THE FATE OF LOUIS CAPDAU. A LEGEND OF LOUISIANA, 1795.

BY MAURICE THOMPSON. A story told in a summer-house that, standing on stilts in the surf-ripples of the Mexican Gulf, looked like a heron whose plumes (the tree-fern and moss on the reof) were as green as emerald. She who told the story was a creole of creoles, and it was a bit of ancestral romance, falling from her mobile lips, as she lay in a hammock, gently swaying to the palpitations of a Cribbean content of the content of the palpitations of a Cribbean content of the most associate with mulattoes. The words were spoken in a loud, clear voice, causing every one to turn and look.

Some of them were barely quick enough to see Louis Capdau slap Don Manuel in the face. It was a heavy blow with the palm; the Spaniard reeligible to protect the planters. Naturally enough, Cortinas led his ing to the palpitations of a Cribbean

Late in the eighteenth century, about the year 1795, perhaps, the narrator's paternal line, flowing down its course of restless adventure, had found a season of quietude and comparative opulance on a large plantation not far

At that time the Spaniards had contro! of the Louisiana territory, and there was no good feeling between the French and their proud and overbearing rulers; but Chevalier de Beret knew well how to avoid friction by offering liberal, even luxuriant, hospitality to the officials of the local government, and to the social controllers

So it came about that one Don Manuel Cortinas saw and fell in love with just sixteen, beautiful as a flower, and Marie's affections were already bestowed upon Louis Capdau, brother of the afterward famous Jean Capdau, who became one of the most terrible of the outlaws then infesting the Gulf region. At that time, however, the brothers had a fine plantation near that of Chevalier de Beret, and were young men of fair standing in the colony, although nothing whatever was known of their antecedents. They were rich, owned many slaves, moved in the best society of New of a duel; but Chevalier de Beret ended his way to a corner of the verand Orleans, and were handsome withal.

The rivalry between Don Manuel | sed to Don Manuel; Cortinas and Louis Capdau was a very quiet one on the surface. The young men met frequently, exchanged polite sat at the same board; but they hated each other, of course, the Spaniard especially revolving in his mind schemes for removing his rival from the scene of action. As for Capdau, feeling sure of his place in Marie's heart, he could afford to be generous as well as perfectly complaisant

Chevalier de Beret's plantation was known in those days as the Cote de Beret, and the mansion, a rude but spacious building, was called the Chateau de Beret. It overlooked a

This perplexity was aggravated in the last degree by what took place, when one day a number of invited guests arrived at the Chateau de place, when one day a number of invited guests arrived at the Chateau de Beret to have dinner and a dance.

He doffed his hat as he came up the steps of the veranda and saluted gravely, but with a bright smile, the company, passing into their midst with the confident grace of one used to the best society.
