, it has to go through the drill of going to the minister and saying that it wants the appeal time extended.

Ministers being responsible, I am sure will ask why. Their staffs will ask that, their chiefs of staff, their assistants. I am not happy with the system as it now is.

Now this authority has been subordinated to somebody who is not a minister, who is not answerable to constituents. I see this as prolonging the process and making it more difficult for members of Parliament to be responsible to their constituents because the minister is now taken out of the chain of at least keeping the appeal period to a minimum.

I see this amendment here, clause 24, as being a retrograde step and being a step that will not serve those constituents who have a devil of a time convincing the pension boards and the disability boards that they are in fact disabled, that they cannot find work.

I checked in my office just before I came here. Right now, we have over 34 cases. Some are in the process of being approved. That is 34 cases for one riding. Let us say that is an average riding. Multiply that by 295 ridings and that means close to 10,000 cases that are being considered.

Ministers as politicians realize the need to keep the appeal time to a reasonable time as they have people themselves who are in the same condition.

If you subordinate this to somebody who is not answerable to a constituent or to a number of constituents, I fear that this will make this process, with which I am very unhappy now and other members are as well, an even longer process and a process that will cause more grief to constituents.

I am very concerned about this aspect of this particular clause. I know that other members are as well. I want the House to take note of that and I am sure my hon. colleague for Broadview—Greenwood would agree with that.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, it really is an exciting moment in my political career to be up speaking on this particular piece of legislation.

I want to talk about these very important amendments to legislation dealing with anomalies, inconsistencies and errors in statutes. We have to correct these things. We cannot allow errors to continue. If we are not here to correct them, then who will? We really are embarking on an important adventure with this piece of legislation.

As we go through this we see amendments to legislation like the Bank Act and the Trust Companies Act. The chairman of that committee knows, and we have just gone through all these amendments and changes and supposedly fixed up the legislation. Here we are now amending it again.

When is the government going to get it right? It is so discouraging that we on this side have to go through these changes when we have just taken a look at the legislation and said: "Now, here we are really finally doing something that is positive for Canadians, putting the four pillars of our financial institutions on a firm basis."

Here we find out that there is still amendment after amendment that has to be dealt with. I can tell by the look on your face, Madam Speaker, that you are as upset about this as I am. So is the chairman. I am surprised that you have not taken some of the officials to task, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. member: Why don't you fix it up?

Mr. Rideout Yes, it should have been done. There are amendments dealing with agencies that are near and dear to the hearts of Atlantic Canadians, the ACOA legislation, the Atlantic opportunities initiatives, those types of things requiring amendments.

These are serious amendments and they do have ramifications. As you go through them you find that they refer to the wrong sections, or they misspelled words, or referred things to the wrong director. But for the loyal opposition being on guard for these things, they would be slipping through. I hesitate to think what could have happened.

That is why we are up on this very important piece of legislation. I know that you want us to to through each and every one of these.

Mr. Robitaille: What is the conclusion; we want a conclusion.

Mr. Rideout: You want conclusions. There are things in here that I know are on the speaker's mind dealing with migratory birds. If they are not allowed to migrate, what is going to happen? You have to realize that it is very serious for them.

All jesting aside, this is a detailed list of changes. We in the justice committee have gone through these and have perused them rigorously to make sure that finally we will get some of the acts corrected. For that reason, I wanted to speak on that and to compliment the chairman of the justice and solicitor general committee for his efforts in correcting some of the mistakes. The whole committee worked very hard. It is somewhat like the banking committee. We worked diligently night and day to go through these amendments to make sure that finally we had a legislative system that would work. As you peruse these, as I have, you will find there are a lot of good amendments here. There are a lot of things that really do correct the legislation. My colleagues have already referred to some of the things that were on their minds, and without going back over those, they did touch on some very important matters.

The committee is unsung when it does this type of work. People jest and make fun of the efforts—

Mr. Milliken: It must be pretty boring.

Mr. Rideout: It was and it was tiring. Look at how thick the bill is. To have to go through all of those things and try to correct the mistakes that government and its officials make is discouraging but we have done it and have done an excellent job. It is almost an inch thick which gives you an idea of the magnitude of the problems that the government has.

I do want to speak on this legislation for at least another eight minutes and tell the Canadian people how important this particular bill is.

Mr. Blenkarn: You do not have to.

Mr. Rideout: My learned colleague wanted an opportunity to speak for five minutes as well and I feel it would be unfair for me to monopolize all of the time when I know he has done a fair degree of research and put a lot of effort as well into the fine tuning that has to be done. So I would defer to the member for Kingston and the Islands. You can tell by the look on his face that he is just dying to get up here and talk about this legislation. I will stand aside and allow him to proceed.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I do have some questions I want to put to my hon. and very learned friend whom I know—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Milliken: Hon. members opposite laugh but it is quite a proper appellation for someone as distinguished as the hon. member for Moncton.

I want to say, Madam Speaker, that I have had a glance, of course, through this bill—yes, I have—and I found it fairly turgid reading. It is one that is quite difficult to follow because each section amends a subsection of another act and unless you have the other act in front of you, it is difficult to follow.

For example, I read one part that says: "The headings in the preceding section 7 of the said act are repealed and the following substituted therefor" and then it goes through a series of changes to the Copyright Act. The headings do not make a lot of sense unless you have the act in front of you. The change is only that it renumbers one of the parts.

It is errors like that which creep into statutes. I know what my hon. and learned friend from Moncton was referring to in his speech. I understand he was a member of the committee that spent, as he says, night and day studying this bill. I am wondering, first of all, did the committee in the course of its deliberations ask the Minister of Justice how many days and nights she spent in drafting this legislation?

Mr. Rideout: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Justice was preoccupied and I am not allowed to refer to the fact that she was not there, but she was not so I will not refer to that.

The officials did assure us they had gone through the bill in great detail and the comforting fact is that there is nothing of any magnitude in these amendments. They were purely curative in nature and nothing that would impact on any legislation or change or alter the course of the ship of state. For that reason, our committee did have some comfort from that fact.

I think you are absolutely right when you refer to those aspects where headings become important and compass readings as well, Admiral, and all of those things are very important as far as statutes are concerned. Our committee did go through that and we spent about two or three days and the accomplishment was this bill. We are very proud as a committee—and it was unanimous, Madam Speaker—working together, trying hard, agreeing on amendments and doing what is best for Canadians rather than any partisan politics. We have gone past that now and this legislation is a clear indication of that. I congratulate all members of the committee for the hard work they have put into that.

Maybe you have another question?

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I have another question on one of the other issues that was very thoroughly discussed in this bill. In fact there was a point of order Your Honour may recall, which was raised at the time the bill was introduced and was of some significance.

The hon. and learned member for Moncton in his comments may want to refer to the work his committee did in relation to that point, that there were some acts referred to in part III of this bill which dealt with bills introduced but not yet assented to.

In other words, this bill proposed amendments to other bills before the House, which procedure was described as irregular at least, if not out of order, by my learned and hon. colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. The reference was to these bills that the government had introduced in the House. Apparently it had blundered in the bills and of course in some of them we know that that happens. Bill C–32 which we were debating earlier today was one of those blunders. The government did not seek to amend it, but it did amend some other bills that had been introduced in the House and that were the subject of debate.

I find it odd that you would seek to amend one bill by another bill instead of moving an amendment to the original bill, but for one reason or another it did not do that.

I wonder if my hon. and learned colleague in the course of deliberations in the committee took a look at this procedure and may have passed any judgment in the course of the committee deliberations on whether the government had behaved responsibly or indeed properly in seeking to amend bills by introducing another bill as this one is, instead of doing amendments to the bills directly, as it should have done before they got royal assent either here or in the other place.

Mr. Rideout: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the member for Kingston and the Islands for that thoughtful question. It is most helpful to me because it brings forward those types of problems a committee deals with.

We did not want to throw too many stones against the government because one sees the magnitude of the blunders that are here. But there are problems in amending legislation through a collective bill rather than going back and going over it. It was very difficult. I think part of time-taking that the committee went through was actually cross-checking because once you are put on notice that the government cannot do it properly, it is incumbent upon the opposition members on these committees to go through in great detail, analysing what happened and what was intended by the legislation and questionning witnesses. We had a number of officials go through and actually study those things and try to make sure that this time it was right.

I should not say this because to err is human and probably we might have even let a few things slip through this time but we were most diligent in looking at that. I hope when amendments come forward as time goes on that the bill will actually be brought forward so that members of the House, and the public in general, will have an idea of what it is all about. I can assure you having gone through this in detail, getting ready for this debate, it is difficult and it is not fair.

The government has told us that it wants to have simplicity in its statutes, in language, and here was an opportunity. Instead it has been made very confusing. I hope as it embarks on the next task of correcting more of its errors that when it comes forward with those that it will bring the bills forward. Then we will have a chance to really see how it fits.

Rather than having to pull those books off the shelf and go through all of them, find everything and check it through, it will all be there in front of us. It would make things a lot easier for legislators, and I think it would make it easier for Canadians because I know they as well want to go through and make sure that the government—

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO STANDING ORDERS

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East) moved:

That the Standing Orders of the House of Commons be amended as follows:

Standing Order 36(2)(b) is amended by inserting the words "Except as otherwise provided in Standing Order 36.1," at the beginning of it; and

The following is added after Standing Order 36:

"36.1 A petition which purports to be signed by

(a) 3 percent of the persons entitled to vote in a general election to the House of Commons in the case of a petition which does not pray for any expenditure, grant or charge on the public revenue, or

(b) 5 percent of the persons entitled to vote in a general election to the House of Commons in the case of a petition which prays for an expenditure, grant or charge on the public revenue, shall, upon being presented by a member in the House pursuant to Standing Order 36, and notwithstanding Standing Order 36(2), automatically stand referred to the Chief Electoral Officer, who shall determine whether or not the petition complies with clause (a) or (b) by counting the signatures and verifying such proportion of them as is in his opinion reasonable, and shall report his findings to the House with all practicable speed and in any case not later than three weeks following the reference to him if the House is then sitting or on the first sitting day next occurring if the House is not then sitting.

36.2 Within 10 sitting days of the receipt by the House of a report from the Chief Electoral Officer certifying that a petition referred to him pursuant to Standing Order 36.1 complies with Standing Order 36.1(a) or (b), the House shall debate a motion on the question of the petition's prayer, such motion being in the form set out in section (6).

(2) Not less than 3 hours on the same sitting day shall be set aside for consideration of the petition's prayer and no motion to adjourn the debate shall be considered by the House until such time as the 3 hours have elapsed, save by unanimous consent.

(3) The time set aside for consideration of the motion pursuant to section (2), and any additional time for its further consideration, shall be set by the Government House Leader, and shall be during time otherwise reserved for consideration of Government Business, and notice of the time so set aside shall be given not less than two days prior.

(4) When the motion is being considered, no Member shall speak for more than 10 minutes.

(5) No other matter or item of Government Business shall be considered by the House until such time as the motion has been considered and decided upon by the House.

(6) At the conclusion of consideration of the motion, the Speaker shall put the following question:

"Shall the petitioners' prayer stand referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections?"

(7) If the motion is passed, the petitioners' prayer shall automatically stand referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

36.3 (1) When a petition is referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections pursuant to Standing Order 36.2(7), the Committee shall, within 15 sitting days of the referral, report back to the House.

(2) The Committee's report shall be in the form of either a

(a) Bill for an Act which, if adopted by the Parliament, or

(b) Motion which, if adopted by the House, would give effect to the petitioners' prayer.

36.4 (1) If a Bill or Motion prepared pursuant to Standing Order 36.3 does not contain a provision for an expenditure, grant or charge on the public revenue, then the Member who presented the petition shall be deemed to be the sponsor of the Bill or mover of the Motion in the House, and shall be responsible for securing a seconder.

(2) If a Bill or Motion prepared pursuant to Standing Order 36.3 contains a provision for an expenditure, grant or charge on the public revenue, then a Minister who is a Member of Parliament designated for this purpose by the Ministry shall seek the recommendation of the Governor General for the Bill or Motion, and thereafter that Minister shall be deemed to be the sponsor of the Bill or mover of the Motion in the House, and shall be responsible for securing a seconder.

(3) A Bill or Motion brought forward pursuant to this Standing Order shall be placed on the Order Paper under Government Bills or Government Business, as the case may be.

36.5 If the House is prorogued or dissolved before all matters brought before it pursuant to Standing Orders 36.2 and 36.4 are resolved, then those matters shall be placed on the Order Paper for the next session of the House in the form in which they had been left and at the stage at which they had been left at the time of prorogation or dissolution.

36.6 No vote taken in the House pursuant to Standing Orders 36.2 and 36.4 shall be deemed to involve a question of the confidence of the House in the Ministry or a Minister."

He said: Madam Speaker, I commend to your attention and the attention of the House the following words and ask that you think carefully on them as I recite them:

> The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefor provide a remedy humbly sheweth—

How grand those words sound, how noble, how redolent of the comfortingly musty air of parliamentary history, tradition and practice. And yet, how hollow, how thin, how utterly void of force and meaning.

Can any member in this Chamber number the times she or he has heard these words or their latter day variants uttered during the Routine Proceedings of this House? Yet can any member name a single instance in which a petition solemnly presented here has resulted in a change of policy, a shift in spending, the taking of some requested action or the abandonment of some other? Can any member name a single instance in which beyond its perfunctory hearing, a petition's prayer was even considered in this House?

I suspect not, which is sad, and I believe dangerous.

We live in a time when many Canadians, despairing of the fruits of their parliamentary institutions and even of the general conduct of public affairs, are coming to despair of public democratic government itself, believing contemporary policies to be the creation not of the parties and politicians who transitorily inhabit and control our democratic institutions, but rather of our democratic institutions themselves. Many Canadians see institutional reform as their best chance for relief from the government policies that cause them so much pain and frustration.

So it is that we see deeply angered westerners, hit hard by depressed international commodity prices, repeating the dull incantation that a Triple-E Senate might forever save the west from another NEP or the unfair awarding of an aircraft service contract.

So it is we see deeply angered Ontarians who have watched their once mighty manufacturing sector devastated in the wake of free trade after decades of truncated branch plant development turn their fury on constitutional guarantees of minority language rights.

So it is that we see maritimers suffering the agonies of depleted fish stocks and the shock of a GST on top of already high provincial taxes ponder the relative merits of maritime union or, like westerners, a Triple-E Senate.

And so it is we see Quebecois battling high interest rates, the high dollar and looming behind all else the dark spectre of ultimate cultural assimilation and extinction. We see them reaching for the intoxicating elixir of independence.

Everywhere, Canadians seem to be seeking institutional solutions to political problems. We should not be surprised at this. Canadians are faced with a government they seem unable to influence. They find themselves truly suffering with the consequences of policies they despise, but apparently having no means of reversing or even moderating those policies.

Canadians write letters in numbers sufficient to denude forests and are ignored. They sign protest petitions by the hundreds of thousands and are told the policies they protest are for their own good. They demonstrate on the streets of the nation in the tens of thousands and are dismissed as isolated and ignorant cranks.

In short, Canadians find themselves devoid of political influence at the very centre of those institutions which exist ostensibly to effect their will. I believe this is the fault of those currently occupying those centres. I believe the government is so blinded by its own misguided ideological mission that it refuses to see the suffering it is causing the Canadian people; refuses to see the flag of rage raised against it. I also believe that the task of those who wish to return the voice of the Canadian people to the councils of policy in power is a political task and not an institutional one.

The best and most effective response to the follies and predations of the current government would be not to change Parliament, but to change the government. I am certain this will happen at the first opportunity. I fervently hope the change will be enough to begin a reversal of the policies that have been devastating this country and not just to change the faces of those politicians uttering vacuous justifications of those policies.

Even when we do finally elect a government that will serve Canadians, it would be prudent as well to implement means to ensure that government continues serving Canadians. We must find ways of ushering the clear political voice of the Canadian people directly into our deliberations. If we are to battle the corrosive cynicism and misguided, institutionally oriented politics that now eat at the heart of true political debate in this country, we must devise means of making that debate more immediately felt in this House. We must open the doors of this Chamber to the concerted intervention of the Canadian people.

Motion No. 89 before us today is a modest attempt to begin this process. It is offered in an effort to restore some degree of credibility to our parliamentary institutions by making more real and effective the political concerns of Canadians within this institution.

This would happen by making petitions effective again. I say again because petitions have not always been the pathetic little squeaks of formulaic protest to which they are now reduced. Before the Magna Carta there were petitions directed to the Crown and, as often as not, seeking redress for some grievance, although no record exists for how often such redress was granted. The institution of petitions remains sufficiently valuable and vibrant to warrant its specific reaffirmation in the Bill of Rights of 1689. The right to petition Parliament slowly evolved out of this statutory and conventionally constitutional right to petition the Crown.

Similarly, as is noted in citation 666 at page 209 of the fifth edition of Beauchesne's:

> The right of petitioning the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the Constitution and has been exercised without interruption since 1867.

Exercised without interruption perhaps, but I suspect it has as well been exercised with ever lessening effect.

This was probably inevitable, but even if inevitable, the erosion of the power of petitions should now be reversed. Democratic practice requires no less.

It lies within the power of this House, through Motion No. 89, to change this, to restore to petitions the status of effective agent of the vox populi at the very heart of the parliamentary process.

The mechanism is simple. All that is required is an amendment to our Standing Orders to compel the House to debate and pass upon any matter brought to its attention by a sufficiently large number of petitioners.

• (1710)

Where a petition asked for something that did not require the expenditure of public money, such as a government commitment to reducing carbon dioxide emissions to 80 per cent of their 1988 level by the year 2005, the signatures of 3 per cent of the electorate, about 530,000 electors, would be enough to compel parliamentary consideration.

Where a petition asked for something that did require the expenditure of public money, such as the implementation of a new national child care program, the signatures of 5 per cent of the electorate, about 880,000 electors, would be enough to compel such consideration.

In either case, the petitions would be referred to the Chief Electoral Officer for verification of the numbers of signatures. Once certified by the Chief Electoral Officer, a petition's prayer would have to be debated in this House for a minimum of three hours on government business time. At the conclusion of that debate, the House would have to vote on whether it supported the prayer.

Contrast this proposal with the current state of affairs. Today, petitions are presented by hon. members pursuant to Standing Order 36. They then quickly subside beneath the murky parliamentary waters.

According to the fifth edition of Beauchesne's in citation 695 at page 213, unanimous consent must be granted just to have the Clerk read out a petition's prayer. The only way a petition can be referred to a committee thereafter is with another show of unanimous consent.

However, if Motion No. 89 were adopted and the House voted to support a petition's prayer, the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections would be charged automatically with preparing a motion or a bill for an act which, if adopted by the House and the Senate in the case of a bill, would give effect to the prayer. That motion or bill would then proceed through the House as a regular piece of government business, except that if the House dissolved or prorogued the motion or bill would automatically be reinstated at the next sitting of the House at the stage and form in which it had been left at dissolution or prorogation.

Of key importance is Motion No. 89's proposed section 36.6 which provides that no vote taken in this House on a petition's prayer or subsequent motion or bill:

> —shall be deemed to involve a question of the confidence of the House in the ministry or a minister.

In other words, all votes in the House on matters arising out of petitions should be free votes.

I would like to note here that I cannot claim exclusive credit or blame, depending on your point of view, for drafting and promoting this motion and the ideas behind it. Jim Gurnett, then the member of the Alberta Legislative Assembly for the constituency of Spirit River—Fairview, and I first cobbled together a motion very much like this one in 1985. Our goal then was the same as I have presented today: To grant people the ability directly to affect the legislative agenda of their parliaments and thereby restore at least some of the people's faith in their democratic institutions.

This proposal was the cornerstone of the Alberta New Democrats' very first public announcement in the Alberta general election of 1986. That was the election which saw their caucus grow from two to 16 members.

Unfortunately, Jim Gurnett was defeated in that election. Upon the convening of the new legislature, this motion was taken up by Gordon Wright, then the newly-elected member for Edmonton Strathcona. Both these men are among the finest I have ever had the pleasure to meet and work with and I am deeply honoured today to be advancing in this House a democratic proposal of the sort previously championed by them in the Alberta legislature.

Surely, some may say, there are other better ways to raise the voice of the Canadian people directly in their Parliament. It is true that other proposals have been made. Hon. members will know that there have been at least two proposals on the Order Paper in addition to Motion No. 89, both aimed at increasing Canadians' control over, and impact on, the political process. The hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore has proposed Bill C-201, a bill for an act which would provide for the holding of referenda on various matters. The hon. member for Calgary Northeast had previously proposed Motion No. 664, a motion seeking a constitutional amendment to provide for holding of referenda when called for by a petition of 10 per cent of electors.

Both these proposals have some merit and are certainly worthy of the House's consideration. Neither can be affected by this House acting alone. In both cases this House's hands can be tied by the Senate.

Motion No. 89 on the other hand can be adopted by the House acting on its own without reference to any other body or authority, and because it is a motion and not a bill, only one vote is required. All that is needed is a willingness on the part of no more than 148 hon. members, a simple majority, to give the people of Canada a little more say over what goes on in their Parliament.

Some may object that Motion No. 89 would have the effect of preventing those elected to govern from doing so, that it would remove decision making from the thoughtful chambers of Parliament and hurl it into the chaos and passion of street level politics. They may see in Motion No. 89 a system discomfortingly close to the form of legislation by initiative found in several American states.

Setting aside for the moment my personal conviction that this may not be such a bad thing, I must with some mixed feelings assure hon. members that this objection is groundless. All the motion provides is that the people of Canada, in sufficient numbers, may compel their Parliament to consider a matter. It remains for Parliament to decide the matter; both at the initial debate on the petition's prayer and, should the prayer be supported, at the debate on the consequent motion or bill.

Further, in precluding the operation of the confidence convention, the motion attempts to ensure that each matter brought forward by petition is considered on its merits alone.

Some may object that passage of this motion would result in legislative gridlock, that the House would be inundated with petitions seeking all manner of fanciful programs and policies and that consequently the legitimate business of the House of Commons would be shoved aside.

To this objection there are two responses. First, the number of signatures required would ensure only the most widely supported initiatives would be brought before this House in this fashion. As one who has spent more than a few hours on cold winter streets attempting to coax signatures from reluctant citizens, I can say that collecting one signature each from a minimum half million voters is no mean feat. It requires extensive organization and widespread grassroots support for the proposition being advanced. The workout alone would be sufficient to weed out all the frivolous and most of the vexatious efforts, ensuring that only matters of substantial public interest were brought forward.

Second, there is what Beachesne's calls an old rule of Parliament. It is a rule first passed in 1604 and conventionally enforced in this House to this day. It precludes consideration of any question previously considered and passed upon in the same session. Citing the fourth edition of Bourinot, Beauchesne's at page 172 of the sixth edition, quotes this old rule as:

> That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House.

This would ensure that only matters not previously debated and resolved by the House would be brought forward. Therefore, given these two conditions the House can be certain that only matters of great public significance not previously determined by the House would be brought forward should Motion No. 89 be adopted.

I would note parenthetically my personal hope that the rule against consideration by the House of any question more than once in a session would not be enforced so rigidly as to prevent legitimate consideration of legitimate matters legitimately placed before this House by petition. There is a danger that over-strict interpretation of this rule could itself constrict the reasonable democratic rights this Motion seeks to establish.

As well, it is greatly to be hoped that governments would not resort to the transparent strategy of quickly introducing and disposing of motions or bills which in content and purpose closely mimicked those of an anticipated petition solely for the purpose of precluding that petition's consideration.

I suggest, however, that these concerns are modest compared to the benefits to be derived from the adoption of Motion No. 89.

As I noted at the outset, it ought to be crystal clear to all hon. members that most Canadians no longer believe what they think and want matters in their Parliament. It is equally clear that they believe there is nothing they can do about it between elections.

This condition is dangerous because it creates the sullen cynicism that can corrode public confidence in, and thus support for, the democratic institutions that constitute the bedrock upon which our civil society is built.

I believe that. In the face of such concerns, we must do what we can. We must take any reasonable measure we can to support and extend our fellow citizens' ability to influence their Parliament.

Motion No. 89 is such a reasonable measure. Its adoption by this House would be an eminently worthwhile investment in the democratic future of our country at a time when real evidence of good faith by elected politicians would be welcomed by the Canadian people.

To adopt motion No. 89 would be good for democracy. It would be good for Parliament. It would be good for Canada.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, it is not common for Whips in our system to participate in parliamentary debates. It is not against the rules but it is not something that we do often. Certainly it is something that I would not do if in fact this particular private members' motion was to be coming to a vote.

There is a responsibility related to votes that goes with the Whip's job. We have been trying in the spirit of parliamentary reform to make sure that Private Members' Business is conducted by private members for private members. There is a distinction between votable motions and non-votable motions.

If it were votable then our side on every one of those occasions since I became Whip after the 1988 election has never had a Whip on any private members' motion that came to a vote. I would hate to provide a signal that was different.

I have spent a few hours of my life, over close to 13 years in this Chamber, and at various times have had responsibilities related to the rules of the Chamber and have had occasion to read those rules for all of their significance on a number of occasions. I felt compelled when I saw this particular motion to rise and express some objection to what I was reading about in terms of the motion itself and what I was hearing in terms of the speech of my colleague from across the way.

This is a funny place. One can ask oneself why do Canadians lose confidence in it? They watch a hockey game and there are rules to a hockey game. They expect them to be the same from one game to the next. In this place it seems to people they are not the same. We have a set of rules and people do not obey them.

I simply say to the member: When you enter into the business of changing rules, do so with some trepidation. I realize he has only been in this Chamber about three years or maybe a little more than three years. It takes a long time to understand the rules of this place and the nuances and it takes a lot of effort.

To say one has a great idea to change the rules and to be reading a text about rule changes in the Chamber is a bit of an anomaly. One of the basic rules is that we really should not read what it is we say in this Chamber. This is a Chamber for debate. It is not a Chamber for reading texts which may have been created by the member or by someone else.

If one enters into the rule debate, one should be really careful to try to obey the rules as they exist as one petitions for a change in the rules. Years ago, in 1979, when I was a new member and we lost the confidence vote and we were back in an election in 1980, we brought forward a budget that created what the Canadian Council on Social Development called the fairest budget to poor people in the decade of the seventies. The NDP moved a motion to turf it out. They voted for the motion and they did turf it out. Yet we had heard so much rhetoric for so many days and so many months about how they cared about poor people and the fairness for poor people. At the very first opportunity to grab for power they turned their backs on the poor people. Under the guise of democracy, it is bringing forward one of the most expensive undertakings that I have seen brought forward in this Chamber.

We are talking about the need to create something in the order of one million signatures. If you have deep pockets with lots of money, you can hire firms like all those American firms that deal with petitions. You can go out and hire them to advance any cause you want. There is no way the poor people of this country could gather one million signatures. They do not have the money. You are trying to turn the legislative dominance of this Chamber over to people with thick wallets. That runs counter to what I think my life has stood for, and what I think the lives of many members on this side have stood for. Their lives have stood for a sense of justice and fairness for everybody. To advance a set of rules which require a lot of money for people to exercise them seems like a bit of a contradiction between what is said and what members do.

On this side of the House we have to exercise a sense of responsibility. If we want rule changes affecting the role of private members, one of the tragedies is the number of motions and bills put forward by private members which are not well thought out. The wording which is inherent in them is not really responsible.

This is a classic example of somebody who is in love with an idea which may have come out of a fiction book or something. It would change the rules of this Chamber. Therefore, if you are a responsible parliamentarian, you must accept the responsibility for making propositions that use the time of this Chamber, propositions that are sensible and which will enable us to proceed in a reasonable fashion.

The member started off his speech by trying to ding government members for what they did about an aircraft maintenance contract. That was popular. The NDP premier of the province of Manitoba got all the headlines by saying that this government was really a terrible government because of that maintenance contract.

I am sitting here, poor little old me who tries to do a little bit of research before I reach a conclusion, and I ask: "Should we be repairing those airplanes today in St. Louis, Missouri and putting all the jobs in St. Louis, Missouri or were we right as a government to bring those jobs to Canada?" I look at de Havilland and I look at Canadair and Bristol and I say: "You know, the common characteristics of those two consortiums is that they are really healthy. In a time of recession they are doing very well. They do not take any more taxpayers' dollars". Canadair used to receive a subsidy of $1 billion and plus. It does not get a subsidy any more. However, there are 25 or 30 per cent more people working there with higher salaries and a better standard of living. Go to Winnipeg and look at Bristol. Again, it is the same picture, I think there are almost 50 per cent more employees working at Bristol.

Yet, it was a bad decision. Somehow or other this government which brought the jobs back to Canada and helped two companies to expand and provide more jobs for more people committed a terrible sin.

If we were dependent on this petition mechanism, do you think it would have been any problem to get 5 per cent of voters, those who read the headlines, to sign a petition saying that the decision was wrong, to create enough political heat there on the street on the basis of little information, on misinformation and cause Parliament to do something with only 18 people out of 300 allowed to speak in three hours?

That is what this motion says: three hours, 18 people. This motion says that in four provinces, if you happen to be lucky enough to live in Ontario, Quebec, Alberta or British Columbia, you could create a petition in your province and cause this Parliament to do something. However if you lived in one of the other six, in Saskatchewan, Manitoba or P.E.I., you could not do that. You would have to go out and gather signatures in some other place.

I look at the time and those who are watching will realize that 10 minutes has gone by already. What if the petition was to eliminate income tax? Do you think there is any big trick in getting people to sign to eliminate income tax? However a responsible group must have a replacement. You cannot borrow your way into prosperity. You cannot borrow money forever. You cannot just do popular things that are will-o'-the-wisp. You have to make responsible decisions and take the heat.

You have to say: "No, we will not repair those jets in St. Louis; we will bring them back to Canada and create more jobs across this country in Winnipeg, Montreal, and Edmonton. If people think we are making a mistake we will listen to them carefully, we will listen to their logic. However, we will make the decision, we will be responsible and then history will tell us it was not such a bad decision after all. It was a pretty good one."

Think how unpopular the GST was. It was so unpopular that the group who promised to bring it in was elected with a majority government and those who promised not to do it were defeated. This group says that free trade was such a terrible mistake. This group says it believes in democracy but the member who says we will have a democratic petition is still fighting the free trade issue.

He ran against it in the election but the party that was in favour of it was elected. That is what democracy is all about.

You submit something to the people from time to time, give them the responsibility of picking their representatives. Then you charge those representatives with the responsibility of making tough decisions, responsible decisions, not being ruled by will-o'-the-wisp popularity at that moment but making the tough decisions which over time make this world a better place for our children, our grandchildren, ourselves, and our parents.

That is what this is about. To change our rules to accommodate the people with lots of money in this country, to give them special control of this place is something I could never, ever support.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton East on his very able presentation and introduction of his motion. As usual his speech was articulate, very carefully worded and most enjoyable. He has a great facility with the tongue.

He obviously wrote well and I congratulate him on that. He chose his words very carefully and I congratulate him on that.

I recognize that the hon. member for Calgary West has pointed out that one of the very important rules of this House is that you are not to read in debate. The purpose is to make speeches extemporaneous. However, there are so many members who choose to read that—

An hon. member: The Prime Minister, too.

Mr. Milliken: The Prime Minister as well. There are members who do choose to read a great deal, and I think it is a matter of some regret. However that is the way it is. Unfortunately we seem to have allowed that rule to fall into desuetude. I suspect that if the rule were in force, our debates would be far more lively.

I think that many of the speeches would be much shorter and we would find that business would be conducted in a speedier fashion. I am sure that would please the government members and it would also give members of the opposition an opportunity to say what is on their minds instead of spouting things they have considered and written down over a prolonged period.

For one reason or another the rule is not enforced. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would want to address that issue in the house management committee of which he is the distinguished chairman, and then maybe something would come of it.

However, that is not the purpose of today's debate. What we are discussing is the proposal of the hon. member for Edmonton East. I must say that while it is an interesting idea, I do not feel that I can agree with it.

What he has done with this proposal is suggest that the members of this House somehow give up their exclusive right to introduce bills to Parliament and have those bills foisted on the House by petition. That is what it really comes down to.

Unfortunately, while that principle in itself may not be objectionable, though I have doubts, I am prepared to concede the point that the mechanism for doing it, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary West, is fraught with difficulty. Specifically, it would exclude smaller provinces from being able to participate in the legislative scheme, as it is drawn. Also, it fails to consider the fact that members of this House are free to introduce bills and have them debated as the hon. member for Edmonton East has done with this motion today.

I think it is very helpful that we can do that.

I wish there were a little more time spent on private members' business. I think there is a need for change in the rules to allow for more time so that when private members' hour is cancelled, as it was yesterday and as it will be tomorrow, that time can be made up at another time, especially when the government benefits by reaping a bonanza of an extra hour of debate on its own legislation when that happens.

That aside, private members' business does provide an opportunity for individual members to introduce these bills and motions and have them discussed in the House. There is no reason in the world why a bill or motion cannot reflect petitions that are presented to us by our electors.

Many members have introduced bills and motions. For some statistics, on Wednesday's Order Paper there were 639 notices of motions introduced in this House during this session. similarly, in the same Order Paper there are over 300 bills of which notice has been given. There were 127 bills introduced in the course of this session which were all private members' bills, all introduced by private members for the purpose of debate and discussion in the House.

That is a sizeable number of bills, especially when you consider that very few of them come from government members. Generally, parliamentary secretaries are not introducing bills. It is done by opposition MPs or by members who are neither in cabinet nor parliamentary secretaries on the other side.

Consider the number of those excluded. I suggest that there is ample opportunity here for the public to have input very directly in the system subject to the statutory requirement that money bills must be introduced by cabinet ministers only because they require the royal recommendation.

My friend from Edmonton East has tried to get around that in a skilful wording of this rule, but I think he recognizes that the rules of the House of Commons cannot change the constitutional requirements. His rule is ineffective in so far as it would require His Excellency to advise that any bill be recommended to the House of Commons. In other words, His Excellency's recommendation is not a forgone conclusion nor could it be.

There is a British precedent, I recognize, for changes which would allow for the royal recommendation to come forward on a bill that has been approved at a certain stage in the House. As I say, there are ways we can look at changing the operation of private members' hour that would allow for more scope for private members and would allow for more time for discussion of private members' business.

The fact is that our rules, in my view, are adequate as presently constituted to allow members of the public to bring forward items they want discussed in so far as those items are legislative changes. That I think is what the hon. member is getting at.

Many of the petitions that come to this House deal with government policy on items that are not the subject of legislation and that may not be legislated for. They may object to the government's policy of appointing somebody to a particular board or commission, and that is not something that is covered by a bill in this House. It can be changed by a bill in this House, but it would be a most unusual step to make such a change.

Similarly, the petitions may deal with bills that are already coming before the House and express opinion one way or the other, such as the GST petitions of which there were so many. I well recall day after day standing and presenting GST petitions, as did members of the New Democratic Party, all in opposition to that bill. The bill was here. It was discussed in the House, albeit for a limited time.

The fact is that petitions are not always ones that call for the introduction of new bills that have to be dealt with.

I find that when I am approached by constituents who want a new bill introduced in the House and discussed, if the bill is one that finds any favour with me at all, I am quite prepared to entertain the idea, have the bill drafted and set it down as one of my bills. I have about a dozen on the Order Paper at the moment.

The hon. member is free to do the same. With 295 members reflecting widely disparate constituencies and having widely different interests, it seems to me it is entirely possible for members of the public to find one member of this House who would be willing to introduce a bill on any given subject as a private members' bill and have it discussed in this place.

I do not think that is overly difficult.

Quite frankly, I think the hon. member in putting forward this motion is perhaps addressing an issue that has not been raised by the public and is not a public issue; that is that the public is somehow deprived of a right to have its grievances addressed in this House.

The weakness I perceive in our procedure, if any, and I think there is one, is that the hon. member is really trying to address the debatability or otherwise of a petition. I think what the hon. member is trying to suggest is that we need to discuss the content of a petition so that the grievance complained of in the petition is aired in this House. There are other ways of doing it. I suspect the hon. member was here earlier today and heard the discussion concerning the use of Standing Order 52, the emergency debate provision and the suggestion that was made by his colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops, and myself.

I know the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Peace River, agreed in large measure with what we said. It was that need to use that rule more often to allow emergency debates to take place, as we are going to do this evening, in a way, on the constitutional matter; to allow the House to deal in a timely way with issues of public importance.

There is natural reluctance on the part of the government to do that because sometimes the issue is one that is cause for embarrassment for the government. If that is the case, the government does not want a public airing or discussion of the issue because it will look bad. Therefore, we have this reluctance on one side and the enthusiasm on the other, perhaps for partisan reasons, nevertheless, because of the importance of airing the discussion or airing the grievance that has arisen in the public mind.

This House could become more relevant if more debates of that kind took place. I think the petition road is too slow. By the time the signatures are gathered on the petitions and brought in here for debate or discussion, the issue may have become moot and of no interest to the general public.

For those reasons, and while I think the hon. member is to be commended for his efforts in drafting this lengthy motion, I think it is ill advised. If it were a votable motion, I would be inclined to vote against it, and I say so with some regret because I recognize the hon. member's great work in preparing this.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to take a few minutes to participate in this debate this afternoon.

I have to say I listened to the hon. member for Edmonton East with great care and as is his usual wont, he gave a very articulate, humorous and convincing argument.

When first I looked at this motion, I was a little struck by it because of my interest in procedure, and thought it was something worthy of pursuit. In spite of the hon. member's compelling arguments and his great rhetoric, having spent a little time on the motion I find it to be, I hesitate to use the word ridiculous, but certainly not one of the more serious presentations that have come before this House of Commons.

I want to spend just a few minutes tonight talking about why I think this kind of motion would be a terrible disaster for us to exercise.

If we look at the beginning of his motion, he lays out two conditions under which petitions would become active items for debate here in this House of Commons. The first is that 3 per cent of Canadians who are eligible to vote, who signed a petition and had that petition presented in this House, would trigger a debate. In the cases of expenditure, 5 per cent of Canadians would be required.

The frightening thing about that is I recently saw a poll from the United States saying that a significant group of people, many more than 3 per cent, believed that Elvis Presley was still alive. Therefore, you can imagine the situation we face in the country. I do not think it would be difficult at all to find 3 per cent of people who believe in anything in this country.

Therefore, here we would be on a regular occasion faced with a debate in the House of Commons on anything from whether Elvis Presley is really dead or alive to who knows what.

My hon. friend argues that this would be a very difficult procedure to organize because it is difficult to get people to sign petitions.

That is not the case. I have to say that I have had some very interesting experiences with petitions and it is for that reason that I do not treat them seriously at all.

When I have received petitions, I have phoned people and I have said to them: "You signed this petition on this particular issue and I want to spend a few moments talking with you about it and its implications". Often they do not remember signing the petition, or once you spend more than about three or four minutes with them, you discover that they really did not know what the implications of that particular issue were.

What we want to create here is an opportunity for that issue to come into the House of Commons and to take up three hours of debate and possibly end up being a law. That would be in an extreme circumstance and I do not want to use an extreme argument to make the case, but it is a possibility because that is what the law provides.

The other thing that I find extremely intriguing about this particular option is the hon. member says: "You may only have one of these every once in a while, a very rare circumstance". I suggest, as my hon. friend from Calgary said a little while ago, that one does not know where these things are going to go when the doors are open. For example, I find it particularly intriguing that what would happen is once you had a petition signed by 3 per cent of the population, or 5 per cent if there is an expenditure, it would be tabled in the House of Commons. It would immediately go to the Chief Electoral Officer. The Chief Electoral Officer, within three weeks, has to report to Parliament.

In three weeks, by the hon. member's own calculations, it is up to the Chief Electoral Officer to verify roughly 530,000, 3 per cent or, in the case of 5 per cent, 880,000 signatures. This is going to create an incredible bureaucracy. This would be a wonderful job creator in the Public Service because what you would need is a huge set of machinery to verify every signature to make sure it is a valid one. Then you would have to turn around and make sure that person was an eligible signer, in other words, they were eligible to vote. Then you would have to cross-reference them to make sure that they did not sign it more than once. My goodness, who knows, you may be faced with two of these petitions in the Chief Electoral Officer's office at the same time.

What do you have to do? You would have to create the employment opportunities to make sure that this happens. It is a wonderful idea for job creation, but I am certain it is not a practical idea in terms of the Canadian public's desire to make sure that government expenditures are curtailed and not increased dramatically, particularly if the public felt it was unnecessary. I think that is a very serious flaw in this particular motion that the hon. member presents to this House.

The other thing I find very fascinating is that in our tradition there is quite a distinction between government and opposition. We have this huge aisle that, for the most part, separates us. We have many traditions and many rules that all respect that distinction. Where does the hon. member wish for this debate to take place? Is it in some special kind of House time? No, it is in government time. It is the government that has been officially and duly elected by the people of Canada to form the government which has to set aside its agenda to provide for a vote or a debate from some 3 per cent of the population. The net result of that is three hours.

Three hours of debate does not sound like much, but it is an entire morning and in some cases it is virtually a whole day. There are several days, Wednesday for example, during which there are a total of six hours of debate. With some other things intervening into it, you would have five, down maybe to four or four and a half hours with Routine Proceedings and so on.

What is the bottom line? With each signed petition which must be debated in this House of Commons, all of a sudden you start seeing that you are looking at a significant amount of government time being taken by something that has nothing to do with the government, the government that was properly elected, and certainly is not part of its agenda.

The other thing that I wanted to reflect on for a couple of minutes was this very novel approach to the idea of the royal prerogative. Under our traditions it is the government that maintains that prerogative. It is the government that goes to the Governor General and seeks the consent, if I can describe it that way, to spend money.

It does it in a very tight balancing act. It says it is going to spend the money here because it is raising it in taxes here and it has constantly a balance of procedures. It has the budget, the estimates, all of which are carefully thought through. We all know how many days and weeks and hours go into the presentation of a budget in this House of Commons. Every group of expenditures is thought through with the greatest of care, because the use of our financial resources that we collect from the taxpayers of Canada is taken so seriously.

Now, all of a sudden, by simply having 5 per cent of Canadians sign a petition, you suddenly have a royal recommendation that comes right out of the blue and is not part of any question of taxation. It is an obligation. I want to read this particular section, it is in proposed 36.4(2):

> —the Minister who is a Member of Parliament designated for this purpose by the Ministry shall seek the recommendation of the Governor General for the Bill or Motion, and thereafter that Minister shall be deemed to be the sponsor of the Bill or mover of the Motion in the House, and shall be responsible for securing a seconder.

The minister does not take into account the question of raising the revenues. There is no responsibility in terms of budgetary balance. It is simply a minister now being instructed to waltz down and get a royal recommendation.

Today we face a deficit problem in this country in which every dollar we are looking to spend on individual programs is a dollar that has to be sought carefully, balanced carefully. All of those considerations have to be taken into account and the net result of this is that we could somehow circumvent all of that.

The other thing I find extremely intriguing is a whole new concept again. We know on our orders, the way they are now, if a bill is not completed by the time of the ending of a session, it dies. This one wants to say it can carry over. It is not a practical solution. It is not a practical idea.

I understand the member's interest in participatory democracy, if I can call it that, but the reality is that this is cumbersome, bureaucratic, expensive and I think totally subverts the whole process that we have in this country of looking after our own expenditures.

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I rise to address this evening the disastrous fishing season in Newfoundland last year that focused attention on the five years of plunder of Grand Banks fish stocks by foreign fleets operating outside the 200-mile economic zone. While Newfoundland trawlers remained alongside, European boats stole over $100 million worth of our groundfish.

The government has been telling the fishing community that nothing could be done about this plundering. That is what it is; it is plundering the nose and tail of the bank because international law has fixed the limit at 200 miles. Nothing can be done about it, it says, until there is an international agreement that extends the adjacent coastal state's fishing zone to the edge of the Continental Shelf.

This opinion in my mind reveals a fundamental lack of understanding of how international fisheries and marine law has developed. I have had 20 years experience in marine and international law and I can say that it differs fundamentally from internal state law in that the unilateral action I am suggesting tonight is recognized as a legitimate means by which law can develop.

I want to give three instances. The first one was the 1948 Truman proclamation whereby the United States laid claim to the sub-sea mineral resources off its continental shelf. In 1970 there was a series of unilateral declarations whereby Iceland extended its fisheries jurisdiction out to 200 miles at a time when the territorial sea was 12 miles.

In the case of Iceland, the International Court of Justice in 1974 recognized the acceptance of preferential rights especially for this coastal state in a situation of "dependency upon coastal fisheries for its livelihood". The situation of Iceland appeared as one of exceptional dependence on its fishery resources.

Then again there is the Canadian precedent in 1977 when Canada decided to take unilateral action—we took it in 1977—to create a 200-mile economic zone of jurisdiction. It is ironic that the need for this action was intensified by the threats of overfishing by Spain and Portugal.

This is not to say, even using those three examples, that all unilateral action is valid in international law. If a state initiates action that is ludicrous and selfish, then it is going to be referred to as piracy and the state will not be able to stand on their ground.

To be legitimate, a unilateral state action must be grounded in an administrative scheme that is in accordance with international law. I submit the three precedents I gave indicate where dependence on the resource is a very relevant issue. It has to be fair.

Another important thing is that the unilateral declaration is not enough unless it is backed up by state enforcement. In other words, the coastal state must assert its sovereignty and be able to do so over the waters in question. I suggest we need to beef up the means to be able to detect, identify, recognize, search, seize, arrest, try and prosecute transgressors.

If the political will is present, Canada can legally under international law unilaterally extend our fishing limit to the edge of the Continental Shelf. Of course any such move has to be accompanied by a global campaign to explain the reason for such action which given the devastating effect of the rampant overfishing outside our 200-mile limit, should not be too difficult.

I will be persistent in promoting this idea until the government gets off its asymmetrical and ineffective approach to overfishing and puts words, thoughts and ideas into serious action.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I must confess to the hon. member opposite that I was expecting him to be discussing the question that he had put in this House on October 22. At least that was what I was prepared for. None of what he mentioned today was mentioned in his question or in the preamble of the question of that day. The central part of his question that day was on job creation and that is what I prepared.

I want to make sure the hon. member understands and ensures his constituents that this overfishing has been of major concern to the Government of Canada. Ambassador Gherson has been working with the European community and various parts of the North Atlantic Fisheries Council. At NAFO we have been working very hard on that.

As well, last month the minister made a major address in London dealing with the very problems that the hon. member is drawing to our attention. He said that unless they start to follow the rules and the suggested limits put down, that unless all members participate, Canada would be forced to try to endeavour to take unilateral action such as the member opposite has outlined.

However, I think the negotiating table must be tried first to make sure we have a reply before we attempt to do what the hon. member opposite is suggesting. I thank him again for bringing this matter to our attention.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, the fisheries industry on the west coast also has problems.

If it were not for changes in the UI legislation which meant that the workers had to put in a full 680 hours to qualify for UI as used to be the case, then there would not be that problem.

It is quite conceivable that the workers in the fishing industry in B.C. could put in a total of 680 hours at a 40-hour week. That is 17 weeks. Often they have to work around the clock if the fish are coming in fast. If the rules were changed so that they got credit for UI on the basis of the number of hours worked, I would not be here today presenting this problem.

In 1990 there was a program that helped them, the Emergency Response Program. It provided employment. More than that, it provided for projects that were beneficial to the industry and to the communities. It helped British Columbia. It helped the people by giving them enough stamps so they qualified for UI.

That program was supported by the fisheries committee this year as something that should be renewed. It was supported by the labour committee where a resolution was passed urging the government to act. In response to questions ministers indicated support for it, but so far the program has not been delivered.

What I am asking is that the government reconsider its position and bring this program in again. Not only does it provide employment for the people who need a little more time to get their UI, but as I say it brought into effect beneficial projects in communities. It helped the industry by developing stream clearing projects. It was something that helped preserve a billion dollar industry that is important to British Columbia and to Canada.

I urge the government to respond positively, to take another look at its decision not to support it this year, and to bring it into effect for this season.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, again I want to acknowledge the hon. member opposite and his dedication to bringing this matter to the attention of the House at this time.

He will recall when members of the fishing industry were down here and asking for us to have a similar program, they likened it to what was happening on the east coast. The Emergency Response Program was what they were alluding to. They felt they should have something similar for British Columbia.

However, we had to point out to them at that time that their circumstances were entirely different from what was happening on the east coast. The east coast had been hampered by ice conditions under which they could not get their gear into the water and then very low catches later on in the summer. Some areas had less than 50 per cent of the previous year's catch.

Within British Columbia the fisheries experienced a period of structural changes. That is what is happening in British Columbia. We are challenged to deal with the technological changes that are taking place in the fisheries. The stocks are certainly on the average of what they have been over the last four or five years; there has certainly not been a shortage of fish.

It is just with the gear changes that have taken place and the number of people who are fishing, they can do it in a much shorter time frame. We have people, as the hon. member has pointed out, who are working very long hours in the fishing plants, almost round the clock and yet only being credited with a single day's work. Whether or not this is the right way to go is something that has to be seriously considered and has been looked at as well. I thank the hon. member for again winging this matter to our attention.

EAST TIMOR

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I am delighted again to stand in the House today regarding a question I put late in 1991 on East Timor. It is not the first time that I have made serious attempts in this House to get an answer to questions regarding the tragic situation as it is in East Timor today.

At that time the Secretary of State for External Affairs had recently announced the suspension of $30 million in aid to Indonesia because of the November 12 massacre at Dili. In addition, all other aid projects were subject to review. The suspended aid is said to comprise new projects which will be put on hold until the minister decides otherwise.

I could be cynical and suggest that the minister will wait until the media goes away before deciding to resume business as usual with Indonesia. We are still waiting for specific details surrounding the suspended aid and what process it must go through before it is either reinstated or cut permanently.

However we do know that the three projects which have been suspended include: (1) a program to train water resource engineers, (2) a program to promote private sector linkages between Canada and Indonesia and (3) a program aimed at helping the Indonesian government modernize its bureaucracy. Although these are hardly the kinds of programs which will rock the Indonesian government to its core, it is encouraging to see that it is not the grassroots kind of aid which goes directly to helping people who are innocent of their government's activities.

The real issue to which I want a response is this: When will this government finally support United Nations Security Council resolutions 384 and 389 which call for the withdrawal of Indonesian troops from East Timor? It is a simple question, yet the government has consistently refused to answer it every time my colleagues or I raise it in this House. There should be no question as to how Canada should be dealing with this situation.

The best word to describe the situation which the people of East Timor have endured since the 1975 invasion and subsequent occupation by Indonesia is holocaust. Up to one-third of the population of East Timor, 200,000 people, have been killed in battle, in concentration camps, or through famine and disease. Yet the Canadian government has ignored the carnage and has ignored the actions of the vast majority of nations in the international community which have outright condemned the actions of Indonesia.

The United Nations has passed resolution after resolution calling for Indonesia to withdraw and for the right of the East Timorese to self-determination, and what has Canada done? It has voted against UN resolutions calling for self-determination. It has lobbied to have the issue removed from the UN agenda. This is unfathomable to me. It is unbelievable. It is an international embarrassment to the Canadian people who are decent and caring and want Canada to help put an end to such slaughter.

Instead of doing what is right, this government has continued to build bigger and bigger trade links with Indonesia to the point that it is now petrified of jeopardizing the precious balance of trade. If the government would listen to the Canadian people, it would know that they do not want the blood of the East Timorese on their conscience.

We have a moral responsibility to end this bloodshed. I would hate to think that the Caanadian government is ignoring the plight of the East Timorese because there is no economic advantage to do otherwise.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs said earlier today that she was pleased that the UN was considering sending an investigative unit to examine the situation in East Timor.

Will she go the extra distance and instruct or advise the Canadian delegation to the UN Human Rights Commission in Geneva to push for Indonesian withdrawal from East Timor?

I ask this on behalf of the East Timorese, on behalf of all caring, thinking Canadians, on behalf of people in other countries who might be helped if this government would stop being hypocritical and inconsistent and live up to its rhetoric on human rights.

Will the minister finally give assurances to the House that Canada will immediately support UN Security Council resolutions 384 and 389 which call for the removal of Indonesian troops?

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. You have been very patient.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, in reply to the member from Nepean on the various questions, I would like to assure the hon. member that the Canadian government has taken action with regard to Indonesia.

I can say that the Secretary of State for External Affairs conveyed Canada's dismay of the shootings during meetings with the Indonesian Foreign Minister in Seoul on November 13, 1991 a few hours after the news of the killing of the East Timorese had come to light.

Canadian concerns were also expressed to the Indonesian authorities by the Canadian ambassador in Djakarta and to the Indonesian ambassador in Canada. These Canadian concerns were also raised during the session of the third committee of the current United Nations General Assembly.

On December 9, 1991, the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced:

1. Canada has suspended the approval of new development projects for Indonesia in the order of $30 million.

2. Canada has decided to give an immediate grant of $150,000 to the International Committee of the Red Cross for humanitarian assistance in East Timor.

3. Canada will take into account the results of the Indonesian commission of inquiry set up to investigate the shootings and the action of the Indonesian government in the context of the current broader aid review.

Canada is encouraged by the interim report of the Indonesian commission of inquiry and the response of the Indonesian government in taking prompt action on a number of the recommendations in the report.

Canada does, however, have serious concerns about the human rights situation in Indonesia and will continue to watch the developments in this area very closely in consultation with like-minded countries in the context of the United Nations.

Canada welcomes the visit of Foreign Minister Alatas in February which will provide an opportunity for further discussions on the human rights situation and the Canadian Development Assistance Program in Indonesia.

RAIL FREIGHT SERVICE

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to return to a question that I raised in this House on November 18 of last year concerning a decision by CN Rail to sell its railway line from Truro to Sydney, Nova Scotia.

At that time, I urged the government, specifically the Minister of Transport, to intervene to block this sale which was causing great uncertainty to all of the major customers and major industrial users all along the line from Truro to Sydney, Nova Scotia.

Unfortunately so far the government has taken no action. Today the Senate committee on transportation and communications has begun three days of public hearings on this issue, which is of vital concern to the economy and to the people of eastern Nova Scotia.

The Senate committee will hear from some of the main customers located along this railway line, customers which together employ some 7,000 people and which constitute the core of the industrial base of the 250 miles of railway line.

The committee will hear from Mr. Tom Hall, the president and general manager of Stora Forest Industries in Point Tupper, which is the largest user of the line on which more than 2,000 people depend in the pulp mill and in the woodlands operation.

The committee will also hear from Sydney Steel Corporation and the Cape Breton Development Corporation, both of which are major users of the line and are pillars of the industrial Cape Breton economy. The committee will also hear from Scott Paper Company of Abercrombie in Pictou county which is another major user of this line.

I do not pretend to anticipate what these witnesses will say in their presentations, but I do know from extensive conversations with senior management at Stora Forest Industries that they are very concerned and that their continued operation depends vitally on a secure rail line service to their plant and that the decision by CN has created great uncertainty, not only to the continued operation of the plant but to further expansion which is vital to the future of the area.

Let me quote one of the witnesses who appeared before this committee today, the minister of transportation and communications of Nova Scotia, the Hon. Ken Stretch, who came up from Halifax to make his point before the committee. The minister of transportation says, and I will simplify the presentation which is an excellent one: "The province of Nova Scotia insists that rail service to Sydney must be maintained. The only way to guarantee that is if the federal government meets its constitutional responsibility to maintain essential rail service. We have some very specific concerns about the viability of a short line operation on this line, which is what CN is proposing to replace this line with".

The decision by CN has caused great concern to all residents and all industrial users in eastern Nova Scotia. In fact, our concern is one of disbelief that CN would actually propose at this time to sell this vital piece of infrastructure and that this government would refuse to exercise its mandate to intervene and prevent this vital piece of infrastructure from being sold off.

To conclude, while the government may try to avoid its responsibility in this matter, it cannot. The land on which the rail line is located is owned by the Government of Canada and it will have to give its approval at some point through an Order in Council if that sale is to go through. Therefore, why not intervene, prevent the sale now and assure the future of this economy.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the government believes that CN must be a fiscally responsible manager in order to remain competitive and ensure financial viability in the transportation marketplace. In this light the Sydney–Truro line has been examined and it has been found that while the line continues to be profitable it is still a light density route.

CN feels that a short line operator can maintain and in all probability enhance the traffic it is currently carrying. CN is not diminishing the importance of the line with this proposal. Indeed, CN recognizes that the continued operation of the line is important precisely because it provides traffic for the main line between Halifax and central Canada.

The more traffic volume that can be generated on the core network, the lower the operating cost. This in turn allows the railway to be more competitive for additional traffic. It is very important to CN that the short line operator selected be one that will continue rail service for existing and hopefully, new customers.

The section process that CN will subject all bidders to has this objective in mind. CN is committed to ensuring that there is the necessary financial capability to undertake the acquisition and operation of the line.

In the hon. member's question of last November, he referred to the confidential nature of the process. The specific content of each bid must be treated confidentially in order to protect the integrity of a competitive bid process. This is standard practice.

CN has been open about the steps in the selection of a buyer and also about the criteria that will be used in each step.

The short line concept offers benefits for shippers and receivers. It is encouraging that the potential of a short line operation for the Truro–Sydney line has drawn a promising level of response. It is an expression of faith in this exciting railway concept and in the promise of Cape Breton.

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, last October 25 I rose in this House to speak of the issue of unfair and unjust salary increases given to presidents and high-ranking officials of Crown corporations and government agencies. At that time I spoke of the $131,250 salary increase given to the president of Canada Post. That was the salary increase on top of the salary that the individual was already receiving.

You could argue that government has the discretion to give whatever salary increase it wishes to this individual. I do not claim that that is so, but even if it were so, it would be unfair if that benefit were accorded to one individual when everyone else's salary has been frozen. That is in fact what happened.

If that is not bad enough, I want to bring to your attention, as I did at that time, the case of a 65-year old widow in my riding who was a rural mail contractor. Her name is Huguette Perrier, 65 years old, a widow who delivered the mail on the rural route. She was unceremoniously dumped by Canada Post after she and her husband—she took over the mail run when her husband died—had been delivering the mail in the community of Dalkeith for a period of 25 years. Do you know why she was dumped, Madam Speaker? Because Canada Post gave the contract to someone else for $1,500 less.

To save $1,500 this person was fired. This person has no job. At the same time, within months, this government was giving a $131,000 increase to the president of Canada Post who already makes a quarter of a million dollars a year in salary. The justification given for all of that by Canada Post boggles the mind.

I have letters here that were written to me by various individuals. I wrote to the minister about this, but of course the minister did not reply other than telling me that he had referred the letter to Canada Post, failing to recognize that under the Financial Administration Act he has the authority to direct the Crown corporation, as the minister does under that act, and as my colleagues all know.

Canada Post says in its letters the following: "I am sure that you will appreciate that Canada Post must operate in a fiscally responsible manner when selecting suppliers and contractors". No one is against motherhood but the facts are different. There is nothing fiscally irresponsible about keeping an employee that has been with you for 25 years when the employee is not even asking for a salary increase. That is just sound, humane management.

Anyone in the private sector who is trying to do what Canada Post is doing would be severely criticized on the floor of the House of Commons if we found out about it. But this is a Crown corporation doing, not what a Crown corporation and agency of the government should be doing, but worse than what any one of us would tolerate from the private sector. That is what is so bad about this.

In closing, I do not object to the fact that when someone has a rural mail contract and the person is asking for an increase, it should be subject to tender in order to get that increase. But when someone wants to merely keep their job at the existing price and they are tendered out and lose their job, well then something is hopelessly wrong.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to what was said by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, and I was surprised he was critical of the salary paid the director general of Canada Post, especially when we realize that from the deficit-ridden corporation it was in 1984, costing taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars, Canada Post has now become a profitable Crown corporation. It takes competent people to do that sort of thing. The current president, Madam Speaker, may not be perfect, but when we came to power in 1984, he was given a mandate to make the Canada Post Corporation a going concern. He fulfilled that mandate, and he did so remarkably well.

Remember, Madam Speaker, when Canada Post was the laughing stock of this country? Postal services were a joke. Everybody was saying that besides paying for the stamps, they had to go to the competition to make sure the mail would be delivered on time.

Madam Speaker, when we appoint people to boards of directors, when we appoint directors to turn a situation around that was bad for the taxpayers and bad in terms of the services offered by Canada Post, we assume these people will have to make decisions that will not always please the customer, considering why they were appointed in the first place.

In this respect, Madam Speaker, if we consider Mr. Landers' salary, it appears to be on a level with remuneration for the same type of work in the private sector. We are not ahead of the private sector in this respect. We are taking its lead. What Canada Post is being asked to do is exactly what other corporations are being asked to do, which is to make a profit. This has been achieved, and we owe Mr. Landers and his team a vote of thanks, and we hope they keep up the good work, for the benefit of Canadians and Quebecers.

SPECIAL DEBATE

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to order adopted on Wednesday, February 5, 1992, the House will continue its proceedings on the adjournment motion, for the sole purpose of allowing members to make presentations on the results of discussions they have had with their constituents on the constitutional issue.

The hon. member for Peterborough has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in these discussions in order that we can communicate to the House of Commons and record in Hansard some of the comments that have been made to us as members of Parliament about the proposed changes to the Constitution and the process which has been implemented to try to make them.

What comes out loud and clear in the letters I have received is that Canada is a relative youngster compared to the nations of Europe. We are celebrating 125 years of nationhood this year, while England, France, Italy, and Greece can measure their ages in thousands of years.

Yet, despite our short history and a small population, Canada and Canadians have achieved much together and have built much of which all of us can be justifiably proud. Canadian men and women have built a society considered to be one of the fairest and freest in the world. Believe it or not, though we are young we are also one of the oldest functioning democracies in the world. We are the eighth largest economy in the world today, and that economic strength has enabled us to develop some of the most advanced social programs of any nation. Indeed, Canada's medicare system is still studied by other countries, including the United States.

Outside of our own country we are considered to be one of the greatest countries in the world, not in terms of our military strength but in terms of who and what we are. In a recent United Nations report which surveyed 160 nations, Canada was the second most desirable country in which to live. Millions of people would do anything to move to Canada and we have long waiting lines at many of our embassies around the world. The dispossessed and people fleeing oppression see Canada as a beacon of hope in an otherwise dimly lit world.

Our society happens to be a model that other nations are keen to emulate. Our tolerance of diversity has enabled Canada to avoid the kind of racial tensions that affect other nations. We are gradually learning how to honour the contribution and special place of our aboriginal people. We are recognized and respected as Canadians, and as a country known as Canada, for the constructive role we play in world affairs. The skills and ideas of Canadians are second to none. The ingenuity of individuals has made Canada a world leader in many fields and I mention but two: transportation and telecommunications.

For example, we were the third nation in the world to put a satellite into space. I might add that Canada continues to maintain a commitment to the search for knowledge through the exploration of space. On January 22, 1992, the second Canadian went into space. Dr. Roberta Bondar from Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, became the first Canadian woman to orbit the earth, returning eight days later following a successful mission.

Canada has once again proven its excellence in the field of scientific research. Just yesterday it was announced that a team of Canadian scientists led by Dr. Robert Korneluk of the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario played a central role in the recent discovery of the gene responsible for myotonic muscular dystrophy, an incurable muscle disease which strikes young adults.

In recent years Canadian scientists have been at the forefront of several major genetic discoveries, including the discovery of a defective gene that causes cystic fibrosis.

Canada's first prime minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, said: "Canada is a great country and shall become one of the greatest in the universe if we preserve it. We shall sink into adversity and insignificance if we suffer it to be broken".

Let us all take up the challenge of Sir John A. Let us all try, as a parliament in particular, to preserve a truly great country.

As a united country we have the seventh largest economy in the world. A divided country would have significantly less economic clout and leverage. Further, as one Canada we have a place at many of the international bargaining tables. For example, Canada is a member of the G-7 economic powers. We are a member of the Council on Security and Co-operation in Europe. We are also a member of NATO and sit at the table of the World Bank.

Both foreign and domestic investors are less likely to invest in Canada if they are uncertain about its political or constitutional future.

International uncertainty also has a direct impact on interest rates, the value of our dollar, and domestic inflation.

The realities of the new global economy are these: competition is fierce and it is getting more so every day; technology and innovation are forcing everyone to adapt more quickly and more often; the new knowledge-based economy demands a higher educated and trained work force; and international capital markets react swiftly to any of these uncertainties.

Over the last few years the government has undertaken many initiatives, often very unpopular ones, to begin the process of modernizing Canada's economy and eliminating the structural barriers to future prosperity.

In the face of continuing change, more needs to be done. However, we can only undertake it by making the fundamental constitutional changes that will ensure Canada's continuing success while at the same time reflecting our national aspirations. The ultimate proposals will not be acceptable unless they provide the means for the federal government to maintain certain national standards in the interests of all Canadians. For example, health care must be accessible to all Canadians and pensions should be portable across the country.

Finally, Parliament and the federal government are the only political institutions in this country that represent all of Canada. Therefore, the federal government must and will play a vigorous role in articulating and defending the vital Canadian interests. We will not be a referee between competing regions or interests in the process.

Within the framework of a strong and united Canada there is a lot of room for constitutional modification. Even with constitutional change we must and will remain a strong and united Canada.

• (1840)

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take advantage of this opportunity tonight to spend a bit of time to reflect on some of the comments that my constituents have had to say about the current debate in Canada about national unity and about our country.

I am pleased to take advantage of this time to talk about two specific initiatives that I have been doing in my own riding, in fact, one particular initiative on this issue which we announced today.

First of all, I think some congratulations are in order for the two House leaders who have arranged for this debate. Obviously, there will be a great deal more debate likely in March when the joint parliamentary committee releases its report and there should be other occasions for this kind of debate.

It is important that all of us from all our different perspectives have the opportunity to report on what we are hearing from our constituents and of course to enumerate and talk about what we see as to how this debate is shaping up.

It is important that all members share with others what they been hearing during this intense and sometimes confusing debate about the future of our country. My constituents are probably like many others. They find in many cases that the debate has gone on much too long.

Perhaps it is time to move quickly to make a decision about Canada, about the nature of our Confederation and of course, to get on to deal with some of the many important economic issues that we have in the country now. In particular, I am thinking of employment in my part of British Columbia, in the Prince George region, about trade, and other issues like those.

They are cognizant of the need obviously to come to grips with the whole constitutional debate and see just what direction Parliament and Canada is going in. In my travels through my riding basically in the last six months or so, I have heard comments from people about the need for a united Canada, a debate about the role of Quebec, a vigorous debate that many of my colleagues from Quebec would expect from western Canada, but a very positive debate as well.

I do not think members from Quebec should necessarily think that everything they see in the news necessarily reflects all the views of people from western Canada. I suppose most are trying to find a way to make Canada a better place and I, for one, think it is a better place with Quebec in Confederation.

We have debated and in my various community meetings we have talked about the Senate. We really need the Senate. Can it really reflect the regions as it is supposed to do? I find interesting just as a side-note that many of those who are promoting the Senate, having an elected Senate, the so-called Triple-E Senate, are often the same people who want to cut government programs. Yet here we are trying to create a whole new level of government.

My own party, as you know, has long been a supporter of the position to abolish the Senate, that we do not need it. That policy of course, in light of the debate today has taken on a new approach and a new look. We are not hard and fast. I do not know if anybody can be that way these days, to see what kind of suggestions Canadians have about what the Senate should be and do.

My constituents are also particularly interested and concerned about seeing a resolution as quickly as possible on the whole question of aboriginal self-government. I think that is an important and a critical issue and one that I hope will be dealt with. It must be dealt with in this so-called round, this Canada round.

We have all been doing our part. All members of Parliament in a manner of ways have been adding to this debate from their own particular points of view. I have held my own community meetings. People have come to those meetings to discuss what is going on with the constitutional debate.

I was even pleased, some say brave, to have the hon. member for Chambly come to a public meeting in Prince George to discuss from his perspective the role of Quebec in Confederation. We had a good discussion with that member and I was quite pleased that he was able to come and discuss his vision of Canada.

I am also pleased to get the information out to people. One of the things that I found really frightening after the collapse of the Meech Lake accord was really how little information there was around about our country's own Constitution. While the government could spend some $14 million advertising the goods and services tax, you had to look pretty far to find out exactly what the Constitution of the country was all about.

That effort has been made this time around. The lesson was obviously learned. More information has to be sent out to Canadians about the constitutional debate. I have made an effort in my area for anyone who is interested. I welcome anyone who is watching tonight who might be interested to write to me.

My office sends out monthly a detailed package of comments from all points of view on the whole debate. Not just comments from the New Democratic Party leader, the hon. member for Yukon, but also speeches from the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, columns and debates from people representing a sovereignist point of view in Quebec so that, at the very least, people in my area will have the information to make a valued judgment about this particular debate.

In fact the results are showing by the very articulate and thoughtful letters I have been receiving from people who have been reading through this information. Some very excellent comments have been made on the Senate, on referenda and it is adding to the debate.

I encourage other members where they can to do that. There is no harm in spreading information about what all of us are saying. Of course, I welcome anybody who is watching to write to me. I would be pleased to put them on that particular list.

The other initiative I mentioned at the start of my comments is that we have made an announcement today in my riding for Prince George—Bulkley Valley. I have asked students at the college in Prince George, the college at New Caledonia to volunteer to put together a constitutional forum.

They will be breaking into teams to represent and present the pros and cons and the different arguments around the government's proposals. This will not be just a sell job for the government's proposals. We want to hear what people's opinions are on all sides of the debate, of the different components of this particular package and indeed, some of the components that are not mentioned.

We have scheduled the forum for February 29, a Saturday. It will go all day and it is open to the public to hear the debate from students and to participate as well. I will be ensuring that a record of all the discussions and comments is made and that it will be passed on to the Prime Minister, the premiers and all members of this House and the Senate.

It is important that we have a user-friendly approach to this debate so that people do have an opportunity to have their input.

Of course, the timing will probably be good. The report from the joint committee will be out the day before. There will be plenty to talk about. Of course, this whole debate about our Constitution does not just end on February 28. Nor does it end on Canada Day, nor I hope does it end in October of this year. Obviously, the debate about our country and the Constitution of Canada will probably go on forever.

If there is any one message we have to get across to all Canadians it is that the debate about our country is not just a debate about words on paper. It has to be a debate about what Canada means and what we have to do is to frame that debate so that all Canadians can feel they can participate.

Again, I want to congratulate all members of the House for having organized this debate. It will be an important one. I will be listening and watching carefully.

• (1850)

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to discuss what is probably the most important issue facing Canada today. Even as I say that, I am extremely conscious of the fact that both our economic difficulties and the constitutional issue must be given an equal amount of attention during the course of the next few months.

In many ways, as I will refer to later in my comments, those two issues are very closely intertwined. It goes without saying that those we would like to attract to our country to provide us with investment dollars, those we would like to join with us in trading relationships want to know before they do so what is to be the future of Canada.

The issue which is before us is very difficult, very complicated and very emotional. I think the fact that it is so emotional makes it even more difficult.

By way of a preview, I would like this evening to try to articulate to the House some of the comments which I have received from constituents in conversations, correspondence and telephone calls, as a result of meetings which I have had in high schools within my constituency, as a result of conversations on the street, in my office, and as a result of public meetings in certain towns.

With reference to the latter, one of the most notable and I think most productive events with which I have been associated for a period of time was a visit to Hartney, which is in the heart of my constituency by the Hon. Jean Charest, Minister of the Environment. He came at the invitation of the community on an evening when it was approximately 30 degrees below zero. He spoke to some 250 people that evening and in my opinion he was exceedingly well received. There was a good opportunity for questions, for answers and for an exchange of views. It is the type of visit which should occur more frequently in the future.

It is important for members to come to us from the province of Quebec and it is important for members from western Canada to go to the province of Quebec if we are to achieve the kind of understanding which we are seeking.

Almost without exception the people whom I speak to in my constituency want Canada to remain united. They say that first and foremost and sometimes with varying degrees of emotion. They are proud of Canada and they know that they have had very significant privileges in terms of living in Canada. They want that Canada to continue to exist.

However, having said that, many of my constituents then express some frustration, frustration with the fact that first of all many of them do not understand why there is such a debate today. I suppose they feel that way in part because they like what they see in Canada and they assume that others should feel the same way. I think that is particularly true of those who were not born here but who have migrated here.

Second, many of them are frustrated with the fact that this debate in which we are now participating seems to have been occurring over and over again throughout recent memory. They are frustrated with our inability to resolve that debate. Quite frankly, many of them are impatient with the process, and as the previous speaker has just said, they are exceedingly anxious that we reach a solution to our problems.

Some concerns are more specific than that. Some have a great deal of difficulty, Madam Speaker, as I think you would understand, with some of the language we have used during the course of the debate. If I were able to go back and choose our words differently than we have done in the past, I would wish that we could find two different words other than the words "distinct society", because those two words in particular have caused in my mind a considerable amount of misunderstanding throughout the land. I think in part that this is so because the word "distinct" in my mind in English means something different than it does in French.

To me, the word "distinct" implies difference. I have no difficulty as a Canadian and certainly as an historian in proving to my satisfaction and I hope often to others that there are very significant differences that have been a part of our history, differences which continue today. I think, for example, of the differences which exist with the Civil Code in the province of Quebec as established by the Quebec Act of 1774; I think of the differences in land forms as with seigneurialism as established in 1774, I think of the rights given to the French language in the courts and in the legislature as subsequently developed after 1791. In my mind, these differences which exist are a product of our history.

But perhaps to our shame many Canadians do not know our history, and certainly the history of all of our regions as well as I would wish that they do. Part of the difficulty we have when we come to the debate is, as many of my constituents say, "I want to keep Canada together, I want it to remain as it has been in the past, but I am exceedingly anxious that it be a Canada in which all are treated equitably and equally".

One of the difficulties with the proposals which we have before us is that they raise in some people's minds a suspicion that the Canada that would emerge would not be one which treats all equally and equitably. I think that is perhaps the most difficult task that is before us now. If I could find one magic solution which would help with the level of understanding which exists in my constituency, it would be the ability to demonstrate to all that the proposals we have before us are designed to recognize and to reaffirm certain differences which have existed in the past, but that they do not propose to give special advantages to anyone in the future.

I have constituents who are concerned with respect to the debate between what they perceive to be collective rights and individual rights as protected under the charter. I have constituents who are concerned about the proposal for self-government for aboriginals because they do not understand exactly what we propose when we say that.

But it seems to me the lesson that comes through in all of this is that our task in 1992 and perhaps in 1993, or whenever this debate should end, is to listen more carefully to others than we have been doing in the past. We live in a very busy world. Canada exists in many ways in spite of its geography rather than because of it. There is an immense barrier created by distance within our land. One of the sadnesses of that is the fact that it is very difficult for many of us living in our regions to know those who live in other regions very well.

The task before us in 1992, and I hope as a by-product of this debate and the ensuing debates and discussions that will take place during the course of the summer, is that we will seize upon the opportunity whenever it arises to listen carefully so that we can understand exactly what others are saying. Unfortunately this lack of understanding has troubled us immensely. In my part of the world people ask and continue to ask that often repeated question which I know the residents of Quebec no longer want to hear. What does Quebec want?

When I have had occasion to visit the province of Quebec and to speak with residents, they say in return: "Exactly what is the opinion in the west that makes some people there feel as they do toward us?"

Sometimes I feel that we simply have failed to learn to know each other very well. We have failed to learn to understand each other. What is required is that people in different regions should sit down and listen as carefully as they can to what is being said. For example, after the right hon. Joe Clark spoke at a meeting in Brandon, a constituent came to me and said, with some sadness in his voice, that it was a wonderful speech, he thought he understood the proposals much better than he had before, but he said: "I do not think we can give Parizeau and the Parti Québecois what they want; I do not think we can give the separatists what they want".

In return, I said to him that I thought that was a very important statement on his part because it demonstrated that there was still a lack of understanding in the sense that we are not trying to give the separatists what they want. Because, Madam Speaker, I think you would agree that there are some in each of our regions who are not anxious to find a solution. They are not anxious that we should find a consensus upon which we can build.

Our task is to find some sort of middle ground. That is what these proposals are all about. I think it is what my constituents would want us to do and what they believe we can do, find the middle ground so that we can build in the future the same way we built in the past. Then we could have a united Canada of which we are all proud and where people are able to grow and enjoy the benefits while, at the same time being satisfied that the needs of a broad majority of Canadians are being met.

Our task is to listen more carefully during the next few months than we have ever done before. I am convinced if we can do that we can resolve our differences and can ensure that our children and our grandchildren have the opportunities to live in the same united Canada that many of us, regretfully perhaps, have all too often taken for granted.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to discuss at some length the constitutional issues that face this country.

On November 7 the special joint committee on a renewed Canada was scheduled to hold hearings in Thunder Bay. Unfortunately, on July 6 the committee was recalled to Ottawa where they restructured themselves. As a result, the riding I represent, Thunder Bay—Nipigon, was not given the opportunity to make its representations to the special joint committee. We had already established some groups that were interested in making those submissions. As a result, on December 9 we undertook in our riding to hold those hearings. They were held on that particular day through the courtesy and through the help of the Thunder Bay Multicultural Association which kindly donated its hall. We had 31 individuals and groups who presented their thoughts on the future of this Canada of ours. We had people who were able to translate into French, Ukrainian, Polish, Finnish, Russian, Italian and Portuguese; all provided these services voluntarily.

At the hearings that day the people who were involved in making the presentations developed a synthesis or a summary of what we heard during those 13 hours of hearings and I would like to present those findings to the House. I think I can summarize and break it down into four areas.

We talked at some length, as you would guess, about the distinct society, the linguistic issues that face us in this country, multiculturalism and a general catch-all of other issues that some people were concerned about. Let me start out by giving you the consensus and a summary of the briefs that we heard that day. First, Shaping Canada's Future Together, the document from which all the groups worked, the consensus was that the document itself added confusion to the debate. Terms that were used in that document were not defined properly. The document was complicated and if most Canadians are to understand it, it should be simplified and out of that came the consensus that there were too many demands for community rights and the Constitution should give greater emphasis to individual rights.

There was also a consensus that the present government has no mandate for Canadians to change the Constitution unilaterally and therefore a national referendum is mandatory before any change is made to the present Constitution. We then went to the linguistic duality issue, bilingualism in Canada. In 31 presentations there were those who thought that Canada should have only one language and those who supported to the fullest extent the official bilingualism policy of our country.

If there was one consensus, particularly from students, it was that all Canadians should learn more than one language but it should not be a forced situation. It is well known that the vast majority of Canadians want a review, not only of bilingualism but of the applications of bilingualism.

I thought these were very interesting comments with respect to the distinct society. We come from the centre of Canada where the east ends and the west begins. The consensus we heard is that Quebec is already distinct because of its language, culture and civil code. These areas should always be retained. Any additional powers must be given to all provinces.

My friend John Wreszchak of the Polish Society of Thunder Bay made an interesting comment. He said: "Canada has blossomed because Quebec is distinct. Quebec has something we should all be jealous of".

The students of St. Ignatius High School said: "Canada will not survive without Quebec. Quebec needs to preserve its right to be different".

The students of Hillcrest High School said: "We feel that giving Quebec control over their cultural rights is a good idea, but further special powers are unacceptable".

Sam Frederico, president of the Italian Society of Thunder Bay, said: "We are all distinct societies. We all have our birthright, customs, religion, language, which are the makeup of our various cultures and heritage. This is the miracle we call Canada".

Those were some general comments on the distinct society clause.

Quebec's distinctiveness should be recognized. The citizens of Quebec are different because of their language, customs and heritage. They have the right to these customs. If they feel insecure and want these rights enshrined in the Constitution, there should be no doubt that they should be enshrined.

Those are interesting comments from the people in the centre of Canada about the distinct society clause we have heard so much about.

There was an interesting consensus with respect to multiculturalism. More than one-third of Canada's population today is a direct result of people who chose Canada as their home and have become Canadian citizens. Many have retained their culture and their heritage, but first and foremost they are all Canadians and immensely proud to be Canadians. Canada is now their homeland. Everything else is secondary.

One comment was: "Immigrants must make the culture of their homeland secondary and multiculturalism should not be enshrined. We grew up in a multinational country and all it created was jealousy and racism. People came here not to stay what they were. They came to Canada to become Canadians".

The students of Hillcrest High School said: "We feel that multiculturalism must take place within the framework of being Canadian. The country would be more united if we were all Canadian first, followed by our nationality of descent. Different cultures should have the right to retain their customs but they should be Canadian first".

John Wreszckak said: "Canada is a family. The parents should treat all members of the family equally for the family to thrive. If one child is favoured the family becomes dysfunctional and it turns against itself".

Glen Bagdon, a member of the Lithuanian community said: "Coming to Canada was a test of one's faith. We hoped for better days and hoped one day we would become Canadian. We kept our customs but we were Canadian first". They go on and on.

Rita Ubriaco, another participant, said: "We all have various cultures but in Canada, as in many other countries, we have the British tradition—parliamentary democracy and the rule of law—and that is why we came to Canada".

There were other constitutional issues discussed concerning other rights. We heard that property rights should be enshrined in the Constitution.

• (1910)

Many of our citizens, especially our seniors, who made representations that day said that the health care system is in jeopardy and the separation of a province from Canada would further jeopardize the delivery of our health care system. They said that the Senate is not effective in its present form, yet not enough information is available for its restructuring. Free trade should be implemented between all provinces. Elected members of Parliament should express the views of their constituents first and foremost. There should be more free votes in the House of Commons. If individual rights are enshrined the Constitution does not need a social charter.

Those were the topics that were discussed throughout the day. If I could summarize with one comment, which is at the bottom of the submission: Canadians must succeed. We need a strong federal government and we need a strong united Canada. Our Canada includes Quebec.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Madam Speaker, this is a valuable debate. It is an unusual debate because it is one that focuses entirely upon what we are hearing from our constituents on the subject of the Constitution and what we ourselves, as members of Parliament, are prepared to do; we who will be charged over the next few weeks and months with shaping that new Constitution.

Like my colleagues, I have had a series of meetings in my constituency on these subjects and have been conducting surveys of my constituents. I will very briefly summarize what I have been hearing.

My constituents rank Senate reform as their highest priority. In the 10 years of its existence, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms has become very important to my constituents. In fact, they were not supportive of the ability of governments to override the charter using the notwithstanding clause. At the same time, most of them indicated that they did not want to see the charter extended, except perhaps to include an environmental rights clause.

The majority of respondents to my queries would like to see the process for public involvement in constitutional amendments strengthened, primarily through referenda and public hearings.

Many of my correspondents do not think that multiculturalism should be reflected in the Constitution as a principle of our society. Those same constituents were not aware that multiculturalism is now reflected in our Constitution as a principle of our society.

The concerns of aboriginal peoples were a high priority for my constituents, while they seemed to be split on the question of which jurisdiction should have control over language policy.

Finally, my constituents indicate to me that a strong federal government that can ensure Canada's international competitiveness and is able to set national standards but has strong regional representation is important to them.

It is my understanding that throughout our country many citizens' committees, many constituent assemblies have been set up to study the 28 proposals, comment on them and analyse them, and that representatives of those committees will be attending the joint committee on Canada's renewal next Monday. That is a laudable move and I look forward to meeting with some of the people who will be coming to make their presentations. Some that I am aware of, and I know there are many others, are those from Sarnia—Lambton, York—Simcoe and Selkirk.

I think the joint committee is doing a great service to the process. I am delighted to see that it is proceeding without rancour in a spirit of multi-partisanship and attempting to do the best it can for Canada. It has a phenomenal chore in front of it. It is worth noting that these 30 individuals, members of the House of Commons and the Senate from all parties, are spending as much as 90 hours to 100 hours a week on their task. They are conducting hearings five days a week and are conscientiously attending the five constitutional conferences which are being held on the weekends.

It is a privilege to have played some role in this process, having had the challenge of co-chairing the previous joint committee on the constitutional amending process.

What we recommended in our report on June 20, 1991 was an open process. I am delighted that the process has been opened as it has. I am also pleased to note the role that Albertans are playing in the process. Canadians from all parts of the country are, but notably in Calgary we had an Alberta minister who is responsible for the dossier. We also had a former premier of our province co-chairing the conference sponsored by the Canada West Foundation.

The value of these conferences when the history of the time is written will be remarkable because they have brought a focus to the debate that may have been lacking before. The Calgary conference in particular, dealing with the council of the federation, rejected that idea overwhelmingly.

It approved, not surprisingly, an elected, effective and almost equal Senate; but it tossed us a curve as well. It said that there must be a voice for the voiceless in that Senate. It is an interesting challenge to think of a Senate which is territorial in its representation but which will have supplemental representation from aboriginals obviously, as was recommended in the government proposals, and perhaps from others. It will be a tremendous challenge to see how those others get selected.

Perhaps we could examine the Athenian model of actually choosing them by lottery. After all, some of the greatest contributions at the weekend conferences are being made by the lottery people, people who had indicated an interest in the process, ordinary Canadians who were chosen by lottery.

I mentioned that I had a number of public meetings on the subject. Following one of those meetings, a constituent of mine born in Holland, a Canadian citizen for many years, approached me and said: "Jim, I did not want to raise this during the meeting, but why should we give Quebec a distinct society?" My response was: "We should give them a distinct society for just the same reason that they should give us the Rocky Mountains". He said: "We have already got the Rocky Mountains". I said: "That is my point, George".

The second point he made was: "Why do we spend so much money on bilingualism?" I said: "You are from Holland. The Dutch spent a lot of money in turning back the sea. The Dutch could have walked away from that and gone to high ground and become Germans, but they didn't do so. What they did was they decided to fight back the sea and developed special national character traits as a result of that".

We have developed special character traits as a result of having a two language policy. We have developed the skill of compromise and accommodation and understanding the other person.

That brings me to my final point, which is that we must go beyond tolerance. We can tolerate black flies and mosquitoes. We can tolerate boils. We do not particularly like them, but in order to move genuinely from tolerance to mutual respect we have to get to know the other individual. As my colleague from Brandon—Souris said: "We truly do not know each other". We are a multitude of solitudes in this country.

We need as well to covenant with each other. Professor Donald Bailey of the University of Winnipeg was a witness before the previous joint committee on March 27 last year in Winnipeg. He said that what we are talking about is a contract in our Constitution. We ought to be talking about a covenant. In covenants the emphasis is on optimums, not minimums. The obligation is to seek ways of giving mutual sustenance as long as the other party has need, not only until the legal terms of the written agreement have been satisfied.

Beyond the covenant I think we ought to be grateful. The greatest gift according to Steindl–Rost is thanksgiving. In giving gifts we give what we can spare and in giving thanks we give ourselves. One who says thank you to another really says: "We belong together, giver and thanksgiver belong together". Let us be givers and thanksgivers as we go through this difficult process so that we may deserve to remain one united country.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to have the opportunity to stand in the House tonight to participate in this demonstration of the desire of Canadians to be part of this constitutional debate.

I was certainly pleased as all members of the House were when the agreement was reached to allow this opportunity for us to put before the House and before the Canadian people—and when I say that I mean all Canadians—the views of those people we represent. I say that they want to be part of this debate and they really deserve to be a big part of it since it is their Constitution we are dealing with.

In this respect I hosted two town hall meetings back in mid–November. They were very well attended. I again want to congratulate the people in Prince Edward—Hastings for their attendance. I have to admit I was very surprised at the number that did turn out. One particular meeting of those two was on a Friday night in a small town. I said to some of my staff as we went to that town: "If we have 20 or 25 people out tonight I will be very pleased". We had 78 people. One might say that is not a lot of people, but in a small town of less than 1,000 people that is a considerable number.

The only disappointment I did have was that I would liked to have had more young people at both of the meetings, more people of a younger age, so that we could have had more input from them. However those were the people who chose to come to the meeting.

At the meeting I did not offer any of my personal comments or interpretations, but we went over each of the 28 points of the constitutional proposal and asked them to fill out a questionnaire which they had received on arrival so that if they did not wish to speak they could express their views. We tabulated those at the end.

Before I am finished I am going to run through those conclusions quickly. They may not necessarily be my own personal conclusions, but they are the conclusions of those who attended those meetings and asked me to bring their views forward. I can say as well that I have received dozens, hundreds, more than that, of telephone calls and letters. I am certainly impressed as all members are with some of the letters that are many typewritten pages long. That is indicative of the concern of many people of the constitutional debate we are going through at the present time.

I had the meetings in the way I did because I did not want to speak at them. By that I mean I wanted to hear what the constituents of Prince Edward—Hastings had to say. I can tell the House and all Canadians—and I am not tooting my own horn—that that is what many Canadians want from us as members of Parliament. If nothing more, they want us to listen and to pass that on. Again I appreciate that opportunity here tonight. They had many concerns and they had many questions. They want their feelings and representations considered in this important national debate.

As I say, I have received many letters. I have responded to those to the best of my ability. I have extended as much information to those people as I possibly could and I know they have appreciated it.

It may not be a surprise—and I am sure it is not—to those in the House and to those who are watching that the public has grown very cynical of elected politicians. Many times it has fallen upon myself and others here to field criticism and objection over our behaviour in the House. I have to admit that too often I had to agree with them. With an effort such as holding the town hall meetings I had an opportunity not to lecture, but to hear my constituents.

I may not use all my 10 minutes. I want to table these and it is my understanding that we can table them with the Clerk tonight. I would ask to do that when I am finished. I have forwarded them to the joint committee and have had letters of acceptance and recognition. I appreciate that as well.

I am going to go through the conclusions quickly. I want to say from the outset that I am not making excuses. I do not necessarily agree with all of them. I may agree to different degrees with some of them. I can say that I know there are likely people in the House and people watching tonight who will be shocked and not be very happy with some of them, but the point of this session tonight is to hear what Canadians have to say.

The proposal on property rights is supported but considered too vague. These are referring to the 28 proposals. Although the override or notwithstanding clause was the object of considerable discussion by the participants, the consensus was that implementation should require a 60 per cent vote of Parliament or legislatures rather than a simple majority.

The distinct society is opposed by the majority along with any special status for Quebec. Aboriginal claims have the support of the majority but with some concerns about self-government and the period proposed to finalize any agreements. The Canada clause is favoured except for the items requiring governments to preserve language rights and Quebec's role in preserving and promoting distinct society.

People want more voice in government and more responsiveness from MPs. An elected Senate with regional representation gaining favour is supported with the Senate having significant powers. A majority opposed concurrent election of the Senate with the House of Commons. The proposed composition of the Supreme Court was not supported by the majority. Consensus on an amending formula for the Constitution favoured approval by two-thirds of the provinces and a referendum with a double majority. Unanimous approval and veto by any government or group was strongly opposed.

A majority approved the free movement of people, goods, services and capital, but the support for exclusive authority to lie with the federal government was marginal. Marginal opposition was expressed against opting out provisions. The harmonization of economic policies did not receive majority support. Questions respecting distribution of government powers were not strongly supported except for the strong opposition to the delegation to the provinces of responsibility for immigration and culture.

There was no significant opposition to eliminating the federal declaratory power. In general, people favour a strong central government. There is strong opposition to delegating powers to provinces unevenly. There is equal support and opposition concerning federal introduction of cost-shared programs in provincial jurisdiction but strong opposition to any opting out of such programs.

There was extremely strong opposition to the council of Confederation. Many commented that there was already too much government.

I read those into the record and I repeat, I do not necessarily agree with all of them. Some of them I do agree with, some of them I do not. We do not have the time for me to discuss that and to put my views forward tonight.

However, I would like to agree with the previous speaker. We know—and if we do not, we have our heads hidden in the sand—these feelings and these concerns are out there. As I said at the start, some of these are very strong statements. I am sure there are members in the House tonight who will say: "There is part of the problem". We have to be realistic. Those are the views of some Canadians.

Let us hope and pray for the spirit of compromise, the spirit of understanding and the spirit of respect which I think is gaining ground. These meetings took place in mid-November. I was pleased with some who attended those meetings. When I saw them there I thought: Here are some very strong-minded, strong-willed, strong-thinking people. At the conclusion of the meeting they thanked me for having it and said: "Lyle, I feel and think differently now than I did three hours ago".

I stress and urge all Canadians to attend any of these meetings, view all of these things, and go forward as we all need to and should in the spirit of compromise, understanding and respect for all other Canadians so that we can keep it together. Together we stand and divided—I don't know what the answer is and I don't really think it would be a good one.

• (1930)

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, I would like to begin my comments this evening by indicating that I have the most common culture as a Canadian sharing something with you tonight. I have the common cold.

So if I sound a little bit gruff and a little harsh it is very systemic and very Canadian to have one of those at this time of the year, unless you are among the more fortunate and go to Florida for the winter. But I don't consider them quite as Canadian as we who stay here and work throughout the entire year and maybe play at Canada throughout the entire year. But a vacation is nice sometimes and sometimes I am envious that I do not take more of them in the nice south in the wintertime.

Although I am an elected member of Parliament I do not wish to speak on this subject so much as a member of Parliament, but as a Canadian and as a son of an immigrant who came to this country from Europe in 1929, and he thought for ever and a day that he was coming to one country, Canada.

So many other people who came to this country and made this country a strong, powerful nation, who built this country up into a modern society, they came to every province, they came to the east coast, they came in the earlier part mostly from Europe.

They came to the west in droves after the turn of the century and built up the west. They came to a Canada that they had read about as a promised land, as a place where they could make a living, raise a family and be away from the crowds and the disparity that occurred in some of the countries they lived in.

After 125 years, which we are now going to celebrate as a country, so many of these immigrants—and I am not talking about the founding nations so much in my report, although they also were very instrumental in putting this country together, knitting it together and creating the provinces—I am talking about my own particular family, where my father and mother came here in 1928 and they worked hard and they prospered and they raised a family which now lives in the province you are from, Madam Speaker, in your own constituency. I have a brother working and raising a family there—to the coast of British Columbia where I have a brother working.

We sons of immigrants grew up in this country because we were proud of it. It offered us opportunities. It offered us opportunities because it was diverse, it was large, it was rich, and it had many, many people with the desire to work hard and take that risk and leave home and start a new life.

My father celebrated his 90th birthday two weeks ago, and he is still quite strong and able, a little wrinkled maybe. He made a speech about this country and how danged foolish we would be to even think of dividing it. He worked hard and he is still living, together with my mom, and as they get older they cannot perceive of this country being divided.

When you consider the hundreds of thousands of people who came to Canada, whether it was to Newfoundland, whether it was the province you are from, Madam Speaker, not coming from Quebec, but coming in fact from other places to start their lives there and having their offspring, their sons and daughters, moving from wherever in Canada, in some cases back to Quebec and adopting that province as their home province with its uniqueness and with its marvellous people, we have to ask the question: Where did this all begin, this desire to make our country two instead of one?

I blame the politicians. I believe it was politically driven, both from outside of Quebec and inside of Quebec. It was not so much from the grassroots. Who wants to divide this nation up? I believe it was politically driven and I believe we have to nip that in the bud right now.

The country, with successive Prime Ministers set about trying to find a way of accommodating that particular problem, as well as others we now face in western Canada of some alienation. I think they have a set of proposals of which I believe all will not be accepted. But there are enough good ones there that we collectively as a country can even become stronger.

The idea of electing a Senate is a terrific idea. I was just down in the United States in Washington and a senator told us that was the right way to go. He said that it would give our Senate some respect. I agree with that.

This appointment of senators is not what we should be doing. It was an old tradition that we brought back from England. Let us elect the senators, it makes sense. Let them be responsible to an electorate. I agree with that. Whether we will end up with a Triple-E or a one-and-a-half-E or a two-E, but I think we should have two Houses and I think that is the way we should govern ourselves. Let us decide collectively to do something like that.

I wonder why we are not sometimes looking at changing this House a little bit and making it more effective. Why do we have to go to the electorate whenever the Prime Minister calls an election as opposed to maybe setting an election day every four years or five years? Maybe we could avoid some costly elections.

We may have some minority governments, we may have governments lose power, but why call an election, why not have the Governor General find a new government that would form with some other coalition? That does happen in other countries and it is really worth considering in my view.

Let us set the date. We all know when it will be coming. We cannot tamper around a lot with the dates as we are now. I wonder if that should not also be considered.

You hear a lot of people talk about why we should stick together. The best reason I can think of, as some I heard this evening and I am sure we are going to hear, it is the young people, it is the children, it is the next generation. Are we going to leave them a divided Canada?

Are the immigrants who came to this country, who wanted a strong nation, going to have to tell them we could not keep the place together when so many others are trying to do so, when so many countries are trying to find common ground, common markets, common currencies because it really is a way of expressing strength and peaceful co-existence. We do have a new world order, there is no doubt about it.

I am going to end on one more area that will keep this country strong, I believe, from coast to coast, and that is the economy. If we do not work on our economy, there may be more and more reason to say that this country is not working because of our differences and because the politicians have not worked in trying to give us a better standard of living.

Without a strong economy, we will find dissension always in this country. We do go through recessions from time to time. They will not stop because we may change governments. I think we have to harness them or at least adjust to them so that they do not become so deep, creating so much unemployment that in fact it creates nothing but dissension.

We have a great opportunity in this land. This country, I believe, is still regarded as the second best place in the world, if we follow the United Nations position on it.

I submit to you, Madam Speaker, that if we divide this nation, we will not be the second best place in the world; we might be the fifty-second or the seventy-seventh or whatever number, because people will see we have lost a great opportunity.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to rise in the House during this special debate on the federal proposals. After listening to the speeches we have had so far, I must say I am disappointed in the level of this debate. It sounds more like a series of open-line shows than a serious debate, when in a matter of only a few weeks or months the final proposals on the constitutional future of this country are to be submitted to Quebec.

I listened more or less attentively to speeches similar to those made in 1980, with their references to this great and beautiful country of ours and their promises of major changes. Twelve years later, Madam Speaker, such speeches are no longer appropriate. In February 1992, they seem rather irrelevant. After all, when the House meets to discuss national unity, it cannot, in the process, ignore the Quebec question.

Quebec is the only reason national unity is a problem for the rest of Canada. This evening I heard about solutions to all kinds of problems, but no concrete proposals for meeting Quebec's aspirations. I realize now why, after the Quebec round, people wanted to drop the word Quebec and call this the Canada round.

After Meech Lake and the lack of generosity shown at the time by the rest of Canada, they now want to confuse the issue and dilute Quebec's aspirations in this vast, 28-proposal plan. However, Madam Speaker, in the end it always comes down to the co-existence of two founding peoples, and whether, in this institution and in this country, there is any possibility they would be able to get along and prosper together.

Madam Speaker, after Meech Lake, English Canada caught a new virus. It was afflicted with acute consultation, and for a year or rather 18 months after the demise of Meech Lake, we have seen a series of more or less useless consultations. Some were more useless than others, and we all remember the Spicer commission. We had the Beaudoin-Edwards committee, the Castonguay-Dobbie commission now Beaudoin-Dobbie and we have had a series of conferences. Basically, the process is still going on. Unfortunately, we have become so obsessed by the process that we have forgotten the purpose, Madam Speaker. We are so intent on pleasing everyone and his dog that we have lost sight of the fundamental issues.

Consequently, when we as sovereignists listen to what is going on across the country and we see how the country is getting bogged down as a result, we can only predict that the process is doomed to fail. Madam Speaker, during the past few weeks, a series of conferences has rejected the federal proposals, one after another.

At the Halifax conference, for instance, the whole division of powers package was rejected out of hand. They opened the dictionary and came up with a new concept. To avoid the words "special status" they called it asymmetry, to confuse Canadians even more. Our pseudo-intellectuals thought they could sell this concept to the rest of the country. However, we have already had a reaction from Clyde Wells, one of the people who killed Meech Lake, and who saw through the mist of rhetoric and said that asymmetry was unacceptable in his Canada.

Madam Speaker, at the conference in Calgary, people also rejected most of the institutional reforms proposed by the government. As for the conference in Montreal, it might as well have been called off before it started, because all the proposals for economic union had already been rejected by members of the government. However, the charade goes on, Madam Speaker, and I predict that the Beaudoin-Dobbie report will be a carbon copy of the Charest report. The truth is, we have the same people around the table, the same parties with the same programs.

After the demise of Meech Lake, people still don't realize that talk and consult as we may, there are still two visions in this country. There are two visions that are diametrically opposed, whether we are talking about institutions, the division of powers or provincial jurisdiction. The problem, Madam Speaker, is that there are two visions and only one country. What we need is another country, and that is why Quebec sovereignists say to the rest of Canada: Make the kind of country you want. Make your own country. Concentrate all powers in Ottawa. Form an economic union that will turn your provincial governments into municipal governments. Go ahead, but don't expect us to get involved. We don't want to appear anti-Canadian. We realize some people may prefer to live in a very centralized country, but we feel this goes against the initial pact of Confederation.

We can assume that English Canadians will develop their own kind of country and their own kind of institutions. We also have to recognize the fact that through the years, francophones and Quebecers have achieved greater maturity, both economically and culturally.

When I hear speeches that recognize our distinctiveness on the cultural level only, I must say that Quebecers' aspirations now go far beyond culture. We have also learned to use the economy to shape our present. We also want to control the instruments of our economic development. Therefore, Madam Speaker, when I see the process in which we are engaged, I must regret that we are talking at cross-purposes and that here in this House people still dream of the good old days and still talk about sharing the wealth, when this Parliament has got the country $400 billion in debt, when we know that every day the Minister of Finance makes decisions on the basis not of sharing the wealth but of sharing the debt.

I would like to be able to believe that the sharing of powers is not necessary at this time and that everything is going well in the best of all worlds. In reality, there is duplication every day; there is waste that our fellow citizens can no longer afford.

I would like to tell you that this debate is not artificial, but it is, Madam Speaker. The reality is that back in their ridings, some members mentioned the reactions of their constituents who do not want any special status for Quebec, who do not necessarily want any new power sharing, who want an equal Senate where Quebec would be equal to Prince Edward Island.

• (1950)

I know that some Canadians think that. They can make their country as they want to, Madam Speaker. But we are telling you tonight that the process this country is in does not fit reality and the last chance, Madam Speaker, was the Meech Lake accord. There are no more chances. The reality is that your process, the one being followed here, talks about the good old days. However, the people have matured much more than this Parliament. Madam Speaker, let us hope that we find a way to maintain the dialogue, to shape new institutions, perhaps common economic institutions, but be sure of one thing: Quebecers will decide their future themselves. This Parliament will not dictate to them what their future will be. Accordingly, Bill 150 of the National Assembly provides for a referendum on October 26 and I hope that this Parliament will respect the democratic choice of Quebecers.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: A point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, on a night when we are discussing the new rules for the country of Canada and our relationships within the country I thought it would be appropriate for me, even though it is also contrary to our rules, to introduce to you—and I hope my friends will forgive me doing this—the 11th Ottawa Hunt Club B-Pack Cubs and B-Colony Beavers, who are with us studying rules.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary has very openly broken a rule which he knows very well. He also knows very well that the only person in this place who can openly recognize someone in the gallery is the Speaker. As someone who was in the scouting movement many, many years in her youth, I will join with the House and say hello to all of them.

[Translation]

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague, my friend who preceded me, because he spoke eloquently as someone looking at a picture of the past and in that picture he sees the future. I accept everything he says to us because he is talking about one vision of Canada. He says that we must save this country and build a country that is evolving. He reminds us that this country was created by a pact that resulted from negotiations between two founding peoples, yes, but their combined population was less than three million 125 years ago.

Today, Madam Speaker, the population is completely different. Our population is now over 27 million. My colleague, my friend, will be the first to admit that the population of the country he knew in the past is no longer the population he sees nostalgically, somewhat romantically, in that picture, some idealized dream of a past that never really existed. That said, I would not deny that there are legitimate aspirations, because every people, all the peoples of Canada, have aspirations that must be considered in the future balance of this country. The history of Quebecers in North America and then in Canada is also my history. As a Canadian, when I was a young student, for me, the history of Canada was the history of Quebecers' experience, because for me they were Canadians. Like many recent arrivals to this country, I felt part of that experience.

[English]

It is an experience from which we have built our own Canadian experience. My hon. friend says that maybe this debate should have been one in which we start to talk about how to save this country.

I do not think there is a member in this House who would not want to save this country, like my constituents and the constituents of all members of this House. The questions have really become frustrating ones about how this is to be accomplished. Even worse, it is a perplexing one: What kind of country do we see?

My colleague from the Bloc has given his image of a country. I am not sure it is an image which is shared by all he would pretend to represent, although it is a legitimate position nonetheless. I also represent a sizeable section of this country which not only has deep roots in the geography, tradition and heritage that is Canada, that is Quebec, that is every other province but has a stake in the future and aspirations of all Canadians, whether they define themselves as—

Quebecers, Ontarians or British Columbians—

[English]

they are part of something which we all aspire to build, because, as my colleague said—we want to make a country in our image.

[English]

If we want to construct a country, what kind of an image is that? It is a country in evolution which takes into consideration that more than 40 per cent of the people of this country have their roots in a history neither anglophone nor francophone in origin.

They see themselves as proud proprietors of the destiny of this country as much as anyone else. The key point that we should be concentrating on in this debate, in the discussion of the proposals that will eventually come before this House, is whether all Canadians will have proprietorship in the proposals this House must consider.

Until this point we have not reached that kind of consideration. As my colleague has said, we have taken a picture of the past seen with great nostalgia and inferred on that picture attributes which perhaps were not considered then and which we wish to selectively attribute through our historical interpretation. Whether we come from one side of that picture or the other we are excluding better than one-third of this country.

Most important, we are excluding the aspirations and the perceptions of the great majority of Canadians. They are beginning to suffer frustration and anguish upon seeing the growing intolerance which I see as a member of Parliament.

I, too, like some of my other colleagues, have sent out questionnaires. I have sought out opinions. Unfortunately, most of the results say that this country is a uniform, monolithic, homogeneous concept which coincides with the writers' own. I do not fit in that definition either, and I could see how my colleague from the Bloc would also not fit into it.

We have a higher calling in this House. I, and my colleagues from all parties, have a calling to ensure that we gather all of those ideas together and demonstrate some leadership. We cannot afford to marginalize those who saw this country as an opportunity to develop a nation built by working collectively, in collaboration, by ongoing co-operation and ongoing negotiations in which the key words were evolution and growth.

Maturity develops when we have a rapport that is not exclusive and is not excluding. There was an article in Time earlier this week alluding to the concept of a multicultural America. I think it is also a very worthwhile concept for the Canadian experience. It is only when we begin to understand the true meaning of this kind of a philosophy, this kind of a concept that we define multiculturalism, that we throw away very quickly with the same kind of disdain that many of our less tolerant Canadians view bilingualism or a multicultural experience or in fact any other kind of experience that is not their own and not particular to their parish.

What we have to do with the debate that has begun tonight is to consider very seriously where the initiatives of the government's proposals are going to take us as individuals, as citizens of this country. Let not any of us give attention to all of those who would wield power by trying to influence a decision based on jurisdictional interests.

Like my colleague, I too am tired of seeing a premier from this province or another province wax with all kinds of arrogance and with all kinds of righteousness on constitutional position and tear the country apart as a result. Positions should be discussed in this House. All of us have the obligation and the authority to do so.

Yes, we can draw upon many of our constituents. I too would like to table in this House at least five of the briefs that were presented at a constitutional piazza in my riding. Over the course of seven hours people from all walks of life, such as Dan Iannuzzi, a publisher of the magazine, Communita' Viva, spoke about some of the reforms of institutions of Canadian-Italian business associations, youth groups and other community groups as well, all of them with a stake in this country and all of them feeling left out, all of them saying: "We can support a new constitutional package if indeed one must be had. If not, we would like to have a stake in what is going to be the outcome". With that stake we also gain that proprietorship. With that proprietorship we can afford to give support. We can afford to talk about those things which are germane to each and every one of us on a day to day basis, the economy, the way that we relate to our parents, to our families and to all of our neighbours.

All of those things cannot be achieved unless we allow all Canadians to draw that picture that my colleague painted so eloquently a few short minutes ago. We can expand that picture to include the whole complexity of Canadian society and give it the philosophical requirement it needs to sustain continued growth. That sustenance cannot be found except through a concept that recognizes equality, diversity, partnership, collaboration, co-operation and justice.

That concept is encapsulized in one word, "multiculturalism". It is not encapsulized in any other. Only under that concept can we permit the kinds of differences and kinds of distinctions and the kinds of authorities and jurisdictions at a legislative level to ensure the flow of the evolution of a development of a country in which we can all take part.

[Translation]

Quebecers, Canadians, everyone. Thank you.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is with a spirit of great optimism that I stand before my colleagues today to speak about the positive momentum and energy that is building around the government's constitutional reform process.

Recent developments lead me to believe the federal government's efforts to promote a dialogue on constitutional reform is clearly having positive results. Granted, our constitutional discussions have a long history. Within the last 13 years the federal government has embarked on no fewer than 15 reports on the Constitution: Pépin-Robarts, Donald Macdonald, and Keith Spicer to name just three.

Last September, my government tabled its 28 proposals in the document Shaping Canada's Future Together. The process to make them known to Canadians across this great country is clearly galvanizing public interest and a desire to solve these issues for generations to come.

In the past weeks Canadians' well-known tolerance and respect for diversity have been diligently applied to the process of building a new Canada. Through the process that has been put in place, namely a special joint committee, the five national constitutional conferences, and the parallel process on the aboriginals, many opinions, some strongly stated, some passionately held, are being advanced. The constitutional conferences are providing Canadians with a first-hand look at how complex nation-building is in reality.

I would venture to say that there appears to have been a subtle change in the atmosphere toward the broad constitutional issue since Christmas. By this I mean that there is more confidence that the process itself is working.

Canadians recognize that it has a much broader legitimacy and so it is a catalyst to inspire better ideas for achieving benefits for all Canadians.

Clearly the constitutional conferences have helped. This is due in part to the fact that Canadians from a wide variety of backgrounds have come together and somehow there is a greater sense that the country is at risk, that we risk losing something truly wonderful.

Canadians at these conferences are taking a national perspective on these issues, which is most heartening. All this is not to say that there will not still be sharp debate in our future. There is a lot to talk about and a lot of agreement still to seek, but this vigorous debate is providing many excellent ideas which will be very helpful in making improvements to the original package.

Let me detail for you some of these positive signs. The spirit of openness and diversity of opinion has marked all three conferences held to date, but participants at the first one are still talking about the spirit of Halifax. At this first conference the unexpected happened. Delegates demonstrated first hand to the rest of the country that they were open to accommodation to ensure that Quebec remains a member of the Canadian family. They were even prepared to suggest that the federal government should change its power-sharing arrangements, that such an act of accommodation would be made to ensure that Quebec is kept as a member of the Canadian family. Canadians have spoken and my government will listen.

Delegates to the conference in Calgary spent the bulk of their time talking about the Triple-E concept, a Senate that is elected, effective, and equal. As you may know there was overwhelming agreement on the first E, that the Senate ought to be elected.

Most people thought a more effective Senate is also a good idea.

True, there was no real consensus on the third E, no agreement on whether each province should send an equal number of senators to Ottawa. My government is anxiously awaiting to see how the special joint committee deals with this issue.

Furthermore there are now a number of formulas on the table that may meet with broader acceptance, such as proportional representation.

At the economic union conference in Montreal there was a broad view that the Constitution should be brought up to date allowing freer trade in services, in capital and people, not simply goods. This is certainly something that the government believes is important. Although there was less agreement on our other economic proposals, we must separate the underlying principles to continue Canada's wealth and prosperity.

Some criticize the language of our precise proposals but fortunately there seems to be a growing acceptance that economic union powers can be expressed as acts of joint decision-making, not unilateral authority.

My government looks forward to the discussions this weekend on distinct society, the Canada clause and Canadian values at the fourth conference. Already in the past few months many Canadians have suggested that accepting Quebec's distinct society would be the natural thing to do.

The future of Quebec in this country is a question to be addressed by every Canadian. When one-quarter of our population wonders if it is wanted, then that is a problem to all of us.

Canadians will voice their opinion on the need to reflect in our Constitution the reality that Quebec is a distinct society so that the French-speaking majority of Quebec can feel at home finally and forever in the Canadian family. The government will listen carefully to those views.

• (2010)

On the aboriginal proposals there seems to be a growing willingness in many quarters to describe the aboriginal right of self-government as inherent, as long as this is in the context of Canadian law or Confederation.

As you can see there is a momentum building. The mood is more buoyant and more positive. This bodes well for the country.

Almost as important as the conference subject matter is the tone with which it is discussed. It is particularly important at this sensitive time in our country's development that these discussions be characterized by a recognition that compromise and accommodation are the essential ingredients for a united Canada.

That is exactly what has occurred in the last three conferences. Canadians are to be commended for their level-headed yet passionate approach to the process of nation-building. It is a process that is working extremely well. It is demonstrating that Canadians are seeking to understand one another's point of view in the interests of building a more united Canada.

As the joint parliamentary committee prepares its report for February 28, a report based on presentations by many different groups as well as the advice from the constitutional conferences, the process for a consensus has gradually begun to take form. Very shortly the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee will provide its recommendations to the government. Regardless of the direction of these recommendations, I am pleased to see that an openness of spirit is growing across the country. Now more than ever, as we enter the final stretch of this stage of the constitutional reform process, the ability of all parties to compromise, to conciliate and to achieve consensus will be paramount. The government intends to continue this open consultation process.

As the Prime Minister recently said: "We will remain flexible, open-minded and focused on an achievable consensus that can serve durably for generations to come".

The federal government looks forward to continued, vigorous and reasoned debate to ensure that the best possible constitutional package is achieved in this Canada round. It is clear from the spirit of compromise that Canadians want to keep this country united and prosperous. My government intends to do everything in its power to achieve that goal.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity this evening to say a few words about the unity of our country. I do so as the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, but also as a citizen of this country, born in Quebec, who chose Ontario as his province of residence.

Mr. Speaker, the electoral district in Ontario which I represent has a francophone majority, which is rather unusual and practically unheard of for some Canadians, and I would even say for some Quebecers. I have travelled many times in Quebec with my family, and I remember one trip in particular. I stopped at a service station near Quebec City, and the young man who filled my tank spoke to me in English. I answered in French, but he kept answering in English. He thought I would appreciate that being from Ontario and as far as he was concerned, I was an anglophone. I had a hard time explaining to him that in Ontario like anywhere else, francophones speak French.

Mr. Rocheleau: But the young man was English.

Mr. Boudria: No he was not. The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer said the boy was English. He was not and I am sure if the hon. member had heard him, he would have realized that. No, this was a francophone who was trying to do me a favour by talking to me in English.

My point is, Mr. Speaker, that first of all, this young man was not aware of the existence of franco-Ontarians, and what is even more important, I think, is that he was being friendly and wanted to please someone by speaking what he assumed to be his language.

And that is something we ought to remember. Every time Canadians quarrel about language, we forget there are many other Canadians with similar differences. The exception does not prove the rule, it is the rule, and we should remember that.

Mr. Speaker, Longueuil township is in my riding, and formerly it was the seigniory of Longueuil. This was before the Constitution Act of 1791, which separated—this may interest the hon. member for Shefford—Ontario from Quebec. The Act of Union of 1840 united Ontario and Quebec, and we have had a united Canada since that time, and I hope we will for many years to come.

Mr. Speaker last fall, I sent my constituents a questionnaire asking them for their views on the constitutional question. I now have the results, and I sent a copy to all the members of the parliamentary committee responsible for examining these issues. In fact, I sent copies to several members and to all the media in my riding, as well as to the respondents themselves. About 500 people returned the questionnaire, and here are their responses to some of those questions. I would like to share this with you.

The first question was: Do you think a constitutional declaration on the nature of Canada should include our commitment to two official languages? Ninety-two per cent of my constituents answered yes, 11 per cent said no, and 7 per cent were undecided or did not reply.

The diversity of our cultural heritage? Sixty-eight per cent answered yes, 15 per cent, no, and 17 per cent, other.

The distinctiveness of Quebec's society? Forty-two per cent answered yes, 41 per cent no, and 17 per cent had no opinion. Here again, the majority of my constituents were in favour of the proposal.

Recognition of the role of aboriginal people? Sixty-two per cent answered yes, 20 per cent, no, and 18 per cent had no opinion.

Actually, the response to all my questions was rather interesting. Take, for instance, the mobility of goods and capital in Canada. Eighty-eight per cent in favour, 5 per cent opposed, and 7 per cent no opinion or undecided.

Elimination of the provinces' preferential procurement policies? Sixty-four per cent in favour, 14 per cent opposed, and 22 per cent other.

Elimination of interprovincial barriers to trade? Sixty-eight per cent in favour, 13 per cent opposed, and 19 per cent no response.

Elimination of provincial restrictions on the practice of certain professions? Seventy-one per cent in favour, 17 per cent opposed, and 22 per cent undecided.

The answers are not surprising, Mr. Speaker, because in a border region like mine, people are aware of the problems involved in moving goods or services between provinces.

Canadians may recall the story of the contractor in Nepean, here in the Ottawa area, who had been awarded a contract to install pavement in the Aylmer area. When it was found the bricks had been manufactured in Ontario, every single brick had to be removed.

• (2020)

Most Canadians know the story. What is not generally known, however, is the fact that the same has often happened in reverse.

I remember that when I was a provincial member, the Ontario government purchased railway cars from Hawker Siddeley in Thunder Bay instead of from Bombardier in Montreal, although they were more expensive, because it meant keeping the jobs in the province. Of course, the people of Ontario ended up paying more, because the government had spent more money than was strictly necessary.

My constituents and I feel the kind of restrictive practices that exist today should be eliminated as far as interprovincial trade is concerned. Interprovincial trade in Canada should be increased. We should have free trade among Canadians.

I also asked some questions about an elected Senate. Eighty-one per cent said they were in favour of an elected Senate 12 per cent were opposed, and 7 per cent had no opinion.

Since I left a space for comments, I expected a lot of people to say we should get rid of the Senate or something like that. However, no one did. People were either in favour or opposed or had no opinion, but 81 per cent of the respondents said they were in favour of an elected Senate.

I also asked the following question: Do you think that the decision to create a new province in Yukon or the Northwest Territories should be up to the federal government and the ten provinces? Twenty-five per cent. The federal government and seven provinces? Twenty-two per cent. The federal government and the people of the territory in question? Fifty-one per cent. Only two per cent had no opinion.

Should the provinces be involved in appointing judges to the Supreme Court? Sixty-three per cent said yes and 25 per cent said no.

Mr. Speaker, I took this opportunity to tell you about the views of my constituents. I would also like to ask the Clerk of the House to lay the document on the table, and I am referring to the response of my constituents to the questionnaire.

[English]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to participate in this very important debate.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity this evening to participate in this very crucial debate on the future of our country, a debate on whether or not we shall continue as a strong and united nation or whether we will allow, inadvertently or otherwise, Quebec to separate from the rest of Canada.

If we are to approach this issue in a realistic and unemotional way, it is important for all of us, whether we live in or outside Quebec, to understand fully the impact and the consequences that separation will have on our lives and on the lives of our families, our neighbours and our friends.

Separation would mean a lower standard of living for all of us. Canadians are bound together not only by a national government, by national programs and national institutions, but also by an interdependent national economy. Separation means severing not only our political ties but our economic ties as well.

In spite of our many provincial trade barriers, six provinces—Quebec, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta—trade more within Canada than they export to foreign countries. All provinces, with the exception of British Columbia, export significant amounts to Quebec. Of our three largest manufacturing provinces—Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia—only Quebec is more dependent on trade with other provinces than on foreign trade.

Quebec's manufacturing shipments are roughly split between international markets and the rest of Canada. In 1989, 14.5 per cent of Quebec's manufacturing shipments went to Ontario while only 5.9 per cent of Ontario's went to Quebec.

However, in terms of dollars, as opposed to percentages, Ontario sends $10 billion of its manufactured goods to Quebec while Quebec sends over $12 billion to Ontario. Quebec's independence would disrupt those economic ties and could result in the erection of tariffs and other trade barriers.

Separation would create two new countries, each with a smaller population and a smaller economic base than a united Canada. Smaller markets and smaller economies are greater risks for investors. Credit ratings would go down and borrowing costs would go up.

The result would be a rise in taxes or a drop in government services for everyone. Because it did not sign the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement, an independent Quebec would have to negotiate its own trade agreement with the United States.

In return for such an agreement, the United States would undoubtedly want, among other things, the elimination of all restrictions on American ownership of Quebec businesses, the unlimited right for Americans to bid on Quebec government contracts and the right to buy Quebec power at Quebec domestic prices.

In addition, since Canada without Quebec would represent only 75 per cent of its previous size, the United States might very well also decide to terminate not only the free trade agreement, but the auto pact as well.

Quebec's independence would also necessitate a division of Canada's assets and national debt. Some say, based on population, Quebec should assume 25 per cent of the national debt. Others say it should be 18.5 per cent based on Quebec's proportion of gross domestic product.

Without the consent of our creditors, the bondholders, Quebec cannot legally assume any of the national debt. At best, we can make a side deal where Quebec makes payments to Canada for whatever share of the interest and the capital we agree on.

However, if an independent Quebec, because of economic problems, defaults on its payments, the new Canada representing 75 per cent of the old Canada would still be responsible for the repayment of 100 per cent of the present national debt. Anyway you cut it, separation means a lower standard of living for each and everyone of us.

Well, if separation is not in our best interest either individually or collectively, what kind of a Canada do we need? In my view, we need a Canada with a strong national government and we do not need more decentralization.

Supporters of decentralization say that we are overgoverned, that we need to disentangle federal, provincial, regional and local jurisdictions and that we need to get decision-making closer to the people. By doing so, they say, we are going to eliminate duplication, waste and inefficiency.

That all makes good sense, but if we do decentralize, what will happen to national standards? What will happen to our national social safety net? What will happen to the equality of all Canadians and what will happen to our sense of being a Canadian? What do you think, Mr. Speaker, will our taxes really go down?

Well, if we do decentralize, the provinces will certainly need additional taxing powers to pay for their new added responsibilities. If we increase provincial taxing powers, we will have to decrease federal taxing powers. That in turn will reduce the number of tools available to our national government for managing the economy and creating an economic climate that encourages job creation and promotes price stability.

Canada is already one of the most decentralized countries in the world. The national governments of the United States and Australia both raise and spend substantially more money in comparison to their state governments than we do in comparison to our provincial governments.

Only Switzerland is more decentralized than Canada. The Swiss manage their economy by expelling foreign workers when unemployment goes up. In Canada this approach would be controversial, to say the very least.

• (2030)

The greater the degree of decentralization, the greater the need for federal–provincial economic policy co–ordination, something which is very obviously lacking between the federal government and the Ontario provincial government during the past few years. While the federal government was trying to restrain spending, the Ontario government was substantially increasing its spending. This increased spending contributed to higher inflation, higher interest rates and a more severe recession.

In 1988 the federal government reduced its income taxes. However, the effect was completely neutralized when the Ontario government raised its provincial income taxes. Further increasing provincial taxing powers will only create more potential for even greater policy conflicts and could lead us into economic chaos. That is the reason for the federal proposals for an economic union.

I think it is significant that in 1977 the leader of the Parti Québecois, Jacques Parizeau, said: "Because rather often in Canada we tend to talk of the abusive centralized powers of Ottawa, we tend to forget that in reality Canada is highly decentralized". Ten years earlier Mr. Parizeau had said: "Any further decentralization would lead to a fragmentation of decision–making powers that would be incompatible with any rational planning". In my opinion Canadians should take Mr. Parizeau's advice, on this issue at least.

What we do not need is more decentralization. We do not even need more decentralization combined with the concept of an economic union. What we need is a strong and united Canada and a strong and effective national government.

When our country was born its architects, Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George–Etienne Cartier, delivered a message. Macdonald said: "We are a great country and we shall become one of the greatest in the world if we preserve it. We shall sink into insignificance and into adversity if we suffer it to be broken". Cartier said: "Avant tout, soyons Canadiens", above all, let us be Canadians.

That is a message we should all take to heart.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, for months now, I have listened to the unending constitutional debate in this country. Mr. Speaker, I see one and only one solution to the present problem: sovereignty for Quebec and sovereignty for English Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to return to the federal–provincial conference held in Victoria in 1971, where we all know that things broke down. In the 1980 referendum, I had the privilege to chair the "no" committee on the Quebec side of the Ottawa Valley. We wanted to try to find ways to unite this country and foster understanding from coast to coast. Mr. Speaker, this was followed by the unilateral repatriation of the Constitution in 1982 which left Quebec out.

In 1985, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party of Quebec under Premier Robert Bourassa was elected. In the following months, there were meetings that in April 1987 led to the Meech Lake accord, which was ratified by the 11 first ministers, the federal government and the opposition parties. Every province had until June 23, 1990 to ratify this agreement. Two provinces, Manitoba and Newfoundland, opposed it. Mr. Speaker, it was the only chance to allow Quebec to enter the Canadian federation with honour and it was refused.

Since then, Mr. Speaker, there have been many commissions and committees. There was Beaudoin–Edwards on the amending formula; the Spicer Commission which cost Canadians some $25 million; the Castonguay–Dobbie committee was set up, but we know that Mr. Castonguay resigned because, as he confirmed last week in La Presse, it was going nowhere. This committee was replaced by the one chaired by Senator Beaudoin and Mrs. Dobbie. There have been regional conferences in Halifax, in Calgary and last week, in Montreal. In a week, one will be held in Vancouver, British Columbia.

The three main parties in the House of Commons asked for tonight's debate. I am sorry that the attendance is so low, Mr. Speaker, only a few members. If we took a vote tonight, the Bloc Québécois would almost have a majority in this House. That is disappointing, Mr. Speaker, in that—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member knows that he should not mention who is or who is not in the House. Committees are meeting, and members are watching it on television inside and outside the lobby. I think he knows better because he has been around here for a long time.

[Translation]

Mr. Rocheleau: Thank you for your comments, Mr. Speaker. To continue, we are discussing the seemingly insoluble constitutional problem tonight.

Previous speakers this evening have offered no solution, Mr. Speaker. They only admitted the failure of constitutional discussions to date. The Meech Lake accord was supposed to be the Quebec round so that Quebec could return to the Canadian federation.

Today, Mr. Speaker, with the Conservative government's 28 proposals, it is now the Canada Round which seeks to solve all the problems at one go, even though Quebec was not allowed to solve its problems honorably. For over 30 years in Quebec, since the quiet revolution—a former colleague of yours here, Jean Lesage, was a minister and was Premier of Quebec from 1960 to 1966. The theme of Jean Lesage's election campaign in 1960, Mr. Speaker, was "masters in our own house", masters of our destiny, with control over cultural, social and economic matters. We have been demanding that since 1960, Mr. Speaker. We are in 1992 and Quebec is now ready to take on its destiny, to look after its own affairs. For Quebec, looking after its own affairs is not to lower itself or English Canada but to enable both to evolve quite naturally, each in their own sphere as they see fit.

Mr. Speaker, English Canada wants power centralized in Ottawa; Quebec wants power decentralized in Quebec. It is all that, Mr. Speaker. We have gone beyond language and culture; we are now dealing with the economy and powers. The best evidence is that the Parti Québécois wants sovereignty for Quebec and an economic association with Ottawa. The Quebec Liberal Party at its convention last year adopted the Allaire report recommending that Quebec take back 22 powers but still leave a few powers in Ottawa. It is no longer a partisan political issue; it is a question of Quebecers' collective will to look after their own future. That is what it is all about, Mr. Speaker.

On some occasions, we have been called stupid here in this House by the Prime Minister, as my colleague from Shefford was. We asked for apologies but they were not forthcoming. We are sometimes sneered at because we represent the majority political option of Quebecers, who want sovereignty for themselves and Canada to go its own way, Mr. Speaker. We do not want to stop Canada from succeeding, but we do not want English Canada's views imposed on Quebec by Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee is to submit its report by the end of February. This House will surely study it. The committee will surely make some recommendations and then the House will surely come to a consensus, as happened with the Meech Lake accord, and everything will again be on the table.

Mr. Speaker, that does not work. In Quebec, we are tired of dealing with the Constitution. In Quebec, we want to deal with our political, social, cultural and economic future. We want to have the powers that will enable us to develop our regions. We are always under the absolute control of federal government policies, in the environment, vocational training and recently, education. In all these fields, nine provinces exercise control over one province.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, the only thing I want is to have the people of Quebec consulted next October on their future. The referendum should ask Quebecers a clear, precise, unambiguous question on sovereignty and they will decide. For the benefit of both English Canada and Quebec, Mr. Speaker, we must from now on talk about something other than the Constitution. We must talk about jobs for our young people. We must talk about the economy, health and education. We must talk about something else because we are destroying ourselves.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I remember a phrase—

[English]

In English, a song Je vous aime beaucoup; in English, Mr. Speaker, "I love you". I think that is sort of the basic message that the people of Alberta, the people of my constituency, would have for the people of Quebec.

If I understood enough German to use a similar phrase then I would do so in the Chamber The people in my constituency and the people in the west generally have those kinds of emotional feelings for their citizens of German descent or of Asian descent. We are a nation of people who for the most part came from somewhere. If we backtrack far enough in history there are certainly theories that even our aboriginal people came from other continents and other parts of the world. That is what Canada is.

In listening to my colleague across the way who has certainly come to a different conclusion about the future of this country, I think the people in my riding would say to him: "Be cautious". I guess my own personal history and sense of family says be cautious.

My father's family came from an Irish Protestant heritage and into the province of New Brunswick years ago. Some of them wandered west and some of us are into several generations in the west now. My mother's side of the family came from Irish Catholic and into the Kingston, Ontario area and some of them wandered west. Now those genes are into the later generation.

In the meantime those who stayed behind are killing, maiming and bombing on the basis of religious differences that endured through the decades and through the centuries. Yet, as Canadians we have been able to escape the negative parts of that kind of heritage and replace them with a sense of community and a sense of communion.

If there is a message that exists in my riding from all of the sources that are available to me as a member of Parliament to gather information and to bring it to this Chamber, it is the message that we are proud of this country. This is the finest country in the world. Geographically it is huge. It is immense with potential that lasts for decades and centuries into the future in terms of natural resources and opportunity for generations yet unborn.

Culturally we are perhaps even richer. It is almost impossible to believe that there is another nation on the face of the earth that can boast in its citizenry a language spoken that is not spoken by at least one Canadian.

On my block in the city of Calgary in my constituency, the heritage of the people on that very short block on both sides of the street is enormous: eastern European, Asian, African, South American, American and several generations into Canadian. All of those are on a single block.

When I hear my colleagues across the way arguing for the notion of separation, I say: Be cautious. They have not only a tiny view of the world, a view which is too small in terms of the opportunity system for their children, but they have a view that I think the world says is impossible.

The last large experiment with the notion that you can impose a culture, you can impose a language, you can impose a political structure, was the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the notion of imposition had it fall apart. It has come to the notion of a federation which we have had for 125 years. We got there 125 years ago and the notion of federation has taken us to at least the second highest standard of living in the world.

They want to take some six million or seven million people in a piece of geography in North America and say: "We can impose a culture, we can impose a language, we can impose a political structure, and it will work".

In the last 13 years I have acquired some capacity in the French language. I have acquired it in the province of Quebec. I have acquired it by spending a lot of weekends in immersion. I have travelled that province. I have stayed in auberges and people's homes and attempted to feel what it is like.

When we get out of the politician's world and in with the people it is a world like my world in Alberta. The people are the same. They want the same kinds of things. They have the same diversity. They do not just speak French and a minority speak English in the province of Quebec; they speak Swahili, Hungarian, German, and on and on and on.

The notion some narrow-minded people have from that province that they can impose a single culture and a single way of thinking on some kind of unified body is a notion fraught with danger, a notion that has within it, inherent in it, failure.

If they achieve some kind of vote on some kind of referendum that says that we will separate and break up the country, and they are to experiment with that, there will be chaos. When he stood in this Chamber and said: "English Canada's views on Quebec", I have news for him. He should travel west more often, he will find out that there is no English Canada's view of anything.

There is no such animal as English Canada. There is Canada with Germans, Hungarians, Chinese, Irish and Scots. There are all kinds of heritages. If you go and live a little while in Newfoundland, a little while in Alberta and a little while in northern B.C., there are differences. The message that comes through is that it is a country full of differences.

By working together the way we have for 125 years, we are much, much more than the sum of the individual parts. To lead a group of people with their own children, to produce a tiny, artificial, impossible world for those children is really not doing them any kind of a favour.

Canadians love this country. One of the opportunities that we have had in this Chamber tonight and will have next Monday, Tuesday and Thursday is the opportunity to table a document, make sure it gets to the committee, to put a few comments on the record, to make sure that they get to the committee.

I want to table one. I have had contact in all kinds of ways with all kinds of constituents and I did put out a questionnaire. Over 1,500 people replied to it. I would like to table it and perhaps leave the Chamber with one message.

Of all of the questions we asked about the kind of Canada that the people in my riding would like to see for the future, they were not unanimous on anything. That is the strength of this nation, that we are not unanimous on anything perhaps other than the love for this country.

If we wanted some principles, three stood out. That was effective regional representation, equal provincial status and economic efficiency. Over three quarters of the people in my riding said those were three basic principles for Constitution-making in Canada.

We are about 99 per cent of the way there on all three of those and I hope this exercise in the next few months will take us the remaining 1 per cent and we will have the kind of Constitution that joins us together, makes us all feel proud for another 125 years at least.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There being no further members seeking the floor for debate, pursuant to order made on Wednesday, February 5, 1992 this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at ten o'clock pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Marcel Danis (for the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)) moved that Bill S–2, an act to implement conventions between Canada and Finland, Canada and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic and Canada and the United Mexican States for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax and the prevention of fiscal evasion and a convention between Canada and the United Mexican States for the exchange of information with respect to taxes be read the second time and referred to Legislative committee F.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased on behalf of the government to begin the debate on Bill S–2, an act to implement tax conventions between Canada and Finland, Canada and Czechoslovakia, Canada and Mexico, and an exchange of information treaty with Mexico.

The purpose of this bill is to implement conventions between Canada and Finland, Canada and the Czechoslovak Federal Republic, and Canada and the United Mexican States for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax and a convention between Canada and the United Mexican States for the exchange of information with respect to taxes.

The role of tax treaties is to promote international trade and facilitate international investment. The existence of tax treaties generates an air of stability for investors by providing certainty both as to the method and the rates of taxation of income flowing between two countries.

Tax treaties also seek to eliminate or alleviate double taxation of income arising from international transactions. The three tax treaties under review follow the pattern of treaties previously approved by Parliament. The major reform of Canada's income tax legislation in 1971 required Canada both to expand its network of tax treaties and to revise treaties previously concluded with other countries.

Negotiations have resulted in the conclusion of new or revised treaties with almost 75 countries. Canada now has 50 tax treaties in force. The bill before the House today represents a continuation of that process.

The rates of tax provided in a treaty cannot be increased unless the treaty itself is revised.

• (1010)

Any revision requires the agreement of the two governments and is a lengthy process. Termination of a treaty is a rare event. As an example, I would note that Canada terminated its treaty with South Africa in 1985. Both in the case of a revision of a treaty and the termination of a treaty, taxpayers are given advance notice of the changes.

Administrative benefits are also provided for taxpayers under our tax treaties. The requirement to pay tax on business profits in the country of source, that is, in the country where the profit is actually made, is eliminated unless the taxpayer has a permanent establishment in that country. A mechanism is provided under the terms of the treaty to settle various problems encountered by taxpayers both as to the interpretation and the application of the treaty.

One of the most important aspects of tax treaties is the elimination or the alleviation of double taxation. Double taxation of international transactions arises when the same income is taxed in the hands of the same person by two different countries. It generally occurs because of the difference in taxation legislation of the two countries.

This type of double taxation arises in three situation: first, where each contracting state—the two states that are involved in the particular treaty—subjects the same person to tax on a world-wide income; second, where a person is a resident of a contracting state and derives income from the other contracting state and both state imposes tax on that income; and third, where each contracting state subjects the same person, not being a resident of either contracting state, to tax on income derived from a contracting state. This may result, for instance, in a situation where a non-resident person has a permanent establishment in one contracting state through which income is derived from the other contracting state.

Tax treaties eliminate double taxation in these situations by either providing one of the states with the exclusive right to tax or by ensuring that taxes paid in one state can be used to offset taxes payable in the other state.

Treaties confer on only one of the contracting states an exclusive right to tax a number of items of income. For these items of income, double taxation is avoided since the other contracting state is prevented from taxing.

For some items of income, the right to tax is not an exclusive one. The treaties confer on the state of source a full or limited right to tax. Although the state of residence of the taxpayer may also tax these items of income, the treaty allows relief for the taxes paid to the other state so as to avoid double taxation.

I would now like to briefly indicate the main elements of these tax treaties. I will deal with the exchange of information convention later in my remarks.

These treaties provide generally that dividends may be taxed in the source country at a maximum rate of 15 per cent. However, in the case of dividends paid to a company that is resident of a contracting state, a 10 per cent rate will apply if the company receiving the dividends holds an equity interest of at least 10 per cent—25 per cent in the case of the treaty with Mexico—of the voting power of the company paying the dividends.

In the case of interest paid by a resident of one country to a resident of the other country, a general rate of 10 per cent—15 per cent in the case of Mexico—will apply. There are, however, a number of exceptions.

Interest paid in respect of a bond or similar obligation of the government, a political subdivision or local authority thereof, is exempt in the country in which it arises. Also, the three treaties contain a provision that would allow that interest paid in respect of a loan made, guaranteed or insured, or a credit extended, guaranteed or insured by a certain state entities—in Canada for example the Export Development Corporation—be taxable only in the state where the recipient of such interest resides.

With respect to royalties, the conventions provide for a general rate of 10 per cent—15 in the case of Mexico—in the source country. Copyright royalties in respect of most cultural or artistic works are generally exempt under the three treaties. In the case of Czechoslovakia and Mexico, they must be subject to tax in the state where the recipient resides in order to qualify for the exemption from taxation at source.

Some of the other matters also dealt with in these treaties include the subject of capital gains. The treaty provision dealing with capital gains reflects the standard Canadian position enabling the source country to tax gains arising on the sale of real property, business assets and shares in real estate companies.

Second, non-discrimination. Under the treaties, discrimination on the basis of nationality is prohibited, thereby ensuring nationals of a country equal treatment with nationals of the other country in the same circumstances. However, this does not prevent a country from providing fiscal incentives—for example, a small business deduction—on the basis of the residence of the taxpayer.

Third, pensions. Canada has preserved its right to tax pensions paid to residents of Czechoslovakia, Finland and Mexico. In the case of Czechoslovakia and Mexico, the maximum rate of tax applicable by a contracting state to periodic pension and annuity payments to residents of the other state is 15 per cent. In the case of Finland, the maximum rate of tax applicable to periodic pension payments is 20 per cent. Finally war veterans pensions are generally exempt from tax under the three treaties.

Fourth, double taxation relief. The treaties provide that in Canada double taxation of foreign source income of Canadian residents is alleviated by way of a foreign tax credit, in accordance with the limitations provided for in the Canadian legislation. In addition, dividends received by a company resident in Canada from the exempt surplus of its foreign affiliate resident in a treaty country are exempt from tax in Canada. Reciprocally relief from double taxation is granted in the other treaty country in accordance with a method recognized by that country.

As to the exchange of information convention with Mexico, this exchange of information convention was signed before the signature of the comprehensive double tax convention referred to previously. It is limited to the exchange of tax information between Canada and Mexico and will be used as a complement to exchange of information provisions found in the comprehensive treaty.

The exchange of information convention will assist the revenue authorities in combating tax evasion. It allows three types of exchange of information: (1) information that will be sent to the other state on a regular and automatic basis, (2) information that will be sent to the other state on a spontaneous basis when it comes to the attention of the sending state, and (3) information that is specifically requested by the other state.

The convention contains a number of safeguards intended to ensure that the information will only be provided for tax purposes and only if providing such information would not violate any law, disclose any trade secret or impose on a state the obligation to carry out measures different from its normal administrative practices.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, equitable solutions are provided under the terms of these three tax conventions for the various problems of double taxation existing between Canada and these countries. The exchange of information convention with Mexico represents a complement to the comprehensive tax treaty with that country. Each of these countries hopes to implement the bilateral convention as soon as possible and consequently I commend this bill to the most favourable consideration of this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I wish to take part in this debate on Bill S–2, an act to implement conventions between Canada and Finland, Canada and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic and Canada and the United Mexican States for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax and the prevention of fiscal evasion and a convention between Canada and the United Mexican States for the exchange of information with respect to taxes.

You can understand that, with such a title, this bill is hard to read and understand. Reading the four conventions attached to this bill is a difficult exercise for a member of this House.

[English]

As a lawyer, even I find the words extremely difficult.

However, the purpose of this bill, which is to avoid double taxation and to prevent fiscal evasion, that is evasion of taxes between the countries that are signatories to the various conventions, is a worth–while one. As the parliamentary secretary has stated, there are 50 such conventions in force at the present time. This act will bring into place three more that deal with those two issues and the additional one with Mexico to provide for the exchange of information.

• (1020)

If I may say, Madam Speaker, when I was practising law on a regular basis, I occasionally had some dealings with these conventions and their application in respect of the Income Tax Act of Canada. I note, as the parliamentary secretary I think stated, these conventions take precedence over the Income Tax Act. The bill before us ensures that in one of its provisions. In other words, where there is a conflict between the Income Tax Act and the convention, the convention takes precedence.

Obviously our main convention is with the United States. It is the one most frequently dealt with in this country by tax experts. I may say that I was not a tax expert. In reading the U.S. convention and trying to decide how it took precedence over the Income Tax Act and over which section is always a bit of a conundrum. Usually I end up relying on advice from the Department of National Revenue. I can only hope that advice was always correct. After all, they are the ones who interpret the act for their own purposes. They are the ones also involved in it on a regular basis and presumably know how it would be applied.

One of my partners, Mr. David Bonham, who is an expert, can cite the Canada–U.S. tax treaty chapter and verse, but I never had such facility with the technical language of the treaty, let alone the technical language of the Income Tax Act, which is even worse, as most people who have had any dealings with it can attest.

However, in dealing with this bill, I suggest the proper course is to have the bill referred to a legislative committee where it can receive the detailed study that it deserves to ensure that the words of the act are sufficient to bring the treaties into full force and also to review the treaties to see that they are in accordance with past practices in this regard.

I note that in the material provided to us to assist in dealing with this bill, it is stated that the treaties are generally patterned on the model Double Taxation Convention prepared by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. The committee will want to ensure that is the case in the course of its deliberations.

I notice also that the treaties were signed by the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Finance and now the minister of fisheries. I assume they were signed at different times when those ministers occupied various other portfolios. I can imagine that the ministers spent a great deal of time negotiating these important treaties and making sure the words were entirely satisfactory for Canada. Perhaps if they had spent a little more time here, we would not be in the fiscal mess that we are in this country today. Anyway, I am sure the parliamentary secretary will speak to them in that regard and encourage them to devote their efforts to fixing up the fiscal mess in Canada rather than dealing necessarily with these treaties, helpful as they may be.

However, Canadian taxpayers ultimately should be the beneficiary under these arrangements, especially those taxpayers who have assets in foreign countries and are subject to taxation there because it will provide for the avoidance of double taxation on their incomes derived from those places and will also assist the Canadian government, on the other hand, in ensuring that taxes are paid by those who are earning foreign income and may wish to avoid payment on it for various reasons.

Perhaps we are all the net beneficiaries as a result of these treaties. The committee will want to look into it. We are pleased to (a) support the bill and (b) assist in ensuring its swift passage in order that the detailed consideration it deserves can be forthcoming. I am sure the bill will be reported back to the House and dealt with at third reading in due course.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, it is quite common for these bills with respect to tax treaties between Canada and other countries to come up in the House, to be treated rather briefly, have them go to committee, have them come back and be passed. I think that is appropriate because they generally are not matters of contention between the parties. There is a standard procedure that exists between some countries and that we hope will come to exist between Canada and all countries, that these kinds of understandings be reached and be enshrined in legislation. This is a special one. I am not saying that we are going to obstruct it in any significant way. We too want to see it go to committee quickly, have it looked at and sent back. We do not intend to vote against the bill, but we do intend to use this opportunity just for a little while to talk about the relationship between Canada and one of the countries to which this bill applies. That is, of course, the relationship between Canada and Mexico.

This bill provides for an exchange of information with respect to taxes between Canada and Mexico. I am sure the government will argue that this exchange of information with respect to taxes is simply a matter of obtaining the information that is necessary in order to draft the appropriate regulations pursuant to the legislation.

We also think that this question of exchange of information between Canada and Mexico could be related or preparatory in some way for the North American Free Trade Agreement which the government would like to sign with the United States and Mexico. At the very least, we would like to argue that there has not been enough exchange of information about Canada–Mexico relations here in this House, never mind between Canada and Mexico.

Just this very week the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca wanted the Minister of State for Small Businesses, or for that matter the Minister for International Trade, to table in this House documents which are reported to be available to Mexican politicians with respect to the negotiations going on now between Canada, the United States and Mexico. We were not able to obtain that document. We have had further proof since that these so-called draft agreements actually exist and that Mexican senators have had access to these draft agreements. Yet, we here in the Canadian House of Commons, on the other side of the negotiations, are still left in the dark. We cannot see these agreements. We do not have any idea what these agreements contain. We are left to speculate as to what is actually in these draft agreements.

I am sure the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, whom I see in the House, will have more to say about the details of these particular documents, how we know that they exist and why the government refuses so far to bring us into the light on this so that Canadian members of Parliament can know what Mexican members of Parliament know about the current state of the negotiations.

Mr. McCreath: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

I know my hon. friend has a very sincere and deep interest in the subject of free trade negotiations in North America and the Canada-Mexico-U.S. trade negotiations. I would hope and expect that in due course there would be an opportunity for the House to debate those issues. However, I would respectfully suggest that is not the issue on the floor today. The issue today is a tax treaty similar to 50 other tax treaties, none of which have led to free trade agreements.

I would respectfully suggest that the subject of trade negotiations between Canada and Mexico or Canada and anybody else has nothing to do with the debate before the House today.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The subject of relevancy is probably one of the most difficult things the House asks its Speaker to deal with. I understand what the hon. member is saying. I have read the bill and I have listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona very carefully. At this point, there is a definite link between the bill in front of us and what the hon. member has been talking about.

• (1030)

I will keep on listening very carefully. I agree with the hon. member that this should not turn into a debate on the good and the bad things about a possible North American trade deal, but I can understand the hon. member making some references to it when reading the bill.

I will make sure that all hon. members who will be talking about it will carefully be choosing their words when talking about the bill that is now in front of the House. I would not want to have to say this every 10 minutes during the discussion of this bill. Let us be very serious about it, let us be relevant and let us debate.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I certainly will do my best to stay within the parameters that you have outlined, but obviously, as you say yourself, if we are talking about Canada-Mexico relations, what could be more apropos than a major development in Canada-Mexico relations which is just around the corner.

The government wants us to just sort of casually let go here in the House today this bill which sets up one stage of this new relationship with Mexico, which may or may not be integral to the next stage. Nevertheless, it does talk about, as I said before, exchange of information. We are saying that it is nice to have an exchange of information between Canada and Mexico with respect to taxes, but why do we not have an exchange of information between the government and the opposition here in Canada about what is going on in this other dimension of the Canada-Mexico relations which is, of course, the negotiations having to do with the North American free trade agreement.

We are talking here of process, not substance. I could go on and on, but out of respect for the rules of the House, I would not go on and on about the matter of substance having to do with the advisability of a North American free trade agreement. I happen to think it would be a disaster, but I would not do that because I want to stick to process and to what is actually going on between Canada and Mexico that is being kept from Canadian members of Parliament when we know, thanks to information obtained by the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, that Mexican senators have access to this kind of information.

We say to the government: Would this not have been a wonderful opportunity for the government in speaking to us today to have also brought us onboard with respect to other aspects of the Canada-Mexico relationships? That was not done.

I noticed that my colleagues to the right, the members of the Liberal Party, did not seize this opportunity. It is not surprising to me that they would not want to talk about the North American free trade agreement because they could not agree among themselves what they would want to say about it, whether it had to do with process or substance. The fact of the matter is that they are for it. Their member on the committee who was considering this issue did his own minority report because he could not bring himself to take the position that the NDP was taking.

When Canadians have a good look at what has been said in the last little while and what will be said, they will know if they are concerned about the North American free trade agreement that it is to the NDP they will have to look for real and honest and trustworthy opposition to that.

That is not what I primarily wanted to talk about today, that is to say I did not want to talk just about the Liberals because again you might call me into question with respect to relevance, Madam Speaker.

An hon. member: And they are not relevant.

Mr. Blaikie: And the Liberals are not relevant. I would understand if you would try to rule me out of order because I was talking about people who are irrelevant. I would hope that someone on the government side might use this opportunity because we have asked questions in the House on this issue and may ask them again. Get up. Now is the time. We have a debate now on Canada-Mexico relations. Someone on the government side of the House—the Minister for International Trade, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism or whoever knows what is going on—can use this opportunity to bring Canadian members of Parliament up to speed about what is going on and tell us what Mexican politicians already know.

Or is there something to hide? It would certainly seem to us, according to documents which have been obtained by Southam through access to information and other background papers prepared by the government, that Canada stands to lose a lot in our upcoming treaty, so to speak, with Mexico.

When this bill goes to committee I am sure it will be treated in the manner which other bills like it have been treated. However, while we are on the floor of the House, why does the government not take the opportunity to bring us up to scratch on what is going on in the Canada-Mexico negotiations? Also, why do the Liberals not take the opportunity to explain to the Canadian people where they stand on the North American free trade agreement? These people were in the fight of their life in 1988 over the free trade agreement but now seem to be in the stupor of their life with respect to the North American free trade agreement, which will be even worse.

I could perhaps conclude by repeating what I said in the House the other day. This country is bleeding to death as a result of the GST and the free trade agreement. What the government has in mind for us with respect to our new relationship with Mexico is not to apply the needed tourniquet but to finally slash our throats, finish the job and do away with Canada as we have known it in any significant respect.

I think that we have done a service to the debate on this particular issue by using this bill as an opportunity to give the government and the Liberals, who are of a piece on this issue, the opportunity to say where they stand.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I certainly respect your ruling on my earlier point of order. I am not greatly surprised that my hon. friends opposite would wish to avail themselves of the opportunity resulting from the word Mexico to engage themselves in discussions perhaps a little more far ranging than this bill.

I know it is not my hon. friend's intention to in any way mislead the House. Therefore, I do want to correct one impression that he might have left with some hon. members. That is, that the exchange of information convention has anything whatsoever to do with any other negotiations that may be going on between Canada and Mexico. In fact, it is quite common within tax treaty provisions to have this type of exchange of information provision dealing exclusively with assisting, in our case, Revenue Canada in dealing with tax evaders.

In the case of the negotiations with Mexico, the Mexicans have been reluctant to engage in tax treaties with anybody. In fact, these negotiations and the treaty with Mexico included within this bill are a result of 15 years of negotiations. After 13 years the Mexicans agreed at the very least to enter into a convention relating to exchanging information to nail down tax evaders. Now they came on side and decided to enter into an agreement in the normal fashion. Therefore, the subsequent agreement, the tax treaty, was signed as well.

I want to assure my hon. friend that the tax treaty in substance, including the exchange of information convention, is substantially no different from the 50 others Canada has signed with countries all around the world.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, the hon. member wants to assure me, and I take him at his word, that is what he understands the situation to be. Would it not be a lot easier for all of us to believe what he is telling us if we knew more about the actual negotiations going on between Canada and Mexico? As a result of the fact that we seem to be systematically kept in the dark about what is actually going on, I do not think we would be doing our job if we were not at least a little bit suspicious.

If the government wants to take the opportunity we have offered it this morning by prolonging this debate a little to give us a bigger and more detailed picture of what is actually going on in the Canada–Mexico negotiations, and in so doing reinforce the view the hon. member just stated, all the better.

We will wait and see whether that opportunity is seized. I think we have good reason to be concerned. I asked the Minister for International Trade, when he was the Minister of Finance, many questions in this House about taxes, about which this treaty concerns itself. Many times he got up and refuted the many suggestions I made about the real alternatives to the GST by saying that we have to maintain what the minister calls tax competitiveness.

My fear is that in an exchange of information about taxes with Mexico the Minister for International Trade might get it in his head that we want to be tax competitive with Mexico, because obviously this notion of competitiveness is loaded. It is loaded with the notion that we somehow have to become like the nations we trade with in terms of our tax policy, our social policy and many other things. That is one of the great concerns those of us critical of the FTA, and now the North American free trade agreement, have.

These things are related whether the hon. member likes to think so or not. I agree that it would be much tidier if we could all just say that Bill S–2 really does not have anything to do with this.

The fact is that tax competitiveness, exchange of information, and the fact that Mexican politicians have a lot more information than we do about a variety of things pertaining to the Canadian–Mexican relationship are real issues, and the government should take the opportunity to deal with them.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, when the member of the New Democratic Party began his debate I really thought he was sincere in trying to link the tax preferences hidden in international treaties to a reason we should be concerned.

My colleague from Newfoundland gave a beautiful example yesterday in which the Canadian taxpayer lost close to a billion dollars because of a loophole going back to 1971. However he then went off topic and started to talk about this virtue only the NDP has in terms of its concerns for the welfare of the people of Canada, specifically getting them back to work.

I want to inform the hon. member that in the province of Ontario in the last year members of the New Democratic Party systematically worked to sabotage Canada's bid for the Olympic Games, which would have created thousands and thousands of jobs in the greater metropolitan Toronto area, not to mention the tourism opportunity.

In the last year foreign investment in the province of Ontario is down 50 per cent. Therefore, when he starts throwing cheap shots in this House at both the government and the Liberal Party, he should examine his own creative process and the damage the NDP has done in the province of Ontario.

In one year it has managed to double the number of people on welfare in Toronto, which was at one time the great economic engine of this country. In the greater metropolitan area there are now over 350,000 people unemployed.

I have absolutely no problem with the hon. member if he really wants to deal with the substance of the bill and discuss how treaties with countries like Mexico might lead to a situation in which Ontario, never mind Canada, could be turned into another Mexico. I have no problem if he was really sincere. However, his actions and those of his party in the province of Ontario demonstrate just the opposite.

In talking about relevance, he tried to link this to job creation. However, he should take that same passion and that same energy to the NDP premier in the province of Ontario and try to give him some ideas about how to once again rekindle an image which would attract foreign investment, attract orders to Canada, and fill our factories so that our people could get back to work.

Yesterday, when the New Democratic leader talked about the $30 billion being spent on welfare and UI which should be put into productive capacity, I agreed with her totally. She was being constructive. However, the member from Winnipeg is forgetting that his book needs to be revised to be constructive.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, we had a debate about relevance earlier but the hon. member has really pushed the limits by trying to relate the Olympics to the debate we are having today. That does not surprise me, considering the source. To be lectured by a Liberal on the virtues of sincerity is a bit like being lectured by a skunk on the virtues of air fresheners.

The member has studiously ignored taking the opportunity I offered the government and the Liberal Party to say anything about the Liberal Party's position on the North American free trade agreement, which was what I was talking about. The fact that he did not say a word about it speaks volumes. The silence of the Liberal Party on the North American free trade agreement speaks volumes to those Canadians who want to know in the next election whon they can trust to really be against the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and the North American free trade agreement. The silence of the member for Broadview—Greenwood speaks volumes to those Canadians about whom they can actually trust on this issue. He just showed us where they stand. They have no stand at all.

Mr. Mills: The hon. member talked talk about hypocrisy in this House. This Speaker knows that I campaigned against the free trade agreement. In my first speech in this House I talked about the free trade agreement. You referred to the member for Broadview—Greenwood, it is absolutely clear where I stood on the free trade agreement. I am opposed to it, my leader said he would rip it up. What more do you need?

An hon. member: Where does the Liberal Party stand?

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are only 45 seconds left in the question and comment period. Does the hon. member for Lethbridge want to use a few of them or is he rising on debate?

Mr. Thacker: I just wanted to comment. I have not been to the House for some time and I am sorry to see that the lovers are quarrelling over there.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the NDP did not talk at all about our tax system, how it applies to the very big business community, and the fairness or unfairness of it, because that is the subject under debate in this particular bill.

It is a very important piece of legislation. It is so important that it should be perhaps the main subject of debate in this House of Commons. We have just introduced the GST. We have just increased taxes in Canada. We have just said to all Canadians that they have to tighten their belts. Yet, operating in our Income Tax Act, our taxation policies and agreements, we have taxes and systems of write-offs which say today that Gulf Canada can pull out of Hibernia on the east coast of Canada, can pull out and leave $370 million spent, draw out of the agreement, not get any money back directly—

Mr. McCreath: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wonder if the hon. member could explain whether his remarks relate to the tax treaty with Finland, Czechoslovakia or Mexico.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member will show a little bit of patience we will get there.

Mr. Baker: I can tell the hon. member that my remarks relate to the tax treaty with Siberia, where Gulf is going to spend its money.

An hon. member: The taxpayers' money.

• (1050)

Mr. Baker: My remarks relate to the tax treaty with Burma where Petro-Canada is going to spend its money. My remarks relate to the fact that those two companies have just pulled out of Canadian operations, have just announced lay-offs in Canada. In preference for what? To spend money in Burma for oil development and spend money in Siberia for oil development.

I am talking about these tax treaties and our Income Tax Act which say that these companies get every cent spent in those foreign nations back on their taxable income as a deduction here in this country, every single penny spent. Imagine if every Canadian had that kind of a deal. Imagine, every penny spent by a Canadian company in Burma for an oil development will be returned to the company as a deduction from its taxable income.

The system operates like this. In the income tax return of an oil company, for example, as we see in this treaty today there is a deduction called—and let us be fair about this, there are deductions for Canadian development of oil, gas and mines, there are deductions for Canadian exploration—"foreign exploration and development".

This is the way it works. A company can take from its taxable income in Canada 10 per cent of what it invested in a foreign nation or the profits it made in a foreign nation from oil and gas development, either one, until 100 per cent is recovered. Of course the same thing applies to Canada, does it not? Gulf, in pulling out of Hibernia and being committed to 243 more days of payments into the project though it is no longer there, can get back the $370 million it spent because 100 per cent of its investment can be taken from its taxable income regardless of whether it is in Canada or a foreign nation.

I looked at this bill today. The hon. parliamentary secretary stood in the House and said: "They are all the same". Well, they are not all the same. All of the 50 other tax arrangements he mentioned are not all the same. This agreement with Finland he just asked me about a few moments ago has a section which says this: "Earnings means the profits after deducting therefrom $500,000 Canadian". Madam Speaker, do you know what that is? That is the deduction on capital gains. It was introduced a few years ago. It is in this bill as it applies to profits and gains. The policy of the Government of Canada is that it is only $100,000 now but if they invest in Finland it is $500,000.

That is not in the agreement with Czechoslovakia or Mexico. The hon. parliamentary secretary said: "Oh, just look at it. Just pass it all. It is all the same". It is not all the same at all. However, I will tell you what is the same.

The rationale for allowing an oil and gas company under our income tax laws, not any other company investing in foreign nations, to be able to deduct the money it spends in a foreign nation is—and the tax department and the tax experts in Revenue Canada will tell you this, they told it to me a hundred times because I have argued with them— if you do not allow a company to deduct all of its expenses overseas it will pull up its roots in Canada and will set up an establishment in that foreign country. That foreign country will then tax its profits, not the Canadian government.

All one needs to do is look at any of these conventions. What do you see? You see a description of where the company pays its taxes. Does it pay it here if it invests in Siberia as Gulf Canada is doing? Does it pay its taxes on its profits here in Canada if it is investing in Burma as Petro-Canada is doing after it closed down a thousand service stations the other day?

The law and the income tax department are pretty difficult things to get around. It spells it out pretty clearly, and I want to put it on the record because it destroys the argument used by Revenue Canada. It destroys the argument used by the Government of Canada that you need to give a 100 per cent write-off for investing in a foreign nation.

Companies are taxed on the basis of which state is the contracting one. In other words, a Canadian company investing in Siberia would be considered to be the contracting state. It says: "By reason of domicile or residence or place of management". Then it says: "Supposing there is a residence in both countries", and then: "A permanent home will be the criteria".

What if there is a permanent home in both countries? Then it will be determined by your personal and economic relations, wherever that takes place; in other words, under law, the centre of vital interest.

What if the business proves it has personal and economic relations in both of those countries? Then it boils down to where it is a national. If it is a national in both countries then it is up to negotiations between the states.

In other words, this argument that somebody, a company or a business, can just set up an office in Siberia or set one up in Burma because it is pulling out of Hibernia, off the coast of Newfoundland, and pay taxes in that country is a complete and utter fallacy. It is a complete and utter fallacy.

It is an argument put forward by people who say and who believe that certain people should not pay taxes. If you are big enough, if you are rich enough, if you are influential enough, if you lobby enough, if you can afford the big guys then you should not pay taxes.

That is the system promoted by this bill. Did you notice what the tax on dividends is? You know what it is? It can only go up to 10 per cent.

Madam Speaker, I understand you are getting ready to cut me off.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately I will have to. The hon. member will want to use the time remaining after Question Period.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

SRI LANKA

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Madam Speaker, on January 26, I arrived in the town of Batticaloa in the eastern province of Sri Lanka to be met by an elderly man who presented me with a letter neatly typed in English on an old piece of paper. In the letter the man asked me to help find his son who had disappeared some 18 months ago.

I was in Sri Lanka on a human rights fact finding mission with a group of distinguished Canadians, including my hon. colleagues from Nepean and Burnaby—Kingsway.

Little did I know that that man's letter would be the first of 261 personal submissions I would receive from people whose sons, daughters or spouses have simply disappeared.

The peace committee in Batticaloa has documented 3,418 such disappearances since June 1990.

We concluded that a tragedy of appalling proportion is occurring in Sri Lanka and frankly the government and the insurgent LTTE are equally to blame.

Only third party intervention will stop the killing and hopefully lead to a negotiated settlement. I urge the Government of Canada to show leadership through the United Nations, the Commonwealth or, better still, the—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Nepean.

SRI LANKA

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, Sri Lanka, incredibly beautiful with enormous potential, is being decimated by an ethnic conflict between the state and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Elam.

There are human rights violations on both sides of the conflict: kidnapping, massacres, individuals held for ransom, forced removal of Muslim population and arbitrary detention.

There is a climate of distrust, fear and repression throughout the country. Media is state controlled. Two hundred and fifty thousand people live in refugee camps. Every young male Tamil is in fear of persecution. Women and children are without proper food and health supplies.

Canada must take a lead position at the United Nations. Canada must ensure there is a complete embargo on all arms exports to Sri Lanka and must call on the international community to do likewise.

Canada should press the Sri Lankan government and the LTTE through the international community to agree to an immediate cease-fire. Canada should suspend the part of Canadian development assistance that is channelled through the Sri Lankan government. These funds should be reallocated to other programs in Sri Lanka.

OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House today to the fact that this is the eve of the opening ceremonies for the XVI Winter Olympic Games in Albertville, France, and that 145 Canadians are eager to take part in the competitions under the watchful eyes of the whole world.

I take this opportunity to ask hon. members to pay tribute today to the men and women of this wonderful country who have trained and sacrificed their time and leisure so generously in order to represent Canada with great distinction and unshakeable determination at these games.

As Pierre de Coubertin, the founder of the modern Olympic Games, said in 1936, the important thing about the Olympics is not so much winning but rather taking part in them.

Let us extend to our athletes our best wishes for success in France and let them know that we look forward to their return to honour them for participating in the Olympic Games.

Good luck to all our athletes.

OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, the XVI Winter Olympic Games will begin tomorrow in Albertville, France. From February 8 to 23, athletes from around the world will be competing for the gold in the spirit of universal friendship and fair play which symbolizes the Olympics.

[Translation]

Our country will be represented by about 240 Canadian men and women, the elite of our athletes, our coaches and our administrative support staff. Our athletes have worked very hard in their respective disciplines to earn a place on Canada's Olympic team. They certainly deserve our admiration and our respect for their talent and their dedication to amateur sport.

I know that all members of this House join me in wishing our athletes the greatest possible success. May they turn in the best performance ever for Canada at the Winter Olympic Games.

Good luck to our athletes.

SRI LANKA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I join with my colleagues from South Shore and Nepean in urging the Government of Canada to play a leadership role to help bring to an end the tragedy which is occurring in Sri Lanka.

There have been literally tens of thousands of deaths, of disappearances, of individuals who are victims of torture, murder and disappearance.

The human rights delegation, led by the very distinguished Dr. Lois Wilson, made a number of recommendations both to the Government of Canada and internationally.

I would note that today in Paris, the Sri Lanka donors consortium is meeting. I hope that Canada will play a lead in ensuring that there is a direct linkage between development assistance, other financial support and a clear timetable by the Government of Sri Lanka for improvements in the human rights situation and, as well, mechanisms for monitoring the human rights situation in Sri Lanka by the donor community. The cycle of violence must end. All deaths must be condemned. Jaffna and the north must be allowed to have the desperately needed food, medicine and fuel that they—

BUY CANADIAN

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, while some companies are closing Canadian plants and shifting production abroad, others are moving product lines from foreign countries to Canada.

Some of these good Canadian corporate citizens include Upjohn, Christie Brown, Canadian Thermos Products, 3M, Xerox, Proctor & Gamble, General Foods, Rubbermaid, Stanley Tools, GTE Sylvania, Dow Chemical and Dupont.

If we are concerned about plant closings and manufacturing job losses, we should be buying the products of these good Canadian corporate citizens, buying Canadian.

The government should be helping us by identifying Canadian products and initiating a buy Canadian campaign. What better way can we celebrate Canada's 125th birthday.

HIBERNIA

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): On Tuesday of this week, February 4, Gulf Oil Canada announced its required eight-month notice that it was withdrawing from the Hibernia offshore megaproject.

The remaining three consortium members, Mobil Oil, Petro-Canada and Chevron, together with the federal government, have vowed that the project will go ahead as scheduled and remain within the budget.

The next eight months will be critical to the future of Hibernia. Despite the announcement of business as usual, I have become aware that Gulf's announcement has added a great deal of uncertainty regarding Hibernia's development and has the considerable potential of dampening future business opportunities in Newfoundland and in Canada.

I therefore urge the government to quickly negotiate a deal for a new buyer and in the meantime develop a worst case scenario that will be a contingency if a buyer cannot be found and the other consortium members cannot afford to split the annual expenditures. The crunch date is October 5 of this year.

MEMBER FOR SHEFFORD

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, last night in this House, the separatist Bloc Quebecois member for Shefford spoke about the $400 billion national debt. He has a short memory. He forgot that he was a minister in the Liberal cabinet in 1983-84 and that he and his party left a national debt of $206 billion in September 1984. Compound interest of over $238 billion has been added to this Liberal debt since 1984-85, for a grand total of $444 billion.

Today this member is shocked about this national debt. Could he also have forgotten the famous Liberal scandal of the century in 1983-84: $3.9 billion in scientific research tax credits when he was a cabinet minister in the Liberal government? Madam Speaker, that is the heritage which this separatist member of the Bloc Quebecois has left to our children and the people of Canada and Quebec.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Americans spend $2,600 per person or 12 per cent of their GNP for health care. Canadians spend only $1,900 per person or 9 per cent of their GNP. Yet, despite spending 30 per cent more, 34 million Americans have no health coverage and 50 million more have inadequate health coverage.

So who has the better health care system? Is it the Canadian who can go to a hospital or a doctor's office and get immediate treatment without fear of financial ruin, or is it the Americans that have to negotiate with an insurance company for coverage they hope they can afford, wait for a few available low-standard spaces in public facilities or face financial ruin?

George Bush has joined an organized U.S. attack on our system by insurance companies, organized medicine and private hospitals because they want to maintain the U.S. system in order to maintain their high profits. They do not like the Canadian system because it is successful and is a powerful example to Americans.

I want to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare for responding to these ill-advised attacks. However, he will truly defend Canadian medicare when he reverses the $64 billion in spending cuts his government has targeted.

PENSIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Hundreds of seniors in my riding and across Canada have a message for the Prime Minister's 75-cent cost of living increase in their monthly pension cheques: Thanks a whole lot for nothing.

Seniors are calling my riding office saying this increase is a slap in the face and is quite insulting. Does the Prime Minister not realize that 75 cents will not buy a litre of milk or a loaf of bread any more? Does he not realize that 75 cents hardly covers the cost of a $10 purchase?

Why doesn't the Prime Minister or his Minister of National Health and Welfare remove the partial deindexation on seniors' pensions and remember that living on tea and toast may not be a problem for some seniors, but it is reality for thousands of others in this country. Another 75 cents sure doesn't help.

WHITE CANE WEEK

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Madam Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that this week is designated White Cane Week. Organized and promoted by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, the purpose of the week is to make all Canadians aware of the very special challenges faced by blind and visually impaired persons in our society.

The first White Cane Week grew out of the experiences of a small group of blind people who had discovered that the public generally did not understand the meaning of the white cane as a symbol of blindness. That was in 1946. Every year since then, the first week of February has been dedicated to White Cane Week.

This year's theme for White Cane Week is access to information. It is important that the public understand that blindness and severe visual impairment represent a major depravation of information about the environment that affects many aspects of daily life, including reading a newspaper, managing your home and travelling in your neighbourhood.

The CNIB and volunteers are to be congratulated for their contribution and commitment.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, I am sure you realize that two Canadians are languishing in a Brazilian jail, sentenced to 28 years for a crime that they may not have committed.

There is an answer and we can solve their problem. But the Secretary of State for External Affairs continues to drag her feet, refusing to initiate procedures which could see these two, Mr. Spencer and Ms. Lamont, return to Canada and to their families. Now we are told that the Brazilian government is anxious to accede to a request from Canada and that it would do everything that was necessary to see these two expelled from Brazil.

The families and Canadians cannot understand why the minister is delaying. Why the reticence? Why did the minister undertake to have an answer in January and why has she not yet delivered that answer? Why will the minister not help Canadians, Canadians in need of our help? It would be so easy for the minister to request the Brazilian government to expel these two Canadians and see them come home. Why?

DUCKS UNLIMITED

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, the Oldman River dam decision should now finally prompt the Minister of the Environment to do the right thing concerning the Ducks Unlimited office complex presently being constructed in the Oak Hammock marsh wildlife management area in Manitoba.

Oak Hammock Marsh is a Manitoba heritage marsh and an international RAMSAR site, and yet Ducks Unlimited has been able to proceed without an adequate environmental impact assessment. The federal government, given its responsibilities under the Migratory Birds Act, should not have let this be dealt with only through the Western Economic Diversification Office which proceeded on the basis of a sweetheart evaluation from the Canadian Wildlife Service.

The Friends of Oak Hammock Marsh request an independent, non-governmental panel, as the law requires, the cessation of funding until the process is complete and the enforcement of the current guideline orders.

I used to think well of the work that Ducks Unlimited did, but it has brought shame on itself and on the wildlife community through this hare-brained scheme of theirs at Oak Hammock marsh.

WINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Madam Speaker, many of us will recall the predictions in 1988 of the demise of the British Columbia wine industry should free trade ever happen. Instead of the industry being devastated, the complete opposite has happened.

Through an aggressive marketing plan and emphasis on a much stricter quality control, the wine industry is expanding in leaps and bounds. Increased sales in many B.C. wineries have skyrocketed to as high as 496 per cent for Calona wines. These are extraordinary increases. On top of these astounding sales figures, at a recent international wine tasting of 15 Pinot Blancs, the top three places went to B.C. products. First was the Calona Wines 1988 vintage, second Sumac Ridge 1989 vintage, third Grey Monk 1989 vintage.

The new symbol VQA has become a symbol of excellence and I am sure I join all of you in congratulating these B.C. wineries for an outstanding achievement.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. After remaining at an unacceptably high level of 10.3 per cent for three months in a row, today we learn that unemployment actually increased in January to 10.4 per cent. This means that 70,000 more people were looking for work in January than at the same time last year.

I want to ask the minister this: If his economic policies are the right ones, why is unemployment going up and not down? If those policies are so great, where is the recovery?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, of course I am deeply concerned about the increase in the unemployment levels. It is a modest increase in unemployment. However, I recognize the serious difficulties that this imposes upon all Canadians but particularly those who are looking for jobs.

As I have said before, there are no quick fixes to the problems we face. It is part of a world-wide situation. Growth in the industrialized countries has faltered, particularly in the United States. We are endeavouring to put in place the fundamentals that will provide for sustained growth and price stability. In the meantime, we are attempting to look at specific sectors that require attention, such as the agricultural industry.

I remind the hon. member that in this fiscal year we put $5.8 billion into the agricultural sector; transportation, which is experiencing serious difficulties, received a $200 million package; the de Havilland assistance package that was put together with the co-operation of the Government of Ontario; the equalization changes which will also help the less wealthy provinces. We are attempting to address the serious sectoral difficulties within our fiscal means. That is the policy of the government.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, the minister compares us with the United States. Why does he not recognize that our unemployment rate is much, much higher than that of the United States and due to the policies of this government. Those policies are creating misery and not recovery for thousands of Canadians. The government's policies are not working and that is why Canadians are not working either.

A few days ago we learned that the help wanted index was down. We learned that bankruptcies last year were at record levels. Thousands of people are losing their jobs through plant and store closings and lay-offs. Every day we learn of another one. The figures out today do not even begin to take into account the thousands of jobs to be lost in the lay-offs at places like Esso and the Stone Paper Mill in New Brunswick that were announced just earlier this week.

I ask the minister: Does this not prove we need an urgent economic recovery plan beyond anything the government has done so far? I ask the minister and the government to come to their senses and put into effect a new total economic recovery plan without any further delay.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will recognize that the adjustment process, the restructuring that the Canadian industry is undergoing, the downsizing, the consolidation, the changes in the way in which the industrial sector is doing business in order to improve their competitive position is really one of the pressures that has added to the difficulties of the recession.

While the hon. member suggests that the United States has a better unemployment rate, I remind him that at the same time I think he will find that our participation rate in the labour force is higher than the United States. As well, I should point out that notwithstanding the fact that the help wanted index has not improved, I am informed that 76 occupations accounting for 23 per cent of total employment experienced annual growth rates above 2 per cent between 1989 and 1991 and 18 occupations accounting for 3.7 per cent of the total employment experienced annual growth rates above 4 per cent during this period.

What that tells me is that it is important to engage in the skills upgrading, the training programs and the retraining programs. That is why we are increasing that training budget from $3.1 billion to $3.4 billion and the labour development program from $1.4 billion to $1.8 billion. Those are important elements that will address this difficulty to which the hon. member refers.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, the minister in his answer talks of the economy downsizing. Canadians say that the economy should not be downsizing; it should be growing. With answers like that the government's rate of support in the public opinion polls is soon going to be below the rate of unemployment. It is probably there already.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the unemployment rate is still rising and soon it will pass the government's share of support in the polls. Canadians are looking for work and they need more action from the government.

When will the minister present a new total action plan for a real economic recovery?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not want to be indifferent to the hon. member but, in fairness, nine years ago when he was over here on the Treasury benches the unemployment rate in Canada was 12.6 per cent and he certainly was not pushing the panic button then. That was certainly too high then and 10.4 is too high today.

As I indicated to him, I am in the process of completing my pre-budget consultations. I have met and discussed the economic situation widely with Canadians across the country. We will be meeting with the premiers. I have met with the finance ministers. I can assure the hon. member that any realistic suggestion that is advanced will be considered. But I have to remind the hon. member that we cannot exceed in a dramatic way our fiscal targets and we cannot consider borrowing our way out of this difficulty. Nor can we consider the option of taxing our way out of this difficulty.

TRADE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

This morning we learned that The Ottawa Citizen has obtained 17 declassified federal background studies on the impact of the proposed trade agreement between the United States, Canada and Mexico.

I want to ask the minister why he did not adhere to his responsibility to table all relevant information, including those background papers, in the House of Commons. Why did the minister and the government not want to keep Parliament and Canadians fully abreast of the facts and of the analysis of those background papers?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend is well aware that my predecessor and I have both met with the parliamentary committee. We have discussed various aspects of the negotiations and are prepared to continue to do so.

You will also note, Madam Speaker, that in the reports that were released under access to information, there were a number of areas that have not been released because of the significance of some of those conclusions in relation to the negotiating position we would want to take in the NAFTA talks right now. It is for that reason that we did not feel it was appropriate to release the reports in their entirety.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, the Minister for International Trade has now admitted on the floor of the House of Commons that we are only going to get some of the facts, not all of the facts. That is what he has just said.

The minister also knows that any trade agreement with the United States and Mexico will have serious impacts on a whole range of Canadian sectors including textiles, auto parts and plastics.

If the government is so confident of its position with regard to the bargaining process that is taking place, why have the minister and the government chosen the course to hide all of the facts from Parliament and from Canadians across this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I think anybody who is watching will see how my hon. friend has distorted the answer to the first question.

Just to put it on the record again, the point that I think bears repeating is that if we release all of the information my colleague would like to have, that would undermine the national interest of the country in pursuing the negotiations.

My hon. friend also said that we are trying to hide things. We are not trying to hide things. What we are trying to do is ensure that the negotiating position is as strong as possible.

If my hon. friend was fair in his interpretation of what those reports said, he would say that they were a balanced reflection of what the negotiating objectives should be of the Government of Canada in these negotiations so that we can understand what the strengths, the benefits and the clear reasons are for us to be in those negotiations in the national interest relative to some of the things that we should be looking out for in the conduct of the negotiations.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Today statistics show that the number of unemployed is still growing: 40,000 permanent jobs have disappeared since November. Unemployment costs the taxpayers $30 billion a year and the bill is going up every day. How will the government pay for unemployment? Will it raise taxes, add to the deficit or finally put these people back to work?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I have indicated in the House on a number of occasions, we are taking steps in the various sectors to help those sectors that are in difficulties, such as agriculture, the transportation sector in regional development programs, tourism programs, saving jobs for example in the de Havilland plant in Toronto.

My colleague, the Minister of Communications, announced a program to support the book publishing industry. My colleague from Newfoundland, the minister of fisheries, announced a Newfoundland roads agreement the other day.

Equalization has been modified which will put $600 million into the hands of the provinces over the next two years. The 95 per cent CMHC guaranteed mortgage has been introduced. Increases in the UI development fund, all of these things are initiatives that we are doing within the fiscal capacity of the government.

I remind the hon. member who suggests that we can spend our way out of this recession of what her own colleague, the premier of British Columbia, said. I share this view because it is a view that is shared by many of the provincial premiers. He said: "We are determined to lower our deficit. You cannot spend your way out of the recession". Mr. Harcourt said that, and I agree.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, what Canadians know is that 40,000 permanent jobs have been lost since November.

What Canadians know is that 56,000 Canadians have even given up looking for work. They have lost hope recently. I want to say to the Minister of Finance, another 56,000 people who have given up hope is like the entire city of Waterloo or Lethbridge or Brossard stopping to look for work. No jobs and no hope, that is the message that this government is giving to Canadians.

My question to the Minister of Finance is this: Will he, his government and his Prime Minister seriously consider at the First Ministers Conference listening to ideas for job creation like the municipal infrastructure program and give Canadians some hope and some jobs?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, of course we will listen and we will do whatever we can afford to do that will be helpful.

I understand what the hon. member is getting at and I share that concern. Also, I think she should recognize with the gradual reduction in interest rates and the lowering of inflation which reduces cost, all of this has had a very positive effect.

There is a headline that says: "Signs of Life in the Canadian Economy". That is encouraging.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): They're wrong.

Mr. Mazankowski: My hon. friend from Edmonton thinks that is a joke. He may think it is a joke, but here is another one.

The Toronto Globe and Mail today, and coming from western Canada I am sure he would appreciate that, says that wheat prices can continue to reach for the sky. That will certainly provide some optimism and confidence for the agricultural producers.

The Financial Post of February 3 said: "GDP—".

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think we must go on.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary.

I think Canadians who are listening to this must wonder if trying to understand the government's economic policies is like milking a cow for eggs. I want to raise again with this government that its policies are leading to unemployment. Every day we read the number of lay-offs, almost 500,000 jobs since the trade deal came into effect, and today formerly secret documents indicate that studies done on the potential trade deal with Mexico indicate that jobs will be lost in several sectors: auto parts, textiles, and footwear.

• (1130)

I want to say to the government that we do not even know what will happen in the environment because most of that was blacked out in the documents.

I ask the minister responsible for international trade why these studies were not made public. Why can Canadians not see the draft agreement? Why can we in Parliament not be able to debate what this government's position is when it knows that the trade deal will not be in the best interests of Canada as these studies indicate and as many Canadians know?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, as always we have very selective reading of the reports that my hon. friend is talking about.

If she is seriously thinking of the national interest, as I responded to her friend from Nova Scotia, she would understand that providing all the information that she wants would undermine our negotiating position. I would also remind her that the draft agreement, which has an awful lot of what we call bracketed tax elements of the agreement that are still subject to extensive negotiation, has not been made available to people in the United States or to people in Mexico.

As I have indicated in the past I am—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My friends over there say they are not true. I would ask them to go and seek out the information. Very clearly they will find that it is true.

My friend says Carla Hills has already confirmed it. He says Carla Hills says that the Mexican senators have it. I know that the Mexican senators do not have it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

TRADE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, in the face of the continued unacceptably massive levels of unemployment in this country, and the papers released today give Canadians reason to be concerned that further additional jobs are going to be rapidly lost in this country, the government continues in the negotiation now under way in the Canada–U.S.–Mexico trade pact.

I want to quote from a document from the minister's own department that says: "If major NU sectors such as automotive and electrical electronics migrate south as a result of the liberalization of trade with Mexico, supplier industries such as plastics would be required to relocate close to their customers to the disadvantage of Canadian facilities. A U.S–Mexico FTA might have the effect of accelerating industry rationalization along the Mexico–U.S. border".

That is not a selective reading. That is a direct quote of the document.

Should Canadians not know that the minister who gave them the Canada–U.S. trade deal is now in the middle of giving them the gears with a Canada–U.S.–Mexico trade deal, and should they not have all the facts, not selected facts, from this government?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, the level of someone's voice does not help in understanding the nature of the debate we are having today. What I have said very clearly is that if we provide this information in full as the hon. member wants, it will undermine the position of the Government of Canada in negotiating.

My hon. friend also neglects to point out that the underlying conclusion, the bottom line conclusion, of the studies is that it is appropriate and entirely right for Canada to enter into these negotiations to seek out ways of protecting our interests and ensuring that the Canadian industry is well served through what will undoubtedly be an agreement between the United States and Mexico. Surely, and I believe it was the position of his party, it is the right thing for us to be at that table protecting the Canadian interests.

My hon. friend talks about the free trade agreement with the United States. Did he not listen to the member for Okanagan who was talking about the wine industry in B.C.? There is a report in the paper about the wine industry in Ontario. Both have done well under the free trade agreement. The position of the Liberal Party of Canada—

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may pass a comment to the House, I think we would all gain by shorter questions and shorter answers. Today we have had very long questions and very long answers.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I will attempt to put a short supplementary. I have a short quote: "Under a U.S.–Mexico FTA, Canadian exports to Mexico could be displaced by U.S. exports ". That is with respect to textiles. That again is the minister's own department.

I ask the minister this: Is it not reasonable, given the promised benefits and the actual reality of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, that the government now come clean with Canadians on the benefits and on the cost of a Canada–U.S.–Mexico trade deal? Is it not time to end the cover–up in the negotiations?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, the bottom line conclusion of the reports that my hon. friend refers to is that Canada should be at the table. What my hon. friend is referring to is trade between Mexico and the United States.

If there is going to be an agreement between Mexico and the United States that will affect trade between Mexico and the United States and could have an impact on Canada, surely we should be at the table to protect the Canadian interest in that particular sector.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

One million, four hundred and twenty–nine thousand Canadians are out of work. Forty thousand full–time jobs were lost last month. Not only is this unacceptable, it is unconscionable. Nine months ago the Minister of Finance told Canadians that the recession was over, yet the bleeding continues right across the country.

I would like to ask the minister of employment what hope does he have for these million and a half Canadians who are desperately searching for work?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I think that we share the concern of the hon. member for unemployed people. I guess we have a different approach. The Liberal Party and the NDP call for further taxes and more deficit for make work projects. We are getting the fundamentals of the economy right so that the private sector can create lasting jobs, not make work projects.

This is the path we are following. When I look at the provisions of the OECD, I see they point to Canada as the country that should have the best performance in 1992. I think that our people can take comfort in having programs in place to do what is right, and that is training them so that they have the skills to occupy those better jobs.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): My supplementary is for to the minister of unemployment.

The government is abandoning Canadians on all fronts. There are 399,000 unemployed in Quebec, 504,000 Canadians unemployed in Ontario, and in the minister's home province there are now 42,000 people unemployed.

I would like to ask the minister this: What does he say to his constituents, what does he say to the people in his very own province, those who are looking for some hope, some employment? Has he abandoned them as well?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Madam Speaker, I have not abandoned them. The government is not abandoning anyone. But the government will not put in place band-aid solutions.

Would Canadians believe that at this time of high unemployment there are some 300,000 vacancies in this country that cannot be filled because of a skill shortage?

The emphasis that we put on providing training and skills for Canadians is a sure way of ensuring lower unemployment in the future. I think that is the right direction to take.

Oral Questions

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, as a prelude to my question, I want to say that I have been in public life for 25 years. When a member gets up and suggests that an issue I raised in this House means that I am not telling the truth, I am prepared to stake my seat against his seat over that issue.

• (1140)

Last Monday and Tuesday I asked the minister, and I intend to ask again today, if he would confirm or deny the fact that Mexican senators have had access to the U.S.-Canada-Mexico draft bracketed agreement. This was confirmed to me by Carla Hills' office and by a spokesperson from the Mexican Embassy.

Yesterday I just learned—

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Barrett: My question to the minister is this: Last week the U.S. Congress budget committee on external trade had briefings on the bracketed Mexico treaty.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I ask the hon. member to put his question, please.

Mr. Barrett: I put the question; I ask the minister this question: if the Mexican senators have had access to the draft bracketed treaty, if the American congressmen have had access to the draft bracketed treaty, why are not Canadian politicians given access to the same treaty?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend will realize, in his question, that he is talking about two things: one is access to the actual text and the other is briefings.

Mr. Barrett: They have had both.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My understanding, from what I have been told by both the Americans and the Mexicans, is that there have been briefings but there has not been access to the actual text. That is the purport of the question that my hon. friend yelled across the House at me a few minutes ago.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, let me be clear when I say access.

My question to the minister is this: The Mexican senators have had access and briefings on the document. The document was given to them in a room and they were briefed from the document. They held the document in their hands.

The American Congress counterparts have had access and the document in their hands. American congressmen went into the room and were handed copies of the draft bracketed agreement. Staff after security clearance were handed copies of the draft bracketed agreement. They have had copies. They have had access. They have had briefings. We have had nothing.

What are you keeping secret from the Canadian people?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I said on Tuesday that I would be appearing before the external affairs—

Mr. Barrett: That is not my question, that is not my question.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): If my hon. friend would let me give a reply to him, I said on Tuesday that I would be prepared to discuss with the committee the various aspects of the text—of the negotiations of interest to them.

His information is different from my information. There is an honest difference—

Mr. Barrett: Don't you call me a liar.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I beg your pardon.

Mr. Barrett: Don't you call me a liar.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There is obviously a difference of opinion, but I do not think that calling anyone a liar or trying to make someone say that someone has said something else will help things at this point. I think we should go on.

BUY CANADIAN

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

A great many Canadians who are concerned about plant closings and manufacturing job losses want to buy Canadian.

Will the government undertake to initiate a buy Canadian campaign across the country? Will it also publish a list of Canadian made products, or are we prohibited from doing this by the free trade agreement?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, I think what my hon. friend is asking an important question. To inform Canadians about the facts is important as well.

As said yesterday, when we look at housing, transportation, food, health and education and we compare with the Americans, the cost of living in Canada is lower than in the United States. So it is not that bad. I think the initiative of my colleagues, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and the Minister of Employment and Immigration, on competitiveness will make the market more competitive.

What we need is a market that is competitive. When the market is competitive the consumers get the benefit. What the member says about the fact that Canadian businesses could ask Canadians to buy Canadian is a good idea for them. However, I think it should be initiated by Canadians, by the business community.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, while this government continues to suffer from its decision-making paralysis, young people's hopes are being shattered in this nation. There are nearly 100,000 more unemployed young people in Canada this January than last January.

When will the Minister of Employment and Immigration realize that our youth want a green light, not a pink slip?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I do not know what this kind of question accomplishes. I know one thing, that this government, along with Canadians in the private sector, has shifted the priority from make work projects to training in order to help the youth, in order to help young Canadians obtain jobs that can last.

I know that the Liberal Party is for make work projects, but not this government. We believe in the future of our youth and the investment we make is in skills for people. We would rather invest in people than in poverty.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, in order to lead a nation one must show people a future. The future that our young people see in Canada today is very bleak and very dark. We have a generation of chronically unemployed young Canadians.

What is the minister going to do immediately to put an end to this very desperate human tragedy?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, it is of no comfort to young Canadians to tell them that. In 1984, when we took office, the rate of unemployment among young people was higher than it is today, much higher.

What we are doing for young Canadians is providing them with a range of programs that will allow them to have the skills to occupy those jobs in the private sector that will last and not make-work jobs.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. Yesterday the minister admitted in this House that the government had failed to do an impact study on the Dunkel proposals at the GATT.

The 1,500 farmers presently demonstrating in front of the office of the Minister of Agriculture want to know when the government will explain its gross negligence when 100,000 jobs are at stake.

Is it not true that the real reason is because the government has already given up at the GATT?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, again another indication of gross distortion by the other side.

We have made it very clear that our position is not to accept tariffication but to seek ways of strengthening and clarifying article XI of the GATT.

We have at the request of the farmers developed some information which we have provided to them to help them understand the impact. We have told the farmers themselves that if they want to join with us in the development of the impacts, we would be happy for them to do so. They are the ones who can best help us in that. At this point in time they have not offered to help with the work on developing what the impact would actually be.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I guess the minister wants the farmers to do the negotiating at the GATT as well as do the farming.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I have here in my hand a document from the minister that tells Conservative members how to avoid answering questions about GATT. It is on the minister's letterhead. How come the minister had the time to prepare this document telling members how not to answer questions from their constituents but did not have time to study the impact on an endangered industry and on 100,000 jobs that might be lost? Is it not true that the real reason is that the minister and his government have already conceded in GATT?

• (1150)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, throughout the GATT negotiations on agricultural issues we have consulted closely and in depth with the farm communities and have developed the positions during that time in consultation and with the full support of the farm community.

Surely my hon friend would expect, if we were to take this another step further and do an in depth study on the impact of the Dunkel proposal, that we would do the study in consultation with the people who are affected, the people who have a fuller understanding of the impacts. That has not been the position of the agricultural communities.

We have said quite clearly that we are prepared to have that sort of an impact study done on a joint basis. Whenever they accept that we will be prepared to start to work.

TAXATION

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

Yesterday in this House we heard that Petro-Canada and Gulf Canada, while cutting back on operations in this country, are at the same time investing in foreign ventures and that they have the ability to deduct those investment costs from Canadian earnings.

At a time when our country is just beginning to witness economic recovery, how can the minister justify giving major concessions and advantages to Canadian oil companies that are making these foreign investments?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, yesterday my very good friend from Gander—Grand Falls suggested that—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: He is a good friend. He suggested that Revenue Canada gave advance rulings to Petro-Canada and Gulf Canada approving massive write-offs from offshore. Nothing could be further from the truth. In fact there were no representations made to Revenue Canada by either of those companies.

In any event, the hon. member who just asked the question knows that all Canadians, individuals or corporate, who make profits outside the country have to pay tax within Canada, even though the profits are made offshore. Therefore, it goes without saying that if they pay tax in Canada from profits offshore, they will also receive deduction provisions according to the Income Tax Act.

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who I am sure is well aware of the close this week of the asbestos mine at Cassiar in northwestern B.C. Hundreds of workers and their families are about to move out of Cassiar and urgently require federal decisions on tax status of severance pay both from the union and from the receiver.

Will the minister give his assurance that he will fast track decisions on federal assistance and programs like relocation and training, and in particular on an exemption like that given to Pine Point on severance pay, because Cassiar meets all of the requirements of the Ministry of Finance such as isolation, single industry and no other economic opportunities. The workers need the money now because they are moving, not two or three months from now.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there is no formal or general policy governing this kind of a situation. But the hon. member is correct when he indicates that remissions have been granted in certain cases, depending upon the degree of isolation and the opportunities that exist for alternative employment.

I would advise the hon. member that we will look at this situation as we have looked at other cases on a case-by-case basis. If the hon. member would instruct Cassiar to send the information to us with all the details, I would assure him and the people of Cassiar that we would look into it and get back to them as quickly as possible.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I thank the Minister of Finance for that positive reply.

My supplementary question on the same situation is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I am sure he is aware that the Dease River Band immediately north of Cassiar and the Thaltans immediately to the south in Dease Lake, Telegraph Creek and Iskut are similarly going to be negatively impacted.

Since the minister knows that the province of B.C. has made a multi-million dollar proposal to soften the landing for those in the community of Cassiar, does the minister of Indian affairs have a comparable plan for the aboriginal residents who are going to be negatively impacted in the nearby communities?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the question of my hon. friend.

Of course I and other ministers of this cabinet are very concerned about employment loss, particularly in single resort communities such as Cassiar.

I am sure my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, is considering the possible benefits of work force adjustment and Community Futures programs. I have asked my officials also to do an inventory of the impact on the Dease Lake and the Thaltan communities.

I would remind the hon. member that it is important he as a member of Parliament give his support to major economic development projects in northern British Columbia such as the Golden Bear Mine, which was recently approved, where the Thaltan community is very much a partner in that venture.

UKRAINE

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance. It concerns the liabilities and assets of the former U.S.S.R.

The Prime Minister of Ukraine, Mr. Fokin, has invited the creditor nations of the former U.S.S.R., the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank to a conference to be held in Kiev on February 18, to discuss the problem of the partition of the liabilities and assets of the former U.S.S.R.

Ukraine has accepted its share of liabilities but wants to discuss as well the assets that the former U.S.S.R. is holding abroad, including in Canada.

Would the minister indicate to the House who is going to represent Canada at this conference? What is the position of the Canadian government concerning this important matter?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that is an ongoing issue that is discussed within the aegis of the G-7 countries.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I would like him to explain to us how his government intends to build the future of the country when 40,000 jobs were lost in January alone, 4,000 of these in Quebec. Is he waiting till just before the election to announce job creation projects or will he act today?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, we intend to build the country by not following the policies embodied by the Liberal Party of Canada, which would raise the deficit and tax people even more. We know that is the Liberal Party's solution. Our economic policy is meant to create a climate that is favorable to investment and in which the labour force can hold these jobs. That is the plan we are following and it is working, Madam Speaker.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, before the government talks about Bombardier, which is in my riding, I remind you that it is only one employer and that other companies like Kraft and Pratt & Whitney regularly cut employment. The jobless rate is going up all the time in Quebec. Right now in the Montreal area nearly 195,000 people are desperately looking for work. What does the government intend to do this year to help these people?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, to help these people, the government intends to spend over $3 billion on a host of adjustment programs from which these people can benefit. There are $150 million for community development, $412 million for job entry and $78 million for on the job training. Furthermore, these programs are in addition to support programs like unemployment insurance, which amounts to some $17 billion. They are all programs available to these people so that they can, we hope, acquire the skills needed to hold a job.

As I said earlier, Madam Speaker, despite the high unemployment rate, our information shows that about 300,000 jobs in this country cannot be filled because people do not have the required skills. This is the problem that must be addressed.

CENTRAL GUARANTY TRUST

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for financial institutions.

The sad saga of Central Guaranty Trust Company continues to unfold with indecision and confusion contributing to some of its shares fluctuating in value from $2.25 to $11 in the last month. Small shareholders in the Atlantic provinces and across Canada have been and are being badly burned while the regulator fiddles.

What is the government going to do to protect the interest of shareholders, depositors and taxpayers as Canadians' trust and confidence erode in a very important segment of our financial system?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions is reviewing this matter and has not as yet brought a recommendation to me. I am told that it is under very active consideration. I think the hon. member would recognize it would be inappropriate for me to comment while these negotiations are ongoing, but as soon as we get word I would be pleased to let the hon. member know.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister tell us or confirm today when a final decision will be made on the survival of VIA in Abitibi?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Abitibi will surely be pleased to know that as a result of his involvement we have been able to arrange meetings between the VIA authorities and representatives of the Senneterre Chamber of Commerce that yielded results which seem satisfactory to both parties. Their discussions at that time are part of the study that VIA is now completing on all services to remote regions. We hope to be able to provide him with a detailed answer in a few weeks.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

MYOTONIC DYSTROPHY

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to rise on behalf of my colleague, the Minister for Science who has an unavoidable previous commitment, to make reference to the announcement on Wednesday in the media that a major breakthrough had been made in the study of the most common form of muscular dystrophy, myotonic dystrophy.

Hon. members may be aware that this debilitating disease affects the muscles but can also involve the eyes, heart, lungs or digestive system. In Canada about one person in 7,000 suffers from this disease, but in some areas the incidence runs as high as one in 500.

The Canadian Genetic Diseases Network announced that Dr. Robert Korneluk of the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario, one of the network's 23 principal investigators, has isolated the genetic defect responsible for the myotonic dystrophy. This is the latest in a series of genetic discoveries in Canada. The cystic fibrosis gene was discovered by another member of the network. The muscular dystrophy gene was discovered by Dr. Ronald Worton.

I would like to point out to the House that each of these researchers is a member of the Canadian Genetic Diseases Network. Since the network was created in 1989 as part of the networks of centres of excellence program it has quickly demonstrated the effectiveness of national collaboration in fostering scientific research.

Since last year the network's program has been funded to the rate of $450,000 over the next five years for Dr. Korneluk's research. As my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest pointed out yesterday, another $400,000 in funding was also provided by the Medical Research Council, which is Canada's major agency funding medical research.

The Muscular Dystrophy Association of Canada and its United States counterparts as well as the Research Institute of the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario and the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario Auxiliary contributed to the research.

Madam Speaker, you know the alliances, the partnerships and the collaborations that are key to scientific research both in Canada and around the world. Dr. Korneluk worked with colleagues in the United States, Netherlands and Great Britain in isolating the gene. On behalf of the Government of Canada I would like to congratulate Dr. Korneluk and his colleagues.

I would also like to thank the 165 families in the Ottawa area who participated in Dr. Korneluk's research. This was the largest group of families affected by myotonic dystrophy ever to be studied. I know that these families and many more across Canada and around the world will take heart from this discovery.

In the short term it is going to mean more rapid diagnosis of myotonic dystrophy. In the long term it may mean new breakthroughs in ways to treat the disease.

In addition, the discovery will help advance the course of science in Canada, science that is not only key to Canada's prosperity but is also helping Canadians to live healthier lives.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise to offer congratulations to those who have isolated the genetic defect responsible for myotonic muscular dystrophy.

This landmark breakthrough was made here in Ottawa by Dr. Robert Korneluk and a research team at the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario.

As we all know, muscular dystrophy is a tragic disease. Myotonic dystrophy is the most common form affecting adults. Its symptoms are progressive weakness and myotonia, which is an inability to relax muscles after they have contracted.

At this time there is no treatment for this form of muscular dystrophy. All that can be provided is physical therapy and medication to help muscles relax. This discovery will mean dramatically improved diagnosis. Most important, doctors will be better able to advise parents who come from families with a history of the disease so they will know whether they risk passing on this genetic defect.

Of course the discovery raises our hopes that we are much closer to finding a treatment or cure for this disease.

Madam Speaker, it often seems in this House that we have a lot of problems to address, a lot of negative issues to deal with. In a world where things so often go wrong, these medical advances seem nothing less than a miracle.

It is one of those times when members of the scientific research community, who spend so many years of their lives in often frustrating research, are publicly recognized for their great efforts.

Again, on behalf of the Liberal Party and all the families and victims of this disease, my congratulations to all those involved in this breakthrough.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, our spokesperson on this very important issue is en route to the Chamber as we speak. I wonder if we could simply agree to progress with the Routine Proceedings and as soon as he— It is appropriate that he speak now, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, all Canadians have a right to be proud of some of the scientific work of our people in the medical field. Canada has had a history of medical research going back to the discovery of insulin. I am delighted to see this government supporting that effort.

However, one of the things that has bothered me over the last two years while I have been in this House and on the health committee is watching the government's dedication to health research being eroded. In the last year the government has consistently cut back on the research funds it has available both in terms of grants to organizations and grants to colleges and universities.

We can all be proud of the discoveries that have been announced in the last week. Certainly it will have an impact on our health care system because it deals with a major breakthrough in one of the more disabling diseases. I wonder how many more breakthroughs we could have had if this government had maintained its commitment to medical research and its commitment to developing a high calibre of medical scientific research in Canada.

• (1210)

It is very nice for the government and all of us to take credit, but the best way this government could take credit would be to encourage medical research and new breakthroughs and restore the funding that they have cut from medical research budgets in the last few years.

SUPPLY

MOTION OF NON-CONFIDENCE IN GOVERNMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I could seek unanimous consent of the House to put the following motion:

> That during the supply period ending March 31, 1992, all motions moved pursuant to Standing Order 81(14) be deemed not to be motions of confidence in the government.

I would like to seek unanimous consent to be able to put this motion today.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member for Kamloops have unanimous consent to present his motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

PETITIONS

SUPPLY MANAGEMENT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to present a petition signed by 600 constituents of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell to convince the government to protect the supply management system that now exists under article XI of GATT. This petition is in addition to ones that 1,900 other people have already sent to me in the past.

[English]

VIOLENT CRIME

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I also have a petition signed by a number of constituents of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and elsewhere who have asked me to table it for them in regard to crimes in society and, in particular, bringing to our attention the case of Nina de Villiers.

I want to take this opportunity to congratulate my colleague from Hamilton Mountain who has been such a vocal spokesperson for our caucus and indeed for all Canadians on this important issue.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition which was signed by hundreds of Canadians from Burnaby, Vancouver and elsewhere in British Columbia which notes that in February 1985 the House of Commons mandated the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to prepare a report on equality rights in Canada. That committee unanimously recommended to the government in October that the Human Rights Act be amended to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation in all areas of federal jurisdiction. We have been waiting almost six years now for the government to keep that promise.

Therefore the petitioners urge the government to bring forward an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of the interior of British Columbia from a whole set of communities too numerous to list. They are concerned about plans to divert one of the major British Columbia rivers partly into a number of channels that would eventually end up delivering British Columbia water into the Los Angeles, California area.

The petitioners are asking that the Government of Canada state categorically that our rivers in Canada are not for sale.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present a petition on behalf of a number of the residents of the Kamloops region of British Columbia who are concerned about the cutbacks in financial support to the RCM Police. The petitioners are indicating a number of concerns they have in terms of the ability of the RCMP to fulfil its mandate and are asking the federal government to ensure that proper funding is provided to the police force in Canada.

VIOLENT CRIME

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Madam Speaker, following the tragic murder of Nina de Villiers on August 9, 1991, my constituents have asked me to present a petition to the House of Commons asking that the government revise the Parole Act, the Bail Reform Act, as well as the Criminal Code of Canada, to deal with people who are out on parole and who in this case has committed a further grievous crime.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I have petitions on three matters that I would like to present this afternoon.

First, quite a large number of constituents who have joined our Canadian family from the country of Bangladesh are petitioning that the government establish a full service immigration program at the Canadian Embassy in Dakar, Bangladesh. People from that country have experienced great difficulty in having to travel to India in order to pursue their immigration files.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Second, Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of my constituency of Ottawa South who are calling upon the government to correct an injustice which seems to be occurring in the marketing of petroleum products in the eastern Ontario area. All members will be aware of how expensive it is to buy gasoline in Ottawa compared to almost every other part of Canada.

VIOLENT CRIME

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Finally, Madam Speaker, I too would like to present a petition from a number of my constituents who have responded to the tragic circumstances of the death of Nina de Villiers. These petitioners are calling upon Parliament to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act in response to the circumstances surrounding that tragic event.

I too would like to congratulate the member for Hamilton Mountain for her initiative in respect of this matter.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present petitions from a large number of people from Quebec who state that six years ago this government promised to amend the Human Rights Code to ensure that sexual orientation be a prohibited ground for discrimination. The Canadian Human Rights Commission has also called for this amendment. The Minister of Justice has made a commitment to this amendment but still there has been no action.

These petitioners are calling on Parliament to bring forward immediately an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground for discrimination.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from approximately 100 residents of the municipality of Tofino on the west coast of Vancouver Island urging the government to restore proper funding to the RCMP so that it can fulfil its mandate and its role as the only visible police force for communities across British Columbia and remain as a visible symbol of Canadian unity.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I have a further petition, Madam Speaker, signed by 750 people from numerous communities across British Columbia and the other provinces of Canada calling on Parliament to bring forward immediately an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground for discrimination.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I have three petitions to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, the first signed by a large number of Canadians from one coast to another who are petitioning Parliament to bring forward immediately an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground for discrimination.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Second, Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by a number of citizens of my own constituency, from the cities of Nelson and Castlegar and the village of Salmo and the communities of Crescent Valley, Procter and South Slocan.

The petitioners state that whereas the goods and services tax is applied to feminine sanitary products such as tampons and pads, and whereas these products are necessities for women in the same way that other products are necessities for other Canadians, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to consider removing the goods and services tax from women's sanitary products.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Finally, a number of my constituents from a number of cities, villages and communities throughout Kootenay West—Revelstoke point out that especially at a time of serious instability in the international oil markets Canadians need Petro-Canada to act as a watch-dog in the mostly foreign owned and controlled oil industry to ensure that Canadians are not being gouged in the purchase of their own energy resources.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to repeal Bill C-84 and keep Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation acting in the best interests of all Canadians.

HEALTH

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition from women across Canada—and I see that there are even men who have signed the petition—who are increasingly concerned about the scientific evidence which has raised doubts about the safety of the Meme breast implant. They are even more concerned about the health protection branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare and its handling of dangers of the Meme breast implant, which it has known about for the past several years.

The petitioners ask Parliament to establish an independent judicial inquiry into the testing and approval process for all medical devices, and in particular the Meme breast implant.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): In addition, I have a petition similar to several others introduced today. This particular petition is from people from Toronto concerned about that the fact that it has been four years since the statement of the government about taking whatever measures were necessary to ensure that sexual orientation is prohibited as a ground for discrimination. In view of the fact that Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Yukon have such protection already included in the Human Rights Act, they humbly call upon Parliament to ensure that the government and Parliament act to bring forward immediately an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I too have a petition which has been signed by hundreds of Canadians, including a great many from the Windsor area, pointing out that the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs prepared a report on equality rights in Canada. In that report it suggested that there should be a number of changes in the Canadian Human Rights Act, including an end to discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

In March 1986 the government accepted the report and the petitioners call upon the government to follow through on that commitment made six years ago and put it into legislation.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Governement in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, Question No. 173 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 173—Mr. Young:

1. With respect to the 1985–86 Treasury Board announcement on the decontrol of certain person-years, by department, how many person-years have been reduced from the 1985–86 base year up to and including the 1990–91 Main Estimates?

2. Since 1985–86 to 1990–91 how many person-years in the Department of Indian and Northern Development have been eliminated as a result of transferring program funds and responsibilities to Indian bands where these bands have hired staff from the funds provided?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): In total the government reduced 23,542 person-years from the Public Service over the five years between 1985–86 and 1990–91. This represented a reduction of approximately 10 per cent of the adjusted 1985–86 authorized person-year levels (see Note 1). From this amount, 11,165 person-years were reallocated to respond to new priorities and to maintain critical service levels related to health, safety and security. The net result was that there were 12,377 fewer person-years authorized in the 1990–91 Main Estimates than in 1985–86.

Note 1: Over the years the Treasury Board has approved a number of adjustments to its policy on person-year controls, which had the effect of eliminating such controls over specific organizations or particular groups or classes of employee. To ensure a consistent comparison, the analysis above adjusts the authorized person-year levels originally reported in all years including the base year to reflect any changes in the size of the Treasury Board person-year controlled universe.

2. (i) The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was reduced by 2,143 person-years from its 1985–86 base level of 6,245 to its 1990–91 level of 4,102.

(ii) Of the total departmental reduction of 2,143 person-years 1,370 is attributable to the transfer of program funds and responsibilities to First Nations and their organizations. The other person-year reductions resulted from transfers of program funds and responsibilities to the territorial governments and from efficiency gains made throughout the department.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

M. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I know that the parliamentary secretary has been doing his best and we have had a veritable flurry of answers to questions this week. However I cannot help but draw to his attention, and I know he would want me to draw it to his attention, the slowness with which the government has proceeded on Question No. 4, as an example, on the Order Paper. It has been there since May 13 of last year. It has been Almost 12 months now.

There is also Question No. 49 of May 21 last year. Both those questions requested a response within 45 days.

It is making a bit of a laughing stock of the Order Paper. I know that the members who put the questions down are not objecting to the government's delay and foot-dragging on this issue. However I am, because I think it is an outrage.

The Solicitor General knows full well that there are rules requiring his department to answer within 45 days. The questions are on the Order Paper and then the members cannot put more on because if members are at their maximum of four questions they are stuck.

The 45-day rule is being worse than ignored; it is trampled underfoot by this uncaring government. I would ask if the parliamentary secretary would perhaps take the House into his confidence and give members some reason the government has failed to respond in a timely manner to their questions?

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I am very impressed with the thoughtfulness of the hon. member in his concern for his colleagues. I hope that perhaps we could transfer him for the debate.

Otherwise, I can tell him that we are continuing to look at the questions. We are doing our best to get them answered. He knows I have answered a significant number of questions this week. It is no wonder I have bags under my eyes as we come to this Friday.

Mr. Boudria; Madam Speaker, I also want to put on record the few questions that I have asked, particularly in regard to the Secor contract of last September 16. Another one concerned the hospitality expenses of every deputy minister. Finally, on September 18 I asked about golf club memberships paid by the government and all of its agencies. I know that those three questions are probably difficult to understand. They may even touch a nerve. The rules of this House do not provide for different circumstances when one's nerves are touched. They provide for 45 days. None of the three questions have been answered.

Furthermore, members cannot place any more than four questions on the Order Paper. By not answering these questions the government is preventing me from asking more questions.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do understand what the hon. member is saying. However he must realize that his colleague from Kingston and the Islands rose on a point of order. He was close to a speech. Now the hon. member is getting into debate. It is a point of order which does not require a speech to make the point.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I want to simply reply to the hon. member. He asked that his questions be delivered to all departments, all agencies and, in one case, all Crown corporations.

Even he should understand that this is a considerable amount of work to be done and I am sorry it takes so long. Perhaps next time he could be a little more specific in his questions. I am sure we could respond quicker.

Mrs. Maheu: Madam Speaker, I have been listening attentively to the responses from the government side on these questions on the Order Paper.

My question requires a simple yes or no answer. It has been on the Order Paper since May 13. I was asking the government if it intends to table the report on the race relations task force headed by Mr. Linton Garner.

An hon. member: What could be simpler?

Mr. Cooper: Question No. 4, I do not know.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

HIBERNIA

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to rise on this particular occasion on this subject.

I submitted a request to the Speaker yesterday for an emergency debate under Standing Order 52 on the Hibernia situation. As I pointed out in my letter, this request was made to adjourn the House to debate this subject because the recent notice given by Gulf Canada to withdraw from the Hibernia offshore oil management project has added a great deal of uncertainty regarding Hibernia's development and could have, if it has not already, a dampening effect on future contracts and business opportunities in Newfoundland and Canada.

This negative cascade, this cumulative effect, the uncertainty this engenders in a dismal economic outlook in Newfoundland, indeed in Canada, deserves debate under the rules of Standing Order 52 in the House of Commons.

I humbly request and ask leave to move adjournment of this House now for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgency, namely that measures be undertaken by the government to preserve the continuity of this project.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1230)

Madam Deputy Speaker: I want to thank the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

His request did come to the attention of the Chair yesterday. I will tell the hon. member that this was discussed yesterday with Mr. Speaker. We came to the conclusion that, without in any way diminishing the importance of the Hibernia situation in the Atlantic region, the hon. member's request today for an emergency debate does not meet with the requirements of Standing Order 52.

Hopefully there will be other times and other moments to discuss this matter which is very important to the hon. member and particularly to the region he represents.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA–FINLAND INCOME TAX CONVENTION ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McDermid that Bill S–2, an act to implement conventions between Canada and Finland, Canada and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic and Canada and the United Mexican States for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax and the prevention of fiscal evasion and a convention between Canada and the United Mexican States for the exchange of information with respect to taxes, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(b), because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by six minutes.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, as I was saying about this bill on double taxation, my concern is that there is no taxation.

What the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception just tried to move in this House regarding an emergency debate on Hibernia relates to this bill because Gulf Canada decided to pull out of Hibernia in Canada and to go ahead with an investment in Siberia.

Petro–Canada, our great national oil company put in place by the taxpayers of Canada, recently announced the closure of gas stations across Canada. It is an enormous cutback. At the same time Petro–Canada is investing in an oil development in Burma.

The bill we have before us today relates to agreements concerning income tax. Income tax was introduced in this country on the basis of progressive taxation. The term income tax as it emerged in Canada during the First World War was demanded by the farmers of western Canada and the workers of eastern Canada. It was demanded by the people. It is the only tax I know of that was demanded by the people of Canada, as it was demanded by the people of the United States before 1900. It was based on the fact that when you say "income tax" it means a tax on income. We have a system that says to Gulf Canada that it can pull out of a development in Canada and go into a development in Siberia and deduct from its taxable income in Canada every cent of money it is spending in Siberia.

The government says to Petro–Canada: "You can pull out of operations in Canada and lay off people in 1,700 service stations, get that pool of money, go ahead with your investment in Burma and every cent, to the penny, the hundreds of millions of dollars, you can get it all back because you can subtract it from your taxable income in Canada for this year, next year, next year, for the year after and the year after until you get it all back. If you have $100,000 of taxable income this year in Canada, you can take $100,000 off that billion you are spending in Burma and you pay no taxes".

What kind of a system is this at this time of recession, at this time of saying to ordinary Canadians: "Tighten your belt. Pay new taxes". Talk about double taxation. Ordinary Canadians are paying triple taxation. However, the government says to the oil companies: "If you do not want to pay any taxes, if you do not want to pay any income tax, invest in Siberia, invest in Burma. Pull out of Newfoundland, pull out of your gas stations".

At times to use the income tax system to promote a development is not a bad thing; it is a good thing. Whether or not it was good or bad or justified that this government initially approved a tax write–off for the purchase of Gulf Canada in the beginning is debatable. I seriously doubt it, when a tax concession of $500 million was approved for a company that has $7 billion in assets. But that is what was done.

As the minister said in the House yesterday, that was called the Little Egypt Bump. We can call this movement of Gulf the Siberian shove because it has decided to invest in Siberia and pull out of its development off the coast of Newfoundland.

Perhaps the time has come for the Government of Canada to step back a little bit and look at all of these taxation agreements and look at the income tax system as it relates to the companies covered in these agreements so that the encouragement is there for them to invest in this country and not to use the money they are saving in Canada to invest in a foreign nation and have the taxpayers of Canada foot the bill.

• (1240)

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I am not sure exactly how my hon. friend's remarks relate to tax treaties between Finland, Czechoslovakia, Mexico and our own country. However, since his comments evidently fall within the scope of the debate I do want to say that while he talks on the surface of double taxation I think what he provides to a certain extent is double-talk.

I am not sure whether it is the policy of his party that the Government of Canada should direct people who are in business on how to do their business, or whether these businesses should be free to try to operate on a basis that makes it worth while for them. It is my understanding that most businesses are in business to make money and to do those things that make sound business sense.

With respect to the issue of taxation, my hon. friend points out that there are deductions for business expenses against income tax. I think the point he should make is that those deductions apply whether those investments are in Canada or abroad.

What he fails to do is go the next step, as the minister did earlier today, and point out that they are taxed on the profits or indeed the income that results from those business investments. At one point he seemed to imply that there should be different standards for taxation applied to different companies or indeed different taxpayers.

I would like to ask him first: Does he believe that the same standards of taxation should apply to all taxpayers in Canada or should there be different rules for different taxpayers? Second, does he believe in the notion that there should be deductions before the determination of tax rates to be paid by taxpayers, and does he disagree with the notion that Canadians or Canadian companies should be taxed on profits they accrue from overseas revenues?

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, I shall try to answer each one of these questions in the order in which they were put.

First of all, he mentioned the profits that are taxed in foreign nations. I remind the hon. member and the Minister for National Revenue that the foreign exploration and development deductions on the income tax returns of these oil companies allow them to deduct 10 per cent each year—it does go down to 9.6 per cent in the second year in the case of Gulf—of their total amount of exploration and development expenses. But it also allows them to deduct from their taxable income in Canada 100 per cent of their profits from their oil development in Siberia.

That is the system that is in effect in our income tax for companies which invest in foreign nations, so do not talk to me about profits in foreign nations. The higher the profit, the bigger deduction they have from their taxable income in Canada.

Now that I have explained that, let me move to the second point. Should there be, he says, deductions before income tax is paid. Of course there should be deductions. But there is not a Canadian who agrees with a system that says that those deductions can be used not only to totally evade taxes but also to allow somebody making a quarter of a million dollars a year in this country to claim benefits that are due to low and modest income people. Nobody in this country agrees with somebody making over $100,000 a year and being able to claim the child tax credit as they do when the maximum you can make is $26,500 to get the child tax credit and then it goes down. The deductions, the business losses, the RSPs; there are 11 deductions before your net income is arrived at and your net income is used to determine every single income tested benefit under the tax system: The child tax credit, GST rebate, federal sales tax rebate, name them all.

Now the next question: Should there be the same standards of taxation for everybody? There should be a standard. The standard of taxation was arrived at, at the turn of this century, by a Tory government by the way. In 1917 that government wanted conscription in Canada and the farmers were demanding income taxes because there were some wealthy families in two cities in this country that were importing cars from Europe.

They demanded fair taxation because all we had was a commodity tax that, as you know, placed an unfair burden on ordinary people because they used the majority of their income just to live.

For example, lower income people have to spend all that money on the GST so they pay a greater percentage in GST. Somebody making $200,000 a year can put money into RRSPs, investments. The percentage spent on the GST is lower.

When the income tax system came into this country, brought in by a Tory government, it did not want to bring it in. It wanted conscription because we were in a war. Its members met in the back rooms of this Chamber with the Liberal opposition. The Liberals said: "We will vote for conscription if you agree to bring in an income tax based on a person's income. It should be progressive. The higher the amount of money you make, the greater percentage you pay in taxes".

That is how income tax began in Canada. If you go back, that is how it began in the United States. It was a demand of the people. It went to the Supreme Court of the U.S. and was judged unconstitutional. The judges said: "How could the majority impose a system of taxation on the minority" who were the rich. The Constitution had to be changed to make it legal.

Do I believe in the same standards of taxes for everyone? Yes, I certainly do. The unfortunate part of it is that over the years since we brought in income taxes, there has been one group of people in this country who do not pay any income taxes at all. The hon. member knows that number is rising. Statistics for last year show that there are many hundreds of people making over $250,000 total income who pay not one penny of income tax, not a single penny.

Do I believe in a standard of taxes for everyone? Sure I do. I believe in the standard that was brought in when the income tax system was set up in this country during the First World War, a system that has not been followed. It is a system that now has got to this bill that we are passing here today, this agreement with these foreign nations that has as its base our own income tax system which says that if you are Gulf Canada you can invest in Siberia and get the same tax benefits as if you invested in Canada.

You get 100 per cent of it deducted. It says to Petro-Canada: "You can close service stations. Invest in Burma". That country does not exactly have a good record on human rights, does it? "Invest there and you get the same benefits as if you invested in Canada".

In fact, when you really examine the taxation systems that are in effect in those nations, you will discover that it is to the company's benefit to invest in those countries and not to invest in Canada. That is why I say that the government has to rethink this whole system because Canadians are sick and tired of being told that they have to tighten their belts and pay more taxes. They can see that these companies are paying nothing and they are living off the taxpayers of Canada while they invest in foreign nations.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, I first of all want to say how impressed I am with the previous speaker's analysis of what is taking place. Frankly his scope of bringing the whole double taxation question into a very important bill is important in this House.

Tragically the framework within this bill has been defined in a sense of time by one of the government spokespersons. This goes back to 1971. I do not intend to do Liberal government bashing. What we knew in 1971 and what we knew 15 years ago when we started these discussions, and it is relevant to provincial governments as well, is entirely different from what we know today.

My good friend has pointed out, by case, what we know today that we did not know in 1971 when this opening was allowed. My good friend has pointed that out in case what we know now applies to Mexico did not apply then as well.

In a world that is being described as the new global economy, we are framing legislation in this bill that is in a world which no longer exists. We think that by sector by sector agreements, for instance with the Mexican government, we are protecting our turf. We also understand, and my friend through his illustration gave proof to this, that money moves within seconds internationally. Money can move from Zurich, from Tokyo, from Hong Kong, from Toronto, from Washington and from London at the press of a computer button. That did not exist in 1971 and I am not going to blame the Liberal government for giving this loophole. That did not exist 15 years ago when my friend talked about the attempt to get a deal. It exists now.

While we politicians sometimes are trapped in classic debates about you said this and you did that, our classic debates are no longer relevant to the technological changes and trade changes that have taken place in this country and in the world.

No one would deliberately set out to allow Gulf to get away with what it did. Gulf got away with it. There has been no clear leadership from this government, as my colleague has clearly pointed out, to close this loophole. This bill will not close the loophole for Mexico or for anyone else.

The appeal is being made by those of us who are reading this and beginning to understand the rapidly changing global world economy. We are elected in Canada, and I am not talking about supernationalism; I am talking about basic political responsibility to the taxpayers of this country. Our basic responsibility is to take as a base line the question of what we need to protect here in Canada as the people who sit on the other side of the table say: "What is it we need here to protect in Mexico?"

Frankly I do not assume that the person you sit down with is going to cheat you. I do not assume that anybody is going to distort the facts. Everybody sits at the table in this kind of legislation with the motivation of enlightened self-interest.

I do not think this government has done enough work. I will stick clearly to the relevance that the Chair so wisely suggested to the House and I will only talk about Mexico and the avoidance of double taxation.

Since this particular bill was introduced, we have had placed in our hands information concerning government documents that indicate a profound potential negative effect of the treaty that the United States and Canada are discussing. That profound negative effect in the documents applies to taxation as well. I will be relevant in dealing with that taxation aspect.

In the areas of textiles, auto parts, plastics, and secondary and tertiary manufacturing for basic resources, there will be no clear-cut explanation once this bill is passed of its implication based on an agreement that is being negotiated.

For the wisdom of all the members of this House, for the protection of the Canadian taxpayers, it would be far better if this bill were withdrawn until the House knows exactly what deck the government is dealing from.

What else is there behind the scenes that we have to force out of secret documents? Why is it that the press has to apply for freedom of information on negotiating positions that have major implications on this bill? I am making a plea to this House, neither for nor against this bill but that we simply do not know enough about what is going on behind the scenes to make a rational decision on this bill. We cannot even have an ideological debate, traditionally from the right, the centre or the left on this bill, because the facts are not before us.

I do not think there is any ill intent by the government in pursuing this bill at this time. I just think there was no thought given to the timing of this bill relative to other things that are happening in a rapidly changing global economy.

It would be far better if this bill were withdrawn for about six months. It would be far better if a committee of this House were struck to deal with that specific broad problem in which this bill falls, and that is the changing global economy.

I think it is absolutely essential in this day and age that every parliamentarian be armed with updated information about this rapidly changing world instead of being fixed here in an almost analogous situation of trying to drive a steam tractor when there are already other operations of carbon driven engines. The House is being hampered by being left in a back frame of time that no longer exists.

It does not surprise me that in some instances when I go back to my constituency people ask me: "Why did you vote this way on this bill? Why did you not think of this or that?" We cannot think of everything. In the crunch we ultimately have to make a decision about many things every single day and we do our best in terms of what is humanly possible.

In this instance, our best in terms of what is humanly possible is to put this bill aside until we as parliamentarians have every single known fact available to us, not kept secret, about our changing relationship with Mexico, because this bill deals with double taxation in Mexico.

What is that changing relationship going to be in terms of one major area, tariffs and content and taxation around the automobile parts industry? How does this bill apply? What does it mean if we change the content rule, as is being discussed in the Canada–Mexico free trade agreement, to the question of double taxation on a Canadian investor who is an auto parts manufacturer if he decides to close his plant here, move to Mexico, manufacture there, cut himself back into the market, avoid the tariffs, take his money out of Canada and not be taxed at all out of the Mexican operation and still have a piece of the action?

What does it mean? What does it mean to Quebec and its textile industry, or what is left of it? What does it mean to the plastics industry and double taxation? There is not a single sector of secondary or tertiary manufacturing in terms of investment and double taxation that is not impacted by those talks.

I would like to know what the Canadian government position is. I would like to know where we are going. Although we may have a difference of where we are going and how we get there, how can we possibly deal with this bill until we know where the government is going, how it wants to get there and what its bottom line is? This is like giving a licence to a 10–year–old to drive a car so that when he reaches 18 we hope he will know what he is doing. This is certainly putting the cart before the horse.

I ask my friends to seriously consider exactly the kind of situation they are placing the House in. We do not know enough. We simply do not know enough about the implication of this bill and its meaning to those who wish to invest in Canada and who wish to invest in Mexico.

• (1300)

If I were a Mexican investor and I were faced with this legislation, the questions that I would ask about investment back in or joint ventures with Canadians could not be answered at this time.

There is no possible way even with this bill being passed, in the framework of the negotiations that are going on with a whole new change of trading partners, that this bill will have any relevance a year from now or two years from now if we sign the agreement.

I think that this bill just got stuck in the government's house works. Its name appeared on the Order Paper and was presented and the government thought: well, this is just a routine thing; let's get it through. It is not a routine bill, but it got captured in the bureaucracy. It got captured in the structure. It is thrust up in the House at a time when we are incapable of dealing with it.

This is not entirely a partisan appeal. It certainly is not without some partisanship, but beyond the partisan appeal that I am making there is a very real appeal that I am trying to present to the government. That is that this bill now is fraught with potential dangers just down the road, 18 months or 36 months from now.

When we take into consideration my hon. friend's historical analysis of how long it took to get this bill here, he suggested 15 years, once the bill is passed it would probably take another 15 years before we would get around to correcting it.

By that time, we could potentially be losing tens or hundreds of millions of dollars worth of taxes that should be coming back to the Canadian people.

I appeal to this government. If it is looking for items on the agenda of this House to do busy work there is other legislation that is far more advanced in terms of information, far more able to get through this House with a consensus, far more important at this point to deal with current problems than this bill.

This bill would entrench a system of taxation and counter taxation that may not have any relevance with Mexico whatsoever within a year or a year and a half.

I want to come to what a suspicious mind might think about this. Not mine, because I am a trusting soul. A suspicious mind might suggest that the government is rushing this bill through the House knowing in advance what the implications are in terms of double taxation on a treaty that it is negotiating without informing the House of the details of what its negotiating position is. That is what a suspicious mind would raise.

Far be it from me to raise any public suspicion on this government. It is too far down in the polls for me to add to that. But if that suspicious mind were accurate then it would go further to say that the way to get this bill though without controversy is ahead of the Canada–U.S.–Mexico free trade agreement, is ahead of the revelations of exactly what Canada's position is, and ahead of any more release of secret documents as they were today under the aegis of Southam News.

I am the least suspicious member in this House, but I have it as a matter of fact that there are some who are far more suspicious than I am. They seem to have a great deal more experience than I as an ingénue in this Chamber, a somewhat chubby ingénue but an ingénue nonetheless.

I say with all great seriousness, the speaker who spoke before me in his articulate analysis of what Gulf has got away with, in his clear-cut and perfectly in order speech about the implication of those tax avoiders, has raised doubts in my mind that perhaps, to be charitable, this government knows not what it is doing.

But perhaps my colleague who spoke before has a suspicion that indeed it knows what it is doing, that indeed its friends who may supply campaign funds are anxious to see this kind of legislation. There are some sceptics in this country that actually believe the old axiom that Canada gets the best politicians that money can buy. I do not know if that is the kind of political science law that is being taught, but the nasty haste around this bill makes even an ingénue like me suspicious.

On this quiet Friday we will gently get this bill through. Not to worry about the changing dramatics of the Canada-U.S.-Mexico free trade agreement, not to worry about the implications of what Gulf has already got away with in Hibernia, not to focus on Siberia, as my good friend has used as an apt example in terms of this legislation and Mexico, but to quietly get this through so that those who will benefit are well protected before the t's are crossed and the i's are dotted under the Canada-U.S.-Mexico agreement.

My appeal is not made on partisanship, as much as I always love to appeal on partisanship. My appeal is made on common sense of which there is an absence of a great deal in this House.

Why the rush? Pull the bill. Let us find out all the facts before we are asked to vote. Otherwise, and I do not say this as a threat, I will be forced to publicly say that the assessment of my friend in the Liberal Party is absolutely correct. This is another bill to cover another sell out of Canadian taxpayers' interests.

It has nothing to do with Liberal ideology, nothing to do with the NDP and its philosophical position, nothing to do with the government's philosophical position. But it has everything to do with paying off the wealthy corporations that have used loopholes in this country time and time again to escape their fair share of taxes.

Fairness is what this is all about and fairness we must have. To be decent in attempting to reach that fairness, I ask the government to pull this bill off the floor. I know that after I have made this appeal it will immediately do so.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by complimenting my hon. friend opposite for the skilful manner in which I believe he tied his remarks to the subject on the floor, unlike some previous speakers.

I heard him say earlier that he had been a parliamentarian for 25 years and I thought he was very skilful in doing that.

However, I would like to remind the hon. member he suggested the bill should be pulled. I notice he made no identification, at least I did not hear him identify any flaws in any of the three treaties or the convention. He does not seem to have any difficulty with them.

He is suggesting that we should hold up the implementation of this bill, one element of which for example provides an opportunity for Revenue Canada, and indeed for its counterpart in Mexico, to exchange information to chase down tax evaders.

I assume that he would agree with the government that catching up with tax evaders is an extremely important thing and that we should do that.

I would remind him as well that right now there are 50 tax treaties virtually the same as these in force between Canada and various countries in the world. I would be glad to share with him a list of those countries.

I would remind him that we are in negotiation with 26 countries of the world to put together similar tax treaties. When we bring forward this bill, it would put in force three further tax treaties that have been signed but not yet put in force by legislation. That is what this bill is about.

This bill has nothing to do whatsoever, with all due respect, with trade negotiations between Canada and Mexico. It has to do with fulfilling the implications of the income tax revisions of 1971, putting together a system which makes it possible for Canadians to participate in business and to do investments and not to be subjected to double taxation. That is what this bill is about.

It is not about Canada–Mexico free trade. I am wondering why my hon. friend is not expressing the same amount of concern about having tax treaties with the other 50 countries that we have them with or indeed with the 26 other countries that we are now negotiating with.

I would respectfully suggest and I would ask him therefore if he would identify specifically the flaws in the three treaties and the information exchange convention now before this House. If there are indeed flaws there, I wish he would identify them and bring them forth.

Otherwise I see no relevance whatsoever to his suggestion, which I know he puts in the best of faith, that we should withdraw this bill for six months.

• (1310)

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his expression of closely held beliefs. On a Friday, to dispel myths for such an earnest speaker I do with difficulty. Since I am challenged to do it, I must do it.

My good friend suggests that this is a simple bill to avoid double taxation, that we have agreements with 50 other countries already, none of which is sitting down at the table changing the rules as Mexico is right now. Why not wait until we have decided what rule changes take place before we pass this?

Let me give one simple example to my friend, simply put so it is simply understood. If you, under this bill, intend to move your auto parts manufacturing to Mexico and this bill is enforced, what will happen is that existing rules under this bill will pursue your personal profits for taxation.

I put this to you on the belief that everybody is playing fair and square. My friend who spoke from the Liberal Party suggests that Gulf is playing within the rules, but are the rules fair and square?

The example I want to give is that rules of origin identify ultimately where a product is made and traced back and taxation is made based on rules of origin.

After we signed the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement we had to be vigilant about rules of origin. I raised that question with the minister at that time. He said that we are making massive attempts to tighten up because of the change in the agreement. I said: "What have you done?" He said: "We have hired six more customs inspectors".

Cross-border shopping takes 106 more customs inspectors, let alone rules of origin. What is the impact of this when we sign the Canada–Mexico agreement?

The rules of origin are still flaunted. Some of the parts manufactured in Mexico today are unidentified. They are shipped across the border under the Maquiladora program. They are incorporated into American parts. That whole part is identified. That is shipped into Canada.

The only area of taxation that exists between Mexico and Canada now is eliminated because of the Canada–U.S. FTA and they are companies sending in subparts without identity and avoiding taxation to the Canadian taxpayer.

It is estimated that with that one loophole $3 billion is lost to the taxpayers of this country. Do you know what $3 billion would do if we close that loophole? A lot of jobs.

I did not mean to be harsh. I do not mean to punish this government. But when it displays such stupidity and then at times to compound it with ignorance, then it is far too much for me to take and my gentleness disappears.

By giving that one example I am trying to point out that we should not burden the Canadian taxpayers with further loopholes, unless we know exactly the kind of situation we are getting into with Mexico.

The government cannot say it today. It cannot even announce it today. The press has to pick out information that was secret. My questions were not even answered. My sensitivities were insulted for a week.

On top of that we have this bill. We are going to get hosed again. That is not good enough; it is simply not good enough.

I must now make a comment that I did not intend to make. This is a government that says it is businesslike. Businesslike administration run by businessmen, and I add for businessmen, by an astute, thoughtful group of politicians. You do not even know when they are trying to sell you the Brooklyn Bridge.

This thing is full of loopholes, particularly when you do not even know yourself or cannot even say publicly what kind of agreement you are going to sign with Mexico.

Do not appeal to me with the idea of shells. Which shell is the pea under? In this shell game we have three shells and no peas under any one of them. We are being asked to sign it.

Just look at the rules of origin as they exist now and see the loopholes that exist. Pass this, and there will be loopholes to drive VIA trains through, that is the ones that are still running.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I follow the very thoughtful remarks of my hon. colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca who has laid out very, very clearly what is actually happening here today.

For those who might be watching this presentation this afternoon on a Friday in the House of Commons, I want to remind people that we are dealing with a bill that originated in the Senate, a bill called S-2. Its title is: "an act to implement conventions between Canada and Finland, Canada and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic and Canada and the United Mexican States for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax and the prevention of fiscal evasion and a convention between Canada and the United Mexican States for the exchange of information with respect to taxes".

There is an old myth around this place that if the government has something it wants to slip through, or if it has an announcement it wants to make and it wants to get as little public recognition as possible, the time to do it is late on a Friday. Late on a Friday is when the press gallery wraps up its affairs for the week and people's attention turns to items other than what is going on in the Parliament of Canada. It is a long-standing tradition that this is the way to low-ball data and information, this is the way to minimize public attention.

We were looking at the legislation in the last few days and we noticed this rather innocuous looking bill, Bill S-2, to establish taxation conventions between a number of countries. As everybody knows, Canada now has tax treaties with 50 different nations. Over the last number of months we have been negotiating six more tax agreements and there are still 26 outstanding for future negotiations.

It is not a surprise that we do this on a regular basis. We negotiate these tax arrangements to facilitate business between countries. In looking at the bill, Mr. Speaker, you will notice that, yes, it deals with Finland. There are certainly no difficulties there. It deals with Czechoslovakia, again there are no particular difficulties there. Then you start looking at some of the fine details.

When it comes to Mexico it says that it deals with factories, workshops, offices, branch plants, the development of natural resources and tax issues, of course, related to those. It deals with income from immovable property and business profits. It involves shipping and air transport taxation. It involves associated enterprises and the taxation thereof. It involves dividends and how they are dealt with, interest payments and how they are dealt with, royalties and how they are dealt with, personal services and how they are going to be taxed, capital gains, and the matter of apprentices and the taxation surrounding apprenticeships. It goes on and on.

We noticed that these would be of serious concern to those individuals wanting to do business in Mexico, to those corporations presently involved in the free trade zone in northern Mexico and the migration of many branch plants, American branch plants and others in Canada, to that free trade zone in Mexico in anticipation of the Canada-U.S.-Mexico free trade agreement being signed in the next few weeks.

Here we are then. We are asked to approve today a special taxation arrangement with Mexico while we all know that we are negotiating a free trade deal with Mexico at the same time. Those of us in the New Democratic Party think that this is folly. This is something we ought not to be doing, period.

We know what happened to Canada when we negotiated a free trade deal with the United States. We got hosed. At last count, if memory serves me, 500,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector have disappeared in Canada, largely because of the implications of the Canada-U.S. trade agreement. Many have been very up front. After all, we recognize that corporations exist to do business and maximize their profits for their shareholders.

• (1320)

They have announced day after day that they are closing down the Canadian operation and moving to Tennessee, Florida, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama to take advantage of lower wages, more lax health and safety regulations, and softer environmental regulations. In other words, it is a lot cheaper because a great deal more exploitation can be conducted.

As we enter into a free trade agreement with Mexico, we have concerns about the implications. What does it mean for Canada? What will happen to Canadian businesses? How will it assist us? What will be the cost? Of course, we do not know because all the negotiations are being done in secret. They are being done behind closed doors.

Today in the newspaper it said: "Secret papers show Canada to get less than it bargains for in the Canada–Mexico trade negotiations".

Another headline says: "The pact would cost jobs, government papers indicate". What government papers are these? Earlier today my hon. colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca asked the Minister for International Trade that considering senators from Mexico's parliament have had access to the documents being negotiated and have had the benefit of direct briefings and selected congressmen in the United States have had access to the agreement being discussed and have had intensive and extensive briefings, why have the parliamentarians of Canada and thereby the people of Canada been kept in the dark and have no idea what the negotiations are all about?

We read, presumably from papers that the Americans and Mexicans have seen, that jobs in the textile industries of Canada would be lost to a significant degree, that jobs in the footwear sector would be hammered mercilessly. As for agriculture, it says that grain growers, livestock producers, pork producers, and oilseed growers will have some problems. It also says there will be a massive shift of the auto parts and automobile industry to Mexico, particularly the free trade zones, from both Canada and the U.S. In other words, just a cursory glance at what is in those documents—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): May I just ask the hon. member if he is reading from the bill or from some other notes? I am just trying to figure out why we are discussing free trade in terms of this particular bill. It concerns double taxation and property and development more than anything else. I do not see free trade in there and I would just like to know from where the hon. member is getting his information, other than out of this Bill S–2.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I understand the concern. First, I was getting my information from American and Mexican excerpts, presumably from the secret free trade agreements which we have not seen but they have, as reported in today's papers.

Mr. Speaker, you ask about the relevancy of quoting from these secret papers that we have not seen. It is because Bill S–2 deals with double taxation, and double taxation occurs when Canadian firms do business in Mexico or Mexican firms do business in Canada. The free trade agreement is all about enhancing the amount of interaction between our two countries.

If we are negotiating a free trade agreement to expand and facilitate business activity between two countries and are debating today the taxation implications, the linkage does not seem to be particularly vague to me. As a matter of fact, it seems to be perfectly clear. That is why my hon. friend from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca said this is out of step. We are entering into detailed taxation agreements not only before the free trade agreement has been signed but before a single one of us has even seen it, been briefed on it, or before we knew anything about it, other than what we have seen from leaked documents from Mexico or the United States.

Mr. McCreath: We do not have free trade with the other 50 countries involved.

Mr. Riis: My hon. colleague rightfully points out, and I think it is a very thoughtful intervention, that we do not have free trade agreements with some of the other countries we have entered into tax negotiations with, particularly Norway, Malta, Thailand, Spain, Singapore, Romania and others. He is absolutely correct. That is why I would propose to facilitate the taxation negotiations taking place and the signatures now required for Finland and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic. I think we should do this expeditiously. After all, that is straightforward.

However, let us be cautious. After all, the third part of this bill deals with Mexico. I have indicated some of the areas in which it deals with trade with Mexico: shipping and air transport, dividends, royalties, property, profits, workshops, branch plants and natural resource development. In other words, this seems to have serious implications for what we are apparently negotiating with Mexico and the United States.

I would suggest that a prudent approach would be to agree to proceed with parts I and II of this legislation, dealing with Finland and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic, and set aside part III, dealing with Canada and the United Mexican States, until we see what this free trade agreement is going to mean for Canada.

I think it is fair to say that anyone who would speak honestly would say that the benefits of the Canada–U.S. agreement are difficult to find. I am not going to say that there are absolutely none. I do not think that would be fair. Obviously there have been some Canadian firms and Canadian workers who have benefited from access to the United States markets when there might have been more difficulties in past times.

I would suggest that for every job we have gained we probably have lost 100 jobs. I will give one example. My hon. colleague looks puzzled. Just the other day the response to an Order Paper question showed that there are thousands and thousands of Americans who have now used chapter fifteen of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement to access Canada who normally would not have been here pursuing those jobs which would be filled by Canadian workers. The free trade agreement has made it a lot easier for skilled tradesmen from the United States and professionals from the United States to do business in Canada.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): And vice versa.

Mr. Riis: Technically vice versa, yes. My hon. friend will also know that there are a number of hurdles in the United States that make it much more difficult for Canadians to do business there than for Americans to do business in Canada. Somewhere between 40 and 100 per cent, depending on what sector you look at, is foreign owned in Canada as opposed to a foreign ownership of 4 per cent of the United States' economy. Naturally there are a lot more Americans doing business in Canada on an ongoing basis because they own such a large part of Canada. The free trade agreement simply made it easier for them to operate.

We all know that. That is on the table. We all understand that. Some want to continue. Others want to abrogate the free trade deal and get on with developing our own bilateral relations with the United States in terms of trade. However, the reality is that, although we in Canada know nothing about it because we are being kept in the dark, a trade deal is being negotiated between Canada and Mexico.

Our Mexican colleagues know about it, our American colleagues know about it, but parliamentarians in Canada have to rely on our American and Mexican friends in order to get any information. This is wrong. That is why I say it is also wrong to proceed today with this legislation to harmonize the tax laws between Canada and the United Mexican States to facilitate economic development between the two countries. It is misguided to proceed. I have yet to hear a good reason why we ought to proceed with this part of the bill.

I would urge the government members to give consideration to splitting. As it stands, I regretfully have to say that our party, the New Democratic Party, is not able to support this legislation in its present form. If it was to be split so that we can facilitate our agreements with Finland and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic certainly we would endorse that.

Let us not put the cart before the horse. Let us not sign a taxation agreement with Mexico until we see what is in this free trade agreement with Mexico and whether we are going to benefit in Canada or be net losers as we are under the Canada–U.S. FTA.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague concerning the issue of double taxation. Right now double taxation is an inhibitor to Canadian companies moving down to Mexico, while other things might be more attractive. For example, in a recent news item I saw that Green Giant Foods, located in Texas, was paying its workers wages of $7 an hour. A worker for Green Giant would go to the plant and make $56 a day canning produce or processing food.

Then Green Giant suddenly closed its plant in Texas, I believe it was, or Arizona, and moved across the border into Mexico where it was paying its workers $4.80 a day.

Think of that: wages of $56 a day being paid in the United States, and that company moved almost within sight of the original plant, across the border into Mexico, and was paying its Mexican workers $4.80 a day. The savings in wages was something like 90 per cent over what it was paying its American workers.

The same thing would apply in Canada if a Canadian plant were moved to the United States. It would be saving something like 90 per cent of its wage bills.

Nobody saw the can of Green Giant corn go down in price by 90 per cent. There was no benefit to the consumers. All of that money went to additional profit for the processing company.

If we had the current tax regime as exists between Canada and Mexico, Canada would be able to tax that whole 90 per cent increase in profit which that company gained as a result of the lower wages in Mexico. Canada would be able to pay, for example, for adjustment programs, for unemployment insurance programs for the workers who were put out of work in Canada. Under this piece of legislation, the government not only wants to give those jobs to the Mexicans, the investment to the Mexicans, and the profit to that company, but it also wants to give it a tax credit. It wants to give that company a tax credit for the tax it pays in Mexico.

Canada loses out on all counts. I have not heard anything in the government's position in this debate today that Canada is going to gain anything from this piece of legislation in conjunction with the Mexican free trade legislation.

I would like my colleague to elaborate on that. Should we be giving jobs from highly paid Canadian plants to Mexico, where they make one-tenth in wages of what they make here, and allow the profits to increase accordingly for that company for moving from Canada to Mexico? Not only that, but based on this legislation, should we make sure that the Mexican government gets to collect the taxes and we give the company credit for the taxes that it pays in Mexico?

What a bunch of losers. They are creating a situation for themselves in which Canadians lose on all counts. I appreciate the speech that my colleague from Kamloops made and hopefully he can elaborate on that.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is much to elaborate upon when I listen to the point made by my hon. colleague. He paints a puzzling picture.

I will simply elaborate on the most recent statistics I have seen in terms of manufacturing wage rates. Consider a situation in which a person who had $20 million at his disposal and wished to begin a manufacturing line. He wanted to start a new plant to manufacture some product. You have three choices under our Canada–U.S.–Mexico free trade deal. You can locate your plant in Canada and you would pay your employees on the average between $10 and $15 an hour, or you could move to the southern United States and open in South Carolina, Alabama, in Mississippi or in Louisiana, and you would be paying on the average between $6 and $8 an hour, or you could go over the line into the northern tier of Mexico and pay between $24 and $28 a week.

Unless you were insane, where would you be tempted to locate your plant if labour were an important criterion in your operation? Obviously, if it were power, if there were some other elements, you might be encouraged to locate elsewhere in the North American context. Labour is critical and we see it in the news today. That is why the American congressmen and the Mexican senators are saying that the businesses in Canada, particularly in the auto industry, the auto parts industry, the textile industry, the footwear industry and in agricultural processing, had better be careful.

You could open a factory or a plant in Mexico and pay people $24 to $28 per week for labour. That is working six days a week, I might add, with virtually no environmental, health and safety laws being enforced and virtually no labour regulations enforced. That is what we are seeing. We are seeing exploitation in that free trade zone in northern Mexico.

It is perfectly clear that Canada cannot be a net winner in this kind of an arrangement. We have seen under the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement the migration of plants to the southern United States. Even within the United States, Americans are noticing that there is an exodus out of the northern rust belt into the sun belt. The United States Congress is becoming increasingly concerned that entering into a free trade deal with Mexico may not be in the best interest of American citizens. American corporations, yes.

Let us face it. When we tear away all of the dialogue and all of the rhetoric surrounding the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, there are people who benefited. The corporations benefited. They can do business more cheaply. They can make more money for their shareholders. For Canada and Canadians, unquestionably we were losers.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, just very briefly. I look forward someday to debating Canada–U.S.–Mexican free trade in this House. Today is not the day because that is not the subject on the floor.

I listened to my hon. friend from Kamloops very carefully and I took down one sentence he used. It seems to me that my hon. friends in the New Democratic Party have shared a lot of gobbledegook with us today.

One statement my hon. friend made in his initial speech when referring to the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement was, and I quote: "We should abrogate the free trade deal, then get on with developing bilateral trade with the United States". I think that demonstrates that my hon. friend really has a lot to learn about trade.

Mr. Riis: I guess we will have a chance to debate the Canada–U.S.–Mexico free trade deal. I hope we never have that opportunity. That is one opportunity I would just as soon miss.

I believe, from what I have heard Canadians say, that they do not like the free trade agreement with the United States. They think it should be abrogated. That is why I think I can say without any hesitation that, speaking on behalf of the New Democrats in the House of Commons, if we have an opportunity after the next general election, in whatever capacity, to abrogate the free trade agreement with the United States, we will. That is clear. We will end the GST and we will end the free trade deal with the United States.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just said that he speaks for Canadians who want the free trade agreement abrogated. There are others who do not. I think the facts speak for themselves. The Federation of Canadian Municipalities states in its latest publication: "Canadian exports to the U.S. have increased by 8 per cent since the agreement went into effect, but exports to the rest of the world have declined. Furthermore, since 1988, Canadian exports have performed more poorly in sectors where they were not subject to the free trade agreement".

I hope that we can keep our senses here so that we do not also have to abrogate a free trade deal with Canada, the United States and Mexico.

Also, Mr. Rutley, Economist for the Canadian Manufacturers' Association states:

> Manufacturing job losses in industrialized countries during recessions traditionally average between five and eight per cent of the entire manufacturing work force. So far, Canada is in the middle, with 6.6. per cent loss between October 1989 and October 1990. By comparison, during the last recession of 1981–1982 and in the absence of a free trade agreement, losses were nearly double for the same period of time. Between October 1981 and October 1982, some 11.8 per cent of our manufacturing jobs were wiped out.

The article goes on to say:

> Free trade has been and will continue to be good economic policy because it ensures access to the world's best market and forces Canada to become more efficient. About the only serious negative since free trade has been the misconceptions visited upon a gullible public.

Most of those misconceptions have been made by the NDP.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. Milliken: Questions are not terminated.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, they are. Would you like to have a question or a comment?

Mr. Milliken: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I will recognize him on a question or a comment.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I thought you had mentioned that the time had expired.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kamloops would like to rebut the hon. minister.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I do not want to rebut. I will respond to the minister, but I assume if we are going to continue I will have a chance to respond to the question.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member is trying to kill the time if he can.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member can respond to the minister.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands suggests that I am trying to avoid the time. I am prepared to stay here all day and respond to points and queries that people will make. I say that very seriously. I am prepared to stay the whole night as well.

I think this is excellent. For the first time we are getting to the base of this, and the government is trying to sneak through a piece of legislation that is connected to the Canada Mexico free trade deal before we in this House have ever seen it.

In response to my hon. friend, she mentions the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. I want to remind my hon. friend that before the free trade agreement with the United States was entered into, 80 per cent of all of our trade with the United States was tariff–free.

As a matter of fact, in excess of 90 per cent, 94 per cent or 96 per cent, of our trade with the United States was with tariffs no greater than 5 per cent. In other words, to a large degree, we have been trading freely across the Canada–U.S. border for years and years.

There were certain areas in which obviously we had concerns. The auto pact was a good example of that. We had an auto pact which was negotiated to protect the Canadian auto industry and auto parts industry and the tens of thousands of jobs therein.

That has gone by the board now. We are seeing in today's papers that apparently in this new round of discussions with the Mexicans further erosion is going to occur in that critical sector of the manufacturing economy of Canada.

It is for those reasons that many of us are concerned. That is why I say categorically that given the opportunity, the free trade deal with the United States will be abrogated.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I still do not see the relevance here as far as this bill is concerned. I hate to say that.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has a question or comment. There are three minutes left.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I enjoy the hon. member for Kamloops, flights of fancy as much as anyone in the House.

I agree with the comments the Chair has made that the relevance of this bill to any free trade agreement seems so far–fetched to be beyond any belief.

Since he has raised the issue and says that the New Democratic Party is committed to abrogating the free trade agreement, I wanted to ask about his former colleague, now the premier of Ontario, Mr. Bob Rae.

Mr. Rae has a position of some prominence in the country. He makes pronouncements on various issues, and he professes not to be a great friend of the present government, although he acts very much like the former Minister of Finance, the member for Etobicoke Centre. When there are any financial dealings coming along, we see the similarity between the policies of the government here and the government in Toronto every day. It is unbelievable. It is a mirror image one of the other. I have never heard him say that he is against the free trade agreement. I have never heard him ask the federal government to tear up the free trade agreement.

If that is the policy of the federal New Democratic Party, why is there no support for this policy forthcoming from the premier of Ontario? Why do we not have someone in a position who can make this claim and ask the federal government to act responsibly and get rid of this agreement? If that is the position of the New Democratic Party, why does the premier not come out and say that with force? Why does he not make a public pronouncement calling on the Government of Canada to get rid of this agreement?

That is what I would like to know.

Mr. Riis: It seems that my hon. friend is still somewhat vague as to what the policy may be in terms of the free trade agreement with the United States.

Unlike the Liberal Party, let me make it very clear: It is to abrogate the free trade agreement. It is to do away with the free trade agreement. It is to oppose the free trade agreement.

That has been the New Democratic Party position since the very beginning. I find the question somewhat puzzling because the previous Liberal premier of Ontario was one of the more outspoken opponents of the free trade deal.

That tradition goes on. With all due respect to the Liberal premier, he realized that the free trade deal would devastate the manufacturing base of Ontario. He knew that. Bob Rae knows that as well.

That is why it is our policy, unlike the Liberal policy and certainly not the Tory policy, to abrogate the free trade agreement. This is not a trade agreement in the best interest of Canada or Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, February 6, consideration of the motion of the Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C-35, an act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When the House rose on yesterday there were two minutes remaining in the question and comment period following the speech of the hon. member for Moncton. I will now recognize hon. members who wish to continue the question and comment period. Are there any questions or comments?

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, members of the Official Opposition, the Liberal Party of Canada, have observed in this legislation the complexity and the non-existence of explanatory notes as they pertain to all of these pieces of legislation.

The danger in passing a bill like this one is that perhaps the House of Commons is passing a major change to legislation that is called in the title non-controversial and of a non-complicated nature therein.

I was looking through this bill a moment ago and it has prompted me to make an intervention. I arrived at the portion of the bill, at page 15, concerning a change to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act. The change is to paragraph 6(b). That is a famous part of that legislation. It is so controversial in Canada. In fact it is the most controversial part of any fisheries legislation that has ever passed in this country since we have been passing legislation. It is the most controversial part of the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

• (1350)

The explanatory notes say this:

> Clause 43. This amendment, which would add the underlined and sidelined words, would ensure that the terms and conditions that are specified in licences need not be prescribed by regulation.

What licences? The amendment says:

> (b) respecting the issuance, suspension and cancellation of any licences or permits — the fees payable — their terms and conditions —

Then the additional words: "which are in addition to such terms and conditions, if any, that the minister may specify therein".

I will tell you what this is. I do not blame the drafters of the legislation because they are not to blame. We have some of the best drafters of legislation in the world. It is what they are told to put in. The licences they are referring to here are the licences for foreign fishing vessels in Canadian waters.

Hidden away, not mentioned, they are the licences of foreign fishing vessels in Canadian waters. The bill now allows the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to change whatever portion of those licences he wishes and the fees to be charged in those licences.

There is such a thing as parliamentary democracy. We are supposed to be told these things because the people of Canada only know through this Parliament a lot of things that go on in government.

I am holding here a remission order that forgives the Government of France a half a million dollars on its fishing licences. When we pass this legislation we will never know when things such as this take place in the future. We will never know.

What the government does not explain in this legislation is that part A of the original act, the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, sets out all of the terms and conditions of licences that are granted to foreign vessels to fish in Canadian waters. It spells them all out. It talks about the people who can work aboard those vessels, that is foreign crew members. It talks about what they can do, where they can go. It spells out all of those things.

In paragraph (b) that we are amending, it talks about the forms. It now says in an amendment that all of this, all that bill requiring it to be done by regulation can now be done by the minister.

How serious is that? Well, it is very serious. In this month, in this week, on this day there are foreign factory freezer trawlers licensed by the Government of Canada under these regulations off the coast of Canada up at a fishing zone called 2G and 2H. These trawlers receive their licences under this bill and they are fishing for codfish. They have a higher quota for cod in zones 2G and 2H on the Labrador coast than Canada does. They have a higher cod quota than Canada does.

Why is that so serious? It is so serious because we are now into the month of February. The month of February is the pre-spawning time for our codfish, the great northern cod stock that feeds all of our fish plants on the east coast of Canada. They are wintering and preparing for their spawning season in the month of March.

These are the only boats that are disturbing those spawning groups. It is not the ordinary Canadian inshore fisherman. He cannot get up there because of the ice. It is not the trawler of National Sea Products Limited or Fisheries Products International. Why you could take a Canadian trawler of 175 feet long, drop it in the hold of one of those Soviet mother factory freezer trawler ships, they call them, and you would need search and rescue to find the Canadian boat. These are 470-foot vessels with the latest in technology.

Mr. Milliken: They've got a licence.

Mr. Baker: They are licensed by the Government of Canada under the section we are dealing with here today. Under this section the minister will be able to give whatever licences he wants. He will be able to set whatever terms he wishes and he will be able to forgive the money that he forgave in a cabinet order for the government of France, but he will be able to do it Secretly.

It is not only the damage that is done to the spawning and the pre-spawning fish stocks, for four weeks those cod involve themselves in a very complex exercise prior to spawning and they cannot be disturbed. All of the scientific studies that have been done in Norway, Sweden and Denmark show that you cannot even drop food into that zone of pre-spawning activity because they will then not spawn. It is the foreign vessels licensed by Canada that is disturbing this process. Not only that, but they are catching fish.

The minister says: "Some of those fish are underutilized". Granted, you could say yes. I notice that nine foreign nations have quotas for what they call grenadier. I have never seen a grenadier in my life, but I am told it is a long, slinky fish with a great big swelled head like some people I know in the Government of Canada. They are given capelin that Canadians cannot fish because it is a restricted fishery. They are given squid and they are given mackerel. Mackerel is the only fish in the ocean that I know of that sinks if it stops swimming because it does not have an air bag, unlike some people in the government that I know. They are given herring. They are given fish that are restricted.

The other day, the minister of fisheries gave seven licences to Japan under this provision in the act to fish tuna. What did he do? He gave them a bigger quota in Canadian waters for bluefin than he gave to the fishermen of Canada. He even issued them an unlimited quota of albacore, big-eye, yellow-fin. Imagine, that is what you buy in the store in tins, the big-eye and the yellow-fin. We say to the minister of fisheries: "Forget your yellow fin, open your big eye and kick them out".

• (1400)

Some are licensed under this section that I think should be pursued that we do not pursue. Take, for example, the ones that are licensed to go down around the riding for the hon. member from Cape Breton, our House leader, to catch sharks.

When you go to a restaurant and you pick up shark fin soup, that comes from a foreign vessel licensed by Canada from the Faeroes Islands. In fact, the name of the boat is Baker, not to be confused with Baker. They make a lot money as they fish for shark.

But all of those other licences granted by the Government of Canada, given permission to do so by regulation, change the licence by regulation, change the fees by regulation for giving France half a million dollars on their boat licences.

Now, under this bill the minister can do it by himself. Without going through any regulatory change, he can change the licences. He can issue the licences. He can give remission orders for non-payment.

Speaking of non-payment, do you know that today there are dozens of factory freezer trawlers from foreign nations that have not paid there fees for the last two years? Do you know what happens to Canadians if they do that? They do not get their licence.

This is a double standard. As our House leader pointed out one day back in December in the House of Commons, it is a system that has led to the destruction of our Canadian fishing resource.

Instead of passing a bill here today that allows the minister to further erode our resources behind the scenes, in his office on the weekends, to further erode in the secrecy of his office instead of going with orders, with cabinet decisions, with regulations, is a further destruction of our fishing resource.

I move:

That the question be now put.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague from Gander—Grand Falls on such a superb intervention here this afternoon. It brings to the attention of many members of Parliament some of the real serious issues that are affecting the fishing industry in Canada.

The seriousness with which this issue is put forward today also underlines, if you will, what I would deem the gross negligence of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and in particular the minister responsible for that department who unfortunately is not here.

The minister is grossly negligent in responding to the concerns that Canadians have raised time and time again with regard to this particular provision that my colleague has so rightly pointed out.

The entire thrust of Bill C-35 and all of the amendments which are tied into this particular bill need further clarification, further debate, further examination by all members of this House.

In December of 1991 I raised on the floor of the House the question as to why the government was proceeding to change the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency in sections 9 and 10 of Bill C-35.

This amendment would substitute the heading "Reports" for the heading "Annual Reports". It would better reflect that fact. Section 21 deals with more than annual reports.

It would mean in essence, instead of every year having a comprehensive report on the activities of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, that they would only be coming forward every fifth year. I wonder why, and I think of the word sneaky. That is the word that I use.

I guess I was somewhat reflective over the holidays. I said to myself: "Perhaps that word was too strong, sneaky". I reflected and I went for a walk in the snow. I came back and I reflected again. I said to myself: "Is it sneaky, or is it not sneaky?"

Then my colleagues, unbeknownst to me, on December 24 gave me information that relieved me of some of the doubts I had with regard to words I used in this Chamber. I felt vindicated because I had used the word sneaky on several occasions.

What was given to me on December 24 was a series of documents outlining very clearly all the expenditures of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency during and just preceding the federal election of 1988. I was astounded.

Then I was given a second document only to find that three years later most, if not all, of the programs and projects for Enterprise Cape Breton for the year 1991 were reduced by over 80 per cent.

I use the word sneaky. I said the government was sneaky. I did not say the minister was sneaky because that would not be parliamentary. But sneaky is sneaky.

I think this government opposite has been exceptionally sneaky with the Canadian people and in particular those of us who reside in Atlantic Canada.

I would have hoped that on this particular day ministers of the Crown would avail themselves of the opportunity to participate in this important debate. I want to add I only see one minister of the Crown.

• (1410)

An hon. member: There are two.

Mr. Dingwall: Somebody says: "There are two". There are two, but I want to say that I only see one minister of the Crown who is responsible for transport. I know that minister would want to avail herself of the opportunity to talk about the excessive user fees which this particular minister and the government are imposing on airports and flight users in this country, particularly in Atlantic Canada.

We were sold a bill of goods back some years ago. We were told by the incumbent government that the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency would be the panacea for resolving all of the ills in Atlantic Canada. Now we have found repeatedly, time after time, other agencies of the Government of Canada such as Transport Canada, for which the minister is responsible, that have introduced user fees in an excessive amount. This will only hamper our very weakening economy in Atlantic Canada.

But now I understand why Bill C-35 is before the House. It is a sneaky bill. What do they want to do? They do not want us to review the comprehensive report. I am not referring to the annual report, because under the legislation of the House and under the statute itself, as I am sure the Solicitor General would attest, they must file an annual report. The comprehensive report will not be given until when? Every fifth year. We will not be able to find out about how damaging the activities of Transport Canada are for Atlantic Canadians.

I would not say that the Minister of Transport or the Minister of State for Transport is sneaky. That would be inappropriate, but I suggest to the Chair that this bill and this government are sneaky. I feel very vindicated and I want to thank my colleagues—the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys, the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls and all my other colleagues in Atlantic Canada—for providing me with what I guess we could call somewhat of a Christmas present on December 24. They presented me with those documents which reaffirmed my suspicions about the activities of the government opposite as it relates to Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure you would probably get unanimous consent for me to speak on. I am sure members opposite would want to hear me and would not want me to lose the opportunity to reveal more information as it pertains to ACOA. The fact is that this government has left an agency trumped up prior to election year as the panacea for economic development in Atlantic Canada. Recently it has been cut adrift by its political masters in Ottawa, namely the minister responsible for ACOA, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance.

All over Atlantic Canada we have example after example of Canadians without work, Canadians who have a desire to be at work, and a generation of young Canadians who have a great cause, the cause to participate in a Canadian economy so that they can make their contribution as individuals and perhaps subsequently, in later years, as spouses and family members.

This government precludes that opportunity. Time and time again it has put up road-blocks. It has not built roads. It has put up road-blocks.

Today 92,000 young people, more so than in January 1991, are without work as a result of the government opposite. All we get from the minister from Atlantic Canada, as we heard in Question Period today, is that he cannot do anything. He does not know what to do. He has no ideas. He has no principles with which to base any sort of sound public policy. All he does is sit and wait, fold his hands, cross his fingers and hope that the market forces will produce the necessary jobs for the young people across this country, including those in Atlantic Canada.

I say to members of the government opposite: "That is not good enough". For those of us who have entered public life to serve this country and try to assist individuals both young and old to improve their lot in Canadian society, I say to the government: "If you don't have the ideas, if you lack the political will to exercise whatever those thoughts may be, you ought to do the most prudent thing and that is to resign. If you can't resign, you should do the next best thing and that is call a general election and allow the people of Canada to decide".

Let me now talk about the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and how it interfaces with other agencies of the Government of Canada. I have made references to Transport Canada. Let me make references, if I may, to Employment and Immigration.

Just last month in Halifax I was extended an invitation to attend a meeting of all the managers and senior staff of the CEIC offices in that province. I told each and every one in attendance that job development moneys, which have been put on hold by this government, were an absolute necessity in order to get people back to work. I have written to the minister on that. First I thanked him for extending an invitation for me to attend those deliberations. Then I told him that there were communities throughout this country with exceptionally high unemployment and very few prospects that the economic picture may change in coming weeks and months. I told him that he had a responsibility, whether it be in Lockeport, Glace Bay, Gander, the city of Montreal or the city of Ottawa, wherever those situations are, to try to assist.

Hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of my constituents in such municipalities as Glace Bay, New Waterford, Dominion, Cape Breton County and Richmond County have no hope of any foreseeable employment within the next 12 months.

The government says: "Where are we going to get the money?" I will throw out a little figure. In 1989 the advertising budget of this particular government was well over $75 million. That was so ministers of the Crown could get the seal of the Government of Canada, their pictures, their names, with PC, MP, or QC, whatever, on documents to distribute throughout the country.

When the Minister of Employment and Immigration stands weaving and bobbing that he does not know what he can do to assist the people of Canada, I suggest to him that he ought to do an examination of expenditures in house. Seventy-five million dollars would do wonders in constituencies like mine and Gander—Grand Falls. No, it would not be the panacea. It would not resolve the real turmoil these individuals are confronted with, but it certainly would be of some assistance. It could also help countless numbers of Canadians who are going to the food banks.

I have been a member of this House for almost 12 years. I have never seen it like it is today when I walk the streets here in Ottawa and I meet the great numbers of homeless people on the Sparks Street Mall, where stores are closing one after another.

This government has the unmitigated gall to say: "We do not have any money". It takes $75 million dollars to see the picture of the Solicitor General or the Minister of Labour, whose looks are surprisingly better than mine. At best you could hire them for a haunted house and make millions of dollars with them. I say to my colleagues opposite: Do not pour out your heart to us on the floor of the House of Commons that there is no money in the kitty. There is some money in the kitty, and it is your obligation to find those dollars and to spend them wisely and prudently for those individuals who need the assistance of the Crown at a very difficult time in Canadian history.

In the time I have remaining I want to say to members opposite that the situation is grave. The time for action is now. There is a call which has gone out across this country asking members of Parliament, and in particular members on the government side, to assess, to listen and, above all, to act.

The refusal to act is the equivalent of saying—I know the Minister of Labour is listening very attentively— that you do not care. I would ask, I would urge and I would implore that members of the government seriously reflect on how they can put money in appropriate agencies across this country to facilitate economic growth in order to provide Canadians, wherever they may be, with an opportunity for a decent living, and to provide assistance to the ones they live with.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I would have to say in all honesty that my hon. friend should recall the reality of the situation in this country which is that if the government, of which he was a supporter, had not been such a profligate spender as it was in the period from 1974 to 1984, it would not have left this country in the financial mess it did and burden the Canadian taxpayer and the Canadian people with the debt that this government, to its credit, has been trying to clean up and attend to in the last seven years.

I have another comment and this is really why I rose. My hon. friend was to some extent caught up in the rhetoric of the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls and the mythological speech that he shared with us about the Atlantic fishery. He made suggestions and implications with respect to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Then my hon. friend from Cape Breton—East Richmond got up and used the word negligence with respect to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. My hon. friend does no credit to himself and no credit to his party when he uses that word with reference to that minister.

I would like to say here that no minister of the Crown in this country has ever served his province of Newfoundland and Labrador, Atlantic Canada and this country with the devotion and the effectiveness as the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

My question to the hon. member is: Will he rise in his place and apologize for the suggestion that any action of this minister could be associated with the word negligent?

Mr. Dingwall: I thank the hon. member for his kind intervention. I assure him that his views will be reflected upon most sincerely by me. I accept his observation that my reference to the minister as being negligent may have been a harsh and untimely chosen word for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

I am not certain I said that.

An hon. member: You should have if you did not.

Mr. Dingwall: So the hon. member is crystal clear, I do not think I used the word negligent. I think I used the words grossly negligent, which is a much stronger term. If there ever ought to be an individual castigated on the floor of the House of Commons, it is not only the minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, but everyone who sits on the front bench. If there has ever been a group of Keystone Kops, it is that group. They remind you of the monkeys that used to advertise for Red Rose tea; the only thing is they can never get their song together for the same verse, as we have seen here today.

Yesterday the Minister for International Trade said there was no draft free trade agreement with Mexico. Only today he admits there is one. He does not do an impact study with regard to the issues affecting GATT, but at the same time he does an impact study with regard to the free trade agreement and does not wish to share the information with all Canadians.

The hon. member is well respected in the province of Nova Scotia, not only in the constituency that he represents but by the people across the province. I say to him that perhaps the best way that we should settle this particular dispute on the definition, on the etymology of the word negligent and gross negligence, is let us go to the people. I will put my seat on the line if that hon. member opposite will put his seat on the line and winner take all; winner take cabinet post, winner take all. That is the offer that I make to my distinguished colleague across the way. Perhaps he will no longer be a distinguished colleague. He may become an extinguished colleague of the Conservative Party.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, before this bill gets rammed through by the impressive majority I see over there, I would like to say a few words on certain aspects of it. I cannot undertake for the House to give the kind of gut speech and at the same time cerebral speech that my friend from Gander—Grand Falls has given; nor the kind of speech that my good friend from Cape Breton—East Richmond has treated us to.

There are, nevertheless, a couple of things I want to say. Perhaps not a bad starting point is right where my friend from Cape Breton—East Richmond finished. He was responding to a concern that had been expressed by my good friend from South Shore. The gentleman from South Shore had taken exception to some remarks by my colleague from Cape Breton—East Richmond to the effect that the minister of fisheries, my distinguished friend from St. John's West, was negligent.

To set the record straight, as the usual impartial observer I can be from time to time, maybe I should say to my friend from South Shore that instead of getting into a shouting match between himself and the gentleman from Cape Breton over whether he did or did not do it, maybe there is a more dispassionate way to decide whether this minister is even capable of negligence, this great friend of mine from St. John's West.

Let me give an example which is very much on the public record, an example that affects my own riding of Burin—St. George's more so than any other riding, an example which also has national implications. In so far as fishing treaties are concerned, two particular agreements were arrived at in recent years to which I would like to refer. First of all, I refer to the agreement setting up NAFO, the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization which flowed from the Law of the Sea Conference that established the 200-mile limit in 1977. That agreement provided that the 12 signatories, which we members of NAFO, to use the acronym, Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization for the fellows from Toronto, including Canada, including the European Community, in September of each year were to be assigned with respect to the following fishing season a certain quota, a certain allocation, a certain number of metric tons of fish which they could take, having due respect for conservation concerns of the fish stocks in the northwest Atlantic. A very simple and commendable process.

From 1977, as the member for South Shore will know, through 1978, 1979 and 1980 and through 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, every signatory, every one of the 12 members of NAFO without exception, therefore including the European Community which will become important later, honoured the agreement and stayed within the quota and there was no overfishing whatsoever, none.

Beginning in 1985 the system was the same but the results were different. Beginning in 1985, 11 of the 12 signatories continued to honour the agreement and one began to massively overfish. That one was the European Community and specifically two members of that community, Spain and Portugal.

Beginning in 1985 that member of the European Community whose quota was 23,200 metric tons actually take 23,200 metric tons. In 1985 it took 172,000 metric tons. It took eight times its quota.

In 1986 it took 12 times its quota, 12 times as much fish as it was supposed to take under an agreement which it had signed. And so it went on. In 1985 and 1986 there was massive abuse, massive destruction, massive pillaging of the fish stocks that my people in Burin—St. George's and people elsewhere in Newfoundland depend on for their livelihood, either as workers in fish plants or as fishermen and fisherwomen on the boats.

That massive, unconscionable pillaging went on through 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988. It went on through 1989 and 1990 and has gone on through 1991. I predict it will go on through 1992. That is one-half of the example. Let me give you the other half. That is the NAFO issue and I have told how there was massive abuse of the fishing in respect to that agreement.

There was another agreement signed between Canada and France, a bilateral agreement just between those two countries, addressing fisheries issues and the fishing rights of those two countries in so far as the Gulf of St. Lawrence and an area known as 3PS, an area basically south of the island of Newfoundland and around the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. There were agreements signed there that allowed, among other things, for France to take certain quotas. That agreement was signed in 1972 and it said that, depending on the advice of scientists and marine biologists, France would be allowed to take a certain tonnage each year. That agreement was signed in 1972. Would you believe that beginning with that agreement, for 1973 and 1974 and 1975 and each year thereafter, France stayed within the quota. Whatever the quota was for that year, it took. Whatever it was for 1975, it took; for 1976, it took. It never exceeded the quota. Right up until and including 1984 France honoured that agreement and stayed within the quota of fish it was allowed to catch off the coast of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

Beginning in 1985 things changed dramatically. Instead of catching its 1985 quota of 9,500 tonnes France took 25,800 tonnes. In 1986, instead of staying within its quota of 9,500 tonnes, France took 26,000 tonnes. In short, beginning in 1985 France began to take approximately three times its quota under its bilateral agreement between Canada and France.

France has continued to do that essentially until this day or, to be more correct, until a year or so ago when this government entered into an agreement, and the purpose of this latter agreement of 1990 or 1991 was right. The purpose was right. The methodology was a bit naive but the purpose was right. It was to get France to the table, which it did.

However, the way it did it was to say: "France, you have been stealing from us. Instead of taking 9,500 tonnes which you are allowed under the agreement, you are taking 26,000. Let's make a deal. Instead of stealing 26,000, will you agree just to steal 17,000? How is that for a deal? We will let you steal fish but only steal twice as much as you are supposed to, instead of three times as much". That is an aside.

The real point I want to make is that in 1977 NAFO signed an agreement and until 1984 that agreement was honoured. Beginning in 1985 the European Community abused it terribly.

On the other hand France signed an agreement with Canada which it continued to honour until 1985, at which time it began to abuse it terribly. I have given the figures.

In both cases there was agreement and both sides worked within the agreement until and including 1984. There was abuse of the agreement beginning in 1985 and has been ever since. Why did massive overfishing begin in both cases in 1985? The short answer must concern the fact that there was a change of government and with it a very definite change of approach as to how to treat France, Portugal and Spain.

As of 1985 the message went out to Portugal, Spain and France that a new crowd was in charge over here, a crowd that did not care how much they pillaged the fish stocks, how many Newfoundlanders in fish plants they put out of work, how many fishermen from Nova Scotia and Newfoundland they put out of work in the fishing boats. "Pillage the stock if that is the way you feel", was the net message that went out.

What does this have to do with what my friend from South Shore asked a minute ago when he was a little concerned about the suggestion that the minister from St. John's West could be characterized as negligent? He is a minister, bless his cotton-picking soul, the only minister we have had in the cabinet from Newfoundland since September 1984. There has been no other, just him, just that one man from September 1984 until the present. The overfishing began in 1985, within six months of his becoming the minister.

The French, Spanish and Portuguese walked off with literally tens of thousands of tonnes. They wiped out thousands and thousands of Newfoundlanders' jobs, those of the minister's fellow countrymen and some of his fellow constituents. They caused a shutdown at the plant at Trepassey in his riding because of fish stocks. They caused a shutdown of the plant in St. John's in his riding as a result of the fish stocks issue. What was he doing?

Mr. Speaker, do you believe, and if you do not just check Hansard, that from 1984 through 1985 when overfishing by those three countries began it continued through 1986, 1987 and 1988?

How many times was the overfishing by foreigners issue raised publicly in this House? It was raised once in four years. In 1985–86, 1987–88, it was raised once. In December of 1988, four years after the overfishing began, it was raised in this Chamber for the first time. I know because I am the one who raised it after I was elected here in November 1988. That is the first time it was raised in this Chamber by anybody.

What more graphic example of gross disgusting negligence could you have than that? A minister lets thousands of his fellow countrymen, thousands of his constituents, plant workers and fishermen go down the economic drain because he is tied to a policy that says "Do not rock the boat, fellows. If the Portuguese and the Spaniards, the French and the Europeans want a few tonnes of fish, let them take the fish, all the fish they want, but do not rock the boat because our Prime Minister, our boy from Baie Comeau, is trying to be a statesman out there. He wants to be buddies with Mitterrand. What do a few fishermen's lives have to do with this? What do a few plant workers' livelihoods have to do with it all? Do not rock the boat, Crosbie. Do not rock the boat, minister from St. John's West".

The accusation against that minister is not negligence. That is too good a term for what he did. The accusation is much worse than that. In graphically simple terms, he abandoned thousands of people in his riding, plant workers and fishermen, and thousands more in my riding, tens of thousands in total, rather than break with a policy that was absolutely unconscionable and that was designed to be the death-knell for the Atlantic fishery.

Luckily and to his credit, and he needs some credit because he committed such an atrocious sin in respect to the other in allowing this to go on silently for four years, the minister has lately decided that enough is enough and now he is out there, belatedly albeit, being the champion on the overfishing issue. It is almost certainly a case of closing the barn after the horse is gone.

His voice is now vibrant in 1992 on overfishing as he trips around the citadels and the capitals of the world. If we had only had it in 1985 in cabinet. If we had only had it speaking up about the jobs in Trepassey and St. John's and those other places I could mention, places in my riding. I mentioned a couple in the minister's riding. That is what he has to answer for. He is playing one awfully big game of catch-up these days, trying to undo some of the misery he inflicted on those people by his silence. I say to the member for South Shore, who I understand has to come in here and toe the line and keep an eye on that crowd, those boys, watch the fellows from Gander—Grand Falls and Burin—St. George's and Cape Breton eastward.

Watch what they say and then get up and try to poke a few holes in it and, if they say a nasty word like negligence, get up and look intelligent and show the people across the country that we take them on. If they want to know, if they want to challenge my colleague's use of negligence, I have just given them an example. If they want some more examples, I can give them more. I cannot give one that is any more graphic than the one I have just given. Literally thousands of jobs of fishermen and plant workers in my riding and in the minister's riding of St. John's West have gone down the drain because of the negligence, the failure to act by that minister.

That will be part of his legacy. He can undo it somewhat if he would do what we have been saying he should do: say to the Europeans they have have had enough time. We in Canada are going to unilaterally extend the continental shelf to take in the nose and tail of the Grand Banks and the Flemish Cap, those three little outgrowths where the fish spend some of their time when they are not inside the Canadian line. It is when they are outside that line of course that they become vulnerable to the pillaging I talked about a little while ago.

I am sure in time my good friend the minister from St. John's West, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, will want to—hopefully before this debate is over—stand and give his side of the story, why it was he was absolutely silent, muzzled, for four entire years, never made one peep in this House, outside this House, not one living peep. Nothing. Zilch. For four years he watched jobs being wiped out and industry being absolutely pulverized by his neglect, his negligence, his failure to go to the Prime Minister, be a man about it, and say he could not stand by and let this be done to his fellow Newfoundlanders, to his fellow Canadians. That is what he should have done. That is what he did not do and I say to my friends on South Shore that is what I call negligence. Maybe he has a nicer word for it.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

ESTABLISHMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION INTO PRICING PRACTICES

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved:

That this House urges the government to launch a royal commission into pricing practices in the pharmaceutical industry to determine the rate of mark-ups in price at each transaction, from manufacturer to wholesaler or distributor, from wholesaler or distributor to retailer, and from retailer to the public, in order to determine how such mark-ups affect the Canadian consumer.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to explain why I presented this motion.

[English]

This motion has a very clear purpose which I hope will meet and satisfy not only the curiosity but the political interest of my colleagues in this Chamber.

The background is the following. First, the pharmaceutical industry in Canada is a substantial business. Its activities amount to some $4.5 billion every year.

Second, for certain products called patent drugs, the industry enjoys a substantial monopoly situation which could be strengthened and amplified if the present negotiations at GATT are successful. On that subject my colleague for York West will be intervening later.

Third, the whole question of mark-ups in the price of pharmaceutical products affects the consumer.

Finally, mark-ups in this industry also affect the taxpayer and the public purse.

For all these reasons I would like to present the following case which is based on a meeting held last May by the Liberal task force on the industrialization and economic renewal in Ontario. It took place here on the Hill with representatives of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada.

On that occasion, we learned that according to the data at hand with the representatives of the association, the mark-ups are as follows: the one practised at the manufacturing level ranges between 15 and 60 per cent. As well there is apparently an inventory charge at the factory level of approximately 10 per cent. When the product leaves the factory gates and reaches the wholesaler, the mark-up at that point is anywhere between 7 and 10 per cent. When the product reaches the pharmacist, the mark-up is anywhere between 30 and 50 per cent, we were told, and to that, of course, is added the dispensing fee. The dispensing fee varies from province to province and ranges from $6 per dispensation to $11.

Why is this a public issue? It is a public issue in two respects. This is an industry that is federally regulated and, as you may recall, the last and rather intensive debate which took place in this House was on Bill C-22.

Second, the cost of prescription drugs is covered by provincial health care plans with public funds. The beneficiaries or the people who are covered by this provincial health care plan, will be mostly found among senior citizens and low income Canadians and Canadians who are under hospital care and who receive medical treatment and drugs while in hospital.

While it is not possible for me to indicate the precise amount of drug costs involved for these two major categories, I would be inclined to suggest that it is a fairly substantial sum.

Mr. Speaker, as a result of this brief overview you can see why the public purse is heavily affected by the mark-ups and by the cost of drugs.

Under the Ontario drug benefit plan, for instance, we learned that over the past decade the increase in expenditures has been 12 per cent for every year. That is not a minor increase year by year in expenditures by the Ontario drug benefit plan.

The Manitoba minister of health and welfare, when he appeared in 1988 before the Senate committee on banking, trade and commerce, said that the expenditures on drugs in Manitoba were increasing at that time at the rate of 15 per cent per year. It is worth while noting that by contrast, while the drug costs are increasing over 10 per cent per year according to the data made available by Ontario and Manitoba, in the case of Ontario the hospital expenditures as an over-all figure have risen only by 4.5 per cent per year. So you can see that the percentage increase year to year in the cost of drugs is three times as high as the percentage of increase in the over-all hospital expenditures.

The House may recall, and I made a brief reference to this fact, that we had quite an intensive discussion at the time of the amendments to the Patent Act and under Bill C-22. The present law makes a provision for a review board to monitor drug prices. At this point you may want to ask, Mr. Speaker, why should we have a royal commission as proposed in this motion? In answer to that question I have to draw your attention to the fact that the mandate of the review board is considerably limited. It is limited to reviewing the price at which the manufacturer sells to the wholesaler. The review board has no authority to review the final price or mark-ups between the factory gate and the store shelf, so that reviewing the annual price increases of patented drugs takes place at that very factory gate snap shut situation, not at the level of the wholesaler, not at the level of the pharmacist, at the retail level.

In addition, and this was also the object of interesting discussions in the Senate, the review board can only review but not roll back prices. In other words, the board cannot determine whether the consumer has been given a fair shake or fair treatment.

For all of these reasons, a royal commission on drug pricing in Canada becomes a necessary step. It becomes a must if we want to give Canadians the assurance that they are treated fairly in the process of acquiring drugs at the retail level.

Let me review again the mark-ups because it is important. At the manufacturers' level, the mark-up is between 15 per cent and 60 per cent. In addition to that, there is an inventory charge of some 10 per cent. Once the product leaves the factory gate, the wholesaler's mark-up is between 7 per cent and 10 per cent. Once it reaches the pharmacist, the mark-up is between 30 per cent and 50 per cent. In addition to that, the pharmacist, for the task which consists of counting a certain number of tablets, typing a label which indicates the name of the patient and the general name of the drug, but which does not, however, reveal the content of it and that is a very serious shortcoming, I submit to you, charges a fee that ranges between $6 and $11 per prescription.

So it becomes clear that we must look at this pattern of mark-ups. They have to be confirmed, have to be examined, have to be studied. That will be the purpose of the commission, to compare them, to look at the mandate given to the review board, which we will find does not protect the consumer. The consumer is helpless because the review board is not empowered to do anything about most of the steps from the factory gate to the consumer.

It is true that it can look at the prices at the factory gate, but even there, where it has jurisdiction to review, it has no jurisdiction to roll back. So, Mr. Speaker, to make this intervention as short as possible and allow as many colleagues as possible to intervene, I will conclude by saying that the motion before you, in essence, asks for fairness in the settling of drug prices for Canadians.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in my place today to respond to the motion from the hon. member for Davenport.

It was recommended that the government establish a royal commission on the pricing practices of the pharmaceutical industry.

I know that the hon. member is motivated by a genuine concern for the impact the drug prices have on consumers, and I know that he is concerned about the ability of provincial governments to respond to increasing prices.

As much as we can acknowledge the undoubted good intentions of this motion, I am afraid that the motion for a royal commission is misplaced.

Any royal commission, as we know, imposes a large expense on the public treasury. Clearly there are important issues which must be examined by commissions of inquiry, but if we are going to burden the taxpayer with the expense, first we had better make sure that we genuinely do need a commission.

I am afraid that when one looks at the proposal and at the state of the pharmaceutical industry in general, I cannot see that we should inflict upon taxpayers the cost of this kind of study.

To begin with, several items the hon. member would like to examine fall under provincial jurisdiction. I am sure that it was not the intention of the hon. member for Davenport to intrude on provincial responsibilities for pharmaceutical price controls at the retail level, but that is the effect of his motion.

In fact, hon. members are well aware that the provinces have demonstrated a great concern for drug pricing. The challenges vary from province to province.

Each province is more capable of focusing on its own needs than a federal inquiry would be. In fact, some provinces have recognized their own responsibility to investigate these matters.

Both Ontario and British Columbia have already conducted their own commissions into the areas that fall under their jurisdiction. I am certain that no one in this House would endorse a commission that would only duplicate that work.

Any federal inquiry would inevitably get bogged down into the complexities of provincial systems over which this House has no jurisdiction whatsoever.

The issue of provincial responsibilities brings me to another reason why I believe this House should vote against this motion.

Hon. members from both sides are no doubt aware that the minister of health and welfare is committed to working with the provinces to ensure reasonably priced drugs for Canadians. In fact, the minister met with his provincial counterparts on January 27 to discuss this matter and other issues of mutual concern.

I am reassured by the commitment of the Minister of National Health and Welfare that prices will be kept reasonable for consumers, and I am encouraged by his efforts to work with the provinces on the issue.

At the federal level, we have the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board. Since the Patent Act was amended in 1987, the board, regardless of any limits on its mandate, has kept price increases for patented drugs below the increase in the Consumer Price Index. The board will be given enhanced powers to keep prices of patented drugs reasonable.

At the same time that this government is working with the provinces to ensure reasonable drug prices, it is working to encourage more research and development in the Canadian pharmaceutical industry.

There have already been some remarkable results. Glaxo Canada, one of the largest research-based pharmaceutical companies in Canada announced on January 16 that it was moving ahead with plans to build a $70 million manufacturing plant in Mississauga.

Glaxo estimates that it will invest $275 million over the next five years on research and development. In 1991, the company invested $25 million in research and development and has doubled its employment over the past five years to more than 1,000 employees across the country.

Four days after the Glaxo announcement, Astra Pharma Incorporated said it was considering building a new $150 million research facility in Mississauga, creating about 50 new research jobs.

Astra is already committed to an R and D investment in Canada of about $95 million over a five-year period. Further investment in facilities and equipment at the company's Mississauga location is likely to reach $97 million.

Both commitments are expected to result in about 160 new jobs. At the same time Astra announced that it has rolled back the 1992 prices on its prescription drugs to the 1991 level. The price reduction would amount to about 4 per cent or 5 per cent on the company's prescription drugs.

• (1130)

At a time when the world-wide pharmaceutical industry is evolving quickly Canada must strive to play an important role in the growth of this industry.

As we can see, new research means high-paying skilled jobs for the medical and scientific communities. New research means a more competitive Canadian pharmaceutical industry. New research means new products that will add to the comfort and health of Canadians.

Canadians want and deserve more research and development leading to better medicines and treatment.

We want to send a signal that Canada welcomes the investment that means jobs in the pharmaceutical industry. We want our intellectual property protection to be an incentive for investment.

I would like to remind the House that investment by the brand name pharmaceutical industry has increased substantially since patent protection was improved in 1987.

At that time the industry made a commitment to increase research and development expenditures to 8 per cent of sales by the end of 1991. Has the innovative pharmaceutical sector lived up to that commitment? Not only have they lived up to the commitment, they have surpassed it.

By the end of 1990, a year earlier than their commitment called for, the research and development to sales ratio of patent holders had risen to 8.8 per cent.

That is a substantial increase from the 4.9 per cent research and development to sales ratio which the industry exhibited before the act was amended. Total research and development has increased from $165.7 million in 1988 to $281.3 million in 1990.

We have come a long way in encouraging research and development investment in the Canadian pharmaceutical industry, but we can do more.

That is why the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs recently endorsed multilateral trade proposals to strengthen patent protection for pharmaceuticals.

These proposals are contained in the draft text of the GATT agreement. They would allow pharmaceutical patent owners to enjoy the full term of protection now provided to patent owners in all other sectors of our economy.

Increased patent protection in Canada will bring increased medical research and development to Canada. This means new jobs and a more prosperous competitive Canadian pharmaceutical industry.

At the same time the generic industry must continue to play an important role in providing medicines to Canadians. The government is sensitive to the needs of the generic industry in adapting to the new pharmaceutical policy.

I remind the House that under the current system a drug typically enters the market 10 years after its patent is filed and the generic copy can enter seven years later.

The current GATT text that we have endorsed would add another three years to this period. In other words the generic products would come on the market after 20 years rather than after 17.

Generic drug manufacturers in Canada use competitive manufacturing technology to produce a broad line of drug products. This segment of the industry is expected to grow at a reasonable rate, in part because of a number of successful drugs that are coming to the end of their market exclusivity in Canada.

The generic drug manufacturers will be able to continue to produce drugs under their existing compulsory licences. Under the proposed changes to the patent protection announced in January they will still be able to market drugs once patents have expired.

In summary, first, the government has stated that if changes are made to the Patent Act it will grant new and enhanced powers to the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board.

Second, the government is consulting with the provinces to ensure drug costs are kept reasonable.

Third, the brand name pharmaceutical companies have stated that they would increase their level of R and D in Canada and their performance bears it out.

What would the effect of a royal commission be on this progress? We have all been in political life long enough to know the effect that commissions of inquiry have on work in progress. It is either slowed or stopped. The temptation is to place things on hold until the results of a commission are known.

Those are the reasons that I would urge the House not to support the well-intentioned motion before us.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, let me say from the outset that I compliment my colleague, the member of Parliament for Davenport for putting forth this motion.

In terms of the drug pricing practices and policies, it is not only substantively well placed, but the timing could not have been better.

That is why I fully support the intent of the motion before the House of Commons for debate.

I say the timing could not be better because on January 14 the Minister for International Trade on behalf of the Canadian government basically agreed to a proposal put forth at the GATT negotiations in Geneva to grant and give brand name pharmaceutical companies essentially a 20–year monopoly on new drugs.

As you well know, Mr. Speaker, the existing legislation in Canada allows for a seven to ten–year protection for brand name drugs and allows at the same time a generic industry that has grown, flourished and matured and has become an integral part of the Canadian health care system to become a reality.

I think the move by the Minister for International Trade will seriously injure, if not completely undermine, that Canadian generic industry which essentially is a made–in–Canada for Canadians system that I think Canadians at large are indeed proud of.

We have to face the reality that we have to strike a balance between the large foreign multinational pharmaceutical companies and those generic companies in Canada when in fact 92 per cent of the pharmaceutical activity in this country is foreign owned. We have to take stock when we throw statistics out that indeed there are some 3,000 jobs involved in the generic industry, largely in Ontario but certainly also in western Canada and other places across the country. We simply cannot throw that to the wind.

When we talk about the generic industry, clearly Toronto, my home city, is a very leading part of that equation where we have the two largest generic industries in Canada, namely Novo Pharm and Apotex.

When we talk about the effect of that January 14 decision, it is clearly twofold. On the one hand, it has a very serious economic impact on the 3,000 jobs that I have just talked about in terms of stopping any further research, all in Canada I might add, by our generic industry. It will stop any contemplated expansions. For instance, Apotex and Novo Pharm are in the mood to expand. Apotex was to have a $50 million research project going on in Winnipeg, Manitoba, which is now seriously in jeopardy. Clearly there is an economic impact in terms of jobs. Lord knows that we need each and every one of those 3,000 jobs, particularly as Canada and Canadians are gripped in one of the worst recessions that this country has ever faced.

The second impact of that impending decision is the whole question of the cost of drugs to Canadians. The government simply has to face, rather than ignore, that the generic industry and generic drugs have permitted a competitive and stabilizing force regarding the price of drugs.

The speaker who preceded me talked about the need for having a competitive pharmaceutical industry. It is quite ironic that a government member should be saying that the effect of the January 14 decision would not be to encourage greater competition, but would place on firmer ground the whole question of giving these multinationals a very large monopoly.

The fact that drug pricing has been moderated by the generic industry is an integral part of our health care system, whether the government likes it or whether it does not. We have to be cognizant that those prices will rise under a state of monopoly. It is natural. Governments and hospitals are now faced with spiralling health care costs. In my province the hospital association is requesting of the Government of Ontario some $600 million only to cover the debts incurred over the last number of years. St. Michael's Hospital, a leading hospital in Toronto, has to close departments because of financial constraints. This is not the time to be giving foreign multinational corporations a monopoly. I am not talking about stopping them at the border. Not at all. I think we should welcome that investment.

I am saying that there has to be a balance between those foreign multinational corporations which wish to invest and hopefully create some economic prosperity in this country. We also have to balance that with the generic drug industries that have helped keep prices down rather than increasing through the roof.

In addition to hospitals and governments, the individuals, our citizens, our consumers are also facing a very tough economic time. They are trying to hold on to their jobs or they are trying to get a job. It has really come down to two basic interests to Canadians, having a job and a livelihood and also trying to have protection for their health and an accessible, affordable system with which to do it.

At this time individuals cannot bear increased prices for their medicines. Are those who do not have a job and who become sick and those on fixed incomes and pensioners who have been granted a 75 cent a month increase on their pensions going to accept a 20 year monopoly on brand name drugs? Is this government not sensitive to the fact that in the last two to three years any new drug introduced on to the market has been incredibly expensive? On average 100 tablets costs between $100 and $200. Are we not to say that there is room for moderate influence? Are we not also prepared to say that a brand name pharmaceutical company should enjoy some protection on their research and development for discovering that drug? On average, that pharmaceutical company gets its money back after only two to three years. Therefore, a 10-year protection would seem to be plenty of time to get back those research moneys and also make a profit. But why 20 years?

In fact, if you think about the life of a drug, it is not going to be more than 20 years. Because of technology and research, after a drug has been on the market for 20 years there will be new discoveries. The generic industry coming in after 20 years is probably not going to be very lucrative or encouraging. After a 20-year life of that drug, rather than the generics replacing it there will be a new and improved brand name drug. Therefore, there really will be a monopoly on those drugs and through monopolies there will be an uncontrollable price on these drugs. The government has not spoken to how it will ensure fairness in that system.

Last, how were Canadians consulted? Did Canadians give the green light to the Minister for International Trade on January 14 to move on what has been an integral part of our health care system? In fact, I have a copy of a letter to the president of Apotex, Barry Sherman, dated Friday, January 10, from the government saying that it wished to consult. After one working day, on Tuesday, January 14, the Minister for International Trade chipped in and gave in on the generic drug licensing system in this country.

I say that is not consultation. Canadians have not been consulted. I am saying to you, Mr. Speaker, through this motion presented by the member for Davenport, that our health care system in this country helps to define what this country is all about, gives expression to the term "Canadianism" and Canadians will not let go of that very lightly. Therefore, the pricing of drugs in this country is a going concern and deserves the support of this House to put in practice the essence of the motion before us.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, on November 22, the hon. member for Davenport raised the matter of drug prices in the House. He presented a motion, urging the government to launch a royal commission of inquiry into pricing practices in the pharmaceutical industry. Although I agree that the price of drugs in Canada deserves our special attention, with due respect for the hon. member, I wonder whether the current situation in the pharmaceutical industry is such that we need a royal commission of inquiry.

The Canadian government is not in the habit of starting this kind of process without good reason. In fact, a thorough analysis was carried out by the Commission of Inquiry on the Pharmaceutical Industry just seven years ago, in February 1985. Furthermore, since 1987, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board, a regulatory agency with quasi-judicial powers, has a mandate to ensure that the prices of patented drugs are kept at reasonable levels.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether before putting his motion before the House, the hon. member took the time to read the board's latest annual report. According to the report for the year ended December 31, 1990, and I quote:

> The prices of patented drugs generally complied with the board's guidelines, which take into account the Consumer Price Index.

As far as I know, the situation has not changed drastically since then. I may remind hon. members that between December 1987 and December 1990, the average annual increase in the price of patented drugs was 3.1 per cent, while the average annual inflation rate was 4.7 per cent.

A preliminary review of 152 new drugs examined by the board in 1990 showed that for 100 of the drugs, companies had followed the guidelines on introductory prices for new patented drugs which came into effect in January 1990. The prices of 16 of the 52 remaining products were approved later on, either because the price had gone down or the change in price level was sufficiently below the cumulative change in the Consumer Price Index for the 1990 price to comply with the guidelines.

Review, verification of data and discussions with patentees are progressing for the remainder, according to the board's annual report. The current situation in the pharmaceutical industry has improved since the act to amend the Patent Act came into force in 1987.

At the time, there were some very gloomy predictions about the repercussions of this bill on the price of drug products. However, as reflected in the report of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board, the pessimists were wrong. The pharmaceutical industry kept its word, as predicted by the Hon. Harvie Andre, then Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

On December 16, 1986, Mr. Andre told the legislative committee on Bill C-22, and I quote:

> That improved patent protection would lead to an increase in research and development in the Canadian pharmaceutical industry.

Spending on research and development throughout the industry rose from $165.7 million in 1988 to $281.3 million in 1990. In other words, the ratio of research and development to sales revenue increased from 6.1 per cent in 1988 to 8.8 per cent in 1990.

All this goes to prove that the amendments to the Patent Act passed in 1987 have benefited Canada and, as a result, all Canadians. Research and development in the industry has expanded faster than was expected. At the same time, consumers have been protected against unreasonable increases in the price of patented drugs.

On the eve of further changes arising from multilateral trade proposals made at the GATT talks, changes that will strengthen patent protection for pharmaceutical products, the Canadian government has promised to ensure that the prices of patented drugs will remain reasonable for Canadian consumers. It is important for Canada's competitiveness and prosperity that our country should adopt a position that is in harmony with the multilateral proposals.

The new protection measures contained in the GATT agreement are one of the ways in which Canada can reinforce its position in the international market. We must remember that this is a market that puts a premium on research and innovation. While Canada must protect consumers, it must also transform its economy, which is now based mainly on the extraction and export of natural resources.

Canada must get in tune with a world economy based on value-added products. The pharmaceutical industry is very promising in this regard. It is therefore important for Canada to implement a legislative framework that favours basic research so as to provide for the creation and manufacture in Canada of innovative value-added products and also products that can be exported.

The present situation must be improved. Prosperity is not assured. We have seen countries lose their prosperity in a short time and that must not happen in Canada, Mr. Speaker. We have everything it takes to meet the productivity challenge. What is important now is that we be aware of the main problems, that we have the will to act and especially that we be prepared to implement a legislative framework for economic prosperity in Canada.

I think that the pharmaceutical industry is a good example of the kind of turnaround that must be achieved in all Canadian industries to ensure prosperity and maintain Canada's competitiveness in the world economy. Since changes were made to the Patent Act in 1987, the pharmaceutical industry's current expenditures on basic research have increased significantly. They rose from $53.5 million in 1989 to $70.1 million in 1990, an increase of 30.9 per cent.

The Patented Medicine Prices Review Board reported that in 1990, 47.5 per cent of current spending on research and development was in Quebec. In addition to investments, many jobs have been created since 1987, including 195 in research and development. It must be pointed out here that increasing basic research in Canada means definite benefits for Canada's health system and well-paying employment for science graduates from our Canadian universities, not to mention the marketing of innovative new products internationally.

A country like ours, where a quarter of production and a third of employment depends on exports, must follow the main trends of the world economy. I am thinking in particular of the very rapid evolution of technology. Companies that can take advantage of it can increase their productivity. They can also make better products more quickly and at lower cost.

In this regard also, the Canadian pharmaceutical industry is a leader and Canada must therefore encourage its development at the same time as it protects consumers. Personally, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the mechanisms now in place in our Canadian system allow for consumer protection and will also enable our federal and provincial governments to benefit from the availability of drugs at very competitive prices.

I do not believe that it would be appropriate to launch an inquiry at this time.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to respond to the motion of my colleague, Motion No. 617, which urges the House to launch a royal commission into pricing practices of the pharmaceutical industry.

This is a very important issue and it does respond to the government's recent announcement of extending patent protection to the large brand name drug manufacturers in this country.

This will be to the detriment of the business of the generic drug industry which is represented in Ontario by two firms, Apotex and Novopharm.

I speak to this issue from an aspect of morality. Governments are very much influenced by the strength of various lobbies that address them, but too seldom do we address the morality issues. By extending patent protection to companies and by not following the advice of the motion put forward by my colleague we are not looking at the more important issue of accessibility of the public to much needed drug therapy.

By extending protection we are making drug therapy more expensive. We have seen that in the reduction of the number of drugs that are on the list of the province of Ontario, for example. Because of the high costs of pharmaceuticals the government has had to strike off the list certain very beneficial drugs. This is not a benefit to us as a country. It relates very directly to our health care system as a whole.

The emphasis today is often on the distribution and the provision of aggressive high-tech but very expensive medical technology to people at the expense of preventive medicine which would benefit our whole country in reduced health care costs. It would certainly benefit far more individuals than our present system.

Obviously, from the many reports we have heard, our present system is under great stress and could falter because of the very high cost types of procedures we are having to support at the moment without reflection. My colleague's motion proposes that we set up a royal commission to review this. I do not accept the government's proposition that this motion is intruding into the provincial realm. It is a federal issue as well. We have the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board which is a federal board, but we are saying that we need to take a special look at this very important issue and set up a royal commission which I endorse whole-heartedly.

I also come to this issue from a different perspective, that is the perspective of the international community, Third World countries in particular. I was involved in trying to bring health care to Third World countries. I can tell the House that it was the generic firms of this country which provided the very necessary assistance, not the brand name pharmaceutical companies. Companies like Apotex and Novopharm assisted by providing thousands and thousands of doses of free medication, the most broadly used and very good quality medication, to people of our world, not just our country, who were most in need of therapeutic pharmaceuticals.

It distresses me that as we increase patent legislation and extend the patents to brand name companies, companies such as Apotex and Novopharm are forced to reduce expansion of their industry. This has a ripple effect of being very damaging, destructive and punitive to not only the many Canadians who need low price drugs but to the millions and millions of people who live in the Third World and can benefit from the generic drugs.

We have to review, revise and relook at our whole health system. One component of it that is very important is the pharmaceutical sector of therapy. We must decide how we can best serve in justice and equality the needs of all Canadians rather than put an emphasis on the very exclusive small sector of high-technology at the expense of pharmaceutical needs.

PUBLIC SERVICE REFORM ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the President of the Treasury Board, the hon. member for Québec, for the opportunity to speak about Bill C-26, the Public Service reform act.

Doing research for this second reading speech gave me the opportunity to examine in some detail the recent history of the Canadian federal Public Service and to make up my own mind about how efficiently the Public Service is delivering programs and services, and what areas need to be improved.

I must say the more I learned, the more I found that I was like the majority of Canadians, and I dare say some members of this House: when it comes to real knowledge about the Government of Canada we are somewhat lacking in facts and possessed of unfortunate negative stereotypes about the men and women who work here. We do not know enough about our own public servants is what I am saying. You know what I mean when you even think this way yourself. There are three persistent misconceptions about public servants held by many Canadians.

Contrary to popular myth, public servants or civil servants are not all overpaid and underworked. They do not have life-long jobs, nor do they all work in an unstressed environment out of touch with reality. Contrary to popular myth, most of them do not just push paper all day. They care about the citizens they serve. And, again contrary to popular myth, Public Service waste and mismanagement is not largely responsible for the huge federal debt. While cutting red tape and making the Public Service more business-like is very important, it will not solve most of the country's budgetary problems.

In 1992 anyone who believes these myths is just plain wrong.

The federal Public Service is a vital national institution in the process of renewing itself from within and becoming more business-like in almost every respect. What is more, every Canadian has a stake in the success or the failure of this effort. Survey results compiled last year by a research team from Carleton University, the University of Ottawa and the University of Western Ontario found that federal public servants are hard working, stressed out and want substantial changes in how they perform their jobs. After years of budget cuts, downsizing, stalled careers, workload increases and non-inflationary pay increases culminating in a salary freeze this year, federal employees, clients and knowledgeable outsiders are calling for major changes in how the Public Service operates.

The changes are under way. The initiative to reform the Public Service was begun some two years ago under the banner Public Service 2000. Public Service 2000 has proved to be very well named. The name denotes a vision of the future while the fact that it was announced in 1990 and not in 1999 is an acknowledgement that many of the changes needed, including changes in attitudes, will take some time.

The Public Service has a long and splendid history. While 1992 marks the 125th anniversary of Canada as a nation, I would remind hon. members that 1992 also marks the 125th anniversary of the federal Public Service as an ongoing institution. While there is no perfect way to go about reforming such a huge, complex or historic institution, I think remarkable progress has been made to date, progress that is largely unknown to members of this House and I daresay to most taxpayers who may be beginning to notice an improvement in service from employees.

Shortly after Public Service 2000 was announced, 10 task forces set off to look closely at specific areas that they felt to be in need of reform. The task forces undertook a great deal of consultation, especially in the area of service to the public, which I am sure all hon. members would agree must be the raison d'être of the Public Service.

The task force reports were all made public. The reports contained some 300 recommendations. The reports and the feedback they generated, plus advice from academics and clients, resulted in a white paper which was tabled in this House more than a year ago by the hon. President of the Treasury Board. The white paper outlined many areas of needed change.

As a result of the white paper, where legislative changes were not required, many administrative reforms have already been put in place or are in the works.

Central agencies are taking the lead in slashing red tape and time consuming reporting requirements. They are moving away from a prescriptive controlled oriented approach to one more focused on results that are achieved by providing guidance and advice to departments and instituting clear accountability mechanisms.

The Public Service is now clearly more important to the federal government than the preservation of the systems and structures. Departments, in turn, are also eliminating their own internal administrative constraints where they have served to reduce efficiency unnecessarily.

Over and above the Public Service 2000, six straight years of frozen operating budgets for almost all departments, coupled with five straight years of downsizing, have forced departments to cut administrative overhead and channel resources elsewhere in order to maintain their programs in the face of ever growing demands.

Frontline employees are now being empowered to make decisions about service delivery. At the more senior levels, layers of management have been trimmed back to only three below the deputy minister, speeding up decision making and empowering the rest of the employees. This restructuring and empowering is especially important for regions as employees no longer have to check it out with Ottawa every time. They can use their own common sense and good judgment to help Canadians faster. They can spend more time listening to clients, understanding their needs and providing the services they are responsible for instead of filling out forms and adhering to restrictive procedures. In other words, employees are now spending less time serving systems and more time serving citizens, and this benefits every Canadian taxpayer.

On another very important front, the government remains committed to finding the most effective ways of delivering its programs. Recently the government regained through negotiations with all of its unions the right of management to decide how best to deliver programs to Canadians. The full range of program delivery options is again available, including delivery of programs by the government itself or by some other method, including privatization, contracting out work, devolving some functions to other levels of government, or performing them through special operating agencies.

Operating budgets are already being introduced in some departments so that management can decide on its own what are the most efficient mixes of resources, be they human or financial, to deliver the programs that Parliament has agreed should be delivered. Most of the costs of providing programs and services are being recovered under a user fee policy that identifies the program beneficiaries who may not be paying an appropriate share of the costs. Examples include services in areas of transportation, passports and various forms of federal licensing.

Departments are reorganizing to reduce administrative costs. They are automating and finding innovative new ways to respond to the needs of Canadians. Improved management of Canada's cash inflows and outflows has saved taxpayers billions of dollars over the last six years, while assets are managed more efficiently.

In this regard this House last year passed legislative changes to the Financial Administration Act and the federal Real Property Act. What most taxpayers do not realize is that if Canadians did not have to pay interest on the national debt, the federal government would actually be running a $12.6 billion surplus in the last fiscal year, that is 1990–91, rather than a deficit. This represents a $28.5 billion turnaround since 1984–85. It is so important that people realize that we have made substantial progress in reducing the cost of government.

I do not think anyone can doubt that this sort of performance improvement represents a spectacular achievement in business terms. Yet it is almost completely unknown and unheralded. By and large taxpayers and clients of the federal programs do not know this. I think members of this House, myself included, must accept some responsibility for this situation.

The passage of Bill C–26 now before us would permit the performance and improvement process to continue. It would add new dimensions to the reform process and invigorate it, complementing other ongoing planned performance improvement. It would reaffirm the merit principle of Public Service staffing and respond to employee concerns about their careers, as well as manage concerns about lack of flexibility to serve the public better through deployment of staff.

To address the issue of career movement which has affected employee morale and hence service at the counter, narrow job classifications would be combined and simplified to provide for broader job groupings allowing easier mobility for professional development purposes.

With more career movement, employees would be able to acquire new skills and work experience through increased lateral movement where promotions are not possible. Yet they would still have access to a system of redress to ensure that delegated authorities are not abused.

Provisions for demotion and release would be consolidated and transferred to the Financial Administration Act. Service to the public would be further improved with proposed changes to make it easier to hire casual staff for short periods, unexpected workloads and seasonal work.

Most hon. members would agree that changes must be made in the area of Public Service labour relations. With the passage of Bill C–26, relations between the employer and its unions would be improved through the introduction of more flexibility and the elimination of confining bureaucratic rules and procedures.

I want to stress that there has been a lot of consultation with government unions in this area. Bill C–26 proposes measures to address difficulties that result from trying to conduct employer–union relations in the 1990s under 25–year old legislation. Bill C–26 would open up new options for both parties and speed up the process of dispute resolution.

All members are aware that Canada is an increasingly diverse society. Canada needs a Public Service that better reflects the society it serves, one where all Canadians, including those who are members of ethnic and visible minorities and other employment equity groups, have equal access to employment and career opportunities.

With the passage of Bill C–26, the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Public Service Commission, two key central agencies, would be able to work more closely to ensure that special programs are established to ease the recruitment and advancement of members of employment equity groups. These reforms would improve the chances of these Canadians finding satisfying careers and help make the department and agencies of government more reflective of the public being served.

Bill C–26 would help enshrine values in the Public Service that are Canada's values, including those of fairness and of equity of opportunity. The federal Public Service is a vital national institution that warrants refurbishing and revitalizing to better serve Canadians.

The former Auditor General, Kenneth Dye, stood firmly behind Public Service 2000, as does the current Auditor General, Denis Desautels. Auditor General Dye said in his 1990 report that "fundamental change is needed in the way we manage people. Since my last report", Mr. Dye said, "the public accounts committee has devoted six hearings to the subject of management of people in the Public Service. At those hearings it became evident that notwithstanding some concerns about the process of Public Service 2000, there was a strong consensus shared by committee and witnesses that the legislative and administrative reforms are urgently needed".

The treasury board president said, when he introduced this bill, that "Canadians expect a Public Service that is effective and up to date, one staffed and led by Canada's ablest men and women, which is to say a Public Service that, though 125 years old this year, is thoroughly modern in its approach to serving Canadians".

Businesses everywhere today are competing fiercely and are restructuring. In turn, public services around the world are changing and modernizing their operations and attitudes to better serve their clients in the private sector. This is where the bulk of the jobs are created and the private sector is demanding closer collaboration and co-operation from governments. They are also demanding that governments reduce the cost of providing their services. Canadian businesses deserve to be supported by a lean and efficient federal Public Service, one that is more client centred and service oriented, one that listens to and collaborates more with the job creators of industry, the way they do in Japan, Germany and other industrialized nations.

Therefore, Bill C-26 can help assure that the reform process, Public Service 2000 already under way, continues in the future. I hope that all members of this House will support the passage of this bill.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, as Canada moves toward its 125th birthday and as we move with the rest of the world toward the third millennium, we are looking carefully at all our national institutions and how they can better serve Canadians in the years to come.

It is appropriate that the Public Service of Canada, one of the institutions that has allowed this Parliament for one and a quarter centuries to carry out the will of Parliament and to carry out services that are essential to Canadians from coast to coast to coast, that that institution also be re-examined.

The purpose of PS 2000 should be, and the purpose of our review of this bill should be, to ensure that the Public Service of Canada is ready to move into the next century and is ready to adapt to change both at home and around the world in providing both policy advice to government, the enforcement of government laws and regulations and direct services to Canadians.

The Liberal Party believes Canadians deserve quality services accessible to all Canadians and delivered by a competent, efficient, professional and non-partisan Public Service, a Public Service that treats all employees with respect and fairness, and is responsive to the needs of all Canadians without favouritism and without fear. The Liberal Party believes that the development of this nation has been a partnership, a partnership between the public and private sector, including non-governmental organizations, business, labour, people at all levels of society, and that that kind of partnership is going to become even more important as we move into a rapidly changing future.

We also believe that the public and private partnership has been well served by a Public Service working in partnership with government to provide policy advice to government, to provide services to Canadians. Nothing that has been decided in this Chamber since Confederation makes one bit of difference without a good competent Public Service out there carrying out the will of Parliament and bringing back to us the concerns of Canadians and an analysis of change that is needed.

The Liberal Party agrees that revitalization of the Public Service to meet the changing circumstances of the future is absolutely essential. We agree that there is a need to adapt to changes which will become increasingly frequent, increasingly unpredictable and increasingly severe, leading us in new directions that we cannot even predict today.

What we need in our Public Service, as we need throughout society, is creative, innovative people, adaptable to the changing needs of their clients and the nation. We need the ability to attract and retain competent, dedicated employees, as the hon. member opposite has said. The best this country has to offer should be in the Public Service at the service of their fellow citizens.

We need to have the kind of Public Service where those people will feel challenged, satisfied, and as they have for 125 years, feel not only that they have a job, but that they are making a contribution to their country.

We believe as Liberals that change can best be managed in the climate of respect, trust, co-operation and consultation with employees and with clients of the Government of Canada. We also believe that accountability to Parliament and to the public for the management of their human and financial resources is an essential ingredient of good government and good Public Service.

As Liberals we also recognize that the Public Service has been essential to the building of a nation. This is a country that was created, not out of natural ties of economy or geography or long history, but of people from different backgrounds living in different regions with different natural surroundings and resources to depend on, deciding and developing the political will to create a country.

That needs the leadership of Parliament, but it also needs a dedicated Public Service prepared to buy into that dream and in their daily working lives to make that dream happen.

Public policy led us, long in advance of need, to build a railway across this country. It led us to establish a postal service to the remote regions of Canada over time. It led us to establish a national broadcasting corporation so that every Canadian, no matter how far from the centres of political and economic power could feel part of this country. It led us to establish a national airlines so that all parts of Canada could benefit equally from progress in technology and transportation. In time it led us into space so that Canada could continue to be a part of telecommunications technology that would be important to us for our future as well. It was the Public Service of Canada that took essential services to the frontiers, truly made it possible for every Canadian to share in what we had decided as a country were certain rights of citizenship, to service, to communication, to travel, to belonging to Canada.

Not only were these essential communication and transportation links a matter of public policy, they were a matter of public policy implemented by a Public Service. What we see is the importance of retaining the Public Service as a strong federal institution, capable of fulfilling that role into the future. Yes, changing, yes, developing, but not being so weakened that the will of this Parliament cannot be carried out.

The whole public role in the development of this country has been part of respecting differences, equalizing disparity of opportunity across Canada, accommodating differences whether they are of geography, of opportunity, wherever people are in Canada. This history we share has made this country the envy of the world and we see a lot now of the forces of divisiveness trying to rip that apart. So as we talk about the Public Service today, it is more than a question of how does a bureaucracy function; it is a question of how does a country function. How do we tie this nation together? How do we continue to have a strong public role in the building of Canada in the future?

We have to deal with change and it is more important than ever that we know who we are and where we are going. That is something not defined only in the marketplace; that is something defined in the minds and hearts of people and reflected in this Chamber and then taken back out to the nation through those we appoint and direct to deliver the services of government to Canadians. It is also a circle of communication and allowing that Public Service to feed back to us as parliamentarians the new and emerging needs of Canadians and how we can meet them better.

We do not want to go into the future with this new global competitiveness homogenizing Canada out of existence. Retaining our identity and retaining our independence and retaining our ability to be a different voice in the world, for diversity, for mutual respect, for human rights, retaining that leadership role for Canada depends on retaining the ability of government to make public policy that is distinctively Canadian and have it carried out by a Public Service that is distinctively Canadian.

As I look at this bill, I can only conclude the ways of the Tory government are the ways of the past, not the ways of the future. The government has shown in numerous ways that it cannot manage change and it is demonstrating it again today. We have only to look at things like the free trade agreement that have inhibited the ability of Canadians to manage things our own way, to make our own decisions, to look after the best interests of Canadians first.

We have only to look back through the years from 1984 when we had a strong, vibrant economy that put us in a position to be able to get people prepared for change, to pay down our deficit, to pay down our debt, to work on new training programs, to work on adjustment to change. Instead, we have a debt that has continued to rise, a deficit that has continued to rise, high interest rates, higher taxes, a high dollar, all of which have impeded

Canada adapting to the changing environment in the world.

We see instead of helping people adapt to change a government that is abandoning those most in need as economic change and upheaval takes place. We see it, for instance, in the cap on CAP transfers to provinces, so that those who are hurting most because of the economic mismanagement of the country are not able to access training, are not able to access what they need to help them through a difficult time.

• (1230)

We see what I believe is an old Tory philosophy at work, that those with money and power somehow know better what is good for us and if we only leave everything in their hands they will look after the rest of us. That does not seem to work out. In fact it seems to work out just the opposite.

It has been said that government is there to moderate the voracious appetites and directions of the private market. Again, we are talking about public policy and the delivery of public services.

The government has shown clearly that it cannot even manage its own employees. We have had the first ever full-scale walkout of public service employees in the history of Canada. We have had downsizing, contracting out, privatization, at which even the Auditor General and the public accounts committee have thrown up their hands in horror because of the complete lack of accountability as to the cost effectiveness of those measures.

In addition to its problems managing, this government seems to have trouble keeping trust with Canadians. We see a pretence at restraint so we cannot give people earning $18,000 a year an increase, but we can give increases to people earning high salaries, up to a quarter or one-third of a million dollars. Just this summer we saw judges earning up to $175,000 getting full cost of a spokesperson for the Treasury Board saying: "Oh, well, the wage restraint on members of Parliament was just a smoke screen to give credibility to our wage freeze".

Either we are in a period of restraint and everybody is in restraint, or we are simply seeing an attempt to take those at the lowest end of the scale and push them down even lower. That is certainly the impression Canadians got of this government this summer.

We have seen the betrayal of the trust of Canadians with the GST. At a time when inflation was a problem this government chose to bring in an inflationary new tax that is hardest on those who can least afford it. We have seen the betrayal of the trust of seniors concerning their pensions. We have seen the betrayal of the trust of farmers who have been told for months: "Don't worry about it. We are looking after it. We will protect supply management". Now we know that is not what was going on behind closed doors. We have seen the betrayal of the needy in tough economic times.

This government promised consultation with its employees on reform. The President of the Treasury Board said that no legislation would come through except that on which there was agreement by all parties. Yet we have a bill here that is roundly condemned by representatives of the employees and an insistence by the government on blindly pushing ahead with its own agenda regardless of who gets hurt, regardless of all the good advice it has had that this is not the way to go.

We heard the member speak about service to the public as the purpose of PS 2000. Can we trust that when the very last report of PS 2000 that was written was a service to the public report? It should have been the first report. It should have been the foundation of all the recommendations that have come before it.

We have seen the government ignoring court decisions that say you cannot simply let managers move people around. That is an abandonment of the whole merit principle. The court said that less than two weeks ago. Yet we have the government bringing in a bill that does exactly that and expands the ability of managers to do exactly that.

We have seen the government attempting to thwart moves toward equity for women in the Public Service by fighting in court the right of those employees to have their cases heard by the Human Rights Commission.

The purpose of this government since 1984—and it is a purpose that has been perpetuated by this bill—has been the dismantling and the weakening of a Public Service that has been important to our history and has linked Canadians from coast to coast, just as VIA Rail, air service, our national airlines and postal services have been ripped out of small town Canada. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is no longer able to serve and reflect the two official language groups as it once did, to reflect the regions to each other and to themselves. Just as these services that have linked us as Canadians are disappearing under this government, so too is our Public Service.

I want to speak about three particular things that are affected by this bill. Since 1919 it has been the proud claim of Canadians that we have a Public Service where you get a job because you are the best qualified person for that job. This is the merit principle.

The Civil Service Commission was established in 1919 specifically to get rid of rampant patronage and favouritism in the Public Service at both the political and the administrative levels. We have been through periods in our history when if the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell were elected in the next election he could walk into any government office in his riding and say: "You're fired. I am bringing in my guys who are loyal to me to deliver services to the public". We got rid of that kind of Public Service decades ago.

Yet here we have again an abandonment of the merit principle, a bill that now says being the best qualified does not count any more. Your boss, your foreman, your manager, your deputy minister will be able to decide on his or her own if you are good enough to get moved around where the opportunities are to advance and to improve your skills. No review and no recourse, totally arbitrary decisions by individuals within the Public Service, and no protection.

I recommend to members that before they deal with this bill they read the decision of the Federal Court of Canada just two weeks ago that said: "This kind of activity is contrary to the merit principle". Yet we have a government that says: "Yes, we want to introduce provisions and we want to expand provisions that are contrary to the merit principle". It acted illegally and beyond its powers two years ago when it said: "Move people around wherever you want to". Now it wants to change the law so that it can do just that at will.

It is not much wonder people in the Public Service are concerned about harassment and intimidation when whether your manager likes you or does not like you becomes the criteria by which you will either get opportunities or not get opportunities. No wonder women, visible minorities and persons with disabilities feel that the old image of who can do the job best is going to prevail even more than it has in the past.

To get rid of the merit principle is a step back in time. It is a step back to when the Public Service was the place to reward your friends and punish your enemies. We only have to look around the world to know that developing countries, those countries where human rights and political rights are most at risk, are those countries where the military is more important than the Public Service. One sign of a developing country that is beginning to make progress is an efficient, impartial public service, and yet this government wants to destroy that in Canada.

Liberals believe in equal opportunities for everybody in employment and progress within the Public Service. We believe that there should be a very strong provision in this bill that requires the government to implement employment equity. This is the largest employer in the country. It should also be the leading employer when it comes to giving every person, regardless of gender, regardless of colour, regardless of what disabilities they may have, equal opportunity to use the abilities they do have in the service of their fellow citizens.

Yet we have a provision in this bill that is so wishy-washy the government should be embarrassed to call it an employment equity clause. It says that if Treasury Board feels like it, it may tell the Public Service Commission that the Public Service Commission may implement employment equity programs.

I think the government should start listening to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce when it says that if the private sector is to be subject to employment equity legislation, the least the government can do is make itself subject to employment equity legislation. This bill is the place to do it.

We have had documentation for decades of the ways in which certain groups are not deemed to be competent. Beneath the Veneer, the report of task force on Barriers to Women in the Public Service, demonstrated again, if we needed to have it demonstrated, that what prevented women from advancing in the Public Service of Canada, the reason they were nearly half the Public Service but less than 15 per cent of management, for instance, was attitudes, attitudes that I do not blame anybody for. They are so ingrained in us that we have certain images of who is competent and who can succeed.

We have to discard those attitudes. In a society that is diverse, if we want a Public Service that reflects that diversity, we have to discard those attitudes. We are not going to discard those attitudes if, as this bill does, we reinforce the right to make arbitrary choices on the part of managers and of deputy ministers. That would be a move back in time, and that is not what this country needs.

I want to speak briefly about the process of PS 2000. When the current Public Service Employment Act and the current Public Service Staff Relations Act were brought in 25 years ago, it was the result of a long process of consultation. It was not done in isolation. It was done publicly. It was done inviting submissions not only from top managers but from employees, from labour unions, from academics, from the public who were the clients of the Public Service.

Yet here we are all these years later saying that managers can do this. They do not have to negotiate and collaborate with their employees. They do not have to bring their clients into this process to determine how to improve the Public Service. Again the government is showing it cannot consult with its own employees. How can we take seriously the recommendation of its task force report on service to the public to consult with the public on services to it?

This is a one-sided bill by the government for the government, not for the public, not for its employees, and not for the future of Canada. It is another step back to the past that reinforces hierarchy and that reinforces top down paternalism. We believe there are ways of giving managers more freedom without trampling on the rights of other people.

The theme song of PS 2000 has been: Let the Managers Manage. That theme song comes from the 1962 Glassco commission. It is 30 years later; we are now in 1992. We are ready for the future, not the past.

We hear a lot about managing change, but leadership is not dictatorship. Leadership is not trampling on other people's rights to free up the arbitrary discretion of some people. We know that morale in the Public Service is at an all-time low. People have seen their work being contracted out, privatized, downsized, and yet the public accounts committee has taken the government to task for not being able to account for whether that is improving the situation, improving cost effectiveness or not.

We have had the Auditor General chastising the government because it does not know what it is doing with its money. It cannot begin to say what it is spending on contracting, and what privatization has produced in benefits, if anything. It cannot possibly go out to the public and say that this is all saving money. It simply does not know. That is irresponsible.

Yet it has gone out to the public and said that cutting the Public Service, keeping it at zero increase and trampling it into the ground is the way to cut the deficit. It has not told the public that less than 12 per cent of federal spending applies to the Public Service. It has tried to divert the attention from the other 88 per cent of its spending to the quarter million people who simply want to do a good job for their fellow citizens.

There are a number of provisions in this bill to which other colleagues of mine will speak. The government is abandoning the merit principle by allowing managers to move people around at will with no recourse. It is changing the classifications so that employment equity and pay equity become even more difficult to achieve. This new deployment then becomes a means of promoting and demoting without review or any consideration of merit principle. It is getting rid of competitions and saying that any qualified person will do. It does not have to be the best qualified any more. Pick up the phone, call your nephew and tell him you have a job which he is qualified for. Tell him to come on in and get on the payroll. There will be the free ability to contract out, when the government cannot even now account for its contracting out and when the courts have said it is not legal for the government to contract out and lay off employees. To go ahead with this piece of legislation is simply not right.

There are some good things in the bill, and of course we will be looking to improve it. The public accounts committee, after weeks of very careful hearings and excellent research, made a recommendation to the House of Commons and to the government that this legislation should not be considered in isolation, that is only 10 per cent of the PS 2000 process and before legislation comes in, the whole process of PS 2000 should be referred to a special committee of the House. It should all be reviewed. The comments of all affected stakeholders, a phrase the government is fond of using, should be invited. Parliament itself should carry out the third party, impartial monitoring and recommendations, as opposed to managers simply proposing what is suitable to them.

Bill C-26 may pass but reform in the Public Service will fail. The private sector is finding out we cannot have reform or change without everyone being on side and on board. Yet the government has deliberately excluded the employees and the public from this process.

We believe the public accounts committee was right when it said that legislation should not be adopted before a special committee of Parliament had an opportunity to hold full consultations. We do not believe the valuable work of PS 2000 should be wasted. It is one step, and it is the first step in a bigger process. The managers and the government are not the only ones whose views need to be considered.

I wish to move a motion that would in fact implement the recommendations of the public accounts committee. We considered suggesting referring this bill to the consumer and corporate affairs and government operations committee, but we recognized that committee is overloaded. This job needs to be done quickly and efficiently by a group of parliamentarians who are focusing on this, and not on credit card rates and all the other things consumer and corporate affairs and government operations committee deals with.

We once again want to urge the government to consider establishing a special committee. For that reason we believe this bill should not be debated at second reading now but should be sent to a committee for pre-study. We have made that clear to the government, and so I move the following motion:

• (1250)

That this motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "that" and by substituting the following therefor:

Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, be not now read a second time but be read a second time this day six months hence.

Hopefully that will give the House leaders time to consult on the establishment of a special committee so that we can have a report on the legislation back before this House very expeditiously that will truly prepare the Public Service for the next century and give us a reform package that is worthy of the aspirations of Canadians.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Ottawa West, seconded by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, moved the previous motion. I therefore declare the motion in order.

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to rise and speak on Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada.

It is very evident this government is changing the laws of Canada so it is no longer subject to any impartial review. Over the last many decades we have developed a system of using the Public Service Staff Relations Board and the Public Service Commission to make sure the government does not arbitrarily change the rules of the game to suit itself.

Just recently the Federal Court has ruled that the actions of the federal government in relation to its employees and its transfer policies go against the legislation that is in place.

This legislation is not good, management driven, but management driven in such a way that managers are no longer subject to any impartial review. In other words, transfers, deployments and appointments can take place, but the affected employees are not really in a position to seek an independent decision as to whether or not the government has made its decision, or senior management has made its decision, on the basis of good judgment.

We are all concerned with some of the bureaucracy that exists in this country. We are all concerned with making a lot of issues, including employment and promotion, a lot simpler. We are all concerned with making sure that the government gets the best bang for the buck. Those are common concerns. But that is not what this legislation is doing. Government spokespersons who get up and say they are making it simpler and allowing managers to manage are not looking at the clauses in this legislation.

As I said earlier, there would almost be unanimous agreement in this House that there are ways for the government to manage better. There are ways of allowing managers to make decisions, but it is completely unnecessary to go to the limits that are in this legislation.

This legislation is basically gutting the Public Service Commission of Canada. It is ignoring the Public Service Employment Act. It is gutting the role of the Public Service Staff Relations Board. These three important groups have tried to make sure that we have a Public Service based on merit and not favouritism or political appointment.

I find it ironic that the federal government is spending $5 billion a year on contracting out, without investigating whether it is cost effective or not. This government is doing this and says that contracting out will not be subject to any review. If you lose your job as a result of contracting out, that is too bad. It is too bad.

We now have a minister in the House which is a welcome change. We should get legislation that is fair to all people. If there is a problem with a process that is too cumbersome then change that process but do not take away all rights of the employees. Do not say you cannot apply for a lateral promotion. It was very evident from a court case which the federal government just lost that a lateral appointment or transfer can be a promotion for some people because you gain experience. You gain a variety of training that you would not gain if you remained in the same job.

That is exactly what the Federal Court ruled when it said this government was in violation of its own laws. The government is saying that if you are transferred from one position to another it is really none of your business. That is not true. The government is saying it does not matter if you have a lateral transfer because you are doing the same job or getting the same salary and it does not affect your future. That is also not true. The Federal Court of Appeal has said it is obvious that if a person wants to apply for a job in a different area within the same category, he will be gaining valuable experience and knowledge that will make it easier to move up the corporate ladder within the department.

I believe that the way this legislation has been proposed by this government means we will not have high morale in the Public Service. We will not have an impartial Public Service. We will have decisions made by deputy department heads which have absolutely nothing to do with an impartial system. The whole basis of this legislation is that it will be up to the department heads to create a new structure. It will be up to the department heads to decide who does what, what classification they are in, and who will be eligible to apply for a job. If you do not like the fact that you are not eligible for a job or that you are put in a new classification, to whom do you appeal? You appeal to the very person who made that decision. What kind of justice is that?

I do not believe that even this Conservative government would introduce this type of legislation for the people who work under the Canada Labour Code. It will do it for the very people who work for the Government of Canada. In other words, when you work for the Government of Canada and the people of Canada, you do not have the same rights you would have if you were working in private industry.

What irony that is. Do you know who the decision makers will be in this process? They will be the senior people at the very top, people whose decisions will not be subject to any real review. Not only that, the people who will make the general guidelines and rules will be the employees at the management level of Treasury Board.

Treasury Board not only is going to be making decisions that affect classification, affect your right to seek a transfer, affect deployment within the Public Service, they are also going to be determining classification. They are going to make all these decisions. They are going to determine who can bargain with whom, what collective agreements will be in place.

To make sure that Treasury Board is not going to find itself in a situation where their decisions are subject to review or where their workers might say things are unfair, the federal government under this legislation is saying that anybody who works for Treasury Board does not really have any rights whatsoever. They are going to be exempt. In other words, they are not protected by collective bargaining. They are not protected by the rights that most Canadians would have.

It is a very strange situation that Treasury Board which is responsible for many things including negotiating with employees is basically saying: "We do not want to negotiate with our employees. We do not want them to have any rights whatsoever". One has to wonder what is the purpose of this legislation?

Is it really to improve management? Is it really to allow management to make the appropriate decisions, or is it a gutting of all the rights that employees have and that the public has under the present system? That is really the question.

Unfortunately, I think too many people have been caught up by government's spin doctors and those people behind PS 2000. They are saying: "Oh, yes, we have to make these decisions because we have to improve management. We have to allow managers to make decisions".

What they have not done is they have not looked at the legislation that is before us. They have not seen the arbitrary nature of this legislation.

They have not seen how this legislation is going to gut employment equity. They have not seen how this legislation is taking away the right of due process. They have not seen that the standards, rules and impartial systems we have devised over the decades are all going to be thrown out.

They have not seen how this system is going to increase the ability for favouritism, increase the ability for nepotism and increase the ability for this government to use the Public Service for political patronage.

It does nothing to make sure that if the government decides to contract out—and it is doing so at the rate of $5 billion a year already—that this will be subject to any sort of impartial review or any sort of cost-effectiveness study whatsoever.

We know that the Standing Committee on Public Accounts of the House of Commons said in 1990 that there should be cost-effectiveness studies based on any move by the government to contract out.

That was said by an all-party committee. It was said by a committee with a Conservative majority. But that is not what this government is going to do. It wants to ignore all that.

This was a committee with members from all parties and as I said, with a Conservative majority saying that if decisions are made to contract out that there should be a study. There should be some understanding as to whether or not that is cost-effective. That was a very reasonable recommendation.

But that is not in this legislation. This legislation increases the ability of the federal government to contract out without worrying about the effects on employees, without any concerns whatsoever as to whether or not this decision will be cost effective.

In addition, and I think we have seen it before, the ability to contract out without any review only increases the amount of political patronage that will exist.

We have lobbyists, some who are registered and some who are not registered, lining up around this building applying for contracts, working for their friends. We do not know how much that is costing the taxpayers of Canada, but we do know that it could be a tremendous amount.

We know of Conservatives who get appointed when there are Conservatives in power. We know of Liberals who are appointed when there are Liberals in power. That happens already and it happens too much. There is an old joke, the only people who get rich in Canada are the consultants and the lawyers.

This type of legislation only ensures that those people will become richer and richer, and the taxpayers will become poorer and poorer. What we are doing is institutionalizing a system where, department by department, decisions will not be made on the basis of merit and where contracting out will not be done on the basis of what is cost effective.

What will be done is that when these decisions are made, the public will not know what the decisions are and the people who are affected will lose any real right to appeal to some form of impartial arbitrator.

We know that the federal government has lost any number of cases on employment equity. It has lost cases with regard to the arbitrary transfer system.

Why has the government lost these cases before the Federal Court? The reason is that the federal government was not following any form of reasonable practice. They were making arbitrary decisions that the Federal Court of this land said were unacceptable.

Not one, not two, but number after number after number of cases have come down saying the federal government does not obey its own laws, that it is arbitrary. It does not follow the very nature of the law; that it is unjust by its application of that law.

So what is the government's remedy? To become fair? To become less arbitrary? To follow due process? No. What it is doing with Bill C–26 is saying: "We are not going to worry about fairness any more. We are not going to worry about due process any more. We are not going to worry about being cost effective any more. We will just change the law and say that we do not do that any more. We have the complete right to do what we want and it does not matter what the courts said in the past because we have just changed the law. We are no longer in a situation where we are going to be bound by impartial Public Service commissions, no longer in a situation where we are going to be bound by Federal Court of Appeal decisions. We have just made this legislation with its 60–odd pages, in such a way that we no longer have to worry about court decisions. We no longer have to worry about rulings from the Public Service Staff Relations Act. We no longer have to worry about the Public Service Commission of Canada because we have changed the legislation in such a way that we are secure from those decisions.".

That is not allowing managers to decide, that is not allowing governments to govern. What we are doing instead is we are taking away all the protections that have existed. We are taking away the rights of people to appeal unjust decisions. That is not reform; that is tyranny.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, you will recall that one of the key recommendations contained in Public Service 2000, the renewal of the Public Service of Canada, was to provide more flexibility for the deployment of employees to meet both operational and career development needs.

By deployment we mean the transfer of any employee from one position to another where there is no promotion occurring and where the tenure or employment status of the employee does not change.

It is important to consider the subject of deployment in the context that was described in the Public Service 2000 white paper. As you will recall, the central theme of Public Service 2000 is improved service to Canada and Canadians. It has recognized that the key to improved service is public servants themselves.

• (1310)

Public Service managers need to be able to manage their staffs in such a way as to provide a continuing and increasingly high quality of service to the public. They need to be able to move their employees quickly to where they are needed and to be able to develop their employees to meet new and changing priorities.

Employees need to be given the opportunity to achieve their career aspirations and to use their skills, their ideas, and their enthusiasm in the public interest. Indeed, as most organizations both public and private are discovering, there is a need to develop a continuous learning culture, to ensure that organizations and employees adapt to a rapidly changing world.

With the deployment provisions in Bill C–26 the government has found a way to balance the interests of Public Service managers to get the work done quickly and well and the interests of employees to be treated fairly and to have opportunities to learn and to develop satisfying careers.

Let me take a few moments to describe the deployment provisions that are being introduced and to tell you why we believe these changes will be effective.

Under the current Public Service Employment Act all appointments to and within the Public Service are subject to the merit principle. What this has meant in practice is that before a manager could transfer or deploy an employee, even for temporary periods, the manager would have to compare employees by competition or otherwise, and choose the best qualified among them.

The manager's decision was then subject to challenge from those who were not successful or felt that they should have the opportunity to be considered.

I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that virtually every step in the staffing process is legislated or regulated and this has resulted in a staffing system often driven by the need to pass potential scrutiny. The result is a staffing system that is slow, cumbersome and complex.

This complex system has hindered the efforts of managers to improve efficiency, to move employees quickly to where they are needed, to fulfil developmental needs and to deal with situations that require compassion such as an employee who must move to be near medical facilities.

When persons are recruited to or promoted within the Public Service they must prove themselves in ways determined by the Public Service Commission to be not only qualified but indeed the best qualified persons for the job.

The Public Service Commission will continue to be responsible for recruitment and promotion on the basis of merit.

Once employees have proven themselves capable of performing duties at a given level of responsibility it should not be necessary to do a complete reassessment of their capabilities and more particularly, to compare them to all other potential candidates.

I do want to emphasize that although it will not be required in law to select the best qualified employee for a deployment, it will be necessary to ensure that employees being deployed are indeed qualified and in particular that they meet the standards for such matters as security, medical requirements, and language.

Treasury Board policy will reinforce this point.

You will also recall, Mr. Speaker, that one of the underlying principles of Public Service 2000 was the need to trust and empower managers and to allow them to use their judgment in the interests of service to the public. Our managers are competent, trained and committed. They are indeed capable of making decisions about their employees and how their employees can be best managed and they need the freedom to do so. Furthermore, they need the freedom to discuss and to decide with their employees the best way of meeting their employees' career aspirations and developmental needs.

The deployment provisions recognize this. Deployment will be the exclusive authority of department deputy heads subject to direction from the Treasury Board.

The Treasury Board does not intend to tie the hands of deputy heads but rather intends to ensure that there is some consistency of approach throughout the Public Service and that Public Service wide interests are taken into account.

In developing the deployment proposals, the government was cognizant of the concerns being expressed particularly from some of the Public Service unions. Two very important protections for employees have been included in these proposals.

First, deployments must be made with the consent of the employee concerned, except in those relatively rare cases in which a willingness to be deployed is a condition of employment. A good example of this would be the foreign service, in which the nature of the work requires employees to move to different locations periodically. In such cases, employees will know before they accept a particular job that this condition applies and that they can accept or reject the job with full knowledge of this.

The second protection is the recourse process that has been designed for deployment. Employees being deployed, or those in the work unit to which their deployment is occurring, will have the opportunity to challenge the deployment on the grounds that it was not authorized by or made in accordance with the statute or that it constituted an abuse of authority.

An employee will first make a complaint to the deputy head who will investigate and take such action as is appropriate. If the employee is still unhappy with the proposed resolution, he or she may go to the Public Service Commission, which will appoint an investigator to look into the situation and recommend a course of action to the deputy head.

If the investigator is not satisfied with the response of the deputy head, the investigator shall report the matter to the Public Service Commission, which will have the authority to order corrective action.

There is one final point I would like to make. The proposals in Bill C-26 will not require managers to consider for deployment persons whose names appear on priority lists before proceeding with the deployment of another employee.

This is a change from the current situation in which priority persons would be considered before others. I know that some members will be concerned about this, and I want to explain the rationale behind this decision.

Over the years departments have done a very good job of reintegrating employees who face lay-offs or otherwise have priority for a reappointment. Deputy heads have displayed a very strong commitment to their employees to the point of often creating their own internal no lay-off policies.

Furthermore, departments must abide with the provisions of the work force adjustment policy, which was recently agreed to with the Public Service unions. Given this, it was felt that it was not necessary to constrain further the flexibility that managers are being given with new deployment provisions. However, I do want to assure members that the Treasury Board is prepared to impose the consideration of priority persons on its own initiative or at the request of a deputy head if future circumstances warrant it.

In closing, I would reiterate that the proposed process allows for the simplification of employee movement but not at the expense of employee input and recourse. It provides a mechanism for managers and employees to create a continuous learning environment.

It provides deputy heads with the legislative framework to meet the particular needs of their organizations, provide service to the public and develop employees.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address this portion of the debate on Bill C-26.

As I open my remarks I want to focus on what I believe to be some of the important Liberal Party perspectives on this very important Public Service reorganization bill.

• (1320)

I think it is fair to say that while we may have some agreement around the House on some of the principles, there are elements of this bill with which our party has significant difficulty.

I would like to go over some of the principles with which I am hopeful all members in the House will be in general agreement. As we approach this bill and what will undoubtedly be a material and substantial reorganization of the way the government deals with its Public Service and the way it provides services to Canadians, the first principle is that we believe Canadians deserve accessible and quality services delivered efficiently by a professional, non-partisan Public Service that treats all employees with respect and fairness, and one that is responsive to the needs of Canadians who pay the bills.

I am sure there will not be many in the House who would disagree with that.

The second principle I would like to put on the record is one in which my party and I believe. It is that we support the revitalization of the Public Service to better allow the Public Service to adapt to rapid change and to create an environment in which the employees of the Public Service can be creative, innovative and adaptable to the changing needs of their clients—all Canadians and the country—and to attract and retain competent, dedicated employees.

Last, the Liberal Party and I are committed to the principle of accountability to Parliament and to the public for the use of both human and financial resources.

There are other principles and subdivisions which we could debate further today, but I want to leave the list at that and affirm my support for those principles.

Over the last little while, since I have become a member of this House, I have had an opportunity to see the workings of some public services of some other countries and some other jurisdictions such as provinces, constituencies, states, et cetera. At almost every juncture, I come away impressed with the level of service, the efficacy and the professionalism of the Canadian Public Service. That did not happen by luck. It happened, I suppose, by design and by the good efforts of those who are in Public Service and by members of government who assisted in the development of the Public Service over the last number of decades.

There was a significant departure made in the year 1919, when the country committed itself to a professional, non-partisan Public Service. Since then, right up to the present, we have been building. It is not like we have not had our difficulties between then and now. There has been an increase in the organization of the Public Service through collective agreements, and the work of government has become more intrusive and more complex. Consequently the Public Service has become more sophisticated and more dedicated to those services, or those intrusions from the perspectives of some people.

In any event, the work of government has become more complex and is more demanding of the Public Service. Therefore, the Public Service must keep pace. It is likely that some of the structures within our Public Service, as they have evolved over these decades, are not suited to the demands of modern government.

Being impressed with the current state of affairs within the Canadian Public Service is not enough, because we know, the Public Service knows and government knows that there are some improvements and changes needed.

Bill C-26 contains many different legislative proposals with respect to the Public Service.

I am concerned with the apparent provisions that would devolve or permit the devolution of certain types of authority out of the rules and structures as exist now in the Pubic Service, a devolution of those authorities and decision making into the hands of managers and into the hands of individuals as opposed to the structured institution.

Over time this institution of the Public Service has not done too badly. The structures that are there serve Canadians reasonably well. Certainly they do not serve perfectly at this point, but they have served the country well.

What I am concerned about now is that as we devolve these authorities from rules, regulations and structures to the hands of managers, will the overriding principle of advancement based on merit continue along and be as important to the Public Service as it has been in the past? I think it is fair to say that the merit principle is important to Canadians. I think Canadians would want to know that Public Service advancement and hiring were done on the basis of merit.

There is a concern among people in the Public Service and among people who work with the Public Service that this authority, devolved into the hand of a particular person, may be efficient at some point and may be very effective but over all if we look behind the principle, if we look behind what is happening here, there is a diminishing, an abandoning of the singular importance of the merit principle in hiring and advancement.

I am concerned about that. Everyone in the Public Service starts off as a basic human being. We are all prone—at the top of the list are politicians—to forming opinions and judgments and doing things based on what we individually feel is best. If we walk away from the merit principle as the chief criterion for advancement in hiring, will we then have to confront at the manager level, not at the structural level up top, potential problems based on a bunch of isms such as nepotism, racism, sexism, and all of these ways of looking at life that human beings adopt? If we are going to abandon the merit principle, will that open the door to decisions made less professionally and by individuals who believe they are right, but whose decisions of hiring and advancement are based on isms which we do not want to make a part of our Public Service hiring and promotion criteria?

I leave that on a cautionary note. I want to state very firmly that I would not support an abandonment of the merit principle as the basis on which hiring and promotions are made in the Public Service.

I want to move to a related area: the business of promotion, demotion and hiring. In the current Public Service Employment Act, sections 21 and 31 provide for a system of appeal by public servants. There is a right to appeal when there is a decision made to terminate you as a result of incompetence or incapacity or when a decision is made to give an appointment to someone without a competition. I know that the matter has come before the House before, and I refer to the ninth report of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations. It basically stated that the policy and procedures of these grievance appeals, these very important mechanisms whereby the Public Service can appeal these extremely important decisions critical to individual careers, were not fair. That is actually a fairly stinging indictment of the process. If the procedure is not fair then it should not be there. It should be changed.

• (1330)

This issue has been before Parliament for many years and the changes have not been made. That is why I am raising it now in this debate because presumably these procedures will be contained in regulations under the new bill, and the issue will be discussed in the bill. Provisions enabling the regulations will have to be a part of the bill. I want to make very sure this House knows that this particular committee of the House has reported without an appropriate response. The committee representing all three parties of this House was unanimous in its report.

The government and the Public Service have not responded favourably. They basically responded with a big zero. That means they are not listening, or they are listening and they are stubborn, or they are listening and they do not care. Whatever it is, it means that government is not working.

I would like to review the three problem areas that I believe should be addressed in this particular bill. The first is the issue of disclosure of relevant information to an appellant before the appeal takes place. The Public Service Commission replied to us in this House that it believed its policy and procedures were just fine. Yet this Parliament, through its committee, has evidence that sometimes the relevant information is disclosed to the appellant and sometimes it is not.

I am trying to paraphrase: "Really it did not create much unfairness. I think everything works just fine, thank you very much". But that is a sham. If there is not disclosure before a hearing, how can the appellant hope to deal with the information that is being put before the hearing? I submit that the appellant cannot.

This principle of fair disclosure exists across the whole breadth and scope of legal and judicial procedures in this country. I cannot imagine that it does not exist in every single court in every single corner of this country. Yet in our very own Public Service procedures for appeal it does not exist. The Public Service and the evidence we have acknowledge that sometimes the information is given and sometimes it is not. That is not good enough.

I should point out that the submission by the Public Service Commission that the policy was there and should suffice is really not a very satisfactory response. A policy position that might be printed on a piece of paper or in a memo is not enforceable by an individual appellant. It is not something that the appellant can argue in this procedure. If the fair procedure was in a regulation, it would be something the Public Service must comply with and part of the law of the land. I would argue that anything less than a fair procedure that is installed, printed and published in a regulation is not useful to Canadians in the Public Service.

The second area has to do with the disclosure of Public Service Commission opinions that are relevant to the decision being made about the public servant whose case is being appealed. The Public Service takes the view that its opinions are not to be provided to the appellant, unless the Public Service decides the opinion is useful, but again that is the Public Service. We are talking here about department heads, the higher echelons of management, making decisions and taking positions that have been made known to everyone who was part of the decision-making process in the Public Service but not to the appellant. That is unfair. I do not have to spend much time on that one. I tried to think of a scenario that might be useful here today to explain how unfair that is, but I think the description I have given should suffice.

The third area is the way the Public Service Commission provides its notices of hearing. Again, in every administrative body across this country there are rules of fair procedure regarding the issuance of notices. If you are going to bring someone into a decision-making tribunal then you must give fair notice. It cannot be given one or two days before, but with sufficient time to enable the person to deal with the issues that will be dealt with at the hearing.

I want to close with some thoughts. I have six or seven recommendations to make to the government. First, I believe the government should provide for full and mandatory disclosure to any unsuccessful candidate or the candidate's representative upon request when there is a decision against an appellant.

Second, full and mandatory disclosure should be made to an employee of the grounds on which a recommendation was made that he or she be released.

Third, I would suggest that the regulations provide that a department wanting to withhold or limit access to information must have the matter determined by the appeal board at a pre-hearing conference.

Last, the notice period for appeal hearings should be extended to two weeks from the present three-day minimum requirement.

I leave these with the House and point out that these recommendations have been put to the House by government members, opposition members and members of the New Democratic Party. The House should not disregard them, or take them lightly.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to participate in this debate because I think there is a growing sense across Canada at every level that for a number of reasons governments cannot continue to deal with their employees in a manner such as outlined in this bill.

• (1340)

One of the cautions I would put in beginning my remarks is that a government that sincerely believes all it has to do is pass a law has some lessons to be learned.

In this day and age it is not the way of the real world. It might have been if all other things were equal: if people were paid large amounts of money, if there were a great many perks attached to it, if it was considered to be a great honour. It may be that this kind of unilateral move on the part of a government in legislative form would be, if not understood, then accepted by those in the employ of the government.

I do not believe that is the case any more. I believe a number of people who work for the Government of Canada are unhappy. For those of us who think we should not expect employees to be happy all of the time, there is more of a lesson to be learned. Morale is at an all-time low. Some would simply say the employees of the Government of Canada should not expect to be happy all the time.

That is not the point of the argument. The point is not if they are happy but if they are effective and feel they are an important part of the process.

Nothing could be more demeaning than to have your traditional rights legislated away. That is precisely what is envisaged by this bill. It is an attitude we saw last year around this time when the government began to sense it would not be easy to negotiate a settlement with its employees. It began very early in those negotiations with the attitude that you either settle it or it would legislate you back to work.

Then it seemed to proceed to various little techniques to ensure that would be a self-fulfilling prophecy. Ministers made statements here and there indicating that negotiations were not going very well. They indicated there was a threat involved and that somehow, if the employees would not negotiate exactly the way they wanted them to, they would legislate them back to work.

Of course, as events transpired, that is exactly what happened. When I visited picket lines during that strike there was a great deal of bewilderment and anger. Betrayal is a better word. People who worked for the Government of Canada felt they had a bond. They believed that somehow they were playing an important role in the day-by-day proceedings of this government of ours and would not be treated in this way by their employer. When they were they felt immense anger and frustration.

Many of them were not industrial trade unionists by nature. They belonged to a union, but not in the sense of the steel workers or auto workers where everybody goes to work in one plant for a regular shift. They begin to bond and get some sense of what a union is about. So their attitudes, the way they go about setting up for a strike has a certain ritual to it. People know what it is all about. They do not have to be told what a picket line is and how you go about having a legal picket.

The people I visited had not done this very often. They were not quite sure what it was all about. They had somehow felt all of that would not be necessary. It turned out in the end that it was. It turns out that process continues. That is precisely what this bill does. It assumes that this government can in fact pass a law and that everybody will just follow along lock-step.

The flaw in the argument is simply this. If the government chooses, as it does in this type of legislation, not to offer a reasonable amount of respect or a reasonable process to the people in its employ, it should not expect to get any respect back. It means that you can never accomplish the goals of the bill to get more productivity and more initiatives put together. That is a tough argument. I believe it is a true one.

There is a reason why executives of major corporations are doing things now they never did before. They are walking around the shop floor and talking to people. They are gathering their workers in groups to discuss how things happen in the work place. It is not because they want to do that. That is the new initiative in industry where people are beginning to understand some simple truths. It is important that you listen to people in the work place.

It is important to understand that someone who works on a shop floor may have a better understanding of what the functions are in that particular work place than the chief executive officer who has never been there.

Many of the things which the document PS 2000 talks about are notions of a modern industrial way to organize a work place.

In part, the perversion I see in this bill is that it does something by legislative means which will practically forbid any of those good initiatives from coming about because it is not the kind of thing that can be legislated. It particularly is not the kind of thing that can be legislated on the heels of having ripped away from these people their right to negotiate for themselves.

Let me offer a couple of comparisons I think are useful. No level of government is escaping the hard fact that revenues are not the same now as they were even two or three years ago. All governments are beginning now to look at how they spend their money in particular, as that relates to their employees and how the employees are organized.

Some of them at the municipal level are doing the traditional things which would be done when a government is strapped for funds. They call in their chief executive officers and say: "Write a report which tells us how many people at the lower end we have to lay off this year.".

I am pleased to report there are some municipalities that are not doing that. They understand it is unlikely that the manager of a department is ever going to write a report saying: "I am redundant. The rest of the people who work in here are useful. They provide a useful service, but to be truthful, I cannot figure out what I do in this department".

In fact what you see most often is that most people who manage the department eventually would like to see that department getting larger and larger and larger. Then they too will be able to call somebody in to write the report.

Some municipalities are actually sitting down with all of their employees and they are taking a look at their whole organization, but it really is very simple.

The trick is that no one person can do this. A consultant cannot be called in to write the report. The department heads cannot be called in to do this. If this is to be successful, it has to be a collective effort. It has to be an effort that has all of the employees in the work place participating in a meaningful way and arriving at these decisions.

I noticed at the city of Ottawa where they are going through their budgetary procedures, it started at the top to announce there were some early retirement programs that would be utilized right off the bat. That is unusual because the first instinct usually is to lay off somebody who sweeps the streets or shovels the snow, or somebody who works in the stenographic pool.

At the province of Ontario—which is struggling as everybody else is in the middle of this recession or depression or whatever it is that we are in—there are attempts being made now to look at how all of the systems are organized to provide services.

The lesson that has been learned there simply is that it is understood if this is not put together by everyone as an equal participant, it cannot work.

If the solution to reducing costs and expenditures—and that is the stated goal of almost everybody in politics these days—if that is the intention, if that is what is trying to be done, that function can only really be accomplished when everyone is a participant in it and at every level of government.

It used to be called fat; it used to be called waste. We can now say that there is a lot of counter-productivity in what governments do, in how they go about things. Well that is true, but if we want to remove that, we will not do so unilaterally.

That is what is wrong with this bill. This is a unilateral attempt on the part of the federal government of Canada to simply do it by writing a law and the law provides immense opportunities here for management to exercise discretion, to move people around, to change the way of doing things. The problem is that it will not work. If that were the problem, this would have been tried a long time ago.

The problem is: How do you get your productivity up? How do you get all of the people who work for you to participate? How do you get to use all of the energy and the ideas of all the people who form a part of this larger group who are employed by the country of Canada?

That is a great challenge and it is not an easy one. I for one would not want to pretend that this is a simple exercise. This is a long and difficult process at the best of times. It starts in the wrong way though.

• (1350)

Those who would defend this bill would say: "We have been discussing this for quite some time". But that is really not the point.

It is going to take lots of discussion, without question, but at critical times you are tested and the test is simply this. Do you listen to those people with whom you have been discussing these matters? Do you incorporate them into the decision-making process, or at the end of it, when you get a little cranky, do you simply sit down and write a law? That is where this process has broken down.

The Government of Canada, getting near the end of a process of consultation and discussion with its employees faltered. It made a critical error, and the error is simply the results that are written into Bill C-26.

It establishes by law that the federal Government of Canada—and for the most part it will be its managers who do it—will now have a legal and unilateral right to do certain things that it could not have done before.

It does not get that right out of a consensus from all of its employees or set of negotiations with its employees. It gets that right out of a law.

In my view, that law is fatally flawed. It will not work. It will give the government a legal right to do something which, for practical purposes it cannot do, nor should it do.

I regret very much that the end of this long consultation process is the unilateral imposition of a law such as this one, for this is off on the wrong foot entirely and will bring heartache to a great many people who certainly do not deserve any more.

It is true that the principles put forward in this bill are roughly following a pattern, a pattern where the Government of Canada says to its employees: "Okay, we are in tough times here, but we do not want to talk to you any more. Now we are going to impose a law".

It did that last year when it tried to go through contract negotiations and impose by law, a settlement at that time. It is doing it again this year with this bill.

It did not work well during the course of contract negotiations; it will not work any better now. That lesson has to be learned by the Government of Canada and all of the members in here.

This is not the kind of thing that one can do successfully. You can cause a lot of pain. You can cause a lot of hardship. You can displace a great many of your employees, but you will not make the process of governing in this country more effective by the imposition of this kind of a law. That is why I oppose it.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, this is an opportunity to debate not only the bill which is before us today, Bill C-26, but also much of what has happened in the context of Public Service reform over the last several years of the current government.

Unfortunately, even as we debate this bill today, there are many across Canada who continue to hold in their minds an image of a federal Public Service which is somehow fat, overpaid, perhaps incompetent, and perhaps unresponsive to people in their times of need.

I think that it is important for the people of Canada to understand not only the kind of Public Service we have today in our country, but the history and traditions of that Public Service over the last number of years, really since it was formed in its present way in 1919.

We have today in the Public Service of Canada approximately the same number of federal public servants as there were in 1974 delivering a vastly increased burden of responsibility and service to the people of Canada.

Well over one-half of them are employed outside the national capital region. Again, the image that somehow federal public servants are centered in the city of Ottawa and are pipe-smoking semi-retirees is a false and misleading one.

The Public Service of Canada delivers a whole variety of vital and important services to our people.

Surveys have shown that public servants are not well paid in comparison to many working groups in the private sector. They often perform functions which the private sector is incapable and unwilling to perform. As well, they perform a very important role in advising government on a daily basis. The traditions we have built up in the Canadian Public Service are fine and honourable traditions going back many decades.

We have had in the Public Service of Canada an understanding of the fact that it was an honour to serve the public, that the traditions of extending oneself on behalf of the citizens of the country was an honour in itself beyond simply earning a living. It was somehow a higher, nobler calling and often a calling which extended throughout one's working career.

Those traditions have been very important to the building of Canada as it is today. We have many well-known and important examples of public servants who have distinguished themselves in the service of our country.

Lester Pearson comes to mind as having been a civil servant who rose to the top office in this country, who in service to Canada won the Nobel Peace Prize.

It is critical at this time as we look at reform of the Public Service that we do so preserving the essential values and concerns that are at the heart of the Public Service as we have come to know it.

In the document Public Service 2000, Renewal of the Public Service in Canada some of these values have been set out. I think they have been well expressed.

Service to Canada and to Canadians, loyalty to the duly elected government, honesty, integrity, and non-partisanship, prudence in the use of taxpayers' money, faithfulness to the principles of fairness and impartiality, professionalism in carrying out their duties, and respect for ministers, other parliamentarians, members of the public and other members of the Public Service, these are the values which underlie this important institution in Canadian life.

So when we embark on a reform of it, the outcome of that reform is exceedingly important to our country. Not just because the Public Service delivers services like air traffic control and meat inspection to the people of Canada, important as those are, but because as Canada faces the very important challenges that confront us over the decade to come, we need the very best of our people, the sharpest minds, and the most innovative policymakers to be advising and directing in the policy-making of our country.

How is it that we are meant to face the challenges of internationalization without a Public Service devoted to solving those problems consisting of the very best and the very brightest.

It is crucial that at this point of renewal, of revitalization, we get it right. It is too important a task for us to fail to do it properly.

For that reason I find that I have to raise for myself at least, the question of whether this government at this time in its mandate is in a position to undertake this vital and crucial task.

We have a government—Mr. Speaker, you need only look to see—of ghosts in this country, ghosts because they have been deprived by their own unpopularity, by their own misguided policies, of the authority granted to them at the voting booths to continue to govern this country in an effective way.

We are confronted by a series of crucial problems, one of which is revitalization of the Public Service. This government of ghosts stumbles from problem to problem, clearly without the authority to make the important decisions that will set the course for this country for the years to come.

When we look at these ringing words of truth on values in the Public Service one wonders where are the ministers and what values do they pursue in carrying out their duties. The core of the problem, if there is a problem in the carrying out of the duties within the Public Service today, has been the deterioration of the morale of our public servants.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, at noon yesterday in Rouyn-Noranda, I met the regional president of the UPA for Abitibi-Témiscamingue, Mr. Jutras, and several members of his organization.

I have defended Quebec farmers for several months at our government meetings in Ottawa. Today we must intensify our efforts so that our farmers win the battle in GATT. We must accept no compromise on the four main pillars of agriculture: supply management, stabilization insurance for farm incomes, crop and farm insurance, farm credit and above all we must strengthen article XI of GATT.

As in past years, I strongly support the demands of our Canadian farmers.

HOUSING

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the announcement last week by the housing minister, reducing the amount required for down payments on first homes, first suggested by the Leader of the Opposition, is laudable and most appreciated by people on this side of the House. It is widely viewed as a positive step for people who would otherwise never achieve the dream of owning their own home.

My office has received a number of suggestions from the people of Halifax as to how the initiative might be improved. One idea is to expand the scope of the program to include those individuals who have owned a home previously but who have lost it. This is a request that is grounded in the fundamental tenet of fairness.

As the minister knows, these are difficult economic times. Many Canadians have not been able to keep pace with interest payments. Therefore, it would be fair to allow them the ability to re-enter the home market in a period of lower interest rates. This initiative could be subject to certain regulations to ensure that the government allows flexibility while maintaining the twin principles of deficit reduction and fiscal responsibility.

Once again I urge the minister to heed the calls of ordinary Canadians and expand his already admirable initiative.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, Canadians from across the land are getting involved in the political system.

Today at the standing joint committee on a renewed Canada my constituents had the opportunity to voice their opinions on the national stage. By expanding our horizons with new initiatives and ideas, we will forge a new beginning for this country where elected people in the House of Commons and the Senate will equally represent constituents from all regions of Canada.

This is a plan that will allow all of our resources to be utilized in a way that will maintain our strengths and freedoms; strengths and freedoms that have made Canada the envy of the world.

NORTHERN TAX BENEFIT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the northern tax benefit plays a vital role in the development of Canada's north. It helps to offset the higher cost of living associated with northern Canada.

Recently the Reform Party has said that if elected they would take away the northern tax benefit. This shows that Preston Manning does not understand how important this tax initiative is for the northern economy. By eliminating the northern tax benefit, the Reform Party would hurt the fragile northern economy and would make it difficult to attract new residents to the north. By questioning the northern tax benefit, Preston Manning is showing his lack of vision for Canada's north.

I have received written resolutions from the councils of a number of northern communities, including Faro and Dawson in Yukon, Churchill and Leaf Rapids in Manitoba and Nampa in Alberta which strongly support the northern tax benefit.

In Alberta the provincial Liberal and Conservative by-election candidates are both Reform Party members federally. However, in this House we must not pander to the narrow vision of the Reform Party. This government must renew its commitment to the northern tax benefit and it must do so in the upcoming budget.

FOOD BANKS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, as the first ministers meet to discuss the economy, tens of thousands of Canadians will eat today, thanks only to food banks.

Hunger in Canada is a disgrace but still the Prime Minister refuses to visit a food bank and calls them "some sort of short-term thing". Gerard Kennedy of the Daily Bread Food Bank is on the front lines and says: "There is more hurt and extreme hardship out there than there has been in the last 25 years". Denial will not stop the reality of malnourished children who cannot learn and adults who become more depressed every day.

What is the government's plan for economic recovery? Why did this government miss the opportunity, from 1985 to 1990, to cut the deficit instead of bringing the economy to a halt?

We in the Official Opposition have shared our five point economic recovery plan with this government, including the plan for infrastructure development.

Let us put aside our partisan politics. Let us co-operate to put Canadians back to work and eliminate the need for permanent food banks in our society.

OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the Winter Olympics opened this past weekend in Albertville, France. They have brought back fond memories of Calgary and the 1988 games.

This week we can all be proud of the Canadian athletes who are each going to reach for the highest standard of personal performance for themselves and for our country.

I have three friends and constituents who are each medal contenders in these Olympics. One of the best known carries the extra weight of high expectations on his shoulders as he competes in men's figure skating. Kurt Browning is three times a world champion and is favoured to excel again. He has already proved that he is the best in the world. We sincerely hope that his skill and conditioning serve him well in Albertville.

Our best wishes go out not just to Kurt, but to all the Canadian Olympians. May they do their physical best and may all Canadians share pride in their performance and recognize the tremendous personal contribution that each of them has made in order to represent us in these games.

HIBERNIA PROJECT

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to say a few words to you on the Hibernia project. The federal government has invested or will invest over $1 billion in this big project without having done the necessary environmental studies. Nor has it taken the time required to assess the profitability of this project. Today we realize that Gulf Canada is withdrawing from the project.

Therefore, I ask the federal government, since there is still time, to withdraw from this project, which is considered unprofitable.

MEMBER FOR SAINT-DENIS

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, today our colleague and friend, Marcel Prud'homme, is celebrating his 28th anniversary as a member of Parliament. He was elected for the first time on February 10, 1964 in a by-election.

Last night, the executive committee, board of directors, advisory board and general assembly of the Greek community all decided unanimously to declare him an honorary member of Montreal's Greek community in recognition of his services to Canada, Quebec and ethnic groups in Montreal, more particularly their community.

Many of us had the opportunity last night to hear him speak at an evening reception in his honour.

Marcel, congratulations for these 28 years.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

WINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, when the free trade agreement with the United States was announced, many thought that one of the big losers would be the grape and wine industry.

However, with the help of the federal government and the Government of Ontario, the necessary restructuring of the industry took place in the Niagara region.

This year the results are becoming evident. For the first time in 12 years there is no surplus of crops, as all the grapes produced have been used by the industry. Domestic wine consumption has increased while the consumption of foreign wines has declined. In fact, international bodies have recognized the quality of Niagara wines, one example being Inniskillen Ice Wine.

The Niagara grape and wine industry is an example of what can be accomplished with quality products and the willingness to compete in the world without the need for a restrictive trade policy.

ONTARIO LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, over the past weekend more than 2,500 delegates gathered in Hamilton to elect a new leader of the Ontario Liberal Party.

The city of Hamilton, her people and the wonderful facilities again demonstrated that Hamilton is a most hospitable and wonderful community.

Thunder Bay is extremely proud that our own daughter, Lyn McLeod, was elected the leader of the Liberal Party. To quote from Lyn: "There will soon be a day when women in Canada will be able to seek high public office without gender being raised into question." Throughout the race she said her main goals would be to revive the Ontario economy and the electorate's faith in the political process.

• (1410)

I am sure that Lyn McLeod will rule Ontario with an iron hand but always in a velvet glove. We all applaud her wonderful victory.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, hopefully today's economic meeting among first ministers will produce constructive initiatives by all concerned. There is one important move, however, that could be made by every premier, that being to harmonize provincial taxes with the federal GST program.

Two weeks ago a public lecture was delivered in Fredericton by economist Dr. William Milne, who holds the Vaughan Chair of Regional Economics at UNB. In his analysis of current economic circumstances, he was not particularly kind to any government and certainly had lots of criticism for federal financial policy.

However, he did address one issue strongly and clearly: the goods and services tax is an absolutely essential measure for the country; it is a major improvement over the old tax system that it replaced; and all provinces should harmonize their provincial sales tax systems with it.

Those are initiatives which could commence today. They would address the financial requirements of governments at all levels; they would simplify sales tax administration for companies, customers and consumers alike; they would dramatically dampen present incentives for cross-border shopping.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, this government has promised action to end violence against women over and over again.

Parliament passed a law declaring December 6 a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women.

Ministers continually boast about the family violence initiative. Now it seems that funding to end violence, so proudly announced by this government, is being cut off before it can be used.

Five government departments recently made commitments of almost $40,000 to a conference called "Justice: Extending the Vision—A National Conference on Victimization and Recovery".

This conference is bringing together service providers who work every day to help women and children suffering from abuse and violence. Now this funding is in jeopardy just a few weeks before the conference is scheduled to start.

So many promises to end violence. Is that all we hear, words? As many Canadian women fear, is it simply just talk?

I call on the government to reinstate this funding today and to keep faith with the women and children of Canada.

HALTON—PEEL SURVEY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I recently conducted a survey in my riding of Halton—Peel and thousands of constituents responded.

Doug Rowan of Caledon East writes me:

> I am 49, struggling with a new business, but expect things to improve financially and everything else will follow along. I am blessed with a close and supportive family and we all work at keeping it so. The country will rally together finally this summer, to keep Quebec in but not without difficulty and continued grumbling. The economy will rally but ever so slowly. The future will brighten if we start talking positively in every respect.

Ed Ford-King of Cheltenham writes me:

> I believe in a strong central government with the courage to make and stick by hard decisions, that concentrates on and believes in education and training, that develops an environment for opportunity and growth, that believes in the rule of law. I am saddened by the party system which lies and bribes with giveaways to gain power. I am sickened by a political system with little or no fiscal responsibility, where different governments go in opposite fiscal directions. I seek a political, fiscal environment in which one can grow in safety and with pride as a Canadian.

I look forward to reporting on my other constituents' views.

MEDICARE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, who is George Bush and why is he saying these nasty things about Canadian medicare?

George Bush is the best known beneficiary of a government medical care system, so why does he want Americans to believe that the hopelessly expensive U.S. system—where 34 million people have no insurance and 50 million people have only partial coverage—is somehow better than Canada's?

Bush is complaining that there are six month delays for heart surgery in British Columbia but the fact is that most critical cases receive surgery within two weeks. That is not bad when you consider those 34 million Americans without medical insurance who would not get needed heart surgery even when they wait a lifetime.

And who is Frank McKenna, and why is he now advocating an American, two-tier means tested health care system? Is he the Republican party's Liberal echo in Canada?

TAXATION

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, a great many Canadians firmly believe that Canadian corporations are not paying their fair share of taxes. Many if not all of the same Canadians are concerned about jobs being lost and transferred to the United States.

One reason that businesses move to the United States is taxes. Prior to 1986 the average U.S. corporate tax rate was 51 per cent while the comparable Canadian rate was 48 per cent. Today the U.S. rate is approximately 39 per cent compared with a 42 per cent Canadian rate. Our corporate tax rate, previously slightly lower than the United States, is now higher. When withholding taxes, as they affect Canadian subsidiaries of U.S. corporations are taken into account, Canadian rates are substantially higher than the U.S. rates.

No wonder we are losing jobs. We do not have a level playing field. As far as corporate taxes and calls for even higher corporate taxes are concerned, we appear to be our own worst enemy.

ILLITERACY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, adult illiteracy is not just a problem for the Third World, it is damaging our economic performance as well as the performance of many of the world's developed countries.

An international survey has pointed out that up to one-third of adults in some countries may be hindered in their work by inadequate reading and writing skills. A Canadian study has pointed out that 38 per cent of Canadian adults tend to avoid situations that require reading because of their inadequate reading skills. Just a couple of years ago a Southam survey found that illiteracy is costing the Canadian taxpayer $10 billion a year.

In September, 1988 the government made an announcement of $22 million for five years to fight illiteracy. This represents an investment of less than $4.50 per illiterate adult in this country. The government has instituted a tax on books and other reading materials. It is now time to take serious action on illiteracy.

What is happening now is not enough. It is inadequate. Nothing has changed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

For months opposition members, business leaders, labour leaders, even bank presidents, have been telling the government that their economic policies are wrong and are leading the country in the wrong direction.

In this month's issue of Inside Magazine a former Conservative MP and the party's former finance critic says that the current policies of the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada are "not only ludicrous, but extremely counter-productive, wrong, wrong-headed, unrealistic and bordering on the tragic".

Does the Acting Prime Minister agree with this prominent Conservative's assessment of the government's financial policy and does he realize that what we need is a new economic direction for this country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the short answer to the question is no.

The premiers of this country, together with the Prime Minister, are meeting today to discuss the short and medium-term economic situation in this country. I might remind the hon. member, as she had the opportunity this morning to listen to the premiers as they made their presentations in a very reasonable and thoughtful way, that there are differences of opinion, that there are different approaches to the situation here in Canada. Some premiers are supporting the approach of the federal government, others would like to see us take a little different line. But, generally speaking, I think they are supportive of our work in getting the deficit under control, getting it down, getting interest rates down, having a dollar that is competitive and getting people back to work on full-time meaningful employment.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): This morning at that same conference, Mr. Speaker, we saw 2,000 farmers demonstrate to appeal to this government about article XI of GATT. According to the publicity in today's newspapers, thousands and thousands of farmers are counting on this government to do its best to protect and even improve article XI of GATT. Therefore I ask the Acting Prime Minister: When will he be able to protect the interests of 100,000 farmers who depend on article XI of GATT?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the position that the Government of Canada has taken in the GATT negotiations is the position that was developed with the stakeholders, with the farmers in Canada. Our position has not changed. We developed that position jointly. Our negotiators are attempting to have that position accepted wherever they are able to find an ear.

• (1420)

The Prime Minister has been involved in discussions with leaders. I have been involved in discussions with my counterparts. The minister of trade has been involved in discussions with his counterparts. We will continue to put forward the case that we developed with the stakeholders in supply management.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the unfortunate thing is that while the government is publicly claiming it is moving to strengthen article XI of the GATT, it is privately moving to prepare for tariffication and in fact discussions in that regard have already occurred.

My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. The Acting Prime Minister should know that Canada is not alone in its intention to strengthen article XI of the GATT. In fact, the government could find allies with Japan, Norway, Israel, Switzerland and other countries who are willing to help us in our battle.

Will this government not, at the very least, develop a common position with other countries to protect the 100,000 farmers whose livelihood is on the line in these negotiations?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): I welcome the suggestions put forward by the House leader of the opposition. We have met with those who support Canada's position. They include Japan, Israel, Norway, Korea and Switzerland.

Mr. Tobin: We know that.

Mr. McKnight: If you know that, as the member says from his seat, then why are you suggesting that we should seek it? We have been involved with those five countries. We led a démarche into Mr. Dunkel to try to gain the position that we share with those six countries.

I can only say to the hon. member she is absolutely wrong in her preface, we have not initiated discussions on tariffication. We never looked at the text to see if the numbers were going to be there until I had consulted with the provincial ministers of agriculture and with the supply managed agencies themselves. They said: "Yes, see what those numbers are.". We looked at those numbers.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKnight: They say "oh". Ask any supply management leader if he authorized us to look at the numbers. We sent the numbers to the supply management groups and now, we are waiting for them to say: "are those the numbers" because we cannot negotiate until we know what harm will be caused. The hon. member should know that.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. The Canadian supply management system has been in place and has worked both for the benefit of the consumers and the producers in Canada. The dairy, egg and poultry producers of this country have not and are not part of the world's surplus problem.

Why are these producers being asked to be part of the solution when they are not part of the problem?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member knows full well that the agencies, developed with the Government of Canada and with the provinces, the position that the Government of Canada is putting forward, that article XI should be strengthened and clarified. It is not something that the Government of Canada, on the side, made a decision on. We consulted directly with the agencies, the supply management groups, developed the position that Canada had at the outset, developed the position that Canada had in December and continues to have to this day.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the the same minister. Mr. Lowen, an Alberta turkey producer says that as a result of the Dunkel proposals at the GATT, that: "Everything that I ever worked for in my whole life will be trashed."

Another rally in Ottawa today of 2,000 farmers agrees with Mr. Lowen. Knowing all of this, why has the government not carried out and published an impact assessment of the Dunkel proposals to GATT?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member asks why the government has not changed its position. We have not changed our position because we developed the position with the supply management agencies. The supply management agencies have not changed their position and therefore the position of the Government of Canada is that article XI shall be strengthened and clarified under the GATT.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the first ministers are meeting today. The Prime Minister is calling for co-operation. The finance minister says he is willing to look at reallocations in his budget to help the economy.

With housing starts down dramatically again today for another month, this economy badly needs help. Federal money for infrastructure would create 63,000 new jobs this year.

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister if the federal government will reallocate money for this kind of program by cancelling the $100,000 capital gains tax exemption, an unjust tax break that increases the deficit by $2 billion a year and gives three-quarters of its benefits to the rich in this country.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): The hon. member would be interested to know, Mr. Speaker, that of those who claim the $100,000 capital gains tax exemption, about 60 per cent of them earn under $50,000 a year. Those are the facts.

The other thing is that the small business exemption, the farm exemption and the $100,000 capital gains exemption help create employment.

The hon. member should understand that. That is investing in the Canadian economy. That is not the area that we necessarily should be looking at.

But I can tell the hon. member this. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are meeting today with the first ministers. They are going to listen to all the suggestions that are made. They will be having discussions which I am sure will be carried on in the weeks ahead. When the budget is presented the hon. member will see this government's position for the next fiscal year and how we are going to handle the financial affairs of this country.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have the taxation statistics here for the most recent year and they show that 76 per cent of the benefits of the capital gains tax exemption go to people making individually over $60,000 a year. That is not fair. That is not right. Over a quarter go to people making over $250,000 a year. There has to be change.

I want to ask about another area of economic policy. The United States is using bully tactics on auto industry trade. U.S. firms and unions are pushing their workers to buy U.S. made cars at the expense of Canadian made cars in clear defiance of the auto pact.

I want to ask the government, given news today, that we have also seen a drop in auto sales in the most recent month, will the government protest as strongly as possible against these unfair discriminatory U.S. actions?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I have to tell my hon. friend that first of all he is wrong in terms of automobiles and motor vehicles. Sales have been up the last two months on trucks and vans and they have been up in a material way.

More important, the hon. member fought tooth and nail against the whole idea of a free trade agreement which would include a dispute settlement mechanism. Under article 18 of the FTA we have a dispute settlement mechanism which allows us, when we are faced with protectionist pressures in the United States that are unfair, or incorrect, to bring them, as we are in fact bringing an automobile case that we announced on January 5 to the dispute settlement mechanism, to a panel which comprises one Canadian, one American and a neutral chairman. We have equality with the Americans when we have a dispute. This is far better than we ever had before the FTA.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, each time a dairy farm dies, part of Canada dies too. These are the words of Canadian dairy farmers today, a truth which can be repeated by all Canadian farmers.

Twenty-six million Canadians cannot feed themselves. As my colleague said before, Japan, Switzerland and other countries want to strengthen article XI. Where is Canada?

The credibility of this minister's statements are questioned by farmers. Why is this government not adamant that supply management is the best system for Canadian dairy and poultry producers?

• (1430)

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I say once again to my hon. colleague that the position of the Government of Canada is that article XI should be clarified and strengthened. We have tried to find allies to reinforce that important position that the Government of Canada has in the GATT negotiations. We have, along with five other countries, joined forces to try to convince another 102 that that is the way that we should be going because Canada knows that the system that we have under the existing article XI has not distorted international trade. That is why we, with the stakeholders and with the provinces, developed the position that Canada had at the start of these negotiations and that Canada has today in those negotiations.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the survival of our food production capacity is a matter of national security. Europeans are very aware of this. Because of the government's weakness in supporting article XI, 100,000 farmers in the dairy, egg and poultry industry are at risk.

Does the government have a strategy and can it show how, and at what cost, it intends to meet the Canadian demand for dairy products and poultry, in the event that 100,000 Canadian producers are wiped out?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised at the hon. member's reaction, when we consider that Canada's position has always been to maintain marketing boards—as explained in the document we tabled in Geneva in April 1990, almost two years ago—and that our position has not changed.

I think we have supported farm producers in all areas, including supply management. I would urge the hon. member and her colleagues in the other opposition parties to join us in defending the position taken by the government, which is that of our farm producers.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, this is no time for divisiveness. It is time for all political parties, including the opposition, and all governments, federal and provincial, to pull together and show the world that Canada is serious about the position it is defending in Geneva. I believe that would probably be more helpful to our farm producers than raising fears that have no basis in fact.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the trade minister, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

On January 14 the government agreed to a GATT proposal to extend drug patent protection to 20 years, thereby endangering the Canadian generic industry at home.

Why did government officials write a letter, of which I have a copy, to one of the largest generic firms, Apotex, on Friday, January 10, seeking its input when, only after one full working day and without any response, the government completely gave in to the GATT recommendation? Why did the government not honestly seek the advice of the generic industry and Canadians on such a fundamentally important matter?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge, the minister of trade said that he did consult the generic industry. I believe that the position was and remains that in terms of research and development, on the question of the compulsory licence, we consider that the decision will be good for Canada.

I met with the ministers of health from all provinces, except Quebec. We had the commitment to consider all the implications of the decision. We are in touch with the provinces. We believe that at the health level, the cost of drugs, for example, will remain reasonable, as Bill C-22 proved.

The member said years ago that there would be sky-rocketing prices. There were not. We have the same kind of approach to reality today.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the government insults the intelligence of Canadians when it says it has consulted, when it writes a letter on Friday, does not wait for a response and moves on it Tuesday. That is just shameful.

I ask the same minister this.

Given that the generic industry employs some 3,000 Canadians, invests all of its research and development in the country and has had a stabilizing effect on the price of prescription drugs, why will the government not seek a better deal and balance between the foreign based multinational pharmaceutical companies and the home grown Canadian generic industry on behalf of and in the interests of Canadians?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I said before that the policy and the decision have been made to strengthen the development of research and development in Canada first.

Second, the member says that the generics will not be able to continue their operations. I tell my friend that in the United States there is no compulsory licence for generic pharmaceuticals.

Third, he should know that 60 per cent of all generic companies products are on non-patent prescribed drugs. The pricing situation worked and will continue to work.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Dairy and poultry farmers have been saying loud and clear at rallies at Kemptville, Kitchener, and here in Ottawa Friday and today that they have no confidence in this government's commitment that it is protecting supply management at the GATT. Farmers are saying that the proposed GATT agreement would do for rural Canada what the free trade agreement has done for manufacturing in Ontario.

At least 120,000 jobs are on the line at this time and this government cannot figure out a way to get those Canadians who are already unemployed back to work.

Will the government give Canada's farm families the confidence they are looking for by telling this House simply that tariffication is not an option and that the retention of supply management is Canada's bottom line?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): The retention of supply management is why Canada sat down with the supply managed groups and put forward a position that we support jointly, that of clarification and strengthening of article XI. That was the position two years ago.

Mr. Hovdebo: What's the bottom line?

Mr. McKnight: The NDP is asking if this is the bottom line. Is there a bottom line? Most people, when they come to a bottom line, wait until they see what an agreement is. I know what Canada's position is. It is strengthening and clarification of article XI.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I will bet you that no farmer will invest five bucks on the basis of that assurance.

Nevertheless, I would like to direct a supplementary to the same minister. The Canadian public is being fed the line by the media, by opponents of orderly marketing and by utterances of this government that grain farmers in the west like this GATT agreement. That is not true, as demonstrated by the overwhelming majority of farmers across the prairies who are saying loud and clear, and who are adamant that the Crow benefits continue to be paid to the railways contrary to the proposed annex 7(e) of the Dunkel document.

Will this government quit trying to pit western grain farmers and orderly marketing farmers against each other and assure us that the government is as committed to maintaining the payment of the Crow benefit to the railways as it claims to be committed to keeping supply management?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, for some reason the New Democratic Party does not understand the position that was developed with the farmers in Canada.

The position that was developed by the Government of Canada in conjunction with and on the advice of the farmers in western Canada was that we wanted a removal of the trade distorting subsidies that have been harming our industry.

In the supply managed area, we wanted clarification of article XI because the existing article XI as it is written, and as has been found by GATT law, as the supply managed industries have said and continue to say, is not adequate to give them the protection they need.

Mr. Funk: I asked about the Crow.

Mr. Dick: He looks like a crow.

Mr. McKnight: The hon. member I am sure would like an answer.

The answer is that we have a balanced position in Canada, a position that will support supply management and will support the exporting part, the red meat part. It is a position that Canada has developed with the producers, and it is the right position.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Destruction of the ozone layer has reached such an alarming point that the minister has had to warn children not to go out and play in the sun. What a tragedy when the environment committee told the minister a couple of years ago that action was needed to control all chemicals that destroy the ozone layer, including among others, halons.

• (1440)

Will the minister act now on the advice that he got two years ago and ban the import of halons by 1993? Do we have that commitment?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this question came up in the House of Commons last week. I guess it is useful to remind ourselves that what the member is referring to is a problem to which Canada contributes about 2 per cent in terms of greenhouse gases. We have taken aggressive measures to eliminate these greenhouse gases to the point where we are now four years ahead of schedule. We think we can go faster. We will be looking at ways with the provinces to accelerate whatever measures we have.

Furthermore, we will in the international community, with the countries that have signed the Montreal protocol, also ask those countries to accelerate the phase-out of CFCs.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister. Since last week, we have had forecasts but no action. In addition to the weather forecast, on a sunny day we will now need a cancer index to warn us against the dangers of sitting in the sun.

One of the substances that causes thinning of the ozone layer is methyl chloroform. Will the minister do as the environment committee recommended and prohibit the use of this substance before the end of 1993?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the government, especially this government, has always been very concerned about this problem. It was the present government that was responsible for the ratification of the Montreal protocol in 1987.

We are now four years ahead of our self-imposed schedule under the Montreal protocol. We think we can speed things up by, for instance, eliminating 45 per cent of CFC emissions between now and 1995. We intend to ask the provinces to work together with us to help speed up measures to eliminate CFCs.

We intend to take the same approach within the international community, always mindful of the fact that the problem we are facing today is a global problem to which Canada contributes 2 per cent, while suffering a far higher percentage of the consequences. That is how we intend to approach this problem while using the green plan to help the provinces and the present government to attain our objectives.

CENTRAL GUARANTY TRUST

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for financial institutions.

Central Guaranty Trust Company shares have traded from $2.25 to $11 since January 1 of this year. The value of shares in its parent, Central Capital Corporation, have been even more volatile, trading in a range from 50 cents to $22 in the last year.

Why is the government refusing to step in and protect the interest of shareholders, depositors and the Canadian taxpayers in this matter of Central Trust?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the identical question was asked of the Minister of Finance on Friday. I cannot add anything to what he said. That was the identical question and I will give the identical answer:

> —the Superintendent of Financial Institutions is reviewing this matter and has not as yet brought a recommendation to me. I am told that it is under very active consideration. I think the hon. member would recognize it would be inappropriate for me to comment while these negotiations are ongoing, but as soon as we have got word I would be pleased to let the hon. member know.

That was the identical question asked of the Minister of Finance on Friday. The answer is the same today as it was on Friday. Nothing changed over the weekend.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, the problems for shareholders and investors are the same today as they were on Friday also.

My supplementary is for the same minister. The ordinary men and women who have invested in what they believe to be a stable, solvent, well-managed and government regulated financial institution are the ones who will be the big losers in this affair. Will the government conduct a full inquiry into the disaster at Central Guaranty Trust Company and its parent, Central Capital Corporation?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I would caution the hon. member to watch the types of descriptions that he is making because that does not give any confidence in any financial institution in this country. I cannot comment on individual situations with financial institutions in this country. When there is something to announce to my hon. friend, if he will listen, I will be happy to give him the answer to the question.

PENSIONS

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, regulatory changes in the Income Tax Act published in the January 15, 1992, edition of The Canada Gazette codify certain rules with regard to pensions and take away the ability of workers to retire after 25 years without a reduction in their pension.

Foundry workers at General Motors in St. Catharines and Ford in Windsor had negotiated retirement with full pensions after 25 years. Public safety workers such as firemen and air traffic controllers have been exempted from these regulations and are able to obtain full pensions.

Will the government consider exempting workers such as the foundry workers who have produced evidence that their life expectancy has been reduced as a result of their working conditions?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the pension plan registration rules were codified to ensure that all Canadians are subject to the same limits on pension benefits provided on a tax assisted basis.

There were some categories due to health and safety reasons that were exempted. However, the foundry workers were not one. I understand their situation. I think it is possible under the plan to deal with the foundry workers particular situation by readjusting their existing pension to continue to allow them to take early retirement.

HEALTH

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, today is a sad day in the history of medicare in Canada. The premier of New Brunswick has called for an end to universality in medicare.

An hon. member: He is a Liberal.

Mr. Blaikie: A Liberal premier, I hope Canadians will take note.

I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to rise in his place today and say that the federal government has no intention of responding in any way whatsoever to this outrageous call for an end to universality in medicare by the Liberal premier of New Brunswick.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I did not wait until today to rise in the House of Commons to say that, but I believe that the health care system in Canada is maybe the best in the world and Canadians should do their best to keep that system intact. I repeat exactly that today.

I believe that we should all work very, very hard to keep our health care system universal, accessible, and with all other principles we put forward. Once again, it is the best system, but it has to be viewed in light of the reality of today. That is why we are working with the provinces. To my knowledge, all of those provinces agree that we should do what needs to be done to keep the health care system intact, and I share those views.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. The premier of New Brunswick apparently said he believes that wealthy Canadians should be paying more for their health care.

Does the Minister of National Health and Welfare agree with me today that the way to meet the funding problem at the root of the crisis in health care is to make sure that the rich are paying their fair share of taxes so that medicare can be fully funded out of the common treasury?

Will he say today in this House of Commons that this government is going to finally bring in the kind of tax reform that will enable us to pay for medicare instead of following the advice of Liberal premiers like Mr. McKenna, who is more afraid of the Irvings than he is of ordinary people who fear for their medicare system?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe the member knows that Mr. McKenna is not the first to raise the question of the health care system in terms of the way that we support it financially.

The premier of Newfoundland said that universality should be over. The province of Quebec is now looking at different ways of refinancing the system. I hope the member does not ask me today to raise taxes to finance a system which is the second most expensive in the world. The ministers of health, including ministers from Manitoba, British Columbia and Saskatchewan, have said that there is enough money in the system and we should look at the way we are managing the health care system in Canada to provide the same quality of services. It is not an answer to put more money in the system.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, farmers in Abitibi and Témiscamingue feel it is important to protect the supply management system for the dairy, poultry and egg industry.

Could the minister tell the House today that negotiations are still going on and that the Canadian government will maintain the supply management system and defend it to the very last, even after March 2, 1992?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I personally had a chance to meet a number of farm producers in Abitibi–Témiscamingue. At the very least, our conversation was frank and forthright, and the same applied to the positions that were taken.

I can repeat, for the benefit of farmers in Abitibi–Témiscamingue and farmers throughout Quebec and across Canada, that our position has not changed. I realize people are spreading all kinds of rumours, but I would urge the hon. member to repeat this to his farmers: The important thing is that farm producers in Quebec and Canada stand together and support the federal and provincial governments in defending our position at GATT. It is the only way to show the world that the Canadian government stands by its position, and we will do so to the very last.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Last week Statistics Canada announced that more than 11,000 people lost their jobs in Manitoba, 25,000 in Alberta, and 15,000 in British Columbia. In the last year 50,000 westerners have lost their jobs. The economic policy of this government is crippling western Canada. What specific measures will this minister take to put 426,000 westerners back to work?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the concern that the hon. member raises regarding the situation of unemployed people in Canada is well reflected by the First Ministers' Conference that is taking place as we speak.

We heard the premiers of every province and the territories and the Prime Minister this morning trying to come together to find a way. The Government of Canada has already, according to the premiers I heard this morning, put in place a series of measures that puts into place the fundamentals for a sustainable recovery. We are on the verge of that recovery.

In the meantime, the Department of Employment and Immigration is spending some $3 billion in training and in adjustment of workers in the work force. That is applicable to western Canadians just like every other Canadian.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The training strategy to which the minister alluded is not completely reaching out to young Canadians.

Let me give an example. A young constituent told me this week that he just sent off his 500th application for a job. He has a Masters degree and will go anywhere in the country. What advice would the minister have from this government for that young man?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I cannot on the floor of the House start advising people as to how to access a job, except to say to this individual and all others that the Canada Employment Centres throughout the country have people in place who have the abilities and the means to help these people access jobs that are available in Canada.

I told the House last Friday that in 1991, last year, our interpretation of the help wanted index showed that we had 300,000 jobs that could not be filled because of skills shortages.

If he has a Masters degree, by contacting an employment office that person can seek help to find a job.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, more than a year ago all three parties in the House urged on the government the importance of "close consultation with Parliament as the North American free trade negotiations proceed". Yet it is only through the Access to Information Act that Canadians have now become aware of various government studies of the proposed agreement which concluded two years ago that its net cost can be high while the benefits may be marginal.

Given the all-party support for close consultation with Parliament, will the government now table all relevant documents, including an analysis of the draft treaty?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I have to tell my hon. friend that in fact the documents that were prepared over a year ago to advise the minister on the pros and cons of a NAFTA negotiation were put together in a form and made public over a year ago.

The minister in fact met the committee on October 3 and the deputy minister a few months before that. The minister will be meeting the committee on Wednesday of this week to give my hon. friend the information he pursues and, I am sure, fill the committee in on all aspects of the agreement that he can do without jeopardizing our negotiating position.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, is the minister saying that the government has tabled all relevant documents? Last week the Minister for International Trade said that Canada had entered the negotiations to protect its interest, not presumably to seek any particular benefit for Canadians.

In response to Parliament's plea that the government keep Parliament regularly and fully informed, will it finally tell Canadians how it intends to protect their interest with regard to the environment, communications, energy, culture? What specifically are the national interests that this government intends to defend in these negotiations?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should be reminded of the over-all objective of these negotiations. It is to make sure that investment that will occur in North America is not shut out of Canada because we are shut out of the Mexican-American-Canadian NAFTA negotiations. Our tariffs, by the way, are pretty well gone against Mexico. They have quite high tariffs against us. We want to negotiate their tariffs down. We also want to have leverage on those other two countries in a broad continental way.

That is why we are pursuing these negotiations and that is why we will continue to pursue them.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the banner headline and story over the weekend is surely one of the most frightening of our lifetimes to those who read it and understand it: "Keep children out of the sun, Charest warns". Parents should not let their children play in the sun at any time. Environment Minister Jean Charest has warned: "It is a lot more prudent to stay out of the sun".

The minister's words make clear the urgency of the situation to Canadians. I would like the minister to confirm the need for a complete world-wide phase-out and ban on ozone depleting substances, the urgent need to recapture those CFCs and other ozone depleters that are already out there and that are in use, and confirm the need that we need to have the Montreal protocol treaty negotiation and meetings now, not next November.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member makes reference to reports of a statement. I think he draws a distinction in his question between titles in the newspaper and the quotes. In fact one specific quote that he made is one that just follows common sense and is in fact part of advice that parents who have children in that age group have been receiving for years.

Let me offer a quote of my own. It is an article in le journal Le Soleil in French by a person I do not know and he is quoted also, so there may or may not be an error. Dr. Bernard says, and I will read it in French:

[Translation]

"Dr. Bernard says that this warning is in line with the one agreed on several years ago by the Canadian Dermatology Association".

[English]

That in fact is what I was alluding to, that elementary common sense and prudence would indicate that we should be careful with the sun and that is especially true for young children.

• (1500)

I think the member and I are in agreement on the fact that this is a problem of global importance. I have already said that we as a country are interested in accelerating the phase-out of CFCs. We are not the only country to be part of the Montreal protocol, but we will be working very hard in the international community to accelerate the phase-out given this very important problem.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): My supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare who I am sure must be sharing the views of the Minister of the Environment. The United Nations environment program has released a report that is just as alarming as NASA's from last week. It shows, in terms of health effects from ozone loss, massive new increases in cataracts and blindness, skin cancer, melanoma, increased severity of AIDS and other viruses.

I would like to ask the minister of health to give a very clear statement in this House to parents and to children in this country. Does he agree with his colleague, the Minister of the Environment, that the solution to this is just to keep the children indoors 365 days of the year, or should we be moving vigorously as a nation toward an absolute ban world-wide of the production of these substances and a mandatory regulation to get them out of use? We can do something. We are not a bunch of nitwits.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to want to indicate that he is taking this issue very seriously. If that were the case, with respect, he is not rendering a service to anybody by misrepresenting what I have said.

I have never said that parents should keep their children inside 365 days of the year. It is not true. What I have said is what is relevant to common sense and knowledge based on information given to Canadians by dermatologists for years now, that we should all be careful with the sun, that children between the ages of two years old and eighteen years old are more vulnerable, and that in applying common sense, given the information we have now, we should be more prudent. Those are the facts.

Given this situation, let me repeat to the hon. member that the Government of Canada will do everything in its power, as has been the case up until now, to accelerate the phase-out of CFCs in Canada.

ARTS AND CULTURE

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications.

As we all know, at all levels of expression our artists are the foundation of our cultural reality and yet in Canada the average artist lives at or near the bottom of the income scale. In fact, by virtue of underpayment or non-payment, ironically our artists are probably the strongest patrons of our cultural being in this country.

What policy initiatives will be forthcoming to compensate or to encourage fair compensation to Canada's artists for their work and when will those initiatives be introduced?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I strongly support the point of view of my hon. colleague. Though people have sometimes talked about contributions made by the Government of Canada or by other levels of government in terms of subsidizing the arts, it has been Canada's artists who have been subsidizing the rest of us for too many years.

We have legislation before Parliament at the present time on the status of the artist bill which will help for the first time to properly put a value on the contributions made by Canadian artists to Canada.

In addition we will be proposing phase two of copyright and we have taken a number of other measures such as the new book publishing policy designed to enable artists and writers in Canada to be more successful.

In all of these ways I think we can help to put something back into the artistic community which has been giving so much to Canada.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both officials languages, the government's response to 26 petitions.

[Editor's Noted: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-330, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Parole Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, the constituents of Hamilton West, and in fact people across this country, say that the time has come to address the issues associated with the victims of violence.

The intention of this bill is to amend the Criminal Code of Canada so as to give victims of violence a greater say in the disposition of persons convicted of violent crimes.

If passed into law the bill would see an end to day passes and escorted absences for persons convicted of violent crimes like sexual assault and murder.

The bill would also remove the so-called faint hope clause from the Criminal Code, which allows persons convicted of first degree murder the possibility of parole, because for the victims of such crimes there is no faint hope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Keyes moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-331, an act to amend the excise tax Act (books).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, today I would like to introduce a private member's bill entitled an act to amend the Excise Tax (books). Its intent is simple. It is to exempt books from the application of the goods and services tax.

This bill clearly defines books and is in keeping with a 123-year old tradition in Canada of a zero rate of tax on books, magazines and newspapers, which was broken by the introduction of the goods and services tax in January of last year. It excludes books from taxation.

Mr. Speaker, I think you will agree, as will my colleagues, that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy, culture and education in a literate, progressive and productive society.

It is for these reasons that I have introduced this private member's bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Duhamel moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES-MEXICO

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you would find unanimous consent of the House to move the following motion:

> That the government table in this House all documents, studies and papers relating to the Canada-U.S.-Mexico trade negotiations, including copies of any draft treaty or agreement within 24 hours of the adoption of this order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

PETITIONS

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by well over 300 residents of Prince Edward Island.

These residents are concerned about the possible impact on their island province of the federal government and provincial government's decision to call tenders for the construction of a bridge connecting Prince Edward Island with the mainland.

• (1510)

They indicate that the federal government has chosen to proceed with a bridge by calling for this project to be put out for tender, while ignoring the views of residents of Prince Edward Island and the warnings of its own environmental assessment panel of August 15, 1991.

The petitioners therefore humbly pray and call upon Parliament to request a halt to all business related to this issue until such time as a direct vote of the public is held in the form of a plebiscite to determine specifically whether the construction of a bridge should proceed across Northumberland Strait.

The House will be reminded that an initial plebiscite was held asking about a fixed link, and a small percentage agreed to that. However, the question of whether it should be a bridge has never been put to the people of Prince Edward Island. I think it should.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition with respect to the removal of the goods and services tax on books.

Petitioners from a number of parts of Canada point out that this tax does not belong in a democratic society; it runs against the principles of increasing productivity and increasing literacy.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition to present.

The petitioners are requesting that the government reconsider the cuts that it has brought upon education, particularly post-secondary education.

The petitioners point out that there is a need for Canadians to participate fully in education in Canada if we are to be competitive and productive. They want especially the removal of the 3 per cent tax. They point out that this year alone $485 million has been cut from transfers and they believe investment in education is essential.

The petitioners cry from the heart: "Stop these cuts".

HOUSING

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present Parliament with a petition signed by constituents living in a senior citizens' co-op apartment, mainly retired school teachers.

The petitioners are concerned with the federal proposal to transfer jurisdiction over housing to the provinces without compensation. They are concerned that some provinces will not be able to afford the co-op and non-profit housing programs.

Therefore, the petitioners are urging the government to recognize housing as a shared federal-provincial responsibility, to support the federal, non-profit co-operative housing program, and to maintain the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to present an official petition signed by many members of the riding of Broadview—Greenwood.

The petitioners are once again calling upon the government to honour the commitment it made to addressing the hot spots of Ontario, not only through the green plan but also in Hamilton in 1988 when it put $150 million toward addressing this problem.

In my riding the Don River, which is the hottest spot, the most polluted river in all of Canada, needs attention immediately. We ask this to be a model of reclaiming rivers in Canada.

The petitioners humbly ask that the government begin the process of reclamation.

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present some petitions today with many thousands of signatures to add to the over 210,000 signatures which we have already received.

These petitioners feel that there are serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system. There are many vulnerable persons who have little protection under the current system. Women, children and disabled persons are at a particular risk.

These petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society. They ask Parliament to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 196 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 196 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 196—Mr. Wood:

With respect to the northern Ontario regional development called FEDNOR (a) how much money has the government appropriated to it for fiscal years (i) 1989-90 (ii) 1990-91 (b) how much is the government forecasting to spend in fiscal year 1991-92 (c) how much of the appropriation for fiscal year 1990-91 has been spent to date and (i) on what projects (ii) what are the criteria used in distributing funds?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PUBLIC SERVICE REFORM ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations act and other Acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H; and the amendment of Mrs. Catterall (p. 6631).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The debate is on the main motion and the amendment of Mrs. Catterall. When the motion was adjourned at 2 p.m., the hon. member for Ottawa South still had 11 minutes left.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, at 2 p.m., I was saying that the main problem with the Public Service right now is the public servants' morale. This problem was very well explained when the report of the task force on services to the public, one of the studies done by Public Service 2000, was tabled.

[English]

The Public Service 2000 task force report refers to the following: "Recent research reveals low morale among sector managers when compared with their private sector counterparts. Our task force research also shows that public servants feel stereotyped as lazy and uncaring more by the general public than by their own departmental clients".

You might wonder why this is relevant to the reforms that are under way. I submit that in attempting through this process of Public Service reform and revitalization to address issues of service to the public, a failure to deal with underlying causes of low morale in the Public Service dooms to failure this reform. This task force, in its report on service to the public, a very interesting document, highlights the characteristics of a client centred organization.

Trying to focus on what reforms are necessary to make the Public Service of Canada more client centred, one of the characteristics which I have highlighted is: "These organizations", that is client centred ones, "treat their managers and staff well, engendering attitudes which encourage empowerment, participation, delegation and trust.

If you accept the premise of PS 2000, the government is trying to get people lower down in the bureaucracy to take responsibility for things that are before them; to become accountable, yes, but to make decisions; as Glassco said many years ago, to make managers able to manage. If that kind of responsibility is going to be taken, the managers and the people with whom they work must feel part of the process.

Surely in embarking on a reform of the Public Service which was intended to make it more client focused, it would have been wise had that reform not been undertaken through a process of study which was entirely top down.

When you look at the issues that have given rise to what is currently a chronic and very continuing state of low morale in the Public Service, you ask yourself how a top down study such at this one, together with the kinds of problems that are compounding the problems that the Public Service is experiencing, will ever lead to a more effective, efficient Public Service.

Let me explain what I mean by those problems.

• (1520)

At present if you look at the people at the lower ranks of the Public Service, many of whom are my constituents, and you consider how the government provoked a labour action last year which led to a great deal of dissatisfaction and mistrust between those employees and their employer, you understand that it will be very difficult to rebuild that morale.

These people are low paid. They are the least empowered, if you like, of all of the government employees and very often they are the people with whom the public deals. In asking the Public Service to accept restraint in wages, which I think it was more than prepared to do, in choosing not to ask it to restrain its wage increases but in offering it a zero per cent increase in a year in which inflation was running on average around 5.5 per cent, the government was so unreasonable as to constitute a breach of trust with the very people we are now asking to be more responsive and more considerate in their dealings with the public and more determined to provide more for less in the context of greater efficiencies.

At the other end of the spectrum, at the senior end of the spectrum, you have a different phenomenon occurring. Over the course of this past few years in government we have seen the erosion of the very important principle of ministerial responsibility. We have seen it in two cases. We have seen it first of all in 1989 in the case of the budget leak, in which the Minister of Finance proved himself unwilling to take responsibility for the fact that portions of his budget were leaked in advance. Instead he chose to stand in the House of Commons, as did the Prime Minister of Canada, and say that it was caused by a criminal act—complete abrogation of his duty as a minister.

Then, more recently, we had the case of the ministers of external affairs and immigration in the affair known as the Al Mashat affair. In that case again ministers of the Crown not only failed to take on their ministerial responsibility but were willing to name public servants in public as being responsible for things that went on in their departments.

Kenneth Kernaghan, a political scientist at Brock University and respected authority on public administration, was quoted in The Ottawa Citizen in June 1991:

> It is extremely important that ministers do not publicly name and blame whoever is at fault. This is to preserve both the anonymity and political neutrality of public servants. Loyalty, after all, is a two-way street. By tradition, public servants are not permitted to speak out in their own defence against ministerial criticism.

In commenting on this affair, the Montreal Gazette wrote:

> What is indefensible is the spineless attempt by the ministers involved to cover their own tracks in this affair.

The Montreal Gazette says that the ministers involved:

> —did not behave like ministers responsible by parliamentary tradition for all that happens in their ministries. They behaved more like cockroaches scurrying for cover when the lights come on. They all denied prior knowledge of Mr. Mashat's immigration and deplored his admission. They dissembled, they changed stories, they pointed the finger at others, they blamed and named civil servants.

In the face of the conduct of this government, in the face of the fact that it has lost credibility and authority as a result of its incompetence and unwillingness to listen to the people of Canada, how on earth can it come forward with a package of reforms such as Public Service 2000, with a bill such as Bill C-26, and expect not only the people of Canada but particularly the members of the Public Service of Canada to take it seriously?

I suggest that it is unthinkable that this package of reforms, with its top down approach and coming from a government that has lost its authority over its own employees, can ever hope to solve the problems the Public Service confronts. It seems to me that the suggestions made by the public accounts committee, when it reviewed the PS 2000 documents earlier on, to refer the discussion papers to a House of Commons committee, was the correct approach. What we need is a study not only by the senior bureaucrats themselves but one by the Parliament of Canada into the Public Service to help us to understand how that Public Service can be best redirected at the end of the 20th century to meet the hopes and needs of Canadians.

It is not enough just to leave it in the hands of the ministers and their senior deputies. It is far too important a task.

I would like to add my voice to that of my colleague from Ottawa West who moved an amendment to the government's motion asking that this bill be pre-studied. Perhaps in that study there will be the opportunity once and for all for parliamentarians to figure out what kind of games are being played by the government in their continuing practice of contracting out functions that in the past have been performed honourably and competently by the Public Service of Canada.

The fact that this continues without any clear accounting system, enabling us to know what is being spent on contracting out, continues to be one of the unproclaimed scandals of the present government. This issue has to be examined under the bright lights of parliamentary and media scrutiny.

I do not think we can support this bill. This bill, bringing forward as it does a few elements of a very broad and very important study, is inadequate to be voted on in the House of Commons without a complete and thorough study of a lot of the principles and the basic concepts that underlie the Public Service today.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that my colleague from Ottawa is always here for his constituents, many of them being public servants. I know that the Public Service tends to be battered from one end of this country to another, especially in ridings like my own where we do not have a lot of public servants. Quite often when service to the public is at fault or it is slow or there are problems in process, it is always the Public Service that tends to get the brunt of the criticism.

We are in a very difficult economic period where the demand on the Public Service is probably twice as high as it would be during a period of a good economy, so there is even more pressure on our public servants, those people dedicated to the service of Canada. They are constantly being bombarded with very difficult situations.

My question for my colleague relates to the number of people in the Public Service. I notice that the numbers in the Public Service right now are the same numbers we had in the early seventies. I think my hon. member, having a large riding of public servants, could be more specific.

I cannot imagine an organization like General Motors, any factory or any organization that was growing and meeting the needs of the market, having in 1991 the same number of people as they had in the early seventies and still expect to succeed in the quality of public service that was required.

Does my colleague not think that that sort of constricted action, that grinding down of numbers and support services within the Public Service Alliance of Canada not only affects the morale of the country but also the quality of service that ultimately we are all elected to provide through them?

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for his question. All of us as members of Parliament from all parties have experienced the effects of the downsizing of the federal Public Service. We experience it on a daily basis in our constituency offices as we endeavour to help constituents who are trying to deal with whatever their problems may be with the federal government.

Recently we found in the area of income security the difficulty of getting information from income security offices on constituents' pension matters, on their Canada Pension Plan, Old Age Security and so on.

I know we all experience, especially in urban centres, the incredible delays in dealing with immigration matters where we have months and months going by while we wait for information on very basic and simple cases. I have followed up on letters I have sent as a member of Parliament to the minister of immigration for which replies were not given within a year of writing. This is how badly backed up the service has become in the Public Service of Canada. The reason is clear. When you look at the number of person years, which is essentially the number of people who work in the federal government, they have declined from about 258,000 in 1983–1984 down to 221,000 in 1990–1991. This is about the level it was in 1974.

All Canadians appreciate the fact that the federal government is being called upon to provide more and better and faster service to the people of Canada than it was almost 20 years ago, yet the people that are actually engaged in doing that are fewer in number.

That is also true in the policy development area. I mentioned earlier we are confronting a large number of very significant policy issues, partly the economic ones that I referred to of internationalization that is occurring, but also we are going through in our society a very dramatic demographic shift as the population ages. By the year 2040, regardless essentially of what we do with immigration, our population in Canada will decline.

We are in critical need, I think, of the very best minds that Canada has to offer in the area of policy development at the government level. Instead of twisting and squeezing and trying to grind this number of public servants down, ostensibly an effort to save expense, we are losing out on the opportunity to have the very best policy development occurring.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricardo Lopez (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak in support of Bill C–26 that is now before the House. I do not at all pretend, as the hon. member for Ottawa South just did, that with this bill we are trying to decrease the number of civil servants or trying to denigrate them. I think that they render all Canadians valuable services.

I have often had to deal with officials of the Public Service of Canada and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I am very satisfied with it. Most of them provide very professional and competent services and make the work of all of us much easier.

The bill before us today is not meant to diminish the number of our public servants or to degrade them; it is primarily intended to make them a little more mobile in their tasks and in their career progression. The Public Service of Canada now has 71 job classifications, which make it practically impossible for public servants of a particular rank and qualifications to move up to higher levels even though they may well be qualified to do so.

Basically, this bill is to allow that flexibility, to be fairer to our public servants, especially those in positions traditionally held by women, since in some categories, women cannot advance and it is practically impossible for them to apply for another type of employment with other qualifications that would give them the opportunity to provide Canadians with very good services and at the same time use their skills.

So I must support this bill because it will make the government more efficient by being able to obtain competent people from other sectors and assign them where they are needed and because it is fairer to public servants, who can apply for positions they could not before.

Therefore I do not at all understand the opposition's arguments against this bill, since it is meant to upgrade our public servants. Nothing in the bill says that public servants do not do a good job or could be used, as someone just said, to denigrate or subordinate them. That is certainly not our intention—quite the contrary, I think.

At the same time as it recognizes their skills, this bill can help them advance, because you have to put yourself in a public servant's position. If they really want to give their fellow citizens good service, they should be given the opportunity to do so. Those who are competent must not be limited.

So that is the purpose of the bill and I can only support it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the amendment before the House proposes: That Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment act, the Public Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

This is a striking example of a government bill that must be examined in depth by this House, by all members interested in this issue, in order to improve it, Mr. Speaker, and to change its principle as well as its implementation and substance. Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret that the government did not follow the advice of the public accounts committee of this House which, a year ago, strongly recommended to the government the referral of this bill or of a draft bill to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Speaker, it has taken 25 years to bring significant changes before this House. If we go back 25 years, we notice that when the original act was drafted, all the parties were involved in the process. This process did not involve only the government. No. All the political parties had been involved in order to ensure a fair examination of the Public Service Employment Act, and to ensure that all parliamentarians be aware of the importance of a Public Service accountable to the public at large and to this House, as well as responsible in its administration.

Now we have a majority government that tables, on second reading, a bill which, as we know, could be passed in its present form, given the number of government members. Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret this situation, because I am convinced that the experience of the members of the opposition, as well as of those of the government, could have been beneficial and positive. We are therefore in the difficult position of proposing an amendment that asks the House to defer this discussion for six months precisely so that we can have this parliamentary exercise, so that we can examine the principle and the substance of the bill before passing it.

As I was saying, this bill is important for civil servants, but it is also important for Canadians. Since it was elected in 1984, the attitude of this government, the Conservative government, toward its employees, makes almost mandatory a complete revitalization of the Canadian Public Service. One only has to take a look at the numerous reports that were tabled, here in this House, or that were ordered by these royal commissions of inquiry, to know about proposed changes to improve the Public Service. I refer hon. members to the Glassco report, in 1957—that is going back a long way—by the royal commission on economic perspectives in Canada; the Finkelman report, that many of us know because we spent several months with its author examining the scope of the proposals to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act; the Lambert royal commission in March 1979, again on financial management and accountability; the d'Avignon report, in September 1979, by a special committee on management and the merit principle; the McDonald report in August 1985, by a commission which again studied the economic union and the development prospects for Canada. All those reports Mr. Speaker, without any exception, proposed numerous solutions, some of them very interesting, that were often forgotten and totally ignored by the governments.

And now we are faced with the implementation of another report. This one is called Public Service 2000, with all its advantages and shortcomings, praised largely by members of the government and criticized by everybody else, mostly by the unions, employees and your humble servant.

The synopsis of the document on the renewal of the Public Service of Canada says, and I quote from the briefing notes we received: "What is different about Public Service 2000 is that it is led from within by those who must implement its results". We are told that public servants were involved. I know some were.

There would certainly be fewer critics if the government had taken the advice of the public accounts committee which I have the privilege to chair which had recommended or strongly suggested submitting the working paper to a special committee of the House on a proposed reform of the Public Service of Canada, well before tabling amendments in the House. We as members were excluded from the consultation process and from any direct involvement in drafting or improving this bill.

There would probably be fewer critics, Mr. Speaker, if the government had stood by its previous commitment to consider only amendments approved by representatives of employees and senior management, as reliable critics.

Consider some of the changes. Selection according to merit, which is the prevailing standard today, means that a person is hired for a job in the Public Service according to merit. In other words, the person best qualified to do the work gets the job.

According to clause 10(2), instead of using the merit principle exclusively, in future the commission may use measures or standards based not on merit alone but also on comparative tests of candidates. In other words, so and so is better suited to the job for the time being, even if he does not win on merit.

We are told there will be regulations to ensure impartiality, to ensure that people do not revert to nepotism by appointing friends or relatives. What will those regulations be like? I don't know. Will they enhance or detract from the merit principle? I don't know. There is a possibility that not the best candidate is selected but the one that suits the manager.

That is what some people have said, and I think that until we have some clear and specific answers, those claims are justified. The unions told me this measure could be used as an excuse for favouritism and all kinds of harassment, including sexual harassment. Mr. Speaker, we don't want to go back to that. We don't want that.

In the case of temporary employees, a new clause would be added to allow the Public Service Commission to appoint any person for a period not exceeding 90 days. An extension could be granted, not exceeding 125 days a year, in the same department or any other part of the Public Service.

Many people, myself included, believe that continual employee turnover and lack of continuity could lead to poorer service rather than the improvement sought.

Some clauses deal with the organization of the Public Service, of the allocation of positions in it and their classification. Mr. Speaker, I have been talking about this issue of job classification for 12 years. These issues will not be subject to arbitration. Nevertheless, this same government in 1984 promised as firmly as it could and as often as it could that job classification would be negotiable, Mr. Speaker. It did not keep its word. We have proof in Bill C-26 today. Even Mr. Mulroney, the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, promised in 1984 to make staffing and classification negotiable.

Mr. Speaker, many of the proposed changes will eventually have to be covered in regulations. What makes it difficult for members here to pass this bill is that we cannot assess the impact of many of its provisions. It is not a bill that is easy to read, I agree. It covers complex legislation. The staff relations act, Mr. Speaker, is hard to know. You almost have to have been involved with it for 18 or 19 years to begin to get a feel for it.

Let us return, Mr. Speaker, to the primary purpose of Public Service 2000: to give public servants and managers more power; to give Canadians top-quality services. According to the authors of this reorganization plan, PS2000, Public Service 2000, as it is called, and Bill C-26, if I go by the material given to us, were to increase to the government's credibility—please note—and to give greater importance to serving the public.

This morning—

• (1550)

[English]

—we heard the parliamentary secretary say that public servants should spend less time serving systems and more time serving citizens. I agree with that. But let us see if indeed that is the result of this proposal.

[Translation]

What this bill should do is streamline a Public Service that has become too complex as a result of administrative red tape. I will give an example, Mr. Speaker, which you may think is rather far-fetched, but just the same: One day, a Public Service employee is asked to go and get a bottle of vinegar from government storage. It cost $30, Mr. Speaker, to take a taxi and go and get a bottle of vinegar that probably cost two or three dollars. Thirty dollars to get a bottle of vinegar, when he could have bought a bottle at the corner store, had he had the authority to do so. But that would have been against the rules! That bottle of vinegar had to come from a vinegar depot!

Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of story that makes Canadians somewhat cynical and is reminiscent of all the red tape that used to exist. When he appeared before the public accounts committee, the Auditor General suggested, and you will find this in the seventh report dated November 6, 1990, and I quote: "The current legislative and administrative framework is not adapted to the environment and challenges facing the Public Service today—the need to eliminate unreasonable constraints, devolving more meaningful authority to departments and front-line managers, while ensuring proper rendering of accounts". There are references to increased delegation of authority. I think that is a sensible objective.

If I refer to the 1991 report of the Auditor General tabled recently, just before Christmas as a matter of fact, here is what I read: "An area of difficulty for past efforts at management reform appears to have been the absence of concrete proposals for moving from "here" to "there", for managing the process of change." Amendments to Bill C-26 are being put forward, but read this legislation carefully. Where are these concrete proposals for an efficient implementation? The Auditor General says further, and I quote: "The white paper on PS 2000 raises concern about excessive, detailed controls, but does not provide enough indication of the controls for government that are both essential and cost-effective." That is on page 26 of the annual report. He goes on to say that "any formal assessment of due regard to efficiency must rely on information about cost and performance."

Let me give you an example, Mr. Speaker, because I feel we should try to focus on this point. I will take the example of contracting out, in a department I am familiar with, the Secretary of State, and a function I know well, translation. At present, an employee may be laid off by reason of lack of work or the discontinuance of a function. The bill before us will enable us to lay off an employee whose services are no longer required by reason of lack of work or the transfer of work outside the Public Service, in other words contracted out.

Such an amendment was deemed necessary by government following a November 1990 appeal judgment by the Federal Court upholding a Staff Relations Commission decision that government had violated a collective agreement when it filled 278 clerk positions in Revenue Canada by contracting out. The judge said that he thought it was not correct to say that the services of an employee whose work had been contracted out were no longer needed for lack of work or because a function had been eliminated. His services were no longer required because the function had been given to outside contractors. The task still had to be done and the function continued to exist.

Mr. Speaker, I see you signaling me that I have no more than one minute left. In the field of translation, Mr. Speaker, in 1985, I think that 19 per cent of the work was contracted out. In 1989–90, it was 35 per cent and I am told that today, 50 per cent is to be contracted out. Where are the rules for accountability, Mr. Speaker? I know for a fact that officials now have a document for the decentralization of translation services because the departments are to be given the responsibility for administering this service.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you: Where is this document? Why do we not have it before us here in the House? Why can we members of Parliament not have it? I know that it exists. This document explains what the decentralization is about. It is important to know who will decide to privatize or contract out a service which it is this government's responsibility to provide as a servant of the state. I do not have all the information, Mr. Speaker, so I must tell you in conclusion that I cannot support this bill until it is reviewed and thoroughly studied by members of this House from all parties so that we can study this matter seriously fully documented and come to a consensus.

[English]

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of my hon. friend from Ottawa—Vanier who, I think all members of the House would recognize, has a very strong interest in this area, representing a very large number of public servants. There were a couple of observations that he made which I would like to comment on and then in turn invite his comments.

One has to do with the provision in this bill dealing with short-term contracting of up to three months and possibly renewable. I think it is important to note that it is difficult to recognize what workloads will be at any given time. From time to time within the Public Service, as within industry, workloads become particularly heavy and it is necessary to bring somebody in to assist in the short term. I would suggest that in such circumstances it makes more sense to go out and get somebody who can perform the task necessary and carry on. If a full-scale competition were required each time somebody needed to bring in a little bit of assistance, the need may well have passed before the competition was completed.

I think what we have in the bill here is the application of common sense. I think it is important to note that such casual employees would not become regular employees by entry through competition in the regular sense.

The other point has to do with subsection 10(2), which my hon. friend addressed. I see this whole bill as an attempt to inject a little more practicality and common sense. My hon. friend suspects, as did some earlier speakers in the New Democratic Party, some kind of surreptitious motive by the government. I think what we really have here is an attempt to apply common sense to the process. I think that is what subsection 10(2) does as well.

We have never really had an adequate definition of merit as opposed to competence in the assessment of circumstances. My hon. friend represents a large number of public servants in the Ottawa area. I represent a relatively small number of public servants in departments like Fisheries and Oceans, Canada Employment, CEIC and so on. It is very important to us that, for example, not just paper qualifications be taken into consideration when assessing people for promotions but, whether they know the area. Are they familiar? Do they understand the lifestyle and the priorities of people in a particular area?

• (1600)

Those things might not reflect themselves in paper qualifications. On the other hand, they are very critical in determining the competence of an individual.

The last point I will make with regard to that are the circumstances, for example, in which a job has been reclassified. Does it make sense to go to the cost, the time and the energy to have somebody reapply for their own job when they have a demonstrated competence in it?

I will stop at that and perhaps my hon. friend would like to comment.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the kind of debate I want. That is the kind of debate parliamentarians should have.

I brought out two or three points. I have another 25 points I could possibly bring out.

The member says that we do not have an adequate definition of merit. I have. The Public Service Commission is being attacked right now by his bill, in my view. I may be wrong. I have been wrong before. I am looking for some advice, some possible debate with the government members and those specialists in the field to make sure that the merit principle as I know it means that you get the job on merit, you can do it better than anybody else, and not because you know somebody or because you have better connections than the next guy. That is the merit principle as far as I am concerned.

I must say that I am satisfied with the annual report before this House by the Public Service Commission. I have been satisfied in the 19 years that I have been here that the Public Service Commission has addressed that question, has impartially administered that principle, that system.

I am worried now because the commission is being weakened. Look at clause 29 and look at clause 27. A new position is being created. I want to read it because it is important: "The Clerk of the Privy Council and secretary to the cabinet is the head of the Public Service".

Who is he? He is a nominee of the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister apolitical, non-partisan? Come on.

"He will table a report on the state of the Public Service in each fiscal year for the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister shall cause a copy of the report to be laid before each House of Parliament on any of the first 15 days on which that House is sitting after the Prime Minister receives it".

My concern is to make sure the Public Service of Canada is apolitical, non-partisan, chosen on merit, and not on the basis of who you know in the Privy Council and if you happen to be a friend of the system. I think that is wrong.

That is why I am concerned on that point. That is the merit principle.

Regarding the question of term employees, I do not have any quarrel with term employees. They do not have any quarrels with our position. They would like to be treated like human beings.

If I read the bill properly they are going to have a nomination for 90 days with a possible extension to 125 days within the same department. Some people have said you can go on and on and this can be a continuous rotation in every department: "We will move our friends after 90 days to 125 days. We will move them throughout the department for another 90 days and 125 days". I say we need explanations. That is not correct. I could go on to every section of this bill.

I beg the member to vote for us, vote on this motion so that we can get into committee and debate these questions and return with a bill, with a response that has been properly studied by all of us who have an interest in this bill.

Mr. Manley: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think we have all been impressed not only with the thoughts that have been expressed by the member for Ottawa—Vanier but with his long experience as a member of this House and as chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

He has indicated that he has a number of other points that he could address. I wonder if there might be unanimous consent to give him an additional 20 minutes so that he can continue to share his wisdom with the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to give more time?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to participate in the debate on Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada.

It is interesting that the government would see fit to bring in legislation at this time and to hear members of the government's side of the House tell us how fair it is going to be for the public servants of Canada and how efficient it will be.

We saw how fair this government was last summer when the Public Service Alliance was coming to the government with its concerns. We saw close to 100,000 out here on the front lawns and how this government reacted.

Before I start on the bill, it would be appropriate to give a little history of what this government has done over the last seven years with regard to public servants. Since the Mulroney government came to power just over seven years ago, we have seen an unprecedented attack on government services. It has passed legislation which cuts funding for health care, education, housing, unemployment insurance, job creation, the CBC and VIA Rail. It has given us eight more senators. He found some money for eight more senators to be able to get a piece of legislation through the Senate. It increased the salaries of bureaucrats by tens of thousand dollars each, including a massive raise for the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. John Crow.

We are not talking about efficiency. We are not talking about fairness to the Public Service people. I have talked to the Professional Institute of Public Servants. Yes, there are some in those departments who would be only too happy to see this piece of legislation go through and some of the powers they would have.

I have many public servants in my riding. I have three national parks: Kootenay National Park, Yoho National Park and Glacier National Park. People are out working the highways with knowledge of what is going on. What this bill will do is take away the initiative and the pride they have in their jobs.

We also have joined highways of provincial jurisdiction that are now contracted out. I want to say to this House that I have seen the difference between privatization and our public sector workers through PSAC on our park roads. You can notice this immediately when you leave the federal park road and hit the provincial road that is now under private enterprise.

I have seen the kind of jockeying that takes place when it comes to contracts and how these are dished out. When I hear the member from the Liberal Party asking to have this bill hoisted for a six-month period, I am in full agreement. It is time this government started to listen to some of the people and let the opposition side of the House have some input into the kind of legislation that it is bringing forward. The kind of legislation that it is bringing forward is not going to address the needs of the Canadian people. We have seen that before. We have seen where this government stays in the polls at this time. It is down to 12 per cent. Is it any wonder that this government is down 12 per cent in the polls?

I talk to public servants in my riding and they tell me about the conduct of what is going on and how the morale has changed. When I talk to the people in the income tax department, in the unemployment insurance department, people involved in the highways, the parks or in customs throughout my area, I begin to realize exactly how these people are being treated and why the Canadian people feel the way they do toward governments.

They reflect what the government is doing to them and to the opposition members as well. It is wrong. These people have a great deal of pride in the work they carry out. They are very efficient in their work and how they conduct themselves. They are literally being throttled by this government with its policies and programs. Their grievances have built up through the years. These have not been processed and have not been put through the system in an efficient manner because this government does not believe in it.

It believes in giving them certification as a union to negotiate in good faith and then it treats them like it did last summer, passing back-to-work legislation without any mediation.

Then the member on the other side gets up and asks the member if he thinks this government is going to be fairer. In fact, his actual words were: "Flexibility to be fairer to our public servants". Can you imagine?

I do not know where he gets the audacity to come into this House and say they want to be more flexible because they are going to be fairer. I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of trust.

The Public Service Alliance does not trust this government. The people of Canada do not trust this government. The opposition does not trust this government. The Liberal amendment asks for a six-month hoist on this bill. It recommends bringing in some of those PSAC representatives and those experts they have brought forward. Let us bring in the opposition side of the House and sit down and go over this bill. Let us bring about some changes.

We all know that some changes are needed, but let us bring in some changes that are going to be for the benefit of all Canadians and not for the benefit of the agenda of this government.

I would like to go over some of the concerns. Once again, the Tory government is going after workers in the public sector under the guise of reform. The rights of workers in the federal Public Service are being undermined. There is no question about that because that is what this bill is all about.

The government says it wants to establish a more creative, innovative, service oriented Public Service. In reality it wants to impose from the top down this vision regardless of the needs and the inputs of the workers.

I worked for CP Rail for 40 years and I saw an employer who I thought was callous. But I want to tell you that we used to operate those trains and leave that division. They knew that train was in our possession, and they respected that we were going to run those millions of dollars worth of trains across the country. They gave us some authority and some respect.

If this government did the same to our public servants and gave them the respect and dignity they need, we would see a much better response from those workers. We would see a much better attitude across Canada in what these people are trying to perform and how they are trying to carry out their duties.

That is the kind of legislation we should be looking at. If we want to really address the problem, we should be looking at some kind of communication among those workers, the government and management, and bring about the kind of legislation that is going to best address the system.

We talk about competitiveness in the work place. I will tell you that the Japanese have certainly shown us how to do it. They have been doing it for about 10 to 15 years, and this government still has not caught on to the idea that it better sit down with its workers, the people who are carrying out the every day chores and the every day agreements that are laid out and the process of that.

It better sit down with them and get the co-operation of those people, their managers and the various people, to bring about the kind of changes we need. It is not going to get it by forcing this kind of legislation through the House of Commons.

Many in the Professional Institute of Public Servants are waiting with their hands folded over for the authority that this new PS 2000 is going to give them to make the kinds of decisions and changes they want. They are waiting for the extra power they seem to think they are going to have, but it will be short-lived.

It will be short-lived because this government will give them that authority until it decides it is time to make its patronage or other appointments. Those people will eventually find themselves down there with the other ones in the long run. I say to those who think there is something in this bill for them that they are sadly mistaken because it is not there at the present time.

The Public Service Alliance people, the workers who are out there trying to maintain their jobs and do their work, have had their fill of this government. They are telling this government in no uncertain terms that they are waiting for the day this government is out of power so they can deal with a government which will sit down and listen to some of their concerns.

I do not care whether you are dealing with public servants, labour in the private sector or whatever, you must have co-operation. This government does not seem to understand that you have got to have the co-operation of the people you hire and put in those places to work for you. Across Canada, this vast nation, there are public servants carrying out the regulations passed here in the House of Commons. This government does not give them the dignity nor the respect of trying to bring about that kind of co-ordination, co-operation between governments and the workers and the official staff and the workers. If this government thinks this response will do what it thinks it will do, it is sadly mistaken.

I would like to put on the record what some of the unions have to say. Contractors are taking the government for a ride. If it breaks down again, they will get more business. Members of the Calgary weather office produced a specialized snow forecast for the city of Calgary and the Ministry of Transport runway crews. MOT was not charged anything for this as it is an intergovernmental project, but the city of Calgary was charged $600 per month. In the name of privatization, the government has said that this cannot be done anymore. Now the cities pay 10 times as much for a firm in St. Louis to do it.

MOT has gone on to the St. Louis firm for the same reasons. The cost of total wages has been drastically reduced simply by contracting out services previously performed by indeterminate employees at a high cost to the employer and a lower standard.

Reducing the number of employees has reduced costs, but has increased the workload of those remaining, contributing to low morale or no opportunity for job advancement and the ever-increasing fear that tomorrow they may not have a job. Is that the message you want to get out to your workers? Are those the kinds of opportunities you are telling these people about, that under the merit system they are going to be able to get their promotions? That is absolute nonsense, Mr. Speaker. There is no way the average worker doing his or her job is going to have any recognition or any further protection under this piece of legislation.

The bill is not about reform, innovation or creativity. It is about the further emasculation of the Public Service and rights of workers. This bill allows the government to continue to contract out work. The government now spends in excess of $5 billion on contracting out. There is no accounting for the expenditure and no study of the cost-effectiveness of the contracting out.

Imagine, there is no study of the effectiveness of it. It reminds me of a provincial highway. When I leave federal park roads which have been nicely ploughed and I hit the private sector roads in British Columbia which have been contracted out, I can sure tell the difference and so can every person driving an automobile.

It provides the mechanism for increased devolution of managerial responsibility and accountability. It attacks the job security of Public Service sector workers. The bill does not addresses the serious problem of low morale in the Public Service. Does it address that? No. Does it address the deterioration of the service to the public? No. Is it to modernize the collective bargaining process? The Alliance still will not be able to bargain issues of classification and staffing levels. Again, it is a matter of trust. Where the government has said in the past that it would ensure that it would have these opportunities, it is taking it away.

What do the workers want? They suggested making staffing classification and deployment of staff bargainable. That is not too much to ask. They would like an adjustment process to hear grievances on the above. If you have a grievance, surely to goodness it should be heard and it should be heard in a reasonable period of time. If you want to speed up and have an effective Public Service, for goodness sakes, do not leave grievances hanging out there until they create the kind of atmosphere which we have had. They want an end to contracting out. Is that too much to ask if your people are doing effective work and carrying out the work? If you are trying to bring about fairness to these workers, that is not too much to ask.

I could go on and on, but I know the government is not going to listen. It does have a majority. It will do the same with this piece of legislation as it did with the back-to-work legislation that it imposed on these workers by bringing in its heavy hand, not even bringing about discussions or normal process of legislation when it comes to back-to-work legislation. No other government, including the Liberals, ever brought back-to-work legislation into this House without first going to mediation. That is the type of heavy-handed attitude that this government has toward its workers.

For this government to come and say now that this piece of legislation is going to help those workers and that it is doing it to bring about a fairer contract for these workers, I say is ludicrous. It is a matter of trust. This government cannot be trusted and we cannot support this piece of legislation.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend indicates that this government cannot be trusted and indicates that this government does not listen. I would remind him that the people of Canada in 1988 and before that, in 1984, had an opportunity to determine who best was qualified and in whom the people of Canada wished to entrust the governance of this nation. I would remind him that they twice chose the government of Brian Mulroney and the Progressive Conservative Party and twice elected the NDP not even as the Official Opposition, but as a rump within this Parliament. They might well remember that.

I am sure my hon. friend has ingratiated himself to his NDP colleagues in the labour movement and in the leadership of the labour movement, and I am sure Mr. Daryl Bean undoubtedly would have really enjoyed my hon. friend's remarks, but I think there is a certain dissidence between what he says and reality and the facts. The facts are that Public Service 2000, the white paper, was an extremely comprehensive process of consultation. All of the Public Service sector unions were involved very extensively in the 10 task forces and in making presentations to the 10 task forces and were consulted at great length. The presentation of the white paper was delayed, I might remind my hon. friend, in order that extensive consultation could take place with the public sector unions. Changes were made, changes that manifest themselves in this eminently reasonable legislation in order to accommodate what the members of the Public Service themselves felt, through their organizations, should be there. I would remind him of that.

My hon. friend talks about contracting out and cites as the definitive authority on contracting out the very trade unions which have a vested interest against contracting out. I agree with my hon. friend that there should be very careful scrutiny of the effectiveness of contracting out, but it should be done by objective authority. We should not just automatically take the point of view of one side in that issue that has an unequivocally vested interest.

Finally, I would remind my hon. friend that the function of the Public Service of Canada is not to create or provide employment. It is to provide services to the people of Canada that through their elected representatives it was determined should be established.

I would remind my hon. friend that those services should be provided effectively, not only from the point of view of the services themselves, but efficiently in terms of the interests of the public, who after all are also taxpayers. If those services can be more effectively performed on behalf of the public through contracting out, then it should be done on that basis. In the same way, agencies of the government should not exist in perpetuity, and if tasks can be performed in the private sector more efficiently and do not have to be performed to meet public service needs through the government running the operation, then privatization is indeed appropriate.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the member has asked me a few questions. The fact of the matter is that the process leading up to the PS 2000 report was one that saw the concerns of the workers, as expressed through PSAC and the Professional Institute of the Public Service, ignored.

Therefore, for you to talk about a matter of trust in 1988, I want to say that the Prime Minister stood up in 1988 and told the Canadian people that our social programs were a matter of trust and he would ensure that they were kept. He even referred to his mother and said: "Even my mother would not support me if I were to deviate from this".

An hon. member: And she doesn't.

Mr. Parker: Now we find out that they are not a sacred trust to this government any more.

I want to say to the member that the Canadian people do not trust this government. Yes, we are talking about service, and in order to have good service you must have public servants and people who know what the programs are, what the government is trying to do, and co-operate with the government in order to carry them out. If you do not have this in this government or other groups, you will never have an efficient work force.

I say again, this piece of legislation is going to do some more harm. It is a matter of trust, and neither the Canadian people nor the workers nor anyone trusts this government at this time.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague from Kootenay East a question.

I know that along with myself he shares a number of federal government services. Being next-door neighbours, as it were, I am also acquainted with the fact that he has held considerable discussions with members of the Public Service Alliance and other employees of the federal government within his own area. Many of them work in national parks, both within his constituency and mine. In fact my colleague is a former mayor of one of the major communities in my own constituency. It is one of those vagaries of redistribution that we sometimes switch communities.

I do know that he has held some consultations, and I wonder, arising from those conversations, just what appreciation he has developed of the degree of consultation that took place with the government over the last two years on PS 2000 and other initiatives related to the bill before us, and what degree of confidence those employees within his constituency have as to the legitimacy of that whole consultative experience.

Mr. Parker: I would like to thank my colleague from Kootenay West. He is absolutely right. There have been small meetings throughout my riding, and I believe some over into his area, with regard to the PS 2000 and how it is going to affect workers. I was not able to attend some of those meetings, but I have copies of the minutes of the discussions they have had.

Some things that came out of those meetings regard loyalty and public relations. They feel they have been betrayed by this government. They had a loyalty to this government, as to all governments, to perform their duties well.

• (1630)

Other comments they made are similar to what I said with regard to appointing eight new senators to fulfil and to push a bill through the House and through the Senate, at the same time that they were forcing the public servants out on strike, at the same time that they were out on strike allowing the Governor of the Bank of Canada to have his wages increased by almost double.

Those were the kinds of things where they feel betrayed by this government. They recognize that changes must be made with regard to their agreements and how they can be streamlined. They are prepared to put in their input and hopefully have some say along with their managerial people.

I meet with the superintendents in my national park and I talk to them about what is going on. They rely on those workers who are out there doing the everyday work, and they have a fairly good working relationship with those people. When it comes to the top areas and how the programs are initiated, the people feel that they are being ignored. They feel that they have very poor public relations through that system. Even though they belong to trade unions and try to bring about their efforts, they feel frustrated. They feel they have been neglected.

I think they are just patiently waiting for an opportunity to throw this government out of office. I guess that is as much as I can say at this time.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased after a couple of warm-ups to now have an opportunity to participate in this debate. I think we should remind ourselves that Public Service 2000 was a multi-year program of changes to internal administrative rules and regulations designed to make the Public Service more flexible, streamlined, and better equipped to concentrate its attention on providing services to the Canadian public. That is what the Public Service is all about.

Bill C-26, the Public Service Reform Act, is an essential part of PS 2000. It will streamline outmoded provisions regarding collective bargaining, staffing, human resources management, and the disposal of surplus assets.

Bill C-26 reaffirms the mandate of the Public Service Commission as the agent of Parliament charged with the responsibility for protecting the merit principle. In particular, the commission will maintain its role to assess merit with respect to recruitment to the Public Service and promotions to higher level duties. The commission will be authorized to define by regulation what constitutes promotion.

Back in the early 1900s, when Canada's civil service legislation was first being developed, the basic reason for requiring that appointments be made on the basis of merit was to prevent political patronage. Every government since that date, including this one, has supported the merit principle. As Bill C-26 demonstrates, this government continues to support that principle.

Merit is the recruitment of the best qualified candidate and promotion of the best qualified. This concept remains at the centre of the values of the Public Service Employment Act. To suggest otherwise, as has been done in this debate, is not to read this bill. Section 10 of the present act remains as it is.

Members who have been part of a large organization are only too well aware that organization charts are usually out of date on the day they are distributed. In today's world, jobs change over short periods to meet ever-changing requirements. The speed of technological change is dramatic. For example, the distribution of micro-computers in the Public Service increased from 10,000 in 1987 to 180,000 last year.

Public servants throughout their careers must continuously adapt through training and skills enhancement. In this environment, it would be short-sighted to recruit young people to meet only the requirements of their first job in the Public Service. New recruits must also demonstrate that they can contribute to the needs of Canada's Public Service as they evolve over time. They must be able to show that they are the best qualified and that they have the potential to respond to new social challenges, to meet the needs for services of an increasingly varied public, and to consult widely with stakeholders in a truly client oriented fashion.

For these reasons the bill adds a new basis for selection according to merit in very specific circumstances.

The commission will be able to prescribe standards not only with respect to a particular position but also with respect to "present and future needs of the Public Service". In the old days it was relatively simple to define a job, to select standards needed to meet the requirements of that job, and to recruit by means of a competition the best person qualified to do the job.

I am pleased to see in this bill, among other things, that for the first time in legislation there will be provision for the establishment of employment equity, although we have had for some time employment equity programs.

I refer to new section 5.1, which says:

> On the request of the Treasury Board, the Commission may provide for the administration and operation of programs for the improvement of employment and career opportunities in the Public Service for disadvantaged persons or groups of persons, including those that are disadvantaged by reason of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

I think it is very important that this provision be included in an explicit manner. There has been suggestion from time to time that employment equity is in fact a disincentive or indeed is an inherent form of discrimination. It is important to note that this is not at all what employment equity is. What this bill really is focusing on is the concept of providing fair criteria for decision making in terms of hiring and promotion. When we talk about people's qualifications for the job, a standard may be set of what is in fact a qualification for a position.

At the same time it is important that employer groups, obviously headed by the government, should have some kind of reflection of the community they are intended to serve. Whether we like to admit it or not, we have had for many centuries systemic discrimination in the way large organisms or institutions like governments function.

If we can look, for example, in a statistical way at the people who are employed in large organisms, be it the Government of Canada or indeed the telephone company, large retail chains, oil companies or anything else, we should see some kind of balance, not only in the proportions of people of different groups that exist within that organism, but indeed they should be represented fairly at the different levels.

Employment equity is a concept that gives promotion advantage or hiring advantage not to people who are not qualified, because it only allows for the promotion of people who are in fact qualified, but gives preference from among qualified candidates to candidates from the under-represented group.

This is something that we as Canadians should applaud and welcome to ensure that the institutions of our society—and none is more basic than the Public Service of Canada—have fair representation of all peoples and all Canadians within our Public Service. The reality is that has not always been the case.

I applaud the explicit reference there. I might mention that there have been for some time de facto programs carried out through the Public Service and through Treasury Board. I refer to things like the Access Program, the Visible Minority Employment Program, the Northern Careers Program, the National Indigenous Development Program and OPTION, the non-traditional occupations program for women. Of course these programs have been very successful and have touched directly many hundreds of Canadians involved in the Public Service of Canada. I think it is important that we upfront the commitment of the Government of Canada to this very important priority.

There are many instances when it makes more sense to appoint a person who can demonstrate that he or she meets the standard of competence established by the Public Service Commission. I would like to give members present here today some realistic examples, not to be confused with some of the distorted examples I heard reference to earlier, where this would be a preferable route for us to take.

There are many training and apprenticeship programs taking place in the Public Service. As employees progress through various stages of their training they become competent to meet the requirements of the next level.

• (1640)

It would seem reasonable to make such appointments not on a competitive basis but on a demonstrated proof that the employee has reached a certain level of competence, for example by successfully passing a test or completing a certain number of hours of on-the-job training. It should be remembered that an assessment of merit was applied when the employee entered the program.

The point made is that when the Public Service of Canada goes out to recruit people to work for the Canadian public, if it wants the best possible candidates it is competing with industry.

When young people are looking for job opportunities, they are going to ask: "What is in it for me in the future?" It is not just a matter of asking: "What job am I going to have today, but where am I going to be five years or ten years from now?" Well, if they go with General Motors or with Eaton's or Imperial Oil, they have some reasonable expectation of how they are going to progress through the system.

At the same time when the employer, be it the Government of Canada or somebody else invests in an employee to see that he or she has the specialized training in order to progress through the system, it only makes sense that there should be a reasonable expectation, both on the part of the employee and on the part of the employer, that that person is in fact going to progress through the system.

Another case where this approach would be justified is where an employee's job has been reclassified to a higher level. If the employee has consistently demonstrated competence in fulfilling the job requirements, then he or she should be appointed without an extensive and costly—and I stress costly—staffing exercise involving a comparison with all potential candidates for the position.

If somebody is doing the job, the job has been reclassified, they are doing the job well and they are doing it effectively, the odds are that they should be allowed to continue in that position. Simply because it is being reclassified, it does not make sense to go to the tremendous expense of disrupting the whole process with a competition in that case.

I believe members will realize that the principle of merit never ruled out other principles of good management theory. The Canadian political system also values qualities such as efficiency, effectiveness, sensitivity and equality of opportunity.

The Public Service 2000 white paper noted that the executive has responsibility for management of resources made available to it by Parliament. For this reason Bill C-26 provides that deployments should be the responsibility of management.

What are deployments? They will be basically the same as a lateral transfer except they will not be an appointment. They will be under the control of the deputy minister who will be guided by policies and guidelines approved by the Treasury Board.

Managers need to be able to ensure that jobs get done when they need to get done. The staffing system should be flexible enough to permit a manager and an employee to agree that the employee should assume the responsibilities of a new position if it is at the same level as the employee's current position.

Deployments will only occur with the consent of the employee in most instances. Where an employee thinks that there has been an abuse of authority with respect to a deployment, he or she will have the right to seek redress including third party investigation.

The concept of deployment does not violate the principle of merit. Deployments will benefit individual public servants, in particular those who wish to expand their career opportunities by taking lateral transfers to jobs which present new challenges and which require the learning of new skills.

There was a suggestion put, I believe by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, to the effect that this bill did not acknowledge the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts with respect to the issue of disclosure. I would say that to legislate along the lines previously suggested by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts might not respond to every situation. Let me illustrate.

There have been calls by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts to make nothing introduceable in an appeal hearing unless previously disclosed. What if information came to an employee that would support his or her case after the disclosure step had been completed and the appeal hearing had started? It could in fact work to the disadvantage of the employee.

I would say as well that it is the practice within the Public Service in handling appeals to make sure that the appellant is aware of the full circumstances under which the decision was made.

I wish to emphasize that these relatively modest changes to the current law regarding staffing provide for a system of checks and balances. The appeal system remains relatively unchanged.

The powers of the Public Service Commission to ensure the delegated authorities to departments are properly exercised are greatly enhanced.

I commend the bill to all members for its urgent passing in the interest of Canadians, but also in the interest of Canadian public servants.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the remarks of the member from South Shore.

I want to come back to the debate he and I had a few minutes ago on the merit principle because he alluded to it. I want to make it clear there is a conditional obligation now for the Public Service Commission not only to look but it is an obligation to describe who is the best candidate to do the job. But there will be an assessment made now, and I take it that the member understands that, according to standards to be set by the commission.

In my view, this will bring about a situation where, instead of ranking employees according to the merit of each employee and comparing them to find the most qualified, the principle of hiring the most qualified will now be changed, modified or replaced by the principle of hiring a, I underline a, qualified person, not the most qualified. That is the point I want to make with the member.

The Public Service Commission which has been the watch-dog over the merit principle is going to become the lap-dog, not the watch-dog. That is what bothers me.

I want to ask the hon. member, being a member of the government, does he have any idea of the standards that are going to be set, the rules and regulations that are going to be in place? How is the commission going to reconcile merit on the basis of selecting the best to do the job with the new proposal, not the best among equals, but in someone's opinion one of those who is best qualified?

I do not understand why we want to dilute the Public Service Commission's mandate. I do not understand why at this time the government endorses such a move. I would like to have some explanations from the member as to why he does.

Mr. McCreath: I would certainly like to respond to my hon. friend. I think it is important to recognize that the merit principle, as indicated in section 10 of the act remains in place and is indeed the basis for hiring decisions and promotion decisions within the Public Service.

What subsection 10(2) is designed to do is to deal with fairly specific circumstances. What we are dealing with here are situations where the circumstances effectively dictate the candidate for appointment.

Some examples would be: where no other candidate can possibly meet the requirements of the duties, such as the case with scientific researchers in a specialized field of research who are being promoted in recognition of their record of contribution in the field; or where an appointment is based on the achievements of an individual, as is the case of persons who are in training, development and apprenticeship programs who have successfully completed their training requirements and are ready for promotion, the example I referred to in my general remarks; or where candidates would otherwise be competing for their own positions, as in the case where an employee's position has been reclassified.

In addition, we would foresee using this authority to deal sensitively and compassionately with situations where an employee has been required by circumstances to accept a lower level job and has found an opportunity to be reinstated at the higher level. This may be the case where an employee has had to relocate in order to obtain medical treatment for a family member or to assist an aging parent. In these circumstances we would wish to provide for a manager to appoint the employee when a position at the former level for which the employee is qualified becomes available.

• (1650)

The provisions of subsection 10(2) will give the PSC the flexibility to deal with these circumstances and to adapt to new circumstances as the nature of Public Service employment changes in response to the changing needs of the Canadian people.

Mr. Gauthier: I go on to another point that the hon. member raised in his speech and that is employment equity.

Adding a clause on employment equity programs that are indeed initiated at the whim of Treasury Board and may be, I underline the words may be, implemented by the commission seems to me more of a public relations exercise than anything else, rather than a genuine effort to achieve fair representation for employment equity among the target groups.

An hon. member: It's a diversion tactic.

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, it is a diversion tactic. I ask the member in all honesty: Where does he see the great opening here, the opening of the heart to people to allow for a real good and effective employment equity program? I do not see it in that bill. He has tended to take it as a very forward movement. I would like him to give me more details on that.

Mr. McCreath: I would be pleased to respond to my hon. friend. He refers to it as programs that exist at a whim. I see it rather as a further commitment of the government, a commitment based on the eight years during which these programs have in fact been in place.

I would suggest to him, for example with respect to the access program that it provides on-the-job training for persons with disabilities who require additional work experience to compete equitably for positions in the Public Service. Since 1983, there have been 1,228 participants. Is it a whim to those 1,228 people who have participated in this program, 1,056 of whom completed the program and over 70 per cent of whom are today members of the Public Service?

The visibility minority employment program provides incentives to departments to recruit members of visible minority groups from outside the Public Service. There have been 426 Canadians who have participated in this program since it was established by this government in 1986. Three hundred have completed the program and 285 of them have been appointed to positions in the Public Service, 86 per cent of these at the officer level.

The northern careers program is another example of a substantive program which is responsible for increasing the representation of aboriginal peoples in the federal government in the Yukon and Northwest Territories through on-the-job and formal training. Since it was established in 1983, 372 persons have taken part in this program.

These are just examples. If my hon. friend would like, I could give him more.

I think the point has been made that there is a commitment by the Government of Canada and I might say not just the current Government of Canada, but indeed the previous Government of Canada.

I believe all Canadians have an expectation that the Government of Canada will lead and will meet its commitments in this regard.

I would hope all members of Parliament would applaud and be encouraged by this further step, perhaps a small step, but this further step with the inclusion of section 5(1) into Bill C-26; yet another reason in my judgment why this bill should be expeditiously passed by this House.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have an opportunity to speak on this bill. We are speaking about probably one of the greatest treasures this country has, namely its public servants, men and women who look after every aspect of serving the people of this nation from coast to coast.

So often I think we take this Public Service for granted. We do not realize that if we are in an urban area we may think of the Public Service as being the employment office or we might think of it as the department of health, or maybe the secretary of state or maybe the passport office. We do not realize that this Public Service is an institution of 250,000 men and women. Many thousands are employed in the Department of National Defence. We are covering every service here. Agriculture Canada has inspection agencies all across the country that make sure the quality of food and the agricultural processes and operations are looked after. We are talking about our first line service to the public in terms of the unemployment offices and customs and excise people. When tourists and business people come to this country, the first people they meet, quite often, are the customs officers at our 30 or 40 airports across the nation. We are talking about the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We are talking about the embassies all over the world.

We are talking about a bill today that touches the lives of people who have committed themselves more to a vocation than to a job. We are talking about people who are concerned about their incomes but there is a certain pride in working for the Government of Canada.

I do not think anybody would refute the fact that it would be a great thrill to work for an IBM or a General Motors or a McDonald's or Magna or whatever, but I bet you nine out of ten Canadians, if they had an opportunity to work for the Government of Canada serving the people and the nation, would take that opportunity.

Quite frankly, what I see here from the government side is this lean, mean machine approach to the human side of this government. It seems to me that it has brought many of the principles of business to running the Public Service when in fact those principles do not apply here.

I come from a business background myself. I have worked in small businesses, medium sized businesses and larger businesses. In business there tends to be: "What will our earnings be per share per quarter?" That tends to be our focus. We are concerned about our employee relations but the bottom line of the Public Service is a totally different operation than business. It is the business of serving people. You cannot analyse it in the same way.

I listened to the previous speaker from South Shore. He talked about streamlining as you would talk about constructing machinery on an assembly line in a factory. I really think he is missing a very important point here.

The spirit of the Public Service of Canada is one of the most important things that we must address and, quite frankly, because of the actions of this government over the last few years, the Public Service has become shell-shocked.

My riding does not have very many public servants. Whether I win or lose in the next election has nothing to do with the Public Service of Canada. I might have four or five public servants in my riding. I do know that my constituents care about the quality of service that the public servants in and around my riding give to them right now because of the way this government has shell-shocked the Public Service. This government, in the last few years, has dismantled agency after agency. It has cut man-years out of department after department. In this sort of possessed focus on reducing the deficit and the debt, the government has actually created an inverse problem. I will be very specific. In the city of Toronto they have cut the man-years of the department of immigration to a point where not only have we affected the image and the reputation of that Public Service, which has been one of the most respected Public Services in the world for many years, because of its lack of ability to really deliver the kind of services that should be given to the public, but they have also caused a further cost to the treasury.

• (1700)

Again I said I would be very specific. In Toronto right now we have a backlog of refugees. I believe it is close to 50,000. I might be off by 2,000 or 3,000 but that is not the point. It is such a backlog because of the lack of support in the Public Service. In the last two years it has cost the taxpayers of Canada, just in the city of Toronto alone, close to $3 billion to look after the refugee backlog.

In the name of efficiency and streamlining and cutting the Public Service we have actually added another $3 billion to the deficit and ultimately, the national debt of this country not to mention the wear and the tear on the morale of the public servants.

I could go on and on. I visited many embassies in the last couple of years and have talked to public servants. In some places we have so constricted the actions of public servants that they are even short of photocopiers. In a place like Hong Kong, where there are many entrepreneurial people who want to come to Canada, to invest their money here, invest in factories which will help keep Canadians employed, but because we have constricted the Public Service so much, we cannot even get some of the jobs done we are trying to do.

Therefore, when the Public Service feels this shell-shock after shell-shock, this dismantling of the national government which has been going on for the last six years, a couple of things happen. Aside from the absolute natural breakdown of morale and spirit, we also develop a lack of trust. There is nothing more difficult to repair than a lack of trust.

Even if the national government was to present a proposal of change to the Public Service of Canada, it comes with tremendous suspicion. That is one of the reasons why we on this side of the House are supporting the amendment of my colleague for Ottawa West that Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

We have a crisis of confidence in this country in every sector, in every region. There is no greater opportunity in the approach and in the challenge of rebuilding the national unity of this country than with a motivated, inspired, committed public service in every department of this government.

Let us just refer to the province of Quebec. Right now we are going through tremendous difficulty in terms of confidence and in terms of the relationship Quebec has with the rest of Canada. We have close to 125,000 public servants on the payroll of the Government of Canada to serve the people in the province of Quebec. What kind of a message are they motivated to send out, day in and day out, when they touch literally millions of Quebecers, when they see the nation's boardroom treating them in such a way that their morale is low, when they feel they are not being treated fairly?

I feel this is an asset that the minister responsible for national unity could not lean on because the morale is so low. If I were the minister responsible for national unity, I would certainly like to be able to count on the 125,000 men and women in the province of Quebec to go out and explain to their communities and all over the province the goods, services and programs that the Government of Canada is providing to the citizens of Quebec.

If that force is being crushed, is not being respected and is not being treated fairly well, it is no different than any other business or environment. It is not that we will not get work, but the quality of that work will not be as good as a force that is motivated.

I really feel strongly about this bill, not just in terms of the general service to the public but also in terms of the federal presence. Quite often, in disadvantaged and remote regions of this country, it is the public servant who really represents the hope, the anchor and the feeling of security of so many Canadians.

Two weeks ago I was in the Middle East on a mission to sell Canadian food. As a member of Parliament, I was so proud to come into the Canadian embassy in Amman, Jordan to see the flag flying and meet the public servants. There was a young student who was travelling. We were chatting about it and he felt the same way. The response of the public servants was fantastic. That security for the government and the people of Canada is in the ambassadorship of all of our public servants, that feeling we get when we travel abroad and see an embassy. We should try to create that same feeling with our constituents and with the people of Canada when they come into contact with public servants all across our country.

When I first came to this city in 1978, the first person I met was a public servant, Craig Carpenter. It was his pride and his commitment to his vocation which inspired me to continue my work in this city. Quite frankly, when you multiply a force like a Craig Carpenter who was happy to speak for Canada, who was proud of working for the Government of Canada, when you multiply by 500,000 men and women across this country and in all areas of the world, I just do not think that we fully appreciate the positive force that can have on the morale of this country, whether it is the economy or the image of this country, whether it is to attract investment or to attract the minds and brains of professional people to come to this country because it is a great place to be.

I know the deficit is important. The debt of this country is important. We must be responsible and do what we can to address it. But there is nothing more important than the spirit of the 500,000 men and women who work for this place. They can eliminate waste on their own if they are inspired. They can create efficiency if they are inspired. They can create an attitude of confidence within the people of Canada if they are motivated. The government is so possessed by the deficit that it has this lean, mean machine approach.

• (1710)

When you are serving the public, it is not an earning per share or per quarter approach, and I know that all members of Parliament know that. We go home on weekends and we listen to our constituents. Quite often, even though very few people have respect for members of Parliament today, we know that we work hours and hours that people never see.

I want to say that most of the 500,000 public servants are the same way. They are counting on us to make sure that we treat them the way we would like to be treated.

Quite frankly I think that they are too easily used as a scapegoat, as a battering ram.

I know that there are public servants who like to use the MAD treatment, maximum administrative delay, people who would prefer to push paper and slow down the system rather than have the joy of moving it quickly. We all have examples.

I have cited a couple of examples in this House in which bureaucrats have used the system for whatever reasons they have wanted. Quite frankly there have been times when I judged them not to be the best motivated. Because of the few who have not committed themselves to this life as a vocation, we should not judge the majority.

Seventy or eighty per cent of the public servants of the Government of Canada put out. They work hard and I know members on that side of the House know it. We should not get brainwashed by the complaints that we get from the people or the clientele we have about the few who can sometimes drive us absolutely crazy.

I think that sometimes happens. We all get complaints about public servants who lost a veteran's cheque, messed up a postal service, or there was a contract in a particular department that should have been processed three months ago or a cheque to farmers that should have gone out. We all know that, but we should not condemn the whole system because of those bureaucrats who are possessed by the MAD treatment.

I say to public servants, if any are listening to this debate, that there is one thing as a member of Parliament I have learned in the last three years. There is one thing that frustrates me about the Public Service of Canada. Even though I am defending it here today, I will also debate with the Public Service. If there is one thing that the system can improve on, it is the movement and the processing of paper.

Quite often they are possessed by the MAD treatment, and not possessed by pushing paper through that they could have done today. Quite often they push it off to next week.

To the government, let us cut back on the lean, mean, machine approach and let us see if there is some way we can mobilize the federal presence and the will of the 500,000 people of this country to work for us rather than against us.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood that I greatly appreciated his statement in support of federal public servants. It comes from a former businessman who is very knowledgeable about the business world, so I appreciate it tremendously and I thank him.

I would like to ask a question about his statement dealing with morale. I know that he commented on his experience in the private sector and how essential it is to have dedicated people who want to work together. Since 1985, as he knows, federal public servants have been sacrificed on the altar of the budget deficit. The 1985 Wilson budget reduced the number of jobs in the Public Service by 15,000. The Public Service faces budget constraints that you are all aware of, as well as a capping of salary increases. Last year's strike, which literally pitted civil servants against each other, was, in my opinion, unnecessary. In other words, civil servants must now live with a budget freeze that deprives them of funds for training, for the replacement of equipment which is often obsolete, and I agree with them on that, when the workload is increasing, since hiring is frozen. This does not make much sense. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance even dared to brag last year that the size of the Public Service of Canada was the same as in 1973. Mr. Speaker, this is nothing to be proud of, when we know that the population of the country has increased by 20 per cent. It seems to me that the more Canadians there are, the more we should be able to provide adequate services for them. That is a fairly obvious statement.

Mr. Speaker, add to those restrictions the problems caused by the government's bad policies and you will see why morale in the Public Service is zero or below zero. Right now, the morale of public servants is the lowest I have ever seen, and it is a very bad time to undertake a complete reform of the Public Service. This does not seem to me to be a very wise move.

The hon. member mentioned certain contracting-out programs that will, we hear, be increased in the weeks and months to come. This means that we will transfer to managers additional responsibilities to dismiss, suspend and, occasionally, hire people. My question has to do with the accountability mechanisms that are in place. I know that the hon. member worked in the private sector and I ask him: Without a known accountability mechanism, how can we improve the morale of civil servants and ensure that people know who manages what and how? What kind of fairness and justice can we expect in the public system from systems used in the private sector? What can the hon. member tell civil servants about this accountability?

[English]

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier for the question.

First of all on the question of contracting out, there is absolutely no question about the fact that some contracting out is good. The way this government has handled contracting out is sort of a preoccupation. An analysis was done about six months ago and a lot of the contracting out that the government has done has ended up costing the taxpayer almost twice as much as if the government had kept it inside. This is what is going on. In the name of contracting out and in the name of creating efficiency, the exact opposite is happening. That is just fact, and the Department of Supply and Services will verify that.

I do not know who the winners are in this contracting out. It is a terrible thing if you are a public servant and you talk about merit in this bill. If you talk about merit and with the way this government is contracting out, it is contradictory. It is absolutely contradictory. I could be sitting in my department, working along, thinking that I have been doing a good job, and I could be seeing an opportunity to advance in the next six months or eight years. I am working hard and trying to achieve, and then all of a sudden the deputy comes along and contracts out the job that I was working on. What really burns you is when you find out about a year later when the bills come in that the cost of contracting out costs the taxpayer twice as much. That does happen.

• (1720)

I am sure there are some examples in which it is almost the same dollar cost, but you cannot forget the cost of the tear on morale. When you multiply that principle of contracting out in every office, in every system from coast to coast to coast, I think there is a very bad mistake being made here.

I think in the name of efficiency there are a lot of things going on that are not actually turning out the way they are being stated.

[Translation]

Mr. André Harvey (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I heard our colleagues in the Official Opposition especially the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier talk about morale in the Public Service. At times his speech was so exaggerated and far-fetched that we had the impression our Public Service was as demoralized as the Soviet public service. I do not think that is the case, however.

If anyone has a morale problem, it should probably be the Liberals, not Public Service employees, would not you agree? A government is a little like a family. When management is strict and the budget is sensibly administered all members of the family are probably happier.

Of course, the Official Opposition would prefer the government to administer the status quo. Mr. Speaker, this is not a status quo government, and we have proved as much in many areas. If we had administered the status quo as the Liberals wanted us to do, the budget would now be $300 billion instead of $155 billion. The deficit would be over $100 billion, instead of having shrunk to $30 billion. I think that is something we should not forget.

In any case, I welcome the opportunity today to say a few words about Bill C-26, which is part of the reform process initiated by Public Service 2000. I think this reform bill will, over a period of several years, have an impact on all internal management rules and thus make the Public Service more flexible, more effective and more service oriented.

The Public Service Reform Act, a vital component of Public Service 2000, will restructure a number of outdated regulations concerning collective bargaining, staffing, human resources management and elimination of surplus goods. There are also some important points in this legislation, including the delegation of authority. The government wants to give more responsibility to people at the base, to all regional managers, who represent a very high percentage of all public servants,

Mr. Speaker. As a result of this decentralization, the number of Treasury Board submissions will be reduced by 40 per cent. I think that is quite substantial.

By giving more responsibilities to our regional managers, I think that across the country there will be more opportunities to take advantage of federal involvement. The reduction in the number of management levels is another important aspect. Ten per cent of management category positions will be eliminated. There is also the issue of transfers which will help all public servants acquire more experience in a variety of sectors. We must not forget that once people have had an opportunity to acquire more experience at the same level, they will be in a better position to obtain advancement within the Public Service.

Of course, a reduction in the number of professional groups, which now total 71, will be a significant improvement.

There is also the whole aspect of surplus Crown property. It is so complicated that every department has trouble disposing of its own surplus property. I think that legislation to rationalize this area will enable those officials, deputy ministers and ministers to feel more responsible.

Regionalization is extremely important. Our government has put more emphasis on regional development because we put even more trust in our officials who work in the regions. Most departments, especially Supply and Services Canada, CIDA and the Department of Industry, Science and Technology, are definitely moving towards regionalization. So I think that it is an important step toward the future and towards better service for all our fellow citizens.

For all these reasons, everything our government has done in the past seven years, whether in the economic, social or some other field, has helped us to be the country rated most highly by international organizations. I am thinking of the OECD and the International Monetary Fund, among others. It is not so well known, but I think that our fellow Canadians will gradually realize that what the government has done in each department, especially in terms of the budget, has given us a top national and international rating.

If you allow me, Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with employment equity at greater length today. For seven years, our government—this year, for example, we will invest $1.8 billion in worker training programs, while respecting the employment equity principle. I think it is good that what our government is doing for all Canadians it is also doing for our Public Service as a whole.

The bill expressly gives the Public Service Commission and Treasury Board authority to carry out programs to improve employment and career opportunities for disadvantaged persons. That is a very good thing, Mr. Speaker, because I think that the Public Service will then better reflect the make-up of Canadian society. In protecting the merit principle as Parliament has instructed it to do, the Public Service Commission will ensure that recruitment outside the Public Service and promotions within it help deputy ministers achieve employment equity in their respective departments.

Treasury Board and the Public Service Commission work closely together to establish special programs to make it easier for members of target groups who do not have equal opportunity to apply for satisfying positions in the Public Service to find employment and be promoted. I am talking about positions that women did not usually occupy before but in which they want to have a real chance to show that they are up to the challenge.

The Public Service Reform Act will enable the Public Service Commission and the departments to ensure that members of the target groups for employment equity can participate in competitions if they meet the established criteria. In its white paper on reform, Public Service 2000 believes that it is necessary to reduce the number of occupational groups in order to simplify the staffing process and to provide better career opportunities.

The new position classification system that has been developed will eliminate all systemic obstacles that prevent members of target groups for employment equity from obtaining a position or a transfer in the Public Service. We will thus have a neutral classification system that takes no account of race, national or ethnic origin, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

Members will no doubt want to know how the new classification system will favour employment equity. According to my information, it will make it possible to eliminate education criteria that are applied systematically and to adapt them to position requirements as established by the Public Service Commission. I understand that this change will mainly affect native people and recent immigrants who are a visible minority and did not attend high school in Canada. It will bring support staff and officers together in one and the same group, general services. This will make it easier for support staff to move up. This group is now called the administrative support category, and women represent 80 per cent of its members.

• (1730)

The elimination of such structural barriers will greatly contribute to do away with the "pink collar" ghetto of women civil servants. Bill C-26 gives legal basis to a deployment system with which managers are to meet more readily the career needs of every employee, in particular those in the employment equity target group.

It will be possible to make deployments between same level positions to allow employees to gain experience and be better qualified for another position or for promotion to the next level. I believe that doing the same job for 35 or 40 years is not the best way to get promoted and to respond successfully to job offers. That is what this part of the bill does.

Deployments will also enable managers to assign civil servants in such a way as to meet the operational needs of government. It must be emphasized that most deployments will require the consent of the employee. This would allow managers to transfer employees who are no longer able to perform jobs they are better suited for.

Certainly, members of this House will agree with me that all these changes are necessary so that the Public Service of Canada can reflect the diversity of the people it serves. I am also convinced that they will agree that the public service legislation should reflect the very best values currently recognized as such in our society. This does not mean everyone should be treated in the same way, but that equal opportunities be offered to everyone by accommodating differences.

This bill shows how much this government is in favour of change. Status quo does not allow us to meet the many national and international challenges facing us, and I am proud of my involvement in this bill.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview–Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to just make a couple of points to the member.

First of all, the member should not think that in any way, shape or form the spirit of the Liberal Party is low over bad. We are in pretty good shape over here right now.

I listened intently to the member speak. A lot of the things he said I agreed with. When he talked about employment equity, opportunities for minorities and new systems, I did not have any problem with what he said, but how does that square with the actions of the government with all of this contracting out? What good is it if I am a minority? What good is it if you say you are concerned about employment equity and I am working in a particular division within a department of government and then all of a sudden the deputy comes along and says: "Listen, I am going to contract this whole department out"? The government's words are inconsistent with its track record and its actions and that is what is driving the Public Service of Canada crazy. That is why there is no trust or very little trust. You say you talk to people and you do not get the sense that the morale is low. You could not have missed the demonstrations that we had across the country a few months ago.

My specific question, Mr. Speaker, for the member is does he not think that contracting out to the degree the government has—and again I am not against all contracting out, but it seems that this government is possessed by contracting out—is a deliberate dismantling of the Public Service of Canada? It is consistent with the dismantling of many other national institutions that we have had in Canada, all in the name of debt and deficit. Quite frankly, some of this dismantling has cost us more money than it has saved us. Again, does he not think it is a bit contradictory?

[Translation]

Mr. Harvey (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. There are reasons that our government has been able to maintain employment in the Public Service at the same level as in 1973, and we do not hide what we are doing. It is obvious that our government believes that the private sector can sometimes provide services more rapidly, as well as more efficiently, in certain sectors.

Our privatization exercise has been successful, as he well knows, from a strictly economic point of view. He is also aware that our civil servants enjoy employment security and he is trying to tell us that the morale in the whole federal Public Service is at its lowest level. I will tell him that is not so.

The private sector throughout the world is going through an extremely difficult period. By comparison, I believe that to be a member of a Public Service such as ours is a rather extraordinary privilege. It is an extraordinary privilege and the mere fact that we have job security and substantial fringe benefits must, I believe, make us appreciate what we have as members of the government as well as members of the federal Public Service.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned that a member of the government party would have this view of the morale of the Public Service and the rights of tenure that they have because this point of view gets promulgated out into the public at large in the country. It is false on two points.

On the issue of morale, the government's own documents on the task force report on service to the public identify low morale in the Public Service as a problem. It is clear by the surveys, particularly at management level, morale of Public Service workers is lower than equivalent people in the private sector. Morale is a problem. He did not even need to go out on the lawn of Parliament Hill last fall to meet the thousands and thousands of demonstrators. All he had to do was read the government's own documents.

The notion that Public Service workers somehow have a contract for life is long gone. I can introduce him to constituents. One comes to mind very recently, over 50 years old, over 20 years in the Public Service, laid off. Where is he supposed to find a job at this stage? The member who just spoke has just told Canadians across the country that kind of thing does not happen in the federal Public Service in Canada. I can tell him that it is happening in this city every day of the week.

[Translation]

Mr. Harvey (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague is trying in vain to impress me because the reputation of all the public services throughout the country and in particular the federal Public Service is well established. If our fellow citizens have a negative opinion of the Public Service, it is because the former Liberal government imposed on it absolutely ridiculous decisions that almost bankrupted us.

Do not forget that in 1984 the deficit was $40 billion—$23 billion interest on the debt and a $17-billion program-spending deficit which, after seven years, we have transformed into a $12-billion surplus that we just applied to interest payments this year. We reduced the deficit by 25 per cent and we expect to have a balanced budget in four or five years.

The whole federal Public Service will be proud of such a record in four or five years. Do not forget that the reputation of civil servants is due to the bad administration of the former Liberal government. To the extent that we reach our objectives, those people will be proud to work with the federal government.

[English]

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I am going to try to make a very simple point here to the hon. member. If you were at the Ottawa airport on a Friday afternoon, or any day for that matter, and there was only one security check because the government had said: "We are only going to allow one security check at the airport", all of a sudden the line-ups would become so large that you would end up missing your plane. The whole system would shut down. Do you think that is efficient? Do you not think that would cost the taxpayer money?

The same thing is happening in the Department of Immigration. Because of the cuts to the number of public servants in the Department of Immigration, we have a backlog of 55,000 refugees in the city of Toronto.

• (1740)

In the last two years in housing, social service payments and dental bills it has cost the Canadian taxpayer $3 billion, not to mention the morale of those poor people who are working 15 hours a day sometimes six days a week. What is a better system, hiring a few more public servants and processing them or tacking another $3 billion to the deficit?

Frankly I think this government is doing a lousy job of handling the deficit. We should actually do a study on all that as it has ended up costing the taxpayer more because of the cutting and the constriction.

[Translation]

Mr. Harvey (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals always react like spoiled children; they do not appreciate what they have and they think that the government can afford anything. A government cannot spend money it does not have. Don't forget that they increased spending by 15 per cent per year in the last 10 years of their mandate, and that the budget would be $300 billion this year, instead of $155 billion, if we had had the same increases. What he is saying is ridiculous. Restrictions exist in the private sector and must also exist in the public sector. That is why our government's performance for the last seven years is recognized by all international organizations.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to talk to Bill C–26. I wish first to make a few comments on the speech of the previous speaker, the hon. member for Chicoutimi.

We must all bear some responsibility for the problems around us. Very often, I resent the grandiose statements made in this place, especially when they come from Conservatives members opposite, who tend to forget that they have been in power for seven years now. I think it is high time that they stop hiding behind what was done by the Liberals up to 1984. It is clear that there are things we could have done better, but it is also clear that since 1984, there is a number of things that they could have done with a little more compassion, a little more caring for the Canadian people.

[English]

I always want to respond when I sit in this House and I hear things. The last speaker spoke in terms of this not being a government of the status quo. Believe me, truer words were never spoken.

I can recall hearing the Prime Minister, shortly after he was elected, saying: "Just stick around and within 20 years you will not recognize this country". He was right. It did not take that long. It has only been seven years and we are having a heck of a time recognizing it.

Someone else made a reference that public servants do not feel as bad about their jobs as the public servants in Russia feel about their jobs. My goodness, where are they? Who have they been talking to? What is this kind of nonsense we are hearing, this constant, constant nonsense?

Please open your ears. Talk to people out there.

Today I talked to a public servant and I asked him how he felt about this Public Service 2000. He was just an ordinary guy, just one of the little guys who works in one of the departments. He is not a manager, not a deputy minister, nothing like that. He is just an ordinary little guy working in one little department somewhere.

He said: "What frightens us the most is this feeling that there are going to be no consequences. Who is going to bear the consequences? The way they are talking about it, the manager will have all the power. What happens to us little guys? Who thinks about us?" They are also asking: "Are we going to bear the consequences if the manager of the department is not doing his job properly? Is it going to be the little guy who is going to lose his job? Is the manager going to get a bonus for getting rid of the little guy?"

This is what they are saying. They are worried about it, how this all works.

I cannot help but support what the people on my side of the House want to do, which is delay and prevent this bill from moving forward at this time. The morale within the civil service is terrible. It is absolutely terrible. The way of helping build morale is not by imposing things on them. No one ever got anywhere by dictatorial methods. We need a little bit more consideration, a little bit more co–operation.

In January I visited a business here in Canada that had come up with some very innovative ways of dealing with its unionized personnel. This business looked at the bottom line and realized that the confrontational approach was no longer working. It was spending thousands of dollars on cases of arbitration, grievances, and people were very unhappy. It was having problems with environmental things. When people are not happy, they do not work properly and they are not always as careful as they should be.

It really surprised me the kind of thing that the business came up with. In effect, it was a system of team work in which really there are no longer any managers. Managers are facilitators. The team itself takes responsibility for the output.

I would very much like to see us take that kind of approach perhaps with the Public Service. I know it is difficult because there is no bottom line. We cannot look at profits and say: "This department is not profitable". Let us look at what we are supposed to be doing. Let us have goals. Let us have goals in terms of how much service we can deliver for a certain amount of money and get everyone together, including that little guy at the bottom of the heap so that he can make those kinds of decisions.

You would be surprised sometimes when you speak to them about the ideas they have and the things they see and the things they could change if they were given the opportunity. The same company I visited implemented this kind of a system approximately two or three years ago. Today it has very few grievances and is really working well.

I spoke with some of the employees. Even the employees who at first were very apprehensive feel a lot better about their job. They feel as if they are actually contributing to what is happening. They have been empowered. Everyone hears the word empowerment, but that is the only way that we will get the Public Service to react, to do what it has to do, to do it well, and to enjoy doing it.

We cannot impose things. It is just impossible to get things done that way. One of the goals of the Public Service is to provide services for Canadians. That should be considered in light of the fiscal restraints. I am certainly very conscious of the fact that we have to be very careful with dollars.

I will give an example of some of the new technologies, the new in things. I do not know if some of you have had the opportunities that I have had. When I work in my constituency office I often do all of my own calling. I decide I am going to call this government department or this other government department. The new in thing now is this voice box recording answering machine. It is a voice box answering machine. I do not know how many of you do your own calling but I do.

I will tell you what happens. You call a government department. It may be good for the people there. I do not know how they feel about it, but I can tell you as a Canadian trying to get service that you can press buttons ad nauseam. You get this beautiful modulated voice on the computer which answers and says: If you wish to speak to so-and-so or you want this kind of information, please press zero. After you have listened to maybe two minutes of this voice box machine, you press zero. You wait and then you get another beautiful voice and another beautiful message: If you wish to speak to Mrs. So-and-So concerning this and this, press this number, but if it is for so-and-so then press this other number on your telephone. Again you press a number on your telephone. That is said in both official languages so it goes on and on and on. You press another number and the same thing happens. It is the most frustrating thing for a Canadian to have to call a government department these days. I am not at all sure it is a good thing to have in place. On the other hand it may save all kinds of money.

However, in one of the government departments the staff was not told that these machines were coming in. It was not even taught how to use them and the machines were in place. Since then, in that particular department the staff has learned how to use the machines. This is the kind of thing that I am talking about. Was this something that the staff was aware of? Did it ask for it? Did someone explain in advance how it would be used and how it would be more effective? In that particular department, no. I did speak to some of the employees later on and they did tell me that they were sorry, but they did not know how to work that machine yet so they could not access the messages in the voice box.

I know government is a big machine and I know there are a lot of layers, but can we not simplify things and just sit down and talk to each other? I think that is really what is necessary.

We talk about the revitalization of the public sector and we talk about contracting out. Contracting out can be a good idea. It can save money, and there are times when it actually does. I know this for a fact, but there are also times when it is a good way of giving your friend a job. You do not have to worry too much about explaining it. You can then turn around and say: "Look at that, my employee numbers are way down". A contract is not an employee. It is just an amount of money and you can hide all kinds of things in there that may or may not be good for us or for the economy. I think some of the previous speakers have said it. They hear that there are massive amounts of dollars that are spent that way and not necessarily in the most economical fashion.

We have to relook at everything. We especially have to talk to people. We have to talk to the people concerned. We cannot just impose these things. You say a manager will have more autonomy. He will have more ways of managing his department, but what is to say that this manager will be the perfect manager and will treat people equitably? What is to say that he will not start rewarding some of his friends and not necessarily the good work? What is to say that equity will always be achieved?

I can recall working and being on city council. I remember how the upper echelons of management worked. I will explain this because it is something that men in general do not realize. I sat down one day and they were talking about staff. We were doing some interviewing for a top level position and in the middle of the interviews we went out for lunch. When we went out for lunch, they talked about how they were going to groom so-and-so, a male, to move into this position, and they went on. I let them go on for about 20 minutes. Not once in that whole time did anyone talk about any of the female employees, about grooming them for jobs. When I mentioned it to them, they said: "Oh, well, do you think maybe they would want to be groomed to be moved up to the echelons?" I said: "Of course they would". It is so much easier to deal with your men friends and to consider them, and so I worry.

Some of the better trained, the more forward thinking people, are going to do a great job and they will consider all these things, but many will not. You can legislate equity all you want, but when all the power is in the hands of a person, a manager, there will be abuses of power. How can we guarantee that these abuses of power will not happen? How can we reassure the people who are employed within the public sector unions and the public sector that they will be protected in some way?

How can we reassure them? Certainly not by imposing a piece of legislation they have not been consulted on. Why do you not withdraw this piece of legislation? Why do you not try to build some consensus among those people? Make them feel better. Make them feel as if you care, as if you know what you are talking about in terms of what is going on in their daily lives. Until you do that, your program will not succeed. It just will not succeed. I would hope that you would seriously consider doing some of these consultations with the employees, with the unions, and not just with the higher people there. Do them with the ordinary every day guy.

It is so difficult to explain unless you speak to those people. As I said, I spoke to one just today. There are so many parts of this whole thing that frighten me.

We Liberals are committed to fair treatment of Public Service employees and of everyone. It is not that we do not want to see a better control of spending. Obviously we absolutely have to watch the way our money goes. But we all have to work at it together. We need co-operation.

One of the previous speakers talked about being in a household and someone sets the budget. Things work along a lot better, lickety-split, if somebody sets a budget. Yes, but does that person set a budget all by himself or all by herself? Does it not work better if he sits down with the others involved and says this is how much money we have, or this is how much money we do not have, and what can we do within the confines of this money?

Do you not think it works far better when you do that? Then everyone concerned is consulted. They are very much aware of the limitations that are within that budget, so everyone works together. Tomorrow, if one of the people in the family wants something and realizes they cannot have it, they are not unhappy. They think: well, this is my share; I know how much money there is, and it is just not there.

Let us try a new consensus building approach, rather than my way or the highway, which has been the case of what has happened with the government over the last little while.

I want to end, because I see the clock is moving on. I want to say that we are not going to support Bill C-26 as Liberals at second reading, and that we urge the government to establish a special committee of Parliament to consider the principle of the bill as well as its substance in the total context of the Public Service 2000, as recommended by the public accounts committee.

We urge our members to support some of the clauses of the bill that would contribute to strengthening the Public Service and its ability to serve the public and improve labour relations. We oppose this bill, as it undermines the merit principle without adequate safeguards, destabilizes the Public Service, discourages the hiring and retention of highly qualified individuals, and reduces accountability.

We would like to see this bill, if it does move forward, substantially amended.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member a question. First of all I would like to congratulate her for the excellent speech she gave us this afternoon.

She was saying earlier today that when we phone some government departments, we get an answering machine rather than an employee. I would like to tell her that it is worse than that. If you call the immigration office here in Ottawa, nobody answers the phone. You can let it ring for half an hour. People there will tell you that they do not answer the phone because they just do not have time. This is the level of service you get from the immigration office here in Ottawa. This is intolerable, but it is thanks to the people opposite.

Here is my question. It has to do with advancement within the Public Service. If I understand the bill correctly, Mr. Speaker, from now on, should it unfortunately come to pass, all the government needs to do—

SPECIAL DEBATE

• (1830)

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to order adopted on Wednesday, February 5, 1992, the House will continue its proceedings for the sole purpose of allowing members to make presentations on the results of discussions they have had with their constituents on the constitutional issue.

For the purpose of the special debate, the question before the House shall be:

That this House do now adjourn.

[English]

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity the House has presented to all members of Parliament to discuss what I think is probably the most important issue that we will deal with in this term of Parliament. Obviously the future of our country is very important, not only to the 295 members of the House, but to all 26.5 million Canadians. I appreciate that the House has collectively decided that each member of Parliament should be allotted some time in this Chamber to present the views that he or she has been able to put together from constituents in their individual riding. It does show that in this House members of the opposition, the opposition House leader and the government House leader can come together to come up with a system or a process whereby we can all participate.

What I would like to do this evening in the time that is allotted as the lead-off speaker in this particular session is to present the views of the Ontario riding as they relate to the 28 constitutional proposals that the government has circulated.

At the end of my presentation I would like to table in the House this document that was put together by the constituents of Ontario riding. Earlier today this document was presented to the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. It was also presented to the joint committee dealing with the constitutional proposals. It was also shared with many Canadians today who travelled to Ottawa to meet with the minister and the parliamentary committee.

As well, I would like to table a questionnaire that was sent out on behalf of the committee to all 57,000 households in my riding. They invited all 57,000 households to present their views on the constitutional proposals that are presently under way.

Last August, at the outset of this process, I invited eight Canadians of several political persuasions who are residents of Ontario riding to come together and spearhead a very public process and to present their views on the Constitution.

These eight Canadians, augmented by five more who volunteered to join the committee, and I would say that all people who volunteered to be on the committee in fact were on it, these 13 people worked to put together the views of Ontario riding. How did they do that?

The first process they participated in, as the group of 13, was organizing five public meetings in the riding. One was strictly devoted to high school students and four others were devoted to the community at large.

It happens that Ontario riding has four unique areas, three towns, Whitby, Ajax and Pickering, and of course the community of Claremont. There were four public meetings, one in each town. I can tell you that in each of those towns there was extensive advertising inviting Canadians from Ontario riding to come together to present their views.

There were these public meetings that were held. The public meetings brought a real variety of interest. I would say certainly the first observation that the committee reports on, one that I certainly noticed myself, that regardless of the views that existed on any one of the 28 proposals, there was very clearly an interest by all of those who participated that we must find a solution to this constitutional impasse.

Not only must we find a solution to this impasse, but we must get on with the other issues that face this country. They recognize that some of those issues could not be addressed until such time as the constitutional process was completed. There was really a very unanimous feeling that the only way we could successfully draw any conclusions out of the constitutional process was to end up with a united Canada, a Canada that stretches from the Pacific Ocean to the Atlantic Ocean with no great gaping holes in the middle.

There were really very clear views on that, but I would say that that is probably where the views started to separate. We had a very interesting process at the students' forum that was held at Trafalgar Castle School in Whitby where there were some 90 or so students. They showed very clearly their strong desire, not only to keep Canada together, but to recognize some of those things in this country that are different.

A major topic of discussion was the issue of "distinct society". I can tell you that the students really had no problem with the concept as expressed, that Quebec does have a very different language in the majority than do other parts of Canada. It does have a very unique culture and a civil law tradition. The students of Trafalgar Castle School and the other schools that participated certainly support that concept.

Throughout the entire process, the other four public meetings, I can tell you there were many comments raised about the distinct society. One of the most common concerns—it is a recommendation of the Ontario riding committee—is that somehow the government has to be very clear and very precise in its meaning. Whatever verbiage it finally brings forward in the final constitutional proposal, it should be concerned about recognizing those things that are unique to Quebec in the Constitution.

It also wants to be sure that whatever that recognition is, it not be something that in fact reduces powers that other provinces or the federal government may want in their area of jurisdiction. They were certainly very clear on that. There were many points of discussion over that particular proposal.

One of the things we found most interesting was the discussion as it centres around some of the economic concerns that were raised in the constitutional process. It is very clear that the constituents of Ontario riding are most concerned about the economic future of this country. They certainly support the idea that we must have free and open borders within Canada for business to conduct its affairs, for the mobility of people, for the mobility of products and services throughout Canada. There was certainly a very strong feeling in support of that.

They wanted to make sure that however we arrived at that particular process, it enabled the Canadian economy to function. Certainly the point was very well raised by many who participated in the public forums that the process of free trade with the United States was there. Maybe we ought to have some free trade in Canada as well. I think that point is reflected in the report of the committee.

Another area, of course, that raised a lot of discussion was the whole issue of Senate reform. I would say that there were very few people who participated in the process who did not want Senate reform. Surprisingly though, there were some who said they believe in an appointed Senate, they do not want an elected Senate. I would suggest to you, and it is borne out by the report, that the majority of people were in favour of Senate reform. They clearly wanted an elected Senate, they clearly wanted an effective Senate.

• (1840)

I would say on this point that there is no unanimity among my constituents. Other parts of Canada may think that equal means exactly that, but in my part of Canada and certainly in Ontario riding this issue of equality is something that needs further explanation, if I can be polite in explaining it that way. For example, it is very clear that Ontario riding today has one MP, as do all the other 294 ridings, but Ontario riding has 170,000 people. The average riding in Canada is 80,000 people. If we are suggesting that we want equality in the Senate, then some of my constituents suggested that Ontario ought to have equality in the House of Commons. That either means another 15 or 20 seats for Ontario in the House of Commons or maybe 20 less seats for all the other provinces.

They are not opposed to equality but suggest that we should not lose sight of the inequality that exists in this Chamber at this particular time. Perhaps we could have a debate on that point.

The other interesting point was the questionnaire that was distributed. I have a copy of it which I will table as well. The results of the questionnaire were somewhat different from the information received from the people who participated in the public process. We mailed out 57,000 questionnaires. There were 28 questions and you had five options on each of the 28 proposals. I think you will find in this report that it summarizes very nicely the responses.

I would suggest to you in a very brief comment that of the 28 proposals, 27 were endorsed wholeheartedly. The 28th, which is the distinct society clause, did not go down to defeat wholeheartedly, in fact it was 41 per cent in favour and 51 per cent opposed, which I think is a fairly close comment. However, all the numbers are in the report and I look forward to the committee and to all members of Parliament reading what my constituents had to say on the proposal.

I thank the government and all members of this House for providing this opportunity for me to present, on behalf of Ontario riding, the views of my constituents on this subject.

Ms. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, Shaping Canada's Future Together, this is, in principle, the raison d'être of all these three rounds of consultations across the country. We held consultations after consultations, at the Canadian citizens' expense, citizens who have had it with all those words and papers, and who are desperately waiting for us to finally make a decision and go on to something else.

[English]

Even if many have doubts about the weight their input might have on where this country might go, groups from all segments of society have taken the time to bring forward their concerns and their hopes.

I would like to share with you some of the opinions held by my constituents, expressed to me at different meetings and convey their attitudes as measured by a small survey I conducted in my riding.

[Translation]

When asked what kind of government would best handle certain matters, most people gave answers which shed new light on what Canadians expect from their government.

Of all respondents to a survey conducted in my constituency, 59 per cent answered that education should be controlled by the provinces; 40 per cent answered that health care should be controlled by the provinces; 65 per cent answered that housing should be controlled by the provinces; 40 per cent answered that labour force training should be controlled by the provinces. However, 37 per cent of these respondents were in favour of sharing powers in the areas of labour force training and health care.

[English]

As for communications, it was very interesting to note that 61 per cent wish the federal government to keep control of this dossier. In other words, Canadians want the provincial governments to handle most provincial affairs, there being a possibility of sharing in certain areas. The federal government would keep control of communications to assure a Canadian vision of this country.

[Translation]

As for the content of the constitutional statement, it is interesting to note that 96 per cent of the respondents to our survey want a clause preserving our two official languages. Eighty-six per cent find that the diversity of our cultural heritage is important and 80 per cent want the role of aboriginal peoples to be recognized.

It is also essential to recognize the distinct character of the Quebec society for 67 per cent of them and that in a multi-ethnic constituency. Those sole percentages already show that the men and women of Saint-Laurent—Cartierville wish Canada to be a country that recognizes its history and lives for its future without rejecting its past.

[English]

While the people in my riding consider the constitution issue as a priority, they are telling me that the economy is even more paramount. Ninety-seven per cent of the respondents to my questionnaire said they believe that the free circulation of people, goods and capital is an important objective if we are to improve Canada's sagging economy.

Many Canadians believe that people with skills and products must be able to circulate without barriers in our own country if we seriously want Canada to be competitive in the global market.

The elimination of provincial buying policies for 62 per cent, the elimination of interprovincial restrictions on trade for 76 per cent, and the elimination of interprovincial restrictions on professions for 72 per cent of respondents are essential, in their opinion, to make Canada more effective.

It is only by free circulation of goods and services that we will be able to answer the working needs of so many and thus boost the economy to a healthier tomorrow for all.

[Translation]

In spite of all these data and all these consultations, it really seems like the country is rapidly disintegrating. Bankruptcies are common. So too are lay-offs and the Constitution is the topic, again and again. People are tired, if not fed up with the word Constitution. They are disgusted with words like unity, separation, amendments, proposals, and consultations. These are only words and they will not necessarily lead somewhere. They are fed up with paying, because their tax money pays for all these consultations which seem to carry on endlessly throughout the country. While the government is spending, sometimes through mismanagement, the country is economically disintegrating. More and more permanent jobs are being lost—in fact, they are becoming a rarity—and, for the most part, they are being lost for good.

The government keeps talking about labour force training programs. But what is the use of this nice training if there are no jobs to go to? If it is important to have a united Canada, it is essential to have an economically sound Canada.

The Liberal Party does not wait to be in office to offer concrete solutions to the economic problems of Canadians. As soon as January 1992, it proposed a one-year emergency economic plan which includes the following: a 5 per cent downpayment on a first home purchase.

On that point, I would like you to note that the Conservative government had the good idea—it happens sometimes—to put that proposal into effect as soon as the House opened, that is at the beginning of February.

Our second proposal deals with the possibility of using a RRSP to buy a first home. The third one is cost-shared programs to modernize the infrastructure. The fourth one is the enhancement of labour force training. The fifth one is an emergency federal aid to food banks.

[English]

People are ready to give Canada a chance. They are ready to support leaders that will make this country an economically healthy place again. They are ready to work and it is up to the Prime Minister to start answering their basic demands if we are to survive.

[Translation]

All Canadians must once again be proud of their country. If the existing government cannot meet this challenge, there is no doubt that the Liberal Party can. And it will be proud to prove it after the next election.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise tonight to take part in this most important debate.

I am very proud of the fact that this morning Brenda Wahlen and Michael Manley-Casimir, both of Coquitlam, British Columbia, made a presentation of a brief which reflects the work of our constitution committee in the riding of Port Moody—Coquitlam. They made the presentation to the Dobbie—Beaudoin committee on shaping Canada's future. I was very proud of them. They did a great job. It was a great example of Canadians getting involved in the decision-making process.

As I speak now, those two people are on a jet aircraft flying the 5,000 kilometres back to the riding. Do not feel sorry for them, however. It is minus 24 degrees outside here in Ottawa with the wind chill. They are going back to something like 10 or 15 degrees, where last weekend people were playing golf, playing tennis and cycling with their families. So they are very lucky.

My riding consists of five municipalities; Coquitlam, Port Coquitlam, Port Moody, Anmore and Belcarra, in the suburbs of Vancouver. They are the fastest growing areas of the country and the people who come from them, as these two people did today, reflect a confidence and a generosity that is really unique in a country that is somewhat dispirited. We are a spirited bunch and we have much to be thankful for in the beautiful natural setting that we have in Port Moody—Coquitlam.

I want to go over the brief because I think it is important and instructive. It dealt with some of the most difficult points that we have to deal with as a nation in the next few critical months. Quebec's distinctiveness is one. Can we recognize Quebec as a distinct society? Here is what the committee said. This committee consisted of a number of people who responded to an advertisement I put in the papers. I contacted people, asked people to come and they met a number of Sunday afternoons in November and December, got together with a larger group in January and put together this brief.

What do they say about Quebec's distinct society? They say that Quebec is historically, sociologically, politically and culturally distinct. So what is the problem? The government proposals define the distinct society in that Quebec has a French speaking language majority, a unique culture and a civil law tradition. They have had that since 1763 and before that. Therefore, the committee says they propose to recognize Quebec's distinctiveness and by doing that acknowledge what has always been the case. So let us not tear ourselves apart as a country over whether Quebec is distinct. Let us say it. Let us get on with other things.

The second thing is aboriginal self-government. Grand Chief Ovide Mercredi of the Assembly of First Nations gave a most passionate speech today before the Dobbie—Beaudoin committee. It was really moving. What does my committee say about this? They said the proposals put forward by the federal government which would say in 10 years you can go to court and try the notion of inherent aboriginal self-government are not satisfactory. Let us be generous, let us be open and let us bring native people also into a modern Canada. They said: "let us recognize inherent self-government now and then let us get a mechanism that we can to define it, to bring in what it really means for all the different native groups across the country".

The self-government should be within Canada. It should be subject to the charter of rights or to some other charter that would fit in the collective nature of what the native people want to do.

Dealing with questions of jurisdiction of money and of other mechanisms of native self-government, they suggest that could be worked out with the help of a royal commission on aboriginal people. They also pointed to New Zealand, where the Maori are represented in Parliament; they said perhaps this could be done in a reformed Canadian Senate. Finally they said let us zero in on where we could really aid native people, that is in post-secondary education, in culture, and in economic matters. I think that the brief makes sense.

On the Canada clause, the third item dealt with, the Canada clause defines various elements in Canada. My people, my committee wanted us to make the Canada clause a stirring preamble to the Constitution. They suggested there are areas of fundamental values Canadians share: human dignity, mutual responsibility—we have responsibilities to one another, they said—economic equity, fiscal fairness; the right of all persons, communities and institutions to fair fiscal treatment we fairly contribute to the well-being of all; social justice, and finally something that is very important in a young community like mine, environmental integrity. Let us put the environment in a modern constitution.

The committee also dealt with Senate reform. It was divided on it, quite frankly. X Some, like me, wanted to abolish the Senate outright. Others wanted the Triple-E Senate. When asked this morning, they said that to the committee. They came up with a compromise, which would be an elected Senate with reduced powers but on the German model, where the bigger provinces get more seats and the smaller provinces fewer, but the smaller or middle sized provinces like British Columbia have a little more than would be normal so that they could be better represented in the federal government. It seems like a good compromise.

They suggested that the House of Commons be reformed, but that should be done here in the House of Commons. It does not need to go in the Constitution. XXXXX

They dealt with the Supreme Court of Canada, and they had a particular British Columbia worry. The government proposes to freeze the Supreme Court as it is now: three Quebec judges, three judges from Ontario, and three judges from the rest of the country. They said: "Wait a minute, B.C. will soon be one of the most populous parts of the country; people are moving to B.C. We are growing like mad. Let us not enshrine this", they said, "because there may in the future need to be a judge in the Supreme Court specifically from British Columbia". This reflects the dynamic nature of the B.C. way of thinking.

On the Bank of Canada, they said do not constitutionalize a failed economic policy or one political idea of an economic policy. However, we could put in the Constitution the nature of an economic union. We should be able to move goods and services and people throughout the country. That makes sense.

An interesting aspect is on culture. My committee dealt with the CBC. They said: "Yes, you can have provincial control, more provincial powers in broadcasting and so on, but do not destroy a national institution like the CBC; be careful about that".

Under government programs and services, where the constitutional proposals are that the provinces get additional powers like in wildlife conservation, tourism and so on, they had a good point. One of the points they made was that when a boater pulls into a small harbour in British Columbia they see a sign that would say: "Canada". My people want to keep that. They want to keep the symbols and the signs and the powers over all of the Government of Canada.

On property rights, I will read what the group said: "The committee is thoroughly uncomfortable with the inclusion of property rights in the Constitution, because the proposal as it stands is vague and undefined". The idea was seen as pandering to big corporations, business and real estate interests, and again not in the general public interest of Canadians at large. There is a clear sense within the committee that a constitutional provision should apply only to a matter of central national public interest and not to particular interest or special interest. The committee opposes the inclusion of property rights in the Constitution.

Finally, although this is not in the government's proposals, the committee wants us to deal with the social charter. It thinks there are general social benefits that are available to Canadians as a whole and this should be in the Constitution.

Let me say again how proud I am of the submission. Let me table it for the House and for other members to see. Let me conclude by saying we want to see and we should see more people participating in the process. When you get the ordinary Canadian participating and sitting down to talk together you get real constitutional solutions.

This country could be lost. We are in a constitutional crisis, and we have to use all our talent. I am very proud of the moderate, visionary and doable proposals of the group from Port Moody—Coquitlam, and I am pleased to present them to the House.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Madam Speaker, tonight I take this opportunity to present to this House and the Canadian people the views of many of the constituents of Calgary Southwest regarding the constitutional proposals. My report is expressed in terms of a consensus that was generated after listening carefully to hundreds of people and reading the many briefs and letters I have received.

In March 1991 I sent out 1,200 questionnaires and received a 16 per cent return. The results were: 95 per cent favoured one unified Canada; 90 per cent favoured a strong federal government; 90 per cent favoured a government that is fiscally responsible to reduce spending, to balance the budget, and to remove inefficiencies and duplications; 80 per cent favoured Senate reform: a Triple-E first, if not, abolish the upper house; 75 per cent favoured all provinces treated equally, equal rights for all Canadians; and 70 per cent wanted aboriginal difficulties resolved, recognizing the realities that exist today, for you cannot bankrupt the country.

Following the tabling of the proposals Shaping Canada's Future Together in September 1991 I held five town hall meetings, well advertised to all Calgarians, participated in five school discussions, plus a CMHC co-operative housing meeting. I also received many briefs with well thought out excellent insight and had numerous meetings in my office.

The views of my constituents are, first, too much to consider in the time available. The main issues are keep Canada whole, Senate reform, aboriginal peoples, and economic union. The challenge that constitutional reform poses for Canada is a unique opportunity to both unify and strengthen our country.

On unity, Quebec a distinct society, I quote: "Quebec contributes much to Canada. There is a special magic in her culture and her language that all Canadians recognize, but we are not willing to keep her at any cost".

There were many heated debates and discussions on distinct society. Most people now understand and have come to grips with the historical significance that Quebec is different through culture, language, and law, but in no way superior. All provinces must be treated equally, while recognizing their differences. There can be no special status for any one province. What is offered to one province must be offered to all, and whether they accept or reject it is another question. Bill 178 in Quebec was and is a lightning rod and is unacceptable to the constituents.

On Senate reform, the Triple-E, elected, equal number of persons from each province, and effective, this is the Senate wanted and supported. I have received suggestions and briefs supporting different opinions. Some want equal regional representation; others say as long as the total number of seats from Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia equal or are more than Ontario and Quebec combined, that is satisfactory. One submission received called for the ACE model—accountable, consensual, and elected—and it is worth study.

Aboriginal peoples: while we did not have extensive discussions, most people agreed upon self-government for natives, yes, but it must be done within the boundary of Canadian laws. The move to self-government should be matched by the elimination of the Department of Indian Affairs. The question asked many times, and I quote: "Self-government is a nice sounding expression, but how can it become a reality when these people are scattered from coast to coast to coast?"

The whole arrangement with aboriginal peoples must be totally revised. Whatever the results, it must include democratic freedom to every individual native and be guaranteed in the Constitution.

Canadian economic union: the free movement of persons, goods, services, and capital, plus the dismantling of our interprovincial barriers, is crucial to our success as a competitive nation. Understanding and identifying what is required to make Canada internationally competitive is perhaps easy; reaching that objective is more difficult. It requires the co-operation and support of all levels of government with one goal: Canada first.

Council of the Federation is not needed, and it really received very little if any support.

The Canada clause should be moved to the preamble of the Constitution. We are all Canadians. We are a free democratic society that respects all people in this diverse country. There should be a responsibility clause, and I quote one suggestion: "a recognition that government is an organization to which we all contribute, i.e. taxes, according to our abilities and from which we obtain services in general according to our needs, and that we citizens have unalienable rights and serious responsibilities to conduct our lives in an honourable manner in harmony with the Constitution, and to inform ourselves of our government's activities and to exercise our rights to participate in the political governmental process at all levels".

Also the environment must be included in the final package.

Other areas have been discussed, and I want to bring them to your attention. Institutional reform: Canadians want a responsible and a responsive political process. The consensus from all groups, while reviewing the House of Commons, was that the discipline imposed by parties should be reduced and elected members must exercise the wishes of their constituents more freely. Free votes should be encouraged and members must participate and examine bills right from the beginning, before tabling, and allow more input. There should be a mechanism or guidelines to establish bills of confidence. All members must raise the quality of debate and make the House of Commons a more credible institution. MPs must curtail verbal abuse, learn to acknowledge positive suggestions, do what is right for Canada.

Housing: the Midnapore Co-op Housing Association expressed a very strong and urgent need that all Canada Housing and Mortgage contracts be honoured if housing is moved to a provincial responsibility.

There is a consensus that property rights should be in the Constitution. Property rights is a basic tenet of freedom.

Most of the constituents believe that appointments to the Supreme Court should not be a matter included in the Constitution. I quote: "The purpose of a Constitution is to set rigid parameters and guidelines within which government is empowered to fulfil the duties set out heretofore. The Constitution is therefore not to be an act of government, but a law to government by the people who pay their representatives to serve them in the said administration of the affairs of the nation".

In conclusion, the main issue is the unity of Canada. At one meeting the suggestion was made to let Quebec have its referendum first and then Canada could debate the Constitution. Bill 178 in Quebec is unacceptable. Distinct society, while acknowledged, should be defined by adding a sentence that distinct means different and not superior. All provinces are equal and must be treated equally. There are no second-class citizens. The Yukon and the Northwest Territories are important and when they become provinces the amending formula of seven out of ten provinces with 50 per cent of the population will have to change. We are all Canadians; no hyphenated Canadians and no multiculturalism.

A strong economic union is necessary to maintain our standard of living. Any amendments to the common market clause, section 121, must be beneficial to all with no specific economic benefits given to one province in particular.

I want to thank all the constituents of Calgary Southwest who participated and gave careful consideration to this process. I have tried to reflect their views here tonight. I have drawn a consensus in opinions received from them in order to meet the time allocated to me tonight. I respect each individual's direction, concern and viewpoint.

I will conclude with a quote: "The federal government should be vigilant of the need to move the governing of the country and provision of services closer to the people, while still maintaining efficient and effective service to all".

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to stand in the House today to present the report of the constitutional panel that was held in my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk throughout the month of January.

I feel that it has been a very important process and certainly a learning experience. I learned more fully the views of my constituents on this issue. Furthermore, I know that their views are indicative of the attitude of the rest of Canadians.

My riding of Haldimand—Norfolk is really in a unique position in that it encompasses so many different interests. It is an agricultural community with a small manufacturing and industrial base. People settled in this region from all around the world to farm the fertile land of the area. We also have the largest population of original peoples located at the Six Nations and the New Credit.

Quite simply, my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk has a cultural and linguistic diversity that could be an example of how compromise and understanding have really built this strong and united country.

Let me begin by telling the House how impressed I was with the interest shown by the group of Canadians in my riding, particularly Mary Edmonds, Hilda Howes, Zelda Stadder and Flora Chute, who organized the two panel discussions in Simcoe. Mrs. Edmonds and Mrs. Howes made their presentation to the special joint committee on a renewed Canada earlier today.

These are people who obviously care about their country and care about the future of our country. After all, they have taken the time and the effort to participate in this current round of constitutional talks.

It impresses me because I know the mood of Canadians. They are tired of this debate and a greater consequence is that they seem to be really fed up with what is going on with the constitutional talks. However, these people have proved that there are still many Canadians in this country who want the country to stay together. I am proud that they are willing to work to help keep it that way.

I believe that their views represent what the majority of Canadians want. They have not let the media or the academics or the politicians skew the reality that Canadians want a strong and united Canada. These Canadians are telling us what Canadians want and we should start listening.

We have had years of this debate. We know what the positions are. These Canadians are telling us that they want us to get on with it.

The constitutional meetings that took place in my riding in January discussed Senate reform, property rights, aboriginal rights, women's issues, Canadian agriculture, trilateral free trade, interprovincial trade barriers and youth issues.

However, the underlying theme of the whole convention was national unity and the importance of Canada staying together and being united. In order to achieve this, the panel concluded that we must all be prepared to compromise, specifically in terms of the issue of Quebec. It noted that in some instances it may be necessary to accept change and go along with things we do not really like in a compromise to preserve national unity. It is exactly the spirit of compromise that can get us through our current constitutional dilemma and guide us into the future.

The panel also recognized the distinct nature of Quebec's language and culture and its need to preserve and protect it. Most important, the panel recognizes that without Quebec there can be no Canada.

Without the French language and culture there can be no Canada. What concerned the panel the most was that Quebecers would not see that the majority of Canadians really realize that, and I hope my friends to my left in the Party Quebecois are listening to that.

Therefore I was pleased when Mrs. Edmonds and Mrs. Howes pointed out to the committee that when the media pays more attention to the defacing of a Quebec or Canadian flag than it does to covering the productive constitutional meetings like those in my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk, it really does a disservice to this country.

I am happy to see that more and more Canadians will recognize this and this may in some way help influence how the media portrays what is happening in this country.

The committee also noted that it was very concerned about the regional economy, specifically the crisis facing Canadian farmers and the many who have lost their jobs in the manufacturing sector. Among the recommendations for a national economy was the importance of eliminating interprovincial trade barriers because "they hamper the prosperity and the freedom of all Canadians".

Women's issues were discussed by school principal Mary Lou Norman who noted that women still do not have a major role to play in constitution making. She stressed the importance of equality regardless of gender, race, ethnic origin, colour or disability.

Graham and Shirley Smith, Oshweken residents of the Six Nations, told the constitutional panellists that land claims are the biggest issue for native peoples. However, they wondered how natives fit into the Constitution and the constitutional process. I quote: "There has to be a respect. There has to be a dialogue on both sides. There has to be a representation on both sides".

The streamlining of government services was a concern of city of Nanticoke mayor Rita Kalmbach, who told the panel that putting an end to the duplication of government responsibilities must be a high priority of any government. She also pointed out that the accountability and efficiency of government must be restored if the public is to have confidence in our government. I quote again from her proposal: "We need simpler government with a clarity of purpose. We need effectiveness and efficiency in the delivery of services".

As you can all see, some very important viewpoints were presented at the constitutional meetings that took place in my riding. I must say I am very proud of all my constituents who involved themselves in this process.

To conclude, I would like to say how much I appreciate the time and the effort that went into the Haldimand—Norfolk constitutional meetings. I now realize like many other Canadians that the people of my riding are working together in promoting our great country. Moreover, there really was a realization that we need to rejuvenate national pride and restore a national sense of purpose and a common cause.

The conclusions reached at the constitutional panel meetings in Haldimand—Norfolk are a real reflection on the Canadian values of fairness, sharing, caring and compassion, but most important the concept of compromise.

The meetings that took place all over Canada had an underlying theme of compromise, recognizing that without it this country really does not stand a chance.

I would like to end by quoting an important passage presented in Mrs. Edmonds' and Mrs. Howe's brief before the committee this morning. It is something that I think all Canadians should think about: "Nothing can be gained by dwelling on past grievances. Bearing in mind past mistakes, we must put old grudges aside and move ahead in the 1990s, working together for the future".

I would like to thank everyone who participated in these discussions for caring so much about Canada and caring so much about our people, and for taking the time to get involved in the future of their country.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate which may be a milestone in the development of our country or perhaps the turning point. I trust that we will take the right decisions in the days and the months ahead.

I represent the constituency of Fundy—Royal in New Brunswick, Atlantic Canada, and I believe that my constituents fairly represent the feelings and attitudes not only of Atlantic Canadians and New Brunswickers but Canadians in general, particularly those Canadians from outside the province of Quebec.

• (1920)

Over the last months I have had an opportunity of conversing with them to gain their opinions. I would like to share with the House and nation some of their thoughts with reference to what this country is all about and what the future of it should be, particularly in relation to how it would affect Atlantic Canada.

Recently, some have called for a wholesale restructuring of our Constitution which would include a new division of powers. This year, Canada and our Constitution will celebrate their 125th birthdays. It is a Constitution which has seen us through massive urbanization, two world wars, the Great Depression and the technological revolution. It clearly has some merit.

It is important that we do not overlook the remarkable flexibility of our Constitution by ignoring these achievements and completely restructuring our fundamental law.

The context in which the national unity debate is taking place is clearly a difficult one. The recession has Canadians' attention focused on the economy and there is a tendency to be somewhat apathetic where the Constitution is concerned. That is understandable, but surely all of our problems pale in comparison to the very unity of our country.

Economic recovery will be meaningless at the end of the day if we have no nation. We must make unity first, and it must he our top priority. It is important that we, as Canadians, are fully aware of what is at stake. We must carefully weigh our options and discard those that would tear us apart rather than unite us.

As with the Meech Lake Accord, the underlying purpose of the current constitutional package is to bring Quebec into the constitutional fold as a full partner. Abraham Lincoln astutely predicted prior to the American civil war: "A house divided against itself cannot stand". Without Quebec as a full participating partner in our federation, our house, if not divided, surely is on a precarious foundation.

Equality in the Canadian context has never meant identical treatment. Indeed, each province negotiated its own terms of union with Canada. That is why British Columbia got the promise of its railroad. Newfoundland got its denominational schools and the maritime provinces benefited from the redistribution of wealth from the more prosperous provinces.

It is this unequal treatment that allows each province to be distinct in its own way, but this should not be confused with Quebec's individuality. The distinctiveness of Quebec is not an issue here. No one surely who is familiar with our nation would deny Quebec its unique character.

The issue is how do we incorporate Quebec's distinct identity into our Constitution. Unfortunately, the issue has been fraught with emotion, but if we are to resolve it, we must approach it from a reasonable and a compassionate point of view.

In my opinion, the new distinct society clause is a much improved version over its predecessor, the Meech Lake Accord, because it makes clear that Quebec's distinct society refers to its French-speaking majority, its unique culture and its system of civil law.

I believe that New Brunswickers and Atlantic Canadians as a whole are fair and reasonable people. We recognize the contribution of Quebec to Canada's identity and we remain confident that an accommodation can be reached with Quebec.

For Atlantic Canada, the issues of prosperity and unity are directly linked. A Canada without Quebec would have serious repercussions for the Atlantic provinces. There would be geographical isolation. There would be a tendency to gravitate to the United States. What are the implications of those types of moves?

It would mean that Atlantic Canadians would have no equalization payments. It would mean that there would be no medicare as we know it today. There would be no support for post-secondary education. There would be no regional development, and there would be no unemployment insurance. There would be no support programs for our agricultural community.

The list goes on. If this were not the unity debate one might think that I was speaking from the platform of the Reform Party from the west, because indeed those are the very things they would have us do away with in Atlantic Canada.

Even if the remaining Canadian provinces somehow regroup, I doubt very much that it is reasonable to assume that the philosophy of equalization would apply. I doubt that very much.

Although the extent of our dependence on the federal government is not something that we are proud of, the fact of the matter is that Atlantic Canada relies on the federal government for its economic well-being more than any other region of the country.

For example, we are a net beneficiary of transfer payments. This year New Brunswick is forecasted to receive $875 million in equalization payments; $198 million under the Canada Assistance Plan; and $550 million under Established Programs Financing. These major transfers account for 39 per cent of New Brunswick's revenues.

Loss of these and other transfer payments would surely result in a decline in our standard of living. There would be substantial emigration from our region. It would have a ripple effect on local economies whose pools of skilled labour would be depleted. It would discourage businesses from relocating to our region and youth would emigrate from our area as surely as the robins fly south in the winter, only not to return. Atlantic Canada would become an area, a region of geriatrics.

I want to emphasize that New Brunswick does not want to remain a have not province. We want to decrease our dependency on the federal government. We want to develop our economy to the fullest extent.

We want to be contributing partners in the federation. But to do so we need the leadership of the federal government. We must recognize that one strong undivided Canada is essential to the economic health of New Brunswick and Atlantic Canada.

The government's proposal to eliminate provincial trade barriers is a positive step. Trade is the life-blood of New Brunswick and it makes no sense to have a free trade agreement with the United States when we erect trade barriers within Canada. We have already taken steps in the maritime provinces to tear down trade barriers. We must do the same throughout the rest of Canada.

We believe that our central institutions must be revamped. They have not necessarily served us in a beneficial manner and for that reason we believe that a reformed Senate is indeed in the best interests of Atlantic Canadians. Elected, effective and equal is a step in the right direction.

I want to conclude my comments this evening by saying that for all of our problems, in Canada we are truly a blessed nation. We have a standard of living that most countries would simply love to emulate, a network of social programs that are the envy of the world, and an international reputation surpassed by few.

The challenges that Canada is currently facing are great, but I do not believe they are insurmountable. In the weeks and months ahead we must call upon our qualities of fairness and willingness to compromise, to forge an agreement that will respect the diversity of all Canadians. To do otherwise would be to sacrifice all that our forefathers worked so hard to create.

We cannot afford to be complacent and assume that Canada will always be there. To have a world without the Soviet Union only a few short months ago would indeed have been unthinkable.

So while the challenges are great, the alternatives are all too real. We must work diligently to ensure that those alternatives do not become the reality.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this special debate to allow members to report to the House and to all Canadians what their constituents think and have told them on the constitutional issue. First, I would like to explain what I did in Saint-Léonard, as the member of Parliament for that riding. Some members have held public meetings; others took polls. Others again went from door to door.

• (1930)

I am one of those who sent a questionnaire to all their constituents, to every address in their riding. During the summer, I also set up a three-week door to door program, so that those who wanted to provide answers could do so using the questionnaire, or by giving me personally their opinions on the whole constitutional issue and the future of the country.

This exercise started with a Liberal Party proposal for constitutional reform which was made public by the Leader of the Opposition during a speech in Montreal on April 21, 1991. The proposal included nine points which I will read briefly, and that everybody knows. In fact, the Leader of the Opposition himself has already explained the proposal during his speech on constitutional reform and has tabled it in the House. Those nine points are: (1) a declaration on the nature of Canada; (2) the attachment to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms; (3) the strengthening of the Canadian economic union; (4) the institutional reform; (5) the division of powers: (a) spending power, (b) immigration; (6) the Supreme Court of Canada; (7) the aboriginal peoples; (8) the amending formula; and (9) the national referendum.

With these nine points, I prepared a questionnaire that, as I said, was distributed to some 38,000 households in my riding. Since this questionnaire was mailed in June, people had all summer to fill it in. At the same time, I announced a canvassing operation and I visited one neighbourhood per evening, of which there are 14 in my riding. On August 12, I was in Rosemont; on August 13, in Mont-Carmel; on August 14, in Garibaldi; on August 15, in Saint-Gilbert; on August 16, in Hébert; on August 19, in Saint-Léonard; on August 20, in Delorme; on August 21, in Port-Maurice; on August 22, in Ferland, on August 26, in Saint-Angèle; on August 27, in Pirandello; on August 29, in Pie-XII. Unfortunately, because of the persistent bad weather, I was not able to visit the neighbourhood of Coubertin.

Madam Speaker, I can tell you that during those 13 evenings going from door to door with a group from my riding, we met people from all ages and all walks of life. So I can tell you that it is their opinion; that opinion is rather representative and is more or less similar to that of those who filled in the questionnaire and returned it to me.

Madam Speaker, I do not intend to give you my opinion on this whole constitutional debate this evening. As members of the House, I believe that we will have the opportunity to do so when the report of the joint committee is tabled, or when the federal government makes offers to the provinces. At that time, there will be a debate in the House and, as a member of Parliament, I will then give my opinion. So this evening during the 10 minutes that I am allowed in this special debate, I want to make sure that it is the people from Saint-Léonard who are heard. I want to tell the House, as well as my hon. colleagues and all the Canadians who are watching us and can read Hansard starting tomorrow morning, what the people of Saint-Léonard think of the Constitution.

As regards the constitutional declaration on the nature of Canada, 74 per cent of those who participated in the exercise think that this declaration should include our attachment to both official languages. A majority of 70 per cent think that this declaration should also include the distinct character of Quebec. As well, 63 per cent of the participants think that this declaration should include a recognition of the role of the aboriginal peoples. This is all about the declaration on the nature of Canada, which defines our country.

Regarding the question as to whether we should promote the free flow of people, goods and capital in Canada, 87 per cent are in favour. The approach and details may vary but, on the whole, 87 per cent are in favour.

As to Senate reform, we asked this question: "In a reformed Senate, do you think senators should be elected?" Eighty-five per cent of respondents were in favour of elected senators. Of course, when you go into specifics, percentages and answers can be a little different, less clear cut. As I said when I started, these are the citizens of Saint-Léonard speaking tonight, not their member, so I will read exactly what they said.

There was a sub-question which asked: "If you answered yes, do you think that elections should be held on a fixed date?" Forty-seven per cent said yes; two per cent said at the time of provincial elections and 34 per cent said at the same time as federal elections. It is not clear cut, and I think we should wait and see whether the committee can come up with some suggestions on that.

About the role of the Senate regarding appointments to federal boards and agencies, 50 per cent of respondents thought that the Senate should have the power to review and 20 per cent said it should have veto power.

The role of the Senate in the legislative process. Forty-seven per cent said the Senate should be able to amend them, while 25 per cent said it should have the power to defeat them, and 14 per cent believe it should have the power to delay approval for no more than six months, which is called a "suspensive veto".

The seventh question, was the following: "Who, in your opinion, should decide whether or not a new province should be established?" Forty-eight per cent answered that it should be up to the federal government and the population of the potential province; 30 per cent said the decision should be made by the federal government, with the approval of at least seven provinces, and 24 per cent that it should be made by the federal government and all 10 provinces.

As regards Supreme Court appointments, 71 per cent of those who responded felt it would be important that the provinces and territories be involved in the process. As a matter of fact, I think there is a nation-wide consensus on this point, judging from various statements that were made and the results of various surveys. The problem is this: in the event of a deadlock, who should decide? Forty-three per cent said it should be the Chief Justice, which I think is a new idea. That is why it is sometimes important that the people be consulted. As I said, 43 per cent think the Chief Justice should decide; 26 per cent said that it should be the province or territory and 25 per cent said that the federal government should settle the dispute.

Where it gets both interesting and complicated is when we deal with the distribution of powers. We asked this question: "In your opinion, which level of government would be best suited to have responsibility in the following areas: communications? Ottawa, 41 per cent; Quebec, 12 per cent; shared responsibility, 45 per cent. Education? Ottawa, 18 per cent; Quebec, 41 per cent; shared, 41 per cent. Fisheries? Ottawa, 39 per cent; Quebec, 24 per cent; shared, 37 per cent. Health care? Ottawa, 25 per cent; Quebec, 37 per cent; shared, 39 per cent. Housing? Ottawa, 12 per cent; Quebec, 55 per cent; shared, 33 per cent. I think housing is the only area the people of Saint-Léonard clearly felt should be a provincial jurisdiction. Immigration? Ottawa, 40 per cent; Quebec, 26 per cent; shared responsibility, 34 per cent. Official languages? Ottawa, 26 per cent; Quebec, 30 per cent; shared, 43 per cent. Labour market training? Ottawa, 24 per cent; Quebec, 58 per cent; shared, 39 per cent. There is no doubt in the minds of the people of Saint-Léonard that responsibility for labour market training should rest with the province of Quebec. Natural resources? Ottawa, 26 per cent; Quebec, 27 per cent; shared, 47 per cent. The environment? Ottawa, 28 per cent; Quebec, 17 per cent; shared, 55 per cent. Finally, unemployment insurance? Ottawa, 46 per cent; Quebec, 14 per cent; shared, 40 per cent.

That is what the people of Saint-Léonard told us, Madam Speaker. I have also received letters, but I do not have enough time to read them into the record.

• (1940)

In concluding, I would like to say that for the citizens of Saint-Léonard, the Constitution is not necessarily the most important topic. In Saint-Léonard, the most important topic is employment, access to jobs for our young people, as well as unemployment and taxes. Madam Speaker, the Constitution came in fifth place. Therefore, I hope that we can settle this issue as quickly as possible and move on to more important things such as the economy and the creation of jobs for our young people. Of course, the process and the specifics could influence the percentages, but by and large 87 per cent were in favour.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, as a member from Quebec, I have always felt that the constitutional question was absolutely vital. In fact, it was one of the reasons that made me decide to run federally. Constitutional issues have been a favourite subject of Quebecers and of mine for many years, but became even more significant between 1970 and 1980.

In 1980, we had a referendum in Quebec, in which about 45 or 46 per cent of Quebecers voted for Quebec's sovereignty. I felt this percentage was significant enough to consider this particular preference on the part of Quebecers.

The unilateral patriation of the Constitution in 1982 violated the rights of Quebecers. In 1984, the Progressive Conservative Party said it wanted to start a process of reconciliation. As we all know, a proposal was tabled and accepted by the first ministers in 1987 and then turned down in June 1990, the so-called Meech Lake proposal.

Since that time, or I should say, since June 26, 1990, two members, one from Lac-Saint-Jean and the other from Compton-Mégantic—Stanstead, resigned in protest during the negotiations on Meech Lake, when we realized that Quebecers were getting the short end of the stick once more.

On June 26, 1990, three members of the Progressive Conservative Party resigned: the members for Rosemont, Richelieu and myself. The day after my resignation, I received more than 300 calls from my riding, congratulating me on my brave gesture. Only three callers told me they were upset about what I did. All of which confirmed, as far as I and my colleagues who resigned were concerned, that ours was a legitimate and courageous act in the eyes of Quebecers. Ever since, I have had no regrets. It was a gesture made by members and people here in Ottawa to demonstrate clearly their position on the rejection of Meech Lake.

What did Quebec do? What did Quebec decide after this rejection? Quebecers and the Government of Quebec, in co-operation with the opposition party, decided to create a commission, one of the most high-powered commissions ever in Quebec. It was called the Bélanger-Campeau commission. Two well-known Quebec figures, with a great deal of credibility, agreed to act as joint chairman of the commission, with a mandate to consider and analyze Quebec's political and constitutional status.

This very serious undertaking was supported by 36 commissioners, including the Premier of Quebec, the Leader of the Opposition, members of the National Assembly, federal members from Ottawa, business executives, union leaders, cultural leaders, and others. They sat for six months and travelled through 11 administrative regions in Quebec. They sat in 11 cities and enjoyed the support of 55 experts. They held 277 hearings, including 32 forums with young people. They received 607 briefs from groups and individuals.

This was one of the most serious exercises ever conducted by Quebec. I think that today the federal government intends to forget what was achieved here. People said Quebec needed sweeping powers in order to be able to develop its full potential.

Since then, after this commission in Quebec, one can also read in the Bélanger-Campeau report: "We are going to see whether the federal government is serious, whether it can offer Quebec sufficient opportunities for development, we are going to look at all this, and if we don't like it, we will hold a referendum on Quebec sovereignty in October 1992 at the latest".

What did the federal government do? It established a committee, the Spicer committee, which travelled across Canada and made a fool of itself as a rule. Its own existence has always been questioned. It was a more or less serious exercise. Finally Canadians were asked for their opinion and I hope it will serve a purpose when the time comes to finalize the report. The Castonguay–Dobbie committee was also established. But as you know, Senator Castonguay resigned because, as we have seen later on, he was against the federal government's proposals, particularly the Canadian economic plan. He clearly said so a few days ago. Hence he was replaced by Senator Beaudoin.

As this did not work very well, the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs decided to hold constitutional conferences which are mostly made up of people who want to renew Canada. In the invitations, mention was made that the purpose was to renew Canada. We have completely forgotten that in Canada there are more than 3 million Quebecers in favour of sovereignty. We have completely neglected to ask for their opinion. Quebec made sure that federalists were represented on the Bélanger–Campeau commission, but the federal government refused to hear sovereignists, even though they number more than three million in Quebec.

Will Canadian men and women understand the reality of Canada? I do not think so. The fact that the federal government refuses to hear Quebec sovereignists in this consultation process prevents Canadians from understanding that francophones are part of the Canadian reality. They are not an ethnic group, they are a nation. Quebecers represent a nation and never in this whole federal process did the government give English Canadians an opportunity to understand what Quebec is. Quebec is a nation; it is not an important ethnic group in Canada. Yet that is what Italians and other newly arrived ethnic groups believe. They believe that Quebecers are an important ethnic group. I think we should perhaps remind them of the history of Canada.

In conclusion, I would like to say a few words about the distinct society. Some people want Canadians to believe that the distinct society concept is limited to language and culture. It is not limited to language and culture, and I mean culture in the proper sense of the word.

• (1950)

Quebec's distinct society includes all our financial institutions, such as the Caisse de dépôt, Desjardins, our trust and insurance companies, and our small businesses. All these economic features set Quebec apart from the rest of Canada. Some people want us to believe that our distinct society is based solely on language and culture, in the strict sense of the terms, but that is not so. Quebecers also wish to protect and promote their economic characteristics.

That is why Quebecers will never accept that their economy be managed out of Ottawa. We will never accept such a thing, and I think several people got the message.

So if they try to delude us into believing English Canada is starting to understand how important it is to recognize our distinct society, it might be because they simply do not understand what Quebec means by "distinct society".

I see my time is running out. I just want to add that we can hardly wait for the federal government proposals. We are anxious to have this constitutional problem resolved so that we can undertake economic projects aimed at promoting Quebec's economy in particular.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, it is with a great sense of pride and opportunity that I participate in this debate this evening and to tell this House, on behalf of the constituents of my riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury, about their views, about the consultations we have had with respect to the constitutional proposals and to deliver the promise which I made as I commenced the consultations in my riding several months ago.

I would like to say that over the past many weeks in a number of ways I have had the opportunity to consult with my constituents at public meetings held almost every month, at citizens' committees which met on regular occasions and in the normal course of interchange in our constituency: at the market, on the street, by phone, by letter and in personal conversation. My message was generally always the same, that I came to my constituents with a sense of pride and responsibility as their member of Parliament, available to talk with and listen to any individual or group of constituents having a message to exchange with me about the historic and significant events which are before us. I said that the opportunities were not an exchange about party politics, but rather about identifying a common vision for our country and finding a sense of Canadian citizenship that we could all share and support.

I went on to say, and I say again, as most of us in this House know, that citizens are getting tired of hearing about the subject of Canadian unity I suppose and they wonder why we do not leave that subject alone and perhaps get on with the building of the economy, creating jobs and prosperity, cleaning up the environment and preserving the quality of life which Canada should possess in such abundance.

Truly those are the major goals that we all seek, but there is a foundation required on which all of our aspirations must be built and that foundation is a Constitution that fully reflects the values and the visions of all Canada's peoples.

I persevered and asked for the keen interest and earnest participation of my constituents over the months that were to come from the beginning of the release of these proposals. As we moved through them together, I believe that we commenced to learn and to understand them well.

We began to determine how we should best deal with them and hopefully we have come to a general consensus in many areas. There are certain areas of disagreement. In many cases there are people in my riding, as there are in every riding, who do not yet fully understand the proposals and those who understand them well and, frankly, oppose them because they do not appreciate the means by which we are trying to put this country together.

What really matters is that we did work at the process, as similar communities have done across this land and we are now realizing the achievement of a public opinion that is based on public involvement and a consultative process that has helped the decisions to be truly made by Canadians together.

As I said at the beginning, I undertook to my constituents that I would ensure their general views were delivered to this Parliament in some fashion, whether in total consensus or not and so I thank the House for the opportunity to do so tonight. I would also like to say I have had the privilege of sitting with the joint parliamentary committee on a renewed Canada at which time, I also, by letter, expressed my views through the co-chair persons to the committee. I will summarize those views briefly.

First of all, the people of Fredericton—York—Sunbury believe deeply in the potential and in the sanctity of a unified Canada. It could be construed as virtually a unanimous point of view. There are many differing opinions about how we should achieve the unity of our nation but I do not think there are many citizens who are strongly opposed to keeping Canada whole. In fact, most citizens are strongly committed to keeping Canada whole.

I am also convinced that in our province of New Brunswick, which is Canada's only official bilingual province, there still does remain an abiding majority support for the linguistic duality of two official languages, both in New Brunswick and in Canada.

There are, of course, many citizens who prefer the perceived simplicity which they feel would exist with only one official language, English, and there are others who are concerned about unfair application of the Official Languages Act and about preferential treatment in government employment practices, but on balance, I do believe that most New Brunswickers take pride in the model which our province has demonstrated for the harmonious and effective living together of our people under the mantle of official linguistic equality. Personally I support those policies in all respects.

With respect to the proposal to recognize Quebec as a distinct society within the context of language, culture and civil law, I also feel that most of my constituents would accept this to be a reasonable reflection of Canadian reality. There are concerns that such recognition does not constitute preferential treatment over other Canadians and there are others who would strongly prefer not to see such recognition take place at all. Again, on balance, I am convinced and would judge the majority view of my constituents to be one of reasonable acceptance of the distinct society provisions as a means of reaching consensus for the unity of our country. Certainly I personally support that position. There seems little doubt that most citizens in New Brunswick and in my riding do share the vision that Canada must include the province of Quebec.

I think also, Madam Speaker, there is a prevailing mood for the concept of aboriginal participation in our constitutional reform and for the principles of aboriginal self-government. There are concerns about the means by which those principles will be established but most Canadians in Fredericton—York—Sunbury would encourage us to move forward expeditiously and constructively.

I have also detected support for measures to improve the objective and constructive operations of the House of Commons and to convey a stronger perception of responsible and accountable representation by members of Parliament. For my own part, I must say I have not felt inhibited in that regard in any way and personally subscribe to the principles of parliamentary democracy, to the party and to the caucus process where I feel that I have been able to advance the cause of my constituents to their benefit in a manner that reflects the great traditions of this Parliament and of this country.

There was a surprisingly large body of opinion which would have been quite content to see the Senate abolished. I would say, however, on balance—this one a much closer balance—there is support for the concept of a Senate which is elected for sure, which is effective and which has function and powers and one which is equitable in the context that most people do not really believe that we can achieve equality in the true sense of numbers except perhaps by regional representation which I and my constituents would also support.

The citizens of Fredericton—York—Sunbury are very significantly concerned about a strong economic union. As original founding partners in Confederation, we have been the beneficiaries of dividends of that Confederation for many years to the extent that at this point in our history the benefit of those dividends amounts in a fashion in our favour to almost $8 billion per year throughout Atlantic Canada or almost $3,600 per citizen. It is extremely important that that participation in the equalized financial life of our country be maintained.

There are two other significant items that citizens advanced which I would like to put on the record.

First is the thought that the concept of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms should be enhanced to include also the sense of responsibility which we as Canadian citizens must share in the affairs of our country.

Second, the Constitution should reflect the concept of economic and financial integrity. By and large we should be a society that pays our way, that remains free of debt in the normal course of events and except for the cyclical flexibility which is required in any kind of economic planning, we should in effect practice that kind of economic integrity.

I know that I am running out of time but I would just like to finish very quickly by saying that it is with a great sense of pride and responsibility that I have worked with my constituents to understand these constitutional proposals. I believe that there is a majority consensus view among the citizens of Fredericton—York—Sunbury which by and large supports the initiatives put forward by the government and which certainly, above all else, supports the efforts being made by all members of this House and by all citizens of this country, I would hope, to achieve the unification of our nation.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak this evening during this special debate on the Constitution and how this important issue is being viewed by my constituents in Stormont—Dundas.

Last month I conducted a series of constitutional forums in my riding in the communities of Iroquois, Finch and Cornwall. I wanted to discuss with my constituents in an entirely non-partisan and informal manner each of the 28 constitutional proposals that have been put forward by the federal government.

In devising these constitutional forums, I wanted to provide my constituents with an opportunity to have their views and opinions heard. I believe it is vital that Canadians have the opportunity to become a part of the constitutional reform process. It is equally important for their voices to be heard, as we know all too well the dangers involved in proceeding with constitutional reform without full and open public consultation and participation.

Aside from the three constitutional forums I held in my riding, I also placed a constitutional questionnaire in my last householder to my constituents. I believe it is incumbent on all members of Parliament to take an active role in finding out what their constituents think on an issue of importance such as the one we are debating today.

While I received nearly 500 responses from my questionnaire in my householder, I can say that the results were very similar to those I obtained from a questionnaire I distributed during the constitutional forums. I will, therefore, confine my remarks to the comments I heard at the forums and refer to the results from the questionnaires I received from these three forums.

To begin with, I was very pleased to see the interest my constituents had in the constitutional debate. I would, of course, like to thank those constituents who did come out on three winter nights to meet and discuss with their member of Parliament, friends and neighbours an issue which they felt was of considerable importance.

I was particularly delighted with the general consensus present at each forum whereby participants had a shared desire for Canada to remain a strong and united country.

There was also substantial support for the aboriginal people of Canada. A clear majority of participants supported aboriginal self-government and native participation in the current constitutional deliberations. Strong support was also present at our forums for a constitutional amendment to permit aboriginal matters not addressed in the current constitutional talks to be addressed in the future.

On the issue of Senate reform, an overwhelming amount of support was displayed for an elected Senate. There was, however, a rough split on whether or not there should be an equal number of senators representing the regions of Canada. In addition, support for an equal number of senators for each province was not evident.

With regard to reform measures for the House of Commons, a significant majority of participants supported members of Parliament having more free votes and having vacant seats in the House filled within 120 days.

On the question of designating Quebec as a distinct society, the majority of participants were not in favour of the proposal. However, while I am committed to this proposal on a personal basis, I respect the views of my constituents and I was heartened by the support that was given to the recognition of Canada's linguistic duality as being a fundamental characteristic of our country.

While there was support for a Canada clause to be placed in our Constitution, there was concern expressed as to what exactly would be in this clause. Some participants commented about the ambiguity surrounding some of the aspects being considered for insertion in the Canada clause.

The proposals relating to a common market throughout Canada and the issue of an economic union were closely examined, and while they were afforded considerable support especially as they relate to the free movement of people, goods and services across the country, there was some concern expressed as to a need for clarification. Specific concern was expressed over how the economic union should be arranged and what it would entail.

The harmonization of economic policies between the federal government and the provinces did however receive support, while questions were raised as to whether or not the federal government or the provincial governments should have sole jurisdiction in certain matters.

Concern was also present over federal funding in provincial areas of jurisdiction. Most participants wish to obtain assurances that standard programs and services would continue to exist throughout Canada and federal funds would not be reduced if provincial governments obtained complete jurisdiction in specific matters currently involving the federal government.

On a more general theme, most of the forum participants in my riding believe that the proposals put forward by the federal government were indeed too ambiguous. Another common observation was that there were just too many proposals. This sentiment I believe has been echoed by many Canadians in recent days.

I too share these two comments on the constitutional proposals of the government but I recognize that they are proposals and there is every hope that we will see a number of these proposals better defined in the final package, as our party has suggested to the government.

I also believe that we will see a reduction in the number of proposals contained in the final package when it is presented in the House. I will, for now, leave those two matters in the capable hands of the committee which is currently discussing the government's proposals.

Finally, with regard to the opinions of my constituents on the matter of the council of the federation, a clear majority could not support the establishment of such a council. Many feared it would be just another layer of government with an equally cumbersome bureaucracy and an expense which we could do without. First ministers' meetings held on a regular basis were viewed as a more appropriate alternative.

I was grateful for the opportunities the forums presented me to obtain the views of my constituents on the government's constitutional proposals. They will be part of my response in this Chamber to the government's final constitutional package when it is presented in the near future.

In conclusion, I am also grateful for this opportunity to share with other members in this House during this special debate some of the views and opinions of my constituents on the Constitution and the government's proposals.

The Liberal Party has also presented its own position on the Constitution to the government and to Canadians. We have indicated the direction we would like the government to take in order to bring about what we all desire for Canada: a united, proud and independent country for all Canadians.

• (2010)

In closing, Madam Speaker, I would just like to add this.

[Translation]

If I may for a moment, I would like to say something on a different matter. A few hours ago I heard that one of my colleagues, the hon. member for Saint-Denis, is celebrating today his 28th year in this House. He has been elected to this House 28 years ago, and I want to congratulate him.

[English]

Also, I see in the Chamber the member for Winnipeg South, the co-chair of our constitutional committee. I want to express my appreciation and respect for the committee and wish it well in its future endeavours.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Winnipeg South): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. gentleman opposite for his kind words and good wishes. It means a great deal to all of us in the House that we conduct these discussions in the kind of non-partisan manner that we have been able to do.

You see, Madam Speaker, that I come today without a formal speech. I am doing this because of some of the things that we heard in the committee over the past two months. It is very clear that many people are concerned that members of Parliament come and appear to simply read from material that people in the public believe has been drafted by the status quo, by the bureaucracy. They are feeling very fearful and suspicious that members of Parliament are not speaking from their hearts or are not speaking from their own sense of conviction.

I hope that I will be able to carry on a coherent discussion this afternoon because I intend to do so only from notes in order to respond to some of those concerns of Canadians all across the country.

I would like to begin by making a comment about the committee's work in the travel that we have had. We have been from one end of the country to the other and to all sorts of far reaches, the furthest reaches of the land. During that time we have received over 4,000 submissions and, believe it or not, we have heard from 560-some individuals and we still have some more tomorrow. Of that number, about 192 represent organizations. This is in addition to the four conferences that we have also been participating in, as listeners in most cases and sometimes as participants.

I think it is indicative of this round of the constitutional talks that Parliament has listened, all members of Parliament have listened to what their constituents have been telling them since the last round of constitutional talks that ended in the failure of Meech Lake. This time our concern is that people have an opportunity to fully participate in this constitutional debate and to know that if they are determined to have a say that they will have the ability and the opportunity to do so.

This is the Canada round. There is no doubt about that. It responds to a host of concerns that were expressed throughout the process of reviewing the Meech Lake Accord when it was tried at the last dying moments to resurrect it by listening to Canadians, and from the things that we have heard since, not just from the Spicer commission but also from the Beaudoin–Edwards committee that came before the committee that I co–chair.

That is why there are 28 proposals on the table. We have heard criticisms that that is too much. First of all, I have to point out that not all of the 28 proposals are constitutional proposals. Some of them are instructions to the committee about the fact that we should do certain things and we should look into certain things. Some of them are intentions that the government has expressed about legislation that it intends to enact and it asks for advice on that legislation. One of those items, for instance, is reform of the Bank of Canada Act which would be accomplished merely through an act of the House of Commons.

You cannot have it both ways. When we went through the Meech Lake hearings, people were saying: "You didn't include us, you didn't count us in. Because this is the Quebec round, this is an exclusionary process and we want in". We heard that from aboriginal people, women, people who come from ethnic communities, people who are physically disadvantaged, and so on.

This 28 proposal package is an attempt to respond to all of the concerns that we have been hearing over the past two years. I suppose in the final analysis, the essential items that have to be dealt with according to the timetable that we have before us now are the ones that will be dealt with by the First Ministers when it comes time for them to begin to negotiate the final results of the committee's deliberations.

For the time being, it is very important that all of the options are there for the First Ministers to examine. These are things that Canadians have been telling us. For example, in the west, they have been saying that they feel alienated. Therefore, they want some fundamental change to the system so that they will feel included in the decision–making that emanates from the centre of the country.

It is important to make sure that we leave all of the proposals as wide open as we can so that First Ministers can make their decisions accordingly. However, there are three issues that concern us all very much. We must respond to Quebec because we have been dealing with this question for many many years. Surely after 10 years of having repatriated our Constitution, it is time to do the generous thing and respond to the minimal requirements of Quebec in order to become part of the Constitution of Canada.

I know that at all of the hearings we have held across the country, people responded very favourably to the idea that Quebec could be included as a distinct society, as represented by its culture, its French language and its civil law. I do not believe if you were able to take a vote of the people who are aware of the issue, who have studied it and thought about it, that you would find many were opposed. It reminds me of some of the more emotional issues that have been before this House where 25 per cent of the people are violently on one side of the issue and 20 per cent are violently on the other side of the issue. The vast middle majority say: "Please, find a reasonable accommodation somewhere down the centre, get it fixed and get on with it". This is true of the constitutional issue and it is true also of some of the more controversial issues in this particular round.

There is a deep desire to resolve the issues that are outstanding for aboriginal people, at least some of them on this round even if we do not get to them all. We should remember that constitutions are not things that are finite. They are never completed. They grow and evolve with the needs of society at that particular time. Of course, we must respond to the feeling of western alienation.

In addition our institutions, the parliamentary reform process about which we heard Mr. Brewin talk earlier, is an integral part of what we are doing. If we do not respect each other as parliamentarians, if we do not learn to listen carefully to what our colleagues are saying, listen with concern and believe they have a valid point, it is very difficult for Canadians to believe that they should respect us. If we have lost some respect perhaps it is time to look into our own hearts and see how we can reform our own conduct to ensure that we reinstil that respect for this particular institution in Canadians all across the country.

I suppose that it is no secret that there will be changes to the constitutional proposals when the committee makes its report. I think that it is a very positive thing for this country and for this government. They are after all proposals and they were put on the table so that people would have a foundation of discussion, a basis upon which to carry on the discussion.

This discussion has been very healthy and very helpful. It will help us to sort out exactly what we need to do when we come to the end of this particular process.

I want to mention something that bothers me a great deal. It seems to me that in some places in this country there are forces of darkness. These are the kinds of forces that instil fear and insecurity in the hearts of all Canadians because they play on all of the little things of which we are afraid.

Because this is a great democracy, these people and these forces have a voice. It is important that Canadians resist the temptation to believe absolutely everything they hear. They should use their heads. They should examine the positions that are being espoused and ensure that they are rational and reasonable. It is only by understanding the obligations of our citizenship that we will be able to preserve this democracy. These voices sound very appealing at times. They are the ones that pit the French against the English, the aboriginals against the French. They pit interest group against interest group and they pit everybody against the national interest. It is up to us to ensure that we exercise our responsibility as citizens in a way that resists those forces and looks forward to the optimistic, the wonderful and all of the things that are good out there.

I am going to just very briefly read from a booklet that was given to us today by one of the people who came to speak before the committee. It says: "Let Young People Speak". Young people have a way of saying things that get right to the heart of the matter and they say it much more eloquently than I ever can. I will read a couple of them very briefly. One is "Canada is a rainbow of people and places". This is from a student in London, Ontario. There is another one from Medicine Hat, Alberta which says: "It is like being in paradise". Another says: "Canada is a clean country, free of earthquakes and wars". Young people understand the value of these things. Another said, and I love this one: "When they ask about Canada, I usually tell them about the snowstorms, the fields and the caterpillars".

These kids really get down to the basics. They understand that there is more to life than fighting about constitutional issues. Finally, a teacher reports from Lumsden, Saskatchewan, that a vote was taken in her class to decide if Canada was a good country. The result was 20 out of 20 are in support of Canada.

Twenty out of 20 are in support of Canada in this House of Commons as well. I think that with good will and with a lot of leadership, we will get through this round and we will keep the country whole.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Madam Speaker, thank you for the opportunity of joining the discussion tonight. I would rather call it a discussion than a debate on the future of our country.

First of all, let me start out by making it very clear to the members of the House that most of my constituents would rather see me rise in my place and talk about economic issues than about the Constitution. I think it is fair to say that a lot of Canadians who are facing severe economic uncertainty in their lives are much more concerned about their personal lives.

I have many constituents that are farmers who are seeing their family farmland that has been in their family for generations disappearing. I have constituents that are workers, that have worked in certain industries and shops for years and years who have lost their jobs or on the verge of losing their jobs or are afraid that they might lose their jobs.

They see that their own lives are falling apart. They are concerned about the future. They are not optimistic about the future. They feel Parliament should provide some economic leadership and that the Constitution is almost like a discussion about how many angels can fit on the head of a pin.

This does not affect their lives. They would like to see some leadership out of Ottawa. They are angry in many ways. To tell the truth, yes, they are angry at the constitutional debate. They have gone through the debate through the eighties and they would rather have us get on with what they consider important things in their lives. There is no denying it, they are important things in their lives because they affect their lives so deeply and so severely.

Having said that, I also wish to indicate to the House where I come from on the constitutional debate. I was one of the four in my party who disagreed with my party when the initial constitutional proposals were presented by Mr. Trudeau back in the 1980s. I felt uncomfortable for a variety of reasons. One was the unilateral nature of the proposals by Mr. Trudeau at the time.

Perhaps essentially I felt uncomfortable because I thought we had in this country something that was very appropriate. To be sure we had to go to Westminster and the Parliament in England if we wanted any constitutional change, but really I was not losing much sleep about that fact. It would have been nice to bring it back home, to have some amendments occur back in Canada, but the notion of a written constitution was what disturbed me and it still disturbs me.

In a country as wide and as different as Canada, with all of its different regions and its different peoples, to try to define it in legalistic terms or to put it into little boxes is a recipe for disaster.

I prefer a common law type of British constitution that is organic, that changes, that allows elements and degrees and shades of grey and is not sharply defined. The former Prime Minister, perhaps because of his legalistic and Jesuit background, wanted things more precise, more defined. Many of the problems we face today are as a result of that.

Now we are trying to define reality. Well reality in this country is something that has to be loose. Living in the 21st century, the century where change is the constant, we want something that is loose, something that is organic, something that can grow in an organic way, rather than something that has to be defined and everything put in pigeon-holes.

Down the road, we go through the process of trying to define. We run into these problems all the time.

As I understand it, Quebec wants recognition in the Constitution in written form, that it is a distinct society. Well that now has to be defined and once it is then others are going to ask: "Well, what about us? Are we not also distinct?" By not mentioning others does that not single out one group? Yes, it is one of the founding fathers, or one of the founding nations of our country. To make them distinct does that mean that the aboriginal people are less distinct, or other groups are less distinct?

You get into this debate that goes on and on and on. It is like a debate on how many angels can dance on the head of a pin. To many people it begins to become unreal to them while their own lives, which are very real, are unravelling.

They look at us as a bunch of fools here on Parliament Hill talking about things that have no effect on their lives as their lives and their communities go under. I must say that I am in deep sympathy with many of my constituents on that.

In 10 minutes I will not attempt to go through all the proposals of the distinct society, of the economic proposals, of the proposals to change some of the powers in terms of the federal and the provincial governments.

In the end, it is a question that the people of Quebec really have to decide. I believe and my party believes they have the right to self-determination on this.

They must in the end decide whether to remain as part of the Canadian Confederation. In doing this they will look at various options and all we can do in English-speaking Canada is to attempt to work things out so that the aspirations of the people of Quebec can be fulfilled within the larger Confederation.

The process in the end might not be entirely rational either. There is a deep desire within the people of Quebec because there is a feeling that they are part of this union, part of this marriage and that it was a forced marriage. This is psychological; it is not logical at all.

Then at some stage this might be expressed in the form of a referendum where the majority of the people of Quebec will vote for something that changes the basic relationship between Canada's nine other provinces and the province of Quebec. I hope that does not happen. I hope that logic will prevail.

Let me put it this way. I have heard Mr. Parizeau and Mr. Bourassa and others in Quebec talk about the European Community as a model. I think it is a good model because we are living in an age of economic globalization and internationalization.

Certainly the demographics, the geography, the history, and the economics necessitate an ongoing close relationship between the province of Quebec and the other nine provinces and the territories.

• (2030)

Let us look at the European model. The European model is a case of where nations that used to be at war with each other in our lifetimes are now joining into a union and are giving up significant parts of their sovereignty to form a larger union.

It is not just a trading agreement because out of the trading agreement is also a social agreement. It is an agreement on social policies, an agreement on the environment, an agreement on labour policies and so forth, to ensure that one nation does not have some economic advantage because it has lower wages or lower social policies in order to attract industry. In order to have a free trade type of integration, there must also be an integration of social policies, labour policies and environmental policies.

I would suggest to the leadership in Quebec, particularly the leadership in the PQ, that they take a close look at what a European model for Canada would be, what an economic union would mean. I would suggest to them that an economic union would not be far different from what we have today. In fact, I would suggest that in an economic union Quebec will lose powers that it enjoys today.

I do appeal to the leadership and the people of Quebec to rationally look at the situation. We can go through the angst, the trauma and the anguish of a breakup and then the reconciliation. But it is my deep hope that we can skip that, that we can jointly come to the realization that we have some good things going for us in this country. With God's blessing I hope we can keep our country together.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Madam Speaker, first I would like to express the appreciation of the people of Wild Rose for the opportunity to offer their views where they feel it will make a difference.

The people of Wild Rose believe in Canada. They represent a good cross-section of Canadians and their views are fair and honest.

They took the time to attend meetings on the Constitution, to telephone, to send me written comments and to meet with me personally to offer their advice. Now I am taking this opportunity to bring to the House their opinions, their ideas and their suggestions.

My presentation will be brief, for although the people discussed many topics briefly, they all placed their emphasis on two or three areas which were usually always the same. They discussed Senate and House of Commons reform, aboriginal self-government and a distinct society clause for Quebec.

They did dwell on the subject of special powers and a distinct society and that perhaps if one portion of Canada was distinct, the rest of Canada might have a lesser role to play in the making of a nation.

They understand Quebec's historical, cultural and linguistic differences. However, they have a definite reservation when it comes to the word distinct. They believe that the definition of the word means superiority and preferential treatment. They question that one Canadian because of heritage may be better than another one. My constituents believe that all Canadians are equal.

With reference to the subject of language, it is no secret that in my riding many people believe that Canada cannot afford two languages, that our population is not large enough to support the expense of two languages and that French should be the language of Quebec, while English is the language of preference outside Quebec.

One of the participants at the forum stated very eloquently his love for this country and all its distinct regions. Mr. Leatherdale stated that each and every province and territory brings to this country a unique and a distinct contribution.

On House of Commons reform, my constituents urged comprehensive parliamentary reform to the House of Commons and entrenchment of such reforms in the constitutional package. They would like the reform, which would allow members of Parliament to be responsive to the constituents and to reduce the adversarial tone of the House while improving the decorum.

On Senate reform, my constituents viewed reform of the Senate as essential. They strongly supported the creation of an elected Senate, equal and effective. They want to see the Senate continue, but in a new and a reformed manner. The solutions as to how and when varied, but all agreed that equal representation by province was needed and that in no way should Senate elections be linked with House of Commons elections.

Over all, the perception is politicians do not listen or are held back from voting the way constituents would like them to. Some believe this is the result of too much involvement by bureaucrats. They also believe that no vote in the House of Commons should be considered a confidence vote unless it is a special non-confidence motion, and that votes that are lost should go back for revisions.

Aboriginal self-government should be studied in more detail. Interprovincial trade barriers should be eliminated and property rights should be enshrined. The federal government should also retain its jurisdiction over the environment. Difficulties could be encountered with some of these issues. However, my constituents wish to see parliamentarians study them more carefully.

Freedom of speech and opinions are important to Wild Rose constituents, and they welcome other voices and opinions because together the future is bright. Combined we can stand strong and free.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, I would like to first of all thank the hon. member for Winnipeg South for her role up till now as chairperson of the special joint committee on the Constitution and for having expressed so well tonight the aspirations of the people of the West.

We too have consulted the people of the riding of Davenport.

[English]

In the month of July we mailed a booklet with questions to every household, and 162 people took the trouble to reply. At that time, eight months ago, the mood was quite different from that of today. Today the mood in the riding of Davenport is one of intense despair due to the fact that plants have closed and unemployment is high, gasoline stations are scheduled to close, people are running out of unemployment insurance benefits.

• (2040)

The general economic situation is in such a decline that people are even losing faith in the future of Canada. Therefore, for these reasons, Madam Speaker, as you have heard from many other colleagues who have spoken here tonight, the sense of confidence in the future of the country is progressively undermined. For this reason the population at large finds it extremely difficult to understand the purpose of the constitutional exchange, important as it is.

In broad strokes of the brush, those who have replied in substance say that they strongly favour one Canada. They express faith in a strong federal system. They express a belief in bilingualism as a binding force for Canada. They express a dislike for preferential treatment of any province. They express strong commitment to the cultural diversity of Canada. They express strong support for a unifying Constitution, as opposed to one that would parcel out Canada and make it a collection of 10 or 12 provinces or territories, communities or regions. As you can see, Madam Speaker, the perspective from a riding in west Toronto is obviously for strong federalism.

In reply to the question whether a constitutional statement on the nature of Canada should include our attachment to the two official languages, you may be pleased to know that 67 per cent replied yes.

In reply to the question whether a constitutional statement on the nature of Canada should include the diversity of our cultural heritage, again 67 per cent replied yes.

When it came to the difficult question whether a constitutional statement on the nature of Canada should include the distinct character of Quebec society, only 33 per cent said yes.

To the question whether a constitutional statement on the nature of Canada should include the recognition of the role of aboriginal peoples, an astonishing 81 per cent said yes.

Then the question was asked: Do you favour the free circulation of people, goods, and capital within Canada? Here, the highest percentage to any question came through, 93 per cent. Specifically on the elimination of provincial preferential buying policies, that elimination was favoured by 69 per cent. As to the elimination of interprovincial restrictions on trade, 86 per cent said yes. As to the elimination of interprovincial barriers to practising some professions, again it was in the eighties, 81 per cent said yes.

The question then was asked: Do you favour a reformed Senate in which senators would be elected? Here the reply in the affirmative was 85 per cent.

The next question: When legislation is passed in the House of Commons, do you believe that the Senate should have the right to amend it, the right to reject it, or the right to delay it for six months? The majority, 45 per cent, favoured the right to amend it, followed by 31 per cent for the right to reject it. The lowest percentage went to the right to delay such legislation for six months.

Then the question was asked: Do you believe that the creation of new provinces such as Yukon or the Northwest Territories should be decided by the federal government in conjunction with all the provinces, or seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population of the territories? Here strong support was given, namely 49 per cent in the affirmative, to the population of the territories to express such an opinion in conjunction with the federal government.

Then the question was asked: Do you believe that it would be important to involve the provinces and the territories in the appointment of federal Supreme Court judges? Sixty-nine per cent replied in the affirmative.

When it came to the question of raising the possibility of an impasse in the appointment of a federal Supreme Court judge as to who should have the final word, the options given were the federal government, the province or territory, or the federal chief justice. Here the largest number of support, namely 35 per cent, went to the federal chief justice.

Moving on to the last two questions, it is interesting to note that when it comes to seeking an opinion on whether unanimous consent of the federal government and all the provinces is required for constitutional amendments in matters relating to the office of the Queen, the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada, the use of English and French in certain situations, and the possibility of future amendments to the amending formula of the Constitution, the question focused on who should exercise a veto on these changes. Forty-nine per cent of the respondents felt that all the provinces should exercise the right to veto, followed by 25 per cent in favour of regional groupings, all of them. Unfortunately—and this reflects of course an interesting attitude that does not favour favouritism for one specific province—only one per cent favoured giving the veto power to Quebec.

Finally the question was asked whether a certain level of government would best be responsible for certain responsibilities. Without going into all the responsibilities, I will only highlight for you that communications was given 48 per cent of the respondents favouring a federal responsibility, education was given 41 per cent in favour of remaining a provincial responsibility, fisheries received 40 per cent favouring a federal responsibility, while housing was the preference by way of 61 per cent in favour of becoming a provincial responsibility, immigration was given 58 per cent for a federal responsibility, and unemployment insurance 43 per cent.

It was interesting to note that when it comes to environmental protection 56 per cent of the respondents felt this would be a shared responsibility between the two levels of government. This was the highest percentage expressed in the category of shared responsibilities, followed by 40 per cent being the next one, health care in the forties as being a shared responsibility the respondents would favour.

This is a snapshot taken, as I said, last July. It represents replies given to questions I did my best to attempt to formulate in a manner that would not be leading but as objective and unbiased as possible, which we all know is ultimately impossible. Nevertheless the attempt was made. I thank you for the opportunity of making this report to the House.

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate on this historic occasion as we debate the future of our country. Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis, which I have been proud to represent since 1984, is a unique riding in Canada, with almost a 50-50 balance between French and English speakers. It includes the four cities of Lachine, Dorval, Pointe-Claire, and Beaconsfield. I believe we are a great example of harmony and co-operation, particularly of French-English co-operation for Canada.

Canada Day celebrations are an example. Special events were planned last year by volunteer committees in Lachine, Dorval, and Beaconsfield, and over 10,000 people in my riding took part.

Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis is a model example to the rest of our province and to the nation. We have our problems, but we have our solutions. We are a suburban riding at the west end of Montreal Island, surrounding Dorval airport. The prosperity of the whole Montreal Island is of great importance to the residents of our riding. For this, a renewed Constitution is very important. The economy is important and success in our deliberations now is crucial.

I believe, and I sense that my constituents share this view, that the Dobbie–Beaudoin committee is developing a good track record. There have been many comments of support from my riding. We are beginning to see the fruit of their labours. Any who have watched this committee at work across the country in their direct hearings and in their participation in the many conferences will admire and respect this dedicated team of members of Parliament.

Just a short time ago I was a participant at the special constitutional conference in Montreal. Again in this dramatic and challenging way we are struggling to find the best method to resolve our differences. Our consultations with electors in Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis included a questionnaire, a survey in one of my householders, and I received hundreds of replies and comments. They were not all complimentary, but most were. People are accepting the process. They feel they are now being listened to.

Finally I held two public opinion forums, open meetings in the riding: one just this last week and the other in November. They were all well attended. The debate and discussion was informed and the process is working. Our concerns from the west island of Montreal are first and foremost for a united and prosperous Canada. We must have a special sensitivity to all our neighbours, all our fellow Canadians, new and old.

Bill 178 in the province of Quebec is disliked by many, very evidently. At our open meetings this was the very first thing many of our participants would raise. Senator David was our guest in November at the public forum, and he said not everyone is in love with this bill. A young law student from my riding, Tasha Kerriddhin, a panellist at the discussion, said although the bill is not ideal it is a reality, and we must work together as English and French to eliminate the need for such a bill.

Dr. Goldbloom, a highly respected and broadly experienced member of the English speaking minority in Quebec, and now Canada's Commissioner of Official Languages, reflected the mood and sensitivities of our minority, the English speaking minority at the west end of Montreal and in other corners of the province, when he made a presentation to the special joint committee for a renewed Canada. He said: "In recognition of the distinct character of Quebec and of linguistic duality, we welcome the government's proposal of a Canada clause to entrench in section 2 of the Constitution Act of 1867 such factors as recognition of the responsibility of governments—governments, all of them—to preserve Canada's two linguistic majorities and minorities, as well as the special responsibility borne by Quebec to preserve and promote its distinct society".

Dr. Goldbloom went on, saying: "We find the non-limiting, yet well-defined description of the distinct society to be felicitous, and likely to allay the misgivings expressed in the past. While we acknowledge that the commitment to ensure preservation"— —of the existence of our official language minorities is a large step forward, we do not consider this wording the best possible safeguard or the most dynamic. We therefore advocate more positive wording that would foster promotion of Canada's English speaking and French speaking minorities and would support their development in keeping with the very objectives of the Official Languages Act".

[Translation]

—that means protection—

I sense, as do my colleagues, that the goodwill and tolerance and moderation of all Canadians is expressing itself, and it will result in a solution to our current constitutional debates.

Time is a precious commodity, both in the over-all process and even here tonight, as I watch my time wind down. But ultimately my electors and I have confidence in this process and its eventual outcome. It will be positive for my riding, Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis; my province, Quebec; my country, Canada.

[Translation]

I think I represent faithfully and honestly my constituents' feelings when I say that we should consider this country with our hearts. Let our vision be far-reaching like that of generations of Quebecers and Canadians before us. We will then be able to see this great country as our ancestors and Fathers of Confederation foresaw the country and that our children hope to see, the country we love wish to continue to love.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity given me this evening to participate, be it briefly, in this very important debate. Let me first say that my presentation will center mostly on the views of my constituents on this constitutional package and on the process in which we are all involved, that is the renewal of our Constitution and of our country.

I understand that this debate is mainly supposed to give us, members of Parliament, an opportunity to bear witness to the diversity of feelings expressed throughout the country on the constitutional issue. However, I hope that I will soon have the possibility to express my own ideas on that issue and on what is at stake in this case. Evidently, my thoughts will reflect not only my own concerns, but also the conversations I have had since my election with many constituents of Cape Breton Highlands–Canso.

• (2100)

Yesterday I was in Pomquet, an Acadian village of my riding, for the opening of their winter carnival. Pomquet, which was founded in 1761, is a community located about ten kilometres east of the village of Antigonish and surrounded by various cultures, including Scottish, English, Micmac and other cultures established there for many generations and which have been increased by immigrants in the eastern part of Nova Scotia.

Looking at people taking part in the carnival, it was very clear that Pomquet is a community which is very proud of its origins and very proud of its culture, of how they could maintain their French language. In addition, it is a community where people get along well together.

[English]

Pomquet is like many other communities in Highlands—Canso, populated by people who are steeped in tradition and people with a proud and deep knowledge of their heritage, whether they be Acadians, Scots, English, or United Empire Loyalists who have come and settled in the county of Guysborough, or even the descendants of the southern slaves from the United States who lived in communities such as Lincolnville and Sunnydale. They are people who are proud of their heritage, whatever it may be, and who have grown together to live in harmony with each other in the areas of eastern Nova Scotia.

The important fact about these communities is that we get along. We are able to recognize and accept and rejoice in the differences we have as a result of our cultural heritage. Perhaps one of the best expressions of this is in the music, particularly the Scottish highland music, which has been developed mostly in Inverness County and has spread across the constituency. It has been passed down from generation to generation and exported beyond our borders and around the world. It has been borrowed and enriched by the Acadians, by the Micmacs, and by other groups who have found such pleasure in it.

The point of this is that the people in my constituency of Highlands—Canso want Canada to work like their communities work. They are not preoccupied with the fine points of constitutional reform for the most part. They are more preoccupied with the mundane business of making a living, of feeding their families, of finding a job and keeping a job, and of growing and preserving their community and their culture. They believe fundamentally that is what is possible within this wonderful country called Canada. They want Canada to work and to reflect the kind of mutual respect that is so present in the communities of Highlands—Canso.

Although my constituents are somewhat perplexed that we as politicians and as experts in the constitutional field have had such difficulty in resolving these seemingly intractable differences, they have joined in this collective search for constitutional resolution and have responded. For example, last summer I sent out a survey to my constituents in the form of a householder, and they responded.

I would like to give you a brief synopsis of some of the salient points that I received from my constituents on some of the constitutional elements.

First, regarding official languages, two-thirds of the respondents want to include some recognition of our official languages in a Canada clause.

Second, regarding cultural diversity, 83 per cent want to include a statement on cultural diversity in the Canada clause such as what I have just spoken about in terms of the community and the cultural diversity which exist in my own constituency.

Third, with respect to aboriginal Canadians, 83 per cent voted to recognize a role for aboriginal people in the Canada clause. There is a deep respect for aboriginal Canadians and a deeply felt need that our first citizens need to find their proper place in our Constitution and in our country. That is from people who live in close proximity and intermingle with native people in the constituency.

Fourth, with respect to a distinct society, respondents were more evenly split on whether to include a statement on the distinct character of Quebec in the Canada clause.

Regarding the Senate, 87 per cent wanted a reformed Senate that would elect senators and only 3 per cent wanted the Senate abolished. Views were split on whether the Senate should be able to veto or only review appointments and whether they should be able to reject or just to amend legislation.

Regarding interprovincial trade, an overwhelming majority favoured free circulation of people, goods, and capital, eliminating preferential buying policies, eliminating trade restrictions and eliminating barriers to practising some professions.

Regarding future constitutional change, people were split on who if anyone should get a veto.

Finally, regarding the division of powers, with the exception of communications, immigration, and unemployment insurance, the majority of respondents favour shared federal-provincial responsibility for issues such as education, fisheries, health care, housing, language, natural resources, environment, and training.

Generally, though, most of the comments that I have received in response to this questionnaire and in letters were positive, constructive and have exhibited great hope and optimism for Canada and for our future and a determination to make Canada work.

I received many letters, and I continue to receive letters on the Constitution expressing the need for us to get on with the business of resolving our constitutional difficulties and to build a better Canada. I would like to quote from a couple of these.

In addition, I also received a tape which is from a Mr. Carl Cann in Baddeck who expressed in a very moving oral testimony what he thought was wrong with the current process. I would like to table this tape for the use of the committee.

I wish I had more time, but I will conclude by reading excerpts from a letter received from Robert MacRury who expresses a sentiment that is shared by many in my constituency.

He writes: "I want to remain a Canadian. My ancestors have been in this country since at least 1758 and we have fought for this country in every war and defensive action that she has ever been in.

My dad lost his best friend and first cousin in Belle-sur-mer, France and was one of the first Canadians killed on the beaches of Normandy. My uncle was shot up in Holland and he also got some shell fragments in his back and he survived these two wounds.

Many of my grand uncles were in the first war and my great-granddad was in the militia when they were preparing to fight the Finians. When he finally got paid for this 40 years later, he was one of the three of his unit that was still alive and able to collect his pay.

Some of my ancestors were United Empire Loyalists and they were forced to flee the U.S.A.

• (2110)

I am sure that the people of Quebec and other parts of Canada have as deep and as long an attachment to this country as I have and that our differences are small and the things that make us the same are great just like Canada."

This reflects a sentiment that is shared by the vast majority of Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): In fact, Madam Speaker, I would like to reiterate what my colleague has just said. It is a fact that you are known in this House for your kindness. Like he said, you are so kind. Congratulations.

I think the people of my riding of Outremont reflect just about all ideological positions in Canada. This riding is made up for the main part of French-speaking Canadians. However, in the western part of the riding, which is know as the Côte-des-Neiges district, live many Canadians of various ethnic backgrounds. Those can also be found in the eastern part of the riding as part of a population both homogeneous, because it lives in Outremont, and heterogeneous, because they each have their own cultures and personalities. A few months ago, I asked my constituents to fill out the questionnaire included in the newsletter I sent out. We then compiled the results and published them in a subsequent newsletter. I intend to submit these results and this whole file to the committee, as many of my colleagues have done.

Besides the questionnaires and the formal and informal meetings, there were our daily contacts with all these interesting people which stimulate the debate at all levels—intellectual, financial as well as emotional. I will try and summarize this for you in the few minutes I have left, but I will submit in writing the position that ensues.

I suggest that this debate is part of a necessary and very healthy process toward shaping the future of our country. Again, I thank you for this opportunity to express my views on this issue, to speak on behalf of the community so that we can do our share in looking for a solution to this problem that concerns all Canadians. I will not have time to get into the whole issue of the Constitution. I would need several hours to deal with the various aspects we have to consider when we think of the future of Canada. So I will merely raise specific points, including the cultural issue and the concept of a distinct society. And I may occasionally make use of information and briefs we received from a number of associations and individuals at the committee on communications and culture.

Finally, it can be said that culture is expressed by how one thinks and how one lives, how one senses and approaches reality. It would be a combination of what people in a certain area see as their history and what they reflect in their behaviour. This culture, which is constantly evolving while maintaining certain basic givens, reinforces sets of values and causes a whole society to reach certain heights of achievement. We can say that all the elements of our cultural values will affect the values and cultural manifestations of others. French speaking Canadians are not French, any more than English speaking Canadians are American or English. We are Canadians, with our own identity, and hence our similarities and differences. And that is what we must protect, share and develop.

We must also realize, that economics exist as an extension of culture, since the relationship between economics and culture is not one of equals.

We have examples across the world that show us that countries value their identity and sense of belonging before they value economics. Great Britain is unwilling to adopt a common currency because it believes that in so doing, it would adversely affect its culture and way of life.

Quebec's society has always seen itself as being distinct. The desire for recognition has always been there. However, I think it is time to get rid of the idea that being distinct means being superior. Nothing could be further from the truth. Distinct means there is a difference. It means a desire to be accepted for what one is, with one's strengths and weaknesses. In fact, Madam Speaker, feminist movements have always asked for women to be recognized as distinct from but equal to men. The same applies to aboriginal people. I think that soon we should stop talking and be reconciled with reality, which is beckoning.

Before changing the subject, I would like to add that the influence of different cultures actually reinforces our own identity, and this paradox is even more astonishing in our present world of instantaneous communication. On one hand, one must recognize the unity of the nation, which must have a certain size to be able to exist and trade with other nations in a satisfactory, profitable way that does not unduly call into question the various aspects of its national identity. On the other, the critical mass of the smaller groups that make up the larger whole must be preserved so that they are not assimilated to the detriment of the various regional entities.

That being said, I will touch on a few points in the time I have left. When the government tabled its proposals on September 24, 1991, at the same time it invited all Canadians to contribute to a real political renewal of their country.

The government has indicated many times that the proposals are a starting point. However, they are all interesting approaches to building a better Canada that will let us achieve our common goals while respecting our diversity.

Canadians' identity and values are at the forefront of the constitutional proposals. We plan to add to the beginning of the Constitution a Canada clause which would define us as Canadians and set forth our common aspirations and values, especially the respect for diversity that the country and its inhabitants are prepared to defend.

The participants at the Toronto conference gave eloquent testimony of this willingness on the weekend when they recognized the distinct character of Quebec society and said that they agreed with including this recognition in the Constitution. But while each of these cultures makes up our Canadian heritage, the government should recognize the distinct nature of Quebec society and Quebec's need to protect and promote its character as a society where most people speak French.

Since the aspects of institutional reform and a more prosperous future for Canada were not dealt with as such in the questionnaire, I would prefer to stop here.

I will move on to some other issues, such as the aboriginal one which I touched on a few moments ago, and on which I will dwell a little. Given the importance we attach to the role and the contribution the first inhabitants of this country have made and will make to the progress and prosperity of Canada, the aboriginal right to self-government constitutes one of the pillars of the proposed constitutional reform. Members of the First Nations will then have the right to devise their own solution to the problems affecting their own society, the right to take their own place in the Canada of tomorrow. If we cannot change anything to the past, we can see to it that our aboriginal people are masters of their future.

In closing, I would like to reiterate how great a country Canada is. How many times will people from outside have to repeat it before we begin to really believe it; Every day we are enjoying conditions of living that are the envy of other people on this planet. In all honesty we cannot act in such a way that our children will be deprived of all that makes our life so enriching.

It is our duty as Canadians to work together to foster dialogues that will assure national unity, economic stability and the needed degrees of autonomy for the provinces. The proposals tabled by the government have set off a process, the success of which only our efforts can guarantee. Now is not the time to give up.

The Constitution

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in the debate on the work done by people regarding the Constitution.

[English]

As a member of the special joint committee on a renewed Canada, I have had the opportunity over the last few months to hear many views on the government's 28 proposals for constitutional reform.

I would like to begin my address by extending a very special thank you to all of the people who took the time to come and address the committee. They were extremely helpful to us in attempting to find solutions to this tremendous challenge that faces us.

As well I want to extend great appreciation to those many Canadians who would have liked to appear before the committee, but for a lack of time and a number of other reasons, were unable to do so. They deserve special thanks as well.

I hope hon. members will forgive me if I pay a special tribute to my own constituents who took the time in a number of ways to inform me of their views on a number of critical issues that are found within those particular proposals.

Many of you will know that the constituency of St. Boniface is very close to the geographic centre, east-west of Canada. It, as well, has access to our great north. We have a majority of English speaking citizens with an important minority of French speaking citizens, almost 20 per cent, and of course, we have important representation from our new Canadian communities as well as our aboriginal Canadians.

How did my constituents participate in the debate and help to inform me? There were phone calls to both the Ottawa and Winnipeg offices. There were a number of well thought out letters to me indicating concern, identifying priorities and both the telephone calls and the letters were extremely useful.

I also managed to meet a broader range of constituents through three hearings which I held. The first one was on January 6 at Dakota high school. The second one was on January 7 at J. H. Bruns Collegiate which is the centre of the constituency. Dakota is in the south. On January 8, there was a meeting at College Louis Riel which is in the northern part of the constituency.

At these town hall meetings, I heard comments such as the following. I want to share them with my colleagues here and my fellow Canadians who are listening. Here is one quote that came from one participant: "Having lived in many provinces as well as Africa and Europe, I have realized that Canada is a wonderful place to live and that it is rich in its variety of people". The person goes on to say: "In a community there is room for differences and acceptance that people do different things in different ways".

Those were some of the thoughts that were shared with me. I was also invited to speak at a number of schools. I realize, as I know a number of my colleagues do, that the Constitution is not only for ourselves, and those slightly younger or slightly older, but for our children and their children and those who will follow. I was invited to Collége Jeanne Sauvé on December 16, at George McDowell School on December 18, at the Nelson McIntyre Collegiate on December 19, at l'École Provencher on December 19, at l'École Louis Riel on December 19—it was a busy day—and at Pierre Radisson Collegiate on December 20.

[Translation]

At Louis-Riel College, the format was extremely interesting. Some students had prepared a number of questions to examine the three sections of the government proposals on the Constitution, from the document entitled Shaping Canada's Future Together. The students asked me numerous questions that I truly appreciated.

[English]

The students of George McDowell School, even though they were a bit younger, as I recall it was a junior high school, asked many interesting, pointed and challenging questions, and I salute them and extend my appreciation for their preparations as well. Also, there is a very special thank you that must go out to the students of the Grade 11 history class at Jeanne Sauvé school whose teacher, Hélene Roy, sent me the fruits of their deliberations.

[Translation]

These students also gave me their own suggestions concerning the Canada clause. Among the values that they would like to see included in that clause are: the promotion of a sense of pride, belonging and unity within the Canadian pluralistic society; the promotion of tolerance among Canadians, regardless of their origins and differences; offering to all Canadians the possibility to develop their potential, wherever they live in the country, and to have equal access to employment, as well as equal treatment in the workplace; facilitating the development of the full potential of all aboriginal peoples in the aboriginal languages, and guaranteeing their total autonomy while respecting their fundamental rights as full-fledged Canadians.

[English]

I also held an open house in the constituency on January 11, and further, I distributed a questionnaire on constitutional and national issues in my fall 1991 householder.

There were, of course, people who were unhappy about certain aspects of the government's proposals and there was some criticism of the committee's deliberations, particularly in its initial stages. But generally, there were some positive remarks as well. I want to share some of those remarks with you and some of those views.

Let me deal first with the questionnaire. People rank Canadian unity within the first half of the issues that I brought to their attention. They really felt that it was something that was essential to us as Canadians. In addition, 86, almost 87 per cent, of those who responded were in favour of a Triple-E Senate; elected, effective and equal.

There was some significant concern expressed as to the meaning or ramifications of entrenching the distinct society clause in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. After debate and discussion, which brought forward many different opinions and proposed solutions, I think it is safe to say that a few general themes emerged among the constituents of St. Boniface. Many more Canadians, as are my constituents, are far more preoccupied with the present economic situation than with the Constitution. The lay-offs, the bankruptcies, the poor, the unemployed, the food banks are really a great concern to them. In fact, 64 per cent, just a few more, of those who answered the questionnaire felt that we should not be discussing the Constitution at this particular point in time because there were more pressing issues and because it was a particularly delicate time to be dealing with it.

However, there was a realization that if we needed to do it, and a grudging acceptance that perhaps it was necessary because perhaps economic development is linked to constitutional stability, then there were a number of urgent priorities. If I have understood my constituents well, as well as fellow Canadians who have spoken to me as I have travelled with the constitutional committee, these are the most important concerns. There is an acceptance, a desire, that the inherent right to self-government for Canada's aboriginal peoples be realized; that there be a reformed Senate. There is a clear preference for the Triple-E. They want a Canada clause that truly reflects the reality of a very diverse multicultural, pluralistic Canada. They ask that we deal with the division of powers without neglecting the minorities and what they have acquired over time. The question of distinct society for Quebec is also a great concern and one that needs to be dealt with.

• (2130)

Although there is a sense that accommodation is necessary, the message is really quite clear. The message is as follows: It is not appropriate to move on just one of those main points, the distinct society, a reformed Senate, aboriginal self-government, the Canada clause or the division of powers. We must move on all of them in order to get an agreement that will respond to as many needs of as many Canadians in as many parts of the country as is possible. There will be very little progress unless we can do so.

I should point out that Canadians from my constituency and I think throughout the country want a Canada clause that reflects the values and visions we have as Canadians. They also want the preamble to properly reflect the founding nations of this country and the contributions of all of those who have chosen Canada to make their home.

The division of powers is presenting a real challenge to many Canadians. We have used asymmetrical federalism as a possible way out, but it makes a lot of people nervous. They are not sure what it means, whether or not we will grant special status, whether or not we will favour a particular group over others. They want that looked at very carefully.

They are very worried about weakening the power of the federal government with respect to a number of programs: medicare, education, language rights for official minorities, culture and communications.

Among the constituents of St. Boniface, the economic proposals in the government's package are very important. They wondered whether or not the best way to treat it was within the Constitution. They also wanted a possible inclusion of social rights within the Constitution.

I would like to thank all Canadians, particularly my constituents of St. Boniface, for having contributed to this debate, for having informed me and for having enriched my life. I believe that the nation is still at risk, but if we are willing to look at each other's needs and respond generously to them, Canada can become a stronger, more united country.

I wish to complete my remarks by saying that we should build a nation by protecting rights, by building upon them and by responding to those who have been neglected with an appropriate and generous response.

I want to remind the House of what Sir John A. Macdonald had to say about this country a little over 100 years ago. I shall complete it very quickly. It is a statement which is very applicable today, and I quote:

> If I had influence over the minds of the people of Canada, any power over their intellect; I would leave them with the legacy: whatever you do, adhere to the union. We are a great country and shall become one of the greatest in the universe if we preserve it.
> We shall sink into insignificance and adversity if we suffer it to be broken.
> God and nature have made the two Canadas one. Let no factious man be allowed to put them asunder.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, home for me is Cariboo—Chilcotin, an area of the country that is truly spectacular and is matched only by its residents who are friendly, feisty and definitely outspoken. They would be the first ones to tell you that they are Canadians first and British Columbians second.

Over the past months many of these proud Canadians from the Cariboo have expressed their concerns to me. Some have written, some have stopped me on the street and others have dropped into my office. Most recently I was able to attend and participate in four town meetings organized by different communities.

At each of these four meetings I posed a question to the people attending: "If Canada did not exist today, would it be worth inventing?" My constituents were unanimous in responding with a very resounding yes. However, the Canada created might be different than the one we know now.

The meetings we held were highly charged and emotional. They included Cariboo—Chilcotins from all walks of life; ranchers, municipal leaders, natives and business people. A wide range of views were heard, both positive and negative. Basically, they all wanted the opportunity to speak and, more important, to be listened to.

It would be obvious to anyone attending these meetings that there was a great deal of anger toward certain topics in particular, and in particular, bilingualism. There is a perception that French is being forced down their throats. As one constituent stated: "We need language by choice, not by legislation". Why are they so angry? Most have never been exposed to French. They do not see it unless it is on the back of a cornflakes box. If you probe that anger, Madam Speaker, it comes down to what they see as a form of unfairness, a forced or legislated bilingual policy for some, and yet what they see as a denial of basic rights to a minority in Quebec as a result of the now infamous sign law. There is no question that this has become the lightning rod for their anger.

There is also concern about the cost of maintaining not only bilingualism but also multiculturalism. Why, they ask, should they pay for something they see as unnecessary? Why should they pay for something they believe creates irritation and division among Canadians? One Canadian, originally from Hungary, made this reasoned and somewhat passionate appeal: "Canada is a country that accepts and encourages Canadians from other countries to retain as much of their culture and heritage as they want. However, we run into problems when we start creating government departments and funding whose sole goal is to encourage immigrants to live among themselves and to amplify their differences".

This anger I am reporting on is an honest anger and it is deep-rooted. They are very leery of special status Canadians, or what some refer to as hyphenated Canadians. For some, anger and negative criticism was all they could offer. Yet for most there was a strong desire to focus on what will keep us together, and not what will push us further apart. Most of the discussion on keeping us together focused on three issues, not surprisingly the same three issues most of the country focused on: Quebec as a distinct society, Senate reform, and aboriginal self-government.

A lot of the tension was focused on Quebec. However, the Quebec issue is one where I have noticed a real swing in opinion over the past year. This time around I got a real sense that they have come to accept, albeit somewhat begrudgingly for some, that Quebec is a distinct society: they have a different language and a different culture and therefore different needs and interest. As such, they can accept and accommodate Quebec into the country as a distinct society, but that acceptance is conditional. Distinctiveness can be accommodated, but it must be done with both fairness and honour for all other regions and provinces. As one constituent put it: "I have no problem giving Quebec what it wants, as long as it is done within the framework of Canada and as long as it does not weaken us as a nation".

The next issue I will address is that of Senate reform. As we all know, Senate reform is a hot topic in western Canada. The Cariboo is no exception. Everyone agreed that there is a need for a change. The difficulty was in deciding on what kind of change is needed. There was the expected support for a Triple-E version of the Senate, but there were also some who did not see this as a total solution. Others felt the Senate as a house of sober second thought is needed, but if it is to be truly functional, then its partisan nature must be reduced and minimized.

One suggestion was to restructure the process so that the Senate veto can be overruled only if it can command a two-third majority vote in the Commons. There were others who saw no need at all for the Senate, but they continued that if it does remain then the representation should be structured in such a way that costs are kept to a minimum.

While there was some disagreement as to what changes were needed, there was no disagreement on the desired result. If I may paraphrase a constituent, we have the House of Commons, an elected body representing the people. What we need out of the Senate is something that will adequately represent the regions while keeping in mind the best interests of the nation.

• (2140)

There is no question that the people of Cariboo—Chilcotin believe that the Senate as it is now constituted is unacceptable. Either abolish it or reform it, they told me, but it must be changed. While we are at it, they suggested that the Commons could use a little work as well: less partisanship and more free votes. Our governing institutions must ensure that the needs and interests of all regions are better looked after.

Unfortunately, when it came to some issues, such as Senate reform and distinct society, there were some in my constituency who threw their arms up in the air in exasperation. As one editorial stated: "Quebec and the other constitutional issues are just too far away from the Cariboo for the local people to take them seriously".

If there is any issue that brings this constitutional debate home to us in the Cariboo, it is that of Canada's first citizens. The Cariboo—Chilcotin's population is nearly 20 per cent aboriginal, representing 32 different bands. In some communities the majority of the population is native Indian. It is the people of these communities who will have to live with the solutions we create, and it is their co-operation that will be instrumental in making the process work.

Most agreed that self-government is both desired as well as necessary. But as was the case with Quebec, autonomy is conditional. It too must be achieved within the confines of Canada. As one constituent said: "Native self-government must include both rights as well as responsibilities, and it must be restricted to within the over-all Canadian system".

The situation as it exists presently is unacceptable to natives and non-natives alike. There is a reliance on a system that is overly paternalistic. It is a system that stifles economic, social, and cultural independence, and it is a system that both natives and non-natives alike want to see dissolved.

There is little doubt in my mind that everyone who participated in the meetings came to understand that this is not an easy process, but few would disagree with the need to find a unity solution. There was a great deal of pride expressed in being Canadian, and in the end I think this is what helped us to get past the irritants and begin to look for constructive solutions.

One mayor said it best when he approached me a couple of days after a particularly stormy session: "Frankly I am embarrassed by what was said the other day. I realize that we were allowing the irritants to get in the way of presenting constructive solutions. I know that when you return to Ottawa you will have to do better than that. I hope you will look past the anger and remember that we love this country and we expect that you will do what is necessary to keep it together".

It is evident to me that the people of the Cariboo want to see this nation remain one, a nation that embodies basic fairness and one with the wisdom to acknowledge its obvious differences, differences that can make us stronger. This is the Canada those in the Cariboo want to be part of.

There were many voices from the Cariboo that comprise what I have conveyed to the House tonight. I know that many of them will have heard themselves in the words I have used. It is only fitting that I close my comments with the words of one of Cariboo's older and I suspect possibly wiser constituents. She said: "Being Canadian should be something of which we are proud. Being Canadian should be something which we practise".

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Madam Speaker, it is an honour for me to rise this evening and present here in the House of Commons of Canada a report from the citizens of Edmonton Northwest. Like my colleagues from all parts of Canada, I have received thousands of communications from constituents concerned with the unity of Canada. I have received letters from seniors who have built this country, veterans who have defended our democratic institutions, students who will inherit the responsibility for this country, business people and people from all other walks of life.

Many of my constituents are worried that our country will come apart over our differences. Many express anger over the perceived inability of elected persons at all levels to solve some very serious problems in society.

We are all aware in this House that Canadians want facts in order to help them decide important issues, not mixed messages and old time rhetoric.

In general, my constituents tell me that they are no longer satisfied with the old ways of constitution-making. It may have been okay for Sir John A. Macdonald in 1867 and even Pierre Trudeau in 1982. However in 1992

Canadians want to be consulted on the issues of the economy and the Constitution.

In the spring of 1991 I mailed a questionnaire to every household in my riding, to 40,000 homes representing 80,000 constituents in Edmonton Northwest. I have in my hand a copy of this householder entitled "Constitutional Survey -Edmonton Northwest. What do Albertans want?" This householder provided background information and asked 26 detailed and sometimes lengthy questions.

The response from Edmonton Northwest was outstanding, in that 1,000 households replied. I want to publicly thank these good citizens and assure them that I am representing their views in the House of Commons to the best of my ability. At every opportunity I discussed the results of my polling with my caucus colleagues.

My constituents realize that the economy and the Constitution are inseparably linked. They realize that there are fundamental problems with the rules set in the Constitution that are impeding our economy.

Provincial trade barriers were seen as a major irritant. Measures to improve the underlying framework of our economic union are being favourably received by many more people than the media reports. They are adamant that the federal government maintain a strong role for the economic well-being of Canada. They said that the government should continue to develop policies that will assist in meeting the challenges of the international community.

My constituents told me that education and training are necessary services of governments needed by Canadians to create jobs in a competitive world. They repeatedly told me to accelerate the deficit reduction measures so that tax dollars could go into these services or to provide some tax relief.

My constituents are, quite rightly, angered when they are shown the books and realize that 36 cents of every tax dollar is lopped off the top for interest payments on the national debt. Thankfully when I had the opportunity to explain the situation and discuss the government's progress in cutting costs, they were usually satisfied that Parliament has been doing a good job.

To summarize the central themes from the 26 detailed questions, my constituents in Edmonton Northwest wanted to see first and foremost a mechanism for increasing regional representation in federal institutions. Senate reform was most frequently mentioned.

Also, my constituents wanted a change in the process that has been followed since Confederation of constitution-making by first ministers. Like other Canadians, my constituents wanted to be more involved in the public debate and to have more control over the adoption of constitutional amendments.

The actual instrument of control was not crucial. Many cited referendums as the only way to have democratic ratification. But others realized that there are many ways for society to come to consensus on major issues.

My constituents gave a high degree of importance to providing in the Constitution means for native populations to achieve self-government and self-reliance; to empower governments and individuals with the ability to protect the environment; to empower the federal government with the ability to provide economic leadership in the major policy areas, while bringing the administration of services to a more local level of government perceived to be more responsive and accountable.

Issues that were raised which were not directly related to the Constitution yet shaped the context of the constitutional debate dealt more with the efficiency of government and a distaste for the overlap of bureaucracies.

My constituents did not approve of a large scale decentralization of powers. However they did express a desire for more clearly identified roles and responsibilities.

In fact, when asked for their preferred model for a Constitution, 72 per cent favoured either the status quo or a modest re-alignment of powers between the two levels of government.

Madam Speaker, 64 per cent of the respondents to my poll said they would favour a re-alignment of tax laws so that the government that is responsible for a particular service be responsible for taxing us for that service. This is a very direct signal to policy makers. Constituents feel as if they are being taxed without representation.

On the other hand, 74 per cent of the respondents insisted that the federal government have the authority to set national standards. I was not specific enough about this question. However, I think it is generally assumed that when we speak of national standards in Canada, we are speaking of health care, post-secondary education and similar programs, all of which are in provincial jurisdiction, funded in large measure by the federal government through transfer payments.

• (2150)

I draw attention to these two specific results to point out that the current system was an appropriate set of arrangements to meet the challenging and somewhat opposing public goals of local responsibility for service within standards set and largely funded by an outside body. Surely federal and provincial governments can streamline operations and find formal ways to eliminate duplication and improved service to the taxpayer.

I for one welcome the government's proposals to streamline and co-ordinate public services to save the taxpayer money.

My constituents value their Canadian citizenship. They were resolute in the desire that Canada remain a united country. They are proud of our charter of rights and 45 per cent indicated they would like to see extensions to the enumerated rights, property rights being most often mentioned.

As well, 61 per cent expressed a desire to abolish the notwithstanding clause. Although it was inserted at the insistence of western premiers, it has been used to infringe on minority rights. In fact the notwithstanding clause was seen as the cause of many of the irritants that some are speaking of these days.

I am told often by constituents that more needs to be done for the environment. Obviously my expertise is in the realm of public finance and my communications often reveal that. Therefore I must take this opportunity to state and affirm on behalf of my constituents here in the House of Commons that they are fearful of irreversible damage to our national environment and to public health. One constituent said: "If we do not fix our environmental deficit, then what will our efforts to fix our money deficit achieve? Our children will still be deprived of living in a healthy world".

This citizen spoke for many other constituents within my riding. In fact, 36 per cent of respondents to my survey said they thought environmental protection should be a responsibility of the federal government, 40 per cent would accept shared powers, but only 15 per cent would leave this crucial aspect of public policy to the provincial governments.

Canadians are telling us that they consider environmental protection to be of utmost concern. Even during these uncertain economic times they remain resolute. They want a strong central government to protect citizens from misguided development projects and from local governments competing to lower environmental standards.

Canadians want strong federal leadership to press the world for international environmental protocols and to have the fiscal authority and ability to use public funds for environmental causes.

At no time in our nation's history have the Canadian people been more a part of the development of constitutional proposals. The Spicer commission brought Canadians from coast to coast together to air grievances and give politicians direction. Every conceivable effort was made to provide opportunities for Canadians to express the values and aspirations that bind them together and to identify problems in our system.

A special joint committee chaired by my colleagues Mr. Edwards and Mr. Beaudoin heard from Canadians on the amending formula of the Constitution. Canadians in my riding and across the country told this committee that they were wary of extending the unanimity requirement. Canadians said they were comfortable with the current requirements that seven provinces with at least 50 per cent of the population were required for passage of constitutional proposals.

Canadians have participated in provincial committees, national forums, in federal committees, and will again be consulted after new proposals for constitutional renewal. I am grateful for this opportunity to summarize views expressed by residents of Edmonton Northwest and ask that all members consider these views.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I am absolutely delighted to have the time in Parliament, limited though it might be this evening, to give the response of the constituents of Regina—Wascana on how they feel about the Constitution. There is no question in my mind that the earlier comments received by our offices both here in Ottawa and in Regina have been by and large letters from constituents saying get on with the job, we have much more important things to do such as the economy. Yet I cannot help but think that now the importance of the Constitution has come before our constituents they have felt as I do that indeed the Constitution must be addressed. Without a resolve to solve the constitutional crisis we will not have an opportunity to have a Canadian economy.

Before I go into my summation of what the constituents have said to me thus far, I would first of all like to thank the constituents particularly for their patience.

Regina—Wascana is indeed a true test of one's intellect when comparing that with the constituents' because I probably have a higher level of intellect in the constituency of Regina—Wascana than other constituencies, and I say this with all due respect to other colleagues and their constituents, having the Saskatchewan Indian Federated College, Canada's first accredited university for Indian people in Canada as well as the University of Regina and, as well, just simply the cross section of people whom I represent.

When they come to testing you, you know you have been tested. I take the responses that I got to the questionnaire that I sent to the constituents to be a response that has been well thought out as best they can given the information that they had, and one that will truly bind me.

We are receiving in the order of about 30 responses a day now. The initial influx of responses has subsided to some degree and until such time as I am comfortable that we will have received all the responses from the people who are going to communicate with our office, I will not attempt to propose that the results I am going to give you tonight are final.

I do propose to give you a figure that will show a trend. This will be a report card. It will not be a statement of philosophy. We will save that for the final report, and indeed the report card I think you are going to find interesting as I did.

Coming from Regina—Wascana, primarily a western constituency, one is liable to think that first of all the very weighty issue of Quebec's distinct society clause which we have heard so many negatives of in the past would be held true to form in my constituency. I am pleased to report that in a particular item as one of the 28 proposals presented by the Government of Canada to the constituency general in Canada, in the constituency of Regina—Wascana there was an acceptance of the distinct society clause.

I can tell you that when I read that, it gave me a tremendous amount of relief because I thought that perhaps representing a western constituency, I would be hard pressed to see that kind of support. It was not unanimous. I do not want to say for a moment that it was unanimous, no, but it was approved in a majority. The distinct society clause as presented in one of the 28 was supported by a margin of constituents from my constituency that I say at the outset gave me great relief.

As a matter of fact, when I read all 28 proposals and the numerical results, I find that other than in areas where the constituents did not understand the precise meaning, such as question 23 for those who are following my remarks and have their forms in front of them, one with respect to the federal government and its declaratory powers, the majority of them were brave enough to say they were undecided. As a result, that tells me they did not understand the question, but as we go through the many categories, the very first one, shared citizenship and diversity, again a good substantial majority with respect to point one.

I mentioned point two, the matter of the distinct society clause. Our constituency accepts that wholeheartedly.

Point number three, that is the matter of the aboriginal participation in the current constitutional process, a very significant number. I would guess without calculating the percentages that 75 per cent of the people felt that the aboriginal community should have a stronger role to play in the development of a Canadian Constitution.

That holds true to point four, aboriginal self-government and the aboriginal constitutional process. As well, there is point six, the representation of aboriginal peoples in the Senate. We find a declining number of people who are supporting these items as I proceed, items three, four, five and six, but nevertheless, in the majority.

We find people rather strongly agreeing on some items. We look at the column entitled "agree" and we have to extrapolate that. When one goes from strong agreement to general agreement, perhaps there are slight reservations. Over all, the principle of items espoused are generally accepted.

A Canada clause in the Constitution, I cannot help but feel from the people whom I have spoken to in the past that yes, indeed. How can I define what it feels like to be Canadian when I have no guidance or no leadership in this particular area.

I think that item seven dealing with the inclusion of a Canada clause in the Constitution seems to address Canadians' lust for truly wanting to be Canadian.

I see my time is rapidly passing me by and I have merely got into the first third of what I was going to say this evening. It is obvious that there is much more that I will have to say with respect to the report card that I will be presenting to the House of Commons from the constituents of Regina—Wascana.

I should close out of respect for the clock. I encourage those who have not taken the time to fill out these forms, to do so because I will be collating all the data that I have received from my constituents as well as all individual comments and will be responding to the residents of Regina—Wascana.

Again, I want to say to the residents of my constituency, how relieved I am that they have accepted these 28 proposals and accepted a united Canada.
