As the noose tightened about Ortwein's neck the white cap was lifted, revealing his face just as the first shock of death was felt. It was a sickening spectacle, The eyes started from their sockets, the tongue shot out, and the face first flush ed crimson, then turned black, or at least seemed to do so. The fall evident ly broke his neck, as there was but a slight convulsion of the limbs. He was a powerfully built man, however, in prime health, and his chest continued to heave and throb at least five minutes. His heart ceased to beat at about seven and a half minutes after he fell. He was left hanging for some twenty minutes longer, when the body was cut down and delivered to Mr. Devore, the undertaker. It is understood that it will be taken to Dr. Dickson's hospital for a post mortem examination.
