Third report of sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping—Mr. Rowe.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Noel Dorion (Bellechasse) presented the first report of the joint committee on Indian affairs and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to on division.

AGRICULTURE

SOYBEANS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT PRICE FOR 1959 CROP

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the agricultural stabilization board has been authorized to provide a support price for soybeans at $2.00 per bushel for No. 2 grade or better for the 1959 crop. This prescribed price is 87 per cent of the 10-year average price and 10 cents per bushel below the support price provided for the 1958 crop. All of the 1958 crop of soybeans has not yet been marketed, but it is estimated that the average market price will be considerably below $2.00 per bushel and the agricultural stabilization board will therefore be liable for a substantial payment on the 1958 crop.

The United States have reduced their support level by 24 cents per bushel, from $2.09 for the 1958 crop to $1.85 for the 1959 crop, national farm average. The lower United States support price reflects the general market outlook for the coming year. While the support price for the 1959 soybean crop has been reduced by 10 cents per bushel below the 1958 level, it will provide a real measure of assistance and should stabilize returns for this crop at a satisfactory level, particularly when consideration is given to what the growers' position would be if no assistance were provided, in view of the general market outlook for 1959 and the substantial reduction in the United States support price.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I thank the Minister of Agriculture for so readily acceding to my request of yesterday that he should announce today the government's policy with regard to a floor price on soybeans. I can only hope that other proposals I have made to the Minister of Agriculture will receive as quick attention as I made for a floor price on soybeans. I regret to say, however, that the announcement is one that will not be widely acclaimed by the soybean growers. I am afraid that this 10 per cent reduction in the floor price—

Mr. Harkness: It is not 10 per cent; it is 10 cents.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Ten cents—of course that is more than 10 per cent.

Mr. Harkness: No, it is less than 5 per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to say this to my hon. friend. Today, but only for today, his mathematics may be better than mine, but I may say to him that his appreciation of the plight of the farmers obviously is not as good as mine. This reduction represents, I think, as others have indicated in this house, a gradual withdrawal by the government, from its announced policy of supporting certain agricultural products by way of support prices.

Mr. Harkness: It is nothing of the kind.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "It is nothing of the kind", but bit by bit, day by day, the government's policy of price supports is being abridged and the farmers are receiving less and less assistance. The minister will recall that when we discussed this matter some time ago—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —I indicated to him that there had been a cut in the floor price on soybeans in the United States and that I would hope the action taken there would not be the kind of action—

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I raise for Your Honour's consideration the question which has been raised before, namely whether by way of comment upon a statement announcing the government's decision in a certain case hon. gentlemen opposite are allowed to cover the whole field, as the hon. member is doing today.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Closure.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no point of order.

Support for Soybean Crop

Mr. Diefenbaker: Hon. gentlemen opposite should be the last ones to talk about closure.

Mr. Speaker: I think the practice is reasonably clear. The comment which is permitted is limited to comment on the subject matter of the statement which was made and does not extend to extraneous matters. Further, this is not a debate. Although opportunity is given for expression of opinion, this is not an occasion for argumentative debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for supporting the position I have been taking. The Minister of Justice, who regards himself as the custodian of our rules, did not object—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have dealt with the point of order. I would ask the hon. member to continue with his comment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, we certainly have the right to comment on the point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Justice raised a point of order and—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thought I had disposed of the point of order, but I did not hear the hon. member on it. If he wishes to say something on it I will certainly hear it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Agriculture referred to the reduction in the floor price in the United States. The Minister of Justice did not criticize or take issue with his colleague's right so to do; and I was commenting on the reduction in the floor price in the United States when my genial friend the Minister of Justice, in his state of war with one of the provinces, suggested that I was out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I noted that at the time the point of order was raised the hon. member was speaking on that matter which had been raised in the statement. That particular part did not seem to me to be objectionable.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for again coming to my assistance. As the Minister of Agriculture said, the United States has reduced its floor price by 24 cents. I indicated some days ago that I hoped that it would not be necessary for Canada to follow the course that had been taken there, because the situation is not comparable.

I thank the minister first of all for so readily answering my question of yesterday, but again I must express on behalf of the soybean growers of Canada—

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —particularly those in southwestern Ontario, our regret that the government by its policy of attrition is gradually withdrawing from the floor price policy that it announced some time ago to the people of the country.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the hon. member for Essex East should be so profuse in his thanks to the Minister of Agriculture for making this announcement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I want a better result.

Mr. Argue: My only comment is that if this is to be the result of questions by the hon. member for Essex East in the future, then in the interests of agriculture in this country we hope the hon. member will cease and desist.

I notice that the Minister of Agriculture went to the United States to find an excuse for reducing the price of soybeans in Canada. If this is to be a consistent attitude on the part of the Minister of Agriculture and the government, then of course there should be an immediate deficiency payment on wheat since the price of wheat in the United States is being increased for the present crop year. But as I said in commenting on the last statement of the Minister of Agriculture when announcing another lower support price, it has become a consistent attitude and policy of the government to reduce step by step, in a piecemeal but rather consistent way, the floor prices on agricultural products.

This is a very regrettable announcement, Mr. Speaker. It shows that the government has abandoned any pretence of maintaining floor prices based on the farmers' costs of production. We can only say that we are certain this announcement will result in the same type of adverse comment already made with respect to many previous announcements of the minister during this session.

CROP INSURANCE

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCIAL SCHEMES

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the payment of contributions and the making of loans by the Minister of Finance out of the consolidated revenue fund, in respect of the operation of provincial schemes for crop insurance.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—REPORTED EVICTION NOTICES TO POLYMER CORPORATION WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works based on a telegram I have just received from the Canadian director of the oil, chemical and atomic workers international union, Sarnia, Ontario. Is it a fact that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has issued eviction notices to a number of workers involved in the Polymer strike? If so, will the minister ask the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to reconsider these eviction notices in view of the offer of the union to guarantee the payment of overdue rent following a return to work?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have had representations on this question from the hon. member for Lambton West, and investigations through Central Mortage and Housing Corporation have already been started. I hope to be able to give the house a more detailed statement tomorrow.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR MINUTES OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE MEETING ON AUGUST 26, 1958

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Would the minister table the minutes of the meeting of August 26, 1958 of the unemployment insurance advisory committee?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Hull knows, there is a procedure set out in our daily routine proceedings for such questions.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister not believe that the request made by the hon. member for Hull is reasonable, in view of the fact that the minister himself the other day, when tabling certain other reports, did table the minutes of at least one other meeting of the unemployment insurance advisory committee?

Mr. Starr: Yes, I believe it is a reasonable request, but my suggestion to the effect that there is a routine procedure to be followed is also reasonable.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL PARKS

SELF-GOVERNMENT OF TOWNSITES—TENURE OF LEASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I understand the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources has been looking into the possibility of an inquiry into the prospect of self-government for the townsites in national parks, and also into the matter of leases and length of tenure in the national parks. There is a great deal of public interest in this question, and I should like to ask the minister whether anything definite has yet been done in this regard.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): This is a matter of great interest in the western parks. I have had representations from the hon. member for Lethbridge, the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Jasper-Edson. I want to thank the hon. member for having raised this point with the department last fall, and thus we were able to take advantage of it. I have approached the institute of local government at Queen's University, Kingston, and Dr. K. Grant Crawford and his associates will undertake an impartial study, not only in the three towns of Waterton, Banff and Jasper but also in the town of Whitehorse, where the situation is somewhat the same.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED ESTABLISHMENT BY U.S. OF AERIAL TOWERS ACROSS CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Yesterday the Minister of National Defence, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Laurier on the establishment in Canada of short range tactical air navigational facilities for the United States, stated that the newspaper reports were inaccurate. I wonder if the minister could tell us in what regard the newspaper reports were inaccurate.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I was asked yesterday to comment on a report to the effect that a series of aerial radio towers were being established across Canada. From the way the question was framed I could not connect this with the TACAN agreement which had been tabled just recently. The description of the navigational instruments of TACAN as aerial radio towers is quite inaccurate. It is inaccurate also to suggest that these are being established across Canada, because they are confined to the Atlantic and Pacific areas.

Inquiries of the Ministry

RE-EQUIPPING OF R.C.A.F. SQUADRONS IN EUROPE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct another question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister yet in a position to announce a decision with reference to the re-equipping of the air division in Europe?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hellyer: I have a supplementary question. Would the minister care to comment on newspaper reports in today's press concerning the possibility of manufacturing in Canada a French plane?

Mr. Pearkes: No, Mr. Speaker. We have looked at this French plane. At the present time there is no comment that I can make as to whether or not it would be manufactured in Canada.

Mr. Hellyer: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister think that the plane most likely to be manufactured in Canada is a mirage?

Mr. Pearkes: The minister has no thoughts on that matter.

GRAIN

REPORTED DROP IN SHIPMENTS FROM LAKEHEAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am sorry I have not been able to send him notice, but would the minister comment on the report that shipments of grain, since the opening of navigation this year, have been 33 million bushels, a drop from the 72 million bushels of a year ago? Could he say whether this tremendous drop in shipments is the result of inadequate seaway facilities, insufficient shipping or both, or of a reduction in our export markets?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I did not require notice of this question from the hon. member. The 47 Conservative members from the prairie provinces are also interested in this matter and have been talking to me about it in the interval. We are not dependent upon one lone figure to draw our attention to these important facts in Canada.

I make no comment with regard to the shipping and the seaway facilities; that is not my province. The situation with regard to export trade is being maintained. The fact that the shipment of grain from the lakehead is not as great as it was last year has no effect on our export market at the present time because there is sufficient grain in position further east to handle these exports. Our exports of wheat are continuing at a good figure. We still expect to reach the quota that we set earlier in the year.

COAL

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO ADEQUATE SUPPLIES FROM CAPE BRETON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. What steps have been taken by the government to ensure an adequate supply of Cape Breton coal for Newfoundland consumers at prices competitive with United States coal?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Trinity-Conception for having given me notice of his question. In reply I wish to say this. Steps have been taken to ensure an adequate quantity of Nova Scotia coal to Newfoundland during 1959. Early shipments are going forward to the principal dealers, and arrangements have been made with the government of Newfoundland for expedition of scheduled shipments from North Sydney throughout the entire shipping season. The deputy minister of economic development, Mr. Johnson, has a complete list of the tonnages and dates of all proposed shipments.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—REPORTED DAMAGE TO GEAR OF SMALL DRAGGERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. I regret that this information just reached me a few minutes ago and I did not have time to send him notice. In view of the reply given by the minister on May 11 to a question by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Muir) in connection with the loss of trawl gear as the result of dragger operations may I ask this question. Is the minister aware that substantial damage has recently been done to small draggers' gear by the large foreign draggers operating along Cape Breton shore? What action, if any, is being taken by his department to protect trawl gear as well as smaller dragger fishing equipment?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I can say only that there is no evidence of foreign draggers operating within the three mile limit off Cape Breton. Of course, under the present international law we have no control over foreign trawlers beyond territorial waters. As to small trawlers which are allowed to fish within territorial waters, the situation has been carefully looked into and attempts are being made to rectify the difficulty.

Mr. Robichaud: I have a supplementary question. Is the minister aware of the fact that foreign trawlers are interfering with the operation of small draggers in the area of from three miles to ten miles out?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): No reports to that effect have yet come to my attention. I will look into the matter.

UNITED NATIONS

REFUGEE CONFERENCE—INQUIRY AS TO PARTICIPATION BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether Canada took part in the United Nations refugee conference which has just concluded its sessions in New York. If so, did the Canadian government agree to assist in the solution of this distressing problem?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Canada supported the resolution at the thirteenth session of the United Nations general assembly last year which set up the world refugee year. Since then, at various international meetings having to do with the problem of refugees, Canada has indicated her support for the principle of the world refugee year.

With respect to the second question, Canada is in the forefront in giving aid to refugee causes and in seeking to find permanent solutions to refugee problems. I think the hon. gentleman will be interested to learn that Canada has increased its contribution this year to the United Nations high commissioner for refugees from $200,000 to $290,000. This contribution will assist the high commissioner in clearing some of the refugee camps which have existed in Europe since the close of the second world war. Canada has pledged a cash contribution of 500,000 to Palestine refugees, as well as a special and additional gift of $1.5 million worth of Canadian wheat flour to help the agency in its difficult task of providing subsistence to the refugees in its care. We have also recently made a contribution of $60,000 to the far eastern program to bring European refugees out of mainland China to countries of overseas settlement.

I think that answer covers, in general, the question the hon. gentleman asked.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

General administration—

163. Departmental administration, including grants as detailed in the estimates and the expenses of the international labour conferences, $1,105,745.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, under this particular vote I take it I am at liberty to direct some questions to the minister with respect to Canadian participation in the international labour organization and to the consideration which Canada gives, or is contemplating giving, to some of the conventions passed by that organization in conference.

There is one convention to which I wish to make particular reference; it is one which I understand Canada has not yet ratified. I took occasion to speak to the minister on the telephone about this, and though I realize that it was only a short while before the house was to sit this afternoon, and that the minister might not yet have this information available, I should like to direct a question to him with regard to it in any event.

My question relates to I.L.O. convention No. 87, adopted in 1948. It is a convention concerning freedom of association and the protection of the right to organize, and one of the articles of that convention, article 15, points out that the director general may indicate which nations have ratified this particular convention. I wonder if the minister has any information at hand as to which nations who are parties to the I.L.O. have ratified this particular convention No. 87.

Mr. Starr: Yes, Mr. Chairman, 35 countries have ratified this convention. Unless the hon. member wishes me to read the names, I can supply him with a list of those countries at any time.

Mr. Howard: Could the minister indicate whether any of the larger and more prominent nations, such as the United Kingdom and the United States, are in that list?

Mr. Starr: Yes; the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R., Norway, the Republic of Germany, Belgium and Austria are among the 35 nations listed here.

Mr. Howard: I should like to make one or two comments with respect to what I think should be the action taken by Canada with respect to this particular convention, and though I shall address my remarks to convention No. 87 I should not be taken as indicating that Canada should not endorse other conventions of the I.L.O. I think Canada should, before now, have taken the steps necessary for the endorsement of this convention; and if consultation with the provinces is involved, as I think it may be, I suggest we should already have entered into such discussions.

There are two or three articles in this convention which relate to the guaranteeing of certain rights and freedoms to both employers' and employees' organizations with respect to the right to organize, and I feel sure that if Canada had taken steps earlier than, at least, January of this year toward the ratification of this particular convention we might have avoided the unfortunate situation which arose in the province of Newfoundland recently involving the decertification of two unions in that province.

I will point out, if I may, that article 4 of this convention, had it been enforced, would have dealt with, or covered, the particular events which occurred in Newfoundland, because it provides that organizations of workers and employers shall not be liable to be dissolved or suspended by administrative authority. Another article mentions that public authorities shall refrain from any interference which would restrict the lawful exercise of the right to organize. Article 11 of the convention provides that each member to which the convention applies undertakes to take all necessary and appropriate measures to ensure that workers and employers may exercise fully the right to organize. This is the general tenor of the drafting of this particular convention.

I think each of those articles to which I have referred has been abrogated in one of the provinces of Canada, notably the province of Newfoundland, where public authorities and administrative authorities have taken steps contrary to the provisions of this I.L.O. convention, even though it is not in force in Canada, by dissolving and suspending certain unions and impeding the lawful right to organize in that province. Failure to ratify this convention reflects not only on the present government but also, in an even larger measure, upon the government which preceded it, because it will be recalled that the Liberal government was in office continually from the time the I.L.O. passed this convention in 1948 until the general election of 1957. That was nine years during which that government had the opportunity, had it so desired, to take steps toward the ratification of this convention which would in large measure have prevented the disgraceful situation which developed in Newfoundland in so far as the lawful right of unions to organize and establish themselves in that province is concerned.

Some time ago on orders of the day I asked the minister whether Canada had ratified this convention and, if not, would he give consideration to the idea. I took it from his remarks that consideration would be accorded to the question, and I wonder if the minister could now indicate what steps he has taken to that end.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, upon delving into this convention with a view to seeing whether it could be ratified, the information I have, based on good evidence, is that the subject matter of the convention is almost wholly within the jurisdiction of the provinces. Only to a minor degree is it within the jurisdiction of this parliament. For that reason two other countries of which we are aware, the United States and Australia, have not ratified this convention.

Mr. Howard: This may be a general query I am posing. Can steps not be taken to have the parliament of Canada deal with conventions of a similar nature where federal and provincial jurisdiction are involved?

Mr. Starr: We cannot take up the question of ratification of conventions where the subject matter comes almost wholly within the jurisdiction of the provinces. We would be going entirely out of our field of jurisdiction and contrary to the laws established by the provinces, where they exist.

Mr. Howard: Is it because of the jurisdiction of the provinces and existing provincial legislation that we are prevented from dealing with these conventions?

Mr. Starr: I would say that is correct, if I apprehended the hon. member correctly.

Mr. Howard: Would the minister not think that a question of forced labour within a province would alter the situation?

Mr. Starr: That subject is entirely foreign to our way of life and to conditions in Canada. We have no such thing as forced labour in this country, and consequently no statutes dealing with that subject are on the books of the legislatures.

Mr. Howard: Let me pose another question. Suppose one province undertook to establish a system of forced labour contrary to the provisions of the I.L.O. convention we reviewed the other day. What position would Canada be in with respect to dealing with that province?

Mr. Starr: We would consider the situation on its merits at that time.

Mr. Argue: And that is all you would do.

Mr. Howard: The minister cannot have it both ways. He cannot say in one case that it is all right to invade the jurisdiction of the provinces because it involves something that has not happened so far in Canada, and when it comes to a question that has not arisen in Canada until recently, when it arose in one province, take the opposite view. We have to be consistent.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, this is an entirely different convention from any others that come within provincial jurisdiction. In my opinion we have not in this case violated the jurisdiction of any province. There is no legislation to that effect, nor do I expect there ever will be.

Mr. Howard: Until two months ago no one in this country expected that a province or the federal government would take the kind of action that was taken in Newfoundland, where political interference in the right to organize a labour union occurred.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must remind him that we are discussing the estimates of the Department of Labour, and it is quite out of order to discuss a hypothetical situation that may arise in a province and speculate about what course of conduct the federal government would follow in such a case. Furthermore I believe the discussion being carried on relates to federal-provincial relations, which do not come within the purview or scope of these estimates. I must point out to the hon. gentleman that he was quite out of order in his latter remarks and it would be appreciated by the Chair if we could confine the debate to the item under discussion.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, speaking to the point of order you have raised, surely it is a long-standing practice in this committee that on the first item of any department, which is the administration item, a great deal of latitude is allowed hon. members of the committee to discuss general matters coming under that department. Surely the question of Canada's action or lack of action with respect to an international convention is an appropriate subject for discussion under this item.

As far as reference to something that has happened in the provinces is concerned, I would suggest that is only a matter of opinion anyway, and I feel therefore it is entirely within the right of any hon. member to discuss labour matters within the provinces.

With respect to a discussion of specific actions in Newfoundland, there are many precedents in the records of this committee which support the view that it is within the right of hon. members to discuss certain laws that have been passed in the provinces, provided an hon. member does not seek to discuss any question of disallowance which is under consideration by the cabinet. The hon. member for Skeena made no reference to the question of disallowance, and in my submission was discussing in a proper manner the general field of labour under item 1 of these estimates.

The Chairman: I think the hon. member for Assiniboia has failed to interpret my remarks correctly. It is quite true that on item 1 of the estimates of any department a certain latitude is permitted by the Chair concerning the matters to be discussed under the particular department involved, but this latitude does not extend into every field. The rules of relevancy must be strictly applied.

At the present moment we are discussing the estimates of the Department of Labour. As long as hon. members confine their remarks to the estimates of the Department of Labour they will be in order, but when they embark on a discussion of federal-provincial relations or what course of conduct the government might follow in a hypothetical situation, the Chair will call such remarks out of order. As long as I am in the chair I shall enforce strictly the rules of relevancy, and this will apply to all hon. members of the committee.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, in accordance with your ruling I shall confine my remarks to this particular item. I think I would be in order in this instance—and I ask your guidance if I am not—in discussing the parliament of Canada, the nation of Canada, the government of Canada, and its participation in international labour organization conferences. As I understand it, we are sending delegates to this conference. I understand the minister will be one of the participants in the I.L.O. conference this year, and that from time to time various conferences of the I.L.O. do endorse conventions. It is then up to the member nations, in this case Canada, to determine whether it desires to ratify any particular convention.

We were discussing that phase of it, and I queried the minister as to why Canada had not as yet ratified one particular convention, namely I.L.O. convention No. 87. The minister indicated that this was because jurisdiction over labour matters was divided between the provinces and the federal government. I hoped we might be able to develop that particular theme because of the divided jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the various provinces, in so far as Canada's attitude is concerned.

With respect to the convention we ratified the other day regarding forced labour, or the abolition of forced labour, I would ask the minister whether it is a fact that because the Canadian parliament gave ratification to the abolition of forced labour convention the provinces are bound in so far as their jurisdiction is concerned? Does the fact that the federal parliament ratified a particular convention which cuts across the jurisdiction of the provinces in effect bind those provinces to that convention? What is going to happen if some action is taken?

The only answer I have received from the minister so far is that we shall cross that bridge when we come to it. I submit the minister should have crossed that bridge before, and should have had at least the common decency and courtesy to discuss it with the provinces, because he himself admitted that they do have jurisdiction in this matter. He should have discussed with them their opinions and their attitudes with respect to the abolition of forced labour.

I am quite sure he would have had no difficulty. I am quite sure there is not a province in Canada, Newfoundland included, that would have objected to the abolition of forced labour. The minister should have had the courtesy to do that. He did not. He has not yet said why he did not, but he does say it cuts across the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities and, in fact, invades their jurisdiction. It is either that, or it does not apply to them at all. It applies only to that section of labour, as it is classified, which comes under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.

I wonder whether the minister can clarify this particular point, whether or not the ratification which the house gave the other day to the abolition of forced labour convention binds the provinces of this country to follow the same approach and not take any steps to promote forced labour but to continue its abolition.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the minister a question. I saw an announcement the other day of the personnel of the employers' delegation to the next international labour conference, but I did not see at the time and I have not seen since anything with respect to whether or not the labour representatives had been announced, through either the minister or the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister say anything about this? Perhaps he could give us at the same time, if he is in a position to do so, the delegation as a whole.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, there are six employee delegates, six employer delegates and an equal number of government delegates, making 18 altogether. The government delegates are supplemented by two more who are operating in Europe at the present time. I am sorry that the officials have not the names of the employee delegates, but they have been designated and I understand they have left for the conference. I can procure their names for the hon. member.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We should know at some time or other who are going to comprise the delegation.

Mr. Starr: They have left now. We have not the names handy at the moment, but we can supply them.

Mr. Caron: On the orders of the day I asked the minister whether he could table the minutes of a meeting of the unemployment insurance advisory committee. The minister answered me at the time and said there was a procedure set out in our daily routine proceedings for such questions. Well, the reason we had no time to place it on the order paper as a motion is that the industrial relations committee is sitting at the present time, and we are in need of all the information available to be in a position to discuss the matter which has been sent to that committee. Since we are sitting at six o'clock this evening we need the minutes at that time. I think it would be an easy matter for the minister to supply the minutes of the meeting of August 26, 1958. There is a lot of material in those minutes which would help the industrial relations committee to understand a little better the bills which have been sent to it.

As a matter of fact we have had a new report from the Department of Labour, bureau of statistics, indicating the number of unemployed in the country at the present time. We see and we rejoice in the fact that there was a reduction of 77,000 in the month of April as compared with last year. I think everybody in Canada will rejoice at that reduction. We know that 7.3 per cent of the labour force are still on the unemployed list, or were in the month of April. This is a very high figure, which must give us concern about the possibility of there being a very high rate of unemployment in Canada next winter.

This is one reason we would like the minister to bring before the house some legislation which will help not only to reduce slightly the number of unemployed, but also help those who will be receiving nothing.

The number varied from 445,000 to 550,000 last January. A great many of these people will not have received any stamps and therefore will not be receiving any benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Something must be done in this matter before next winter. I take advantage of this opportunity to ask the minister whether the time has not come when we should know what the government intends to do.

We know that unemployment is going to be severe next winter. We know something will have to be done. We know the municipalities will have to carry a very heavy load. Knowing all these things, we expect the government to be ready to present some kind of legislation to alleviate all the difficulties that will be created by this situation. Now that the minister is free I will come back to my question. Will the minister be kind enough to table this afternoon the minutes of the meeting of August 26, 1958, of the unemployment insurance advisory committee? Is the minister ready to answer?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I advised the hon. member on the orders of the day as to the procedure to be followed in order to secure the production of any papers. There is provision for that under routine proceedings and orders of the day.

Mr. Caron: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is what the minister said, but if he had listened to me a while ago he would have known—

Mr. Starr: I heard the hon. member repeat it twice, and what I said on the orders of the day still goes.

Mr. Caron: The minister does not seem to appreciate the importance of these documents to those members who are working on the industrial relations committee. We have to sit morning and night, all the time, to try to finish the work we have to do. The only thing we are asking from the minister now is a little co-operation. If the document can be produced in a day or two by placing a motion on the order paper, it is just as easy to table it now because these reports are in the hands of the minister at the present time. The only thing we are asking is that the minister not be so fussy about the rules and regulations of the house and give us this document which we need.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member referred to reports. I filed the reports.

Mr. Caron: I am talking about the minutes of the meeting which was held on August 26, 1958.

Mr. Starr: There was no meeting held on August 26.

Mr. Caron: All right; the minister wants to be fussy about dates. He knows perfectly well what I mean. It was the last meeting held in August, 1956—I mean 1958; the minister will rise again and say that it was not 1956. We want a little bit of understanding from the minister. Up to this year we have been able to get some co-operation, but this year he seems to be completely unwilling to co-operate with the opposition. We need this document badly, and the only thing we want is for the minister to extend a little bit of co-operation.

Some members to my left are talking. If they want to rise and make speeches I will be very pleased to listen to them; otherwise, Mr. Chairman, please ask them to be quiet. If they want to speak loudly enough so I can hear them I may be able to answer them. Will the minister agree to co-operate with the members of the industrial committee—the industrial relations committee? I had better be careful not to change the words.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the hon. member for Hull has asked a fair question. I believe the minister, who is a fair-minded man, will accede to this request. He will remember that when we were discussing the unemployment insurance amendments the other night he tabled of his own volition certain reports that had been prepared by the advisory committee under the former administration.

Mr. Grafftey: Are you sure he did it of his own volition?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to know what my profound, experienced and hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. Grafftey: I merely asked the hon. member if he is sure the minister did it of his own volition.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, the Minister of Labour did it of his own volition. There was one report he tabled after I had asked about its existence, but the other reports I am referring to were tabled by the minister voluntarily without any suggestion from this side of the house. After he tabled those reports I had the opportunity of examining them, and I found attached the minutes of at least one meeting. The dates of the meeting in question are confusing because at the top of the report it says "Ottawa, August 26, 1958" and later on in the body of the report it refers to a series of committee meetings that were convened on August 19. It is with regard to the minutes of these meetings that the member for Hull has asked the minister. The basis for the request by the hon. member for Hull is that this morning in the industrial relations committee—

Mr. Pallett: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who is on his feet at the present time is an experienced member of the house, and he knows there can be no reference in the house to proceedings that take place in a committee until the report of the committee is before the house. I just wanted to draw that to his attention, because it appeared that his remarks were tending in a direction in which perhaps he did not realize he was going.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know of no such rule which precludes a member, having been denied in the committee—

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let me finish my reply.

Mr. Pallett: —if the hon. member knows of no such rule I would refer him and you, Mr. Chairman, to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, page 251, citation 324, which reads as follows:

(1) Until the report and evidence have been laid upon the table, it is irregular to refer to them in debate, or to put questions in reference to the proceedings of the committee.

(2) When the evidence is before the house it may be debated at length, but members will not be permitted to discuss the conduct or language of members of the committee, except so far as it appears on the record.

(3) If a document has been formally laid before a committee of the house, and entered upon its minutes, it is in the possession of the house, and it is a breach of privilege for any person or department to withhold it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What citation is that?

Mr. Pallett: It is citation 324, page 251.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am not going to argue the point. On reflection I think there is some merit, but only some, in the observations of my hon. friend. But having suggested what I have in my mind by merely a few words at the beginning of a new sentence, I am sure the Minister of Labour knows perfectly well what the situation is. The minister has said that he is prepared to give consideration to the request if it is made by way of a motion for the production of papers. If my hon. friend insists on relying on that procedure nothing can be done about it, but I would point out to him that it would be of great assistance while we are engaged otherwise outside of this house—

Mr. Pickersgill: Or even in this committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then I will say "outside of this particular chamber" in an effort to satisfy my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman did not understand my point. I was suggesting that it would be a great help right here in this committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As usual the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is right. It would also help us in this committee. The Minister of Labour has these minutes readily available, and can produce and table them today so they can be used by this committee, or he can go through the other procedure which will involve some delay. I am sure that his winning ways would be helpful if he would only give some recognition to the reasonable request so mildly put forward by my colleague the hon. member for Hull.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to echo this request, because submissions by a number of organizations concerning the meetings covered by these minutes have come to our attention. Because other organizations have made reference to meetings that were held, and specific dates and resolutions, I think these minutes should be produced. I feel that a great deal could be gained by the production of these minutes now rather than going through the long and tortuous method that would have to be followed to obtain the information contained in them from the people who took part in these meetings. The minutes themselves would give us the information we desire more expeditiously and with a great deal less heat than is going to be generated if these facts have to be ascertained from the people who took part in the meetings.

A great many of these people are now sending us briefs, and whether or not they know all the answers they certainly know what was said at these meetings. They know what is in the minutes of these meetings. I think a great deal of hardship is being imposed upon the members of this committee by the failure to produce these minutes. It seems that everyone except the members of parliament knows exactly what is in them. I do not believe it is going to be any more advantageous to us to have to ask a number of outside people what the minutes contain, and I think the Minister of Labour will expedite the business of the committee by producing these minutes.

It is probably quite true that the minutes do not have to be produced. However, I believe that on previous occasions the minister has done things he was not compelled to do; he has been very lenient in connection with other matters. This is a case in which less heat is going to be generated and a lot less difficulty created in a number of rooms in this House of Commons if these minutes are produced in this fashion, rather than forcing hon. members to reconstruct what took place at these meetings by interviewing the people who took part in them.

I think the minister should give some consideration to this procedure, unless there is something specific in those minutes which the government does not want published. The minutes could be presented, and this would expedite the consideration of the estimates of the minister's department.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I want to revert to that question, but in French this time, because I am more at ease in French. We submit this is a question of paramount importance and, if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) was willing to co-operate a bit, the debate would be much shorter. In fact I am convinced that even in some committees the debates would also be shortened if there was willingness to give opposition members the co-operation which is required at times. However, I realize that the present position of the minister seems to be a by-product of the government's definite policy of unwillingness to provide the opposition with the material they need to perform their assigned task. By the same token, the people of Canada are being denied information they are entitled to have. And why are they being so denied? Merely for the pleasure of thwarting those who are in the minority.

As was mentioned by the previous speaker, representatives of various organizations seem to be aware of all that went on at the sittings of that committee. Moreover, they seem to be informed of all the minutes which were passed; the members of this house are the only ones who are not, and they cannot obtain the facts. To that effect, the Minister of Labour suggests we should place on the order paper a notice of motion for the production of papers. Well, Mr. Chairman, it is precisely because we cannot do it for lack of time, and because we need this information immediately, that we are making our request. It is not for the mere pleasure of filibustering, since I believe that at the present time any filibustering is being instigated by the government, more particularly so by the Minister of Labour.

We want to obtain this information so as to get a better grasp of the facts, and to discuss intelligently the subject matters which are deferred to the industrial relations committee. Whenever that matter comes up, at meetings of the committee on industrial relations or anywhere else, the answer is always the same: the Speaker of the house has ruled such and such, and even then the actual ruling is not reported, so that on the basis of misconstrued rulings, we are again denied access to necessary material.

(Text):

Mr. Pallett: The hon. member is again directing his thoughts, as was the hon. member for Essex East, to matters that are not—

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I was not speaking of the committee. I said that in certain committees the members are refused the material they need. I was not referring to one committee in particular, and this I have a right to do because I am not discussing matters which are being considered by one committee. I think it is the policy of the government—

Mr. Pallett: I assume, then, from what the hon. member is saying that he is not making reference to any matters that are before any of the committees that are sitting now or which have been sitting in the last few days?

Mr. Caron: I was speaking of a general attitude on the part of government members in the house and in the committees.

The Chairman: Order. First of all I must apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but I believe that as chairman I should make a few remarks at this stage on this particular item. Requests have been repeatedly made, and the reasons for those requests set forth during the last half hour, for the tabling of the minutes of a certain meeting which took place on August 26, 1958, I believe. The Minister of Labour has made a suggestion that a motion be put before the house in the normal fashion for the tabling of these papers. Hon. members have sought to expedite matters by requesting that the minutes be tabled immediately.

I must in all sincerity confess that you have put your chairman in a dilemma at this time. On the one hand I must advise hon. members on my left that a repetition of the same argument for the tabling of these minutes does not conform with standing order 34 (2), which deals with repetition. On the other hand the minister has made a suggestion concerning the tabling of these minutes. If the Minister of Labour persists in his decision, and if hon. members opposite persist in repeating the same arguments, I shall have to ask the committee to pass on to another item. It would be appreciated if an answer could be given to these requests, and it would certainly facilitate the task of the chairman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before the Minister of Labour replies, perhaps I could offer an argument that is clearly within the rules at this time.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): How would you know?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "How would you know?" I suppose I would know for reasons that would be different from those which the hon. gentleman would entertain on the same point.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You have been wrong three times on the rules this afternoon so far, but I will concede that you admitted that you were wrong.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, when he is caught, is usually generous. He is caught now, and he acknowledges that the fault is not all one-sided. What I rose to say, Mr. Chairman, was that if my friend the hon. member for—what is the name of that riding in which all these people are out of work?

Mr. Pallett: You are referring to the banner county of Peel?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes; the riding of Peel, which has the Avro plant. I knew that something struck me forcefully when I looked at my hon. friend. What I was going to say was that if he was in order, as I think he was, in calling my attention to citation 324 a moment ago, I am sure he will agree with the argument I am now going to make. We will be dealing later on in the estimates with item No. 172, which has to do with the unemployment insurance commission and also with (S) under that number which has to do with the government's contribution to the unemployment insurance fund.

I was not fully appreciative of the observation made by my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate a few moments ago, when he said "It will be useful before this committee". I am grateful to him for mentioning this point. The minutes asked for by the hon. member for Hull will be of concern and interest to this committee when it comes to deal with these items. I would ask the Minister of Labour if he does not think he would facilitate the passage of his estimates if he acceded to a request which he is prepared to fulfil in a few days.

We have a right to ask for this information. It is germane to the discussion under item No. 172. I put the request to the minister again and ask him to table these minutes. If the minister refuses one will be obliged to draw the conclusion that the minister, for some reason or another, does not wish to have disclosed to this committee and to the country the nature of those minutes.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I shall put my question in a different way, in keeping with section 34 of the standing orders. Since the minister seems reluctant to table the minutes concerned unless we introduce a special motion to that effect, I would ask him to consider sending the report of the minutes concerned to the chairman of the committee on industrial relations, so that we can refer to them when needed.

Would the minister agree to that request?

Does the minister's silence imply refusal?

(Text):

Mr. Pallett: This is an improper request.

Mr. Caron: I have a right to know whether or not the minister wants to do it. That is the right of any hon. member. I am asking the minister whether his silence is a refusal to produce these minutes.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I do not know how many times the hon. member needs to be told of the procedure to follow in this respect.

Mr. Caron: I am asking another question. Is it or is it not a refusal? Am I to get a straight answer? I am asking that straight question.

The Chairman: Order. It is rather against the rules for the minister to answer this question. I cannot demand that the minister answer the latter question of the hon. member for Hull. The minister suggested that the regular procedure be followed in this instance. I do not believe I can permit the hon. member for Hull to demand of the Minister of Labour that he answer the last question he asked.

Mr. Caron: I will not continue on this subject, Mr. Chairman. I will just accept as a refusal the silence of the minister.

The Chairman: Shall vote 163 carry?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Chairman. The other day when we were discussing this item the suggestion was made—and I think it was not unreasonable—that in view of the employment situation at the present time perhaps this item, after we have concluded our discussion of it now, might be permitted to stand so that at the end of the session it could be brought forward again in the light of the unemployment or employment situation at that time and we could, under this item, hear from the minister what steps, if any, the government have taken in the meantime to deal with this situation. I am thinking particularly of the plans for winter work which, as the minister I believe himself agreed the other day, should be put into train at the earliest possible moment.

I am speaking now from recollection but I think I am right, and the minister may be able to correct me if I am wrong. I believe a request of this kind was made at least once in the past, namely that the item, without prejudice, should be allowed to stand after the discussion had been completed, for the purpose I have indicated; I think I am right in saying that the request was accepted at that time by the previous administration.

The reason I make this request is that the figures which have been recently released—I think they were released yesterday—show an encouraging improvement in the employment picture. From that improvement no doubt the government can take a special satisfaction, but we all rejoice in it. Nevertheless, in spite of that improvement, there are still some 445,000 unemployed on the basis of the bureau of statistics estimates—perhaps that is not the exact figure, but I think it is something like that—or something over 700,000 on the basis of the other calculation. That remains, of course, a serious situation; and justifies the request we are making, namely that when its consideration at this time is concluded—and perhaps it is not concluded yet—this item should be permitted to stand so that at the end of the session it can be brought forward again. Then we can have a look at the employment situation at that time and get from the government before this session of parliament ends a statement of its plans for winter works programs or anything else it may have in mind which will bring about an improvement in the situation. We recognize it is improving but a great deal more improvement is required before we on this side of the house can be satisfied with the picture in this country.

Mr. Starr: In reply to the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Chairman, I must say at once, as I said last week when my estimates were before the committee, that I cannot accede to that request. These are the estimates of the Department of Labour. The responsibility for action on unemployment in this country is that of the government. The government will have to decide what action it will take and the appropriate time for that action.

The figures that have been quoted by the hon. member are a month old. Since then there has been a further improvement. Hence the situation is not as dark as he tries to paint it at this moment. It is much brighter, and we hope it will continue to become brighter still. But the responsibility for action in this matter is still with the government. When the government feels that it is the appropriate time to assess the situation, it will do so and will reveal its plans.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask the minister: when is an appropriate time? The hon. gentleman has just stated that the figures quoted by my hon. friend on my left are a year old—

Mr. Starr: A month old.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry. A month old. I was in Vancouver only two days ago, and two days ago in Vancouver, because no action has been taken by the Minister of Labour or by the government in response to repeated requests from this side of the house for action which would extend the period of seasonal benefits, between 7,000 and 8,000 men were cut off unemployment insurance. That is according to the figures given by the Vancouver Sun and the Vancouver Province when I was in Vancouver at that time.

What are those men supposed to do? When is an appropriate time to take care of those 7,000-8,000 men who were cut off from benefits two days ago because no action had been taken to continue the payment of unemployment insurance? As nearly as I could point out—and I was only able to spend two or three hours in Vancouver—the answer they were given was: apply for social welfare. That was the answer the government gave in Vancouver two days ago. When is the appropriate time for action by this government—afterwards or before? I would appreciate an answer. I asked this question about a month ago, and so did others on this side of the house. What are these men supposed to do? Starve to death? Apparently they are.

Mr. Starr: In answer to the hon. member I want to remind him again that this government extended seasonal benefits for two months.

Mr. Winch: I admit that.

Mr. Starr: This government also extended seasonal benefits by an additional six weeks last year.

Mr. Winch: I admit that, too.

Mr. Starr: Because of this situation, the fund has been depleted to such an extent that we must now consider increasing the contribution rates on the advice of the actuary. We are now being criticized in this house for depleting the fund, and we did it in order to help people such as the hon. member has described.

Mr. Winch: What about the position of these people two days ago?

Mr. Starr: You are criticizing us for what we did last year.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The last statement by the Minister of Labour was most unusual. He is saying that because of the fact that the government has provided supplementary payments the fund has been depleted. He might have added that it has been seriously imperilled, as we now know, because of the fact that it has now been reduced to $496 million. But if the fund has been imperilled, that is only one of the contributing reasons and it is not even the major reason. The major reason for the depletion of the fund is that we have had in the last two years the highest level of unemployment we have experienced in the history of Canada except for the years 1930 and 1935. That is the reason why the fund has been so seriously depleted. The hon. minister takes satisfaction because, he alleges, the unemployment figures at the present time are even less than was reported on May 20. That is a situation which will be welcomed by everyone in this country.

But the figures now before us show a serious and continuing problem of unemployment—445,000 persons without jobs and seeking work. That represents a decrease of 80,000 compared with the previous month, but 445,000 out of work is nevertheless a serious figure. The minister says he can show that the number has been considerably reduced since those figures were issued. I would be interested in knowing what is the revised figure. It should not be forgotten that the reported statistics as contained in this monthly release do not cover all the workers of the country and that in addition to the 445,000 must be added at least another 60,000 who are not included in the standard of measurement used by the bureau of statistics in the compilation it presents monthly. The minister can correct me if I am wrong in this assumption.

In any event, there is a serious problem of unemployment still confronting us, and the request made by the Leader of the Opposition and repeated on Friday last by other hon. members of this house was founded upon the desire to elicit from this government its plans for dealing with this hard core of unemployment which, according to every indication, is likely to continue into the fall of 1959 and into the winter of 1960 at levels we hope not at all comparable with what we have experienced during the past two years.

The request of the Leader of the Opposition is, surely, not an unfair one. The minister replies by saying that it is the responsibility of the government to announce policy, and that the government will announce its policy when it feels it is the proper time to do so. I say this to the Minister of Labour: if it is the responsibility of government to formulate policy, as undoubtedly it is, then it is also the responsibility of the government to recognize the duty which it owes to parliament, and parliament is asking now, through some of its members, for a declaration of policy for the ensuing months.

We do not want to be confronted next winter with a situation such as attended us this winter, namely finding that the government had embarked on an employment program in the late fall too late to give that program an opportunity for providing work for a much greater number of people than the 33,000 or 35,000 persons provided for under the government's winter works program. That program, in its results, did not touch the problem of unemployment, and in making this request to the minister we are, in fact, asking the government to let this first item stand so that we shall not be caught by a situation at the end of the session which would not offer us the same instrument for calling the attention of the government, if the situation should warrant it, to the fact that it has not brought forward at this early period a program designed to take care of the unemployment situation which may exist in the fall, or in the winter of 1960.

If the government has a program for next fall or next winter, can that program not be announced now? If the minister would tell us what that program is, this item will go through very speedily. If the minister would rise and say that the government has not decided on what kind of program, if any, it is going to present to parliament to take care of the situation next fall and next winter, then that at least would be a reply, and the opposition would have to consider the course it should follow. But the minister does not give us any indication whether or not this winter works program is to continue.

Surely, he sees himself that some announcement is desirable. I know he does. I regret he should find himself in his present position because, as I said the other day, if he had direction of this matter there is no doubt what he would do: he would come forward now with a program. But obviously his colleagues are not agreed on this subject, and he must therefore take responsibility for the failure of the government to tell parliament and the nation at this time what its program is to be.

Let no one minimize the seriousness of this problem. The unemployment figures as revealed yesterday represent 7.3 per cent of the labour force as is stated in the release which bears the imprimatur of the minister. That figure compared with 5.3 per cent of the labour force out of work in the United States and with less than 3 per cent in the United Kingdom indicates how serious our problem continues to be. We asked last June, July and August what we are now asking the minister today, to state the government's policy so we could anticipate along with it the kind of situation which we feared would eventuate. We are now saying to the minister that on May 21, the indices indicate that we will have a serious problem of unemployment next fall and next winter. We hope it will not be as severe as during the two previous corresponding periods, but it is going to be a problem of some seriousness. Will the government not now announce its policy, giving the municipalities sufficient advance notice so they can prepare their budgets? Will the government not now, through the Minister of Labour, also indicate whether the program will be extended so as to include such factors as supplies and thereby enable many communities such as my own community, thus far not having participated in this scheme, to have an opportunity of so doing.

The minister has won the respect of hon. members of this committee. I say to the Minister of Labour in the friendliest manner that if he would accede to this request he would find that he would cause his estimates to be disposed of rapidly and would give the country and parliament some sense of satisfaction in knowing that this government, a government that made so many promises in this field, is at long last prepared to take strenuous and vigorous steps toward easing unemployment.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I should also like to speak to the Minister of Labour in a very friendly manner. I fully appreciate all that was said by the previous speaker in asking for a pronouncement from the Minister of Labour on the plans of the government for this summer, this fall and this winter to meet the problem of unemployment. There is no question whatever but that this is a reasonable request to which the minister should accede. I support all that was said by the hon. member for Essex East and endorse the questions he asked but I believe there is a problem of an even more immediate nature. We should have from the minister a statement concerning the government's present position, policy and plans for those who may not have food on the table this week of which there must now be thousands because of the fact that the supplementary or seasonal period for unemployment insurance has expired.

I recognize the truth of what the minister said in answer to a question a few moments ago. I appreciate all that the government has done in terms of extending on two occasions the seasonal or supplementary benefit period for unemployment insurance. That is all to the good. We congratulated the minister before on having done this and if he wishes more congratulations we will extend them to him at this time. However, the good work and good policies of the past mean nothing at all if no provision is made for a situation that may develop this week. The extension of the period to a certain date this month, excellent as it is, is not going to put ham and eggs or oatmeal on the breakfast table of hungry Canadians tomorrow.

In view of all the questions raised in the past and again today it is obvious that the government gave no consideration whatever to what would happen to the thousands across Canada on seasonal or supplementary benefits when the period was closed off. When thousands are cut off from receiving unemployment insurance benefits on one day it is not to be assumed that there are thousands of jobs waiting to be filled by them. What is the planning and thinking of the minister and the government in this respect?

It is now common knowledge that there was no planning or interest on the part of the government in the thousands of Canadians who were cut off. They were on their own unless they were prepared to go through the procedure of making application for receipt of social welfare or what is commonly known as relief. Hon. members of this committee are perfectly in order in raising questions such as those raised today by the hon. member for Essex East. These reasonable questions have been put to the government in emphatic terms on many occasions and are deserving of honest answers. But of even more importance is that the government inform us through the minister what the government's policy is for those who are not only unemployed but not in receipt of seasonal or supplementary unemployment insurance payments.

It is easy to speak in platitudes and generalities about what has been done in the past but that does not feed, clothe or shelter those who in the past two days have been denied any further assistance under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I believe we are being very reasonable in asking for an answer to this question.

Having just returned from my home city of Vancouver I can say that this is the question my constituents expect me to direct to the Minister of Labour: How do they eat tomorrow and next week when no jobs are available and without receipt of unemployment insurance payments?

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, the minister says: "We shall act in due course", yet everybody knows that "to govern is to foresee".

I fully agree with everything the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) just said. Since additional benefits or payments have ceased, i.e. since May 15, the position has become serious not only in view of next fall, winter and spring, but even now. I realize that people will not die of hunger, because they will turn to the municipalities, but by that time municipalities will have to carry too much of a load for their means, as they did last year.

I have previously quoted some figures in this respect, and I am repeating them. In 1955 the city of Hull spent $180,000 on public relief, part of which was paid by the provincial government and the rest by the municipality. Under this heading the budget of the city of Hull provides for the fiscal year 1959-60 an amount of $588,000.

What is the department planning to do for the relief of municipalities? Did not the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) promise the municipalities before March 31, 1958 that he would help them, knowing that they lacked the taxation powers of the provincial and federal governments? Just now, when municipalities are really in need, we ask the government to act, and all it says is: "We shall do so in due course".

As the hon. member for Vancouver East said a moment ago, the time to do so is now. The unemployed are no longer getting insurance benefits and, as a result, municipalities and public relief agencies have to shoulder the whole burden. Could not the minister introduce at once some legislation which could at least help municipalities shoulder the burden that is crushing them because of the government's carelessness? Unemployment insurance benefits which have to be paid out are not the result of temporary unemployment, but of an economic recession for which municipal governments are not responsible.

Mr. Chairman, municipal governments cannot be held responsible for problems of international trade, nor for the decrease of foreign purchases in Canada, nor for the fact that our industrial reserves are so huge that our industries have to close down plants to avoid overloading their warehouses. Quite the contrary, the responsibility for all this lies with the central government, and that is why we are now urging them to open their eyes and see what is going on.

The hon. member for Vancouver East is back from visiting his constituency. He saw for himself what the situation was back there. It is the same situation as in this area and in neighbouring municipalities, yet the government—starting with the Minister of Labour—are closing their eyes so as not to see. That is what we are complaining about at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, a moment ago, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) asked the Minister of Labour to postpone consideration of the first item of his departmental estimates, that we may have a chance to discuss those problems. What was the minister's answer? He replied: "We can't do that." And yet, it has been done in the past. On many occasions in the past, ministers have agreed to let the first item of their estimates stand, for later consideration. This procedure was also the current practice in the Quebec legislature when I used to be a member. As a matter of fact, the first item of the estimates of each department used to stand till the end of the session. However, it seems that we want to enforce a new kind of closure in this house by saying: "You have to adopt this or you will not get anything." Sir, we cannot agree to this new brand of closure from a government whose members have claimed that the rights of members of parliament should be respected and that the rights of the opposition are equal to those of the government side of the house.

Mr. Chairman, we find that all those rights are being denied members of the opposition. We have no right to request anything. We are always turned down. Mr. Chairman, I say that the government is wrong when it does not live up to its responsibility towards those who are suffering. As the hon. member for Vancouver East said earlier, it is not its responsibility to feed the hungry, to clothe those who are cold and provide shelter for those who may have to live in the open.

I believe that the minister is not facing his responsibilities when he refuses the proposals put to him by the members of the opposition. Let him bear the whole burden, the whole responsibility.

(Text):

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, we have heard some very impassioned appeals this afternoon, and pictures have been put before us of people whose benefits under unemployment insurance have expired and they are being thrown off the list. It is hard to realize that those appeals have come from an opposition which is doing everything it can to obstruct amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which, among other things would extend the period of benefit from 36 to 52 weeks.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, the hon. gentleman has said that hon. members in this house are obstructing the passage of certain amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. "Obstruct", of course, is an offensive word as you, Mr. Chairman, well know. What we have been doing is trying to provide greater justice to the workers and the employers of this country under the act. The suggestion made by so reasonable a member, one of the most reasonable in this house is, to put it mildly, a matter of the greatest regret, I hope that he will withdraw that at once and not require action by the Chair.

The Deputy Chairman: May I advise the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that he cannot discuss a matter which is before a committee until that committee has reported to the house.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, I would just remind the committee and all those who are complaining about the number of people whose benefits under unemployment insurance have expired, that they did in fact vote against this measure in principle in the house within the last few days, all except one member, the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, those who voted against the measure did not vote against unemployment insurance; they voted against a particular provision which they felt did not provide justice to certain groups in our country. They did not vote against unemployment insurance, particularly when it is realized that those in the Liberal opposition constitute the party which introduced unemployment insurance in this country.

Mr. Pallett: That is not correct.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, to put the record straight as to who introduced unemployment insurance, I would like to remind the committee that the Conservative party introduced it long before the Liberal government ever did. If hon. members will look up the record they will find the answer. It was assented to on June 28, 1935, when the Conservative government of Rt. Hon. R. B. Bennett was in office. Furthermore, the first thing that the Liberal government did when it got into office was to try to get rid of it, and the way they did it was to have it taken to the Supreme Court of Canada where it was ruled ultra vires.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: That is true.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman said that the Liberal government caused the Supreme Court of Canada to rule it ultra vires.

Some hon. Members: He did not say that.

Mr. Ricard: He did not say that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Under our constitution there are three arms of government, the legislature, the judiciary and the executive, each of which has separate functions. For one hon. member to say that a political party has interfered with the judicial process in this country is to cast a reflection on that body and is contrary to the rules of debate in this house.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): The effect of their referring it there was to get rid of it. The same thing applies today in these extraneous arguments that they are giving to us. They have all kinds of reasons why they cannot vote in favour of it. They are opposed to it. They do not want to stop unemployment insurance but they do not want to extend the benefits. They do not want to increase the contributions. I think every fair-minded person in this country realizes that if we are to extend the benefits we shall have to increase the contributions to the fund.

The Deputy Chairman: I must remind the hon. member that this matter was before the house; it was voted on and disposed of.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): It was before the house and it was voted on. That is what I am saying. Then, we hear all those bleatings from the opposition in this house about the people suffering because their benefits have expired.

Mr. Argue: I rise on a point of order. It is a well-known rule in this house that in a debate it is out of order to refer to anything that took place in another debate in the same session. I think, in the interests of proper procedure in this house, the hon. member should not attempt to revive on item one of the labour estimates a debate that took place on an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I would suggest that the hon. member who has the floor should not stoop to such a flagrant breaking of the rules of this house. I would suggest that in the interests of orderly procedure no member should refer in one debate to action taken by members in another.

The Deputy Chairman: I think I made it quite clear to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that he could not refer to a debate concerning a matter that has already been voted on in the house and on which the house has made its decision. I hope the hon. member will bear that in mind.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I would be the last to want to offend against the rules of the house, Mr. Chairman, but I simply felt that the facts should be set straight at this time.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I raised a particular question earlier in the consideration of this item. You know, Mr. Chairman, if these people opposite would like to make comments I would appreciate it if they would do so in a loud voice so I can hear them or make them in the proper way by standing up and doing so instead of sniping and yapping away like a little terrier puppy. I asked the minister a question concerning the ratification of I.L.O. convention No. 87 concerning freedom of association and protection of the right to organize. I raised this matter earlier and I only make these comments to refresh the memory of the minister because so much has intervened since then. The convention provides that workers' and employers' organizations shall not be liable to be dissolved or suspended by administrative authority or interfered with by public authority as was done in Newfoundland by the politicians of that province.

I asked the minister then and I ask him now whether it would not be possible for Canada to ratify this convention. I make reference to it particularly but there are many others which Canada has not ratified. Could not Canada ratify this convention in so far as it applies to the field of jurisdiction of the federal government or the Department of Labour without in any way having any effect upon the provinces? Will the minister indicate whether action is contemplated to ratify convention No. 87? If that step is taken he will realize it may prevent some other minister of labour—I do not include the present minister because I am sure he probably does not entertain thoughts of this nature—from taking precisely the same disgraceful steps that were taken in the province of Newfoundland. Will the minister take under consideration the possibility of ratifying convention No. 87 in so far as the jurisdiction of the Canadian parliament is concerned?

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Starr: In answer may I advise the hon. member that I will confer with the Department of Justice in order to receive their advice.

Mr. Howard: As indicated by the minister in answer to a question of mine, there are some 93 international labour organization conventions which have not been ratified by Canada. I have here a list of them giving their numbers, their dates of passage by the I.L.O. and an indication of their subject matter such as unemployment, maternity protection, night work, minimum age and so on. The reason given by the minister is that they all fall partially within the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces. Will the minister confer with the Department of Justice to ascertain our position with respect to the rest of these I.L.O. conventions? I point out that they all fall in substantially the same category. I should also like to ask for permission to have this table incorporated as part of the proceedings.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the committee to have the table he has referred to printed in Hansard?

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman explain what the table is? I am afraid I did not catch what he said.

Mr. Howard: I thought I had done so. This is sessional paper No. 80A. It contains the minister's reply to a question of mine and the conventions not ratified by Canada are listed numerically and there is also an indication of the subject matter and the year in which the conventions were adopted by the I.L.O. It indicates which ones have not been ratified by Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has this not already been printed if it is an answer to a question?

Mr. Howard: No, it was an order for return.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to have this list printed in Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 163 carry?

Mr. Howard: I had asked whether the minister would indicate if he will confer with the Department of Justice about these other I.L.O. conventions.

Mr. Starr: I will take that suggestion under consideration.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I have been greatly disappointed with the attitude of the minister toward a winter works program. In looking over Hansard for Friday, May 15—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member cannot refer to a debate on another matter.

Mr. Argue: May I tell my hon. friend from Newfoundland that I am referring to the debate on item one, the same item, and it is very much in order. As a matter of fact, such references are provided for by the rules.

In connection with the possibility for providing a winter works program the minister said: "I have had some experience in this connection. Preparation for any plan of this nature at this time would be a little premature." That is a rather fantastic statement by the Minister of Labour in view of the history of seasonal unemployment in this country. Everyone who knows anything at all about unemployment statistics knows that even in a period of relatively full employment we do have substantial unemployment in Canada in the winter time.

I have on my desk the unemployment figures for recent years. Taking the month of February, for example, I find that unplaced applicants in February of 1956 numbered 515,000, in February of 1957 574,000 and in February of 1958 854,000. Tremendous unemployment in the winter has become almost the pattern. Yet the Minister of Labour, when asked whether the government is making any plans to provide for even a relatively small winter works program, said that it was too soon and that it would be premature to advance such a program at this time.

This shows, that the government not only has no plan but does not really think that seasonal unemployment is a very urgent or important matter. Not only has the government winter works program employed only 40,000 people on site, but the fact is that the government is not prepared to undertake the necessary planning to provide an adequate program next year. Surely this is a callous attitude. It means that the government has little or no regard for the approximately half million people who have been unemployed during the winter for some years. I suggest to the minister that he endeavour to get his colleagues to agree now to announce that for the coming winter there will be a continuation of the winter works program with certain improvements as to amounts paid thereunder. As has already been said, the minister would assist in the passage of his estimates if he were to state now the policy of the government on this important question.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer, Mr. Chairman. I should like to ask the Minister of Labour what the attitude of the government has been to the very important presentation made to the government by the united steelworkers of America requesting a full inquiry into the steel industry of this country. I feel that the Minister of Labour is the appropriate member of the cabinet to whom to direct this question, since the whole point in the brief presented to the government was this: That the workers in this industry have been blamed for the very high steel prices. They believe that the high steel prices have resulted from an arbitrary fixing of steel prices by the companies at levels that are unduly high, at levels that are not justified by the wage rates paid in the industry. Although there has been a substantial increase in productivity over the years, the wage increases have never equalled the increase in productivity and yet the steel industry of this country, according to this submission to the government, has set steel prices unduly high to the consumers of steel and the industries in Canada dependent upon steel. I should like to have from the Minister of Labour a statement on the attitude of the government toward this brief.

Mr. Starr: May I answer the hon. member's question at this time? It is evident that the hon. member does not realize this matter is under consideration by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that the representations in that regard will not be made by me but will be made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the government.

Mr. Argue: I wish the Minister of Labour would talk to his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I see that the memorandum was not presented to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but was presented to the Prime Minister and the government of Canada. This is becoming a government of delay, indecision and procrastination. There has been delay with regard to this submission, with regard to the appointment of a minister of external affairs, as well as appointments to 40 or 50 prominent positions in the civil service. There has been delay upon delay. I think the trade union people of this country will be disappointed that the Minister of Labour, on item one, is not able to give an affirmative answer to the important request of the steelworkers that the steel industry in Canada be investigated. In their submission, the steel industry is taking exorbitant profits and is blaming the high prices on the workers in the industry.

I have another question that I should like to direct to the Minister of Labour, and that has to do with the wage rates being paid by contractors doing work on the South Saskatchewan river project. I want to say that I raised this matter under the P.F.R.A. item of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. At that time I was told by the Minister of Agriculture that all the correspondence coming to him on this matter had been referred to the Minister of Labour. I take it, then, that the Minister of Labour has knowledge of this situation and will be able to tell the committee what action has been taken in this regard.

As I understand the situation, it is that the contractors who are doing the work on this project have not abided by the minimum standards of wages and working conditions provided under the Saskatchewan law. They have failed to comply with the Saskatchewan law because they have said that in working on this project they are subject to federal law. The trade unions in Saskatchewan, and the people of Saskatchewan generally, do not support the position taken by the contractors, namely that they should be paying sub-standard wage rates in Saskatchewan and imposing working conditions that are not similar to working conditions provided by contractors who come under provincial jurisdiction. If this is the case, and I have every reason to believe it is, if it has not been corrected, then I think it is a reflection on the federal government and the federal government's policy.

Another point that is made is that the people employing the labour at Outlook are endeavouring to employ labour based upon non-union wages, based upon wages in rural areas that are not and cannot be subject to a general labour act and are, therefore, tending to pull down the general level of wages in the province. I ask the minister what action has been taken as a result of the submissions that have been made to him.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has brought up the matter of the South Saskatchewan river dam project and the wage policies applying to that project. I should like, in answer to his question, to make this statement. My department, that is the Department of Labour, has received a number of representations respecting wage rates on contracts let by the Department of Agriculture for various phases in the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam. Most of these representations have stemmed from the Saskatoon building trades council, in an attempt to have the wage rates recognized by that council and which apply in Saskatoon, applied also to various contracts let for the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam.

The Saskatoon construction industry wage rates are generally the highest in the province. There is no justification for applying these rates on the Saskatchewan dam unless it is necessary to bring labour from Saskatoon in order to proceed with the project. But, in fact, the inquiries that we have made show that only 3 per cent of the labour supply comes from Saskatoon, and the great bulk of it comes from many locations in the province outside the four major cities of Saskatoon, Regina, Moose Jaw and Prince Albert.

What we have done has been to establish on this project minimum rate schedules which are based upon collective agreement rates where they are applicable in the area, and on wage surveys of private industry construction rates where there are no collective agreements. Such survey areas comprise the secondary cities and the larger towns of the province. With respect to our minimum wage rates applied at the Saskatchewan dam, three rates are collective agreement rates applicable on projects anywhere in Saskatchewan and one rate is that established by a collective agreement on the site of the work. The other rates compare favourably with quite a few of the rates that we use on contract projects in the four larger cities.

I wish to make it clear that the wage rates contained in the wage schedules issued are the minimum wage rates which the contractors are required to pay for the several occupational classifications of employees employed on the projects. The contractor may find it necessary to pay higher rates than those provided in the schedule, either by reason of having to recruit his employees from higher wage centres or as a result of collective bargaining. If we applied Saskatoon rates on the dam projects, it would mean also that the Saskatoon rates would have to be applied on all other federal government contract works in the province, including the extensive work done by P.F.R.A. It would have the effect of raising construction rates generally and thus increasing construction costs all over the province without good cause.

We are making another wage survey this summer of the private industry construction wage rates in Saskatchewan and if the general level of wages has risen, then corresponding increases will be made in the minimum wage rates used on these federal contract projects. The method of determining fair wages to apply on federal government contracts is based upon the fair wages legislation and is in line with the policy that has been applied for over 50 years.

Mr. Argue: I do not think the reply of the minister is satisfactory. A little later on I wish to quote from a letter that was sent by Premier T. C. Douglas to the minister on January 21, 1959. I placed a motion on the order paper under date of May 1, 1959, and the motion reads as follows:

> A copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents or agreements exchanged between the federal government or any agency thereof and any provincial government, trade union or other organization, regarding the wage rates which are to apply in connection with the construction of the south Saskatchewan dam.

In looking through this correspondence I am unable to find reported here an answer from the Minister of Labour to the letter written to him by Premier T. C. Douglas on January 21. This may have been an error in the bringing down of this return. I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he has replied to the premier of Saskatchewan; if so, under what date and whether his reply will be produced in the House of Commons in compliance with this order passed by the house.

Mr. Starr: Yes, I replied to the premier of Saskatchewan. I cannot tell from memory what the date was. I shall be glad to table the letter. Since I replied to the premier no further correspondence has ensued between the two of us. Hence I would deem that he was satisfied with my answer.

Mr. Argue: I would assume that he has probably come to the point reached by many other people in this country. I think he is probably discouraged with the great volume of correspondence he has had with the government and the very little action which results from such correspondence.

Mr. Pickersgill: At that he has obtained more than the premier of Manitoba.

Mr. Argue: The premier of Manitoba did not get very much.

Mr. Pickersgill: No; he certainly did not.

Mr. Argue: The premier of Saskatchewan received a letter which has not been produced in this house. Hence the premier of Saskatchewan has not received very much either. The premier of Saskatchewan and the minister of highways in Saskatchewan have been corresponding with the Minister of Public Works and trying to get the Minister of Public Works to embark on some programs to provide employment in this country. I am sure there are projects in which the Minister of Labour would take a great deal of interest. All the Saskatchewan government have been able to get from the Minister of Public Works are answers to their letters, but no action. In his letter of January 21, 1959, the premier of Saskatchewan said in part:

> Labour groups in our province have drawn to our attention the fact that to date the wage schedules issued to contractors have been set on the basis of the town of Outlook, the nearest urban centre to the construction site. Outlook, however, is only a town of less than 1,000 people. The great bulk of the workers on the project will have to be drawn from the larger cities such as Saskatoon, Moose Jaw and Regina, and their families will no doubt continue to live in these centres. The labour groups, therefore, contend that establishing rates of pay on the basis of Outlook conditions is manifestly unfair and the government of Saskatchewan shares this view.
> We recognize that the schedules issued by your department are only intended to fix minimum rates, but there is no doubt that the construction firms use these schedules in tendering on contracts with the result that the schedules effectively influence the actual wage rates. I would urge very strongly that in future the fair wage schedules should be based at least upon the going rates applicable in the cities of Saskatoon and Regina.

That has not been done, I interpolate, according to the minister's reply this afternoon.

> Unless this is done, I am very much concerned that the better contractors will find it difficult to bid successfully on the project and that the overall progress of the construction program will be greatly hampered by continuing labour difficulties.

We in Saskatchewan are proud of the way in which the contractors who have done work for the Saskatchewan government have been able to get along amicably with the trade unions in Saskatchewan. We resent very much the fact that on a federal project contracts being let result in the paying of wages that for Saskatchewan on similar projects are substandard.

Mr. Garland: I should just like to say one word briefly on this matter. Those of us in the opposition are indeed disappointed at the attitude of the minister in refusing to allow the first item to stand so that we might learn from him or from the announcements of other ministers in the government their attitude toward this continuing problem of unemployment. Many members on all sides of this house have come here after holding office in municipalities. In looking over the members whom I know I find that many of them have held offices in municipalities and are well aware of the problems that arise there. Regardless of party affiliation, I think many of them must view with some alarm this policy of winter works which was announced last year and which sought to transfer some of the responsibility for unemployment to the provinces and to the municipalities.

This winter works program—as has been said so often in this chamber and it is not my intention to repeat at any length—was a hurriedly conceived scheme at best. It has been described as too little and too late. The effect of it is apparent. It provided employment for less than 1 per cent of the employable people in this country. One might well question the value of a program of this type. Of what use is this type of work, provided, conceived and planned quickly by a municipality—that of laying sewers, digging ditches, cutting brush—to the average office worker, plumber, electrician or carpenter of this country who has the right to seek employment in his own trade?

I say that this is a matter of some real concern to the municipalities of Canada. With the experience that was gained with this program last year surely it was up to the government this year to announce earlier the program they propose to implement in this regard. As all members of the house know, the municipalities arrange and plan their budgets early in the year. Surely that was another reason for announcing earlier in this calendar year the program that would be followed by this government.

There is, of course, another problem associated with any works that will be planned by the municipalities, namely that occasioned by the increased interest rates and the increased costs of borrowing which municipalities are now experiencing.

One other point I should like to make is this. I should like to ask the minister whether it is the intention of the government to announce before the end of this month what their policy will be in connection with winter works programs. My reason for asking that question is this. From May 31 until June 3 the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities will be meeting in North Bay in convention. It would seem to me that here would be a splendid opportunity for the Prime Minister, who will be addressing that conference, to announce to the delegates assembled there the program which his government intends to implement as an effective means of dealing with this problem of winter unemployment. I wonder if the minister would be prepared to say if the government will be in a position to make an announcement at that time, or earlier.

Mr. Starr: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Winch: I rise at this time to express an opinion on the winter works program. I do not intend to say anything on the last winter works program, but merely to convey, as I think it was intended that we from Vancouver should, the views of the Vancouver city council and of the engineering staff of that city on any other program of a similar nature which may be envisaged. I feel quite sure that the minister has something of a similar nature in mind for next year.

About two days before most of us had to leave Vancouver to attend the opening of the present session of parliament the Vancouver city council requested Vancouver members to meet them and discuss the winter works program. Unfortunately, the majority of hon. members could not be there but there was, nevertheless, a fairly good representation. It was pointed out to the Vancouver members of the House of Commons who were present that the city of Vancouver could have done much more with regard to this program if greater notice had been given, and if the city had been given the opportunity to arrange finance and carry out preliminary engineering work. It was emphasized at this meeting that if longer notice had been given to the cities and to the municipalities they would have been able to take much greater advantage of the federal government's proposal. We were asked to convey these views to the government.

I hope the minister will take this opportunity to say that consideration will be given to a further plan of this kind in the coming fall and winter, and in the following spring, and that he will be able to give the committee an assurance that longer notice will be given in order to enable the cities, towns and municipalities to take fuller advantage of his plans to the benefit of themselves and of the unemployed.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, I must say to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) that his reply of a flat no to the very sensible question put by my colleague, the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland), came as an unpleasant surprise to me.

The Minister of Labour must surely remember that the recent winter work program has not been an unqualified success in all cases, especially in the province of Quebec.

That is why I should like to say a few words on this matter. In the province of Quebec, all of the heavy burden fell on the municipalities alone, because the Union Nationale government failed to help them by paying 25 to 30 per cent of the cost of labour, as was done in other provinces.

As mentioned by my colleague, announcement of that program will presumably be made at a later date—at least that is what the Minister of Labour has indicated—probably in August or September. It will then be too late; in fact, it is too late now, because—as stated by previous speakers—municipal budgets are usually drawn up in February, March and April. So when the scheme is announced in August or September, municipalities will not have the money for public works that would provide jobs.

Of course, I cannot say whether the cabinet or the Prime Minister has asked the Minister of Labour to keep mum, but surely the minister must realize that the program should be announced now while we are discussing his department's estimates. In view of past experience, and of the situation last winter when many municipalities, mostly in Quebec, were unable to take advantage of the winter works program—wholly inadequate as it was—and had to take the full blame, or at least 90 per cent of it, for this state of affairs, I think the government's plans should be disclosed earlier. I hope the minister can tell us, before we are through with his estimates, what the government is planning in this respect, so that municipalities can start their own planning. As the minister knows, it takes two or three months to complete field surveys and prepare plans and estimates, so if a start is to be made on this program in early December, municipalities should be put in a position where they can start planning for it immediately.

I hope the minister will not remain silent until we are through with his estimates, but rather will inform not only the house, but also interested municipalities, as to its intentions regarding this program for next winter.

Item agreed to.

A—Department—

164. Economics and research branch, including research grants and related expenses, $670,030.

Mr. Howard: This particular item concerns the economics and research branch. I wonder if the minister would indicate what are the activities of this branch. Could he tell us what researches the branch conducts, and could he give us some information about the research projects which have been conducted during the past year, together, if possible, with any plans the branch has for the future. With regard to grants—and I believe these amount to some $7,000—could he tell us who receives these grants and for what purpose they are used.

Mr. Starr: Under the general authority of the Department of Labour Act the economics and research branch serves as a central federal agency for economic and social analysis and research in the labour field in carrying out research projects on labour problems including wages, hours and working conditions, union organizations, collective bargaining, employment and unemployment, professional and skilled manpower, occupations, the training of skilled manpower and other subjects in the labour field. The service is conducted in co-operation with employers, unions and research, statistical and other agencies within the government and outside.

The results of these activities are made available through regular and special reports which are widely distributed, and many articles appear regularly in the Labour Gazette. This is the type of work which is carried on, and whenever any particular subject comes to our attention it is taken up by this department for study and a report.

These grants are paid to universities. Last year we paid out the following grants: University of Toronto, $200; University of Alberta, $1,000; University of British Columbia, $1,200; an additional grant to the University of British Columbia, $1,000; University of Ottawa, $1,200 and McGill University, $1,000. These relate to studies on labour arbitration, labour management and labour relations, union management, technological change and so on. These are the grants paid to the universities to carry out studies of this nature.

Mr. Howard: Professor Carrothers, a law professor of the University of British Columbia, has written a book concerning the use of court injunctions in labour disputes in the province of British Columbia and is presently working on an analysis of arbitration cases in that province. Would he be in receipt of any of these grants? Would he operate partially under a grant?

Mr. Starr: In 1953-54 we provided for the payment to Mr. Carrothers of $900 to assist in the study of the use of labour injunctions and in 1954-55 the sum of $300 was provided for this purpose.

Mr. Howard: I understand he is presently working on a similar study with respect to arbitration in labour disputes. Would he receive assistance in this respect?

Mr. Starr: Out of this $7,000 there would be some assistance in that matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, under this item I presume would come the authorization for whatever researches are being undertaken in the department with regard to a modern problem that is of great concern, I am sure, to all of us, and that is the problem of automation. This question was referred to the other day by the Leader of the Opposition and earlier in some detail by the hon. member for Trinity.

It would be interesting to know to what extent the Department of Labour through its research division, which I am sure is an excellent one and I suspect comes under the direction of that very able economist, Mr. G. V. Haythorne, has been able to ascertain what conclusions have thus far been arrived at with regard to the effect of automation in Canada.

Our unemployment figures are serious as they have been for the past two years.

To what extent are we able to attribute it to the factors of automation? Possibly the minister could give us some indication as to whether or not studies have been pursued to show if automation has affected unemployment and could it be somewhat counteracted by the advantages to date of automation itself, or is it a fact that the machines, for instance, that make automation possible in our day are not produced in this country to any extent but are produced notably in the United States and as a result, while we have unemployment due to automation, we do not at the same time have fully the corrective measures to provide some counter-action?

I have been interested in this problem as one who lives in a great industrial centre of the automobile industry. I have recently been told, for instance, that automation has not had the effect on that industry that I had publicly suggested was the case. In any event this is a matter that very greatly concerns our generation. The Department of Labour, I know, has been giving some attention to this matter. I am sure we would all welcome a statement from the minister as to the effect and as to the result of these researches.

Mr. Starr: If the hon. member would hold his question temporarily I could make a statement in a few minutes.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, there has been some suggestion that the research and economics division of the Department of Labour was set up for the specific purpose of providing figures that could be compared to or used in conjunction with or opposition to those figures prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics. Since the present government has taken office has any consideration been given to eliminating the duplication that obviously takes place as between the two departments. Many of these figures we have on employment and employment trends are at variance with dominion bureau of statistics figures while others appear to be a duplication of the bureau's figures or statistical breakdowns of figures prepared by them. Has the minister found any justification for maintaining this division that processes and obtains figures which should already be available from the dominion bureau of statistics?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, the work in the economics branch is undertaken from the point of view of the labour market and does not duplicate the labour activities of the economics branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce which works from a labour trend and research point of view.

I made inquiries in this regard to satisfy my own curiosity and general knowledge on another occasion and I have been assured there is no duplication. One group does a certain work and the other does another work both of which are vital. The work of the labour department is valuable in the compilation of these figures. As I say, I have been assured there is no duplication.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, along the line that the hon. member has just taken, I have been really concerned over the growing margin between the estimate of unemployed which we all know the dominion bureau of statistics secures by a sampling procedure similar to the Gallup poll—one hopes it is as accurate—and the actual count that is made in the employment offices. The disparity between these figures has grown very markedly in the last two years. If the hon. member for Essex East happens to have his figures there I could point out that the gap—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is 445 in one case and 733 in the other.

Mr. Pickersgill: The figure in one case is 445,000 and in the other 733,000. I think this is a bigger gap than ever before except perhaps in one or two preceding months this year.

Some of us who represent outlying parts of the country know that even the figure of unplaced applicants is well below the number of people who are genuinely anxious to get work because some people who have exhausted their stamps do not think it is worthwhile to waste a postage stamp writing to St. John's or to Grand Falls to have their names put back on the roll when they know there are no jobs available in any case.

I have had some experience with this matter when I was an official some years ago and these two sets of figures are very difficult to reconcile.

I admit that they do not pretend to measure the same things. I am not going to try to make arguments on this side of the house that I used to reply to when I was on the other side of the house. The only thing I am concerned about—and I think a lot of us in this country who are really concerned about the continuing magnitude of this problem of unemployment are also—is the growing margin between these two figures. It is really quite a big gap between 445,000 and 733,000. It is almost 300,000, and that is not the kind of gap there used to be in earlier years.

Of course, the magnitude of the figures was less in earlier years; but I am wondering how much research is being done on the preparation of these figures, and how much is being done about checking the sampling technique, because I have a very real concern about its accuracy. I know that an effort has been made—and I am not accusing the government of anything because I know that when we were in office we made an effort—to purge these employment service lists of names of people who had already got jobs or who had really left the labour market, and tried to keep them as a reflection of people who were really looking for jobs. I know also they are taken once a week. They are always going to exaggerate to some degree, I admit, the number of people who are unemployed but there does seem to me to be a really serious disparity between these two figures on which more real study is needed than appears to have been given, judging by such debate as we have had in the house up to now.

Mr. Starr: In answer to the question of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, may I say that these figures have intrigued me ever since I have taken over the responsibility. I found upon inquiry that this trend of the difference has always been in existence between the D.B.S. figures and the other figures.

Mr. Pickersgill: Always a difference, yes.

Mr. Starr: On the same basis, as a matter of fact.

Mr. Pickersgill: The proportions are getting worse.

Mr. Starr: In the summer time they are closer together and then when seasonal unemployment starts, winter lay-offs start, the gap widens in that respect. That is the only explanation I have been able to get on this difference.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is one other thing I would like to say. The minister will remember that when he was over on this side of the house his measure of unemployment, and that of his associates over here, was always the national employment service figure, but then, on June 21, he saw a great light on the road to Damascus and since that date the figure for unemployment has always been the lower figure.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was not Paul.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was not Paul, either, as the hon. member for Essex East pointed out, on this occasion who saw the light on the road to Damascus. It may not have been the road to Damascus; it may merely have been the road to the Confederation building. But I must say that I cannot help but have the feeling that a lot more research should be done not merely into the categories of figures but perhaps because, when all is said and done—as the Prime Minister told us on one famous occasion—unemployment is not a statistic. There should be a study of who these people really are and what the kinds of employment are, and a lot more work. I am not arguing that the minister should employ a lot more people in this branch but I am just wondering whether the kind of practical, hard study, realistic study is being carried on that should be carried on.

Mr. Starr: Yes; I am assured that extensive research and continual research is being made in this respect.

May I answer the hon. member for Essex East who requested an explanation of automation? I would like to make this statement, Mr. Chairman. New labour-saving machines and more efficient production methods have been a feature of industry and business in Canada for as long as these have existed. What is new today, and it is affecting both the factory and the business office, is the increased pace at which technological changes are taking place and the way in which new automatic equipment is performing a whole range of production or office tasks rather than only one or two relatively simple operations.

It is very easy to become confused when discussing automation because this type of technological change can take many different forms. One type, for instance, involves the use of specialized machinery which carries out a pre-set number of operations with almost no human intervention. Such machines, although becoming more numerous, have been in use in many manufacturing industries for quite a few years.

A second kind of automation involves the integration of materials handling and a number of processing operations. Transfer equipment, for example, automatically carries the work from one automatic machine to another. This is usually called Detroit automation and in Canada is found in only a very few firms, mainly in the automobile industry.

A third type of automation involves the use of automatic electrical or electronic control systems. These are fairly common and have been a feature of some industries for many years. This is the type of automation found in oil refineries, electric power stations, communications and a number of other newer fields, such as railway yards and sheet steel production.

A final type of automation involves the use of electronic computers and data processing machines. Such equipment can be used for research work and for office work where large volumes of data have to be processed.

Insurance companies, public utilities and banks are using these to an increasing extent.

It is very difficult at this stage to estimate the impact of automation upon the labour force in Canada. There undoubtedly have been cases where it has resulted in lay-offs of individual workers at specific plants. There is some evidence to indicate, however, that the Canadian experience so far has been that the expansion of company business and normal labour turnover, coupled with planned policies on transfer and retraining, have gone and can go a considerable way toward successfully meeting the human challenge posed by the new methods and machines.

Nevertheless, what the cumulative effect will be on the situation in local areas or on the national economy is still not clear. It has been suggested that the employee displaced by automation is the one who is not hired. That is to say, the main result may be important changes in the kinds of job opportunities available for new entrants to the labour force. One difficulty is that the effects created depend on many other factors: the degree of prosperity in the national economy; levels of employment and unemployment in alternative occupations; the speed with which new or extended job opportunities open up in the tertiary service industries; and the rate at which technological changes themselves spread throughout Canadian industry.

It is because of the scarcity of reliable data on the effects of automation that our intention in the Department of Labour has been to carry out, and stimulate elsewhere, as much research as possible on these effects in industry and in business offices. In the department we have been conducting for the past two years a number of detailed and more general studies of automation and its effects. The findings of some of these investigations have already been published and given wide circulation.

To help us in securing the facts about automation and its consequences we established two years ago a small technical advisory committee consisting of representatives from industry, from labour and from Canadian universities. I made mention of that in the committee last week when we were discussing the estimates of our department.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Under the chairmanship of—

Mr. Starr: Mr. Haythorne.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A splendid man.

Mr. Starr: We have reviewed our research plans with this committee and discussed our findings with them and in this way received useful advice and suggestions. This committee will be meeting again in May to discuss this work further.

As I have indicated, it has seemed to us that there was not enough reliable information about automation and its effects on manpower to provide a foundation for a fully useful discussion by any large committee or conference. Our approach at this stage, therefore, has been to make use of a smaller advisory committee to work with us in the basic job of assembling the facts. This is the foundation on which any more general discussion should be based. I must say that for the past two years we have been working on automation in the automobile industry.

Mr. Herridge: On that point I should like to ask the minister a question. I think I have been most restrained this afternoon. Are these investigations carried out in the smaller centres and in the smaller industries? I think the picture there is in some cases changing faster than it is in some of the larger industries. The picture so far as automation is concerned has changed very rapidly in the last five years and if these investigations are not carried out in the smaller centres and industries they will not actually reflect the true picture throughout the country.

Mr. Starr: Automation in general has been carried out in the larger industries rather than the smaller ones. We have made studies of the electrical products industry, the heavy machinery industry, the household goods industry and the automobile industry.

Mr. Herridge: I think the minister's department should make some investigation into the sawmill industry in view of the thousands of feet of lumber that are being cut per man per day compared with even ten years ago. The same thing applies to logging in some cases. Years ago it was considered to be a good day's work to put 1,000 feet of logs on the beach per man per day but in our district it has now reached 10,000 feet per day per man. That shows the effect of automation even in the smaller logging enterprises and smaller sawmills.

Mr. Carter: Can the minister advise the house whether he has any information on similar studies being carried on in the United States with regard to this question? The reason I ask is that I saw a report recently indicating that the pre-recession level of production had been attained in the United States with a million fewer people in the labour force. The inference was that the million fewer jobs was due to automation. Can the minister confirm anything like that from United States inquiries?

Mr. Starr: No, Mr. Chairman, I do not know what studies are being carried out in the United States in that field.

Mr. Peters: I think some consideration should be given to the matter of having the same type of organization in two departments of the government. I am satisfied that the minister has probably examined the matter in terms of unemployment figures because he has had a great deal to do with them in the last two years. However, a large proportion of the figures coming from the research branch of the Department of Labour appear to be only a re-hash of figures compiled by the dominion bureau of statistics. Sometimes they are put together in a different way. Sometimes they are divided by zones or in various other ways. They are issued in various publications and this seems to be a duplication of services which I do not think is necessary.

Having been in the labour field for a number of years and interested in the research done by the Department of Labour, I have found that most of the material published is not suitable for use in the field. Most of it can be found in a much more up to date form by reading the newspapers and gathering the information there rather than from the Department of Labour.

There are also a number of other publications that I think serve very little purpose. One of them issued by the Department of Labour was entitled, "Two Minutes of Facts" or two minutes of something. It was very poorly received by the workers. Possibly management liked it better but it was poorly received by the workers in the industries with which I have been connected. It seemed to serve very little purpose except that of keeping somebody in a job.

I think a look must be taken at the work of this branch in view of the charges that have been made, with which I am sure everybody is familiar, that it was set up by a former cabinet minister for the specific purpose of keeping track of another department in which he was interested. The hon. member for Essex East is probably quite familiar with this story.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, I am not. I was wondering about it.

Mr. Peters: Well, it is a widely circulated charge and I think the government should give some consideration to an examination of whether this department did serve the function of keeping track of another department and, if it did, whether it was worth while to do so.

Many of the publications of the research branch are pretty much a waste of money and the time of those who have to read them. A good proportion of the figures do not seem to serve much purpose. They are out of date when they are received and in the main they are taken from some place else. The staff is not sufficiently large to accumulate these figures and evaluate them.

I think that the research department could serve many functions. The minister has outlined the work that it is doing but there are a great number of things that it is not doing. One of them really does not involve automation but concerns the situation where one industry has disappeared and is not being replaced by other industries. I am thinking particularly of mining where communities have been developed which are dependent on one particular industry. The industry then faces extinction through loss of markets or depletion of ores. No assistance is being given to the workers or employers or the communities generally to help to establish industries that are suitable to the particular geographical area. I think this matter should be a part of the problems of the Department of Labour.

I would refer particularly to pulpwood and logging operations affecting areas such as Kapuskasing, Cochrane and Timmins. These are areas where large year-round labour forces used to be maintained but now the numbers of workers are very small. No assistance has been given to aid in the establishment of new industries or the development through research of something that will replace them so that large numbers of men will continue to be employed.

In some cases technical changes are eliminating work forces and in others the need for certain products is passing. Therefore the employment picture is not the same as it was previously. I think the Department of Labour could do some research in this field, not research with regard to whether people like to use left-handed shovels or right-handed shovels but with regard to whether or not they are going to be able to use a shovel at all.

There is a new trend of workers being unemployed in large numbers over long periods of time with little likelihood of their being re-employed in the same kind of work they were doing a few years ago. I refer to the pulp and paper industry again because for three or four years now we have seen the employment figures dropping. Yet everybody is aware of the fact that as much pulp and paper are being used and that sales of these commodities have not varied very greatly in our export markets. Nevertheless the labour force has decreased very rapidly and the workers do not appear to be coming back. I think it would be advantageous if research were carried on under the Department of Labour with regard to developing secondary industries and for the purpose of supplying employers and employees with the facts as to what types of industries would be most suitable.

Some of the problems are obviously connected with this matter of diversification of industry, especially as that relates to the city of Toronto. I am concerned mainly with Ontario, and in the city of Toronto there are thousands of new factories being built every year while in northern Ontario, where unemployment is increasing—in fact there would not appear to be any end to this unemployment problem in certain industries—new industries are not being established. No information is made available to help induce some industries to come to areas where their raw materials are more readily available, where a labour force is more readily available than it is in major cities such as Toronto.

I think some consideration should be given by the department to this field. The minister will agree, I believe, that we are not interested entirely in improving the unemployment situation by means of handouts or increasing the benefits given to people who are unemployed, but we are primarily interested in seeing that these people are employed. If the research department is going to do the job which I think it should be doing, working toward creating opportunities for workers to obtain employment, whether it be in new industries or in revamped industries, then the research department should be working along the lines I have suggested. I do not believe this has been the case up to date. I believe the research department has produced the figures it has been asked to produce. I am not suggesting that these figures have been requested by the Minister of Labour. What I am suggesting is that there has been a direction given to this department to produce certain sets of figures, and those are being produced.

I suggest, however, that this should not be the function of the research department. The dominion bureau of statistics should be capable of producing these figures. Perhaps there should be a transfer of this work from one department to the other. It may be argued, and perhaps the Minister of Labour could indicate, that if his department took over the functions of the dominion bureau of statistics they could do a much better job. I do not believe there is room for both departments in this field. These figures should be factual. We should be able to get them from one department. We should not be asked to compare two sets of figures which have a discrepancy of almost 50 per cent.

I should like to see more down to earth research undertaken, that is research that is going to provide jobs for people and which would provide us with information that is not now available. I should like to suggest the type of information that I feel should be available. In northern Ontario we have many natural resources, and many other advantages for increased industrial development and employment opportunities. We do not have the type of information available that is available in other countries. In Norway, in Russia and many of the Scandinavian countries, they have a similar climate, similar mineral and timber wealth to that which we have. They have had experience in industrial development in these areas which are similar to parts of our country in which we have no industry at all except the so-called primary industries. These facts should be available and could be available. I should like to suggest that the minister's department give some consideration to undertaking this type of research and having these figures made available to the Canadian people.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member's rather lengthy intervention has prompted a very brief one from me. We were told by the Minister of Finance, late in June, 1957, that he was going to eliminate waste and extravagance from all the departments of government. It is some time since we have heard much talk about that. Can the minister tell us from which branches of his department the Minister of Finance has eliminated waste and extravagance? If he has, how much has been eliminated?

Mr. Starr: Well, all the hon. member has to do is look through the estimates for the past two years.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister reduced his estimates very materially?

Mr. Starr: We have maintained our establishment, we certainly have not increased any part of it, and we are doing a great deal more work now. We have had the responsibility for a larger winter works program.

Mr. Pickersgill: And for more unemployed.

Mr. Starr: The Department of Labour is not responsible for the unemployed. The Department of Labour looks after the administration of labour matters, and the registration for work is conducted by the unemployment insurance commission, as the hon. member well knows.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the total number of persons employed reduced? This is statistical information that this research department would have.

Mr. Starr: No, it is not.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to say a few words in support of the contention put forward by the hon. member for Billingsgate just recently—excuse me, I mean Bonavista-Twillingate—with respect to some study to ensure a better understanding of the actual number of unemployed persons in Canada. We have gone on from year to year taking two sets of figures about which everyone has his own opinion.

I have discussed this matter with a number of people because I have been interested in ascertaining why people do not register for employment. In one case I was informed by the man that he knew there was no work available. Another chap told me the work that was available was unsuitable. Another one told me he could not leave home for family reasons. Another one told me he did not register for work because his wife was expecting a baby. Actually another man, on another occasion, said he did not register for work because he wanted his wife to have a baby. Another man told me he wanted to rest for a week or two. Another one was without the funds with which to pay the fare to the place where employment could be obtained. Another one was on a diet and could not leave home; he could not eat in a lumber or mining camp. Another man had insufficient money for the purchase of the clothing required to undertake employment in a mine some miles away. Another man was taking advantage of the opportunity to cut his year's fuel, and so on.

I do believe there should be a very close study made of this question so that, as soon as possible, we can have a figure given to us which would indicate the total number of unemployed in Canada, a figure in which we could have some confidence as representing the facts.

Mr. Starr: I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member very much because I have been giving some thought to this problem of having two sets of figures, and once in a while a third set of figures will be given by other people. This creates confusion. I have been considering having the department work out some new figure that would be more authentic and would be more to the point so that we would all know the exact number of unemployed.

165. Annuities Act administration, $1,242,512.

Mr. Badanai: I should like to ask the minister a question on this item. Has he given any consideration to increasing the ceiling of $1,200 per year which is in effect now in connection with the annuities that can be purchased by a person in one year? When the Annuities Act was introduced some 20 years ago $1,200 was considered to be a fair retiring allowance for a couple living in a very modest way. Since then, the value of the dollar, in terms of what it will purchase in food and commodities, has dropped to about 50 cents. I should like to hear from the minister whether he is considering allowing people to purchase an annuity of more than $1,200 a year. Would the minister answer that question?

Mr. Starr: No, I am not. I am not giving that matter any consideration.

Mr. Badanai: I should like to ask the minister why not. As a matter of fact, I understand that the Department of Labour are anxious to see these annuities extended to embrace larger amounts in order to cover the necessities of life at the present time. Does the minister think that the value of the dollar today is the same as it was some 25 years ago? By no stretch of the imagination can anyone think that you can now buy for a dollar the same commodities that you bought 25 years ago. I urge the minister and the government to give this matter serious consideration because I think it is of vital importance to the people of the country.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Can the minister tell the committee what is the interest rate paid on annuity? While I am on my feet, I should like to thank him very much for the courtesy he extended to the delegation from Saguenay and lake St. John yesterday when we were in his office to discuss unemployment.

Mr. Starr: The interest rate prevalent now is 4 per cent.

167. Civilian rehabilitation branch, including payments to the provinces to implement a program for the rehabilitation of disabled persons, in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the governor in council, $209,850.

Mr. Roberge: I should like to know from the minister what provinces are participating in this program for disabled persons and what was the amount received last year by each of them?

Mr. Starr: The expenditures for the year 1958-59, up until March 31, 1959, were as follows:

Newfoundland	$6,973.86
Prince Edward Island	1,960.09
Nova Scotia	9,238.65

Mr. Roberge: I know that Quebec does not receive anything. Can the minister tell us whether Quebec has ever participated in that program?

Mr. Starr: No. Quebec has not signed the agreement.

Mr. Roberge: Never?

Mr. Starr: It never did.

Item agreed to.

Vocational training co-ordination—

170. To carry out the purposes of the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act and agreements made thereunder; to authorize the Minister of Labour to enter into agreements with any province on terms approved by the governor in council to provide financial assistance to vocational and technical schools and training under youth training projects and to provide for the expenditures thereunder and under vocational training agreements entered into in previous years, including authority, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, to make commitments for the current fiscal year not to exceed a total amount of $9,825,700—Payments to the provinces, $9,525,700.

Mr. Denis: What is the amount of money paid to the province of Quebec under this item? Has Quebec received any money under this item? If so, when? What is the total number of persons who have benefited under this item?

Mr. Starr: The year 1953-54 was the last year in which Quebec participated in the vocational training agreements.

Mr. Herridge: Can the minister tell the committee the amount paid to the province of British Columbia under this item?

Mr. Starr: The amount was $972,717.34.

Mr. Denis: Can the minister tell us the number of persons who benefited under this item? In the details, for instance, we find such headings as training for primary industries and in home-making, foremanship supervisory training and training of unemployed workers. Of course, the minister must have the number of persons who have benefited.

Mr. Starr: There was a total enrolment of 25,670.

Mr. Pascoe: The item reads in part:

—to authorize the Minister of Labour to enter into agreements with any province . . . to provide financial assistance to vocational and technical schools—

There is in Moose Jaw a technical school built by the provincial government. Can the minister say whether the federal government is helping out in the construction of that technical school; if so, how much is the contribution?

Mr. Starr: Yes. We contribute to it to the extent of about $1,700,000.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Unemployment Insurance Commission—

172. Administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act, including expenditures incurred in connection with other duties and responsibilities assumed and carried out as required by the governor in council on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour in accordance with section 4 of the act, $35,179,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if he could bring us up to date with regard to the advisory committee set up under the Unemployment Insurance Act. As the committee knows, three representatives of labour on that committee resigned over an appointment made by the government to fill a vacancy which arose on the unemployment insurance commission. When Mr. Tallon retired, Mr. MacArthur was appointed by the government. The representatives of labour resigned because it was felt that there had been a failure on the part of the government to comply with the provisions for consultations contained in the act. Accordingly, three of the labour representatives resigned—Mr. George Burt of the United automobile workers, Mr. Marchand of the Catholic syndicates and Mr. Andreas who, I believe, was the representative on the advisory committee of the Canadian Labour Congress.

I should like to ask the minister if he has taken any steps to meet with the labour representatives I have mentioned with a view to their resuming their functions on that committee and whether, if he has taken such steps, they have agreed to return. If not, will the minister tell us whether he has taken any action whatsoever with regard to them and, if the answer is in the negative as I gathered the other day it will be, what steps has he taken to fill the vacant position on the advisory committee. I am sure the minister will appreciate the importance of the advisory committee being able to function at full strength at the present time, particularly in the face of representations which are now being made to a committee of this house and of discussions which have taken place in this house and which will take place later when the committee makes its report. It seems to us there should be no delay about either asking these gentlemen to return to their functions after withdrawing their resignations or, alternatively, re-establishing the full quota of labour representatives on the advisory committee. I think the minister owes this committee the fullest information he is able to give us.

Mr. Starr: For the information of the hon. member for Essex East, the unemployment advisory committee is composed of four representatives of the employees, four representatives of the employers, and a chairman. This committee meets once a year to consider the actuarial report to the unemployment insurance commission on the state of the fund, at which time they make a report to the governor in council. That report is tabled in the House of Commons as prescribed in the act.

As the hon. gentleman knows three of the workers' representatives resigned. However, the term for the whole committee expires on June 27 of this year, and with this in mind I have written letters to the four representative employers organizations asking for either the resubmission of the nominations of the present serving members or for new names for consideration. I have also written letters to the workers' organizations. I have written to the Canadian Labour Congress advising them of the fact that there are three vacancies and that the term expires on June 27 and asking them for the submission of names. I have also written to the Canadian Catholic federation of labour pointing out the same thing and asking for names. I have written, further, to the national legislative committee of the railway brotherhoods. In these letters I requested that names should be submitted to me by May 22, that is tomorrow. I have received word from the Canadian Labour Congress that Mr. Jodoin has been away on business, but he will be back tomorrow, so I expect names will be submitted to me for consideration.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says the committee meets once a year. I think the act provides that it shall meet once a year, but he may recall that once, in 1958, it actually met on two occasions.

Mr. Starr: I can clarify that point. The committee does meet once a year, and I have set out the purpose for which it meets on that occasion, but it may also meet at the request of the minister at any time the minister may wish to consider certain amendments to the act.

Mr. Pickersgill: And at the request of the commission.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate points out it may also meet at the request of the commission. Can the minister say whether or not there have been any meetings of the advisory committee since the introduction of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Mr. Starr: There has been no meeting of the advisory committee since August 19, 1958.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Was there any consideration given to the request of the labour representatives who resigned, prior to their resignation, for the holding of a further meeting other than that held on August 19, 1958?

Mr. Starr: That was a matter for the decision of the chairman of that advisory committee.

Mr. Carter: Before this item carries I should like to take a few minutes in which to make some observations about unemployment insurance benefits for fishermen. Recently we have heard statements over the air by commentators, and we have read articles in the press, which have been phrased in such a way as to create in the public mind an impression that one of the big factors in the drain on the unemployment insurance fund has been the inclusion of fishermen within the scope of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I think that such statements require an answer. In reply to the hon. member for Kent (N.B.) the minister put on record some time ago—and I am referring to page 3146 of Hansard—that during the period between June 30, 1957 and March 31, 1959 payments out of the unemployment insurance fund amounted to $782,794,595, while at the same time, contributions amounted to $426,316,719. In other words, during that period the unemployment insurance fund paid out $365.5 million more than it collected.

To mention this in the same breath as saying that benefits are now being received by fishermen is to convey a very wrong impression to the people of Canada. I do not know what the exact figures are—perhaps the minister could put them on record—but I do not think that the payments to fishermen amount to more than $10 million a year in excess of the total of the contributions received. In other words, why focus so much attention on about 3 per cent of this drain and say nothing about the other 97 per cent?

That is what is being done by certain writers in the daily papers and by certain people who have access to the air waves over our broadcasting stations. In addition to that it has been stated that now the fishermen are included this fund is no longer an insurance fund but has become a welfare fund. There again it seems strange to me that fishermen should be singled out for this distinction because if it is a welfare fund now it was a welfare fund long before any fisherman got any benefits from it.

All the people who are employed on the great lakes know that they are going to be out of work during the winter. That fact is a certainty. They were included years before the fisherman was included. If it is a welfare fund for the fisherman surely it is a welfare fund for them. The same applies to all the stevedores along the great lakes' fronts, along the St. Lawrence seaway and to the people employed in our canals and at the Montreal and Toronto docks. It is true as well, in some instances, of those employed in the forest industry. All those people were included long before the fisherman was included and nobody said a word about the insurance fund being turned into a welfare fund. It is strange that now, because a few fishermen have at last been admitted, a hue and cry has been raised and severe criticism expressed of the fact that fishermen are at last eligible for insurance.

Some of the most severe critics of the extension of insurance benefits to fishermen have been mainland firms and organizations such as chambers of commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. I should think that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association should be the very last to make any comment on this question—

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the hon. member for a moment. I believe he is right in saying there has been a great deal said about what the inclusion of fishermen has cost the fund. To put the record straight I must say that fishermen came under the unemployment insurance act on April 1, 1957. From that day until March 31, 1959 the inclusion of fishermen cost the fund a total of $13,880,000 over a period of over two years.

Mr. Carter: Over two years it has cost less than $14 million and this has been receiving adverse publicity in publications put out by chambers of commerce and by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and over the air. I thank the minister for setting the record straight in that respect.

These manufacturers in complaining and criticizing the inclusion of fishermen are saying in effect that it is all right to include the people who manufacture the fish, the people who process it in plants, the people who convey it from the boat and weigh it and carry it to the plants and ship it to the markets; in fact, it is all right for everybody who handles the fish to get unemployment insurance benefits. On the other hand the poor man who has to go out and risk his life and undergo the most severe hardship and danger should not be included. They are saying in effect that it is wicked and wrong for him to get unemployment insurance benefits. Surely the critics of this should reorient their thinking. In my opinion the fisherman has a greater claim to benefits than any of the others because he produces the raw material which provides not only the employment but the opportunity for all the other people to get benefits and also the opportunity for the manufacturer to make a profit.

It has been said that the contributions of fishermen are very small in comparison with the benefit period. I saw in a publication a statement to the effect that a fisherman can get benefits for 5½ months. It is true that he can, but so can everybody else who qualifies for seasonal benefits. These people should know that the number of weeks of benefit a fisherman gets depends on the number of stamps he has. In Newfoundland this year the majority of our fishermen did not earn enough stamps to get benefits at all. I suppose that approximately 60 per cent or 70 per cent of our fishermen could not qualify because they could not acquire sufficient stamps. Another 30 per cent got the bare 15 stamps and as a result of that received benefits for ten weeks. The average benefit period for seasonal unemployment is less than 15 weeks or thereabouts.

When these manufacturers and chambers of commerce wax indignant about the fisherman receiving benefits and when they draw comparisons between the amount the fisherman contributes and the amount he draws out, I should like to remind them of this. The fisherman is a taxpayer. He pays sales tax on everything he buys. In addition to that he contributes his share to the benefits that are paid to all the people who secure employment because of the product he produces. These people must be very naive if they do not realize that all of this comes out of the price paid to the fisherman for his fish and he, being the low man on the totem pole, has to carry that burden.

I would ask these people to examine their consciences collectively and individually before they continue pointing fingers at the fisherman. If they are honest with themselves I believe they will come to the conclusion that they themselves by their own actions in laying off men unnecessarily have put a far greater drain on the fund than that represented by all the fishermen who may draw benefits for many years to come.

While on this subject I should like to remind the minister that we were promised some time ago that the part of the act which applies to fishermens' benefits would be revised. We have not heard from the minister concerning when he expects to do something about this. He must know now that there are serious inequities in the way the act is administered and that some revision is long overdue. As the act stands at present some fishermen can never draw benefits because their greatest period of activity is during the winter season and the stamps they earn at that time cannot be counted for benefits during the slack period of the fishing season. I hope the minister will be able to assure us that the government does intend to overhaul this legislation and revise that part of the act which relates to unemployment insurance benefits for fishermen.

Last year I made several suggestions to the minister about the administration of unemployment insurance benefits. As I went about my district I was glad to observe that the minister took some of my suggestions seriously and put them into effect which fact was very much appreciated by the fishermen.

I should like to elaborate now on a suggestion that I made a few days ago to the minister about people who pay into the fund for five consecutive years without drawing any benefits at all. I suggested that there should be a maximum period for people who are never going to be out of work and who pay continuously all throughout their working life. I should like to amplify that by citing the case of a foreman. It is often the case that a foreman starts out on an hourly wage rate and after a few years is transferred to a salary basis. His income then rises above the level which permits him to continue coverage under this act. I am told that in such cases his insurance book is valid for only 90 days after his transfer to salary. Should he get out of work he cannot receive any benefits at all from the contributions that he has paid in for five years. That seems to me to be very unfair.

Mr. Starr: May I just give this information? The stamps and book are good for two years.

[Mr. Carter.]

Mr. Carter: Are good for two years after the man has transferred to salary?

Mr. Starr: Yes.

Mr. Carter: Or after his salary rises above the permissible level of income?

Mr. Starr: That is correct.

Mr. Carter: I am very glad to have that information because it is not generally known. I am also told that after the two-year period expires and this man gets laid off and has to be re-employed at an hourly wage rate he has to start all over again and build up his contributions from scratch.

Mr. Starr: May I interject again? I personally paid into the fund for 10 years and I was very happy that I did not have to collect anything from the fund, and that time has expired.

Mr. Carter: I am glad that the minister was able to pay into the fund for 10 years, but the minister was fortunate enough not to be laid off and have to look for work. I would point out to the minister that when a person is out of work it does not matter too much whether he is on an hourly rate or on a salary rate; his need is just as great and there should be some coverage. Therefore, I would suggest to the minister that he should take another look at this five-year period to see whether something more equitable could not be worked out for people who have paid for a full five years or seven years, or whatever the minister or his advisers may decide, and give them some special consideration.

Before I sit down there is just one other point I want to bring to the minister's attention. It arises from the experiences which I have encountered from a number of my constituents. The applicant in an isolated community, particularly in my province, has to send his application in by mail. Now, his application can be lost in the mail. It can also be received in the office and be mislaid by some of the commission's employees. In both of these cases the applicant must prove, and must very often go to considerable inconvenience to prove, that he actually sent in his application. Some discretion should be given to the managers of the offices in the various regions in such cases because, it seems to me, the applicant has no protection if a clerk in the office loses his book. All he has to say is, "Well, I did not get it; it was not received". The poor applicant is put to untold inconvenience. The postmaster may mislay it or it can get lost in the mail somewhere and the applicant has to suffer the whole burden of the inconvenience. I do hope that some way can be worked out under which the benefit of the doubt can be given to cases such as these.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to say that I endorse completely everything that my hon. friend from Burin-Burgeo has said about unemployment insurance for fishermen. I do think that this apparently concerted publicity campaign by some people in more favoured and protected industries against the fishing industry is one of the most unwarranted and unfair things that I have seen in a long time. I am very grateful to the minister for his intervention in the debate to indicate that he agreed with us about that. After all, this is an industry that has to stand on its own feet. And worse than that, it competes without any subsidy in world markets against half a dozen countries where the fisheries exports are subsidized. The fishermen have to buy in a protected market. I will not elaborate the argument which was made very well by my hon. friend from Burin-Burgeo; but there are one or two particular observations that I should like to make very briefly about the administration of unemployment insurance, particularly unemployment insurance for fishermen, but not exclusively that. It is much more the administration, generally speaking, in remote areas where it has to be done largely by mail.

But before I do that, in view of some of the extraordinary history we have heard this afternoon, I should like to say how proud we are on this side of the house that it was a Liberal government that, after struggling for three years against the Tory premier of Quebec, and finally getting him defeated, was able to bring unemployment insurance on a constitutional basis into operation in this country. All the improvements that have been made in this legislation over the years, except one or two that have been suggested very recently that we do not think were improvements, were also attributable to a Liberal government.

Having said that, I come back to one or two of the small flies in the ointment, and a very good ointment it is, too. The first thing I should like to say is something that I thought would have melted the heart of the minister long before this. I have written him on several occasions, as he will recall, about cases where young men who had got enough stamps to get unemployment insurance were denied unemployment insurance because they went back to school. Now, I do think, this is the kind of provision that gets put into legislation in prosperous times. It is quite obvious that in times of full employment unemployment insurance is not intended to be used as a kind of income while someone completes his education; but it does seem to me that in times when unemployment is great and employment is slack it is a terrible social waste to say that because a young man goes to school instead of hanging around at home when there is no work available, his unemployment insurance is cut off. I am sure that this would not require —I should not say "I am sure" because I am not a lawyer and I have not examined the act carefully—I very much doubt whether this would require any amendment to the act; I think it would merely require an amendment to the regulations. I appeal to the minister once again to take these cases under consideration, and not merely to take them under consideration but to get his colleagues to act and do something about them because it is hard to think of anything more wasteful than saying to these young men, "you have to stay out of school in order to get your unemployment insurance; if you go to school you have no right to unemployment insurance." This happens, of course, more often in a seasonal occupation such as fishing, perhaps, than in some others.

The other difficulty I mentioned the other day and I should like to reiterate it. It is this. There is a very strong feeling about this, and I think it is a justified feeling about placement disabilities. As I said, I do not want to criticize the officials because I have nothing but praise for the officials with whom I have anything to do. I think they are doing their best; but in a province like Newfoundland there is a real problem because of the poor communications and the great distances from the offices. There is unquestionally a tendency when jobs become available to give them to those people who are handy to the offices rather than to others who, though they may have been unemployed a great deal longer, are more remote from the offices. I do not say that the ones that are remote should get preference over the others, not at all, but it does seem to me that in some way or other there should be equality in a matter of this kind. I hope that the minister will give the matter some consideration and will get his officials to give some consideration to trying to work it out.

I also want to appeal again to the minister to have more peregrinating officials in provinces like Newfoundland. It is a very great problem to explain things by letter. I have received a lot of letters, as the minister knows, and I have sent a few to him. I have also sent a lot to the chief commissioner who has always been most considerate with any of these letters and has gone to a lot of trouble over them. But it is very hard for many people to understand and explain all the complications that arise as between seasonal benefits and regular benefits and the number of stamps that are required and it does happen at times that mistakes are made quite inadvertently in the offices. That is why, when it takes a week for a letter to come back and another week for a letter to reach the office, people get discouraged.

Sometimes these people go for months without the insurance payments to which they are entitled. They have to go on relief. They spend the relief money and when they finally get their insurance money the welfare organization wants repayment of the relief money. This creates all sorts of unnecessary social problems.

Mr. Starr: If I may interrupt, I think we can overcome some of the problems the hon. member has mentioned. As you know, we have appointed agents now who are sufficiently trained to carry out the function of filling out claims on behalf of people so that there is no delay involved in letters going back and forth through the mails. If the hon. member knows of areas in his riding where he thinks there should be an agent appointed I will be glad to do so if he will let me know.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not going to take the time of the committee or the minister now. I will be very glad to talk about that privately. The minister will understand that I do not want to mention some places in my riding without mentioning them all. I promised the Minister of Public Works that I would not give the names of all the places in my riding this evening. That was a private undertaking but I intend to keep it. But there is one other point. While it is very useful and important to have claims offices, I have been very much interested in seeing the minister make provision for job officers who would travel around—

Mr. Starr: We established two new offices in your riding.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the offices the minister established were for the purpose of dealing with claims, not for the purpose of providing jobs.

Mr. Starr: They have placement officers there.

Mr. Pickersgill: In my riding?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Why don't you take a trip down there and find out what is going on?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member for Saint John-Albert would like to come to my riding with me any time I would be very happy to take him around. He would soon find out that I am fairly well known in my riding, probably just as well known as he is in his.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): The hon. member said in the first election in which he ran that he was going to move into the riding and I notice that he has not established residence there yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, sir, I do not know whether you will permit me to reply to the hon. gentleman but what he has stated is completely incorrect and I have tried to choose a word that is parliamentary. Whenever my constituents complain about my conduct I will be impressed but as long as the complaints come only from the hon. member for Saint John-Albert I will be impressed rather differently.

The Chairman: I believe we should discuss the labour estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am labouring to get back to the point. My point is that I feel a more decentralized effort should be made in certain of the provinces in the field of placement as well. It seems to me that I should not take any more of the time of the committee.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I was very glad to hear the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate speak of this group's efforts to bring to the minister's attention the wisdom of permitting university students, those who can obtain technical training—

Mr. Pickersgill: And schoolboys too.

Mr. Herridge: —nurses and others who might attend business college to attend these institutions during the time they are drawing unemployment insurance if during that period they would otherwise be simply unemployed and idle. I agree with what the hon. member said. I think it is stupid and socially wasteful to allow our young people to waste their time when we can assist them to that limited extent without any additional expense to the exchequer.

I want to bring to the minister's attention again the question of covering defence personnel by bringing them under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I brought this matter up in the veterans affairs committee and found out that the high officials of the defence department made the decision. Personally I do not see why senior officials of the defence department should decide whether or not other ranks in the armed forces should come under unemployment insurance. I have a number of cases in mind of men who came out of the armed forces during the last 18 months and who have been unemployed for long periods because they have been out of contact with work in the area, out of contact with employers and so on. I do urge the minister to give consideration to bringing at least the other ranks in our defence forces within the scope of this act.

I agree with what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had to say with respect to the local administrative officers having more opportunity to move around the districts they serve in order to meet employees and employers and so that the employees will have a better understanding of how to complete these forms when they become unemployed and will also have a better opportunity to be aware of the job opportunities throughout the district.

Having made these few remarks, I wish to deal particularly with the question of the inclusion of farm workers under this legislation. I started to expand upon this subject in the debate on second reading of the bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. However, Mr. Speaker clipped my parliamentary wings on that occasion so that I have got to do it at the proper time, which is now. I know that the minister is fully informed of the situation but I promised the farmers of my constituency that I would bring up the matter at every opportunity and I look upon this as another opportunity. I should like to tell the hon. gentleman that I am not in the habit of speaking in the house for the sake of gathering votes.

The farm organizations of British Columbia, including the British Columbia federation of agriculture, the British Columbia fruit growers association and others, have expressed their opinion concerning this matter. It is a problem to the farmers. These organizations have expressed their opinion by resolutions passed at annual conventions year after year but so far without result. I realize the difficulties surrounding the problem. It is somewhat more complex than servicing an industry where you have workers working eight hours a day within a certain area, under certain foremen and things of that sort. I know there are differences but for the life of me I cannot see why these difficulties cannot be met through satisfactory regulations.

The average farmer is placed in an unfair position compared with other employers because when he wants to get casual or temporary help the prospective employee has two choices. He can go to work where he is covered by unemployment insurance or he can go to work for the farmer. Naturally he is going to choose the job where he is protected by unemployment insurance and can earn the stamps while he is working. For that reason, at various times and particularly during certain seasons the farmers have difficulty in getting labour, particularly in a region such as ours where they have to compete against the lumbering industry, the mining industry and the smelting industry whose scales of wages are somewhat higher than the average. I do think that this matter should be given further consideration and I believe that regulations could be drafted that would exempt the farmer's family. This regulation could be so drafted as to confine the coverage to persons outside the family who were employed by the farmer for particular work.

There is another matter that I want to mention which does affect farmers who do employ persons under circumstances that do not bring them within the terms of this act. I have had this matter mentioned to me by farmers on a number of occasions. They claim that the definition of persons who can be brought under this act when working for farmers is not clear enough. I wrote to Mr. James McGregor, director of the unemployment insurance commission, in connection with this matter on March 18 last. He replied to me as follows:

> This is in reply to your letter of 16th March to Mr. E. C. Desormeaux, secretary of the unemployment insurance commission, with reference to the insurability of certain types of labour on farms.
> Employment in agriculture is excepted by section 27(a) of the Unemployment Insurance Act. However, it was considered desirable to preserve the continuity of insurance for skilled tradesmen who ordinarily work in insurable employment when they take employment in their regular trades on farms. As it is not very practicable for a farmer to arrange to insure employees for only a day or two of casual employment, this provision applies only when a skilled tradesman is engaged for more than six days in any period of thirty consecutive days.
> I hope this general statement will be helpful to you. However, it might be advisable if you receive specific enquiries about this to refer your correspondent to the local office of the commission which serves his area. In this way it is more likely that he will get complete and up-to-date information based on the circumstances in his particular case.

My point is, Mr. Chairman, that I have discussed this matter with the local officials of the unemployment insurance commission, with the officials in my own district, and they have said, if you want clarification you must write to the senior officials in Ottawa. I have done that, and they have referred me back to the local officials in the constituency. There is a great deal of ambiguity on this question. I want to suggest that there should be some clear definition as to who can be covered by unemployment insurance when working for a farmer.

I want to know if you can cover a man who is clearing land? He is doing identical work to that of the man working in the woods. He is not regularly employed in the production of crops or assisting in the raising of stock. Can you insure a man who is assisting in the building of dams for irrigation purposes? Can you insure a man who is erecting a fence, and who has particular equipment for erecting fences? He comes along with a truck which has pulleys, winches and things of that sort on it. Can you insure a man who is grading roads on your property? Some farmers have miles of road to be graded with mechanical equipment. Can you insure a man who is installing a water system? He is not a plumber; he is not a skilled tradesman, but he has had a lot of experience putting in water systems and provides a very satisfactory service. Can you insure a person who is cutting fuel? Now, this is an operation that is more akin to a forestry operation. He is not working on the farm, he is employed with a power saw to cut you 50 cords of wood for next year.

I am one of those persons, who live under rather primitive conditions compared to most of the sophisticated members of this house. I ask these questions because they have been particularly brought to my attention by farmers in my district. It would assist farmers generally if there were a clear definition. In my opinion, there should be a clear identification of the persons who are covered and who are employed by farmers. I am quite sure there are many farmers who have lost opportunities to obtain the services of a particularly competent person because the farmer and the employee were both of the opinion he was not covered under the act. I should like the minister to give us some information on this subject. I see he is chatting with his officials and is probably bubbling over with information at this time.

I should like him to tell us, first of all, his opinion as to the possibility of allowing university students, technical school students, students at business colleges, nursing schools and so on, to be covered by unemployment insurance to which they are not entitled now while attending these schools. I should like his opinion about the coverage for these people who work for farmers. I am not much concerned about those who are not in the working ranks. I have always been concerned about the working man, being one myself. I should like his opinion on the possibility of having farm workers generally included within the terms of the act, and what he can suggest with respect to having a clearer definition of the persons who can be employed on a farm now.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and also the hon. member for Kootenay West asked me about the coverage for students attending schools or universities.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or ordinary schools.

Mr. Starr: Well, this applies to them. One of the requirements to be fulfilled in order for a person to be eligible for benefits is that he must be available for work. It is this requirement that students are usually unable to meet. The umpire, who is the final authority under the act, has ruled that in the case of full-time students there is a strong presumption of non-availability. This presumption can only be rebutted when the student demonstrates his primary interest is in obtaining immediate full-time employment.

If, for example, a student has incurred substantial expense in attending a course, such as fees, it may be taken for granted his primary interest is in pursuing the course. If, on the other hand, he was prepared to change to evening classes, where those are available, he may be considered as being available for work or being eligible for benefits. Generally the claimant who, while unemployed, occupies himself by taking short courses at a time when opportunities of suitable employment are not likely to develop until after the course is completed may be available for work. It will be seen from what I have said that each case has to be decided on its own merits.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister would permit me a question on that point, I would say that the first case I drew to his attention was the case of a young man in Newfoundland, and it cost him absolutely nothing to go to school. He could have quit school the next day and yet the decision was adverse. I have had a good deal of correspondence about that case with the minister. I have had no case in which there was any question of anyone being put to any expense, yet all these applicants have been turned down. It does seem to me that there should be some redefinition of the regulation because, certainly in Newfoundland, it does not seem to work very well.

Mr. Starr: I am going to look into the whole situation because I must admit that I have sympathy with the hon. members on this point.

So far as the farm employees are concerned, over the past few years there has been a tendency toward more farm labour coming under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. There have been difficulties. The farm organizations themselves were not sure that they actually wanted to be brought under the Unemployment Insurance Act. There were segments of the agriculture economy in which opinion was against it. There were other segments, particularly the fruit growers in the Okanagan valley, the Annapolis valley and the sugar beet growers, which were anxious to come under the act. We have studied every possible form of coverage, universal coverage, territorial coverage, and at the moment we are studying what I consider to be a feasible plan, that is inclusion on a voluntary basis.

In other words, if a farmer finds himself unable to obtain employees to work on his farm but there are some available and the only reason they will not accept his employment is that he has not unemployment insurance coverage, then he may be able to be registered as an employer and to obtain that coverage. That might be the start of the inclusion of the farm employees. As I say, we are at the moment giving study to this matter. This study of the inclusion of farm help has been going on ever since I have taken office, I might say, but because of these difficulties and because of the change of mind by the industry itself, so to speak, there has not been brought about a more rapid solution.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister mind commenting on the present ambiguity with respect to who is covered as farm labour?

Mr. Starr: Section 61 of the Unemployment Insurance Act has to do with the matter. It covers skilled tradesmen employed by farmers. The act applies only to skilled labour, tradesmen who are employed by farmers for a short period of time; I believe it is 60 days.

Mr. Herridge: What is a skilled tradesman? The minister must understand that nowadays a man turns up with a hammer and saw and says "I am a skilled tradesman". What is the definition of a skilled tradesman?

Mr. Starr: There is not a clear definition of that category. It is supposed to include carpenters and other people whom the farmer might hire to work on his farm doing repair work or in the construction of buildings and so on. There is no clear definition. That is one of the things that probably will be cleared up when we look into the possibility of including farm labour under this act.

Mr. Herridge: This matter is of a good deal of importance to the people in my district. Would a man who came on your premises to clear land and said, "I am a skilled logger and I take contracts to clear land on farms on occasion" be a skilled tradesman?

Mr. Starr: I doubt that very much. I would not think so.

Mr. Herridge: I should like the minister to tell that to the loggers in my district.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before this item carries I want to make reference to one matter. There have been many issues between the Minister of Labour and myself and hon. members in the past few weeks but I should like to thank the Minister of Labour for resolving a problem which was of great concern to a number of my constituents during this past year. Some of them had been called upon to pay fairly large sums of money back to the unemployment insurance commission. These consituents came to me and I decided that under the law these impositions had been exacted illegally. I took the matter up with the commission and they told me finally that they agreed with the decision I had taken but that they had no authority to return these monies to the individuals concerned. The commission also stated that it did not propose to demand payment of others who had not made the payment in accordance with the demands previously made on them by the commission. This matter was finally taken to the minister and he decided that as the impositions in the first instance were unjust it would be unfair to fail to return the monies to those who had already paid just as it would be unfair and illegal to demand payment of those who had not paid. I want the minister to know that notwithstanding the vigorous character of the issues between himself and those of us on this side of the chamber and in particular myself, I appreciate his resolving this problem which has meant so much to a considerable number of the men in the factories in Windsor whom I have the honour of representing in this house.

Mr. MacEwan: I have just a few remarks to make on this matter. It is a matter of which the minister has knowledge now but I believe it will bear repetition. I listened with interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Kootenay West. Of course, I always enjoy them. Off the record, may I say this. He mentioned the fact that he did not speak to gain votes. I am sure that his winning ways and pleasant personality are responsible for doing that.

I wish to refer to a submission made to the Minister of Labour by the United Steel Workers of America, local 1231 of Trenton, Nova Scotia with regard to a certain part of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Many of the members of this union are employees of the Eastern Car Company which builds railway cars. As a result of this type of employment, it quite often happens that the employment is intermittent as orders come and go throughout the year. As to the payment of benefits under the act, as is known, under the act the average of the last 30 weeks is taken. In this case, the employees of this particular industry, who number close to 1,000, are at top production pay on the high rate by way of contributions but because the work is intermittent as I have said—that is, they are called in on a certain day and are laid off on a certain day—they are given a small stamp. As is known, four small stamps, in the course of this contribution, place the contributor on the lower benefit scheme.

The submission which was made by this union or by its local branch to the minister, of which I have knowledge, was to the effect that if a change could be made in the act—and it would probably apply to other types of workers in Canada—to the effect that if 51 per cent of the higher stamps for the past 30-week period was used as a medium it would give them an opportunity then to receive the higher benefits. As I have pointed out, when they are working, as a result of their earnings they pay on the higher bracket but they do not receive the benefits on that rate scheme.

Last year a submission was also made to me by this same union with regard to the matter of an increase in the benefits paid to the contributor. I spoke at that time and without commenting on the act which is now before the House of Commons and is in committee, and in which an increase is proposed by the government—certainly not brought about by any advocacy on my part, but by the wisdom and the efficiency of the Minister of Labour and of this government, of course—I hope that as a result of the few words that I have said this evening on this matter, perhaps the same desired results will be obtained.

Mr. Carter: I want to mention briefly one or two points which slipped my mind when I had the floor a little while ago. First of all, I want to take one parting shot at those manufacturing firms in central Canada and remind them that every cent the poor fisherman is going to get from the unemployment insurance fund will come right back here into their own pockets because they have a protective market and we are their prisoners. Therefore I hope they will think twice before again objecting to benefits for the fishermen.

There are two other points which slipped my mind when I had the floor just now. The first one is this. It is my understanding that if an applicant sends in an application for regular benefits and if he has not qualified he must submit another application for seasonal benefits. I would ask the minister if something could not be done, particularly in the case of fishermen, so that only one application would be necessary.

The other point I wish to make concerns fishermen, particularly fishermen from Newfoundland who leave their homes and fish on ships sailing from mainland ports. These men are away from their homes for ten months out of the year, but on some occasions during the off season when the ship is under refit or for some other such reason they come home, and during that time they draw unemployment benefits. However, occasionally it happens that a trawler in a nearby port is shorthanded, and a company applies to an employment office in St. John's, informing the officials that this fisherman is home. Under these circumstances the man has to leave home and take the work offered to him or be disqualified from benefit. It seems to me that some special provision should be made in the case of people who work away from their homes for long periods of time, and I ask the minister if he would give his attention to making some special provision to meet this type of case.

Mr. Tucker: The government intends to raise the contribution but fails to increase the benefits. In other words, the fishermen, the labourers and the workers will now be required to pay more of their meagre earnings for stamps to qualify them for the same amount of benefits. The new provision allowing a full claim for 52 weeks of benefit does not really mean much, as a claimant would only get value for the amount of stamps he has to his credit and fishermen and other workers barely get enough stamps each year to qualify for seasonal benefits, so this benefit is of no value to them or to the many. It will only benefit a few. Some of the benefits paid are ridiculously low, $6 or $8 a week. What can a person do on such an amount these days?

Section 46 (2) cuts off some of the benefits from the claimants. For example, when a claim expires at a full week the subsequent claim begins on a previous Sunday so eventually a claimant receives benefit for a full week. For example, a claim expires on Wednesday. A claim is put in for Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. A subsequent claim begins on Sunday of that week, so later the man is paid for Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Thus he gets the benefit of the full week. Under this new amendement a claimant will not receive any benefit for Thursday, Friday and Saturday because his subsequent claim will commence only on the following Sunday, so he has no claim in existence for Thursday, Friday and Saturday of the week, whether or not his claim expired on Wednesday, so he loses benefits. This boils down to the fact that both claimants and employers have to pay more to the fund in order to get the same benefits out of it whereas the government is not contributing any more than it did formerly. The workers must pay all the time.

Many fishermen in Newfoundland are disturbed by changes in the unemployment insurance regulations providing for the compulsory deduction of 25 per cent from gross earnings before calculating earnings for insurance purposes. Would the minister explain why this change was made and what advantages there are for the fishermen?

Mr. Starr: The change in the regulations was made in November, 1958. Many changes were made at that time to try to remedy the anomalies which existed. In doing that we created anomalies, also, and one of them is this one and right at the moment we are considering it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am glad the minister is doing so.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I have two questions I should like to put to the minister. I understand that many civil servants employed by the provincial governments have been brought by those governments within the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I should like to know how many provinces have placed their employees within the scope of this act, and what are the conditions for taking such action?

Should Quebec not be participating, I wonder whether the minister would consider, writing a friendly letter to a friendly government, not to put the hammer over the heads of the Quebecers but to invite them to participate in the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Starr: The civil services of all the provinces except Quebec are included, and I have taken note of the hon. member's suggestion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will you file it?

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister could now give me the information about the Winnipeg office for which I asked him the other evening.

Mr. Southam: Coming from a rural constituency I am interested in the problem of unemployment insurance in relation to farm labour, and I thought I should make a survey to find out information which I could pass on to the minister.

Several weeks ago I wrote to all the reeves and councillors in my constituency asking them pertinent questions and seeking their views on this matter. I have had a good cross-section of opinion. All of them with the exception of one, Councillor Reid, have written me saying that they feel that farm labour should come under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I just thought I should pass this information on to the committee, feeling this is a good cross-section of opinion in this particular area.

Mr. Starr: I should like to reply to the hon. member for Trinity and to congratulate him on the very good speech he made to this committee on the matters with which he dealt last week. This has to do with mechanization in the prairie region. An installation on a trial basis was made last year and the results obtained have justified the continuation of the experiment. Hon. members will appreciate that with the complexity of this operation and the speed which must be achieved and maintained several bugs were encountered. These are however being overcome and it is hoped that the final results will not only provide the best service possible to claimants but will also lessen costs. Because this is still in the nature of a pilot installation, the commission is not in a position to determine what the ultimate staff requirements will be in the regional and local offices of the prairie region at the present time. It is expected there will be a saving in this connection.

The machine installation consists of multicontrol reproducing punches and standard interpreters in all mechanized local offices, which are 14 in number. The yearly rental for this equipment is $37,800. At the regional office there are 24 machines consisting of Univac electrical computers, tabulators, collators, verifiers, sorters, etc., and the yearly rental for this equipment is $50,520. The total rental for equipment is $88,320. Special forms are required for use in this equipment and the cost for 1959-60 is estimated at $140,000. These forms, of course, replace standard forms used in the non-mechanized officers of the unemployment insurance commission. Furthermore, if and when mechanization becomes universal, forms will be purchased at somewhat lower prices than for the pilot operation.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to bring to the attention of the Minister of Labour the case of the farm labourer and in particular I should like to plead for the western farm labourer. Our agricultural industry in the west is rapidly becoming mechanized and because of this it is difficult to obtain labour to run the machinery. It takes a skillful labourer to run these machines. As a result of mechanization the farm labourer has become a seasonal worker. I believe the farm labourer is the only one not now covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act. The fisherman is a seasonal labourer and he is covered by this legislation.

I should like to thank the minister for informing us that studies and research have been done along these lines but may I point out to him the urgency of having the farm labourer brought under the provision of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to thank the minister for his complimentary remarks about my earlier effort on the subject of rehabilitation of displaced workers. I hope that he and the department will give my recommendations serious consideration and I would be pleased if they would implement some of my recommendations in whole or in part.

I should like to sound a warning at this time with reference to mechanization in the unemployment insurance commission. Machines that will streamline the operation and make it more efficient are desirable but machines and procedures that treat people as statistics are undesirable. I know that the minister is in general agreement with this philosophy but I just want to call his attention to the very grave danger of treating unemployed people simply as units in an unemployed labour force.

I do not have personal knowledge of how these procedures work but I urge him when he considers the merits of the experiment and the possibility of extending it to other regions to take into consideration the effect it has on the relationships between people, the unemployed on one hand and those members of the commission who are trying to serve and look after them on the other. I urge the minister to bear this in mind. I know he will because I am convinced that he is just as interested as we are in this matter.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I wish to assure the hon. member for Trinity that I have this philosophy foremost in my mind. The mechanization of which I spoke of relates to the processing of claims only and certainly there will be no mechanization in terms of placing people in jobs or interviewing them.

(Translation):

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, while we are discussing the Minister of Labour's estimates I shall avail myself of this opportunity to draw the minister's attention on the hardship suffered by loggers and bushworkers following a notice published by the Unemployment Insurance Commission in December 1958, which reads as follows:

> Notice to operators engaged in wood cutting and lumbering.
> As from January 4, 1959, section 143, as amended, of unemployment insurance regulations will put into force a revised table of quantitative divisors used in establishing the number of unemployment insurance contributions to be credited to workers engaged in wood cutting and lumbering, whose rate of pay is based on their production figures rather than on the time spent on such production. The revision of the said table took into consideration more general use of mechanical saws, which resulted in a higher weekly production per man than in the past.

The notice also provides that, in future, wood cutters must cut 12 cords instead of 8. The proposed amendment therefore requires that lumberers increase their production by 50 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if, on the one hand, account was taken of mechanization, the fact was overlooked, on the other hand, that forestry operations, in Quebec, are mostly a winter activity, and that it is rather difficult for a lumberer to work a six-day week. Often, as a result of bad or changeable weather, they have to be content with four days' work. It is therefore quite impossible for them to cut 12 cords a week under such conditions.

It seems to me that if account was taken of mechanization, in determining the number of cords which a bushworker may cut, account should also be taken of bad weather, so as to extend to those workers the same privilege that is extended workers in private industries, that is to say the right to obtain a stamp without having to work a full week. I therefore ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) to take up this matter with commission officials for their consideration so that they may be in a position, if possible, to show greater fairness towards lumberers.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct another question to the minister. Could he tell me whether the negotiations undertaken with the authorities of the State of Maine and New Hampshire are being continued, so as to enable Canadian forestry workers employed in those states to qualify for unemployment insurance, through an agreement similar to the agreement reached with the authorities of the state of New York? Could the minister indicate whether it is possible to reach such agreements with the states concerned?

If not, would it be possible to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act in order that these workers could qualify for benefits? We know that many of them would rather work in Canada—thus increasing the number of those who are seeking jobs—than go to the United States to work, because they cannot have the coverage of unemployment insurance. Therefore, I ask the minister to tell us if the negotiations with the two states concerned are still going on.

(Text):

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for his suggestion which I shall take under consideration. For the past year and a half I have been endeavouring by communication to arouse an interest on the part of the states of Maine and New Hampshire in the terms of the reciprocal agreement with those states. Just recently within the past few weeks a representative from the Department of Labour attended a discussion held in the United States on this subject, the movement of labour across the border. He reported to me that the United States authorities now have a more lenient attitude toward the problem. We hope to follow it up and bring about a satisfactory conclusion in that respect.

Item agreed to.

173. Transfer of labour to and from places where employment is available and expenses incidental thereto, in accordance with regulations of the governor in council, $75,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister if he could tell us how many areas in the Atlantic provinces are now declared labour surplus areas coming within this vote and how many people have been moved out of those areas in the Atlantic provinces under this vote since the first of the year?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, there are two areas designated labour surplus areas, Springhill and Bell island. We have had inquiries from two firms interested in a few hundred of the men from Bell Island. That is the reason why this area was designated as a labour surplus area, in order to allow us to pay the cost of transporting the worker, his wife and family and household effects to the location of his new employment elsewhere in Canada.

There were 42 workers and 23 dependents transferred from the Springhill area in the last fiscal year for which we paid their expenses to other jobs elsewhere in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Have there been any yet from Bell island?

Mr. Starr: As far as I know there are no reports of any being transferred as yet.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Denis: Before we get through with the estimates may I be permitted to revert to item 168 just to ask one question while the officials are here?

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member the consent of the committee to revert to item 168?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Denis: I should like to know from the minister whether the province of Quebec has received any benefit from this item which has to do with a program for combatting seasonal unemployment, the organization and use of workers for farming and related industries and assistance to the provinces under agreements entered into with the provinces and the federal government?

Mr. Starr: I regret very much, Mr. Chairman, that that information is not available on my desk at the moment because of the fact we had passed the item. I should be glad to convey that information to the hon. member.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The answer is that the province has not.

Mr. Starr: I want to be sure.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of Labour.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

318. General administration, $9,335,045.

The Deputy Chairman: This item will be found on page 64 of the blue book and the details on page 416.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, the estimates of the Department of Public Works are set up in such a way that most of the discussion and questioning takes place on the different items, but I thought it might be helpful on the first item if I gave the members of the committee a brief summary of the work of the department during the last fiscal year which ended on March 31; then, a brief summary of our plans for the present fiscal year which commenced on April 1. Also there are three or four particular projects about which I think the members would like to have special information.

The work of the department has been quite severely handicapped because of the severe winter weather conditions which existed during the last winter in most parts of the country. However, the departmental activity was maintained at a very high level and I should like to pay tribute to the officials from coast to coast. They have been working under great pressure and have a great many projects under construction. I am sure that all hon. members who have had any contact with the department during the last year—and I would think that that includes everybody, judging from the letters I get—will agree that these officials have done a very good job.

The high level of activity is reflected in the total departmental expenditures of $220.3 million for the fiscal year 1958-59, which is an increase of approximately $8 million over 1957-58 and $55 million over the year 1956-57. On the building construction side of the departmental program in 1958-59 the expenditures totalled $60.5 million compared with $52 million in 1957-58 and $45.4 million in 1956-57. Expenditures on the construction of new harbour works as distinguished from the building construction work of the department reached a total of $28.4 million, against the previous year's figure of $26.2 million and an expenditure of $22.4 million in 1956-57.

The sum of $10 million was spent on the construction of the trans-Canada highway in the national parks which, as hon. members know, is the direct responsibility of the federal government. Our contributions to the provinces on the shared portion of the trans-Canada highway construction represented a total expenditure of $51.1 million compared with $49.4 million in 1957-58 and $24.8 million in 1956-57. The expenditures on this account in 1958-59 reached the highest total ever achieved in a single fiscal year. In addition to increased expenditures on works which fall within the department's own responsibility, activities on behalf of other government departments resulted in expenditures totalling $33.1 million, an increase of $1.7 million over the previous year.

There has been continuing emphasis placed on construction through the winter. This was very effective during the last winter, particularly in the building construction field, in which most of the projects were not closed down during the unfavourable construction season. The severe weather conditions did curtail winter construction activity to some extent on the harbours and rivers side, particularly in Quebec and the maritimes, where the physical conditions in many cases made progress impossible. However, to offset this the department undertook the policy of acquiring materials in advance. This had the double effect of providing increased employment during the winter months, for example timber cutting in Newfoundland, and of permitting a start on actual construction as early as possible after the spring break-up.

A large program of works was undertaken during the winter in the field of building repairs and maintenance, such as interior painting, partitioning and so forth. Although those works are not individually large in value, their cumulative effect is significant. Quite a large number of locations were involved. For 1958-59, the total expenditure on these types of works reached $2,710,000, with a labour value in the neighbourhood of 2½ million man hours.

The program of constructing small standard post offices across the country was another highlight of 1958-59. This program has been adopted to get those small post offices built during the winter months and with a minimum of administrative work, which perhaps I should call red tape. This is the first winter that the department has gone into such a plan heavily and we think it has been very successful. Mind you, those buildings are erected only where a lease has expired. We do not build them where there is a lease in existence; but where a lease is running out and it is considered appropriate by the Post Office Department and the Department of Public Works that a small post office should be built, that has been done. Sixty-seven buildings, with a total value of approximately $1.35 million, were undertaken. Most of these have now been completed or are in the final stages of construction. The construction of these buildings, as I have said, was carried out during the winter months. I have here a list of these post offices and if hon. members are interested in seeing it perhaps I could have leave to place it on Hansard.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the minister leave to place this on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Green: Perhaps I might say a few words now about harbours and rivers engineering projects. The use of model studies, in conjunction with the national research council, was increased and emphasized to study proposed projects in advance with a view to determining the results which can be expected and minimizing the possibility of inefficient and expensive undertakings which fail to achieve the desired results. Among the projects which have special problems and have therefore been subject to prior model study are the ones at Port aux Basques, Newfoundland, which as we all know has been a very tough problem; Saint John and Ingalls Head, New Brunswick; Glace Bay, Nova Scotia; Chandler and Matane, Quebec. A model study of the Fraser river development has been in use for some years.

To turn to development engineering projects, which come under another branch of the department, during the last year work on the construction of the trans-Canada highway through the national parks included completion of the bituminous stabilized base course in Banff and Yoho national parks, making it possible now to drive from the east gate at Banff to the western boundary of Yoho on a first-class paved highway. I might add that it is possible to drive on a first-class paved trans-Canada highway from the western border of Yoho park all the way to Kenora, Ontario. I did it myself the summer before last and the highway is even better now.

In Glacier and Revelstoke national parks the start of construction was delayed in that the route involving these parks was not decided upon until 1956. As members from the west will know, the decision then taken was to abandon the Big Bend route around the bend of the Columbia and build a new road paralleling the Canadian Pacific railway from Golden to Revelstoke with the exception that the road goes through Rogers pass and the railroad goes through a five mile tunnel having abandoned the road through the pass quite a few years ago.

Similarly, in the case of Terra Nova in Newfoundland this park was only declared in 1957. However, the work in these three parks has been pressed forward and all of the trans-Canada highway mileage was under grading contract by last summer. In Terra Nova in particular, while grading is not yet completed traffic is making use of the road. A full statement of activities on the trans-Canada highway through the provinces was given during the readings of the bill to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act last March. However, an indication of the accelerated progress on this undertaking on the basis of final figures for 1958-59 is that Canada's share of expenditures for the year rose to over $51 million, as I pointed out earlier in my remarks, which exceeded the original estimate by an appreciable amount.

Other projects in the field of highways and bridges which concerned the department during the year included the awarding of contracts for the substructures of bridges at Campbellton, New Brunswick, which will run to Cross Point, Quebec, $1,261,600, and at Burlington, Ontario, $698,300. In addition, the contract for the superstructure of the Burlington bridge has been let at an amount of $3,684,400 and tenders for the Campbellton-Cross Point superstructure have been called for June 4.

Work on behalf of other government departments was undertaken in all major fields of activity of the department. More than 200 individual projects were undertaken for 15 other departments. The majority of these were on behalf of the R.C.M.P. and northern affairs and national resources and included are major developments which are taking place in northern communities. There was also a heavy program of highway construction and location undertaken for northern affairs and national resources. In the national parks some of the principal items were reconstruction of the Banff-Jasper and Banff-Windermere highways and the Emerald lake road in the west and of the Cabot trail and the gulf shore road in the east.

In the northwest territories the extension of the Mackenzie highway toward Yellowknife was continued both on the location and construction sides. Other road survey projects in these areas include the Marian river road, the Fort Fitzgerald-Bell Rock road and a road from Peace Point westerly in Wood Buffalo park. In the Yukon territory, the reconnaissance survey of the road from the Dawson-Stewart highway to the oil reserves in the Peal plateau and thence to Fort McPherson, a distance of about 300 miles, was completed, as was the final location of the first 140 miles of the road. During the past winter a clearing contract was awarded on the first 45 miles where construction will start this summer. All of these undertakings involved an expenditure of $12 million during 1958-59 with the money being provided in the appropriation of northern affairs and natural resources.

So much for a brief review of the fiscal year 1958-59. I should now like to give members of the committee a few of the highlights of the departmental program for 1959-60. The total amount requested, exclusive of statutory items, in the 1959-60 estimates is $173.6 million. This reflects a decrease of $17.8 million on ordinary account. The decrease relates mainly to the completion of the major construction phases on a number of construction projects, for example, the customs building and post office at St. John's, Newfoundland, the national revenue building at Montreal, buildings for mines and technical surveys here in Ottawa and also some very expensive harbour improvements such as at Port aux Basques, Newfoundland, and Toronto. I hope, by the way, that we are not going to be criticized for reducing our estimate by a small amount.

Offsetting the decrease to some extent are additional requirements for the Campbellton-Cross Point bridge, an increase of $1,800,000, the low level Burlington canal bridge, an increase of $2,200,000, and an increased requirement related to the construction of a new dredge for the west coast dredging fleet, the increase being $660,000. Additional expenditure of about $1 million is included for the construction of the trans-Canada highway in the national parks. An increase of $3 million is also forecast in the contribution to the provinces for the trans-Canada highway, although this is a statutory item.

As for the winter employment implications of the 1959-60 estimates, although the amount provided for repairs, upkeep and normal maintenance of public buildings across the country is slightly reduced, it is the intention again to schedule these works to be carried out during the winter months in the interest of relieving seasonal unemployment. The department's activities in this field in 1958-59 have tended to reduce the requirements somewhat.

Similarly, it is intended to proceed again with a program of standard post office construction across the country in the winter of 1959-60. This program is carried out from the vote which is described as being for "miscellaneous works" in which an increase of three-quarters of a million dollars is requested. I have a list here of the small post offices and where they are to be built during the coming winter. If hon. members so wish, I would be glad to place it on Hansard.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to put this list on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Green: I would point out that sometimes things happen in connection with these small post offices and I cannot guarantee that all of them will be built. There may be some changes and perhaps some additions to the list. I find that quite a few problems come up in this connection, such as a quarrel about a site or something of that kind, and these things take time to work out. One centre in which a large federal building and not a small post office was to be erected had three sites selected by the local citizens. Almost a civil war developed in the town as to which site should be used, and the result has been that, for the time being, no building can be erected in that particular place.

Then in so far as work for other government departments is concerned I would say that a significant increase is indicated in the volume of works the Department of Public Works is being asked to undertake on behalf of other government departments. For 1959-60, 338 projects with an estimated total value of $227.9 million have been assigned by 11 other departments. This compares to a total of 236 projects valued at $152 million which was originally included in the 1958-59 program. Expenditures on this account for 1959-60 are now estimated at $51.82 million compared with $40.6 million at the time of the 1958-59 estimates and $35 million included in 1957-58.

Hon. members might be interested in some of the major departments for which the Department of Public Works will be undertaking work. I have a list which could be put on Hansard. For example, there is the department of northern affairs, 95 projects and the estimated total cost is $165 million; the estimated 1959-60 requirement is $26.9 million. Then, there are projects for veterans' affairs, transport, citizenship and immigration, the R.C.M.P., agriculture, national research council, national health and welfare. Perhaps I could have these figures printed without reading them.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member permission to have these figures printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Editor's note: The figures above referred to are as follows:)

Department	No. of projects	Estimated total cost (Millions)	Estimated 1959-60 requirement
Northern Affairs	95	165.0	26.9
Veterans Affairs	8	11.0	1.7
Transport	17	9.6	3.4
Citizenship and Immigration	44	9.3	4.5
R.C.M.P.	105	8.8	3.9
Agriculture	11	7.5	3.9
National Research Council	3	7.3	1.8
National Health and Welfare	36	6.9	2.7

Mr. Green: Not included in these listings is the program of construction of community stages for the fishermen in Newfoundland. This program, being undertaken on behalf of the Department of Fisheries, is now estimated to cost about $835,000. During the 1958-59 winter sites for the stages were decided upon and some of the materials required, mainly timber, were obtained. It is expected that the program can be completed in 1959-60. I had hoped we could finish some of this work during the winter months, but that turned out to be impossible.

In so far as the development engineering projects are concerned for 1959-60 fiscal year, slope seeding—as hon. members know that is where you spray grass seed on the slopes of the highway—general clean-up and the installation of guard railing will be carried out along the paved highway in Banff and Yoho parks. The grade separation at the Norquay overpass in Banff, as well as the Wapta lake railway relocation in Yoho, will be completed. All aggregate needed for the final paving of the trans-Canada hghway in those two parks will be crushed. In Glacier and Revelstoke parks, depending upon weather conditions, the major part of the grading of the highway will be completed as will most of the structures. Avalanche studies in the Rogers pass section of Glacier and the design of suitable avalanche defences for this area will be continued. In Terra Nova park grading on the highway will be completed and we will be in a position to proceed with the bituminous stabilized base course. For all of these projects, an amount of $13,400,000 is provided. However, if we encounter a good construction season, it is possible that a supplementary appropriation will be needed later in the year. An amount of $48 million is included in these estimates to cover payments to the provinces under the trans-Canada agreements during 1959-60.

In the few minutes which remain, I should like to give to the members a sketch of the situation with regard to five or six particular projects. One of the most challenging and most interesting projects the department has under construction is the improvement of the harbour in St. John's Newfoundland. A further amount of one and one-quarter million dollars toward harbour improvements in St. John's, Newfoundland is included in this year's estimates. This will provide funds to allow a continuation of the major reconstruction program for this port for which funds were provided in last year's estimates. This is one of the largest projects which the department has undertaken, with the total cost being in the neighbourhood of $13 million. To date, three contracts totalling over a million dollars have been awarded to provide a marine agency wharf for use of the Department of Transport, a small boat basin and a significant quantity of dredging. The first of the demolition work contracts has been advertised, with more to follow.

It is expected that tenders will be called in July or August for the main finger pier and the related operating facilities, with this particular contract representing a value of probably some six to seven million dollars. There are numerous portions of this harbour development which are receiving continued study at present, as the planning is relatively involved. I refer to improvement in the road traffic surrounding the waterfront; the extension of sewers through the new waterfront structures; naval and Canadian National Railways' installations; and such other problems. A large number of properties, including some private homes, wholesale and retail businesses, lumber concerns and a fish plant are being acquired in order to make these improvements possible.

The need for modernization of St. John's harbour is easily seen by a comparison of the cargo handling costs there and in other Canadian harbours. The capital expenditures being made in connection with this development will pay for themselves in the savings to be realized by Newfoundland through the improved handling and distribution of cargo. The plan includes, in addition to the works now under way and the large finger pier—it is so named because it is shaped like a finger—an adjacent marginal wharf which will provide berthage for all sizes and types of ships using this harbour. Transit sheds, storage sheds, etc., are of course included.

Progress on the general project has been favourable. However, I expect the work will not be completed until 1962 or 1963. This project is, of course, supplying much needed employment for the St. John's area and when the main pier contract is awarded this employment will be greatly increased and should be of particular help during the coming winter.

Hon. members will have heard about the possibility of a causeway from New Brunswick to Prince Edward Island over the Northumberland strait. As reported to the house, the government has undertaken a feasibility study for providing a crossing over Northumberland strait to replace the existing rail and highway ferry service. Proposals for such a crossing had dated back to 1891. The most recent proposal was put forward by the province of Prince Edward Island in 1956, when they suggested that a rock-filled causeway be constructed at a cost of $50 million, and asked the federal government to investigate rock sources on cape Tormentine. Preliminary work was done on this, as well as an economic study of the cost of operations and capitalization of the existing ferry system.

The difficulty in considering the proposal of Prince Edward Island, as well as previous ones, was that no engineering studies had ever been made to establish that a causeway could be constructed and supported by sufficient data to give an estimate of cost. Most important, investigations had not been made to establish what would be the results of tidal conditions along the coast should such a causeway be constructed. As this information was required before a proper assessment of either the physical or economic feasibility of the project could be considered, the government authorized the undertaking of this study in March 1958.

The study has been most complex. The design of any type of structure required a complete tidal survey throughout the whole of Northumberland strait. This work was undertaken by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys which had engaged a boat to put the work in hand by May, 1958. In addition to establishing the existing tidal conditions, that department predicted the changes in tidal conditions which would result from the construction of a causeway. It was established that a causeway would completely change the phases of the tide at the crossing, so that high tide on one side of the crossing would coincide with low tide on the other side, creating a condition where there would be up to ten feet differential in head on opposite sides of the causeway. It was also established that such a causeway would create changes in tidal ranges to varying degrees along both coasts of Northumberland strait. This necessitated a survey of existing shore line conditions and land use along the coasts of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in the Northumberland straight area and these surveys are now being used to establish estimates of cost of remedial works and possible land damage as a result of construction of a causeway.

In addition, it was necessary to have a very complete survey of the ice conditions in the strait and predict what the conditions would be as a result of causeway construction as obviously any change in these conditions would require careful study in relation to navigation and fisheries.

A great deal of credit is due to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys for their tidal studies and for their studies on the shoreline and land use, particularly in view of the fact that they were able to undertake this work so efficiently during 1958 and provided so much information in a limited time.

Considering the scope of the study and the fact that each phase of the survey was, to some degree, dependent on the information from other phases, the work has progressed remarkably well and it was possible to provide sufficient information to the consultants who were responsible for the site investigation and preparation of alternate designs enabling them to submit their report within the last week.

The alternatives in this report will now be considered by this department as well as by other departments concerned, such as transport, the Canadian National Railways and fisheries, and will be consolidated with the reports on the cost of remedial works and possible land damage. This review is now proceeding, following which the government will give consideration to the economic feasibility of the project.

Then I had intended to say a word about the development in Courtenay bay, at Saint John, New Brunswick, but I will leave that.

I also have a report on an extremely interesting development—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: However, I am sure the committee will give him unanimous consent to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Green: I thank hon. members very much for their kindness.

Mr. Bourget: Before the minister goes further, may I ask whether he can inform the members of the committee if a copy of the report on this study with respect to the causeway between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island could be made available to members of the committee? It may be a confidential report; I do not know whether or not that is the case. But for the information of the committee, I think it would be extremely interesting if we could have a copy of it.

Mr. Green: The report, of course, has just come into the department and it will require careful consideration. At the moment it would not be wise to make that report public until it has been considered.

I should like to say a few words about the development in the lower St. Lawrence area because, to me, this is one of the most interesting developments taking place under the department. There are a number of items included in this year's estimates which will provide funds for the continued development of the Quebec north shore area, notably Pointe au Pere, Pointe au Pic, Seven Islands and Baie Comeau.

Economic growth in the north shore-new Quebec region is continuing at a rapid rate. Resource developments are centered around power, newsprint, ilmenite, iron ore and aluminum and, more recently, grain handling facilities at Baie Comeau. Companies such as Canadian British Aluminium, Iron Ore Company of Canada, Quebec Cartier Ore, and Cargill Grain are either locating or expanding developments in this area. Centres like Baie Comeau and Seven Islands are growing rapidly and their economic base is becoming deeper. More extensive and more diversified ties with the rest of the country are at the same time developing, and this calls for improved and expanded public services.

The Pointe au Pere item is to provide for the construction of a winter port which will enable year-round service to be maintained across the river. The total cost of this project is in excess of $3 million. Tenders for this work were received on May 13, and it is expected construction will commence shortly.

Tenders have been received for the enlargement of a wharf at Pointe au Pic, and the total cost will be in excess of $700,000. This contract should be awarded shortly. Expanded accommodation here will, of course, improve the handling facilities on the lower St. Lawrence routes.

At Baie Comeau the department shared in the cost of certain dredging undertaken to facilitate the operation of new grain handling structures being built by private interests. The private companies' work on the grain elevators and docks, etc. is well in hand. This dredging will make for greater use of the continually expanding harbour at Baie Comeau.

At Seven Islands a new wharf, costing in excess of $1 million, is now coming to completion, and this again will provide improved facilities for cargo handling in this area.

In addition to these projects presently under way and those planned for starts this season, the department is continuing a study of the need for providing terminal facilities at both Forestville and Baie Comeau.

I had intended to refer to the reconstruction work being done in the Jackson building here in Ottawa but I will also leave that.

Finally, I have a word of encouragement for the hon. member for Fort William and the hon. member for Port Arthur. An item of $300,000 is included "towards harbour improvements" for the lakehead cities of Fort William and Port Arthur. As well, dredging not related directly to the new terminal development is being undertaken at these two cities.

[Mr. Green.]

In order that the whole of western Canada may share in the benefits of the St. Lawrence seaway development, modern cargo handling facilities are being undertaken at the lakehead, which will facilitate the transfer and movement of cargo from the seaway route to the western provinces. At present, some 600,000 tons of packaged freight move through the existing facilities. Before long, this figure will be close to 1½ million tons, so that the need for improved facilities is obvious.

The initial terminal will have three berths, two for lake freighters and one primarily designed for ocean freighters. It will be designed so as to be capable of further expansion, if required. This terminal will also allow handling in all of the new methods of transportation such as roll on-roll off, piggy-back, fishy-back and package-containers.

The development will open up a potential industrial area of some 100 acres. The proposed location of the development is known as the boundary site, since it is very close to the physical boundary between the two cities. The largest part of the terminal area will be developed by reclaiming land, and will provide much needed space for rail cars adjacent to the terminal berths. Various types of modern construction will be used, with the greater portion being steel sheet piling. The estimated total cost of the development is approximately $7½ million, and it is felt that this capital investment will be recovered through the greater speed and efficiency of the cargo handling. The first contract for access roads and bridges has been advertised, with tenders being due on June 3. Work on this aspect of the project should start shortly thereafter, and the larger contracts for the main terminal facilities will be called later this summer.

That is a hurried and sketchy report of some of the activities of the department. In closing, I should like once again to pay tribute to what we in the department like to call the public works team. This team spirit was initiated under the former minister, Hon. Robert Winters. I am sure that his former parliamentary assistant, the hon. member for Levis, will agree with me that it is a wonderful thing.

Mr. Bourget: Entirely.

Mr. Green: Each year the leading officials from all over Canada are called in for a conference of a week. The various problems are reviewed and suggestions are made. This is only one of the ways in which the deputy minister, Major General Hugh A. Young and his assistant deputy, George Jackson and the other executive members of the team have built up this good spirit. I should like to commend their work to the members of the house. I think they are doing a splendid job for Canada.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the leader of the house if he would tell us which we can expect on the menu after the energy bill.

Mr. Green: I could give the hon. member better information on that point if he could tell me when I can expect that debate to end.

Mr. Pickersgill: As soon as possible.

Mr. Green: If it ends tomorrow before five o'clock, we will be going on with public works estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is private members' time.

Mr. Green: I said before five o'clock; five minutes to five.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the leader of the house give us any information about next week?

Mr. Green: I am sorry but I cannot say just what the legislation will be next week. We must get this Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act through. Payments to the provinces are being held up because it is not being passed. I would think that would be the first item called after the debate on the national energy bill. We have been holding back the resolution on the C.N.R. finances until my hon. friend's party are ready to go on with it. I do not know whether or not they are now prepared to do so. I believe the report from the committee was tabled this afternoon. But I am not sure whether the printed reports of the evidence taken in the committee have been distributed. We should like to get on with that resolution.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I should just like to remind the minister that payments to another province are being held up also because of the failure of the government to bring in legislation. I hope they will give consideration to that matter as well.

Mr. Green: I am not quite sure to which province the hon. member has reference.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I can make a declaration of war.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 22, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRAQ—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC MISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of continuing developments of international concern in the Middle East, the government has given or is giving consideration to the establishment of a diplomatic mission in Iraq, supplementing changes that have been made in our missions in other Middle East countries. This question is based on a suggestion I made during the course of the last international affairs debate in this house. I would be grateful to the Prime Minister for an expression of intention.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government is fully conscious of the importance of Iraq in the Middle Eastern scene and is keeping the question of representation constantly under consideration and close review. Regard, of course, must always be had to the priorities which must be established as between this crucial area and other countries and regions which are of importance to Canada and in which we are still unrepresented. However, I know the hon. member has referred to this matter on another occasion, and I recall that the hon. member for Saskatoon has also interested himself in it. Certainly representation in Baghdad is one of those things that are before the department, and has to be decided in the light of future circumstances as well as priorities.

COLOMBO PLAN—INQUIRY AS TO NAMING OF CO-OPERATIVE EXPERT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister based on a press statement attributed to Mr. Ralph S. Staples, president of the co-operative union of Canada, to the effect that Canada's 20-month delay in naming a co-operative expert under the Colombo plan is hampering co-operative development in India. Can the Prime Minister explain the delay in this appointment and will the appointment be made immediately since, according to Mr. Staples, a co-operative expert is available?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): This matter comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall take the question as notice in order to read the article and see what the actual plan is, in order to ascertain whether the article is accurate in its statements.

AIRPORTS

DAWSON CREEK, B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO PURCHASE OR DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position to report on what progress is being made by the government toward the purchase and/or development of the airport at Dawson Creek?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The hon. member for Cariboo has been almost constantly in touch with me about this matter, and I know he will be interested in my answer. On December 10, 1958 I wrote to the mayor of Dawson Creek to explain the basis of government assistance toward capital airport field improvements as well as the possible extent of assistance in respect of the Dawson Creek airport. In my letter I pointed out the specific information we must receive from the city before seeking a parliamentary appropriation. To date I have not received a reply.

Mr. Regier: I understood that negotiations were under way as a result of the city having offered the airport to the government. Is that information right?

Mr. Hees: All I can say is what I have said. We are waiting for the information we have asked from the mayor. When we receive it we will be able to proceed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SEED GRAIN—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister inform the house when the new legislation concerning seed grain is likely to be introduced?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say definitely, of course, when it will be introduced. We certainly intend to introduce it, and that will be done as soon as the order paper is cleared of some of the other important matters now found thereon.

Mr. McIlraith: Put it on the order paper so we can see it.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROTEST BY PRINCE RUPERT WITH RESPECT TO DOCUMENTARY TELECAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue; I hope notification was received by him in sufficient time. Can the minister, as the person who reports to parliament for the C.B.C., give the house any indication of the steps which the C.B.C. has taken or intends to take as a result of the protest of the city of Prince Rupert regarding a documentary telecast of that city which the C.B.C. undertook recently?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did send notice this morning and as a result I telephoned the C.B.C. and asked for a report in writing on the matter, which report I have just received. I am advised by the C.B.C. that there has been an exchange of correspondence on this matter between the mayor of Prince Rupert and the acting president of the corporation as well as between the corporation's head office and the British Columbia regional office.

The telecast in question was not intended to be an over-all documentary on the city of Prince Rupert but rather a look at one incident which took place in that city, plus contributing factors to the incident. The C.B.C. advises that it plans to film additional and broader program material on Prince Rupert during the coming months.

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Howard: Can the minister indicate whether the C.B.C. in its correspondence has offered an apology to the city for this telecast?

Mr. Nowlan: I have no further information on the matter than that given to me in writing by the C.B.C.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—STATEMENT ON REPORTED EVICTION NOTICES TO POLYMER CORPORATION WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Leader of the Opposition—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am so used to receiving wise direction from the Leader of the Opposition that I confused him this morning with the leader of the house. The Leader of the Opposition asked the Minister of Public Works yesterday whether or not it was true that evictions of certain tenants of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation homes in Sarnia were taking place. The Minister of Public Works promised an answer today. Is he in a position to answer?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Yes, I was just proposing to answer that question. There have been no eviction notices whatever given in Sarnia. Certain notices to terminate tenancies have been given, which of course, as the hon. member knows, is quite a different thing. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is prepared to deal with individual cases on the merits of each case, and where there is difficulty I believe some arrangement can be made with the union for a guarantee of the rent in such case. Negotiations have been under way and are continuing in an effort to work out the problem.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question. Did I understand the minister to say that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is prepared to accept the undertaking of the union that it will guarantee the rent after the strike is over?

Mr. Green: In individual cases, where there are problems in connection with the payment of rent, it has been the practice to make arrangements with the union. I believe that can be done in Sarnia. I am not referring to an over-all, blanket guarantee of all rentals.

Mr. Argue: Would this arrangement also be applied to the tenancy cases, to the people who are renting?

Mr. Green: I am only speaking of the rental cases. There are no arrears of payments under mortgages.

POLYMER CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if he can bring the house up to date on the Polymer strike.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, meetings have been held in Toronto between the company and the union with Mr. Taylor as mediator. The latest report, as of last night, indicates that progress is being made. The talks will adjourn to Sarnia, where they will continue on Monday.

INDUSTRY

FORD COMPANY OF CANADA—REPORTED INTENTION TO INCREASE OWNERSHIP BY U.S. COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister care to comment on a newspaper report to the effect that the Ford Motor Company of Dearborn, Michigan, is preparing a $150 million bid to increase the extent of its ownership of the Ford Motor Company of Canada?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have no comment to make, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

WOOL—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT PRICE FOR 1959

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Having in mind the tremendous help to the Canadian sheep industry resulting from the support price on wool last year, is the minister prepared to say now whether or not that policy will be continued for the 1959 wool clip?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): In reply to the hon. member's question I am happy to announce that wool will be supported this year on approximately the same price basis as last year. Price support for the 1958 clip was calculated on the basis of 60 cents per pound for western range choice, half-blood staple, f.o.b. Toronto. The support price for the 1959 wool clip will be 60 cents per pound for the average wholesale price of western range choice, half-blood staple, and eastern domestic, quarter-blood staple combined. The prescribed price will be approximately 110.5 per cent of the 10-year average of the two grades, basis f.o.b. Toronto, which is a slightly higher percentage than for the 1958 clip, for which the prescribed price was 110 per cent of the base price.

The support price for the 1958 clip resulted in a payment by the stabilization board of 28 cents per pound on all eligible graded wool. The payments have not been entirely completed, but will amount to more than $1.5 million. The relatively high prescribed price of 110.5 per cent of the 10-year average for wool is considered necessary and justified, and is designed to arrest the decline in and provide some incentive for the Canadian sheep industry.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR INITIATION OF DISCUSSIONS ON AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but in view of his absence may I direct it to the Prime Minister. My question arises out of a statement which was made yesterday by Mr. D. A. Hanson, retiring president of the Montreal council of social agencies. Speaking about unemployed people in Quebec he said last night that this is a "disgraceful situation in a rich country". My question is this. Will the government initiate some discussion with the provincial government with a view to trying to pursuade them to accept unemployment assistance from the federal government?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, such a question should be directed to the appropriate government. I saw the article in question. I would say to the hon. gentleman that if he would apply some of his own advice to that provincial government, he himself being a member from the province of Quebec, no doubt it would receive some consideration.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance how soon he hopes to be in a position to table the return to a question that was passed as an order for return some time ago, asking for federal payments to certain provinces.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): That is not a return of the Department of Finance, Mr. Speaker. That was a return that was ordered by the house and consequently, in the ordinary course, will be tabled by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then, Mr. Speaker, I should be delighted to address the same question to the Secretary of State.

An hon. Member: As soon as possible.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the Secretary of State is going to reply to the question.

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire from my department and will let the hon. member know.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Prime Minister, while I am asking for returns, how soon he hopes to be in a position to table the other return about Newfoundland with respect to term 29?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I thought that had been done. There were two returns to be brought down. They are ready. One was brought down but apparently the other one was not.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could ask the Minister of Justice when he hopes to be in a position to table the return in response to a motion that was passed concerning his department.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): As soon as possible, Mr. Speaker.

SHIPPING

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO CONTRACTS FOR VESSELS FOR C.N.R. SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I regret not having been able to give the minister notice, but if he requires notice perhaps he could answer on Monday. Have the contracts yet been awarded for the construction of the two coastal vessels for the C.N.R. service in Newfoundland?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I shall be glad to check into that matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Carter: I have a supplementary question. At the same time would the minister inform the house what firms, if any, have succeeded in getting the contracts, and what the contract price was for each ship?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order paper.

Mr. Hees:. I would think that question would be more appropriately an order paper question.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-49, to provide for the establishment of a national energy board.

He said: In the discussion on the resolution prior to the introduction of Bill C-49, all who spoke appeared to be agreed upon the fundamental purpose of the measure, which is to establish a national energy board with a view to assuring to the people of Canada the best use of the energy resources of this country. Now that hon. members have the bill before them and as the discussion develops, I hope they will agree that the principles underlying the bill and the means by which we seek to apply those principles are also generally acceptable. Although the bill comprises 101 sections, it is very largely based on the relevant sections of the Pipe Lines Act and on the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act. What is new is important but not extensive.

It is now my intention to explain the main functions of the board as set forth in the bill and as contemplated by the government; to compare some aspects of the bill with relevant recommendations in the first report of the royal commission on energy, and to draw the attention of the house to certain limitations upon the powers of the board.

I would first point out that the bill will provide simpler machinery for dealing with matters relating to oil and gas and the pipe lines to transport them than has existed in the past, and also simpler than that contemplated by the royal commission on energy. In the past the board of transport commissioners has had certain responsibilities in respect of the construction and operation of pipe lines as set forth in the Pipe Lines Act, while the Minister of Trade and Commerce has had certain responsibilities under the Exportation of Power and Fluids and the Importation of Gas Act.

Procedures under the two acts have been separate and not entirely parallel. In the case of gas exports involving pipe line construction, applicants have had to satisfy two different agencies. The effect of the Borden commission's recommendation would have been to require applicants seeking permission to build pipe lines coming under the jurisdiction of parliament to satisfy two different bodies, the national energy board and the board of transport commissioners. The bill now before you will replace the Pipe Lines Act and the Exportation of Power and Fluids and the Importation of Gas Act. It will concentrate within the single agency of the national energy board the functions formerly carried out by the board of transport commissioners and those carried out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in respect to import and export licences for gas and export licences for electrical power. As in the case of the Pipe Lines Act, certain sections of the Railway Act will be incorporated in this bill by reference.

So much jurisprudence has grown up concerning these sections and so many rights have been created through their application that it would have been a most complex and time-consuming task, delaying the presentation of this legislation, to restate them afresh with any confidence that the results would be satisfactory and that existing rights would be protected. Notwithstanding this qualification, I suggest that this bill should commend itself to the house on the ground that it will simplify what has been a complicated and confusing statutory situation and streamline the procedures which must be followed by companies wishing to construct pipe lines.

Turning now to the functions which the bill will establish for the national energy board, I would first direct attention to the board's advisory responsibilities. They are the functions by which the board will be kept informed of changing circumstances and requirements and will thus be enabled to give expert advice to the government. The need for a central body charged with responsibility for research and comparative study of the various forms and sources of energy has long been apparent. Some useful work has been done in the past, both by ad hoc bodies such as the Gordon commission and the Borden commission and, in various special fields, on a more continuing basis by various departments and agencies. However, most energy sources are to some degree and in some circumstances interchangeable, and in some fuel applications there is intense competition.

The balance between the various energy sources has changed very markedly over recent years, and we may expect it will continue to change in the future. Such changes have important implications for national policy, and it is therefore highly desirable that a continuing and consistent study of energy matters be carried forward by a competent body.

In framing the advisory functions of the board we have had in mind, among other things, certain recommendations of the Borden commission, in particular recommendation 20. Since the language of that recommendation appeared open to the interpretation of requiring intrusion upon matters which are under the jurisdiction of the provinces, it is made clear that the responsibilities of the board for making continuing studies and for making recommendations to the minister are to be limited to those matters over which parliament has jurisdiction.

Also, whereas the intent of recommendation 20(b) was apparently that the national energy board should assist other agencies—and this is of course a laudable objective—it was considered by the government to be undesirable to allow the board on its own initiative to proffer advice and recommendations to any minister or any federal agency, since the indiscriminate use of such authority could give rise to confusion and uncertainty in the formulation of government policy. The bill therefore requires that requests for assistance from the board be channelled through the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Under the advisory functions provision has been made in general terms for arrangements such as those specified in recommendation 29 of the Borden commission:

> That, if possible, reciprocal arrangements be made with the United States of America for a commissioner of the federal power commission of that country to sit as an ad hoc observer, but without vote, when the national energy board is considering any application for a licence for the export of natural gas from Canada to the United States or for the import of natural gas into Canada; and for a member of the national energy board to sit as an ad hoc observer, but without vote, when the federal power commission is considering the correlative application for the licence to import from or export to Canada such natural gas.

The objective which the Borden commission appears to have had in mind was the desirable one of establishing liaison with the federal power commission in order to avoid the misunderstandings and deadlocks which might all too easily arise in the matter of the export and import of natural gas. We desire that a basis of effective co-operation in satisfying our respective national interests be established with the federal power commission, but the arrangements suggested by the Borden commission raise questions for both countries which may have implications not fully foreseen by the commission. Both the federal power act and the natural gas act might have to be amended by congress to enable the federal power commission to participate in such arrangements.

The federal power commission is, we understand, required to conduct its deliberations, as contrasted with its hearings, in private without any interested party being present.

From another viewpoint, it would be embarrassing for either government to have the regulatory agency of the other government make a decision adverse to its interests when a member of its own regulatory body had participated in the events leading up to such a decision. For these reasons the bill will give the board a general power to recommend the establishment of co-operative relationships with other agencies. Under this power a satisfactory relationship will, we are sure, be worked out and be given appropriate recognition by such action of the two parent governments as may be necessary. The best solution will have to be found in the light of experience and the possibilities that exist for such co-operation.

Perhaps this would be an appropriate point to mention that the government has not accepted the Borden commission's recommendation 28, "that a member of the national energy board be appointed in due time to the Canadian section of the international joint commission." The recommendation appears to be inconsistent with the principle that a quasi-judicial body such as the latter should not have as a member representative of a party which may be directly interested in proceedings before it. Presumably such a member would be expected to disqualify himself in international joint commission cases in which the national energy board had such an interest, a step which would make the dual membership arrangement sterile.

To revert to the research and advisory functions of the board as set forth in the bill, hon. members will have noted that the board will be expected to avoid unnecessary duplication of existing research facilities and sources of information within the government of Canada. Conversely, where such information is not readily available from these or other sources of information, the board will be enabled to secure any information it needs by exercising the powers of commissioners under part I of the Inquiries Act. The relevant paragraph of the Inquiries Act is section 4, which reads:

> The commissioners have the power of summoning before them any witnesses, and of requiring them to give evidence on oath, or on solemn affirmation if they are persons entitled to affirm in civil matters, and orally or in writing, and to produce such documents and things as the commissioners deem requisite to the full investigation of the matters into which they are appointed to examine.

This power should, in the view of the government, be given the board to enable it to fill certain gaps in the information available to it through other channels. For instance, section 15 of the Statistics Act prohibits the release by the dominion bureau of statistics of figures relating to individual companies, with the exception of carriers and public utilities. It will be recalled that the Borden commission in support of its recommendation 19, that the importation into Canada of crude oil and petroleum products be made subject to licence granted by the national energy board, argued that such licensing was required—> —to provide the government of Canada, through the national energy board, with basic information respecting the origins, cost, transportation charges and laid-down cost in Canada of crude oil and petroleum products—

Licensing appears to be an inappropriate method for obtaining the desired information. The preferable method of ensuring that necessary information can be obtained is through the powers conferred by the Inquiries Act. The exercise of these powers is restricted to the advisory functions of the board.

The next broad function of the board would be the exercise of control over the construction and operation of pipe lines for the transmission of hydrocarbons and the issuance of certificates of convenience and necessity to authorize the construction and operation of such pipe lines. This part of the bill is drawn very substantially from the present Pipe Lines Act. The national energy board would, however, replace the board of transport commissioners as the responsible agency.

It is here that one of the important differences exists between this bill and the recommendations of the Borden report. Recommendation 15 of that report was, in essence, that anyone wishing to build an oil or gas pipe line subject to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada must obtain a certificate from the national energy board; recommendation 32 was that no application for leave to construct a pipe line should be entertained by the board of transport commissioners unless the applicant had such a certificate from the national energy board. The board of transport commissioners would also regulate oil and gas pipe line transmission rates.

The Borden commission did not believe that any purpose would be served by transferring these functions to the national energy board. Transfer of the board of transport commissioners' functions would, in the view of the commission, not only mean an unjustified duplication of administrative machinery and personnel but would ignore the whole of the experience in this type of work now embodied in the board of transport commissioners. In the commission's opinion, as expressed in the report—

> —the problem involved in assessing Canada's energy resources and needs and in relating these and the implications of other energy studies—

Which the commission has recommended should be carried out by the national energy board:

—to the issuance or withholding of licences or certificates of public convenience are distinct from the regulatory function which the commission has recommended should be carried out by the board of transport commissioners with respect to oil and gas pipe line companies.

In practice any duplication of administrative machinery and personnel would be more apparent than real. The personnel of the board of transport commissioners and its staff who are familiar with the oil and gas industry are not as numerous as the commission may have thought. The board of transport commissioners has had one engineer employed full time on pipe line work, one engineer part time and one stenographer. Changes have recently occurred in the board itself due to resignations and retirements. Consequently in transferring these functions to the energy board there would seem to be little danger either of duplicating personnel or of losing valuable experience.

On the other hand, to ask two boards to deal with somewhat different but closely related aspects of pipe line matters would certainly invite duplication and confusion, both within the government service and among applicants who would have to appear before both boards, and who would find difficulty in satisfying either board in the absence of decision by the other. We do not wish to add to the administrative burden on industry in submitting applications.

Under the present bill, therefore, the board of transport commissioners will have no power over pipe lines, except in so far as its permission is required for the crossing of railways by pipe lines. The energy board will issue certificates of public convenience and necessity which at the same time will be "leave to construct" orders, in the sense in which that term has been used by the board of transport commissioners. The energy board will also issue "leave to open" orders. That is, it will discharge the functions now held by the board of transport commissioners as regards the public safety aspect of pipe line regulations. It will also regulate the transmission charges of both oil and gas pipe lines, a function in which the board of transport commissioners has had no experience but which the Borden commission recommended it should assume.

Although it was not so recommended by the Borden commission, all certificates issued by the energy board will be subject to the approval of the governor in council, as will any regulations made by the board governing their issuance. New major pipe line projects appear likely to raise questions of national policy so important that decision on them should be reviewed in this way.

It will be noted that certificates are to be issued only for pipe lines transmitting hydrocarbons. The by-products of the processing of gas, mentioned in recommendation 15 of the Borden report, will consequently remain unregulated as regards transmission by pipe lines unless they fall within the definition of hydrocarbons. Sulphur, the chief by-product, which is not a hydrocarbon, is neither a form nor a source of energy, and consequently lies outside the area of reference of this legislation.

In addition to certificates of public convenience and necessity, the Borden commission suggested that licences also be required. Recommendation 16 reads as follows:

That the national energy board be authorized to require any company engaged in the transmission across provincial boundaries by pipe line of crude oil and petroleum products and natural gas and by-products thereof, to obtain a licence from such board.

Recommendation 20(f)(ii) suggested that the board should have authority to grant, revoke or suspend such licences, upon such terms and subject to such conditions, if any, that the board might decide. Recommendation 21(c) suggested that among the factors to be considered in issuing such licences should be: (i) the direction of movement and destination of the contents of the pipe line; and, (ii) the volume proposed to be transmitted. The licensing of interprovincial oil or gas movements was included since, in the commission's view, and again I quote the commission's words—

"—control of such matters as the volume so transmitted, the direction of flow and the destination of the oil and gas within Canada is essential to ensure that the public interest can be protected in the effective use of these resources".

Licensing would not be on an annual basis, but the original licence would be re-examined whenever changes in the operation of a line were to be made with regard to direction of flow or substantial increases in volume.

None of these recommendations has been implemented in this bill. The view has been taken that the direction of movement, as well as the initial and ultimate capacity of any such pipe line, would have been specified in the application for a certificate of public convenience and necessity. Any change of direction, or capacity beyond the specified limits, would require application for a further certificate, so for these reasons a licence would be superfluous.

An extension of a pipe line would also require an application for an additional certificate. A change in the proportion of throughput delivered to various destinations along the certificated route would in most circumstances result from normal business considerations, and would hardly require a licence for any reason of public policy. There is intense competition among the various fuels and energy sources; therefore there is a strong impetus for a pipe line company to maximize its volume and minimize its unit costs in all markets in which it can compete.

Service to new markets by construction of new sales laterals would involve either (1) construction of laterals contemplated in the original application and therefore covered by the original certificate; (2) construction of long new laterals not contemplated in the original application and therefore requiring a new certificate; (3) construction of short laterals coming within an exemption procedure provided in the bill; or, (4) extension of service by direction of the board, also as provided in the bill. None of these cases would appear to require a licence, as distinct from the required certificate.

Finally, the volume to be transmitted would either be within the capacity originally certificated, within which range business conditions and decisions would appear to be the effective determinants, rather than the licensing procedure; or major increases in volume would require major looping, which would require a further certificate.

There is an historical justification for export licences, in that electricity and gas exports have been dealt with under earlier legislation in order to ensure that these energy forms are not alienated unless they are clearly surplus to present and foreseeable Canadian requirements. An export licence is also required to satisfy the requirements of the federal power commission as to the availability of gas to fill export contracts. However, the considerations affecting the public interest in the operation of pipe lines within Canada are different; non-discrimination, non-exploitation of quasi-monopoly positions, avoidance of unnecessary and uneconomic duplication of facilities, economic access to energy resources, and the public safety are the kinds of consideration that underlie control of domestic pipe lines. These considerations are taken into account and dealt with in the bill without introducing a separate licensing procedure.

There is provision in the bill to ensure that a certificate may be suspended or revoked if its terms and conditions are violated or if the operation of the pipe line is conducted in a manner not in compliance with the act, the regulations thereunder, or any lawful order of the board. Finally, the bill provides that a pipe line company may not, without leave of the board, sell, lease, amalgamate or abandon its facilities; a certificate and the privileges and immunities provided by it, would be transferable only by leave of the board.

The experience of the federal power commission in the United States is that it is unnecessary to issue an operating licence as well as a certificate of public convenience and necessity. In fact the order of the federal power commission approving an application is itself regarded as the certificate of convenience and necessity and is the only authority a pipe line company requires to construct, maintain and operate the facilities specified. There is a separate requirement of a presidential permit to export or import gas, comparable to the proposal in this bill that there continue to be in Canada a separate procedure and licence required in respect of export and import of gas.

In our view no useful purpose will be served by requiring a pipe line company to obtain a licence to operate in addition to a certificate of public convenience and necessity, leave to open and any export or import permit required. To set up two requirements instead of one would tend to add to administrative work without serving any useful purpose. It would seem more or less immaterial whether the basic permission is described as a certificate of public convenience and necessity or as a licence for which the basic consideration would be the public convenience and necessity. By whatever name, one permission should suffice for the purpose specified.

In addition to the certificate procedure for pipe lines which I have been discussing, the bill provides a parallel, though more briefly outlined, set of arrangements for international electrical power lines. Power export licences have been issued in the past under the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importations of Gas Act. The construction of facilities to export power was subject to the same licensing arrangement. What is here intended is to improve the consistency of the statutory requirements by applying the certificate procedure to the construction of the physical facilities to export power, in parallel with the procedure applied to the construction of pipe lines for the export of gas. The export of power will require a licence as before, but it is now to be issued through the same agency and under the same statute that will govern pipe line construction. It is not intended to impose any regulation upon the construction of interprovincial power lines, since most large systems are either provincially owned or under close provincial control and are merely interconnected one with the other.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to the very important question of the criteria which the bill will require the board to apply in dealing with applications for certificates of public convenience and necessity for pipe lines and international power lines. In considering what should be specified the government was mindful on the one hand of the possibility that a detailed list of criteria might result in some danger of restrictive interpretation by the courts if they were to take the view that what is not specified may not be taken into account; on the other hand, a too general description might afford insufficient guidance to the board.

The bill will enable the board to consider all such matters as appear to it to be relevant to the question of public convenience and necessity, while at the same time suggesting to the board that it may take into account certain more particular considerations. In wording these considerations we had regard to section 12 (3) of the Pipe Lines Act, recommendation 21 of the Borden report, section 15 (3) of the Aeronautics Act and a set of 24 points which the board of transport commissioners has embodied in a memorandum for its own guidance and for the guidance of applicants in leave to construct proceedings before it.

The part of the bill which has to do with traffic, tolls and tariffs lies at the heart of the legislation and is perhaps the most important single new feature. The Pipe Lines Act provided for the control of the traffic, tolls and tariffs of oil pipe line companies once such companies had been declared by the board of transport commissioners to be common carriers. However, although the major oil pipe lines have in fact acted as common carriers they were never declared by the board to be such, and accordingly their traffic, tolls and tariffs have never been controlled. The charges of gas transmission pipe lines have not been subject to any control.

Gas prices at the point of production are regarded by the provinces of origin as being under their jurisdiction, and gas prices to the ultimate consumer are controlled by the province in which consumption takes place. The government of Canada has had the power to exercise control over the price of gas being exported under the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act. It has long been felt by many people, including the members of this government, that the gap in regulation of the price of gas between the point of first sale and the point of sale to distributors in the area of consumption was a gap which in the public interest should be closed.

The case for regulation of gas transmission charges is fairly straightforward. The commodity which gas transmission companies provide is in competition with other energy sources, so they are not so clearly in the position of a monoplistic public utility as are, for example, water services. However, few if any of their customers can turn to another source of gas, and if they do turn to another energy source they incur the expense of installing different equipment. The gas transmission companies are therefore in a partial monopoly position, and the public interest requires that they should demonstrate that their rates are not such as to constitute exploitation of that quasi-monopoly position.

At the same time, since they must compete at the point of origin for supplies of gas and compete at the point of sale with other fuels and energy sources, there is a substantial element of risk for gas transmission companies. For this reason they must not be prevented by regulatory action from earning a return sufficient to attract capital, nor must management be deprived of the normal incentive to improve efficiency.

We hold the same view about oil pipe line operations. Here there is the added factor that it is more feasible for the pipe line customers to obtain their oil from other sources. Also, the competition between oil and other fuels is perhaps more intense than the competition faced by gas, and the results of oil pipe line operations are accordingly more subject to fluctuation. Some oil producers can find an outlet to market through only one pipe line, and some refineries are similarly dependent on one pipe line. Oil pipe lines therefore have some of the characteristics of monopoly, and the argument for some regulation in the public interest therefore applies.

Neither in the case of oil pipe lines nor in the case of gas pipe lines will the public gain anything if regulation is so restrictive as to put the pipe lines out of business, or discourage their normal development, or impede the building of new pipe lines to serve new or expanding markets, or restrict the essential work of exploration and discovery of further reserves of oil and gas. Our objective, therefore, is to find the means and level of regulation that will adequately protect the public interest, and particularly the interest of the consumer, while maintaining healthy conditions for the pipe line industry, the oil and gas producing industries and the industries distributing oil products and gas for consumption.

The bill does not specify a formula which the board is to apply in examining and, if need be, in setting tolls and tariffs. On the contrary, we are convinced that it would be an error to crystallize in statutory form a single formula to apply to all the companies in either the oil pipe line or gas pipe line industries. Certainly no single formula would apply to the two industries, where the nature of business and the inherent risks are so different. The circumstances of individual companies differ widely one from another, and the circumstances of the industries as a whole change so substantially over time that any single rigid formula would be found inappropriate almost before it could be applied.

What is needed here is flexibility combined with an understanding of the industries involved and of the public interests affected. We hope to provide this through a board of competent men, served by well trained and experienced staff, appreciative of the public interest and of the needs and problems of the industries concerned.

This board will, I am sure, in due course draw up and publish a set of rules which will provide a firm framework for rates. It would, however, be unfair to the proposed board, to the industries and to the public to establish at the outset some untested statutory formula which would bind the hands of the board for the future.

This explains why there is not in the bill any reference to the shareholders' equity formula proposed by the Borden commission in its recommendation 12. In fairness to the Borden commission I should like to draw attention at this juncture to a paragraph in its report which has perhaps been overlooked by some of those who have criticized that recommendation. I quote from the report, page 41:

> We have carefully considered whether the proposed legislation should fix the rate of return to be allowed on the shareholders' equity and whether this rate might be different in the case of oil or gas pipe lines or, alternatively, whether these matters should be left to the discretion of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. We have concluded that it is preferable to allow the board to exercise its discretion in this regard, recognizing that in so doing it will strive to exercise its powers in a fair manner and authorize rates, and thus a level of earnings, having regard to the circumstances of each case, sufficient to attract the necessary capital. The flexibility which will obtain under such a plan is, in our view, particularly desirable.

Gas transmission pipe line companies buy gas outright at the point of production or processing and sell it outright to their customers. In this they are unlike the oil pipe line companies which in general carry oil owned by either producers or purchasers for a toll which is part of a published tariff. It is not the practice in peacetime to control prices of commodities in internal trade, but it is normal to control transportation or transmission charges, as in the case of railway freight rates. The bill therefore provides for treating as a toll a certain proportion of the difference between the price paid by the transmission company for the gas and the price charged by the company to its customers. The fixing of this proportion is to be left to the board.

I wish to turn now to the question of exports and imports. The provisions of the bill in this regard will replace the corresponding provisions of the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act, and differ from the latter in several important respects. First, export and import licensing will in future be administered by the national energy board rather than being dealt with by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Second, the statutory provision for the imposition of export duties on electric power laid down in section 4 of the existing act has been omitted from this bill and taken up instead in the Excise Tax Act. Third, the export of oil is no longer to be licensed unless a proclamation to that effect is issued by the governor in council. The licensing of oil imports, which is not regulated under present legislation, may similarly be instituted by proclamation.

It will be noted that the term "fluids" dating back to the original act in 1907, has been omitted from this bill to be replaced by gas and, by proclamation, hydrocarbons which include gas and oil. "Fluids" were defined as gas, oil, water or any other fluids whether liquid or gaseous, that originate or are produced or recovered in Canada. While the export of fluids was defined as their transmission through pipe lines and other like contrivances, the power to license exports of water was not called into use until 1955, when it was used in reference to a power project on the Arrow lakes on the grounds that the weir involved was a "like contrivance". The passing of the International Rivers Improvement Act later that year, however, obviated the need for further control of this sort. Two other fluids, salt in solution and wood pulp in aqueous suspension, were also caught by this definition and brought under licence. Since the intent of this bill is to deal with energy matters and not the incidental use of water as a transporting agent for non-energy commodities, only the export and import of gas, and by proclamation oil, and the export of electric power will be controlled by the proposed legislation.

Perhaps the most important difference is that export and import licences will in future be issued only after public hearing. It has long been a just cause of public complaint that the existing procedure provided no means by which interested parties could appear, be heard, and examine applicants for an export licence, and that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been under no obligation to state what considerations he had before him in approving or denying a licence. The public hearing process, which in the bill is provided for in that part which deals with the organization of the board, will at once afford better protection to the public interest in these important decisions, and a more satisfactory way of dealing with applications from the point of view of the government and of the various parties concerned.

It is intended that the governor in council's approval of export and import licences, and of their cancellation or suspension, will be required. This will be expressed in the regulations. One such regulation will be that no licence for the export of gas or power or the import of gas will be valid without the approval of the governor in council. The reason for this approach is that in the event it is decided to put into effect the proposed permissive power to license imports and exports of oil, it would be undesirable to make every licence for every import of oil affected dependent upon approval of the governor in council.

The term of export licences is not to exceed 25 years. This upper limit is regarded as the term likely to be required to enable financing of gas export pipe lines. It is intended to continue the policy of limiting electric power export licences to one year, unless exceptional circumstances justify a longer term.

Before issuing an export licence for gas or electric power, the board would have to be satisfied on the reasonableness of the price to be obtained. The attempt to reconcile exports and domestic price which was expressed in regulation 9 under the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act has proved inadequate, since the conditions specified were found never to exist. As in the case of rate regulation, it was the conclusion of the government that any rigid statutory formula would probably be more harmful than helpful. The price and other considerations which the board is to apply to export applications are therefore expressed broadly. The principles will be that quantities to be exported should not exceed the surplus remaining of proven and potential reserves after allowance for reasonably foreseeable Canadian requirements, and that the export price should be just and reasonable in relation to the public interest.

The matter of import and export restrictions with regard to oil requires some particular attention. The measure now before us provides that the application of that part of the bill dealing with exports and imports may, by proclamation of the governor in council, be extended to oil.

I shall first deal briefly with exports of oil. Under the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act, exports of oil require a licence, which in the case of oil pipe lines has been freely granted on an annual basis. So far as I can determine, the licensing requirement was applied by an analogy with the reasons for regulating exports of power and gas. The analogy is not valid, because oil, unlike power and gas, is a commodity moving fairly freely in world trade, moving from a variety of sources to a given market or from a given source to a variety of markets, and moving by various means of transport, of which pipe lines and water-borne tankers are the most economical.

Gas and power, by contrast, move by fixed channels under long term contracts at the source and long term contracts in the area of consumption, so that once committed to a market they cannot be withdrawn without hardship. A gas export service once established must continue for a substantial period to enable the enterprise to attract capital in the first place, and to permit amortization of the necessary investment. Interruption of such export service is apt to be a source of international friction. Hence there is a clear case for being cautious about permitting exports of any power or gas which we are likely to require ourselves, but with respect to oil these conditions do not apply.

As in the case of other important products moving in trade, our interest and the interest of the industry is to sell oil where we can, either within or outside of Canada. Therefore we feel there is no requirement of national policy to be served at present by licensing exports of oil. On the contrary, we have only recently been successful in obtaining exemption from the restrictions imposed by the United States on oil imports, and it would ill accord with the treatment we are now receiving from the United States to establish new restrictions on the export of oil.

The case with respect to licensing of imports of oil is different and more complicated. I do not propose to argue that case fully today. It would be premature to do so until the second report of the Borden commission in respect of this matter has been received and considered.

There are, however, certain obvious considerations to be kept in mind. I referred a moment ago to the recently announced exemption by the United States from its import controls of crude oil, unfinished oils and petroleum products moving into the United States by pipe line, rail or motor carrier. Canada is the principal beneficiary of this arrangement, which will improve our exports of crude oil and will also restore the less important but still significant export trade we have been building up in refined products and in liquefied petroleum gases. In the light of this favourable outcome of our negotiations with the United States, it would seem unwise at the present moment to take any action by way of import controls which might give rise to misunderstanding and possibly call the present arrangement into question.

Some persons have recently been inclined to minimize the importance of these United States exemptions. Actually the prospects for increasing our exports of oil are very encouraging. In the Puget sound market, where there are three large refineries which are logical customers for Canadian oil moving through the Trans Mountain pipe line, the July purchases nominated by General Petroleums will, I understand, rise from 15,000 barrels per day to 27,000 barrels per day; those of Shell from 12,000 to 20,000 barrels per day, and those of the Texas Company from nothing to 8,000 barrels per day, a total increase from 27,000 barrels to 55,000 barrels per day or an almost immediate doubling of our sales in this natural export market for Canadian oil.

There are many other considerations important to this question of imported oil, and particularly its relevance to our general commercial policy and trade relations with other countries. The government has been weighing these considerations, and will continue to do so.

Last Monday evening the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) referred to certain doubts he had about the proposal to give the governor in council power to impose by proclamation licensing requirements on the imports and exports of oil. His reservations were on two scores. The first—and these are his words which are to be found at page 3783 of Hansard—was this:

> —that this is a matter of such importance and of such a nature that it should be dealt with by parliament and not be taken to the governor in council by way of arbitrary authority.

His second point—and again I quote his own words—was this:

> —so long as that power is contained in the legislation, then we are going to have a situation where a threat is going to be hanging over the heads of the industry at large that the board will interfere by way of regulation, and that is damaging because of recommendation 19 of the Borden commission report.

I would assure the hon. member and the house that these points have indeed been taken into account by the government in preparing the bill, and that only after careful thought have we come to the conclusion that in the present circumstances the merits of the course we propose must outweigh the disadvantages to which he has referred.

He is quite right in thinking that some uncertainty will remain but it is not, however, the threat of frivolous or unnecessary government intervention. It is the threat that the present world-wide conditions of surplus supply which exist in the oil industry will result in so great a decline in world prices, and such great pressure of supplies of oil offered at distress prices, that normal marketing arrangements may be overwhelmed. If this were to happen, very serious injury could be caused to the oil producing and processing industries in this country.

It is against this contingency that we consider it necessary to take the power under discussion. If the need arose it would in all probability arise quickly, and would require quick action to avert serious disruption. For this reason it is proposed to make the power applicable by proclamation.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister permit a question just at this point for purposes of clarification?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: In dealing with the point I raised at the resolution stage, would he comment on the (b) part of recommendation 19 of the Borden commission report, in relation to the point with which he is now dealing?

Mr. Churchill: In view of the length of the (b) part of recommendation 19, after the hon. member has had an opportunity of contributing to the discussion and when we reach the conclusion of the debate I might comment on that point and others that he may raise.

I should now like to deal with the limitations upon the authority of the board. The bill does not give the board any power to regulate coal, atomic energy or uranium, or matters having to do with electrical power except for export of such power. Neither does the bill propose any alteration of the arrangements under which our negotiations with the United States for a mutually satisfactory program of development of the Columbia river basin are being conducted, though I am sure those who are now involved in those negotiations on the Canadian side will look to the board when it is established for co-operation and assistance. While the board's advisory functions require that it be free to study any aspect of energy, we do not believe it would be profitable under present circumstances to disrupt the existing agencies involved in these related fields.

Great care has been taken to ensure that in its vital actions, particularly as to certificates of public convenience and necessity, import and export licences, and the establishment of regulations, the board must have the approval of the governor in council. This is intended to ensure that the decisions of the board which affect the national interest are consistent with general government policy. At the same time we have sought to assure the security of tenure and independence of the board and its staff. This balance between independence and responsibility to parliament is always somewhat difficult to achieve; we believe that here we have proposed a satisfactory equilibrium.

While we have sought to arrange that the findings of the board shall be final, as should be the factual findings of any expert board, we have been careful to preserve the right of the citizen to appeal to the highest courts of the land on matters of law and jurisdiction. Also, I would emphasize again that we have sought with great care to avoid any interference with the proper jurisdiction of the provinces.

Throughout this statement I have indicated our desire to strike a balance in discharging our responsibilities between, on the one hand, the public interest in the sound development and use for the benefit of the people of Canada of our vast and vital energy resources and, on the other hand, the essential requirement that enterprise be left free to make its own decisions so far as may be consistent with that public interest. The functions performed by the energy and related industries are of great importance to the well-being of our country, and we do not wish to hamper or impair the ability of these industries to perform their services. Hence we have drafted a bill which is general rather than particular in respect of formulae to be applied in regulation, because only through stating our intentions in somewhat general terms can we preserve that flexibility which we feel is essential.

Finally, may I point out that we have attempted to arrange that the transition from the present situation to that envisaged under the bill can be accomplished without delay, disruption of activity, or duplication of effort. We have sought to provide that the existing rights of companies which will be under the jurisdiction of the board will be fully protected in so far as is consistent with such new functions as rate regulation. We have provided for time within which such companies can accommodate themselves to the new statute, and have sought to avoid placing a sudden and difficult burden of requirements upon them. We have provided that matters now before the board of transport commissioners under the Pipe Lines Act, and matters now before the Minister of Trade and Commerce under the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act, shall be transferred to a similar position before the new board without loss of status or repetition of effort.

The house will decide the nature and extent of the debate on this major issue which is of such importance for Canada's future. I hope that full discussion will result in complete clarification of a subject that is not devoid of complications. At the committee stage there will be an opportunity of considering the details. The general principles I have attempted to set out today. This bill, if enacted, will set the pattern for the development and use, in the national interest, of the great resources of energy which are the endowment of our country.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the minister has placed some interesting information on the record. We are grateful to him for having done so. The large amount of information he has decided to place on the record is a good indication of how important this proposed legislation is.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, after reading or hearing the remarks made in the house last Monday by the minister, when he had the responsibility of moving that legislation be introduced to establish a national energy board, one might have wondered whether the government intended to incorporate in such legislation a large proportion, if not all, of the main recommendations found in the interim report submitted by the Borden commission on energy. Indeed, the minister himself, in the debate on the resolution, after briefly commending the commission for the conscientious discharge of its heavy responsibilities, made this specific statement:

> Many of its recommendations are to be implemented as will be clear when the bill is before the house.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we have gained a quite different impression now that we had a chance to take a good look at the contents of the bill. We now feel that the government has been prompted by many other authors than those of the preliminary Borden report.

Everything in this bill which might be considered consistent and sound has been borrowed from the pipe lines act, from the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act, from the Railway Act, and, I would even say, from various recommendations made late in 1957 in the final report prepared by the Gordon commission on Canada's economic prospects.

Mr. Speaker, all essential parts of the bill are borrowed from the various acts just mentioned and from recommendations which are exactly similar to those of the Gordon commission. The non-essential parts, those that are contentious or even prejudicial to our industry or to the public interest are the government's own ideas or have been suggested by the Borden commission report.

I shall come back to this point a little later in my remarks, and we also shall have the opportunity of emphasizing what I just said when the house sits in committee on the various sections of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, in a detailed study of power prospects in Canada, prepared and edited at the urgent request of the Gordon commission by Mr. John Davis, who is an expert in this field, we find abundant information on this country's hydraulic resources, on coal, oil, natural gas, nuclear energy, as well as on tidal and solar energy.

For the first time in Canada, a complete study of mutual relations between the various power industries has been made in the said document by that great expert, Mr. Davis. That study enables us to form some estimation of the rate of growth of Canada's power requirements in the next 20 or 30 years, and of the changes that will occur in the consumption of the various forms of energy and in the relative contribution of various power resources to satisfy the needs of the country. I might add that if this government had really sought to be consistent and had tried to act as promptly as had been implied, it would have gone ahead, on the basis of this survey, and would immediately have established a national energy board, in the fall of 1957 or early in 1958.

The Davis study is divided in three parts:

(a) Energy consumption and economic growth;

(b) The energy supplying industries;

(c) Energy and Canada's economic prospects.

In part (a), or first part, in chapter 2 dealing with energy consumption and economic expansion, we read the following on page 19:

> Canada's industrial expansion in the 20th century can be interpreted not only in monetary terms but also by listing the ever increasing quantities of energy being put to use on the nation's farms, in its mines, stores, and factories, and in its homes. With the labour force today only little more than twice as large as that of 50 years ago but with better equipment, improved techniques, and—more significant still—with the help of about five times as much energy, the Canadian economy is turning out about six times as many goods and services as it was producing in 1900.
> Scarcely a field of endeavour but has benefited in one way or another from the increased availability of fuel and power. Today a farmer with power-driven equipment can harvest 30 acres of wheat for every acre he could have reaped a century ago, using hand tools.
> Each paper mill operator is turning out ten times as much newsprint as his forebears did around the turn of the century. To raise a ton of ore, the average miner took about two hours as recently as 1930, less than 50 minutes in 1955. Distance has become less of a handicap. On the railways, the latest diesel electric locomotive is capable of doing five times as much work as its steam driven counterpart at the end of world war II.

The report goes on to explain the great advantages of certain power resources we have here in Canada.

In part (b) of the Davis study dealing with energy supplying industries, the author has compiled a great variety of information on each of those industries.

In regard to the oil industry, for instance, Mr. Davis first makes an historical summary; he gives an outline of the world situation, deals with the prospects of Canadian oil and concludes by outlining a long-term program.

In the case of the natural gas industry, after outlining its background and dealing with prospective markets for Canadian gas, Mr. Davis explains the supply and demand pattern and gives details on its financing and development.

> Canada is exceptionally well endowed with water power resources. Being both large and conveniently located they have played a major role in its economic development. Among other things they have helped to make up for a lack of mineral fuels in central Canada. They have made possible the processing of forest, mineral and other primary products on a scale unmatched anywhere else in the world. And, by making low-cost electrical energy available to the nation's homes, farms, stores, offices and factories, they have contributed in innumerable ways to the exceptionally high standard of living which Canadians now enjoy.

A little further on, the report says:

> Thanks to a favourable climate and to the right kind of topography, to widespread precipitation, extensive drainage basins and readily harnessed water power sites, Canada has made tremendous strides in this important energy field. With the exception of the United States, this country has installed more hydro capacity than any other nation in the world. While Norway's per capita installation still tops the list at 1.6 horsepower, Canada is second with 1.1 horsepower, followed in order by Switzerland and Sweden.

There again, the report gives very instructive and important information. Later on, on page 201, Mr. Davis concludes that part of his report by saying:

> Whatever happens, Canada's power industry will continue to grow both in extent and complexity. Accelerating as it does, it will help through its very momentum, to carry along with it the rest of the Canadian economy. Thus, in innumerable and in unforeseen ways it will continue to do what it has done so well before—that is to stimulate industrial development in those resources and allied fields where Canadians as a people possess their greatest natural advantage.

Those, sir, are the few paragraphs which I wanted to quote from the Davis study. Considered as a whole, that study is a precious source of statistical information of all kinds and there is no doubt that the government might well have sought inspiration from it and from the final report of the Gordon commission on Canada's economic prospects before submitting some legislation which would have met the demands of industry while ensuring the Canadian people of the best possible use of this country's power resources.

The final report of the Gordon commission was submitted in November 1957—a very significant date to keep in mind. Giving an overall picture of our power needs and resources the commission sums up the position as follows, as appears on page 143 of the report:

> Issues of this kind, in our opinion, should be examined within a context broad enough to include all forms of energy and all the energy industries. In this chapter, we have tried to suggest that, although there are a number of separate energy industries, the interrelations between them are close and complex. Each of the various energy resources has its own peculiar advantages which make it better suited than others for some purposes. Wood needs no processing before it can be burned as a fuel and is found almost everywhere, except on the prairies, so that it will still be used for heating in some outlying districts, although Canada's total consumption of fuel wood will continue to decline. Coal has both a high heat content and valuable metallurgical properties, and there are large reserves of it. It will continue to be essential in steel making and, after the passage of time, may begin to recapture some of the volume markets that it is now in the process of losing.

That is what we hope, Mr. Speaker.

> Petroleum products provide the most practical form of power for cars and trucks, and highway traffic will continue to depend on it almost exclusively. Natural gas is a particularly clean and convenient fuel and its special properties will always ensure for it many premium markets. Water power can be harnessed with a very high degree of thermal efficiency and electricity can be produced from it without exhausting any natural resources.

In its final report on Canada's economic prospects—a report which has been available to the government since the fall of 1957—the Gordon commission dealt at length with the vastness and significance of our power resources and having examined prospects for their exportation advocated the creation of a national energy board.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to quote out of this report a few paragraphs bearing particularly on natural gas, which I think are worthy of special attention. This is from page 133:

> Wide availability of natural gas will obviously affect the consumption of other fuels and the prospects of the industries that exist to provide them. The area of competition with oil will be fairly wide, although the largest single market for petroleum products—in transportation—will be immune, since natural gas cannot readily be used to drive automobiles, aircraft, ships or locomotives. On the other hand, some of the natural gas liquids (i.e., propane, the butanes and natural gasoline) which are stripped from natural gas in the cleaning process, are well suited to drive internal combustion engines and may capture at least a fraction of the present market for refined gasoline and diesel oil. Heavy residual oils used as industrial fuel will also be displaced in some instances by natural gas.

Farther down, the report says this:

> The effect of this competition, however, may be reflected less in the output of Canadian refineries than in the volume of imported petroleum products, since the severity of the Canadian winter has made it necessary to import large quantities of fuel oil during the season of peak demand. The Canadian oil industry will also, of course, have the consolation of drawing additional revenues from the sale of the natural gas it will continue to have as a by-product from its field operations.

There ends the quotation with regard to natural gas. Farther on in the same chapter, on page 134, the commission deals with the importance of reserves and of export markets. I quote from the beginning of the paragraph:

> In spite of the very rapid growth that we anticipate over the next two or three decades in Canadian consumption of natural gas, reserves are likely to grow even more rapidly and make possible substantially larger exports to the United States than are now being contracted for. The growth of reserves will be a function of the demand not only for natural gas but for crude oil as well; it will also be affected by the government policies pursued in both Canada and the United States; so that any estimate must be subject to a wide margin of error. It would seem plausible, however, to expect reserves of natural gas to increase over the period from 21 trillion cubic meet in 1955 to perhaps 100 trillion cubic meet in 1980. If that estimate is not too wide of the mark and if Canadian consumption runs at about the rate we have forecast, the amount available for export twenty-five years from now might be one trillion cubic feet annually or about half the amount likely to be marketed in Canada.

Those figures, Mr. Speaker, are very important. They show the wisdom of doing whatever is necessary to develop, if possible, the part which is now considered as a surplus.

I now come to the proposal made at page 146 of the report, where the commission urges the establishment of a national energy board. Here is the recommendation of the

Gordon commission on this matter, and I would like to quote directly from page 146 of the final report, issued in November 1957:

> We assume that in connection with these intergovernment negotiations, the appropriate Canadian authorities are considering our long-term interests in the whole field of energy. These include not only the question of exporting electricity for periods long enough to permit the financing of new installations, but also our interests in export markets for oil, both crude and refined products, and for gas and its by-products.

And now, here is the essence of the Gordon commission recommendations:

> In order that a sound and comprehensive policy may be worked out with regard to development, exports, imports and consumption of all forms of energy in Canada, we propose that a national energy authority be established which would be responsible for:
> (a) advising the federal government and, upon request, any provincial government on all matters connected with the long-term requirements for energy in its various forms and in different parts of Canada; methods of promoting the best uses of energy sources from a long-term point of view; export policy, including such questions as the further refining of oil and gas in Canada and the disposal of by-products; coal subsidies, etc.
> (b) approving, or recommending for approval, all contracts or proposals respecting the export of oil, gas and electric power by pipeline or transmission wire, including, where necessary or desirable, the holding of public hearings in connection therewith.
> If this proposal is accepted,—

I repeat what I said Monday last.

> —the organization of the Dominion Coal Board should be merged with that of the proposed national energy authority. It is perhaps unnecessary to add that the proposed new body would not interfere with the rights of the provinces respecting control over natural resources.

Then, here—

(Text):

Mr. Morris: Will the hon. member permit a question which is intended only for clarification; it is not antagonistic. After reading these extracts from the final report of the Gordon commission, is the hon. member in a position to say whether his party favours the inclusion of coal in this energy bill, as was recommended in the extracts he just quoted, or does he favour the retention, as we do, of the dominion coal board?

Mr. Dumas: I said that on Monday, definitely. For the time being we do not agree that the coal board should be integrated with the national energy board. I said that very clearly on Monday. I shall say something more about this question later in my remarks.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I had expected an altogether different question from the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Morris). At all events, I shall be in a position, at the end of my remarks, to say or rather to repeat what I said Monday in the house about the Liberal party's policy with regard to Canada's energy resources.

(Text):

During the 1957 election campaign, Mr. Speaker—and this has been mentioned very often in this chamber—the Prime Minister promised the Canadian people quick and bold action on this matter. The Conservative party was going to encourage through specific measures, a greater degree of Canadian ownership in this field and the further processing in Canada of raw materials and by-products through the more efficient development and use of our sources of energy. I would like to quote from the remarks made by the Prime Minister in Toronto on February 4, 1957, at the annual dinner of the Toronto board of trade. Of course that was some time before the election of 1957. However, this is what the Prime Minister said:

> There is a need now for the setting up of a Canadian national energy board, with its membership composed of technical personnel, who might be selected by the president of the national research council of business organizations, of the dominion and provincial governments, to the end that the most effective use of the energy resources of Canada, in the interests of the public welfare, may be assured. We have vast resources of gas and oil and coal and uranium. I believe the time has come to set up such a board, whose duty it would be to advise and to recommend proposals regarding these resources, so that they may be safeguarded from prejudicial action now, ill-timed action to the detriment of this and future generations.

What was the situation in this respect after the general election and during the fall session of 1957? Did the government take action at that time, as was urgently required by our industry and as had been promised—that is the point—to Canadians? No, Mr. Speaker; it merely submitted the recommendation of the Gordon commission to another royal commission created for that purpose.

What did we on this side of the house have to say then about the creation of the Borden commission? Here is, for instance, what Hon. Jean Lesage, the former minister of northern affairs and national resources, had to say on November 13, 1957, at page 1082 of Hansard:

> In the field of energy, here, again, we have heard no policy announced by this government. We all know that the Gordon commission devoted a good deal of attention to this problem and will in its final report make specific recommendations which were anticipated in its preliminary report. Before knowing what will be the final recommendations of the Gordon commission in this respect, the government appoints a royal commission whose main purpose is to make an inquiry on the recommendations of another commission before these recommendations are presented in final form. This is what can be called quick action, but what about the wisdom of the action. Of course, everybody knows why this royal commission on energy was appointed; everyone in Canada knows that it is to hide the fact that the Conservative party wants to continue the pipe line policy initiated by the past Liberal government.

That is why the royal commission on energy has been appointed. The Conservatives strongly criticized this policy of the past Liberal government and of course they do not dare admit publicly now the fact that they endorse the policy. What they wish to do is hide that policy of theirs behind a royal commission. They do not have the courage to admit they will have to follow our policy in this matter. They intend to escape their responsibility by appointing a royal commission.

What did we on this side of the house have to say about the creation of that royal commission? We said what Mr. Lesage said in the remarks I have just quoted.

In the fall of 1957, therefore, we on this side of the house contended that the appointment of the Borden commission was a means of shelving problems and a mere delaying tactic to enable the government to postpone taking a definite stand and specific action before the forthcoming election of 1958. That delaying tactic has worked. After a year of inquiry the Borden commission presented its first report in October, 1958. That report contained final recommendations only in so far as natural gas is concerned. We all recall also how widely that report and some of its sections in particular were criticized when the report was made public.

Then more delays were experienced. It was only on April 23, six months after the government had received the report, that a resolution appeared on the order paper. But again nothing happened. It was only after another month that the government decided at last to proceed with the resolution. The bill was made available to us for study only on Tuesday evening. Finally, after all these delays and hesitation and confusion, the government discovered that this was a most urgent matter and that the house should proceed with the consideration of the 101 provisions of the bill without any adequate time to study them carefully.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I must say here that we are grateful to the Prime Minister for agreeing on Wednesday to postpone second reading of the bill until today. During the intervening hours we have had some time to study the bill, and for this reason we think this was a good move on the part of the Prime Minister, because it will accelerate debate at this stage.

We think this is an important piece of legislation. It is a long and complex bill which could have deep, long term implications on the future economic development of Canada. For this reason and also because of the long delays in bringing the legislation before the house, for which the government must assume full responsibility, we on this side of the house want to make clear that we are far from being satisfied about the haste shown by the government on this occasion. We claim that not enough time has been provided to hon. members for full consideration and study of the bill. We also believe that those individuals and groups more immediately concerned with this matter will not be able to analyse the legislation and make their views known in so short a period of time.

In the little time I have had to study the bill, however, I have been able to discover that this legislation is almost a complete repudiation of the Borden report. I am quite sure that no other royal commission has been more completely ignored and by-passed. This shows very clearly how right we were in the fall of 1957 when we claimed that the setting up of the royal commission was merely a delaying tactic used by the government to postpone action until after the 1958 election.

The bill we are now considering is not only a repudiation of the recommendations of the Borden commission but is also a repudiation of the definite promises and commitments made by the Conservative party to the Canadian people before the 1957 election. Most of the provisions of the bill are not new, as we intend to show at the committee stage when we will be able to consider the bill in detail. A great number of its sections have been taken without any change or without any substantial modification from the Pipe Lines Act and from the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act, as I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks in French.

The bill also contains a few new provisions which we think are clearly undesirable. It gives unnecessarily wide powers to the governor in council. This is surprising from a government which when in opposition was so critical of government by order in council. I should like at this stage to give just a few illustrations of this undesirable feature of the bill. I am not going to quote the section, Mr. Speaker, because I know I am not permitted to do so at this stage of the bill, but I should like to point out that clause 87 says the governor in council may by proclamation extend to oil the provisions of the bill dealing with the export and import of gas.

Surely this is a most unacceptable procedure. With that provision the government is proposing to by-pass not only the Borden commission but also parliament. As we all know, the Borden commission has not yet made its final recommendations with respect to oil exports and imports. In spite of this the government is asking parliament to enact legislative provisions with respect to oil. Even if the government has already decided to ignore the recommendations the commission may make with regard to this matter, it might at least have waited to see the report before taking action. I do not think we should have that clause in the bill.

The Borden commission has now been placed by the government in an impossible and intolerable position. As far as we on this side of the house are concerned, we want to see what the Borden commission has to say on this subject before deciding what should be our attitude on this clause of the bill.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Speaker, just before the house rose at one o'clock I was commenting on clause 87 of the bill, and I was telling the house that the Borden commission had been placed in an impossible and untenable position by the government. This is not the whole story, however, Mr. Speaker. According to this bill, the legislative provisions with respect to oil, after having been approved by parliament, will be implemented only if and when the government so wishes. This, Mr. Speaker, is legislation by cabinet and we certainly cannot accept such a procedure. We maintain that if and when the government feels legislative action is necessary with respect to oil it should then, but only then, ask parliament to take such action. The government is certainly not entitled at this stage to seek these wide powers when it does not even know how it will use them in the future.

Another illustration of government by order in council is provided by clause 85, paragraph 2, which enables the government to exempt any person, any product, any transaction and any area from the legislative provisions and regulations regarding export and import of power or hydrocarbons. This is another example of the wide, arbitrary power that the government is seeking in this bill. Parliament is asked to enact legislation and, at the same time, to authorize the government to exempt from the legislation all the possible cases which could be covered by it. We certainly cannot accept provisions which give such wide powers to the government.

Our attitude toward this bill is clear and simple. We approve its principle, which is to set up a national energy board. As a matter of fact, we have been in favour of such a board since January, 1958, at least. I should like, at this stage, to quote from the resolution approved by the Liberal party at the last convention in Ottawa, in January 1958 and which I quoted on Monday evening, May 18, 1959, as reported at page 3773 of Hansard for that date,

> We of the Liberal party advocate the integrated development in co-operation with the provinces of petroleum, natural gas, hydroelectric power, coal and all other energy sources across the whole of Canada to meet the needs of industrial and population growth. We advocate the establishment of a national energy authority to advise the government as to the long term requirements of energy in Canada, including the best methods of providing efficient long term uses in Canada and for export.

Therefore, in 1958 we were on record as favouring such a board, and this is long before the government decided to introduce the present bill. However, we do not want another board which will more or less duplicate what has already been done by other existing government agencies, and thus create further administrative delays and confusion. From this point of view, we feel that the functions of the board have not been clearly defined in relation to the responsibilities of existing agencies.

It is true that this morning the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) gave some information to the house on this subject. However, I should like to outline a few of the problems we will have on our hands if this division of responsibility is not made absolutely clear. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has failed, in that way, to tell us what will happen to the present agencies established under statutes of this parliament and operating within the field of energy. He said this morning that these agencies would continue to work, but we should have had more information regarding this problem. This question, of such fundamental importance, was almost ignored. Will these present agencies, and their functions, be integrated within the framework established for the new national energy board? The minister should be more definite about that. Will certain parts of present agencies be brought under the aegis of the new authority, or will complete existing agencies be incorporated? Parliament should have such information.

It may be that all present agencies will be maintained—we were not given this understanding this morning—without any changes in their functions. If that is the arrangement contemplated, we are entitled to ask how the new board will discharge the duties assigned to it in the bill and still avoid extensive and inefficient duplication with existing machinery of government?

There is still another alternative about which we must ask, and that is whether it is proposed to wind up or liquidate some of the existing agencies operating in the field of energy. This is a matter of fundamental importance—

Mr. Lambert: Which ones?

Mr. Dumas: This is what we want to know; this is a matter of fundamental importance and for that reason we intend to press the minister for precise answers to each of these questions as they apply to each existing agency.

I want to list now the present agencies and governmental machinery operating in the field of energy. They are: the dominion coal board; the atomic energy control board; the international joint commission; the water resources branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources; the interdepartmental committee on energy. These are the main agencies and machinery. There may be others, but these are the ones which occur to me at the present time.

Before I deal with each of these more specifically, I wish to refer to a paragraph of the minister's statement at the resolution stage. A reading of this statement will illustrate the broad functions of the board in the field, and how any diligent exercise of such functions is bound to lead to duplication with the work of existing bodies. The paragraph reads, as recorded at page 3767 of Hansard:

> The board would exercise certain broad advisory functions ranging over the whole field of energy and sources of energy in so far as the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction over such matters.

Clause 22 of the bill, which I am prevented from quoting in full at this stage of the debate, confirms the interpretation I attach to the minister's statement, though the words used therein are "shall study and keep under review", and so on.

How will the dominion coal board be related to the energy board? The coal board operates under a separate statute, namely the Dominion Coal Board Act, and sections of the act, especially sections 6 and 7, seem to overlap directly the provisions of the bill now under consideration. Section 6 of the coal board act reads as follows:

> 6. The board shall study, review and recommend to the minister from time to time such policies and measures as it considers necessary respecting the production, importation, distribution and use of coal in Canada.

This is the statute of 1947, chapter 57. Then section 7 deals with research and investigation. I wish to quote clauses (d) and (f) in this connection. Clause (d) reads as follows:

> (d) the position of coal in relation to other forms of fuel or energy available for use in Canada;

Clause (f) reads as follows:

> (f) the co-ordination of the activities of government departments relating to coal;

My question now is this. How will the authority granted by parliament to the dominion coal board be affected by the authority of the new board? Coal is a source of energy; yet the new board deals with all sources of energy without exception.

I now turn to the atomic energy control board. This body operates under a statute, namely the Atomic Energy Control Act. Its functions are carefully described in a brochure published by the authority of the Secretary of State of Canada (Mr. Courtemanche) and entitled "Organization of the Government of Canada". As I read the functions of the atomic energy control board, I suggest to hon. members that they reflect on the obvious overlap with the new board. This is what we read in this little brochure published under government authority:

> The primary function of the board, as stated in the preamble to the act, is to make provision for the control and supervision of the development, application and use of atomic energy, and to enable Canada to participate effectively in measures of international control of atomic energy that may hereafter be agreed upon. The act, accordingly, provides for control by the board of materials, equipment and information related to atomic energy and for the making of regulations for these purposes. The act also authorizes the board to establish scholarships and grants in aid relating to atomic energy research.

Surely the role of atomic energy in the future energy supplies of Canada is of crucial importance. That energy source is under a board of its own. Can the new board successfully operate without concerning itself with atomic energy? If it does concern itself with that source of energy, how will it fit in, and relate its activities to the present atomic energy control board?

The same questions can be asked about the international joint commission. Its functions are described in the volume to which I have referred already as follows at page 160:

The commission deals with matters arising mainly out of the use of lakes and rivers in the border areas along the boundary between the United States and Canada.

We all realize, Mr. Speaker, that in the recent past the international joint commission and its Canadian section have been occupying much of their time with the development of power from the harnessing of international waters. Yet the new board will have the authority to deal with agencies outside Canada in respect of energy matters. It would be interesting, I am sure, for the house to know in what way the new energy board will function in relation to the international joint commission.

The dominion coal board, the atomic energy control board and the international joint commission operate under sanctions granted by this parliament. But there has been operating in this field the water resources branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and an interdepartmental committee on energy. The work of the water resources branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources could hardly be more similar to the functions of the energy board. We want to know whether it is proposed to close out this branch, or whether it will continue along its present path which will of necessity involve duplication with the board.

The scope of the work of this branch and the extent to which its functions coincide with those of the new board can be readily seen in the report of the department for the fiscal year 1957-58, especially at page 44. I believe, Mr. Speaker, it is worth quoting two of these paragraphs:

The branch—

That is the water resources branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

—continues to provide technical advice to the Department of External Affairs and to the Canadian section of the international joint commission in their considerations and studies of international waterway problems which have arisen on various rivers across Canada. Among the most important studies of this nature undertaken by the branch are those of the Columbia and Fraser rivers. These two river systems comprise the bulk of the drainage for the whole of southern British Columbia, and their topography has permitted consideration of their interconnection by diversion from the Columbia river to the Fraser river system. Various possibilities for separate or combined development of these two major river systems are being given careful scrutiny.

Further in the report we read this:

The Yukon river has been the subject of previous study to determine the possibilities of diversion of its upper reaches into the Taku river system for power production in northwestern British Columbia. Since the Yukon river with its tributaries constitutes the bulk of the drainage system of the Yukon territory and hence is a federal responsibility, the branch continued its power resources reconnaissance survey, initiated in 1956. When this work has been completed, it will be possible to provide a reliable estimate of the power potential of the Yukon river system which might be developed within the Yukon territory.

Presumably, Mr. Speaker, the setting up of energy board will mean winding up the work of the interdepartmental committee on energy. I think we might take that for granted.

Mr. Churchill: Do not be too sure that you can take that for granted.

Mr. Dumas: I do not suppose the minister will have, in addition to the energy board, another interdepartmental committee. He may keep the agencies that we already have but I suppose that he proposes to wind up this committee. The existence of the committee was referred to by Mr. C. D. Howe, as reported at page 1538 of Hansard of 1955 as follows:

We have today an interdepartmental committee on energy. Any matter having to do with energy is referred to that committee. It is not a committee established by act of parliament; it is simply a committee of civil servants who have duties relating to the field of energy. The Department of Trade and Commerce have to do with the exporting of energy, all energy, and the Department of Trade and Commerce are privileged to bring this committee together, to bring the experts together to discuss any problem of export of energy with which the department is confronted.

From his later remarks, it appeared that Mr. John Davis, of the Department of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Hume, of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, and representatives of the Department of Finance, the dominion coal board, the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the Department of Labour and—the then minister also thought—the international joint commission made up the interdepartmental committee.

Now I believe I have said enough to indicate the importance of knowing what will happen to existing bodies and agencies, and how they will be integrated within or related to the new board. We want precise answers from the minister. We intend to press until we receive such answers. We will be studying the bill in committee, and I hope that our criticism of the different sections of the bill will be constructive. We hope also that the government will do what it has to do to try to improve the said proposed legislation.

Although a great number of the provisions of this bill are not new, it is now proposed to create new procedures and a new administrative set-up to study, control and regulate a very important sector of the Canadian economy and of our international trade. Viewed in that perspective, this bill could have, and undoubtedly will have, far-reaching implications on Canada's future. Will those consequences be favourable or unfavourable? I think at this stage that very few members in this house would be in a position to answer that question with any degree of certainty. That is why we hope the government will agree to send this bill, after second reading, to a standing committee of the house which would be in a position to give to those individuals and groups interested in this matter an opportunity to be heard. We think that this is a most reasonable request.

After all, this is a most important and complex matter. Very few persons have had an opportunity to express their views on this subject in the short time since the bill has been made public. It may be, although it is not at all certain, that such a procedure would involve a delay of a few days to secure the approval of the bill; but this should not cause any great inconvenience. Our objective in making that suggestion is not obstruction. Mr. Speaker, I can assure you, and I can assure the minister, that we wish to co-operate. We wish to do our best to work with the government and make this legislation what it should be. We merely want to be sure that the bill which will be enacted will be a good piece of legislation and will serve the best interests of our country.

The government recently decided on its own initiative to refer the unemployment insurance bill to the standing committee on industrial relations. I do not see how the government could now refuse to use the same procedure with respect to this bill which is much more complex and which could have far more important implications on the future of our country. I am quite sure that hon. members would welcome the advice which could be secured through the committee from the great Canadian experts in the field of energy. We are not pressing the matter, but I hope that the minister will give consideration to this request, and I repeat that in this matter we want to work with the government and make this piece of legislation something of which we will be proud.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the question of control of transportation rates and prices of energy in this country is a most important one. As a matter of fact, to a very large extent the future industrial life of Canada as well as the prosperity of Canadians generally depend upon the availability of cheap energy sources. It has become clear in very recent years that Canada has large supplies of natural gas and petroleum. We are an industrial nation, and we in the C.C.F. believe it is within the capabilities of the Canadian nation to develop our energy resources at low cost, and be able to provide this energy to Canadian industry and consumers.

It is on that basis that we approach the subject and the bill now under discussion. Mr. Speaker, this whole field was the subject of a very important inquiry by the Borden royal commission on energy. This inquiry took some considerable time. It cost the taxpayers of this country a great deal of money, and an exhaustive study has been made. As a matter of fact, in a return brought down in this house on February 25, it was shown that the cost of this royal commission has amounted to $317,124.52. It is therefore correct to say that the Canadian nation has invested a large sum of money in the inquiry that was made, and the recommendations that have been presented to parliament should be given every consideration.

Mr. Speaker, as I read this report and its recommendations, I think that some of the most important recommendations are contained in the list of recommendations and the suggested amendments to the Pipe Lines Act. Recommendation No. 11, paragraph (c) reads as follows:

> It shall be mandatory for the board of transport commissioners for Canada to regulate the prices or rates of gas pipe line companies subject to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, and, in so doing, to require, if necessary, any such gas pipe line company to renegotiate the terms of any existing contracts for the sale or delivery of gas for distribution or consumption within Canada;

> It shall be mandatory for the board of transport commissioners for Canada periodically, and at least once in every 24-month period during the early years of regulation, to review and, if deemed necessary, to adjust the prices, tolls, rates and tariffs of pipe line companies regulated by it;

This report refers to the board of transport commissioners. We do not quarrel with the fact that the government has decided to give these powers now held by the board of transport commissioners in this connection to the energy board. We feel that the recommendations apply equally to the powers that will be held by the energy board as they should apply to the powers now held by the board of transport commissioners.

Recommendation No. 12 reads as follows:

> That the prices, tolls, rates or tariffs of a company owning or operating an oil or gas pipe line, as regulated by the board of transport commissioners for Canada, should be just and reasonable, non-discriminatory and calculated to yield a fair rate of return on the shareholders' equity, after making due allowance for reasonable and proper operating expenses, depreciation, interest, income and other taxes.

Mr. Speaker, the recommendations contained herein are very clear. They ask that power be exercised by a board to regulate the prices or rates of gas pipe line companies subject to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada and in bringing about these rates to require, if necessary, any gas pipe line company to renegotiate the terms of any existing contracts for the sale or delivery of gas or its distribution or consumption within Canada. The purpose of this section is to remove any injustice that presently is contained in the rates charged for gas in terms of distribution or consumption.

It is further recommended that at least every 24 months it shall be mandatory for the board to review and, if deemed necessary, to adjust the prices, tolls, rates and tariffs of pipe line companies regulated by it. These recommendations are that the board have wide powers and that the board must use those powers to set tolls and to regulate the prices of gas and oil.

The other recommendation to which I have referred was to the effect that the prices, tolls, rates or tariffs of the companies owning and operating an oil or gas pipe line shall be so regulated and calculated as to yield a fair rate of return on the shareholders' equity after having made due allowance for reasonable and proper operating expenses, depreciation, interest, income and other taxes. This is a most important recommendation. The whole purpose behind this recommendation is to remove from the calculations of cost the fabulous profits that have been made by investors and the controllers of gas and oil pipe lines in this country. This recommendation says that anyone who has invested money in these companies should receive a fair return on his equity. The purpose is to provide that Canadian industries and consumers will not be saddled with the high rates for energy that are necessary to pay large returns on the highly speculative and bloated profits and income that accrue to the controllers of the gas and oil industry.

These are the central recommendations and these are the recommendations the government has avoided. It is true that by this bill the government is setting up a board but the board is free to do almost anything it likes and indeed it is free to fold its arms if it so wishes and do almost nothing.

Clause 53 of this bill reads as follows:

> The board may disallow any tariff or any portion thereof that it considers to be contrary to any of the provisions of this act or to any order of the board, and may require a company, within a prescribed time, to substitute a tariff satisfactory to the board in lieu thereof, or may prescribe other tariffs in lieu of the tariff or portion thereof so disallowed.

The board has full discretion to sit on its hands indefinitely and let the speculators and buccaneers continue to make large and bloated profits from Canadian industry and consumers. That is the attitude of the government. The policy of the government has been to forget all of its statements in the past and to forget its well-known position that Canadian interests should be protected and Canadian energy resources should be developed by Canadian capital in the interests of Canadians. The government has forsaken that position and introduced this anaemic bill to set up a board the powers of which are not well defined and by this means to allow the exploitation of Canadian energy resources in the future and to allow them to remain in the hands of outside interests and overnight buccaneers and to remove these resources from direct and precise control by a board operating in the interests of this nation.

The royal commission on energy was instructed to inquire into this whole general field to see to what extent speculative and exorbitant profits had been made in this industry in the past. The commission has done a most thorough job in this regard. It inquired into the whole operation of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. I am convinced from reading the report that it was precisely because of the huge profits that had been made by a few people on almost negligible investments that the royal commission recommended that the people of Canada should not have to pay rates for gas and oil that provide fabulous returns on such investments.

We have heard a lot about Texas buccaneers from hon. gentlemen opposite in times gone by. This commission inquired into the extent to which Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is controlled by outside sources. On page 74 of the report it is stated that as of June 1, 1958 the company that held the second largest number of shares in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited was Canadian Delhi Oil Limited, Calgary, Alberta which had 542,885 shares. Looking further into the affairs of Canadian Delhi Oil Limited the commission at page 77 of the report had this to say:

> The commission has been advised that Mrs. Betty Lee Moor MacGuire, who was the registered owner at the date above referred to of 238,984 common shares of Canadian Delhi Oil Ltd., is a daughter of Mr. Lee Moor, an associate of Clinton W. Murchison of Dallas, Texas; that the partnership of Richardson & Bass, shown as the registered owner of 132,010 common shares, includes as a partner Mr. S. W. Richardson, a Texas independent oil operator, who is likewise shown as being the registered owner in his own name of 35,762 common shares of Canadian Delhi Oil Ltd. and that Clinton W. Murchison, Jr., and John Dabney Murchison, of Dallas, Texas, shown as the registered owners of 275,512 and 229,325 common shares respectively of Canadian Delhi Oil Ltd., are sons of Clinton W. Murchison, Sr., of Dallas, Texas.

Here is concrete evidence of the activities of Texas buccaneers to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) made reference in this house a few years ago. This is evidence of the extent to which Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is controlled by people living in the United States.

With respect to profits that have been made on certain transactions the commission at pages 82 and 83 of its report had this to say:

Public financing of Trans-Canada was announced in February, 1957. The prospectus of the company is dated February 13, 1957. On February 1, 1957, Mr. Tanner exercised his option with respect to 15,000 shares and on February 6, 1957, with respect to 40,000 shares. As at June 1, 1958, Mr. Tanner held 30,800 of these shares, having transferred 15,000 shares principally to members of his family and 200 shares to the National Trust Company Limited, under a trust agreement, and having sold 9,000 shares for an aggregate price of approximately $263,400. As at the same time, there remained, 5,000 shares with respect to which Mr. Tanner was entitled to exercise his option before March 9, 1959.

Mr. Tanner under his agreement was obligated to pay to Trans-Canada for the 55,000 shares the sum of $440,000. At the middle of September, 1958, common shares of Trans-Canada were traded on the Toronto stock exchange at approximately $34.50 per share. Had Mr. Tanner retained these optioned shares and sold them at that time and at that price he would have made an apparent capital gain of approximately $1,457,500. This calculation does not take into account the 10,000 shares optioned to him by Canadian Delhi Oil Limited and the western group at $1 per share, which as previously stated he transferred to Mrs. Tanner. In addition, as noted above, Mr. Tanner still has the right, exercisable before March 9, 1959, to purchase an additional 5,000 shares of Trans-Canada at $8 per share.

Here is a man, Mr. Speaker who according to the royal commission on energy, a commission which cost the Canadian taxpayer over $300,000, who by way of an option and by no risk investment himself, stood to make in September of 1958, with shares at the price of $34.50, a capital gain of $1,457,500. This is the nefarious deal to which the Conservative members used to refer. This is the great betrayal under which one man has made $1,457,500 at the expense of the Canadian nation.

This deal was made, prior to this government coming into office, but what has been the attitude of this government? To set up a royal commission, yes, and a royal commission which brought in a report and said in effect that gas rates should not be set and oil rates should not be set at prices to give this man a $1,457,500 capital gain, but only a return on the equity that he has in the company. This, Mr. Speaker, is the recommendation of the commission and this is the recommendation that this government has refused to follow.

It was not only Mr. Tanner who made a fabulous profit. There was Mr. Charles S. Coates, of Houston, Texas, who himself had a very large option and has made very fabulous profits. The royal commission at page 85 had this to say:

As previously mentioned, public financing of Trans-Canada was announced in February, 1957, and the prospectus with respect to such financing is dated February 13, 1957. On February 11, 1957, Mr. Coates exercised his option in full. As at February 19, 1958, Mr. Coates still held 40,000 of these shares, having sold 10,000 shares in the fall of 1957 for an aggregate price of approximately $280,000. Accordingly, if one takes the price at which common shares of Trans-Canada were traded on the Toronto stock exchange in the middle of September, 1958, i.e. approximately $34.50 per share, and had Mr. Coates retained these 50,000 optioned shares and sold them at that time and at that price, he would have made an apparent capital gain of approximately $1,325,000.

This is another example of the fabulous profits that have been made at the expense of the Canadian nation because of the former government's pipe line action with regard to Trans-Canada pipe line. These are examples of fabulous profits that have been made by certain people connected with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. Look into any major gas company, look into any gas pipe line company in Canada, look into the financial picture of any major oil pipe line in Canada, and you are almost certain to find a duplication of the same kind of fabulous profits.

An inquiry was made into profits that resulted from the operation of the Northern Ontario Natural Gas Company. In the Globe and Mail of Friday, February 13, one finds the report that Mr. Farris purchased 37,500 shares for $300. He sold 22,500 of these shares for $318,300. He retained 15,000 shares, and at the price of approximately $14 per share at which shares are being traded today, this Mr. Farris, on an investment of $300, has a capital gain of $528,000. These are the very kind of fabulous actions that this government is protecting by this legislation in the rates which can be charged which will give a return on these fabulous amounts. Mr. Clark, another investor in the same company, purchased 58,549 shares for $9,072.50. He sold 30,149 shares for $146,215. He retained 28,400 shares, and on the basis of today's trading price this man, on a purchase investment of $9,072.50, is in a position to make $543,000. Mr. Newell, the third person mentioned, purchased 29,334 shares for $10,160. He sold 22,850 shares for $234,125. He still holds 6,548 shares. Mr. Newell, on an investment of just over $10,000, stands to gain $326,000.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, this kind of fabulous profits, based not on risk investment but on mere token investment, based mainly on the control and the acquisition and ownership of large numbers of shares, is a disgrace to this nation and to this parliament. Because of these fabulous profits, because a few people have control of those great energy resources, the Canadian people have looked to this government to take action to restore the natural resources to the people of this country. This has not been done. As a matter of fact, effective steps to restore control over final charges are not being undertaken by this measure.

In recent elections the government made very strong statements to the people of Canada as to how it would develop resources in the interests of the Canadian people. In a pamphlet published by Progressive Conservative party national headquarters, 141 Laurier avenue west, Ottawa, Ontario prior to the 1957 election this was stated on page six:

> Canadian subsidiaries of foreign concerns should be required to provide a substantial interest in their equity stock to Canadian investors.

There is no such reference in this bill. On page seven of the same pamphlet I find these words:

> In his opening campaign speech on April 25 John Diefenbaker emphatically stated: "In common with all Canadians, and I underline what I am about to say, we welcome foreign investment. We do not want to see it discouraged. But, I say this—as Canadians a sense of national destiny for Canada calls for that investment being directed to the maximum benefit for Canada. I go farther than that—I quote the words of the Financial Post, which I have referred to, when it said this"—

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member goes further with that, would he think that this debate, which is undoubtedly a broad one, deals with foreign investment? It seems to me that it deals with investment in oil, gas and energy companies but it deals with that not as foreign and domestic but as investment. I just wonder whether there are not some limits to the scope of what is relevant in this debate.

Mr. Argue: I would refer you, Mr. Speaker, to the debate on the trans-Canada pipe line. That was legislation that affected only Canadian pipe lines. Yet a large part of the debate ranged around whether or not the people investing in and controlling that company were in fact Canadians. When we are considering a bill which contains power to control gas prices in this country I think whether the bill is effective depends to some extent on whether the great gas and oil companies that this legislation seeks to control are dominated by outside capital. If we were dealing purely with domestic investors we might have one attitude toward the bill but because we are dealing in fact with an industry which to a very substantial extent is controlled outside this country we have a different attitude to the measure. I feel that it is exceedingly pertinent to the whole question of the government's energy policy whether or not the companies that may be controlled are themselves owned by and in the control of outside interests.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has a point with respect to existing companies but what I was endeavouring to find an answer to was whether the general policy of foreign investment was involved in this debate. It seemed to me that the quotations he was using were directed toward foreign investment generally. If he wishes to talk about foreign investment in the existing companies which will come under the control of this legislation that may be all right.

Mr. Argue: If you will recall, just a moment before I had quoted from the royal commission report as to the fabulous profits made by Mr. Coates of Houston, Texas.

Mr. Speaker: I made no objection to that. I was simply trying to keep the member away from a general discussion of foreign investment in Canada.

Mr. Argue: After having referred to Mr. Coates, after having referred to the royal commission's statement about these people, most of whom are Texans, who control Canadian Delhi Oil Company, I then came to the statement of the Prime Minister as to how this type of foreign investment and control was detrimental to the very existence of this nation. I intend to keep my remarks related to the gas and oil pipe line business but I also have referred to the way these pipe lines are controlled in large measure outside this country. The statement of the Financial Post, and it is a short one, which the Prime Minister quoted was as follows:

> How long, with the growing dominance of foreign owned enterprises, Canada can continue a separate existence is the problem before Canada today.

Mr. Speaker: In my view that general field is too broad a field for this debate and I think the hon. member should keep his remark related to the oil and gas industry.

Mr. Argue: I am dealing with the oil and gas business and the way it is dominated and controlled outside this country and the fact that it is necessary for the government to take action to control the Texas buccaneers. The people and corporations who were once referred to as the pampered pets of the Right Hon. C. D. Howe and who are the pampered pets of this government today, these Texas buccaneers, must be smiling. They must have very broad smiles on their faces because I am sure that when this government took office there was some concern that the party now in power meant to do exactly what it said it would do, restore control of these companies to Canadians and take action to see that Canadian resources are developed and used by Canadians in the interests of this country.

The government went so far as to appoint a royal commission on which more than $300,000 was spent. It brought in specific recommendations as to how gas and oil going through pipe lines should be controlled but the government has decided to set aside its main recommendations.

The Liberal party appears to be taking a very active part in this debate and I am certain we are going to have many speeches from members of the Liberal party before the debate is over. But I wonder where their basic quarrel is with the government. After all, they are the people who brought into existence the very pipe lines, the very companies, that required a royal commission to look into their operations. Has the Liberal party any fundamental quarrel with what is being done now? I do not think so. The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas), speaking for the Liberal party at the resolution stage, had this to say as found on page 3772 of Hansard.

> If it is the intention of the government to follow the recommendation of the Borden commission in this respect, that is, establishing a base rate in this way, it will merely tie the hands of any board which will have to enforce the law, and at the same time it will discourage investment in Canada at a time when investment ought to be encouraged and not scared away by restrictive provisions.

The attitude of the Liberal party is, bring in more Texas buccaneers, bring in more Americans to control industries in this country and once control is obtained by them then bring in an anaemic bill which does not have the teeth in it recommended by Mr. Henry Borden, chairman, and the other members of the royal commission. The spokesman for the official opposition went on to quote Mr. Ely, the president of the investment dealers' association of Canada, in these words:

> There is no doubt that the report has been a great blow to the confidence of foreign investors in Canada. Its recommendations, if implemented, will certainly impair our ability to import from abroad the large amounts of capital we require.

There is the stand of the Liberal party in opposition to the recommendations of the royal commission. In this debate, the Liberal party and Conservative party are in substantially the same position. They are prepared to see the Texas buccaneers, the pampered pets of the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, who have today become the dear dollies of the Prime Minister, continue to make out of almost zero investment—sometimes $8 and at other times no risk at all—fabulous profits ranging anywhere from one-third of a million dollars up to one and a half million dollars. The people of Canada, by this legislation, are being asked to pay returns on gas and oil that will provide substantial profits to these buccaneers, not on the basis of the money they risked but on the basis of the fabulous, exorbitant and unwarranted profits that have been theirs.

The members of the Liberal party and the members of the Conservative party can smile broadly this afternoon, but what is happening under the action that has been taken is that the cost of energy required for the survival and expansion of Canadian industry, both domestic and export industries, is being increased unduly. Canada's ability to compete in the export markets is being damaged by this government. The government's attitude is, we welcome capital to make speculative profits; we are prepared to allow high prices to be charged for gas in order to pay fabulous returns on these speculative investments even though the result is high cost industry in Canada and damage to Canadian export markets.

This capitalist system, Mr. Speaker, as managed or mismanaged by the Liberals and as managed or mismanaged by this government, has shown itself not to be a free enterprise system in which the ordinary Canadian has a chance to invest and make a good return, but has shown itself to be a system which breeds, by way of clique and special privilege, millionaires and which makes multimillionaires out of existing millionaires. It is doing great damage to Canadian industry by increasing energy costs and making it more and more difficult for Canada to maintain its trade position in the world today.

I have great respect this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, for the position taken by the Conservative party in 1956. I wish I could say I had the same respect for the position that they are taking today.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): In introducing the resolution which preceded this bill on Monday last, a measure to provide for the establishment of a national energy board, and in the course of his statement in moving second reading of the bill this morning, the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) indicate that this bill offers very little new in so far as legislation is concerned. In fact, this morning the minister clearly stated that this new bill was based mainly on the principles of the Pipe Lines Act and also on the exportation of gas act. In other words, Mr. Speaker, it took a royal commission and a great deal of expense to the taxpayers of this country, plus almost two years, for the government to decide to replace existing legislation which adds very little new except the name of a new board to be known as the national energy board. This board will have little additional power and limited scope, and at this early date we are not in a position to determine fully the importance of its contents after having had only a few hours to examine the bill.

The minister further stated this morning that in preparing this bill the government had in mind certain recommendations of the Borden commission. Well I intend to show, in the course of my remarks, how little attention the government has paid to the Borden commission recommendations. The minister also referred this morning to the final report of the Borden commission. I hope that before this debate is concluded the minister will tell the house when we may expect to receive the second or final report of the Borden commission. It may be that as a result of the very poor reception the preliminary report has received in the country, and the very little attention which has been given to it by the government, the final report of the commission may be some time in the future.

The minister also stated in the course of his remarks this morning that the present bill contains no provision to regulate coal, uranium and certain other sources of energy, and that the government had decided not to disrupt agencies involved in these commodities. I shall have occasion, in the course of my remarks, to deal briefly with this point. The minister stated, too, that this major issue if of very great importance to Canada's future and it should receive consideration by this house. I wonder why, if the issue is of such major importance, it was thrown at us by the government for discussion in second reading within a few hours after the bill was introduced.

In introducing this bill, the Minister of Trade and Commerce insisted that this was in fulfilment of an objective held by the Conservative party over the years. He then quoted a statement made in this house on February 25, 1955, by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, now the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) in which he expressed the need for an over-all energy policy. He quoted the minister as saying, let us get away from dealing with the problem piecemeal, with the different departments concerned. The Minister of Trade and Commerce then went on to quote the preamble of order in council P.C. 1957/1386 passed on October 15, 1957, setting up the royal commission on energy. This order in council referred to the different sources of energy in the form of gas, oil, coal, water and uranium within Canada's boundaries, and referred also to the increasing need of energy for the growing industrial requirements of Canada which renders it of the greatest importance to assure the most effective use of these resources in the public interest.

The royal commission appointed by this order in council was instructed, by its terms of reference, to inquire into and make recommendations in connection with certain matters referred to in detail by the minister in introducing the resolution preceding this bill. I do not intend at this stage to go into the details of the terms of reference of the commission known as the Borden commission, as the minister himself has spent some time in reviewing the content of the order in council instructing the commissioners to proceed with the study of Canada's energy problem. To my astonishment, however—and this notwithstanding the broad recommendations of the commission—I find that the study of the Borden commission to date has been rather curtailed and limited to certain aspects of the energy problems in this country quite far apart from the terms referred to in relation to the export of energy and sources of energy.

The first report made public in October, 1958 says little if anything about the use of coal for the production of energy; and even to this date, almost two years after being introduced, the commission has not yet seen fit to hold meetings in the Atlantic provinces. Is it because the coal problems of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia and of the Minto coal fields in New Brunswick are not important enough to warrant the investigation and study allotted to other sources of energy, or is it because the chairman of the said commission is so disappointed and upset by the public reaction to his preliminary report—or, I could add, to the government's reaction to his first report—that he feels reluctant to proceed further with the assignment of inquiring into and making further recommendations concerning the problems of such other related matters having to do with sources of energy not covered in this first and preliminary report.

The bill presently under discussion is nothing else but a mere repudiation by the government of the Borden commission's recommendation as contained in its first report. My colleague, the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas), referred this morning to an address given at an annual dinner of the board of trade in Toronto on February 4, 1957 and quoted remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on that occasion with regard to his party's policy on the setting up of a Canadian national energy board. If we look at these remarks made by the Prime Minister, we may ask ourselves who will select the membership of the board to be appointed following the approval of the present bill? Will it be the president of the national research council or some business organizations? Would it be through the recommendation of interested provincial governments? Or will it be a board appointed to serve the best interests of the present government?

The Prime Minister has mentioned our vast resources of gas, oil, coal and uranium. Is the board to be set up for the purpose of advising and recommending proposals with regard to our resources or would it be limited to the issuing of export permits and other minor matters relating to the operations of pipe lines or other means of energy distribution? Is it only a board to replace other existing government agencies such as the board of transport commissioners under the Pipe Lines Act and those parts of the Railway Act incorporated in the same act?

In introducing his bill, the minister has referred to the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act and also to the Pipe Lines Act of 1949 which we understand will be incorporated in the present bill. Referring to the development of sources of energy, the minister has indicated that the increasing demands for electrical power have stimulated the use of most of the readily available sources of hydroelectric power. He even mentioned the fact that thermal power units based on the utilization of coal are being constructed in increasing number. The fact remains, however, that thermal power units based on the utilization of coal are becoming more and more a question mark in the development of electrical energy. It is my feeling that proposed power plants originally intended to use coal as a generating source are contemplating shifting to other sources of generating fuel.

It seems a pity that even eight months after the publication of the first report of the Borden commission—notwithstanding statements made to the contrary even in this house by the Prime Minister himself—it appears that coal has been removed from the context of studies which Canadians have every right to expect would cover all forms of energy. The problems affecting the coal mines of Nova Scotia may not be superficially connected with the studies of the Borden commission; but no one can deny that one of Canada's basic industries is left out or even singled out as if it was not of sufficient importance to the national economy to share in what was supposed to be an important and complete study on Canada's energy.

Without suggesting that the existing dominion coal board should be interfered with—and I want to be clear on this point—we of the official opposition feel that the coal problem should have played a more prominent part in the study of the Borden commission. Notwithstanding statements of assurance made to the contrary by government members, we fear that our Canadian coal industry is threatened by the wide-spread expansion of natural gas and fuel oil. This is our reason for insisting that every means possible should be taken to include coal within the sphere of a royal commission set up to clarify our energy problems.

When one peruses attentively the bill presently under study and compares it with the recommendations contained in the first report of the Borden commission, he cannot help wondering why the present government had to go into the expenditure of $200,000 or $300,000 before introducing this piecemeal legislation. Here is a government whose policy has always been—that is, if it ever had a policy at all to rely on—to maintain complete freedom and competition of trade. Today this same government is asking us to approve a measure which will regulate the importation or exportation of electric power and gas and also the importation of gas. Furthermore, this same measure will introduce a rate regulation system which sets the tolls on natural gas and this at the board's discretion subject to cabinet approval. What kind of a deal will be offered to investors when the new rates are set up? The provisions of the present bill appear to be putting the whole regulation system on a flexible basis, but no assurance whatsoever is given as to the government's attitude towards a fair treatment of investors as well as of consumers and producers.

The first report of the commission has met with severe criticism from the Canadian petroleum association. This complex document of the Borden commission, which appeared more concerned with criticism of the previous administration than with offering constructive measures which could provide greater knowledge and broader control of our energy resources, does not agree with the views of the oil and petroleum industry in Canada. In its policy statement presented to the Prime Minister on December 15, 1958 the association expressed its views in the following terms as found in the introduction on the first page of this brief:

> The interim report of the Borden commission is a lengthy and complex document. Following study of this report we wish to present a reasoned and reasonable view of constructive measures that may be taken to provide Canada with greater knowledge of and broader control over its energy resources, without wastefully inhibiting development of these resources, and at the same time:

(1) Preserve competitive free enterprise in our country;

(2) Adhere to the principle of honouring contracts;

(3) Maintain sound climate for investment still needed in vast amounts to turn Canada's "potential" into "reality".

The commission's report points up the complex problems created by the growing importance of oil and gas to the economy of Canada and the resulting need for adequate machinery to deal with national energy policies and regulation of interprovincial gas pipe lines. We take issue, however, with certain specific features of the commission's recommendations and offer our suggestions in the hope that the objectives of the federal government can be attained without excessive regulation of private industry or confusion and duplication between various levels and branches of government.

It is most important, Mr. Speaker, that government-imposed regulations be drafted so as not to interfere with competitive free enterprise in our country. The objective of the federal government in dealing with energy policy and regulations can be attained without interference with private industry, as suggested in this brief, and without creating confusion and duplication between various levels and branches of government. Excessive regulations and controls will result in confusion not only with investors but with producers alike. It could bar and exclude incentive and competition within the industry, thus resulting in higher costs of production passed along to consumers. The present bill might relieve somehow the apprehensions created by the publication of the first report of the Borden commission.

I have here before me the list of recommendations included in chapter 1 of the report of the commission on the export of natural gas and crude oil. How many of the said recommendations are implemented in the present bill? When we look at the first recommendation having to do with the export from Canada of natural gas which may from time to time be surplus to the reasonably foreseeable requirements of Canada permitted under licence, we find that this recommendation is included in the bill.

The second recommendation, part of which has to do with the terms and conditions of the contract under which the export is proposed to be made and the contemplated arrangements with respect to the disposal of by-products and avoidance of waste, we find is excluded from the present bill.

The third recommendation that an export permit may be granted for a period of not more than 25 years from its date is included in the bill and was referred to by the minister this morning.

The fourth recommendation that section No. 9 of regulations respecting the exportation of power and fluids and the importation of gas made and established by order in council P.C. 1955/907, in so far as it applies to natural gas, be rescinded, has not been considered by the government in preparing the present bill.

Recommendation 6, which asks that the return on the shareholders' investment in Westcoast Transmission Company Limited permitted by the board of transport commissioners shall not result in Canadian consumers of natural gas contributing more than their fair, reasonable and proportionate share of the total return, has been ignored in the present bill.

Recommendation 7, which again has to do with the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited, is not yet at least included in the present bill. The same applies to recommendation No. 9, that any application which Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited may make in the future for a licence with respect to such export be considered on its merits.

In section B having to do with crude oil, recommendation No. 10 reads:

That, having regard to the present proven reserves of crude oil in Canada and to trends in the discovery and growth of reserves, the export from Canada of crude oil be permitted under annual licence.

There is no mention of this recommendation made in the present bill.

The same will apply to recommendation No. 11, which recommends that it shall be mandatory for the board of transport commissioners for Canada to exercise the powers conferred upon it under part II of the Pipe Lines Act, etc. The same also applies to recommendation No. 12, that the prices, tolls, rates or tariffs of a company owning or operating an oil or gas pipe line, as regulated by the board of transport commissioners for Canada, should be just and reasonable, non-discriminatory and calculated to yield a fair rate of return on the shareholders' equity, after making due allowance for reasonable and proper operating expenses, depreciation, interest, income and other taxes. Again this recommendation is completely excluded from the present bill. The same also applies to recommendation No. 13, which reads:

That legislation be enacted by the parliament of Canada to enable the government of Canada to exercise effective control over the export from and the import into Canada and the movement across provincial boundaries of all energy and sources of energy.

Recommendation No. 14 that a national energy board be established is being taken care of in the present bill. The same would apply to part of recommendation No. 15, that the national energy board be authorized to require that anyone wishing to construct an oil or gas pipe line or one intended for the transportation of petroleum products or by-products of the processing of gas, subject to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, obtain a certificate of public convenience from such board. It appears that this recommendation, at least in part, replaces some of the powers of the board of transport commissioners.

Recommendation No. 16, that the national energy board be authorized to require any company engaged in the transmission across provincial boundaries by pipe line of crude oil and petroleum products and natural gas and by-products thereof to obtain a licence from such board, is included in the present bill.

Recommendation No. 17, which recommends that from time to time other forms of energy or sources of energy be brought under the authority of the national energy board for such purposes as may be specified by the governor in council, I have not been able yet to find in the present bill in the little time I have had to examine the bill. The same will apply to recommendation No. 18, which reads:

> That such divisions or branches of the various departments of the government of Canada now concerned with oil and natural gas and related matters and whose responsibilities would properly come within the jurisdiction of the national energy board be transferred to its jurisdiction.

Recommendation No. 19, which has to do with the importation into Canada of crude oil and petroleum products being made subject to licence granted by the national energy board is, according to my understanding, subject to the decision of the governor in council. Recommendation 20 provides that the national energy board has certain authorities and authorizes it to give advice and make recommendations with reference to any matter relating to energy or sources of energy to any minister or to any board or agency constituted under the authority of an act of the parliament of Canada. This is partially covered in the present bill with the exception of the portion that provides that such advice be given at the request of the minister to any board or agency constituted under the authority of the legislature of any province.

Also not implemented was the portion of that recommendation which provides that the board shall compile, study and review the statistics and estimates of the quantity, quality, location and availability of the various forms of energy and sources of energy in Canada so that the board may maintain an up-to-date inventory of Canada's energy resources. Another portion of that recommendation not implemented or covered in this bill is the one directing the board to co-operate with and assist any board, agency or other authority, constituted under the provisions of any act of the parliament of Canada or of the legislature of any province, having jurisdiction relating to energy and sources of energy, in establishing standards of measurements and methods of assessing and estimating supplies of energy and their sources. The balance of this recommendation concerning the granting of licences has been covered by this bill.

Recommendation 21 is covered by the bill with the exception of subsection (a) (ii) which reads:

> The advisability of encouraging the development in Canada of processing industries relating to energy and sources of energy as distinct from the export of unprocessed natural resources.

It is not too clear whether this would come within the purview of Bill No. C-49.

Recommendations 22, 23, 24 and 25 which have to do with the hearings of the board are included in the bill as is recommendation 26 relating to the submission of an annual report of the board.

Recommendation 28 relating to the appointment of a member of the board to the Canadian section of the international joint commission has not been implemented nor has recommendation 29 to which reference was made this morning by the minister and which provides that if possible reciprocal arrangements be made with the United States federal power commission to have a member of that body sit as an ad hoc observer but without vote when the national energy board is considering applications for the export of national gas from Canada to the United States or for the import of natural gas into Canada.

Recommendation 30 refers to enabling legislation and is covered by this bill. Recommendation 31 relates the coming into force of the enabling legislation and has been included in the bill. Recommendation 32 is only partly covered by the bill and recommendation 33, which provides that the board of transport commissioners exercise regulatory jurisdiction as recommended by the commission in its report, has not been included. Recommendation 34 to the effect that no special measures need be taken in relation to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited in order to safeguard the interests of Canadian producers or consumers of gas has been covered by the bill.

By going through the 34 recommendations listed in the report we find that 23 have been included and 11 have been completely ignored. Out of those 32 that are listed in the present bill most represent provisions already included in existing measures that are being repealed and replaced by the present legislation.

The Canadian petroleum association in its brief to the Prime Minister recommended that a national energy board could best serve the national interests if limited to fact finding and advisory responsibilities. The Borden commission also recommended that the energy board should have authority to compile, study and review the statistics and estimates of the quantity, quality, location and availability of the various forms of energy and sources of energy in Canada so that the board may maintain an up-to-date inventory of Canada's energy resources. Nowhere in the present bill do we have the implementation of such a recommendation.

Before concluding my remarks I wish to place on the record the conclusions of the Canadian petroleum association brief presented to the Prime Minister which will be found on the last page of this document. This reads as follows:

1. That many recommendations of the Borden commission as stated in its interim report would, if implemented, result in excessive regulation damaging to the best interests of Canada.
2. That there should be a division of energy authority as between policy making, advisory and regulatory functions.
3. That the government should not relegate policy making to any board.
4. That an energy board can best serve the national interest if limited to fact finding and advisory responsibilities.
5. That regulatory powers should continue to be administered by the board of transport commissioners supplemented by the addition of an oil and gas division.
6. That it is vital to the national interest that greater utilization of western Canada's surplus gas reserves should not be delayed and that the existing board of transport commissioners be used to expedite action at the federal level in current gas export applications.
7. That elimination of "leverage" on pipe line shares would hinder the financing of new pipe lines in Canada, would reduce opportunity for public investment in pipe lines and would inevitably increase the cost of oil and gas to consumers.
8. That all private business is based on sanctity of contract and no changes in government policy should be made that would fail to uphold that principle.

It is doubtful, Mr. Speaker, if the new board will meet the wishes of the industry concerned. A substantial amount of the taxpayers' money has been spent without achieving the results and accomplishments expected. Before introducing the present bill to establish the energy board the government would have been well advised to give further consideration to recommendation 18 of the commission's report which reads as follows:

That such divisions or branches of the various departments of the government of Canada now concerned with oil and natural gas and related matters and whose responsibilities would properly come within the jurisdiction of the national energy board be transferred to its jurisdiction.

In other words our energy problems are so vital to Canada's economy that every division or branch of the various departments of the government of Canada now related to oil, gas, coal, uranium or other sources of energy, could properly come, not only within the jurisdiction of the national energy board but perhaps under the jurisdiction of a separate department of the government.

While the present bill calls for a board to consist of five members, a government whose charges of waste and extravagance were so frequent in the past could well give consideration to limiting the members of the board to three as suggested in the Borden report. In fact, the limited coverage of the present bill is an indication that the responsibilities involved could well have been taken care of by a board composed of three members instead of five as suggested in the bill.

Why has this bill, an entirely new piece of legislation, been thrown at us on 48 hours notice? We are being called upon to discuss a bill of 101 clauses, an entirely new bill, which was given first reading on Tuesday of this week and which the leader of this house was insisting that we should discuss on second reading no fewer than two days later. Now that we have been given an extra 24 hours to examine this empty piece of legislation, we are asking ourselves why such a rush on the part of the government? Now that they have waited two years before introducing this measure, why all at once this anxiety to see it through? Why, in fact, has it been introduced before the final report of the Borden commission is made public? Is it because the government is afraid to face the unpopular repercussion which has resulted from the preliminary report? Is it because the government is more anxious to legislate by cabinet decisions than by approval of parliament? We recall, Mr. Speaker, the attitude of the members of the present government when they were sitting in opposition in 1955 and were criticizing the government because the minister of defence production was asking for certain powers which he may have to use only in an emergency. We well remember the objections which were raised at that time.

My time is limited, but before resuming my seat I would suggest that this bill be sent to a special committee of the house where representatives of the industry concerned could make representations and where the bill could be given the proper study it deserves.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it is with regret that I have to state on rising to speak on Bill No. C-49, to provide for the establishment of a national energy board, that I am bitterly disappointed in the bill as proposed at the present time. We in this parliamentary group have for years been expressing the need in every session for both the establishment of a national energy board and, perhaps of even more importance, a national energy policy. I can well recall when a number of the present members of the government were sitting on this side of the house to our right on those occasions, and the remarks that they had to make in support not only of a national energy board but of the establishment of a real national energy policy. Naive as I am, after all those years, I did have the thought that perhaps in this respect at least they were sincere and that when, after two years consideration in the seats of government, and after receiving the reports of a royal commission, they had reached the time of introducing a bill, it would really be a worth-while bill.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I feel bitterly disappointed. In the first place, the provisions of Bill No. C-49, although it does establish a national energy board, do not contain the authority either for a fact-finding body or the administration of a national energy policy.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the introduction of this bill, saying it is the national energy board, is a sham and a shibboleth on the members of this house and the people of this country because a national energy board should be exactly what the term implies, namely one that deals with energy in this country.

We fully realize that there are conflicts in jurisdiction. There is the jurisdiction which is strictly federal; there is the jurisdiction which is provincial; there is the jurisdiction which is interprovincial, and there is the jurisdiction which is international. Surely it should have been possible for the government to draft an act which would give full power, within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, to this board, and to have given also the board at least a consultative and advisory capacity which would try to work things out on an interprovincial as well as an international basis.

I do not think the government is trying to fool us—it cannot fool itself either—but you cannot have a national energy policy that does not take in every province and everything of an energy-producing nature in this country. If you are going to have a national energy policy you cannot consider electrical power on a provincial basis. There has to be a plan on what is known as the grid basis, as they have in the United Kingdom, a complete tie-in and control on a grid basis; that is, a tie-in of power interprovincially and nationally. In so doing, there is then the question as to whether the power should be hydro, thermal, coal or nuclear. I cannot conceive of that kind of plan being evolved except under—I will use the word "direction"—at least the consultative and advisory direction of the federal government, because power is of such an integrated nature and the developments of science are proceeding so rapidly that the best interests of the country can be served only by at least a federal body which recognizes the well-being of all Canada in so far as power is concerned, whether it be coal, thermal, nuclear, hydro, gas or oil. The fact that that principle is not recognized in this bill is, I say, a betrayal of Canada, because we are now at a time when decisions have to be made and if not definitely undertaken at least studied, and some central body should have the authority and direction to work on this most important subject.

I am most bitterly disappointed that the government has been so derelict in its understanding of the problem of the need of power that something of this nature and direction is not included in any way whatsoever in this bill. No authority whatsoever, as far as I can read the bill—and I have read it three times now—is included to enable this board when established to be able to proceed.

I am not going to speak at all, as the previous speaker did, on the Borden report itself, but I do think that note should be made as to who was the chairman of that commission. If my information is correct, and I think it is because I got it from the Financial Post directory, Mr. Borden is president of the Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company Limited, which company I understand also has certain dealings in gas in Brazil; chairman of the Canadian board of the Norwich Union Life Insurance Company and the Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society Limited; a director of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, Canadian Fund Incorporated, Investment Fund Limited, International Business Machines Company Limited, National Trust Company and Massey Harris-Ferguson. He is a man who, I presume, has vast experience as a financial and industrial baron and as chairman of this royal commission he was actually investigating the operations of the financial and industrial barons of Canada.

I am going to say, because I think it is correct and therefore should be said, that with his knowledge and experience with respect to industry and finance and examining the operations of industry and finance in Canada he brought in his recommendations as a royal commissioner having in mind what is in the best interests of Canada. It is rather amazing that a man of his experience and background, having examined the operations of his colleagues in Canada, should feel that in the interests of Canada certain things should be done to protect the Canadian people and yet in the vast majority of cases the government has not seen fit to follow the findings and recommendations of his report.

As I said, I am not going to speak on the actual report itself about which a great deal has already been said. What I want to do in the time I have available is to take the bill and draw what I think are very pertinent facts to the attention of the members of the house. We are discussing the principle of the bill so may I refer first of all to the explanatory note respecting the bill. I want to place particular emphasis on the explanatory note, especially the first half of it. This is what it says:

> The purpose of this bill is to establish a national energy board which shall,—

> —in order to assure to the people of Canada the best use of energy resources in this country, regulate in the public interest the construction and operation of oil and gas pipe lines subject to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, the tolls charged for transmission by such pipe lines, the export and import of gas, the export of electric power and the construction of those lines over which such power is exported.

I think it is to be expected that the principle of the bill would be explained in that first explanatory note, and it definitely states that the principle is to establish a national energy board which shall assure to the people of Canada in their best interests, in the public interest, certain policies, which shall establish certain regulations and shall establish certain tolls and tariffs. Having regard to the principle of the bill I say that the explanatory note as to the principle underlying the bill is not correct in that nowhere in the bill can you find that the board to be established under this legislation shall have the power as a board to implement in the public interest what the explanatory note says is the purpose of the bill.

I think that any constitutional lawyer or lawyer skilled in interpretation will agree that the two most important words in any statute of a legislature or of the House of Commons are the words "may" and "shall". I cannot remember very many acts that have come to my attention that have had so many "mays" and "shalls". But remembering what is supposed to be the principle of the bill and the powers of the board I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and to that of members of the house where the word "shall" appears and where the word "may" appears. "Shall" is mandatory; "may" is permissive.

[Mr. Winch.]

In a few sections of the bill "shall" is used a great deal. We find that there shall be a board consisting of five members. We find that the commissioners shall live in Ottawa or within 25 miles thereof. We find that the chairman, vice-chairman, and the other three members shall be paid certain remuneration. We find that the head office shall be in Ottawa. We find that there shall be a secretary appointed by the governor in council and that he shall live in Ottawa or within 25 miles thereof. There are some very definite "shalls".

When we go beyond the provisions respecting appointment of the members of the board, their salaries, where they shall live and the staff of the board and come to the powers of administration of the board it is truly remarkable how the word "shall" disappears and is replaced by the word "may". In section after section we find that, so far as policy and administrative powers are concerned, the board is not a policy making or administrative board at all. It is a political stooge of the government in power. If those hon. members who are now giving vent to sarcastic laughter have read the provisions of the bill they will know that the wording is "may", subject, almost without exception, to approval of the governor in council. I have to speak on the principle of the bill and I shall speak on the principle of "may" and "shall".

When we come to the real purpose and principle of the bill, the powers and the policies of the board, we find that on page six of the bill there is provision as to orders and decisions of the proposed board and that any decision or order of the national energy board may, for the purpose of enforcing thereof, be made a rule, order or decree of the exchequer court or of any superior court of any province. An order, decree or decision of the board is only permissive from the point of view of enforcement thereof by the exchequer court or any other court. Having made a decision, order or decree we find that under the principle of the section the board may review, rescind, change, alter or vary any order or decision. But that is subject to—the governor in council. We find, as we go through the bill that the same thing applies to almost all the regulations and administrative powers of this new, proposed board.

When it comes to what I presume is the major principle in the bill, that is the power of issuance of certificates for pipe lines and international power lines, we find that the bill does not say the board shall be able to issue a certificate for a pipe line or international power line. No, it says the board may, subject to the approval of the governor in council, issue a certificate for a pipe line or international power line. Not only has the board not the power within itself to deal with the purposes for which we understood this bill would be introduced, but under the provisions of this bill they cannot even revoke or suspend any licence which they grant with the permission of the governor in council except with the approval of the governor in council. They cannot issue a licence without approval, and they cannot revoke or suspend a licence without approval.

I say that this principle of "may" makes the board subject at all times to the governor in council and makes it a political stooge and not a policy making or administrative board. We heard much from the minister when he spoke on this bill, and we read about the principle underlying this bill as contained in the explanatory note which I read a few minutes ago, indicating that the board shall have the power to make orders with respect to traffic, tolls and tariffs. But what does the bill say? The bill says that the board may make orders with respect to matters relating to tolls, traffic and tariffs.

If the government is sincere in the purpose for which this bill is introduced, will they kindly explain why, in connection with a major purpose which is tolls on gas and oil, the bill merely says in clause 50 that the board may do this. Why is everything subject to the governor in council and political expediency control? I do not think any of us in this group or amongst the general public expected that kind of bill to be introduced by this government. This principle goes all the way through the bill, that the board may make orders with respect to traffic, tolls and tariffs, but under governor-in-council control.

Once again I might say, as I did a few minutes ago, when it comes to the issuance of certificates for oil pipe lines, if this board wants to disallow or reconsider the issuance of a certificate it is a question of "may", not a question of "shall". This board does not have very definite administrative powers. So, we go all the way through this bill to the section dealing with the transmission of oil and the principle in this bill is that if the board has something important to do in connection with the transmission of oil, the board may, if it considers it necessary or desirable to do so in the public interest, require a company to do so and so. If the board finds, in the words of the bill, it is necessary or desirable to do something in the public interest, then why should the bill say that the board may take certain action? Surely, it should be that the board shall, in the public interest, exercise its power.

As it is in connection with the transmission of oil, so is it in connection with the transmission of gas. Once again we find that if the board finds action necessary or desirable in the public interest it may take certain action. Surely, if honesty, sincerity and integrity mean anything to this government, then if it is in the public interest and if it is advisable for the board to do something the bill should provide that it shall be done, not that it may be done. All the way through, in section after section, when we come to the powers of the board under this bill there is no provision that they shall do things in the public interest; it says they may do something in the public interest. Whether or not the board may do something in the public interest is not determined by the board, but by the governor in council. I do not believe I have ever read a bill drafted in the way this one is.

If you want to go through the bill clause by clause until you come to the provision for the transmission of gas in clause 61 you will find that when it comes to the equalization of the differential between costs, if the board finds it a right thing to do, then they may take certain action. It is not that they shall, but that they may. Mr. Speaker, I say that in legal terminology the words that mean so much are "shall" and "may". The proof of the sincerity of the government moving a bill of this nature is also found in the terms "shall" and "may". A reading of this bill now before us shows that in small things like the salary of the members, how many members there can be and how long they can continue to hold office, the word "shall" is used. These are very important provisions, I realize, and the government must have given a great deal of thought to them. However, when it comes to the major provisions of the bill concerning the powers of the board itself, it is always "may" and almost without exception, subject to the governor in council.

As I said at the outset, I find myself very keenly disappointed in this bill. We had looked forward to a real bill establishing a national energy board that would have authority, that would have the powers of administration and investigation, that would have everything permissible which would enable them to do a task which is a basic requirement and an immediate necessity for Canada, that is develop a real national energy policy covering every province of our nation and all the resources which are capable of the production of energy. This bill represents a start. All I can say is it ought to be able at least to crawl if it cannot walk or run. We hope that before this bill passes, with the knowledge of modern science, the knowledge of modern medicine, the knowledge of the new economists, that somehow or other the minister who introduced this bill will give it a hypodermic and bring it to life.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, it may be a surprise to some of the members of this house to hear me speak on gas and oil. However, I should like to inform the house at the outset that gas, particularly dry gas, is of great interest in my constituency. Throughout the past half dozen years there have been established throughout the eastern part of Alberta numbers of settlements which have sprung up primarily owing to the gas industry. In some places there is a considerable amount of oil. I therefore feel that I should perhaps say something in this debate.

I noticed that the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) asked the question, "Why spring this on us in 48 hours?" I am certain that the people in my constituency and the people in Alberta generally would not think that this government has sprung this on anybody in 48 hours. The Borden commission sat and looked into the gas industry and studied it. It was announced in the speech from the throne that an energy board would be set up. I cannot see where the hon. member gets the idea that only 48 hours' notice was given. It appears to me that he had at least four months' notice.

Then the hon. member goes on and wants to refer this matter to a committee. He refers to the recommendation in the first report of the Borden commission. I am certain a great deal of study has been given to this matter. By sending it to a committee there would just be a great deal of repetition of what has gone on before.

When the Borden royal commission was set up it was instructed to look into the policies that would best serve the national interest in relation to the export of energy and sources of energy in Canada, the problems involved, and the extent of the authority that might be best conferred on a national energy board. In brief, that was what the commission was to study. It was also pointed out that the Borden report contained 34 recommendations. Some hon. members who have already spoken have said that the Borden report was not considered. As was pointed out, 23 of the recommendations were accepted.

In setting up the Borden commission this government was not necessarily saying that it would accept every recommendation which the commission brought forward. I think they have given a great deal of study to this matter. I commend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) for the great amount of work he has put into this bill and the considerable amount of work that went into the drafting of it. I certainly think that the recommendations in the Borden report are evident in the drafting of this bill.

First of all, the Alberta conservation board have said they have a surplus of gas. Then the energy board will have to study the matter and see whether Canada has a surplus. In the report I think it is suggested that it has a surplus. I hope that in the near future we can export that gas. However, as was pointed out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, before any gas can be exported, the federal power commission of the United States will have to consider the question of whether they want to import gas. As the minister pointed out on May 18, a great deal of work has been done with the federal power commission in the United States in trying to bring about a flexible arrangement and one mutually satisfactory to the two parties. I sincerely believe that things will work out and that we shall export gas in the near future.

There are some who believe that the energy board, when it is set up, should control the exact profits of the industry. To anybody who believes that such a board should control the exact profits of an industry in which so much risk is involved, may I say that such a procedure might prove to be detrimental to the rest of Canada. It might have the general effect of slowing up the development of that natural resource which is the source of so much wealth and with which this country is so abundantly endowed. I would say that a great deal of consideration and study should be given to the matter before any thought was given to controlling the exact profits a company might make. Anyone who has had any experience with wells or has watched a number of wells being sunk in Alberta will know that there is a great deal of risk and a great deal of expense in connection with the drilling of wells and the finding of dry holes.

I see no objection to setting up the tolls on the gas lines. I think it is a good step. I do not think this procedure will in any way hinder the development of this industry. This government has provided for the setting up of an energy board. I think it is a good step. The board should consider the protection of Canadian interests. I am not a lawyer, but on looking over section 44 of the act, in connection with certificates of public convenience and necessity in the construction and operation of pipe lines, I find the following:

44. The board may, subject to the approval of the governor in council, issue a certificate in respect of a pipe line or an international power line if the board is satisfied that the line is and will be required by the present and future public convenience and necessity, and, in considering an application for a certificate, the board shall take into account—

It then goes on to list five things which it shall take into account. One of them which has been evident in today's debate is found in paragraph (d) which reads as follows:

(d) the financial responsibility and financial structure of the applicant, the methods of financing the line and the extent to which Canadians will have an opportunity of participating in the financing, engineering and construction of the line;

I think this legislation sets out clearly that the interests of the Canadian people will be protected before any certificates are granted to any pipe line, and that they will certainly take a close look at the financial structure of those pipe lines. I may be wrong, but in section 47 the bill goes on to provide as follows:

47.(1) Subject to subsection (2), the board may by order, with the approval of the governor in council, revoke or suspend a certificate if, in the opinion of the board, the person to whom it was issued has violated or failed to comply with any term or condition thereof.

I think it is set out clearly that we shall have a certain amount of control over the financing, that there will be regard for Canadians and that there will be an opportunity for Canadians to participate in the financing of a given pipe line.

In the province of Alberta a surplus of gas has been declared. Right now the industry is waiting to see whether gas can be exported to the United States. As I said before, the federal power commission of the United States must first grant permission before any gas can come into the United States. As a resident of Alberta and of my own constituency I know that this could well mean a great deal more activity, a great deal more employment and a great deal more development in Alberta. I hope that in the near future we shall export gas.

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, one of the first questions which comes to the mind of any member of this house who is interested in the subject of energy is this: Why has it taken the government so long to introduce the legislation now under consideration? Those who have followed the matter recall all too vividly the words of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he spoke in Toronto on February 4, 1957. Here is what he said when speaking to the annual dinner of the Toronto board of trade:

There is a need now for the setting up of a Canadian national energy board.

Then I shall skip a few words referring to the composition of the board and again quote the Prime Minister:

—to the end that the most effective use of the energy resources of Canada in the interests of the public welfare may be assured. We have vast resources of gas and oil and coal and uranium. I believe that the time has come to set up such a board whose duty it would be to advise and recommend proposals regarding these resources so that they may be safeguarded from prejudicial action now, ill-timed action to the detriment of this and future generations.

I want, Mr. Speaker, to draw attention to the Prime Minister's use of the word "now" for the setting up of a national energy board, and his further expression that the time has come to set up such a board. That was a call for immediate action. Four days after he had spoken in Toronto the Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, spoke in the House of Commons, and again expressed the view that there was a need for the setting up of a Canadian energy board. In this regard I would like to quote from Hansard for February 11, 1957, page 1159. This is what the Prime Minister had to say at that time:

In order to meet the industrial demands of Canada's future there is a need, as is set forth in the Gordon commission report, for the setting up of a Canadian energy board with a membership composed of technical personnel which might be selected by the ministers of the departments particularly interested and also by the president of the national research council. Upon that committee as well there should be representatives of industry and of the dominion and provincial governments to the end that the most effective use of the energy resources of Canada in the interests of public welfare may be assured.

So it is perfectly clear that at that time, in February, 1957 the present Prime Minister believed in and actively advocated immediate action to set up an energy board. In the circumstances it was not unreasonable, when parliament met in October, 1957, that hon. members fully expected that at the opening of parliament the speech from the throne would forecast legislation to implement the policy advocated by the Prime Minister and to establish a special board to deal with energy in all its forms. However, the speech from the throne made no mention of legislation to create such a board despite the statement of the Prime Minister in February of 1957 both in and outside the House of Commons that the time had come to set up an energy board.

But on the following day, October 15, 1957 the Prime Minister announced the setting up, not of an energy board but of a royal commission to inquire into the policies which would best serve the national interests in relation to the export of energy and sources of energy in Canada. This commission, the Borden commission as it is popularly called, was also directed to make recommendations as to the extent of authority which might best be conferred on a national energy board. The terms of this commission will be found in Hansard of October 15, 1957. To say the least, Mr. Speaker, this was a strange way of making progress. The Prime Minister had advocated the immediate setting up of the board in February, 1957, but by October of that year it seemed necessary to ask the Borden commission to recommend the policies with regard to energy that would best serve the national interest and also to tell the government what powers and authority ought to be conferred upon that board.

It can justly be observed, I think, that the national energy board was put into a deep freeze, and though many observers understood that the unfreezing process would last until the election was over, not even the most cynical of these observers believed that it would take 19 months to unfreeze the board and bring it to life by formal legislation. It was not only the formation of the proposed board that was frozen over that long period. During that whole time the country, the members of this house, the public, the oil industry and investors generally, remained in complete ignorance of the policies which this government intended to follow as to the export of natural gas and energy in other forms, and indeed with respect to all forms of energy.

I have read with care what the minister said last Monday when he opened the debate on the resolution introducing the bill, and I find even yet no positive statements as to government policy on this very important aspect of the development of our natural resources. I find it even harder to understand that the minister, who spoke this morning, was not more precise in his words about the policies of the government than he was in his introductory speech when the resolution was before the house. Mr. Speaker, as we know, parliament was dissolved in February, 1958, and not unnaturally the subject of natural gas cropped up in the election.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

EXPORT FINANCE CORPORATION OF CANADA LIMITED

The house in committee on Bill No. S-17, to incorporate Export Finance Corporation of Canada Limited—Mr. Muir (Lisgar)—Mr. Rea in the chair.

[Mr. Brassard (Lapointe).]

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Chairman, in my remarks on second reading of this bill I endeavoured to set out in some detail the purposes in setting up this Export Finance Corporation. Today, however, I should like to discuss briefly the importance to Canada's export business of the credit facilities that will be offered by this proposed corporation.

Under present circumstances Canada is at a very serious disadvantage in a highly competitive export market in that many of her products have to be sold for cash. In many instances the sale of Canadian goods is limited to the amount of exchange available or to the credit offered by foreign lending agencies. In other words, we have been losing prospective customers because of our inability to provide the necessary long range credit.

The Export Credit Insurance Corporation which is a crown company will insure sales of Canadian exporters to the extent of 85 per cent of the value of such exports. It does not, however, make loans to exporters nor do we have any such lending facilities in Canada at the present time. The chartered banks are not generally interested in long term loans of this nature and the proposed export finance corporation will complement rather than compete with the chartered banks.

The Toronto Globe and Mail, commenting editorially on Canada's export position in the May 21 issue, had this to say:

> Two recent developments may help the situation. The throne speech which opened the present session of parliament revealed that amendments will be made to the Export Credit Insurance Act which will "increase the range and effectiveness of the guarantees provided for financing exports".
> The second development is the formation of the Export Finance Corporation of Canada, a private company whose bill of incorporation is now well on its way through parliament. The company would have a lending capacity of $500 million to expedite foreign trade, and would accept payment in several currencies.
> The new company should be given every encouragement. Whether it alone will be able to meet the demand for credit remains to be seen. If it does not, there is no reason why the government cannot establish its own credit agency. The United States, in addition to the government institutions, has about 35 private firms in the export credit business, so public and private agencies can work together in this field.
> The important thing is to establish credit facilities now, before it is too late.

The United States, in addition to the export-import bank, a government agency, has some 35 private firms in the export credit business, and other exporting countries have similar lending agencies. In order to put Canada on a competitive basis in her foreign trade it is necessary that we should have facilities such as are offered by the proposed Export Finance Corporation for extending long term credit for our exporters of manufactured and farm products. To be in the position to trade for less cash on the line, and more extended credit it should not be necessary that sales of our manufactured and primary products should depend on credit supplied by foreign lenders.

The banking and commerce committee was told that the sale of $28 million worth of Canadian wheat to Poland was financed by lenders in West Germany. With private Canadian capital willing to provide these funds, through the lending facilities of this proposed corporation, it would seem rather ridiculous to leave the extension of our export trade to the whims of foreign capital.

I did not intend to go into too much detail at this stage but one hon. gentleman opposite who was not present at the second reading stage of this bill asked me to refer to it in detail. I shall briefly set out the purposes of the bill and outline the type of service this corporation will provide.

In the first place it will provide credit assistance to Canadian exporters. This means the discounting of foreign trade papers received by Canadian exporters as a result of sales abroad. Such financing could be with or without export credit insurance and with or without recourse against the exporter as the case may be. Transactions which are eligible for export insurance could be negotiated with a minimum of formality and with speed. It is expected that this type of business will amount to 10 or 15 per cent of the total business transacted by the corporation. This estimate is arrived at on the basis of United States statistics and the experience in other countries.

There will also be credit assistance to foreign buyers of Canadian goods and services. This means the discounting of foreign commercial paper usually guaranteed as to the availability of the exchange and otherwise by the national bank of the exporter or supported by other forms of guarantees. Business of this type would constitute roughly 50 per cent of the financing activities of the corporation.

Commercial trade paper issued in accordance with the regulations in the respective countries and receiving the appropriate guarantee is a comparatively safe form of investment. For the most part commercial banks establish credits and make loans on the credit of the borrower. The corporation would depend mainly on collateral for its security. Thus a Canadian exporter with a capital of, say, $10,000 might negotiate an export order for $200,000 through the proposed corporation.

There would be participating financing. That means a transaction in which the corporation would participate with others such as Canadian and foreign banks, for example. The corporation would engage in project financing. Financing of this type would assist a Canadian manufacturer who might wish to establish a branch factory in a foreign country. The financing would be substantially limited to machinery and equipment and to goods and engineering services exported from Canada in connection with a project abroad.

In some cases exporters may sell provided they are willing to accept part or full payment in foreign currency. Such foreign currencies are usually convertible into dollars. The corporation in appropriate cases will guarantee dollars to the Canadian exporter where a foreign currency is stipulated in the payment terms. The major exporting countries of the world have facilities for financing exports on a long term basis in the categories indicated and such facilities do not yet exist to any degree in Canada.

It is characteristic of all commercial banks throughout the country that they do not engage in long term financing of the type envisaged by the proposed corporation. On the other hand private banks and syndicates of individual companies and special corporations constituted in the respective countries provide such facilities on a large scale. As I said before, the services of the proposed corporation will complement but will not compete with services provided by chartered banks. The corporation cannot successfully exist without assistance from the chartered banks in Canada.

This bill has had a thorough review, first in the committee on banking and commerce of the other place and then in the committee on banking and commerce of this house. In supporting this bill I am convinced it will serve a useful purpose in the pattern of our export trade.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, those persons in Canada concerned with our foreign trade will, I am sure, welcome this private bill and its passage by the Canadian parliament. It is perhaps rather elementary to stress the importance of our foreign trade in our economy and perhaps it is not proper to discuss in detail at the committee stage of a private bill the problems that beset our export trade. But it seems to me that our foreign trade today is in considerable jeopardy and beset with more than the usual problems which confront it, not only because of the organization of trade blocs in the world and the difficulties of exchange but also because of some internal matters within Canada.

Of course, one of those internal matters within Canada is the high cost of our exports, the high cost of the products that our exporters have to export. This is something that perhaps could better be discussed on the trade and commerce estimates. Perhaps it is not appropriate to discuss it here other than mentioning it.

But we have two other problems constantly confronting our exporters. One is the handicap in Canada of easily accessible information on the subject of shipping; that is from Canadian firms doing business in Canada. It is quite true that the information can be obtained, but we simply have not an abundance of Canadian firms in that kind of business with all the information readily available for any type of shipment and any type of shipper in any part of the country.

The other difficulty is a comparatively new one. It is the matter of giving the required credit which competition between exporters from the different countries require if we are to get the sale and this bill sets up a private corporation which can do much to meet that need. Many orders are now being lost to Canadian exporters, not because of the price, not because of shipping difficulties, not because of quality but because the Canadian producer or manufacturer is simply not able to grant the term of credit required to obtain the order. He cannot do this because he requires his own money to operate his own business and he can find no way of discounting his commercial paper. It is quite true that the banks do meet part of this need but they are necessarily and properly limited in the field in which they can operate, particularly in the short term requirements of bank lending.

It is also quite true that some finance companies have done a little to help in this area through indirect methods, but there is no Canadian corporation directly engaged in this business. So far as I am aware, this is the first Canadian corporation to come into this business. I think I am correct in that. I am sure that all members would, therefore, wish it well and recognize the need that it will meet.

This whole question of discounting paper for exporters is one that is very much a problem today in the export business, and this bill will undoubtedly go far to meet that need. I am quite sure that hon. members would welcome other corporations to come forward and carry on this enterprise. When I say that, I am not in any way detracting from my wishes for success of this corporation; but the field is so wide and there is such need in this field that it is to be hoped that not only will the business of this corporation expand rapidly but that others will come into the field.

As I work out the amount that this corporation will be able to do in this field I see that its capital setup is of the order of $50 million. I would take it that their lending capacity would probably, in the natural course of events, be about $400 million. Now, in terms of our export trade that is not a very big item. There is room for others and there is plenty of room for expansion of this corporation.

To me, it is a rather shocking thing that many of our export orders today are financed through other companies not operating either in the importing country or in the exporting country but in completely unrelated countries, and that volume of business is lost to our country as a whole. In addition to losing that business we have undoubtedly lost—and I am aware of no way of getting statistical information on this—a great number of orders because the financing of the transaction could not be arranged. It is something outside the field of the exporters' own activities to have export financing information pertaining to all countries in all continents of the world, and yet it is a very necessary service and one that can best be provided by experts, specialists, in that field.

Holding the very strong views that I do about the importance of our foreign trade, and appreciating the problems that beset it, and particularly this one of financing exports, I welcome this legislation and wish the corporation well. I am not well informed on the personnel of the incorporators. I have not too much information, but I understand they are quite reputable financial people of high calibre.

There was a little confusion in the committee about where the Export Credits Insurance Corporation fitted into this. It is unfortunate that there is some similarity in the names, but the Export Credits Insurance Corporation is in another field altogether. It is a crown corporation which was set up, as hon. members well know, at the end of the war to insure the risk of sales to countries that had been devastated during the war in an effort to help Canadian exporters retain markets that had been lost through the ravages of war. But the two corporations are fully complementary, one to the other. They in no way conflict. I can see no point of conflict between the two corporations. It is in some respects unfortunate that the names are so similar, particularly since one is a crown corporation and the other is a private corporation; but bearing in mind the fact that this corporation is to operate in foreign countries and therefore has to translate its name into many foreign languages, I see no way of overcoming that slight difficulty in the choosing of names, and I see no objection to it.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, according to the bill the objects of the corporation shall be:

> To finance and facilitate exports and imports and the exchange of goods and services between Canada and any nation of the commonwealth of nations or other nations, and between agencies or residents of Canada and such nations, or agencies or residents thereof.

I am sure no one can disagree with the purposes of this bill and the objects of the corporation, particularly in view of the fact that I read an item in the Toronto Star of May 20 of this year entitled:

> "Should Be Ashamed"
> West Germans Finance Our Wheat Exports
> A Montreal trust company executive said yesterday a $28 million sale of Canadian wheat to Poland is being financed by West Germany because appropriate credit facilities are not available in Canada.
> "We ought to be ashamed of ourselves," the commons banking and commerce committee was told by Stanley Stanger of the Guardian Trust Company of Montreal.

I quite agree with that gentleman's comment. We certainly ought to be ashamed of ourselves when we find such a situation. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I must say that we in this group regret that the government has not taken the initiative in this matter by introducing a bill to establish a government corporation to meet the need for export credits. However, this bill has been introduced by persons who recognize the need for this type of assistance to exporters and in all fairness I cannot but congratulate them on their initiative, incentive and enterprise in their effort to do what they can in this respect to meet the need. As the former speaker mentioned, I think it will require a great deal more than this bill to meet the need of Canadian exporters at this time.

During recent years, particularly during the last two years, there has been increased recognition of the fact that there must be an extension of facilities for the provision of credit to exporters from Canada. That was brought home to me very strongly during the last week when we heard representations, briefs and evidence from persons representing various sections of the pulp and paper and lumber industries of Canada. While, as the hon. member for Ottawa West said, this is not the occasion on a private bill to deal at length with Canada's trade situation and the serious position of many exporters, I think it is worth while to quote a paragraph or two from some of these briefs to indicate the situation of the exporters of our primary products at this time, particularly the pulp and paper people and the lumber industry.

We heard a most interesting brief from the Canadian lumbermen's association. Witnesses on behalf of this company outlined the situation of the industry because of loss of markets, declining markets overseas and competition from other countries and the need for credits to assist certain sections of the industry. I quote from page four of the brief:

> It would be possible to expand on the difficulties with which the timber industries of Canada are continually faced. Suffice it to say that any realistic investigation will quickly convince the investigator that conditions are becoming ever more difficult and that aid in rectifying present unsatisfactory conditions is urgently needed.

Then we heard another very interesting brief from the woodlands section of the Canadian pulp and paper association which dealt with the same question. They all emphasized the difficulties of their industries in maintaining markets abroad, and on page two of their brief they bring that to the attention of the committee in this way:

> Our share of the world's markets declined substantially in the recent period of world pulp and paper expansion. Here again, the facts can be seen in reports of the dominion bureau of statistics, and we would be glad to make them available to you.

Then they go on to say:

> We believe it should be a matter of great concern to the government of Canada that these trends be halted, as otherwise there will be serious inevitable losses to our future economy.

Then there was a brief in which I was particularly interested which was submitted by the forest industry associations of British Columbia. It is interesting to me that adversity always drives people together. I believe this is the first time in the history of Canada that all sections of the pulp and paper and lumber industries of British Columbia have presented, as it were, a united brief to the government of Canada or to a committee of this house. The persons who presented this brief, which is an excellent one covering very fully the problems of all the lumber industries in British Columbia, dealt at length with the problems of overseas markets, increasing competition and lack of export credits. I quote briefly from page 31 of the brief:

> In the field of pulp and paper our main concern is the decline of Canada's relative position in this important activity. It is substantial enough to give cause for alarm. We have lost over one million tons annual production not only to our chief competitor but also our chief market. We earnestly suggest that it would be in the interest of the national economy if all aspects of this decline were examined by the government and the feasibility of aggressive tax incentive policies was fully and carefully examined, as a method of overcoming some of the physical disadvantages that presently beset us.

Later we heard from a most interesting gentleman. I had never had the pleasure of meeting him before and I must say it was most refreshing to listen to his frank comments. In my opinion it is most refreshing to hear people say exactly what they think about certain questions even when you do not always agree with them. I enjoyed his testimony very much indeed. This gentleman dealt particularly with Canada's overseas trade position and emphasized the need for export credit. You must remember that the pulp and paper and lumber industries of Canada represent somewhere between 8,000 and 9,000 units but of these 8,000 to 9,000 units there are about 200 major concerns and the remainder are what we would term small industrial enterprises, which shows the large contribution they are making to the economy of the country. This gentleman dealt, with some heat on occasion, I admit, with our trade policies, our trade situation and the need for export credits and government action in this direction.

As I said previously, this bill is an attempt on the part of certain persons with initiative and enterprise to do something at least in a partial way to meet this growing need, and on that account we in this group support the bill. But the need is so great, as the member for Ottawa West mentioned, and the matter is of such urgency and importance that we believe it cannot be met in full and satisfactorily without action on the part of the government. Therefore we look forward to the introduction soon by the government of a measure that will provide for the establishment of a national corporation or agency that will satisfactorily meet the needs of our exporters and to that extent assist in the development of our overseas trade which is so important to Canada as a whole and so important to those persons who depend upon our export industries for their livelihood and welfare.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested in the remarks of the previous speakers, particularly those of the hon. member for Lisgar when he went into some of the background of the bill. This may not be too pertinent at the committee stage but it is more or less essential because unfortunately the minutes, testimony and findings of the banking and commerce committees of the house and of the other place which considered the bill have not been published. As a result, this is the only record there will be for succeeding parliaments to look back on.

It is well that all phases and aspects of this particular bill be considered, although you can see there is general agreement on all sides of the house that this measure will be of advantage to this country, and it has the endorsement of all parties. It is true that the hon. member for Vancouver East and his colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West, deplored the fact that it is not a government agency that is carrying out this purpose, but rather a private agency. A reading of the testimony given in the other place indicates that this corporation is backed by all the chartered banks of Canada, who are subscribers to it and who will bring their business knowledge and know-how to the operation of this corporation.

It is indicated also that this corporation will have behind it the facilities, and indirect aid, of one of the best banking systems in the world today. It is quite true, also, that a crown corporation could have been formed to assist in this particular manner, but this procedure is against the policy of Canada because it would set up further competition with private enterprise. A crown corporation, if formed, would probably receive many applications for development financing which would require the export of capital for labour and materials for development projects abroad. This is not the function of this corporation. The function of this corporation is to provide capital for lending to legitimate exporters. This capital would provide a revolving fund, as the hon. member for Ottawa West has said, of $50 million, and would most likely result in an effective fund of some $400 million. According to the witnesses, it is not $400 million but it will give an effective fund of some $500 million. It may well be that this fund will prove to be insufficient, but if it is I am sure the corporation will come back and request the right to have additional capital subscribed.

It has been pointed out that this corporation will be complementary to the Export Credits Insurance Corporation. It has been pointed out also, however, that the loans insured by the export credits insurance agency or corporation represent only 10 per cent to 15 per cent of the total business which will be done by the Export Finance Corporation. Over 50 per cent of the business will be done in the form of contracts which are outside of the present range of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, although it may well be that as changes are made in that act some of these trading transactions will be brought within the ambit of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation.

Internationally Canada is recognized as an island of freedom in a sea of trade control. Other than our commonwealth tariff agreements we shun all bilateral and regional trading and payments arrangements. Canada's foreign trade is in the hands of independent traders and companies, free from restrictive government controls. On the other hand, a very large number of countries in the world today negotiate exportable surpluses against required imports. These negotiations may be in the form of bilateral trade agreements, as the hon. member for Ottawa West has pointed out; they may be in the form of regional payments agreements, or they may be even special financial arrangements, as for example those of the United States through the United States export-import bank.

The problem with which our exporters have been faced is how to get around this dilemma without seriously compromising our economic principles of freedom of international trade and trade payments. This is a principle that we do not want to compromise because it is that principle of freedom of trade, freedom within the nation, that has led Canada, with its rather small population, to the position of the fourth trading nation in the world today. It is estimated that one out of five Canadians is dependent for his living upon export trade. The problem is, therefore, how to keep the advantages we now have and yet to leave our position on the fringe of this ring of countries which follow this method of negotiated trade agreements and enter into that circle in at least a limited form. If we do this, we will then have the best of both arrangements.

As I said before, all our chartered banks are shareholders in this corporation, so we will have immediately within this corporation the know-how of effective leadership to make the corporation a functioning entity almost right away. This is better than a government scheme because it is more flexible, more able to change with changing conditions than a government institution. The capital and borrowing power of the corporation will have one, and only one, objective and that is the promotion of export trade. There will be no special considerations in regard to the transactions the corporation undertakes. The only consideration will be, what is the risk and how best to meet it in all prudence to protect themselves, and what is a fair profit for the risk that they undertake.

The corporation will work in the closest cooperation with the Department of Trade and Commerce, of course, through commercial councillors of the department, through Canadian ambassadors and through liaison with the government within Canada. This corporation, without being tied by government policy and by government restrictions, will, I am sure, have the backing of the government in any way that they may require it. Examples have been cited of the opportunities which Canada has lost because we have lacked facilities such as these. One witness, Mr. Hurter, of an internationally known engineering firm, president of Stadler, Hurter & Company and Stadler Hurter International Limited, of Montreal, gave other examples. As I said before, the minutes of the committee were not printed, but I should like to put some of these examples on the record.

He pointed out that a project for Egypt calling for approximately $10 million of machinery and certain services was not bid upon by Canada because of the credit terms required. The contract was awarded to Krupp of Essen, Germany, based on 5½ years credit at 5¾ per cent interest. It was noted that Krupp would furnish only three items of equipment to an approximate value of $90,000, and the remainder would be subcontracted to other firms. Mr. Hurter said all of this equipment could have been purchased in Canada.

The second project was in Brazil, and although he does not mention the company I think it is a Canadian owned company which would naturally want to buy in Canada. The company could not do so because of the credit requirements. The value of this order would have been approximately $12 million, and 85 per cent of all machinery and equipment was purchased in Italy. Only approximately $50,000 worth was purchased in Canada, and strictly on a cash basis against shipping documents.

Again, Mr. Hurter pointed out that on a visit to Chile he was asked if he could obtain all the equipment and machinery and services as listed in the feasibility report prepared by his office on credit terms from Canada or any other country. Chile would raise the balance of the capital for the purchase of land, construction costs, railroad facilities, labour cost for installation of equipment. The value of this contract, according to Mr. Hurter, would be around $17 million. Credit was required which could not be secured in Canada. He goes on to point out that these same conditions prevailed in Mexico.

Incidentally, this corporation would undoubtedly be dealing with foreign government agencies which in effect are extensions of foreign governments. In effect, through the powers which they are asking for, they can even lend money to foreign governments in the way of financing Canadian exports.

With regard to this particular project in Mexico, the Canadian firms were able to manufacture the equipment required. They supplied bids. But because again of credit the orders went to other countries. Mr. Hurter went on to point out several other examples.

I know that last year when I was in Rio de Janeiro representing this house at the interparliamentary union, commercial counsellors at our embassy pointed out several cases of very large orders which might have come to Canada if the requirements of the Brazilian government could be met. Brazil is on strictly a bilateral trade agreement, using barter deals. There was no way in which we could take advantage of the offerings. There was a question of railroad equipment, rolling stock, steel rails and so on. There was also the question of Canadair selling certain planes, and sending parts for a certain number more of this particular type of aircraft and eventually the project was to manufacture the last 57 in Brazil. I believe that particular project is still open. But the whole point was this. How could it be financed? Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think that in this proposed bill to set up this company, we have a means by which we can take advantage of those deals which will be of advantage to this country.

Incidentally I may say that there will be many projects which this corporation will turn down because they would not be good business deals. But since it is their object to do as much business as they can, to make a fair profit and actually to give a service to our exporters—a service which they do not have at this time—I believe that it is perhaps the best method which could be evolved to take care of the conditions which prevail in certain nations in the world today whose markets we cannot now enter.

We have noticed that there has been a freeing of trade. There has been a reduction in currency restrictions. All of that is of help to us in our regular methods of having no restrictions on trade or payments. But there will still be a large number of countries, for a good many years yet, whose markets we shall be able to enter only by extensive credits and perhaps by negotiations of a nature which are not usual and normal in our regular trade channels.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could take a few minutes of the time of the committee, following the remarkably interesting speeches of the other members who have preceded me in the debate this afternoon on Bill No. S-17, coming as I do from a port which literally and actually relies on the export and import trade.

The first thing I should like to say in speaking on clause 1, on which I understand the discussion may be in very general terms, is that I welcome the fact that private interests have combined together to such public advantage. I think that too often we in parliament are expected to solve almost any problem under the sun within the confines of these walls without giving consideration to the fact that outside of this place flows the great stream of commerce and that there live men and women who can be somewhat remote from the perhaps pedestrian and bureaucratic ways in which government is run.

It is for that reason that I welcome the fact that Mr. Clement Tremblay, Mr. Thomas Edwin Hays and Mr. Stanley Stanger and apparently a great number of other people have been interested enough to combine together to incorporate the Export Finance Corporation of Canada Ltd. If it were not for people of this ilk, Mr. Chairman, I believe we would have reached the positive state a long time ago and that 1984 would not only be in front of us but would be here right now and would be here to stay. If we can interest more people in doing this sort of thing for the public weal, we are indeed performing a service for Canada.

On this general theme, may I say this. I had occasion to do some study a while back on the psychiatric make-up of the members of parliament. I thought that perhaps too many of us manifested a rather grave Caesar complex in which we felt that any problem in the world could be brought before us and could be solved within this chamber. I am glad to note that hon. members from all parties have in fact supported the Export Finance Corporation of Canada, Ltd. which is purely a private enterprise undertaking. I welcome the fact that even with the reservation noted by the hon. member for Kootenay West, all of us seem to be bent on taking the same road.

The objects of the corporation are set forth clearly in clause 5. I welcome again the suggestion that this corporation shall help to finance and facilitate exports and imports and the exchange of goods and services between Canada and, first of all, the nations of the commonwealth and, second, other nations. It seems to me that the people behind this corporation have shown great statesmanship, having regard to the purposes for which this corporation was formed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps before these bills get second reading a few words would be in order. The number of divorce bills before us this afternoon and the number which have been previously given second reading but have not yet gone through all of the processes of the House of Commons bring the total number which have been considered by the house to 274. It may be of interest to the house in considering its work before the wind-up of the session, which we all devoutly hope is not too far away, if I say that I am informed by the committee of the other place that they plan to cease the hearing of these cases some time around June 10 or June 15. I realize I am not in order at all when I make that particular statement, Mr. Speaker, but nonetheless it will undoubtedly be of interest to the house and I am sure that no one will quarrel with me or anybody else in the hope that we may so arrange our affairs that we can get through our work by July 1.

With reference to the cases which are before us this afternoon, they are no worse, and perhaps some of them are somewhat better, than the type of case we have considered earlier in this particular session.

Did the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) wish to ask a question?

Mr. McIlraith: No, I am sorry, I have no question to ask.

Mr. McCleave: Apparently there are some other interests in the House of Commons this afternoon, Mr. Speaker. I do apologize for interrupting the private conversation between members of the opposition and members of the treasury benches.

There is one contested case before us this afternoon. Oddly enough, of all the cases before us this afternoon and the cases which have been considered before, not one involves husbands who are domiciled in the province of Newfoundland. I think that is a significant thought in itself. Over past years I have noticed that Newfoundland cases tend to run to about 2 per cent of the total which are considered by parliament. This year, or at least in the first 274 cases this year, there have been no cases which can properly be called Newfoundland cases. In other words, the cases which have come before us for consideration are from the province of Quebec. So it is today that there are no Newfoundland cases among those we are considering.

As a sign of modern times in the automotive age, it may be noted with interest, if nothing else, that one of the cases involves a divorce on wheels: the offence complained of occurred in a motor car. I believe I mentioned earlier that another divorce bill, Bill No. SD-248, was a contested case. Apart from that, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing particularly interesting about the cases before us this afternoon.

Mr. Broome: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question. Has the hon. member any idea how many more cases will be coming before the private bills committee, or is that question out of order?

Mr. Speaker: That is a hypothetical and speculative question. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. McCleave moved that the bills be read the second time.

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to standing order 105, the said bills stand referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker, as it is now three minutes to six, it seems we cannot give a very full discussion to any other private bill, and with the permission of the house I would ask to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that we now call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. house leader indicate the business for Monday and as far as possible into next week as he can?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, we intend to go ahead with the debate on the national energy bill. Then we will take the items I mentioned last night: the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, the C.N.R. resolution and the bill amending the Bretton Woods Agreements Act. Members might also be prepared to give approval to the convention on the nationality of married women. The first item on today's order paper concerns amendments made by the Senate to the act providing for the appointment of parliamentary secretaries. The government is accepting the amendments and we will be bringing that matter on for consideration as well.

Mr. McIlraith: Will the business be taken in the order indicated by the minister?

Mr. Green: I am afraid I cannot be certain of that, Mr. Speaker. We will try to keep to that order.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 25, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE LATE JOHN FOSTER DULLES

TRIBUTES ON PASSING OF FORMER U.S. SECRETARY OF STATE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, while it is a most unusual thing to do, the passing of John Foster Dulles, the former secretary of state of the United States, has evoked feelings of world-wide sympathy, and I shall therefore share with the house the message I sent yesterday to President Eisenhower on behalf of the parliament of Canada and the Canadian people:

May I express the deep sympathy of the government and people of Canada on the death of the Honourable John Foster Dulles.

In his passing, the American people have lost one of the outstanding figures of our time, one whose years of devoted service as secretary of state crowned a long and distinguished career in many spheres of private and public endeavour. The world has lost at a critical time a great and steadfast personality, ever vigilant in the defence of freedom.

To Canadians, he was more than a renowned world statesman; he was a friendly neighbour who regularly turned to his island home in Canada for rest and inspiration.

Our thoughts are with you and the people of the United States as you mourn the loss of one whose counsel was of such distinction and whose labours were so unstintingly given. His refusal to spare himself even when in the grip of a fatal illness will stand for years to come as an example of personal courage and public dedication.

Please extend to Mrs. Dulles and the family the expression of Canada's sorrow at his passing.

I know that the house and all Canadians will join with me in paying tribute to Mr. Dulles' memory. I may add that at the funeral in Washington on May 27 the government and people of Canada will be represented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in associating our party with what the Prime Minister has just said, and particularly with his words of sympathy to Mrs. Dulles and the other members of the family, perhaps I may be permitted to read a few paragraphs from the statement I gave to the press yesterday when I heard the sad news of Mr. Dulles' death:

History will evaluate the contribution he made to the solution of international problems. But we do not need to wait for history to tell us that this contribution was a powerful, at times a decisive one, and one that had the highest purposes behind it. His illness, and now his death, has left a vacuum in the direction of the foreign policy of his country, and indeed of the western coalition, which will not easily be filled.

He was a dedicated man and even his opponents could not but admire his courage, determination and capacity. He discharged his responsibilities with an unflagging zeal and a single-minded devotion that was beyond praise. He fought for what he believed with the intensity of a crusader and the skill of a great advocate.

He would have been a powerful and respected figure in the diplomacy and policy of any country he represented. As a spokesman of the most powerful state in the world, his was often the dominating voice. It never weakened in the pursuit, through policies in which he passionately believed, of freedom and security in the world as the foundation of peace. Those who worked with him to reach this goal, even though they may not have agreed with everything he said or did, will pay tribute to his sincerity of purpose, his clarity of mind and his magnificent courage, as they lament his passing at this time.

The free democracies have lost a great champion, whose like we shall not see again.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we in the C.C.F. wish to be associated with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in sending to Mrs. Dulles, their two sons, and the members of the Dulles family our sincere sympathy at the time of the passing of John Foster Dulles. He spent his life very largely in the service of the state department of the United States. Since the time he became secretary of state all have acclaimed his zeal, his strong will, and his complete devotion to that task.

The members of the C.C.F. movement in Canada, Mr. Speaker, have not always agreed with the policies put forward by John Foster Dulles, but we have admired his bravery throughout his life and particularly his great courage in fighting the dread disease of cancer which finally conquered him. Though we have not always agreed with his policies, we respected him as a western leader who put forward his views believing them to be right in the light of the many problems and trials confronting the world from time to time. We associate ourselves with this message of sympathy from Canada to the President of the United States and to the family.

ATOMIC ENERGY

AGREEMENT WITH U.S. ON USE FOR MUTUAL DEFENCE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement at this time in regard to an agreement signed on May 22 in Washington between the Canadian and United States governments providing for co-operation between the two countries on the uses of atomic energy for mutual defence purposes. I trust that the house will grant me leave to make this statement. An announcement concerning this agreement is being made simultaneously in Washington. Copies of the agreement will be available in the joint parliamentary distribution branch in both languages.

This agreement will enable Canada to take advantage of the amendments made last year to the United States atomic energy act, and therefore continue and extend the degree to which co-operation in this field has been carried out under the agreement for co-operation regarding atomic information for mutual defence purposes signed in Washington on June 15, 1955, and the amendment to the civil agreement which was signed on June 26, 1956.

Under the terms of the United States act, as members of the house know, agreements for co-operation on the uses of atomic energy for mutual defence purposes must lie on the table of the joint committee on atomic energy of the United States congress for a period of 60 days after signature. It is expected, therefore, that this agreement will come into effect in approximately that period of time.

It might be helpful if I were to draw the attention of the house to the main features of this agreement, and in that connection I will use the language of the agreement. It will permit the exchange of information necessary to the development of defence plans; the training of personnel in the employment of and defence against atomic weapons and other military applications of atomic energy; the evaluation of the capabilities of potential enemies in the employment of atomic weapons; the development of delivery systems compatible with the atomic weapons which they carry; research, development and design of military reactors to the extent and by such means as may be agreed.

Provision is made for the transfer to Canada under mutually agreeable conditions of such non-nuclear parts of atomic weapons systems involving restricted data as are jointly determined to be necessary to improve the state of training of Canada's armed forces and the operational readiness of those forces. Finally, the way will be opened for the transfer at some future time to Canada of military reactors and any special nuclear materials required for them. Because of the sensitive nature of the information and materials which will be exchanged and transferred under this agreement, certain appropriate safeguard provisions have been included.

I feel certain that the co-operation which will be carried out under this agreement will be of substantial benefit to Canada, not only in the training of our armed forces, in the development of defence plans and in the improvement in our military state of readiness and our equipment, but also in enabling Canada's armed forces better to play their part in the defence of North America and the free world.

I trust this agreement will be carried out in the same spirit which has marked the harmonious relations which have always existed between Canada and the United States on atomic energy matters.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to imagine an agreement on a more important subject than the one which the Prime Minister has just read to the house. I have heard it, as have other hon. members, for the first time. I would not wish to make any comment on it without the most careful consideration. Its importance certainly warrants that consideration.

However, from what the Prime Minister has said I gather that the co-operation which is visualized between the two governments in the field of atomic weapons does not extend to the transfer of control from the United States to Canadian sources of any atomic weapons which might be manufactured in the United States and be made available to the Canadian forces for tactical or defence purposes. That, of course, is an extremely important limitation—if indeed it is a limitation—in this agreement.

As I say however, the whole matter is of such great importance that I would not wish to make any further comment on it at this time.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this is undoubtedly one of the most important announcements that has been made in this chamber for a long time. It is most difficult, without any prior notice, to be able to state one's position immediately on such an important and complicated matter. However, the principles which guide us in looking at such documents are well known. We are interested, of course, in defence. We are interested in the protection of the integrity of Canadian sovereignty. We shall study this agreement with great care and we shall comment on it after such study in the interests of not only Canada's defence but, of even greater importance, in the interests of the peace of the world.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

WELLAND CANAL—STATEMENT ON PROGRESS IN CLEARING VESSELS

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, because of the general interest that has been shown in this matter I feel sure that all hon. members will be interested to learn that good progress has been made in clearing through the Welland canal the accumulation of vessels that developed after the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway. When I visited the Welland canal two weeks ago today there was an accumulation of 40 upbound vessels waiting to enter the canal at Port Weller. The number had been reduced to five this morning; two ocean-going ships anchored in the lake reported to be waiting for pilots and three ships in Port Weller harbour, one ocean-going and two North American. There are no vessels awaiting entry or being delayed from entering the downbound channel at Port Colborne.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT ON U.S. INTERFERENCE WITH CANADIAN TRUCKS IN TRANSIT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on May 20 the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway asked me a question, and at that time I promised to give a report, as soon as definite information was available, as to the possibility of the United States authorities lifting the restrictions recently applied to Canadian trucks carrying goods in bond through United States territory.

I am glad to report, as has been indicated in the press, that the United States authorities have lifted these restrictions. Official notification of this decision was received by the Canadian embassy in Washington on May 22. I may add that the government, and I am sure this house, welcomes this helpful action by the United States which reflects a willingness to co-operate in the solution of our joint commercial problems.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE SALARIES FOR ADDITIONAL JUDGES

Hon. Howard C. Green (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Judges Act to provide salaries for three additional puisne judges of the superior court of Quebec, for two additional judges of the supreme court of British Columbia and for two additional judges of the supreme court of Alberta.

TERM 29, TERMS OF UNION, NEWFOUNDLAND

Motion No. 110—Mr. Carter:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I might say in this connection that there is just the one letter, and that letter was included in the documents produced in response to a recent motion made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, on this subject I wonder if I might be permitted to ask the Prime Minister if that is the only document in that other return, because it was the only one which reached my desk.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Whatever documents were produced were the only ones.

Mr. Speaker: In the circumstances referred to by the Prime Minister would the hon. member wish to withdraw this motion? Is it the pleasure of the house that this motion be dropped?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion dropped.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—BENEFITS TO CANADIANS IN BORDER STATES

Motion No. 111—Mr. Racine:

MINUTES OF MEETINGS, UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Motion No. 112—Mr. Caron:

For a copy of the minutes of the several meetings of the unemployment insurance advisory committee convened on August 19, 1958.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I have given this motion careful consideration, and in view of the fact that minutes of this sort have been considered as privileged documents, and because if such a practice were indulged in it would undermine the work of all such committees, I cannot accept it.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Will the minister not give consideration to the fact that he tabled—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but this motion is not debatable under the rules unless the matter is deferred for debate, and in these circumstances it is my duty to put the motion.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Caron), which was negatived on the following division:

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR MINUTES OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE MEETING ON AUGUST 19, 1958

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour how he justifies the refusal of the government to table the minutes of the meeting of the unemployment insurance advisory committee convened on August 19, 1958—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking about a matter that has been determined by the house within the last few minutes. It is therefore a matter that is decided. On what basis would such a question be in order?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What I am asking, Mr. Speaker, is why the Minister of Labour saw fit to table the minutes of the unemployment insurance advisory committee of July 24 and 25, 1950, under the previous regime, when he refuses to table the minutes of a meeting of the unemployment insurance advisory committee in this instance.

Mr. Speaker: I understand what the hon. member is asking. What I am interested in knowing is how it could be in order to ask such a question at this time. It is purely an argumentative question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, surely I am entitled to ask the Minister of Labour—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless the hon. member can cite some authority for the propriety of the course he is seeking to follow I would ask him not to pursue it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I would submit what is perhaps the best authority, and that is a statement containing the actual words of the minister.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. I understand that the hon. member is trying to argue with the minister about a decision he expressed before the vote was taken on the basis of some other decision taken at an earlier time. I do not think it is in order to ask such a question at this stage. It may be in order to refer to it on the estimates or at some other time, but to my mind it is not the type of question that should be asked on orders of the day and I ask the hon. member not to pursue it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You ask me not to pursue it, but with your permission I should like to pursue it because it is a matter that involves the rights of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: There are ways of dealing with the rights of parliament, but my decision is that it is not proper to ask this question on the orders of the day.

[Later:]

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. As reported at page 3869 of Hansard the minister said this:

> Yes, I believe it is a reasonable request, but my suggestion to the effect that there is a routine procedure to be followed is also reasonable.

This is my question. Would the minister tell me how he could change his mind so quickly?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member heard a previous attempt to introduce the same form of argumentive question, and—

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, which I think affects all members of the house. On May 21 in connection with the matter to which my hon. friend has just referred, a question arose and it resulted in an inquiry by the hon. member of the minister as to what procedure should be followed to get certain information. The hon. member was told how to get that information, and because he was given that advice he himself did not pursue the matter further.

We now find that in attempting to get the information by that method, we cannot secure it because the government will not give it. I think that is a question of privilege. If the minister had not taken the stand he did the other day the matter would have been pursued then. We have now been foreclosed from getting that information from the government.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure where the previous attempt to get information took place. Was it in committee?

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I did not make myself clear, Mr. Speaker. It was on May 21, on the orders of the day, as reported at page 3869 of Hansard, when the hon. member asked the minister whether he would table the minutes of a certain unemployment advisory committee meeting. The minister replied that that was a reasonable request but that there was a proper procedure to follow in getting that information. He made the request that that procedure should be followed, as a reasonable request, and it was followed by my hon. friend. As a result we have been foreclosed from getting the information from any source. The minister therefore misled the house, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I suppose that if the minister had given an undertaking to produce the document it might have been a matter of privilege. But as the Leader of the Opposition recites what took place, I take it that the minister suggested that a motion be made for a return, something which has been done, and the house has now decided not to order the production of the document. I do not see how there can be any possibility of a question of privilege with regard to the house's decision. I would say that no question of privilege really arises at the present time.

Mr. Caron: Speaking to the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say that on that date I was misled by the minister. From the way in which he spoke—"I believe it is a reasonable request"—I thought it would be given if I went through the ordinary channel to get the answer. If the minister had not led me to believe that he would give the information we would have pursued the matter at the time. Because the minister misled me at the time and refused the information today, we are denied the privilege of discussing the matter in the house. I believe this is a question of privilege for the members of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Deprived of debate by trickery.

Mr. Speaker: There cannot very well be any question of privilege arising out of a vote freely taken in the house. I do not see how the hon. member can raise the point now. It is perhaps unfortunate that he did not pursue the matter on the earlier occasion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: As far as I am concerned the question of whether or not the document in question should be produced has been determined finally by a vote of the house. If there is anything to be made of what took place on an earlier occasion, it is any hon. member's privilege to raise the matter, of course, and to ask the house to deal with it.

Mr. Caron: The question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I should like to hear from the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will withdraw the statement he made a moment ago. I know it followed in the course of another statement that was not in keeping with the position of the Leader of the Opposition, when he said that the minister had misled the house.

Mr. McIlraith: Sure he did.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West is at his best when he is sitting down and keeping quiet. I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate should withdraw his statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the Prime Minister say what he would like withdrawn?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would think that the hon. member being about to write the history of Mr. King, and having—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid the Prime Minister is introducing another point of order in the middle of the first one. The Prime Minister is asking for a statement to be withdrawn. If he would allow me to deal with the first matter, then I would—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, will you allow me to finish now?

An hon. Member: A special privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have sat here quietly listening to all these slurs based on nothing more than imagination. I was asking that the hon. member withdraw the statement he made a moment ago that there was trickery in what had actually taken place. I suggest that statement is not in keeping with the responsibility of the house, however far the Leader of the Opposition goes in that direction.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister was allowed to finish his observations perhaps I might be permitted to say a word, because he asked me if I would withdraw—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Pearson: —the statement that the minister had misled the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, I did not ask that.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, you will recall that the Prime Minister did say that to me. I said the minister had misled the house. I did not say the minister had knowingly misled the house, because the minister would not do that; but the minister did mislead the house unwittingly by taking the stand on May 21 to which I have referred, in which he advised an hon. member of this house of the procedure to be followed in order to secure certain information. In accepting that advice the hon. member let the matter drop.

Having taken that advice, the minister and the government now have refused to give the information asked for in accordance with the procedure which the minister himself stated was reasonable. That is why I said the minister had misled the house in the advice he had given the hon. member last Friday, and I do not withdraw that observation.

Mr. Speaker: It has been raised as a matter of privilege that the Minister of Labour—I take it he is the minister referred to—has by his conduct offended the privileges of the house. What was said on the previous occasion is a matter of record in Hansard, as is also what has been said today. If there is any matter of privilege it is a privilege of the house, and is a matter for the house to deal with. Does the Minister of Labour wish to speak to the point?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the other day both the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Hull spoke to this matter. The hon. member for Hull requested that I table the minutes of the meeting which was held on August 19, 1958, and the member for Essex East asked whether it was a reasonable request. I said it was a reasonable request. Any request is a reasonable request; but it is still a decision for the minister to make whether such documents will be submitted. I pointed out to the hon. member for Hull that there was a procedure in this house under routine proceedings and orders of the day under the heading "Notices of Motions for Production of Papers".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, before you go any further on this matter, may I ask if you do not think that not only the privilege of a private member is involved here but also the privileges of this house? The Minister of Labour tabled the minutes of certain meetings which were held in July, 1950. The minister was not asked to table those minutes; he did so voluntarily. Then when requested to table the minutes of the advisory committee meeting on August 19 last he said that he could not table those minutes because they were privileged documents. Surely that statement cannot be correct unless it also applies to the minutes of the other meetings which he voluntarily tabled, and I suggest that the minister owes it to the house to explain.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is now getting on to a different point. The question of privilege which was raised by the Leader of the Opposition relates to the conduct of the Minister of Labour on a previous occasion, which I take it is asserted becomes a matter or privilege by reason of the decision which the Minister of Labour announced to the house today.

Mr. Starr: I think, Mr. Speaker, this will probably explain the situation. When I voluntarily tabled in this house four reports, I did so because the hon. member had asked me whether it was possible to have them tabled. If I had had any intention of tabling the minutes relating to all those reports I would have done so, but the hon. member will notice that out of the four reports only the minutes of one of the meetings were tabled.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But the minister tabled those.

Mr. Starr: Would the hon. member permit me to explain; unless he does not want an explanation, in which case I will sit down. The only reason those minutes were tabled was because they were attached inadvertently. They were stapled and tabled inadvertently, and the hon. member can take my word for that. If I had noticed that the minutes were attached to that one report I certainly would not have tabled them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I beg the right to say something now. The minister has said that he tabled the minutes of July 24 and July 25 inadvertently. If he makes that statement, of course under the rules of this house I must accept it. But since the minister has had ample opportunity to correct the situation and state that the minutes were tabled inadvertently, I can only conclude that his refusal to table the minutes is because the government is afraid to disclose their contents.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I think I must answer that charge. The hon. member has the report of the advisory committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I want the minutes.

Mr. Starr: The report highlights the discussions and the recommendations which went on in the course of the meeting and he has that information. Therefore he cannot possibly charge with any sense of honesty and decency that the government has anything at all to hide, because the report is tabled.

Mr. Speaker: I think this matter has been pursued far enough. There is no motion before the house. If there is a matter of privilege involved it can be raised in the proper way by a motion. I can see how the difficulty arose, but the explanations have been given by the minister and it is up to members to consider the matter from that point on, and I hope the matter will be dropped now.

However, the right hon. Prime Minister raised a question which I have not yet disposed of.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat the exact words. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made the statement that the house had been deprived of debate by trickery. All I would suggest is that in the interests of maintaining the decorum of the house, the hon. member do what I think members in general would expect him to do, namely withdraw the statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say "the house had been"; I made the exclamation, "Deprived of debate by trickery". We have certainly been deprived of debate; that is abundantly evident. Whether it was by trickery or by some other means, I imputed no motive to any individual. If Your Honour says it is wrong to say that the house has been deprived of debate by trickery or if Your Honour feels it is unparliamentary, I shall withdraw the word "trickery", but unless Your Honour says so I will not withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear the words, and I am not sure they went on record in Hansard. However, a request has been made for their withdrawal and it is clear, now, what was said. It is true that unless a statement is offensive in the sense that it charges a member with some reprehensible conduct related to him specifically, it is not unparliamentary; but I think in the circumstances, when the discussion related entirely to the conduct of the Minister of Labour, the inference is there, and I should feel much better if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would indicate that he was not charging the Minister of Labour with trickery.

Mr. Pickersgill: I never intended to charge the Minister of Labour with trickery. I am quite willing to withdraw the word "trickery" and say that we were deprived by maladroitness.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should now like to raise another point of order, and it is this. The Minister of Labour in referring to the hon. member for Essex East used the expression "if he has any sense of decency at all". Following the remarks which were made about the use of the word "trickery" I would say that the words "any sense of decency" implied that the hon. member for Essex East personally has no sense of decency. This is a direct charge against a named person, and I ask that those words should be withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: I will give the minister a chance to say what he has to say about that.

Mr. Starr: I do not recall the exact words. I think I said "If he had any sense of decency..."

Mr. McIlraith: We have been in considerable difficulty this afternoon with regard to rulings which are, by the very nature of things, difficult to make. This statement was made by the Minister of Labour in the heat of an announcement on a somewhat complicated question, and the point of order was raised immediately afterward. The minister charged the hon. member for Essex East with having no sense of decency, because he said that if the hon. member had any sense of decency he would not have said what in fact he did say. I fail to see any distinction between that direct personal remark reflecting on the character of an hon. member who was identified by name and the other somewhat general charge about what had been done.

Mr. Speaker: I have given the minister who made the offensive remark his opportunity to speak. It was, unfortunately, offensive, but many remarks are offensive though they are not unparliamentary. The reason I felt so strongly about the use of the word "trickery" was that it does involve an underhand and deceitful course of conduct, and if any hon. member accused another of that I would feel it proper to ask that the word be withdrawn. The other matter is, to my mind, not something I should insist upon.

IMMIGRATION

JEAN ORESTE VOLCY—REPORTED STATEMENT ON REASONS FOR LEAVING CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration arising out of a news report in this morning's Gazette to the effect that Mr. and Mrs. Volcy and their Canadian born daughter are now leaving Canada for the United States because, according to Mr. Volcy, they are tired of being watched by immigration officials, and that they would be permitted to remain in Canada if they were not coloured.

Would the minister care to comment on these statements and say what consideration is being given to cancellation of the deportation order so that a Canadian child will not be deprived of her birthright?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Assiniboia was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question and accordingly I have prepared a statement on this matter, which with the permission of the house I should like to present.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the answer is somewhat longer than is usual on orders of the day?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member permission to proceed with the answer?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Fairclough: Thank you. The facts of the case are as follows. Jean Oreste Volcy is a citizen of Haiti, 29 years of age. He entered Canada on September 6, 1951, at which time he claimed he was single and was destined to the Institut Agricole d'Oka, Quebec, to study agronomy. He remained at that institution until the end of March, 1952, and left the institution when he failed to pass his examinations.

He registered with the school of veterinary medicine in St. Hyacinthe, Quebec in September, 1952, but again failed to pass. On July 28, 1953 he registered with the school of textiles at St. Hyacinthe, Quebec, where he obtained a diploma in cotton weaving on June 13, 1956.

On May 29, 1956 he started working for Bathurst Containers as a take-off man. At that time he declared to his employers for income tax purposes that he had three dependents, i.e. a wife, Nicole, and two children, Jean age six, and Nicole age three, all of whom he claimed were residing in Montreal.

On June 18, 1956 he registered with the Institut Alie, Montreal, for a commercial course which was due to start in September of that year. According to a letter from the Institut Alie he quit his studies there about November or December, 1956, leaving an unpaid balance of $60.

In September, 1956 he had been granted an extension of stay in Canada to expire on September 1, 1957. On September 3, 1957 Mr. Volcy called at the Montreal immigration office and requested a further extension of stay in Canada stating he was registered with the Elie business college. It was subsequently established that he had registered at the Elie business college at the beginning of September, 1957 but did not present himself when courses started on September 9, 1957, and it has been confirmed that he never attended any courses at that institution.

When he applied for an extension of his temporary stay in September, 1957, Mr. Volcy stated that he was single and requested an extension on the basis that he was still a student. He definitely claimed he would never apply for permanent admission. He also denied being employed at that time. The requested extension was granted on the basis of the information furnished, but it was subsequently established that Mr. Volcy was not then single, nor was he a student, he was employed, and in fact he later applied for permanent residence.

Upon subsequently learning that Mr. Volcy was married an effort was made to locate him at the last address furnished the immigration officials, but he had moved and his whereabouts were unknown. In November, 1957 he was located in Montreal, and when an officer of the immigration branch called to interview him a person now known to be Mrs. Volcy denied she was his wife and claimed to be only a friend.

It was established, however, that the Volcys were married in New York city in August, 1957, four months previously. Mr. Volcy further admitted that the dependents he previously claimed for income tax deduction purposes were non-existant. Mr. Volcy's attorney at this time suggested that Mr. Volcy be granted the privilege of effecting voluntary departure from Canada.

The first order of deportation was issued against Mr. Volcy in October, 1957, at which time it was not known he was married. A new order was issued in April, 1958 in which his wife, Mrs. Volcy, was included. At this time they had no children. I might say that the child has never been included in the order of deportation, and in fact remains a Canadian citizen and travels on a Canadian passport, with the right to return to Canada at any time.

When the Volcys were served with the order of deportation their solicitor argued that they had not been given an opportunity to establish that they were not subject to deportation. To meet the solicitor's objection the first order of deportation issued in April was cancelled and new orders were issued by the minister on October 28, 1958, only after a complete review of the representations made by the solicitor on behalf of his client. These deportation orders were served on the Volcys on November 10, 1958, and they were released under a conditional bond on that date.

On November 14, 1958 a petition for prohibition was served on the minister, and this was dismissed by the courts in Montreal on December 19, 1958. On January 6, 1959 the solicitor filed an appeal and deportation was accordingly suspended. In the meantime the Volcys applied for United States visas in November, 1958 and they effected voluntary departure from Canada on May 24, 1959.

From the time the deportation order was first issued until they left Canada voluntarily they were never watched by immigration officials, as has been alleged, but remained at liberty while complying with the conditions of the bond under which they were released.

This case has been given a great deal of publicity, and it has been alleged that the Volcys were being deported because of their ethnic origin. I must deny this categorically. It is well known to hon. members that Canada admits students from many lands, and of every ethnic origin, and they encounter no difficulty as long as they continue their studies. It is evident from the summary of the Volcy case, however, that from 1956, at least, Mr. Volcy has not been a bona fide student but has rather endeavoured to remain in Canada permanently by various devious means. He is not admissible as an immigrant under Canadian immigration regulations, and his record is not such as to warrant any special consideration.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that this so-called voluntary departure, under threat of a deportation order, involves the exile of a Canadian citizen, does the minister not think that in this case humanitarian considerations should have priority over the department's adherence to the letter of the law being stubbornly upheld?

Mr. Stinson: That is very cheap.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, as I said when my estimates were before the committee, what the hon. member is now saying does not jibe at all with his practice when he occupied this post.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the hon. lady a further supplementary question. I will not comment on that remark, because I said what I had done at that time was wrong. I should like to ask the hon. lady if, as she promised during consideration of her estimates, any further consideration was given to this case after it ceased to be sub judice?

Mrs. Fairclough: It did not cease to be sub judice until they departed from this country last evening.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): May I ask a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if he or his department provided the information to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration concerning what was contained in the income tax returns as to the number of dependents of this immigrant, and now made public by the minister?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): The answer is no.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could ask if she could disclose to the house where she got that information?

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not think there is any secret about it. It was given to us by employers who had in their possession form TD-1, which all employees fill in when they claim more than the statutory exemption of $1,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. lady think she is entitled—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This seems to be developing into a debate. Does the hon. member wish to ask a further supplementary question?

Mr. Pickersgill: My supplementary question is this. In view of the fact that it has always been clearly understood that the government does not make public information on income tax returns, I should like to ask the hon. lady if she thinks she was entitled to give information of this sort to the public.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Answer.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

HARRINGTON LAKE, QUE.—SUGGESTED COUNTRY RESIDENCE FOR PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I will now quieten the atmosphere by asking a non-controversial question of the Minister of Public Works. In view of the general concern that the historic and beautiful Harrington lake residence and property be preserved and used to the best advantage, will the government recognize this concern and interest by the introduction of legislation that will establish this property as an official government country residence for use by the Prime Minister, his distinguished guests and other appropriate persons?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. The suggestion he makes will be given serious consideration by the government, and should it be the wish generally of hon. members that such a course be followed I should think legislation could be introduced at this session.

AIR TRANSPORT

AUSTRALIA—INQUIRY AS TO RENEWAL OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. May I ask the Prime Minister if during the course of the visit of the Prime Minister of Australia, he had an opportunity to discuss with him the subject matter of the air agreement between that country and Canada, and what progress if any has been made up to this time in the negotiations?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): There was a general reference to that matter, but there was no progress made other than had already been achieved at the time of the arrival of the Prime Minister.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—INQUIRY AS TO EVICTION NOTICES TO POLYMER CORPORATION WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. I wonder if he could advise the house what his department is doing with respect to the veterans in Sarnia who are tenants of C.M.H.C., and who are out on strike against the Polymer Corporation?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): On Friday last I announced that I thought arrangements could be made by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in connection with those tenants who are in arrears. Now a special representative is being sent to Sarnia to assist the branch manager there in interviewing the tenants who are in arrears. I am very hopeful that a settlement can be reached.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. I take it that my hon. friend's answer to the question put by the Leader of the Opposition the other day is still the same, namely that under no circumstances will the government tolerate any evictions taking place because these people are out of work, through no fault of their own?

Mr. Green: As I pointed out to the hon. member for Essex East the other day, there have been no eviction notices given. Whatever notices were given were notices of termination of tenancy, and eviction proceedings would only follow the expiration of the notice of termination. I can assure the hon. member that each of these cases will be examined very carefully on an individual basis, and I think he may rely on it that there will be no harsh methods allowed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No evictions; that is what I asked.

POWER

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL AID IN BAY D'ESPOIR DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell the house if it is true that the government of Canada has offered to make available to the province of Newfoundland, under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act, more than $9 million in order to make possible a 350,000 horsepower hydro development at Bay d'Espoir on the southeast coast of Newfoundland?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): On Friday last I sent a telegram and a confirming letter to the premier of Newfoundland, informing him that this government is prepared to enter into agreement with his province to make possible the construction of a proposed power transmission line, in accordance with the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act, on terms similar to those in an agreement made under this act with the province of New Brunswick.

The transmission line in question would be in connection with the development of a 350,000 horsepower hydroelectric power project at Bay d'Espoir by the British Newfoundland Corporation.

By and large, the cost of all transmission facilities in connection with the project would be capitalized at the date of completion of construction and funds made available by this government, repayable in 40 equal annual instalments with interest at the federal borrowing rate plus one-eighth of one per cent.

I might add that if the province of Newfoundland wishes to enter into such an arrangement, I hope the premier will let me know at an early date.

THE CENSUS

INQUIRY AS TO QUESTIONS RESPECTING ETHNIC ORIGIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will there be in the census of 1961 a question which will permit people to indicate their ethnic or racial origin?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a statistical question if there ever was one.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, that question arose in the house on February 24 and was answered on that occasion. There must be a misunderstanding among some people in Canada with regard to this matter, or perhaps the information has not reached them through the press. The answer is that there will be two questions on the census return, one dealing with the country of citizenship, to which the answer will normally be, of course, "Canada," although those who have not their citizenship papers will reply "United Kingdom" or "United States" or whatever country of which they happen to be a citizen. There is a blank space left if the country is not named in the form. It is open to people to indicate and write in the country if it is not listed.

Then there is a second question: "What is your ethnic descent on the father's side?" There people may list their ethnic descent as they wish. The form carries about 24 types of ethnic groups, and again a blank space is left for those who do not find there the one they wish to put down. To that question people may answer "Canadian" if they so desire, or "English" or "Welsh" or "French" or "Polish" or whatever ethnic group from which they claim descent.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Would he not agree that asking people for their ethnic origin is in opposition to the Prime Minister's earlier opinions, often expressed in Canada, namely that he is opposed to hyphenated Canadians?

Mr. Churchill: There has been a great demand that I have received by way of letters and representations that this type of question appear on the census return.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN CORPORATION AND EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the report on the radio news this morning concerning negotiations between the C.B.C. and its employees, can the minister bring the house up to date with regard to the position of the negotiations?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there has been no direct communication with me as Minister of Labour with regard to these discussions which are going on at the present time. I have only the information I have read in the newspapers.

Mr. Chevrier: May I just follow that matter up. I asked a question earlier, perhaps a week or ten days ago, and the minister indicated that his officers were at the disposal of either side. Have his officers been requested to help bring about a settlement in this case?

Mr. Starr: Not to my knowledge.

SHIPPING

NEWFOUNDLAND—STATEMENT AS TO CONTRACTS FOR VESSELS FOR C.N.R. SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo inquired if contracts have been awarded for the two vessels to be built for the Newfoundland coastal service. Contracts have not yet been signed but the necessary submissions to treasury board have been made, and as soon as approval is received formal contracts will be entered into.

[Mr. Churchill.]

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—SUGGESTED IMPROVEMENT IN FERRY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say whether or not two engineers of the Canadian maritime commission have been in Michigan investigating the possibility of buying the ship Vacationland to be used in the ferry service to Prince Edward Island? If so, has the minister had a report, and when will a decision in this regard be made?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer is that engineers have been looking over the Vacationland. A decision has not yet been made.

Mr. Argue: I have a supplementary question in the same field. Can the minister say whether or not a report on the feasibility of a causeway to Prince Edward Island is expected to be received by the minister in June?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

EAST SAINT JOHN THERMAL PLANT, N.B.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege, and this also has to do with the production of papers. On April 15 in my absence the house agreed to motion No. 25 for the production of documents and correspondence in connection with the Saint John thermal plant. On May 18, when I asked the Minister of Northern Affairs when he might expect the tabling of the correspondence and documents as agreed on April 15, having to do with the Saint John thermal plant, the minister answered as reported on page 3743 of Hansard:

> As I recall the motion accepted on April 15, it was on the understanding that if an agreement was signed with the province.

The minister ended by saying that he was not able to table the documents. Mr. Speaker, the minister has no right to take it upon himself to refuse to table documents whose production has been approved by the house.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has heard the matter raised; that there was an order for the production of documents which has not been complied with. Has he any statement to make?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I recall the events of that day there were four motions on the order paper—I have forgotten the exact number—and one of them was a motion by the hon. member for Assiniboia who got up and suggested, as I recall the debate, that in order to get these items off the order paper I should accept them and then, after the agreements had been signed, table the documents. I accepted the suggestion and then asked if we could revert to the three previous motions which had been allowed to stand and suggested that they could be passed under the same conditions. You, Mr. Speaker, asked whether it was acceptable that those three motions should pass under those circumstances, and they went through. That is what happened, according to my recollection.

Mr. Robichaud: I am not speaking of what I recall. I am speaking on the basis of the records of the house as reported on page 2705 of Hansard. Motion No. 25 has been agreed to without any conditions whatever, and for this reason I feel the house has the right to have these documents produced.

Mr. Speaker: The suggestion is that the motion has not yet been complied with. Is the minister prepared to comply with the motion?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am prepared to comply with the motion the minute an agreement is signed, but when agreements are under discussion between two governments it is not proper to table the documents.

Mr. Robichaud: The records of the house do not say anything about the signing of agreements. This is a motion to produce certain documents—a motion which was agreed to by the house—and a month later the minister says he is not able to table the documents.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has stated his point. It is clear from the record that the motion was made. Motions are to be complied with, of course. If not, I conceive that it raises a matter of privilege for the house to deal with.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed from Friday, May 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Churchill for the second reading of Bill No. C-49 to provide for the establishment of a national energy board.

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): When the debate was adjourned last Friday I said that the Prime Minister had moved back from the high gear he was using in February, 1957 when he advocated setting up this energy board. He had moved back into second gear, if not indeed into low gear. Here is what he said in February and March of 1958. I read from a report which appeared in the Montreal Star of March 15:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker also told a meeting of some 2,400 here last night that he hopes that the Borden commission on energy resources will approve the export of natural gas to the United States. He said the government would act immediately after the commission brought down its recommendations in an interim report.

I want to stress the word "immediately". Mr. Speaker, the Borden commission presented its interim report last October, and despite that statement by the Prime Minister that his government would act immediately after the report was brought down, more than six months elapsed before the necessary resolution preceding this bill was introduced on April 23, and that is framed in such general terms as to give no hint whatever of the actual content of this bill.

For 26 days the resolution remained dormant before it was discussed. The debate which took place on it was brief. The bill was distributed to hon. members on Tuesday evening, but to the general public only on the following day. And here we are, just a few days later, expected to be thoroughly familar with a 28 page bill containing 101 sections, and to be able to debate its contents. I must say that there seems to be no proper proportions in the various periods of time which have elapsed. It took the government 3½ months to decide to appoint a royal commission, 12 months for the government to introduce the legislation and nearly one month more before the bill received first reading; 22½ months in all, Mr. Speaker, and after less than a week we are expected to debate it. There has been both unseemly delay and unseemly haste; but I must not fail to point out that for all those months the public and the petroleum industry have waited for this bill and they have been allowed two days, Wednesday and Thursday, in which to examine its 101 provisions and to consider its implications, but obviously no time has been given in which to make representations.

As an example of ineptitude, the government's handling of this whole matter is classic. It follows the same general pattern so familiar under this government: delay followed by delay and then a sudden, ill-considered burst of speed to make up for the lost time.

The bill itself does not explain why so much time has been consumed in its preparation. It breaks little new ground, but it does draw extensively, if I may use the minister's own words, upon legislation introduced by successive Liberal administrations. Because so much of the bill comes almost textually from the Pipe Lines Act and the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act, I can only infer that the real problem which has faced the government was to determine how many of the recommendations of the Borden commission could be left out of the bill. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that only a few of those recommendations have been followed, and those that have been followed were not, I feel sure, considered by the commission to be the most important.

The bill has as its first purpose the establishment of a board of five members, and sets forth in considerable detail the duties to be carried out by the board in the administration of the act. Before coming to its duties, which up to the present have been carried out either by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) or by the board of transport commissioners, in addition to the other numerous duties which evolve upon it under the Railway Act, I want to point out that the volume of applications which the board will have to deal with is very small indeed. I cannot, therefore, see the need of five members when three could perform the task equally well. I ask myself, too, whether it is possible for the government to find more than three highly competent people to carry out the duties which are to be entrusted to the board.

In addition to the administrative duties relating to international power lines and to oil and gas pipe lines, the board is to have the duty of studying all matters relating to energy and of reporting to the minister. I shall not go into the terms of the clauses of the bill which require the board to undertake studies and to make recommendations. All I shall do is merely point out that the government seems to be in the process of setting up a board which is going to duplicate a great deal of the work already being done by other bodies. It is sufficient, I think, for me to draw attention merely to the statute setting up the atomic energy board to give one instance of overlapping; to point to the statute creating the dominion coal board to indicate another area where overlapping will take place. There is no doubt that the water resources branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources undertakes studies which clearly fall within the scope of the duties it is proposed to assign to the energy board. In setting up this board there was an excellent opportunity for the government to integrate all of the activities of government agencies related to energy, but seemingly the government has neglected this opportunity of integration.

[Mr. Brassard (Lapointe).]

The bill does introduce a new principle, recommended by the Borden commission, that no pipe line and no international power line shall be built until the board has certified as to the public convenience and necessity of the project. This, of course, is the legal way of saying that the board must consider the factor of competition and the possible injury which a proposed line might do to an existing line. After all that the Conservative party has said about encouraging competition, the introduction of legislation making "public convenience and necessity" a factor is to say the least an interesting development.

But this principle is to go hand in hand with another principle, namely control by the government; for it is clear from the bill that no new pipe line for the transmission of hydrocarbons may be built, even if its public convenience and necessity are fully established to the satisfaction of the board, unless the government gives its approval. This is an entirely new requirement, which seems to be in strange contradiction with the lofty statements made by the Prime Minister in Hull on May 7, 1957 when, according to the Ottawa Citizen of May 8, he said:

> We will put a stop to the government going into business and gradually exercising control over the economy.

The bill also introduces another surprising principle. I say "surprising" because it is in direct contradiction of what was said in the house by the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green). If we look at page 1528 of Hansard of February 25, we can read the following words uttered by the present Minister of Public Works when he was sitting on this side of the house in 1955:

> I do not suppose it would be possible to have a power of revocation much wider than the one contained in the present act. Then there is the power to limit exportation to the surplus after Canadian needs have been met, and also to regulate the price on export so that price will not be lower than the price charged to Canadian consumers.

This refers to the present requirement of the regulations adopted pursuant to the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act. Regulation 9 requires that the price for power or gas exported by a licensee shall not be lower than the price at which power or gas, respectively, is supplied by him or his supplier in similar quantities and under similar conditions of sale for consumption in Canada.

The Montreal Star of March 15, 1958, in reporting a meeting at Calgary on the previous day, said:

> Mr. Diefenbaker added, however, that his government was determined to see that gas prices charged in Canada were not used to subsidize gas sales at cheaper prices to the United States.

I may not, on second reading, quote the relevant provision of the bill, but I do point out that the act under which the present regulations were adopted is to be repealed and that the bill does no more than to require the price for export to be just and reasonable. It does not say that gas prices charged in Canada are not to be used to subsidize gas sales at cheaper prices to the United States, despite all the determination which the Prime Minister expressed when he addressed a meeting in Calgary.

The bill contains yet another principle on which I wish to comment. It is that the government proposes to arrogate to itself the power, without further reference to parliament, to control through the board the importation of oil. As to this vitally important matter, as to the reasons for asking for such far-reaching authority, such exorbitant power for the executive, all the minister could say last Monday was:

> However, a section of the bill will deal with this important matter and if approved by parliament will give authority to the governor in council to extend the application of the relevant portion of the bill to oil.

These words may be found at page 3768 of Hansard of May 18. Not one word of argument, not one single reason was invoked by the minister in support of the preposterous demand for more power for the executive. What has he said on Friday which adds to the empty words he used on Monday last?

I shall close by drawing attention to the fact that repeatedly in the bill the government is asking parliament to permit it by order in council to modify the requirements of the bill, to exempt some from its application, and to adopt regulations without their nature and scope being specified.

Mr. Speaker, we have waited nearly two years for this bill. We had been led to expect some bold steps forward, but we find on reading the bill that, as the minister has said, it draws extensively upon the experience of the past. We find that the steps forward are timid and unpromising. But because the bill draws so heavily on Liberal legislation, there is a great deal in the bill to which we do not object. It fails to do much with regard to the integration of the existing agencies of the government that are concerned with energy in some form or another but I hope that when we consider the bill clause by clause we shall persuade the government that many improvements in the bill ought to be made.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this bill which in essence sets up the machinery to organize and regulate the use and export of our energy resources in Canada and also establishes a national energy board I believe I can safely say it is one of the most important pieces of legislation particularly for western Canada that has been considered by parliament for many years. It is just as important or perhaps even more important that the farm stabilization bill which considered for the first time the element of cost of production when setting floor prices.

For many years prior to the setting up of the Borden commission and since that date the people of the province of Alberta have been waiting and watching with anxiety for the implementation of a sound federal policy in reference to our national resources, natural gas and petroleum. I commend this legislation to the house as giving us that sound policy.

In particular the people of Alberta have been watching with anxiety to see what medium would be set up to consider, approve and reject applications for the building of transmission pipe lines for the transmission of gas and for the purpose of the export of natural gas, a top economic energy source produced in western Canada today which has been explored and discovered in large quantities and which exploration and discovery, I suggest, is still in its infancy.

For years in the province of Alberta the provincial Liberal party opposed the export of gas not only from Alberta to the United States but also to other parts of Canada, on two grounds. In the first place they felt there was an inadequate supply for the forseeable future for Alberta and, secondly, that the export of natural gas to other parts of Canada and elsewhere would increase the price of natural gas to the consumer in Alberta. These objections were based on fear and lack of knowledge rather than on vision and logic.

We have only to examine the Canada Year Book of 1957-58 and refer to page 510 to determine the tremendous development that has taken place. I should like to place the following on the record:

> The rapid development of Canada's petroleum and natural gas resources, initiated by the Leduc oil field discovery of 1947, continues unabated. At the end of 1956 proved reserves of crude oil and natural gas liquids totalled 3,129,304,000 barrels compared with 72 million barrels at the end of 1946 and during the intervening ten-year period, production amounted to 657,605,839 barrels. In 1956, the new oil found was more than three times the actual production which, at 170,569,200 barrels was more than 22 times the 1946 output. Natural gas reserves in 1956 were in excess of 23 trillion cubic feet compared with 4.7 trillion in 1950. Crude oil has, since 1953, maintained its lead in annual production value for all mineral produced in Canada and natural gas is entering the period of rapid growth.

May I suggest that what is set out in the Canada Year Book has been corroborated by the Borden commission in the findings of that body based on ample evidence carefully examined. We now have a known and proven reserve of 23 trillion cubic feet of natural gas in Alberta and an unproven reserve estimated in the western Canada sedimentary basin of between 300 and 400 trillion cubic feet. I wish now to place on the record a statement from the report of the Borden commission:

> Although the findings of the oil and gas conservation board indicate that Alberta had, as at March 31, 1958, only 4.1 trillion cubic feet of natural gas, which could be declared surplus to future requirements of the province, existing permits and immediately contractable requirements of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited for Canadian market, the board estimated future discoveries to the year 1987 to be 51 trillion cubic feet. It concluded that future Canadian requirements, other than those mentioned, would be adequately protected by these future expected discoveries.

May I suggest that a very good analogy which emphasizes the weakness of the argument to keep the natural gas in Alberta for Albertans is the same type of argument that was used in the 20's in reference to the coal reserves of Alberta. This argument was used by speakers both inside this house and outside of it approximately 20 or 30 years ago. Although it was said then that Alberta had approximately 65 per cent to 75 per cent of the coal reserves of Canada, there were those who were shortsighted enough to argue that we must be careful about exporting coal to ensure that the reserves in Alberta did not become depleted; they might not be sufficient for the foreseeable needs of the people of that province and of Canada.

Today we find that a new form of energy, natural gas, has replaced coal. These 30 years have gone by, and what has happened? We were so cautious that we went to bed with our coal. Some people say coal may have a future in 20 or 30 years, but that is little comfort today to the people in Alberta who have gone bankrupt in the coal industry or to those miners who are now unemployed. May I suggest that the time was long overdue for the appointment of this royal commission. The last speaker talked about delay. I say that there was delay on the part of the former government because they should have set up this commission at an earlier date and introduced the legislation that is now before us.

This bold and aggressive step taken by this government to set up the energy board, with the powers outlined in this bill, should give the people in Alberta and the rest of the prairie provinces, assurance that we shall not go to bed with the natural gas in Alberta and elsewhere as we did with coal. A sound federal policy setting up the energy board will stimulate exploration and hence further discovery of natural gas well beyond the imagination of those experts who made these estimates. Often estimates are only guesswork. The production of natural gas will produce untold wealth and create a new and far-reaching prosperity for western Canada, and hence Canada generally. One has only to look back on the pages of history to find that the early explorers who first set eyes on the prairie plains described them as a windswept desert and a non-productive plain. What does the record show? Over the years we have seen the prairies produce in one year from 400 million to 600 million bushels of wheat and millions of head of cattle.

What we need today is men of vision and foresight in connection with this particular form of energy, such as we had in connection with the development of the prairies for agricultural purposes. Let us not be planners filled with fear and caution with reference to the development of natural gas and with reference to the export of natural gas.

The energy board that is set up by this legislation can and should be in a position to decide expeditiously—which is always important in industry—the quantity of the surplus that can be exported in order to make use of the developed resources and turn this natural gas into wealth that can be used for further exploration and discovery. If the early pioneers had been forbidden to produce grain in such quantities on the prairies since 1900 because of the fear of wearing out the most valuable resource of all in western Canada, the topsoil, what development would have taken place in the west? The important part of this legislation is that one body, the energy board, is empowered to give permission to build transmission pipe lines and to license the export of gas. Both of these decisions are a necessary part of the marketing of the commodity.

I presume, from a reading of the bill itself, that this board will be set up similar to a court, and will examine evidence which may suggest that another pipe line should be built or that some amount of gas should be exported. Then, after this examination of the evidence, the board will exercise its discretion, subject of course to the approval of the governor in council. These decisions are a necessary part of the marketing of the commodity. This is a superior method to having two important steps controlled by two independent authorities, the board of transport commissioners and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill).

In brief, I commend this legislation to hon. members because the authority to permit the building of a pipe line and the obtaining of an export licence are under the jurisdiction of one body, the energy board. Under clause 27 of the bill in question—I believe I am right in saying that on second reading I am discussing the principle of the bill and I should not read the wording of the clauses of the bill—a certificate of public convenience may be granted, while under clauses 82 and 83 a licence to export gas may likewise be granted. Both of these decisions can no doubt be made at the same time and based on the same evidence. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated in his remarks when introducing this legislation, "This method will simplify the procedure". May I quote from his remarks when introducing this legislation? He said:

> At the same time, since they must compete at the point of origin for supplies of gas and compete at the point of sale with other fuels and energy sources, there is a substantial element of risk for gas transmission companies. For this reason they must not be prevented by regulatory action from earning a return sufficient to attract capital, nor must management be deprived of the normal incentive to improve efficiency.

In these words, we see the element of flexibility in the bill. Then, the minister further stated, and I quote:

> Neither in the case of oil pipe lines nor in the case of gas pipe lines will the public gain anything if regulation is so restrictive as to put the pipe lines out of business, or discourage their normal development, or impede the building of new pipe lines to serve new or expanding markets, or restrict the essential work of exploration and discovery of further reserves of oil and gas. Our objective, therefore, is to find the means and level of regulation that will adequately protect the public interest, and particularly the interest of the consumer, while maintaining healthy conditions for the pipe line industry, the oil and gas producing industries and the industries distributing oil products and gas for consumption.

This flexibility is necessary to maintain the interest, first of the industry itself so that it will continue to widen the horizon of discovery to ensure that new quantities of gas can and will be discovered. Millions of dollars have already been spent by the industry in question in exploring and discovering the reserves that we now have, and it was because of the risk that was taken and the faith that those in the industry had, that the Borden commission was able to report that there was, in fact, a surplus over and above the foreseeable future needs of Canada. As I said a while ago, 30 years ago there were those who spoke gloomily about the reserves of coal in Alberta. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is evidence that we went to bed with our coal, so let us hope this new legislation and this new board will make certain that we will not go to bed with the natural gas in Alberta.

We hear a lot from the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) about full employment and economic prosperity. If the government had seen fit to implement the regulations suggested by the hon. member which would have strangled the industry would the men in the petroleum and natural gas industry be willing to take the risk? Would they have faith in the future of the industry itself? I remember the same type of speech was made in 1945 in Saskatchewan by Premier Douglas and the members of his government. What took place? The drilling rigs that were situated in Saskatchewan pulled out and went into the province of Alberta. This is probably one of the main reasons that we have the development in Alberta which we have today because this was at the time of the Leduc discovery.

Sometimes when one sits in his place in the House of Commons and listens to the rantings of the hon. member for Assiniboia one is reminded of those early speeches that were made by the men who promoted the Russian revolution, which finally destroyed not only economic freedom but political freedom as well. It was the same kind of talk, I suggest, that drove the industry in question out of the province of Saskatchewan. May I suggest also that that industry returned to the province of Saskatchewan only when members of that government had finally realized that there was something to the system after all, and they themselves saw that they could enrich their own pockets; and so there must have been a place in industry for others.

In reference to the stand which the Liberal party has taken in the province of Alberta, I should like to read from an editorial of December 11, 1957 in the Calgary Albertan, in which is discussed the Liberal stand in reference to the export of gas at that time. It reads in part as follows:

> Last weekend the provincial Liberal party had a meeting of sorts in Edmonton. Naturally it had to say something about gas. But a more meaningless and cowardly statement it could not have made. The party is still obviously confused, still hopelessly ignorant of the industry and issues.
> It called for a "maximum availability of natural gas for domestic and industrial users in the province, having regard to economics involved". Nobody disagrees. Nobody at all. But does the provincial Liberal party realize that the maximum local availability can only be obtained as the result of a vast and thriving export industry.
> It called for a provincial gas policy which would "encourage the establishment of new industries within the province".
> There again, evidence is conclusive that the maximum local industrialization will come through a policy of maximum export. If the Liberal party agrees, why it is beating around the bush?
> Finally, it says "any policy of gas export from Albera shall first take into consideration the present and future interests of the province, and especially the matter of protecting the consumers of Alberta in the matter of costs".

There again there should be no doubt or hesitation. With export,—

That is to the rest of Canada.

—the price is likely to go up. Without export it is likely to go up very much higher. And besides the benefits accruing to the people from a healthy gas export industry will far more than offset any increase in price.

So, is the provincial Liberal party in favour of gas exports or is it not? If it is, why doesn't it say so? If it has the best interests of the province at heart, why doesn't it add its voice to the protests of the government?

Speaking personally, Mr. Speaker, may I say that it seems to me that natural gas is a commodity which is different from beef or wheat. It seems to me that there is a weakness in the argument, which is to keep gas in Alberta or in any other province and that it is just as weak as that which says "keep beef in the foothills of Alberta because the price will be cheaper". But where will be the prosperity of the rest of the province and of the rest of the country? The same argument would apply with regard to wheat. Hence, when I hear Liberals stand in their places and criticize this government about delay, I would remind them of what has taken place in the province of Alberta. The Borden commission should have been set up by the previous government and the energy board should have been set up by the previous government so that we could have got things going, so that there would be prosperity in the west such as we have never seen before.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to listen to the remarks of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) inasmuch as they are so reassuring. Every time we listen to him we get a little bit more evidence of the rightness of the cause of the members of the C.C.F.

In order to deal with this bill that is before us today, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be appropriate to do a little review as to just what are the reasons why we have it before us. Bills do not come before the house just for the sake of giving us something to do. Usually there is a good reason and sometimes there is a long neglected reason before we get a bill presented to the house for its approval. I think we all realize that this bill is based, at least to a certain extent, on the report of the royal commission which was appointed on October 15, 1957 and which of course brought in the report of October 1958.

If we go back a little further I think we will realize that the royal commission was set up as a result of the Trans-Canada pipe line debate which almost rocked this house on its very foundations. In fact, I think we could pin it down even closer than that if we refer to the remarks of the former hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when he spoke in this house during the 1957-58 session. At that time he referred to the remarks made by the former leader of the Conservative party. In connection with this particular bill which is before us now I think it might be an appropriate time to put those words on record again. These are his words as found at page 4673 of Hansard of June 4, 1956:

—enlarge the powers of the crown corporation so that the entire pipe line may be constructed immediately under public ownership.

Mr. Speaker, all this has led up to the report of the royal commission of last year. But what has happened to the important recommendations contained in that report? In this bill which is before us today what is there that enables this board to deal with the famous Texas buccaneers, to use the words of our present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker)? What indeed is contained in this bill to deal with the Ontario buccaneers who had improved even on the Texas buccaneers, and go right up to cabinet rank in their government? Where are the safeguards that are going to give protection to the people of this country in the future where they did not have protection in the past? We find some of these recommendations in the report of the commission but we do not find any in this bill. For a moment I should like to give one or two examples. If we turn to page XII of the royal commission report, recommendation 21, paragraph (b), we find these words:

(ii) The financial structure, ownership, financing, engineering and construction plans of any applicant and the opportunity for the people of Canada to participate in the financing, engineering and construction of the project.

I think those are significant words. I should like to draw particular attention to the words "and the opportunity for the people of Canada to participate in the financing". I should now like to turn to the bill that is before us in order to see how this particular phase appears in that bill. In clause 44, paragraph (d) we find these words:

(d) the financial responsibility and financial structure of the applicant, the methods of financing the line and the extent to which Canadians will have an opportunity of participating in the financing, engineering and construction of the line;

There is quite a difference in the phraseology or the wording of those two otherwise approximately similar sections. I do not know, of course, what the purpose of the commission was when they worded this particular recommendation as they did. However, I would go this far. I would say that there is a reasonable doubt that they possibly came as close as the people sitting on this commission could come, when you realize their responsibilities, their duties and their position, to recommending that the trans-Canada pipe line and other similar projects should be public utilities in this country. I cannot see any reason why this particular clause should be worded as it is. There is certainly no hint given in the words of the clause of the bill. There is no room for doubt there; any doubt in regard to the recommendations of the royal commission has been very carefully left out.

Now I would like to come to another point. If we look at the report, on page IX we find recommendation 12, which has been mentioned before during this debate. It reads:

> That the prices, tolls, rates or tariffs of a company owning or operating an oil or gas pipe line, as regulated by the board of transport commissioners for Canada, should be just and reasonable, non-discriminatory and calculated to yield a fair rate of return on the shareholders' equity, after making due allowance for reasonable and proper operating expenses, depreciation, interest, income and other taxes.

We find a section in the act which deals with the same subject, clause 52, entitled "Tolls to be just and reasonable". That clause reads as follows:

> All tolls shall be just and reasonable, and shall always, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions with respect to all traffic of the same description carried over the same route, be charged equally to all persons at the same rate.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, we find that the very important and pertinent words "on the shareholders' equity" have been very carefully left out of this bill. I think this is very significant, Mr. Speaker. When we think back to the famous or infamous debate on the Trans-Canada pipe line and think of the ringing words of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) spoken in this very house about these Texas buccaneers, and so on and so forth, we must remember that at this time there was supposition on his part. We had not experienced their actual operations in this country; we had not seen just what these people would do. That no longer is so. We have had many opportunities to view just what these buccaneers have done, both the foreign and the domestic buccaneers.

I think possibly the actions we have seen over the past two or three years may have greatly influenced those recommendations which were brought down by this royal commission. But what has happened? In spite of the fact that the royal commission made the recommendations, this present government is still unwilling or unable to act in the interests of the Canadian people. Once more if we look back at the bill, on page 18 we find clause 62, which deals with the general powers of the board. I am not going to read all of these different subclauses to clause 62, but it does raise another matter of which we have had ample experience in this country, and that is the question of the abuse that can be made of the law. As I understand it, this clause has been transferred almost word for word, if not word for word, from other legislation which was previously on the books of this country.

It is true that according to the law some of the practices which have been carried on by these various pipe line companies were actually outside the law. But there was no provision in the legislation to uphold the law, and consequently it was left to each poor individual little farmer, or whoever was involved, to hire expensive legal aid and to go through very expensive court action in order to uphold the law. I do not want to list at great length some of the practices to which I am referring. I would just like to refer hon. members to speeches made by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and myself, found on pages 1183 and 1185 of Hansard for June 16, 1958. Hon. members will find many of them listed there, and they are some of the actions with which we are very familiar because they happened as the pipe line was going through my constituency. The only ones I would like to add today are ones which have been brought to my attention since the completion of that line.

As one reads the clause one finds that these companies are responsible for any damage done. They are responsible to leave the ground as they find it, and all that sort of thing. Unfortunately that is not the case. I could take hon. members to many places and many farms throughout my riding and throughout the riding of Timiskaming where great damage was done. Fences were not put back up again, fields were not graded. In one particular case a farmer's wood lot was expropriated and they cut a strip 200 feet wide, changed their minds and moved to another place where they cut another 200-foot strip through the farmer's wood lot, changed their minds again and went back to the first lot and left his property in that condition, and when he asked about damages they said he could go ahead and sue.

We have seen cases very recently of how much it costs to uphold the law of this country. I think an excellent example is the Roncarelli case in the province of Quebec where it cost, I think, something in the neighbourhood of $35,000 to uphold the law. I think the government has a duty to the people of this country to protect the small farmer and other people who are involved who cannot afford costly law suits in order to uphold the law of the country.

Mr. Speaker, in the limited experience we have had I think it has been well demonstrated over the years that the best defence that the Canadian people can have in matters of this kind is that of public ownership of these utilities. At least when we have public ownership it is under the responsibility of the government, and the government is responsible to the people. Certainly these companies are not responsible to anyone but themselves. As has been demonstrated in many cases, they are not even responsible to the law unless one can afford to uphold the law. It is also quite apparent from this bill that the government has no intention of setting up anything, except what might be described as a Punch and Judy show as far as this board is concerned. I am sure the board will be out front dancing while the government is behind pulling the strings, because from what I can see of this bill that is all the board will be entrusted with.

If we look at the report of the royal commission, recommendation No. 23 on page XIII reads as follows:

> That the enabling legislation contain provisions to ensure the independence of the members of the board.

When we pick up this bill we find clause after clause after clause is always subject to the approval of the governor in council. How can this board have any independence if every move it makes is subject to the approval of the governor in council? How can this board take any action against these pirates, either foreign or domestic, if it has to turn to the government every time for approval? Who knows, by this time these pirates may be just as good friends of this government as they were of the previous government. I maintain that the bill to set up this board is not doing the job which the people of this country expected. I maintain it is not doing the job that it should do. In fact, it would appear to me that this government is hiding behind this sham board which is being set up to take any blame that might be levelled at its policy, though, in reality, the board is obliged to do the government's bidding.

With this in mind, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier):

> That this bill be not read a second time until further consideration has been given to the public ownership of interprovincial gas and oil pipe lines.

Mr. Speaker: If any hon. member wishes to say anything about this proposed amendment he may do so. Otherwise, I will reserve the question for the time being and give consideration to it as the debate continues.

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Edmonton West): I rise with a great deal of pleasure to speak on this energy bill because, like many hon. members in this house, I feel that the principle of the establishment of a national energy board is one which should have been adopted long ago.

I felt some concern listening to the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) the other day when he indicated that the national Liberal convention of 1958 had advocated the setting up of a national energy board. I think that at that time—and today, too—we would accuse him and his colleagues of "me tooism", because up to that date they had not indicated any intention of considering the establishment of a national energy board or of a national energy plan.

I wish to confine my remarks today to the oil and gas industry, as this represents a most urgent question. It is true that coal is a form of energy which presents a serious problem, but I suggest that this is a matter of somewhat longer range. We in Alberta have great quantities of coal, and regardless of the remarks which were made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) the other day, coal is certainly going to be studied by the Borden commission. Surely one cannot expect the commission to look into every facet of energy within its terms of reference before writing a report; in other words, surely he does not expect we should have to wait for the whole study to be completed before we could consider those immediate aspects which are of particular importance to us today.

The oil and gas industry is a very young and virile industry. It made its debut on a commercial basis in 1920, but one could go back a good deal earlier in history as far as Ontario is concerned, though production was on no very great scale. Our oil and gas industry in this country really dates from February, 1947 with the discovery of Leduc No. 1. Today it has advanced to its present position, I would suggest, under the stimulus of several factors; first, a greatly expanding domestic and foreign market; second, the Middle East crisis of 1955-56, which created a scarcity of petroleum products on the North American continent and, third, the methods of development by reason of the very nature of oil and gas, and also because of the land policy adopted in this country which encourages development. There have been many criticisms of this policy.

Let us look at the progress the oil and gas industry has made. First of all, it has climbed in the short space of 12 years into the No. 1 spot among Canada's mineral producing industries, in terms of capital investment, employment created and value of production. Second, oil refining capacity in Canada has been trebled to a current 800,000 barrels daily, an expansion which has kept pace with the near tripling in 12 years of Canada's petroleum consumption. Third, another indication of growth is that oil productive capacity, only 20,000 barrels daily 12 years ago, has increased over fifty fold to a current potential exceeding one million barrels a day. Fourth, oil markets climbed from 20,000 barrels daily in early 1947 to over half a million barrels daily in 1957. They slumped to some 460,000 barrels in 1958 due to reduced export demand, but they began 1959 at well above half a million barrels daily, still only about 54 per cent of potential. Canada's production now equals about two-thirds of Canada's consumption, although the nation's productive capacity makes self-sufficiency either in fact or in balance quite feasible.

Proven reserves of crude oil and other liquid petroleums, which were under 100 million barrels at the beginning of 1947, climbed to about 3.6 billion barrels by the end of 1958, despite production of some one billion barrels in the 12-year period. In 1958, for each one barrel produced, more than three barrels of reserves were discovered.

Proved reserves of natural gas, which were about 1.5 trillion cubic feet at beginning of 1947, climbed to about 28.5 trillion cubic feet by the end of 1958 despite production of 1.8 trillion cubic feet in the 12-year period. In 1958, despite record production of about 400 billion cubic feet, almost ten cubic feet of reserves were discovered for each one cubic foot consumed.

A recent summary published by the Alberta government indicates that in the period between 1947 and the end of 1958 there have been drilled in Alberta 9,121 oil wells, 1,335 gas wells and 3,975 dry wells. Remember that last figure: it represents a tremendous loss in investment. Taking into account the adjustments from 1959 to date, recent figures indicate that there are some 8,800 producing wells in Alberta and some 3,850 in Saskatchewan. In Alberta there are some 700 producing gas wells and about 870 capped gas wells. These capped wells represent a tied up investment of close to $200 million from which no one is drawing any benefit. In that period of time, 1947 to 1958, some $2,800 million was spent on exploration and development, and in the last three years money was spent at a rate in excess of $360 million per annum. That is an indication, Mr. Speaker, of the investment that has been made not only by Canadians but by people foreign to this land in our oil and gas industry in the short space of 12 years.

What has that industry meant to Alberta? It has meant the employment of upwards of 150,000 people who in some way or other derive all or part of their livelihood from exploration, development and production and marketing of oil. Second, we have had a multi-million dollar petrochemical industry established in that area. Third, we have a steel industry, a pipe mill and fabricators. We had indications just the other day that one of our eastern Canadian firms plans to establish a new $10 million mill to produce up to 42-inch pipe, in the largest diameter to be produced in this country. Fourth, the revenues to the province of Alberta from the sale of crown reserves and leases, lease rentals and royalties amounted to the sum of $855,490,000 from the first of January 1947, to March 31, 1959. We have seen tremendous years such as 1956 and 1957. Nineteen hundred and fifty-eight saw a decline because of the incursion of imports into the North American market and the so-called voluntary curbs by the United States refineries and some decline of business activity. The first quarter of 1959 has seen a pickup. The rate this year is higher than 1958 but it is still only 75 per cent of the rate of 1956 and 1957.

The industry in Alberta last week produced about 319,000 barrels a day, which is only 40 per cent of the rated capacity. With these figures, I believe I can underline the seriousness of the problem of oil production and marketing. Recently there was a lifting of the compulsory quotas imposed by the United States. What has been the result? First of all there was an increase in the nominations from the Puget sound refineries to about 55,000 barrels a day, as announced this week by the nominations from those refineries to the Alberta gas conservation board. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) indicated the other day, the situation must be watched carefully. We must always remember that the United States refineries may choose United States domestic oil or Canadian crude oil and, therefore, the fact that those restrictions were lifted does not necessarily mean that an extra barrel of Canadian oil need be sold. However, we see that some is being sold.

Although it has been said that while the removal of restrictions may not mean an immediate increase—and I have indicated that there had been a slight, hopeful one in Canadian production—over the longer term this action will encourage an increase in the movement of Canadian oil into the natural and economic export markets of the United States.

I would like to extend my congratulations to the government on the energetic steps it took to have the mandatory controls removed. I am sure that the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan—in fact the people of the whole country—will be gratified to know just how much encouragement and attention were given to this problem by their own individual members. However, removal of those quota restrictions in the United States does not increase the market for western crude in eastern Canada. In fact, the reverse may be the result, because it may serve to make competition more acute as the result of a diversion of more fire-sale crude into the eastern Canadian market. Mr. Speaker, eastern Canada must not become a dumping ground for foreign crude at the expense of domestic crude. The situation must be watched very carefully and ultimately drastic measures may be necessary. This is why I would support provisions in the act which permit the imposition of controls on oil imports or exports by proclamation when the situation may demand it.

We have just heard this afternoon, and on previous occasions, criticisms by the Liberal opposition to the effect that this gives wide and sweeping controls; it is an abdication of control by parliament. But, Mr. Speaker, surely those hon. gentlemen do not think that if the situation did boil up in the oil industry, and it could do so very quickly, we should have to wait for the summoning of another session of parliament to amend the act to bring those provisions into effect. It has been argued that it has made the position of the Borden commission impossible. But surely the situation is that the Borden commission will make its recommendations in connection with oil matters. Without binding itself in any specific way, the government has now made an open ruling. It may adopt the recommendations, not only of the Borden commission, but from other sources for dealing with the problem when it arises. I cannot see why there should be this criticism.

I can conceive, for example, of a situation arising. Last March there were price cuts in the pipe line rate of from 5 to 12 cents a barrel, and posted purchase prices for light crude were dropped from 14 to 17 cents a barrel. This meant an over-all price cut of between 19 and 29 cents a barrel in eastern Canada. What it really meant was a reduction of $25 million to the producers in western Canada. But no sooner was that cut introduced than we saw a matching reduction in the price of off-shore crude, so that the net result of the reduction was absorbed by the oil producers of western Canada.

We must also study, and with some concern, the effect of the potential movement of off-shore crude by tanker through the St. Lawrence seaway, which at the moment cannot be assessed.

People, including the premier of Alberta, have tried to lay the blame for the present situation with respect to the marketing of oil at the door of this administration. As pointed out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day, quotas on imports and so forth which might be imposed by the Canadian government could have many serious short range implications; indeed, it could very seriously complicate our foreign trade position. I do not say it necessarily will but there are warning signs. We can see the warning that there are difficulties ahead. Unless the position drastically worsens, it would not appear that quotas are the immediate answer.

A suggestion has been made by certain people, including the premier of Alberta, that the federal government should call together the major companies to allocate to their eastern refineries more western crude. This proposal could be considered but I am just wondering whether the premier of my own province has done anything in this regard. After all, his contacts with the oil company have been constant and repeated over the years and one would assume that he would have some influence with these companies. I wonder what would be his government's constructive contribution to the solution of the oil marketing problem.

May we now return to the field of natural gas. Like all Albertans I look forward to an early decision on the export of this form of energy and I am sure the government is moving toward this goal. I would, however, urge upon the government to not lose sight of the fact that the passage of months before a decision is reached on export could result in the loss of an entire year from the point of view of the industry. I need not point out in detail to the house the implications of delay on employment in the pipe line construction industry and on the oil well supply firms, on our steel mills and our fabricator mills. The oil industry is marking time. It is upon this background of which I am sure the government is aware that we are making progress toward a decision.

On the other hand I find somewhat morally dishonest any statement that there have been unjustifiable and unnecessary delays in considering applications, let us say, of West Coast Transmission and Alberta and Southern Gas. After all, if we look at the record, the Alberta conservation board made its report on the application of these two companies on March 18 last and the government decision authorizing export was made on April 7 last. No sooner had that decision been made than we heard allegations from certain government sources in the province of Alberta that it was all due to the delay of the federal government that we did not have immediate export of natural gas.

The answer to that criticism, if indeed it can be deemed a criticism, is this. Even if it had the machinery in existence, how could this administration consider a hypothetical question? It must be remembered that the export of natural gas is a two-phase operation. First of all we must consider export in excess of the needs of a province. This must be determined. We have the decisions in the case of the Alberta gas conservation board. Second, we have to consider the needs of Canada as a whole to determine whether there will be export from this country.

I am not going to speak on the application of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited which is now before this administration or on the new application now before the Alberta gas conservation board. It would appear to me, however, that Trans-Canada may now be shifting its feet since its appearance before the Borden commission. It now wants a further 420 billion cubic feet over 22 years so as to export 200 million cubic feet a day through Emerson. It would now appear that if the company is to fulfil its export quota it would have to use some of its Canadian allotment over the next few years.

It is not my intention this afternoon to go into detail in outlining the differences between the principles of the bill and the recommendations of the Borden commission. Other speakers dealt with this at considerable length the other day, particularly the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith).

My own opinion of the speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) is that he has not read the bill or if he has read it he certainly does not understand it. I would have thought that clause 44 was a full answer to his remarks saving those which were of a strictly doctrinaire, partisan nature. The people of Canada have given their opinion as to the value they place on such remarks and the people who espouse them.

I should like to endorse the remarks made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) about the change in attitude in Saskatchewan when they first approached the problem of oil and gas. Oh yes, we had all sorts of comments like those put forward by hon. members in the far left corner about controls but the net result was that there was drilling and no activity for years until the Saskatchewan government saw the light and acted just a little more favourably. They have now gone a long way from their original position, but that is not the position hon. members of the C.C.F. take in this house today.

As far as the Liberals are concerned, it would be interesting to see what has been their attitude on gas. In 1951-52 they were unalterably opposed to the export of gas not only from Canada—why, they would not even consider that point—but from the province of Alberta. Then last year during the course of the election campaign I seem to recall that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) at some meetings in Saskatchewan promised to grant a permit to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited for the immediate export of gas; but at the same time his provincial colleagues were introducing a motion in the legislature of Alberta which would have required specific reference to the provincial legislature for the granting of any new export permit or the increase of any existing permit. In other words, they were going to take the powers away from the Alberta gas conservation board and so we had the two of them going by divergent paths. This illustrates that the Liberal attitude on oil and gas has not been consistent over the years.

In so far as the Conservative party in Alberta is concerned it has consistently been in favour of the export of gas under appropriate conditions. As far back as 1952 it advocated the greatest possible participation by Canada in the financing of oil and gas pipe lines. I am glad to observe that clause 44 specifies that this is one of the conditions that the energy board will or may consider—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May.

Mr. Lambert: Yes, and undoubtedly will.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): It does not say that.

Mr. Lambert: Undoubtedly this will be considered in the issuing of pipe line permits.

In 1952 I remember being among those who fashioned a plan of classified and limited financial participation by Albertans and other Canadian citizens similar in principle to the plan later adopted by the Alberta government in the setting up of the financial structure of the Alberta Gas Trunk Pipe Lines Company.

I feel that in the main this is a good bill but I have one suggestion to make. Bearing in mind the question of appeal in matters of law and jurisdiction I would have preferred to see an acceptance of the principle of the right of appeal with respect to tolls and tariffs; that is, the setting of tolls, the revocation and variation of tolls and traffic.

However, that right does not appear in the bill, but I would commend it to the serious consideration of the government. In the event this suggestion is not acceded to, perhaps one might hope for a favourable review or consideration of the matter in the working out of the bill with respect to this particular phase.

I should like to conclude by indicating what I think has been the reaction of the industry to this bill. In so doing, I should like to cite the words of the president of the Canadian petroleum association who, when asked to comment on this bill on May 23 last, had this to say:

> The actions of government show an apparent desire to expedite the export of natural gas. The Canadian petroleum association has been pleased that some of the more extreme measures that have been suggested in the past do not appear in the bill, but the full effect of some of the regulatory powers contained in the bill will have to be judged by their application. In the interest of accelerating the movement of gas, the Canadian petroleum association does not wish to make any further comment at this time.

May I again congratulate the government upon bringing forward this bill and upon taking action which we hope, before too long, may see some regulated activity in the field of the gas industry. I would commend this bill to the house.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; does Your Honour intend to rule on the amendment at this stage or do you wish to hear representations upon it?

Mr. Speaker: I thought I would leave it, if the debate goes on, until after the dinner adjournment. If the house is ready for the question, I would rule on the amendment immediately.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I was wondering if the hon. member would permit a question before he resumed his seat?

Mr. Lambert: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Does the hon. member think it was a change in the policy of the Saskatchewan government or a change in the policy of the companies in Saskatchewan which caused the oil industry to pick up in that province? If, as he has indicated, he believes it was a change in the policy of the government, could he outline any specific change in policy?

Mr. Lambert: It would strike me, if my memory serves me right, that there was a considerable change in the attitude of the Saskatchewan government.

[Mr. Lambert.]

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Could you outline that change, please?

Mr. Lambert: I am sorry but I cannot pinpoint that at the moment. However, that is my definite impression.

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, if I rise to take part in this debate on second reading of Bill No. C-49, which is to establish a new board known as an energy board in our country, it is not because I feel I have the technical knowledge to discuss the objects and principles of the bill. However, I am pleased to state these objects and principles were well put before the house by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) last Friday afternoon. However, there are certain principles which I feel, as the representative of Nickel Belt, I should like to discuss because, as many hon. members have said, this bill is of great interest to the people of Canada, and possibly of even greater interest to the people of northern Ontario. It is in this area that these various forms of energy are of extreme importance in the development of industry.

The purpose of this bill is to establish a commission or board which, in the interests of the Canadian people, will be asked to regulate the construction and operation of oil and gas pipe lines, and to make regulations with respect to tolls, the export and import of gas and also the export of hydro. However, it is also of interest to note that the board is to study and review, on behalf of the people of Canada all matters pertaining to forms of energy which come within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. It is in this regard that the proper constitution of this new board becomes of importance.

There are, however, many indications of contradictions between the principles of the bill and the opinions expressed by members of the government. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) will agree that even the statement he made in introducing this bill had to be explained to this house and the people of Canada because it had been misconstrued. Everyone in Canada is familiar with the pipe line debate. This debate takes on an added significance now because we see the people who at that time made such strong protests against the expansion and transportation of the gas industry in Canada now bearing the responsibility for creating a new board which necessarily will regulate the transportation of gas.

Furthermore, I may say that the members of the Conservative party who have, on occasion, obstructed the expansion and transportation of gas in Canada now find their names linked in my province with profit making in the construction of the gas pipe line. Of course, this bill will introduce into the development of forms of energy certain regulations but, as we all know, as society grows in Canada and elsewhere a certain amount of regulation is required. I agree with this. I am a great believer in the principle in medio stat virtus. There is no doubt that if we do have to have regulations, they must necessarily be just and proper under the circumstances. There would be great danger in Canada in either going too far, or having no regulations at all.

In this connection, I should like to place on the record the words of Mr. Askew, in his submission on behalf of the Sun Oil Company to the Borden commission, concerning this problem of infringing upon the liberty of people who try to better the development of industries in which they are interested. Mr. Askew had this to say as reported in the bulletin of the Sun Oil Company. He said:

> The flight from this philosophy has been characterized by a growing effort to place the planning of the economic affairs of men in the hands of government, and increasingly to substitute rule by agencies, bureaux and boards for rule by law. The process continues, despite repeated evidence from history, extending from the days of Confucius to modern times, that rather than contribute to the material well-being of the people, it tends to dull and eventually to snuff out the very inventiveness, ingenuity and enterprise upon which economic progress is based.
> It is upon these considerations that we urge a long, hard look at the proposed national energy board and the functions and authorities to be assigned to it. No matter how innocuous may their charter seem, such agencies have been shown by history to yield to irresistible pressures to extend their activities, compound their regulations, and confuse those over whom they have jurisdiction. They tend to become foci for every unrest, and soon are engaged less in protecting the people than in equalizing competitive capabilities. In this process they negate inherent economic advantage and deny its benefit to people.

I realize, of course, that although regulations are necessary, they must follow a proper and just norm and not be subjected to political pressures which in this bill I feel are seen necessarily to crop up. In this bill which brings about in Canada such an important innovation as this new board to regulate energy, the first principle which should apply is that the members of parliament should be given the proper information on which to make that decision for the Canadian people whom they represent. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) before the elections had a great deal to say on this matter of an energy board. I should like to quote for the benefit of the house, his remarks in 1957, namely on February 4, when he was speaking at the annual dinner of the Toronto board of trade. That is nearly two and one-half years ago. The Prime Minister then had this to say:

> There is a need now for the setting up of a Canadian national energy board, with its membership composed of technical personnel, who might be selected by the president of the national research council of business organizations, of the dominion and provincial governments, to the end that the most effective use of the energy resources of Canada, in the interests of the public welfare, may be assured. We have vast resources of gas and oil and coal and uranium. I believe the time has come to set up such a board, whose duty it would be to advise and to recommend proposals regarding these resources—

Mr. Speaker, this is over two and one-half years ago. I feel there is something which is not readily understood, namely why this government had to wait for those two and one-half years, especially in the light of its conduct in the last few days when, extremely swiftly, it has presented this difficult bill, as mentioned by many hon. members. This bill, consisting of 101 sections and 28 pages, as was stated, is placed before the house for a decision in this abrupt manner although the government has stated this was an emergency matter over two and one-half years ago.

In addition, members of this parliament were not furnished with certain reports and studies which necessarily were made for the preparation of this new law which we are now discussing. On that score, Mr Speaker, I should like to refer to the report of the department of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) as far back as the year 1957. I am reading from the annual report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for 1957, at page 54, where the minister indicated that they had formed what he called the energy studies branch of his department:

> The main functions of the branch are to develop systematic records and analyses relating to energy matters; to prepare studies on current energy problems requiring policy decisions in this and other departments and agencies; and to provide information and assistance to the numerous departments and agencies which are concerned with one or more aspects of energy matters.

Later on at page 55 we read the following:

> It was occupied, during 1957, with studies on such questions as those relating to natural gas pipe line development, export policy for natural gas, policy relating to supervision of transmission rates and sale prices for natural gas, policy on thermal electric power developments, the effect of United States oil import restrictions on the Canadian petroleum industry, and United States proceedings related to the importation of Canadian natural gas.

Later on the same subject of energy we read the following:

> Most of the study papers prepared during the period have necessarily been confidential.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is possibly the person from whom it is most difficult to obtain information by way of reports placed before the house. Since he has made reference in his own report to these studies and reports I feel that it would have been necessary that he allow the members of parliament, the representatives of the Canadian people whose interests we are trying to protect in the matter of energy in Canada, to have that knowledge before the study and the passing of this extremely important bill.

We find something further on that score, speaking on this matter of the interests of the public and the contention that the public should be informed. We find something similar which again illustrates the conduct of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to what is done with reports and studies which should be made available to the representatives of the Canadian people, the members of parliament.

Mr. Churchill: What accusation are you making as to what I have done with regard to reports? Do you mind repeating it?

Mr. Godin: I am saying that the minister in his own report for the year 1957 states that many reports and analyses were made and so on. We have no such reports available. In his report he states that he considers them to be confidential. We see this in the bill, Mr. Speaker, and the minister may take note of this matter and possibly bring about an amendment. Clause 23 reads as follows:

23. Studies and reports of the board made under this part may be made public with the approval of the minister.

There again we see politics entering into the matter of the interests of the Canadian people and their protection. In the very bill which is before us his action shows the attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce toward the information which should be known to the representatives of the people here in this house.

The same thing is found in the principle by which the appointments will be made and public knowledge offered. In other words, it is a bill which will permit a sort of closed shop, a tool for the cabinet. In reading the bill we find this. I should like to refer to the principle indicated in clause 85 (2). The Canadian people do not even know whether or not they have a bill dealing with the energy board. In that clause it is stated that the minister may, through the governor in council, declare any class of persons or areas not covered by this bill. It reads as follows:

(2) The governor in council may by regulation exempt any person or class of persons or any product or class of products or any transactions, persons or areas from the operation of all or any of the provisions of this part or the regulations.

Is it not clear to the house that the Canadian people may have a bill or they may not have a bill? If you pass the bill, you possibly give the Canadian people absolutely nothing because it will remain absolutely in the hands of the cabinet and the government and in that way it will become necessarily a political tool.

Again we have further provisions where we elaborate on the principle whereby five men in Canada will compose this board and regulate it. On the other hand, in the very next clause, we give one member of the board absolute power. This is done after creating a most expensive board. I am not sure that I know exactly how many there should be. It may be proper to have five; but this principle enunciated in the very next clause is to the effect that one member of the board can do absolutely anything on behalf of any five members, except possibly a very few things. There are so few that they are enumerated, and they indicate that one member of the board of five can do absolutely everything alone, according to the act, except for a very few exceptions. So once again the principle is indicated in this bill that the Canadian people, after the constitution of a very expensive board, will see themselves regulated by possibly one member of that board.

For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I think that the bill is lacking in many respects. It does not afford the Canadian people the protection of their interests which the minister himself stated the bill was meant to do. He spoke about necessary speed. We have been faced with a delay of two and a half years, and now there is pressure over possibly two and a half days. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) indicated that what was required in this matter of energy was aggressiveness and vision, but what do we find? In his own speech he stated that he recognized that in the province of Alberta the progress of the gas and oil industry has been visibly indicated for the last twelve years. That certainly cannot be to the credit of this government.

Mr. Speaker, in all fairness I believe that an energy board is the necessary instrument to protect Canadian affairs, but I do say that this bill in certain respects falls short of giving to the Canadian people the assurance that we mean to give them when we say that we will now have the constitution of a body which will protect their interests.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the permission of the house we shall now await the return of Mr. Speaker, who I believe wishes to rule on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin).

Mr. Speaker: The house is ready for the question, I understand?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker; we are ready to hear your ruling on the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I indicated earlier I would leave it until after the adjournment. However, if everyone is here and content to proceed with the matter now, I shall be glad to rule on it.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, are you going to hear argument on this point?

Mr. Speaker: Yes. I thought that before I heard argument I would indicate that it appeared to me that the amendment was not relevant, and therefore the onus is on those supporting the amendment to prove that it is acceptable. I therefore propose to call on any hon. member who wishes to argue to the contrary.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on September 2, 1958, as reported on page 4503 of Hansard, Your Honour went to considerable length to determine what is and what is not in order in regard to possible amendments to a bill on second reading. If I may read from what you had to say on that occasion, you quoted from May as follows:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move what is known as a "reasoned amendment" . . . A reasoned amendment is placed on the paper in the form of a motion and may fall into one of several categories.

I am only going to repeat No. 1:

> It may be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.

Then we have a fairly large number of precedents where we had amendments on second reading of a bill, and occasions where Your Honour allowed amendments. Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer you to July 30, 1958, when the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) moved an amendment to the excise tax bill as reported on page 2864 of Hansard in the following terms:

> That this bill be not read a second time until further consideration has been given to the repeal or reduction of the excise tax on motor cars.

Then on September 2, 1958—that was the day of your explanation, Mr. Speaker, as you understood these amendments—the member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) moved, as reported on page 4510 of Hansard:

> This house declines to proceed with a bill the fundamental terms of which are repugnant to the spirit and objectives of the treaty obligations of Canada under GATT.

Then there was another motion in 1958 moved by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) to the effect that a bill be not read a second time until further consideration was given to the possibility of making tax free gifts from husbands to wives effective in the province of Quebec to the same extent as in the rest of Canada. The hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) also moved on September 2, 1958, as reported on page 4476 of Hansard:

> That this bill be not now read a second time because of new provisions for arbitrary valuations which transfer the tariff-making authority from parliament to the minister and the cabinet, contrary to the principles of responsible government and the essential right of parliament to tax.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you have ruled a number of these amendments out of order because they dealt as to a particular. However, may I repeat that you did endorse what May had to say in regard to an amendment being declaratory of some principle adverse to, or different from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill, and may I in that regard call your attention to our amendment:

> That this bill be not read a second time until further consideration has been given to the public ownership of interprovincial gas and oil pipe lines.

We feel that this very definitely is an amendment to the principle contained in the bill now before us.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to thank the hon. member for his concise and very pertinent argument. The amendment is one of that type which is permissible on second reading, that is to say, is declaratory of a principle adverse to the bill, and my reason for not considering it acceptable is that the principle is not relevant to the bill. The doctrine of relevancy applies to amendments which are declaratory of an adverse principle; in other words, the adverse principle must be one which comes within the reasonable limits of what the bill seeks to do itself.

Now this bill sets up a board, whereas the substance of the amendment is to declare for nationalization or public ownership of interprovincial oil and pipe lines which seems to me to go far beyond anything which could reasonably be said to be relevant to the bill as it is now before the house. The purpose of the bill, as the explanatory note says, is to create a board, and the board is for the purpose of regulating the operation of oil and gas pipe lines, fixing tolls and giving advice. There are three or four main functions of the board but, basically, the principle of the bill is to establish a board to regulate the industry, including electricity.

To attempt to declare as a contrary principle that consideration ought to be given to the nationalization of something which might be within the regulatory powers of the board seems to me to be going far beyond the broad limit and scope of the bill as it stands to be considered by the house, and therefore I consider the amendment not to be within the precedents which the hon. member has stated, for the reason that it goes too far afield from the principle of the bill.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, we heard the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) read a quotation expressing the sentiments of the Canadian petroleum association in connection with the deliberations on the bill now before us.

The hon. member obviously indicated, when he did that, that he is concerned with the welfare of those who invest in the development of Canadian natural gas and oil enterprises, and with the welfare of those who invest in Canadian gas and oil pipe lines. And he indicates, using the submission of the Canadian petroleum association to bolster his argument, that he is concerned with the investors in these enterprises and in the future welfare of these investors.

This reminds me of the philosophy so often expounded in this House of Commons and so successfully sold for so long to the people of Canada by a recent member of this house, the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, who seemed to contend that as long as our economy was expanding, and as long as those who were investing money were able to provide the stimulus which would provide employment, we had better forget the high price which the Canadian people would eventually have to pay for this continuous and often reckless expansion in certain lines of the Canadian economy.

The C.C.F., as is well known, has always maintained the primary position that the resources of Canada belong to the people as a whole. We agree that investment in Canadian enterprises has to be safeguarded. We are willing to go a little beyond that, and agree that risks must be adequately compensated. If we did not agree to the safeguarding of invested capital and to the compensation of risk capital we realize that the development of our economy would have to operate under a very severe handicap indeed. However, basically we feel that the goods and riches of the world are meant for the mass of the people of the world, and when we look at a bill such as the one before us to set up a national energy board we first of all must ask ourselves: how are the interests of the Canadian people likely to be affected by the implementation of this measure?

We believe that a bill of this nature would be able to do much in the interests of the people as a whole. However, I could not help being impressed by the arguments put forward last week by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) who expressed the opinion that after looking over the bill a number of times he had come to the conclusion that the proposed energy board was designed to be nothing more nor less than a stooge for the government of Canada. Although the powers of the board might in certain circumstances, under certain governments which may some day be elected, be quite extensive and even beneficial to the welfare of the Canadian people, it is envisaged in the terms of the bill now before us that any action or any attitude of the proposed energy board would be completely dependent upon the whims of the government in office at any particular time.

I believe it might be wise to look for a while at the origins of the bill now before us and at the origins of the Borden commission whose recommendation supplied the initiative to the government with regard to this bill. We had a very lengthy debate in the House of Commons a couple of years ago on the subject of the trans-Canada pipe line, and I believe that the debate at that time was more than any other single factor responsible for the House of Commons now being faced with this national energy board measure.

Mr. Speaker: Would this be a convenient place for the hon. member to call it six o'clock?

Was there a motion to be made?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I was intending to make a motion at eight o'clock. I do not have it with me.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose for the dinner recess I was beginning to outline the origins of the bill now before us and I mentioned at the time that the initial impetus for a bill of this kind was the debate in the house a number of years ago concerning the building of a trans-Canada pipe line for the transmission of natural gas. The opinion of the Liberals and the Social Credit party in the house at that particular time was that this pipe line ought to be built immediately at any price. There were in the house at that time in addition the official opposition, the Progressive Conservatives, and the group of which I am a member, the C.C.F., who had the feeling that the pipe line ought not to be built at any price; that the pipe line ought to and might be built at a price that the Canadian people would be prepared to pay and in a manner in which the pipe line would operate in the interests of the people of the nation as a whole.

We all remember very well indeed how the member for Eglinton, now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) at the time felt so keenly about the actions of the government of the day that he had himself expelled for the time being as a member of the house, and the Union Jack was placed over the desk of the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think it is incorrect for the member to say that the hon. member for Eglinton had himself expelled from this house. He should withdraw that statement; it is not true.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, I will amend that and say that the hon. member was expelled from the house because of his insistence that the interests of the Canadian people were being violated by the actions of the government of the day. I notice that the hon. member for Eglinton is not in his place in the house at the present time. I would recommend to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough), who was so adept several years ago at bringing in an appropriate flag at the time, that she now bring in a skull and cross bones flag and hang it over the desk of the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Lambert: More demagogy.

Mr. Regier: Because the bill assures us that the piracy which at that time was being condemned so vigorously by the hon. member for Eglinton is now being condoned and being aided and abetted by that same member for Eglinton. The skull and cross bones indicating the flag of the pirates would now aptly replace the flag of the patriot of only a few months ago.

We also heard at that time the leader of the official opposition, now the High Commissioner of Canada in the United Kingdom, for whom I may say I have the highest regard. Regardless of any disagreements I may have had with him at the time I always realized that he was at heart one of the most honest members that this house has ever seen. He admitted in the final analysis, after his attempts to get Canadian financing for this trans-Canada natural gas pipe line to replace United States financing, after he realized that Canadian financiers were not available, as he had wished them to be, that at long last public ownership was the only answer. The present leader of the Conservatives, our Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), fought an election on this issue and he largely won that election in 1957; he at least obtained the right to form a government, even though it was a minority government. Rather than take measures to implement the expectations of the electorate at the time in this regard, he decided in his wisdom to evade the issue for the time being, in that he appointed a royal commission. We at that time, through our leader, M. J. Coldwell, expressed our reservations as to the members of the commission. However, we must admit that the members of the commission, in several major aspects at least, placed national interest above their personal prejudices and feelings, and brought in a number of recommendations. We regret very much that the government of the day has ignored the major recommendations of the Borden commission.

At the time the Borden commission was appointed, and in the election after, my national leader had this to say on March 5 last in the Richmond high school in British Columbia:

> The pipe line scandal of today is on a par with the railway scandals of the past. The promoters of the railways of that time even have been outdone by the promoters of the pipe lines of today. The fortunes made by Mackenzie and Mann as well as others as a result of government assistance to railway construction have their parallel in the fortunes made by Tanner and Coates and McMahon as well as others. The whole sordid story of quick fortunes being made by a few at the expense of the public is being repeated today and old-line party governments whether Liberal or Conservative are doing nothing about it.

Again, on March 6, my national leader, in a C.B.C. radio speech, had this to say:

> You will remember too, how the Conservatives denounced the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company, and how vigorously they attacked the Liberal cabinet policy on the pipe line. Oh, what a tragedy is there; for today Liberal and Conservative, alike, vote together to protect the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company, that company and that policy which the Conservatives denounced as an iniquitous proposal, an infamous proposal, the greatest betrayal of the Canadian people since confederation, a caricature of national development.
> Yet, the present government is doing the same as the Liberals before them and they voted against the C.C.F. motion expressing what the Conservatives had advocated.

My national leader also said on March 11 in the city of Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan:

> Mr. Diefenbaker has failed to right a great wrong, the wrong done to the people of Canada in the trans-Canada pipe line deal. He led the people to believe that he was sincere in his denunciations of what he described as "a nefarious deal". He led the people to believe that under the Conservatives something would be done about it. But now the Conservative government opposes as "socialism", the very policy that they supported while in the opposition, namely, the public ownership of the line.

Mr. McPhillips: Who is your national leader?

Mr. Regier: My national leader is M. J. Coldwell, such a leader as no other political party in Canada has ever seen—

Mr. McPhillips: Where is he now?

Mr. Regier: —and is not likely to see again for a considerable time. The conduct of the Liberal party in this debate is, of course, an utter disgrace. They have nothing to say. They say they are going back to the grass roots. However, we notice no repentance, no change of heart, no change of policy. I have heard three or four of their members take part in the debate and I am unable to decide what their opinion is. I realize that they are very anxious for the conclusion of the debate at an early hour and that their leader is now anxious to participate and wind up the debate on behalf of the Liberals. I realize that the Liberals are embarrassed, that they do not want a debate on this issue. They only want to straddle both sides of the fence hour after hour and when the vote comes no doubt they will find that they are able to support the government and able to support the buccaneers and the racketeers from the state of Texas.

We have not only had a number of racketeers from south of the border but there have also been a couple of Canadian racketeers involved in this matter. In the province of Ontario a number of leading people unfortunately got themselves rather involved. I come from the province of British Columbia and when a cabinet minister does wrong in our province he ends up behind bars eventually even though it may take a number of years. However, when cabinet ministers do wrong in the province of Ontario they again ask the public for an expression of their confidence at the next election. All I can say is that I hope the wintry frost will very soon leave the minds of the voters of the province of Ontario.

An hon. Member: What a hope.

Mr. Regier: When I look at the bill I am reminded of the attitude expressed in this house year in and year out by the former member for Cape Breton South in his appeals for the establishment of a national energy board that would include all forms of energy so that we might develop our resources in the interest of all parts of the dominion. In this regard I am convinced that if a national plebiscite were held now on this one issue, without the varnish, the propaganda, the show, the circus that accompanies our national elections, and the people of Canada were asked, shall public utilities be publicly owned, there would be no doubt as to the outcome.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has been coming back from time to time to the question of nationalization of interprovincial oil and gas companies, which was the subject of an amendment that I considered to be out of order. Therefore, I think that issue should not be debated as part of this debate. I have not stopped the hon. member but I hope he will not proceed too far on that line because in my view it is irrelevant.

Mr. Regier: I must say, Mr. Speaker, that even though you have ruled the amendment out of order the house has not made a decision and the arguments I am presenting are not in exactly the same position as if the house had made a decision on this issue. However, I am willing to abide by your ruling.

I should like to point out that the bill falls far short of the recommendations of the royal commission on energy, more commonly known as the Borden commission. I notice that on page 28 there is the following recommendation:

> That the prices, tolls, rates or tariffs of a company owning or operating an oil or gas pipe line, as regulated by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, should be just and reasonable, non-discriminatory and calculated to yield a fair rate of return on the shareholders' equity—

I should like to emphasize the words, "shareholders' equity."

> —after making due allowance for reasonable and proper operating expenses, depreciation, interest, income and other taxes.

I have a few things I should like to say about the recommendation of the Borden commission that there should be a fair return on the shareholders' equity. I notice that the bill has no provision along this line. We are now faced with a bill that would allow the owners of any pipe line company to obtain what may be considered a fair return on the over-all investment. I should like to give one example. The original investment in the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company was roughly $100 million. The shareholders' equity was $15 million. The remaining $85 million was supplied by the insurance companies of the United States and Canada.

Assuming that this pipe line earns a net return after taxes of $8 million, on the investment of $100 million that would be a net return of 8 per cent. However, in the bill before us the government has ignored the recommendations of the Borden commission and is apparently perfectly willing to allow any pipe line company to declare earnings on the over-all investment. In this case it would be 8 per cent. However, if we consider $8 million net earnings after taxes, and the earnings have been that high, we find that the net earnings would amount to 53⅓ per cent after taxes on the shareholders' equity and,

I might add, after most unusual depreciation allowances that are being permitted at the present time. If the Borden commission recommendations were to be pursued, therefore, and allowed for in the bill now before us, that would help in no small measure to protect the interests of the consumers involved.

Another recommendation of the royal commission on energy is to be found on page 36 of the report. Paragraph No. 18 says:

> An examination of the financial statements of Montreal Pipe Line Company Limited and those of Portland Pipe Line Corporation, shows the combined net income (after payment of income tax) of the companies for the years 1953-57 inclusive represented the following rates of return on the shareholders' equity at the beginning of each of the respective years:

For the year 1953, the percentage of return was 15.66; 1954, the percentage of return was 9.94; 1955, 20.45; 1956, 19.51; 1957, 14.76.

Now these returns, Mr. Speaker, in our opinion, and also in the opinion of the Borden commission are excessive. They are needlessly high, and it is our firm belief that while capital invested and risk capital have to be adequately compensated, there is no need for rates of return running as high as 53 per cent on the basis of shareholders' equity.

We listened with a great deal of interest to the claim of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) the other day when he said that one of the major problems of the bill was that this new energy board would have only limited authority, and that its authority was going to be subject in all major matters to the whims and wishes of the government of the day. We regret also that the bill does not allow for any provincial representation. We realize that authority in this matter is divided between the national government and our provincial governments. However, in the arrangements that are offered for the establishment of the board, our provincial governments are not going to be given any say in any manner, shape or form. The whole arrangement is for an organization designed to implement and to give effect to the wishes of the government of the day. We feel that this is not necessarily always in the interests of the people of the country.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat may be surprised to learn that I am speaking on this bill without any embarrassment whatever. The fact that I am the fourth member of our party in the house to speak also shows that we are not, as a party, embarrassed in discussing this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is an important bill dealing with the subject of energy resources which is as important for the development of this country as any subject can be. We are debating this matter today, May 25, 1959, and it is a long time since February 4, 1957 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in Toronto—these words have already been put on the record in this debate—said that the need was now for setting up a Canadian national energy board, and that the time had come to establish such a board. Four days after that statement, he said the same thing in the House of Commons.

The Prime Minister had his opportunity when the House of Commons met in October, 1957, and he was the head of the government. There was no mention in the speech from the throne at that time of the establishment of an energy board. Indeed, on October 15, I think it was, three days after the speech from the throne, the Prime Minister announced, not an energy board but a royal commission to look into the matter and to make recommendations. This royal commission, Mr. Speaker, put this whole question into a deep freeze for 19 months, for obvious reasons, and during that time I think I am right in saying that nothing was heard in this parliament about government policies dealing with this vital matter of energy resources, and national development as affected by energy resources. This is in contrast, Mr. Speaker, to what we heard on the subject from so many members of the government in earlier years when they were sitting on this side of the house.

On March 14, 1958, during the election campaign, the Prime Minister did tell the country in Calgary, in words that have also been put on the record, that the government would act immediately after the interim report of the Borden commission. This word "immediately" is now so often used by the government in statements about what it is going to do that the particular coinage has become debased, in fact there were more than six months between the interim report of this commission and the resolution dealing with the energy board which was put on the order paper on April 23 of this year. The resolution was in very general terms, and did not give us much opportunity to speculate on the type of bill that would be based on it.

The bill itself was discussed a month or so, almost a month, after the resolution was first introduced. Then, Mr. Speaker, as you know, within 24 hours of the receipt of the bill or the tabling of the bill, we were to be asked to take decisions with regard to it. That period was later extended by a day or so. It was a period which would not have given members on this side of the house the opportunity to which they were entitled to make a real study and analysis of the bill and would not have given an opportunity for the expression of views by interests concerned in the country with this important matter.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we naturally wondered why, after such a long delay, there should have been so much haste. As was stated this afternoon by my friend the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard), I think it was, this is another example of inept handling on the part of the government of an extremely important piece of legislation. Here we have had long delay, without any discussion or without any information on the matter, folowed by a sudden, ill-considered burst of speed in order to make up for the loss of time, by the introduction of legislation which was to be decided without any delay. We are becoming familiar with that particular pattern of activity in this house.

I suggest, as other hon. members on this side of the house have already suggested, that that delay was quite unnecessary. Surely it is now clear—as indeed we on this side of the house stated would be the case at that time—that the appointment of the Borden commission was merely an unnecessary delaying tactic, and that it was not necessary for that commission to go into this matter as it is still going into it in order for the government to have made up its mind as to what it wished to do. As a matter of fact, the proof of that contention is that the government is now largely by-passing—as so many hon. members have pointed out—the first report of the commission, while the legislation which is now before us has been introduced before the second report of the commission has even been submitted. The commission, however, has accomplished its purpose in providing an extremely useful delaying tactic for the government at a price, as was pointed out last Friday, of some $300,000 or more.

In his statement last Friday the minister admits that the major part of this bill before us comes almost textually from the Pipe Lines Act and from the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act and that most of the other provisions that are not textually from those two acts, including the creation of a national energy board, were recommended in the Gordon Commission report. That report, which was in the hands of the government in 1957 and which included a special study of this question of gas and oil, surely provided the government with sufficient information on which it could have acted if it had desired to do so, especially as the present bill now before us has in effect repudiated the major recommendations of the commission which followed the Gordon report.

This particular bill is an even more drastic repudiation of all the feverish words and emotional arguments put forward by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his colleagues, including the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), during the pipe line and earlier debates on this general subject of energy. The present bill contains no provision to realize the Prime Minister's vision of Canadian resources development by Canadians. It contains no safeguards, so often clamoured for and even recommended as desirable in the Borden report itself, to ensure the maximum possible Canadian ownership and control of resources development. It contains no provisions to encourage the processing of raw materials in Canada—that was another strong Conservative battle cry when in the opposition—through effective utilization for that purpose of our great sources of energy in this country; and I hope to have a word to say about that matter later. It contains no provisions—and we have heard a great deal about this matter also—for keeping Texas or other buccaneers out of our affairs or limiting the extremely exorbitant profits about which the Prime Minister and the minister used to get so indignant.

In this bill, Mr. Speaker, you will find nothing dealing with these matters. That which is contained in this bill could surely have been brought in, if the government had so desired, in October 1957. Had it been brought in then, time and money would have been saved and many months of uncertainty and confusion about government policy would have been avoided, which uncertainty and confusion, as the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) pointed out over a year ago, were bound to have an unsettling effect on the industries and areas most concerned.

As to the bill itself, may I say this. The hon. member for Calgary South, speaking at the resolution stage of the bill on May 18, had this to say as reported at page 3779 of Hansard:

> I can appreciate, as can most hon. members, the difficulty of the government in attempting to reconcile the two extreme views which have been expressed in relation to the Bordon royal commission, namely those on the one hand who have stated their belief that the industry should not be in any way restricted by regulation, and those on the other hand who believe that a tight form of legislation is required in the interests of Canadian consumers.

And the hon. member went on to say this:

It is my contention that it is not inconsistent to believe—

Whatever that may mean.

—that there can be introduced into and be passed by parliament a bill which, to a substantial degree, will satisfy both of these two extremes.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, according to the hon. member for Calgary South this is the kind of bill which will satisfy those on the one extreme who do not want any regulation at all and those on the other extreme who want a tight and complete regulation, as he put it. That is a fairly impossible objective for any piece of legislation, namely to satisfy both extremes and I do not think it is met by the bill that we have before us.

So far as the principle of the bill is concerned may I say this. As has already been stated—and I am happy to repeat it—the broad principle of this bill is satisfactory to this party. Of course, it should be satisfactory because in January, 1958 our party put itself on record in favour of a national energy authority. We therefore accept that principle because we stand by our platform. But as has already been pointed out, that does not mean that we support all the provisions of this bill or that we believe that this bill is adequate to implement the principle we support. On the contrary, we feel that this bill —and we shall try to point this out in more detail when we get to the committee stage— contains many sins of omission and commission.

Let me look for a moment at one extremely important function mentioned in the bill, that of research and investigation by the board. The administrative duties of the board which are proposed in this bill are limited by the bill itself to oil, gas and international power lines. But the functions of research and investigation and of report and recommendation are absolutely unlimited. They cover the whole field of energy, as I understand it, without any limitation whatever. Furthermore, clause 22 of the bill does not say that the board "may" study these matters. That particular clause says that the board "shall" study these matters. Hence we ask ourselves why there is this difference in the scope of the two main functions which are allocated by the bill to the board. This question becomes of special importance, because, as has already been pointed out, there are other agencies of government at this time which have research and advisory functions in the energy field which are not touched by this legislation. Obviously there arises the danger of duplication, with its resulting confusions, conflicts and waste. When the minister was discussing the resolution, long before we had the chance of seeing the bill, the minister said—I am paraphrasing what he said—that the major purpose of this bill was to consolidate, to coordinate, to pull together governmental functions in this field. On Monday, May 18, as reported at page 3766 of Hansard, the minister said that this legislation was in fulfilment of a long held objective of his party to bring this about, and to support that view he quoted a statement which the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) made on February 25, 1955, at page 1530 of Hansard for that year. This is the quotation of the Minister of Public Works put on record with much approval by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. The former member for Vancouver Quadra said:

We believe there is a great need for an over-all energy policy. Let us get away from dealing with the problem piecemeal with different departments concerned. It is not an efficient way to deal with these important matters.

That is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce quoted the present Minister of Public Works as saying in 1955, and he quoted him with approval. But the minister who introduced the bill did not remain convinced for very long of the validity of the argument of the Minister of Public Works, because on second reading last Friday the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us that all the existing agencies were to be left unchanged. Quoting from his statement last Friday, he said, as reported on page 3930 of Hansard:

While the board's advisory functions require that it be free to study any aspect of energy, we do not believe it would be profitable under present circumstances to disrupt the existing agencies involved in these related fields.

We know what these agencies are because they have been put on the record, but perhaps it is worth while repeating them to show how many government agencies are working in this field of research, analysis, examination and reporting on energy matters. There is the dominion coal board; the atomic energy control board; the international joint commission; the water resources branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources; the interdepartmental committee on energy; and the national research council. The danger of duplication and overlapping, confusion and conflict is obvious.

Now may I say a word about the regulatory functions of the proposed board, which is something we will be discussing in much greater detail when we are in committee. Those functions are limited in the present bill, at least at the moment, to the licensing of construction and operation of international power lines, export of power, construction and operation of interprovincial and international oil and gas pipe lines, the import and export of gas, and possibly the export and import of oil.

First, then, may I say a word about the regulatory functions which I have mentioned dealing with power. We on this side agree that these are matters which should be controlled by a public authority. There is not much difference of opinion between us on that score except that we are worried—we will have something to say about this in committee—about the suggestion by the minister that exceptional circumstances may justify the licensing of power exports for a period longer than one year. I am not sure whether he used the period of 25 years or not. The Gordon commission report points out that this might be necessary in changed circumstances, that it might be wise for the government to depart from the policy it has followed for many years of licensing from year to year. I am not taking issue with that in principle, but I do suggest that if this is to be done and these licences are to be extended for a longer period than one year, that should be done through parliamentary sanction rather than merely by order in council.

Then there is also a danger of duplication and conflict, and indeed confusion, in this question of control of the export of power. The minister knows perfectly well, of course, that the Canadian section of the international joint commission has at the present time the responsibility of studying and making recommendations regarding power projects in boundary waters and other public projects on international rivers which may be referred to the commission by the two governments of the United States and Canada. But under this proposed bill which is now before us, every project of this kind approved by the international joint commission and involving the construction of international power lines or the export of power will have to be reviewed and approved as well by the national energy board, and surely there is a danger of conflict there. Also under the International River Improvements Act which was passed in 1955 the same possibility of conflict and confusion arises between the licence which is required from the department concerned under that act and the obligation of the new board to review and consent to these matters. I believe that it would have been possible to have avoided these dangers of overlapping and confusion through a better allocation and integration of functions between the various governmental agencies concerned.

Then there is a third subject, the construction of gas pipe lines and the import and export of gas. We believe that it is right that natural gas service and its development as a public utility should be under government regulation. But we also believe that these regulations should be of a type and administered in such a way that will not encourage inefficiency. Under this bill export sales of gas will be contingent now upon approval by the provincial authorities, the national energy board, the governor in council, and the federal power commission of the United States. In the case of domestic and export long term contracts, you will have to deal with proven suppliers at one end and an established and responsible distributor at the other. We know that local franchises are involved, and political considerations, sometimes indefensible ones, arise at various levels of government, and we also know that profiteering can take place. Delay and disappointment are inevitable. That means that most promotions in this field require hearings, negotiations, interventions, reassessment of positions, all of which take a long time, and these delays add to costs. Where a project is finally approved, the ultimate terms and conditions often reduce its profitability far below earlier expectations. Therefore while we do agree, Mr. Speaker, that this field must be subject to public regulation, in the public interest the administrative set-up and the procedures designed for that purpose should be efficient, and should minimize delays and difficulties. Perhaps the government will be able to convince us that the machinery established in this bill for this purpose is the most effective which could have been drawn up.

Now I come to another subject, the export and import of oil. There should be no difficulty about the export of oil because I think we are all agreed that any interference by government in the export of oil should be reduced to a minimum, because it is of first importance to encourage in every way possible the export of our oil into United States markets, especially now when it is going to be a little easier than it would have been perhaps a month ago. But the import of oil is a different thing, and it is this aspect of the bill to which we take the greatest exception. On Friday last the minister said, and I quote from his statement as reported at page 3930 of Hansard:

> There is no requirement of national policy to be served at present by licensing the import of oil.

And, again, he said:

> It would seem unwise at the present moment to take any action by way of import control which might give rise to misunderstanding and possibly call the arrangement into question.

The arrangement he had in mind was the arrangement recently made with the United States. Then the minister added:

It would be premature to do so until the second report of the Borden commission in respect of this matter has been received and considered.

We share these views as to the undesirability of acting, even through parliament, at this time with regard to this matter, but what is the government doing now in this bill? In clause 87, in spite of the words of the minister that there is no necessity for action at this time, the government is asking for power by order in council to take action which, it says, is not necessary now and may not be necessary in the future. That power it to be used against one commercial import singled out from thousands of others, and a very important commercial import at that. And this power is not power to act through parliament, but power for the government to act by order in council and without any consideration of an emergency to justify this power being used, or the action taken. That is an astonishing request to be made of this house by a government which consists of members most of whom had some very strong words to use about this kind of thing a few years ago. What a betrayal of all the brave, emotional words used by members of the Conservative party during the debate on the Defence Production Act in 1955. Where are the memories of the impassioned appeals to the rights and privileges of parliament of those days? Have they so soon been forgotten? Where are the Pyms and Hampdens, the parliamentary flag wavers and flag wearers of those days?

Mr. Churchill: I am glad you recognized we were advocating freedom then.

Mr. Pearson: I am trying to show the minister the great departure there has been as evidenced in this action now, from the words used in those days; and this departure throws a very lurid light on the meaning of the words which were used at that time.

The excuse now is merely that things may have to be done in an emergency in order to deal with oil imports. That is the excuse given by the minister, that we might have to act quickly. But is the security of the nation at stake in this issue? Would there be no time to consult parliament in a matter of this kind? This, apparently, is the minister's argument, that there would be no time to consult parliament because it might be necessary to act quickly. That is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated, and I quote the words he used last Friday:

If the need arose it would in all probability arise quickly, and would require quick action to avert serious disruption. For this reason it is proposed to make the power applicable by proclamation.

But when the minister of trade and commerce a few years ago asked for discretionary power of this kind to be used in a national emergency only and not merely to deal with the import of a commodity, this is what the same hon. gentleman had to say about the minister of trade and commerce of that day, Mr. C. D. Howe:

He has appeared to prefer to do things quickly rather than by the slower methods of parliament.

That was the statement which the present Minister of Trade and Commerce made on June 13, 1955, as reported at page 4688 of Hansard.

And the Minister without Portfolio from Toronto (Mr. Macdonnell), the hon. member for Greenwood, had this to say in the same debate, and I wish he was in his seat tonight to hear me repeat these words. At that time, when the request was made for this power under order in council to deal, not with the import of a commodity but with a national emergency, these were the words he used:

This is arbitrary power. This is the antithesis of our way of life. This is the antithesis of the rule of law, described by Dicey when he says that wide arbitrary powers are the absolute antithesis.

I wonder whether, if the hon. gentleman were in his seat tonight, he could defend this particular provision? I wonder if he would vote for it? I wonder if he would give the sanction of his parliamentary prestige and purity to it?

And then there was the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton). I regret having to read these quotations in the absence of the ministers concerned, but in this same debate when the government of that day was asking for power by order in council, that hon. gentleman quoted these words with ardent approval from a British pamphlet, as reported on page 4732 for June 13.

Those who give and those who receive arbitrary power are alike criminal and there is no man but is bound to resist it to the best of his power, whenever it shall show its face in the world. It is a crime to bear it when it can be rationally shaken off. ...Law and arbitrary power are in dreadful enmity.

Of course, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) took part in this debate, and he was naturally even more emotional for the time being than any of the others. On June 28, 1955, as reported at page 5385 of Hansard, dealing with the request by the government of that day for power by order in council to deal with a national emergency, he had this to say:

Parliament! What is parliament to the minister? Parliament is not even to be permitted to be a partner with this all-powerful government in working out this program of defence production. Bring these matters to parliament? Why, the idea is unthinkable to this government opposite. What is parliament, anyway? Parliament to them is but a nuisance. We have had proof abundant today, sir; all this talk, all this poppycock about parliament is just lip service from this all-powerful government opposite.

However, it was the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself who put the matter best when he said, as reported at page 4688 and 4689:

> Normally ministers come to parliament and ask for extension of their powers or for special powers for special purposes and parliament examines the situation, makes the grant of power and withdraws it when the crisis has subsided.

And then he went on:

> There are no angels in the House of Commons, and precautions are necessary when we are entrusting the government of men to men.

There are no angels in the House of Commons today, especially on the government benches. The argument which the minister made at that time in respect of an application of powers to be used by order in council in respect of a national emergency surely applies one hundredfold to an application in this bill for power by order in council merely to deal with the import of a commercial commodity.

Mr. Churchill: Would the Leader of the Opposition permit a question? Has he not overlooked the fact that the debate on the Defence Production Act in 1955 hinged on the request of the government of that day to give those powers to the minister of trade and commerce in perpetuity? It was that to which we objected, and we said: come back to parliament every two years.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, these were powers to be used only in case of national emergency, and the minister must know that the bill as passed did not give the minister power in perpetuity; it gave the minister power for five years. The five-year period lapses, I may add, if the minister has forgotten, in a couple of weeks. But the minister's excuse is that we have to act quickly, never mind parliament, we have to act quickly in case we have to put restrictions on the import of oil. I cannot understand why there is this necessity for haste in the case of oil. Is it a question of defence and security, or oil sanctions, or something like that? These are some aspects of this bill, Mr. Speaker, which cause us anxiety on this side, and which we will deal with in more detail when we get to the committee stage.

I have already said that we would support the principle of the bill because we are in favour of the establishment of a national energy board; but I repeat that there are a good many features of this bill which we do not like and which we will do our best to get changed in the committee stage. We are not satisfied, as I have said, with the administrative set-up and the allocation of functions envisaged in this bill. We are convinced that the proposed arrangements will lead to duplication and possible conflict between the new board and other related existing government agencies. We think that in this bill—notwithstanding what the minister said about it on Friday and earlier—the government has failed to guard adequately against those dangers. We think it should have proposed at least a re-allocation of functions of some of those agencies, and indeed it might have brought some of those agencies under this board or under a single government department.

But while there is this danger of duplication on the administrative level there is also an important gap. There is no provision for consultation and liaison between the United States and Canada, and more particularly between the federal power commission and the national energy board. I know the minister discussed this the other night and he indicated why the government found it necessary to reject some of the recommendations of the Borden commission on this matter; but he did say that they were trying to work out satisfactory arrangements for liaison with the United States authorities. However, the minister must know that in most cases where those two agencies will be involved, the United States commission will have to issue an import permit—I am looking at it from the Canadian point of view—and the Canadian board will have to issue an export permit. The United States board and the Canadian board, I should think, would be bound, unless great care were exercised, to use different criteria. If there is no basic arrangement between the two countries, the applicants may have to travel between Washington and Ottawa without making very much progress, and perhaps for a very long time. In my view at least, that is likely to happen, and it would be most undesirable.

I do suggest to the minister, though I know he tried to deal with this the other night, that some basic arrangement in this field of energy between the two governments may well be required and be required quickly. Perhaps the precedent of the 1909 treaty on boundary waters may be invoked. Perhaps a similar arrangement may have to be ultimately worked out covering the field of energy between the two countries and providing for some kind of international joint commission in this particular field. I am not suggesting and I am not criticizing the government for not having put that in this bill. I quite realize that it would not be possible but I do suggest that in the working out of this bill something like that may be found to be necessary. I hope the matter will be given very serious consideration.

While there is in our view duplication and gaps in the administrative arrangements provided by the bill, it seems to us to have an even more serious shortcoming in that it does not provide any national policy or guidance on energy questions.

Before issuing a certificate in respect of a pipe line or an international power line, the proposed board is required to ensure, primarily, that the project is economically feasible. I recognize that the main test to be applied by the board will be—if I read the bill correctly—the protection of the existing facilities and the control of competition. Moreover, the bill provides that the tolls to be determined by the board shall be just and reasonable. There is your criteria, "just and reasonable". Finally, before issuing an export licence, the board must be satisfied that the energy to be exported is in surplus and that the price to be charged is just and reasonable having regard to the public interest.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are the only policy principles contained in this bill and the only guides which are given to the board in carrying out the functions allocated to the board by this bill. Those policies are so vague that they will be of little use to the board in carrying out and discharging its responsibilities. Indeed, the bill does not provide any policy on energy and the board will have to develop such a policy if it wishes to use its powers consistently, according to certain specific principles. That, I say, is a very unsatisfactory state of affairs. The Borden commission, in its recommendations, did have—whether you approve of them or whether you agree with them or not—a national policy in mind when it recommended that the board be required to take into account, and I quote from the recommendation of the commission:

> The advisability of encouraging the development in Canada of processing industries relating to energy and sources of energy as distinct from the export of unprocessed natural resources.

In making that recommendation the Borden commission felt that our sources of energy should be used, not only to serve our national development but they also suggested that the board concern itself with—and again I quote from the Borden commission recommendation:

> Arrangements with respect to disposal of by-products and avoidance of waste.

I ask the minister whether he can point to anything in the bill that deals with this matter, a matter which is of very great importance to this industry and to the development of energy. As we all know—some perhaps know it better than I do because they are more familiar with this subject—the sale of such constituents of wet or sour gas as propane and sulphur helps to render fuel operations much more profitable. As our exports of gas to the United States increase—and we all hope they will increase—the disposal of those by-products will become a major problem in Canada. Sulphur, which was in such short supply only a few years ago, as we all know is now in surplus supply. Many of the liquid petroleum gases, including propane, will encounter increasingly difficult marketing problems, and yet they are becoming more and more important to the development of this industry. Were it possible to convert some of these materials into chemical products and to find substantial export markets for those products some of those difficulties might be avoided. The Canadian market is quite limited, and the United States market for chemical products, as we know, is not easily accessible, having regard to tariff barriers. Surely this is one field in which some bargaining with the United States might prove to be highly profitable as they more and more realize they are going to need our surplus, and that is the only kind of gas they are going to get, gas; but there does not seem to us to be any reference to this matter or any recognition of its importance in this particular bill.

Therefore, we contend, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is inadequate in the sense that it does not lay down any national policy for energy development. I think this is a major shortcoming. But whatever we may think of this bill, there is little doubt that it can have far-reaching implications on Canada's future. It is because of our recognition of its importance that we put forward these suggestions for improving it.

If this bill is to be made as effective as it can be made, surely those who have drafted the bill and those who are putting it before parliament now would be glad to submit the bill to experts in the field of energy where it could be scrutinized and where suggestions could be made for its improvement. It is for that reason that we have already made the suggestion, which I repeat with all earnestness, that the bill should be referred by the government to a standing committee so that witnesses can be called, evidence can be given and the bill can perhaps be made more effective.

There are good precedents for this course. There is a good precedent in this present session. The unemployment insurance bill has been referred on the government's own initiative to the committee on industrial relations and in 1955 a bill on international rivers improvements was referred to the standing committee on external affairs. That action proved to be most useful because several provisions in the bill were altered as a result of the examination given to it by the committee on external affairs.

So, Mr. Speaker, I ask the government if they will consider the reference of a bill of this importance and complexity to a standing committee, whatever standing committee is most suitable, so that evidence can be taken before that standing committee and so that as a result of that evidence and as a result of the examination given to the legislation the bill can be improved and made more effective than we think it is in its present form to reach the objective we all have in mind in setting up a national energy board.

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, the bill being debated by the house at the present time, has for its purpose the setting up of a national energy board, and in my opinion this is one of the most far-reaching bills that has come before this session or any other session for a long time. I may say that energy is the key to industrial development and national welfare. The people of the west who reside in that tremendous area commonly known as the sedimentary basin are fully aware of the tremendous resources they have in their back yard.

For those of you who are not familiar with the area and its geology from which the oil and gas supply originates, let me say that from the crest of the Rocky mountains stretching eastward almost, through Manitoba and north to the Arctic and into the arctic islands is a tremendous area known as the sedimentary basin, and it is in that area that we find these tremendous deposits of oil and gas. The exploitation of these resources, the finding of markets for the products and the development of petrochemical industries in the west are what we are looking and hoping for.

In order to have sound economic development of these vast resources it was considered necessary in the interests of the people, in the interests of the industry too, may I say, and in the interests of equity within the industry to advance the idea of an energy board. When we are talking about a natural resource like gas we must realize that it is an expendable resource. It is a resource that can be drained off by use and therefore we must give greater consideration to that factor than we would in the case of a replaceable resource such as hydroelectric power, for after all the water keeps flowing over the dams and hydroelectric power is generated, but when you draw gas and oil from the ground you are draining off a non-replaceable natural resource. That brings up the need for some measure of public control.

I am not one who believes by any means that everything has to be controlled but there are certain things, and gas is one of them, where you have got to have a certain amount of control in the public interest. That was found when the Alberta government set up the conservation board in that province. After the energy board has been set up to look after the interests of Canada with respect to oil, gas and other energy products the same thing will be found to be true.

I rose to speak on this matter because in my constituency in Alberta is found a great share of the natural gas that will warm the homes of Alberta. Turner valley is located there and also Flat Top mountain and Savannah creek. The tremendous gas and oil deposits in the vicinity of Pincher Creek are also located in my constituency. All along the eastern slope of the Rockies there are these tremendous fields of oil and gas. Therefore, with this tremendous surplus of energy we have to look forward to markets and I for one am 100 per cent behind the finding of export markets for these products. I think they have to be exported. Above all, if I am to say anything about export on the floor of the house I wish to say that an energy board should be set up for the purpose of looking after the public interest with respect to export. The question is how the exporting should be done in order to protect the public interest.

Let me call to your attention, Mr. Speaker, some of the factors which I think should be considered by an energy board. Coming from the west as I do and having worked very closely on these matters as a consultant in Calgary for a number of years, I feel I can speak with a certain amount of inward feeling and understanding of some of the economic relationships that pertain to this matter in the west. I should think that some of the factors which will need to be considered are, first, the pools which are to be drained. When we export gas careful consideration should be given as to what pools are drained. We do not want to see a pool drained right beside a great metropolitan centre which is using gas while another pool away off in the hinterland is not drained although there are pipe lines leading to it. Some consideration should be given to the question of what pools are drained when gas is exported.

The second factor is the price to the producers. If we are going to export gas it is necessary to take into account the 600 to 800 capped wells in Alberta where people have put their capital and see that they are given a decent return on this capital they have invested. I for one would like to see these people receive a fair share of the sale price of the gas in the foreign market. It is my thought that through more effective bargaining we should receive the best price possible for the gas we export. I am not so sure that an individual company, interested in completing a deal, is likely to act in the best interests of the public when it comes to agreeing on a price which would be the best price that Canada should obtain in relation to the price which consumers in Canada must pay.

The exporter of natural gas deals in wholesale quantities. In other words, if a gas company is making a deal to sell a tremendous amount of gas they will sell it a little cheaper than if they were selling a small amount. My contention is that we should look at the sale of gas from the retailers' point of view. Out in Alberta, where the climate is cold in winter the individual user of gas will consume perhaps 4 or 5 times as much gas as the consumer in the warmer climate. If we are looking at the problem from the consumer's point of view, then the man in Alberta is the big consumer, not the man in the warmer climate. If the price were established on the basis of the consumer, then that big consumer in Canada should pay a lower price for his gas than the small consumer in a warmer climate. All I am saying is that those who are looking after the public interest should protect the interests of the Canadian consumer by taking this matter into consideration.

If we are to establish industries, and have the industrial development hoped for then natural gas must be sold at a low price and the supply available for a long time. The petrochemical industries in the west are capable of producing in the neighbourhood of 10,000 products. Let us take the plant at Sarnia as an example. There are over 10,000 products that can be produced from oil at that point. The Polymer Corporation alone produces some 600 or 700 different commodities. As you know the gas which comes out of the ground is about 90 per cent wet gas and only 10 per cent methane gas. It is only the methane gas that goes through the pipes and into homes. The so-called wet gas is a sour gas which has to be put through processing plants to strip out the methane, ethane, propane, butane and hydrogen sulphide.

Some fields in the west for instance around Okotoks and in the Pincher Creek area are capable of shipping out a trainload of sulphur per day. There is a tremendous development in sulphur production alone, and there are tremendous quantities of propane, butane and ethane, all of which must find markets. When Canada is exporting tremendous quantities of natural gas to the United States it will be done through a pipe that has a 36-inch diameter, flowing 450 million cubic feet per day. This is a tremendous amount of gas and will result in a lot of by-products which will need to find markets either in the United States or through the development of industry in Canada. This is one of the most troublesome aspects of the oil and gas industry in the west, particularly the gas industry. Alberta has a conservation board and it is the policy of that board to require that gas and its by-products be conserved. This has meant pumping certain surplus products back into the ground, and that is being done to a certain extent. A certain amount of propane is flared in the summer. Wherever gas is flared, as was the case in the Turner valley during the early development period the loss to society was tremendous. I think everyone in this dominion frowns on that type of wasteful operation.

Now, coming back to industrial development I should like to say that in the Crowsnest area, for example, where we expect this pipe line will find its way through to markets in the United States, we are tremendously interested in the development of industry. If we are going to develop the iron ore or any of the other minerals in the Crowsnest Pass area, and if you are going to have secondary industries developed, we must have a price for gas which will be in line with the ability of companies to pay and with their ability to attract capital.

There is one other point I should like to mention and that is that those who are charged with the responsibility of examining the contracts of the different companies should look into the question of escalator clauses in those contracts. I am told these gas exporting companies have escalator clauses in their contracts. In other words the price of gas is set at a certain level and then it goes up year after year in increments and gradually the price is increased. I have heard that these escalator clauses are based on economic trends. I would recommend to the government that they look into the question of who drew these economic trends. There is no other industry in this country that I know of that has escalator clauses in contracts relating to the things which it sets out to sell.

Then, having said that, I believe there should be a sufficient margin of profit given to gas exporting companies to enable them to attract capital and to make their operations profitable. There is no one in the picture who is going to deny them that. What we do want to see is that they act in the public interest. We should maintain equity among the different producers. It is possible that a big company such as Imperial Oil or Shell, with lots of bargaining power, could obtain a better deal than some small Canadian gas company. I believe that the economic forces should be bent in such a way that, over a long period of time, Canadian ownership will develop. Above all, we should maintain equity among the producers of gas and encourage Canadians to assume leadership in the production of gas and oil.

In so far as those of you who are not familiar with the gas and oil industry are concerned, I might say that natural gas often results from the exploration for oil. A company may be drilling for oil, and quite often strike natural gas. The valuation of gas or oil is a problem worthy of mention. Let me say for the benefit of hon. members who are unfamiliar with the oil and gas industry that if we are looking at the mathematics of investment, it depends on how fast you can exploit the supply in the well and this in turn depends on how much the conservation board will allow you to sell. That plus an assumed discount rate determines the price of the well. Any income from gas beyond 25 or 30 years, if discounted to the present, assuming an interest rate, does not amount to much. That is one reason why we have had a tremendous campaign to influence the public that we ought to cut and get out of gas in 25 years.

I do not blame that one body of people who are concerned with the exporting of gas, namely the pipe line companies. Their interests are to get their money out as quickly as possible; that is only good business; that is only natural. What I am trying to get at is that there is a conflict between that speed with which the export companies wish to get their capital back out and the public interest. The other side of the picture is the investment of capital in secondary industries. If you are going to put money into a petrochemical industry that will cost several millions of dollars, the very first question the investor is going to ask is this: How long is my source of raw material going to last?

It has been my humble duty to run an economic consulting business at Calgary for western Canada. Many companies have come to me and asked me for a study of where they should locate in Alberta. After you have gone through all the different factors necessary to consider in evaluating the potential income of that particular company, you will come to the conclusion that much depends upon the cost and continuity of the source of hydrocarbons. If you can show, as in the Medicine Hat area, where you have a source of gas that will probably last for 75 years and more and the cost is likely to be relatively cheap, that is where the industry is located. So when it comes to the investing of capital, there is that principle to which investors pay attention, namely how long is my source of hydrocarbons going to last. But that consideration is in conflict with the speed at which exporting companies wish to get their money back out of gas fields once developed.

The setting up of a national energy board is a step taken primarily for western Canada. These tremendous deposits of oil and gas and energy are largely located in western Canada. Since they are located out west, this board should have on it personnel who understand the problems of western Canada. I have watched the debate on this energy bill in this house and I have noticed that the people of Ontario are only mildly interested. I can understand why that should be so. We in western Canada are primarily concerned. It is us who should be considered when choosing people to be on the board. British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and to some extent Manitoba—yes, and Ontario—are the provinces concerned. But as to eastern Canada, what is the use in having on the board somebody from Halifax who knows very little about the energy resources in western Canada? All I am saying is this. They are good people and everything else, but this particular piece of legislation is largely for western Canada and I should hope that those who are in eastern Canada would look upon it as such and that they, for once at any rate, would regard us in the west as grown-up children and give us an opportunity really to direct this particular board in the interests of developing our tremendous resources out there, getting the capital and getting these petrochemical industries and other industries established.

I now want to say a few words on another matter. I have been tremendously impressed by the words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and of other members of the opposition and of the C.C.F. They have gone to great lengths in praising the report of the Gordon royal commission which recommended the establishment of an energy board. The Gordon royal commission made the energy board their number one recommendation. You may be interested in knowing how that recommendation got into the report.

Mr. Gordon set up a system and asked for the help across Canada of scientists, economists and everyone whose services he could draw upon. In Alberta he asked the Alberta government to prepare a brief for the information of the Gordon royal commission. I was asked by the Alberta government to head the preparation of the Alberta brief. We made the creation of a national energy board our number one recommendation. Through Dr. Stewart who was on the royal commission with whom I talked many times and Mr. Gordon himself and others, as a result of the way in which they were impressed with the soundness of the recommendation and I may say the brief is in print for anyone who wishes to read it, the question of an energy board found its way into the final report of the Gordon royal commission.

Let me go back one step further because I want to give credit to the people who deserve credit. I was asked to take leadership and prepare "Alberta's Economic Prospects" which was Alberta's brief to the Gordon royal commission. There were some 50 people who made submissions to that brief. Each department of the government and the university, the research council, the power commission and many others were assigned by me to prepare certain submissions. An outline was prepared first and the submission written. The paper was then read by me and others and criticized. A series of teams prepared the various submissions and I acted as the economist with each team and co-ordinated the final paper. This was known as "Alberta's Economic Prospects" to the Gordon royal commission. During this work I made an assignment on coal to Mr. Lang of the research council. When he had his submission prepared and I read it I found that over a few pages from the beginning he had recommended an energy board but he had stricken it out. He thought that it should not be up to him to recommend an energy board. I said, "I think we ought to take that particular feature out of there and play it up and hold some meetings". So we called a meeting over in the office of the minister of economic affairs. Mr. Lang and Dr. Grace were assigned the task of redrafting the recommendation for the establishment of an energy board. That was done and we worked it over again, and from there it was made number one recommendation in "Alberta's Economic Prospects". You will find it in the back of the printed publication. This report was prepared back in October of 1955. Although the matter of an energy board had been mentioned by others this action in Alberta's brief focused attention on it. I do not wish to take any credit for it. I want to see all of the credit go to Mr. Lang of the research council of Alberta, Dr. Grace and others who worked with him. They are the people who deserve the credit.

As I have said before, Mr. Speaker, I am 100 per cent behind the export of gas. But if precautions are taken in order to protect the public interest with respect to supply and price I see no reason why we cannot go forward and have great benefits accrue from the export of gas. I just hope that we can build up an export market from which we can get a proper price and that all the people will benefit. I wish to thank the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) for the effort which he has put into this piece of legislation, and while any piece of legislation is a compromise, I believe that everything considered the bill before the house is the best compromise which could be arrived at at this time.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested to note that the last speaker referred to this bill, like some of the other bills we have dealt with this session, as a bill concerning mainly his province or the other western provinces of Canada. However, that is not what the bill says. This is a national energy bill, and there are 101 clauses. I would assume that out of the 101 clauses some of them must, or should, apply to the people who live in the other parts of Canada.

We listened very closely to what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) said tonight. He said many things about this particular bill. In fact, much of what he said reminded me of Shakespeare's "Much Ado About Nothing", and I think that is about what the situation was. The member who has just sat down also referred to this bill as a far-reaching bill. It is far-reaching all right; it goes everywhere and gets nowhere.

This particular bill, in my opinion, is one of the most important bills which has been considered for a long time. I think that one of the oversights in this bill is the fact that it is called a national energy bill when in fact it is not. I think this bill is a bastardization of a great number of bills which we have at the present time, including our export and import bills concerning the production and sale of gas. This bill does not talk about matters of energy which should be in an energy bill, but which are completely neglected. A national energy bill should contain legislation which will govern gas, oil, coal and hydro power. Atomic energy must be taken into consideration also in a national energy bill. These things have not been taken into consideration.

This bill was no doubt prompted by the discussions spearheaded by the decision made by the previous government, and particularly by the then minister of trade and commerce. This bill in the main considers the matter which was raised by the trans-Canada pipe line. Even in this field where the Conservative government conducted an election on this particular issue, and beat the drums across the country on the issue of the trans-Canada pipe line and the faults and manipulations which took place in the introduction of that pipe line, the government has completely neglected the responsibilities which they said they would assume in that particular field.

They have failed in the main to mention the other fields of national energy. The 101 clauses in this particular bill do not even consider the major sources of energy which we are going to use for many years to come. There is nothing in this bill that concerns our greatest potential energy in future years, the matter of atomic energy. That has not been considered. Therefore I would agree that this bill is far-reaching; it goes to many places but really does not get any place at all.

I suggest that this bill could be supported quite well by the Liberal party, and I was not surprised when the Leader of the Opposition rose and said that he was willing to support it in principle. I would like to know where he finds the principle in this bill. This is a conglomeration of a number of other bills and there is no principle in it. If the Leader of the Opposition does not know there is no principle in it, then I think it is an excuse for the attitude taken in the past on this matter of national energy, and in particular the manipulation and handling of the trans-Canada pipe line.

I think particularly in the last few years it has generally been decided that national energy is something which belongs to the Canadian people and should be used for the Canadian people. One of our greatest natural resources in years gone by has been hydro. I can think of one or two isolated cases in the province of Ontario where we have not nationalized hydro. I am thinking of a particular case not too far away from the constituency of the Leader of the Opposition. Perhaps it is something he could give some consideration to, because he represents a riding that is affected by a particular company. In Sault Ste. Marie they still have the natural resource of hydro controlled by a private company. I am thinking of people who live in the village of Searchmont which is only 10 or 12 miles from a major transmission line of this particular company, but there is no electricity in that community. They have built one of the most modern sawmills in Ontario, probably one of the most modern in Canada today. They have built this sawmill but have had to put in their own power development in the sawmill for the simple reason that private industry, as always, fails to serve the needs of the people when dealing with a national commodity, and certainly hydro power comes under that category.

We have seen also abuses over the years of these commodities and groups of commodities which have been nationalized. I am thinking again of the Ontario hydro as it affects a certain community not too far from my area. I pay five cents for the first quota of hydro power in rural electrification in northern Ontario, while at the same time the people of Quebec are buying the product of the Ontario hydro at half a cent a kilowatt and selling it to their own people through a co-operative in the province of Quebec at three-quarters of a cent. So even where we have nationalized some of these industries on a provincial or municipal basis, sometimes we find they do not serve the needs of the people because the people who implement them fail to make them work for the benefit of the people.

This government has failed miserably to do anything about many of the major sources of national energy. I do not really see why they set up the Borden commission to do a survey of national energy in Canada. I have read parts of their report and they have proved of great interest. I think the report has been well prepared and should serve the government in developing a national policy. But has the government taken any of the recommendations of the commission into consideration? Two of the major recommendations were, first, that there should be compulsion in the selling rates, so the government ignored that; and another recommendation was that the tolls, rates and tariffs should be calculated to yield a fair rate of return on the shareholders' equity. This recommendation was also ignored because it interferes with private enterprise. The government does not want them to get a fair return; they want them to get an exorbitant return.

It is apparently the hope that if this money is piled high enough, if the graft and profiteering which is taken out of the distribution of national energy in particular can be piled high enough, few of the crumbs may spill and fall on the floor where the multitude can share in some small way in those profits. We do not really care about the size of the profits which are being piled up as long as a few crumbs fall off and the ordinary people get their share of the crumbs.

Another question which we must take into consideration when discussing the establishment of a national energy board is coal. For years we have depended on coal, and we have on the statute books an agglomeration of many acts which deal with that industry. We subsidize coal production in two or three different ways; we assist in the digging of it, in the shipping of it and in the selling of it. This is a commodity which could certainly be used for the betterment of all Canadians if it were brought under a national plan which would utilize it for the good of all the people.

One of the things we must keep in mind is that national energy represents one of the greatest resources we have in the country. We, in Ontario, have nationalized our hydro industry but we have also abused it badly. We have abused it to the extent that there are only a few more developments which can take place in the province which could be of benefit to the people generally. We have not carried out this operation on a planned basis. We have considered how it was likely to affect private profits rather than how it could best contribute to the development of Canada. We have given much more consideration to how this development was going to help the profiteers than how it would assist the mass of the people of this country. We have kept the requirements of the financial institutions more in mind than the need to develop our resources for the good of all.

If we lose our national resources, it should be remembered that there is nothing which can be put in their place, and this should make us particularly careful and responsible in our approach, especially to those areas which are so far untapped and undeveloped. If the government is sincere in wishing to develop those areas which up to the present have not been developed, one of the most effective ways of doing this would be to control our national energy and supply energy at a low rate of cost to communities where natural resources are lacking. We should find that a little subsidization in the field of the development of natural energy would be a lot more profitable than a great deal of subsidization in fields which are much less productive—the development of secondary industries, for example.

The government appointed the Borden commission to make this investigation. I wonder just why these commissions are set up, and I think the Canadian people are beginning to ask themselves the same question. I say this because after the Borden commission has been set up by the government, the government declared that no matter what recommendations the commission brought in it did not intend to pay any attention to them. The question arises: why set these commissions up at all? Do we need to stall for time until some decision can be reached? Did we ask these intelligent and highly reputed gentlemen to travel across this country, to interview people, to examine the situation in all parts of Canada and to hear representations from the major organizations just in order to give the government some measure of time in which they can overcome a growing understanding on the part of the Canadian people with regard to the place of natural gas in a national energy scheme?

Did the government want to overcome the feeling which is developing across the country that Canada has been sold down the river by the privateers and profiteers? Did the government want to let the smoke of that battle —the battle which they helped to lead—die down so that they could do exactly as the former government did, and bring in a bill which does nothing to assist the planning or development of Canadian resources and which does absolutely nothing to develop our sources and supply of natural energy for the good of the Canadian people? I think the Canadian people are going to ask why the Borden commission was set up. Obviously it was not set up to tell the government anything, because the government has completely ignored it. The government has paid no attention to its views.

Mr. Churchill: That is not right.

Mr. Peters: The hon. gentleman says: that is not right. I remind him that this plan was not produced for peanuts. But what major recommendation suggested by the Borden commission after an expenditure of a third of a million dollars has been adopted in this legislation now before us? A staff writer for the Toronto Star, Mr. William McGaffin, in an article which appeared on May 20 pointed out with reference to this bill that there was no compulsion about it; that the board might make orders with respect to all matters relating to traffic, tolls or tariffs, but that there was no indication of compulsion. The writer points out that the governor in council can, if it so wishes, over-ride these permissive powers, because it has the final say. It is true that recourse may be had to the supreme court on matters of fact and of law, but according to this bill such recourse is only possible on points of law.

It is also pointed out that tolls and tariffs are to be calculated to yield a fair rate of return to shareholders. Does this take into consideration the actual amount of money which was originally invested? Does it take into consideration that Mr. Tanner, president of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, decided to place a bet as one would on a horse race—that he decided to place a bet of $8 which yielded a return of well over—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must remind him that it is past ten o'clock.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business will be tomorrow? I wonder if we could be told the business from now until the end of the week?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall proceed with this debate. There is a possibility that at the opening of the sitting we shall take item No. 1 on today's order paper, consideration of certain amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. C-37. Then we shall have to change the order from that which I listed on Friday in view of the expected absence of the Minister of Finance. We shall take item 9 on today's order paper, that is the resolution approving the convention on the nationality of married women.

Mr. Chevrier: That is after this debate is concluded?

Mr. Green: After this present debate on the national energy board is concluded. Then we shall go on with item 10, the resolution concerning the Defence Services Pension Act; item 11, the resolution on the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, and afterwards to the resolution which appears under government notice of motion today providing for additional judges. I am sorry that I cannot as yet tell the hon. gentleman what estimates will be considered should we get the energy bill through before the end of the week.

Mr. Chevrier: Is there any indication of what we shall do on Monday?

Mr. Green: We had in mind taking a supply motion should the national energy bill have gone through.

It being two minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MINES, FORESTS AND WATERS

Second report of standing committee on mines, forests and waters—Mr. Murphy.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MEETING WITH WESTERN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he has any comment to make on the supplementary statement left today by the western farm delegation with the members of the government in support of deficiency payments on wheat, oats and barley.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As the house knows, representatives from Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba met with members of the government today and placed before the government certain supplementary information, to which was added a reply to the several questions I had raised in the house on this subject in August last, as well as on the occasion of the farmers' meeting here in the month of March. I think I can go no further than to say that there was a very complete discussion of the whole situation and that in so far as the whole question is concerned it will now receive further consideration in the light of the information given in the additional brief, as well as the information personally passed on to members present by representatives of the various organizations.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister say whether, following the consideration that is now being given, a decision will be made during the present session of parliament so that if it is necessary to introduce legislation in order to implement the government's decision, that can be done?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to answer that question directly, for the reason that it depends on the length of time during which consideration is given to the request.

Mr. Argue: Since the government has been considering this matter now for some months, does the Prime Minister not feel that a decision can be made within the next few weeks?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the government gives the fullest consideration to matters before finally making a decision. In that respect it is somewhat different from the hon. gentleman whose question prompts this reply.

HOUSING

REPORTED DECREASE IN NUMBER OF HOUSES TO BE BUILT IN 1959

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Will the minister comment on the report presented yesterday to the National House Builders' Association that only 67,500 houses will be built in Canada this year?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think whoever made that estimate was an extremely poor guesser.

Mr. Garland: Perhaps the minister would care to make an estimate of his own for the benefit of the house. I am serious, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister be in a position to make an estimate of his own?

Mr. Green: As I have told the house previously, Mr. Speaker, I am not in the business of estimating. We are watching the situation very carefully. Tomorrow I am meeting the officers of the National House Builders' Association. When the government's policy has been decided upon it will be announced in the house.

Mr. Garland: Would the minister agree that this particularly drastic decrease of 55 per cent in house construction is due to a shortage of mortgage funds?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I am not agreeing to these far-fetched words which are used in statements of this kind. I know it is what I used to do when I was in opposition; I always tried to make things look as black as possible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You did not have as good material, though.

Mr. Garland: Perhaps the minister will be in a position tomorrow to tell the house and the country—and I am sure, Mr. Speaker, this is a serious matter, as he agrees—just what the government intends to do to correct this shortage of mortgage funds. I wonder whether today he would be in a position to assure the house and the country that the interest rates on N.H.A. loans will not be increased.

Mr. Green: I can give the hon. member the latter assurance, Mr. Speaker. With regard to his earlier suggestion, I would point out to him that it does not help house building, the morale of the Canadian people or the creation of employment to have all this calamity howling that we are getting here on this question.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I have a supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether he used to feel that way when he was over here on this side of the house?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I thank God that I have never felt like the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works. I wonder whether the Minister of Public Works, after reversing his position in other matters, also reverses his position with regard to painting pictures and now paints as rosy a picture as possible?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC MISSILE—REPORTED UNCERTAINTY AS TO SUCCESSFUL OPERATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister care to comment on a Canadian Press dispatch appearing in today's Globe and Mail to the effect that there is growing uncertainty with respect to the Bomarc anti-aircraft missile and that in the event the United States should discontinue its production, Canada would be left without an air defence weapon?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the facts do not warrant any uncertainty as to the effectiveness or future use of the Bomarc ground to air missile. I visited NORAD headquarters at Colorado Springs as recently as last Saturday, and I can say that the Bomarc program is up to schedule, and the inclusion of this weapon as a major element in the defence of North America remains unchanged.

[Mr. Garland.]

Mr. Hellyer: May I ask a supplementary question. Has the Bomarc yet been successfully tested against a supersonic target?

Mr. Pearkes: I said that the development of the Bomarc is up to schedule, and if it had been planned that it would be tested against a supersonic target, that would have been done. If it has not been, the intention is not to have it tested as at this date.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his hypothetical answer. Will the minister consider using his surplus Arrows to test the Bomarc before it is too late, and thus do a great service to our western allies in determining its deficiencies or otherwise?

An hon. Member: You be the pilot.

Mr. Pearkes: Canada is not developing this weapon. The development of this weapon is being carried out in the United States at their expense, and if the hon. member wishes to act as pilot in one of the target aircraft he should apply to the United States authorities.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED MEETING OF SMALLER POWERS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, notice of which I was able to give him just before 2:30 p.m. Has the Prime Minister's attention been drawn to a press report of a statement made by United States Senator Lyndon Johnson that there should be a summit meeting of the many in order to emphasize the important influence in the world today of countries other than the great powers? If so, is Canada prepared to extend an invitation to hold such a summit meeting in this country?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity, even though the hon. gentleman did give notice of his intention to ask this question, to read the remarks of Senator Johnson. However, I will read the transcript of his remarks instead of the press summary, and when I have done so I will be in a position to reply. Certainly we have one invitation out now for the holding of a summit meeting in Canada, and I think one at a time is really sufficient.

TRANSPORT

RIDEAU FERRY, ONT.—REQUEST FOR OPENING OF LOCK ON SUNDAYS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the desire of many tourists and residents of the area to make use of the lock at the Rideau Ferry bridge on Sundays, would the minister give consideration to the opening of this lock to traffic on Sunday, May 31 and thereafter?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have been spoken to several times about this matter by the hon. member for Lanark, the member in whose riding this lock is, and I am very glad to say that we are going to be able to keep this lock open for the extended time requested.

CHIGNECTO CANAL—REPORTED LACK OF JUSTIFICATION ON ECONOMIC GROUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I sent him notice of this question, and I hope he received it in sufficient time. My question is, has the attention of the minister been drawn to an article on the front page of the May 23 edition of the Financial Post, which states that the Chignecto canal cannot be justified on economic grounds? If so, would the minister care to comment?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I have not seen the article to which he refers. My department is giving close study both to the economic and the engineering feasibility of this project.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question. Has a board of engineers or a commission been established by the minister's department to study the economics of the canal?

Mr. Hees: The economics of the canal are being studied by the economics division of the Department of Transport.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

OLD WELLAND CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO CLEAN-UP AND RESTORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the old Welland ship canal, which is now under the seaway authority. Is the seaway authority now prepared to accept the agreement with the municipalities and the engineer's plans and estimates prepared by the Department of Transport, canal services branch, to complete the clean-up and restoration work on the old Welland ship canal in Niagara peninsula? If so, when will further tenders be called?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question.

Having taken over the administration of the Welland canal effective April 1, the St. Lawrence seaway authority will implement the arrangements made by the Department of Transport in connection with the work referred to, provision for the expenditures involved to be made from the canal services construction vote. Tenders will be called next month for the second stage of the planned improvements.

WELLAND CANAL—DELAYS CAUSED BY PILOT SHORTAGE AND CANAL CAPACITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Yesterday the minister referred to the traffic jam at the Ontario end of the Welland ship canal and told the house it was down to five ships, all of which were awaiting pilots. My question is, to what degree is shipping being held up at that point because of the shortage of authorized pilots, and to what extent is the delay due to the physical capacity of the canal?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): When I made my announcement yesterday I said that only two of the ships were being held up for lack of pilots; the other three were waiting in the harbour itself.

TRADE

RUSSIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the signing the day before yesterday of a five-year trade agreement between the United Kingdom and the Soviet union, can the minister inform the house what progress if any has been made toward the renewal of the Canadian-Soviet trade agreement which lapsed many weeks ago?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Negotiations with the representatives of the U.S.S.R. are continuing with a view to having a new trade agreement between our two countries. The fact that this agreement has been concluded in the United Kingdom may have some bearing on the conclusion of the conversations we have been conducting with the representatives of the Soviet union.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON BASIS OF PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister in a position now to report on the results of his investigation as to the basis of welfare payments to the unemployed in Newfoundland?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As I think I mentioned earlier, an official of my department has been in correspondence with officials in Newfoundland and has received a reply to his inquiry. I am not in a position to say exactly what the present situation is without further study, but I shall be glad to report to the hon. member.

IMMIGRATION

FURTHER UNFAVOURABLE PUBLICITY IN U.K. NEWSPAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a report in the British newspaper The People that there has been almost a total failure of co-ordination between the unemployment authorities in Canada and Canadian immigration officials in the United Kingdom, and that this has enticed Britain's skilled manpower into a veritable man-trap in Canada and caused bitter disappointment because of lack of jobs? Have steps been taken to investigate the situation and to correct any false impressions which may have been created?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The answer to the first part of the question is yes. I really do not know what one can do to correct reporting when it is so biased and so falsified as that which has been indulged in by the newspaper to which the hon. member referred. This newspaper sent one of its representatives to Canada. He was given every co-operation by officials of my department in travelling around this country. He represented himself to me as having been satisfied with what he saw here. Beyond that I am not sure I can go. If the newspaper insists on misrepresenting the facts as they are, I am afraid there is not much I can do about it.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, May 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Churchill for the second reading of Bill No. C-49 to provide for the establishment of a national energy board.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned last evening I was making the point that we had done very little to solve one of the problems outlined by the Borden commission, that of the financial manipulation that takes place from time to time, an outstanding example of which was that which occurred with respect to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. I pointed out that an official of that organization having made an investment of approximately $8 received a return of something over $1 million. The commission pointed out that investors are entitled to receive a fair return on their equity, but I suggest that even the government would agree that a return of this size in relation to the total investment is unreasonable.

We in this group are interested in the energy bill. Energy affects all Canadian people. This is a matter of interest not only to hon. members from western constituencies, nor is this a bill just to regulate or decide on the price of gas. Natural energy concerns everyone. Our heating, cooking and home illumination are provided by natural forms of energy, and all these aspects of the question should be considered in relation to this bill.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I feel I should ask the house to settle itself and hon. members who have business to transact in the house to do it in such a way that it will not make it impossible to hear the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, we in northern Ontario are vitally concerned with this bill. In the days of the founding of northern Ontario the potential of the natural resources there was well known to the traders and trappers who passed through the area over a period of years. Of particular interest at that time was the potential lumbering industry. When the development of that part of the country took place other forms of natural resources were found. In northern Ontario communities have been built around two major industries, the lumbering industry and mining which includes nickel, cobalt, silver, gold and copper. These industries have built many of the towns in northern Ontario, and these communities are totally dependent on these industries. Communities such as Timmins, Kapuskasing, Kirkland Lake, Matachewan and Cobalt, which have all the facilities of modern towns including housing and schools and which should be capable of supporting a large population, have been unable to expand or even maintain a normal rate of growth.

It was thought that one stimulating factor would be the advent of gas. What happened when this new and potent form of energy was introduced in northern Ontario? A pipe line was built through our part of the country. A number of people who might be called land agents of the pipe line company came in to get easements of land for the construction of the pipe line.

The bill refers to expropriation. This was not a promise in northern Ontario; it was a threat. Many of the people had their arms severely twisted by the threat of expropriation. They were told that if they did not give easements to the company they would be taken to court where they would have to go through the process of law, and would have to give up rights pertaining to their farms whether the line happened to be going through the barn or the house or some other place. They were told that they were going to have to give these easements for a lot less than the company was offering.

I would suggest that the bill has all the inherent faults and problems that we were faced with, because the expropriation section is based on the old Railway Act and, as everyone knows, you can expropriate the land to build a railway from coast to coast much more easily and cheaply than you can expropriate a piece of property 66 feet wide on a man's farm. It would take several years to go through the due process of law, and the farmer would have no farm left by the time he had fought the case through the many stages necessary to conduct his case.

We have not given consideration in the bill to the people who are affected with respect to easements, but we have given a great deal of consideration, as we always do, to the people who are going to make fortunes as a result of the bill. They are going to have the law on their side, as has always been the case. There is going to be justice for the rich and no justice for the poor. I know many farmers in my area who did not get a fair deal even after we made a very strong case publicly on their behalf. The amounts were tripled and raised even higher in many cases, but they still did not get a fair and reasonable deal.

The transporting of energy through a pipe line was looked forward to in northern Ontario as something that would solve some of the problems with which we are faced. Most of our industries are based on natural resources that cannot be renewed, and the ones that can be renewed have not been or it does not appear that they are going to be. I speak of the forest industry. As far as the mining industry is concerned, the towns involved are withering away through lack of impetus to bring about further development in the area.

Gas coming into northern Ontario could mean a great number of things. It could have meant the development of a low grade coal project we have in the area. If this energy could have been supplied at cost it could have made possible the development of this low grade coal deposit. We also know that in the wastes which come from our mines in the form of slag we have a great potential so far as building materials are concerned. If we were able to use this energy for the betterment of that part of the country we probably could develop a process to transform the slag into building blocks in one form or another, and thus utilize many of the wasted assets connected with the mining industry.

We have depended on hydro power, we have depended on coal and oil. Each of these commodities is terrifically expensive, and that is not because of the geographical position of that part of the country. We made arrangements many years ago to sell hydro power to southern Ontario. We made arrangements to sell timber to other parts of the country. As to the gold, coal and nickel industries, they are not designed so they can be advantageous to our secondary industries. Oil costs us 29 cents a gallon, and the price is not competitive with that of oil in other parts of the province.

We have raw materials available in the form of wood and many minerals. All we need is a source of energy which will allow us to process them into completed products and thus be the basis of our secondary industry. But when gas came into northern Ontario it did not supply this need. Therefore we are suggesting that again the Canadian people have not been given the things they expect from our natural resources. They have not worked to our advantage.

We say this bill is just a cover-up for a lot of mistakes in many other bills. It is a conglomeration of a number of other bills, and it does not set up a new national energy policy. One of the Conservative members rose last night and said that eastern members should help to pass the bill immediately because it only affects the people of the west. That is not what we want from a national energy bill, and that is not what we are going to support.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher):

That this bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

In moving this amendment, Mr. Speaker, I am doing what the Leader of the Opposition said he wished to do. I have also decided on the committee to which the bill should be sent, something on which he could not decide, and we hope we will have the support of the opposition in our effort to refer this matter to the committee for further consideration.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to express my regret that by reason of circumstances I could not control I was not able to be in the house last evening when the Leader of the Opposition spoke on the bill, for after all I was most anxious to hear his views on this very important measure. While one can read Hansard, it never conveys the message to the same extent as listening to the spoken word. As I proceed I shall be making mention of some of his suggestions and some of his references.

However, I must say I am glad that the opposition has seen fit, as I apprehended his remarks, to support this measure which is so necessary to the development of our country. I shall also refer to the amendment just moved by the C.C.F. party which, of course, as I understood from an earlier speaker, builds its case on a policy of national ownership of those things that are required for national development.

I shall commence simply by speaking of the purposes of the bill, and I think the explanatory note sets forth those purposes, "to assure to the people of Canada the best use of energy resources in this country." In other words this is another step forward in the national economic policy of the government wherein positive action is being taken. Indeed, there is no other basis for national development than through the medium of such a policy in which the state provides the climate and the opportunity for development while at the same time maintaining the public interest and denying injustice in the carrying out of development plans by private industry.

I remember so well, and I speak now for the moment in so far as the C.C.F. amendment is concerned, that prior to 1944 the solution for every problem in Saskatchewan connected with the development of that province depended on nationalization and control by the state. I find, however, that in the light of the experience those in the government of that province have gained, they no longer have that same feeling of massive adherence to the doctrine of socialism which they had prior to taking office.

I am one of those who are opposed to anything in the nature of unjustified or inordinate profits made without risk. The essence of profit is the foundation upon which jobs are assured. You cannot expand a nation unless there is a reasonable and proper return, that return being dependent, in size in particular, upon the degree of risk undertaken by those who are prepared to invest their money in these plans. The hon. member for Timmins said he had read the Borden commission report and it seemed to come close to recommending public ownership. I have read that report from end to end, but I see nothing to indicate support for that contention.

I think I should mention the transition, the metamorphosis that has taken place in Saskatchewan, when these hon. gentlemen opposite speak with horror of fair returns to industry. A moment ago there was a speech, and it was similar to one that was made a day or so ago, regarding the awfulness of expropriation. Well, we have expropriation in our province and we also have the means by which the individual may assure himself, through the courts, about the way in which it can be done and those circumstances have been disclosed.

When these hon. gentlemen speak in lachrymose words and tones regarding profits, non-risk and the like, I would remind them of one or two recent examples in Saskatchewan wherein the government of that province has seen fit not to maintain the principle of public ownership but indeed to invite private enterprise into Saskatchewan fortified by the guarantee of the provincial government. I am not going into the particulars in this regard unless hon. gentlemen have a curiosity for full information. However, I would remind them of one or two recent examples. One of the latest examples is the establishment of a steel mill in Regina. In that case the government of Saskatchewan backed the loan to the extent of $10 million, according to the Financial Post, and there were 2 million common shares authorized. Of those, 130,000 were offered to the promoters at 60 cents a share.

Banish the thought, Mr. Speaker, of the government of Saskatchewan agreeing to guarantee and back private enterprise companies which were not undertaking too great a risk, but in this instance they allowed the promoters to take 130,000 shares at 60 cents a share. Do you know why they did so, Mr. Speaker? I do not, but it is interesting to note that the provincial treasury took 180,000 shares at the same rate and the sponsoring group took a further portion of those shares at $5.40. Finally, there was a public offering to the average person at $6 per share.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) may believe that this is different from oil companies. Well, as the result of a guarantee by the provincial government this company, and indeed another company, a cement company, as well as the Prairie Pipe Company, were able to go into Saskatchewan and establish themselves under a guarantee of their bonds by the government of that province, in whole or in part, and for that 60-cent investment, in which there was no particular risk, the promoters and the treasury of Saskatchewan could, if they were to take the price of the shares set in a public offering, get $6. I am not going into further particulars about these companies unless anyone exhibits a zest for further information in that regard.

Is it not strange, Mr. Speaker, that they are still speaking of the merits of public ownership? I ask these hon. gentlemen to go out to Saskatchewan to see the experiment in operation. They went to New York to get financing; they found it necessary to go to private enterprise when Alberta and Manitoba were advancing very rapidly in the matter of resource development, with a view to seeing whether or not it would be possible to secure the necessary funds so that Saskatchewan, which was presumed to be the experiment in nationalization and socialization, would be able to catch up with the other two provinces. It is well to keep these things in proportion, and it is well to realize that when these facts were pointed out to the hon. member for Assiniboia he answered in words to this effect, "Well, it is different". Perhaps I should read from the article in question. It is an article dated December 1, 1958 in the Globe and Mail, and reads:

> Speaking recently in Vancouver, Mr. Argue said parliament should pass a law making it illegal for company promoters to offer stock to the public at more than they themselves paid for it, or conversely, that they should not be permitted to get it for less than the offering price.

Then it goes on to say:

> In Saskatchewan in the last three years three industries have been launched with government financial assistance. In each instance promoters obtained stock below the price asked the public. In the latest venture—Interprovincial Steel—the C.C.F. government itself owns the biggest block of promotion stock.

When this was brought to the attention of the hon. gentleman he said, "Well, these are different types of companies". These vocal rules he had established became obliterated in the light of experience. I point these things out by way of introduction because the hon. gentleman said this, as reported on December 27 in the Regina Leader-Post:

> —his criticism of shares being given to individuals at low cost, was confined at criticism to pipe line companies.

I will allow him to extricate himself from his own reasoning in due course.

The latest thing is the motion that this matter should be submitted to a committee. Throughout this session I have heard complaints that so many committees have been set up that it is impossible for hon. members to discharge their responsibilities. Here we have legislation for which the government must take the responsibility. Royal commissions do not legislate. They hear the evidence; they make recommendations, and governments act on the basis of accepting those portions which in the opinion of the government will meet the exigencies of the moment. We have had two commissions on this matter. The official opposition say the Gordon commission covered this situation. The Gordon commission sat for a long while. It sat for $1,380,000 worth of time. It was covering the history of Canada for the next 25 years and, as an incidental in the recommendations it made, it dealt in part with this question.

As I remember the facts in connection with that commission, the report in general was available in September of 1956 although it did not officially come into the possession of the government until December 6 of that year. The Leader of the Opposition says, "We are all for an energy board; we came to that conclusion in January, 1958". The Gordon commission recommended the setting up of such a board in December of 1956. I brought the matter before the House of Commons in February, 1957 and I remember the disparaging answer given by the then minister of northern affairs and national resources to the effect that all was well—and a reading of his speech at that time will indicate support for my contention thereon —that there was no need for such a board.

While the recommendation was made by the Gordon commission, it was not acted upon. The former government was in power until June 20. The house sat until April of that year, yet no action was taken. It was not until January, 1958, according to the Leader of the Opposition, that the Liberal party finally came to the conclusion that this particular recommendation was in accordance with its wishes, its desires and its hopes.

I would say this. I intend to review the bill in general without referring to the sections, something of the nature of the bill that is before us and its reasoning. A moment ago I said it marks a further major step in the implementation of a great national development policy for which this government received a mandate from the people of Canada. A national energy board covers this particular phase of the entire situation, namely energy within the definitions contained in paragraph 2. The Leader of the Opposition says there should be a national energy policy in a statute. I do not know what kind of a statute it would be if it were to contain generalities with respect to national development. This is but another step in that national development policy.

As to coal, and in particular maritime coal, this government has taken forward and important action in order to assist the miners of the maritimes. Tomorrow, I will be in western Canada, in the province of Saskatchewan, to see taken one further step in that national development plan, namely the beginning of the work on the South Saskatchewan dam. For many years members in various parts of the house asked that action be taken in this regard and pointed out the possibility that the time would come again—as has happened recurrently in the last 100 years—when drought and the like would overwhelm those particular portions within the Palliser triangle. This year conditions are not as hopeful as I should like them to be.

Over the years, over and over again, there have been advocates in support of this tremendous undertaking. We received promises, qualified and unqualified, from 1949 on; but it was only when this government came into power that action was taken in this regard and a beginning was made on this project.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister is now giving us a dissertation on irrigation in western Canada. In it he might include the request for deficiency payments made this morning by the farmers of Canada. What have these matters to do with the bill now under discussion? In the last few days, Mr. Speaker, we have been held strictly to account. You have ruled us out of order on matters which had more relevancy than this. I would ask you to remind the Prime Minister that he is not immune from the rules of this house any more than any other hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether or not the Prime Minister wants to reply before I say anything on this subject.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, with becoming modesty in so far as this government is concerned I was trying to answer the Leader of the Opposition, who said last night that this bill did not go far enough and that it should go further. I am showing that it is just a step in the national development policy. That causes the hon. member for Essex East, by reason of his own conscience bothering him, to be just a little bit exasperated.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. You will recall that yesterday you ruled an amendment out of order because it dealt with public ownership, a subject which you considered to be irrelevant to this bill.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that the Prime Minister was talking about public ownership.

Mr. Pearson: He was.

Mr. Speaker: As I understood the point of order, it was concerned with the South Saskatchewan dam, which is somewhat remote from the problem we have in hand, except in so far as it may generate electricity. I am sure the Prime Minister does not intend to stay in Saskatchewan too long. To deal with what the Leader of the Opposition said, it is true that this is not a debate on public ownership, as I have already ruled. I noticed that the Prime Minister got rather far in that field today, but it was in response to what had been said earlier and I do not intend to try to confine the matter too rigidly. But on the point that has been taken I agree that the South Saskatchewan dam is not relevant to this bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right, Mr. Speaker; I was trying to give hon. gentlemen some information on this matter. I knew it would be a bed on which they would not want to lie.

Mr. McIlraith: Follow the rules.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to continue to cause them so much personal suffering.

At that point, Your Honour, I was about to deal with other examples of this national policy, but I shall not do so in view of your ruling. I think, however, I should say something about our energy reserves, not in detail in any way but simply to indicate the importance of this bill, because the attitude taken by the Liberal party is a most unusual one. They support it in principle.

Mr. Pearson: In principle.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are opposed to this provision and that provision. They are shocked by certain items. They are annoyed by items which do not exist at all, and they are exasperated by the fact that we are proceeding to do that which should have been done, as they now concede, years ago.

Few countries in the world are so richly endowed with potential sources of energy as Canada. The hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for Bow River and other hon. gentlemen have over the past months told us something of these vast resources. I am now restricting myself to oil and gas, which provide the opportunity for Canada to stand on the threshold of a new era. The mobilization of these resources of oil and natural gas, coal and hydro power must be assured to guarantee to Canadians the fullest advantage of this land and their heritage.

I shall not deal with the hydroelectric potential or with the tremendous possibilities of the Hamilton river in Labrador, other potentialities on the Yukon river when diverted through huge tunnels into the Taku river, and the undeveloped power in this country amounting to more than 54 million kilowatts. All these are resources that we believe must be developed. Their development must be encouraged now, while at the same time protecting and preserving the public interest. In the western Canada sedimentary basin there are today proven and potential resources which may give to this country the largest crude oil resources in the world. No one can say today what is the possibility and the extent of the black gold which lie beneath the surface in Canada.

It was because of the importance of this matter that we advocated on many occasions a national policy in respect of the various kinds of energy and also the various types of potential development. No one can give any estimate as to how much our oil resources are worth. There are those, however, who have recently estimated that the crude oil resources of Canada are worth $96 billion. In so far as the gas resources are concerned, it is estimated they are worth $40 billion. These are figures which actually stagger but at the same time challenge the imagination of this country.

It was because of this that we endeavoured, not only in 1957 but earlier, to secure some action on the part of the former government. As the then leader of the opposition I set forth our views in this house on February 11, 1957 as reported on page 1160 of Hansard of that date, and on that occasion moved this amendment:

> —this house is of the opinion that the welfare of the Canadian people requires the adoption now of a national development policy which will develop our natural resources for the maximum benefit of all parts of Canada, encourage more processing of those resources in Canada, correct the present serious unfavourable trade balances, foster wider financial participation by Canadians in the development of our resources, and promote greater opportunity and employment for a steadily increasing population.

The answer given at that time, in general, was that no such policy was needed, that we had the necessary legislative powers under existent statutes. I would like to point out before I proceed to deal with the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition just what that legislation comprised. It consisted of an act to regulate the exportation of power and fluids and importation of gas. Fluids are defined as "gas, oil, water or any other fluids, whether liquid or gaseous, that originate or are produced or recovered in Canada". I would point out that that act was passed in 1955 and included oil.

The manner in which the act dealt with licences permitted those things which took place in the Trans-Canada pipe line organization that we, by this legislation, intend to ensure shall not take place in the future. The provision as to licences was under section 3, which reads:

> Subject to the regulations and to such terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve . . . licences may be granted for > (a) the exportation of power and fluids;
> (b) the importation of gas; and
> (c) the construction or placing of any line of wire—

And so on. Then subsection 2 reads:

> A licence to export power or fluids may provide that the quantity of power or fluid to be exported shall be limited to the surplus remaining after due allowance has been made for distribution to customers for use in Canada during the period of the licence.

Then section 6, subsection 1, reads:

> No person shall export any power or fluids—

"Fluids" include oil.

> —or import any gas except under the authority of and in accordance with a licence granted under this act.

All the powers as they were exercised then were within the limitations which are now objected to by the official opposition. In so far as exports were concerned, regulations were made in this regard. Section 9 of the regulations passed by order in council on June 20, 1955 reads as follows:

> The price charged by a licensee for power or gas exported by him shall not be lower than the price at which power or gas, respectively, is supplied by him or his supplier in similar quantities and under similar conditions of sale for consumption in Canada.

Now, sir, that did not protect Canadians from being placed in the position of subsidizing the cost of gas and the like for another country. That was one of the most serious shortcomings of this legislation as it existed subject to the regulations in 1955, that it was ineffectual in that regard. I remember the momentous debates of three years ago in which we endeavoured to point out to this house and to the country the serious situation whereby Canadians would pay more for gas in Canada than would the recipients of the gas in the United States after export. In other words, our contention was that action had to be taken in this regard to protect Canadians, both producers and consumers.

The Leader of the Opposition in his remarks last evening seemed to leave the impression, or endeavoured to do so, that the Borden commission had been an expedient, a delaying action. He suggested that the legislation now before us did not clarify the national energy policy, that it left unresolved numerous duplications in function; and in sharp words he spoke of the oncoming dangers of arbitrary government by order in council.

Then he ended by saying, "Let us have a committee on this. The Borden commission made the situation clear and heard evidence over a very considerable period of time, but let us now disregard the evidence which was taken in the past and have this matter submitted to a committee of parliament". I say there is no expedition in that course nor any value in it, having regard to the fullest possible investigation which has been made by these two commissions.

The Leader of the Opposition complained that we had delayed bringing this particular piece of legislation before parliament. I would point out that the time of parliament has been taken up mainly, with the exception of certain items of legislation which have been brought before it, with the debates on the speech from the throne and, latterly, on the budget, and the budget resolutions. The resolution preceding this measure was placed on the order paper early in the month of April. Every opportunity was given for the study of these two reports in the intervening period.

The Leader of the Opposition says that in June, 1958—and I take it that was in a spirit of resignation—the Liberal party came out in favour of an energy commission. Well, I can understand the hon. gentleman's feelings in that regard, for he spoke in the city of Victoria during the election campaign and he dealt with this question. At a press conference he said he would agree to the export of natural gas to the United States.

He took a long time to come to that conclusion—until 1953 or 1954. But listen to these words, the significance of which can only come to the minds of those who were here three years ago.

He said this, but he emphasized—and I can see him as he did so—that this would not be a one-man decision. Whom did he have in mind? Did he have one in mind who is no longer here and who was able to advise the Trans-Canada pipe line company that export would be allowed in the event that the federal commission in the United States agreed? No longer was there to be a one-man decision.

That is the reason for this type of legislation—to assure that decision will be made by a board; not by such a board as was suggested by one member and reiterated by another, but by a board which, when set up, will hold office during good behaviour for a period of seven years and which can only be removed by the governor in council upon an address by the House of Commons and the Senate. There is not much of the stooge about a board whose members will be placed in the same position as the civil service commissioners, who can not be removed except by a vote of parliament. In other words, to make sure that this board will operate for the benefit of all Canadians it will operate beyond any suggestion of control in any way.

Mr. Winch: Eyewash. All the powers are subject to the cabinet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When it comes to eyewash I do not want to compete with the hon. gentleman.

The Leader of the Opposition said he intended to support the legislation. We are glad to see the opposition taking that view. We are dealing with legislation which is difficult to draft—difficult to assure and preserve the rights of Canadians as a whole—and we hope there will be full examination; we hope the views of hon. members of this house with regard to this measure will be placed before the government of the day through the medium of debate.

The board has no power to do other than handle the energy resources of Canada. Mention was made of power exercised by order in council. Let me say that in so far as our great resources are concerned no responsible government would dare place itself in the position where any determination would be made on questions of national policy except on the basis of our legislative system, whereby responsibility rests on the executive with the assistance and the support of the House of Commons and the Senate.

There seems to be general support for the legislation. The broad powers are made flexible enough to assure that risk capital will not be prevented from coming into Canada; it will be invested here, and development will be maintained. I cannot refer to the several clauses, and I do not intend to do so except in so far as I may paraphrase them.

I mentioned a moment ago how entirely free from outside control the board will be. Now with regard to the issue of certificates —and again I am just paraphrasing—someone has said—and I think I heard the Leader of the Opposition say this—that there would be no assurance that Canadians would have any participation, and that we had strongly advocated the necessity of our natural resources not being owned to an overwhelming extent outside Canada.

I would point out that in granting licences the board has to take several matters into consideration. It is not a perfunctory or routine discharge of responsibilities. The board has to take into consideration the availability of oil or gas or power, the existence of markets, the economic feasibility of a pipe or power line. In addition, it has to ponder another consideration; to deny fly by night promoters, who risk nothing but organization costs, the opportunity to make tremendous profits, inordinate profits. The board must take into consideration the financial responsibility and the financial structure of the company, the method of financing, and—I underline this because it is of material importance—the extent to which Canadians will have an opportunity of participating in the financing, engineering and construction of the line. What could be clearer than that?

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the Prime Minister would permit a question at this point. Is he suggesting that the criteria he has just read from the bill are any different from the criteria which have been applied by the board of transport commissioners for Canada in connection with hearings for leave to construct pipe lines?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not here to discuss what the board of transport commissioners did or did not do, or the criteria they applied. But from now on these criteria, in the event that they are passed by parliament, will be dominant in the determination by the board to give regard to the necessity of Canadian participation.

Finally, even when all these things are determined, a major matter is the question of the public interest which must at all times be one of the considerations in the determination of a recommendation for the issue of a licence. Also, the board can issue a certificate; but it has already received instructions under an earlier clause that it must take into consideration and may add such items and conditions in the issue of the licence as to construction, ownership and operation of the line as it considers desirable or necessary. That is an answer to all these querulous arguments that we have in any way abdicated from the position we took when we determined on the necessity of Canadian participation.

Those clauses of themselves indicate something of the circumstances which must be taken into consideration and which do in fact protect the public interest. Then, too, there will be no more hiding on the hearings. The hearings will be in public so that all who want to may be present and every opportunity will be given for the fullest possible airing of all the circumstances connected with the matter.

Finally there is the question of whether the public interest will be protected. One of the matters that was the cause of infinite unfairness to Canadians under some of the licences granted when the former government was in power was that Canadians paid through the nose for consumption in Canada while the price in the United States was lower. Members of the former administration said, "We cannot protect you because the regulations say that regard must be had to similar conditions and similar quantities before determination in this regard can be made".

These are a few of the material matters with which this legislation is concerned. Somebody said that the powers should be spelled out. In reply I affirm that they are spelled out and are sufficiently flexible to assure, through public hearings and through maintaining the inviolability of the board by its appointment for a period of seven years unremovable except by vote of parliament, that the public interest can be and will be maintained.

When it comes to the question of appointments we intend to make the best appointments it is possible for us to make.

Mr. Winch: All Conservatives.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not have the hon. gentleman who interrupts in mind. We intend to assure that those who are on this board will be the best men procurable regardless of any other consideration.

Mr. Winch: That would be something new in appointments.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend must be thinking of the experience in Saskatchewan. We want to assure that the best possible men will be obtained. I know the Leader of the Opposition will agree with me when I say that no one can understate the difficulty of getting the number one, the most outstanding men for these various positions, because of the sacrifice that results from the salaries that are granted. There is no doubt about this, as anyone occupying a position of responsibility will corroborate.

I know this has been my own experience. I have seen outstanding men approached concerning appointments of this nature. They have begun by pointing out to me that in private life they make a great deal more money and that these are their earning years. They finally conclude by saying that much as they would like to serve the public interest they find themselves unable to sacrifice to that extent.

This is an aside, but may I say that when I was in Australia and New Zealand a few months ago I met a number of outstanding men in the public service there. These were civil servants like those we have in Canada, who make an outstanding contribution. I am thinking out loud now, but I have often personally wondered why they remain in the civil service at the salaries they receive. In speaking to these men of tremendous capacities and great abilities who were prepared to accept salaries far below what they could secure in private life I said, "How is it?" "Well," they said, "we have little rewards that go farther than money can possibly go in compensating us. When we give years of devoted service we ultimately may receive something not in the nature of a title but something in the nature of a decoration which will indicate the state's appreciation for the services rendered."

Mr. Speaker, we experience difficulty in securing the best, but we intend to do everything possible to assure that this board, with the great responsibilities it has to protect the public interest and to maintain the assurance of resource development, will be composed of the most outstanding men who are available; because among other things this board will have the power to determine just and reasonable tolls—and this is of great importance—and shall always, subject to the exception therein given, be responsible for seeing that they are charged equally to all persons at the same rate. That is one of the most important considerations, the determination of just and reasonable tolls, not tolls that by any stretch of the imagination could permit of exorbitant or extraordinarily great profits without risk being attached; such rates that will assure the return that must always be accorded to those who risk, and that will assure a fair return to all and at the same time preserve and maintain the public interest.

I found it a little difficult to follow the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Villeneuve, in what I thought was a most thoughtful speech, argued that the Borden commission was not needed because the work had already been done by the Gordon commission. He said that had all been done but of course urged that a standing committee be set up for public hearings. There were those who said they believe today in a national energy board. Again I would point out what the former minister of northern affairs and national resources said with respect to this matter in 1957.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the Prime Minister give the reference to what Mr. Lesage said in 1957, and the date?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact I can tell the hon. gentleman that it appeared in Hansard following the motion I moved on February 11, 1957. I have in my hand the notes I took at that time. I have not the copy of Hansard here, but the hon. gentleman could look it up.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps, sir, the Prime Minister would permit one other question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely.

Mr. Pickersgill: Was not Mr. Lesage at that time referring not to a national energy board but to a national development policy?

Mr. Diefenbaker: This was one of the elements in a national development policy. I will not cross swords with the hon. gentleman on that because we have proven since how necessary a national development policy was and how development can be achieved by proper encouragement on the part of the government.

I am not going to take very much longer. The three most important features of the legislation are, first, maintenance of the public interest; second, the assurance that the wells of risk investment shall not be dried up; the exercise of important advisory functions under which the board will continue to mobilize statistics relative to power, gas, oil and the like and have up to the minute information in the public interest and, finally, the streamlining of the entire procedure.

I want to deal with one other matter, the question that has been raised as to delay. Under the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act exports of oil required a licence which in the case of oil pipe lines was granted freely on an annual basis. However, oil, unlike power and gas, moves fairly freely into world trade. There have been those in this country who have felt that some action should be taken in order to assure, in the event that the United States were to maintain its mandatory controls against the importation of Canadian oil, that there would be a market for Canada's oil and that Canada would have to take the necessary measures to open up a market in Montreal. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) says, why have you that power, which he says is only to be exercised under order in council? I cannot read the clause, sir, but again it is a question of proclamation. Ordinarily certain statutes provide that the entire statute shall come into operation by proclamation of the governor in council. There have been many such statutes throughout the years. This is not order in council government. This is simply a provision that one portion, instead of the entire act, shall come into effect by proclamation.

The Leader of the Opposition says, why is this, what is the reason? I am reminded again of his words in his speech in Edmonton in the month of February, 1958, when he found himself in a most disagreeable position. Nobody knew what the Liberal policy was on this question and he proceeded to enunciate that policy. The wording of the Canadian Press despatch from Edmonton, February 27, is as follows:

> Lester B. Pearson has pledged to Canadan oil producers that as prime minister he would turn over the rich Montreal market to them if the United States continued to restrict oil imports from Canada.

I ask him, how was he going to do that? What were his plans? Were these but words? There is only one way in which it could be done economically and that would be to apply import quotas against those companies that today control the market in Montreal to a large extent.

Mr. Pearson: But not by order in council.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pearson: Which you would do.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —how the unrepentant have become repentant. The hon. gentleman now admits in effect by that interjection that what he had in mind was the imposition of quotas. Well, anybody who advocates that—

Mr. McIlraith: No, no.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has quite completely misinterpreted me.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, I see. All right.

Mr. Pearson: When I interjected "but not by order in council" I meant it would be done by parliamentary approval and not by order in council of the cabinet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see this reformation on the part of the opposition but I remember the hon. gentleman's own speech in the pipe line debate dealing with the cutting off of discussion. It is only three years ago but I do not want to resuscitate that debate to the exasperation of my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. Hellyer: You should be very grateful the pipe line was built.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The fact is that in his Edmonton speech the Leader of the Opposition went on to say:

> If Washington will not modify its present attitude with respect to importation of Canadian oil—

These were hard words spoken from the heights of Olympus.

> —if the American government insists on placing restrictions on such importations and thus damaging and retarding the national development of a vitally important industry in a friendly neighbour country, then we, in Canada, will have to consider necessary steps to move oil from western Canada into the big market centring on Montreal.

Mr. Pearson: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say that as a result of our action these controls were removed. We pressed strongly for their removal. They were imposed in July, 1957 and they would have been imposed by the United States administration regardless of what government was in power in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, the record shows that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The 15 per cent diversion caused that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Importation would have been prevented by the United States to the same degree that it was because the plans had already been made. Public reference has been made to that fact. We acted. We pointed out the difficulties and the impossibility of the position of Canada, with its joint defence relationships with the United States when oil, so necessary to our joint defence and to freedom itself, was excluded. We were able to secure removal of the controls. I will give you something of the picture of the initial effect of the action taken by us resulting in our being able to secure that action by the United States. As generally expected, it means an increase in exports of from 15,000 to 25,000 barrels of crude oil per day. That is a most important and valuable concession. I have before me the Daily Oil Bulletin for May 20, 1959 in which is set forth some of the changes that have taken place as a result of the strong action and strong objection this government took against the importation quotas in the United States. In this publication there is the following:

> Effective June 1, crude oil and products brought into the United States from country of origin by pipe line, rail or truck are freed from the restrictions imposed by U.S. import quotas . . . Today the first news of direct impact on western Canadian oil producers was released, when refiners submitted nominations to the Alberta oil and gas conservation board for crude to be delivered in June.

The article goes on to set out that in particular the Texas company has nominated for its first Canadian crude for its plant at Puget Sound. The article states:

> Texaco has called for 8,000 barrels daily of pipe line fill for June, which will mean actual deliveries to its refinery will start by July 1. Shell Oil Company, whose Puget Sound refinery dropped Canadian crude for one year, resumed take in May with nomination for 12,000 barrels daily. Shell's nomination has been raised to 15,300 barrels daily for June. General Petroleum's Puget Sound refinery, a consistent user of Canadian crude, has nominated for 27,400 barrels daily in June, up from 15,350 barrels daily in May. Total Puget Sound nominations for June are 50,700 barrels daily, including the pipe line fill, compared to 27,350 barrels daily in May.
> For the United States midwest, June nominations for Alberta crude total 13,400 barrels daily, up from 9,300 barrels in May. International Refineries in Minnesota calls for 7,800 barrels daily, up from 7,300 in May. Bay Refining Company in Michigan calls for 4,000 barrels daily in June, after taking 3,000 barrels in April, none in May. International Refineries Incorporated, will receive 1,300 barrels in June compared to its 2,000 barrel take in May. West Branch Refineries, 300 barrels daily in June after taking that amount in April and none in May.
> The over-all Alberta nominations total 352,092 barrels daily, an increase of 51,272 barrels daily, or 17 per cent over the May nominations of 300,820 barrels.

Then it goes on to deal still further therewith. In other words, we have, as a result of the strongest protest that could possibly be made under all the circumstances, been able to achieve with the co-operation of the United States the removal of these quotas which did, in fact, play havoc with the oil industry.

Reference was made to the overruling power of the governor in council. How shocked the finer sensibilities of the Leader of the Opposition were when he referred to that. Let me point out the various boards that are in the same position. The most analogous is the board of transport commissioners, to which reference was made a little earlier. The authority granted to the national energy board is in no way unique. Section 53 (1) of the Railway Act respecting the powers of the board of transport commissioners reads as follows:

> The governor in council may at any time, in his discretion, either upon petition of any party, person or company interested, or of his own motion, and without any petition or application, vary or rescind any order, decision, rule or regulation of the board, whether such order or decision is made inter partes or otherwise, and whether such regulation is general or limited in its scope and application; and any order that the governor in council may make with respect thereto is binding upon the board and upon all parties.

In other words, so much has been said about so little, and when you consider the similar powers with respect to the board of transport commissioners there is a complete answer to all these wails about the danger in the authority given the governor in council under this legislation.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I want now to go to one other matter which has to do in particular with the province of Alberta. At no time have I, nor shall I, in any way participate in any degree in a provincial election. I think the Prime Minister should follow that course, and my predecessors have done so. However, when there are statements made in that election or prior to that election, and if those statements do not accord with the facts, then they deserve being commented upon. I intend to refer particularly to a statement made by Premier Manning of Alberta in which he says that one facet of the proposed national energy board is a threat to the further development of the oil and natural gas in Alberta. He goes on to say that if the board is set up there will be a delay in deciding on these applications for export which will be detrimental to the province of Alberta. He said that the processing by the new board will mean a delay of at least four or six months, and the delay is costing the province thousands of dollars, but there is an even greater cost in lost development.

I wish to say in regard to that, that his own words, as reported on November 7, 1957, give the reply. Following an interview in Ottawa Premier Manning said that he could foresee no delay if the international interests require early action by the federal government in approving export permits when new markets opened to Canadian industry by such permits are vital to continued development and expansion of the petroleum and natural gas industry and the national economy. Then, he goes on to say that Ottawa is derelict in its responsibilities in not pressing the major integrated oil companies to accept more Canadian crude for refining. In so far as that statement is concerned, I say to him, it is in your own province where these things happen. It is there that the control can be exercised and I suggest to him that the control, if any, that he has in mind lies in that province because the major companies receive their licences from that government and should have determined for them, by him if he so desires, the action which he asks us to take.

I intend to refer to the question of delay because the boot is on the other foot. There has been an effort made to shift the burden of oil and gas surpluses to this government. I want to make this abundantly clear now. As soon as this bill is put through, the applications of Westcoast Transmission Company Limited, Southern Gas Company Limited, and any other application will receive immediate attention by the board which will be set up immediately after the conclusion of this legislation. There is going to be no delay.

Mr. Winch: You already have your appointees in mind, I take it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As I said, the question of export permits will receive immediate consideration. I am going to go to the record, because it is intensely interesting. The premier says we have delayed. Let me give the picture in so far as these companies are concerned. In so far as Westcoast Transmission Company Limited is concerned, its application for export was made on July 30, 1957. Hearings were held on December 10 to 13; December 16 and 17, 1957; January 13, 28, March 4 to 7, 1958; and permission was refused on September 15, 1958. The application was amended on December 9, 1958. The hearings on the amended application took place between January 6 and January 20, 1959, and there was no grant by the government of Alberta of the right to export until April 7, 1959. If it took the board in Alberta, including the original application and the amended application, from July 30, 1957 to finality on April 7, 1959, where is there any solid support for the suggestion of delay by this government?

These records tell the story as clearly as it is possible to tell it, and give the answer to the words to which I have referred. The Alberta and Southern Gas Company applied on October 18, 1957 to the gas conservation board. There were hearings on February 11, 1958 and from March 11 until March 31, 1958 and finally it was refused on September 15, 1958. Then there was an amended application on December 2, 1958. It was heard on January 6 to January 20, 1959 and was not granted until April 7, 1959.

If it took that much consideration, Mr. Speaker, to determine whether the conservation board of Alberta should decide in favour of exports, where is there any basis for the suggestion that a month and one-half or a little over should not have passed by without action on the part of this government? It might be said that the date of application to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) was, in the case of the first company, December 27, 1958 and in the case of the second company, December 23, 1958. That might be another argument that could be used. That is true enough. But the fact remains that as yet no determination made by the national government would in any way hasten the export because action is required on the part of the federal commission in Washington. That action has not yet been determined.

There are other companies in the same position. There is the Canadian-Montana Pipeline Company. There was an application to the Alberta conservation board on December 2, 1958; sittings from January 6 to January 20, 1959; application granted April 7, 1959. Again we find the same position of affairs. The application to the minister was on December 24, but any determination on our part in that regard would in no way hasten the export without a decision on the part of the federal commission of the United States.

I agree that it is essential that these matters be thoroughly investigated. I am not complaining at all. It is for the government of Alberta to determine the time to be taken. What I am saying is that if the government of Alberta found it necessary to hold the matter up for the length of time it did so, we must certainly be given every opportunity to look fully into the matter in order to determine the course to be taken. A general examination has been made by the department. Again I come back to this point. In so far as those applications are concerned, they will be processed immediately by the board when it is set up. It will be set up immediately. There will be no need to wait for the mobilization of the board. The members of the board, from the evidence taken by the Gordon commission, the evidence taken by the Borden commission and the evidence taken by the conservation board of Alberta, will be in a position, I am sure, to determine fully the entire question.

With regard to export, it is provided that in the granting of export—and again I reiterate this—the quantity of gas does not exceed the surplus remaining after due allowance has been made for the reasonable foreseeable requirements for use in Canada. It is necessary to maintain that surplus for, after all, these resources are not replaceable. Once gone, they are gone forever. The result is that the primary consideration must be the assurance that Canada in the future shall not find itself handcuffed or in a straightjacket as a result of the failure on the part of those of us here today to realize the necessity for that degree of conservation which will assure to Canadians full development while at the same time maintaining for future generations the necessary supply without which Canada's industrial development will not be attained.

As to the price to be charged for gas and power, it must be just and reasonable in relation to the public interests. With the implementation of this legislation, no longer will there be any suspicion that the Canadian consumer is being forced to subsidize the foreign markets or that Canadian industries will be asked to pay higher prices for their energy than those paid by foreign industries using Canadian energy. That matter is extremely important. In the trade world in which we are living, with the conflicts that are accelerating from month to month in the communist trade offensive, above everything else it is necessary for us in Canada, if our international trade is to be maintained, to see to it that we shall not be placed in a position where our costs in connection with energy derived from Canada are greater to Canadians than they are to any other nation, however friendly that nation may be.

As I see it, the bill protects not only the industrial future of Canada but the producer and the consumer. It assures a maximum advantage from the available production of Canada of gas and of power, it being available, in so far as gas is concerned, for export when surplus to the needs of the Canadian economy in this and foreseeable generations in order to ensure for Canadians an adequate supply of the natural resource sources which are the heritage of this country, at the same time bringing to Canada the benefits that are confirmed by profitable export of surplus resources.

When we get into committee of the whole, if there are suggestions on those matters that reasonably will assure the achievement of these purposes, I hope they will be made. My attitude on this matter, as it was when I sat in the opposition, will be that what we are trying to do is to preserve the resources of Canada, to maintain the assurance that the resources shall not be uneconomically wasted and to bring about in this country a development by means of which our country may reach the destiny which its resources make possible.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to follow the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the emotional effusions he has placed before the house this afternoon. I shall, however, try to deal with the subject bearing in mind relevancy and reason. I quite share the view expressed by hon. members who have spoken previously, indeed on all sides of the house, as to the importance of the subject matter. I must say, however, that I regret that the Prime Minister saw fit to take so much of the time of the house in order to deal with his views on certain provincial governments. The Prime Minister, of course, is entirely free to do as he wishes in the provincial elections, as are private citizens outside of the house. But surely the provincial election in Alberta does not have to be fought in the chamber of the House of Commons. The delightful excursion into local politics in Saskatchewan on the subject of public ownership was probably interesting to some. But having regard to Your Honour's ruling yesterday and the decision given by Your Honour and, as I understand it, adopted by the house, that that was irrelevant to this bill, it therefore was not a subject for discussion here. The Prime Minister saw fit to make this delightful excursion into local politics in Saskatchewan, but however much one may dislike or like, as the case may be, the particular government in that fine province, it surely is not relevant to this particular bill.

While this rather lengthy discourse was going on this afternoon on all kinds of subjects, some relevant and some irrelevant, erecting a smoke screen in front of the real matters confronting us on second reading of this bill, I wondered what the purpose of the Prime Minister was. I still am not wholly clear what it was. I cannot help but recall, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister made reference to the resolution stage and to how long the resolution was on the order paper. I would point out to him, as I had occasion to point out at the resolution stage, that the resolution did not contain the usual information that resolutions preceding the introduction of bills should contain. It left out all the relevant information, and was therefore of no value whatever by way of notice.

Then a rather extraordinary thing happened. The bill became available for public distribution through the distribution office shortly after twelve o'clock on Wednesday. It is true that certain members of the opposition were able to get copies on Tuesday immediately after first reading. The proposition was put forward on Tuesday night that the debate on second reading should be proceeded with on Thursday. That would be about 24 hours after the bill became available for public distribution. That is a most extraordinary procedure with regard to new legislation of this type, which is a bill involving some 100-odd clauses dealing with such an important subject. Then the Prime Minister intervened and had the matter stood over for one other day, and second reading was started on Friday of last week. So two days were allowed to elapse to enable the public to see the bill.

I have been curious about what it is that the government was seeking to hide. Why was it they were so concerned with not permitting members of the public, particularly those in the industry, to have an opportunity to receive copies of the bill and peruse it? It is particularly interesting to note, in view of the fact that for the two whole years since the government assumed office in June 1957, they have refused to make any statement of policy on this important subject.

Mr. Pallett: What was the hon. member doing for those two years? Was he asleep?

Mr. McIlraith: The chief whip for the government seeks to make a personal reference but I will let it go by. The fact is that the government has refused, and in doing so has done considerable damage to the industry, to make any statement of policy on the subject of energy resources in Canada, particularly with reference to oil and gas and its exportation and importation, as well as other related matters. But it has now become clear, after listening to the Prime Minister, just what the reason was, after such a long delay in dealing with the subject, for the haste to get this bill through. Such is their determination to prevent the public looking at it and prevent their being heard.

In that connection, it is interesting to note also that throughout the time the Prime Minister took in his speech this afternoon he omitted to deal with the request made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) that this bill, when it gets second reading, be referred to a standing committee where witnesses could be heard. He omitted to deal with that altogether. What are we to conclude? We can only conclude, I respectfully suggest, one thing, that after two years of no policy the government has been somewhat humiliated by having to come to the decision that the policies of the Right Hon. C. D. Howe in relation to the commercial aspects of this matter were sound policies, and that the recommendations of the Borden commission, which were so effective a smoke screen during the last election, were of no value at all and not to be used.

It is true that there are two important matters of principle on which new policies are asserted in this bill. One has to do with the advisory functions of the board, and the other has to do with the import of one of our trade commodities, oil. But on those two matters of principle it is interesting to note that while the government brought in a new policy it did not in either case follow the recommendations of the Borden commission.

With respect to that new principle concerning the advisory committee, it is interesting to note that the legislation provides that the board shall study and keep under review matters over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction in the field of energy. Energy is not defined in the bill before us. This wholly new principle of charging the board with responsibility and instructing it to study and keep those matters under review is a complete duplication in so far as the dominion coal board is concerned, the atomic energy control board is concerned, as well as other legislation dealing with fuel is concerned. It is, as I say, a complete duplication. It is not even in a form which is permissive, but it is a requirement that they shall keep it under review. This means, in addition to the waste and inefficiencies of duplication, that the industry will have to duplicate information and so on. In his remarks on second reading the minister seemed to indicate that he did not visualize duplication, yet it is one of the main principles of the bill which he has introduced.

Then there is another interesting matter. The first report of the Borden commission states that the national energy board shall have the authority to study, review, recommend and so on. In other words, the recommendation of the Borden commission in that respect is repudiated. The minister has given no explanation as to why he chooses to repudiate the report of the Borden commission on that point.

I have other matters with which I want to deal in particular. First of all, there is the question of export. I am sorry that the Prime Minister has left the chamber so quickly after speaking this afternoon, although I understand he had to leave and I think he has explained why, but I wanted to say something about his reference to the export provisions now covering oil. My point is this. He omitted to mention that when that legislation was enacted the situation was that we were relatively small producers of oil.

He omitted that altogether, but, more important still, he omitted those parts of the definition contained in the act which are relevant to his argument, that is, that "export" had reference to export through pipe lines only. That is the one subject which he omitted in his argument about export. In addition, of course, the export of oil began in wholly different circumstances before the development of the oil industry; we now have a margin available for export and the problem is one of finding markets. The hon. gentleman spoke about fluids and, of course, he did not read the definition of fluids, either. I regret that the effect of presenting his case in this way was to make his argument on that point of a nature which would be misleading to any person who was not familiar with the legislation on this subject, and I am sure that is not what he intended.

There is another principle in this bill which I find wrong and difficult to accept. It is to be found in clause 87 where the governor in council is, in effect, given power to control the export and import of oil. This provision is offensive for two reasons. The first is that by the very nature of the operation of the oil business there would be sufficient time for legislation to be enacted by parliament in the event of any of the difficulties arising such as the minister mentioned in his introductory remarks. The hon. minister knows perfectly well that the construction of refineries is only undertaken when supplies of oil are assured. He knows that contracts for the supply of oil either through pipe lines or by other means cannot be entered into on a day to day basis. Thus there is no possibility of any of the evil things which the minister told us might happen at some dim and distant time in the future occurring so suddenly that parliament would have no opportunity to deal with them. I am one who believes that parliament should have the right to deal with matters of this kind, and I am at a complete loss, remembering the argument used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) when they were in opposition, to understand how they could seek the kind of arbitrary power they are now seeking, and let this proposal get past the draft bill stage and be introduced into this house, having regard to all they said against arbitrary power in a situation which was related to a national emergency and to the national defence of this country.

Now the government wishes to take this arbitrary power and apply it to a trade commodity—a very important trade commodity—when there is no case at all to be made out for doing so. As a matter of fact it is interesting to recall the remarks made by the minister when he was dealing with this subject. He seemed to be very sensitive about it, because in introducing this bill on second reading he had this to say as reported at page 3929 of Hansard:

> Therefore we feel there is no requirement of national policy to be served at present by licensing exports of oil.

The hon. gentleman dismisses the matter of exports in that way, though there is, perhaps, some argument which could be made for licensing exports in the light of restrictions of imports by the United States. And in the next paragraph, the Minister of Trade and Commerce had this to say:

> The case with respect to licensing of imports of oil is different and more complicated. I do not propose to argue the case fully today. It would be premature to do so until the second report of the Borden commission in respect of this matter has been received and considered.

For the minister, having said that, to ask the House of Commons to give him the power of regulation is something which, I must confess, I find strange. Surely if there is no case to make for the possession of this power, and if it is premature to deal with the question, we should not be asked to pass the authority of parliament over to the minister and his colleagues in the cabinet. Surely that is a principle which is quite wrong and I am amazed at the minister putting it forward. In fact, I suppose one could use such words as "effrontery" to describe the conduct of a minister who comes before parliament and says: I do not propose to argue the case fully because it would be premature to do so until the second report of the Borden commission has been received and considered, but despite that I am asking you to give me these powers. That is closure with a savagery we have never seen.

Mr. Churchill: Nonsense. There is no closure in it at all. You were the proponents of closure in 1956, and you suffered for it.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister will not argue the case. He does not propose to argue it. He himself says he cannot argue it because the background against which the matter could be discussed is not yet available. Despite this, he says: give me the power. If that is not closure, then nothing is. It prevents any argument on this subject and I respectfully suggest that the question of whether there should be control of oil imports is a very important matter, and that if and when any government decides that controls should be applied, that is a matter which should come before this house for debate and decision. I am still old fashioned enough to consider that there is some virtue in debate in parliament on these matters and that our discussions throw some light on the subject and enable a better decision to be taken.

Mr. Churchill: I wish you had held that view in 1956.

Mr. Pickersgill: We wish you held that view today.

Mr. McIlraith: There is a marked difference between what was done in 1956 and what is being done today. In the case which the minister has in mind I would recall for the benefit of hon. members that there was three weeks debate on the legislation in question. This way, the minister is not going to permit any debate at all.

Mr. Churchill: That is not true. You can have all the debate you want for as long as you want.

Mr. McIlraith: Let me remind the hon. minister that he has been given a high responsibility of administering and directing the trade policy of this country. That is a very difficult and complicated task and one of great importance to the economy generally.

The hon. gentleman must surely have learned something from that foolish 15 per cent trade diversion policy put forward at one time. Here he is now seeking to put another product that has historically moved rather freely from country to country under the arbitrary control of himself and his colleagues without even a debate on it in parliament. I invite him to consider what he is doing in asking for such authority.

Let me remind the minister of one other thing. The Prime Minister spoke at great length today about making our resources available to the Canadian people which is an excellent sentiment but there is another facet to this matter. The availability of energy is basic to the development of our whole economy, there is no doubt about that at all. Allow me to place on the record a statement made by Mr. John Davis in a booklet entitled "Canadian Energy Policy" published by the Canadian institute of international affairs. At page 6 of the booklet we find these words:

—the basic difference—

Between Canada and the United States.

—is one of price. Even in 1958, consumers in Canada were paying between 30 and 50 per cent more for their energy than were their opposite numbers in the U.S.A.

The point I want to make out of that is that I hope the minister will bear in mind the cost of energy sources to suppliers and producers who are seeking to export. These things should be considered. The Prime Minister chose not to deal with this question in his lengthy remarks this afternoon. I suggest to the minister that he take another look at the principle that he is trying to assert in this bill on this point and that he consider withdrawing it.

May I also point out that this is the type of question on which we could get information if the minister would permit this bill to go to a standing committee where evidence could be obtained on all these points.

There is another thing I want to point out about the minister and his colleagues taking this arbitrary power. This is bad not only on the grounds of it being arbitrary power vested in the minister but it is also bad to provide import control in such a way that the first report of the Borden commission which is outstanding could be incorporated in it. Section 19 of that report which deals thoroughly with the subject provides rather drastic controls. I think the minister will agree with my description of them as being drastic. I commend section 19 to the attention of the minister. With that kind of comprehensive and burdensome control recommended in the report of the Borden commission and with the minister and his colleagues assuming this arbitrary power to deal with this subject, does the minister not see what could happen in places like the maritimes? Is anyone going to develop refineries in the maritimes to supply purely local needs? There are great problems like that which should be debated in this house at a time when the government feels it has any information that would warrant putting on import controls. Does the minister not see the damage that could be done to the development of this industry in assuming this power, damage that would be unnecessary and improper and that would have the effect of sharply increasing the cost of our energy in the meantime?

The Prime Minister this afternoon raised the same old cry about the former government not establishing this board and he referred to the Gordon commission report. The Prime Minister raised this matter in the house on January 15, 1957, when he asked the then minister of trade and commerce if he would agree to the suggestion in that report about setting up a national energy board. Mr. Howe in reply said that he had not considered the matter and that the decision would be one for the government rather than for an individual minister and that he did not want to give his opinion at that time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty to interrupt the hon. member in order to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of public bills in accordance with section 3 of standing order 15.

INTEREST ACT

AMENDMENT TO PLACE CEILING ON INTEREST RATES

The house resumed from Thursday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Argue for the second reading of Bill No. C-3 to amend the Interest Act and the amendment thereto of Mr. Roberge.

Mr. W. L. M. Creaghan (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, the explanatory note of Bill No. C-3 reads as follows:

Section 2 as at present provides that there is no restriction as to the rate of interest except as provided by statute. The amendment limits the rate to 12 per cent.

This bill was the subject of a full day's debate on February 12 last at the conclusion of which the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge) moved an amendment as recorded at page 962 of Hansard in the following words:

That the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Following the amendment a number of hon. members participated in the debate and spoke in favour of the amendment. I want to go on record as favouring the amendment but I wish to say a few words on the bill itself in order that my expressed reaction will be available when the amendment goes before the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Naturally I am opposed to high interest. High interest in Canada is not justified on any ground. However, when we consider interest I think it is only fair that the word itself should be interpreted in the usual and customary way. Credit must be available to keep our factories in production and to make it possible for Canadians to maintain their high standard of living. Extended credit is necessary for the housing industry, for automobile manufacturers, household appliance firms and every other type of business in Canada. Credit is the backbone of the nation and without it millions of our citizens would immediately be put out of work.

The problem I see in the bill is who should have credit and at what price. We have various types of credit. The first and common type of credit is first mortgages. In my short time as a lawyer I have seen first mortgages bearing interest running from 4½ per cent up to 8 per cent and higher. If a maximum rate for any type of interest is to be fixed, let us not do anything that may encourage an increase in the interest rate of first mortgages.

Another common type of credit is bank credit. Credit is given to a customer depending on his credit standing and in many cases with security. I am a bit afraid if we pass the bill in its present form we may be opening the door to encourage the banks to demand an amendment to the Bank Act which will permit bank loans for normal purposes at a higher rate of interest.

I think it is only right that I should refer to the report made by the banking and commerce committee in 1938 so far as the word "interest" is concerned. I refer to page 418 where I find the third report of the standing committee with respect to its inquiry into small loans and small loans companies. At that page the following appears in the report:

> That the search for a "reasonable" rate of interest should have continued over the ages is largely due to the application of the word "interest" to dissimilar uses.

In the same paragraph the concluding sentence reads as follows:

> While under our present economic system we have imperfect competition, it is manifest that given a sum of $100,000 for investment the rates on its return will necessarily differ as to whether the sum is say: (a) invested in a block of Canadian government bonds, (b) lent to 50 land owners secured by first mortgages, or (c) distributed in lots of $200 to 500 people of nondescript occupations on personal security.

In explanation the final paragraph on the same page reads in part as follows:

> While loans on personal security are made for diverse purposes, as set out in our records, and contain different degrees of risk, they possess two common features that affect the element of cost, namely: "size" and "time", i.e., they are small loans made for short terms. Quite obviously the purchase of a block of 12-year Canadian government bonds requires little expenditure for investigation and none for supervision; investments on 50 farm mortgages, for varied periods, entail considerable cost for both investigation and supervision; while the investigation of 1,000 applications to effect loans to 500 people for a few months, with meticulous supervision, becomes expensive business when expressed as a percentage rate of $100 on a monthly basis.

I suggest it is only fair that all of us must remember that recommendation when considering this bill either in this house or before the standing committee. In the previous debate there was serious criticism of Eaton's and Simpsons-Sears. Both of these firms do business in my riding and I feel that the criticism was not entirely justified. The mover of the bill suggested that these companies charged up to 54 per cent on instalment purchases. He explained that on an instalment sale of $20 the customer paid a minimum of $2.25 and that this amounted to 54 per cent provided the loan was paid to the firm at the rate of $5 per month.

I have not made any effort to check the computation but I think when he refers to interest he is overlooking the important factor of other costs. Surely the firm is entitled to make some charge to a willing purchaser for the cost of staff salaries as a result of the office work entailed, bookkeeping expense, the cost of ledgers, the cost of collection and perhaps the cost of loans or financing in order to maintain inventories.

Mr. Winch: How much is reasonable?

Mr. Creaghan: I think reasonable costs are costs necessarily entailed in order to finance the sale. I do not suggest that the salaries of the clerks engaged in selling should be charged as an expense but I think that charging necessary administrative costs in order to supervise the loan is reasonable.

Mr. Winch: Is that what is 54 per cent?

Mr. Creaghan: The 54 per cent may apply to the cost of a $20 sale. One thing that I believe should be kept in mind is how much of the cost, about which the hon. member has been questioning me, is actually interest. I think the house should be more concerned about making finance houses, small money lenders and instalment vendors show clearly the annual rate of interest rather than the monthly rate which we see advertised so often in their advertising "come-ons". I believe this rate should not include the costs I have just mentioned and others necessary to record a legal document in a registry office in order to protect the vendor. I do not think this type of cost should be part of the interest rate.

Another thing which I feel is related to the subject under discussion, and which I believe is in order, is the subject of loss leaders. Personally, I believe they are related to the subject of interest. People under a free enterprise system like to take advantage of a bargain, and in their anxiety to take advantage of a loss leader, which is strictly a gimmick of the retailer—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order. I shall have to ask the hon. member how he would relate loss leaders to an act to amend the Interest Act which is before the house this afternoon.

Mr. Creaghan: The reason I think it is related is that loss leaders tempt people into a store. They sign credit contracts, and when they sign these contracts they are, in some cases, paying exorbitant rates of interest, etc.

Mr. Winch: Good for you; you have finally come to it, have you?

Mr. Creaghan: They pay exorbitant rates of interest or selling costs which are not all true selling costs. In any case, whatever they pay for, it is related to the subject because the result is to place that many more contracts into existence, and they are reflected in the total millions of dollars of credit extended to the people. This leads people to buy things that they cannot afford, and in many instances the loss leader type of contract is responsible for a man getting himself into debt to 15 or 20 creditors and eventually arriving at the door of the moneylender.

Since the end of the war the government has done a lot to help the home owner. It has done a lot for the farmers and fishermen, and we all hope it will do more. Through the creation of the industrial development bank it has done a lot to help small industry. What has it done to help the automobile industry? I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the automobile and truck industries have contributed more to the growth of the small loan companies and the moneylenders of this country than any other commodity. Why could the government not consider the creation of a crown company to make money available at reasonable rates of interest to those people who are employed in the trucking industry? This would make it possible for the small loans companies, the finance companies and other types of moneylenders to have more money available and if they had an excess of cash I am sure the rate of interest, about which we are concerned, would automatically come down to a more reasonable level.

The high interest rate is the main cause of inflation. This bill itself would not curb it. A few years ago if a man was in debt he might lose his job if his employer found out about it. I have had examples of people having garnishee orders served upon them, and as a result they advised me that if the judgment were not paid in full the employer would not keep them on the payroll. The finance companies have, in this one instance in my opinion, done quite a service to the public in permitting some people to consolidate their debts. This has given these people some peace of mind.

My main criticism of the finance companies is the type of advertising they put out. In today's Globe and Mail there is an ad which I saw at five o'clock. It is in the classified pages and reads:

Second mortgages, $2.49 interest weekly—

Then the words, "for every thousand dollars you borrow", are in small print. There follows the name of a certain mortgage company in Toronto. If the loan remained in existence for a year, this rate of interest on second mortgages would be in excess of 12½ per cent per thousand dollars, on what might be considered a fairly secured risk in the city of Toronto. If it is necessary to pay up to 12½ per cent for some types of second mortgages which are secured debts, how would it be possible for finance companies to make loans at the suggested rate of interest? I believe that these advertisements must be regulated. I do not believe it is proper to advertise "Money for loan" in large black type, and then follow it in small type with the words, so much per week for every thousand dollars borrowed. I believe that the house should consider the necessity for regulating the type of advertising, and I suggest we should seriously consider making it compulsory to advertise an annual rate of interest as opposed to a weekly or monthly rate. In this way it would be possible for the average person to readily compute what he would be paying for the money borrowed, and at the same time make it convenient to compare the rates demanded by various companies.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, I believe it only fair that finance companies should be permitted to charge a rate over and above what second mortgages demand, and over and above what the banks request. In my opinion the house should give serious consideration to making it possible for the finance companies and moneylenders to itemize their costs separate from their interest income. These companies maintain properties, pay office expenses, and a great many people throughout this country are employed by them. I think that the cost of the loan should be itemized separate and apart from simple interest per annum. At the present time the various financial companies, small moneylenders and retail credit vendors, have outstanding nearly $2 billion loaned to the people of Canada. This has done a good deal toward helping provide employment and keeping the industries of the country going.

As I said earlier, I would encourage the house to give serious thought to regulating the loss leader type of merchandising; to give some thought to recommending to the government that truckers, who cannot borrow except through finance companies, be entitled to borrow money, as their fellow Canadians do, from crown corporations at reasonable rates of interest; and that some regulation should be introduced governing the type of down payment that vendors in this country must insist upon. This would discourage people from buying things that they cannot afford. I know that it looks relatively easy to put out a dollar or two dollars a month to buy a certain article or piece of household equipment. However, when you add these payments on to the payments to which people have been previously committed for other types of merchandise, it does not take long before people have become indebted to 15 or 20 creditors, which makes it impossible on pay day to give each and every one of them 50 cents or a dollar.

All of these suggestions which I have mentioned would automatically reduce the volume of business that the moneylenders are doing. As I said before, if their business is reduced, they will have an excess of cash available and money will be lent by them at more reasonable rates.

In conclusion, I wish to put on the record a statement that, in my opinion, the finance companies and the moneylenders of this country have done a service to this country. I refer to an editorial which appeared in The Albertan on Wednesday, April 4, 1956. This editorial is long but I intend to put only a couple of paragraphs on the record. It is entitled "The Small Loans Business" and it reads in part:

> The C.C.F. members of parliament have been opposing two private bills having to do with small loans companies. One would give a company already in business a more attractive name, the other would incorporate an American company which happens to have the national president of the Liberal party as one of its dummy directors.

Later on the editorial states as follows:

> The Albertan has no sympathy with the practice of levying exorbitant interest. We acknowledge the seeming injustice of people most desperately in need of money having to pay the highest rates of interest.

With that paragraph I am in complete agreement as, I am sure, are all members of this honourable house. The editorial states further:

> Banks and mortgage firms offer money at reasonable rates. If the borrower can't qualify for a loan there, in most cases he could have been an active member of a credit union and borrowed from it. Credit unions more and more are meeting the need for small loans, and still they have a long way to go before they have reached the limit of their possible expansion.

The concluding paragraph of the editorial states as follows:

> We doubt that there is any more moral justification for government controls on the price of money than on the price of housing rental, the price of automobiles, or the price of pickles. Anyone who objects to the price someone else is charging is free to offer that commodity at a lower price.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that this editorial expresses in most certain terms most of my thinking on this important bill.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of the house are in sympathy with the intent of this bill. The problem of usury has faced governments and peoples down through all written history. In his introduction to the bill the sponsor of it stated that this bill would control part of the area of small loans. He pointed out that as to small loans companies the ceiling on their loans on which control was exercised had been raised from $500 to $1,500. This was done under the former minister of finance, Hon. Walter Harris.

I spent some time going back and reading some of the statements made during the sittings of that committee. I found many of them to be pertinent to the bill that is now under consideration. It was pointed out that the degree of risk inevitably was reflected in a higher rate of interest; that if a person is not a good credit risk, he pays more for his money. The problem, of course, is how to legislate people into dealing prudently with their resources or how to legislate people into being good financial managers of the resources they may have. I believe that is a problem that would stick even our friends in the C.C.F. group. It comes back to human nature.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) makes a passing reference to this matter as reported at page 949 of Hansard. He states as follows:

> Canadians need credit. They have to have credit, and when they have to have credit they are forced to pay these fantastic rates of interest. I am suggesting that the government should take action in this field, and should study this whole question.

With all the good will in the world towards the intent of this bill, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the statement made by the hon. member is certainly open to question. Canadians need credit. Everybody needs credit. Our whole business economy is fashioned and based upon an extensive credit system. But we need credit within the resources which we have and which will allow us to repay the loans we receive. If a person is making $4,000 a year and that is the extent of his resources, I doubt whether that person would be a good credit risk for a loan of $40,000 or $50,000.

I well remember that, in canvassing in the election of June, 1957, I met a lady who said to me, "Why can't you do something about these loan sharks?" She was referring to the way in which the future of borrowers is mortgaged to the point where they have no reserve whatsoever for any eventuality that might come up, where they are prisoners of their own enthusiastic buying. After discussing the matter for a little while, she came to the conclusion that they would work their own way out of it, that they would never get caught again but also that this tale of their experience would not help their neighbours who would have to find out for themselves.

I know of other cases about which I have been told where a cash sale has been refused at the price originally offered because the salesman expected that it would be a time payment matter. It was quite clear that the interest rate would be quite high, and that is where the profit of the sale lay.

The advertising mentioned by the hon. member who spoke previously can be seen when you walk down the streets. It seems to me that the largest customers of the neon companies are the loan companies because, wherever you look you find there is one advertisement after another staring at you. Their advertising is to be found in the busses as well as in the newspapers. But at the same time these people give a useful service in the way of advancing credit which the person receiving that credit could not normally secure.

Credit unions have been mentioned. I helped to found a credit union. Over the years I have periodically had loans from that credit union and I paid 12 per cent interest. It is true that I obtained a rebate but the rebate was not very much. There is little risk to a credit union. They know everybody in it. The greater part of the loans they make are secured. Nevertheless they still are obliged to charge that interest rate in order to break even. This is a non-profit organization.

We have heard from the superintendent of insurance of the success of the Bank of Nova Scotia small loans plan. I believe the Bank of Nova Scotia was the first chartered bank to go into that field, but even there you pay 12 per cent. I am not arguing that there is no need for control. I would say that the interest rates as set up in the present Small Loans Act are reasonable, because those interest rates reflect the fact that small loans are more expensive to carry and operate than large loans. As the hon. member for Assiniboia undoubtedly knows, on the first $500 the interest rate is 18 per cent, and after that, from $500 to $1,500, it drops to 12 per cent. The intent of this bill would be to raise that ceiling indefinitely, and on that basis the principle is good because the larger the loan the less money it should cost the loan company. However, the only result will be that those loan companies will have become more selective and will have to refuse credit, which perhaps may be a good thing.

I think the hon. member for Assiniboia is certainly not reasonable in his statement which I have referred to, where on one side he says there should be almost unlimited credit, and on the other side he says interest rates should be controlled. Those two things just do not go together. That is another reason why the amendment to send this bill to a committee for further study is a proper amendment. Because a few years back it was wise and right to raise the ceiling to $1,500, perhaps the proper course is not to take the recommendation of the hon. member for Assiniboia in toto but maybe that after study the upper limit should be raised to $2,500 or even $3,500, I do not know. But those facts can be brought out if this bill is referred to a committee to thoroughly investigate the situation.

I do wish to refer to the remarks made by the previous speaker in regard to misleading advertising. I believe that is a subject which has been brought up in the house before and it is pertinent to this particular measure. Misleading advertising in regard to small loans is the sort of thing where you get the small print, where the rate is stated as $10 or $100 and you do not get the rate of interest you are paying per annum, because the original amount of the loan starts to reduce one month later and the interest rate which you may appear to be paying simply does not reflect the true interest rate which in fact you are paying. I think there is room for control there, and I believe further control is needed in the field touched upon in the hon. member's bill. I do say that in correcting one evil we may jump into or subject ourselves to worse evils.

The whole point, as I suggested at first, is that you cannot legislate people into being good financial managers. If a person wants a loan and there is a law which says he cannot have it, there are always people available to help him break the law by means of turning back a certain amount of the loan and the face value of the loan does not reflect the amount of money he receives, and so on. The fact that the law can be broken is no reason why one should not be there. But whatever law is enacted, it must be enforceable. It must have safeguards in it and it must be reasonable.

I would like to try to find words properly to describe how I feel in regard to the practice of holding people up with fantastic interest rates, and on top of that to make tremendous discounts on the face value of a mortgage. Perhaps a person should not take out a second mortgage, but in many cases people are forced to. They must have a house to live in because they have children and they cannot rent a house. In that last respect if we had more rental accommodation or had some law which compelled landlords to take in families, perhaps matters might improve. Therefore this person is faced with the necessity of acquiring a basic essential of married life, namely a home. If he never makes another mistake in his life, or never has to buy anything else on terms, that one purchase can put him behind for 15, 20, 25 years, because of the bonus which he may have to pay if he has not enough money to make a big enough down payment so that a first mortgage would carry the balance. In that field I have thought that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation might perhaps enter. It may be a field which should be considered entirely separately from the particular point brought out by the member for Assiniboia.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I am sure no hon. member wants to see unreasonable interest charges and bonuses imposed on people because they have to have something. We believe that where it is possible the government needs to control the situation. Such a committee I think might well investigate the legislation which other countries have on their books, for example, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States. But in the final analysis, any legislation which is evolved must be legislation which is fair and which is enforceable.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this bill has been before the house a number of times and we are now debating an amendment that was moved to the bill on February 12. The amendment reads as follows:

Although different attitudes are taken from time to time regarding an amendment of that type, it is usually considered that, at least for the time being, it sets aside the bill under discussion and refers not the bill itself but the subject matter thereof to a committee. Mr. Speaker, we have seen a lot of tears—I do not know if they are crocodile tears or not—being shed with regard to the welfare of Canadians who have to pay exorbitant rates of interest. Some members when discussing this bill have complained of the one per cent figure, or the rate of approximately 12 per cent per year. They have said: "Where did you get the figure? Did you pull it out of a hat? Why this figure? Isn't it too low? Won't it cause the companies too much hardship if the rates are reduced to that amount?" Mr. Speaker, I do not think I got the figure out of a hat. It is the rate charged by credit unions in this country, the maximum rate. A great many of them charge less, but as far as I know it is the maximum rate which is charged by credit unions. The credit unions have done a very excellent type of business. They have made a good saving for their customers. They have grown, and I think it is the very maximum rate which should be allowed at this time.

Although the adoption of the amendment before the house would not result in any heady progress with this matter, I do suggest that the very least hon. members opposite should do would be, first of all, to permit a vote on this amendment and, second, to support it. Then they will not be embarrassed, if indeed it is an embarrassment, by having to decide whether or not they think the 12 per cent figure is a correct one. They would be making it possible for the banking and commerce committee of this house to study the question of interest rates and to study the subject matter of the bill, and, I hope, after studying the subject, to take action which would result in the lowering of interest rates.

I have in my hand the Toronto Star for today. I sent for it a short time ago, and I noticed on the front page a heading: "Demand Ottawa Probe 50 per cent Mortgage Bonus". The article reads:

> Richmond Hill council last night called for a federal judicial inquiry into the practice of some mortgagors charging up to 50 per cent bonuses for second mortgages in new town subdivision. Coun. James Haggard explained that to get a second mortgage of $5,000 some homeowners must pay an additional $2,500 as a bonus. This must be paid back with interest.

A resolution calling for the inquiry was passed unanimously. Copies will go to the Ontario minister of planning and development and the Toronto real estate board, council decided.

All Metropolitan Toronto municipalities will be asked to support the Richmond Hill resolution.

The passage of the amendment to this bill will enable this inquiry to proceed immediately in Ottawa before the banking and commerce committee and we could find out whether this nefarious practice, this legal gangsterism which is referred to in this article, should be allowed to continue unchallenged in this country. By talking about this measure and preventing it from coming to a vote, hon. members opposite must accept responsibility for these abhorrent practices being continued. I think it is a disgrace to the free enterprise economy which hon. members opposite champion so strongly that Canadian homeowners should have to pay a bonus on second mortgages reaching the staggering amount of $2,500 on a mortgage of $5,000.

If hon. gentlemen will vote on this amendment, and if the amendment is carried, it will not cause political embarrassment. Surely the whip will not be hard on them; surely the whip will not chastise them; surely, even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) will not instigate disciplinary action, because all this would do would be to allow a committee of this house to hear witnesses, take evidence and see whether or not in the opinion of the committee action should be taken in this regard.

I challenge hon. members opposite to quit this farce of talking out this measure time after time, this farce of preventing, by talk, members of this house taking a decision and, by talking out the measure, making it impossible for people in this instance and in many other instances who wish to obtain homes to obtain those homes, and obtain second mortgages, unless they pay staggering and fabulous rates of interest.

The rates of interest charged in this country are not going down. The present government, by its high interest policy, is promoting, aiding and abetting a continuation of this type of gangsterism in the interest field. The government has allowed the rediscount rate to reach the highest interest rate in the history of this country. The tight money policy of the former administration was just a joke compared to the rigid high interest policy of the present administration; apparently there is no limit to be placed upon it. My appeal today is for the government to allow this amendment to go to a vote so that members of parliament may study this question. Then let us take action in the interest of the ordinary Canadian to reduce and limit these fantastic interest charges.

Mr. N. L. Spencer (Essex West): I was surprised to hear the sponsor of this bill re-entering this debate to support the amendment made to his motion.

Mr. Argue: Better than killing it by talking it out.

Mr. Spencer: No one has spent more time in talking about bills and talking a lot of nonsense than has the hon. member who sponsors this measure, and I do not think he made any contribution toward furthering the passage of this bill by the remarks he made, if he sincerely intended that it should pass.

I think it is obvious that there is a general feeling in this house that some kind of control of interest rates should be adopted. This bill, when one considers it, is an all-embracing bill in that it defines and covers not only interest as we understand it but all manner of charges including discounts and penalties. I do not think that we can, by a simple formula of specifying a rate per annum based upon the size of a loan, arrive at a figure which would be fair and reasonable and just in all circumstances.

I think that this bill has created a forum for the making of a lot of extravagant and unjustified statements. I have no sympathy with so-called loan sharks, but I do not think it is fair to those who are engaged in the legitimate business of lending money to classify them in a general way of being loan sharks. Neither do I think it is proper for members of this house to rely on newspaper statements and accept those statements as being full statements of all the information on those subjects, and to refer to those involved in terms of gangsterism. I know that in this country we do have elements of gangsterism, but they are certainly not confined to the interest field as the hon. gentleman would have us believe.

This question has two sides like so many other questions and issues that arise from day to day in our daily lives. I think it is generally agreed, as is indicated by the remarks of those who have thus far taken part in this debate, that there is a need for legislation for regulating interest and other charges of a like nature such as commissions, bonuses, investigating charges and perhaps recording and renewal charges, but when you take into account penalties, fines and charges for defaults as is the case in this bill then you are, of course, stepping into a realm of figures just as fantastic as most of the figures we have heard related in this house as being charges which are unconscionable and unreasonable. Over the years we have accepted penalties as being reasonable but when they are applied and determined on the basis of an annual rate they become unreasonable.

We know, for instance, of utilities that impose a penalty for non-payment of bills which is applied on the first day of the default. It is true that the penalty may be the same whether the default continues for thirty days or even longer but the fact remains that the penalty is imposed on the first day of default. When that is determined as a rate per annum then we enter the realm of percentages ranging from 20 to 50 per cent per annum.

The bill also deals with discounts. Here again we find that premiums are granted for prompt payment. When those are projected into percentages per annum we again find that we reach fantastic rates.

Another objection I have to the bill which I do not believe could be cured by passing the amendment and referring it to the banking and commerce committee is that it is deficient in many respects. I have no doubt that what is in mind in connection with this legislation is the small loan. Of course, we have some legislation in existence dealing with the exacting of interest and maximum rates of interest on small loans. I believe that if we are going to legislate in respect of loans then there should be some limitation in connection with loans on real estate as well. Of course, when we consider that factor we come to the question of security. That again is something not taken into account in the bill now before the house and no attempt is made to spell it out.

Everyone knows that the element of risk has a great deal to do with interest. That may be manifested in many ways but it does obtain very generally in the money market and in the security market.

No one would suggest, for instance, that a loan of a modest amount of money, perhaps to the extent of 25 per cent of the value of a first class real estate property and secured by way of a first mortgage should carry with it a rate as high as if the loan were up to 75 per cent of the value. Instead of criticizing and casting aspersions upon the government of the day in so far as its record in the field of loans is concerned, I think the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) might well have congratulated the government and also might well have mentioned what I consider to be a most significant statement made today concerning the intention of the government to keep the rate on first mortgages down to 6 per cent per annum. That is of much more significance than all our time-consuming debates on small loans.

[Mr. Spencer.]

I know of instances where rates far in excess of 6 per cent are now being exacted on mortgages and I believe the average rate is about 6¾ per cent. When that is projected over a period of 30 years the borrower really becomes burdened. There is no great burden in his having to pay anywhere from $1 to $5 in interest even though that may represent interest in excess of 12 per cent per annum but when a home owner has to pay an annual rate of interest in excess of 6 per cent which I think should be the maximum rate payable on a home loan and when one considers the length of the term of the mortgage one realizes that it runs into substantial sums of money.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Churchill for the second reading of Bill No. C-49, to provide for the establishment of a national energy board, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Peters.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, when this debate was adjourned for private members' hour I was dealing with some of the remarks of the Prime Minister. I had been seeking to deal with his charge that the former government should have provided an energy board and his reference to it being referred to in the Gordon commission report on Canada's economic prospects. I was dealing with his having asked the then minister of trade and commerce on January 15, 1957 whether he was going to set up a national energy authority and his statement that the minister had replied that he had not considered the matter, that the decision would be a matter for the government and he did not care to express an opinion then. It was at that point in my remarks that the interruption in this debate occurred.

I want to continue my argument by pointing out that the Gordon preliminary report had been tabled on January 10, 1957, some five days earlier. It had been made available to the government either in December of 1956 or early January of 1957. Therefore up to that time there had been no opportunity to consider the matter at all. I also want to point out that the report made reference to a special study being carried out with regard to Canada's energy prospects. That study bears date of March, 1957, and was tabled in the house on November 22, 1957, after the change of government. That report would presumably be a basic document in considering the Gordon report recommendations on this subject. Therefore, bearing in mind that parliament was dissolved on April 12, 1957, it was wholly misleading to the house to suggest that there was an opportunity for the previous government to consider the Gordon commission report on the subject of energy and to deal with it.

Reference was also made to Mr. Lesage, then minister of northern affairs and national resources, and it was asserted that he had been opposed to the setting up of such an authority. In that regard reference was made to a debate but the Prime Minister gave no page reference to Hansard for the then minister's speech. We were left without being able to identify the exact page when the Prime Minister made the assertion. It now turns out that the matter under discussion on that occasion was the whole subject of the treatment of national resources and it was not related to the subject of a national energy authority at all. Nowhere can I find any statement by Mr. Lesage which would indicate opposition to a national energy authority being set up.

Then there was another part of the remarks of the Prime Minister to which I think some reference should be made. I refer to his reading of the criteria set out in the bill for deciding whether or not a licence or certificate should be granted. Perhaps I can deal with that point very quickly. He might just as well have read the criteria from notes he might have got from the board of transport commissioners as to the procedure to be followed in dealing with pipe line applications under the old legislation. They are all there. There is nothing new or changed in the bill in that respect although there is one change in the bill in that it omits certain former legislation that had to do with the price of gas exported from Canada being not less than the price of gas sold in Canada.

Another argument made by the Prime Minister was rather interesting. He took great credit for obtaining the removal of the mandatory controls or quotas applied by the United States against the export by Canada of oil to that country. He is not modest in taking credit for some of these things but there are those who think that maybe his policy involving the famous 15 per cent trade diversion had something to do with causing such mandatory controls to be imposed in the first place. In any event, granting him credit for having such influence with the United States government as to have that government remove these quota controls, I think his attention ought to be drawn to an article in the Montreal Gazette of Tuesday, May 26, 1959. That article is headed, "Crude Oil Exemption Political Convenience". Perhaps I should read part of the article. I should like to read it all but time does not permit me to do so. It reads in part as follows:

> The possibility of any substantial increase in American imports of Canadian crude seems more remote than ever, despite the exemption of Canadian crude from import quotas and the encouraging 20,000 to 30,000 barrels daily increase scheduled for Puget Sound refineries.
> The reason for this gloomy assessment is found in section 2, paragraph (c) (11) of the presidential proclamation exempting Canadian oil from the quota. The substance of the paragraph is that the quotas will be re-established if Canadian oil begins to flow in large volume.
> It looks as if all the United States has done is to remove a political source of irritation without forfeiting the economic advantages to its producers of the quotas.
> Canadian oil, it should be remembered, seldom, if ever, was imported into the United States to the full extent permitted by the quotas. The recession was most often cited in explanation for this. It is now quite apparent other considerations were at work.
> The most obvious of these has been the pressure upon American-based international oil companies to keep facilities, refineries, pipe lines and tankers designed for off-shore oil running at maximum capacity.
> The initial imposition of quotas was followed by elaborate swap-out arrangements between these companies and between them and American independent producers and refiners, all directed towards concentrating import volume where it would yield the most profitable return.
> Canadian oil, while cheaper than American oil in some border markets and in the American northwest, had small attraction to American refiners in these circumstances. The subsequent exemption of Canadian oil has made little difference.

There is a lot more to the editorial but the point I want to make is that the Prime Minister's remarks on that aspect of the subject were something less than complete and put a better picture on the position of Canadian exporters than the facts warrant at the present time. Then the Prime Minister went on to say that the bill—

Mr. Lambert: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he not agree though that this has removed a very definite trend in the other direction?

Mr. McIlraith: I have a very short period of time left. I do not want to prevent the hon. member from asking a question because I know he is interested in the subject. The answer is that undoubtedly it helped remove a handicap to our export volume. Of course it did. The Prime Minister then went on to indicate that the bill removed the suspicion that Canadian industries will be asked to pay a higher price for their energy than that paid by foreign industries using Canadian energy. At that point in his remarks he was referring to gas. I want to point out just how loose that statement is.

How is he going to control the price that foreign industries have to pay for the natural gas they import from Canada? A large public utility in the United States, using vast quantities of gas from a number of sources, may very properly and very probably be taking a small percentage of its total quantity from Canadian sources, and the Canadian government has no control over the retail price charged by this company to its consumers, especially if the bulk of its supplies come from sources within the United States at a lower cost because of proximity or other reasons.

What he undoubtedly was seeking to refer to was his hope that there would be no export at prices lower than those charged to Canadian industry. However, that is quite a different thing from what he said in his argument. I point that out to show how loose his argument was this afternoon, and how misleading it could be.

Mr. Speaker: Order; I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take a great deal of the time of the house in adding to the many remarks and observations which have been made during this debate and which I think we will all agree have been, for the most part, of a constructive nature. I have had occasion to express my views before in relation to the problems of import and export, so there is no need to repeat them except as they apply directly to this bill.

It has occurred to me though, Mr. Speaker, in listening to the discussion thus far that we have reached a point in the motion for second reading of the bill presented to us where those of us sitting in our seats in the house or people sitting in the galleries might find it confusing to try to ascertain exactly what we are endeavouring to determine in so far as the objectives of an energy bill are concerned. I fully recognize that I am not the last speaker, nor am I setting myself up as an authority to determine how to summarize the debate thus far. It would, of course, be suggested by more than one member on the opposition side that my view would be prejudiced. However, if for no other reason than to try to clarify my own thinking, I propose to try to separate the various arguments in their generalities so that we can come to some basic conclusions on which to either agree or disagree.

I can do no better than to start with the argument of the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas), who opened the debate from the standpoint of the opposition. I join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) who complimented him. I think the Prime Minister described it as a thoughtful contribution, and I would add that I think it was generally objective. His basic objections, as I understood them, were that there was really no difference between this piece of legislation we have before us and the situation in which the petroleum and natural gas industry found itself in the past.

You will recall, sir, he then went on to say that we, as a government, had rejected or repudiated the Borden commission recommendations. There was, of course, some inconsistency there because one of his colleagues who followed him pointed out that the government had accepted some 23 of the recommendations and had rejected only 11. The point of his argument was that we had not employed—these are my own words—some of the tired, old Liberal ideas that had been left on the shelf for years. We had not put them into force as part of this energy bill. He quoted at length from Mr. John Davis who did a very fine job in the interests of the Gordon commission. He suggested that the government had not shown sufficient speed because they had sufficient material to establish an energy board, had they used the Gordon commission as a basis.

I wonder if the hon. member would reflect, first of all on the fact that this commission held its hearings some time ago, and certainly some time before the rather extreme changes which occurred in the economics of the industry. I believe that Mr. Davis might concede that he did not make as extensive a study or examination as Mr. Borden and his colleagues, and certainly his report would have needed updating. More important, the problems that he was asked by the commission to investigate were much broader than those objectives of the Borden commission, upon whose recommendations this energy bill is based. From one side of the house we have heard criticisms to the effect that the government has introduced more of the recommendations than it should, and from others we hear that it has not introduced enough.

Perhaps it is important to note that this government did not ignore the Borden royal commission recommendations as has been the habit for many years past of the previous governments, but rather it took the best from this report and rejected the balance. After all, that is their responsibility. I have, on more than one occasion, joined the critics in suggesting that Mr. Borden and his colleagues, first of all, did make a fine contribution to energy resources in Canada by establishing a vast array of material for the development of a national oil and gas policy. I have also said that many of their recommendations, as I intend to show, have been adopted in this bill and will be beneficial, not only to the industry but to the consumer as well. As I have had occasion in the past to tell my friends in the oil industry, this commission was not established for any one particular group. It was established for the benefit of the public, regardless of whether they were developers of resources or just consumers.

The criticism which I have repeated many times in relation to the weakness in the Borden commission report—I think it is a human weakness—is that it fails above everything else in some of its recommendations to recognize that this is a business which involves great risks; great capital investment is required. I have been endeavouring to impress this on the house since I was first sent here. When one recalls that this industry spend a million and a half dollars a day in looking for these resources, it is quite obvious it is an undertaking that involves substantial capital and the risk factor is extreme.

I am going to leave this question and go on to the principal differences which the hon. member for Villeneuve says exist to the detriment of the industry. First of all, a board was established, and the Prime Minister dealt with that. I feel I certainly could not add to his remarks. A board was established, and that is something of which we should not lose sight.

Second, its advisory functions, I think, have not been given the weight or have not been put in the perspective in which they should have been put by many of the hon. members who have spoken. We hear to a considerable degree some of the comments with regard to the problems, first of all, in relation to the federal power commission of the United States and the problems of equating the amount of the reserves which are going to be required for Canadian consumption. These must be related also to the gas and oil that we anticipate to find, and the research that must be continually done in co-operation with the provinces. These are functions of an advisory nature which have never been carried out before and which will be carried out by this board. This is a second difference between what today we may look forward to and what has happened in the past.

A third rather distinct difference between what this bill proposes and what we have seen in the past is the simplification by which an applicant can appear before an agency of government to determine whether he has the right to construct a pipe line, and equally important whether he has a right to export a hydrocarbon product. We know that under the old process it was necessary first of all to appear before the board of transport commissioners in order to obtain what we call a certificate of public convenience and this was given to the applicant who if successful received consent in the form of a certificate. He then had an additional problem of appealing through a second act for power to export. This gave him a licence, provided the minister conceded that this was acceptable. It was partly a discretionary power however.

I suggest that had this discretionary power been removed, had the present energy board been in force some three years ago and had the right of a public hearing been granted to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines in their initial application for an export permit, we would never have seen the situation by which this company eventually was asked to bring into the house an unprepared case and then drag out a hearing before the House of Commons in the pipe line debate. I am not suggesting that parliament should not have had that opportunity. But here we saw the minister of that government attempting to negotiate a contract which should have been the right of a public board, a body that would have had the opportunity to weigh the evidence, that would have been able to call witnesses and have them examined, and then to produce a finished recommendation on which the representatives of the people could then make a determination whether it was in the best interests of the people to grant a permit. It would have then been unnecessary to drag this long and extended application through the parliament of Canada. That is indeed a distinct difference between what we will see today and what has taken place in the past. But let me go on.

We have in this bill—and again repetition is unnecessary because the Prime Minister has dealt with the matter—provided for greater Canadian participation. I should like to say here that there is in some quarters in Canada a feeling that those involved in the petroleum industry of those outside it in western Canada are somewhat resentful of this suggestion. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, there are no more loyal Canadians, either in or outside of the petroleum industry, than there are in western Canada. We believe in the rights of Canadians no matter where those Canadians may live. We welcome Canadian participation as an inclusion in this bill.

Then we have, of course, the question of the regulation of tolls; and in this matter we see again the separation, in the past performance of a government which saw no reason to regulate tolls in so far as they applied to gas. Indeed, this is another change in this bill which marks, so far as I have been able to count them, the fifth major change to date. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to make reference to others at a later point. But in discussing the change in the exercising or maintaining of a toll rate on gas lines, I should like to make what I hope will be construed by the hon. gentlemen on your left as an assessment which is done in all fairness of their arguments.

They have expressed considerable approval over Mr. Borden's recommendation of a fixed rate of return and asked whether something more stringent was still not necessary, something that was going to prevent the extreme profits of their Texas buccaneer from recurring.

I recall the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) dealing with the options which were granted to a group of executives of three companies in particular. At most they were a handful of men. I say very quickly that I do not justify extended options. I am not making a case for these gentlemen. They have been entitled to speak for themselves. However, what I say is this. Let us remember that when you fix a rate of return, when you apply any fixed formula controlling these returns, while it might have some influence on the Texas buccaneers, I suggest to them that it would also destroy completely the value of the shares, either present or future, held by many Canadians. Equally important, it would in my view eliminate the possibility of the construction of future pipe lines, certainly with private capital. Recognizing the difference in our ideologies, perhaps that matter is not of any real concern to them.

I suggest that we should remember that in one pipe line company alone—one which has been subjected to considerable publicity in this house—namely Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, there are 30,000 Canadians who would be affected as shareholders. They represent about 70 per cent of the share capital of that company. I suggest that when they invested their money as equity in this company they did so in the hope or the belief that it would not be interfered with by undue government regulation. It should be remembered that the principle of return based upon equity implies more rigorous control than we have ever experienced in Canadian industry. Certainly in peacetime, to regulate the return on equity we would have to decide whether the company could borrow money; if so, when and how much; and, finally of course, what rate of interest the bonds should pay and perhaps even who should buy them.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary South).]

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has grown in its maturity to date on the basis that we have been able to maintain an attractive investment climate. When we start stipulating the rate of return which is going to be extreme, in order to discourage the return which is required in an investment undertaking of the highest risk nature, we are indeed biting off our nose to spite our face and we are indeed going to over-control industry and thus affect the very shareholders who are themselves Canadian citizens.

I suggest that the hon. member overlooks entirely the fact that Canadian interests are protected by this bill under the provisions which affect the rate of return. I refer, of course, to the provisions under which a Canadian, as an operator, applies for a certificate of public convenience in which again the Canadian rights are given consideration. May I suggest to him that in his concern to restrict the profits of a handful of people we should not expect to place excessive regulation on industry in the development of the resource itself. What he is attempting to do is to have the government act as a group of security policemen in order to see that profits of these individuals are not going to become extreme. I counter that argument by saying that the very regulations implied in the bill take care of that situation adequately. We have had the minister, in the course of the debate to date, suggest that he would welcome suggestions, especially as we proceed in a clause by clause study. I offer these suggestions to him. Many of them, of course, can only be borne out after the bill has had an opportunity to be applied to the industry which it is going to regulate.

The member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) dealt yesterday with the right of repeal. This has been a matter of interest to myself. It is rather unusual because I find, on the one hand, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) embracing the Borden commission report and suggesting that the fixed rate of return based on equity is a good thing, yet he is very critical of the fact that a very flexible form of return based on what is described as fair and reasonable is going to be the principle of application to determine this same return.

If I have any objection at all, it is just this. Supposing, for the sake of argument, that the appointments to this board at some future date turned out to be from hon. gentlemen on your left. In their opinion what might be fair and reasonable might then make the conditions under which Mr. Borden introduced his fixed rate of return look rather acceptable. I have argued that perhaps it might be well to suggest to the government that they review the method by which we could give some right of repeal to the consumer, and the industry, to determine whether or not the board were being completely honest in making their assessment of what is fair and reasonable. I believe you cannot fix a rate of return; it must be something that is determined by each individual application, because of course each pipe line will require a different application of the principle.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that we would be able to give some thought to the basis on which a right of appeal either to the senior court of this land or to the governor in council could be made by which we could keep the board, as I say, honest in their application; that they would have a clear understanding of the fact that there are limitations in which this term "fair and reasonable" could be interpreted; and I suggest that the right of appeal which is often introduced in legislation of this nature might be a simple method of affecting this. However, I make my point. I am not suggesting this should be done, at least until the bill has been given a fair trial, but at some point it may be necessary to make this simple amendment.

I think one other point which perhaps should be taken under consideration, Mr. Speaker, is the question which I referred to earlier. The bill in one of its clauses—and I realize I am not permitted to refer to it at this point—discusses the basis on which a permit for export of natural gas will be granted. Here again flexibility is essential, and I agree that this clause which is designed to eliminate the ambiguity which was contained in the export of power and fluids act is a sound approach. But one of the conditions states that the amount of gas which is required for Canadian reserves must be greater in amount, either anticipated in the future or in its present volume, than the demands on it for export.

Too often when we assess export demands we are inclined to take our proven reserves as the basis for calculating the requirements of the country for a 30-year period and then take the difference between the 30-year period which we require and the amount that is proven is the difference it is agreed that is available for export. I suggest that is hardly reasonable and logical, because first of all if you set up a basis of a 30-year requirement you must equate or relate this to the expectant proven or potential reserves which you intend to discover. As I pointed out before, with proven reserves of 26 trillion cubic feet and a discovery rate of 2½ trillion cubic feet a year, I suggest these are the basic figures which must be used in this equation to determine the amount actually exportable. I am happy to see that the bill makes reference to this, but I think it important if the minister in his concluding remarks would perhaps cover the point in somewhat greater detail.

Another point which I would suggest to the minister which has been dealt with by him and has also been covered by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) is the position our energy board, in relation to the federal power commission of the United States. I am sure hon. members appreciate that before a company can undertake its financing it must receive authority for export, first of all, from the province of origin; then a federal permit is required, and also a permit from the United States government agency, the federal power commission. So we then have the difficult problem of determining which comes first, the chicken or the egg. Do we only grant the permit prior to any action of the federal power commission, or do we grant it conditionally upon the fact that they will grant a hearing? I think the minister made a very fair statement in this respect in that progress had been made in working out some arrangement with the federal power commission. I suggest to him that we must safeguard Canadian rights so that we do not find ourselves, as the former government did, in the position of having granted a permit to an exporting company and find they have then to wait anywhere from eight to sixteen months before the federal power commission are prepared to act on it. I think the reason is obvious, because the terms under which the contract was initially issued to the Canadian company changed completely in the interim.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that in establishing the energy board this government has created the first agency which is in a position to deal with any United States authority on common problems. While I recognize the constitutional problems which will not permit a member of the federal power commission to sit in an advisory capacity on the board or to act on it, I believe the steps which have been suggested of having a close liaison with them to determine the problems I have outlined are essential, and I hope in the minister's remarks he will deal in somewhat more detail with that point.

Mr. Speaker, I mentioned the advisory function of this body to the government, and one of the things which has concerned Canadians for some time is how we can process more of our raw materials in Canada. As you know, natural gas as an agent can be used for upgrading a great many minerals. I think that here is a substance to which the research staff of the national energy board may well apply themselves. We have great bodies of ore, lead, zinc and iron which can be upgraded to a considerable degree and therefore utilized in a finished product within Canada. I suggest that here again is a matter to which the advisory board will certainly make a useful contribution.

On the question of any infringement on provincial rights, I was happy to hear the minister say in his statement that every effort had been made to avoid this. It was his view, I understood him to say, that there was no indication of any such infringement. Where there is any question of provincial rights it might be worthwhile, and I suggest it is worthwhile, if this problem might be referred to a body which I have often felt, while it performs a useful function, could make a more useful contribution to a board of this nature. I refer to the mines ministers' conference which, while it only meets annually, has a variety of committees which deal exactly with these and other subjects and could be used very effectively in an advisory capacity to the board as well. I point out that this consists of a group of men from industry and government in every province where there is any form of resources, and I suggest to the minister that he might usefully employ this body, to assist the energy board. I should like also to have the minister state clearly that there will be one hearing for an export permit after the order has been issued for a permit for convenience. I read the bill again at dinner time, and it did seem to me that there might be a need for clarification in this respect.

I come now to the last point I wish to make, and this concerns the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition when he dealt, first of all, with the problem of marketing oil in Canada, and with our domestic market. I thought his concern over the delay in the introduction of this bill was touching, because the concern which we have had in the province of Alberta has been with the delay which the Liberals in that province have shown in agreeing to the exportation of natural gas. It was refreshing to hear the hon. member for Villeneuve urge that immediate action should be taken. This is in contrast with the position taken by the leader in our province and it will be interesting to see what his comments will be in view of the hon. member's statement.

Then the Leader of the Opposition talks about the fact that there are no safeguards for Canadians. It is hardly necessary for me to dignify those comments by discussing them further. They have been dealt with. There was a complete lack of recognition of the fact that there is an important clause which deals with this point. He stated his view firmly that there is no urgency whatsoever about granting authority to the governor in council to exercise the right to license imports and exports of oil. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) also dealt with this point.

I say, not in any heat of battle or debate, that I somehow get the feeling that hon. gentlemen opposite just do not understand the problems with which we are confronted. We have a marketing problem which is twofold. First, we export a volume of oil into what is known as district 5 of the United States and also into the mid-west of the United States. We import vast quantities—290,000 barrels—of foreign crude into eastern Canada into the refining area of Montreal. Our problem is, one of markets for exports and, second, a problem of whether the imports of foreign crude coming into Canada are seriously reducing the markets which western Canadian oil has captured in eastern Canada.

Western Canadian oil men have never asked for any special advantage or consideration. What they do maintain is that when this oil comes in at firesale prices, at a dump rate, and the provisions of the anti-dumping act are not such that it can be prevented, then surely some form of regulation to protect the entire Canadian economy, not a segment of it, is essential.

It seems to me we are splitting hairs in determining how we are going to apply this principle of regulation in the bill. We can recall the Leader of the Opposition in Edmonton accepting the need of establishing oil markets in eastern Canada in the event that the restrictions by the United States on the entry of Canadian oil were not lifted. He must be equally honest with himself and recognize, while we are grateful that these restrictions have been lifted, and the indications are that we are going to benefit as Canadians as a result, that there is still no certainty that this will be a continuing benefit. If we are to continue to be able to market only about 45 per cent of our possible production, if dumped crude comes in from other parts of the world at six or nine cents a barrel compared with Canadian costs of $1 a barrel, is it not essential in the interests of the Canadian economy to have some type of legislation which can be employed immediately? I suggest that no one can appreciate this problem unless he recognizes the havoc that it can create in the industry.

As I have said many times, you cannot turn on a valve when you require oil or gas and then turn it off. You have to maintain a healthy industry. That is something which is entirely dependent on markets, and on continuous markets. If we found ourselves tomorrow in a situation where there was a vast quantity of Russian crude on our doorstep, as we were a few short weeks ago with substantial quantities of crude from Venezuela, from Borneo and from the Middle East—crude that comes in at, say, 45 cents or 60 cents a barrel—below the price of Canadian oil, are hon. members going to tell me that the eastern Canadian consumer is going to benefit for more than just a few days? What about his line of supply? What if an emergency were to occur when these supplies of foreign crude were not available?

Is anyone going to argue that it is not essential that we should maintain a healthy economy based on a continuous supply of the product, and this is the basis on which this regulation can and will be implemented as I understand it. No one likes government regulation unless it is essential. The word "protection" has indeed become a dirty word. There are occasions, however, when one must recognize that the products we build or produce in Canada from our resources are essential in order to maintain economic unity, and without that economic equality how can we maintain national unity?

I should like to make one reference to the remarks of the Prime Minister. I have long been an advocate of the need for early action with regard to the export of our surplus natural gas based on the statistics which I have given to the house on many occasions in the past. This is not a question of trying to get rid of gas for quick profits. It is part of the argument I have just advanced in favour of the necessity of maintaining a continuous supply and a continuous market. I thank the Prime Minister for his statement that every consideration is going to be given to hearing the three applications currently before the board of transport commissioners, and that they will be transferred to the energy board. I accept his suggestion that they can be heard immediately following this debate and that the board would then be in a position, as I understand it, to hear these applications without any further delay.

I do not intend to go into Premier Manning's statements now, but in view of the Prime Minister's statement I feel we could ask for no more than has been offered. I think this is a satisfactory solution. I think it will provide the answer to the producers in western Canada to say, first of all, that the gas is going to be sold when it is surplus to the requirements of Canadians and that, on the other hand, in processing applications through the energy board the rights of the Canadian consumer will be adequately protected.

In these last moments I should like to say to my friends in the house that I have on a number of occasions been overly sensitive to the suggestions that the petroleum industry and those of us in western Canada generally come from the land as it is so often described as "a fast buck". If you come from Calgary or that general area or have any connection with the petroleum industry one is regarded by many people as a cross between a procurer and a pickpocket, but I may assure hon. members that neither designation is true. While some may attempt to degrade the industry and its people in holding an exaggerated conception of wealth in their minds, let them remember some basic facts in relation to the industry. First of all the petroleum and natural gas industry is the number one mineral industry in Canada. Let them also be reminded that it was the greatest single factor in western Canada's postwar development. Let them remember, too, that when one single drilling rig moves into a community employing some twenty men it immediately contributes approximately $20,000 to the economic life of that area.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member takes his seat, would he permit a question? My question is this. The hon. gentleman referred to Texas buccaneers. I should like to ask him if he would take exception to the investment in Canada of United States enterprises in the petroleum industry?

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): If I may reply to that question, Mr. Speaker, I have said on many occasions as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate well knows that we in western Canada welcome capital invested in the development of our petroleum industry regardless of its nationality, whether it is foreign or domestic capital, we need it so urgently and in such quantity.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then you do not agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order and comment that there is no relationship between the statement the Prime Minister made and the comment I have just made.

Mr. Pickersgill: We can judge that for ourselves.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) for two reasons. In the first place I have a great personal respect for the hon. gentleman and second, I realize that he has a vast knowledge of the gas and oil industry through his past association and no doubt because he comes from a part of the country where this industry is prominent. I do not necessarily always agree with what he says but I have a great deal of respect for the hon. gentleman.

The hon. member mentioned one point of considerable importance. If I heard him correctly he said that his only suspicion about this bill was that should hon. members of this group ever form the federal government the bill as it stands would give them much concern at that time. Perhaps I did not understand him correctly but I gathered from his remarks that this was the only reservation he had about this bill. I should like to know how hon. gentlemen opposite can have this suspicion when there is no proof? Why should they think that hon. members in this corner of the chamber would not suspect this bill when we in this corner have ample proof gathered over the years that there is need of more teeth in this legislation? If they are suspicious without any proof how can they expect hon. members in this group not to be suspicious when we have abundant proof before us based on the experience of the past?

I was most amused this afternoon at the example of the memory of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). How well that hon. gentleman's memory served him in taking him back to 1944 in talking about the great and terrible thing that the Saskatchewan government did at that time. This was also referred to by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). The Prime Minister's memory recall amazed me because his memory is so poor concerning what he himself said just two or three years ago. Interestingly enough, in referring to 1944 the Prime Minister did not substantiate his statements any more than did the hon. member for Edmonon West who when asked to specify yesterday said he could not remember the exact events but had given his impressions.

Perhaps most amusing of all was the smoke screen the Prime Minister tried to throw about the purchase of shares in certain companies by the provincial treasury of Saskatchewan. I am sure he intended to give the impression that the government of Saskatchewan is no different from the government of Ontario or any other province but there is one distinct difference. In the words of the Prime Minister himself it was the provincial treasury of the province of Saskatchewan that owned the shares; not the provincial treasurer, but the treasury. These shares are still owned by the people of Saskatchewan and are not owned by the cabinet ministers—

Mr. Pallett: What about the promoters of that transaction?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): —nor the Tory friends of the Prime Minister, as we have seen in the province of Ontario. The Prime Minister did not mention that any of these shares were owned by the provincial president of the C.C.F. in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Pallett: They are owned jointly by the government and the promoters.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Like we have seen shares owned by the president of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario. Indeed, he made no mention of the number of shares passed on to the leader of the Liberal opposition in the province of Saskatchewan like we have seen in Ontario. There is a marked difference between the practice in the province of Saskatchewan and that in the province of Ontario and other provinces.

Thus far in the debate we have heard no hon. member on the government side of the house point out how the Canadian public is going to receive any more protection under this bill than it has received in the past. Instead of citing my own opinions for a moment I should like to refer to an expression of opinion contained in an article by Mr. John Bird which appeared in the Toronto Star of Monday, May 25, 1959:

> The public was shocked by the revelations of the Borden royal commission showing the perfectly legal "killings" made by the insiders in the Trans-Canada pipeline stock set-up. To control this sort of thing in future, the Borden report recommended relating pipeline tolls to the actual amount of equity capital in the venture.

Not only members of this group are concerned about this matter but many others who do not belong to this party are equally concerned. Another interesting point is contained in the final paragraph of this article:

> And so, until the board is set up and we see how it functions, and particularly until we see what yardstick it uses for determining fair tolls and how carefully it examines the financial set-up of applicants for pipe lines, we shall have no way of knowing how far the public interest is to be safeguarded.

It is not too often that members of this group can turn to the Financial Post and find agreement with our comments and observations. But much to our surprise we find that in the May 23 edition of the Financial Post the biggest part of one page is devoted to the very problem under discussion at the present time in an article by Michael Barkway. I have not studied the material there thoroughly but I find that there are at least 15 places where concern is shown in the Financial Post article along the same lines expressed by members of this group. I think that some of these observations could very well be put on the record. The headline reads as follows: "How Ottawa Plans to Control Pipe Lines; National Energy Bill Would Regulate Rates, Tolls and Export Prices, But Standards Are Not Laid Down." The article goes on to point out in many places the views expressed by the members of this group and, indeed, expressed by myself when I spoke on this matter yesterday. The article points out that in clause after clause control is left firmly in the hands of the cabinet. The new board that is to be set up is not being given the jurisdiction that it should have. The article states:

> Wide powers to regulate oil and gas pipe lines and export of electrical energy are conferred on the cabinet—

Farther down it goes on to say that all gas and oil pipe lines which come under federal jurisdiction will require a certificate of convenience and necessity "but its issue will be subject to cabinet approval". It goes on to point out that international power lines for the export of electric power will be subject to the same cabinet approval and that the export and import of gas and export of power will be subject to regulations to be issued by the cabinet itself. We go down farther and we see there is a reference to "general cabinet regulations, within the terms of which the national energy board may grant licences". In another place it is pointed out that the decision of the board will depend on government approval in two different ways. In another place it says:

> But the certificate will not be issued without government approval.

Then the article goes on to say:

> The wording of the bill says: "The board may, subject to the approval of the governor in council, issue a certificate—

And further:

> But very wide discretion is left to the members of the national energy board to find a basis for setting a rate of return. It is assumed here that the board will have to set what is in effect a standard rate of return on a certain defined base. But what that may be cannot be known until cases are argued and rates set in specific cases.

And again:

> But exports are to be covered by regulations issued by the cabinet—

Then there is a reference to "such terms and conditions as the cabinet prescribes". Again, we find these words: "But they must be ruled by cabinet decision". Then we have the words, "which are subject to cabinet approval". Then there is the following:

> Before they issue export licences, since these must be in accordance with cabinet regulations laid down before they even examine the applications.

And finally:

> Decisions of the national energy board may be appealed direct to the Supreme Court of Canada on matters of law only. There is no appeal on matters of fact.

Here we see the Financial Post, which certainly by no stretch of the imagination can be classed as a C.C.F. newspaper, very much in accord with us on this most important matter. There has been some reference made to the Texas buccaneers of yesterday. I know that both from the government side and the official opposition benches there is very little talk about the Canadian buccaneers of today. I suggest that the only difference between the two is that we used to recognize the Texans by their drawl.

All members of this group have wondered just where the Liberals stand with respect to this bill. I must confess I listened very carefully to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) yesterday but when he finished I am afraid I was no wiser than when he started. When we find a newspaper like the Financial Post pointing out so clearly what a puppet body the proposed board is going to be, how completely under the control and domination of the cabinet it is going to be I wonder where our Liberal friends have found this new faith in the Tory party and the Tory cabinet. Where is the sham battle that we so often see between the two old parties?

Some point was made today that the board is going to have powers similar to those of the board of transport commissioners. That is not so. The board of transport commissioners has the power to make decisions subject to veto by the governor in council. From what I have been able to see from the bill this new board will have no such power. In my opinion one thing has been demonstrated very clearly not only to the house but throughout the country as a whole, namely that the huge, overwhelming majority on the government side is completely controlled by the cabinet. I think it is also equally understood and has been demonstrated on many occasions that the cabinet is completely ruled and dominated by the Prime Minister. To go one step further, Mr. Speaker, we have also seen that the Prime Minister is not even ruled by parliament itself.

Mr. Churchill: Nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): We saw that very clearly demonstrated yesterday and it is reported today on page 17 of the Globe and Mail. At this time I should like to say that

I agree completely with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and I also recommend it for consideration to my hon. friends in the Liberal party to my left.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, very little can be added in the closing hour or so of the debate on the bill to set up a national energy board. I should like to try to kill once and for all one red herring that has been dragged in by the official opposition. It was brought in tonight by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) when he referred to the 15 per cent trade diversion and the 15 per cent reduction in oil imports by the United States. In the early months of 1957 I happened to be a senior engineer with perhaps the largest pipe line contracting firm in the world. At that time the official journal of the oil industry in the United States was full of the submissions which were being made to Washington, particularly by the independent producers in Texas, asking for mandatory restrictions on oil imports, and the figure mentioned in issue after issue of this journal was 15 per cent.

The reason they were asking for this restriction was that it was claimed the independent producers in Texas were operating at about one-half maximum efficient capacity because the majority of the refining capacity was in the hands of the majors and the independents could not sell as much as they wished to the majors. The majors had enough of their own oil coming in from offshore concessions to satisfy a large part of their requirements. This 15 per cent business is about the most arrant piece of nonsense that I have heard in this house in the length of time I have been here. I am seeking very carefully for words which will not be called unparliamentary in order to describe the antics that have been gone through in this regard.

In so far as the possible control of oil imports is concerned, the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) has made a very able speech pointing out the necessity for it. I should like to add a few remarks covering a few points which he did not mention. It is not generally known, but the approximate cost of bringing a barrel of oil to the surface is half a cent per barrel in the Near East; 65 cents in Venezuela; 90 cents in Canada and $1.20 in the United States. The reason for this, of course, is that a well in the Near East will be producing 10,000, 20,000 or 30,000 barrels per day, whereas in Canada a well will produce 20 to 30 barrels per day on the average. Our wells are operating at about half the capacity the wells in Texas were operating when the Texas producers demanded that a state of emergency be declared and that oil imports be limited because production in Texas had dropped so low. Our western producers were in, and are in, a far worse position than the Texas producers ever were.

We have heard something about this point of commercial preference. It sounds complicated, but it is very simple. It simply means this, that the major oil companies are world wide organizations, fully integrated and owning producing fields in Venezuela, in Sumatra and in the Near East. When they import this oil they are buying it from themselves, and they can set whatever price they wish on it. They also have the advantage when they use it in their refineries of using 100 per cent of their own oil. When they use western Canadian oil, because all wells are on a pro rata system, the independents and the majors alike pump into the gathering systems according to the number of wells that they have in production and on the basis of the quota that they have been allotted by the provincial board governing that matter. Therefore, when they use Canadian oil they get only that percentage of their own oil that this percentage bears to the total production of all wells in western Canada. It is therefore much more advantageous for a company to use its own offshore oil.

It is also advantageous from the point of view that oil in Canada is safe but oil in these other areas I have mentioned is unsafe because of unstable political conditions. Mr. Harold Rea, president of the Canadian Oil Company, speaking to the Harvard club in Tulsa, Oklahoma, had this to say, and I quote:

> "Large U.S. companies with substantial oil reserves in Canada, and facilities to market that oil in the U.S., should do so."
> Companies should not tie up great tracts of exploratory land in Canada and put their reserves of Canadian crude in "mothballs" while, at the same time, eastern Canada must import large quantities of foreign-produced oil, Mr. Rea stated.

At the conclusion of the Borden commission hearings the oil companies voluntarily agreed that they would use more western oil in the Toronto refining area, and they would back up oil which was being refined in the Montreal area to give a greater marketing area to the refined products from Toronto. This was to increase the use of Canadian crude. They also agreed that in the oil deficiency areas of the United States, that is district No. 5 comprising Washington, Oregon and the northern part of California, those refineries which were connected by pipe line through Trans-Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company to sources of Canadian crude, would be allowed a greater degree of freedom in the amount of oil that they purchased. In fact, they were not originally on a quota basis so far as the United States government was concerned, but so far as the operation of the oil companies is concerned they are on a quota which is based on how best they can use their reserves to make the most profits for themselves. This operation dictated the use of offshore oil.

Now, when we talk about the importation of 290,000 barrels per day of Venezuelan oil into the Montreal market, we really mean 290,000 barrels per day of United States oil because that oil comes from companies owned and controlled in the United States. It is only fair and reasonable that we should be able to use this major import as bargaining lever with the United States to promote the flow of our oil into our natural market, that is the oil deficiency area of district No. 5 in the Pacific northwest and the oil deficiency areas in the midwest United States. It is for that reason I believe the mandatory controls have been lifted. As the hon. member for Ottawa West did point out, there was an article in this morning's Gazette by Mr. Meyer, the financial editor, pointing out that even the elimination of this mandatory control still leaves the ceiling section in the regulations which prohibits the importation of Canadian oil in excess of the quota arrangements we had been given previously. I am not sure whether or not Mr. Meyer has properly interpreted the regulations, but if he has we can only gain back the ground we have lost, and that will not be satisfactory. It is for this reason that in this bill the government is being given the power to use this importation of 290,000 barrels of oil per day as a bargaining lever. If it does not work out that way, then there is always the alternative of supplying our own oil to this major Canadian market.

So far as the companies are concerned, as I have tried to point out, through commercial preference and the integrated operation between the producing fields and the refining and distributing set-up, the world wide company can pretty well set what price it wants to set on its own oil; but that price means nothing.

But what does mean something, incidentally, is that the underdeveloped countries are demanding a greater and greater share in the profits from the mining of their oil. Where Anglo-Iranian could get by with a 25-75 split, Aramco today are signing contracts on a 60-40 basis, with 60 per cent for Saudi Arabia. Hence the costs of this so-called cheap oil are going up. There is still that major factor of the political instability of these countries and the necessity for the international oil companies to plow back into those countries revenues in the form of royalties in order to maintain the government which they have. This is their problem; it is not ours.

Reverting to the question of natural gas, there is one point on which I will disagree with my friend the hon. member for Calgary South, namely with regard to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company. Trans-Canada today is a good company controlled by Canadians. As the hon. member pointed out, some 80,000 Canadians have shares in it. I have talked to the president. The company has almost 100 per cent Canadian personnel now and in every respect it is a good company. It is a good company for the people of Canada and a good company for its own employees. When that company was set up I believe the names which would appear as the largest shareholders start off with Mr. Murchison and run through the gamut of the so-called Texas buccaneers. These people sold out. They sold out their cheap stock at a fairly good price to people like Home Oil and others. Canadians paid good prices for this stock which these people obtained as a gift through the policies of the previous administration.

I should like to make particular reference to gas as it affects Vancouver. I will quote from an editorial of Thursday, February 20, 1958 which appeared in the Vancouver Province. It has to do with the sale price of gas to the Pacific Northwest Pipe Line Company and to the British Columbia Electric Company. This editorial is headed "Bilked on our own gas" and it reads in part as follows:

> The Borden commission in its Calgary hearings has already laid bare, and in fact openly suggests, that the Canadian public is being bilked in the promotion and sale of its natural gas.
> The situation in British Columbia is presently under examination. Distributors in the United States are buying our natural gas at the border for 22 cents a thousand cubic feet. Canadian distributors pay 32 cents a thousand cubic feet.
> The Westcoast Transmission Co. Ltd. has made a 20-year contract to deliver natural gas from northern B.C. and Alberta to the Pacific Northwest—

That is Pacific Northwest Pipe Line Corporation.

> —for 22 cents.
> The chairman of the commission, Henry Borden, has been moved to comment in open hearings that this export of Canadian gas is "unprofitable."

The editorial goes on to say this:

> Commission counsel has shown that it costs 24 cents to deliver the gas to the border. He has also suggested that any profit on this kind of operations must come out of the Canadian consumer.

The editorial is broken into two parts. In the second half it goes on to state as follows:

> The gas-price situation being examined by the Borden commission could—and should—brew up into a first-class political scandal.
> During their years in power the Liberals insisted repeatedly that their policy was to protect the interests of Canadian gas consumers.

National Energy Board

On March 13, 1953, the then minister of trade and commerce, Mr. C. D. Howe, declared proudly that while the Conservatives were talking of a "Canada first" gas policy, the Liberals went farther: their policy was "Canada always."

On April 15, 1953, announcing the granting of a 22-year permit to Westcoast Transmission, Mr. Howe said flatly in Commons that "the interests of British Columbia customers will be protected."

On June 4, 1956, the then minister of finance, Mr. Walter Harris, quoted regulation No. 9 of the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act, and said:

"This means, Mr. Speaker, that when a licence is granted for the export of gas out of Canada—and that licence has not yet been granted—it is going to be subject to these regulations, and these regulations will be enforced by the government of Canada to see that the export of gas is not at a price lower than the price for gas supplied in Canada."

What is regulation No. 9? It was quoted by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) this afternoon.

The said regulation No. 9, drafted by the Liberal government, reads: "The price charged by a licencee for power or gas exported by him shall not be lower than the price at which power or gas, respectively, is supplied by him or his supplier in similar quantities and under similar conditions of sale for consumpton in Canada."

The loophole is the phrase "in similar quantities and under similar conditions of sale."

The Borden report went into great detail on this matter. I should like to say that this condition came about through no fault of Westcoast Transmission. The promoters of Westcoast Transmission spent great sums of money and had brought it to the point where it had no future because they were denied the right to export gas to the United States. It looked like a lost cause. When they were offered this arrangement from Pacific Northwest they were obliged to accept or see the whole project fall through completely. I have been up around Dawson Creek where the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Henderson) lives and Fort St. John and Taylor. He can tell you better than I of the industrial activity and the vitality that has come to that country through the building of this gas pipe line. But that is not to say that we should not expect to get these benefits in the future without sacrificing any part of our birthright.

The Pacific Northwest Company drove a hard bargain with Westcoast Transmission. I now quote from page 17 of the Borden report which states as follows:

In December, 1954, as a part of the consideration for executing the gas purchase contract with Westcoast, Pacific Northwest demanded a 50 per cent share interest in Westcoast but accepted an option, dated December 11, 1954, in favour of one K.S. Adams, to purchase common shares equivalent to 25 per cent of the common shares of Westcoast outstanding after its public financing and at the price at which shares would be offered to the public.

The result of this was that Pacific Northwest acquired 1,127,750 of its common shares at the price of $5 per share. Those shares were $16 on the market right after the public offering. So we have this United States company paying far less for their gas than does the Canadian distributor which incidentally is taking off at the same take-off point as the United States company. The United States company to boot has obtained 25 per cent of the stock of the transmission line. Finally, any profits made by the transmission company will be made on the sale of gas to Canadians and the United States company will get 25 per cent of that amount also. This is the sort of thing that is meant in this bill in clause 44 where reference is made to the financial responsibility and financial structure of the applicant, the methods of financing the line and the extent to which Canadians will have an opportunity of participating in the financing, engineering and construction of the line and the question of any public interest which may be involved.

It seems that although the Borden commission talk about sanctity of contracts I see no sanctity in the contract with Pacific Northwest. I believe one of the first acts of the energy board should be to review this matter to the end that the gas sold in the United States or any exported gas is not sold at any more favourable price than it is offered to Canadian consumers.

The final point I would like to make is in regard to Canadian participation in these companies and the fact that the bill itself states that the commission shall see to it that financing is carried on in such a way that Canadians participate. I do not think there should be an offering of any pipe line shares other than in Canada. I think the method used to finance the Alberta trunk gas lines is an excellent form to follow, except of course in that case it was restricted to the residents of Alberta alone. I am convinced that the people of Canada do have the courage to invest in risk enterprises like this, because a pipe line is a tremendous risk. It is a gamble and if it fails then there are literally millions of dollars lost, because with a pipe line there is no halfway measure. But I believe that Canadians do wish to participate and wish to have the right to subscribe at the initial offering of stock in these companies, and this bill will see that Canadians will have that right.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wonder what all the talk is from the opposition benches? We have heard more twaddle, more vagueness, more lack of understanding of this whole question from the opposition benches than anything I can recall having listened to in the house before. The hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin), an admirable fellow in many ways, talked about the cabinet taking the responsibility and not the energy board. Of course the cabinet has the responsibility. The energy board does not have to report to the Canadian people, but the cabinet does, and through their elected representatives the Canadian people will have control and will be able to say whether they do or do not agree with the way this board is working. It seems to me that that is the only possible way to make this work. Undoubtedly there will be a period of trial and error. There will have to be minor modifications, but the bill has been so framed that not only is there freedom for the board to work but there is also the saving grace of cabinet approval. Therefore I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we get on to the details of the bill as soon as possible.

Mr. M. L. McFarlane (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak for a few moments tonight on the export of gas and what I think should be done in connection with the Canadian consumer.

With the discovery of vast quantities of natural gas and the subsequent construction of pipe lines throughout Canada and the United States, natural gas is fast replacing many other types of fuel in communities which are fortunate enough to have this modern convenient type of fuel. In the years to come any community that is not serviced by this modern convenience when the pipe line is in construction will be seriously handicapped in its development. Western Canada has been blessed with an abundance of natural gas and large quantities of this fuel to export to areas which are less fortunate. We would definitely urge the exporting of gas in order that the economy of Canada may benefit.

First, Mr. Speaker, we would like to recommend return on capital invested in the gas and oil industries. We feel that the investors are entitled to a return on their investments. Second, the creation of employment for Canadians in the construction of gas lines and gathering systems, scrubbing plants and also the development of by-products from the gas itself. Third, the creation of permanent employment for Canadians in the maintenance and operation of these installations. Fourth, giving the gas companies encouragement to continue further explorations for new fields, and I believe many of these could be found in southeastern British Columbia.

However, Mr. Speaker, before permits for the export of natural gas are granted by the department provision should be made to supply Canadian communities within reasonable range of the main transmission line which desire to be serviced with adequate gas supplies at a reasonable rate. There will very shortly be an application or applications presented to the energy board by the Alberta and Southern Gas Company Limited and the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited to export approximately three trillion cubic feet of natural gas from Alberta to the Pacific northwestern states. The proposed pipe line will transport gas from the Alberta border at the Crowsnest pass to the international boundary at Kingsgate, British Columbia, travelling through that part of British Columbia more commonly known as the east Kootenay.

In the east Kootenay there are six organized municipalities, namely the cities of Fernie, Cranbrook, Kimberley, two small villages of Marysville and Chapman Camp, and the rapidly expanding district of Creston. These communities are very desirous of being served with natural gas and the only possible source of this fuel for these communities will be this pipe line solely designed for export purposes. We feel that if these communities are serviced at the time of construction we will have an added incentive for industry to come into our area.

Mr. Speaker, due to the location of this pipe line—incidentally I have been over part of the present survey—it is not economically possible to serve the above mentioned communities, with the exception of Fernie, by the main pipe line. Therefore we are going to need branch lines taken off the main service lines. The cost of transportation of gas from the pipe line as presently proposed to the boundaries of these municipalities desiring the service would make the cost of the gas very high to the consumer. However, if the export pipe line company were to include the cost of these distribution lines to the various communities which I have named, bringing them to the boundaries of their municipalities, in the over-all cost of the pipe line, so that the entire volume of gas carried would bear its share of the cost, the increase per million cubic feet would be very nominal.

We have watched with consternation the establishment of rates for natural gas on the previously constructed pipe lines. The fact that Canadian utilities, for example Inland Natural Gas Company Limited and the British Columbia Electric Company, pay more for gas than the United States utility companies, for example Northwest Utility Company, is a situation which does not meet with approval in Canada, and in British Columbia in particular. In the opinion of some of the experts Canadians are subsidizing United States gas. This should not be the case. It would be more reasonable to expect the reverse. In the present application the maximum Canadian consumption would be approximately 2 per cent of the gas carried and it is not unreasonable that 98 per cent should subsidize the 2 per cent for the privilege of export. This is a matter which is very important to the Canadian communities concerned.

In our area we have an abundance of raw materials. We have practically all the raw materials that are required for the manufacture of a great number of articles. We should like to be in such a position that when the gas lines are brought to the edge of the municipalities we could apply for it and derive the benefits of this gas without the necessity of making formal application to various boards. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) has mentioned the difference in the Vancouver rate, and pointed out that Vancouver is paying approximately 50 per cent more for gas than the people across the line.

I wish to bring three points to the attention of the house. I think when this gas line is constructed it should supply natural gas to the cities of Cranbrook and Kimberley and to the villages of Marysville, Chapman Camp and Creston; that the companies should sell the gas to these communities at the same cost as sold at the international boundary, and that they should deliver the gas to the boundaries of the municipalities concerned.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): There are some members of this house who are, I know, very anxious to deal with this bill and have it passed as quickly as possible. However, I believe the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) this afternoon showed that the government is very concerned about the great amount of adverse criticism of this bill and the very bad press which the government has received in connection with this legislation.

The Prime Minister made a long statement this afternoon in which he spent a great deal of time attacking the C.C.F. group in this house. Mr. Speaker, it has always been my contention that until you are effective enough to get the government to pay some attention to you and counter-attack you are not making your points, and the very fact that the Prime Minister had to spend so long trying to prove to us that public ownership was not a good thing suggests to me that this was hitting him where it hurts.

I found it surprising that he should have to journey out to Saskatchewan, just a few hours ahead of the plane trip which he is about to make, in order to attack policies of the Saskatchewan government which have nothing to do with this bill whatsoever. This measure is concerned with the government's policy on natural energy. I did not know it had anything to do with a cement factory; I did not know it had anything to do with a steel factory. But the Prime Minister, in saying that public ownership is not the best type of ownership, takes us out to Saskatchewan and talks about a cement factory and talks about pipe lines.

It is significant that he did not mention that the Saskatchewan government has its transportation facilities under public ownership.

An hon. Member: And they cost more.

Mr. Argue: And they cost a good deal less than in the province of Manitoba in similar circumstances.

Mr. Churchill: Not in all parts of Manitoba. It is cheaper in Brandon.

Mr. Argue: I will deal with Brandon. I can appreciate the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) is very sensitive about this because, of course, he comes from the city of Winnipeg and he was one of those who criticized the Liberal administration so vigorously—

Mr. Churchill: And effectively.

Mr. Argue: —and effectively—that is correct—when they were following the policy of coddling the Texas buccaneers. But now the Minister of Trade and Commerce has taken those same buccaneers to his own bosom. He is doing nothing under this policy which changes in any way the substance of the policy of the former administration, and it is no wonder that after advancing this anaemic and innocuous bill he is sensitive to the fact that in the city of Winnipeg the people in his constituency are paying these exorbitant prices for natural gas.

The Prime Minister took us out to Saskatchewan not to deal with the Saskatchewan power corporation which is in the field of the distribution of natural gas and which, I may say, has made a very good showing. The corporation is this year extending natural gas to all of the small cities in Saskatchewan as well as to the larger cities which already have gas, and to the communities on the lines between those smaller cities. Not only is the Saskatchewan power corporation extending gas to those communities but it is showing a profit on its operations. I have in my hand the annual reports for 1957-58 of the crown corporations in the province of Saskatchewan, available to hon. members in the parliamentary library, and this volume shows that in the year 1958, with a revenue of some $7,639,000 from gas, the Saskatchewan power corporation made a net profit of some $843,442. With this good financial showing the Saskatchewan power corporation is obtaining funds to extend its supplies within Saskatchewan to the smaller communities. The people of Saskatchewan recognize that the Saskatchewan power corporation in its distribution of natural gas is providing the best type of service to that province, and it would be interesting if the Prime Minister would tell us what he thinks of the effectiveness of that corporation.

We hear hon. members of the Liberal party, and of the Conservative party, too, criticizing crown corporations—criticizing socialism. One of the Liberal members in that province a few years ago said that if the Liberals ever got to office they would throw the crown corporations out the window. It is significant that when the Saskatchewan Liberal leader was asked the other day what he would do with the Saskatchewan power corporation if he became premier of the province—whether he would sell it—he replied: "No. Over my dead body. We would maintain it as a publicly owned enterprise." The Prime Minister would have made a more significant statement today if instead of going out to Saskatchewan to attack the province's policies with regard to other matters he had told us where he stands as far as the Saskatchewan power corporation is concerned. This is a publicly owned utility which is doing a good job in that province by bringing gas to the people of Saskatchewan at a rate cheaper than the citizens of Manitoba are able to obtain it, and the people of Saskatchewan would be anxious to hear from the Prime Minister where he stands on that point.

When the Conservatives were in opposition they attacked the Texas buccaneers. They attacked the fabulous profits—

An hon. Member: Old stuff.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member says, "Old stuff". You see how quickly they want to forget? The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) when he was in opposition said that the deal was the greatest betrayal in history.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has referred on several occasions to the last paragraph of a speech I made—

Mr. Argue: This was the second.

Mr. Green: —but he never goes on to point out that the terms of that speech had no connection whatever with the attacks he has been making on this government.

Mr. Argue: They had no connection? The Prime Minister called it a nefarious deal. He called the people involved Texas buccaneers. Now the interjection is that this is old stuff. After just three years, less than two of which were spent in office, apparently members of the government believe that everything said by them when in opposition is old stuff.

The Minister of Public Works told us today that what was said in opposition was not always the attitude taken by hon. gentlemen opposite when they got to the government side of the house which is perfectly true. This government through this bill is saying in effect that Mr. Nathan Tanner, who according to the government's own royal commission report made just under $1,500,000 capital gain on a risk of $8, should be allowed to go, not only scot free and be allowed to have his capital gain, but indeed the government goes even further in this legislation by refusing to implement the part of the report which says that returns to shareholders of pipeline companies should be based on their own equity. So what can happen under this legislation and what I have no doubt will happen is that not only will these buccaneers get huge returns on the amount of their investment plus the amount of their capital gain but the door will be wide open to give them an additional return based on the amount of borrowed capital, the amount of debentures and the amount of other capital that the corporation uses.

This will be a fine state of affairs. Not only will Mr. Tanner, Mr. Coates and their associates and other buccaneers—

Mr. Woolliams: And Mr. Fines.

Mr. Argue: —be able to make huge capital gains—$1,500,000 on an investment of $8 is not too bad—but will be able to obtain a net profit, a return on somebody else's capital, since the government has refused to implement that part of the report of the commission which has to do with returns on equity capital.

There has been a great change in the attitude of the Conservative party. It is no wonder that the interjections tonight are to the effect that this is old stuff. It is old stuff, all right; it has been forgotten as rapidly as the Conservative government has been able to forget it as well it might because when the former leader of the Conservative party, the Honourable George Drew, stated the policy of the Conservative party back in 1956, as reported at page 4673 of Hansard of June 4 of that year, the motion he presented read as follows:

> That the Bill be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that they have power to amend sections 5, 6 and 7 thereof to include the agreements made with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited as schedules to the bill and add other sections necessary to ensure that the bill shall give effect to one of the following principles;
> First, the immediate agreement of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to reorganize as a company under effective Canadian ownership and control and to undertake construction without a grant of public money, in accordance with the assurances upon which its charter was granted by parliament; or—

There is no indication now that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is to reorganize as a company under effective Canadian ownership. In introducing the legislation the minister said that as far as the government was concerned it would welcome Canadian and foreign capital. All that means in the context of this legislation is that the government is prepared to have pipe lines built and controlled by outside capital. It can mean nothing else because there is no control based on Canadian capital and no control to prevent foreign capital from controlling this industry.

I continue with the words of the motion of Mr. Drew:

Second, failing such agreement, the immediate consideration of other proposals submitted by any other persons or companies for the immediate financing and construction of the pipe line under effective Canadian ownership and control and without a grant of public money; or Third, enlarge the powers of the crown corporation so that the entire pipe line may be constructed immediately under public ownership.

The Conservatives in 1956 were prepared to accept public ownership as an alternative policy to that being followed by the government of the day. Today they not only reject public ownership but they reject any effective control that would guarantee that this industry and other energy in Canada be developed by Canadians and by Canadian capital.

This government has made a complete about face. It has turned its back on its own statement and its own record. Not only is it prepared to allow this industry to fall more completely into the hands of outside persons and outside capital but it is not prepared as outlined in this bill to give the energy board any effective power to deal with the development and control of energy in Canada.

Mr. Lambert: Produce the evidence to support your remarks.

Mr. Argue: I shall be happy to produce evidence. The evidence is contained in this bill. You do not have to look beyond the bill to find evidence.

Mr. Lambert: You have proved that you know even less than you knew yesterday.

Mr. Argue: Under this proposed legislation anything the board can do the government can set aside. Anything the board can do effectively has to be done with the approval of the governor in council and if the governor in council wishes it can put aside anything the board may do. This is a bill drafted by a government that considers itself all-powerful, that considers parliament subservient, and that considers all it has to do through the Minister of Trade and Commerce is to look around at the tremendous majority and say, "Who is going to stop us?"

Mr. Lambert: You know even less than you did yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue with this debate and in the event it concludes the order of business will be that announced last night. Any estimates that might be taken this week would be those of public works and fisheries.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.B.C.—HIRING OF SECURITY GUARDS

Question No. 65—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1959, has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation hired any protective guards, security guards or similar categories of employees?
2. If so, (a) how many; (b) what are their wages, expense allowances, hours of work and duties; (c) what are their names and addresses?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

1 and 2. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises that since January 1, 1959 it has not employed any security or protective guards individually but arranged for the services of the following four firms temporarily to provide essential protection for C.B.C. property and other duties in Montreal: J. Broderick Services Ltd., Atlas Investigation Bureau Inc., Barnes Investigation Bureau Ltd., and Service d'Investigations et de Perception Enrg. The hours of work vary from 8 to 24 hours daily.

The total cost of security and protection service in Montreal up to February 7, 1959, was approximately $174,500.

MUSEUM OF NATURAL HISTORY—LOCATION

Question No. 194—Mr. Argue:

1. Have any suggestions ever been made to the government that the museum of human history be established outside Ottawa?
2. If so, what person or persons made these proposals, to whom were they made, and on what date?
3. What was the nature of each such proposal?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. Yes, it has been suggested that a branch of the national museum might be established in the convent building of the Congregation de Notre Dame de Montreal situated on Nun's island.

2. The proposal was first made to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources on December 30, 1957 by Collin A. Gravenor of Montreal. It was also suggested by telephone on January 7, 1959, by the member for Verdun, Mr. H. E. Monteith, and in a letter dated January 30, 1959, by the member for Montreal-St. James, Mr. C. E. Campeau.

3. The proposal was to establish a branch of the national museum dedicated to the province of Quebec, its heritage and religious background, folk lore and traditions.

C.B.C. RELAY TRANSMITTER COSTS

Question No. 242—Mr. Benidickson:

1. What were the costs of C.B.C. for 1957-58 and 1956-57 for relay radio transmitters operations at: (i) Dryden, Ontario; (ii) Sioux Lookout, Ontario; (iii) Atikokan, Ontario?
2. How much of this expense was attributable to wire line rental charges to the organization representing jointly C.N.R. telegraphs and C.P.R. telegraphs?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises as follows:

1. (i) (ii) (iii) The cost of operating a radio low power relay transmitter averages about $250 per annum for maintenance, replacement parts, inspection and incidental costs.

2. The figure of $250 does not include wire line rental charges. It has been held that it would be disadvantageous to the corporation in business negotiations to make public amounts of payments to organizations for services provided.

C.B.C.—T.V. RADIO VIEWER AND LISTENER RATINGS

Question No. 367—Mr. Fisher:

1. Does the audience research division of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation acquire viewer and listener ratings for television and radio programs?
2. If so, what are the ratings in terms of T.V. homes reached, persons viewing, on a national and a major area basis for the following programs since December 1, 1958: Perry Como, Ed Sullivan, Father Knows Best, Cannonball, Citizen's Forum, This Week, Tabloid, Press Conference, Fighting Words, the 11 p.m. Canadian Broadcasting Corporation T.V. news, Viewpoint, and the Nation's Business or its alternate, Provincial Affairs?
3. What are the radio ratings in the same period for the Nation's Business and/or Provincial Affairs, Citizen's Forum, Week-end Review, Critically Speaking, Project '59, University of the Air, and the 10 p.m. national news?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises as follows:

1. Yes.

2. See table "A" attached.

3. See table "B" attached.

Question No. 86—Mr. Howard:

How many, if any, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, other than commissioned officers, were members of the force prior to October 1, 1934, and of this number (a) how many elected to make; (b) how many elected not to make, pension contributions under the provisions of part 4 of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, perhaps with the consent of the house I might deal with questions Nos. 84, 85 and 86 together.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to speak to these three questions together?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: These three questions—particularly the first two of them—ask for information which is of a purely statistical nature and which involve quite lengthy answers giving statistical information. There is no objection whatsoever to giving the information but I think I should say, in view of the nature of the question and the length of the reply, that I have some reservation as to whether this is an entirely proper subject to be covered by a starred question at this stage.

I make that reservation, Mr. Speaker, but subject to any objection which you may raise I would be prepared to supply the answers on this occasion and would suggest that I might be allowed to table the answers to questions Nos. 84 and 85 now as they are purely statistical, so they would appear in Hansard at this point.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house willing that the suggestion of the minister be adopted, namely that the answers to questions Nos. 84 and 85 be tabled at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: To appear in Hansard at this point.

Mr. Speaker: And that they appear in Hansard at this point.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

January 1 to May 13, 1959	19	8

Mr. Fulton: With respect to question No. 86, Mr. Speaker, I have taken this to mean how many, if any, of those members on the strength of the force as of May 13, 1959, excluding commissioned officers, were on strength prior to October 1, 1934 and served continuously since the latter date. If any of those members still serving who engaged prior to October 1, 1934, left the force and subsequently re-engaged after that date, they became compulsory contributors to part IV of the act and consequently are not included in the reply as they had no option of electing.

On that basis the answer to question No. 86 is that. On May 13, 1959, there were 143 members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on strength, excluding commissioned officers, who were members of the force prior to October 1, 1934. Of this number, (a) 73 elected to make pension contributions under the provisions of part IV of the R.C.M.P. Act; (b) 70 members did not elect to make pension contributions to part IV.

Mr. Speaker: To make sure the record is clear, the minister asked to have the answers to questions 84 and 85 inserted in Hansard. I take it that has the consent of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence based on his reply to question No. 90 today. In view of the fact that the Department of National Defence has maintained most of its liaison and inspection staffs at Malton and at Orenda Engines Limited in Toronto, does the minister expect that their services will soon be required there again?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Their services are required at the Avro plant at the present time. They would not be there if they were not required. There are other projects going on; for instance, the inspection of the aircraft spares which are being sent over to Belgium, for the CF-100's. This is the sort of duty on which these staffs are presently employed.

Mr. Hellyer: May I ask a supplementary question. Is the minister trying to convey to the house the impression that all these people were employed on the present projects before the cancellation of the Avro Arrow?

Mr. Pearkes: Not necessarily. Some were employed on the Avro Arrow and others were employed on various projects which are going on now.

NATIONAL DEFENCE PERSONNEL, GOOSE BAY AIRPORT

3. How many of the said employees were ordinarily resident in Newfoundland before taking up their present employment?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this question makes inquiries regarding the prevailing rate employees at Goose Bay. The answer to the first question is that there are 201 employees there. The answer to the second part, which inquires how many were hired in the province of Newfoundland, is 100. The answer to the third part is 100. I might add that on February 18 last I announced in the house that arrangements were being made to recruit all personnel for employment at Goose Bay within the area covered by the national employment office at St. John's, Newfoundland. These arrangements became effective at the beginning of this month.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer to No. 1 is yes. The answer to No. 2 is: Dr. Andrew Stewart; Mr. Roger Duhamel; Mr. Carlyle Allison. The answer to No. 3 is: I have been so advised by the parties concerned.

CITIZENSHIP COURT, HAMILTON, ONT.

Question No. 93—Mr. McMillan:

1. Has a citizenship court been established in Hamilton?

2. If so, who is the presiding judge, what is his salary and what was his previous employment?

3. Who is the clerk, what is the salary for this position and what was his or her previous employment?

4. What is the estimate of the total annual cost of said court and the number of cases to be dealt with annually together with the number of employees?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is that a citizenship court has been established in Hamilton on April 15, 1959. The answer to the second part is that Mr. Beamer William Hopkins, Q.C., former magistrate, has been appointed as president of the court at a salary of $11,000 per annum. The answer to the third part is that the position of clerk of the court is still vacant. The salary for that position is from $6,380 to $7,020. The answer to the fourth part is that the cost of furnishing and equipping the court is $10,917.10. The total salaries for the four employees provided on the establishment is $24,360. It is estimated that a minimum of 5,000 applications under the Canadian Citizenship Act would be handled by that court, which would produce revenue of approximately $35,000.

[Later:]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN MAGAZINE "DATA"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he has any comment to make on an editorial which has appeared in the American technical aviation magazine called Data, and which is reportedly based on information supplied almost verbatim by a ranking officer of NORAD, which states among other things that the United States, both politically and militarily, regards as "utterly silly" Canada's claim that the North American air defence command is merely an extension to this continent of NATO.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I think the statement alleged to have been made in this paper is utterly silly.

[Later:]

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether, in regard to the article I have just brought to his attention, he considers also as "utterly silly" the statement in that article that a dozen United States officers assigned to the R.C.A.F. air defence command at St. Hubert for NORAD duty had to appear as liaison officers in civilian clothes because of political implications.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. I consider that even more stupid than the first part.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO LETTER OF PROTEST RESPECTING FRENCH TELEVISION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Tremblay (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister aware that a letter from the Episcopal council of the civil province of Quebec has been sent to a C.B.C. director in Montreal, protesting against certain French T.V. programs? If so, would he care to comment on the matter?

(Text):

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I have no knowledge of any such letter. If it has been sent to the director, then of course it would not have come to my attention anyway; it would be a matter for the corporation. I will make inquiries and inform the hon. member whether such a letter has been received.

HOUSING

REPORTED SHORTAGE OF MORTGAGE FUNDS FOR HOME CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Further to our exchange of yesterday, is the minister now in a position to advise the house and the country what action the government proposes to take at this time to alleviate the shortage of mortgage funds for house construction?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this is the same question as the hon. gentleman asked me yesterday, and I submit that it is not in order to put the same question again in the same form.

Mr. Garland: I wonder if the minister realizes that a 50 per cent reduction in house construction in Canada this year would, by the minister's own statement, eliminate 200,000 jobs.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: It is not open to the hon. member to make statements and give information under the guise of asking a question. I believe what the minister says is correct; this is precisely the same question, and unless there is some addition or variation it would be out of order.

Mr. Garland: I gathered the impression from the minister's reply yesterday, Mr. Speaker, that he was meeting with the National House Builders' Association today and that we might expect some information.

Mr. Green: I am meeting with the National House Builders' Association this afternoon. In the meantime I have found that the figures quoted by the hon. member yesterday were just about half what the proper figures should be.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS TO BANK ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the acting Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to introduce at this session amendments to the Bank Act which would allow the raising of interest rates to the banks of Canada?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker.

HARBOURS

LAKEHEAD—REPORTED CHARGES BY PORT ARTHUR CITY COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister been informed of the charges made by the Port Arthur city council that the council of the city has been betrayed and sold down the river in the appointments to the lakehead harbour commission? If so, has he any comment to make or any information on the matter?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no.

Mr. Pickersgill: To which question?

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Churchill for the second reading of Bill No. C-49, to provide for the establishment of a national energy board, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Peters.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the amendment before the house is that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter be referred to a standing committee of the house. We would hope that hon. members would support the amendment as a means of getting this subject before a standing committee of the house so that witnesses could be called to discuss the provisions of the bill and the major omissions in its provisions so that as a result of the meetings of such a committee we could hammer out a national energy policy that would meet the needs of the Canadian people.

In view of the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition that the bill should be referred to a committee of the house, and in the light of the reply made by the government to that suggestion, that the bill would not be referred to a committee, I would hope the members of the official opposition will support the C.C.F. amendment now before the house. It seems to me that they would place themselves in an impossible position by advocating at one time that the bill be referred to a committee and then voting against this amendment which seeks that very procedure.

A great deal has been said about the speculative stock holdings of certain promoters of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and other pipe line companies. The history of the Trans-Canada speculation is set out very clearly on page 62 of the report of the royal commission on energy, where it is pointed out that some 1,926,182 shares were issued at $8 per share and, according to the royal commission report, on the basis of the selling price of these shares in August of last year these outstanding shares would mean to their holders capital gains in the order of some $60 million.

Therefore it is very evident that the action of the former administration in providing money for this company enabled tremendous capital gains to be made. This is the point we have been complaining about, that when public money was placed at the disposal of this company Canada's national interests were not protected. Speculators were allowed to reap fabulous profits, and instead of this government, which promised action against the buccaneers and speculators, taking appropriate action it has brought in a measure that will not only permit but appears to guarantee that this nefarious scheme will be maintained in perpetuity.

The Prime Minister attempted to draw a red herring across the debate yesterday when he referred to some of the things that had been done in the province of Saskatchewan. As I said last evening, he did not point out, as he should have, that in the field of transportation of natural gas, in Saskatchewan natural gas is under the control and operation of a publicly-owned corporation, the Saskatchewan Power Corporation. But he endeavoured to bring in two examples of industries that have been brought to Saskatchewan with the assistance of the industrial development office of that province. I hope to be able to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the assistance of the government of Saskatchewan in this regard is very different from the action of the former administration and the condoning of that action by the present government.

The first company to which the Prime Minister referred was the Saskatchewan Cement Company, which came into the province of Saskatchewan to set up a new industry at least partly because the Saskatchewan government guaranteed a loan of $5½ million to that company. I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, that for Saskatchewan this is a new industry and a new company; that in view of the general cement monopoly in the country this was not an action that created a monopoly but was intended, at least to some extent, to break an existing monopoly and provide certain competition.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he is having a good deal of competition from various parts of the house. Notwithstanding his strong voice I find difficulty in hearing him. I wonder whether hon. members who are transacting business in the aisles and other places would moderate their tones.

Mr. Argue: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This seems to be a regular chore a few minutes after the first speaker takes the floor following the orders of the day.

I was saying that the Saskatchewan government had provided a guarantee to assist this company to come into the province of Saskatchewan. One of the reasons it provided such a guarantee to assist this company was an endeavour to bring in a new industry which would provide some competition for an existing monopoly. It was much different from the creation of the trans-Canada pipe line, which brought in a monopoly. This was the very opposite; it was brought in to provide certain competition.

Another point in which there is a great deal of difference is that the national treasury of this country, through action taken by the former administration and now condoned and supported by this administration, in fact has supplied a very substantial monetary bonus to the trans-Canada pipe line company. This has been done, and it continues to be done today, through the crown corporation by having advanced to it sums in excess of $100 million at a rate of 3½ per cent. Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited has an option to purchase the Ontario section of the line, and in fixing the rental terms Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited has calculated, as a basis of fixing those terms, an interest rate of just 3½ per cent.

We all realize the very rapid increase in interest rates in this country. I find that on February 18 of this year $200 million of government bonds were yielding rates of 4.76 per cent and 4.94 per cent. At the rate interest rates are advancing in the country it will not be long, apparently, unless something is done to halt them, until interest rates on government borrowings may reach the 5½ per cent that the Saskatchewan Cement Company is paying for the money it obtains. But so far as the provision to which I have referred is concerned with the federal government, there is a bonus to the extent that the interest rate exceeds 3½ per cent, a bonus to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. The Saskatchewan government, on the other hand, in guaranteeing this loan to the Saskatchewan Cement Company obtains for itself an interest rate of 2 per cent; that is, 2 per cent of the 5½ per cent interest is paid by the company into the provincial treasury.

What has happened in Saskatchewan, therefore, is that not only has the Saskatchewan government been successful in encouraging a new industry to locate in that province, but in exchange for its guarantee on loans of $5.5 million at an interest rate of 5½ per cent the Saskatchewan government receives a fee of 2 per cent and the bank concerned receives an interest rate of 3½ per cent. The Saskatchewan government has added to its provincial income $110,000 per year by this action. This type of action is certainly far removed from the type of action taken by this government in bonusing the buccaneers and pirateers.

Mr. Churchill: Why does the hon. member not answer the Prime Minister's argument instead of skating around the edges? The Prime Minister spoke about the fact that the Saskatchewan government in this instance, and I quote his words, "...allowed the promoters to take 130,000 shares at 60 cents a share," while there was a public offering to the average person at $6 per share?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I thought the Minister of Trade and Commerce could read, and I thought when he read that he would be able to understand. His question has to do with another company. I shall answer the question, but he should have kept his question until the company concerned was under discussion. No shares of the cement company so far as I know, and the Prime Minister did not say so, are in the hands of the Saskatchewan government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I turn to the arrangements with the steel company. I want to point out just how different this is—I will answer the question—from the position of this government which condones the action that was taken by Right Hon. C. D. Howe, something that was called "old stuff" last night. I have already said that the almost 2 million shares passed around by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited at $8 resulted in capital gains of some $60 million, according to the royal commission report. The federal treasury has received nothing. The people of Canada have obtained nothing. As a matter of fact there has been a drain on the federal treasury.

Now, that is a different attitude from that which was taken by the Saskatchewan government in exchange for the guarantee they provided for the Interprovincial Steel Corporation. The Saskatchewan government retained for the people of Saskatchewan 180,000 shares at a rate of 60 cents per share, and the promoters of the company obtained only 130,000 such shares. The people of Saskatchewan, therefore, in return for a guarantee that was given to this company retained for themselves a greater number of shares than were provided to the promoters of this industry. On the basis of the current value of these shares the Saskatchewan government, if it so wished at this time, could obtain for the people of Saskatchewan the sum of $1,200,000 for its guarantee and for the shares it now holds.

There is the difference, Mr. Speaker. The Saskatchewan government, in assisting this company to come to Saskatchewan to set up a new industry in that province, to assist in the employment of the people in that province, obtained for itself 30 per cent more of the promotional shares than were obtained by the promoters themselves. We feel that if this government or the previous administration had taken the same attitude they would not have been going all the way we would like to see them go in the field of public ownership, but the Canadian people would have had a substantial amount of stock in this pipe line and would obtain substantial monetary returns.

Mr. Hees: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: I will permit a question when I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. Hees: I do not blame you for not wanting to answer.

Mr. Argue: Your questions are not so tough.

Mr. Hees: I know you cannot answer it.

Mr. Argue: When you are hurting them a little, then they start to complain.

Mr. Hees: You are not hurting us, you are hurting yourself.

Mr. Argue: All these barks are coming from hon. members in the recesses who say nothing, and who are not able to get up and take part in the debate.

Mr. Hees: Why not answer a simple question?

Mr. Argue: It would probably be a simple one, coming from the minister.

Mr. Hees: Why not just answer a straightforward question?

Mr. Argue: On the basis of the shares having been divided in the same way for the trans-Canada pipe line the people of Canada, instead of providing a large sum of money, instead of providing an interest bonus, would have an ownership of stock today to the value of $80 million. There is the answer to the Prime Minister. Here is the action of the government of Saskatchewan which protects the legitimate interests of the people of Saskatchewan when a guarantee is provided by obtaining for the province a substantial block of shares at a low price—

Mr. Hees: You still do not want to answer a question?

Mr. Argue: All right; I will hear from the minister.

Mr. Hees: I should like to ask the hon. member this. Do we take it he agrees that it is quite a satisfactory practice so far as his party is concerned for promoters to retain for themselves, or give to other promoters concerned with the deal, stock at considerably lower prices than those at which the stock is offered finally to the general public?

Mr. Argue: I think when it comes to a national pipe line in Canada—

Mr. Hees: Answer the question.

Mr. Argue: I will come to the question. You asked the question; just let me answer it. When it comes to a pipe line going across this country in connection with which the federal government has ample resources, that kind of action is not necessary. I did say, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat, that if this government had gone even that far it would have meant a substantial improvement for the people of this country.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member please answer my question?

Mr. Argue: I will.

Mr. Hees: You have not done so; you are afraid.

Mr. Argue: Oh, don't be so childish.

Mr. Hees: Answer that question; come on, let's go.

Mr. Speaker: Order; the hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Transport thinks he is back in the opposition.

Mr. Hees: Let us have a yes or no answer, if you are capable of such an answer.

Mr. Argue: I could ask the minister a question on a straight yes or no basis which he would rather not answer. These people are interested in hearing a reply, yet there are 100 of them giving the reply themselves.

Mr. Hees: We are listening.

Mr. Argue: It sounds like it. I think when it comes to the development of a new industry within a province, action taken by the provincial government within that province where it has not the financial resources of the federal government, and where it retains for the ownership of the people of Saskatchewan more than half of the shares, is sound and sensible. I say that on that basis the answer is yes to the question of the minister.

Mr. Hees: Thank you very much. That is just fine.

Mr. Argue: It is an amazing transformation—

Mr. Hees: It certainly is.

Mr. Argue: —since 1956 and what was said about Coates and Tanner, and the Texas buccaneers. This government was against what was being done then. Now that they are in office they are protecting everything that was done, and they are protecting what has been done even in face of recommendations of the royal commission they set up which would provide some effective controls for these companies.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation that is being proposed does not really set up a national energy board at all. It does not set up a national energy board that has control of the energy resources of this country. The energy board that has been set up has been given a certain minimum jurisdiction with regard to gas pipe lines and oil pipe lines and the possibility of certain control over electrical energy, but this is a minimum of control. This board, a creature of the government, a creature of the cabinet, will not be allowed to function as a board should be allowed to function, namely as an independent tribunal removed from immediate control and manipulation by the cabinet, and removed so far from that control and manipulation that only when major decisions are made could an appeal be made to the cabinet.

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think the phrase "manipulation by the cabinet" is unparliamentary and should be withdrawn by the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: Rubbish.

Mr. Argue: How thin can their skins get, Mr. Speaker? I say it would be manipulated, mangled and torn asunder by this government for political reasons.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Argue: If the government did not wish to do these things for political reasons it would not have kept to itself all the power that it ostensibly says it is placing in the hands of this board. From the very minister across the way who has asked this question we used to hear about an all-powerful government with an all-powerful minister, and that parliament was being cast aside. What the former administration has done in this regard this government is maintaining and perpetuating in the bill.

Mr. Churchill: Nonsense.

Mr. Argue: It is making the governor in council the master. It is making this board a plaything of the government.

Mr. Churchill: Nonsense.

Mr. Argue: When the Prime Minister complains that it is hard to get able men to staff such a board, I say no wonder. Who would like to be placed in the position of being just a pawn of this government? That is the position in which people who accept the responsibility of serving on this board will be placing themselves.

This board has practically no power except as it is allowed to exercise that power by the government. This cabinet control, this cabinet dictatorship over the board is maintained even in areas of authority where you would think the board would be allowed to operate without question. The board can issue regulations for the protection of property and for the safety of employees, only with the approval of the governor in council. It is the governor in council who will say whether, in fact, there will be promulgated regulations that will protect property and protect the safety of the employees. The government keeps the power. The board has the power to issue a certificate for a pipe line if the board is convinced of a number of things such as the availability of gas, markets, economic feasibility and financial feasibility and whether or not it is in the public interest. The board can issue a certificate subject to the approval of the governor in council. It is the cabinet that will decide.

The board may, with the approval of the governor in council, revoke or suspend a certificate if there has been a violation of the terms on which it was issued. Why should the government be the judge as to whether or not there has been a violation?

An hon. Member: Because they are responsible.

Mr. Argue: It is the cabinet that will say whether or not effect will be given to a recommendation by the board that a certain certificate be suspended even if there has been a violation of the terms. Hence the cabinet can condone a violation of the terms. The cabinet can condone the actions of a company that fails to abide by the terms of the certificate.

There is another part of the bill, Mr. Speaker, which says that lines of a shorter distance than 25 miles will not be subject to all these provisions, and that lines in excess of 25 miles can be exempted from all of part III of the bill by the cabinet or by the governor in council. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, when one goes over this legislation one finds there is little room left for the operation of a board that wishes to do a job. As a matter of fact the board is not even given the authority to control tariffs and tolls in advance of their being set. A company shall not charge any tolls except tolls specified in a tariff that has been filed with the board.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take any part in this debate until the Prime Minister made that incredible political speech which he made yesterday, most of which had nothing to do with the bill. I hope we shall have freedom to refer to the Prime Minister's irrelevancies as well as to those very few respects in which he dealt with the bill at all.

Before I say anything about the Prime Minister's speech I should like to say that, in looking through Hansard for 1957, I found a speech made by the Minister of Public Works on the amendment to go into supply, to which the Prime Minister referred yesterday.

Mr. Churchill: What is the page number?

Mr. Pickersgill: The page numbers are 1171 and 1172; at least the references I am going to make are to be found there. I may say that, from reading this speech, the thought struck me that we were now seeing the end of a beautiful political friendship. Perhaps the speech to which we have just listened by the hon. member for Assiniboia is evidence of this unhappy end. Here are a couple of gems from a speech by the Minister of Public Works only two years ago:

> The Conservatives and our C.C.F. friends, on the other hand, stood firm from the start for a Canada-first policy . . . Who was it advocated a Canada-first policy in bringing gas to eastern Canada? It was not anybody on the Liberal side of the house . . . No; again it was the Conservative and C.C.F. members who advocated that policy.

We remember the day when this beautiful friendship existed, and we are seeing the way in which it is being dissolved in recent times. I was very much interested in the rather feeble defence made by the hon. member for Assiniboia of certain of these corporations in Saskatchewan, but I do not intend to enter into that irrelevancy. However, what I suggest to the hon. member is this. Whatever may have been the case in 1956, I think in view of the financial policies of the government and the financial muddle in this country at the present time, for the minister to suggest that we have now ample resources to nationalize any great pipe line is, having regard to the present state of the bond market, a travesty on the facts. That might have been possible in the days in 1956 when this country was being well administered, but it would be a very difficult thing to do today. I imagine the hon. member for Assiniboia would agree with that.

Mr. Churchill: Excuse me, but I think my hon. friend used the word "minister" instead of "member".

Mr. Pickersgill: That is one of the reasons there has been such an about-face by the present government on this question.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that in the course of his remarks, in referring to the hon. member for Assiniboia he used the word "minister", which I think might be indicative of me rather than the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I did, it was by sheer inadvertence. I would say that the chances of the hon. member for Assiniboia being a minister are even less than those of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre remaining one for very long.

Mr. Argue: At least I was not kicked out.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

I would now like to turn to some things the Prime Minister said yesterday, and I will deal with them consecutively. The Prime Minister referred in the first place to his queries in the year 1957 about the interim report of the Gordon commission and the recommendation in that report for a national energy authority. He said twice in his speech yesterday, as reported on page 4017 of Hansard and again several pages later at page 4022, that Mr. Lesage had been very disparaging about that suggestion. Of course that is not true at all. The fact was that a debate was under way on an amendment of the Prime Minister's on a motion to go into supply, and what Mr. Lesage did in fact say was—

Mr. Pigeon: Who is Mr. Lesage?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Lesage is now very well known to the hon. gentleman, and he will be much better known in the future. All Mr. Lesage had to say about that matter, Mr. Speaker, was that there was already a committee, an interdepartmental committee, performing certain functions in this field. He simply made a factual statement and expressed no opinion one way or the other about an energy board, and for the very good reason that the final report of the Gordon commission had not yet been delivered; and until that report had been delivered it would have been premature to take any such action.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) had something to say about the Gordon commission in that same debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Page 1171. The minister might like to have his memory refreshed about that, and I will refresh it for him by reading a little bit of his speech. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, it is a very sad thing to happen to a million dollar report. I feel extremely sorry for Mr. Gordon for the way the recommendations made by him and his fellow commissioners have been treated by the members of the cabinet. But there the report is and it merits study by all Canadians, even though the government tries to shove it under the rug.

I would suggest that the minister needs to substitute only one word and that is to put "Borden" in place of "Gordon", and it would be a very apt description, indeed, of what has happened to the Borden commission and the Borden report. The fact of the matter is, as the Leader of the Opposition said so very clearly, it seemed to me, the other day, that what the government has done after two years with the Borden commission is to go back to the Gordon commission and follow the recommendations, the sensible recommendations, which they made and which were in the hands of the present government just about the time the Borden commission was appointed in the autumn of 1957. It should not be forgotten—I shall not repeat this because it was put on record by several members on this side of the house—that the Prime Minister, prior to the election of 1957, had promised that this problem would be dealt with promptly and immediately, that it was urgent. Of course the word "immediately" is a word the Prime Minister is fond of using, and it seems to have in his mouth a singular meaning indeed.

I would now like to refer to another reference by the Prime Minister as reported on page 4020 of Hansard of yesterday, where he took exception to the Leader of the Opposition saying that the Borden commission had been an expedient, a delaying action. He suggested that because the Leader of the Opposition, quite properly, said the Borden commission was a delaying action, we should be arguing that this bill should be put through without any delay, and that we were the ones who should be demanding immediate action on this bill. If this bill had followed faithfully the recommendations of the Borden commission the government might have had some ground for saying that parliament should deal with it, because there have been a good many months now in which to study the recommendations of the Borden commission. But the government comes in with a bill which practically repudiates all the recommendations of the Borden commission and substitutes something entirely different, and then asks parliament to rush it through without any adequate or proper consideration. That is what we on this side of the house are objecting to and what we still object to.

Mr. Broome: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Broome: Does the hon. member intend to vote against the setting up of the board?

Mr. Pickersgill: It has been made very clear that we do not intend to, and I can tell the hon. gentleman why. This bill, in its operative parts, is simply a codification of the existing legislation. It simply puts under one board and into one act powers which already exist, all of which were put on the statute books by the Liberal government. So why in heaven's name should we vote against the principle of the bill, because they are the very principles which were condemned by hon. gentlemen opposite and are very different from those recommended by their chosen commission, which they have disregarded.

The only thing we object to in a really fundamental way is the little "war measures act" in clause 87, this attempt by the government to clothe itself with unlimited arbitrary powers, and I will have a word more to say on that in a moment. Mr. Speaker, perhaps it might not be amiss, indeed, if I said it right now. The Prime Minister referred, in tones which did not sound very like the hon. member for Prince Albert of some years ago, when he was in opposition, to the wails about the danger of authority given to the governor in council under this legislation. He now calls them wails when people object to government by order in council. If that is what they are, there never was a wailer in this house like the Prime Minister.

I would like to read to you, sir, a few things, in case a lot of people have forgotten about them, the Prime Minister had to say in another debate about a proposal to give the government certain powers to act under order in council for the national defence and security of Canada.

Mr. Lambert: Make sure the circumstances are the same before that is done.

Mr. Pickersgill: The circumstances are by no means the same, and I am glad the hon. gentleman made that interjection.

What we were dealing with in 1959 was the national defence and security of this country, and whether the course recommended by the government of that day was right or wrong; that was its purpose, and if there is any purpose for which emergency powers can properly be asked of parliament, it is for that purpose. But here this government is asking for unlimited arbitrary powers to do something in an emergency which the government itself says it is not satisfied may arise, in connection with an ordinary commercial activity—powers whose application would be unpredictable, or at least, I thought it was unpredictable until I heard the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) speak last evening. He really let the cat out of the bag.

Mr. Green: Before the hon. member leaves that point, may I ask whether he is in favour of having control over the export or import of oil included in this bill or not?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not in favour of having control over the export and import of oil included in the bill until the government defines the precise nature of the controls it proposes to exercise, and we in parliament, who are elected by the people of Canada, have our say about what they should be. It may be that circumstances will arise when controls are necessary, but they are certainly not necessary now in my submission.

Mr. Green: Would the hon. gentleman say—

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister would make his speech when I have made mine. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) said himself the other day that controls were not necessary. I will be very glad to answer any questions when I have finished. I have a lot of things I want to say, and I am limited by time.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): A lot of things you want to read.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, a lot of things I want to read, and I might say it would profit the hon. member to hear some of the things which the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) used to say when he was on this side of the house. Here is another of the things which the Prime Minister had to say on June 9, 1955. I notice that there is a singular reluctance on the part of hon. gentlemen on my left to hear what the Prime Minister had to say before he became Prime Minister, and I must say that I cannot blame them. The hon. member for Prince Albert, as he then was, had this to say:

> I ask the Prime Minister now: do you have to circumvent the rule of law in order to achieve power under this legislation? Nothing of the kind! Have the powers, but in order to assure that no individual shall be discriminated against and denied equality before the law, to assure that the individual shall not be a puppet in the hands of the minister, give to the individual who is able to establish that he has been discriminated against a right of review by the courts of the land.

Here is a power to prohibit—a power to prevent—absolute, unlimited power, and that is what we object to. And then the Prime Minister said as reported at page 4564 of Hansard:

> Have we come to a condition of affairs in this country where any person occupying the almighty position of a minister of the crown in the federal parliament can, with the assistance of the cabinet, fix prices—

As they certainly can, under the powers for which they are asking; that could certainly be done by order in council. And then the hon. gentleman went on:

> Have we arrived at a position in Canada where gluttony for power will permit the governor in council to say, "I fix the price of essential services on hydroelectric"—

It is extraordinary how these things come home to roost. And then, on page 4566, the hon. gentleman said:

> I ask the Prime Minister why the inclusion of arbitrary powers such as these? The answer given is: we do not use them.

That is exactly what the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said—we do not use them; we do not even know what we want them for. But in 1955, the right hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister continued:

> What have you them for—a club, a threat, intimidation? Do you want the sword of Damocles to hang over everybody? Oh, we do not use these powers! Why have these inexcusable powers? . . . Where is the rule of law? Have we placed the rule of law in the refrigerator of security?

It is not in the refrigerator of security today; it is just in the refrigerator of protecting commerce. And the hon. gentleman went on:

> The tyranny of the majority is a multiple tyranny. No better answer can be given today than that. It is no excuse that you have a big majority.

I could read more, but I think that is enough to illustrate the point I am making.

Mr. Churchill: What was the reference? I have the pages, but I did not get the date.

Mr. Pickersgill: June 9, 1955. I am surprised the minister should have forgotten. I was reading from pages 4562-4566.

Until the hon. member for Calgary South spoke last night we did not know why the government wanted these powers. But the hon. member told us why these powers were wanted. He said we might have an emergency; an emergency might arise very suddenly; oil might be dumped from some other countries. It is only a few months ago that we fought bitterly against legislation to give the government powers which we did not think were justified to prevent something which the administration was pleased to call dumping. We felt those powers went far beyond anything that was required. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) is already armed with what we consider to be arbitrary and excessive powers to prevent what the government is pleased to call dumping—powers which are virtually sufficient to exclude almost any kind of import from entering this country.

Now the government wants another individual to be clothed with even greater powers—power to prevent import, power to prevent export, power to regulate the flow of this commodity in any undefined way which suits him. Such power, were it to be given to the government to use, could have a very detrimental effect indeed upon many areas of this country. There are many parts of Canada which cannot possibly be supplied by any pipe line from the Canadian oil fields and while we agree that in certain circumstances we would feel, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) pointed out yesterday, that steps might have to be taken to protect the interest of the people engaged in this industry, as in any other great Canadian interest, we do not feel that an emergency of a kind which anyone could reasonably foresee at the present time is likely to arise so suddenly that parliament could not be called upon to deal with it.

Mr. Lambert: Nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: We hear the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), one of the followers of these almighty and powerful ministers, with their big majority, say that an emergency might come so quickly that parliament could not deal with it. We do not give the government the power to declare war without calling parliament. Surely in these days of air transport, and with all the facilities which are available, no one could seriously argue that if an emergency did arise in the oil industry it would not be possible for parliament to meet and deal with it.

We all recognize the importance of this industry to the economy of the country. We all hope it will be of increasing importance to the Canadian economy, and I am confident it will be so. But surely no one could argue that any emergency is likely to arise so quickly that it could not be dealt with by means of the extensive, indeed, far too extensive powers already given to the Minister of National Revenue under the Customs Act; without it being necessary to superimpose this absolutely unlimited power over the import and export of this particular commercial commodity.

Oil is really quite different from gas. Continuity of supply to a community that has gas is all important. There is a public interest there that has to be preserved and protected and everybody in the house has always recognized that. But oil is perhaps one of the greatest commodities entering into international commerce, and to suggest that the kind of emergency might arise when there would not be a supply of oil for the few days required to call parliament is just absurd. The only conclusion one can reach is that the government and perhaps the hon. member for Calgary South, who represents a constituency once represented by a former prime minister who was the greatest protectionist we ever had in this country, and perhaps this is the real nigger in the woodpile—

Mr. Green: Oil is under export control now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the real purpose in getting this arbitrary power is to do something in the secrecy of the closet by order in council that they would not dare to come to parliament and ask to have done openly. That is the only conclusion one can reach with respect to the demand for this arbitrary power. Perhaps, of course, since the Prime Minister dragged the Alberta provincial election quite unnecessarily and irrelevantly into the debate yesterady, it is to try to create the same kind of impression in Alberta as they tried to create in Ontario by calling the phony federal-provincial conference for next July. I do not think it will work very well in either case.

But what is really important, as the Prime Minister pointed out with such eloquence in 1955 and as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) and all these other crusaders for the rights of parliament pointed out in those days, is the rights of parliament. But here this is being done without any excuse of national security, without any suggestion that there is any reason whatever for it. Indeed, the minister went further than that. He said that they could not do this until they get instalment two of the Borden commission report, because they may tell the government how they should do this, but in the meantime they want the power anyway so they will not have to have a debate in parliament. You know, we have been bitten twice in this session on that very point. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) got her estimates through and then the very next day she got an order in council passed whose sense was the exact opposite of the impression given here in parliament.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with the energy bill, not with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I think the hon. gentleman should confine his remarks to the energy bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was reasoning by analogy and my analogy was strictly relevant, unlike some of the arguments we heard from a very exalted source yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: This is not a narrow debate. It has ranged fairly wide so far and unless the hon. member wants to pursue the matter he alluded to I do not think I need to intervene.

Mr. Pickersgill: I had no intention, of course, to do more than make my analogy. Of course, the other analogy that comes very much to our minds I perhaps could not properly make under the rules because it has to do with another measure that is still under consideration. I will reserve it for the time when that measure comes back into the house but it will be in everyone's mind.

The plain fact is that this government twice in the present session has shown that it is not to be trusted, that it cannot be trusted with the power to make even the most ordinary kind of orders in council and to give parliament proper opportunities to debate them. A new and subtle form of closure has been imposed upon us and this is exactly what this looks like. Clause 87 is an attempt to get the power to do something that the government would not dare to come and ask to have done openly by parliament itself. They want to be clothed with these arbitrary powers these powers to circumvent parliament. What about? About something they do not even tell us is an emergency; at least, the minister does not. The minister-elect says there might be an emergency but the minister-elect has not succeeded the minister yet. Whether he will when the minister succeeds the Minister of Finance I do not know. I am not in the confidence of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Lambert: Not likely to be either.

Mr. Churchill: Give us some more secrets.

Mr. Pearson: That is no great deprivation.

Mr. Pickersgill: But I want to say again that it does seem to me that this clause should not be in the bill and that the government should remember the position that was taken when they were on this side of the house and take it out of their bill when the time comes in committee.

I should like to say a word about the word "immediately". The Prime Minister said that it was very urgent to pass this legislation because there were some applications to come before the new board, and that it would be appointed immediately. The word "immediately" has come to have a different meaning in the mouths of members of the administration from the ordinary dictionary meaning. It took the government nearly six months to appoint an ambassador to the United States. They chose as ambassador to the United States the chairman of the civil service commission and that very important post is still vacant although we have had repeated assurances that it will be filled as soon as possible or almost immediately.

Mr. Churchill: Is there an analogy here that we are missing?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is now straying off the beaten path.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not straying very far afield, sir, because the Prime Minister told us that these appointments would be made immediately and he also told us the kind of exalted people who were going to be appointed although he did not tell us precisely who they were. In our opinion there are more members of the board than there need be. It seems to us that three members would be quite sufficient to discharge these functions and that three members with the kind of qualities the Prime Minister described yesterday are going to be pretty hard to find unless, perchance, the Prime Minister is going to turn to that rather distinguished and growing number of former public servants who have left the public service since the present administration came into office. There are among them a number of people who could perform these functions with the greatest competence and I am sure that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would be the first to admit that because he has a close acquaintance with many of them.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Are you available, Jack?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think that politicians should be appointed to these positions, to answer the hon. gentleman's question directly. I hope no politicians are going to be appointed because there is going to be enough political control anyway. We had this statement by the Prime Minister about how independent this board is going to be. It was really touching until the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), in an interjection with which I must say I completely agreed, though I do not always agree with him, said, "Eyewash". The hon. member for Vancouver East gave the reason why he said "Eyewash". He went on to say: "All the powers are subject to the cabinet." That is perfectly true.

Mr. Lambert: You are wrong.

Mr. Pickersgill: This government is so passionately devoted to passing orders in council, this government led by a man who formerly denounced government by order in council, that they have made it necessary for every act of any consequence of this board to be confirmed or otherwise by the governor in council.

Mr. Lambert: That is where you are wrong. You have not even read the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member might read it and he will find that is the case.

Mr. Lambert: You read about tariffs and tolls.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister said that in order to make sure that this board will operate for the benefit of all Canadians it will operate beyond any suggestion of any control in any way, except, of course, that anything it does is subject to the veto of the governor in council. It does not seem to me to matter very much—

Mr. Lambert: You have not read the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is an amendment before the house and the hon. gentleman has the right to speak again if he would like to, and refute my words. Let him go ahead and do so.

Mr. Lambert: I will.

Mr. Pickersgill: But perhaps he might let me make my speech in the meantime. As a matter of fact, I was very interested to observe that the Prime Minister did not attempt to reply to the hon. member for Vancouver East except in the Prime Minister's usual way, by innuendo. He said:

> When it comes to eyewash I do not want to compete with the hon. gentleman.

I do not think there is anybody anywhere in this country who can compete with the Prime Minister in that commodity.

I say that we support the principle of the bill because in fact it is just codifying the law under a new board which we as a party feel it is desirable to have for the purpose of advising on the development of this industry and for the purpose of the really necessary regulation of this industry, but not for unnecessary regulations. Moreover, with very few exceptions, in its operative clauses it simply takes the exact language from the Railway Act or the electricity and fluids exportation act, or the Pipe Lines Act. I think particularly of the clause the Prime Minister read yesterday which he said was establishing a new kind of control and safeguard. But the clause he read yesterday was taken, I am assured, verbatim from the existing legislation.

I say it would be absurd for us not to support the principle of this bill since the principle is to continue what was there before under a Liberal administration. But that does not alter the fact that the arbitrary, unnecessary and undesirable powers in clause 87 should be taken out of the bill. It does not alter the fact that the bill itself is in most of those respects, not all, but in most of those respects in which there are innovations, capable of being very considerably improved, and it is our hope that in committee a great many improvements will be made.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Pearson: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Green: Is it the stand of the Liberal party that there should be no export or import control over oil in the country?

Mr. Pearson: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir; I thought I answered that question.

Mr. Pearson: You did.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall repeat my answer. I say that any controls over the export or import of oil should be imposed by parliament. They should be spelled out by parliament, and arbitrary and unlimited powers should not be given to the governor in council to do it by order in council.

Mr. Green: Is it not a fact that there has been control over the export of oil under the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act for many years, I think since 1907. There is in the law of Canada today actual control over the export of oil and there was that control over the export of oil during the whole of the time my hon. friend's party was in power.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is perhaps true to say that in that statute there would have been the power to exercise that control.

Mr. McIlraith: Only through pipe lines.

Mr. Pickersgill: It appears to me that the power was never exercised except in the case of the export through pipe lines. I understand also that there was no limitation upon the quantity to be exported, or anything of that sort. This was treated as an ordinary commercial commodity. The nature of the control of the export had to do with where it could be exported and where the pipe line would go. However, I do not pose as a great expert on this subject. What I am saying is I do not think there should be the unlimited powers to make controls, which have not been specified in advance, by order in council.

Mr. Green: Is the hon. member not aware that export licences are required at the present time and were required during the whole of the time his government was in power, and on an annual basis?

Mr. McIlraith: He is.

Mr. Pickersgill: We know an export licence is required for the export of electricity. I am perfectly well aware of that.

Mr. Pearson: And a lot of other things.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest this matter might be followed up in committee when we reach that stage. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, there are one or two comments that I should like to make on this particular motion. May I say first that I enjoyed very much listening to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), both his historical recount of the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his objections to the dictatorial powers which are given to the government to administer this matter in the bill before us. I am afraid that he spoiled what would otherwise be a well-prepared and well-documented speech by starting off saying that we had a good administration in this country in 1956. If he had left that out he would have been on much safer ground. He may have convinced himself that we had a good administration in the government of 1956, but he was not able to convince the Canadian people to that effect.

Mr. Pickersgill: At least we could float a bond issue in those days.

Mr. Howard: You could float a bond issue if you had the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: But we paid off debt instead.

Mr. Howard: By increasing the debt, which the Liberals did also. You are not above criticism in that regard.

I listened to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate complain about the powers that were demanded in this particular bill. He then went on at great length and prefaced his objection by saying that he was going to vote for it anyway. I do not know, but he has become just as much a political paranoid as Premier Smallwood. He is trying to get on both sides of the issue at the same time.

I have but one comment to make about the speech—I should not put it that way—the oratorical act that we saw put on yesterday by the Prime Minister. If ever there was a single unqualified admission that the Tory party were a great bunch of liars when they sat over on this side of the house in opposition it was made by the Prime Minister in his admission yesterday, because their position has changed entirely. They espoused certain ideas when they sat over here, Mr. Speaker. When they got over there—

Mr. D. J. Walker (Rosedale): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I ask—and I think all hon. members would support me in asking—my hon. friend to withdraw his reference to the Conservative party when in opposition when he described them as liars. Of course, when one considers the source of this remark one can have some appreciation of it. It comes from one who has little appreciation of parliamentary duties and an understanding of them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I think the hon. member has made his point.

Mr. Howard: I would like to comment on it. What I said was this: in effect, the Prime Minister admitted that when the Tories sat over here they were liars because they are not carrying out what they promised they would. I am not saying they are liars now; they will have to decide that for themselves.

Mr. Churchill: Withdraw.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I am sure the hon. member for Skeena realizes that perhaps he should rephrase his remark.

Mr. Howard: All right, I will attempt to rephrase it and say that they lied when they sat over here and they lied to the public on this question in two elections.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I think the hon. member can find a better word than that.

Mr. Churchill: Withdraw.

An hon. Member: A false statement.

Mr. Howard: I am waiting for those barking dogs over there to slow down a little so that I can say that I withdraw the remark classifying the Tories as liars when they sat on this side of the house. I will not go into the question of what they are at the present time.

Mr. Walker: A person in a glass house should not throw stones.

Mr. Howard: My thin-skinned friend over there would object to what I said no matter what it was.

Mr. Walker: We consider the source.

Mr. Howard: We consider the source of any remarks which come from the other side of the house. We have had the assistance of the open mouth of my friend on quite a number of occasions.

Let us deal with the question of the referral of this particular bill to a committee for study, and so on. The objection has been made that for a number of reasons we cannot do that. It has been said that the question has been exhaustively studied by commissions. It has been said also that complaints have been made in the house that there are too many committees functioning at the present time and that there is not sufficient time for hon. members to carry on all of their parliamentary duties, and so on.

If we could have a bill on the Unemployment Insurance Act referred to a committee for study, regardless of the fact the chairman of that committee is trying to stifle the proper functioning of it, then surely this question of a national energy board is equally, if not more important and should be sent to a committee for consideration and study. Veterans' legislation falls into the same category. The question of the humane slaughter of animals is also being considered by a committee. Certainly a bill of this nature which entails the financial slaughter of many citizens in Canada should be given some serious consideration by a committee.

I submit that the reason this bill is not being sent to a committee for study to allow interested people to present their ideas, their suggestions for changes if they are necessary, their complaints or their commendation of the bill or sections of it, is that the minister has not got the guts to subject his own piece of legislation to the light of day. He would rather that the docile majority on that side of the house—

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; I suggest that the use of that phrase "has not got the guts", should be withdrawn by this member who is apparently unfamiliar with parliamentary practice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I do not believe that remark is parliamentary, and I think it might be better if it were withdrawn.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has an hon. member the right to rise in the house in any place except his own?

Mr. Howard: If I may say so, that expression has been used in this house on a number of occasions and no objection has been taken. These people want two sets of rules, one to apply to them to allow them to do what they want, as the Prime Minister did the other day, and another set of rules to apply to the opposition to prevent them from saying anything. If my delicately-skinned friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), feels that term "has not got the guts to subject this bill to committee study" is sufficiently objectionable to him for me to change it, then I will say he has not got the intestinal fortitude if that is a more euphemistic phrase.

Mr. Churchill: I am quite content to allow this man who shows none of these qualities himself to use this expression.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) has withdrawn that remark.

Mr. Walker: Can the hon. member get out of the gutter for a few minutes and remember he is in the Canadian House of Commons?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order; the hon. member for Skeena has the floor. If anyone wishes to ask a question, he may.

Mr. Howard: I had said the Minister of Trade and Commerce would rather ram this bill down the throats of the members of the House of Commons with the help of his docile majority on that side of the house, than subject it to consideration by a committee of this house as it should be. A few years ago we had in this House of Commons a minister of trade and commerce who was well known throughout the country as an arrogant, despicable dictator, and my friend the present Minister of Trade and Commerce is a perfect apprentice to the former minister, C. D. Howe.

Throughout the debate on this bill to establish a national energy board the Minister of Trade and Commerce has interjected one phrase particularly and that has been, "Nonsense, nonsense", whenever objections were raised. I shall, therefore, use this phrase in return and say it is nonsensical to say that this is a national energy board. This is national Tory endorsation of thievery and corruption in the gas and oil pipe line industry; precisely that, and nothing else. The whole history of gas pipe lines in Canada, not only interprovincial ones but those within provinces as well, fairly reeks with the smell of political and stock market manipulations and corruption. This is a straight endorsation of that condition which has existed throughout the history of gas pipe lines.

The trans-Canada pipe line has been dealt with particularly on many, many occasions. The Prime Minister—"John" as he is affectionately known throughout the country—stated during the elections campaigns of 1957 and 1958 that he was going to fix this. He was going to change it so the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited would operate to the benefit of the general public. The phrases have been used, "these Texas buccaneers" and "reaping piratical profits", all that sort of thing. The Prime Minister even went so far as to embrace the idea of public ownership to ensure that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines would be operated for the benefit of the Canadian people and not for the benefit of foreigners to reap the profits.

Those are the phrases, words and attitudes of the Prime Minister when he was in opposition. This bill is an indication, if nothing else is, coupled with all the other betrayals of trusts and the promises that were made by this government, that John himself cannot be trusted any longer. He cannot be trusted any longer even with the intention of carrying out what he has promised he would do. This situation is not confined to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, but applies to many other things. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister, who yesterday gave his blessing to this particular bill, had any sense of decency and honesty I am sure they would not proceed with it or would put into it the ideas they espoused before they got into the seats of the mighty and became enamoured with this dictatorial power they now have.

There are a number of energy matters that confront Canada with which we will have to deal and with which we should be dealing now. This bill should contain a provision whereby we would be able to deal, when the need arises in the future, through what is classified as a national energy board, with the question of nuclear energy. An estimate contained in one of the studies made concerning Canada's economic prospects indicates that by 1980 some 10 per cent of the energy being fed into the distribution lines in Canada will originate from nuclear power stations. It is estimated also that by 1965 or 1970, somewhere in that period, the cost of nuclear energy will have fallen sufficiently to enable it to compete with other methods of generating electrical energy, such as hydro. This national energy board should be given authorization to deal with the question of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes such as the generation of electricity, and so on. However, there seems to be a complete abandonment of any thought of the energy board dealing with this question, and we are left floundering around as we have been in the past on this question of energy.

The matter of oil and the oil industry is not dealt with effectively in this particular bill. The question of international control of our oil industry in Canada—and the Tories were loud in their complaints about international control of other industries a few years ago—is not left to the Texas buccaneers and the Wall street pirates. It is all right for them to do whatever they want with Canada's natural resources. Again according to one of the studies made concerning Canada's economic prospects, it was indicated that at the end of 1956, 75 per cent of the oil reserves in western Canada were controlled by international oil companies and 85 per cent of the refining capacity was under foreign control at that particular time.

It lists the international oil companies that control this great bulk—75 per cent or 85 per cent—of the oil reserves and the refining capacity in western Canada. It sets them out as companies whose record is extremely unsavoury when it comes to dealing properly or decently with the welfare and interests of Canadian citizens. That is a failure of the bill, namely failure to have any sort of control over or authorization to deal with this particular question of the international control of our oil industry and our oil reserves.

Perhaps coal is another factor or another phase of energy that has been dealt with slightly. All we have heard so far is the Prime Minister, in support of his bits and pieces policy on coal, make reference to the subsidies and subventions in the maritimes but without any indication or any thought of future needs for coal consumption which by about 1965—according again to estimates—will start to pick up again to the point say in 1980 where we shall be consuming twice as much coal as we are consuming at the present time. But no; the policy of the government in this regard also, as with others, is to wait until the crisis develops, hope that it will work its way out of it but if not, then to do something when conditions are so serious and have deteriorated to such a degree that it cannot possibly postpone any longer taking concrete action.

Coal mines have been closing left and right all across the nation. There are some excellent coal fields both in the maritimes and in the western provinces and all across the country. If the 1980 forecast is correct, that we shall be consuming approximately twice as much coal then as we are now, what is going to happen in the meantime with these mines that are closing and will be closing in the future because of the decline in consumption that is still taking place? The machinery will deteriorate. The timbered sections of the mine will deteriorate. Many of them will be flooded. There will be greater hazards from cave-ins and everything else when and if the mines re-open at that time following 1965 when our consumption will start to increase. There is no foresight used in connection with that particular problem.

The so-called national energy board—which to me is a misnomer; it should be called the the national gas board or maybe the national gas and oil board—has nothing to do with the question of coal as energy nor with hydroelectric power. In British Columbia we have quite a potential of hydroelectric developments. We have a number of potential hydroelectric development sites out there. The estimate of the provincial government is that we have somewhere in the neighbourhood of 25 million horsepower potential in the province. The Columbia river is one around which there has been a considerable amount of discussion and negotiation with the United States through the international joint commission with regard to the downstream benefit question.

The then government—not this one but the one that preceded it—indicated that it would agree to participate financially with the province of British Columbia in developing the Columbia river under the British Columbia power commission, that is to say develop it for hydroelectric purposes, for storage sites, storage dams and so on. I do not know what the attitude of this government is. I do not know whether they have carried on that same undertaking that was made by the previous Liberal government to British Columbia or whether they have reneged on that matter also as they have done on so many other things. But here is a fine example of something which this national energy board could deal with namely the question of the Columbia river. International problems are involved. The river flows through Canada and through the United States. Also federal and provincial relationships are involved. The previous federal government—and I hope this one will be just as generous—indicated that it would agree to participate financially in the development of that river. What could be more simple than to allow the national energy board to deal with questions of that nature and to give to British Columbia the amount of consideration that is necessary.

The Minister of Public Works was here a while ago. He is also the acting prime minister. He is a long time resident of and member of parliament for one of the British Columbia constituencies. I am sure that his desire to participate with British Columbia in the development of resources out there has not diminished one bit but I hope that his friends in the cabinet have not been able to over-rule him and swing their weight against this joint participation.

These are just a few of the things which the so-called national energy bill fails to deal with. Apart from the things which were covered so eloquently and at some length by my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate with regard to the dictatorial powers that the government is demanding in this particular bill—apart from these objectionable features—we should not want to give the right to this government to carry on in the same way—which they will do—as did the Liberal party when they were in office, namely run everything behind closed doors, operate the country by order in council, dictate what is going to happen, never mind consulting the country or parliament. We should not be asked to give the government this power. The Minister of Trade and Commerce should have more sense, or if he had any sense of decency and honesty, he would not ask parliament to give him and his colleagues in the cabinet the control that he is asking for.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I regret having to call attention to unparliamentary expressions but I think we must have some sense of order in this house. As to this suggestion about honesty, if you will refer to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, pages 130 and 131, you will find listed there various phrases which have been considered in the past not to be suitable for use in the House of Commons. Phrases that allege dishonesty are not permissible. I ask the hon. member to withdraw.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. You may recall that the day before yesterday, I think it was, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) used the expression "if the hon. member has any sense of decency". That expression was ruled by the Speaker as being quite parliamentary.

Mr. Howard: That is the point I was going to make, may I say, speaking on the point of order. I thought surely I would be allowed the same right as was the Minister of Labour who made exactly the same charge in precisely the same words; namely if the hon. member had any sense of decency and honesty he would not say a certain thing.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): If I remember correctly, I think that phrase was allowed by Mr. Speaker when used by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Howard: I was using it in the same sense.

Mr. Broome: Speaking on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I do not think the phrase was as stated, although the matter can be corrected by reference to Hansard. I thought the phrase was "a sense of decency". I do not think the word "honesty" was mentioned.

Mr. Winch: Is there a difference between decency and honesty?

Mr. Broome: The citation which was mentioned had to do with honesty. It was in that regard that the minister was taking exception to the remarks of the hon. member. It is the implication of dishonesty that is objected to.

Mr. Howard: If I may, I should like to say this, Mr. Speaker. I know you have ruled on the question but my friend the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) raised this question again. I should like to point out to him that as reported at page 3971 of Hansard of May 25 the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) said:

> Therefore he cannot possibly charge with any sense of honesty and decency that the government has anything at all to hide—

And later on, when the question of order was raised, the Minister of Labour said this:

> I think I said "If he had any sense of decency—"

But Hansard records his having said "with any sense of honesty and decency".

Mr. Broome: The point is that the minister, in his explanation, said that he thought he had said "a sense of decency" and in effect was withdrawing any reflection on the honesty of the hon. member to whom he was referring. In this regard the minister is asking that the hon. member withdraw any reflection on the minister. I think the point is well taken.

Mr. Howard: I think the matter has been fairly well exhausted. I might point out to my friend the hon. member for Vancouver South that Mr. Speaker rules on things that are said and not on what the minister thought he said. There is a great distinction between the two things. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) seems to have a delicate skin and an ear which is upset by words which drive home to him the actual condition which exists, both with respect to himself and his colleagues in the government, but in any event I had completed my remarks.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the more we look at this bill now before us the more we realize what a farce it is indeed. This is a far cry from what the people of Canada were led to believe they might expect at the hands of a newly elected Conservative government. Over the years in this house Mr. Clarie Gillis asked for the establishment of a national energy board which would take into consideration and have authority over all phases of energy available in our land. He had, of course, particular reference to and concern for the welfare of coal enterprises.

We are now faced with the setting up of a national energy board that has no authority, and which is not even asked to consider the future welfare of one of our primary sources of energy, namely coal. We are now asked to consider the establishment of a national energy board that will have no authority to deal with the future potentialities of nuclear energy. We are now handed a bill that will give to the government, not to a board but to the government, the right to determine all matters in relation to national development of energy. We regret very much the limitations that are imposed upon the board in that the board will not have any authority or responsibility to consider the possibilities of future nuclear energy development, and no responsibility to consider what will happen to one of our major sources of energy in years gone by.

Last week the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) very adequately expressed the essence of our position on the bill now before us when he said that the bill seems in the main designed to establish a board that will be nothing more and nothing less than a front; I believe he used the words, "a stooge for the government in office". I remember so very well, Mr. Speaker, when a number of years ago the Conservatives in this house were so very eloquent in their opposition to the extension of the emergency powers bill under the Defence Production Act. I would like to recall some of the words of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), now Minister of Finance, when he referred to the Emergency Powers Act. He said, as reported on page 1909 of Hansard for March 10, 1955:

> These are not the times for permitting the continuance, Mr. Speaker, of powers so sweeping that those whose plants or whose materials are related in any way to defence must stand in fear of an omnipotent government.

Our complaint at this time is very much in line with the complaint registered at that time by the hon. member for Eglinton. He and other representatives of the Conservative party were arguing that the emergency powers as handed to the government of the day under the Emergency Powers Act ought to expire because, they argued, under this act it was within the power of the government to reward its friends and to punish its enemies. I heard a number of speakers argue that if the Emergency Powers Act were to continue the government of the day would be able to completely ruin any enterprise in Canada that did not tally along with the political opinions of the government of the day.

That is our major objection to the bill that is now before us. Under the authority of this bill we will have a situation, or I should say might have a situation, arising whereby any oil company, natural gas company or pipe line company will be at the complete mercy of the political whims of the government in office. I know that for a goodly number of years the Conservative party has been most envious of the resources, and especially of the revenues, of the Liberal party, and there has been developing a feeling that there were too many crown corporations and other agencies of the government, or as they themselves call them, "pampered pets" of the government, who aided and abetted the cause of the Liberal party and who also, in the opinion of many, were responsible for the failure of the Conservatives to make any headway on the political scene. We have witnessed over the last year or more a desire on the part of this government to roll into line all the crown corporations. Heads have rolled.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member appears to have got away from the subject under debate.

Mr. Regier: No, Mr. Speaker, I am attempting to point out some of the dangers in connection with the bill now before us in that we have observed in recent months a desire to undermine the independence of crown corporations and make them subservient to the government in office. And here the government is asking parliament to establish another board. However, they are not running any risks; they are ensuring by the terms of this bill that the proposed energy board would have no authority to do anything until it had received the advice and the consent of the government of the day to do what it felt ought to be done.

I should like to recall once again the words of the hon. member for Vancouver East last week to the effect that after reviewing this measure thoroughly it was obvious that no effort had been made to establish, as the government claims is being established, a national energy board. I say this first of all because this board is intended to deal only with certain phases of energy. One of our oldest sources of energy, namely coal, is being omitted, and one of our newest energy sources—nuclear energy—is also excluded. The board will be limited in the main to energy sources in the field of oil and gas. Moreover, the board will have no real authority to do anything except by the will and after the consent of the governor in council. We feel this is a regrettable move.

We are all in favour of the establishment of a national energy board which would be able to survey the energy needs of the nation as they exist today and as they are likely to exist in the years ahead; a board which would be able to take into consideration all the energy resources which are now available in all areas of Canada and which would in all likelihood become available in the years ahead. We had hoped, too, that the energy board when established would have authority to formulate regulations under which enterprises might operate within the nation. However, we now realize that the board is completely helpless; each and every regulation must first of all receive the approval of the government of the day and, even after regulations have been established, each and every major decision will have to be approved by the government before it is announced.

We feel that the Tory party is now establishing for itself an instrument such as it used to oppose when in opposition. In former times they ascribed all kinds of motions to existing agencies of government. Now they have with some success hacked away at the authority and independence of existing agencies, and in this bill presently before us they are showing their true colours and claiming that any agency established in the interests of the people of Canada must necessarily be subservient, not to the House of Commons but to the whims, the wishes and even, we believe, to the political interests of the government of the day.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to state the position of the official opposition with regard to the amendment which is now before the house, but before doing that I wish to comment very briefly on two or three points which have arisen during the discussion last evening and this afternoon in the hope that the minister when he speaks later in this debate may deal with them.

I should like to ask this question in particular: does this bill offer any method for controlling excessive profits from, for instance, the financing of pipe lines, which is not now available to the government of this country? In other words, does this bill represent any improvement and, if so, in what particular, over the situation which has existed now for some time and which certainly occupied the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in opposition and concerning which they had some very hard words to say. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) dealt with this matter, or attempted to deal with it, yesterday in a way which certainly did not provide any satisfactory answer to this very important question when he said, as reported on page 4025:

> As to the price to be charged for gas and power, it must be just and reasonable in relation to the public interests.

There is nothing in this bill as I see it to indicate how this desirable principle is to be carried out in a way which will constitute any improvement whatsoever over the provisions contained in the previous legislation.

Indeed, the previous legislation was in some particulars more satisfactory than the present bill.

Perhaps last night the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) gave some indication of the view of the government in this matter, for as reported on page 4040 of Hansard he had this to say:

> I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has grown in its maturity to date on the basis that we have been able to maintain an attractive investment climate.

I could not agree more with any statement; I merely point out that it is contrary to many statements we used to hear from the opposition when we were sitting on that side of the house. And the hon. member continued:

> When we start stipulating the rate of return which is going to be extreme, in order to discourage the return which is required in an investment undertaking of the highest risk nature, we are indeed biting off our nose to spite our face and we are indeed going to over-control industry and thus affect the very shareholders who are themselves Canadian citizens.

And then the hon. member stated:

> May I suggest to him—

That is, to another member

> —that in his concern to restrict the profits of a handful of people we should not expect to place excessive regulation on industry in the development of the resource itself.

I am not quarrelling with that sentiment. It seems to make sense. But because the government has so often made a point of this in the past, I ask the minister whether there is any provision in this bill which would prevent the kind of thing happening with regard to financing about which they had so many harsh words to say on some occasions. That is one point.

Now there is another point. The Prime Minister, in his long speech yesterday, made some observations obviously aimed at Alberta. As reported on page 4025, he said that the matter of export permits would receive immediate consideration. Then again, he said:

> In so far as those applications are concerned, they will be processed immediately by the board when it is set up. It will be set up immediately. There will be no need to wait for the mobilization of the board.

Whatever that may mean. The impression given by these words is that once the bill becomes law these export permits will be dealt with at once. But, Mr. Speaker, that may be creating a false impression, desirable though it is to deal with these matters with the maximum of speed, because the board will have to be established, the board will have to be set up, the board will have to be mobilized, in the words of the Prime Minister, and consideration will have to be given by new members of the board, some of them perhaps not familiar with these matters in the past. With the best will in the world it is bound to take some time before all these applications can be cleared up and action finally taken with regard to them. The Prime Minister's observation would give the impression that it would be pretty routine, that it will be done immediately and everything will be settled and that that is one reason why we must get this bill into operation at once. I merely want to remove the impression that this is quite as simple a procedure as the Prime Minister indicated.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): May I ask the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) a question? Does he not feel that the suggestion of the Prime Minister can in fact take place? Most of the detailed information has already been processed; first, by the province of Alberta; second, in the Borden commission report having regard to its limitations; and, third, by the board of transport commissioners in that it has already given some consideration to the matter with respect to one of the three applications. In view of this, does he not feel that this body of information will facilitate early consideration as suggested by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, indeed it will. There is no doubt about that. The work that has been done previously in the manner indicated by my hon. friend should facilitate the final decision of these matters. I am not suggesting anything to the contrary. I am suggesting that the impression that might have been created was that all the board would have to do would be to meet after it was established and process these export permit applications and that that could be done very quickly. I would hope it would be done as quickly as possible. But the new board is bound to look into the work done previously by other agencies concerning this matter if that board is to be as responsible as the Prime Minister said it must be in considering these matters. The Prime Minister also said as found on page 4025:

> I agree that it is essential that these matters be thoroughly investigated. I am not complaining at all.

He was talking about what he said might be a delay on the part of the government of Alberta. All I am trying to point out is that, with the best will in the world, once the board is set up it will require some time to take final action with respect to these matters.

There is one other point that has a bearing on this question of what is a just and reasonable price. The Prime Minister said, and I quoted this a few moments ago:

> As to the price to be charged for gas and power, it must be just and reasonable in relation to the public interests.

Just and reasonable as determined by a board and subject to confirmation by a government. Then he went on to make this very important statement which I think should be put on the record again and perhaps confirmed by the minister if it is to be confirmed. It is found on page 4025 at the bottom of the second column and is as follows:

> With the implementation of this legislation, no longer will there be any suspicion that the Canadian consumer is being forced to subsidize the foreign markets or that Canadian industries will be asked to pay higher prices for their industries—

I think that word must have been "energy".

> —than those paid by foreign industries using Canadian energy.

In other words, the Prime Minister in those words, and I think I am being very fair to him in this interpretation, has given the assurance—on what basis I do not know—that the price paid by United States consumers of Canadian gas will not be less than that paid by Canadian consumers of Canadian gas, without any qualification or condition attached to that assurance. Perhaps the minister will deal with what I thought was a pretty rash statement on the part of the Prime Minister having regard to the conditions surrounding the export of gas the conditions of sale and the varying circumstances that enter into the pricing of gas for export.

Finally, may I mention the situation regarding section 87 having to do with oil imports and exports. It has already been dealt with in great detail and I do not propose to do so in detail at this time. Last evening the hon. member for Calgary South complained that in my earlier statement I had given no indication that I appreciated the fact that emergencies might develop with regard to oil which might require governmental action. I know that he was no doubt thinking of an emergency which would require action with regard to imports so that western oil could be moved east under certain circumstances.

My own position and the position of our party on this matter is quite clear. I have said previously and I am glad to repeat it now that the economic market for western Canadian oil is the northwestern part of the United States. In a well-ordered economic society that is where it would be going at the present time and that is where it is going although not in the quantities we hoped notwithstanding the removal of the restrictions the other day. That is where it would be going in a well-ordered economic society. However—the Prime Minister quoted words to this effect that I have already used—if ever the policy of the United States makes it impossible for us to market our oil in the United States no Canadian government is going to let that oil remain in the ground and any Canadian government is bound to take the kind of steps which may be required to market that oil in Canada, indeed, in the east.

I am not complaining about that. I hope that will not be necessary because it is not the most desirable way of marketing that oil at the present time. If it is necessary, it will have to be done. I also add that that kind of government policy is of a very far-reaching character indeed and goes beyond the commercial in its implications, just as the building of a transcontinental railway involves something far more than a commercial venture. That kind of situation would require government action at the time perhaps with regard to the import of oil but it would be of such a far-reaching character that our complaint is that this action should be taken with the knowledge and consent of parliament.

There is no likelihood of that action being required at the present time, at least if we believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill). When the Minister of Trade and Commerce says that the case with respect to licensing imports of oil, contrasted with exports, is different and more complicated and he does not propose to argue that case fully because it would be premature to do so until the second report of the Borden commission in respect of this matter has been received and considered; if the Minister of Trade and Commerce says it is not necessary even to explain to the house why this might have to be done in the future, surely we have the duty and the right to object to a clause in the bill which gives the government that particular power which the minister himself says does not need to be argued at this time because there is no immediate emergency which might require that power. That is the burden of our complaint with regard to this particular clause and we will come back to it when we are in committee.

So far as the amendment is concerned, the official opposition will not, of course, be able to support it because it would surely be entirely inconsistent for us to support an amendment on second reading which is opposed to giving second reading to the bill itself. I know it is not possible to move an amendment on second reading to send a bill to a committee although it is possible to move an amendment that the subject matter of a bill be sent to a committee, which is the nature of the amendment before us. The effect, however, of supporting this particular amendment would be to kill the bill and the principles involved in the bill.

Mr. Argue: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition a question. Would he agree that it would be possible for the government to re-introduce a bill covering this same subject at a later time during this same session?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, of course it would, but what we are trying to do is to get this legislation through, to improve this particular bill, to get the government itself, after second reading, to send it to a standing committee where the interests concerned could be heard, have the bill altered in accordance with the evidence, brought back to the house and passed during this session.

Mr. Argue: The Leader of the Opposition does not really think they will do that.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): May I ask the Leader of the Opposition a question? Is he aware of any demands by any group of people, either from industry or elsewhere, that this bill should be sent to a committee so that, as he says, they will have the opportunity to give evidence?

Mr. Pearson: I have had in my own office a request to do what we could to ensure that this bill should be subject to an examination by a standing committee of this house, before which witnesses could be summoned. Therefore, we have asked the government—and I repeat the request now—that perhaps that course could be followed. That would not be a course which would unduly delay the passing of this bill, but might make it a better bill than it is now.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Will he say who it was that suggested it should be sent to a committee? It was not a representative of any body, I assume?

Mr. Pearson: If the hon. gentleman knows more about my correspondence than I do myself perhaps he will come up to the office and I will show it to him.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Did the Leader of the Opposition reply?

Mr. Pearson: The hon. gentleman does not speak for all the industrial activities in this country and all the interests that are concerned with this bill. I have given my own view on that matter and perhaps we can let it go at that.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Fine.

Mr. Pearson: The nature of the amendment is important. It seems to me if it is carried the bill will be killed. That is shown in the purport of the amendment. It is explained in citation 386 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition. Paragraph (2) which reads:

> An amendment, urging the setting up of a select committee to consider the subject matter of a bill, might be moved and carried, if the house were averse to giving the bill itself a second reading and so conceding its principle.

There are the words, and, of course, if we voted in favour of this amendment we would be voting against the principle of the bill. We have already said that we are in favour of the principle of the bill, though we are opposed to several provisions of it. Therefore, naturally, we will not be able to support the amendment.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Peters) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. Is the house ready for the question on the main motion?

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): On this main motion for second reading, Mr. Speaker—and may I say that I think I am one of those who have not spoken on the formal motion now before us—I think it would be well to attempt to summarize the impressions we have been able to get from what has been said so far in the debate, the statement of the minister and the discussion that has taken place. I will just wait for a moment, Mr. Speaker, until the noise subsides. As I was saying this is an attempt to summarize the impressions that we in the C.C.F. have been able to get from the comments of the minister, the discussion at the resolution stage and the discussion that has taken place during the last few days about the possible effect of this particular bill and the impact it may have on society and upon the consumers of gas and oil with whom the bill is primarily concerned.

In that regard we in the C.C.F. have an opinion to express with respect to the formal approach to the endorsation or non-endorsation of this particular bill. In that regard—and I may as well do it now as later on—I have an amendment to make to this motion. Following that I shall explain my reasons. This amendment will give an indication of the official position which we feel it necessary to take with regard to the endorsation of this particular bill. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge):

> That the word "now" be left out and the words "this day six months hence" be added at the end of the question.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member finished his speech?

Mr. Howard: No. I am waiting for Your Honour to read the amendment which I have moved.

Mr. Speaker: If I did so now, it would terminate the hon. member's speech. The hon. member for Kootenay West will then speak as he seconds the amendment.

Mr. Howard: I misunderstood the situation. I thought Your Honour would merely read the amendment and I would continue with my speech.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is customary not to put the motion until the hon. member has finished his speech.

Mr. Howard: As I said earlier, considerable discussion has taken place over quite a number of days on this matter during which we have heard expressions of opinion by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). I imagine these are the official approaches to the problem and to the bill. We have had speeches by members of the official opposition, by members of the government party and by members of the C.C.F. party. As the motion indicates, we have come to the conclusion that it would not be in the best interests of the Canadian people, the consumers who would be supplied by gas and oil pipe lines, the orderly development of these industries or of the other types of energy which exist in Canada for us to give endorsation to the principle of the bill.

As has been indicated—and these are only general statements at the moment—this bill consolidates the provisions of other acts that are at present on the statute books dealing with the question of oil and gas pipe lines. The statutes concerning that matter are the Pipe Lines Act and the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act. The provisions of those particular acts, with the exception of one section in the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act, are consolidated into this particular bill. In the consolidation in this bill now before us of these, as I suppose you could loosely call them, beneficial provisions in so far as being beneficial to the consumers and citizens of Canada are concerned, and as poor as those provisions were, we find that many of the saving features of the Pipe Lines Act and of the Exportation of Power and Fluids and the Importation of Gas Act have been watered down. We find that, generally speaking, the protective features, in so far as protecting the interests of the consumers and the citizens of Canada are concerned, are less favourable in the bill now before us than they were previously.

Coupled with the tremendous insistence on the concentration of power and authority—and I do not mean energy power such as electrical power; I mean power of individuals—to be vested in the cabinet, that is the most objectionable feature that we find in this particular piece of legislation. We are absolutely opposed, as we always have been, to the granting of dictatorial powers of this nature and to this extent to the government of this nation, whether that government is of Conservative stripe or of Liberal stripe, and irrespective of the type of political philosophy it may embrace.

There was a considerable amount of discussion in years past about the dictatorial powers of certain cabinet ministers in the former administration. Certain parties who were the champions of the rights of parliament in those days are now reversing themselves and insisting upon substantiating the same type of autocratic or authoritative control vested in the hands of 22 members of this House of Commons, so far as this particular bill is concerned. We are not vacillating in our approach to the question as did the Liberals when they condemned with all the fire they could generate and muster the provisions of the bill and complained about the insistence upon dictatorial powers being given to the cabinet, and then they turn around and indicate their support for a sort of confined or controlled lead. They must be under a misapprehension that instead of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) piloting this bill through the house it is their old friend C. D. Howe because one would certainly gather from their gleeful endorsation of its provisions which they say they abhor and do not like that the ghost of C. D. Howe must be overhanging the Liberal party and deciding what their attitude should be.

There is one reference I would like to make, Mr. Speaker, to Hansard of yesterday. I would like to read some excerpts from the comments made by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) who spoke on this question last evening. The reference I would like to make is to the part of his speech which related to the question of investment profits, equitable and fair and reasonable profits, in so far as these lines are concerned. At page 4039 of Hansard we find the hon. member for Calgary South starting off his discussion on this particular phase as follows:

> The criticism which I have repeated many times in relation to the weakness in the Borden commission report—I think it is a human weakness—is that it fails above everything else in some of its recommendations to recognize that this is a business which involves great risks; great capital investment is required.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member think it necessary for the purpose of his argument to repeat what was said last night? I think it is reasonably fresh in the minds of hon. members who heard the speech. Unless he wants to pick out some particular phrase on which to base an argument, I suggest he limits his reading to the very essentials.

Mr. Howard: I had reached the end of my reference, Mr. Speaker. I did not want to misquote the member or have it said I was being unfair, but perhaps I may adopt your suggestion and paraphrase what his comments were. They had to do with the fair and reasonable profit question. He said, "If I have any objection at all, it is just this." That is, the provision as to a fair and reasonable profit. If he has any objection at all, that is the objection that he has, that there was any provision whatsoever in the bill to determine fair and reasonable profits.

What does the government want? What does the hon. member for Calgary South desire? If he does not want fair and reasonable profit arrangements, or authority given to the energy board to determine this question of reasonable profits, what does he require? Is it that he wants to see an emergence on the scene of additional—

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked me a question, and if he reads what I said, I said I want the right of appeal, and that is my reply.

Mr. Howard: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I did not get this gadget to my ear quickly enough to hear what my hon. friend said.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): The hon. member asked me what I wanted in the bill, and I said the right of appeal.

Mr. Howard: The right of appeal in so far as just, fair and reasonable profits are concerned? That is the provision we are dealing with, and the hon. member does not want a fair and reasonable provision in there. If he indicates that he wants the right of appeal from a decision of the board as to what is fair and reasonable, then that clears up what he feels is just and reasonable.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Read his entire speech.

Mr. Howard: I cannot hear my friend. If he would get the mush out of his mouth—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I said, read the entire speech.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, my friend is suggesting I violate the very ruling which you have just made, and I am sure that you or anyone in the house would not—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I did not mean the hon. member should read the speech to us. I thought from the remarks of the hon. member that he knew nothing about what the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) was talking about, and I thought he should read the whole speech in private.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member, who does not appear to be speaking from his own seat, must recognize that the floor is held at the moment by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard).

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The hon. member asked me to speak louder, Mr. Speaker, so I rose to my two feet and did so.

Mr. Howard: Well, Mr. Speaker, for the last few minutes I have been trying to indicate that I had concluded the remarks I had to make.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to this amendment. We have before us an amendment which will allow us to give some consideration to this bill and give an opportunity to the government to introduce the bill in a much more acceptable and honest condition. This bill which we have before us refers in the main to gas and oil, yet when we look to find what a national energy board might be expected to embrace we find this bill could cover a great many other sources of energy besides those of gas and oil. It could cover the regulation of solar energy, electrical energy, atomic energy and thermo energy, all energy supplied from a number of sources in a number of ways. This bill has failed to take into consideration that if we are going to give to Canada a truly national energy board then we are going to have to regulate and make available under the act direction for all the various segments which go to make up the energy resources of this country.

The Liberals have pointed out that they were for many of these things. They also pointed out they were opposed to some of the major clauses of this bill. I think their position has not been justifiable with their own consciences, where you support something which you say is wrong in principle. The member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) pointed out that when the Borden commission sat on energy and made its report, 23 of the recommendations of the Borden commission were favourably considered by the government and 11 were rejected.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You want to read his speech, too.

Mr. Peters: I did not hear you.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I was referring to the speech made by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith). He quoted a Liberal member—the member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud)—as saying there were 23 recommendations in this bill from the Borden commission.

Mr. Peters: It does not matter whether the Liberals have decided this or the Conservatives, because they both voted the same way with regard to a recent decision made in this house. There is some justification for the position the Liberals have taken on this matter. I think they have some justification because the schmozzle they got the Canadian people into over the matter of gas distribution a year or two ago. They would probably not be justified if they took a position contrary to the one outlined by C. D. Howe at that time. However, I do not think this is the situation as far as the Conservatives are concerned. They agreed that if certain conditions existed—they were going to deal with this matter in one of two ways—

Mr. Speaker: May I remind the hon. member that five or six speakers have already made that point in the course of this debate. I suggest that if he wishes to continue to take the time of the house he should find some new ground.

Mr. Peters: I was just trying to point out that conditions hark back to the pipe line debate of some years ago and that these conditions have set the stage for the energy bill which is before us. But this energy bill is not satisfactory in any shape or form because, as I think it is generally agreed, the Canadian people are entitled to have a board set up which will handle our natural resources in the best and most advantageous way for the benefit of all. This bill fails to establish such a board. For example, it fails to take the coal industry into consideration, and it fails to include the atomic energy industry about which much more will be heard in the near future. It also failed to take hydro-electric power into consideration, with the exception of the export of such power.

In the climate which existed a year or two ago, when there was difficulty in raising money and when the government would not concern itself about raising funds for national development of energy resources, then, I think, this bill might have been introduced and might have received the support of some hon. members here. But today, with a government which says that it is going to develop the natural resources of northern Canada, particularly; a government which says it is going to take advantage of the natural resources that we have, and use them to the best of its ability, this measure loses a good deal of its point.

The measure needs a great deal of study, fundamentally, and I do not think we can even agree with the terms of the bill. If this bill is going to be called the national energy bill it will have to take into consideration all the forms of energy I have mentioned. This may raise difficulties for the government, and we may have to concede that it might be exceedingly difficult, because they seem to work much better in terms of experience than they do in foresight. I agree they had some success with the vision, but they should put these visionaries to work in developing many of the advantages which the Canadian people could receive from a properly designed board which would take into consideration nuclear energy. This form of energy may be a few days ahead but we are faced across all Canada with the failing of the sources of energy we have used in the past, particularly electricity generated by hydro developments. We have been faced even in the province of Ontario, which is blessed with many hydro facilities, with the possibility that within the foreseeable future, and the near foreseeable future, that hydro power will no longer be available and that there will be no future developments of that nature.

Ontario is going as far north, now, as Otter Rapids near James Bay to put in hydro developments and while there are two or three projects in this area they are limited and the end potential as we know it in that area has now been blocked out and indicated. Yet we are going to be faced continually with greater need for energy and electric power in the province of Ontario, and we have given no consideration in this bill to the one large source of energy of which the Canadian people have an abundance.

We speak sometimes of the surplus that we have of wheat and of the problems we are going to have in disposing of this surplus wheat, but we are going to have a much larger surplus of uranium oxide in a very short while. We are now in a position where we can see no sale or a very limited sale for uranium oxide after 1962, and I suggest that the government might with advantage have given this board the duty to decide how our atomic energy resources should be developed in order to supply Canadian homes and industries with heat, light and power.

However, the words have never been mentioned. And in those parts of Canada where it is impossible to put in transmission lines for power today, an alternative solution is yet possible. We talk about the development of the far north of Canada even in the ice and snow areas. Why has the government not given some consideration in this bill to the use and development of solar energy which would not require the use of extensive transmission lines and which would allow certain developments to take place in the far north which it is very difficult to achieve at the present time? We have given no consideration to these matters and I do not see how the government can be proud of the energy bill if it has not given consideration to all the forms of energy which we have available to us in Canada.

I think there has been some small discussion over the matter of gas and oil, but I think that all we are doing is incorporating a number of bills which we already have in force. I think the machinery is already in force and that it will allow us to export all the oil and gas we wish if the government would just relax some of the restrictions which it has placed on the board they have now. The proposed board will have no restrictions. This board is going to have only advisory functions and I would suggest that maybe the civil service could through its officers probably perform the advisory functions that would be necessary and that the governor in council could, in fact, run this national energy board all by himself, and there would be no need for a board and no need for five men to advise him.

Again, we are faced in Canada with the fact that all these forms of national energy have not been taken into consideration. We have given consideration only to the western members who are concerned with gas and oil. In my part of the country, too, we are interested in this new form of energy, but it no longer becomes a national form of energy —it is passed through pipe lines and it becomes the product of a number of people who are out to make a fast profit.

When it reaches northern Ontario and other areas it gives the people no advantage that they are not already getting from coal, oil and other normal sources of energy which they have had to use in the past. This natural resource has not been used to the advantage and development of secondary industries and has not been used to the advantage and development of new areas by supplying them with a new form of energy. I suggest that we do not need a national energy bill to provide the Canadian people with the development that the people were told would come about if they would allow a pipe line to be built from the west to the east to supply gas to eastern Canada. Gas has turned out to be a product that is competitive and only competitive and it offers no advantages in the field of secondary industries.

I think many of the considerations involved in the bringing of this natural energy to eastern Canada are going to have to be faced again by the Canadian people. It is rumoured at the present time that very shortly another pipe line will be built through northern Ontario from the west. One of the large contracting companies is going around telling people that they hope to be in our area again this fall and that they will be looking for crews. They are expressing the hope that the people who worked for them last year will be available this fall for the new pipe line.

If this bill were going to serve any useful purpose I suggest that a page would have to be taken out of the history of the trans-Canada pipe line and steps would have to be taken to remedy all those factors that were found not to be advantageous to the people of northern Ontario. This has not been done in the bill. There is absolutely nothing in the bill that is not already found in a number of other statutes.

I mentioned before the matter of expropriation. The government did not even write into the bill a new expropriation provision. They used the old law.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member did deal with that subject when he moved his first amendment and I would ask him not to repeat.

Mr. Peters: I was just pointing out that this has been a source of grievance and I would have thought that the bill before us would have taken care of it. A national energy board is being set up to control all sources of energy in Canada and I presume it is not intended to amend the legislation next year or in a week or two. I presume that the Canadian people will have to operate for a long time under the bill as it now appears before us. I wish to suggest that some of the faults found in present acts could have and should have been remedied in this bill so as to permit the Canadian people to profit from the mistakes that have been made in the past.

Another factor that enters into the situation is the matter of making money from these new sources of energy. We have all heard about the many mistakes made in the past with regard to the financing of the trans-Canada pipe line. Let us remember that the trans-Canada pipe line was probably one of the best opportunities we have had to bring about equalization of conditions in those areas suffering from inadequacy by making available to them a source of energy at a very low cost. However, we allowed certain types of financing to take place.

The hon. member for Calgary South is an expert on gas and oil. He has been connected with this field for many years. I think he is honestly concerned with gas and oil, and I am not sure that that applies to many other people in that field. I believe he is sincerely interested in the development of gas and oil and therefore would be interested in the financial basis for organizing and operating gas companies and gas distribution lines. I was surprised when he said he did not agree that there should be a clause in the bill making provision for a fair and reasonable rate, a fair and reasonable tariff and a fair and reasonable return in connection with gas and gas distribution. That is what I understood him as saying although he indicates that that is not so. I am quite willing to accept that because I do not believe he thinks that way. I do not think that the member for Calgary South believes that. I think he believes he can exist in that industry and that the industry itself can exist for a long time only if a much more ethical and orthodox method of financing is followed.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are interested in this only as history because I do not think the Canadian people will ever allow it to happen again. When they elected this government to office they gave their answer to the mistakes the Liberals had made in this field and the Canadian people will not permit another government to do the same thing.

We are giving consideration now to the development of a national energy board but we find that there are several other sources of energy to which the government has given no consideration at all. Are we going to wait for the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes? Are we going to wait until its use in weapons is outlawed? It will then be necessary to dispose of the uranium oxide and we will have to seek possible methods of developing energy from that source. Incidentally, Canada should be very proud of its position because we have an almost unlimited amount of uranium oxide available.

I am sure that before too long we will be faced with the establishment of plants that will use atomic energy as a cheap and reasonable source of energy, particularly in those areas where there are now no sources of energy. I am thinking particularly of the James and Hudson bay areas which we wish to develop. I presume the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) has given consideration to this matter. We have a large iron ore deposit in this area and all we need is some source of energy that is readily available without terrific transportation costs. Then we will be able to reduce the iron ore into iron oxide or other forms of iron and be able to distribute these products around the world much more cheaply than shipping them to others parts of Canada and we will not have to ship the iron ore to Germany or Great Britain in order to have it processed. I suggest that both solar and atomic energy will eventually be available in these areas where transportation is difficult.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member again but on my count this is the third time he has come back to that point. Although I do not want to restrict him in any genuine contribution to this debate, I remind him that this amendment is very similar to the last one and that there is a good deal of scope for repetition which I do not think is warranted under the rules. In fact, it might be worth while to refer the house to the rule against repetitious speeches. It is rule 34 subsection 2. I would ask hon. members to bear that in mind when they proceed with this discussion because to my observation, and I am not referring particularly to the hon. member, a good many of the speeches have been singularly repetitious in this debate.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I do not like to disagree. While it is true I have come back to this subject on other occasions I think that we are discussing national energy—

Mr. Speaker: I must remind the hon. member that we are not discussing national energy in all its forms. We are discussing this bill which proposes to set up a national energy board. I have not ruled it out of order to indicate that some forms of national energy are not being covered by this bill, but that does not mean that the house is free to embark upon a discussion of the uses of solar energy. It can only be done by way of criticism of the limitations of the bill. It does not bring those other issues directly into the debate as a subject of debate.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, that is the reason why we have proposed this amendment. These things are not in the bill and we say that these are the faults and failings of the bill. These matters are of major national importance as energy resources. The bill is called a national energy bill; therefore, I would strongly urge the government to give the fullest consideration to the fact that there are other forms of power besides gas and oil. The attitude seems to be that gas and oil are the last word in Ontario. We doubt that. We would say that probably hydro has been the last word in energy. I am just suggesting that in my opinion there are other forms of energy which are going to be more important. They are going to require greater control from this bill. I will not pursue that, Mr. Speaker.

In considering this bill I was interested to listen the other day to the Prime Minister of the country. He spoke of the immense resources in Saskatchewan. I was particularly surprised to hear this because he referred to a number of conditions in Saskatchewan. There are certain developments in that province that I would have thought the Prime Minister would have been very proud of. We are very happy to have many people from Saskatchewan in northern Ontario. Some of my best friends came from that province. Some of them have always told me that John Diefenbaker was a different kind of guy; he was not really a Conservative; he was a very good guy and he was the champion of the rights of the small people of the province of Saskatchewan. When I heard him say he was very unhappy about some conditions in the province and particularly with the people who have decided on what kind of provincial government they should have and with the decisions that had been taken I was very surprised. I am going to be very happy to tell my friends that he is not the champion of the little people of Saskatchewan who made the decision a long time ago as to what kind of government they wanted. I am sure they will be surprised to hear this.

The Prime Minister mentioned several conditions there, but he pointed out that conditions are not really so bad in Saskatchewan. They have gone into certain forms of assistance in the development of new industries in that province. They have been cautious in developing gas and oil. On the other hand, the province of Alberta has not. The Prime Minister pointed out that they have a lot of free enterprise in the province of Alberta. He also mentioned the province of Manitoba. He could have been right about Alberta because they certainly have a free enterprise government in that particular province, but the Prime Minister did not tell us that they had a deficit of $40 million in Alberta. He also did not explain what the development was which was taking place in Manitoba. From my trip out there I would say that they have very little industrial development in that particular province.

The Prime Minister also did not point out that he was very proud to come from Saskatchewan where they have a surplus of $3 million. I think he should give consideration to what is happening in Saskatchewan, because they did not have to make any deal with private enterprise; they did not have to sell out to a lot of financial interests in building the pipe line they have there. I understand their pipe line system is quite extensive. They did not have to sell out; they made arrangements which have been advantageous to the people of Saskatchewan. Something which I think our people should keep in mind is that gas and oil, like a lot of the minerals in the mines in the area from which I come, are not renewable resources; they are not renewable in your day or mine. They tell us that it took millions of years to put gas and oil in the ground, and the Conservative party is not going to remanufacture it no matter how much hot air they shoot in Ontario, in Manitoba, or in other places during elections. They are not going to be able to renew this particular resource and therefore I think they should not be in such a hurry to get it out of the ground. They should have consideration for their children and their children's children and the development of Canada in the future. They should give some consideration to bringing this gas and oil out as we need it and using it to the best of their ability for the Canadian people and for serving the needs of the Canadian people.

I do not think the Prime Minister did his province any great service when he attacked it for the arrangements it has made in financing the development that has taken place in that particular province. The fact that Alberta has a large deficit is no credit to the government of that province.

Mr. Henderson: May I ask the hon. member a question? He was sitting in his seat yesterday when the Prime Minister was speaking. Why did he not tell the Prime Minister all this? Why relate it to us? We have heard it at least five times today.

Mr. Peters: The Prime Minister makes his own speeches. I am happy to answer. I am only a very small fish in a very large puddle.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Henderson: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming has the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman was raising a question of privilege, sir.

Mr. Speaker: I understood the hon. member asked a question and the hon. member who has the floor answered him.

Mr. Henderson: He said he was in a large puddle. I would say it is a very small puddle.

Mr. Speaker: I see. I think it could probably be settled by calling it six o'clock. Is the house agreed that it is six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Do I assume that tomorrow we will go on with this debate?

Mr. Green: Yes, Mr. Speaker. When we conclude this debate tomorrow we will take up public works estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: I can hardly keep a straight face.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Explanatory note: The figures for the years 1930 to 1954 are those which are set out in appendix "B"—capital case statistics, of the report to the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on capital punishment. In the answer to part 2, the ultimate disposition of each case has been related back to the year of conviction. That is to say, if a sentence of death was imposed, for instance, in November of a particular year and was commuted in February of the following year, the case is treated, for the purpose of these statistics, as having been one where the sentence was imposed and commuted in the same calendar year.

The figures contained in the answer to question 1, are the number of convictions in that year.

Question No. 422—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1951, have any proclamations been issued pursuant to subsection 2 of section 4 of the Indian Act?

2. If so, what are the details of each such proclamation?

3. Have any such proclamations been revoked?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1. Since January 1, 1951, three proclamations have been issued pursuant to subsection 2 of section 4 of the Indian Act.

2. (a) In January 1958, section 93 (a) (i) and (b), and sections 95 and 96 of the Indian Act were made inapplicable to a parcel of land containing 162 acres, more or less, in Musqueam Indian reserve No. 2, leased to Shaughnessy heights golf club of Vancouver.

(b) In September 1954, section 73 (2) of the Indian Act was made inapplicable to the river desert band, Maniwaki Indian agency. This proclamation provided for a reduced number of councillors and was issued at the request of the band.

(c) In November 1953, section 73 of the Indian Act was made inapplicable to the Mohawks of the Bay of Quinte band, Tyendinaga agency. This proclamation provided for a reduced number of councillors and was issued at the request of the band.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. W. Kucherepa (High Park) presented the sixth report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

REMOVAL OF RESTRICTIONS ON CERTAIN U.K. DOLLAR IMPORTS

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I should like to inform the house that an announcement is being made in London today of a further major step toward the dismantling of the United Kingdom's restrictions on purchases from Canada and other dollar countries. Effective June 8, restrictions on dollar imports will be completely removed from some 110 items including a number not previously liberalized from non-dollar countries. In addition non-discriminatory quotas will be established for 14 items for the next United Kingdom quota year. The existing dollar quotas for the current year will be enlarged for five other products. Most of the items on which controls are being removed can already be imported freely from western European countries and other commonwealth countries. This liberalization move represents an important and welcome measure of progress toward the elimination of discrimination against Canadian exports.

The steps which have now been taken by the United Kingdom are in accordance with the undertaking given by the president of the board of trade at the commonwealth conference in Montreal last September. At that time he said that all being well the United Kingdom would make a start this year with the removal of dollar restrictions on as wide a range of consumer goods and foodstuffs as possible. Most of the items affected by the latest liberalization move fall into these categories.

The products of particular importance to Canada which are now being completely freed from control include cheese, eggs, honey, cereal breakfast foods, macaroni, canned soups and vegetables, paints, leather and leather manufactures including footwear, rubber manufactures including tires and tubes, hollow ware and hardware, woodenware and domestic electric appliances.

Canadian producers will have access to global quotas for such products as sporting goods, toys and games, stationery, clocks and watches and costume jewellery, fresh pears, canned apples and paper manufactures. Dollar quotas will be increased for other types of canned fruits and for motor vehicles.

Canadian producers of a considerable number of items formerly subject to discrimination have now been placed on a footing of equality with non-dollar suppliers in the United Kingdom market. This will open up new opportunities for the expansion of Canada's export trade, and will contribute to the desirable strengthening of trade relations between Canada and the United Kingdom.

We are pleased that at this time the United Kingdom government should have moved in this substantial way toward carrying out the program for the removal of dollar restrictions announced at Montreal. Discrimination will still remain with respect to quite a number of Canadian products, but we hope it will not be too long before we shall see the end of the restrictions against dollar goods which the United Kingdom and other sterling area countries have felt obliged to maintain throughout the post-war period.

We welcome the widening of markets which the dismantling of these restrictions will bring about. We welcome also the great improvement in the economic position of the United Kingdom which has enabled her to make sterling convertible and to proceed with the removal of artificial barriers to trade.

With the permission of the house I will table a list of the items which have been liberalized. I have four copies here; other copies will be available later this afternoon.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Naturally, Mr. Speaker, we on this side welcome this news of further liberalization of trade between the United Kingdom and Canada. We hope this process will continue until all the discriminations which have existed for many years will have been removed. The process of removal has been going on for a long time.

Proposed Legislation

We welcome this move also because it is a reflection of the economic and financial strength of the United Kingdom itself. These considerations, of course, have been an obstacle in the way of liberalization over the years. We hope this liberalization can be extended not only to the United Kingdom but to the sterling area as a whole. I am thinking particularly of trade between Canada and the West Indies.

In so far as this represents a move toward the achieving of this final objective, I am sure all hon. members on this side will greatly welcome this announcement.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, any move that reduces trade barriers in the world is welcome. Since we all are quite aware that Canada is dependent for her prosperity to a very large extent on export markets, anything that is done to make it possible for Canada to maintain and increase markets is, of course, welcomed. The United Kingdom is an exceedingly important market for Canadian goods, and this is an additional reason why we are happy at the announcement that has been made.

We realize at the same time that it is becoming more difficult to maintain markets for Canadian goods. The European common market has raised certain difficulties. The government frequently refers to increasing competition from the U.S.S.R. which adds to the difficulties facing Canada today in the export and trade fields generally. We welcome this announcement as a move in the right direction.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the minister has leave to table the document to which he referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LENGTH AND MASS UNITS ACT

AMENDMENT CHANGING VALUE OF POUND IN RELATION TO INTERNATIONAL KILOGRAM

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-20 (from the Senate), to amend the Length and Mass Units Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

AMENDMENT CHANGING VALUE OF POUND IN ACCORDANCE WITH INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-21 (from the Senate), to amend the Weights and Measures Act.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Churchill: Is an explanation required?

Mr. Pearson: Why not?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is parliament for?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the standard of mass for Canada is the pound. There has been an alteration in the relationship of the value of the pound to the kilogram according to an international agreement, and it is necessary to incorporate that change in these bills.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR MINUTES OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE MEETING ON AUGUST 19, 1958

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Notwithstanding the decision taken by the house the other day, having regard to the fact that the particular document has now appeared in the press textually will the minister now table the minutes of the meeting of the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission held last August 19?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, a decision was made by this house the other day as to whether or not the minutes should be tabled. As to the newspaper article to which the hon. member referred, I have no information as to the source of the information which served as the basis of the article.

Mr. Pearson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister give the house an assurance that the document that has appeared in the press is an accurate account of the meeting?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge as to whether or not it is.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. In answer to the questions put by the Leader of the Opposition, and due to the fact that this hidden report has now been made public, does the minister not think this house is entitled to have the same information that has been given outside this house.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Was the hon. member asking about the statement or was he pursuing the question of tabling? Because, as has been properly said by the minister, the house did take a decision with respect to tabling of this document, and it would not be proper for any member to ask that it be done in contravention of the decision of the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What I was seeking to establish, as the Leader of the Opposition did indicate, is that a new situation has been established, namely that the document which the minister said was privileged, the minutes of the committee, had been made known to the Canadian people through the press. The fact is that now, as the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, the minutes of this meeting have appeared in the press of this country, and as a result surely we are entitled to a disclosure in this house such as has been made outside.

Mr. Speaker: Well, I may say to the hon. member that first the decision of the house would have to be disposed of. There is a procedure for dealing with the matter but the minister, in my view of the present situation, is prevented by a decision of the house from tabling the document, until that decision has been changed or removed. There is a procedure by which that can be done. It would not be proper to act in contravention of the decision of the house.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may raise a point of order in that connection. The decision of the house was surely that the house would not compel the government to table the document, but the house did not decide to forbid the government from tabling it. It is a well recognized rule that the government may table any document in defence of its policies that in its wisdom it feels should be tabled, and it is in that context that we are urging that it be tabled now.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, may I say a word or two on this point of order. What the hon. member's suggestion really means is that if he or any of his colleagues can get hold by devious means, of a document to which they are not entitled, then the government has to table that document.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pearson: Just a minute. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Closure.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, without commenting on the minister's language, "by devious means", which is of doubtful propriety, this document has appeared in the press, and that is why we are asking the government to reconsider its decision to refuse to table the document, which was made before it appeared in the press. It has now appeared in the press and surely, Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate that we should know whether or not this is a document of the government. The only way that can be done is by having it tabled.

Mr. Speaker: I am impressed by the argument that the decision made by the house was to negative the request that this document be produced. It may be that the point of view expressed by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is right, namely that the government or a minister is free to submit documents to the house of his own volition.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there is a well known and well understood rule with regard to privileged documents which I have heard my hon. friends opposite, when in office, invoke time without number. I am surprised that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who has set himself up, on his own admission, as an authority with regard to the custody of official documents—and indeed he has a number of them in his possession at the moment in connection with another matter that he is pursuing— should say that if a document leaks and some portions of it are purported to be reported in the press, then all confidentiality between the government and its civil service advisers should be broken and the document must be tabled in the house. To say that is to make nonsense of the whole system of the confidential relationship between the government and the civil service of which my hon. friend has always pretended to be an upholder.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think I have a question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am not quite sure what the subject matter of the debate is. We are now at the period of oral questions. There have been two or three questions asked about this document and they have been answered. It seems to me there is no need for any further decision or any further discussion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think I have a question of privilege in relation to the misrepresentation of what I said. You have just listened to the Minister of Justice. I never said anything about the confidentiality of this document or anything at all about its nature. All I said was that it was a well known rule of the house that notwithstanding the fact that the house would not order the production of privileged papers, the government was always free to table privileged papers when it saw fit to do so. That will be found in May. I cannot give the citation offhand, but I could look it up very quickly.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION ON LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In reply to a question of mine on March 10 as to whether the government would disallow the Newfoundland legislation that is of such a controversial nature, the Prime Minister replied that consideration was being given to that question. Can the Prime Minister now say whether consideration is still being given to the question, or whether a decision has in fact been made to disallow the legislation?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, consideration is still being given to that question.

Mr. Argue: Is the government, by refusing to make a decision within the legal period of one year, in fact going to allow the legislation to remain in effect without taking a stand?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that the government has not refused to disallow the legislation within the period of one year. He is asking a hypothetical question.

Mr. Argue: Then I have a further supplementary question. Is it the intention of the government to make a decision within the one year period?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I first point out that a period of approximately two and a half months has gone by. That leaves a considerable constitutional period within which to consider the matter finally.

Mr. Argue: Will a decision be made within that time?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED SIGHTING OF UNIDENTIFIED SUBMARINE OFF NOVA SCOTIA COAST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister comment on newspaper reports to the effect that an unidentified submarine had been sighted off the Nova Scotia coast.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, while at Saint John attending a civil function H.M.C.S. Nootka was ordered by the flag officer, Atlantic command, to investigate a report from a source which appeared reliable that an unidentified submarine had been sighted. I am sure that all concerned regretted the departure of the Nootka from Saint John before the ceremonies had been completed but the people of Saint John will realize, as do all Canadians, that the primary duty of the Royal Canadian Navy is to protect our coasts and our shipping.

Mr. Hellyer: Was the minister pleased with the results of this test of his eastern defences?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The navy always carries out its job well.

Mr. Fulton: Possibly Premier Smallwood had declared war again.

TRADE

AUTOMOBILES—REQUEST FOR RECIPROCAL TREATMENT ON EXPORTS TO U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is in a liberal mood this afternoon, whether, in view of the announced fact that under the new trade agreement between the United Kingdom and the Soviet union the latter will be able to export automobiles to the British market, the government will give immediate consideration to an arrangement with the United Kingdom for the export of Canadian manufactured automobiles on terms, not less generous than those now accorded by Canada to the United Kingdom for export to this country of British made automobiles?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's suggestion will be given full consideration.

PIPE LINES

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE—ALLEGED REFUSAL TO ALLOW CONTRACTORS TO BID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, notice of which was sent to him. Has the minister any information that might allay the bitterness in northwestern Ontario over the fact that regional contractors were not invited and thus were unable to bid on the construction of stations along the line of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any bitterness. There may have been some misunderstanding with regard to this operation. The Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation has under construction this summer three compressor stations. These projects are specialized in nature and are subject to a very stringent completion date. They are required to ensure a continuous supply of natural gas to the eastern Canadian market and must be in operation by November 1, 1959; therefore, Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation decided, on the advice of its engineers, to invite tenders from a selected group of contractors having specific experience in the type of construction involved. Twelve firms were invited to tender.

The corporation has called for public tenders for clearing, grubbing, roadwork, and the supply and erection of structural steel, and it is planned to advertise for public tenders in the near future for housing and office facilities at these stations. It is not considered feasible further to subdivide the project.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO LOANS TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether the government of Canada has made any loans to the unemployment insurance commission since May 7?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I have not that information at the moment, Mr. Speaker, but I can get it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. CHURCHILL—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON MAY 27

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which I do not need to raise if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) will rise and make the correction in Hansard which I asked him to make last night. If he is prepared to do that I need not say anything further. Yesterday in the course of his speech I suggested to him that he had used the word "minister" when he was talking about the hon. member for Assiniboia, and that from the context he could not refer to anyone but me. I am not now suggesting nor have I ever suggested that we have ample resources to nationalize any great pipe line. The reference I am making is to page 4071. If the correction is not to be made I suggest that anyone who selects that sentence from the context and makes it apply to me is incorrect in so doing.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister and I did not quite understand each other. After he drew the matter to my attention I read the context very carefully, and I was afraid that if I changed the word "minister", having regard to the minister's observation afterwards, it would make no sense whatsoever.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: By that I do not mean what I said; I mean what the minister said, because the minister would have referred to the word "minister" and it would not have been there. It was for that reason that I did not make the change. But I acknowledge that I said it inadvertently. I think I admitted that in the house at the time. I think the reference I made specifically to the dim prospect of the hon. member for Assiniboia ever becoming minister made the whole thing abundantly clear.

Mr. Argue: I am still no "has been".

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Churchill for the second reading of Bill No. C-49, to provide for the establishment of a national energy board, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Howard.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, in speaking last night I was asked a question by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Henderson), and was able to give him only part of the answer. In answering his question I referred to the fact that I was only a small fish in a large pool, and that when it is my turn to speak the big fish have usually left the pool. However, I am quite certain that if the Prime Minister is interested in my remarks, he can read Hansard for himself.

We have opposed and are opposing the national energy bill that we have before us. One of the reasons we are opposing it is that it is not a national energy bill. I should like to refer not only to the Borden commission report which we have heard quoted—and that commission did a survey of the energy prospects of Canada—but also to the report of the royal commission on the economic prospects of Canada under the chairmanship of Mr. W. L. Gordon.

In his submission on Canada's economic prospects he mentions a number of other forms of energy. I suggest that these other forms of energy must be taken into consideration if we are going to discuss an energy bill. I find that not only does he mention some of the ones that I referred to, but he also mentions some that I did not know about because I come from an inland area and therefore they do not affect me.

He points out at page 270 of the report of the royal commission that another form of energy is tidal power. He goes on to point out that in the maritime provinces, particularly at Passamaquoddy, a tidal power project has been discussed as a method of producing energy. This particular project must be national. It has been discussed by a national commission, a joint commission of the United States and Canada and they have discussed this matter since 1920. It is pointed out that this project, while physically feasible, is not necessarily an economic method of producing power at the present time. They point out at page 271 that in a joint commission report of 1950 the international Passamaquoddy tidal power project could be feasibly engineered, constructed and operated, and they go on to point out that it would be very expensive.

Another form of energy which I mentioned was nuclear energy. They pointed out some of the problems in the development of this form of energy, and also the fact that it was an important source of energy and would become much more important. Obviously if it is going to be a source of energy then it must be brought under the national energy bill if it is going to be truly national, and also take into consideration all forms of energy.

It also goes on to point out, as I mentioned last night, that there is a form of energy known as solar energy. I quote from the report at page 272:

> Solar energy holds out hopes in quite a different direction. It falls on cheap waste land just as abundantly as on built-up areas in the nation's larger cities and towns. Solar operated devices can (and indeed must) be small in size.

As I pointed out, this will be effective in our northern development. It will be a factor in developing power necessary for expansion in our far north. These are some of the things that I think must be taken in consideration in a national energy bill, but they have been completely ignored.

Again, I think this bill is only a combination of a number of other acts that have been used to regulate the export of hydro-electric power and the sale, export and transmission of gas and oil. Canada has many other forms of national energy. It has many other energy resources which should also be given consideration. Many other important reasons have been given why this bill should not be accepted and made final for the Canadian people. For this reason alone I suggest that the amendment should be supported and this bill be given the six months' hoist.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have read and studied the bill carefully, and I have also listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks made by various members during this debate.

I now rise to give, as it were, a summation of this group's point of view with respect to its hopes when the resolution was introduced; its disappointment when the bill was introduced into the house, and its alternative proposals to this legislation. In a way I am really concluding the remarks of this group on second reading and explaining our reasons for considering, shall I say, the aridity of this legislation. The embryo of this bill was buried in the very general language of the resolution preceding it.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that all my life I have been a bit of an optimist, and I had hoped that a healthy legislative child would be born with the introduction of this bill. We did not expect a very lusty infant, but we did expect that it would be healthy. However, our hopes were doomed to disappointment on the introduction of the bill.

Why did we have these hopes? Why were we justified in having hopes that this legislation would to some extent be satisfactory to the members of this group? Well, Mr. Speaker, first of all because the royal commission gave its close attention to the energy problem in Canada. It was a royal commission appointed by this government which, after an expenditure of over $300,000 of public funds, made its report to the government. It was on that account that we expected this government to give effect at least to the major recommendations of this report, and so did a great many Canadians across the country.

In addition, our hopes at the resolution stage were considerably bolstered by statements made by the Prime Minister when he was a member of the opposition in 1956, as well as statements of other prominent members of the present government at that time. Then again, we thought after the discussion in 1956 and the study of the whole situation by the royal commission on energy that the government recognized the need to protect the national and consumer interests of Canada by the creation of an effective national energy board. Here we have the introduction of a bill which does not even give a definition of what energy is.

In addition, we felt justified in expecting something because of the name given to the board, the national energy board, in the resolution preceding this bill. However, Mr. Speaker, we were sadly disappointed with the undernourished orphan which was born when the minister introduced the bill into this house, and it was because of our disappointment that the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) moved this amendment which in effect would kill the bill at this time.

On the government side we have support for the bill. The Liberals have, shall I say, offered their tepid benediction to the measure in the dulcet tones of the official Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), in the cello-like resonance of the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Spencer), and the piccolo-like sweet tones of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill).

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the hon. gentleman means Essex East.

Mr. Herridge: I beg the member's pardon. I meant Essex East.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I also be permitted to correct my hon. friend and say that I am the leader of the official opposition, not the official leader of the opposition.

Mr. Herridge: I stand corrected. When I look at the good natured countenance of the leader of the official opposition I am rather inclined to extend his powers beyond those legally given him.

Mr. Speaker, I noticed during this debate that even the minister seemed to hang his head for the greater part of the time, and I noticed that on occasion he was peeping over at this group as much as to say, "Don't blame me entirely for this; it is not altogether mine." I could not help but think he looked like a shamefaced accoucheur in the introduction of this bill.

I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Macleod the evening before last with great interest. Apparently he speaks as a doctor of economics who has given some consideration to this measure. He has experience as a consultant in the oil and gas industry, and possibly has more understanding of the problem than a good many of his own colleagues. On that account I wish to quote a few passages from his speech which rather intrigued me and other members of this group, because if the speech is read carefully it was an expression of some doubt and concern. I now quote from page 4003 of Hansard of May 25, and this is what the hon. member said at that point:

> There is one other point I should like to mention and that is that those who are charged with the responsibility of examining the contracts of the different companies should look into the question of escalator clauses in those contracts. I am told these gas exporting companies have escalator clauses in their contracts. In other words the price of gas is set at a certain level and then it goes up year after year in increments and gradually the price is increased. I have heard that these escalator clauses are based on economic trends. I would recommend to the government that they look into the question of who drew these economic trends. There is no other industry in this country that I know of that has escalator clauses in contracts relating to the things which it sets out to sell.

That is one of the reasons why this group is so concerned about an effective national energy bill. Then again the member went on, on page 4004, to say:

> I believe that the economic forces should be bent in such a way that, over a long period of time, Canadian ownership will develop. Above all, we should maintain equity among the producers of gas and encourage Canadians to assume leadership in the production of gas and oil.

This is a clear admission that Canadians have not leadership in the production of gas and oil in this country at this time, and that is a situation this group is very concerned about. Then he went on to say, on the same page:

> I now want to say a few words on another matter. I have been tremendously impressed by the words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and of other members of the opposition and of the C.C.F.

So we have had some effect, you see, in this debate, Mr. Speaker. He continued:

> They have gone to great lengths in praising the report of the Gordon royal commission which recommended the establishment of an energy board. The Gordon royal commission made the energy board their number one recommendation. You may be interested in knowing how that recommendation got into the report.
> Mr. Gordon set up a system and asked for the help across Canada of scientists, economists and everyone whose services he could draw upon.

That is another reason, Mr. Speaker, why we object to this measure. The government has completely ignored the opinions and advice of this talented group of specialists in the field of the production of oil and gas, its marketing and so on. Then finally the hon. member finished his very interesting speech with these words.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member what he is quoting?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I am quoting from Hansard of Monday, May 25.

Mr. Speaker: From this debate?

Mr. Herridge: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I suggested last night that it was not in order to quote at length from this debate. Hon. members have heard what has been said, and it is certainly repetitious to put the speeches on Hansard a second time. If the hon. member wishes to found an argument on something that was said, and quote for that purpose, well and good; but that does not open the door to long quotations from this debate.

Mr. Herridge: I was quoting briefly from the speech of the hon. member for McLeod in order to develop my argument and give added reasons why this group is opposing this measure.

Mr. Speaker: It is quite permissible to quote for the purpose of founding arguments, but not for the purpose of putting the speech again before the house.

Mr. Herridge: I would not dream of doing that in any circumstances. But what did the hon. member for Macleod say, as reported at page 4005? He said, "The bill before the house is the best compromise that could be reached at this time." I am quoting in order to give a reason for this party's position. That is another reason why this group is opposed to this measure, because we consider it to be an unfortunate compromise which does not meet the needs of the Canadian national interest and the Canadian consumers at this time.

I was very interested to hear the remarks made by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. McFarlane) with respect to the protests of certain municipalities in his constituency against the export of gas to the United States without the service being extended to the communities in that district. I support the hon. member wholeheartedly. Here is another illustration of the need for a board with effective powers. I have in my hand a copy of the Kimberley News of Wednesday, May 13 headlined "Kootenays seek Natural Gas—Ask Government Support" and I will quote briefly from the article in order to demonstrate the circumstances and the fact that the present authorities have no power to deal with these people; and as far as we can see, under this bill the national energy board will have no greater powers than those enjoyed by the present authority set up under the Pipe Lines Act.

Murray McFarlane, member of parliament for Kootenay East, will be requested to support a brief calling for the suspension of granting a gas export permit to Alberta and Southern Natural Gas until gas supply has been assured for the Kootenays.

The executive of the association of Kootenay municipalities—

Who, incidentally, sent me this paper.

—Friday night endorsed a brief to halt the shipment of 3,000,000,000,000 cubic feet of natural gas to the U.S.

Permission had earlier been granted to the company by the Alberta conservation board.

Dr. Fraser, commissioner at Creston will prepare the brief to be submitted to the federal government.

It was pointed out in a resolution presented to the executive meeting that the company is seeking an export permit from the dominion government to export the gas to the United States.

The pipe line crosses the southeast corner of the East Kootenays from Crowsnest at the Alberta boundary to Kingsgate at the Idaho boundary.

It has been pointed out that the communities of Fernie, Cranbrook, Kimberley, Chapman Camp, Marysville and Creston are all desirous of being served by natural gas.

The only way the Kootenays could obtain the gas would be from this planned export line which is not planned to conveniently serve them.

The resolution stresses the importance of the dominion government withholding the granting of a permit until the Alberta pipe line agrees to deliver natural gas to the boundaries of the East Kootenay municipalities at a cost comparable to which it is sold to the American pipe line companies at Kingsgate.

Fernie has already appeared before the Borden commission on the matter in a separate application.

If we had effective legislation there would be no necessity for these communities to present briefs to this government and go before commissions in order to get their natural right, the right to enjoy Canadian natural resources before they are exported to the United States.

This oil and gas industry is in my opinion a breed apart when it comes to dealing with governments at all levels and with consumers. That is indicated by my own personal experience. I remember when they were starting to build a pipe line across southeastern British Columbia, and the way some of the officials of the company concerned ignored the rights of citizens, or tried to ignore them, when it came to matters such as the location of the route of pipe lines, expropriation proceedings, compensation and so on, almost past belief. In a number of cases groups of citizens were obliged to organize and send representatives to Victoria. They were obliged to take co-operative and strong action in order to protect their rights, which should have been protected by law, either federal or provincial.

Again, when it comes to employment practices, these high and mighty people did not use the facilities of the national employment service in some districts in which they were operating. The manager of one of our employment offices in my own district told me that the engineer for one of these companies had said to him, "We are not going to use your potty little national employment service. We like a line-up at the office here every morning at seven o'clock so we can go along the line every morning and say 'You, and you, and you, and the rest can come back tomorrow' ". No other group of employers in southeastern British Columbia, in my experience, has taken that attitude and shown such complete disregard for Canadian rights, sensibilities and practices.

Then we come to the question of sales to the United States at lower prices than those which are being obtained in the province of British Columbia and other parts of this country and, in this instance, the complete disregard shown for the requirements and the wishes of municipalities which have been established for a long period of years and whose people have made a great contribution to the wealth of this country—places such as Cranbrook or Kimberley where the famous Sullivan mine is located. Consider the enormous wealth of products which come from that area; think of the lumber industry and the coal industry in the towns along the eastern end of Crowsnest pass. The requirements of these municipalities, the requirements of industry and the requirements of Canadian consumers will be completely overlooked unless we have an effective national energy board with powers to protect their interests.

I said previously that the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) has moved this amendment, asking in effect for a six months' hoist for this legislation, because we believe that this bill does not give the board power to do the job it should do in order to protect the Canadian national interest and the interests of Canadian consumers. Here is a concrete illustration. This bill gives the national energy board no more authority than is exercised at the present time by the authorities who administer the Pipe Lines Act, if indeed it is to have as much. We intend to watch this situation very closely. What happens in the next few months with respect to the brief presented by the municipalities along the Crowsnest pass will determine very effectively whether the national energy board has the power to do the things which the minister says it can do.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Herridge: Certainly.

Mr. Churchill: It is in connection with this discussion as to the powers the board is to have. I wonder if the hon. member has looked at section 59, subsection 2, which will, of course, be considered in committee. That indicates quite clearly that the board has the power, which the hon. member claims it does not have, to see that the facilities available are offered to people nearby.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad the minister has raised that point. Strictly he should be called to order for referring to a section, but I want to reply if I may. This group likes the word "shall" in preference to the word "may". That is why we object, because the bill says "may".

Why has there been this retreat on the part of the government from the position taken by the Prime Minister and his colleagues when in opposition in 1956? They took a very strong position at that time. There must be a reason, and one must be fair. The reason is this, as far as we can see it; that this is a government which worships at the altar of free enterprise, enterprise as represented by the hon. member for Calgary West at the present time.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Calgary South.

Mr. Herridge: This government, because of its political philosophy, is caught in the squeeze between the pressure and wishes of the industry and the need to do something to protect the national interest and the interests of Canadian consumers. The result is this compromise, this ineffective bill, this undernourished legislative orphan, this achromatic child of the government's dilemma.

When we offer criticism of the bill in all fairness we must offer constructive alternative proposals and I intend to outline briefly what a C.C.F. government would do under these circumstances.

An hon. Member: That is an extremely hypothetical question.

Mr. Herridge: Someone has commented that that is a hypothetical question. Only time will prove that there is more substance in my remarks than the hon. member gives credit for at this time.

What would a C.C.F. government do under the circumstances? First of all let me say there would be no conflict between the philosophy and policy of a C.C.F. government and the national and consumer interest. Therefore there would not be a necessity for compromise and rationalization in the introduction of a bill of this kind as demonstrated by the effective distribution of gas in Saskatchewan, which the hon. member for Assiniboia dealt with so ably in his reply to the remarks of the Prime Minister, who made a most unfortunate reference to Saskatchewan.

A C.C.F. government would establish a national energy board responsible to parliament and avoid the day to day interference by the governor in council made possible under this bill. We recognize from attending various committee meetings this session the serious position of the Canadian economy in respect of international trade, and the necessity to do all that is possible to effectively meet increased competition.

One of the prime requirements in effectively meeting foreign competition in trade is low cost power effectively distributed across the country. A C.C.F. government would give effect to a national policy along the following lines. The national energy board would have power to make recommendations to parliament with respect to public ownership that could best serve the national and public interest under various circumstances obtaining in Canada. That would be considered primarily in respect of the interprovincial transport of oil and gas. The board would be given power to protect the national consumer interest in the export of gas. It would not issue licences under which companies could sell gas in the United States at prices below those obtaining in respect of Canadian consumers.

A C.C.F. government would establish a board that would promote policies designed to conserve and direct the use of energy resources. A C.C.F. government would establish a board with power to ensure that, as far as is practicable, fuel and power resources were equitably distributed to all sections of the populated area of Canada. A C.C.F. government would establish a board with power to introduce rates and charges for the transportation of power in its various forms whether that energy was being transported under public or private ownership. A C.C.F. government would establish a board with power to co-ordinate the activities of various agencies having information that would assist in the development of energy resources whether on the federal or provincial level or in private industry.

A C.C.F. government would appoint a board with power to promote research into every field of the production, distribution and marketing of energy in Canada. A C.C.F. government would establish a board with power to work in co-operation with a dominion-provincial advisory energy council so that the activities of the board within the provincial sphere could be correlated and the rights of provincial jurisdiction would be respected. It would ensure that all activities were directed to the end of an ample supply of cheap power equitably distributed throughout Canada.

I have dealt with our hopes and disappointments, and have briefly outlined what would be the policy of a C.C.F. government if it were appointing a national energy board and introducing legislation of this type at this time. In our opinion the present bill is a legislative facade that provides the opportunity for the government to accept the credit for any small advantages that may accrue, and to place the blame for its disadvantages on the shoulders of the national energy board. It is a hollow shell, and for that reason the hon. member for Skeena has introduced his amendment which we shall support.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. The question is on the main motion. Is the house ready for the question? I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at any great length at this stage of the debate on second reading because I realize that the house generally is eager to get into the committee stage where the bill can be dealt with clause by clause. I appreciated the remark of the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition (Mr. Pearson) last night when he said, "We are trying to get this legislation through."

I prefer to refer to him as leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition and not leader of the official opposition. He is obviously the official leader flanked by aspiring and unofficial leaders. But as leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition he has co-operated to the extent of indicating that the house in general is anxious to get this legislation through and certainly to the committee stage so that there can be careful study of the various clauses.

In the course of the debate, although it was on the general principles of the bill, as it developed the principles were at times overlooked and certain extraneous material was introduced. But just to remind the house, I think it should be clearly set out that, as far as general principles are concerned, this bill is to establish a national energy board which shall, in order to assure to the people of Canada the best use of energy resources in this country, regulate in the public interest the construction and operation of oil and gas pipe lines subject to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, the tolls charged for transmission by such pipe lines, the export and import of gas, the export of electric power and the construction of those lines over which such power is exported. The board shall also study and keep under review all matters relating to energy within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, and shall recommend to the Minister of Trade and Commerce such measures as it considers necessary or advisable in the public interest with regard to such matters. The bill also authorizes the extension of the export and import provisions to oil.

In the course of my opening remarks on second reading I set forth the principles with which we are concerned. I might say here, Mr. Speaker, that I do not intend to deal with the remarks of each hon. member who participated in the debate up to this stage. I appreciate the valuable contributions made by many of those who took part, but so many of the points raised have reference to various clauses of the bill that it would seem advisable to deal with those suggestions and criticisms as the clauses come before the committee.

However, I notice that in some of the statements made by members of the opposition there was criticism to the effect that this bill did not go far enough in that it was not concerned with all forms of energy in Canada. In my opening statement I attempted to make it quite clear that we were not interfering with the dominion coal board and that we were not attempting to take over the functions now performed so adequately by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited but that we were concerned with the question of electricity, oil and gas, the export of those forms of energy and the import of them when necessary.

In the bill we have made provision for wide advisory functions of the national energy board so that board can advise the government as to the policy that might be pursued with regard to energy and the sources of energy. The opposition stressed the point that this bill should be referred to a standing committee, a suggestion which is hard to balance against their repeated statements that there is nothing new in the bill, that it is simply a continuation of policies which they have advocated in the past and which they had placed on the statute books. In view of those statements, it is hard to understand why they would now want to refer this bill to a standing committee for further study.

They have referred to the work of the Gordon commission. They have commented upon the Borden commission. From both those careful investigations of energy in Canada surely sufficient information is now in the hands of the house for it to proceed with this bill without further reference to one of the standing committees. The committee of the whole house is quite competent to deal with it.

A great deal of attention was given by some hon. members of the opposition to the alleged seizure of arbitrary powers on the part of the government. This is a strange change of attitude on the part of my hon. friends opposite. It shows that they have learned something from the debates that took place in this house in 1955 and 1956 to which they have made reference and from which they have quoted at some length. I think they have learned in part the lesson that was taught them in those days. However, it ill befits them now to suggest—as was suggested by one member of the opposition, namely the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith)—that closure was being attempted in this debate. Nothing of the sort is being attempted. The debate is wide open for any length of time that people desire. There is nothing in the nature of any seizure of arbitrary powers. Everything is disclosed in the bill. We have placed it before the house for consideration. Every aspect of it can be examined. We have no intention now —and never have had any—of wanting to do anything without the authority and consent of parliament.

They have directed their attention particularly to clause 87 which we have set in there subject to later proclamation. That is not an unusual course in connection with bills that come before this house. That course of action has been followed on many occasions in the past. It permits the house to examine the proposition, to give its consent —or withhold it, if it so desires—and then having the facts disclosed, permit the subsequent proclamation of a section or sections of the act when the time seems propitious for that to be done. There is no concealment here or no intention of taking any arbitrary powers. If it seems advisable at some subsequent date to proclaim section 87, the document which does that will be immediately tabled in the House of Commons and debate permitted with regard to that action.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder whether the minister would permit a question just on that point?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: How would debate on that document to proclaim be permitted? Under what procedure?

Mr. Churchill: It has been done before, Mr. Speaker. It would be open to the house at the time that document was tabled or subsequently, on recognition of the place in the program for a debate of that nature, to debate it. It has frequently happened that the government of the day has agreed to the debate of a subject on the request of the opposition. We are suggesting that can be done under these circumstances.

Mr. McIlraith: Like the immigration order.

Mr. Churchill: Hon. members of the C.C.F. party made a lengthy, if somewhat raucous, contribution to the debate and ranged extremely far afield. I am surprised to find them aligned in opposition to national development and to the establishment of a national energy board.

In the debate which took place in this chamber in February of 1957, and which has been referred to frequently by hon. members opposite, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), who was then leader of the opposition, introduced a resolution advocating national development and in the course of his speech proposed the setting up of a national energy board, the C.C.F. party of that day, under its then leader, supported that resolution and supported the idea of national development and found no objection to the setting up of a national energy board.

But the present surviving members of what was once a strong party of this house have taken a stand against national development and against a national energy board. On the one hand they have advocated nationalization of pipe lines, public ownership, and on the other hand they have suggested that if there is to be a national energy board it should have complete powers without any responsibility to parliament, a misunderstanding surely of the function of parliament and how the executive is responsible to parliament. As I followed their argument through its devious course, it appeared to me that they were advocating some body which would be completely independent of this parliament. That is not the type of body that we are setting up. We are setting up a body which is responsible to the government, which in turn is responsible to parliament. Every action of that board and every action of the government is subject to question and review.

Mr. Argue: It is just a pawn of the cabinet.

Mr. Churchill: My hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. group, who speaks not in the measured tones of his distinguished predecessor of a few years ago, says it will be a pawn of the cabinet. That is not true. Like any other body set up by parliament it will report to the cabinet and it will report through the Minister of Trade and Commerce to parliament, and every action taken will be reviewed. I do not see the purpose that is attempted to be served by the C.C.F. party in the attitude which they have taken with regard to this bill. The wisdom of the house is of course against them on the two motions we have had before this house. The house has voted them down and has pressed on with the consideration of this particular problem.

We are prepared, Mr. Speaker, in the committee stage to examine very closely all angles of what I have earlier said is a very complicated problem. There is no pretense that this question of dealing with energy and the sources of energy in Canada is not complicated. It ranges far afield and involves not only matters within our own country and the conservation of our resources but our export policy, our relations with our neighbour the United States, and all sorts of difficulties which arise in dealing with oil and gas in particular.

In conversations with members of the federal power commission in the United States which have been conducted over the years by officials of the department, a great deal of advice and information has been received as to the difficulties which confront boards charged with responsibility such as we are proposing to give to the national energy board. We appreciate the difficulties that are ahead, and it is for that reason that so much of this bill has been drawn in general rather than specific terms, so that the national energy board comprised, as we expect it will be, of men of experience and ability will, in the general framework which will be set out, be able to map out a policy which will be in the general interest of all Canadians. Experience over the course of the next 12 months will guide us in the future, but this is a step in the right direction. This, as I said on the introduction of the resolution, is the fulfilment of a policy pursued by this party over many years.

As the Prime Minister mentioned, the suggestion of a national energy board to deal with Canada's national development was proposed by the late Gordon Graydon many years ago, and subsequently that idea was carried forward year after year through debates in this house sponsored by the Conservative party. The setting up of the national energy board at this stage is part of the fulfilment of our desire to develop the resources of Canada in the interests of all Canadians, and we are confident that through the bill which is now before the house, and subsequently through the board which will be set up, the interests of Canadians will be protected, that our resources will be adequately developed, and Canada will continue to maintain her position as one of the leading nations of the world.

The bill which is before the house setting up a national energy board I am sure will meet with general approval throughout this country. We have already had indication that there is general approval for action of this nature which is in line with the policy of national development announced by this party and now being followed through on many fronts. No front is of greater importance to the Canadian people than that which relates to energy, and the national energy board will fulfil the purpose that we have had in mind over the years.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Martin (Timmins)

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. MacEwan in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, it was pointed out that this group believes that this bill is not properly referred to in the first clause. A national energy board should be empowered to deal with energy in all forms whereas this bill establishes a national energy board in respect of the regulation of gas and oil only. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Timmins:

That clause 1 be amended by deleting the word "Energy" and substituting the words "Gas and Oil Regulatory".

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 6; nays, 108.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): I declare the amendment lost.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. McIlraith: There are so many subparagraphs to this clause that I wonder whether it is the intention of the minister to deal with them as one clause or one by one? I have some remarks on several parts of the clause. It would be more orderly if they were dealt with one by one.

Mr. Churchill: It is immaterial to me. If the Chairman would call them alphabetically it would be all right.

Subclauses (a) and (b) agreed to.

On subclause (3)—Company.

Mr. McIlraith: Can the minister make clear the origin of this definition of "company" and explain the difference in the definition from that contained in the previous legislation?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, in the Pipe Lines Act "company" is defined in section 2, subclause (b) as follows:

"Company" means a person having authority under a special act to construct or operate pipe lines for the transportation of oil or gas.

There is no change there except that we said, "To construct or operate pipe lines".

Mr. McIlraith: The point I want to make is that it appears that by adopting the definition contained in this subclause the minister is striking out any differentiation between company pipe lines and other pipe lines. Can he develop that, or explain why it has been done?

Mr. Churchill: There is no intention to make that distinction. In the Pipe Lines Act, chapter 211 of the Revised Statutes of Canada a company pipe line was defined. We dropped that and here we define a company and later we define a pipe line.

Mr. McIlraith: What I am seeking to point out is that there is a difference in the definition here from the former legislation. There was a difference between a company pipe line and a pipe line. That distinction seems to have been dropped. I am not arguing that it should or should not be dropped. I would like the minister to tell the committee why this distinction has been dropped. What is the effect of it?

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps I did not make it clear. It was a separation of the definition. The company pipe line in the Pipe Lines Act was explained rather fully, and what we have done is to split the thing, to define "company" as I read it out just a minute or two ago and then to define "pipe line" on page 2, incorporating the relevant phrases that occur in the Pipe Lines Act. It seemed to us to make it clearer to drop the expression "company pipe line".

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, the Pipe Lines Act contains a definition of the word "company", then a definition of "company pipe line" and then a definition of "pipe line". The effect of that was to have two classes of pipe lines, the company pipe line and then the other pipe lines that were included in the definition "pipe line" and which were not company pipe lines. That distinction has been dropped. There must be some reason for it.

Mr. Churchill: I think we have it clarified by the present definition, Mr. Chairman. The explanation that has been put forward is that under the old act a pipe line could include things other than the movement of oil or gas. It might be for the movement of water or salines, liquids, and things of that nature.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, before you proceed to pass the definition of "company", may I say I read this to mean that it includes a crown corporation, if one were established to operate a pipe line. Is that so?

Mr. Churchill: That appears to be correct.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, not only that but it excludes other companies that may be operating pipe lines because of the fact they were operating much earlier than the enactment of the Pipe Lines Act.

Mr. Godin: Can the minister explain how under this act a company can mean a person? No permits will be granted to companies. It would seem to me that one person is singled out in this subclause, which is definitely not the intention.

Mr. Churchill: In the Interpretation Act a person includes a company. This is just a reprint from the Pipe Lines Act.

Mr. McIlraith: No, it is not a reprint. It omits part of the definition in the Pipe Lines Act. It is not a reprint; it is a reprint of part of it.

Mr. Godin: Can the minister explain to the committee why a company would not include a corporation, and so on, which would have a licence under the legislation which we are about to pass for the Canadian people concerning the administration of energy in Canada.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder whether the hon. member would repeat that question? I missed part of it.

Mr. Godin: The clause as it now stands is not in conformity with the previous act from which apparently it comes by way of the scissors and paste method. The bill simply states that "company" means a person having authority under a special act to construct or operate pipe lines. Why should it no be more specific and indicate what bodies or entities may be considered as companies to whom we may grant permits, further extend permits, refuse permits and so on?

Mr. Churchill: I thought that the explanation of that was in what I said earlier about the Interpretation Act.

Subclause agreed to.

On subclause (d)—Export.

Mr. McIlraith: Will the minister explain the origin of this definition?

Mr. Churchill: This is the definition in the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act in so far as power is concerned and, quoting from that act, the definition of "export" is as follows:

> "Export" means
> (i) with reference to power, to send from Canada by a line of wire or other conductor.

That portion of the definition in the bill comes from the Exportation of Power and Fluids and the Importation of Gas Act.

Mr. McIlraith: I am concerned with the second part of subclause (d). I take it that is new. Is that correct?

Mr. Churchill: That is new because of the use of the word "hydrocarbons" instead of the word "fluids".

Mr. McIlraith: What I want to get some explanation of is this. Under the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas

Act the term "export" was defined, and the definition in so far as power is concerned is the same in the bill as in that act, but with reference to fluids the definition of the word "export" is wholly changed. The definition in the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act dealing with fluids reads as follows:

"Export" means—

In other words, there are two limitations there. The export of oil under these regulations was confined to the export of oil through pipe lines, and that is the only oil under control under that act. That was the point I sought to make with respect to the Prime Minister's remarks on second reading. When he addressed the house he dealt with this subject but he did not make any reference to the limitation contained in that act and, indeed, in remarks he made during the course of the debate yesterday the Minister of Public Works was guilty of the same omission.

Mr. Green: Is it not a fact that there is no export by any other means than pipe lines?

Mr. McIlraith: I am seeking to clear up what might very well be a misleading impression created by the Minister of Public Works when he stated, if I remember correctly, that there had been the right to control exports since 1907. I sought to point out by way of interjection, which, of course, is a poor way to do it, that control was limited to export through pipe lines. In other words, it was an attempt to control pipe lines and, indeed, it came into force in 1907 at a time when there was no question of export. The problem of finding markets for oil simply did not exist then. That was the point I wanted to make. I thought that the minister should clear up the matter here because otherwise it could be very misleading.

Mr. Churchill: In recent years the pipe line method of moving oil has been almost universally accepted, and as far as Canada is concerned that is the way it is moving instead of by tank car or truck. There can be export by these other means and we have made allowance for that but normally export is by pipe line.

Mr. McIlraith: The point I wish to make is that export by pipe line, of course, obviously refers only to export to the United States and by means of that one method only. The bill is sharply different. Contrary to the argument made by the Prime Minister and implied by the Minister of Public Works, the export control now sought by the minister is sharply different in that it involves export by any means. That is the whole crux of the argument. I do not see why that is not admitted and put forward in that way by the government. I do not see why there should be an attempt to be confusing with respect to it.

It is quite clear that any control or regulation with regard to the export of oil was limited by that definition to export through pipe lines which means export to the United States by one method only and that there was not control of export by tanker or any other method which would imply, of course, export to other countries and which could become important now that this country is in the fortunate position that the oil industry has developed. There is a big problem to be faced in finding markets. It is a wholly different problem and I think the minister should clear up this matter.

Mr. Green: I think the hon. member for Ottawa West misunderstood the exchange between the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and myself. He was complaining about the government taking arbitrary powers and so on and so forth and I asked him if he was not aware that since 1907 there had been control over the export of oil. That was the basis of the question and it was asked because he was criticizing us for taking control over the export of oil. Then he admitted that the former government had this control, and in effect they had control over all export of oil because oil was only exported by pipe line.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not think I can let the minister get away with that argument because in fact there was only authority to control it through pipe lines and if there was any other practical method of shipping oil to any other country by any other means it was not under control. In other words, what was sought to be controlled in 1907 was the subject of pipe lines, not the subject of the export of oil. Our problem today is quite different. We are seeking to find markets for oil. I think the minister will agree that at that time the problem arose because of the necessity for control of the export of electricity. That is the point I want to make.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, under this subclause the definition of "export" so far as hydrocarbons are concerned is unlimited, in other words, "to send from Canada by any means" but in a subsequent subclause, subclause (g) which deals with imports, the definition of "import" in its application to gas and oil is limited to specified methods of importing. Would the minister explain why this distinction was made with regard to the definitons of "export" and "import"?

Mr. Churchill: The Leader of the Opposition is quite correct. The definition has been spelled out when we are dealing with imports in subsection (g). There the idea was that if a license procedure had to be adopted for imports of oil, it would not apply to small quantities which might come in by other means than those there specified. Under the question of export and sale by any means, it was not spelled out in the same way in view of the fact that, if the control of the export of oil was under consideration, there might be substantial exports by other means —or it would include gas—not foreseen at the present time which perhaps should come under control.

Mr. Pearson: Then paragraph (d) which deals with export means that if oil were brought in by air freight it would not be subject to control because it would not be imported.

Mr. Churchill: I am not sure that the definition would apply there. There may be other methods unknown to us by which these things could be transported.

Mr. McIlraith: There is another point to be made clear with reference to export, namely that the government is seeking a sharp widening of any control there may have been in the past on two grounds. Formerly it was obvious that export control could only apply to the United States because it was through a pipe line. That is the first ground. The other is as to quantity. If by any chance they make export control regulations applicable by the act under the later section, then they are going to be controlling any quantities of oil to any country in the world. I am wondering just how far this matter has been thought through by the government and to what extent they intended so sharply to extend the export control as they are doing through this method of definition.

Mr. Churchill: I might point out that sections 82 and 83 give a certain amount of leeway here for exemptions and these exemptions could be applied in the case of small quantities or quantities that were not of any great importance. Section 85, subsection 2 indicates another exemption regulation.

Mr. McIlraith: That has to do with the regulations. The government is taking extremely wide power here and is asking for much wider power than was indicated in any of the speeches made on the second reading of this bill. It is quite true that they may say, "Maybe we will not take as wide power as we are asking for", but it is not in the act. Parliament has not passed on that matter at all. Parliament had the limitation in the earlier legislation; it does not have it at all in this legislation. Parliament had imposed its limitation in the earlier legislation; in this case parliament is asked to remove all limitations on the subject. That is the point I wish to make.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, as to the reference made by the minister to section 82 may I say this. Does not the word "exportation" in section 82 (a) refer to the definition in clause 2 (d) and therefore are we not back to the same problem?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: I was drawing attention to subsection 2 of section 82 which reads:

> (2) A licence issued under this part may be restricted or limited as to area, quantity or time or as to class or kind of products.

Mr. Godin: Surely the minister is not expecting the board more or less to over-ride the cabinet and parliament as to what they will decide in the very elementary problem of what under this act it is meant for them to govern.

Mr. Churchill: Nothing of the sort.

Mr. Godin: We do not find in the definition anything as to the responsibilities of the board. The minister refers the house to paragraph 2 of clause 82 and states that there they have more or less vague and unlimited powers to deal with areas and modes of transportation and that they will have in their own fashion the right to distinguish as to what is meant in the extremely important matter of this act.

Mr. Churchill: What I was objecting to in the hon. members' statement was this. I think he said something to the effect that the board would act without reference to parliament. If he will read section 82 again, he will notice it states "Subject to the regulations", and the regulations have to be approved, as will be seen by reference to section 85. In all instances these regulations will have to be approved by the governor in council. Hence the board is not simply given a free hand. Their authority would be spelled out in the regulations.

Mr. Godin: Is the minister indicating to the house that in the final analysis it is for the cabinet and the governor in council to decide all matters under this act?

Mr. Churchill: I do not know. If the hon. member wants to interpret it in that way it is within his rights as a matter of this house to do so; but it is not the interpretation that we put on it. Even in those acts which we are now supplanting by this one, regulations were passed spelling out some of the sections of those acts and giving instructions as to what should be done with regard to licences, fees, export, import and so on.

Mr. McIlraith: There is one other point I wish to refer in connection with clause 2 (d). I refer to the definition in (d) (ii) "with reference to hydrocarbons, to send from Canada by any means". I have dealt with the point "by any means" being an enlargement over the former provision "by pipe line". As to hydrocarbons—we shall come to that matter separately—the terms has reference to oil and gas. The former act had to do with fluids and the definition of fluids included gas, oil, water or any other fluids and so on, exported by way of pipe line. I want to ask the minister just what other fluids, if any, are exported from Canada by pipe line, whether water or otherwise. Second, I should like to ask this question. If any water is exported from Canada, a matter which was regulated under the former legislation, what provision is made for the regulation of it now? Is it being dropped from all regulations? If so, why? The point turns on the definition of the word "fluids" in the former legislation and its omission in this legislation.

Mr. Churchill: In the old act having water in there meant that licences had to be issued for saline solutions and woodpulp in aqueous suspension. These are not going to be required under this act.

Mr. McIlraith: Will they be regulated under any other federal regulations or legislation?

Mr. Churchill: That is derived from the definition of fluids under the act, a saline solution and wood pulp in aqueous suspension.

Mr. McIlraith: As I understand it, that legislation is repealed?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: Then does that mean there will be no regulatory control over such export at all?

Mr. Churchill: Not under this, because they were not sources of energy and therefore are not included here.

Mr. McIlraith: But as I understand it, that act is repealed by the new one.

Mr. Churchill: It will be.

Mr. McIlraith: The whole of that act is being repealed by the bill now before us?

Mr. Churchill: That is right.

Mr. McIlraith: I would like to find out from the minister if it is the intention of the government that such saline and wood pulp solution as now being exported by means of pipe line and under regulatory control will cease to be under regulatory control?

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Churchill: If that control is now being exercised it will cease when the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act is repealed, and it is not our intention to impose any regulatory control.

Subclause agreed to.

On subclause (e)—Gas.

Mr. McIlraith: Subclause (e) is a new definition altogether. Would the minister give an explanation of that?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, that is a new definition. It brings in temperature of 60 degrees fahrenheit and pressure. The definition of gas refers to laboratory conditions and has nothing to do with the temperatures or pressures at which such hydrocarbons are normally carried or transmitted in commerce. The principal reason for such a definition, apart from convenience and the fact that gas and oil must be separated in some way, is that it was considered desirable to control the import of propane and butane into Canada, and to do this they must be classified as gases since the bill provides for the immediate licensing of gas imports but only for the contingent licensing of oil imports. Propane and butane are normally transmitted in liquid form, but under conditions of normal temperatures and pressures are gaseous and must fall under the regulations.

Mr. McIlraith: Then I take it that the definition of gas would include propane and butane as presently transported; is that the intention?

Mr. Churchill: That is right.

Mr. McIlraith: One other question, and I am not sure whether this comes under the definition of gas or hydrocarbon. Perhaps I could leave it until we get to hydrocarbon.

Subclause agreed to.

On subclause (f)—Hydrocarbon.

Mr. McIlraith: I have two points on this. There was a pipe line company incorporated this session, but unfortunately I have forgotten the name of it at the moment. It had to do with a proposition to export certain material, if I may call it that for the moment. I think the minister will be familiar with the company I am referring to. Does the product proposed to be put through that pipe line come within the definition of either hydrocarbon or gas as defined in this legislation?

Mr. Churchill: The answer to the hon. member's question is that it is not included in this definition.

Mr. McIlraith: That is, it is not included in either the definition of gas or oil, and therefore it would not come under this legislation at all; is that right?

Mr. Churchill: Well, not at this stage. Subsequently, when we reach a clause further on in the bill I will draw attention to this and we will bring to the attention of the committee that that type of operation would come under a portion of this legislation.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I can let it go. Am I to understand from that that it is not the intention of the government that such international pipe lines should be freed from control?

Mr. Churchill: There will be a minimum of control with regard to that type of pipe line which is not carrying an energy or a source of energy. At the same time we do not want to exclude from some of the provisions of this bill certain advantages which might come to a pipe line of that sort if it came under this legislation.

Mr. McIlraith: What I want to draw to the attention of the minister at this point is that such a pipe line is in the minds of the public, at least in areas of Canada where there are no big producers of oil, in exactly the same situation as an oil or gas pipe line with all the implications that that has with respect to the public financing of the company, and so on. I am just wondering as to the wisdom of the government freeing such an operation from control, with the careful type of hearing which is giving the public protection. I refer to the type of hearing that the board of transport commissioners has been giving to these cases, and which, I presume the new board will also give to these cases. It seems to me it is an innovation which should at least have been mentioned on second reading.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is referring to the Foothills Pipe Lines Ltd., is he not?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, that is it.

Mr. Churchill: Which has been incorporated under Bill No. S-16 of the Senate of Canada. I judge that full opportunity was provided to obtain all the information which was being required with regard to the matters he has indicated in connection with the incorporation of a company of this nature.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, my concern did not have to do with the incorporation of the company at all. My concern had to do with the fact that by the definitions we are now adopting as to gas and hydrocarbon in relation to this present bill now before us we are exempting from the type of control which formerly existed under the Pipe Lines Act certain proposed very large international pipe lines dealing with the export of one of the oil industry by-products from western Canada. The implication of that is pretty serious because the whole concept at the time the Pipe Lines Act was enacted, and I think as is the intention with this bill, was to control those large interprovincial and international pipe lines. There was inherent in that legislation, as there is in this, a certain measure of protection in that the applicants had to come before a board—in the former case the board of transport commissioners, and in this case the national energy board—and give a great deal of information as to the economic soundness of their proposed operation. There is a long list of criteria which they have to prove before those boards, and as well as proving economic soundness in the sense of having a sufficient supply of the product to put through the line, and a sufficient market for it there was the requirement of this board for full information about the proposed method of financing so that anyone really concerned could find out exactly what the method of financing a line was to be—how much was to be debentured and bond debt, and how much was to consist of other types of capital; what the equity capital was and so on.

By taking such pipe lines outside the operation of the act we are really being asked to embark on a wholly new policy. I am wondering whether the government has considered this point and if it is really what the government intends. If this is the intention of the government, then nothing was said either on the resolution stage or on second reading which would indicate that this was the case. As a matter of fact the Prime Minister and the minister himself speaking on second reading both indicated that they were seeking to control all the energy sources. I think the subject is of sufficient importance to warrant a clear statement from the minister and, if I may take the liberty of making the suggestion to him, perhaps he would indicate the clause of the bill where there is any authority of the kind he suggests. We might then discuss the subject better when we come to that clause.

Mr. Churchill: When we come to clause 62 I will make an explanation with regard to this subject. But dealing with the hon. member's first point, may I say that we are dealing here with sources of energy. That is why we have limited this to gas, oil and electricity. The hon. member is quite right in saying that we have not in this legislation continued a form of control, or intended to do so, over other types of pipe lines. I am not sure whether the hon. member is advocating that control should be extended to pipe lines dealing with materials which are not sources of energy or energy in themselves.

I grant that there have been developments in pipe line construction. There are experiments going on in the United States where other materials are being carried by pipe lines, notably coal and wood chips, and it may well be that other materials may in course of time be carried great distances on the North American continent by pipe lines. But we have not reached that stage in Canada yet, and we are not suggesting control of pipe lines presently under construction or earlier constructed other than matters dealing with energy and sources of energy—gas, oil and the power lines for electricity.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not know if the minister's explanation is sufficiently precise. A water pipe line is, of course, a pipe line dealing with a source of energy. I do not think it is good enough to leave the subject in this way. There is provision now for the control of such pipe lines and, increasingly, this is becoming a method of transporting water. The method has grown in use in the last few years since it has become so much easier to obtain pipes of large diameter and to construct large sized pipe lines. I think the minister might give some consideration over the dinner hour as to whether or not he should clarify the subject a little further. What he has done is to cut down the control over large pipe lines, interprovincial and international, and to eliminate several classes of pipe lines from control. There was no indication of this being done either on the resolution stage or during second reading and I think the committee should be given precise information on this point.

Mr. Churchill: I would be interested if the hon. member could give me instances of these pipe lines which he mentions. I made mention of two which are excepted under this legislation—saline solution was one, and the other was wood pulp in aqueous suspension. What other pipe lines has the hon. gentleman in mind? I do not know that my explanation could be clearer. We are not exercising control over pipe lines which are not carrying sources of energy.

Mr. McIlraith: You have excepted water.

Mr. Churchill: Can the hon. member give me an instance of a water pipe line which is used for crossing an international boundary in order to develop energy?

Mr. McIlraith: No, I cannot at the moment but I think I am entitled to get that information from the minister because he is the one submitting this legislation for repeal.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Churchill: I have no knowledge of any such pipe lines crossing an international boundary and no knowledge of any prospect of such pipe lines being constructed for the purpose of developing energy.

Mr. McIlraith: If the minister means to tell me, when he says he has no knowledge, that he has checked the point and found out that there are none being licensed through his department I am satisfied, but if he has not—

Mr. Churchill: It has been checked through the department and my officials assure me that my statement is correct.

Mr. Robichaud: Can the minister tell the committee whether the transport of wood pulp in aqueous state through pipe lines is at present governed by these regulations or whether any other regulations now cover such exports?

Mr. Churchill: It will not come under this legislation.

Mr. Robichaud: It will be under this legislation?

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Robichaud: Will it be covered by any legislation at all?

Mr. Churchill: It may be, under provincial authority.

Mr. Robichaud: An international boundary? I have an example from Edmunston where there is a pipe line carrying pulp in bulk into Maine. Under what regulation is this export allowed?

Mr. Churchill: We may be at cross purposes. Is the hon. member suggesting that we should control that type of operation? I did not see that there was any purpose in maintaining whatever control there may have been in the past.

Mr. Robichaud: I was asking the minister if such operations would be under control.

Mr. Churchill: The answer is: no.

Mr. McIlraith: On a new point altogether, the definition in the Pipe Lines Act is quite different with respect to oil and gas. It is quite broad. The new definition of hydrocarbon reads:

> "Hydrocarbon" means any chemical compound composed exclusively of carbon and hydrogen.

The point I am making deals with the use of this word "exclusively". It seems to me that that is indeed a very narrow limitation to put on crude oil and oil in certain other states of processing. I wonder if the minister could give us an explanation?

Mr. Churchill: I am just wondering whether the word "substantially" might have been clearer than the word "exclusively" because this is not intended to rule out impurities.

Mr. McIlraith: I am wondering about the definition. Unless there is some explanation it seems to me that it rules out a great many of the crude oils in Canada and I am sure that was not the intention. For instance, there are some areas where there is a very high sulphur content in the chemical compound. This would rule it out if there were any sulphur content at all. Would the minister agree to let the clause stand until we come to the end and then deal with it again? I believe it is something that should be looked at again.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you. We shall have a look at it and see if it cannot be modified.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Does the committee agree that subclause (f) stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Subclause stands.

On subclause (g)—Import.

Mr. Dumas: The first part of this subclause seems to be the same as found in the definition in the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of the Gas Act but part 2 of the subclause seems to be entirely new. It reads:

(ii) with reference to oil, to bring oil into Canada through pipe lines, by railway tank car, by tank truck or by tanker;

This does not appear to cover the question of oil transported by aircraft, by barges or in oil drums. The amount transported by aircraft I should think would be very small but transportation by barges or in oil drums may be considerable. Would it be possible to make a small amendment to include the words "by any other means"?

Mr. McIlraith: That is too wide, is it not? That would include manufactured products transported by truck.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member has pointed out the difficulty one experiences in trying to spell out these questions. Another suggestion would be to amend part 2 of the subclause to read:

(ii) with reference to oil, to bring oil into Canada—

Let it stop there. That inferentially would include "by any other means", would it not?

Mr. Dumas: Perhaps the minister would agree to having the clause stand for the time being. I appreciate the difficulty involved in these matters. "By any other means," may be too wide.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister cannot use that language because he then would be regulating the control of all penetrating oils in cans, lighter fluids and other things with which I am sure it was not the intention to deal in drafting the definition of "import".

My objection to the subject of the control of the import of oil still stands but I think it could be more appropriately dealt with under the clause dealing with imports rather than under the definition clause. I do not want this committee to conclude that in letting the definition of the word "imports" go by I am in any way weakening the position I have taken on the subject of the control being asked for by the minister over the importation of oil without the minister having given us an explanation as to why there should be control of the import of oil at this time. I want to make that perfectly clear.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, we would like to reserve our right to discuss any question relating to oil under clause 87 when it is reached, even if the present subclause under discussion is passed later.

Mr. Churchill: That is quite all right. I appreciate the interest of hon. members in this definition clause because it is important to get it right. On the other hand with regard to these interpretation clauses we will be dependent upon experience as the board operates over the year. There may be other changes that will come forward not only now but in subsequent months. Unless the hon. member for Villeneuve wants to press the point, perhaps we could pass subclause (g) at this stage.

Mr. McIlraith: We will have to let the clause stand until eight o'clock in any event.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Does the committee consent to allow subclause (g) to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Subclause stands.

Subclauses (h) to (k) inclusive agreed to.

On subject subclause (l)—"Oil."

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps we could let this stand for the time being. I think it could carry depending upon what is done with (m). Could it stand over without discussion for the moment?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Does the committee agree to let subclause (l) stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Subclause stands.

National Energy Board

On subclause (m)—"Pipe line."

Mr. McIlraith: At this point may I ask for a fuller explanation for the reason for dropping the distinction between "pipe line" and "company pipe line"?

Mr. Churchill: It may be that we will get the law officer here who drafted the bill to explain this to the satisfaction of hon. members opposite. When we were going over this earlier we had not anticipated this particular problem. Although it may appear clear to us nevertheless we could perhaps have a fuller explanation when the law officer is present after eight o'clock.

Mr. McIlraith: There are one or two possible explanations I can think of but I do not believe there is any point in putting them on the record. There was a clear distinction under the Pipe Lines Act and now there is an elimination of this distinction. From a careful reading of the bill I am not fully clear as to the government's reason for eliminating that distinction. It is clear why the distinction existed originally but it is not clear as to why it was eliminated. Perhaps we could let it stand.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Does the committee agree to stand this subclause?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Subclause stands.

Subclauses (n) and (o) agreed to.

On subclause (p)—Secretary.

Mr. McIlraith: I notice it is intended to appoint the secretary by the governor in council rather than through the commission. Is there any reason for that? Frequently, the members of the board are appointed by the governor in council but I notice in this case the secretary is appointed by the governor in council.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder whether that question could be held over until we reach clause 8 (1), which deals with the appointment of the secretary, rather than discuss it on the interpretation section?

Subclause agreed to.

On subclause (q)—Special Act.

Mr. Drysdale: The interpretation section of the Pipe Lines Act states:

> In this act and in any special act—

And then it proceeds to incorporate those definitions into the special act. I am wondering by what means those definitions are incorporated in the special act?

Mr. Churchill: I do not recognize a difference from the earlier act which reads:

> "Special act" means an act of the parliament of Canada that authorizes a person named in the act to construct or operate pipe lines—

And so on.

Mr. Drysdale: It states: "In this act", then it proceeds to go on with various definitions. In the Pipe Lines Act we find this:

> In this act and in any special act,

The following definitions shall have this meaning. Clause 80 of the bill we are discussing defines "special act", and it states that the special act shall be taken to override the provisions of this legislation. What I was wondering was whether any provision had been made to have those definitions the same as the ones used in the special act; in other words, the same words have the same meaning as in the special act. As I read it, there is no provision for the special act.

Mr. Churchill: In order to get a satisfactory answer for my hon. friend I think we shall have to get the draftsmen here to explain that because again there is some special meaning that has to be drawn from this clause.

Mr. Drysdale: The reason I raise it, Mr. Chairman, is that in the Pipe Lines Act they went so far as to say in section 2:

> Unless it is otherwise provided, words and phrases in this act or in a special act have the same meaning as in the Railway Act.

Apparently there is nothing to cover the special words used in the special act.

Mr. Churchill: What is intended here is an addition of what my hon. friend was asking for, following subclause (q), an addition which would repeat subsection 2 of the interpretation section of the oil and gas Pipe Lines Act. It would not alter anything that is now written in lines 24 to 30; it would be an addition to those. We shall be reverting to the interpretation section after the supper adjournment and I shall have an answer for the hon. member then.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Shall subclause (q) carry?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Subclause (q) stands.

On subclause (r)—Toll.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, is there any change in this new definition? Is it the same as the definition in the Pipe Lines Act?

Mr. Churchill: The change is hydrocarbons for oil and gas.

Mr. McIlraith: There is another change.

Mr. Dumas: I thought the word "transportation" appeared before. It has been deleted and replaced.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, and the word "rate" appears. It reads: "Toll, rate". In the old act the word "transportation" appeared. It has been deleted and replaced by the word "transmission".

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, in view of the practice in this industry of referring to the transmission of gas and the transportation of oil and the provision existing in many of the regulations on the subject and in some of the judgments of the board of transport commissioners having to do with the transportation of oil through pipe lines, I wonder why this change was made in the use of the word transportation and its replacement by the word "transmission" as applied to oil?

Mr. Churchill: It was considered that it was a more exact use of the English language to use the word "transmission" when the reference to toll is to a pipe line and the oil is transmitted through a pipe line rather than transported.

Mr. McIlraith: I would point out to the minister—I hope he will not misunderstand me—that I just question the latter part of his explanation. I think he will find in many of the reasons for judgments in the pipe line cases that the reference is to the transportation of oil. The word "transmission" was always used in putting gas through a pipe line, the transmission of gas through pipe lines, but transportation of oil by pipe line is the phrase that was used. The word "transportation" was used in that connotation. By the complete elimination of the word "transportation" this change is going to mean that those judgments, when read by persons who are not familiar with the history of the change, will have a different meaning altogether. This is the possible consequence of it.

Mr. Churchill: If any misunderstanding should arise in that connection I see no objection to putting the word "transportation" back into the definition. The word "transmission" could be there as well.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder whether the minister would take it up with his own departmental law officers? There is something there that should be looked at.

Mr. Churchill: All right.

Subclause (r) stands.

Mr. McIlraith: Before we leave this subclause I want to ask the minister why there is no definition of "energy" here? Perhaps I should point out what the weakness is in not having a definition of energy in clause 2, in relation to later portions of the bill which charge the board with certain duties to study and keep under review the subject of energy. Energy covers a wide field including such things as the burning of wood, the burning of alcohol and the burning of waste chemicals. You can go far afield. Sawmills are run by the burning of sawdust. The sources of energy are very wide indeed in the industrial life of Canada. Later in the bill the board is charged with very heavy responsibilities and duties concerning the subject of energy but the word "energy" has not been defined. I respectfully suggest to the minister that this can lead into all sorts of unforseen difficulties.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Dumas: No, Mr. Chairman, we are on clause 2.

Mr. McIlraith: Is the minister going to deal with the point I raised about a definition of energy?

Mr. Churchill: As a matter of fact, I was looking at the clock opposite me which shows it is after six o'clock and I thought the reply might well be given after the supper hour.

Mr. Drysdale: Before we adjourn, I wonder whether the minister would consider over the supper hour if there is any particular reason for omitting the definition of "lands" which was included in the Pipe Lines Act?

Mr. McIlraith: That is the next point I was coming to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Order. It is five minutes to six according to the Clerk's watch. Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. McIlraith: No. We are on clause 2. We are still discussing clause 2.

Mr. Dumas: We did not carry clause 2.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, two of the three clocks show that it is after six o'clock so we have a majority.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): The house in committee of the whole on Bill No.

C-49, an act to provide for the establishment of a national energy board. Is it the wish of the committee to revert to subclause (f) of clause 2?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On subclause (f)—"Hydrocarbon".

Mr. Churchill: There was a question concerning this subclause as to the need for the expression "exclusively" and whether or not "substantially" might be substituted therefor. However, on consultation with the people who have knowledge of chemical compound, I am informed that "substantially" would change the meaning very much and that you might have a chemical compound composed substantially of carbon and hydrogen and which might have sugar and alcohol as part of it. The word "exclusively" makes sure that it shall be of carbon and hydrogen and that the impurities which might occur with the hydrocarbon are not part chemically of the compound. Consequently the word "exclusively" is required in that subsection.

Subclause agreed to.

On subclause (g)—"Import".

Mr. Churchill: With reference to subclause (g), there was a suggestion that in the second part of it, where we speak of pipe lines, railway tank car, tank truck or tanker, there might be other means of bringing oil into Canada. The example that was given was that of drums of oil transported by barge. It does not seem to be essential that that should be included because it is an uneconomic way of transporting oil nowadays.

Mr. Dumas: Do I understand the minister to say that there is no objection, that oil can be transported by barges?

Mr. Churchill: We thought it would not be necessary to place a control on oil that comes in in drums on these barges.

Mr. Dumas: For what reason?

Mr. Churchill: It is an unusual method of bringing it in and an uneconomical method when pipe lines are available.

Mr. Robichaud: In other words, if that were done it would not come under this regulation?

Mr. Churchill: That is right.

Mr. McIlraith: Is that as to oil brought in by barge in bulk form? A barge is not a tanker. They are in use now and of course are not included in the definition.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Shall subclause (g) carry?

[The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan).]

Mr. McIlraith: Before it carries I should like to know whether that is the minister's answer.

Mr. Churchill: Yes; not to bring it under control. We do not see the necessity for it.

Mr. McIlraith: I am somewhat curious. What is the reason for that? If you put it into a tanker with power in it to drive the tanker, it is under control. If you put it in a barge behind separate motor power, it is not under control. If the minister is satisfied with it, I am.

Subclause agreed to.

On subclause (l)—"Oil".

Mr. Robichaud: The minister was supposed to give us an explanation.

Mr. Churchill: Subclause (l) was dependent on the explanation with regard to subclause (f) and I have dealt with that subclause.

Subclause agreed to.

On subclause (m)—"Pipe Line".

Mr. Churchill: There was some discussion here with regard to dropping the expression "company pipe line" and using for that expression just the phrase "pipe line". In the oil and gas Pipe Lines Act the words "company pipe line" were used. We find that "pipe line" is sufficient. Referring to the pipe lines connecting a province with any other or extending beyond the limits of the province where it has been necessary to use the other expression "line" as you might find in section 76 (1), subclause (b), we simply use the expression "line for the transmission of hydrocarbons or power". It is merely a simplification and the use of fewer words to give the same meaning.

Mr. McIlraith: In the Pipe Lines Act there was a real distinction between the company pipe lines and pipe lines other than company pipe lines. It was defined in that way for a purpose in that act. Is the minister indicating that the new legislation no longer requires a distinction? Is that his point?

Mr. Churchill: Yes. That is the intention.

Subclause agreed to.

On subclause (q)—"Special Act".

Mr. Drysdale: I believe the minister had an explanation of this section.

Mr. Churchill: The question was raised here as to the addition of subsection 2 of section 2 of the Pipe Lines Act which reads as follows:

(2) Unless it is otherwise provided, words and phrases in this act or in a special act have the same meaning as in the Railway Act.

In the Pipe Lines Act there may have been a need to refer back to the Railway Act for the meaning of the various words. In this act we have defined the words we use. There is no need to refer back to the Railway Act for any of the meanings. The definitions are here. That is why that subsection 2 was not incorporated in this act.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister missed the point I was trying to get at. Section 2 of the Pipe Lines Act contains the words "in this act or in a special act" and it goes on to provide the various definitions whereas under the present act section 80 provides that a special act shall over-ride all the provisions in this act, which would also have the effect of over-riding the definition section. The thing that worries me as a lawyer is this. I do not want to be obliged to litigate over definitions when there is no provision for them under the special act.

Mr. Churchill: I was perhaps referring to another section.

Mr. Drysdale: That is supplementary to section 2.

Mr. Churchill: If my hon. friend will refer to section 80 which deals with the construing of special acts he will find that we have dealt with that matter quite separately.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Shall subclause (q) carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. That is a good point.

Mr. Drysdale: I do not think we have had an explanation, Mr. Chairman. I am not trying to labour the point. But if the bill is accurate, as it is, I feel there should be a logical explanation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Winch: May I point out to the minister that section 80 does not cover what he has referred to.

Mr. Drysdale: In my opinion, section 80 has the effect of over-riding the whole act. In other words, the special act completely over-rides this general act on energy. It therefore means that any of the words which are used in this subclause (q) cannot be interpreted in the special act in the same terms as they are interpreted under the energy act. I feel that is fundamental, and if it is not corrected we are running into difficulties because you have no interpretation for these terms under the special act.

Mr. Winch: How do you reconcile the two?

Mr. Churchill: There is a difference of opinion here. We were not reading it that way. We were reading clause 80, subclause (a)—

—this act shall be construed as incorporate with a special act—

Which I thought covered that point, but my hon. friend does not see it that way.

Mr. Drysdale: As I understand it, clause 80 is in part V dealing with oil pipe lines.

Mr. Churchill: That is right.

Mr. Drysdale: This general definition section applies to the entire act, and clause 80 overrides the whole interpretation section. Therefore you have nothing to interpret the words used in a special act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member does not think that "special act" in (q) would refer to the act covered by the implications in clause 80; is that his point?

Mr. Drysdale: Yes. My contention on that basis is that under the Pipe Lines Act it refers to "in this act and in any special act", and it then goes on to define "special act" in subsection (h) in exactly the same way as you are defining it in subclause (q). I am not trying to cause any unnecessary difficulties, but I do not want to see the legislation enacted and then have to come back again.

Mr. McIlraith: It should be sent to a standing committee.

Mr. Churchill: I would welcome further argument with regard to this point. Perhaps I am not following my hon. friend, but I do not quite see the difficulty.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could explain it this way. Under the Pipe Lines Act, section 2 (l) starts off, "In this act and in any special act". Then it goes on to set out the various interpretation sections, including the special act definition which is used in this particular bill. Then as I understand it, if you look at the legislation, part V is practically taking out the Pipe Lines Act and putting it into the energy bill. Clause 80 of the energy bill says that a special act shall in effect supersede all the legislation contained in this section, and there is no definition in part V. The only definitions are at the beginning of this particular bill. Therefore on my interpretation there is no definition under the special act legislation or under the special act.

Mr. Churchill: This is quite a neat point. The way we were reading the bill was that the interpretation clause of the bill starts off with, "In this act", and that is followed in clause 80, and our conclusion was that the interpretation clause here in the bill would apply throughout.

Mr. Drysdale: Clause 80 (b) says:

—where the provisions of this part and a special act relate to the same subject matter, the provisions of the special act shall, in so far as is necessary to give effect to the special act, be taken to override the provisions of this act.

But there is nothing to cover the definitions of these particular clauses being incorporated into the special act. In other words, there must have been some reason for putting it in the pipeline legislation stating, "In this act and in any special act".

Mr. Winch: It does not make sense as it is now.

Mr. Churchill: Does the hon. member want to hold over (q) for further consideration, or is he suggesting some additional words being incorporated?

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I thought perhaps the words used in the pipe line legislation would cover it, namely, "In this act and in any special act".

Mr. Roberge: The pipe line legislation was good and quite clear.

Mr. Churchill: If that satisfies my hon. friend, we have no objection to incorporating clause 2, following the word "act", "and in any special act", which are the words in the present Pipe Lines Act.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I am not trying to force an interpretation upon the committee, and if it is adequately covered and these definitions can apply to special act provisions, I will be satisfied. But to date I have not been satisfied, and if it should be considered further I am content with that.

Mr. Churchill: I am prepared to let it stand and will give further consideration to my hon. friend's suggestion.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Is the committee agreed that subclause (q) will stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Subclause stands.

On subclause (r)—Toll.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the minister had some comment to make on this subclause.

Mr. Churchill: The question arose whether the word "transportation" should have been retained rather than the word "transmission" substituted. The opinion of the law officers is that "transmission" is satisfactory and somewhat more exact.

Mr. McIlraith: I would like to point out that over the recess I was able to check some copies of special acts I have, some 31 of them, and in all cases I checked the language used was "transportation of oil and transmission of gas" in relation to this subject. In the judgments or orders of the board of transport commissioners—I have some ten of them which I had an opportunity of checking—they referred to the transportation of oil. My recollection is that in all the years I have been dealing with this subject the reference has always been to the transportation of oil by pipe lines and the transmission of gas by pipe lines. That being the case, and bearing in mind that all the judgments or orders of the board of transport commissioners and other memoranda they put out on this subject seemed to use that language, I am wondering about the wisdom of changing it unless there is some good reason. I am not prepared to defend the language as a matter of purity of English, but it is certainly the only language used heretofore in this context, namely of transporting oil through pipe lines.

Mr. Churchill: I think one of the reasons for the change, in addition to having a more exact expression, has been that we referred to the transmission of hydrocarbons, and by definition hydrocarbons include oil and gas. Thus we would be in difficulty with regard to the word "transportation", and the hon. gentleman would be arguing the opposite way.

Mr. McIlraith: My point is that they should both be in, otherwise these judgments in these oil cases become confusing. If the minister would look at the judgment of the board of transport commissioners in the oil cases he would find that in all cases reference is made to the transportation of oil and in the case of gas the word "transmission" is used. It seems to me they should both be in.

Mr. Churchill: I think it would be an easy matter to put the word "transportation" back in, and then we would have them both.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Is it agreeable to the committee that the subclause read "shipment, transportation and transmission", etc.

Mr. Green: The suggestion of the minister was that it should read: "shipment, transportation, transmission" and so forth.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Is that proposal agreeable to the committee?

Amendment agreed to.

Subclause as amended agreed to.

Mr. McIlraith: Before we turn to clause 3, there were two other matters outstanding with regard to clause 2. The first had to do with the omission of any definition of the word "energy", and the omission is significant in the light of the use of the word "energy" in the latter part of the bill.

Mr. Churchill: That is right. I was asked why energy is not defined. It is used in the bill only in clause 22 in the part dealing with the advisory functions of the board. It was thought wise not to limit it by definition. There can be no misunderstanding of the subjects with which the board will be dealing as it continues its study and review of matters pertaining to energy and sources of energy. Sources of energy not now in use may be discovered or developed as time goes on, and there seems to be no necessity therefore to define and, by that means, to limit the meaning of "energy".

Mr. McIlraith: On that point, I draw the attention of the minister to the fact that clause 22 is mandatory. It charges the board with the responsibility of studying and keeping under review matters concerning energy and sources of energy in Canada. There are a great many sources of energy in Canada which I am sure it is not the government's intention that the board should be obliged to study and keep under review. That is the difficulty into which the minister is heading by omitting to define the term "energy".

Mr. Churchill: I think that although the board is expected to study these matters and keep them under review it will not in its wisdom devote time and effort to unproductive subjects. I think we can trust the board to relate its work to what is generally understood by the words "sources of energy" and "energy".

Mr. McIlraith: The point I am making is that the board has no opportunity to exercise its wisdom in this respect. The legislation charges it with the responsibility to study and keep under review matters relating to energy and sources of energy. The board has no discretion to exclude certain sources of energy from its considerations. It has no authority for excluding them. That is the consequence of proceeding without a definition of the word "energy". I think it is reasonably clear from the course of this debate so far that the minister and the government have in mind that these studies shall pertain to certain well known sources of energy—oil, gas, coal, atomic energy and so on.

Mr. Churchill: What was in our minds was that the regulatory functions of the board would relate to electricity, gas and oil. But the study and review would relate to energy and sources of energy, and the board could range as widely afield as it wished, the purpose being that it should inform itself with reference to these matters and be in a position to advise the government. We did not wish to place any restrictions on the board in this connection and we leave it to the judgment of the board as to the intensity of their study and the extent of their review in any particular direction.

Mr. McIlraith: My point is that the board is not left with any discretion in the matter. Following the minister's argument, either clause 22 must be changed or there must be a definition of "energy". The board cannot keep under review only those sources of energy which it thinks best deserve study. The hon. gentleman must either define the word "energy" or adopt the recommendation of the Borden commission relating to clause 22. He cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Churchill: I do not see the matter in quite the same light as the hon. gentleman. There is an opportunity for the board to use its discretion. Part (2) of clause 22 states:

> The board shall, at the request of the minister, prepare studies and reports on any matter relating to energy or sources of energy.

These would be matters to which they had already given study and which they had had under review, but more detail might be required by the government.

Mr. McIlraith: Paragraph (2) of clause 22 is discretionary, and the discretion lies with the minister. But paragraph (1) of clause 22 is mandatory and requires the board to include all energy and all sources of energy in its studies.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps we might take the example of solar energy which has been mentioned during the debate. Solar energy has not yet advanced through the stage of experimentation to the point where it is competitive with other fuel sources. The board will take cognizance of what is being done in relation to the harnessing of solar energy, but would not need to spend too much time on it at this stage. It will keep itself informed of what is happening and advise the government accordingly. Surely there is room here for the board to decide, in its wisdom, which subjects should receive long and detailed study, and which subjects should be given more limited consideration.

Mr. Pearson: I think this is a matter of some importance and it may well be that if it is not dealt with now in this legislation it will cause confusion and difficulty later. Because we are not defining "energy", and because we are making it mandatory in a clause of this bill that the board shall keep under review all sources of energy we may leave the board in some doubt as to the extent of its obligation.

Practically everything is a source of energy, but surely the board is not obliged to keep all the various sources of energy under review. Someone over here has just remarked that cod liver oil is a source of energy, and so it is, but that is obviously not something which is in the mind of the hon. gentleman as a subject for study by the board. I think it is desirable to clear this matter up so that there may be no question of confusion.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The terms of reference of the Borden commission contained in order in council No. 1386 at page 90 of the report of the commission state, in part, as follows:

> That, in as much as Canada has within its boundaries large sources of energy in the form of gas, oil, coal, water and uranium, the increasing need of energy for the growing industrial requirements of Canada renders it of the greatest importance to assure the most effective use of those resources in the public interest;

Whether or not the government sees fit to accept or implement the recommendations of the commission, surely that reference in the terms under which the commission was set up makes it imperative that the word "energy" be defined in this bill. Would the minister not agree with that?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, who is to determine what other sources of energy may come into use in the future and which may have the greatest importance? That is why we feel this should be left broad to allow the board through its technical branch and in its own wisdom to decide what sources of energy should be kept under intensive study.

In addition to that reference is made to the board studying and keeping under review questions of this kind. The board would maintain what is sometimes called a rolling inventory of the sources of energy in Canada so we may look far ahead and see whether the emphasis should be placed on one source of energy or another at varying times.

Mr. McIlraith: Dealing with the minister's remarks, who is to say the sources of energy that are to be affected? Parliament is saying now that the board shall do a certain thing. Parliament is making it mandatory that the board shall do certain things; in effect, keep under study and review sources of energy in Canada. That is what we are asking to be defined. And then, the minister has a discretion under subclause 2 of clause 22. That clause, by its nature, is discretionary in the minister so that if new sources of energy are brought into being in the future the minister has the discretion under that clause to have the board study them and keep them under review. That argument does not apply to subclause 1 which is mandatory and absolute in form.

Mr. Denis: The Tory party is a great source of energy.

Mr. Churchill: An inexhaustible source of energy.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, before the dinner recess I asked the minister if there was any reason for omitting the definition of "lands" which was in the Pipe Lines Act and is not included in this bill. Could the minister comment at this time?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I looked at that over the supper adjournment. It seemed not necessary to include it. It does not appear to be needed in this bill. If you read clauses 66 and 67 where it speaks of lands vested in Her Majesty and lands in an Indian reserve, you would see that the definition in the Pipe Lines Act would obviously be unnecessary and would not apply.

Clause stands.

On clause 3—Board established.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this is the clause which deals with the establishment of the board. I was going to ask the minister if in the consideration that has been given to this legislation consideration was given to the establishment not of a board but of a special department of the government under a separate minister to deal with energy questions. I know a great deal could be said for or against this possibility but as the minister knows in some governments there is such a department. In the government of Ontario there is a department of energy under a separate ministry and the government of the United Kingdom has what I believe is called a ministry of fuel and power.

I was wondering if the minister and the government had considered that solution to the problem of governmental control of energy questions in their considerations of this matter.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, some attention was paid to that matter but we thought that everything that was desired from the standpoints of the national interest, efficient operation and the responsibilities of the government would be served by the establishment of a national energy board rather than through a government department.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, subclause (1) of clause 3 reads as follows:

There shall be a board, to be called the national energy board, consisting of five members to be appointed by the governor in council.

It might also be pointed out that recommendation No. 22 of the Borden commission suggests that the board should consist of not less than three and not more than five members. I think this committee has a right to know why five members were selected. After all, the scope and powers of the board being constituted under Bill No. C-49 are rather limited. We also remember that this government pledged itself to avoid waste and extravagance.

Furthermore, clause 13 of this bill provides that the board may delegate to one or more of its members, either jointly or severally, all or any of the powers, functions and duties of the board under this bill with certain exceptions that are specified. It will cover more than 75 of the 101 clauses of this bill. I therefore move:

That subsection (1) of section 3 of Bill C-49 be replaced by the following:

"3(1) There shall be a board, to be called the national energy board, consisting of three members to be appointed by the governor in council."

Mr. Drysdale: What are you going to do about clause 6 where three is specified as a quorum?

Mr. Pearson: All other consequential changes would have to be made.

Mr. Churchill: Recommendation No. 22 of the Borden commission has to be considered in relation to other recommendations of that report. They were thinking in terms of continuing the board of transport commissioners and setting up in addition to that an energy board. That is why the suggestion was made of three and not more than five.

Our conclusion was that it would be wiser to have an energy board and to transfer to it the functions now performed by the board of transport commissioners in this regard and that a membership of five would be suitable for that purpose.

Concerning the other statement the hon. member has made, he has misinterpreted the clause to which he referred. It will be seen when we come to it that it is subject to exceptions. The delegation to which the hon. member referred relates only to minor functions of the board and the clauses that are excluded from that contain the major functions that the board performs.

Certainly of the 101 clauses there are a great many under which a single member might be asked to act because they are matters where the board is not involved in an immediate decision but are exploratory.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the committee will not agree that, notwithstanding his good intentions, the minister has really not dealt with the suggestion on its merits, that instead of a board of five there should be a board of three in accordance with the recommendation made by the Borden commission.

The Prime Minister told us, I think the day before yesterday, that since becoming Prime Minister he had been surprised to find out how difficult it was to persuade good and competent people to leave their private occupations and take on responsibilities of this kind. If there was much merit in the observation of the Prime Minister, that argument ought to be rather convincing in the context of the situation that is now before the committee. In addition to this, the minister has the example of the unemployment insurance commission of three members, a body that administers a very large fund and has very many heavy administrative responsibilities. I think the board of broadcast governors is limited to three but there is a large executive committee. I may be wrong in this one but my impression is that there are three consisting of Dr. Stewart and two others and they are assisted by a large executive committee. It would seem to me that, in addition to the reasons given by the hon. member for Gloucester, there is the third argument of efficiency and of preventing unnecessary expenditure, the great purpose to which this government was dedicated certainly in the days of elections and presumably in the days of actual responsibility not so much so.

I suggest to the minister that this is a good suggestion and that in the absence of a satisfactory explanation as to why it should not be accepted the minister should accept it. He has the opportunity at the moment of explaining, in addition to the reasons he has already given, further reasons, but unless he can establish clearly the necessity of having five members it seems to me it is not unreasonable to accept this suggestion. The consequential changes that will be required in the remaining subclauses of the clause can be dealt with simply by editorial revisions. They do not involve any fundamental obstacle to the suggestion as made that we ought to follow the pattern with regard to bodies of this sort that the federal government has established. Commissions of three have worked well. They provide for adequate representation of occupational interests, and I strongly suggest that the minister will find it not as difficult to appoint three as five if we are to take seriously the observations made by the Prime Minister. In any event, the minister owes us a much more complete reply than that which he has given.

Mr. Churchill: I am very happy to add to the explanation that I gave earlier. In the first place, let me point out and repeat that the Borden commission did not limit the number to three. It suggested three and not more than five. Second, the energy board will deal with one of the greatest industrial developments in Canada. The oil and gas industry is in its infancy and the whole development of energy and sources of energy in Canada is on the threshold of great advances. This board will be heavily engaged in dealing with one of the most vital parts of the Canadian economy. To limit the board to three members might incapacitate it from performing its function fully because there is always the chance of a member being away or ill. There is also the necessity for this board to do a certain amount of travelling throughout Canada and to hold hearings in various parts of the country. Furthermore, my hon. friend talks about having a board of three. He overlooks the fact that the board of transport commissioners is a board of six members. I do not recall that during his term in office he suggested that it be reduced for the purpose of economy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is no comparison.

Mr. Churchill: I do not recall his suggesting that it be reduced to three. We think this energy board will be as fully and actively employed as the board of transport commissioners. Consequently, the figure of five seems suitable in the circumstances.

There are other reasons which might be advanced to persuade my hon. friend of the weakness of his argument. I am glad he recognizes that we are interested in economical operations, but there can sometimes be false economy when you do not provide the proper number of people to carry out a job of major importance. From the experience of our friends across the border we know the difficulties they have had in an industry which has grown by leaps and bounds in that country, and which will grow by leaps and bounds in Canada. The work of the energy board will become increasingly onerous as the years go by.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I think we all agree as to the importance of the oil and gas industry in the economy of Canada but the point is this: How do we get the most efficient board in relation to the duties it will have to perform? That is the question before the committee at the moment. I point out to the minister that in his reference to the board of transport commissioners he did not really deal with the point at all. That board, consisting of six members, has responsibility under some 21 acts of parliament. If the minister would read the memorandum put out by the board of transport commissioners for Canada, a review of its constitution, jurisdiction and practice, he would see that that board has had to deal with the jurisdiction over railway applications, the very large question of freight rates in this country, a large question, indeed, as most western and eastern members will agree. Then, it has to deal with the lake shipping under the Transport Act; it has to deal with the tolls of telephone companies; it has certain jurisdiction under that legislation. It has had to deal with pipe line applications. In other words, it has covered all those fields I have mentioned in addition to certain subsidiary ones.

The legislation before us deals with certain pipe line companies. It was made clear before six o'clock that it does not deal with all of them, which is something a little less than the pipe line cases the board of transport commissioners was dealing with. But if we assume it is the same, that bit of the board of transport commissioners work required six full-time members. I suggest to the minister that if he wants an efficient board he wants a board that will be fully occupied. I suggest to him that he will more closely approximate that if he has three members rather than five.

Mr. McPhillips: We will not appoint an undertaker as you did to the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Pearson: A new source of energy.

Mr. McIlraith: I am not quite clear as to what the interjection means; I admit my inability fully to understand it but I will let it go by and deal with the point before the committee. It seems to me that by setting up a board that will merely be a proliferation of appointees you are not going to get the type of members for that board which we all hope you will get. It is an unnecessary waste and duplication and I think the wrong way of approaching the thing. Certainly if it is only going to have jurisdiction over a very small part of the duties now performed by the board of transport commissioners there is no reason for five members.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, the clause now under consideration provides for the appointment of five members to the national energy board.

The board of transport commissioners is made up of six members who have to deal, among other things, with the matter of pipe lines.

In its report, the Borden commission recommended the appointment of three or five members.

Our Conservative friends, during their election campaigns, came out strongly against extravagance and waste.

It is now obvious, according to the bill under consideration, that for some years, this board that we are asked to establish will deal only with gas and oil, because, in the first place, the bill does not include a definition of the word "energy". Therefore the duties of the board will be restricted and I do not see why five members instead of three should be appointed. It might be that in a few years five members would be required but I suggest that, for the present time, three are enough.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, as one who comes from the province of Alberta I have a very considerable interest in the bill and I must say I have been somewhat disappointed at the picayune objections which members of the opposition are making, apparently with the object of delaying the passage of the bill.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Habel: Making a better bill of it.

Mr. Harkness: I can well understand that because members of their party in the province of Alberta—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Roberge: On a point of order, sir, I do not think the Minister of Agriculture should impute motives to the members of the opposition with regard to the work they are doing in this chamber.

Mr. Harkness: I will not impute any motives. I will just state the facts as they appear to one sitting here listening to this debate.

Mr. Habel: You just came in.

Mr. Harkness: As I say, I can well understand their object in trying to delay the bill and the setting up of the board so that it can begin to operate and deal with the various gas applications in the province of Alberta.

Mr. Roberge: Is there an election there?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I think there should be an opportunity to reply to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I have the floor.

Mr. Pearson: Speak on the bill then.

Mr. Harkness: I was about to suggest to hon. members of the opposition that instead of quarrelling over whether there should be three or five members—

Mr. Crestohl: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, can the minister tell us what clause he is addressing himself to? We are dealing with a specific clause and he is not speaking on that clause.

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member had been paying attention to what I was saying he would know that I have just finished saying that instead of members of the opposition addressing themselves to the question of whether there should be three or five members—incidentally, the hon. member who has just spoken did not realize the number was five. He said six.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Harkness: Instead of attempting to delay the passage of the bill by, as I said before, objections which really do not amount to very much I think they would be much better advised to co-operate with the members of the government in getting the bill passed so that quite urgent gas export applications may be dealt with. However, as I was saying when I was interrupted I am not a bit surprised at this gambit because in the province of Alberta members of the Liberal party have been trying their utmost—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Harkness: —for several years to prevent the export of gas from that province.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): I would ask the Minister of Agriculture to discuss clause 3 of Bill No. C-49.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, we are grateful to the Minister of Agriculture for his advice but it has nothing to do with the bill though it may have something to do with the Alberta election. If he had been here while this discussion was going on he would have realized—

Mr. Harkness: I was here.

Mr. Pearson: —that the suggestions we have made, which the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is responsible for the bill, has received in good faith, are suggestions which we had hoped would make the bill more effective to do the job it is intended to do without delaying unduly the passage of the bill. The provision of the bill we are on now deals with the number of members that should be appointed to the board. We have suggested that, without interfering in any way with the effectiveness of the board, we might reduce the number to three and save the taxpayers of this country $32,000 a year in salaries. That, of course, makes no impact on the mind of the Minister of Agriculture, but it is of some importance provided that a board of three would do the job as well as a board of five. In that regard we suggest that no argument has been advanced yet which indicates the superiority of a board of five over a board of three. If no argument of that kind can be advanced then naturally a smaller board should be just as effective and more economical.

The minister has attempted to make a case that five members are required for this particular board. He made the analogy of the board of transport commissioners but that has been very effectively dealt with by the hon. member for Ottawa West. That board deals with 21 separate pieces of legislation. The minister also mentioned the federal power commission of the United States. The federal power commission of the United States, which has jurisdiction over matters which are, I am sure the minister will agree, of even greater importance and scope than any similar board in Canada, if there were a similar board, manages to get along with five members. It has jurisdiction over matters in the United States which in this country are reserved for provincial governments.

If the federal power commission can get along with a board of five to deal with matters of far greater scope than those to come under the board provided for in this legislation, surely a board of three would be just as effective in doing the work as a board of five and would save a good many thousands of dollars a year. I am the more convinced of that, because the regulatory functions of a board of that kind, as anyone realizes who knows anything about the operations of administrative boards, can be performed as well by three men as by five, and in some cases perhaps better by three men.

The minister attempted to make the point that if there were a board of three members one member might be ill or away and what would you do then? But the minister himself has made provision for that contingency in subclause 6 of clause 3 which reads as follows:

> If any member of the board by reason of absence or other incapacity is unable at any time to perform the duties of his office, the governor in council may appoint a temporary substitute member upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may prescribe.

That is covered. So far as the investigatory, research and reporting functions of the board are concerned, the minister must know, as anyone who has had the responsibility of government knows, that the actual work of investigation and research will be done in large part at least by the staff which will be accumulated by the board or by the staffs of all the other agencies of government which deal with this matter. He must know that the five members of the board, five very responsible members, hard to secure with the ability and experience, members who are going to be paid good salaries though perhaps not as much as they would get in civil life, are not going to do very much in the way of carrying on investigation and research and reporting. Therefore it seems to us, notwithstanding the Minister of Agriculture who has barged into the argument with an irrelevant political observation, that the work of the board will be just as effective and will be done more economically if we have three members instead of five.

Mr. Drysdale: What would the quorum be?

Mr. Pearson: Two.

Mr. Winch: Surely you would not put two Conservatives out of a job?

Mr. Roberge: The Minister of Agriculture said that I did not know what I was speaking about when I referred to six members.

Mr. Harkness: You referred to six members.

Mr. Roberge: I said that under the Railway Act the board of transport commissioners had six members but according to the bill before us the energy board is to have five members. We argue that there should be only three members on this board. I can repeat that in French.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Robichaud) negatived: Yeas, 21; nays, 72.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Dumas: No. Speaking to clause 3, may I say this. It seems strange that paragraph (5) of clause 3 does not preclude any member of the board from holding bonds, debentures, promissory notes and such documents or from selling or buying those bonds or debentures and many other items. Apparently they can be members of the board even if they hold debentures of an oil or gas company or if they hold bonds. I am therefore greatly surprised that this matter was not taken care of. I understand that the Railway Act provides that members of the board of transport commissioners may not own such bonds or debentures. I do not know why the minister overlooks this matter. At this point I should like to move an amendment which reads as follows:

That subsection (5) of section 3 of bill C-49 be replaced by the following:

The clause could be numbered as it is, namely clause 3, paragraph 5, subparagraph (i) and it would read exactly the same as paragraph (5).

"3(5) (i) A person is not eligible to be appointed or to continue as a member of the board if he is not a Canadian citizen, or if, as owner, director, officer, partner or otherwise, he is engaged in the business of producing, selling, buying, transmitting, exporting, importing or otherwise dealing in hydrocarbons or power."

But there would be another subparagraph.

"(ii) No member shall directly or indirectly hold, purchase, take or become interested in any stock, share, bond, debenture or other security of any company subject to this act; and if any such stock, share, bond, debenture or other security or any part thereof or any interest therein comes to or vests in a member by will or succession for his own benefit, he shall, within three months thereafter, absolutely sell and dispose of the same or his interest therein."

I hope that the minister will not say that this is not an important one.

Mr. Harkness: It is exactly the same. It is another delaying tactic.

Mr. Robichaud: You are so accustomed to delaying your own estimates that you think everybody else is doing the same.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Dumas: Will the minister comment?

Mr. Bourget: The minister should say something on the amendment. It is extremely important.

Mr. Churchill: I recognize the importance and also the length of the amendment which requires study. The way in which the bill is worded now is a standard wording to make sure that people who are eligible for positions of this nature are not concerned with some of these matters. The word "otherwise" introduced in line nine and again in line eleven is considered broadly to cover some of the things which have been written into the amendment which has been submitted to us. We felt that from this wording in subsection (5) it would be perfectly clear that no particular benefit would be resulting to a member of the board. In subsection (5) we say that a person is not eligible —if as owner, shareholder, director, officer, partner or otherwise, he is engaged in the business of producing, selling, buying, transmitting, exporting, importing or otherwise dealing in hydrocarbons or power.

Looking at the Railway Act to which reference was made, I note that the definition we have here is in some respects wider than that in the Railway Act.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the references of the Minister of Agriculture to these matters as picayune—

Mr. Harkness: You do not like them.

Mr. McIlraith: No. I think they reveal an incompetence that is shocking. I think if the minister is not familiar with the subject—

Mr. Harkness: They hit home too much for you. That is what you do not like.

Mr. McIlraith: If the minister has not any knowledge of the subject or has not any interest in it, I think he should permit the minister who is sponsoring the bill and is anxious to get on with it an opportunity to do so. His continued reference to these matters as picayune and delaying is not worthy of a minister of the crown.

In seeking to get the best possible board—and the Prime Minister in his own speech on second reading made it clear that such is his desire in respect of this board and he therefore properly made reference to that subject—it is important that the members of the board be not in a position in which their interests can conflict with their duties. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce will see that the present clause is not as wide as were the provisions of the Railway Act dealing with the same subject.

The amendment is substantially derived from the Railway Act and is an attempt to deal with the subject by adding to the provisions of the Railway Act on a similar point. It will be noticed, for instance, that under the national energy bill setting up the board there is no provision excluding bondholders or pipe manufacturers, and so on, and I would ask the minister to give the matter further study because I think it is a matter important enough to warrant further study. The Railway Act provisions are considerably wider and I think better protect against the possibility of having a board where the interests of the members of that board can conflict with their duties.

Mr. Churchill: I appreciate the hon. member's suggestion that we might take a little time to study this matter. It is an amendment of some length and should be read rather carefully to see whether or not it would fit in suitably with the clause as now drafted. I would be quite prepared to suggest that subclause (5) stands until we have the chance to examine it further.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): I would remind the committee that we have been dealing with the whole clause and not just the particular subclause. Is it the wish of the committee that the whole clause stands?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I was referring just to the subclause. I think the other parts might be dealt with unless there are any other comments.

Mr. Robichaud: I think in this case the other subclauses should be dealt with.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, we had considerable discussion with regard to the first part and a vote was taken on that. These other subclauses seem to me not to arouse controversy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let subclause (5) stand and we can go on with the others.

Mr. Churchill: The others are the normal provisions with regard to the establishment of the board, the tenure of members, the appointments, retirement age, temporary substitute members, residence, other employment prohibited, and so on.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Is it agreed that clause 3, subclause (5) do now stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Subclause 8 is next.

Mr. McIlraith: On subclause (8) I have one matter which I think should be brought to the attention of the minister. It concerns the establishment of the kind of board we want, and I agree with the necessity of getting a competent board. I was quite concerned with some remarks of the Prime Minister on second reading. He spoke about the difficulty of getting competent members on a board of this kind and the difficulties of having adequate compensation, and that sort of thing. I was tempted, as a matter of fact, to suggest to him at the time that there are other factors in getting the best possible board, and one is that the board, since it is a court of record, should be given independence to carry on its own work within the ambit of the bill and not be interfered with or dictated to. There is a good deal to be said on the subject about why members of these boards are leaving. I for one am perfectly frank in admitting that I am concerned about the number of able men who have left various boards within the last few years. I think of boards such as the board of transport commissioners, the Canadian farm loan board and the tariff board. There is a real problem for the government there in the loss to the public service of Canada of men of the calibre who have left those boards.

The point I want to make arises out of the Prime Minister's remarks on page 4025 of Hansard for May 26 last. He was dealing at that point with certain Alberta applications, and I would like to quote a passage from what the Prime Minister said in order to make my point. In referring to these applications he had this to say:

> In so far as those applications are concerned, they will be processed immediately by the board when it is set up. It will be set up immediately. There will be no need to wait for the mobilization of the board. The members of the board, from the evidence taken by the Gordon commission, the evidence taken by the Borden commission and the evidence taken by the conservation board of Alberta, will be in a position, I am sure, to determine fully the entire question.

The point I want to make is that the minister gave a firm commitment as to what the board would do. He did not indicate that he would ask the board to undertake the matter immediately, to deal with these cases immediately, and have the necessary hearings, or as the case may be. Not only that, but he went further. He undertook to indicate what evidence the board could deal with. That is a pretty serious matter. If you are setting up a board which will be a court of record, and then before the board is set up limit the evidence it can hear on particular applications, it is indeed quite shocking and I am sure not what the Prime Minister intended had he thought about it. I think he has had enough court experience to realize the impropriety of that course, and I would hope that the minister at some point in dealing with this matter will clarify the position and make it perfectly clear that there will be no such dictation to the board as is indicated in the remarks I have quoted. I regret that the Prime Minister is not here himself to deal with the point, because I am sure he could not have realized the extent to which he went in those remarks in the form in which they appear in Hansard. They appear to be absolutely ordering the board as to what they shall do, and even determining what evidence they shall consider in certain cases which will be coming before them in the future. I think it is a point which should be made very clear before any members are appointed to the board, or indeed any persons are approached to be members of the board.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall subclause (8) carry?

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister make some reference to that?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, all I would like to say here is that I did not read that or interpret it as an order to the board to do anything. As I read the paragraph, the Prime Minister said that in his view from the evidence already accumulated the board will be in a position, he is sure, to determine fully the entire question. There is no order to the board in that sentence whatsoever. The intention is, as he set out there, to move as rapidly as possible in this matter.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I point out that the Prime Minister said with reference to those applications, the particular named applications, that they will be processed immediately by the board when it is set up. In other words, he was not going to ask the board to do it but—

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Green: In view of the great importance of these applications, does the hon. member not wish to have them processed as quickly as possible?

Mr. McIlraith: Of course I do. That is my whole point. I want to get men competent to process them as soon as possible, but you cannot get the kind of men you want who are competent to process them by putting on record that the Prime Minister will determine when they will process them.

Mr. Green: We will get the men; do not worry about that.

Mr. McIlraith: I am sorry, but I will worry about it. I am sorry the Minister of Public Works takes that attitude, but there is a parliamentary responsibility and it is not a thing which should be treated in that way at all. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce more nearly appreciates the point, and I should be glad if he would address himself to the first sentence of the Prime Minister's remarks I quoted in which it appears that an absolute commitment or order was being given to the board.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not know whether or not the minister intends to answer the point made by the hon. member for Ottawa West, but it seems to me he might give us an indication of who the government intends to appoint to this board. I understand that a decision has already been made.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. McIlraith: I still think the minister should address himself to the point. This cloud over the board should surely be removed.

Mr. Churchill: I doubt the relevancy of the hon. member's remarks about this subclause and the speech made by the Prime Minister on May 26. I fail to see the connection between the two. However, I think that what the Prime Minister was indicating was that there should be quick action.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What he intended to indicate.

Mr. Churchill: When he spoke of the mobilization of the board he meant that it would not be necessary to wait for the entire staff to be assembled down to the most junior office boy, but that the board could turn its attention to matters of immediate concern.

Subclause agreed to.

On clause 4—Salaries.

Mr. Robichaud: Clause 4 in subclause (1), calls for certain salaries to be paid to the chairman, vice-chairman and members of the board. We are not questioning those salaries, because we realize that if we want to get men to do the job which they are called upon to do under this bill they must be paid accordingly. But when we come to subclause (2) stating that expenses shall be paid to the members of the board, we certainly have some questions to raise. The subclause reads:

> Each member is entitled to be paid reasonable travelling and other expenses incurred by him in the performance of his duty while away from his ordinary place of residence.

We know that according to subclause (7) of clause 3 members may reside a distance away from Ottawa, as the governor in council determines. This leaves an opening for unwarranted expenses and we feel that a firmer control should be imposed over this board as far as travelling and other expenses are concerned. I therefore move:

> That subclause (2) of clause 4 be amended by replacing the words "his ordinary place of residence" by "the city of Ottawa".

It should be remembered that this board is called upon to sit in Ottawa, and for this reason we feel that the amendment should be accepted.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is there to be no explanation?

Mr. Churchill: I doubt if the hon. and very alert hon. members opposite need any explanation. This is simply a provision for reasonable travelling and other expenses incurred by members of the board in the performance of their duty. As to the provision regarding the ordinary place of residence, which we have suggested should be the city of Ottawa or within 25 miles thereof, that is modelled on section 15 of the Railway Act.

The distance limitation has been modified somewhat because of modern forms of transportation. The members should live within 25 miles of Ottawa.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Or within such other distance—

Mr. Churchill: Somebody might be five miles further out.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Or might live in Winnipeg.

Mr. Churchill: There are some competent people in Winnipeg who might serve on this board if that is what the hon. member has in mind. But normally one would expect them to be living here in Ottawa or near to Ottawa. As to drawing the line at 25 miles; well, someone might be 30 miles away. That is all we had in mind.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The bill does not say that.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister indicates what he had in mind, but the measure itself says something quite different, and the amendment would make the position clear. Unless the amendment is accepted it will be quite possible for a member of the board to reside in Winnipeg and have all his travelling and similar expenses paid for coming to Ottawa to attend these hearings as set out in another part of the bill. It is to avoid that kind of situation that the amendment has been proposed. In other words, there is an unfortunate gap in the legislation as it is now presented to us, and if the minister would bring his proposals into line with the intentions he has indicated, we would be quite happy.

Mr. Churchill: Section 15 of the Railway Act contains that phrase "within such distance thereof"—referring to the city of Ottawa—as the governor in council at any time determines. Has any trouble arisen in the past, in the experience of hon. gentlemen opposite who were formerly in power, which would lead them to find fault with this provision now?

Mr. McIlraith: The answer to that question is: yes—a very dogmatic yes. Though I may say it was not under the Railway Act.

Mr. Roberge: The minister referred to section 15 of the Railway Act. He is right, of course, when he says that this provision of the Railway Act states "within such distance thereof as the governor in council at any time determines." But the minister failed to refer to section 29 which deals with the expenses and remuneration of officers of the board when they are away from Ottawa on duty. Under the bill we are now considering the ordinary place of residence may be

St. John's, Newfoundland or Vancouver, and every time a member of the board comes to Ottawa for two days he would be able to claim expenses.

Mr. Crestohl: I wonder if the minister would offer a word of explanation about the phrase "and other expenses incurred by him" in subclause (2) of clause 4. We can understand what reasonable travelling expenses are, but there is nothing to indicate what the other expenses may be, nor does the subclause speak as generously about the other expenses as it does about travelling expenses. When it speaks of travelling expenses, it speaks of reasonable travelling expenses. At least the subclause should read: "and other reasonable expenses".

Mr. Robichaud: I think we should have a better explanation from the minister than the one he has given. After all, it has been said that this board is called upon to sit in Ottawa. Ottawa is the seat of this board, even if it is not the residence of all the members, and as the measure now stands, as was pointed out by my colleague from Ottawa West, a member of the board could have his ordinary place of residence in Winnipeg, come to Ottawa to attend the sittings of the board and have all his travelling and other expenses paid at a cost to the government of $25 or $30 a day or more. I think this is simply running the risk of incurring unnecessary expense and we are warning this government which has committed itself to avoiding all unnecessary extravagance of the possible consequences. I want to recall to the government as well that at present there is an inquiry going on in certain committees about travelling and moving expenses. That is a warning to the minister. I think he should take it in good faith and accept this amendment.

Mr. Crestohl: If the minister chooses not to answer the question he leaves the words "other expenses" open to inclusion of the interpretation of unreasonable expenses. I draw to his attention again that when speaking of travelling expenses the word "reasonable" is used but not in respect of the words "other expenses". Does that mean that these other expenses may be unreasonable?

I have another question for the minister. Has the government estimated what it would cost the country in the over-all picture to operate the national energy board including salaries, offices, staff and whatever the requirements might be? Can the committee have some indication as to what the estimated cost of this will be to the country?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I cannot answer the hon. member's second question. In the course of time we will have some estimate of that expense.

With regard to his first question about the word "reasonable" I do not read it as applying only to the word "travelling". It applies to "other expenses" and I think would be so construed by anyone reading that sentence.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I think the government should be consistent. In fact, subsection 8 of section 3 provides that:

> Members shall devote the whole of their time to the performance of their duties under this act.

Therefore, if board membership implies full time duties, I take it the government expects board members to reside in Ottawa. If board members may reside say in Vancouver or in Newfoundland and travel to Ottawa to discharge their duties or functions, the government will have to pay their expenses and, in my view, that is inconsistent. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) should be wise enough to accept the amendment we have just put forward.

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Dumas: The minister should answer my argument.

Mr. Churchill: The argument has been pressed with some vigour. I note that subclause (7) declares where the members usually reside. Subclause (2) of clause 4 when it speaks of the ordinary place of residence, obviously must be read in conjunction with subclause (7) of clause 3; so it is Ottawa or within 25 miles thereof.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Churchill: It is not Winnipeg or Vancouver or some distant place.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I will not say the minister is trying to mislead the committee because he would call me out of order. However, he is reading only part of subclause (7). It reads:

> (7) Each member shall during his term of office reside in the city of Ottawa or within twenty-five miles thereof—

The minister stopped there. The subclause continues:

> —or within such other distance thereof as the governor in council determines.

The minister should have read those last two lines. This bill gives too much power to the cabinet. This is one case where by order in council a member may be allowed to reside in Winnipeg, for instance, and his expenses would be paid during all the time he was in Ottawa. If he were to come here for two or three months at a time his expenses would be paid.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. I take it that the committee having agreed to subclause (7) of clause 3, hon. members in debate on subclause (2) of clause 4 will refer only to subclause (7) of the preceding paragraph in an incidental manner. It is not to be opened up for debate again.

Mr. Dumas: We accept that.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister put a rather pointed question to me a moment ago when I took exception to subclause (2) of clause 4. I pointed out that it was not in language that coincided with the language used in subclause (7) of clause 3. The minister asked rather pointedly if I had knowledge of any such case where this difficulty arose. I gave a somewhat dogmatic answer which I meant precisely the way it was given. I point that out as something that should be dealt with.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. McIlraith: Let us make it clear. Does the minister not wish to answer that point?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not care to accept the answer of hon. gentlemen opposite.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Would the minister tell us the difference between the ordinary place of residence of a board member, and his residence while performing his duties in Ottawa? As far as I can make out, paragraph 2 of section 4 deals with his ordinary place of residence. Then, I take it a board member has to reside in Ottawa during his term of office. Is that not so?

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We are waiting for a reply.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Those in favour of the amendment will please rise.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, we are not satisfied. I think—

Mr. McPhillips: Order!

Mr. Dumas: I think the hon. member is quite unwise to act in that way. The minister should realize that this amendment is a reasonable one. We are not making undue demands. This is a logical amendment, and I think the minister should respond to it.

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment (Mr. Robichaud) negatived: Yeas, 22; nays, 73.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Chairman and Vice Chairman.

Mr. McIlraith: I have one point to raise here. There is a provision in the Railway Act providing that a judge of a superior court of Canada or of any province of Canada, or who is a barrister or advocate of at least 10 years' standing, may be appointed chief commissioner. This provision is found in section 10 of the Railway Act. Has the minister considered that provision and is there any reason for omitting it from this clause, which seems to correspond somewhat with the Railway Act?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I would say with regard to that that we did look at the section to which my hon. friend has referred. We considered that it was not necessary in this bill.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 agreed to.

On clause 7—Rules.

Mr. Winch: I would like the minister to explain this. Quite bluntly, I cannot understand why the word "may" is there and not "shall". This clause deals with the rules of the board. It says in part:

> The board may make rules respecting
> (a) the sittings of the board;
> (b) the procedure for making applications, representations and complaints to the board and the conduct of hearings before the board, and generally the manner of conducting any business before the board;—

And so on. It is strictly something that the board does. Why the word "may" and not "shall"; is it automatic that the board must make these rules?

An hon. Member: It is not permissive.

Mr. Winch: It would be a terrible board if it did not make these rules.

Mr. Churchill: This is the normal method of empowering a board to do something. Hon. members will find wording along this line in section 20 of the Railway Act. The board may make rules and provisions respecting the type of thing that is listed here. There is nothing unusual about this wording in acts of this kind.

[Mr. Dumas.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the word "may" not have a periphrastic effect in the Interpretation Act? Does it not really mean "shall"?

Mr. Winch: The board cannot even function unless it does mean "shall".

Mr. McIlraith: It does.

Mr. Winch: Am I correct in that? How can the board act under permissive rules? It cannot function at all.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8—Secretary and other officers and employees.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it that clause 8 derives from the Railway Act, so that there are no substantial changes from the provisions of the Railway Act?

Mr. Churchill: It is modelled on the Railway Act.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 9—Experts.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it that clause 9 also follows the Railway Act?

Mr. Churchill: It is modelled on section 21 of the Railway Act.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 10—Board a court.

Mr. McIlraith: I have one question on this clause. Paragraph 1 of clause 10 contains the simple statement that the board is a court of record. How does the minister reconcile this provision with clause 22 of the bill which provides for duties which are not usually those of a court?

Mr. Churchill: I think this simply indicates that the board has double duties. I do not think it is a question of reconciliation. The board has double duties to perform.

Mr. McIlraith: The point I want to make is that it is not the court of record that will perform those advisory duties that clause 22 has reference to. The court of record should obviously more properly have reference to all other provisions of the bill rather than clause 22.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11 and 12 agreed to.

On clause 13—Delegation.

Mr. Robichaud: This clause states that the board may delegate certain powers to one or more of its members, either jointly or severally. Can the minister explain to this committee what is the difference between the powers, functions and duties which the board may delegate to one or more of its members and those that are excepted in this section?

Mr. Churchill: I regret I did not hear the conclusion of my hon. friend's remarks.

Mr. Robichaud: Can the minister explain to the committee the difference between the powers which may be delegated by the board to one or more of its members and those that cannot be delegated? There are certain exceptions such as 36, 37, 38, and so on, as outlined in the clause. Then, the powers of the board are listed in part IV of the bill. What is the difference between those duties and the ones that can be delegated to one member only?

Mr. Churchill: There is an error in these, and I shall be having an amendment moved in a moment to delete it. The clauses listed here are clauses in which there are major decisions to be made, and the board acts as a board with regard to these. The delegation to one or more of its members applies to functions in which the board is not sitting and making a decision. The hon. member can check with each one of those clauses that are listed here, which clearly indicate the importance of the duties of the board which would quite improperly be delegated to a single member of the board. It has just been made clear that these things are to be done by the board as a board.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, in order to illustrate what the minister has said, does he mean that one member of the board could be delegated by the board to issue licences, certificates, permits, and so on, under the regulations?

Mr. Churchill: It is just the opposite. These are the things that are listed in these exceptions, namely 36 on to the end of the paragraph.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, in view of the minister's explanation, clause 12 says:

> The board may order and require any person to do, forthwith, or within or at any specified time and in any manner prescribed by the board so far as it is not inconsistent with this act, any act, matter or thing that such person is or may be required to do under this act, or any regulation, certificate, licence or permit,—

Mr. Winch: Is it not a mandatory order and not a permissive one?

Mr. Churchill: I think the hon. member did not read the entire clause and his omission makes it confusing. If he will look at line 35 he will see the words, "and may forbid the doing or continuing of any act, matter or thing that is contrary to this act or any such regulation, certificate, licence, permit, order or direction".

Mr. Robichaud: Then the board may delegate to one of its members full and exclusive jurisdiction to inquire into, hear and determine any matter mentioned in clauses 11 (a) and 11 (b) which would lead to the issue of certificates.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps I did not follow the reasoning of my hon. friend, but if it comes to the issuing of the certificate then clause 44 on page 14 of the bill clearly indicates how that may be done by the board, subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. Robichaud: My reason for making this point is that the minister stated earlier when he introduced an amendment to clause 3 that the board would require five members because there was a lot of work involved and the board would have to have hearings throughout the country. What I want to point out is that one member of the board can be delegated to function at these hearings, according to clause 13.

Mr. Churchill: I think there is a misunderstanding here. It is only with regard to the orders made by the board that one person might be delegated to hear that particular matter but certainly he is not given the authority to issue certificates or to take the powers of the board itself.

Mr. Robichaud: The point is that one member of the board may be sent anywhere in the country to hold a hearing. He then comes back, makes his recommendation to the board and the board will issue a certificate. It does not take five members to sign or issue a certificate or permit.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): For the sake of convenience, we have had notice of an amendment but the committee has not had the amendment placed before it. Perhaps it could be brought before the committee now.

Mr. Robichaud: There has been no notice of an amendment. We just asked the minister for an explanation.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): There was verbal notice of an amendment to this clause.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, with respect to clause 13 I should like to move the following amendment:

> That clause 13 be amended (1) by striking out "section 36" in line 44 on page 5 and substituting therefor "subsection (3) of section 36, section", and (2) by striking out the figure "85" in line 45 on page 5.

Mr. Winch: What is the effect of the amendment?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. The committee has heard the amendment. Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Winch: I tried to hear what the Minister of Public Works was changing but I have not got the bill before me. What is the effect of the amendment?

Mr. Churchill: The effect of the second part of the amendment is to correct a misprint. The "85" should not have been there. The first part of the amendment substitutes subsection 3 of section 36 instead of all of section 36. If you will look at section 36 on page 12 you will find that subsection 1 deals with approval of deviations, subsection 2 with the construction of works after approval and subsection 3 with exemptions. Subsection 3 says that "the board may exempt a company" and that is a function which would not be performed by one member of the board under delegation.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 13 as amended agreed to.

On clause 14—Powers of single member.

Mr. Roberge: I should like to ask the minister if clause 14 (1) differs from the similar clause in the Railway Act and if it does what is the difference?

Mr. Churchill: Clause 14 (1) is identical with section 12 (1) (b) of the Railway Act. Clause 14, subsection 2, is modeled on section 36 of the Railway Act. Does the hon. member wish any further comment on that particular point?

Mr. Roberge: The minister states that clause 14 (1) is identical with section 12 (1) (b) of the Railway Act.

Mr. Churchill: It is identical except for inappropriate words. The Railway Act refers to the chief commissioner where this bill speaks of the chairman. The Railway Act talks about commissioners where this bill speaks of members.

Clause agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister tell us what the order of business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall continue with this debate and if it should be concluded we will take the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If it is not concluded, can my hon. friend tell us what the order of business will be for Monday?

Mr. Green: If the bill is not finished tomorrow we would go on with it on Monday. If it should be finished, then we would take a supply motion. I believe there is some possibility of agreement being reached between the three parties that the supply motion will be for one day only instead of two, with the vote at 8.15 in the evening, so that members will have from that time until ten o'clock to bring forward any grievances.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is clear that we will be on this bill on Monday if we do not finish it tomorrow?

Mr. Green: That is right.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 29, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

POLYMER CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I wonder if the Minister of Labour is in a position to advise the house as to the result of negotiations since Monday last in the matter of the dispute at the Polymer Corporation in Sarnia.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Taylor, who has been appointed mediator, had to leave for a few days to go to Vancouver but he asked both parties to continue their talks. It has been left in that position for the moment. I expect to see Mr. Taylor back with both parties on Monday.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO "GLOBE AND MAIL" EDITORIAL CONCERNING "UNDIPLOMATIC DIPLOMATS"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has he seen and would he care to comment on an article in the Toronto Globe and Mail of May 27 entitled, "Undiplomatic Diplomats"?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did see the editorial in question, and the only observation I should like to make upon that matter at this time would be that an exercise of greater restraint in controversial utterances on the part of diplomats in general in Canada could not but be regarded most favourably, I think, by Canadians as a whole.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENT ON 1957-58 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister anything further to report with regard to the final payment on the 1957-58 wheat crop? The minister said to me on May 18 that he expected a report from the board almost momentarily.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the pool for 1957-58 was closed out on May 15 and the cheques will be issued commencing the first week of June.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for his very favourable answer. Is he able to inform the house of the amount of the final payment per bushel?

Mr. Churchill: No, Mr. Speaker, I have not that information in front of me.

AGRICULTURE

SUNFLOWER SEED—ANNOUNCEMENT OF FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the government yet been able to reach any decision on the request of the sunflower growers of Manitoba for a floor price, and would the minister give the house a statement on this important question?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this matter has been dealt with. The agricultural stabilization board have been authorized to provide a support price for sunflower seed to the producers of this crop in the province of Manitoba at 4 cents per pound, Canada No. 1 grade, for the 1959 crop. The prescribed price is 87 per cent of the 10-year average price of 4.6 cents per pound.

This crop is mainly grown in Manitoba and is an important secondary cash crop to producers in this area, with present plantings at about 45,000 acres. The products from crushing sunflower seeds are competitive with soybeans and other oil-bearing seeds, and the level of support, 87 per cent of the 10-year average, is the same as that provided for the soybean growers.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture following the announcement he made concerning a floor price for sunflower seeds. When the minister mentions soybeans, of course, he always arouses me, and that in turn causes me to ask whether or not he is in a position to announce a floor price for Ontario wheat following the request made by the Ontario wheat producers' association?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF INTERIM SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance and ask if it be his intention to ask for another interim supply bill in order to carry on the public service beyond May 31.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The supply which parliament provided was in order to carry the expenses of government just to the end of this month. Subject to the arrangement of the business of the house by the house leader it was my hope that I might move for interim supply next Wednesday.

Mr. Howard: Which is after May 31.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. I shall move for interim supply in order that we may have funds to meet our obligations on the 15th of June, for which we must have funds a week in advance.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can inform the house what progress, if any, he is making in the appointment of a secretary of state for external affairs.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am making a wonderful degree of progress, and I think the Leader of the Opposition will have his curiosity satisfied at a very early date.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before the end of the session?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC MISSILE—REPORTED REDUCTION IN U.S. APPROPRIATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister comment on reports that the United States congress appropriations committee has slashed by one-third the current appropriation for the Bomarc missile?

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the government of the United States, in the same way as the government of every other nation, are finding that the necessity of providing funds to meet defence purposes is causing a great strain on their budget; and they, like the government of Canada, are seeking every possible means of removing any duplication. They have been doing that through their various committees. A few weeks ago a Senate committee recommended considerable reductions in the Nike system of ground to air missiles, of which the Nike Hercules is the most advanced type. Yesterday or the day before a committee of congress recommended a reduction in the expenditures in connection with the Bomarc "A", which is the first of the Bomarc series of ground to air missiles.

The Bomarc "A", like the Nike Hercules, has rather a limited range. My understanding is that there have been no reductions recommended by the congressional committee in the development of the Bomarc "B" missile, which is the missile with which Canada expects to have its forces equipped in the near future.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question. Does the minister feel that this proposed reduction indicates a lack of confidence in the missile by the United States authorities?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that the question seems to relate to matters beyond the administrative responsibilities of the minister to whom the question was directed.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, this matter seems to fall within the administrative competence of the minister, in that the Canadian defence forces—

Mr. Churchill: Question.

Mr. Hellyer: —are relying upon this missile for our air defence.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member then might direct his question in such a way as to get his information by a little more direct inquiry than an inquiry on what is going on in the United States congress.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, may I pose another question?

Mr. Pearkes: The statement made by the hon. member a moment ago is quite incorrect. The Canadian government has never had any intention of employing the Bomarc "A", which is I understand the missile referred to in the congressional committee report.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the Bomarc "B" has yet been tested successfully?

Mr. Pearkes: I think the hon. gentleman will remember that there was a press report only a couple of days ago that the Bomarc "B" had been tested.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but surely we do not have to get our information from press reports, and this particular press report did not indicate that there had been a successful testing.

Mr. Hellyer: Perhaps the minister would comment on the report in the Globe and Mail of this morning by Philip Deane of the Washington staff of the Globe and Mail, in which he is reported as saying that he has learned at first hand from one of the chiefs of staff of the United States armed forces that the Bomarc is indeed useless; and he was an air force man.

Mr. Pearkes: That is not the information we have, Mr. Speaker. The official information I have is that the development of the Bomarc "B" is proceeding according to schedule.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister as up to date as Mr. Deane?

Some hon. Members: Order.

R.C.A.F.—POSSIBLE REMOVAL OF HEADQUARTERS FROM JERICHO TO KITSILANO, B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister give the house any information on a statement made in Vancouver two days ago by a member of this house, to the effect that the R.C.A.F. is going to be moved from Jericho and Kitsilano to Vancouver?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): The possible move of R.C.A.F. headquarters from Jericho to the Vancouver station, which I believe is Kitsilano, is under consideration.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO BANK ACT AMENDMENT RAISING INTEREST RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister in a position to assure the house that the government will not ask for an amendment to the Bank Act at this session which would raise the permissible interest rates that the banks are allowed to charge?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is no intention on the part of the government to introduce any amendments to the Bank Act at the present session. It is a longstanding custom of parliament to revise the Bank Act every ten years following detailed hearings before the banking and commerce committee, and there appears to be no occasion to depart from that well established practice.

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL INVESTMENT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether he has given any consideration to the early establishment of a national investment board so that the credit needs of the Canadian people may be met?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer, of course, is no. The establishment of any such body would not necessarily have the consequence that the hon. gentleman holds out for it at all. Credit problems and the strains on credit at the present time are attributable to the very rapid expansion and recovery of the Canadian economy. I think the hon. member has evidently quite underestimated the strength of the expansive forces at work in the Canadian economy today. Certainly the Canadian economy is recovering at a very rapid rate.

Mr. Regier: Is the minister in a position to inform the house what branch of the Canadian economy is undergoing this very rapid expansion that we have heard so much about?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A large number of them.

Mr. Speaker: I think that is perhaps a bit too broad a question for this stage of the proceedings.

INQUIRY AS TO LOANS TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I wonder if the Minister of Labour could tell us whether he has the information I requested yesterday, as to whether or not any loans have been made by the government to the unemployment insurance commission since May 7.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): That information has not yet come to my desk. As soon as it does I will convey it to the hon. member.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps in view of the fact that the Minister of Finance has returned to the city he could give us that information.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to answer offhand as to specific amounts and dates. If my hon. friend had indicated to me his intention to ask this question I would have been glad to provide him with the amounts and dates. However, I believe the authority that was given in the two orders in council, to which reference was made during discussions in the house within the last fortnight, has not been exhausted as yet. I believe that at the moment the total outstanding is around $75 million.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then another $20 million has been added since my hon. friend spoke about it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The total amount at the time of the debate two weeks ago was $55 million, and my recollection is that the total at the moment is around $75 million. The authorization under the two orders in council was for $80 million, and that has not been exhausted as yet. I might also tell my friend, although this is not a final answer, the indications are that the total authorization is not likely to be required.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is because of the amendments that are now before us?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is rather because of the substantial improvement in the employment situation.

DRUGS

NARCOTIC CONTROL—RESPONSIBILITY OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister taken note of the reported statement by the attorney general of British Columbia that all matters relating to narcotics are the responsibility of the federal authorities? Will he comment on the statement and give the house an indication of government plans relative to this most important and disturbing problem?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of what the attorney general of British Columbia said is not the same as the summary just given by the hon. member. The report upon which I believe the question is based refers to a statement made by the attorney general of British Columbia to a meeting of the Canadian congress of corrections in Vancouver. I am informed that what the attorney general said there was by way of making a report on what British Columbia was doing in this field, and that he suggested that to deal with the matter satisfactorily there should be a greater assumption of responsibility by the federal authorities.

On that point I think about all I should say is that our planning committee is making a study of the question of the treatment of offenders who are also narcotic addicts. We are pursuing some preliminary inquiries in my department and with the Department of National Health and Welfare, and when we have the report of the committee I expect to be able to refer it to my colleagues and then make some final plans or recommendations with regard to what we should do in the narcotic field.

Mr. Winch: Can the minister give us any indication at all as to approximately when he expects to receive the report of the committee he has just mentioned?

Mr. Fulton: I expect to receive the report by the end of this year.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN FUTURE EXPANSION AND ADDITIONAL FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport of which I have given him notice. Will the minister make a statement to the house on the results of the meeting this week with members of the Vancouver city council in regard to the future expansion and the provision of additional essential facilities at the Vancouver international airport?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the members of the Vancouver city council called upon me to discuss questions relating to the operation of the Vancouver international airport by the city of Vancouver and the method of financing a new terminal building there.

I informed the delegation that government policy provided for grants in aid to terminal buildings at municipal airports served by class 1 scheduled services. The amount of the grant in aid would be related to the cost of the customs and immigration space, and a proportion of the public waiting room space in the building. I also informed them it would not be possible to go beyond this policy or to have the federal government finance the whole of the construction of the terminal building, either by loan to the city or by direct financing of construction with the building thereafter being rented to the city.

Members of the delegation also inquired regarding the responsibility for the operation of the airfield, and I informed them that we were quite happy with the present efficient operation of the airfield, but that if at any time the city felt that it wished the federal government to take over full responsibility for operation, this was a matter we would be prepared to discuss with the appropriate municipal authorities.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

SHIPPING—REPORTED PRESSURE TO WITHHOLD CARGOES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, and I hope my notice reached him in sufficient time. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to the article in the May 23 edition of Saturday Night which indicates that the combines investigation branch is investigating charges that the Canada-United Kingdom freight conference has been using pressure tactics to keep freight rates up, and if so could the minister comment on this matter?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): The hon. gentleman was kind enough to send me notice of his intention to ask this question. I have not had time to study the article in Saturday Night to which he refers, but I assume it refers to the freight conference which was the subject of an earlier inquiry directed to me by the hon. member for Quebec East. If the hon. gentleman will look at Hansard, page 1442, for February 27 of this year, he will see the question the hon. member for Quebec East asked and my answer. I think he will find there the information that he desires.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE TO THEFT FROM PRIME MINISTER'S RESIDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): May I ask a question of the Prime Minister. We were all sorry to learn of the theft which took place at his residence, and I wonder if the Prime Minister had previously communicated with the Postmaster General concerning the installation of a burglar alarm or in connection with procuring the services of the R.C.M.P. as a matter of security?

THE MINISTRY

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. C-37, to provide for the appointment of parliamentary secretaries to ministers.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May we have some explanation?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the amendments suggested by the Senate are simply as follows; that the governor in council may appoint one or more members of the House of Commons to be parliamentary secretary or secretaries to the ministers. Then there is an alteration, and the later clause providing for the parliamentary secretary or secretaries, to make that subsequent section conform, has been amended accordingly.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this seems to be a sensible change, because it would make it possible for a minister or for the Prime Minister to have more than one parliamentary assistant, if that were considered desirable. I take it that is the purport of the amendment. It does seem to make the legislation a little more flexible and perhaps improves on the original bill. It will also make possible once the amendment is accepted, if it is accepted by the house, for this legislation to be put through and for the government to take the necessary action in regard to it.

The effect of this legislation is awaited by many members of the house, to use the Prime Minister's words, with a good deal of curiosity; but I would think that in view of the fact that the session is now so far advanced and that perhaps we have only another six or seven weeks to go, all being well, it would not be desirable to sanction such an expenditure of public money as would necessarily be involved in the appointment of these parliamentary secretaries so near the end of the session. Once the session is over they would have nothing to do. Therefore by delaying this measure, although it is unfortunate from one point of view, the government has at least saved some public expenditure.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as far as this group is concerned this seems a sensible amendment. It provides a certain flexibility to meet the administrative requirements and duties of the ministers. That is all I have to say in this connection; but could the Prime Minister inform the house when he will relieve the state of tension in his own party by the appointment of these parliamentary secretaries?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I had not known of this aggravated state of tension except for the assistance given by the members of the opposition, who have shown an unusual interest in this regard. However, I am glad to find that they concur in the suggested amendments. The Leader of the Opposition has said that it makes possible the appointment of two parliamentary secretaries to one minister, which would seem to indicate that probably one would be English speaking and the other French speaking, and I think that is a very desirable end.

I would say that the two parties opposite are not in complete agreement, though they sometimes have an unusual spirit of cooperation between them. However, the Leader of the Opposition has said today that the appointments should not be made immediately, and the hon. member for Kootenay West has said they should. I think on this occasion the views of the C.C.F. are going to receive more support from this side of the house than those of the official opposition.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The committee resumed, from Thursday, May 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-49, to provide for the establishment of a national energy board—Mr. Churchill—Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

The Chairman: Shall clause 15 carry?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, there were two clauses which were stood yesterday. I wonder if we could consider those first. They are clause 2, subclause (q), in the interpretation section, and clause 3, subclause 5, to which there was an amendment. It would be helpful, Mr. Chairman, if we could consider those before we go on any further.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that we revert to clause 2, subclause (q)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On subclause (q)—Special act.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, this suggestion was made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond; that for clarification the words "in this act" at the beginning of clause 2 should be succeeded by "and in any special act", as occurs in the interpretation section of the act respecting oil and gas pipe lines. His suggestion has been considered, but as I stated last night paragraph (a) under clause 80 indicates that "this act shall be construed as incorporate with a special act". If the two acts are to be read together as one act then obviously the definition will apply. I do not think the suggested amendment would accomplish anything, and I would prefer to leave the clause as it stands.

I might say that a number of the special acts have been looked at in the interval. They all follow the same pattern; they do not have a definition section. Most of the expressions defined in this bill are not used in the special acts. They do, of course, refer to gas and oil and pipe lines, but the meaning of those terms in the special acts is quite clear from the context in which they are used and there is no inconsistency between those words and any terms in this bill.

Subclause (q) agreed to.

On clause 3, subclause 5—Eligibility.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, an amendment was moved last night to this subclause which is now under consideration. That amendment would have incorporated in this bill the provisions of paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 14 and subsection 2 of section 14 of the Railway Act. This refers to the fact that no commissioner or officer of the board—that is, the board of transport commissioners—should have any interest, if I may paraphrase it, in stocks, shares, bonds, debentures or other securities of any company that comes under that act.

Our consideration of that amendment may be summed up as follows. The purpose of a provision such as subclause 5 is to ensure that the board will be disinterested and unbiased. In drafting such a provision as this it is not easy to cover all conceivable cases, as hon. members will understand, and the danger is that the provision will go too far. In the Railway Act there is no disqualification in a case where a member of the board is a director or other officer, as there is in the present bill. Moreover, the Railway Act prohibits a member of the board from indirectly being interested in any security of a company. Read literally, this would prohibit a member of the board from holding a participating life insurance policy with a company that had invested some of its funds in securities of a railway company.

In the present bill we have tried to draft a provision that would cover the normal cases without, at the same time, leading to absurd situations. There is an important distinction between this clause and the present provision in the Railway Act, in that under the Railway Act there is only an obligation to report and get rid of an interest, whereas in the present bill there is an absolute statutory disqualification. I should think the present provision is wide enough to dissuade any member from being interested in bonds or securities of a company, because if he transgressed the section he would by operation of law become disqualified. It must also be borne in mind that the proposed board is to be a court of record, and it is a fundamental principle, whether stated in the statute or not, that a judicial tribunal must be unbiased.

I do not expect there will be any difficulty in applying this section so as to disqualify all those who ought to be disqualified, and I am therefore unable to accept the amendment that has been moved.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has said that he does not feel it is possible for the government to accept this amendment. May I ask him this question. Under the present clause would it not be possible for a person to hold debentures in a pipe line company and yet be eligible for membership of the national energy board?

Mr. Churchill: Our consideration of this clause, with exactly such a situation as that in mind, is that a member of the board would, prior to becoming a member, divest himself of any holdings in a pipe line company. The way in which this clause is worded now—"if as owner, shareholder, director, officer, partner or otherwise—engaged in the business of producing, selling, buying, transmitting" and so on, would certainly dissuade a member of the board from retaining any holdings in a pipe line company, because if he did possess such holdings and that became evident he would automatically be disbarred from sitting as a member of the board, whereas under the Railway Act a disclosure of that nature only imposed upon the member of the board concerned the duty to divest himself of his holdings before continuing in office. This is a more stringent regulation than that contained in the Railway Act.

Mr. Dumas: I think the argument of the minister is invalid, because at the present time the members of the board of transport commissioners, for example, cannot hold bonds or shares, and I am sure those commissioners must have life insurance. So the minister has not given us a valid reason for rejecting this amendment. As the bill stands, members of the energy board could hold debentures and bonds in a pipe manufacturing company and still be eligible for office.

The Leader of the Opposition put a direct question to the minister. He asked whether a member of the board holding debentures in a pipe line company or in an oil company could carry out his duties. The minister did not answer that question. He said the provisions in the bill should be an incentive not to hold such bonds. We maintain that members of the board should be prohibited from holding bonds and debentures in a pipe line company.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister answer this question. If the possession of shares in a pipe line company disqualifies the holder from sitting on the board, why should not that disqualification also extend to the holding of debentures?

Mr. Churchill: Our feeling is that we do not need to write specifically into this clause all the conceivable situations which might arise. We feel that as this clause is drafted no member of the board will subject himself to any suspicion of holding an interest in pipe lines with which he is dealing in a judicial capacity as a member of the board. We feel that that is sufficient to guard the public interest.

Mr. Pearson: If that is sufficient, why put the clause in in its present form at all? Why say "shareholders" and not "debenture holders"? In any case I would point out that a great many debentures have share warrants attached to them.

Mr. Dumas: That is correct. Debentures are issued, and to those debentures share warrants are attached, so that if a member of the board owns debentures he owns shares as well. I think the words "debentures and bonds" should be included.

Mr. Churchill: I am not taking any inflexible attitude with regard to this question provided we can arrive at something satisfactory to the committee. Would it be agreeable to the committee if we added, at the end of the clause, the words "or if he holds any bond, debenture or other security of a company"?

Mr. McIlraith: That undoubtedly would materially improve the subclause, but it does not cover the case of shareholders in pipe manufacturing companies. A member might be a large shareholder in a pipe manufacturing company or in a wholesale pipe distributing company and still be eligible to sit on the board. That is not covered by the minister's proposal, and I wonder whether the hon. gentleman has something to say on that point, bearing in mind that there are now a good many wholesalers in this business.

Mr. Lambert: With all due respect to the hon. member for Ottawa West, why limit it to a pipe mill? What about the steel mill immediately back of the pipe mill? How far back is one to go?

Mr. McIlraith: I think the answer to that question is simple. The reason for not limiting it further is that a steel mill produces a very heavy tonnage of steel in a year of which only a very small percentage goes into the making of pipe. If the hon. member would look at the tonnage figures for steel production in Canada last year and then look at the figures for the number of tons of that steel which went into pipe construction he would find the answer quite readily.

Mr. Lambert: I suggest that the hon. member should consult the record with regard to certain steel mills in the country not located in this particular area; he might find the respective volumes are different from those he has suggested.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, in that regard they manufacture all sizes of pipe, and by far the greatest production is in casing pipes. Also, we have international competition in this sort of business. A great deal of pipe comes from England. If you want to be really specific about it, what about the coatings and coverings that go on the pipe? They are manufactured by firms such as Minnesota Mining. You just cannot carry it too far, because the industry is so vast and complex that you could relate it to literally thousands of products to the extent that it would become ridiculous.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, the amendment suggested undoubtedly improves the clause, but the point is that an effort is being made by the clause to prevent persons engaged in the business from being eligible for appointment to the board. It is just a matter of finding some reasonable wording that will prevent persons who are directly concerned with that type of business from being appointed to the board. That is why my colleagues and I raised the question of ownership in a pipe manufacturing company. It is quite true that if someone wants to make a ridiculous case about it he could go back very far through industry and reduce the question to an absurdity. It is a matter of getting a practical line that is workable and which, when we put it into language in this clause, will have the effect of excluding those whose interests may be in conflict with their duties on the board.

I am pleased that the minister has seen fit to accept as much of the suggested amendment as he has indicated. I believe it does a great deal to correct the situation, but I ask him to consider the further point I raised and comment upon it.

Mr. Churchill: That is worthy of consideration, but I feel that under the circumstances we have adequate protection here. I feel we have had a meeting of minds. We are lifting right from the amendment in front of us those words, "bond, debenture or other security". If the hon. member who moved the amendment would withdraw it my colleague would be pleased to move the modification I suggested.

Mr. Dumas: I agree, Mr. Chairman, subject to the minister moving his modified amendment.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I move that the following words be added at the end of subclause 5:

—or if he holds any bond, debenture or other security in the company.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to accept the amendment?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I think that amendment improves the clause and we on this side could accept it.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McIlraith: Before the amended clause carries I want to be clear on one point. It is only a point of draftsmanship. Would the words "of a company" mean a company under the definition in clause 2?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, as defined in the bill.

Mr. McIlraith: That, of course, excludes oil companies, refining companies and so on?

Mr. Green: As I understand it this would include any pipe line company.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, but the point I was interested in is this. That language at the end of the amendment has the effect of excluding any oil company. In other words, it makes eligible for appointment the largest bondholder in the country in one of the oil companies. Is that what was intended?

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, may I point out to the hon. member for Ottawa West that in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Villeneuve this same expression was used.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, it was "company" subject to the language in the Railway Act from which this seems to come. It covers a wide range of companies. I was wondering if the minister had given sufficient attention to the point I raised. I do not want to press it at all, but before the amendment finally carries I merely wish the minister to consider that point.

Mr. Green: That type of company is not expressed in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Villeneuve.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not think the argument that two things that are wrong make a thing right can be accepted.

Mr. Churchill: What we considered was "company" as defined in this bill.

Mr. McIlraith: So the bond holder of an oil company is eligible for appointment?

Mr. Lambert: No. Read your clause.

Mr. Churchill: A shareholder is already excluded by the earlier part of the bill.

Mr. Lambert: Selling or buying.

Mr. McIlraith: "Selling or buying" are the words it would cover. I think that answers the point.

The Chairman: Shall the clause as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 15—Enforcement of board orders.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it that this is lifted from the Railway Act with appropriate changes of language?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am wondering about this clause, no matter what its origin may be. It reads in part as follows:

> Any decision or order made by the board may, for the purpose of enforcement thereof, be made a rule, order or decree of the exchequer court or of any superior court of any province of Canada and shall be enforced in like manner as any rule, order or decree of such court.

One of the clauses makes the board a court of record. As the hon. member for Ottawa West pointed out last night, clause 22 of the bill gives advisory functions to the board that certainly would not be normal to a court of record. The exchequer court is a court in the full sense of the word and in the meaning we convey when we use the words "judicial process". Can the minister say whether his legal advisers have given full effect to the implications of this?

I will admit there is some extenuation in the words "for the purpose of enforcement thereof". It may be that the strictest interpretation is that the decree of this body may be regarded as having the same value as that of the exchequer court but only with respect to the question of enforcement. In any event it seems to me as a lawyer that one ought to be very careful in endowing a body that is not a court at all, even though the bill designates it as a court of record, with the authority and all the dignity that attaches to a body of this kind, when it is not really a court.

Mr. McIlraith: We need it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My friend the hon. member for Ottawa West says that we need it. It may be necessary, but what we are doing is giving the board all the authority of a court for the purpose of the enforcement thereof. I should like the minister's comments.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is in agreement with our thinking on this line. He has seized upon the words that are important there, "for the purpose of enforcement thereof". Otherwise it is identical with section 50, subsections 1 and 2 of the Railway Act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The rules of evidence and argument and that sort of thing would not apply? My hon. friend who is a lawyer can understand what I am concerned about. Someone comes before a board like this. If it was really a court you would be obliged to take into account the rules of evidence in a normal court, which would be quite impossible before a body like this. I take it nothing like that is intended.

Mr. Lambert: They set up their own rules.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what I want to make sure.

Mr. Churchill: It is because there is no enforcement machinery in the energy board; therefore this is the method by which its orders shall be enforced.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 16—General or particular orders.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it this clause is completely new. Is that right?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, it is new.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 17—Review of orders by board.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it that this one is from the Railway Act, with the appropriate changes having to do with the fact that the governor in council must approve the orders issued by the board. Perhaps the minister will assure us on that point.

Mr. Churchill: It is substantially section 52 of the Railway Act. The major decisions of the energy board require the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. McIlraith: In addition to that, this clause provides that where there is any change or alteration in the order, the change or alteration cannot be made without the approval of the governor in council in cases where the approval is necessary.

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: Of the original order?

Mr. Churchill: If the approval of the governor in council is required any change, therefore, in that type of order in its turn requires the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. Pearson: Would it be possible under this clause—and I ask the minister for information—for anyone concerned with a decision of the board to request a review? This clause does give the board the power to review, to alter, to rescind, and in that sense perhaps it makes provision for an appeal. But could someone concerned with a decision use this particular clause and ask for a review of a decision made by the board?

Mr. Churchill: That might be done subject to the rules of procedure made under clause 7 on page 4 of the bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would like to follow up this.

Mr. Churchill: Clause 7 says:

> The board may make rules respecting
> (b) the procedure for making applications, representations and complaints to the board—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That could be, but it seems to me the point made by the Leader of the Opposition is not without some value. Of course clause 18 provides for an appeal on questions of law and matters involving the jurisdiction of the board, but what the Leader of the Opposition seemed to be asking was whether or not the permissive review provided for in clause 17 would authorize an individual to take steps to appeal a decision that had been made by the board on a question, let us say, of fact, or on a matter that was outside the mischief of clause 18, involving a question of law or one of jurisdiction. This raises the whole question, of course, of the administrative practice of administrative tribunals, as to whether we are going to give individuals the right of appeal from an administrative board order, not only on a question of law but on a question of fact; or, once the board makes a decision on a question of fact, is that to be final, subject only to the approval of the governor in council?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, that was intended. Under this clause an individual might request the board to review, and so on, and under this clause the board has the power to take action.

Mr. Pearson: Would the board have the power to take action of that kind unless it had made rules under clause 7, which is the procedure clause? The minister will appreciate our interest in this matter, not only our interest, but the interest expressed also in this appeal procedure by hon. members from Edmonton and Calgary. We were wondering whether this clause could be used to meet the points which they brought out in their statements on second reading.

The minister has now said that an individual can ask the board to review a decision, but unless rules of procedure were made by the board under clause 7, could the board do it? In other words, could the board take that action without the appropriate rules under clause 7? Is it the intention, or was it the understanding of the government in drafting this bill, that perhaps a procedure of this kind could be provided for under clause 7?

Mr. Churchill: I think it is clear that the board already has the power under clause 17. Whether or not it writes out something by way of rules under clause 7, it still has the power.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the point the Leader of the Opposition makes is worth pursuing. There is no doubt that under clause 17 the board may review a decision it has already made, but there is no power inherent in clause 17, and certainly there is nothing directly mandatory in clause 7, that would permit an individual who feels that he has been aggrieved, or a company which feels that it has been aggrieved, to go to the board and say, "We would like you to review this matter". The board, while it has the power to review the matter, could very well take the position, "Well, we do not intend to review it"; the individual might say, "Well, here is further evidence", and so on. I do not feel that I know enough about this particular problem, but theoretically I can see an objection to the clause as drawn which does not allow an appeal. I will admit there is some difficulty, in that we would be asking the board to appeal its own decision.

Under clause 18 we can go to the supreme court, a new body altogether, but there the appeal is on a limited basis. Is it the government's intention to permit an appeal or a review by the board at the insistence of an applicant? That really is what it amounts to.

Mr. Churchill: Well, we considered this very carefully, and the arguments advanced by the hon. member we have similarly considered, but on another occasion. We feel that this is satisfactory. The board has the power here to review, but we have not made it mandatory on the board to consider any complaint raised by an individual, which could conceivably make for endless delay in dealing with matters which come before the board. Obviously this is intended to give the board an opportunity to consider any mistake which may be drawn to its attention, and I think it fully protects the rights of individuals.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 18—Appeal to supreme court.

Mr. Robichaud: This clause has to do with appeals to the supreme court. Subclause 1 reads:

> An appeal lies from a decision or order of the board to the supreme court of Canada upon a question of law, or a question of jurisdiction—

I realize that this is similar to the terms of section 53 (2) of the Railway Act. However, it might be pointed out that the power of the governor in council to vary or rescind an order of the board of transport commissioners has not been provided in this case as it was in section 53, subsection 1 of the Railway Act, which reads:

> The governor in council may at any time, in his discretion, either upon petition of any party, person or company interested, or of his own motion, and without any petition or application, vary or rescind any order, decision, rule or regulation of the board, whether such order or decision is made inter partes or otherwise, and whether such regulation is general or limited in its scope and application; and any order that the governor in council may make with respect thereto is binding upon the board and upon all parties.

This part of the Railway Act, as I said, is not included in this clause. I might also refer to statements which were made during the debate on second reading. I do not want to quote them in full but, as found on page 3987 of Hansard, the hon. member for Edmonton West suggested that he would prefer to see acceptance of the principle of the right of appeal with respect to tolls and tariffs, that is, the setting of tolls and the revocation and variation of tolls and tariffs.

Then, as found on page 4040 of Hansard, the hon. member for Calgary South also suggested that perhaps it might be well to suggest to the government that they review the method by which we could give some right of appeal to the consumer and the industry to determine whether or not the board were being completely honest in making their assessment of what is considered a fair and reasonable rate.

Again, as found on page 4087, the hon. member for Calgary South interjected during the speech of the hon. member for Skeena and said that what he wanted in the bill was the right of appeal. In fact it was reported in Hansard as "repeal" and the hon. member corrected it the following day to read "appeal". I should like to have the minister's comment on this clause of the bill.

Mr. Churchill: We gave very serious consideration to the subject matter which the hon. member has drawn to the attention of the committee. Our judgment was that the way we have set it out in the bill would be a satisfactory method of dealing with these problems of appeal. We considered the Railway Act, and we have had experience with regard to the type of appeal which emerges from the method outlined in that act. We considered that the new board, dealing as it will with highly complicated and technical matters, should have its findings thereon considered to be conclusive. Other matters of law and jurisdiction are, of course, dealt with in the normal manner.

As we have just discussed with reference to an earlier section, the board is empowered to make changes and review its decisions if new evidence is produced on the basis of some complaint by an individual, and we feel that in matters as highly technical as those which are involved in dealing with the problems that will face the energy board it would be better and more in the interests of the public if the board's findings of fact were held to be final and conclusive.

Very careful consideration has been given to this question, and we think it should be left in this way. If subsequent experience shows that something more should be done, parliament will have an opportunity to consider the matter. The question has been gone into with the greatest of care and we have concluded that this is a satisfactory method.

Mr. Pearson: I take it that the minister and the government feel, after the consideration they have given to this matter, that there should be no right of appeal written into the legislation but that there is a possibility of appeal or review of the legislation if the board makes such a review possible. The government feels that that is as far as they can or should go at the present time in respect of the matter.

Mr. Churchill: Yes. I would not want the hon. member's words to be misinterpreted as an indication that there is no right of appeal in the act.

Mr. Pearson: No. There is a right of appeal on matters of law but not on the facts.

Mr. Churchill: Law and jurisdiction.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think we should leave the legislation in this uncertain state. Is it the government's policy that if the board does not wish to listen to an application for review it need not do so; or is it the intention that the board shall, on request by an applicant for review, be allowed to do so and under the bill that would be made legally possible by a provision in the rules provided for in clause 7 of the bill?

Mr. Churchill: Our whole intention here was to leave this matter entirely to the board. My hon. friend, with his vast experience in the past, will know the difficulties that would be involved if some other method were used, and I am sure he will be inclined to agree that this is the way it should be done in a matter so complicated and technical.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 19—Orders and decisions final.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to refer to the first part of clause 19, where it is provided that decisions of the board are final and conclusive. Since there is no appeal on certain of the orders, for instance in the case of tolls, they become final immediately the order is made. There does not seem to be any provision, short of the board rehearing a case of its own volition, for a review or rehearing at that point, and this concerns me a little.

Would the minister care to elaborate on the point? I have no quarrel with the clause as applied to the ordinary cases, but I am somewhat concerned about those cases where there is no right of appeal and no method of obtaining a review other than if the board decides of its own volition to set up regulations that will permit it.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps I have not followed the hon. member as closely as is required. I thought we had covered that when we were dealing with clause 17. Is it some extension of that to which he is making reference?

Mr. McIlraith: It is an extension of the discussion on clause 17. Subclause 1 of clause 19 is absolute in form. It makes every decision or order of the board final and conclusive. I am concerned that there is no way of amelioriating that position with respect to certain types of orders where there is no appeal, and I have used as an example decisions on tolls. There is no appeal with respect to such decisions, and it might be thought desirable that there should be a rehearing. As I read the bill I find no provision for a rehearing other than the one we have just discussed in clause 17. Nowhere in the bill is there any method of assuring a rehearing or an appeal. That is the point I want to have clarified. I may be wrong in my understanding of the situation, because I am not too certain on the point.

Mr. Churchill: I think the hon. member is correct. The way I would read clause 19 is that every decision or order of the board is final and conclusive except as provided by clause 17, which gives power to the board to review and make changes.

Mr. McIlraith: So that once an order is made there is no way of procuring a rehearing of that application?

Mr. Churchill: Upon request the board, being a reasonable board, would under proper circumstances grant that review.

Mr. McIlraith: But only if the board sets up rules to provide for it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When the exchequer court hears a matter that arises out of certiorari or by mandamus, there is no review of the facts apart from questions of law?

Mr. Churchill: No, they would not deal with the facts.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 20 and 21 agreed to.

On clause 22—Board to make continuing studies and reports.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, this clause 22 is entirely new. It imposes upon the new board two duties. The first is that the board shall study and keep under review matters relating to the exploration for, production, recovery, manufacture, processing, transmission, transportation, distribution, sale, purchase, exchange and disposal of energy and sources of energy within and outside of Canada. The second duty is that the board shall prepare studies and reports and shall recommend to the minister from time to time such measures as it considers desirable in the public interest for the control, provision, conservation, marketing and development of energy and sources of energy.

At this point I should like to mention the fact that it may not be objectionable to entrust these advisory functions to the board. However, I wish to emphasize that a relatively small part of these activities fall within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. The major responsibilities in this field, as we know, lie within provincial jurisdiction. I should like also to point out that of those activities which do fall within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, few are really under the authority of the board.

I should like to ask a question of the minister, and I think he will be able to supply the answer. Did the minister make a study of all the departments or other agencies having something to do with energy or sources of energy? The second part of my question is, if so, how may agencies and branches of departments have something to do with energy or sources of energy? We should like to have this information if it is at all possible.

Mr. Churchill: We did make a study, and I shall produce it in just a minute. I have a list of these other bodies that have an interest in energy matters. I cannot lay my hands on that just at the moment, but certainly a little later I can give that information to the hon. member.

Mr. Dumas: Will the minister allow this clause to stand, then?

Mr. Churchill: Oh, yes, that is quite agreeable.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Is it the wish of the committee that the clause be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

On clause 23—Publication of studies and reports.

Mr. Bourget: This clause has to do with the publication of the studies and reports mentioned in clause 22. Now, if we look at the report of the royal commission on energy, recommendation No. 8 (b) and (c), we see that the commission recommended as follows:

> 8. That the national energy board shall have authority:
> (b) To give advice and make recommendations with reference to any matter relating to energy or sources of energy to any minister or to any board or agency constituted under the authority of any act of the parliament of Canada or at the request of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to any board or agency constituted under the authority of the legislature of any province.
> (c) To compile, study and review the statistics and estimates of the quantity, quality, location and availability of the various forms of energy and sources of energy in Canada so that the board may maintain an up-to-date inventory of Canada's energy resources.

This recommendation of the royal commission envisages that reports and studies containing such information will be of great assistance to the public in general, and particularly to those who are interested in questions relating to energy. In addition, Mr. Chairman, I think this board has the powers of a royal commission, and a royal commission always publishes its reports. The same practice is followed by the restrictive trade practices commission, so I feel sure the minister would have no objection if this clause were amended, because I am certain the minister does not want to have another series of hidden reports.

I should like to move, therefore:

> That clause 23 be amended as follows:
> That the word "shall" be substituted for the word "may" and that the words "with the approval of the minister" be deleted from the clause.

Mr. Churchill: I am interested in the remarks of the hon. member, which were helpful, and were marred only by the use of one sentence in which he said that I would not likely want to have another series of hidden reports. I have had no hidden reports. The hidden reports were on that side of the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the Minister of Labour on unemployment insurance?

Mr. Churchill: I have had nothing to do with hidden reports, except through complete misrepresentation of facts on the part of my friends who are not sitting here on the floor of the house.

Mr. Bourget: We want to prevent that; that is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. Churchill: This is one of the important duties of the energy board, to study and review in order that they may give advice and make recommendations on matters relating to energy and sources of energy. We have discussed this at the resolution stage and on second reading. We examined very carefully recommendation No. 20 of the Borden commission, and we did not accept all of it with regard to the publication of these reports. It is for that reason that we worded this clause 23 as it is worded, that such studies and reports of the board, made under this part, may be made public with the approval of the minister.

This does not limit the board; the board may make its investigations and carry out its proper functions. Some of the subjects listed for study might quite rightly include matters which the provinces consider to be subject to their jurisdiction, and the publication of reports simply upon the authority of the board might cause unforeseen difficulties on a jurisdictional basis. Consequently it seemed wiser that reports of this nature should be made public with the approval of the minister.

I think it would be quite wrong to make it mandatory for the board to publish every subject which they have had under internal review. That would limit the effectiveness of the board. There might be subjects they would want to review and look into very closely which they would feel hesitant about doing if they were compelled to publish their findings on some matter where perhaps confidential information had been obtained, or on a matter which went beyond the jurisdiction of the energy board. So with all these facts taken into account, as well as others which might be stated, we considered it advisable to word the clause as it has been worded and we are not in a position to accept the amendment proposed.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, we think the case which is being made to have these reports made public is an excellent one. We think it is a great mistake for the government and the minister to take the attitude that the reports which are made by this board, which is set up by parliament and paid for by parliament should be handed to the minister and that the minister himself should decide whether or not they should be made public.

Matters that the board can undertake for study, of course, embrace a very wide field, but I would say it is a field which should be disclosed, an area where the light of day should be let in. They may make studies as to the recovery, manufacture, processing, transmission, transportation, distribution, sale, purchase, exchange and disposal of energy and sources of energy within and outside of Canada. I think this is public business. When the board of transport commissioners hear evidence as to rates, all the evidence is taken down and it is available to the public. The studies the board of transport commissioners have been recently making into the equalization of freight rates have also been published, and we feel the government should not be taking this power to cover up and conceal reports that properly should be made public.

The amendment which is before the house is acceptable to us. However, we had an amendment drafted in somewhat different terms. With great respect to the legal advisers of the official opposition I, as a farmer, would say that this amendment drafted by non-legal people is a superior one. It would read as follows:

> That clause 23 be amended by deleting the words "may be made public with the approval of the minister" and substituting the following:
> "Shall be laid before parliament by the minister within 15 days of their completion, or if parliament is not then sitting on any of the first 15 days next thereafter that parliament is sitting."

This, of course, would nail the government down to a specific date.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. We are now discussing an amendment moved by the hon. member for Levis, not the English or other merits of another potential amendment.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, that is hardly a point of order, because I am advancing a suggestion as to how the amendment now before the house could be improved, and I think it is very much in order. I go one step further than the amendment, because the amendment says the minister shall make it public. We say not only should it be said that the minister shall make it public, but that parliament itself should detail by what means it shall be made public and within what limits.

This amendment, of course, is taken from many statutes, and would require that within 15 days of the meeting of parliament all reports in the hands of the minister at that time shall be laid before parliament, or if parliament is in session, then within 15 days of receipt of the report it shall then be made public. We feel that nothing but good can come from having these inquiries made public. We think if the people of this country themselves could learn from time to time of the fabulous profits which are being made in this industry, the public opinion which would be brought about because these reports had been made public would exercise itself and would result in lower rates.

The minister has said that if the reports were to be made public it would narrow the scope of the board and would make it more difficult for the board to make certain inquiries. I would say that the board would be in a much stronger position if it knew that the reports it made would be made public and would not just gather dust in some of the recesses of the minister's office, and that many many hours of very hard work would be wasted because the minister did not have time to give full consideration to the reports. If the studies on these public questions outlined in clause 22 are to be made public, we feel that there should be written into clause 23 not only that the reports be made public but that they may be made public within 15 days of the meeting of the House of Commons.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I want to deal with the argument advanced by the minister. He referred to the Borden commission report, paragraph 20, and I would point out that we are back at the difficulty we discussed last night. The Borden commission report merely provided that the board should have authority to do certain things; it was a permissive section. The scheme of clause 22 of the bill is, as to subclause 1, that it is mandatory on the board. The bill before us makes the board a court of record, and I thought the minister's argument was rather dangerous in that he was putting forward the proposition that the reports of a court of record were not to be made public. I think he really extended that argument much further than he intended. The extent of his argument, so that it could have any applicability at all, would be to reports under clause 22(2) and not under clause 22(1). It is a distinction upon which I would like a little more elaboration.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is aware of the fact that I was discussing the advisory functions of the board, and that nothing I said had any relation to its operation as a court?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, I am very well aware of that. I am talking about the advisory functions under clause 22, and the studies and reports under that clause.

Mr. Fulton: It is not a court of record in that respect at all.

Mr. McIlraith: The very point I made last night was that it is a court of record here; and that is the way it will read—regrettably, in my opinion. This is the point I raised earlier, as I think the minister will agree, with regard to clause 10(1). The contention, then, is that the studies and reports of a court of record should not be made public. Surely that is going beyond what the minister intended to argue.

Mr. Churchill: I am sure I did not say that. I certainly did not intend to do so.

Mr. McIlraith: The point I wish to make is this. We have charged this board with making these studies and reports. The parliament of Canada has given the board this responsibility. They are not in any shape or form confidential reports to the government, so this question does not arise with respect to them. Surely then, unless the minister has some other argument to address to this point, they should be made public as are any other documents prepared by a public board under its statutory authority.

It is one thing to argue that confidential reports obtained for the use of the government should be confidential, but that was not the point raised by the minister at all; and that point, if it were raised, could only be applicable to subclause 2 of clause 22. It seems to me the reports should be published in the same way as the reports of royal commissions, and that parliament should have a right to them as it has a right to any other public study. The minister has no discretion to decide whether or not parliament should have such documents, and I am curious to know why he wants to have a discretion of this kind with regard to the type of report we are considering.

Mr. Lambert: Might I answer a couple of the points which the hon. member for Ottawa West has made? I think the purport of clause 22, subclause 1 is that the reports are made to the minister and not to parliament. That is quite clear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All reports are. They must be.

Mr. Lambert: In this case they are not reports to parliament, they are reports to the minister. On this question of publicizing studies I suggest to members of this committee that there might well be very many areas in which the government might require the board to make certain studies of a confidential nature, and one does not have to go far back into history to find an instance of a similar body which had studies of this nature under its jurisdiction. If this body had been required to publish its reports as required by this amendment the area in which the government was moving would inevitably have been indicated. I feel that in the interests of security alone, to cite only one example, a mandatory requirement that all reports be published would be most unwise.

I suggest, further, that the board might make confidential inquiries from certain organizations, and that this amendment if accepted would immediately destroy this basis of confidence. Thus I believe that the amendment goes much too far and would involve us in a great deal of difficulty.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. member permit a question in order to clarify the latter part of his argument? Is he suggesting that the reports and studies which the board carries out of its own volition under subclause 1 are confidential? Is it not a fact that such confidential studies for the benefit or advice of the government as he has mentioned would only be undertaken under subclause 2, and that his argument about the reports being confidential would therefore only apply to reports made under subclause 2?

Mr. Lambert: I do not know why a distinction should be made. Certainly those reports made under subclause 2 should fall particularly into the class to which I referred. However, the board could conceivably of its own volition make certain studies the immediate publication of which as required by the present amendment would not be in the public interest.

Mr. McIlraith: What, then, is the purpose of the studies and reports made under subclause 1 if it is not to inform parliament and to inform the public? If the arguments now being advanced are to be accepted, I respectfully suggest that there is none, and that subclause 1 of clause 22 ought never to have been included in the bill.

Mr. Lambert: I suggest that the hon. member might give consideration to one field of study, namely where certain information is gathered in relation to government policy.

Mr. McIlraith: That is under subclause 2.

Mr. Lambert: It could also be under subclause 1. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate my meaning.

Mr. McIlraith: I have never heard it argued before that reports of the kind dealt with in subclause 1 are confidential documents for the use of the government. I cannot recall any similar proposition being asserted. I agree there is an argument with respect to subclause 2 when the government requires certain information in order to formulate policy on certain subjects, but surely the type of study we are considering under subclause 1 is for the benefit of the public, in order to protect the public interest, and for the benefit and information of parliament. I am mystified why government supporters are applying a proposition which might be argued with reference to subsection 2 to the whole of the section.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. gentleman this. Suppose this board made intensive studies of atomic energy which is, of course, one of the great energy sources. Does the hon. member for Ottawa West suggest that all these studies should be made public?

Mr. Fulton: Including the recommendations?

Mr. McIlraith: As a matter of fact I think those studies should be made public. I think the atomic energy control board is the body charged with dealing with security matters in the field of atomic energy. Under this bill the energy board is not given responsibility for security matters at all. I think if the minister would look at the legislation on atomic energy he would find that I am correct. This emphasizes an earlier criticism which we were making of this bill, namely that it involves unnecessary duplication. I do not intend, of course, to raise that whole subject now.

Mr. Green: Does the hon. member suggest then, that this board should have no power whatever to study anything having to do with atomic energy which is the subject of security regulations?

Mr. McIlraith: I suggest that this legislation gives the board no power to do so.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): The hon. member for Ottawa West has asked whether there would be any likelihood of disclosing any information which by its nature should not be disclosed. He referred to subclause 1 and I will read, if I may, the opening paragraph:

> The board shall study and keep under review matters over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction relating to the exploration for, production, recovery, manufacture—

And so on. I think we have a neat parallel in the conservation acts of two of our provinces. I am not too familiar with the act in Saskatchewan, but the Alberta conservation board makes reports similar to those here envisaged. It is a body of record and, at the same time, it has certain advisory functions. When the energy board receives, as it no doubt will, the co-operation of industry, much of the information that it will obtain from industry is certainly going to be of a confidential nature, industry having spent considerable money to develop the resources and reserves.

I suggest that one of the ways they will obtain that co-operation is on the assumption that information that is confidential is not going to be made public. I suggest that the parallel of the conservation boards of our two provinces is a good one. Of course they publish reports, but they are not going to publish confidential information of companies competing one with the other.

Mr. McIlraith: The confidential information would not be contained in the report. It would form part of the evidence on which the report is based. There is nothing here providing for the publication of the evidence.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I know, but I would have some concern about this, and I think the hon. member will appreciate what I am about to say. Without the discretionary power of the minister there is a risk that the information contained in the minutes, evidence or reports conceivably could become public, and the discretionary power vested in the minister would serve as a safety check.

Mr. McIlraith: Is the hon. member aware how that problem is handled by the tariff board at the present time? They deal with great volumes of confidential information all the time, and all their reports are made public immediately. They have no difficulty whatever on that score. It is an old problem concerning which there is a vast amount of experience. I think the tariff board is the best example I could use to answer the hon. member's argument. The statistical information the board gets from companies is confidential, yet it publishes all it reports.

There is another question I want to ask the hon. member. He made reference to certain parts of subclause 1. What importance does he attach to the words "as it considers necessary or advisable in the public interest" when dealing with the recommendations of the board? If the reports are to be reports of the board as to what it considers advisable in the public interest, surely it should not be discretionary on the part of the minister to decide whether or not the reports shall ever be made available to the public. Surely that is not the position of the government on this point.

What is the point of setting up a board to report to us on what is necessary or advisable in the public interest if we cannot find out what is contained in the board's report? What is the board to be, a monument of futility? Is it to work and prepare its reports only to have them filed away? What is the purpose of expending this vast amount of money in setting up this kind of organization if we are not to know anything about what it is doing? How are we protected in that way?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, when I spoke earlier I believe I incorrectly said or implied that the Borden commission had recommended that such reports as we are talking about should be made public. That was incorrect on my part and I want to make it clear.

In reply to what was said by the hon. member for Assiniboia, or as a result of his remarks, I wish to make it quite clear that what I was talking about was the advisory function of the board. I believe the hon. member for Assiniboia got off the subject and began discussing the functions of the board as a court, the public hearings the board would be holding to receive evidence, and so on. There is no intention at any time of having that type of work of the board not made public.

I believe the hon. member for Assiniboia was attempting to create the impression that some sort of concealment was being considered in this regard. The subject matter under discussion was the advisory function of the board and the type of report it would make from time to time to the minister. We have considered this fully, and though I have listened with interest to the suggestions made by hon. members opposite we feel we cannot accept the suggestions that have been proposed.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, in his argument on the amendment the minister referred to provincial jurisdiction and said the releasing of such reports might interfere with provincial jurisdiction. Subclause 1 of clause 22 clearly provides that the board shall study and keep under review matters over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction relating to the exploration for energy and sources of energy within Canada, etc. Would the minister suggest that such matters coming under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada should not be made public?

Mr. Winch: I want to follow up on the same argument. The wording of clause 22 is very clear, but what I cannot understand is the apparent contradiction between the attitude expressed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce a few moments ago and that expressed by his parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Argue: Which one?

Mr. Winch: The one who in the last 24 hours has been acting as parliamentary assistant and whispering a great deal into the ear of the minister, and who yesterday sat alongside him and who this afternoon sits behind him. It may be that the shadow is before the sunlight. Because this board is responsible to parliament and under this clause is charged with the responsibility of studying and keeping under review matters coming under the jurisdiction of parliament, why should not every report be made public? There are no considerations of national security as far as I can see.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he not think that the words "within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada" might mean within the jurisdiction of the federal government, as distinct from matters coming within the jurisdiction of the provincial government? That is the whole purpose of those words.

Mr. Winch: Why should not the parliament of Canada know all about it?

The Chairman: Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. Argue: No, Mr. Chairman. When the committee rose this morning we had heard a number of arguments as to why this amendment should not pass. One of the strangest arguments that we heard was from the Minister of Public Works who said that if the board should undertake an inquiry into atomic energy it was something that would not be published or should not be published. I should like to criticize that statement on two grounds. First of all, I do not think it is the intention of this bill—and the minister can say whether or not this is correct—to have the board inquiring into the field of atomic energy and making reports about atomic energy. The second thing—and this is even more discouraging—is the attitude of the government that any inquiry into the field of atomic energy is something that should be kept a state secret. This is greatly overdone. The scientific facts about atomic energy are not only available to Canada but to all of the countries of the world. This represents more a state of mind on the part of the government than anything based on any sound argument or any real fact.

Another argument that we have had advanced—this has already been dealt with a number of times; a completely fallacious argument—is that this has to be secret, or the provisions for keeping it secret must remain, because the board might be inquiring into something under provincial jurisdiction. This is a rather strange attitude for the government to take. First of all, I do not know why under clause 22 the board would be inquiring into things that are under provincial jurisdiction because it specifically states that:

> The board shall study and keep under review matters over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction—

Why would the board be wandering into the fields of provincial jurisdiction? Then, there is the further qualifying phrase in the same subclause:

> —as it considers necessary or advisable in the public interest—

Surely, these two provisions make it necessary that all of these reports should be made public. We are having a great deal of difficulty I would think, Mr. Chairman, in dealing with this measure because we are getting answers from so many people. The bill is in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. This is what the bill says, but some of the questions are answered by the Minister of Public Works, some are answered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the advice of the Minister of Justice who was sitting with him part of the time this morning, and then we have a couple of candidates for parliamentary secretaryships, or potential parliamentary secretaries, competing one with the other and with the minister in the field of answering questions. I do not see why we should be getting replies from parliamentary secretaries who have not yet been appointed.

An hon. Member: They have no right to answer.

Mr. Argue: They cannot answer for the government; they can speak, but when we ask the minister a question and a would-be parliamentary secretary gets up and says "I will answer that", it is hardly a reply from the minister.

The Chairman: We are talking about the energy bill and not about eventual nominations for the positions of parliamentary secretary. It would be appreciated if we came back to the bill.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I have been discussing the variety of replies, the confused replies and the great difference in those replies. One had atomic energy in the bill and another had atomic energy outside the bill. At one moment we have to be careful to keep those studies secret and hidden because the board may even be inquiring into matters under provincial jurisdiction and the next time we have, of course, the bill itself quoted, which says they have no business inquiring into things which come under the jurisdiction of the provinces because they are to inquire into things that have to do with the business over which parliament has control.

I am rather surprised, that a party that spent such a long time campaigning while in opposition about hidden reports, against secrecy, against the power to cover up matters which should be open to the public, is the very one that is taking these far-reaching powers to keep hidden from the public things which are, in my submission, of a public nature.

I would appeal to the government to give sympathetic consideration to the amendment which is before the committee. Surely on the basis of the limitations of clause 22, clause 23, the one now under discussion, should be amended in such a way as to require the minister to publish studies and reports which have been submitted to him by the board.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. McIlraith: Just before the question is put, would the minister mind answering two questions? He made reference to matters of security under the atomic energy legislation. Will he agree that the atomic energy control board, by the legislation of this parliament, is made responsible for matters of security on that subject? Second, does this legislation give the energy board any responsibility for security matters on that subject?

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is correct with regard to the security functions performed by the atomic energy control board, and under this legislation the energy board would be careful to observe any security that was required with regard to atomic energy.

I might say while I am speaking that the hon. member for Assiniboia is expressing some surprise. I in turn am surprised that he should be so critical of what has really been a fine display of co-operation on this side of the house. His party is so distraught with disunity that perhaps he doesn't understand how a party can work together in co-operation, as has been done here.

Mr. Argue: You mean they are all speaking with authority.

Mr. Churchill: They are speaking with an understanding of the subject matter under discussion which has perhaps escaped my hon. friend.

Mr. Argue: I see you are speaking for your colleagues.

Mr. Churchill: My hon. friend is trying to make out that there is some intent to conceal. That is not the case at all. This is just the normal precaution with regard to studies and reports which, as I mentioned before the lunch hour, might infringe upon confidential information supplied by or obtained from companies that are conducting business operations. There is no intention here to impose such strict limitations that nothing that the board studies will be made public. On the contrary, I imagine that most of what it deals with will be published in the interests of informing the Canadian public. This is a precautionary clause which has been introduced into the bill and we like it the way it is.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not think the test merely is that the minister likes it the way it is. In the first part of the remarks which the minister has just made I think he stated the position correctly with respect to atomic energy and really in effect destroyed the argument he made as to any reason for the minister not tabling these reports on the ground that they would invade the field of security as to atomic energy because the responsibility for security on that subject is and remains with the atomic energy control board.

The other argument he made before the noon adjournment about a possible invasion of the field of provincial jurisdiction has been disposed of because the only studies or reviews the board can make are limited by clause 22 to those matters over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction. Finally, he put forward an argument on the basis of confidential reports, but I point out that the reports referred to in subclause 1 of clause 22 are not confidential reports. They are recommendations that the board makes of its own volition and which it considers necessary or advisable in the public interest. I do not see that the minister has advanced an argument for rejection of the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Bourget) negatived: Yeas, 15; nays, 48.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the government has been unable to accept the amendment to clause 23 and its position in that regard has now been confirmed by a vote of the committee. The amendment would have dealt with all reports and studies under all parts of clause 22. But perhaps the government may be able to take a different attitude toward a different type of amendment. As I understand it, the minister said that the earlier amendment was undesirable because it might conceivably result in the publication of reports or studies which conflicted with provincial jurisdiction or might result in making public confidential information. Perhaps that difficulty, if it is one and we do not think it is much of a difficulty, could be removed if the amendment in respect to publication were restricted to clause 22, subclause 1, because, whatever may be the intent of subclause 2, there is no question that in subclause 1 studies and reports are only made by the board on matters within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. That is so stated in that subclause. Furthermore, there is no question of reports or studies being made under that subclause except on the initiative of the board itself, not on the request of the government. So by limiting the amendment to that subclause that particular difficulty should be removed.

As to the other alleged difficulty respecting confidential information, again that does not seem to me to apply to clause 22 (1). There is no question of confidential information being made public by reports initiated by the board any more than there is a question of such confidential information being made public by the reports initiated and made by the tariff board, all of which are made public. Therefore perhaps the government's difficulty in regard to altering this part in order to give publicity to those studies, which surely is desirable, might be removed through an amendment which I have much pleasure in moving as follows:

That clause 23 of the bill be amended by striking out the words "this part may" and substituting therefor the words "clause 22 (1) of this bill shall", and by striking out the words "with the approval of the minister."

Clause 23 would then read:

Studies and reports of the board made under clause 22 (1) of this bill shall be made public.

Mr. Lambert: What about those under clause 22 (2)?

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the minister not going to say something in answer to the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact that hon. members want information, which I am prepared to give at any time, but this appears to be simply a debate along similar lines to the one that was carried on before the lunch hour, and I think all the facts have been covered.

Mr. Pearson: Obviously the minister has not understood the amendment because the debate before the lunch hour and subsequent to the lunch hour, which has been concluded by the vote just taken, was a debate on a proposal to change clause 23 to make it obligatory for the government to publish all reports and studies under subclauses 1 and 2 of clause 22, not only reports made by the board on its own initiative but reports and studies made by the board at the request of the government.

The purpose of this new amendment is to remove the government's objections put forward to the effect that these reports might be of a confidential character or might be on a subject within provincial jurisdiction. Now that kind of objection cannot be taken to clause 23 as amended because it relates only to clause 22 (1) and in 22 (1) reports can only be instituted by the board on subjects within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. They could not be confidential in the sense that they could not be published, any more than the reports of the tariff board are confidential. Surely, the minister would have something to say on that.

Mr. Churchill: If my hon. friends want to debate the subject at length, I am quite prepared to do so. However, I understood that they were hoping to get along with reasonable speed, and they have been very cooperative. I have no reluctance whatever about entering into the debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I quite appreciate the minister's position. Can he tell us what reasons he has for not accepting the amendment offered by the Leader of the Opposition which only refers to clause 22 (1). The minister is safeguarded on the matter he raised earlier because clause 22 (1) provides that the board shall report from time to time to the minister and shall recommend to the minister such measures within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada as it considers advisable in the public interest. This part still remains in 22 (1) and, in so far as the objections raised this morning by the minister are concerned, that safeguard is there. What I am asking the minister is, can he tell us what reasons he would have for not agreeing to this amendment.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Churchill: I do not accept the hon. member's conclusions that the arguments advanced this morning do not still apply to clause 22 (1). However, it seems to me there is a considerable difference between subclause (1) and subclause 2. Subclause 2 deals with formal studies and formal reports which would be documents presented to the minister for consideration. Subclause 1 suggests that the board shall study, but it does not say they will prepare long, documented studies. It says they shall study and keep under review certain matters and they shall report from time to time to the minister. This could be done by virtue of verbal reports such as one receives all the time from officials and from bodies such as this. Similarly, the board could recommend to the minister verbally that various measures should be considered.

Subclause 1 does not deal with the type of formal studies and reports that are mentioned in subclause 2. I think on that ground the argument of my hon. friend is extraordinarily weak, and the amendment would not achieve the objective that they have in mind in any case. This is the way I see the problem, and I do not see that there is any advantage in pressing this amendment. I do not see that it will assist in any way to improve the act. The board will be a competent board and the information that needs to be brought to the attention of the public in the national interest certainly will be because that is the policy of this government. This is not a subject in which there is any concealed activity to be expected. The whole purpose is to advance the interests of Canada through the functioning of an energy board dealing with this immensely important subject of energy. We hope this advancement will take place through that medium.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has not really made out a very strong case. It is true that the board, pursuant to the powers given to it under clause 22 (1), is not called upon to make written reports. Some of its reports, as the minister has indicated, may be oral. In that event, of course, the only way by which information could be given out would be by interrogation in this house, by voluntary statement in the house or outside by the minister.

But if the board is going to discharge its functions under clause 22 (1), namely study and keep under review matters over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, and make reports thereon, it is quite conceivable, as the minister admitted, that there would be reports which could be tabled in this house. There is the safeguard that they are not to be tabled unless it is thought by the minister to be in the public interest to have them tabled.

The minister, as a lawyer, knows that what is said in these debates will not assist in any way those who have to interpret what this clause means after the bill has become law. The courts, in interpreting these clauses, are not permitted, under the rules of evidence and interpretation, to ascertain the meaning of a clause by observing what took place at the time the particular clause was adopted in the legislature. The good intentions of the minister, therefore, will not help future litigants or others concerned.

In any event while the minister himself may have the best of intentions and may intend that written reports shall be tabled provided they are not contrary to the public interest, he is not a unique creation of the Creator endowed with immortality, in terms of his person and in terms of his particular tenure. Next week he may become the minister of external affairs, for instance; I do not know. His successor is not likely to have the same good intentions that my hon. friend has. I suggest to him that while I appreciate, as one who has piloted measures through parliament, the reluctance of a minister to see his own special creation emasculated beyond the proportions that he, himself, had devised, I suggest to him that the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition, which really represents a compromise from the original amendment, is one to which the minister, in pursuing his present interest, ought to accede.

The minister would, I am sure, facilitate the passage of this and other clauses if he readily acknowledged that there is real merit in this suggestion, and accepted it in the spirit which I know animates him as he pursues this very heavy project.

Mr. Pearson: The minister's argument that you can really trust us, or rather you can really trust me, has no real validity in application to this legislation. If, for the sake of argument, we can trust the government, they are not immortal as my hon. friend has pointed out. If we carry the argument to even more extreme lengths and assume a situation where they are not in office and my hon. friends on my extreme right are in charge of the government, and this legislation is on the statute books—

Mr. Argue: We would make it public.

Mr. Pearson: I am carrying the argument to extreme lengths—we see where this argument might lead. If we had a C.C.F. government in power, we might never get reports at all.

Amendment (Mr. Pearson) negatived: Nays, 62; yeas, 20.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 24 agreed to.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I think as we are coming to the conclusion of part II, may we revert to clause 22, because I had a question to answer on that clause asked by the hon. member for Villeneuve.

The Chairman: Is the committee agreed that we revert to clause 22?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 22—Board to make continuing studies and reports.

Mr. Churchill: The question which was asked me was with regard to possible duplication of effort, and I think reference was made to recommendation No. 18 of the Borden report. That recommendation reads as follows:

> That such divisions or branches of the various departments of the government of Canada now concerned with oil and natural gas related matters and whose responsibilities would properly come within the jurisdiction of the national energy board be transferred to its jurisdiction.

The question concerned the number of divisions within government circles which would have some responsibility to these and related matters. It was considered rather difficult to express a transfer of these functions in legislative terms and that after the energy board was set up the departments which were concerned with studies similar to those to be conducted by the energy board would review their position and see whether or not their activities would be curtailed in any respect. I had a search made of the various departments of government and crown corporations that have some work going on related to that which will be undertaken by the energy board, and if the committee would like a list of them I am quite prepared to give it. They are arranged alphabetically.

First of all there is, as has been mentioned, the atomic energy control board. Then Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which does research and standards on domestic heating. The defence production department on its purchasing side has something to do with sources of energy. Then there is the dominion bureau of statistics, naturally. The external affairs department has a function to perform, or at least an interest in the licensing function of the national energy board, where international movement of energy and energy sources is concerned. The finance department naturally has an interest in the national energy board, but not in the research side of it. The international joint commission, as was mentioned in the Borden commission report, will be doing work which will be of interest to the national energy board concerning the export of electricity. The mines and technical surveys department indicates considerable activity in fields which are related to those that the energy board will be surveying.

The national defence department is concerned only with regard to the question of fuels for their purposes. The national research council does quite a bit of work with regard to building research which has to do with heating appliances. Of course, the national revenue department exercises control with regard to imports and exports under its customs and excise division. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is active in research matters on energy and requirements through its economics division, water resources branch, and mining and lands division. The northern Canada power commission puts forward policies regarding production of power in northern Canada and the maritimes. The Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation might perhaps be considered as an interested party here. The tariff board would be interested in policy matters regarding import controls.

The Department of Trade and Commerce has its energy studies branch, a branch which has been largely responsible for the immense amount of work which had to be done prior to the introduction of this bill. The standards branch is interested in the export of electrical power and exports and imports of gas. The chemicals division of the commodities branch has an interest in petrochemicals and oil and gas; and of course the department generally in connection with external trade. The board of transport commissioners, as I mentioned in the earlier stages of the debate, will transfer its duties to the national energy board and be concerned only with instances where pipe lines cross railway lines. The Department of Transport will obviously have an interest in matters of transportation of energy and sources of energy when consulted by the national energy board.

Those are the areas in which there might be some duplication of effort, but chiefly I would think it would lie in the work now being done by the mines and technical surveys department and the northern affairs and national resources department. I think if any overlapping will occur, it will occur there. Experience will show to what extent some of that work might be continued under those departments, and what part of it might rather be performed by the national energy board and the information obtained by that board made available to these departments which are interested.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, the minister has answered by giving a long list of departments and agencies which are concerned with energy and sources of energy. That shows there may be a duplication, as the minister has said, and I think we should try to avoid this.

The minister said before, I think in the debate on second reading, that it was not the intention of parliament to incorporate those agencies in this new organization, and we are all in favour of that. We want the board to operate separately and we want some other agencies to operate separately. The question is how much duplication there will be, how much expansive operation there will be due to the fact that this board is authorized to do research and investigation, and so on, on all matters concerning energy and sources of energy.

I think this should be clarified. For instance, how would the dominion coal board be related to the energy board? This we should know, because coal is a source of energy. We should also like to know how the international joint commission will be related to this new board, and how the atomic energy control board will be related to this new agency. What about the water resources branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and any other departments which are concerned? I think this should be clarified, and for this reason I wish to propose an amendment to clause 22 subsection 1 which reads as follows:

That subsection 1 of clause 22 be amended by addition of the following words in line 20 after the words "sources of energy":

"for which the board has regulatory responsibility."

Mr. Churchill: I appreciate the hon. member's interest in this matter and his desire, which coincides with our own, that there shall be no unnecessary duplication of duties and, as a result, added expenses. I am pleased that the hon. member introduced the word "regulatory", because there is a sharp distinction between the functions of the board in its regulatory and in its advisory duties. Here we are dealing with the board's advisory functions, and if this amendment were accepted those advisory functions would be restricted to areas in which the board has regulatory responsibility, that is, electricity, gas and oil.

Our conception of the advisory function of the board is much wider than that. We are hoping that the national energy board will keep under review all the sources of energy in this country and that its review would range over the entire field. This would not interfere with the work presently being done by the dominion coal board—we gave that careful consideration—nor would it interfere with the work of the other bodies which have been mentioned. The energy board would, for example, draw upon the information available to the dominion coal board in order subsequently to advise the government and thence parliament as to the part coal would play in the over-all picture of the use of the energy resources of this country. Similarly, the entire field of energy would be subject to study and review by the energy board without interference with duties now being performed by the dominion coal board or Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, the research council and so on. Surely hon. gentlemen opposite will agree that the information available from these bodies should be studied by the national energy board which would consolidate that information, review it and, on that basis, make recommendations and give advice.

Mr. Pearson: I can appreciate the point which the minister is making, but inevitably the information which he has just given us does show the variety of government agencies engaged in these fields of energy and underlines, surely, the danger of duplication and overlapping with resultant confusion and, perhaps, unnecessary duplication and expense. The minister is no doubt aware of the operation of Parkinson's law as applied to government procedure and there is the danger—and it is a human danger—that the new energy board when set up will be subject to the temptation to carry on its investigations and researches into every field of energy, because that is what it is authorized to do by clause 22(1). There is no limitation on its activities. The men responsible for this board will be men of ability and initiative, and they will naturally wish to extend their researches into all fields of energy. That, surely, involves the danger of duplication, because there are boards which have been operating in this field for a long time, charged with duties which they have been carrying out effectively.

We have been concerned about this danger as, no doubt, has the minister himself, and if the amendment which we have suggested is not considered suitable for the purpose I wonder what steps the government visualizes as being suitable? Will the energy board be given supervisory control over all researches in this field or is there to be an intergovernmental committee which will include representatives from all the main bodies to ensure that duplication of effort and expense will not take place.

Mr. Argue: This is a restrictive amendment. What the official opposition is endeavouring to do is to restrict the powers of the board, even its advisory powers, its ability to make inquiries. The opposition wishes to restrict the board even in this respect to the very narrow field over which it has regulatory responsibility. What they are really trying to do is to prevent the board from obtaining the knowledge of the broad field of energy in this country which is essential to the making of intelligent decisions on the particular types of energy over which the board has regulatory responsibility. I may be wrong, but I can imagine a great development of atomic energy in this country—atomic energy becoming economic and more widespread in use—and the board then having to decide whether or not a great many gas and oil pipe lines should be built across this country.

Mr. McIlraith: In such an eventuality is this situation not taken care of by subclause 2 of clause 22?

Mr. Argue: I think that clause says that the minister shall make these requests.

An hon. Member: It would be for the minister.

Mr. Argue: All of a sudden the members of the official opposition have great faith in the minister. For a while this morning they were very cautious about him and careful that his jurisdiction should be well defined. They did not want him to have hidden reports. Now they say he has enough power; that the power he has under paragraph 2 is such they would like him to restrict the powers of the board and weaken the knowledge it has with regard to energy matters other than those over which it has regulatory responsibility, making the board dependent upon the minister making a decision under subclause 2. I think that the opposition in advancing this argument have advanced it because they wish to advance a great many amendments. At a previous stage of this debate, to which I may refer only briefly, they were most uncomfortable. They voted for the bill. They got into bed with the government, but then the government embarrassed them by calling a vote on second reading and putting them on record. Now they want to retreat from this very inept decision which they made by trying to show how different they are from the government over matters of detail. In their enthusiasm to show their difference they are really endeavouring to restrict the knowledge of the board and therefore its effectiveness. We in this group have consistently advocated those things that we feel would enable the board to do a comprehensive job, to have adequate powers and not be interfered with or dictated to by the minister. We therefore feel that this restrictive amendment should not be supported.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, we do not feel at all uncomfortable about this and the other amendments. Unlike my hon. friends to my immediate right we are not content to make wild, general and vitriolic statements on second reading designed to attract the attention of the press. Second reading is over and we are now dealing with the provisions of the bill. As an opposition should, we have studied these provisions and are providing amendments designed to make the bill a better one.

Mr. Argue: Others have read it for you, you mean.

Mr. Pearson: Procedure of this kind may not get into the headlines or attract the attention that these large and histrionic speeches do on second reading—

Mr. Argue: Excellent headlines.

Mr. Pearson: —but the course we are following is a constructive approach to the consideration of legislation. I hope the hon. member for Assiniboia will offer his helpful support to those provisions which he feels he could support and I trust he will vote against those which after careful study he feels he cannot support.

Mr. Argue: That is exactly what I have been doing. I will vote against it.

Mr. Pearson: After these introductory remarks I may say I do not think the point made by my friend the hon. member for Assiniboia is very well taken because the amendment in question would prevent the duplication of investigatory work. That is all we are seeking to do. If the investigatory work of the board as this amendment suggests is restricted to the functions given to the board by regulation we may be certain that the investigatory work of other boards will be similarly restricted and will result in a saving of unnecessary investigatory work. Therefore, without placing a restriction on the work of this board or any other energy agency, through the acceptance of this motion we will help prevent the duplication that sometimes makes for inefficiency and always makes for expense.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), is talking nonsense. What we want is to safeguard the standing of existing agencies.

I think the dominion coal board will feel encroached upon, and a loss of prestige, if this new board is allowed to consider all problems relating to coal. So would all other agencies, and that is what we want to avoid.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member says we did not bring this up on second reading. If the hon. member will go over the speech I made then, he will find that a substantial part of my remarks dealt with this matter, and he should take due note of this fact.

That, sir, is our reason for moving this amendment, to maintain the prestige of agencies which have to continue their work. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) did say that they would continue to work as in the past, and we concur in the government's views in this respect.

(Text):

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Dumas) negatived: Yeas, 15; nays, 65.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 25—Who may construct or operate pipe lines.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I often regret the inability of my untutored layman's mind —I am not even a law student—to follow the complexities and subtleties of legal language, but there is something in this clause I do not understand and no doubt the minister will be able to explain it to me. Clause 25 (1) reads as follows:

> No person, other than a company, shall construct or operate a pipe line.

In the definitions outlined in clause 2 of the bill, subclause (c) reads:

> "company" means a person—

I wonder if the minister will explain that.

Mr. Churchill: I appreciate my hon. friend's grave difficulties. I recall some of the struggles I went through such as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is now enduring. In reading the interpretation clause you must not stop at the word "company". The full sentence reads:

> "company" means a person having authority under a special act to construct or operate pipe lines.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): At first when my leader was raising this point I thought he was going to make a slur on the minister's profession and mine but he carefully avoided any suggestion along that line and asked a perfectly proper question, how we should reconcile the words "any person" in clause 25 (1) to the definition in clause 2 (c).

I should like to ask another question on clause 25 (1). The clause says that no person other than a company shall construct or operate a pipe line. Does that mean that no one can hope to obtain a licence to construct such a project unless it is an incorporated company? Does that mean that an individual could not undertake such a project if he wanted?

Mr. Churchill: No person unless he has authority under a special act to construct or operate a pipe line; "unless" is stressed.

Mr. Pearson: I see, thank you.

Mr. McIlraith: I have a suggestion to make at this point. It seems to me that the next 25 clauses are lifted almost entirely from the Pipe Lines Act. It would make for better order in considering these clauses if when they are called the minister would indicate which clauses are taken from the Pipe Lines Act, which are taken from that act but partially changed and which are new.

Mr. Churchill: I will try to do that. Clause 25 (1) is modelled on the first part of section 10 (a) of the Pipe Lines Act as amended. I might go on to say that subclause 2 of clause 25 is based on the latter part of section 10 (a) of the act as amended. Subclause 3 of clause 25 is section 2 subsection 4 of the Pipe Lines Act.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 26—Operation of pipe line.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps the minister would give an explanation.

Mr. Churchill: Clause 26 has no counterpart in the Pipe Lines Act. It complements clause 25 (1) above dealing with the operation of a pipe line.

Mr. McIlraith: There is something here that I wanted to have clarified a bit. It arises out of our discussion yesterday of this bill in the committee stage. It becomes clear that certain very large interprovincial and international pipe lines are, by the legislation now before the committee, being released from any regulatory control; that is, a class of pipe line of the nature of the one incorporated by special act earlier this year, namely Foothills Pipe Lines Limited, which under the former legislation would be required to come before the board of transport commissioners in order to get leave to construct its line, with all the protection to the public that that might imply. But under the new legislation such a company, if it carries out the purposes expressed in debate by its proponents, rather than merely the things it is authorized to do under its act of incorporation, will not be required to apply to the board for a hearing and a certificate before it constructs its line.

I want a little clarification because I am not too clear in my understanding of that point. I want to point out the implications of that to the committee. When one reads the debates when that special act was before the other place it becomes clear that it envisages construction of a very large pipe line over an international border. Indeed, it may very well be that when they come to that stage it will be a duplicate pipe line, having separated—I am not too familiar with the technical terms—a particular form of gas produced in the area into two forms, and that there will in fact be duplicate lines side by side to take the products off in separate forms. One will come under the regulatory provisions of the act and the other will be excluded from the provision of the act. Will the minister clarify that a bit for me.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend was incorrect in his statement that the line to which he was referring, which carries sulphur, is not now regulated by the present oil and gas Pipe Lines Act, which regulates company pipe lines transporting oil and gas, and does not regulate a pipe line such as the one to which he refers. The present bill similarly is not taking under regulation that particular pipe line.. Subsequently in the legislation we will suggest to the committee an amendment which would give that and similar pipe lines not transporting hydrocarbons certain other rights that are in this legislation with regard, for example, to the expropriation of lands.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to point out that the definition of oil and gas in the old legislation —I will not rehash this discussion— was considerably wider and it may well be that the Pipe Lines Act would have covered the particular pipe line I have reference to. In any event, there is another control over that under the legislation being repealed. If they are not now under the oil and gas legislation, then they come under the provisions of the exportation of power and fluids act, that other legislation which is being repealed.

Just before this clause carries there is one other question I wish to raise. As I read this now it exempts companies which are not incorporated by special act, and which do not come under the definition of company in this bill and which are now operating pipe lines, from requiring a certificate.

Mr. Churchill: This is intended to carry forward section 10 (a) which is section 2 of the present Pipe Lines Act. The amendment was made in 1953 and that amendment said:

> Nothing in this section shall be construed to prohibit or prevent any person from operating or improving an extra-provincial pipe line constructed before the 1st day of October, 1953.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the point is a little different.

Mr. Churchill: That referred largely to the line running from Montreal to Portland.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the point is a little different. There are some companies that are not companies within the meaning of this legislation operating pipe lines. There is a distinction between the former legislation and this legislation in its implications for such companies.

Mr. Churchill: Has the hon. member any definite companies in mind that he could name? We do not recall any at the moment.

Mr. McIlraith: I have definite companies in mind; yes, but I prefer not to name them.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 27—Approval of board.

Mr. Dumas: I have a point that I wish to have clarified in view of the fact that plan, profile and book of reference are mentioned in this clause. I think this is an exact copy of the Pipe Lines Act.

Mr. Churchill: Section 11, yes.

Mr. Dumas: But it is much different from the Railway Act. Section 170, subsections 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 mention plans and profiles. They do not mention any book of reference. In the province of Quebec plans and the book of reference can only be certified by the minister of lands and forests. They cannot be certified by the secretary of any board; they have to be certified by the proper provincial authority. I doubt whether this is legal because section 171 of the Railway Act, subsection 7 reads:

> In the province of Quebec the portion of the railway comprised in each municipality shall be indicated on the plan, and in the book of reference, by separate number or numbers.

This could be added to clause 29 but I do not know whether it should not be added to clause 27, in view of the fact that the book of reference is mentioned there, because the book of reference cannot be certified by the secretary of the board; it has to be certified by the provincial authority.

Mr. Churchill: I would be quite content to stand this clause to consider the point brought up by my hon. friend.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Dumas: When we come to clause 29 it might stand also. I will not press the question but I should like the minister to stand clauses 27 and 29. Maybe his legal advisers can throw some light on the matter.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Does the committee agree to stand clauses 27 and 29?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clauses 27 and 29 stand.

On clause 28—Application for certificates; material to be filed.

Mr. McIlraith: Is this from the Pipe Lines Act?

Mr. Churchill: The Pipe Lines Act, section 12, subsections 1 and 2.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 30—Effect of approval.

Mr. McIlraith: Is this from the Pipe Lines Act?

Mr. Churchill: Clause 30 is section 14 of the Pipe Lines Act.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 31—Time for acquiring lands.

Mr. Churchill: Clause 31 is section 15 of the Pipe Lines Act.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 32 to 35 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 36—Approval of deviations.

Mr. Dumas: Is clause 36 the same as section 20 of the Pipe Lines Act or is there any difference?

Mr. Churchill: May I indicate here that sections 13 to 19 inclusive of the Pipe Lines Act refer to those clauses up to and including 35. Any that I did not mention as we went along are derived from sections 13 to 19 of the Pipe Lines Act. With respect to clause 36, subclauses 1 and 2 are the same as subsections 1 and 2 of section 20 of the Pipe Lines Act. Subclause 3 differs from subsection 3 of section 20 of the Pipe Lines Act to a certain extent. I have an amendment to be proposed in connection with clause 36.

Mr. Green: I move:

> That subclause (3) of clause 36 be amended by striking out the words "lessening a curve, reducing a radiant, or otherwise" in line 38 on page 12.

Mr. Churchill: By way of explanation I might say that the words it is now proposed to strike out were carried forward from the Railway Act into the present Pipe Lines Act. We have received representations from within the pipe line industry that these words are not usefully applicable to pipe line construction and that is why we have suggested that they be dropped.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The important thing is change or alteration.

Mr. McIlraith: There is another point here. I have not the exact reference to the Pipe Lines Act but I understand that there was a limitation on the amount of deviation there could be without filing new plans. That limitation, which was 300 yards, has been taken out altogether. Would the minister explain why that was done?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Subclause 3 of clause 36 differs from subsection 3 of section 20 of the Pipe Lines Act in that the extent to which a pipe line may deviate from its planned course and still be allowed exemption from the provisions of this section is now discretionary with the board and is no longer a fixed figure of 300 yards. In the past such definite limitations have proved embarrassing when the need to skirt large and unforeseen obstacles has arisen requiring in some cases a deviation of only a few yards more than the maximum limit, and in view of the short construction season in Canada it has been felt that everything possible should be done to avoid unnecessary procedural delays during the actual building of a line. That accounts for the slight change from the older act.

Mr. McIlraith: I point out to the minister that he has put no limitation whatever on it. I can understand the necessity of raising the 300 yard limit but does he not think there should be a limit of some kind? Was any consideration given to that point?

Mr. Churchill: The board, you see, determines the route in the first instance and we thought it would be best left to the board to make that decision rather than to write a limit into the act because experience has shown that when a definite limit is written into the act some difficulty arises.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 37—Board may order diversions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is this from the Pipe Lines Act?

Mr. Churchill: Section 33 of the Pipe Lines Act, and no change.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 38—Leave to open line.

Mr. Dumas: Are there any changes?

Mr. Churchill: Clause 38, subclause 1, is identical with section 34 of the Pipe Lines Act. Subclause 2, grant of leave, has no counterpart in the Pipe Lines Act. It gives authority to the board to grant leave to operate and this clause is designed to ensure that all lines are inspected in the interests of public safety before they are opened. That inspection can be carried out in several ways, by personnel from the board, by private engineers who might submit affidavits of inspection to the board, or on the basis of evidence derived from the company that satisfactory tests and inspections have been made. We are leaving it to the board to determine how that evidence shall be obtained.

Mr. McIlraith: There is another point involved. The minister will recall our discussion last night on another clause regarding the use of the term "transportation" as applied to the moving of oil through a pipe line. I will not repeat the discussion that took place on the earlier clause, but he will note that this clause merely uses the word "transmission". Has he considered whether or not the word "transportation" should be added here in the light of the discussion last evening on the other clause?

Mr. Churchill: Consideration was given to this matter after the discussion yesterday and we reached the conclusion that the verb "transmit" and the noun "transmission" might be better than "transport" or "transportation" in instances in the act other than where we first inserted the word "transportation", which was with regard to the definition of a toll. There it was an all-inclusive definition, but elsewhere in the bill such as here the words "transmit" and "transmission" would have their ordinary meaning and include everything that is embraced by "transport" or "transportation". It seemed that perhaps it would be unnecessary to use two expressions throughout the bill when one conveys the meaning that is intended.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 39—Safety.

Mr. McIlraith: What is the explanation of this?

Mr. Churchill: Clause 39 is taken from section 35 of the Pipe Lines Act, except that the regulations referred to must now be approved by the governor in council. My statement applies to subclauses (1) and (2), but subclause (3) is not from the Pipe Lines Act. This is the paragraph that provides for penalties.

Mr. McIlraith: I did not catch the explanation for subclause (3)?

Mr. Churchill: Subclause (3) does not come from the Pipe Lines Act, and was introduced here to indicate the penalties for violation of the regulations.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 40—Leave to construct power lines.

Mr. Robichaud: This clause has to do with the issuance of a certificate before proceeding with construction of power lines. I understand that it follows the main lines of the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act, section 6, subsection (30). This seems to be different in that under the exportation of power act a permit is required, whereas under this bill a certificate is required. Can the minister explain why there is that change?

Mr. Churchill: That is correct; in the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act there was a licence requirement. This is now changed to a certificate of public convenience and necessity which makes this provision parallel with other provisions in the bill dealing with gas and pipe lines.

Mr. Robichaud: In order to clarify this clause, may I give an illustration? The New Brunswick Electric Power Commission is exporting power to the state of Maine at certain periods of the year. Will they come under this clause of the bill?

Mr. Churchill: Clause 96 of the bill should be looked at for an explanation of this clause. Clause 96 states that every person who, on the day this act comes into force, is operating an international power line, is entitled to a certificate. This certificate would be issued and would take the place of the licence now in existence.

Mr. Robichaud: I shall want more information about this when we come to clause 96.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 41—Material to be filed.

Mr. McIlraith: Clause 41, I take it, is putting into the bill what was in the regulations under the act being repealed?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, and these clauses are running parallel to the earlier sections, 27, 28, 29 and 35 of the present bill.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 42—Regulations.

Mr. Robichaud: I understand that this is an entirely new clause which was not covered under the old exportation of power act. Can the minister explain the purpose of this clause?

Mr. Churchill: It is again running parallel with the sections which provide for oil and gas pipe lines and gives the board power to make regulations. It may differ in minor detail from the ones that would apply to pipe lines.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): How can the governor in council or the board in any way give power with regard to the registration of property or the duties of the registrar of deeds, when these matters are within the competence of provincial authorities?

Mr. Churchill: The way it reads, starting in clause 35 and continuing, these phrases are the headings that you will find earlier in the bill and they are just repeated here, the registration of plans, profiles, books of reference, and so on.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That may be, and my hon. friend probably has a very good explanation, but how can my hon. friend define what are the duties of the registrar of deeds, and so on, with respect to these plans and profiles? Surely only the provincial legislature can set out the duties of the registrar of deeds?

Mr. Churchill: This was provided for in clause 34 with respect to oil and gas, and here we are simply making provision to do the same thing for electricity.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, I know, and I am not quarrelling with that. I just want to understand the section because it seems to me that any duties that the registrar might have could only come from the authority that is concerned with property and civil rights under the B.N.A. Act, that is the provincial authority.

Mr. Herridge: Can the minister explain how this parliament or the board, with the approval of the governor in council, can make regulations with respect to the duties of the registrar of deeds who is a provincial official and comes under provincial jurisdiction?

Mr. Churchill: This was drawn originally—

Mr. Brooks: I believe that this clause means that the registrar of deeds would receive instructions as to the way in which the plans would be filed or the way the details would be recorded in the book of the registry office. The board would give instructions as to the manner in which the details were filed. I think that is continually done in the provincial offices of the registrar.

Mr. McIlraith: It is probably a technical objection, but this parliament seems to be seeking to interfere with the duties of a provincial official.

Mr. Churchill: I think because of the reference to international power lines this gives the dominion some interest in the matter.

Mr. McIlraith: It gives them an interest, undoubtedly, and gives them the right to regulate international power lines, but not to make regulations as to the duties of the registrar of deeds. There is unfortunate wording here, but I take it the clause is taken from previous legislation that has been in use.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 43 agreed to.

On clause 44—Issue of certificates.

Mr. Argue: Clause 44 sets out under what conditions, and for what reasons, the board may, subject to the approval of the governor in council, issue a certificate in respect of a pipe line or an international power line. The board will have regard to the following: The availability of oil or gas; the existence of markets; the economic feasibility; the financial responsibility and financial structure of the applicant, and the public interest that, in the board's opinion, may be affected by the granting or the refusing of the application.

I should like to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that there should be one further condition placed in this clause which would provide for control by Canadians of the companies to which certificates may be issued. This is a proposal that, in the past, has been very dear to the hearts of hon. members opposite, namely that in the construction of gas pipe lines in particular these companies involved should be Canadian companies and should be controlled in this country.

It should almost be unnecessary to set forth the reasons why it is preferable to have a Canadian company. We see to a growing and alarming extent the further alienation of Canadian resources to outside interests and capital. The government has said in this legislation that it welcomes both foreign and Canadian capital; but even if that is the position which the government takes, I think that the interests of companies erecting pipe lines should be Canadian.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I would like to move the following amendment:

That clause 44 be amended by adding the following:

"Provided that no certificate shall be issued to an applicant of which less than 51 per cent of the common stock is owned by residents of Canada or by companies deemed by the board to be controlled in Canada."

We remember a previous debate, a particular pipe line debate, in which the position of the government party, which at that time was in opposition, was that the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company should be Canadian-controlled. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, because we are interested in having the greatest amount of control by Canadians of Canadian industries and natural resources, we feel that this amendment should commend itself to the house. We have before us the report of the royal commission on energy. It shows to what a very large extent the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company is controlled by outside interests. Surely hon. members opposite would agree that this company is an example of the type of company which has the type of control against which we should guard. This provision does not, of course, imply public ownership; it merely states that in the development by private companies of oil and gas pipe lines certificates shall be issued only to companies wherein 51 per cent of the common stock is owned by residents of Canada, or by companies deemed by the board to be controlled in Canada. This would remove Canadian pipe line companies from control by Texas buccaneers or other kinds of buccaneers outside this country. We hope, Mr. Chairman, that the government will give sympathetic consideration to this amendment.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I think the committee is entitled to a reply from the minister as to the attitude of the government on this proposition and whether the government thinks it is reasonable or not. Perhaps it likes the general idea. It might wish a different percentage of the common stock in the amendment or might wish it changed in some minor way. But I do feel that the minister owes it to the committee to state the position of the government on this proposition, which they have advocated many times in the past.

Mr. Churchill: I hesitated to intervene at this stage just as I did at an earlier stage this afternoon when my hon. friend was having a spirited exchange with the Leader of the Opposition, and I anticipated my intervention might start it again. However, I have no reluctance to answer the hon. gentleman. We have introduced into this legislation something entirely new, to be found in subclause (d) of clause 44, which reads as follows:

—the financial responsibility and financial structure of the applicant, the methods of financing the line and the extent to which Canadians will have an opportunity of participating in the financing, engineering and construction of the line;—

That latter phrase is new in legislation. The board is instructed by this clause to take full account of those matters, and particularly the opportunity for Canadians to participate. We thought that that was reasonable under the circumstances and that the board, with this guidance and its public hearings, would certainly be able to discover to what extent Canadians were given an opportunity to participate. Our conclusion was that with that written into the act it would not be necessary to state any specific percentage of stock that should be owned by Canadians. Rather let us wait for some experience in the operation of the board and then we will be guided. I am not suggesting that I have any further action in mind at all. I am simply suggesting that experience is helpful in all these matters, and we have gone a long way here in publicly declaring the policy of the government—and I hope it will receive the approval of parliament—that Canadians will have an opportunity of participating in these operations.

As I say, that is new. It is different from what has prevailed in the past and should provide the opportunities that we all hope there will be for Canadians.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, my reply to that would be this, that the committee should be entitled to a more definite indication of what the government's policy is as set forth in this clause. I asked that very simple question because of the fact that according to the first line of the clause the board may do certain things subject to the approval of the governor in council. It would seem to me that since the authority of the governor in council is required for the issuance of a certificate in respect of a pipe line or an international power line, the governor in council now must have some idea of what it means by subclause (d) to which the minister has referred, namely:

> —the financial responsibility and financial structure of the applicant, the methods of financing the line and the extent to which Canadians will have an opportunity of participating in the financing, engineering and construction of the line;—

I would say, Mr. Chairman, that as this clause now stands it is very nebulous, and indefinite. It is the kind of legislation that we find this government presenting to parliament more and more frequently. It is legislation that can mean all things to all people. I can imagine some American coming to see the government and asking what subclause (d) means, the extent to which Canadians will have an opportunity. He might easily get the answer, "Well, of course, there have been long debates about this in the past and it reads nicely for some people but we are not going to be very difficult about the extent; we are not really too concerned whether or not Canadians have the chance to obtain a very large proportion of the control of such a company." This is completely indefinite, as I say. The extent might be zero.

[Mr. Churchill.]

There is no guarantee that it means anything more than zero, because there is no definition whatsoever.

One does not even find such a word as "substantially". Merely "the extent to which". And then it goes on: "the extent to which Canadians would have the opportunity of participating in the financing, engineering and construction of the line." Nothing is said about control. Nothing is said about what proportion of the voting stock should be in the hands of Canadians. This very general and inexact clause really does not tie the government to any policy at all. It is so general that it may not carry out even the hint which is provided that Canadians may have some opportunity to participate in the financing, engineering and construction of lines.

As it now reads this is a most unsatisfactory clause. It does nothing to carry out policies which members of the Conservative party advocated when in opposition, because even without this clause Canadians could probably have some opportunity to participate in the financing, engineering and construction of many of these projects. The governor in council, with the requirement that their approval must be obtained before a certificate is issued under this nebulous clause, could completely overlook the need for Canadian participation in financing, construction and engineering, to say nothing about the control of the company involved.

This is the type of loose amendment that we see so often from this government. It is most inexact; it means all things to all people, and the Canadian citizen, reading it, will have no idea what is behind the government's move to include it in this bill. I think we require something more from the minister by way of a definite statement. I should like him to comment on what the objective of the government would be as to Canadian participation in the financing, engineering and construction of pipe lines. Surely the minister owes it to the committee to say whether or not the government feels that Canadians should play a substantial part in the financing of these projects. "Substantial" is a generous word, but it means something more than zero. To what extent will there be Canadian participation in the construction of the line and so on?

Amendment (Mr. Argue) negatived: Yeas, 3; nays, 65.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 44 carry?

Mr. Pearson: This clause is, of course, one of the most important in the bill. There were certain observations made about this portion of the bill during second reading which seemed to convey a wrong impression of what the clause could or could not do. It was argued by the Prime Minister when he was discussing the powers of the board that this clause ensured that there would be just and reasonable tolls, a matter of great importance. The Prime Minister also argued that this particular clause ensured that profits could not by any stretch of imagination be promoted which would be exorbitant or which would be extraordinarily high. Those were the words he used.

In fact, the clause makes no such provision. I cannot go as far as the hon. member for Assiniboia in arguing that there should be unreasonably restrictive provisions in a clause of this kind, for instance in respect of stock ownership by Canadian nationals. Our position on that matter has been consistent over the years and while we would naturally support any reasonable move which would assure for Canadians a maximum of control over Canadian activities, there are provisions in legislation which would be unnecessarily and unwisely restrictive and which would prevent the very kind of Canadian national development which they might purport to encourage. Nevertheless, while that kind of provision does not seem to us to be wise, to give the impression that this particular clause is an assurance that the board will take certain action and be able to prevent extraordinarily high profits being made or high tolls being charged is not justified by the language of the clause, because as I read it it is purely permissive in character. The words are: the board may do certain things. It is provided that the board shall take into account all such matters as to it appear to be relevant. And without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the board may have regard to various criteria which are set out, and which it may take into account in issuing a certificate in respect of a pipe line.

All this clause does, and we might as well be perfectly clear about it, is to advise the board that there are certain criteria which the legislation specifies which may be taken into consideration. A few moments ago the minister mentioned some of them—financial responsibility and the financial structure of the applicant, the method of financing the line and the extent to which Canadians will have an opportunity to participate in the financing, engineering and construction of the line. There is nothing in this clause which could possibly be interpreted by the board as an instruction to do anything. It is purely permissive in character, and while these may be very useful and a valuable criteria—criteria which the board, no doubt, may take into consideration—it is quite wrong to give the impression as the Prime Minister did the other day that this particular clause will ensure that tolls will not be exorbitantly high or that profits will not be extraordinarily great. I thought I would bring this matter to the consideration of the committee so that there would be no misunderstanding as to the exact meaning of this particular clause.

Mr. Churchill: We were just asking ourselves what was the exact meaning of the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition. It seemed to us he was getting forward into the other clauses which deal with tolls and tariffs. Here we are simply dealing with the issue of certificates and the considerations that are to be taken into account at the time the issue of a certificate is being considered by the board. Here we have set out the criteria that are necessary for the board to examine. I note that in looking back at the Prime Minister's speech on Tuesday, May 26 he commented upon this and listed the essential elements that appear in clause 44. We feel that this has no relationship to some of the matters to which the Leader of the Opposition has been referring. It is the issue of the certificate after the board has satisfied itself that the company making application is in a position to perform the functions that it considers it is able to do.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce have special reference to the observations made by the Leader of the Opposition. On a strict technical interpretation, part of what my hon. friend has said would have validity but the Leader of the Opposition, of course, was using clause 44 to make a general observation. If he had confined his remarks only to tolls, of course, he would have waited until he had reached part 4 with clauses 50 and following clauses, but he was just making a general observation prompted by the statement made by the Prime Minister as reported at page 4022 of Hansard of May 26 in which among other things the Prime Minister said:

> That is one of the most important considerations, the determination of just and reasonable tolls, not tolls that by any stretch of the imagination could permit of exorbitant or extraordinarily great profits without risk being attached—

There is nothing in this particular clause or in any clause of the bill that warrants that statement. That is the gist of what the Leader of the Opposition was saying. He was recalling to hon. gentlemen opposite their observations made on another occasion. We have been looking for an opportunity of ascertaining whether in any clause of this bill there was any provision that would prevent what hon. gentlemen have so frequently referred to on other occasions. This is the opportunity for them to implement these statements and allegations of another day.

We were told not long ago about the fact that this country economically was gradually, bit by bit, being dominated by another country, that strong steps had to be taken to protect Canadian interests vis-à-vis the invasions of even the friendliest country and in this bill, and certainly in this clause, as the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, there is no provision that would avoid exorbitant profits and no provision that would prevent any dominant group from any outside jurisdiction coming in and taking control of the situation provided for under clause 44 of this bill.

What the Leader of the Opposition has said was very relevant. What was said by the minister a few moments ago and earlier in the discussion of this bill and particularly on this clause has served to confirm the position that we in this party have taken with regard to foreign participation. The objective of all Canadians, of course, is to see to it that Canadians participate to the full, but in this stage of the development of our country we have not felt it was possible by regulation to take a firm stand in that particular. That was an honest position to take.

What was the position hon. gentlemen opposite took? This country was being dominated by the United States by way of the inflow of capital, by way of management of corporations, and the like. In this very clause the government would have had the opportunity of taking the step that would reveal that once in office the government was prepared to act consistently with these declarations on other occasions. While there is no fundamental issue taken with this clause it does afford us the opportunity of saying to hon. gentlemen opposite, including my hon. friend the genial Minister of Public Works who I think was among those who took strongest issue, that nothing is now being done by the government consistent with the position it took before and particularly during the election with regard to the domination of this country by those who supply capital by way of investment from the United States in Canada.

Mr. Green: Of course you are completely wrong.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the best kind of argument my hon. friend is capable of making when he is in a difficult position is saying I am wrong.

Mr. Green: You are always wrong.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is an assertion that simply adorns the fact that my hon. friend is in a very weak position. The fact is that this government made much of the fact that there was foreign capital in this country and of the domination by the United States of so many corporate structures in Canada, but when the government is given the opportunity in the legislation it formulates it does not do anything about it.

The government sat motionless the other day when there was a big announcement of the decision of the United States Ford Motor Company to take control by way of stock participation in the Canadian Ford Motor Company. Not one word was said at that time but there were these great words uttered from one end of Canada to the other during the election. This expression of new Canadianism is now received by this lethargic government with respectful silence, and when I refer to the government I include the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, we have just listened to the greatest exhibition of oratorical fence-sitting we have heard for a long time. We have heard the hon. member for Essex East saying that the government is in a weak position. There is no one in this committee in a weaker position on this question than the Liberal party so far as I can see.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We are consistent.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member for Essex East and the Leader of the Opposition got up and made speeches which, if they lived up to what they said, would indicate that they would have voted for our amendment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We believe in logic. We are consistent.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member for Essex East and I have a different understanding of the word "consistent". I cannot understand hon. gentlemen rising in their seats and in effect leaving the impression with the committee that they have always been as opposed to United States domination of capital in oil and gas pipe lines and other energy resources as this group has and at the same time saying they have no fundamental issue with the clause in question and accusing the government of the very thing of which they themselves are guilty.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, it is not very difficult to deal with the point raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West who is undoubtedly upset because a particular method put forward by those in that group for meeting this problem has not been found acceptable to those in this party. It is one thing to complain about the action of the government in these matters in the past and about the weakness of a particular provision but it is something else to introduce a provision which is quite unrealistic, unworkable and which would not accomplish the purpose which even those hon. gentlemen have in mind.

To put in legislation that an applicant must have a certain percentage of the stock held in Canadian hands and to make no provision for any change in stock ownership after that provision has been fulfilled makes no sense at all. You might have 51 per cent of the stock in Canadian hands at the time of the application and a week later only 10 per cent. For the C.C.F. to suggest that this particular problem is solved by this kind of amendment shows how unrealistic they are when it comes down to practical matters.

And now, Mr. Chairman, to turn to important matters, this particular provision does not deal with the question that my hon. friend has dealt with, and which has so often been in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, especially when they were over here: what can be done to ensure maximum Canadian control of Canadian companies?

I quite appreciate the minister's point that in mentioning tolls in particular I was anticipating perhaps another clause of the bill. But the fact remains that this is the clause in the bill which was put forward by the Prime Minister and others as a clause which would ensure that there should be no unwarranted, exorbitant profits. These are not the exact words he used but I think it is a fair interpretation of what he said. There is nothing in this clause which would necessarily bring about that result at all. All it says is that the board may have regard to the following in issuing a licence:

> The financial responsibility and financial structure of the applicant, the methods of financing the line—

So far as I can make out, this is the only provision in this legislation which bears on profits of pipe line companies that the board, before it should give the licence, may take into consideration. To suggest to the committee and to the country that this is a guarantee that there will not be extraordinarily high exorbitant profits, creates an entirely false impression. The government has done nothing whatever in this legislation to implement the expressions they used to use when they were in opposition any more than the C.C.F. have done anything practical in putting forward its amendment to meet this situation.

Mr. Herridge: In reply I wish to say that if the members of the Liberal party in the house at the present time, and particularly the hon. gentleman who has spoken on this, should agree with us that they do not want to see a domination of Canadian interests in this respect by United States capital and if we, because we are not lawyers—we all come from the producing section of society, the beaver section—are not as skilled as those who are learned in the law, if they mean what they say, they have their right now, if the amendment can be improved technically, to change the amendment to give expression to the views they have expressed in this house on the amendment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member has not followed what the Leader of the Opposition said.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 45—Objections of interested persons.

Mr. McIlraith: I wish the minister would explain the origin of this.

Mr. Churchill: This is modelled on section 12, subsections 3 and 4 of the Pipe Lines Act.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 46—Conditions to certificates.

Mr. McIlraith: May we have the same explanation?

Mr. Churchill: Clause 46 is modelled on section 12, subsection 5 of the Pipe Lines Act.

Mr. Robichaud: Section 46 is a very important one because it has to do with the terms and conditions which will lead to the issuance of certificates. It is most important in this case that the minister and the government should take into consideration that undue restriction can be more harmful than helpful in serving the purposes of this legislation. In other words, as desirable as the objective may be, we must be careful not to create restrictions of such a nature as to discourage the building of facilities instead of improving or extending such facilities. I hope the minister and the government will take this into consideration when the terms and conditions come into force which would probably be covered under the regulations.

Mr. McIlraith: Has the minister anything further to say on clause 46?

Mr. Churchill: There is no question about the importance of clause 46, which deals with certification. But I think we can rely on the board when it is issuing the certificate to set out the terms and conditions that are necessary in the circumstances, with each project being considered on its merits. I am not quite clear as to all these difficulties that are in the mind of my hon. friend.

Mr. McIlraith: If the minister will look at the clause he will find that there are some changes in this clause from the sections on which it is modelled, as taken from the Pipe Lines Act. As I read it, he has taken out the direct reference to the imposition of a time limit. It seems to me there is some real significance in that because on the leave to construct applications, it was usual to put in a time limit and if the time limit was not met the order then no longer had validity. Here we have a little different situation. The board is issuing a certificate which is final once it is issued. The matter is not quite as simple as the minister has indicated. It may well be that there is a good reason for the change, but certainly the committee has not been given it.

Mr. Churchill: Subsection 5 of section 12 of the Pipe Lines Act reads:

> Where the board grants leave to construct a line, it may impose such terms and conditions as it considers proper and may limit the time within which the company shall construct and complete the line.

We have left out the expression about limiting the time because that is included in the expression "such terms and conditions". It is just an improvement in drafting of clause 46 which is now before us.

Mr. McIlraith: With deference, I suggest it is not an improvement in drafting. In the other procedure they made an order as to the time, and if the order was not fulfilled the company was not free to proceed without further application. Now, having taken that procedure away, changed it, the certificate, as it is called, is still outstanding and still valid. That is the point I want to make. It may be there is some explanation and some proper requirement for the change.

Mr. Churchill: I would think that the time element would be expressed as a condition of the issuing of the certificate, so that it would not just go on indefinitely.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the point I want to have explained. It seems to me the time limit is not sufficiently covered or protected by the new legislation. This is the point I want to make. Perhaps it is covered in some other way.

Mr. Churchill: I grant that it is not mentioned. It is left to the competence of the board to determine that. In the old act all they said was they limited the time, without saying whether it should be six months or fifteen years.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. Under the old act if there was an order issued as to time, then the matter was ended if the company had not lived up to that time limit and had not in the meantime made application to have it varied or extended. I see no such right under the new legislation. It seems to me it is a small point which is not covered at all, but it could be quite important.

Mr. Churchill: There is no question about its importance, but I am sure that the board would have a time limit as a term or condition of its certificate, and that provision is made in clause 47, under which power is given to revoke and suspend a certificate if the terms and conditions thereof are violated.

Mr. McIlraith: Unfortunately, in so far as this point is concerned, the certificate is made final under the new legislation.

Mr. Churchill: It is made final but it can be suspended if the conditions are not met.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes; but under the former procedure it became inoperative merely by the passage of time without action being undertaken to have an order rescinded. Under the new procedure it requires an application and a hearing. It remains in force until steps are taken to rescind it. Was that intended?

Mr. Churchill: Whether or not it was intended, I do not think that it will affect the construction of pipe lines or the issuing of certificates seriously.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 47—Revocation and suspension of certificate.

Mr. McIlraith: Could we have an explanation as to the origin?

Mr. Churchill: Clause 47 is not from the Pipe Lines Act but is modeled on section 3, subsection 3, of the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act which deals with the revocation of export and import licences. This is an essential provision to be placed in the act and, as you will notice, in subclause 2 provision has been made for notice to the holder of the certificate and there will be a hearing so that he can put forward his case.

Mr. Regier: I notice we have passed a clause whereby the board may, subject to the approval of the governor in council, issue a certificate for the building of a pipe line or an international power line, and naturally there will be attached to such certificate all kinds of conditions to which the applicant will be expected to adhere. In clause 47, subclause 1; we are being asked to give the board the power of revoking a certificate once issued if in the opinion of the board the person to whom it was issued has violated or failed to comply with any term or condition thereof. I also notice that once again in this clause there are the words "with the approval of the governor in council". For the life of me I cannot understand why that phrase should be there.

Once a certificate has been issued upon the recommendation of the board and with the authorization of the governor in council, once the cabinet and the board have agreed upon the necessary terms and conditions, I completely fail to understand why the board should not then have the authority to exercise powers of enforcement with respect to the terms and conditions under which the certificate was issued. I do not see why the cabinet should want to retain the right to revoke or suspend a certificate. We feel that the powers of policing and the authority to enforce the terms and conditions under which the certificate has been issued should certainly be vested in the board and not in the governor in council. Therefore I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West:

That subsection 1 of section 47 be amended by deleting the words "with the approval of the governor in council".

Mr. Churchill: The reason the approval of the governor in council is required in clause 47 is virtually the same as the reason for the same approval in clause 44. You are dealing with such a major matter of business in issuing a certificate in the first place and then revoking a certificate in the second place that surely these things should not be done without the full knowledge, consent and approval of the governor in council. If a certificate has to be revoked that means the end of the operation of the company and it might create great distress and hardship far beyond the immediate circumstances leading to the breaking of any of the conditions in the certificate. The operations of a company under a certificate of public convenience and necessity may be vast, and surely my hon. friend would not suggest that any revocation or suspension of a certificate should not be reviewed by the governor in council. We are giving the board wide powers but not powers to that extent.

Mr. McIlraith: On the question of the amendment before the committee, it seems to us that since we have passed clause 44 which provides for the issuance of the certificate by the board with the approval of the governor in council it is not possible to have a different authority with the power to revoke. For that reason, regardless of what may be said about the powers of the governor in council, if they have it for the one they must have it for the other.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to say that is further evidence of using a verbal escape hatch to conceal a desertion of principle.

The Chairman: This amendment is rather inconsistent with clause 44 which has been approved and I therefore declare it out of order.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a submission on the matter of order.

The Chairman: The Chair is quite ready to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Regier: Thank you very much for your lenience. I realize that this may be out of line after you have made your ruling. However, in all humbleness I should like to submit that clause 44 sets out the terms and conditions upon which a certificate may be issued. When we come to clause 47 we come to an altogether different problem, the enforcement of the terms and conditions under which the certificate has been issued. It is one thing to legislate but it is an entirely different matter to enforce legislation and we are asking that the enforcement be divorced from the legislative authority.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I hope you will reconsider your ruling. I think this would be one of the dark days of the House of Commons if this kind of ruling were to be enforced. Surely no one is going to argue that because certain words appear in one clause of a bill you cannot move that those words be deleted in another clause. As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has pointed out so well, clause 44 sets out certain conditions for the issuance of a certificate while clause 47 sets out certain conditions for the revocation or suspension of a certificate. If you have not yet made your ruling firm, Mr. Chairman, I would appeal to the house leader to intervene. I know he is not in favour of the amendment but I feel he is in favour of maintaining the basic right of members of the House of Commons to move amendments, and clearly this is an amendment that is entirely in order.

The Chairman: Order. The ruling I made was based on my own personal judgment of the matter. Under clause 44 it is provided that the board, subject to the approval of the governor in council, may issue a certificate. Therefore it stands to reason in my view that the revocation of such a certificate must also be done by the same authority. However, I am quite willing to let the committee decide this matter although I consider personally that the amendment is out of order for the reasons I have given. I repeat that I am quite willing that the committee should be the judge of this situation if it so pleases the committee.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, we would have no objection to having this amendment put.

I realize Your Honour is worried about whether or not the amendment is in order, but under all the circumstances it would be helpful if the amendment could be put.

The Chairman: I must, in all frankness, repeat that I, personally, consider the amendment is out of order, but I offer to the committee the opportunity to judge on this amendment. Therefore, I am at present asking the committee if it is ready for this question?

Mr. Argue: I take it, Mr. Chairman, you are allowing the amendment to be dealt with by the committee when the appropriate time comes for a decision on the amendment? I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for having ruled this way, even after having some personal misgivings as to the nature of the amendment.

As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has said, this clause as it now stands would give the governor in council complete latitude to condone wrongdoing and the breaking of the rules by any company. Surely, it is one of the basic tenets of law that a decision of the court is not set aside by the cabinet.

In this instance, we have a board which has the right, in this case subject to the approval of the governor in council, to revoke or suspend a certificate if in the opinion of the board the person to whom it was issued has violated or failed to comply with any of the terms or conditions thereof. This board is almost powerless. This board is a creature of the cabinet. This board is a pawn in the hands of the cabinet. The minister has said on previous occasions they are going to do their best to get highly qualified men to become members of the board. They are going out across the length and breadth of this country to get highly qualified men to be members of the board, and then give them no power. The power that they have is merely the power to go to the cabinet and make representations. I am surprised at the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Ottawa West. He says if the company is set up at the will of the cabinet, then its life should become extinct also on the approval of the cabinet.

Mr. McIlraith: I am sure the hon. member would not wish to misrepresent what I said, and that is not the effect of what I said.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member can explain that when I have finished. As I understood it, he said a certificate is to be issued subject to the approval of the governor in council, so it should be revoked or suspended only with the approval of the governor in council. It seems to me that is saying that if the certificate is issued by cabinet authority then the cabinet should have the right to extinguish or not to extinguish the life of the company that has been given such a certificate.

If this board is to be worth its salt, if it is to be worth the price the public will be paying the members of the board, then the board should have some power. Surely, the people who are put on this board, of whom the government says they are going to be highly qualified, should have sufficient authority to ascertain whether or not in their opinion a given company has maintained the terms of its contract. If there has been a violation which in the opinion of the board requires revocation or suspension of the certificate the board should have power to act in that regard. If there are a number of companies that have been set up, and if there are a certain number that are breaking the contracts, then according to the authorization provided the governor in council under this clause the cabinet can decide which one of the number of companies will have its certificate suspended.

This opens the door to the government allowing a continuation of wrongdoing, a flouting of the law. This also opens the door to the cabinet playing favourites in so far as certain companies are concerned and discriminating against other companies. If there should be pampered pets of the government involved, then they could allow those companies to go free and no amount of wrongdoing or breaking of contracts would result in the cancellation of the certificate because the cabinet would be on their side. On the other hand, if the cabinet should decide that a particular company, for some reason, some personal reason of certain cabinet members, should have its certificate revoked, then of course that may be allowed. For the life of me I cannot understand why the cabinet requires this far-reaching authority.

We have heard so much in the past about the authority of the cabinet being dominant over our whole national life. I do not believe the former minister of trade and commerce, about whom we have heard so much concerning his desire to get so much power for himself, would have gone any farther than the present Minister of Trade and Commerce in introducing this bill. Surely, it is not something that goes with the portfolio; that once a man becomes minister of trade and commerce he seeks to be all-powerful. This is what the government is doing in this clause, and I am very much surprised at the stand taken by the official opposition in condoning this clause and in saying that they will not support an amendment which endeavours to curb cabinet power which could be used for only one purpose, which in plain English is to allow the breaking of the law by a company building a pipe line.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You have misstated our position.

Mr. Argue: I hope that the committee will turn down the clause as it now stands and support what we consider to be a very fair amendment, and one which should be supported if we are to protect the gas industry of this country against a cabinet that can condone wrongdoing and can play favourites amongst the companies.

Mr. Chairman, it is five o'clock.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: As there are a number of divorce bills standing for consideration in committee of the whole, is it agreed that in accordance with section 1 of standing order 54, they be referred to the committee of the whole in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MARCELLE FLORE TERREAULT WRIGHT

The house in committee on Bill SD-234, for the relief of Marcelle Flore Terreault Wright —Mr. McCleave—Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Winch: On clause 1, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I have been given to understand that there are a number of divorce bills of a very unusual nature requiring very special study by the committee. I understand that the committee is making a very special study of certain divorce bills on which there is a question whether or not they should be passed by the house. Have we the assurance of the chairman of the committee that of all the bills we are considering none of such a nature are before us at this time?

Mr. McCleave: I am afraid I will have to ask the hon. member to expand his question a bit. Does he mean that none of the cases before us this afternoon are of a questionable nature?

Mr. Winch: Are all those now before us not of a questionable nature?

Mr. McCleave: I could not give the hon. member of the committee any such assurance. I have studied the particular cases which are before the committee this afternoon. I would say there are several in the doubtful category; that is, that I myself perhaps have some reservations about. But when they were considered by the committee they did pass the committee.

FLAGS OF CANADA

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR A NATIONAL FLAG OF CANADA

The house resumed, from Friday, February 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Boulanger for the second reading of Bill No. C-6, respecting flags of Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will allow me to make a few brief remarks about this bill for the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag.

The matter has often been debated, and fairly recently, last February 20, 1959, it was again talked out, but comes up again this afternoon. Much has been said and written about this matter and I hope that the members of the house will limit themselves to brief remarks so that we can vote on that bill.

The Liberal party has been often criticized for its failure in the past to adopt a distinctive flag. In fact, a member of the present government the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) said, during the 1957 electoral campaign, as reported in the Nouvelliste of May 20, 1957:

Mr. Balcer stated that among concerns dear to French-Canadian hearts were those of a distinctive Canadian flag and of the appointment of an ambassador to the Vatican.

Whenever those matters were raised in the commons, he said, federal members from Quebec remained riveted to their seats until the question was put and then rose only to register their opposition.

It is therefore time that hon. members on government benches take a leaf out of the Solicitor General's book and leap at the chance they now have to state their views by voting for or against a distinctive flag. If they oppose the bill, we will see that it is the party now in power which does not want it.

We often hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) preaching national unity. Only recently, at a banquet in Montreal, he told his audience that he had a surprise in store for them which would reveal the cabinet's attitude while favouring national unity.

By this bill members of the house, particularly those on the government side, are provided with a splendid opportunity to give special attention to the matter. Members of the Conservative party, who profess to belong to the party of national unity, now have a chance to say whether they are in favour of a national flag.

A public survey has been conducted in the larger cities of Canada: Victoria, Vancouver, Edmonton, Saskatoon, Calgary, Toronto, London, Montreal and Saint John, New Brunswick. The result of that survey was published in the Canadian High Life News of January 25, 1958. In that survey, the following question was put to 1,200 students: "Do you think Canada should have its distinctive national flag?" The replies were 83 per cent in favour, 13 per cent against and 3.3 per cent undecided.

This proves once again that the time has come to reach a decision on this matter. If the people in Canada's large cities feel it is time to have a distinctive flag, I say and repeat that it is our duty as representatives of all Canadian citizens, to decide whether the matter of a distinctive flag should be settled today or again put off.

Mr. Speaker, when you see a country as under-developed as Ghana choose a national flag immediately upon being recognized as an independent state, whereas Canada, which contributes to assistance under the Colombo plan and helps underdeveloped countries of the world in their struggle for survival, has no distinctive flag, you cannot help feeling the absurdity of the situation which should be remedied once and for all.

A friend of mine who visited the Brussels fair was telling me that every country represented there was flying a distinctive flag, whereas Canada, if I remember correctly, flew the Red Ensign, the flag of our merchant navy. Such a situation is simply absurd. The more you go into the matter, the more you realize that it should be settled as soon as possible, in the best interest of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of dealing with this matter at any great length, and I urge hon. members to take this opportunity to indicate whether they are for or against the bill under consideration.

In closing my remarks, I ask the house to reach a decision and to put the matter to a vote.

(Text):

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber): There is no doubt in my mind that the great majority of Canadians do want their own flag, and this majority has been growing during the years. Undoubtedly two wars have played no small part in influencing Canadians into wanting their own flag, because thousands of young men who went to fight in other lands wanted a symbol of their own national identity. That is what a flag provides—national identification.

I do not blame the Liberal party for not having introduced a national flag during the 22 years when they were in office, but I do think it is a little ridiculous now for them to try to find evidence in favour of a flag when they had ample opportunity in the past to do something about it themselves. None of us in this house wants this flag to become a political issue. We do not want to create a division over something which can be a very emotional matter. What we must do is call upon that well-known Canadian characteristic—compromise. With our two healthy and vocal cultures, we have built our nation through compromise. If there is any controversy over this bill, I do not believe it arises over whether we should have our own flag or not; what we have to agree upon is the design of the flag.

Like all other hon. members I have received hundreds of suggested designs, some of them absolutely monstrosities, other meaningless and still others rather attractive. But a flag is not just a selection of colour and emblems. It is a tracing of history. That is why I believe we should have the Union Jack as our flag. The Union Jack is part of our history. It grew out of British history, which, in turn, is part of Canadian history. In a book called "The History of the Union Jack" by Barlow Cumberland, there is this description of a flag:

> National flags are not merely a haphazard patchwork of coloured bunting, nor meaningless things. Their combinations have a history and tell a story.

When we look back on this history of the Union Jack, the story it tells is one of continuous growth. Part of that growth has been provided by Canada. For instance this three-crossed Union Jack of Canada is the only flag on this continent which has always been a flag of liberty, a flag by which all men, as their birthright, have been created free and equal. Other countries, in their past, tolerated slavery, but as soon as a slave reached Canada he was free. That, surely, is a fact that should make us proud.

In most parts of this world today the red ensign with our coat of arms is recognized as the Canadian flag and it seems to us particularly fitting that this should be so. Canada is the senior member of the greatest federation or combination of nations ever seen in the world history—the British commonwealth of nations. In 1901 Australia adopted the blue ensign with six stars as her national flag. New Zealand also has the blue ensign with four stars, and the white ensign as her naval flag. Surely the red ensign, or the white ensign, would be especially fitting for Canada? The white ensign might well be chosen as a distinctive Canadian flag depicting the fact that we are a northern country of snow and forests. But whatever is chosen, whether the flag is red or white or blue, let us not obliterate the Union Jack from the design.

Three arguments are mainly used against the inclusion of the Union Jack. First, it is said that it indicates British sovereignty over Canada; second, that the Union Jack has no symbol in it to represent the French part of our nation; and, third, that the Union Jack means nothing to the ethnic groups in our country. Let us consider these three arguments one by one.

As to the argument that the Union Jack indicates British sovereignty over Canada, I do not believe that any thinking Canadian really holds that view today. In his heart of heart every Canadian knows that Britain has no desire or right or inclination to infringe on our independence, our sovereignty. As to the contention that the Union Jack bears no symbol in it to represent the French part of our nation, that is true, but if our French-speaking Canadians want some symbolic emblem in our new flag, by all means let us have it. If the fleur-de-lys answers that objection, let us have it; if the maple leaf answers it, let us have it. But the fact remains that the Union Jack is still part of Canadian history and it should be in our flag somewhere.

A great Canadian, His Excellency the Governor General, once made a speech which has been put into a book, and the title of his speech was "The Quest for Unity". He had this to say:

> The British tradition in Canada has fortified our sense of freedom. Today our association with the other nations of the commonwealth is an expression of political liberty. If it is sometimes said that the British connection is an evidence of "colonial subordination". Nothing could be further from the truth. The "colonial" point of view no longer exists as a factor in our national life, and is held by no thinking Canadian.

Then we are told that the Union Jack has no meaning for those ethnic groups who have come to this country and become Canadians. I cannot accept that argument, either. People from other lands came here by their own choice, knowing that the Union Jack was part of our history. They might well have been influenced by that very fact, because the Union Jack is a symbol of liberty, a flag by which all men, as their birthright, have been created free and equal. As a people I believe we are all too prone to tear down the old for the new and modern. It seems to me that in a rather immature way we appear to want to throw away all our traditions to show how grown up and independent we are.

On Christmas Day, 1957 Her Majesty the Queen in her broadcast issued this warning which I think applies very strongly to us at this particular time in our history in deciding about a flag:

> It is not the new institutions which are the difficulty. Our trouble is caused by unthinking people who carelessly throw away ageless ideals as if they were old and outworn machinery.

I believe that the Union Jack is one of those ageless ideals. It has been the inspiration of many deeds of heroism in Canada by French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians and Canadians from many ethnic groups. I say to this house, let us not throw out this part of our past and of our traditions as if it were old and outworn machinery. Let us have a Canadian flag but let us keep the Union Jack in the design of it.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, no one can quarrel with the large segment of our Canadian population that sincerely desires a distinctive Canadian flag. It is in keeping with the spirit of nationalism that is sweeping the world today, a spirit which can do great good and also great harm.

The bill before us is one way in which nationalism can be manifested and by which great harm could be done, not because of the content or the idea behind the bill but because the bill brings something which affects the emotional make up of Canadians into the political arena involving us in what you might call a cheap political trick because the bill says that the governor in council shall prepare the design, then put it to the house, and after winning the approval of the house and Senate it will be sent on its way for royal approval. You can well imagine what design at the present time would gain unanimity of opinion in the House of Commons.

This bill is not designed to promote national unity but in the way it is framed it is constructed so as to promote national disunity. I am sorry that the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) who sponsored the bill it not sufficiently interested in his own bill to be present in the house this afternoon while it is being debated so that I could address my remarks directly to him.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. gentleman has mentioned that the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska is not interested enough to be present during the discussion of his bill. The hon. member has personal reasons for being away from this house. Every hon. member knows the physical condition of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska. If he is not here today it is because he has reasons not to be here and it is casting a reflection on the hon. member to make such a remark.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly withdraw my remark about his not being interested in the bill but will leave the rest of my statement as it stands.

We have two great cultural groups in this land both with traditions that go back to their homelands in Europe. Those of French Canada were broken by the French revolution but the traditions of English speaking Canada, by chance, were carried forward without interruption. The contribution of French speaking Canada to the growth of this country and the development of our nationalism and to the position we occupy in the world today cannot be over-estimated. After the American revolution and during the war of 1812-14 it was French Canada that was a major bulkwark of defence against aggression.

The history of this country to a great extent up to very recent times has been the history of Upper and Lower Canada. I for one will pay tribute to the advantage we have had in the contribution of French Canada to maintaining our national integrity. The French culture has acted as a barrier against our absorption into the United States. But as we recognize the great traditions of the French speaking people so must they recognize the sources and origins of the traditions of the other main racial groups in Canada.

I resent such remarks as those made by the sponsor in introducing the bill on February 20, at which time he spoke about putting an end to spurious sentiment. Sentiment and tradition are two of the greatest things in our lives and as the previous speaker said they are not to be lightly dispensed with.

There is a form of "little canadianism"—and both words should appear in lower case letters—which can see subservience and domination in almost everything. At one time they saw it in the word "Dominion". I would expect they could see it in the procedure of this House of Commons because it is not a Canadian development but is modelled after the procedure followed in the parliament at Westminster. They might also see subservience in our laws which are based on the English common law system. Doubtless they see subservience in our present flag.

I say that this question goes beyond any consideration of subservience or domination. We must consider the question of what most truly reflects the aims, aspirations and wishes of the Canadian people as a whole, ignoring their ethnic background. Canadians comprise almost every race in the world today. Our traditions were influenced by two world wars in which thousands of young Canadian men and women served and lost their lives. There is scarcely a family in this country which has not suffered in this respect. Do we throw all of this overboard? Are we to say that the past means nothing and only the future is important? Individuals can do that but nations are bound by what has happened in the past as inexorably as we are bound to the fact that we are all fated to die some day.

I have with me a card showing the coats of arms of the provinces of Canada. Would you say that we in British Columbia are subservient because we have the Union Jack and the crown on our provincial coat of arms?

Mr. Drysdale: No.

Mr. Broome: And that the red cross of St Andrew, which appears in the coat of arms of Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario, makes them subservient?

Mr. Drysdale: No.

Mr. Broome: And that it is not fitting that the arms of Nova Scotia should have the cross of St. Andrew, the arms of Prince Edward Island and of New Brunswick should have the heraldic British lion. The lion is not a native Canadian animal. Should these things be dispensed with and thrown away? Is the answer, why not? The point I am trying to make is that perhaps the one thing I can agree with in the speech of the hon. member who sponsored this bill is what he said about Montcalm and Wolfe when he quoted the latin inscription which is carved in the monument on cape Diamond in Quebec city, which translates as follows:

> Gallantry united them in the same death. History awarded them the same fame. Posterity built them the same monument.

In that lies unity; in remarks of that nature lie unity. But when he refers to the fact that General Nasser disagreed with the uniforms our soldiers wore as members of the United Nations force—that was one reason he cited for a distinctive Canadian flag—I say it makes no sense. What I say is that this problem, this idea of a truly distinctive Canadian flag, is good nationalism, but it must be worked out in harmony and with consideration for the background of both of the main groups which comprise the Canadian people, and also it must take into consideration the newer peoples who have come to us. There must be give and take.

The one thing that I think as a nation we are outstanding in is that we can compromise our difficulties away; that we are always willing to give in a bit to the other side so that general agreement can be reached. It is by these methods that we can accomplish what the sponsor of this bill wishes to accomplish; but it must be done in some way that does not bring politics into the picture, because once it becomes a political issue then there is political gain or political disadvantage, and this is too great an issue and too important an issue to be handled in that manner. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this bill as it stands is something that I cannot agree with, because it ignores the way in which the people of Canada wish to resolve this type of difficulty.

Mr. Robichaud: Will the hon. member permit a question, since he was a bit confused in most of his remarks. Will he tell the house whether he is really in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag, or is he against it?

Mr. Broome: Actually there are two statements there. There was no confusion in my mind as to what I was saying. In regard to a distinctive Canadian flag, certainly I would like to see a distinctive Canadian flag.

Mr. Robichaud: With or without the Union Jack?

Mr. Broome: So far as my personal opinion is concerned, it happens to be my opinion that anything which ignores the background of the English speaking peoples, or which ignores the background of the French speaking peoples, would not be a truly distinctive Canadian flag.

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to go into the technicalities of the bill before us. I wish to discuss some of the principles of the matter and express the views of a third group of Canadians, neither English nor French. I think I have the right to reflect their ideas and thoughts; therefore I hope the house will bear with me if I make some remarks along these lines.

The question of a new flag is a very interesting one. We say we have grown up; we are no longer a British colony. But Canadians seem to be divided into three distinct groups on this particular question of a flag. I say there is one section of the country which wants a distinctive Canadian flag and which would eliminate the Union Jack and the fleur-de-lis; that is, we must erase all traces of the past that the Union Jack and the fleur-de-lis have stood for. Another section of our population wants a distinctive Canadian flag but it must have the Union Jack on some part of it. There is another section of our country that considers that discussion of the flag is taboo; it is something we must not discuss because it might hurt somebody's feeling. I feel, that when a matter of public interest cannot be discussed in a free country, that country ceases to be free. Therefore, if I am unduly frank in some of my remarks, I feel that I am in a free country which permits free discussion, and it is something that is our right and privilege.

I would go along with the hon. member for York Humber (Miss Aitken) but not in every respect. I do not wish to be repetitious, but yet I make reference to the fact that our sister nations of the commonwealth, namely Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, above all, have a Union Jack on some part of their flags. I will answer the question. I think Canada should have a distinctive national flag. I am not particular as to what colour it should be, I mean the whole field of it, whether it should be blue, red white or any other colour, but I have strong feelings, about the fact that it should contain a union jack of some kind. I cannot help it; it is in my bringing up. I remember that during the first world war when I attended public school we sang the song "We will never let the old flag fall." I still get a thrill when I think of it. I remember the song "Red, white and blue, what does it mean to you". It is ingrained in my generation, and I am neither of French nor Anglo-Saxon origin.

I feel that the Union Jack stands for something and that we just cannot wipe it out. It stands for our solidarity with the British empire, but not as a colony. We are not a colony. We are a sovereign nation voluntarily in the British commonwealth of nations and the Union Jack stands for that solidarity, for that empire. It stands for the tradition of freedom that we enjoy here and that people, whether white, black or yellow, enjoy wherever that flag has been planted, no matter in what part of the world. To me that flag stands as a symbol of the tradition of fair play and the tradition of British justice.

I think various sectors of our population owe a great deal to the Union Jack, and I am going to be quite frank. I have met Canadians of French origin who have confessed to me that the Union Jack meant something to them in that when the Union Jack was planted on the plains of Abraham those who planted it there did not treat them as a conquered people. That flag guaranteed them freedom of culture, freedom of religion, freedom of language and that agreement has been kept to the letter.

What does it mean to one of Anglo-Saxon origin? He brought it with him from his mother land. He brought it from England. What does it mean to the descendants of the United Empire loyalists who came to the Ontario wilderness from the colonies just to be under that flag? Their descendants have a right to their sentiment and it is a ridiculous statement for anyone to say that as a majority want a new distinctive flag the Union Jack must be wiped out altogether. That is a ridiculous statement just as it is a ridiculous statement to say that the ethnic groups which, according to some figures, comprise one-third of our population, want any other flag. I have still to receive a request from any of my fellow Canadians of any ethnic group, including my own, for a new Canadian flag. I do not think that question bothers them at all. They will be happy. Probably the young generation would be happy to have a new distinctive Canadian flag. But, as I have mentioned, there is this sentiment with regard to what the Union Jack stands for.

Some people say that we have no flag today. Yes, we have. The Canadian ensign is our flag. We are going to display it on all public buildings and public places when Her Majesty visits Canada. It is very easy to say that we have grown up but when my son grew up I did not expect him to throw away my name, the name I gave him. I did not expect him to throw away the traditions in which I brought him up. I did not expect him to forget the language I taught him.

Throw away the Union Jack? Why not throw away the idea of Her Majesty being our queen? Why not throw away all the parliamentary procedure we have inherited from the mother of parliaments? Why not throw away all our freedoms? Why not throw away our tradition of justice and fair play?

I am going to make my remarks brief, Mr. Speaker, because I should like to see others state what they feel they should contribute to this debate. But I am going to tell you one thing. When the boat on which my father came to Canada approached these shores he saw that flag and found refuge under it. That applies not only to my father but to millions of immigrants from all parts of the world. To them it meant the same thing as the statue of liberty in New York harbour. It has meant that to them. It meant that to my father because that flag guaranteed him freedom and liberty.

Finally, may I say that I cannot express myself too strongly. I am in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag and I do not care what colour it is. However, I feel very strongly, and I believe there are millions of Canadians who feel the same way I do, that on some part of it the Union Jack must appear. Otherwise we are breaking away from everything we have got. Otherwise we are going to become a satellite of the United States. We will be heading toward becoming the 51st state of the United States. I want to retain our connection with the crown. I want to retain our connection with Britain, not as a servant, not as a subservient colony, but as an equal, and we are treated as such.

We are all looking forward to Her Majesty's visit to Canada. Why, tell me why this should be done. We have the same queen, common laws and common justice. Are we ashamed of that flag? Are we ashamed of keeping company with New Zealand, Australia, Rhodesia and South Africa who have retained the Union Jack on their flags?

(Translation):

Mr. Robert Lafreniere (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, let my first remarks be an expression of deep sympathy with the former Liberal administration, particularly bearing in mind a resolution passed in January 1958, during a Liberal convention, in favour of a distinctive national flag. Of course, Mr. Speaker, you will appreciate the genuineness of my feelings because, as everybody knows, that wonderful, sincere and firm resolution was adopted by the former administration after having been in power for 22 years in this country.

Mr. Speaker, the matter we are discussing tonight is obviously of a very delicate nature. Thousands of Canadians have quite different opinions on this matter. Some favour an exclusively Canadian flag, others would like to see the past remembered, by leaving on the Canadian flag the Union Jack or the red ensign. Such views must be respected by both sides.

The Union Jack and red ensign should of course be referred to with great respect by all Canadians. Canadians of all racial origins, particularly during the last two wars, have fought under those flags. Many Canadians, of either English or French origin, dying on the battlefield, looked their last upon this flag which we revere and respect, whatever our origin.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, we must reckon with history, and with the years, and not only years past but years to come. Our nation—as none will gainsay—is still comparatively young. While we are about to celebrate the centennial of Canadian confederation, our history goes back to no more than three or four centuries. This country which is rich in possibilties, both in human capital and natural resources, is destined to play a tremendous part in the future.

If Canadians, whose predecessors started to consolidate the national unity in 1867 with the confederative pact, want to continue that work of consolidation, I believe that Canada should choose an exclusively Canadian flag, a distinctive flag.

Of course, in this country where I believe we enjoy a greater measure of freedom than in any other, a Canadian citizen—whether a Canadian-born or naturalized citizen—must be entitled to the same rights and privileges, whatever his origin.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to those two great races, the French and English, that pioneered this country, there are thousands of Canadians who have lived in this land for many generations. Some of them already form large racial groups that are worthy of respect.

What would happen then if each of those racial groups, already large and deserving of regard, should want to place on the Canadian flag the emblems of their own origins? It would of course lead to a practically inextricable situation. Each group would have excellent reasons for wanting on the Canadian flag an emblem reminding them of their origin.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that we should forget the glories of the past. Canadians of English origin, and Canadians of French origin have both played a significant part in the history of our country. But we must consider that Canada, being a young country, must look above all toward the future. It is for that reason, most of all, that in making these remarks in the house tonight, I say I am in favour of the adoption of an exclusively Canadian flag.

Before resuming my seat, I should like to stress again all the respect, admiration and veneration I have for our history. Our country has already glorious pages of history to its credit, but how many more remain to be written about this country, Canada, which today is considered as an adult country by other nations. I believe that we should be in a position to display at international gatherings, a flag which would clearly assert our independence, our will to grow and to progress. That does not necessarily exclude, Mr. Speaker, the reproduction on a Canadian flag of a certain emblem denoting the origins of the two great races which presided over the foundation of the country in which we are proud to live today.

(Text):

Mr. H. C. McQuillan (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that whenever I speak during the private members' hour I am always on the short end of the stick. I do not mind that a bit—

Mr. Winch: Do not talk it out.

Mr. McQuillan: —but it is almost as if they did not trust me because they think I will talk too long. I think perhaps a lot of the hon. members are like me—

Mr. Winch: Do not let it be said a member from B.C. talked it out.

Mr. McQuillan: Perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) could be quiet for a minute. Perhaps other hon. members are like me, but I know that whenever I walk up the hill it is a matter of pride to me to see the flag flying from the masthead. I am sure that, like other hon. members, my heart swells with pride because as a member from British Columbia this has been my flag. I think many people in Canada have recognized it as their flag.

Perhaps there should be a little more recognition given to the French background of a great part of our nation, but I feel that will come about in the course of time. I do not believe that by any stretch of the imagination a flag is going to make a nation of us. We first have to become a nation, and then we will evolve a flag, a flag which truly represents the nation of Canada. It is rather a coincidence that I am following my good friend the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lafreniere). I have had the pleasure of visiting him in Quebec city on two different occasions. I must say that I did not feel I was outside of Canada when I saw the fleur-de-lis flying from many of the buildings. I am sure that when they come to western Canada they do not feel that they are outside of Canada.

I believe that this whole question, Mr. Speaker, of a distinctive national flag will resolve itself as we become more and more a nation.

Mr. Speaker: Order; it is six o'clock.

Mr. Winch: I am ashamed that a B.C. member killed this bill.

An hon. Member: Who talked it out last time?

Mr. Speaker: It is six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Habel: Could we learn from the leader of the house the order of business for next week?

Mr. Green: On Monday we shall commence with the debate on the energy bill. When that is completed, we will take item No. 7 on today's order paper, the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act; item No. 8, the Bretton Woods Agreements Act; item No. 15, the resolution concerning Canadian National Railway Company financing; item No. 18, the resolution providing for additional judges; item No. 13, the resolution concerning the R.C.M.P.; item No. 12, the resolution concerning the Defence Services Pension Act; item No. 11, the resolution for the approval of the convention on the nationality of married women.

Hon. members will have heard the Minister of Finance say that he expected to ask for interim supply on Wednesday. There is a notice of motion which appeared on Votes and Proceedings today which will extend the hours of sitting of the house, in the hope we can get away before Christmas. This resolution will be taken, and I am not sure at what stage but it will be either on Monday or Tuesday.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1959-60

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1960, was presented by Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

(Translation):

PRIVATE BILLS

FOURTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table the 14th report of the standing committee on private bills, in English and in French.

(Text):

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONTRIBUTIONS OF FLOUR AND DRIED SKIM MILK

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I should like to make an announcement respecting two important matters which are referred to in the supplementary estimates.

It will be recalled that when the heads of governments of the NATO countries met in Paris in December, 1957 I brought forward a proposal for the establishment of a food bank among the NATO countries for use particularly in the event of any outbreak of hostilities. At that time I expressed the willingness of the Canadian government to play its part in the establishment of such an institution. The house was made aware of the facts of this question on July 19 of last year, during the debate on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Since then and throughout the year discussions have been going forward in NATO, and directly with interested countries, to determine under what conditions a Canadian contribution to NATO food stockpiles in Europe might be made. These discussions were most useful, and I am hopeful that it will not be long before it will be feasible for a Canadian contribution to be made effective.

I would therefore advise the house that the government has now decided to ask parliament to provide $10 million for the current year by an item in the supplementary estimates, such an amount to provide for Canadian flour for storage.

I would also, subject to the approval of parliament, like to say it has been decided to make available free of charge an additional 20 million pounds of dried skim milk to relief agencies, both national and international, for distribution to needy people in other parts of the world. While some of this milk will be used to meet emergency requirements, the bulk of it will be used to provide people, and particularly children, in the less developed countries with a supplementary source of food and a much needed means of balancing their diet.

Of the 30 million pounds which we set aside on the same basis for the use of relief agencies in the past year, nearly half has now been taken up by UNICEF, the Unitarian service committee of Canada, the Canadian Lutheran world relief agency, the Canadian council of churches and CARE of Canada. It is expected that the balance of the amount previously set aside, together with the additional supplies which are now being made available, will help these and similar organizations to carry on with the humanitarian work which they have been doing in other parts of the world.

These particular items are Nos. 506 and 510 respectively in the supplementary estimates.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the proposal for the establishment of a NATO food bank, which has been under consideration for some time, is one which certainly commends itself to those on this side of the house. This is one reason, Mr. Speaker, why we were somewhat discouraged a year or so ago—perhaps not as long back as that—when the United States state department representative indicated to the congressional committee that not much progress was being made in that direction. The Prime Minister has now announced that as far as Canada is concerned, a specific proposal has been made to set aside a certain amount—I think he said for flour—to initiate this NATO food bank.

If this food bank is to be successful it will have to be participated in by other NATO countries. I am not in a position now to express an opinion on whether the bank will be more effective through the storage of flour than wheat. It is one of the things that will have to be gone into, but the principle of a food bank seems to us to be a good one, and if it can be carried out on a NATO basis it will receive support from this side.

I have read, Mr. Speaker, that recently the United States, which should be participating, of course, in this kind of enterprise, has shown more interest in the President's food for peace proposal, about which there have been discussions I think in Washington or New York, I am not sure which, recently. It is to be hoped that these two ventures will not conflict.

So far as making available skim milk powder for relief is concerned, my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture will recall that my colleague the hon. member for Essex East brought up this matter during the discussion of the minister's estimates, I think it was, and he received a rather discouraging reply from the minister in regard to his proposal. I have understood from what the minister and others have said that it has been difficult to find relief agencies and others who are interested in the amount of skim milk we have been able to make available to them, and I hope the announcement of the Prime Minister this afternoon indicates that that particular difficulty has been overcome. I cannot think of any better way to use surpluses of this kind than for the purposes indicated by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians are coming more and more to the point of view that Canada should lay greater emphasis on the provision of economic assistance generally and less emphasis on the provision of military equipment. We are pleased that Canada is taking this first step to promote a NATO food bank. We hope the other nations in NATO will follow suit and that this offer will be generally accepted.

I note that the government is including $10 million worth of flour. I, of course, do not know why flour was chosen instead of wheat but I think it is an acceptable move, particularly because at this time markets for flour are even more difficult to obtain than for wheat. While this is a pool to assist NATO by providing a food bank in time of emergency, we cannot help but relate it to the availability of supplies in Canada. The 20 million pounds of dried skim milk powder is a welcome contribution. In our opinion it is a very important food item and it is also an item, of course, that is in surplus supply in this country. No one can say that this is an implementation of article II of NATO, but this is certainly a step in the direction of economic assistance instead of merely providing more military assistance.

We think this proposal will meet with wide acceptance in Canada, and if it came to a choice between providing a food bank or food for peace and military aid we would much prefer an effort of this kind, rather than provide obsolete equipment to NATO. We hope that for Canada this is the beginning of further expansion in this field, and that other nations will follow in placing greater emphasis on economic co-operation.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RECENT TREASURY BILL ISSUE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance make a statement on the important and novel financial operation announced by the government on Friday last? Perhaps in his statement he might also include an explanation as to why the announcement was not made in the House of Commons before it was given to the press.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on Friday morning at 9 o'clock the wires, in the usual way, were delivered to those who are interested in financial offerings of this kind. The offering is an invitation in respect of up to $200 million of government of Canada one year treasury bills dated June 10 for sale through competitive tender. Payment for the treasury bills may be made in either cash or by exchange of government of Canada bonds of the issue which matures on July 1 next. Tenders will be received up to the closing hour of five o'clock on Tuesday, June 2, that is tomorrow, from primary distributors of new issues of government of Canada securities. The Minister of Finance reserves the right to accept or reject any tender in whole or in part.

This is the first time, Mr. Speaker, the government has issued or offered treasury bills of one year maturity. We have long been accustomed to bills of three months' maturity. Recently we have been offering bills with six months' maturity. The former government for several years had offered bills of a nine months' maturity. The one year maturity is a well established treasury bill in the experience of the United States.

As to the second part of the hon. gentleman's question, may I say that it has never been the practice to announce offerings of this kind in the house before they are made public. These offerings are regularly made whether of treasury bills or of bond offerings. The treasury bill tenders are invited every week. The tenders are received and opened at noon every Thursday. That has been the practice followed for a long time both with regard to the three months' treasury bills and also lately with the six months' treasury bills.

So far as bond offerings are concerned, it has not been the practice to announce these in the house. As a matter of fact, they could not be announced in the house at a good time because the house meets in the afternoon. It has been the practice of my predecessors, as well as the practice that has been observed since we came into office two years ago, that these offerings go to the primary distributors by telegram for delivery at their offices at the opening of business on the morning chosen.

Mr. Pearson: In view of the fact that the minister himself has said that this was an unprecedented offering, and in view of the fact that the information was given to the press, does the minister not think it would have been at least a courtesy to have given parliament this information at eleven o'clock on Friday morning?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was no discourtesy to the house. The information was available. If there had been any question by the hon. gentleman I would have been glad to deal with it then. As a matter of fact I rather expected that he would have had a question. Questions have been asked repeatedly in the house about treasury bills by hon. gentlemen opposite. Their interest in this matter has been very keen. But, Mr. Speaker, the practice has not been to announce these matters in the house. If the house wishes information week by week as to treasury bills or special information of this kind, the house will certainly be given the information. But this information was made public at the same time as the telegrams of offering reached the desks and offices of those to whom they were directed.

Mr. Pearson: In view of the fact that this was an unprecedented offering may I ask the minister a supplementary question with regard to it. Is it a fact that 2½ per cent bonds maturing on July 1 will be redeemed at 101.25 per cent instead of 100 per cent if they are exchanged for the new issue? If that is the case, why was it necessary to offer this particular inducement?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the basis upon which this valuation is placed on the bonds to be turned in is contained in the following sentence in the prospectus:

> Where 2½ per cent government of Canada bonds due July 1st are offered in exchange at a valuation of 101.25 per cent they must be in bearer form with the final coupon attached or if in registered form be accompanied by proper transfer documents.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has made quite a play on the use of the expression "unprecedented".

Mr. Pearson: You used it first.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The thing that is unprecedented is simply the fact that the treasury bill has been given a 12 month maturity. I have already pointed out that we have had in this country three month, six month and nine month treasury bills. The form of the offering is new only in so far as this is a twelve month offering in place of some of those shorter maturities as in the past.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he would explain to the house why unmatured victory bonds were called in last year, and now in effect one year treasury bills are being put in their place. Is the minister afraid of issuing a long term government bond?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. gentleman is just all mixed up. Last year what we offered was a conversion bond issue in return for victory bonds of five different maturities to the extent to which the holders were prepared to exchange them. On this occasion, those who hold this bond which matures on July 1 next have the opportunity offered to them, if they agree to exercise it, to tender for these treasury bills up to the amount stated. It is entirely a matter for their own choice whether or not they tender for these bills, and it will remain a matter for choice on the part of the Minister of Finance to accept or refuse any tender in whole or in part.

Mr. Regier: May I ask the minister why the government decided not to issue a long term government bond rather than proceed along these lines?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We considered that in the public interest this was the best form of maturity to offer at this particular time for this particular amount.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Is the minister aware that the highest United States short term treasury bill rate is 3 per cent, while our own exceeds 5 per cent, a differential of over 2 per cent?

Mr. Speaker: I think we have had a fairly complete discussion of the question initiated by the Leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for Welland has just asked a supplementary question which appears to be giving information rather than asking for it, and I suggest that we pass to the next topic.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect, Mr. Speaker, a very misleading impression has been left by the observation which the hon. gentleman has just made, and I would ask the opportunity to set that right. Evidently the hon. member is not aware of the situation with respect to treasury bill rates in the United States. I happen to have them with me in a statement which reached my desk only today. On the 340 day bills in the United States the rate is 3.835 per cent average; on the 220 day bills it is 3.565 per cent average, and on the 1 year certificates, the 4 per cent coupon is offered on a 4.05 per cent basis.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY RUSSIAN FOREIGN MINISTER IN WASHINGTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to give the Minister of Finance an opportunity to satisfy my natural curiosity. Can the minister inform the house whether the Washington news dispatch is correct, of date May 29, to the effect that the Soviet foreign minister, Andrei Gromyko, informed Hon. Donald Fleming, Minister of Finance for Canada, at President Eisenhower's luncheon in the White House, on Thursday, May 28, that he still prefers the Progressive Conservative and Labour Progressive parties to all others in Canada? If so, would the minister care to comment on this provocative, evocative and projective statement?

Mr. Speaker: The question does not appear to come under any of the better known administrative responsibilities of the Minister of Finance, but since it has been asked I will not prevent the hon. gentleman from commenting if he wishes to do so.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The first part of the question asks me whether this news dispatch is correct. Well, the news dispatch does bear a resemblance to the facts. The hon. gentleman may recall that the late lamented Gordon Graydon, in the days when he used to be one of the Canadian parliamentary observers at the United Nations, struck up quite a friendship, among many others with Mr. Gromyko. All those who knew Mr. Graydon will recall his affability. In conversation with Mr. Gromyko at the President's luncheon at the White House last Thursday I made some reference to the late Gordon Graydon, and Mr. Gromyko remembered very well the way in which Mr. Graydon used to exchange banter with him.

In those days the word "progressive" was the favourite word in the communist vocabulary, and Mr. Gromyko did not always differentiate very clearly between political parties which embraced the word "progressive" in their names. I did not say to him, though I might have, that there is one party in this house, namely the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs, which sometimes has a little difficulty with its name, too.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question with regard to this bit of history inaccurately accounted for in the remarks of the Minister of Finance. Is it not a fact that Mr. Gromyko told Mr. Graydon that he would become a member of the Progressive Conservative party provided the Progressive Conservative party became socialist?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not recall that rider, but I can well guess that by the time the report passed through the hands of the hon. member for Essex East there would be some unrecognizable accretions to the story.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

WELLAND CANAL—REPORTED CONGESTION OF DOWN BOUND TRAFFIC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Could the minister say what is being done with regard to congestion on the Welland canal of down traffic from Port Colborne?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. The hon. members from Hamilton West, Hamilton East and Hamilton South also asked this question.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about the hon. member for Welland?

Mr. Hees: As a matter of fact I have not heard from the hon. member for Welland. This congestion occurred last week and was brought about by the large volume of shipping, inward bound, which left the Welland canal during the first month of operations this year, and by the heavy surge of foreign shipping which has used the canal this season. On Friday there were reported to be 33 ships waiting at Port Colborne to go through the canal. This morning 22 were waiting, so it can be seen that the congestion has been reduced by practically one third in three days.

Two weeks ago I announced a system of priority for bulk carriers carrying supplies which are vital to the industries of North America, enabling them to pass through the canal more quickly. That system of priorities is still in operation. I hope the congestion at Port Colborne will be materially reduced during the next few days, and I feel sure that the system of priorities introduced two weeks ago will greatly assist ore and other carriers to pass through the canal more quickly.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Can the minister tell me whether the report which appeared recently in La Presse of Montreal to the effect that his department is carrying on a study of the economics and costs of duplicating the single locks on the Welland canal is accurate?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker. I spoke with a gentleman from La Presse in Montreal a week or so ago when I was down there for the christening of one of our ships, and I told him that we were looking into the possibility of putting in tie-up walls between several of the locks so as to facilitate the movement of ships, and also examining the time taken at the lock gates on the Welland canal as compared with that taken at the newer lock gates which have been constructed in the seaway proper to see if the time saved would warrant the necessary expenditure on the older locks.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REPORTED DENIAL OF MEDICAL BENEFITS TO SWIFT COMPANY EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour arising out of a telegram I have received from Mr. D. Thomson of Winnipeg stating that while Canada Packers and Burns and Company have granted medical coverage to their Canadian employees, Swift and Company, a United States corporation, refuses to permit its Canadian subsidiary to enter into a similar agreement.

Has the minister received a similar telegram, and what action can the minister take to see that this kind of coverage is granted industry-wide?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I received a message this morning to that effect. In reply I must inform the hon. member that the setting up of health and welfare benefits by employer and employees on a participating basis is a matter for collective bargaining. Labour legislation covering the meat packing industry rests entirely with the provinces, and I suggest that the only action which could be taken rests with the provinces.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would have any comment to make on that particular part of the statement wherein it alleges that a United States company is to prevent—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think any further questions become out of order by reason of the fact brought out by the minister that these companies are subject to provincial jurisdiction rather than federal, and that it is not a matter under his administrative responsibility.

AGRICULTURE

SKIM MILK POWDER—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture how he reconciles the statement he made in this house at page 2963 of Hansard of April 23, 1959, when he was reported as saying——it is apparent that our production of skim milk powder must be reduced—

[Mr. Hees.]

—with the statement made earlier in the day by the Prime Minister with regard to moneys being provided by Canada for allocating skim milk to the international food bank about which he made reference, and whether or not—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. member who is pursuing this matter whether it would not be better to deal with it when these supplementary estimates come before the house, as they undoubtedly will in a very short time. It seems to me that if he is asking for an explanation and justification it would be more appropriate to have the matter dealt with in debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, Mr. Speaker, the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture have been completed—

Mr. Speaker: I was referring to the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, I know. I was about to say that the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture have been completed. The supplementary estimates, as Mr. Speaker knows, are generally prosecuted by the Minister of Finance. In any event my second question is very important. In view of the announcement made by the Prime Minister does the Minister of Agriculture not think he ought to review his judgment and restore the 5 cents to the floor price on skim milk, the reduction of which he announced a few months ago in this house?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, apparently the hon. gentleman does not appreciate what the situation is in regard to skim milk powder. The 50 million pounds which the Prime Minister has announced will be available in toto, of which some 15 million pounds have already been taken and a few million more have been more or less contracted for, will not remove the surplus which we hold at the present time, let alone take care of any further amounts which we may obtain during the present period and up to the end of September when the present purchase program for dried skim milk will come to an end.

AIR TRANSPORT

GANDER—REPORTED IMPOSITION OF FINES ON AIR LINES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware of a British United Press release issued this morning to the effect that fines were levied against two air lines at Gander because of alleged infractions of the quarantine, immigration and sick mariners regulations? Has he taken cognizance of the fact that air line pilots threatened today to boycott Gander airport and use other refueling stops on the trans-Atlantic run?

I wonder if the minister would be good enough to comment on this. Unfortunately I did not send him notice, but perhaps he could comment without having had notice.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I heard this report. I understand that the people concerned are employees of departments other than my own. We are having it looked into right away.

IMMIGRATION

FURTHER UNFAVOURABLE PUBLICITY IN U.K. NEWSPAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the minister's attention been drawn to what appears to be a factual account in a recent issue of The People, published in London, England, of the difficulties facing highly skilled, industrial craftsmen who emigrate to Canada from Britain, under present conditions as the result of what is stated to be an almost total failure of co-ordination between the unemployment authorities in Canada and our immigration officials overseas? If so, has the minister investigated the circumstances mentioned with a view to making any necessary correction in administrative procedures?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, one day last week I answered a question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia with reference to the reports which have been appearing in The People. I have not seen the actual report to which the hon. member refers, but I have seen some of the Canadian press comment on that report.

In so far as the reporting of The People is concerned, I think I answered that last week. With respect to co-operation between the national employment service and this department I may say that it has always been very close, and the information that is given to our offices overseas is given only after careful consideration and with the approval and co-operation of the national employment service.

Mr. Herridge: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The report on which my question was based is contained in the most recent issue of The People, which I think is in much better tone. It seems much more factual than the previous articles. Would the minister look into those articles?

Mrs. Fairclough: Well, Mr. Speaker, we look into all these allegations whether or not they appear to have any basis in fact. I think what I said a few moments ago is about as far as I can go. If there was any suggestion that there was lack of co-operation we would immediately investigate it without waiting for the sensational news report of The People.

PAY DEDUCTION FROM IMMIGRANTS ATTENDING COURT FOR CITIZENSHIP CERTIFICATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Would the minister investigate the possibility of discouraging certain corporations from deducting wages from new Canadians who are obliged to attend court to try their examinations and receive their certificates when making application for citizenship?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if this has happened in a court located in the same city as the industry concerned I am sorry to hear about it. I do not think it is usual, but I am afraid, in so far as the department is concerned, there is no action that can be taken in the matter. It would be a voluntary courtesy on the part of the industry itself to the employee.

INDUSTRY

HAMILTON, ONT.—REPORTED CLOSING OF TEXTILE PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received advice concerning the proposed closing of the large Canadian Cottons textile plant at Hamilton? If so, is he in a position to say what action the government is contemplating that will provide employment to the workers concerned?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I noticed in the press that the textile plant in question was closing. In so far as providing alternative employment is concerned, that is a continuing problem which receives the fullest consideration by the government.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ROYAL VISIT

REQUEST FOR BILINGUAL PRINTING OF TOUR BROCHURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of the fact that the official program for the royal tour has been printed in English only by the Canadian government travel bureau under the authority of the minister, and also in view of the fact that protests have been filed with the bureau, I wonder if the minister would be kind enough to see that this situation is remedied and that the program is printed in both official languages of Canada.

I would also like to say that Her Majesty is going to visit Chicoutimi, Jonquiere and Kenogami, and these three names do not appear in the official program.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of this question over the lunch hour. I have not been able to get the full story, so I will have to tell what I know from memory.

The Canadian tourist association wrote the Minister of Transport about having a brochure of the royal tour printed. The minister wrote my department, under which the travel bureau comes, and asked if we could provide some sort of brochure for the royal tour. One was produced and I see that it went beyond the actual confines of the brochure as originally conceived and contains something of the itinerary.

The travel bureau prints these documents for distribution in the United States, and I understand that some will be available for distribution in Canada. The department has not followed the practice of printing these in French. May I point out that this is not the official itinerary. If the hon. member wishes to inquire about it, I suggest that he direct an inquiry to the appropriate minister.

HOUSING

ST. JOHN'S EAST, NFLD.—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF LAND ASSEMBLY PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Would the minister please advise the house when he expects the land assembly project in St. John's East, Newfoundland, will begin?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, a land assembly project in St. John's, Newfoundland is presently under consideration, but as yet no definite announcement can be made as to date of commencement.

TRANSPORT

GREAT SLAVE LAKE—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION OF RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in regard to the Pine Point railway. I would like to refer to the Powell River Digester of March-April, 1959. There is an article in this Digester written by Hon. Alvin Hamilton, which reads in part as follows:

> The time honoured means of transportation—by rail—is also to add its quickening influence to the development of the north. The federal government's decision that a railway connection is to be extended to the south shore of Great Slave lake is another good omen for the early opening of a new and exciting chapter in the economic development of Canada's last frontier.

Can the Prime Minister tell the house when the decision was made, if there has been a decision made, and when the start will be made on the construction?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to see the article in question before making any answer.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO FRENCH EDITION OF "TRADE AND COMMERCE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister tell the house why the supposed to be French equivalent of the publication Trade and Commerce, namely Commerce Exterieur, is not as complete and is published monthly only, when Trade and Commerce is published bi-monthly.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I did not receive notice of the question, Mr. Speaker, and I will take it as notice.

GRAIN

REPORTED DROP IN SHIPMENTS FROM LAKEHEAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, arising out of the very drastic reduction in shipments of grain from the lakehead. Can the minister explain why shipments from the lakehead since the opening of navigation have dropped from 86 million bushels last year to only 42 million bushels this year, and whether anything is being done to speed up shipments through the St. Lawrence seaway?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this question in almost similar form was asked ten days ago. Already today the Minister of Transport has given an explanation with regard to shipping facilities on the great lakes. I do not know whether my hon. friend from Assiniboia is attempting to cause some alarm with regard to the situation but, as I pointed out ten days ago, our export market has not been interfered with at all because grain has been in position in the elevators on both coasts, and our export of wheat and flour up to the end of March of this year has just been 9 million bushels below the same period last year.

Now, if the hon. member for Assiniboia is worried about producers' marketing deliveries to the country elevators, may I assure him that for the period of the crop year up to May 20, 1959 wheat delivered by producers exceeded that delivered for the same period last year. The same is true for barley and flax; it is a little bit down on oats and rye. The general situation with regard to producers' marketing is just about the same as a year ago.

If he has any further worry with regard to the quota distribution in the prairie provinces, may I assure him that this year at this time there are 264 stations on a 7-bushel quota per specified acre; last year there were none. This year there are 308 stations on a 6-bushel quota per specified acre; last year there were 341. Generally the picture is much better than it was a year ago.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to know whether there might be some improvement in this very drastic reduction in shipments out of the lakehead, and I am asking the minister whether he can make any statement on that point. I would like him to comment as to why almost consistently since the opening of navigation Canadian exports are down this year as compared with a year ago.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, that last statement is quite incorrect. Canadian exports are holding up extraordinarily well.

Mr. Argue: I am not talking about the year in question; I am talking about recent weeks since the opening of navigation. The graph put out by the minister's own department shows a very substantial reduction. I can send it across to the minister.

Mr. Churchill: There was a delay in the opening of navigation this year, as my hon. friend knows, because of ice conditions not only in the canals but at the lakehead, and there has been some difficulty in the speeding up of shipping on the lakes; but I do not think there is any need now for despair, gloom and despondency, of which my hon. friend is a great purveyor.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, the minister has told us that shipments out of the lakehead did not reduce overseas clearances, yet—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: I ask the minister how he relates his comment now that exports are down because of the delay in the opening of the navigation season with his previous statements. He cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Churchill: I explained with regard to our exports overseas that grain was in position at the elevators in eastern Canada and on the west coast. They have been full, and grain has been moved from there as it has every year. The same is true of the elevators at Fort Churchill, from which 20 million bushels will be used as soon as navigation opens there. I do not think there is any need for alarm with regard to our export position.

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, I did ask a very proper question, I feel, that had nothing in it about alarm. I was merely trying to get from the minister in charge a statement as to whether or not this drastic reduction might be overcome in the weeks ahead. It was a very simple and very proper question, and I am asking the minister when this increase is likely to come about.

Mr. Speaker: I suppose the hon. member might raise a point of order on the nature of the answer, but I do not know what his point is, if he has one.

Mr. Argue: My point is that I asked a very simple question and the minister has talked about everything else. I asked him a simple question and—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: I asked him the reason for the reduction in the shipments and whether this difficulty was likely to continue in the future.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the hon. members may find another time and occasion to carry on this dispute.

National Energy Board

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Friday, May 29, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-49, to provide for the establishment of a national energy board—Mr. Churchill—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 47—Revocation and suspension of certificate.

The Chairman: When the house rose on Friday last we were discussing clause 47 of the bill and the amendment proposed thereto by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, at the time the committee concluded the discussion last week I had moved, as you have indicated, an amendment to the effect that we omit from clause 47 the words "with the approval of the governor in council". I should like to remind the committee that clause 47 reads:

(1) Subject to subsection 2, the board may by order, with the approval of the governor in council, revoke or suspend a certificate—

—and so on. I would like to underline the word "may". When the minister replied to our amendment on the first occasion he indicated that there might be times and conditions under which a company that had received a certificate should not automatically be obligated to lose its licence or its certificate. He indicated that certain unforeseen conditions might arise. However, it is our submission that the bill as it reads enables the energy board to take such matters into consideration, in that the clause provides that the board may revoke or suspend a certificate once it is issued if the terms and conditions of the certificate are not, in the opinion of the board, being complied with. We feel that the word "may" is the important word and that the board would act in the national interest and would take all circumstances into adequate consideration. We do not see why the governor in council or government of the day should want to delegate unto itself the authority to police the implementation of the act.

I can remember well that a number of years ago we were considering in the house a pipe line company that had been issued a permit to build a trans-Canada natural gas pipe line. Time after time this particular pipe line company was unable or unwilling to meet the terms and conditions upon which it had been granted its rights. I can remember the Conservatives, who were in opposition at the time, asking the government of the day to enforce the terms and conditions that had been imposed upon Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, but the government of the day procrastinated and continued to procrastinate. Six month extensions were granted one after another until many years elapsed from the time the pipe line was to have been built until it actually was built.

The Conservatives in the house at that time expressed the opinion that the government of the day ought not to extend indefinitely the rights obtained by this pipe line company, and that if the company was unable to meet the terms and conditions which it had agreed to meet it should move out of the way and allow the formation of another pipe line company which would meet the needs of the Canadian nation in this regard. But here we have the Conservatives in office and asking that they be granted in this bill the same rights that were being exercised at that time by Right Hon. C. D. Howe. They are asking that we deny the energy board the right of enforcement of the terms and conditions attached to certificates. We find that the cabinet wants to retain this authority for itself.

We feel that once the energy board has recommended the issuance of a certificate and has set the terms and conditions the company must meet, once these terms and conditions have been reviewed by the cabinet and approved, thereafter the energy board, having issued a certificate either to build a pipe line or an international power line, should have the right to police the terms and conditions. In other words we believe that political considerations should not be a factor with regard to whether or not a company will be allowed to retain its certificate indefinitely irrespective of whether it obeys or flagrantly violates the terms and conditions to which it agrees. We cannot understand why the cabinet wants the authority to police the implementation of the conditions attached to the issuance of the certificate.

I remember quite well that on another occasion several years ago the house had under consideration the extension of the powers of the governor in council under the Emergency Powers Act. In my opinion one of the strongest arguments put forward by the Conservatives, then in opposition, against the extension of the Emergency Powers Act was, as one of their members said at that time, that this would allow the government to aid and abet any corporation politically friendly to the government in office, and would also enable the cabinet to extinguish completely a Canadian corporation that did not subscribe to the particular political aspirations of the government in office. That was when the Conservatives really put on a fight in the house. That was the beginning of the road into office for the Conservative party.

Yet now that they are in office they are in effect, in expressing their non-approval of the amendment, asking for the very same authority, the authority to reward their friends and punish their enemies, an authority which in years gone by they regretted was being held by the Liberal government of the day. We contend that once the rules of the game have been established by the energy board and approved by the government of the day the board should be allowed to be the referee. We should give the energy board the authority to enforce, wherever they may deem it advisable, the terms and conditions of the certificate.

Amendment (Mr. Regier) negatived: Yeas, 4; nays, 58.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 47 carry?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Chairman. In explaining this clause on Friday last the minister indicated that it was modelled on section 3 of the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act, and left the matter there. On checking that section I notice that a substantial change seems to have been made in the bill now before the committee. I wonder if the minister would explain why the change was made, and the purpose of the change.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, what is the substantial change to which the hon. member is referring and about which he wishes an explanation?

Mr. McIlraith: The former legislation provided an opportunity for any person licensed and in business, if he was not complying with any term or condition, to be given notice to bring himself into compliance with the term or condition. Under those circumstances the licence could not be revoked. Now a person has no protection; the new legislation gives him no protection at all.

Mr. Churchill: I fail to understand that. Does not subclause 2 cover everything the hon. member has in mind? It reads:

> No order shall be made under this section unless notice has been given to the holder of the certificate who is alleged to have violated or failed to comply with any term or condition thereof and an opportunity has been afforded to him of being heard.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I had better explain more fully the point I have in mind. The clause before the committee now reads in this way, clause 47 (1):

> Subject to subsection (2), the board may by order, with the approval of the governor in council revoke or suspend a certificate if, in the opinion of the board, the person to whom it was issued has violated or failed to comply with any term or condition thereof.
> (2) No order shall be made under this section unless notice has been given to the holder of the certificate who is alleged to have violated or failed to comply with any term or condition thereof and an opportunity has been afforded to him of being heard.

It will be noted that if there is an allegation of failure to comply with a term there is an opportunity of being heard; but the board, after the hearing, may still revoke the licence. The relevant part of section 3 of the exportation of power and fluids act provides, as follows:

> A licence granted under this section may be revoked if the governor in council is satisfied that
> (a) the licensee has refused or neglected to comply with any of the terms or conditions of the licence—

That is practically the same in its meaning.

> (b) notice of such refusal or neglect has been sent to the licensee, and
> (c) the licensee has, after receiving such notice, refused or neglected to comply with any such terms or condition.

The point is that under that legislation the licensee had an opportunity of bringing himself into full compliance with the terms and conditions. Under the legislation now before the committee the licensee may neglect or fail to comply with some term or condition, and it is quite true he is given notice, but the board still has the power to revoke his licence even though the licensee has brought himself into full compliance with the terms and conditions. What I fear in that is that we are putting these licensees in a position of uncertainty that is not going to be helpful to all concerned. I would fear, looking at the clause, that it is something more than was intended when the legislation was being considered.

Mr. Churchill: I do not think it was intended to be more stringent than the provision in the exportation of power and fluids act. I see the hon. member's point, that the wording in that act permits the licensee to restore his position. We thought the fact that there was a hearing, or an opportunity to state his position, would obviously lead him to restore himself to the position in which he was before if he inadvertently failed to comply with some of the terms or conditions.

In any event there is a further protection, is there not, in that if the board errs in making an order after the licensee has complied with the conditions, the governor in council has a chance to review that decision because the approval of the governor in council is required. May I assure my hon. friend that there was no intention of making it more stringent than the old clause. I feel that the new wording is not overly severe and that the licensee, because of the public hearing, will have a chance to get his position understood by the board.

There was not a hearing in the exportation of power and fluids act. There was first the alleged refusal or neglect to comply with conditions, then the notice, and then the order if the licensee refused or neglected to comply with the terms or conditions. The hearing provides him with an opportunity to appear and state his case, and this opportunity was not granted to him under the other legislation.

Mr. McIlraith: I am afraid it is not quite as simple as that. It is reasonable to assume that there will be terms and conditions to a great many of these licences, some of them of a fairly technical nature but not, in themselves, of major importance. We are being asked in the present bill to give the power of revocation of a licence because of neglect to comply with one of such terms or conditions, an absolute power of revocation. I am suggesting to the minister that this provision is much more severe than the facts warrant in such cases, and that the effect will be to leave a cloud hanging over these licences that may do the very thing the minister desires not to do.

He spoke, at several earlier stages of this bill, of the necessity for large investment in these operations. It is clauses such as this one that make the obtaining of such investment needlessly difficult. What we want to be sure of here is a proper hearing and proper protection when licences are granted, and once they are granted we do not want to give a right to revoke a licence needlessly. I feel this is the real point, and I believe it is something that should be investigated because of the fears I have mentioned.

Mr. Churchill: I certainly appreciate the hon. member's views on this matter. He quite approves of the review by the governor in council or the approval of the governor in council being required before orders such as these are made. I believe there is sufficient protection because of that opportunity for the person to be heard. The board would hold a hearing and then make its findings after a full discussion of all the facts involved. This is like clause 44, in which the approval of the governor in council is required.

The seriousness of the whole situation I pointed out, myself, when we were debating this on Friday. We appreciated that in both instances, in the granting of the certificate and second in a case where it had to be revoked. We were relying on a public hearing in both instances, and then an actual act by the board by way of an order which finally had to come to the governor in council for approval. I think in both instances there is sufficient protection.

Mr. McIlraith: There is one small point that perhaps I should clarify first. I do not want my remarks on this section to necessarily indicate approval of the governor in council. I merely took the position that as the minister will recall, having granted that power in clause 44 it seems to me that it is necessary to grant it here. I do not want to raise or reopen that matter.

Mr. Churchill: I realize the situation.

Mr. McIlraith: I think I had better bring the matter to a head. I think there should be an amendment to this clause. I therefore move:

That section 47 of Bill C-49 be replaced by the following:

"A certificate may be revoked or suspended by the board, with the approval of the governor in council, if the board is satisfied that:

(a) the holder of the certificate has refused or neglected to comply with any of the terms and conditions of the certificate;

(b) notice of such refusal or neglect has been sent to such holder; and

(c) the holder has, after receiving such notice, refused or neglected to comply with any such term or condition."

Perhaps I do not need to elaborate on it.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. McIlraith) negatived: yeas, 13; nays, 30.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 48—Compliance with conditions and Act.

Mr. Robichaud: This clause makes it a condition that the person to whom a certificate is issued shall comply with the provisions of the act and the regulations as in force at the date of the issue of the certificate and as subsequently enacted made or amended. Can the minister explain why these words have been included, "and as subsequently enacted, made or amended"?

Mr. Churchill: I think the reason it is drafted in this way is that from time to time there has been uncertainty as to a clause of this nature respecting regulations. People will say, "Are they the regulations presently in existence or the regulations which you are going to put into effect shortly or the regulations which may subsequently be subject to amendment?" It has been spelled out here as follows:

—and the regulations as in force at the date of the issue thereof and as subsequently enacted, made or amended,—

That is done in order that there may be no lack of clarity in the section.

Mr. McIlraith: It could very well be a prohibitive amendment in so far as a particular company is concerned. It seems to me that this is another example where, without any adequate explanation, we are doing something that gives more insecurity to these licencees, and that we are by this clause creating a condition where we are deterring capital investment which we admittedly need in this enterprise and in this whole field.

Mr. Winch: That is the one section of this act with which I agree.

Mr. McIlraith: Does the hon. member mean that he agrees with the principle of retroactive legislation? That is what this section means.

Mr. Winch: I do not see how you can do anything else.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): After listening to the hon. member for Ottawa West I think the minister should give us some explanation. We can all appreciate, of course, the desirability of regulations that will have the effect of protecting the public. But my impression is that these words are unusual, certainly in their present application. The regulation could be of such a kind, as the hon. member for Ottawa West has said, as to be prohibitive or to be impossible of performance. At the moment I cannot think what such a regulation would be, but it is conceivable that if the governor in council, for some reason or another, wished to avoid the continuance of benefit of a particular holder of a certificate, the governor in council might well pass a regulation which could not possibly be met by the owner of the certificate at the time. In the absence of some comment by the minister on the point made by the hon. member for Ottawa West, it would seem to me that the suggestion he has made is valid indeed.

Mr. Churchill: I perhaps do not fully appreciate the reasoning of my hon. friend, who is generally so fair about all these things. The assumption is that people will abide by the act and by the regulations. I have pointed out that in order that there may be no doubt about what regulations are meant, lines 10 and 11 have indicated that situation more fully. Then of course my hon. friend recognizes the fact that acts are sometimes subject to alteration in subsequent sessions. This clause ensures that, despite changes of that nature in the act or in the regulations, the holders of certificates are expected to comply.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not satisfied. If section 48 said that the certificate in the situation outlined could be withdrawn on an order of the board, that would make me feel a little more comfortable. But under this act the governor in council is empowered to make regulations. Notwithstanding the generality of the foregoing and so on. The governor in council is given authority to make regulations. We are jealous on this side of undue power being entrusted to the executive in a matter of this sort.

Mr. Winch: Ye gods.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Therefore we have the right to say that since the governor in council has power to make regulations, it is not fanciful to suggest that the governor in council, as distinguished from the board, might make a regulation that would prevent the continuation in benefit of the holder of a certificate. It seems to me that my hon. friend, who will remember the position which his party took on this kind of matter with regard to legislation before this house in recent years, will see the wisdom of the course that we are taking in our discussion at the present time.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 49—Exemptions.

Mr. Churchill: There is an amendment here. Perhaps we could have the amendment first and then comment on it. The suggestion here is that clause 49 should be amended by striking out line 18 which reads "this part relating to location, construction or operation of lines" and that the words "sections 25 to 28" be substituted. My colleague will move the amendment.

Mr. Green moved:

That subclause 1 of clause 49 be amended by striking out the words "this Part relating to location, construction or operation of lines" in lines 18 and 19 and that the words "sections 25 to 28" be substituted therefor.

Mr. Pearson: This amendment does not remove my desire to ask a question on this clause. In view of the fact that under this clause the government could exempt any pipe line from the regulations contained within the clause and the amendments, why was it necessary to put in the words "not exceeding in any case a length of 25 miles"?

Mr. Churchill: Clause 49 is modelled on section 37 of the Pipe Lines Act. There is no change in that wording. The limit to the length of the line which may be exempted is still 25 miles, just as it reads in the Pipe Lines act.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Churchill: But this limit may now be raised in any specific case if the approval of the governor in council is obtained.

Mr. Winch: That is the very point. Under the original wording the board is absolutely supreme up to 25 miles. There is an amendment now being suggested, and I think I agree with the amendment as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough because there are still left in the words "or such other length as the governor in council may prescribe." I personally have no criticism of the fact that the board might have the power to make exemptions in certain circumstances when the line does not exceed 25 miles in length, but I cannot understand why the governor in council should be given authority to make exemptions covering lines longer than 25 miles. The lines subject to such exemptions could go right across Canada. Under this clause as it reads at present there is actually authority to construct a second trans-Canada pipe line, exempted from all the regulations and rules of this entire bill at the whim and purpose of the governor in council.

Surely if this act means anything at all, regulations, once they have been made, should be enforced. Surely the exemptions from the provisions of this bill of lines up to 25 miles is sufficient. When I said "ye Gods" a few moments ago I was referring to some of the acts which are already on the statute book and to what the hon. member has just said about the power of the executive cabinet. As long as these words "or such other length as the governor in council may prescribe" are left in the bill complete authority is given to the governor in council to wipe out this entire bill together with all its regulations and provisions, setting aside all questions of financial conditions, locations and operation across the length and breadth of Canada. That is exactly what these words mean.

I do not know just how to proceed, now that the leader of the house has moved an amendment, but I certainly wish to suggest an additional amendment to the effect that subclause 1 of clause 49 be amended by deleting the words "or such other length as the governor in council may prescribe".

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Winch: I said I was not quite certain how to proceed but that I should like to have this done. I thought I had made that clear. If these words remain in the bill one might as well wipe out all these powers as far as parliament is concerned.

Mr. Robichaud: Before a decision is taken on the amendment which the leader of the house has proposed, may I say that I intend to move an amendment which deals particularly with the points which have been brought up by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I think in respect to the words "or such other length as the governor in council may prescribe" that this is a function which should be exercised by parliament and not by the governor in council. Therefore, as soon as the amendment moved by the leader of the house has been taken care of, it is my intention to move the amendment to which I have referred.

Mr. Winch: Me too.

Mr. Churchill: First, I should like to say a word by way of explanation. I admit the force of the argument made by hon. members with regard to what may happen under certain conditions which they envisage. But what was intended was by no means as serious as they have been pointing out. What was intended was to make it not too inconvenient for the industry if a line exceeding 25 miles in length—perhaps only 26 miles long, or something like that; a few miles longer—were to be constructed. This would relieve the sponsors from the necessity of going back and undertaking the whole procedure of obtaining another certificate of public convenience and necessity. That was the reasoning behind this phrase—to make things a little less inflexible. But when the imagination of hon. members opposite carries them to the extent of distances such as 2,700 miles, the clause is put into a somewhat different light. If the committee will consider the amendment which has been moved already by the Minister of Public Works, I believe my colleague will put forward a second amendment which will meet all the wishes of the opposition.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Green moved:

That the words "or such other length as the governor in council may prescribe" be deleted from clause 49.

Mr. Winch: Hear, hear.

Mr. Robichaud: We have heard the amendment moved by the leader of the house, and we of the opposition accept it and wish to thank the minister for having taken our wishes into consideration.

Mr. Winch: I have already said "hear, hear". I do not want to say any more.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Herridge: May I say that I am in entire agreement with my hon. friend. Had the government taken another course I was ready to intervene at some length. I can recall, in one case which came before the courts, a defendent using a minister's interpretation of a bill in an effort to show what the legislation was intended to do, and the judge telling him that it was not what the minister said in the house or anything else that mattered when it came to interpretation, it was simply the wording of the act.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 50 agreed to.

On clause 51—Tolls to be approved.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, while the vote on our last amendment was being taken I distinctly heard the tall and elongated hon. member for Halifax refer to this group as dedicated dough heads. I think that is getting marginal as far as parliamentary language is concerned. My colleagues remind me that a speech made by one of the so called dedicated dough heads prior to my rising influenced the Minister of Public Works to rise and move an amendment along the lines he suggested. I do not think, therefore, it is fair to refer to this small but hard working group as dedicated dough heads.

It is not my habit to indulge in unparliamentary language but when I look at the hon. member he reminds me of my asparagus patch and of the fact that the higher you go up an asparagus stalk the softer and less useful it becomes.

We take strong exception to clause 51 because it differs entirely from the recommendations of the royal commission on energy. I want to place on the record a few of those recommendations and a paragraph commenting upon them. The commissioners dealt at considerable length with this problem. At page 27 of the report we find recommendations in this respect as follows:

> The commission recommends:
> 1. That the Pipe Lines Act, R.S.C., 1952, Chapter 211, be amended to provide that:

That, of course, refers to the Pipe Lines Act as it then stood. I continue:

> (a) It shall be mandatory for the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada to exercise the powers conferred upon it under part II of the Pipe Lines Act, with respect to the regulation of the traffic, tolls or tariffs of oil pipe-line companies subject to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.
> (b) It should not be a condition precedent to the exercise of such powers that an oil pipe-line company be declared to be a "common carrier";
> (c) It shall be mandatory for the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada to regulate the prices of rates of gas pipe-line companies subject to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, and, in so doing, to require, if necessary, any such gas pipe-line company to renegotiate the terms of any existing contracts for the sale or delivery of gas for distribution or consumption within Canada;
> (d) It shall be mandatory for the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada periodically, and at least once in every 24-month period during the early years of regulation, to review and, if deemed necessary, to adjust the prices, tolls, rates and tariffs of pipe-line companies regulated by it;

At the conclusion of the recommendations the report states:

> That the prices, tolls, rates or tariffs of a company owning or operating an oil or gas pipe line, as regulated by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, should be just and reasonable, non-discriminatory and calculated to yield a fair rate of return on the shareholders' equity, after making due allowance for reasonable and proper operating expenses, depreciation, interest, income and other taxes.

We agree with that recommendation. In commenting on the recommendations, the commissioners say:

> Although the Pipe Lines Act gives the board of transport commissioners the authority to regulate the traffic, tolls or tariffs of oil pipe lines, subject to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, this authority has not been exercised, although the board did conduct a formal hearing on a complaint raised by a shipper of crude oil. No regulatory body of the government of Canada has the authority at the present time to regulate the selling prices or transportation charges of gas pipe lines subject to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. The commission considers that a more positive and active approach to the question of regulation has now become necessary.

The members in this group agree 100 per cent with that opinion of the royal commission. I go now to another paragraph in the commentary:

> In view of the great need of the Canadian economy for supplies of heat and energy producing fuels, it is desirable to ensure not only that adequate supplies are available at all times, but also that prices are kept at a reasonable level. As crude oil and natural gas must be moved over long distances to reach the principal market areas of Canada, transportation charges must be no more than are fair and reasonable. The commission is of the view that the board of transport commissioners should have all the powers needed for the regulation of the prices or rates, traffic, tolls or tariffs or pipe-line companies subject to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.

We believe those are very wise recommendations and comments. We believe it is very necessary that the national energy board have the same responsibilities in this respect as the public utilities commissions in the provinces. In British Columbia power companies, provincial transportation companies such as bus and trucking firms, public carriers and telephone companies, go before the public utilities commission in order to have their rates established by that body. That has been found an excellent practice since it began. It is not a question of those companies establishing rates and then going into operation and the commission reviewing them after some period, but before they are established they must be set on the basis of an order from the public utilities commission.

We believe for the protection of the interests of industry and of the Canadian people generally the same practice and procedure should be followed in this bill and that we should accept the recommendations of the royal commission in this respect. I therefore move seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East:

That section 51 be amended by inserting the words "and approved by" after the words "filed with".

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, we in this group would just love to hear some comment from hon. members in the Liberal party on this matter. I am sure that the hon. member for Essex East has some contribution to make.

Mr. Winch: This amendment is so necessary and fundamental it will be accepted as was the previous one.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, since my name was mentioned perhaps I should observe that we thought it was so obvious as not to require further comment.

Mr. Herridge: And so, Mr. Chairman, the so-called dedicated dough heads again have had some influence on this committee.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, the dedicated dough heads have a large amount of crust and that is about all.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I was just giving consideration to the amendment which seeks to insert the words "and approved by" in addition to the requirement for filing. I rather question the necessity of having the approval of the board before the filing of the tariff because there are ways and means of dealing with these tariffs after the board has had a chance to look at them. I would draw attention to clause 53—

The Deputy Chairman: Has the minister the amendment? The amendment inserts the words "and approved by" after the words "filed with".

Mr. Winch: I point out to the minister that there is nothing in the previous clauses, as I read them, which states that filing means approval. I know there are other acts, such as the Transport Act, where it can be taken for granted. Is there any objection to it? I am certain that the intent of the minister was that filing automatically included approval; otherwise it would have no meaning at all. What we are asking is that we clarify it by inserting the words "and approval by" after "filed".

Mr. Churchill: We did not have in mind that it was an automatic approval by any means because, as I had intended to point out, clause 53 gives the board the power to disallow after it has had a chance to review the tariff. Clause 54 gives the board power to suspend. It is because of those provisions that it did not seem essential to us to insert the word "approval" here. It does not automatically follow that it is approved just because the tolls have been filed.

Mr. Pearson: Is it not a fact that clause 50, which we have passed, gives the board power to make orders with respect to tolls, that is, to levy tolls? We on this side of the house assume that any toll filed before the board would be one which had been approved by the board. That is why we assume that this particular amendment is perfectly in order even though it may not be necessary.

Mr. Winch: I believe the rule is that one cannot refer to proceedings in a committee of the house, but in one of the committees of the house this year we have had a number of meetings in which there were a number of questions asked about the rates of the air transport board. Once a rate is filed and accepted by that board it remains a tariff and is unchanged; but there is nothing here that makes it clear that a tariff which is filed has to be accepted. The evidence before the committee dealing with the air transport board tariff situation was that the tariff could be challenged; it could be changed; it could be amended. We found nothing there to indicate that it was an actual order. All we are asking here is to make it clear that with the filing there shall be an approval so that it is an established tariff. The minister's parliamentary assistant can give him all the advice that he needs because he knows all about it.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, if the committee is agreeable this clause could stand over for a while for further consideration.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee agreeable to standing clause 51?

Clause stands.

On clause 52—Tolls to be just and reasonable.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, clause 52 is a very important one; it is one of the most important clauses in the bill because it has to do with tolls which will be charged under this legislation. I notice that its terms are identical with those of section 43 of the Pipe Lines Act. In view of the remarks which were made during the course of the second reading of this bill by the hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for Calgary South, remarks which I drew to the attention of the committee on Friday, as reported at page 4153 of Hansard, I should like to have the minister comment on this. Perhaps the minister can tell us why no provision is made for an appeal in connection with the setting of these tolls. This also has some connection with the minister's own statement when he referred to the profits which could be made or which such pipe lines would be allowed to make.

Mr. Churchill: I think, Mr. Chairman, we did discuss this subject matter the other day when we were discussing other appeals.

Mr. Robichaud: On clause 18.

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Robichaud: It was a different point. It had to do with a question of law or jurisdiction.

Mr. Churchill: That was on clause 18, but certain people went on to discuss other matters, and the question of an appeal on fact was also under consideration, and an explanation of that was made. We looked at it in this way. There has to be some element of finality somewhere and with a board of competent and experienced people examining all the facts that they would have to examine prior to determining whether tolls are just and reasonable, it would be undesirable for that fact finding activity of the board to be placed under review through an appeal. With the provision of an appeal on law and jurisdiction we thought that the rights of Canadians were adequately protected; but this is a specialized operation, determining from a mass of figures and calculations what constitutes a just and reasonable toll, and we were placing this responsibility on the board to make that decision. If, for example, an appeal on fact were carried, as it is in some other matters, to the governor in council, we would be in a difficult position in having to review all matters pertaining to what is admittedly a complicated problem, and we would not be in the same position as the board itself as it gathers experience on this subject. Therefore, it was for these reasons we decided that we should give this a trial, anyway. We are not making claim to any superior intelligence in drafting clauses of this bill. This is our best judgment at the moment. If in the course of time we find that this is not the most satisfactory method of dealing with the matter we shall have to take a second look at it, but for the moment we think the board should be given the opportunity of gaining experience, sizing up the problem, and as time elapses advising us as to whether or not this is the best way in which this difficult subject should be considered. This is another reason why we have placed it as we have and have said that there shall be no appeal from its finding of fact.

Mr. McIlraith: There is another point pertaining to this clause. The minister will recall that at the resolution stage, I think it was, he was in some difficulty in a statement he made in his preliminary remarks on the point as to charges, and then he took the opportunity, as a question of privilege, to rectify his remarks.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member will not mind if I interrupt him here. I was not in difficulty with regard to my statement, but some person misinterpreted it and used different words and was in difficulty and I was extricating the unknown person.

Mr. McIlraith: The point, in any event, is that the words used by the minister in introducing the resolution were misinterpreted by some persons, and I have reread them since—

Mr. Churchill: That is right.

Mr. McIlraith: —and I am afraid—and this applies to many of us—words uttered are not always monuments of clarity. His certainly were not clear on that point. He considered it to be sufficiently important to rise on a question of privilege and attempt to clarify the matter. I have reread the clarification and I must say that the original remarks taken with the clarification have tended to confuse me as to just what the minister did mean. I found myself a little clearer as to the meaning when I read the original remarks by themselves. Would the minister take a moment or two to indicate what he visualizes by way of charges and tolls under this clause, and particularly to try to clarify further the misunderstanding that did arise?

Mr. Churchill: I was just attempting to look up the remarks I made on the resolution stage and I cannot lay my fingers on them at the moment.

Mr. McIlraith: It is page 3775 and page 3768.

Mr. Churchill: However, I was discussing returns and whoever sounded off on the radio that very day spoke of profits. Having heard about that comment, I felt obliged to rise in the house on a question of privilege and indicate to the house that when I had used the term, "regulating the returns of gas pipe line companies", I had not specifically referred to profits. Of course, I grant you that you can argue that in some form or other the regulation of the returns will perhaps have some effect on profits but the comment that was made at that time on the radio was directly on the question of profits whereas the word "returns" is common parlance in the industry. It relates to all matters with regard to financial operations, and was understood in that way. That was why I rose on that occasion to indicate what was meant and that is the way the explanation stands, that it is a question of dealing with returns in general.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 52 carry?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Chairman. I think we have to go a little farther than that. The first report of the royal commission on energy, the Borden commission report, went a very great length in its recommendations dealing with the regulation of pipe line companies and on this particular point a recommendation was made that tolls, in addition to other requirements, be calculated to yield a fair return on the shareholders' equity and so on. The minister rejected that and adopted a provision which has been in the law for some years and which I think is a much better clause. But the Prime Minister in his speech on second reading of the bill went on to indicate that the board had much wider and different powers in respect of tolls than in fact it has under the clause we are discussing, and that is a point that I think should also be cleared up.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I always listen with attention to my hon. friend who has been looking at this bill with care but I doubt very much if we need to go into a lengthy debate with regard to what was intended and meant by the Borden commission and what was intended by somebody else's remarks. We have accepted certain recommendations of the Borden commission. Other recommendations have not been accepted. In this particular instance clause 52 is identical with section 42 of the Pipe Lines Act. Here again we are leaving the matter to the board, rather than setting out some rigid, specific formula, so that the board may determine what is just and reasonable. We weighed very carefully the submission in the Borden report and gave it full consideration. But again we decided that for flexibility it would be wise to let the board work this out, determine how these tolls shall be applied, what is a just and reasonable toll and how it shall be related to the company's operations.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I can clarify it. I do not want to delay the thing unduly but it seemed to me that in part of recommendation No. 12 the Borden commission went quite too far and made a recommendation that was defective, to use a very mild word to describe it. I am glad to see that the minister has recognized that the legislation in force on this point, put there by the former government, did assert proper principles and that those principles are the ones that are being carried forward in this bill. I found myself in some difficulty with respect to the minister's and the Prime Minister's remarks because the impression seemed to be capable of being drawn from the two sets of remarks, together with the Borden commission report, that a change was being made in the clause as to tolls now being adopted and it is not. It is not changed at all. I think that clarifies the matter a good deal. I do not like making general remarks about the minister's statement on the earlier stage of the bill but his remarks and the Prime Minister's on this point were certainly of a nature, when read together with the Borden commission report, as to create a very bad misunderstanding on this subject and really were capable of misleading those who were not careful in trying to understand the subject and who did not read the remarks carefully.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that a reading of the Prime Minister's statement on May 26 cannot but give the impression that the alleged weaknesses of the previous legislation on the subject with respect to the protection of the public interest were to be removed by this particular bill. The Prime Minister stated, as found on page 4021 of Hansard:

> Finally there is the question of whether the public interest will be protected.

Then he went on to show how this bill would be more effective in that regard than the previous legislation. Also, on page 4025 the Prime Minister said:

> As to the price to be charged for gas and power, it must be just and reasonable in relation to the public interest. With the implementation of this legislation, no longer will there be any suspicion that the Canadian consumer is being forced to subsidize the foreign markets or that Canadian industries will be asked to pay higher prices for their energy than those paid by foreign industries using Canadian energy.

Presumably this is the clause of the bill under which that is to be guaranteed, so I should like the minister to tell us how this particular clause, which lays down the general criterion of equity and reasonableness, is to be more effective in the protection of the public interest, the prevention of unnecessary profiteering and all that kind of thing than the previous legislation.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, it is hoped that the board, through its careful consideration of all these problems, will end up with formulae which will be just and reasonable and that the interests of Canadian consumers will be protected. I feel that, from the experience of the past, that will be very much in the minds of the board. It is difficult to spell out things like that in legislation but a board, with all the facts before it, and with the public interest in mind, will be able to determine for us, in the Canadian interest, what is just and reasonable. We have deliberately left this flexible so that the board will have room to manœuvre and come to conclusions in an area of business, and business regulation, which is new to Canada.

We have noticed the experience of the people across the line with regard to this and we gather from observation that some flexibility would be very much worth while. Starting off as we are here, with the intention to bring together the various methods that have been used in the past with regard to the oil and gas industry and with regard to electric power, we feel this is the best way to make a start by allowing the board, in its wisdom, to determine what is just and reasonable. We thought it was better that flexibility should be permitted rather than spelling out the specific means right in the bill.

If my hon. friend finds, as time passes by, that the national interest has suffered or that Canadians have been discriminated against, I am sure he will be amongst the first to rise and point out this fact to us. I hope he will do so. However, I feel that we have a great chance here of having the Canadian interest protected by giving the board this freedom of action.

Mr. Pearson: The minister's language is very much like that which used to be heard in this house from his predecessor, whom he used to criticize strongly when the former minister was emphasizing the merits of flexibility in these matters and the impossibility of spelling out everything in legislation. It is interesting to hear that statement from him.

I have no quarrel with the statement as such, but I have a quarrel with the relationship of the statement to the very inflexible words of the Prime Minister to the effect that the price to be charged for gas and power must be just and reasonable in relation to the public interest. I suggest to the minister there is nothing in this particular provision, or any other provision in this bill, that ensures that the price to be charged for gas and oil must be just and reasonable in relation to the public interest. It is just as well that that should be made clear.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 53 agreed to.

On clause 54—Suspension of tariff.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to ask the committee to allow this clause to stand because I have an amendment under review.

Mr. Winch: I hope the amendment you have under review is exactly what I have in mind.

Clause stands.

On clause 55—No unjust discrimination.

Mr. McIlraith: There is a question of clarification in connection with clause 55 which does not have to do with the purpose of the clause but has to do with the word "company". Formerly, the regulation in this respect was of companies that had been declared common carriers. This principle has been dropped from the bill now before us. I am wondering what the significance of that is in relation to this clause of the bill, and in relation to companies whose shareholders are two or three producing companies who are using the full capacity of their lines to carry their own product. This question does not arise specifically under this clause only, but it arises under several of the clauses. I can see no other clause under which I could discuss it, and if there is any clause under which that point could be discussed, if the minister would indicate it I would like to hear about it.

Mr. Churchill: I am not sure that there is another clause under which this point arises. In reply to my hon. friend, if a company owning a pipe line is carrying only its own produce through that pipe line, there is no possibility of any discrimination. If it is carrying the material of other companies, then there might be room for discrimination in tolls, services or facilities, hence the clause has been written the way it is. I grant that in the old act the reference was to a common carrier.

Mr. McIlraith: It was declared to be a common carrier.

Mr. Churchill: There was a reference to a common carrier and the fact there should be no unjust discrimination.

Mr. McIlraith: I am not concerned about the unjust discrimination part of the clause. My point is that under the former procedure an application could be made to declare any company a common carrier. Most of the companies operated as common carriers but so far as I am aware none of them was declared to be a common carrier. This means that all the procedures concerning pipe lines did not have to be carried out in relation to those companies or a great number of the companies, in any event but only applied to those that were declared common carriers.

What I am concerned with here is this: Those classes of companies that are not in any way common carriers, but whose shareholders are in reality two or three producing companies, and who carry only their own products to the full capacity of the line, now are going to have to go through all these procedures with regard to tolls, just as any other company. I am not arguing at the moment that that is desirable or undesirable. I want to know from the minister whether or not he has considered that point because the provision for tolls is absolute and applies to all companies under this bill.

Mr. Churchill: I think it will not apply to the type of company to which my hon. friend refers, which is picking up and carrying its own material and not disposing of the material of others. Why would there be tariffs or tolls?

Mr. McIlraith: The reason would be that a company, within the meaning of the bill, is a pipe line company incorporated by a special act. This sort of company must charge tolls to the three companies whose products it is carrying. You see, such a company is virtually a private company, yet it is going to have to go through all the tariff procedures. The point I am raising is that the former act took care of that situation, but this bill does not.

If the minister will look at the point I am raising in connection with clause 51, he will see what I mean. It has to do with the definition of the word "company" and deletes the words "common carrier". The distinction in relation thereto is provided for under the former Pipe Lines Act but not under this bill.

Mr. Churchill: I appreciate the problem, but I do not know that I consider it to be quite as large as my hon. friend indicated. Do you think it is going to cause any difficulties that cannot be solved by the board?

Mr. McIlraith: I was looking at the special acts I had here on Friday in connection with another point. There were some 31 of them in the particular binding that I had. When I started to leaf through them I was appalled at the number that were of such nature in relation to the number which were carrying on as common carriers and were in effect, although not declared as such, common carriers. It is a point for which I just cannot find a solution in the bill put forward by the minister. I hope he has not completely overlooked the point.

Mr. Churchill: I think this is one among many problems which the board will have to consider and determine. The hon. member has raised a very good point; but unless he considers that somebody is going to suffer thereby, I wonder whether he would be content to let it stand as it is and then to see how the board deals with this particular matter.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I am content to let it stand and to see how the board deals with it. But there is this problem. The whole purpose of the legislation on the subject is to protect the public interest. But where you have companies operating where they are not jeopardizing the public interest in any way it seems that an unnecessary and excessive burden is being put both on the board and such companies. I think that this result is not intended and that it certainly does not accomplish a good purpose.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 56 agreed to.

On clause 57—No rebates, etc.

Mr. McIlraith: I notice that this clause is modelled on one in the Pipe Lines Act. But clause 57 deletes provision for a fine and leaves the question of punishment to the provisions of the Criminal Code. Is there any explanation for that deletion?

Mr. Churchill: Yes. There was that deletion of a fine not exceeding $1,000 and the substitution of the phrase "is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction as provided in the Criminal Code." That is the standard method of dealing with it, and it is a smaller fine.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. That is what concerns me. I wondered why you wanted a smaller fine for this type of offense.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 58—Contracts limiting liability of company.

Mr. Churchill: To clause 58 there is an amendment which my colleague is about to move. It is with regard to subclause 1 of clause 58.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That subclause (1) of clause 58 be amended by inserting the words "is included as a term or condition of its tariffs as filed or" after the word "notice" in line 32 on page 16.

Mr. McIlraith: Will the minister make clear the purpose of this amendment?

Mr. Churchill: Yes. It is to clarify a possible ambiguity. The words now printed in the bill left in some doubt the status of terms and conditions which were filed as part of the tariff but where not the subject of an order or a regulation by the board. The amendment would make clear that terms or conditions filed as part of a tariff pursuant to section 51 would be in the same position as a term or condition approved specially by a board order. It is no change; it is just clarification.

Mr. McIlraith: There is just one point. On a quick reading of the amendment I see no objection to it. But is this not going to depend somewhat on what is done with clause 51 which has been allowed to stand? As I understand it, clause 51 stands.

Mr. Churchill: That is true.

Mr. McIlraith: I am not raising any objection to the amendment to clause 58, but it seems to me that probably it should stand in case there are changes in clause 51.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 58 stand.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

On clause 59—Duty of oil pipe line company.

Mr. Winch: There is one point in connection with this clause, and I spoke about it on Friday on second reading. I am afraid I find it difficult to understand the wording of subclause (2), where it is stated:

(2) The board may, if it considers it necessary or desirable to do so in the public interest, require—

And certain things are mentioned. What I have never been able to understand in some acts, but in particular in this one, is this. If the board deems it in the public interest to require a company operating a pipe line or transmission line to do a certain thing, I think it should say that it shall do so. I think this is an important matter. If something is required in the public interest I should like to know why the legislation should not say that it shall take the action as set forth, and not that it may in the public interest do so. If it is in the public interest, surely the word should be "shall" and not "may". Otherwise, why have in there at all the words "in the public interest"?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The explanation is found in the last line of the section.

Mr. Churchill: We had this matter under discussion in part on Friday. It was not made a mandatory because of the final clause in that subsection which states as follows:

—if the board finds that no undue burden will be placed upon the company thereby.

Mr. McIlraith: The whole clause raises the point that I dealt with a few minutes ago in connection with clause 55, namely the failure to distinguish between common carriers and companies that are not common carriers. Perhaps I will not repeat the remarks that I made on that clause but they are applicable with variations to this clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 60 agreed to.

On clause 61—Tolls for transmission of gas.

Mr. Robichaud: I understand that this is a new clause which was not included in the Pipe Lines Act. Can the minister explain why certain provisions are necessary in the case of gas but there is no comparable provision with respect to oil? I understand the minister is out for a few moments.

Mr. Green: Go ahead with your question.

Mr. Robichaud: Could the minister explain why there are provisions with relation to gas when there are none with respect to oil? I understand this is a new provision altogether and I should like the minister to give the committee an explanation.

Mr. Winch: This is one clause which has completely got me stumped. I have read it and re-read it but I have completely missed the purport of it. Maybe I am missing the odd words which would give me the intent of the clause, but I simply cannot understand what is the purport of clause 61. Perhaps the minister could explain it in layman's language. Perhaps the hon. member from Calgary South already understands it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I will wait until the minister can tell me.

Mr. Robichaud: There is a further explanation which the minister may give when he comes back. This clause provides that where the gas transmitted by a company through its pipe line from any place within a province to any place outside the province is the property of the company, the board can fix a proportion of the difference between the amount paid by the company for the gas and the amount for which the gas is sold. But there is no such provision in the case of oil.

Mr. Winch: Let us look at the terms of the clause. The wording reads:

Where the gas transmitted by a company through its pipe line from any place within a province to any place outside the province is the property of the company—

Here we have a situation where a company owns the pipe line. It buys the gas in one province and sells it to another end in another province, but it owns the pipe line in which the gas is being transmitted. That, I can understand. But what is the meaning of what follows?

—such proportion as the board may fix of the differential between the amount paid by the company for the gas and the amount for which the gas is sold by the company shall for the purposes of this Part be deemed to be a toll charged by the company to the purchaser for the transmission thereof.

What in the name of heaven does that mean?

Mr. Churchill: This clause 61 has no counterpart in existing energy legislation. Recommendation 11 subsection (c) of the Borden report has been questioned on the ground that parliament had no power in peace time to control the prices charged for gas by transmission companies. The provinces, of course, claim jurisdiction over the price of gas at the point of origin and at the point of consumption. The price jurisdiction which the government would exercise is that on prices charged by interprovincial companies transmitting gas to their customers, that is, to the companies which buy gas for resale either to other gas companies or to consumers. While these prices cannot legally be controlled, the actual transmission charges of the pipe line company can, since they are similar to the freight rates on railroads. In the case of gas pipe lines the commodity carried is generally the property of the carrier and no transmission charge as such is levied. It is, however, provided here that in such case a proportion of the difference between the price paid for the gas and the price at which it is sold by the transmission company shall be deemed to be a toll.

Mr. McIlraith: Is it not simply a matter of the provinces having jurisdiction over the purchase price and the sale price of the gas and an attempt by this government to put forward something which would prevent exorbitant differentials? This is only a partial protection of the public in the sense that the companies can pay any price they wish for their product, or sell it at any price they wish but that the differential, which is the only element which this parliament can control, may be subjected to a limiting toll. The clause could very well have been put in in the early part of the bill as a definition of the word "toll". That is where it should have been included. This is the only way in which the board can control the price paid by consumers in the event of an abnormal transmission charge being made. I am not suggesting that this would happen, because I am sure that no producer would want to do any such thing. But the problem is still there. It still remains, and this clause does not really take care of it. However, it goes about as far as we can go constitutionally.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the minister if this is not precisely what he and his friends used to call centralization when they were on this side of the house?

Mr. Argue: I am wondering if under this clause the board is permitted to bring only a part of the difference in price under its control, in the case of a company which owns both the gas and the transmission lines? In this case that would mean the possibility of a much smaller share than in the case of a pipe line company which is merely transporting the gas. I ask this specific question: supposing the company which owns the pipe line also owns the gas. These figures might not be realistic, but supposing the gas going into the pipe line is bought at a price of, say, 30 cents and it is sold out of the pipe line by the company which owns the pipe line and owns the gas to a company that is distributing the gas, to a retail company, at a price of 60 cents. I want to know whether, according to this clause, the difference between 30 and 60, or part of the difference between 30 and 60 can be exempted from this provision. If this is the case I think the clause is wide open for an interpretation by the board which would allow the company to proceed almost free of all regulations. I can understand that if the 30 refers to the price of the gas going into the line and the 60 refers to the price of the gas going to the consumer, this clause would exempt a proportion of the cost which ordinarily might be considered a retailing cost. But my question is this: if the 60 is the price to a distributor is it then possible for the board to say whether or not it should regulate the full difference between the 30 and 60?

Mr. Churchill: That is a question which has received a good deal of study. It has arisen in the minds of many people and a great deal of midnight oil was burned over clause 61, I can assure the hon. member. The difference between the 30 he mentioned and 60—the entire amount—the board could take as a differential or it could take any proportion of that which it saw fit in view of all the circumstances and in view of what it considered to be just and reasonable.

Mr. Argue: The minister's explanation to me is not satisfactory. It may be an accurate explanation but I take it that the board has the right to decide what proportion it feels it should control in this specific case in view of all the circumstances. I would submit that is a very loosely worded clause. It means in fact that the board could decide to regulate only a small proportion of the difference in cost and the whole bill, whatever it may be worth,—and as we go from clause to clause I see less and less value in it—would fall to the ground. I do not know why the board is not given the power to regulate the entire difference between the price of gas going into the line and the price of gas coming out of the line.

If the gas pipe-line company is itself in the retail field I think the board would have to set an arbitrary figure as to what should be the price coming out of the line. Under this clause I do not see why the board should be given the power in the instance of a company that owns the gas to exempt most of its operating margin from control.

Mr. Winch: Perhaps I am not getting this through my head but I do not want it to pass until I understand it. Is my interpretation of this correct? Does this deal wholly and solely with the transmission of gas on an interprovincial basis purchased in one province and sold in another? Do the words "the board may fix of the differential" mean that the board may decide the differential between the purchase price of the gas at one end and the selling price at the other? Is that basically what it means or is the minister now as confused as I was when I started?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member's first question I would say that this does refer to a pipe line crossing a provincial boundary. It reads that the board may fix of the differential between the amount paid by the company for the gas and the amount for which the gas is sold by the company. This means whatever proportion it chooses; the whole thing, if it likes. Using the figure the hon. member for Assiniboia put forward, if it is 30 cents at the intake end and 60 cents at the point where it leaves the pipe and goes to the consumer the difference is 30 cents and the board may say the 30 cents is the toll. On the contrary it could say that of that 30 cents it considers that 25 cents or 20 cents should be the toll charged. The board determines the proportion of the 30 cents that shall be declared to be the toll, but it could be the whole 30 cents.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 62—Powers of company.

Mr. McIlraith: Coming to part V of the bill, I take it that clauses 62 to 74 are virtually identical with those contained in the Pipe Lines Act, is that correct?

Mr. Churchill: All of part V with minor changes represents sections from the Pipe Lines Act. Clauses 62 to 65 of the bill correspond to sections 7 to 9 of the Pipe Lines Act; 66 to 69 correspond to 21 to 24 of the act; clause 70 is section 25 of the act; clauses 71 to 74 are drawn from sections 26 to 29 of the act; clause 75 is section 30 of the act; 76 is 31; 77 is 32; 78 is 36; 79 is a new clause and clause 80 is taken from section 3 of the act. The changes within those clauses are minor changes. Where there is a major change I shall draw it to the attention of the committee.

Before we go on, there is a change in clause 62 which I would ask my colleagues to move in the form of an amendment.

Mr. Green: I move:

That clause 62 be amended by inserting in paragraph (e) thereof the word "houses" after the word "buildings" in line 23 on page 18.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Churchill: There is a further amendment to this clause. Some of these amendments, I might say, have come to us from people within the industry who have been studying the bill with great care. They have asked for some of these things for the purposes of clarification.

After the number 62 in line 1 on page 18 the figure 1 in brackets should be inserted, and then at the bottom of the page a new clause will be added which will be subclause 2. Here the intention is to clarify the expression "pipe line".

My colleague will move an amendment to this effect in just a moment. It is sought to extend the definition of a pipe line to include a line for the transmission of sulphur or sulphur compounds obtained from an oil or gas well connecting a province with any other or others of the provinces or extending beyond the limits of a province.

I will give the explanation after my colleague has moved the amendment.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clause 62 be further amended by inserting "(1)" after the number "62" in line 1 on page 18 and by adding thereto the following subclause: "Lines for transmission of sulphur."

(2) for the purposes of this part the expression "pipe lines" includes a line for the transmission of sulphur or sulphur compounds obtained from an oil or gas well, any product thereof, connecting a province with any other or others of the provinces or extending beyond the limits of a province.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to provide that pipe lines incorporated by special act for purposes including the transmission of sulphur and sulphur compounds would come under part V of this act. This will enable such a company to exercise the powers of expropriation contemplated in its special act. Later when we come to clause 75 I shall propose another amendment to ensure that in exercising those powers such a company will come under the scrutiny of the board.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, this clause goes part way to meet the difficulty I raised the other day when we were dealing with another clause of the bill, I believe the clause having to do with the definition of the word "company". In any event, it puts the type of very large pipe line to which I made reference on that occasion under this act in so far as certain rights and privileges of the company are concerned. Some of the rights and privileges given to such a private company incorporated by special act are quite extensive. I would point out—and I want the minister to correct me if I am wrong—that the amendment gives such a private company the very extensive right of expropriation of lands, but at the same time does not protect in any way the public who may be investors in such a pipe line company. We are not giving any protection by way of public hearings by the new board before the company constructs its line. There is no requirement that they apply for a licence, and the fact may well be that such a company will be thought by many of the investing public to be another pipe line company under the jurisdiction and control of the national energy board.

I would point out that the particular company to which I made reference on Friday—and I may say I know very little about it—uses in its name the words "pipe line company", a name very similar to the type of name commonly used by oil and gas transmission lines. We are doing something here that causes me some concern. It is a real point. I must say that I for one dislike intensely the common habit of this parliament and of legislatures in the provincial field of extending the right of expropriation pretty freely, and here we are doing that very thing and at the same time not giving the public the corresponding type of protection that parliament in its wisdom has seen fit to apply to all other pipe lines dealing with the transmission of products arising out of the oil development in the west. This is something that concerns me very considerably.

Mr. Churchill: I may say on this point that the amendment which will be proposed to clause 75 brings that type of company under the scrutiny of the board. This amendment will be moved subsequently. The provisions of part III respecting the plan, profile and book of reference apply mutatis mutandis to a company in the exercise of its powers in this section in respect of the matters described in clause 62 that we are dealing with. Perhaps that would meet in part at least my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. McIlraith: It meets a small part of it but it does not give any protection to the investing public. There is a real difficulty here. I am grateful to the minister for bringing such a company under some control, but it is very little control. After all that has been said in this parliament over the years, here we are enabling certain types of companies to take the extraordinary rights of expropriation and other rights of that sort, and at the same time removing them from all control. It is something that concerns me a good deal. I am wondering how much the government has really thought through this point because I must say I frankly did not think of the difficulty until I saw that special act of incorporation of the one company to which we made reference.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I thought we were dealing with the amendment. If it is satisfactory to deal with the question of compensation I would like to say something on it.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question? You have heard the amendment. Shall it carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Just a minute; the thought occurs to me—and this question was raised the other day—that the company here is given power, subject to the provisions of the special act, and this provision may cover the point I have in mind. The power given is to go into and upon any crown land. What right has this parliament to empower any company to enter into and upon any crown land? We certainly have the right to give a company the right to enter into and upon any crown land in the right of Canada, but certainly not on lands held by the provinces. I know this is not a new clause, but I would be interested in the minister's comments.

Mr. Churchill: I appreciate the hon. member's inquiry, but I think I would have to refer that to my colleague, the Minister of Justice, for an appropriate reply. I have not the reply myself right now. In any case, Mr. Chairman, in view of the comments with regard to the amendment which we have proposed I ask that we let this clause stand and perhaps an answer to the latter question might be given later.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee agreeable to have this clause stand?

Mr. Herridge: If the clause is going to stand I would just like to say the few words I intended to say on this clause before it stands. As a matter of fact, I was rising to make the same comment as the hon. member for Essex East made with respect to what right has this parliament to authorize a company to take land in the name of the queen in the right of a province? I also want to deal with the question of crossing private land. I am thinking particularly of farm land, because we had rather an unfortunate experience in our district in the laying of a pipe line there. I notice that this clause, particularly in paragraphs (b) and (c), makes provision for a company to purchase, take and hold of and from any person any land or other property necessary for the construction, maintenance and operation of its pipe line and alienate, sell or dispose of any of its land or property that for any reason has become unnecessary for the purpose of the line.

Paragraph (c) reads:

> Construct, lay, carry or place its pipe line across, upon or under the land of any person on the located line of the pipe line.

When I go to clause 68 I notice there appears to be more protection given to mining companies. Clause 68 reads:

> No company shall, without the authority of the board, locate the line of its proposed pipe line, or construct the pipe line or portion thereof, so as to obstruct or interfere with or injuriously affect the working of or the access or adit to a mine then open, or for the opening of which preparations are, at the time of such location, being lawfully and openly made.

My point is that there appears to be much greater protection provided under the legislation for a mining company, or mining operations, than there is for a farmer. In our section during the construction of a pipe line the engineers for a certain company laid out the route, and this route was over a distance of some 15 miles just beside a highway, some 100 feet back from the highway, but in front of a considerable number of farm residences, and in some instances going within 10 feet of the farmers' verandahs and through their barnyards along this considerable distance. When the local people, the owners, protested, the engineer in charge said, "No, we have got the right and that is where the line is going." When the people of Kootenay West are in trouble it is only natural that they come to the member for Kootenay West under such circumstances and at that time they did so although this was a provincial matter. I went and saw the farmers and told them not to sign anything. The engineer in question threw the easement document on the ground and said, "If you will not sign it we will go to court and get the right very quickly." I said to the farmers, "Do not sign anything".

I called a meeting of all these people. They all happened to be members of the Doukhobor sect although not Sons of Freedom. At the meeting they discussed their problem and they had a legitimate complaint. Fortunately we were able to have the matter considered by a prominent lawyer in Vancouver. He went to see the attorney general who saw the injustice and called in the heads of the company and as a result of what in effect was almost an order they had to change the route of the line to the back of the farms which all bordered on mountain ground. The area is between Brilliant and South Slocan and the Minister of Public Works understands exactly what I am talking about.

There was no provision there for reference to a board or anything of that sort. Apparently they had the right to do this. It was only after meetings, united opposition and the realization on the part of the government that this was a very unwise thing to do in that county, to say the least, that the company concerned was forced to change the location of the line at an increased cost of $30,000 to $40,000. I think we should do everything possible to make certain that the rights of farmers and small property holders are protected. In another case this company went right through a man's farm, and with an oil pipe line it is not simply a question of burying the pipe. A certain area of ground on each side of the pipe cannot be cultivated or used and has to be kept free of weeds so that if gas escapes it will not be inflammable. There are several disabilities to property owners who, in my opinion, are not sufficiently covered just by the payment of so much per acre for the land used.

Because of my experience in this respect and the experience of some of my constituents I should like the minister to explain to the committee what protection there is in this clause for the farmer or small property holder in order to prevent a recurrence of such circumstances and also why more protection apparently is provided to mining companies than to farmers and small property holders when it comes to the question of entering their property for the laying of a pipe line.

Mr. Winch: The minister has said that this clause may be allowed to stand. I should like to ask him whether it would not be possible to reopen clause 61 and allow it to stand. I have just been informed that some very eminent members of the legal profession in this city are also very disturbed about clause 61 on account of the confusion. I do not think it would bother the minister if it were reopened and allowed to stand for a few hours. Would the minister agree?

Mr. Churchill: The member is making a rather unusual request with respect to a clause which has been passed. I hope he is not anticipating too lengthy a debate. I am glad to hear from everybody on clause 61. As I said earlier, it is a difficult clause.

Mr. Winch: I only ask because in the past few minutes I have received what I consider very good advice that eminent lawyers in this city are very much disturbed about clause 61 because they find it most confusing. If I possibly can I should like to find out in the next few hours just why they are confused.

Mr. Churchill: All right.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to allowing clause 61 to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Mr. McIlraith: Just before we leave clause 62 there is one comment I might add the minister might wish to have in mind when he is considering this clause further. In discussion on earlier clauses I advanced an argument having to do with the difference between common carriers and companies that are not common carriers. I would point out that clause 62 is another clause illustrating the need for that same distinction. There are many companies transmitting oil or gas several hundred miles which have never used the power of expropriation. Yet we are not making any provisions for such companies that are not in fact operating as common carriers and not using powers of expropriation to be treated any differently from companies that are using the power of expropriation and operating as common carriers.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has agreed to let this clause stand and as my remarks were confined only to crown lands the minister will look into further similar aspects of the clause. For instance, in subclause (a) it says, "enter into and upon any crown land," and in subclause (b) it says, "purchase, take and hold of and from any person any land or other property necessary for the construction", etc. I think the examination that is going to be made should be made not only with respect to any crown lands but any lands, particularly those held by private individuals.

Mr. Henderson: Where I come from a pipe line was built and they came there and wanted to go through our lands. We did not want them to go through. They said that they could go through so we stopped them by force and they moved two miles south and came in over V.L.A. land. Apparently V.L.A. let them go through that land and they bypassed us. There was no protection whatever, only brute strength. This fellow came along and said, "Where are you and I going to have 'rassle', behind the barn"? I said that I did not know that "rassling" was mixed up in this. I said ,"You are not coming through our land." We had eight quarters there and we really had him blocked.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would bet on the hon. member for Cariboo anytime.

Mr. Henderson: The outcome was that they went and saw the soldiers' settlement officer and he told them to go through the V.L.A. land. They went south of us and there they are. We had no redress, only brute force.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 62 be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Clauses 63 to 65 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 66—Crown lands.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Subclause 1 of this clause reads as follows:

> No company shall take possession of, use or occupy lands vested in Her Majesty without the consent of the governor in council.

If the lands in question are lands vested in Her Majesty in the right of a province surely it is no concern of the governor in council. The same point is involved here that I made with regard to clause 62. Perhaps that ought to be considered, unless the minister has an explanation.

Mr. Churchill: I take it to be a matter of interpretation. As I mentioned earlier, virtually all of part V of the bill has been carried forward from the Pipe Lines Act and these clauses or sections have been standing on the statute books for a number of years.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My objection is technical, but it is important. The illustration given by the member for Cariboo is perhaps the most persuasive argument we have had that there are occasions when there are violations or invasions of property in the manner suggested. No matter how long something has been on the statute books, if it is incorrect—I know it would not have been put there intentionally—it is our responsibility to correct it at the first opportunity and now is the opportunity. If the law officers of the crown are not able to give us satisfactory answers, then surely there is only one course open to us and that is to correct it. I am not trying to hold up my hon. friend's legislation, but he might have that clause looked at as well.

Mr. Churchill: My hon. friend raised this question on clause 62, which we are holding open.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, but I am now raising it on clause 66. My friend has left clause 62, but if we pass clause 62 then we have no way of bringing this to the minister's attention again.

Mr. Churchill: We can stand clause 66, then.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to allow clause 66 to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Clauses 67 to 74, inclusive, agreed to.

On clause 75—Expropriation provisions of Railway Act incorporated.

Mr. Churchill: I have an amendment to suggest, and it is an addition to clause 75, so there will be a subclause (1) and subclause (2). I believe I read out this amendment earlier, and this is related to what we were doing with regard to clause 62. Perhaps for the record, we might have the amendment moved now, and I presume we would have to stand clause 75 until we determine what shall be done with clause 62.

Mr. Green: I move:

That clause 75 be amended by inserting "(1)" after the number "75" in line 1 on page 22 and by adding thereto the following subclause:

(2) the provisions of part III respecting a plan, profile and book of reference are applicable mutatis mutandis to a company in the exercise of its powers under this section in respect of a line as described in subsection (2) of section 62.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee agreeable to clause 75 standing, with the amendment?

Mr. Robichaud: Could the minister explain if this amendment has something to do with clause 27 which was allowed to stand on Friday?

Mr. Churchill: No, clauses 27 and 29 have been allowed to stand because we are waiting for the return of the hon. member for Villeneuve who suggested a change. I shall have an explanation for him. If we complete the bill tonight, of course, we will deal with them then. Otherwise, it will be tomorrow.

Mr. McIlraith: Before this clause is allowed to stand, I notice a reference to section 251 of the Railway Act in the corresponding section of the Pipe Lines Act has been left out. I take it that is because it is felt it is not needed.

Mr. Churchill: Section 251 is to be replaced, and it will be discussed under clause 76.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee agreeable to allowing clause 75 to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

On clause 76—Definitions.

Mr. Churchill: There is another amendment to line 17 on page 22, and my colleague will indicate the slight change there.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That subclause (1) of clause 76 be amended by striking out the words "hydrocarbons or power" in line 17 on page 22 and substituting therefor the words "hydrocarbons, power or any other substance".

Mr. Churchill: I might say that the purpose of this amendment is to include in the definition of utilities, lines of pipe such as those, for example, conveying water, sewage or chemicals other than hydrocarbons.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee has heard the amendment, is the committee agreeable to the amendment?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Churchill: There is another amendment to clause 76. We intend to strike out subclause (6) and substitute therefor a different wording.

Mr. Green: I move:

That clause 76 be further amended by striking out subclause (6) thereof and substituting therefor the following:

(6) The appropriate authority may grant leave under this section after construction of the proposed work has commenced if the appropriate authority is satisfied that the work was urgently required and, prior to the commencement of construction, the appropriate authority was notified of the company's intention to proceed with the proposed work.

Mr. Churchill: I might make an explanation of the purpose of this amendment. It is to take care of an emergency situation with regard to the crossing of utility lines. Various companies engaged in the operation of pipe lines have indicated to us that the words now appearing in the bill are so restrictive as to be little better than requiring formal prior approval by the appropriate authority. The kind of situation contemplated is, for instance, where a pipe line construction crew comes upon another line of pipe running across its right of way and rather than stop work, under this amendment it would be possible for the company to notify the appropriate authority and unless strong objection is expressed by that authority, proceed with the crossing. The applicant would, of course, bear the onus that the work was urgently required and that it was carried out in a manner consistent with the statutes, regulations and any relevant orders of competent authorities.

Mr. Herridge: Does that mean a company, in theory, could proceed with a pipe line without bothering to investigate what other pipe lines of utilities would be crossed, and just consider them as the construction crews came to them on an emergency basis as provided for in this clause?

Mr. Churchill: Are you ready to put the question on the amendment, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Herridge: I have asked the minister a very simple question. I was just waiting for an answer.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member please repeat his question.

Mr. Herridge: I asked the minister, Mr. Chairman, whether under this section in theory a company constructing a pipe line could ignore going to the trouble of finding out the public utilities it would be crossing in the way of municipal water works or sewers or others and then when they came to them could treat them all as emergencies without previously getting permission from the board. I am rather suspicious, Mr. Chairmain. The municipalities in my constituency have had some rather unfortunate experiences with respect to getting permission to do things and getting consideration for municipal, individual and community rights. We have had a similar experience as that of the hon. member for Cariboo.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Churchill: I was wondering whether we could not proceed with this matter.

Mr. Argue: Six o'clock.

Mr. Churchill: There has been some discussion with regard to this matter but we think that the appropriate authorities have every protection under the proposed amendment here which provides in part:

> —if the appropriate authority is satisfied that the work was urgently required and, prior to the commencement of construction, the appropriate authority was notified of the company's intention to proceed with the proposed work.

We think that is adequate to protect the various organizations mentioned by my hon. friend. The wording follows closely that of the present act. The difference there is simply the question of consent in writing.

Mr. Herridge: The appropriate authority, I assume, would be the national energy board. Is that correct?

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Churchill: It depends. At the beginning of clause 76, as my hon. friend will note, "appropriate authority" is defined under four headings.

Mr. Herridge: Yes; but in each case the situation is the same. I would not blame the individual concerned for a moment. But, as an illustration, suppose the Minister of Public Works has a matter like this referred to him. He has no personal knowledge of the circumstances on the ground or of the conditions under which the pipe line is being built, and the tendency would be to accept the word of the company. What I am concerned about is this. I can see the necessity for the provision under emergency conditions but it should be used only under strictly emergency conditions. I mention this matter because in our constituency a company blundered ahead across various properties and caused considerable unexpected damage. This action was covered in some way by our provincial legislation but a great deal of dissatisfaction was caused by the way in which this pipe line was built, in some cases. I refer to failure to respect the rights of municipalities, communities and individuals.

Mr. Churchill: With experiences such as that in mind I think the energy board will exercise closer supervision over these companies and give closer examination to their plans when they are applying for a certificate of public convenience and necessity. That is not to say that the board of transport commissioners has not done its job adequately; but obviously various unforeseen things occur in the construction of these pipe lines. It all now becomes a matter of history of which the board will be cognizant and perhaps greater care will be observed in the future.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee has heard the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 77—Leave to construct highways, etc., across pipe lines.

Mr. Churchill: There is an amendment here, Mr. Chairman. It is just a slight change such as we made earlier, with the addition of four words.

Mr. Green: I move:

> That subclause (1) of clause 77 be amended by striking out the words "for the transmission of hydrocarbons or power" in lines 5 and 6 on page 23 and substituting therefor the words "or a line for the transmission of hydrocarbons, power or any other substance".

The Deputy Chairman: The committee has heard the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 2 as amended agreed to.

On clause 78—Company to cut down weeds.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister a question with respect to this clause. What supervision over the company is provided to make certain that the weeds such as thistles and so on are cut on these strips that are taken through cultivated land? How does the national energy board make certain that section 78 is complied with in connection with the cutting of noxious weeds and thistles and so on across the farmer's land?

Mr. Churchill: I think in the same way as the board of transport commissioners has satisfied itself in the past. It would be through inspection or inspection following upon complaint or through certification by the company that it had lived up to the sections in this act and had disposed of the thistles, noxious weeds and so on. I think there are various ways in which the energy board could satisfy themselves that the company had maintained or continued its work properly and held to the sections of the act.

Mr. Herridge: I judge, then, that if a farmer complained to the national energy board they would at once see to it that this section was complied with.

Mr. Churchill: I hope the situation will not reach the stage where a farmer is obliged to complain to the energy board in order to get a company to do what it is supposed to do. Experience again will show whether or not that is done. But in so many instances the pipe is buried and the land above the pipe is plowed and sown. It is not left vacant just to grow weeds. This situation will occur in areas of uncultivated land and various parts like that going through bush country perhaps where action will have to be taken because of the effects of these weeds on adjoining cultivated property.

Mr. Herridge: In our district, Mr. Chairman, there is a strip—I think it is 25 feet wide—along the pipe line and the farmer is not allowed to cultivate it or to grow any more crops.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Clause 78 agreed to.

On clause 79—Assets of company subject to execution, etc.

Mr. McIlraith: Clause 79 is a new clause, and I wonder what the basis of it may be.

Mr. Lambert: I wonder if I could address myself briefly to clause 79? Contrary to some prognostications that there is nothing new in this bill, this is an innovation and one upon which the government is to be commended in my humble estimate. Briefly, this clause provides that subcontractors, suppliers and workmen who, unfortunately, have not been paid, may attach a lien under the various provincial statutes to contractors' claims. We had an unfortunate experience a few years ago during the construction of an interprovincial pipe line when a substantial subcontractor was unable to collect because he was not able to file his lien. I think it would be highly unfair that while pipe lines within provinces are subject to the right of every citizen to recover in respect of unpaid claims, promoters of a pipe line which crosses a boundary should escape such responsibilities.

It must, of course, be recognized that the right to file a lien is subject to the statutes and provisions which exist within each province. I do not think there are good grounds for the fear expressed by some people that this provision may harass the pipe line companies. I do not think this will necessarily follow, and I submit that this is an excellent provision.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not intend to deal with the merits of this clause because, naturally, I do not quarrel with it. But the hon. member who has just spoken is a lawyer. Does he think that this provision in any way changes the rights of the provinces with regard to executions of any property or in connection with the creation of any lien. This bill says, of course:

> —that nothing in this act restricts or prohibits any of the following transactions—

I wonder if the hon. member would agree that this clause is, in a sense, superfluous in that it clearly cannot restrict or prohibit anything mentioned in clause 79 (a) (i) or (ii) since these are matters seemingly within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. Lambert: Perhaps I may briefly recall the experience of a fellow lawyer in the Comstock-Midwestern case a few years ago. Notwithstanding the fact that there was a provincial statute permitting a lien, in that case, because a pipe line was an interprovincial construction, the provincial statute was not deemed to apply. This clause, I suggest, is a means whereby an interprovincial pipe line is taken out of this refinement of the interpretation of provincial legislation.

Mr. Henderson: We want protection in this part of the bill for companies like Northern Hardware at Prince George which paid $13,000 for dynamite for a pipe line outfit and lost every cent.

An hon. Member: Too bad.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 80 and 81 agreed to.

On clause 82—Issue of licences.

Mr. McIlraith: Before we pass clause 82, is the minister satisfied that the releasing from control of export of fluids other than hydrocarbons as defined in this new legislation is not going to create any difficulties?

Mr. Churchill: We examined that point very closely and we reached the conclusion that no difficulties would arise.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 83—Considerations applicable to issue of licences.

Mr. Churchill: I have an amendment to move with respect to this clause. If my colleague will move the amendment, I will give the explanation.

Mr. Green moved:

That clause 83 be amended by inserting after the word "Canada" in line 19 on page 24 the words "having regard to the trends in the discovery of gas in Canada."

Mr. Churchill: May I say that the intent of these words proposed to be added is to make clear that the board shall have regard to trends in the discovery of gas in Canada as well as to the reasonably foreseeable requirements for use in Canada. Thus the board will consider not only the present reserves of gas in relation to future requirements but also the trend in the discovery of gas, or the potential reserve which could be assessed.

The Deputy Chairman: May I draw the minister's attention to the fact that the amendment should read "in line 20 on page 24." I will change the amendment to read "line 20". Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. McIlraith: Far be it from me to question the Chair, but I am wondering if it should be line 20.

The Deputy Chairman: "Canada" is in line 20.

Mr. McIlraith: There seem to be two sets of the bill. In mine, it is in line 19.

Mr. Pearson: I take it that this amendment is designed to ensure that there shall not be an unnecessarily restrictive policy applied by the board in respect to the export of gas and power and that foreseeable requirements for use in Canada which, of course, as the minister implied, is the first essential in any decision made by the board, should be interpreted in the light of potential production. The purpose of this amendment is to make easier rather than more restrictive the possible export of gas from this country.

Mr. Churchill: That is precisely the way we understand it. I thank the Leader of the Opposition for the clarity of his request.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I have a few words to say on clause 83 which, notwithstanding the amendment which has been introduced by the minister, is very important as far as this bill is concerned. Clause 83 imposes on the board the duty of having regard to all considerations that appear to it to be relevant though no such duty is imposed under the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act. We have no objection to this change but clause 83 also requires the board to ensure that the quantity of gas or power to be exported does not exceed the surplus remaining after allowance has been made for the foreseeable requirements for use in Canada.

When the Prime Minister spoke on second reading of this bill he insisted that the bill was introduced to protect the public interest. We feel there is no clause in this bill which protects the public interest from the tolls to be charged in comparison with those that could be charged when such commodities are exported. I therefore move:

That paragraph (b) of section 83 of Bill C-49 be replaced by the following:

83(b) the price to be charged by an applicant for gas or power exported by him is not lower than the price at which gas or power, respectively, is supplied by him or his supplier in similar quantities and under similar conditions of sale for consumption in Canada.

My main reason for introducing this amendment is that in certain cases power is being exported and sold to consumers in the United States. There is no provision in the bill to give assurance that the rates charged to United States consumers will be comparable to those charged Canadian consumers. We think the best illustration can be found in New Brunswick where the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission exports power to the state of Maine where a certain company exports in turn this same power to Canadian consumers along the Saint John river valley. We feel there should be protection under which Canadian consumers would not be charged rates exceeding those charged United States consumers and under which a Canadian company exporting power to the United States would not charge rates lower than those it would charge Canadian consumers for the same power.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, may I pass one observation on the amendment. Surely the hon. member who proposes this amendment must realize that market conditions in the two countries may be entirely different. The United States distributor may be competing with other types of power or fuel which are not applicable in Canada. How could the Canadian government absolutely determine what the ultimate rate would be to the consumer in the United States? Once a contract has been established there may be a change in the situation. Whereas in Canada the rates may be allowed to go up after various hearings, in the United States the rates might be driven down by reason of competition or otherwise; yet the hon. member would forbid export under those circumstances. I feel that the hon. gentleman is getting into some horrible difficulties.

Mr. Robichaud: In many instances, Mr. Chairman, the power that is being exported to the United States is being subsidized by the Canadian taxpayers. This should be an important consideration in a case like this. I have in mind particularly the case of the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, we in this group express the strongest support of this amendment. To meet the objection raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West, who I admit has not had an opportunity to read the amendment, I would suggest that if he looks at the last sentence of the amendment he will see provision for the thing he fears. This means that under comparable circumstances gas should not be sold in the United States for a price less than for which it is sold in Canada. We in this group give strong support to this amendment because we have suffered from this in British Columbia and appear to be going to suffer from it in the southern interior of that province.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I draw attention to the words of the Prime Minister on second reading of this bill as reported at page 4025 of Hansard of May 26:

> As to the price to be charged for gas and power, it must be just and reasonable in relation to the public interests. With the implementation of this legislation, no longer will there be any suspicion that the Canadian consumer is being forced to subsidize the foreign markets or that Canadian industries will be asked to pay higher prices for their energy than those paid by foreign industries using Canadian energy.

The purpose of this amendment is to make the Prime Minister's words mean something.

Mr. Winch: It will also give the Conservatives an opportunity to fulfil an election promise made in British Columbia. I was reading in the paper a few moments ago that the Minister of Justice was speaking in British Columbia and boasting about how many promises the Conservatives had implemented. In British Columbia the Conservatives promised that there would be placed on the statute books of Canada a piece of legislation that would never again allow a situation like that which presently obtains in that province. Gas in Alberta and northern British Columbia is shipped all across the province of British Columbia on one line which remains unbroken until it reaches a point approximately fifty miles from Vancouver where it divides two ways. It goes to New Westminster, Burnaby and Vancouver through one branch and across the border through the other. The price to the wholesaler at the border on gas going south of the border is less per thousand cubic feet than the price to the wholesaler who supplies it to Canadian citizens in Vancouver, New Westminster, Burnaby and the Fraser valley.

This is an extraordinary and damnable situation which the Conservatives during the election said they were going to correct. Through this amendment we want to make sure a correction takes place. We are certainly in support of this amendment and we feel that the Conservatives are, too, unless they have changed their minds in the last two years.

Mr. Churchill: The amendment that has been proposed is almost identical in wording with regulation 9 under the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act. This is the regulation which the Borden commission recommended should be rescinded. Recommendation No. 4 of the Borden report reads as follows:

> That regulation 9 of "Regulations respecting the exportation of power and fluids and the importation of gas" made and established by order in council P.C. 1955-907, in so far as it applies to natural gas, be rescinded.

My hon. friends, now faced with that, are attempting to have it re-established in the legislation. That regulation is precisely the one which gave rise to the difficulties out at the west coast because of the phrasing, "in similar quantities and under similar conditions of sale", and it is very difficult to get two situations exactly similar. For that reason, along with other things that we have done in the legislation, we have left it to the board to determine what is just and reasonable in the circumstances; is it just and reasonable with regard to the price to be charged by an applicant for gas or power exported by him, and it is just and reasonable in relation to the public interest.

The board we think will have to take into account the very factors my hon. friends are pointing out as to whether the public interest is protected, and to make sure that Canadians are not placed at a disadvantage with regard to their competitors in the United States. Our experience in Canada dates back to the days long before gas was used in this country, when hydroelectric power was being developed, and when hydroelectric power was being developed in this country some of it was done by United States capital. The power was exported across the line and used to build up United States industry there. Many years ago our people discovered that the advantage lay with the United States using the power that was developed in Canada. With that experience behind us we do not want to have the same thing happen with regard to this other great source of energy, namely natural gas.

Surely this is something that the energy board will take into account when it is considering the applications for export. At the same time I am sure they will have to take into consideration the cost to Canadian consumers if there is no export of gas. A line built at tremendous expense might operate at only a fraction of its total efficiency unless some gas were exported. If it operates lower than its full efficiency, obviously the price to the Canadian consumer will rise. The board will have to weigh and balance these factors one against the other and see what is to the advantage of Canada. With the difficulties that have already arisen and are apparent to Canadians under regulation No. 9 which I have just read we thought the wise thing to do was to give the board freedom of action to weigh all those factors and determine what was just and reasonable in relation to the public interest, and that is why the clause is worded as it is.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, the minister will realize that we have listened carefully to his argument and we have also noticed this afternoon and this evening that the minister has at his side the Minister of Public Works who has been moving quite a few amendments to this bill which proves why we were insisting that this bill be sent to a committee where it could be studied. Right from the time the bill was introduced we argued that it was a bill which needed careful study, and it should have been sent to a committee.

To answer the minister I would refer him to the remarks made by the Minister of Public Works as reported at page 1528 of Hansard, for February 25, 1955, when he was the member for Vancouver Quadra. Here is what he said on that occasion:

> I do not suppose it would be possible to have a power of revocation much wider than the one contained in the present act.

He was speaking then on the power, fluids and gas act. Then he added:

> Then there is the power to limit exportation to the surplus after Canadian needs have been met, and also to regulate the price on export so that price will not be lower than the price charged to Canadian consumers.

The amendment which we have moved is to cover exactly this point. It is to protect the Canadian consumers so that the price they will be charged for power is no higher than the one which can be charged for power exported to the United States.

Mr. Pearson: In the circumstances perhaps the Minister of Public Works would like to second our amendment. If he would not, perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver South, if he were in the house, would like to do it because only the other day he said, and I quote from page 4048 of Hansard:

> I believe one of the first acts of the energy board should be to review this matter to the end that the gas sold in the United States or any exported gas is not sold at any more favourable price than it is offered to Canadian consumers.

It is in order to assist the energy board in applying this very criterion to this problem that we have introduced this amendment. The minister emphasizes the desirability of giving the board flexibility in this matter. We think this particular question is so important that the board should also be given protection.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I rise to say just a few words about the sale of electrical power across the border. I think there is some misunderstanding in the mind of the hon. member for Gloucester on this score because I have been in conversation with the New Brunswick electric power commission and with other power commissions in various parts of the country. It is very clear to me that in the sale of hydroelectric power you have to keep in mind three or four types of power. If you are talking about firm power which will sell under a base load obviously it would be very simple to have the type of amendment you have in mind. Basic power can be sold at lower rates in the country of the source of origin sometimes.

You come now to the question of secondary power either as peak or dump power. If you can get a contract for your secondary power sometimes it can be sold at a lower price in your home country; but if you are up against a situation whereby your power surplus has a dumping factor in it then you do have to sell any place. This dumping power comes up without any knowledge simply because of the flow or lack of demand. Then, it is customary in power systems to get rid of this power at any price whatever and that, of course, is the case in the New Brunswick electric power commission, the example which the hon. member gave. Last year because of the high flows in the Saint John river they had a power surplus beyond all their expected demands and beyond all they could use in their own country. Therefore, rather than let the power go to waste they sold it to the systems to the south for what I consider was an attractive price of five mills.

Therefore, getting back to the amendment, if you put in an amendment—and I can interrupt myself here by saying that no person more than I wanted, in all the cases listed, something that would prevent the things I complained of in the last few years—when you take a look at the direct benefit, if you put the amendment in that you have to sell at a lower price for similar quantities, then in the case of electric power you can do great harm to the efficiency of the Canadian-operated system. If we are to measure ourselves as to how good Canadians we are I think the test should be one that gives the best for Canadian interests all along the line. In the case of hydro power, when you are referring to dump power particularly, it would be absolutely wrong and hurt Canadian interests if you put such a statutory proviso in the bill which would limit the board to make adjustments that would be advantageous to Canada.

The same thing could apply to natural gas. No person in this house has over the years stood up and complained more about what has happened with the Westcoast Transmission and could have happened at Emerson and may even happen at the Niagara connection of those United States competitors who are processing using Canadian power cheaper than we in Canada can get it. If you limit this board to regulation 9 in the old act you might legally allow the very thing to happen that happened before, and I think we should all be determined not to let that happen again in the future.

Mr. Robichaud: No remarks have been made this evening which are more in support of our amendment than those just made by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. After all, the minister has referred to basic power, secondary power, power surpluses and the dumping of extra power but the minister has failed to consider the last part of our amendment which reads as follows:

—than the price at which gas or power, respectively, is supplied by him or his supplier in similar quantities and under similar conditons of sale for consumption in Canada.

This is exactly the point which the minister has failed to recognize in the remarks he has just made.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I hesitate to speak again but I have not failed to recognize that. Using that example of similar conditions, if you were a power entity in Canada and were supplying your own market and if you had a surplus beyond that market and dumped that on your own market and destroyed your whole price structure you would break your own market but if you dumped that extra power into another country which could use it, then any price you got above zero would be a good deal. If the hon. member thinks that through for a minute I think he will see that is true.

Mr. Robichaud: In other words, the minister is making the point that Canadian taxpayers can subsidize power and export it to the United States and that it is a good deal to export power which has been subsidized by the Canadian taxpayers and sell it abroad at a lower rate than that offered Canadian consumers.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): You are putting words into my mouth which are not so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure we have listened to a very extraordinary argument by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in support of the clause as it is proposed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. As has just been pointed out, the conditions and circumstances of the foreign sale of gas, which have been mentioned by the hon. gentleman, can be safeguarded in the public interest by bearing in mind the concluding words in the proposed amendment which bear repetition, namely "is supplied by him or his supplier in similar quantities and under similar conditions of sale for consumption in Canada."

The hon. gentleman has made the same argument that was made by his colleague who argues for what he calls the principle of flexibility or perhaps we should more accurately say the principle of doubt. If the Canadian interest is such that the situation is as revealed by the two ministers speaking for the government, then surely the necessary safeguards are provided in the concluding part of this amendment. We have had placed on Hansard tonight the words of the Minister of Public Works, words uttered by him as a responsible member of the party in power. Those words must be taken as reflecting the principles that the government had in mind with regard to this measure, and if there could be any doubt about the authority of this position the Leader of the Opposition has removed that by referring to the observations made by the Prime Minister in his speech on the bill on May 26 last when he said on this very point, as the Leader of the Opposition reminded us, as found at page 4025 of Hansard:

As to the price to be charged for gas and power, it must be just and reasonable in relation to the public interest. With the implementation of this legislation, no longer will there be any suspicion that the Canadian consumer—

These are the important words.

—is being forced to subsidize the foreign markets or that Canadian industries will be asked to pay higher prices for their energy than those paid by foreign industries using Canadian energy.

With the safeguard in the amendment, "in similar quantities and under similar conditions", how is it possible for the government tonight to persist in this particular clause in the face of this statement by the Prime Minister? The Prime Minister is the head of the government and if hon. gentlemen pursue the present clause in its present form we are confronted with a division of view in the ministry itself. The Prime Minister had no doubts about this matter. I refer to other words of his which will be found on page 4021 of Hansard in which he said:

Finally there is the question of whether the public interest will be protected. One of the matters that was the cause of infinite unfairness to Canadians under some of the licences granted when the former government was in power was that Canadians paid through the nose for consumption in Canada while the price in the United States was lower.

These are not the words of a private member among those who sit on Mr. Speaker's right. These are not merely the words of a minister of the crown. These are the words of the Prime Minister spoken in this very debate on this very bill. When the Prime Minister spoke his words went all through the country. They were widely reported as reflecting the opinion of the government and these words of the Prime Minister were also widely applauded. The Prime Minister cannot expect parliament or the Canadian people to accept his words as representing government policy if the amendment now before the committee is not accepted or if there is no other appropriate modification of the words in the existing clause. The Prime Minister went on to say on page 4021:

These are a few of the material matters with which this legislation is concerned. Somebody said that the powers should be spelled out. In reply I affirm that they are spelled out—

We are asking that they be spelled out. We are asking that under similar conditions where there are similar quantities involved Canadians will not be charged more than citizens or industrial corporations of the United States. That is the principle, that they shall be treated alike. That is what the Prime Minister said. Our amendment carries forward the principle stated in the Prime Minister's observations. The bill as now drawn without this amendment is absolutely contrary to what the Prime Minister said. I can only say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has carefully piloted this legislation and, if I may say so, has done so with an understanding of the position of those who have sought to improve it, that he is placed in the invidious position of putting forward a clause in a bill which is diametrically opposed to the statements to which I have referred and which were made by the Prime Minister in his speech on this bill.

Mr. Drysdale: Would you like to finish reading that particular quotation?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

In reply I affirm that they are spelled out and are sufficiently flexible to assure through public hearings and through maintaining the inviolability of the board by its appointment for a period of seven years—

I want to remind my hon. friend who has just asked me a question that he should remember these words of the Prime Minister:

Finally there is the question of whether the public interest will be protected. One of the matters that was the cause of infinite unfairness to Canadians under some of the licences granted when the former government was in power—

This is the important point.

—was that Canadians paid through the nose for consumption in Canada while the price in the United States was lower.

These words are on all fours with this amendment. The Minister of Trade and Commerce tonight, in putting forward this particular clause in its present form, presents to the house the most unusual sight of cabinet division that we have seen since this government came into office. The Prime Minister is advocating a policy that is fully consistent with this amendment. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is advocating another policy. He might not have recalled the words of the Prime Minister, and it is because of that that I hope he has taken advantage of the reading of those words of the Prime Minister to reflect on the position in which I think he is unfairly placed. Under our system of government, the cabinet must speak with one voice. The Prime Minister, on a matter of policy, cannot have one view and one or more of his ministers another.

If the Minister of Trade and Commerce persists in presenting this clause, without the amendment or the kind of amendment proposed, then hon. members and the country can come to no other conclusion but that the cabinet is divided on this matter, and the consequences of such a division of ministerial view are well known to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Churchill: I always listen with a great deal of interest to my hon. friend. I want to assure him that there is the greatest exposition of cabinet solidarity here—

Mr. McIlraith: Not Friday night, there was not.

Mr. Churchill: —that he has seen. As a matter of fact, the entire house is in agreement on the principle of this matter, the principle being that Canadians shall not be placed at a disadvantage when their natural resource, gas, is exported. We are in agreement upon that, but my hon. friends want to continue as the law of the land regulation No. 9 which I read some time ago. They want to continue this regulation which has caused all the trouble.

This regulation was examined by the Borden commission and they rejected it. They said to rescind it. Let me quote to you what the royal commission on energy had to say on page 13 of their first report. After reprinting the regulation, the commission wrote as follows:

While the commission believes it understands the result which regulation 9 was designed to accomplish, nevertheless we have found it most difficult and, indeed, almost impossible to interpret. In the first place, the quantities and conditions of natural gas sales vary greatly as between contracts, so that price comparisons are difficult to make. The usual method of determining appropriate prices is based on a computation of cost of service and there are various methods of allocating certain of these costs to different types and quantities of sale. Furthermore, the regulation does not take into account other factors, such as competitive prices and value of service, factors which many authorities believe should be taken into account in the setting of prices. In the opinion of the commission, regulation 9 should be rescinded.

The commission believes that, if a national energy board enquires into the terms and conditions of each proposed export contract, satisfies itself that the terms are fair and reasonable and in the public interest, and discharges the other responsibilities which the commission is recommending should be placed upon it, the objectives which the commission assumes were envisaged by regulation 9 will be achieved.

Regulation 9, as the hon. member for Kootenay West pointed out, is the regulation under which the situation developed about which he complained. The Prime Minister drew attention to this regulation on page 4021 of Hansard for May 26, 1959. He said this:

Members of the former administration said, "We cannot protect you because the regulations say that regard must be had to similar conditions and similar quantities before determination in this regard can be made."

It is because regulation 9 did not give the protection that everybody wants, and the whole House of Commons is in agreement on this, that the Borden commission rejected regulation 9 and suggested another way of dealing with it. Our drafting of the bill is made to achieve exactly that desired end. We put it up to the energy board to size up all the factors concerning each contract for export and determine, as it says here, that the price to be charged by an applicant for gas or power exported by him is just and reasonable in relation to the public interest. The public interest means the Canadian public interest, and surely the public interest means the development of Canadian industry. This does not mean to make it possible for a competitor across the line to gain an advantage from the use of our natural resource, gas.

How is it to be done? Regulation 9 has been tried and has been found wanting, so the suggestion is that the board be given this power to determine the method by which the public interest can be protected. It was not protected under regulation 9. My hon. friends, who are striving to bring regulation 9 back into the statutes, are surely on the wrong track. This has been proven to be wrong. The regulation was examined by the Borden commission and rejected and a new method suggested which is calculated to do exactly the things that regulation 9 did not do, one of which is to protect the public interest. I have read and re-read regulation 9, which is really the amendment before us. There is a change in only one or two words. Regulation 9 falls on that phrase, "in similar quantities and under similar conditions of sale", because you cannot get those things exactly equal. A person who is buying in great bulk, as was done out on the west coast, is buying under different conditions from the person who is operating a very small business on the Canadian side. This was the argument under regulation 9, that prices for export, therefore, should be lower than the prices in our own country, and it is to that the people are objecting.

Then how do we get the safeguard? Our suggestion is embodied in this clause with which we have been dealing, clause 83, paragraph (b). This will give us the safeguard that everyone wants. Certainly we cannot get it if we just simply carry along with regulation 9. My hon. friends, therefore, who have been trying to make out a case of cabinet disunity and a case for lack of concern with regard to the Canadian people, have been arguing from a false premise. Our concern is exactly the same as that of our hon. friends opposite. Our concern was expressed by the Prime Minister in the words that have been quoted and re-quoted. Our concern has been shown by the wording which we have put into this bill.

Mr. Pearson: It is refreshing, it is almost unique, to listen to the minister produce a recommendation of the Borden commission in support of the position of the government. Against this recommendation we place the words of the Prime Minister, most of which are clear, and all we are asking the minister to do is to make an honest man of the Prime Minister by this amendment.

Mr. Brooks: I just wanted to say a few words on this amendment. I was rather surprised at the example cited by the hon. member for Gloucester in support of his amendment. He cited the export of electricity or power from the province of New Brunswick. He knows as well as I do that there is very little power exported from New Brunswick, an infinitesimal amount. As a matter of fact, up until the time the present government in New Brunswick came into power New Brunswick was starved for power. We feel very proud today that we not only have sufficient power for our own use but last year, as was pointed out by the minister for northern affairs, had power to export.

If we had charged the same price for the power that was exported as we charged for the power that was used we would not have been able to sell it. It would have been an entire loss. I suppose we used about 95 per cent at least of the power that was produced. The other small quantity was exported. The New Brunswick power commission found that they could make a good sale in the United States. They were well satisfied. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that the people of New Brunswick felt that the public interest was well served by the amount that they received. I think that had this act with this proposed amendment been in force at that time the province of New Brunswick would have lost the sale of this amount of power and would have had this surplus on its hands. Frankly, as I said a few moments ago, I feel that a great disservice would have been done to the province of New Brunswick which is today in the proud position of obtaining all the power that it needs and, in addition, has some to export.

Mr. Robichaud: I have listened with great interest to the remarks that have just been made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and I am sure that if the minister had read the amendment—and I want to read again the last sentence, which has been repeated three or four times; I refer to this amendment that I have just moved—if the minister had read the last part of it, he would not have made the remarks which he has just made. The last part of the amendment reads as follows:

—is supplied by him or his supplier in similar quantities and under similar conditions of sale for consumption in Canada.

Mr. Brooks: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Robichaud: Yes.

Mr. Brooks: The amount that was exported, I think he will agree with me, was a very small quantity. I think it was in the vicinity of 5 per cent, although I have not the exact figure. To whom would he have sold in the province of New Brunswick 5 per cent at a lower price than he would have sold the other 95 per cent? Is he going to discriminate against the buyers in the province of New Brunswick simply in order to satisfy the sale of a very small quantity of power abroad?

Mr. Robichaud: Notwithstanding what the minister has said, we should also take into consideration the fact that we are selling power that is being subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer.

As to the statement made by the Minister of Trade, may I say that I followed it with great interest. I noticed that the minister was more interested in rejecting certain recommendations or certain aspects of the bill or of the Pipe Lines Act which were not recommended than those sections which were opposed by the Borden commission. This is being done by the same minister who incorporated in the present bill 23 out of 34 recommendations of the Borden commission. I therefore think it is a very weak argument for the minister to make when he states that the Borden commission could not approve regulation 9 of the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act, and to use this as an argument for not accepting our amendment.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think this matter can rest at this point because the principle involved is too important. It will be recalled that when the Prime Minister spoke on May 26 he was followed by the hon. member for Ottawa West who put on the record a statement my Mr. John Davis who wrote in the "Behind the Headlines" series a pamphlet entitled "Canadian Energy Policy". At page 6, in the second last complete paragraph, in the last sentence of that study, the following appears: He goes on to point out:

> The quantities of energy used in both countries—

That is Canada and the United States.

> —are about the same per unit of gross national product. Hence, the basic difference is one of price. Even in 1958, consumers in Canada were paying between 30 and 50 per cent more for their energy than were their opposite numbers in the U.S.A.

At that time we were discussing the second reading of the bill. We had not reached an examination clause by clause of the measure as we are now doing tonight. What the Leader of the Opposition and those of us who have spoken on this point have been endeavouring to do is to point out that the head of the government has taken one position and that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is taking another. In the absence of a statement from the Minister of Trade and Commerce I think we can only conclude that the point of view stated by the Prime Minister is for some reason or another not now being accepted by the government.

The Leader of the Opposition has put on the record observations made by the Prime Minister in his speech during this debate and a few moments ago I put on the record another statement of his. I now wish to put on the record a third statement which was made by the Prime Minister and which is seemingly even stronger and more pertinent than were the other two and only accentuates the difference that prevails between my hon. friend who has the responsibility of piloting this measure and the Prime Minister.

As reported at pages 4025 and 4026 of Hansard the Prime Minister stated as follows:

> As to the price to be charged for gas and power, it must be just and reasonable in relation to the public interests. With the implementation of this legislation, no longer will there be any suspicion that the Canadian consumer is being forced to subsidize the foreign markets or that Canadian industries will be asked to pay higher prices for their industries than those paid by foreign energy using Canadian energy. That matter is extremely important.

Then the Prime Minister went on to say this, and I underline these words:

> In the trade world in which we are living, with the conflicts that are accelerating from month to month in the communist trade offensive, above everything else it is necessary for us in Canada, if our international trade is to be maintained, to see to it that we shall not be placed in a position where our costs in connection with energy derived from Canada are greater to Canadians than they are to any other nation, however friendly that nation may be.

Can there be any doubt about those words? The head of the government says that we must take steps in the bill, second reading of which was then before the house, so as to see to it that we shall not be placed in a position where our costs in connection with energy derived from Canada are greater to Canadians than they are to any other nation, however friendly that nation may be. Those are the words of the Prime Minister. Either those words mean something or they do not. Either they meant something when they were uttered or they were intended to give an impression which I am sure the Prime Minister did not intend. But the only conclusion is that his indications of intention are not being carried out in this bill. All that is being provided for in section 83 is that the board shall have regard to all considerations et cetera and that the board shall satisfy itself that the price to be charged by an applicant for gas or power exported by him is just and reasonable in relation to the public interest.

That is not what the Prime Minister said. The clause before us is not a direction. It is simply an indication that in considering an application for gas or power export the board will determine whether or not the price to be charged is just and reasonable. It says nothing about the price being charged to foreign corporations or industries being the same as the price being charged to Canadians.

Unless the minister is able to reconcile the difference between the words of the Prime Minister and the terms of this bill, the minister guiding this legislation tonight is, I repeat, in the unfortunate position of proposing something which represents a serious division between himself and the Prime Minister. The minister smiles, and I can understand why he should smile—I can understand his desire to smile—but that does not alter the fact that there is this difference between him, in his bill, and the words of the Prime Minister and this, under our constitutional practice, requires from the minister an explanation of the reasons for that variation in opinion which he has not yet given to the committee.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. gentleman is very entertaining indeed, but he is not logical and I regret that, because he used to be logical. There is no difference of opinion between the Prime Minister and myself. If there were I should be happy to find it out from the Prime Minister and not from hon. gentlemen opposite.

The words of the Prime Minister have often been quoted. He pointed out in his statement on May 26 that regulation 9 had failed to give Canadians the protection they required. He stated in the same speech:

As to the price to be charged for gas and power it must be just and reasonable in relation to the public interest.

That is precisely what we have here in this bill, almost word for word.

Mr. McIlraith: No, no.

Mr. Churchill: Almost word for word. The hon. gentleman says "no" but let me read out part of clause 83:

The price to be charged by an applicant for gas or power exported by him is just and reasonable in relation to the public interest.

That is what the Prime Minister had in mind, that the public interest would be protected by giving this type of authority to the energy board who would not be cribbed, cabined and confined by regulation No. 9 which is a restrictive regulation. Here the board can take account of all the factors which should be considered, and there is no no doubt in my mind, after the Borden report and after the lengthy discussion here in the House of Commons, but that the energy board to be set up will take fully into account the Canadian national interest and take fully into account the expressions of opinion here from both sides of the committee, leading toward the same objective.

I commend hon. members opposite for their helpfulness in discussion throughout this debate. They have been of assistance to us in clarifying the measure. I think, however, that in this particular instance they have been somewhat less than helpful, although they have very clearly stated that in their opinion the national interest requires the same thing as we consider that the national interest requires. Thus we are at one as far as that goes. We differ as to the wording by which that objective is to be achieved. I see no difference of opinion between the Prime Minister and myself with regard to the substance of clause 83.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister one question, if I may. What objection could the government have to accepting the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gloucester unless he and his colleagues intend that energy should be sold at a lower price to the United States? All this does is to impose one test—that it must not be sold at a cheaper price to the United States. What conceivable objection could there be to this amendment unless it is intended to sell at a cheaper price to the United States?

Mr. Churchill: I do not mind answering the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. The amendment, as I pointed out before, is just a rewrite of regulation 9 in which there was no provision for the public interest and under which gas is today being sold in the United States at a lower price than to Canadian citizens.

Amendment (Mr. Robichaud) negatived. Yeas, 23; nays, 76.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 84—Revocation and suspension of licences.

Mr. Pearson: Clause 84 deals with revocation and suspension of licences for export and import, and it merely states that subject to subsection 2 the board may revoke or suspend a licence issued under this part. But in the earlier part of this bill when we were dealing with revocation and suspension of certificates under part III, we found clause 47 reads:

Subject to subsection 2, the board may by order, with the approval of the governor in council, revoke or suspend a certificate—

Mr. Churchill: In clause 84 it is not only subject to subsection 2 but it is also subject to the regulations, and in clause 85 the governor in council may make regulations with regard to the purposes and provisions of this part, and in the regulations it is open to the governor in council to require that any revocation or suspension of licences must have the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. Pearson: Is the minister's explanation that it is because in clause 82 the board does not require the approval of the governor in council to issue the licences, that approval is not required in this instance?

Mr. Churchill: In clause 82 it is subject to the regulations and the regulations when drawn up may require the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should read this clause into the record in order to make my argument clear:

84. (1) Subject to subsection (2) and the regulations, the board may by order revoke or suspend a licence issued under this part if, in the opinion of the board, the person to whom it was issued has violated or failed to comply with any term or condition thereof.

(2) No order shall be made under this section unless notice has been given to the holder of the licence who is alleged to have violated or failed to comply with any term or condition thereof and an opportunity has been afforded to him of being heard.

My point is this. Presumably on these licences there may be several terms and conditions, some very important and some of lesser importance. It is possible that an exporter or a person licensed under this part may inadvertently fail to carry out one of the terms or conditions attached to the licence.

This present cause provides that he would be given notice and an opportunity of being heard. The legislation on which this is modelled is section 3 of the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act.

That act provided that in addition to their being a breach there must be notice to the licensee and the licensee must have an opportunity of rectifying the matter when drawn to his attention, and if he rectifies it there was no power of revocation. I point out to the minister the same argument I made on clause 47 which is similar when I outlined the danger of what he is doing by taking away that right of a licensee to rectify his breach in those circumstances.

I could perhaps move an amendment similar to that I moved previously but I do not think it is necessary. I made the point on the similar clause and I believe it is well understood by the committee. What the minister is doing here is putting an uncertainty on the value of these licences and that value is going to impair the right of the holder of the licence to finance his enterprise.

The minister pointed out at some length the need for investment in this whole industry and in the development of the sources of energy with which we are concerned and yet by this clause he is doing something that will interfere with obtaining investment and indeed tend to prevent the realization of what he indicated on second reading was so necessary. I therefore want to again draw the attention and point out this defect in the clause.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. McIlraith: Has the minister anything further to say?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I was not certain that the hon. member wanted me to comment at length on this. I appreciate that his argument is the same as he made so effectively on clause 47. We will certainly bear in mind the point he has raised but again I doubt there is any real danger. We have written in here the opportunity for the holder of the licence to be heard under the circumstances. If his licence is to be revoked or suspended notice must be given and an opportunity for him to be heard must also be given. We think that provides adequate protection. When discussing clause 47 I pointed out that the argument advanced by the hon. member is certainly deserving of attention and his points will be borne in mind.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 85—Regulations.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, subclause 2 of clause 85 reads as follows:

> The governor in council may by regulation exempt any person or class of persons or any product or class of products or any transactions, persons or areas from the operation of all or any of the provisions of this part or the regulations.

It seems to me that this is another of those paragraphs that gives sweeping powers to the governor in council under which in fact, if the governor in council wished, it could take away all of the powers the board has under this clause. I think it is perfectly ridiculous for parliament to go to great lengths to spell out the specific powers of the energy board which the government says is going to be staffed by competent men and then include provisions of this kind.

Part VI in my opinion contains sufficient qualifications and escape hatches for the board to make decisions in the interest of Canada. I do not know why the governor in council should wish to retain this all-embracing power. I therefore move:

> That subclause 2 of clause 85 be deleted.

If the governor in council wishes to strengthen the powers of the board the members of the cabinet should have no hesitation in accepting this amendment. They have been in a receptive mood as far as some suggestions are concerned. If the board is going to be competent surely the cabinet does not need to retain this complete power of veto over every action of the board.

Mr. Churchill: Once again in relation to this clause there appears to be in the mind of the hon. member a tendency to go beyond what was intended. If it seems suitable to parliament to accept the subsequent clause No. 87 and if in time oil becomes controlled as to export and import, unless exemptions are permitted there would be an endless amount of red tape in the issuing of permits and licences for a product which would be moving not only by pipe line—in which form it is easy to control—but moving in small quantities, in tins and in forms like that.

Without an exemption provided for in the regulations every single bit of oil including the small cans of sewing machine oil would have to come in by permit. It was to guard against red tape and a great increase in the number of people who would be required to administer a program like that that this exemption clause was written in.

If my hon. friend thinks that it destroys the power of the board, or that the governor in council might be somewhat arbitrary in its use, there is always the responsibility surely to the House of Commons and to parliament. The government has to answer for everything that it does, so there is a check, and an effective check, on the misuse—which my hon. friend is thinking of—of subclause (2) of clause 85.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, we on this side of the house are definitely in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member. This is a clause which gives so much power to the governor in council that it may completely nullify the purpose of this legislation. It is a case of the government coming in by the back door to nullify the provisions of the legislation, and it makes the bill practically worthless notwithstanding the remarks which have just been made by the minister. For this very reason we will definitely support the amendment.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, if the cabinet is going to spend its time deciding whether there should be certain exemptions on sewing machine oil coming into Canada, and quarts of oil and thimblefuls of oil, they are going to be a very busy cabinet in considering all these exemptions.

Mr. Churchill: That is not the way it will be done.

Mr. Argue: I do not know what the cabinet does in its spare time. It must apparently have a great deal of spare time.

Mr. Churchill: You will never find out either from actual experience.

Mr. Argue: I will never find out because it will all be hidden; it will be kept away from parliament, that is right. "You will never find out", never find out what the cabinet is doing.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member did not catch my last phrase, "from actual experience".

Mr. Argue: Hidden reports; cabinet secrecy.

We have a bill before us, Mr. Chairman, setting up an energy board, and every important decision is subject to the approval of the cabinet. The hon. member for Vancouver East says now, "all of the unimportant ones". We may have sewing machine oil in 6-ounce cans, or we have quart containers, and all these trivial things that the minister says will be dealt with under subparagraph (2). Surely the cabinet, in carrying out the public business of the country under its jurisdiction, has a tremendous burden now without having this all-embracing power which the Minister of Trade and Commerce says will be used only on trivial matters. I think the whole purpose in setting up this energy board should have been to give to the energy board the right to make important decisions which are not subject to cabinet veto every day of the week. There are certain things I would not object to, such as an appeal on general rates to the cabinet as there is on freight rates now from the board of transport commissioners; but to have every single decision of the energy board subject to cabinet approval I think would be a very great mistake. The cabinet complains of its burdens.

Mr. Fulton: We do not complain.

Mr. Argue: Oh, you do complain. You want sixteen parliamentary secretaries. That is the result of your complaint. The hon. gentlemen in the other place may have had the Minister of Trade and Commerce in mind, seeing that he has grouped around him a number of potential parliamentary secretaries, and they may have thought he needed more than one. Of course he has the advantage of many ministers. That is the solidarity of the cabinet, speaking with many voices. We are on energy, but I am not sure what kind at the moment, Mr. Chairman; but I do feel that this is a mistaken use of the important time of the cabinet to have in this bill, as in the other parts and in so many clauses, the right of veto. If the cabinet is going to consider all of these decisions—and they must, according to the legislation—I think it is taking upon itself a great burden of detail that it is not able to discharge. That is a bad thing in itself, and I think it is a very bad thing to have this board subject to cabinet veto on so many decisions.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, we on this side would have moved the same amendment that has been put forward by the C.C.F. if they had not done it because this is an extraordinary provision to have in legislation of this kind, particularly as it comes from the Minister of Trade and Commerce who used to talk so vigorously and violently on the rights of parliament and the necessity of reducing the power of the executive.

The minister has said, of course, that their intentions in the exercise of this particular power will be good but, as the minister must surely recognize, good intentions do not ensure good legislation. He has also said—and this is a most extraordinary argument—that the reason for this provision is so that the cabinet can protect the public interest against unnecessary red tape and all that kind of thing. In other words, we are setting up a board of five responsible members. We are giving that board great powers, and yet the governor in council cannot entrust this particular board with enough power to deal with those minor matters. They must themselves put a provision in the legislation allowing the cabinet to take from the board not only its powers in minor matters but all powers because this particular clause empowers the governor in council to exempt any person or class of persons or any product or class of products or any transactions persons or areas from the operation of all or any of the provisions of this part or the regulations. If that is not an arrogation unto itself by the executive of all powers over legislation, then I do not know what arrogation of power means. The only excuse the minister has given us, or the only one he has given us so far, is that there may be some quantities of this and that come in, some kind of oil, some kind of gas.

Mr. Argue: Cod liver oil.

Mr. Pearson: Cod liver oil or castor oil. It would not do to have this board wasting its time on matters of this kind; we have to give this kind of thing to the cabinet. Surely in the circumstances the minister himself will realize that this provision is not only unnecessary but ridiculous, and if it is not ridiculous it is dangerous.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This matter is too important to allow it to pass without further observation, particularly in the absence of a strong statement from the minister.

The clause before us gives the governor in council power to make regulations for carrying into effect the purposes and provisions of this part and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing to make regulations respecting (a), (b), (c), (d), and so on. Usually, where the board or a minister or the governor in council is empowered to make regulations there is a provision for the tabling of those regulations. There is nothing in this legislation or the regulations requiring the governor in council or the minister to table the regulations within 15 days of the opening of parliament. I well remember the criticism which was levelled by hon. members over alleged assumption of power by the executive, by the present Minister of Justice.

We were going to give to a board, I think it was the old age pensions board, the power to make regulations, and those regulations the country and parliament would never know about. It was argued they would be kept within the confines of the knowledge of officials from the provinces or the federal government. There must be a requirement of the ministry, it was argued, that these regulations shall be tabled so that parliament will know what they are.

If there was justification, and there was, for that argument, how much more there is for a measure of this sort affecting as it does civil liberties and civil rights of the greatest kind. I suggest to the minister that on his own initiative he will see the force of this argument and that he will take steps to modify this clause at once so that there will be a requirement to table in parliament within a specified number of days the regulations which the governor in council will be empowered to make.

With regard to subclause 2, certainly there ought to be a requirement for the tabling of such a regulation. That subclause reads:

> The governor in council may by regulation exempt any person or class of persons or any product or class of products or any transactions, persons or areas from the operation of all or any of the provisions of this part or the regulations.

Yet there is no requirement to table a regulation so fundamental in its implications. I hope that the minister will take the initiative, as I said, to make provision in the bill for tabling the regulations envisaged in subclause 1 and in subclause 2. What can be the purpose of this particular clause? Here we have decided to pick a board, not a board of three as was suggested from this side in the interests of economy but a board of five, of five of the best and most competent individuals who can be obtained.

Mr. Pickersgill: Already selected.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Already selected, one hon. member suggests—a board that is going to have the powers covered by various clauses we have already dealt with, and all of a sudden in one of the concluding clauses of the bill the governor in council takes the power to vitiate in whole or in part anything that the board may have done.

Let us just see how far-reaching this clause is. It is one thing to have government by the executive and parliament but under our system it is another thing to have government only by the executive. How often have we heard the Minister of Justice, who laughs now, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and others, speak about preserving the rights of parliament? I do not recall the Minister of National Defence in this particular but I am sure the Minister without Portfolio from Newfoundland was among those who spoke feverishly about preserving the rights of parliament against an executive that wanted to assume exclusive power. Hon. gentlemen have the opportunity tonight to repeat their speeches. Let them look at this particular clause and observe the power given to the executive by a government that was going to preserve the rights of parliament at all times, a government headed by a right hon. gentleman who went up and down the length and breadth of the country complaining about the invasion of the rights of parliament by the preceding government. Yet this present government, with less than two years in office, comes to parliament and puts before us a clause like this, the like of which perhaps no government in the history of Canada has ever tried to put before parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. members object. I see the hon. member for Rosedale laughing. He is a lawyer and one who theoretically at any rate, and I am sure in fact, appreciates the value of the rule of law. I ask him to look at clause 18 of the bill where the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada is given on matters of law and on matters involving a question of jurisdiction. That is a precious right given by the bill in accordance with our traditions, those traditions which accord to the individual the right to seek the support and preservation of privileges and rights by the judicial arm. Under subsection 2 of the clause we are now discussing the cabinet can simply wipe out by order in council the right given to individuals and corporations under clause 18 of the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada on a matter of law or on a matter involving the question of jurisdiction. Hon. members laugh at that but if they do they will be laughing at something that was uttered repeatedly in this house by hon. gentlemen when they sat on this side of the house and by no one more vigorously than by the Prime Minister. I have here the words of the Prime Minister as found at page 4563 of Hansard for June 9, 1955. Listen to these words of the then member for Prince Albert:

> I ask the Prime Minister now: Do you have to circumvent the rule of law in order to achieve power under this legislation? Nothing of the kind! Have the powers, but in order to assure—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friends laugh. These words were so important at the time that I want to make sure that every word is underlined so that they will sink into the mind and heart of the Minister of Public Works for one, into the mind and heart of the Minister of Justice who should be the custodian of these things, who should be the first to rise tonight and say, "Of course we have made a mistake; we must not give the governor in council the power to take away the right of an individual to lodge an appeal on a matter of law or on a matter of jurisdiction to the highest court in the land."

Mr. Lambert: They do not take it away.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But what hon. gentlemen said on another occasion is not to be pleaded tonight. The situation is different. They are now on the ministerial benches. It was all very well for them to complain about violations of the rule of law when they were in the opposition but now they are sitting in the seats of government. They say they are not going to do anything that will interfere in any way with the rights of the individual but at the same time they want this power of veto. They have not told us why. Just as we on another occasion were subjected to criticism because we did not give answers regarded by those in opposition as satisfactory, it is now our duty in the opposition to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to explain to us in careful detail why he takes these wide powers in the face of this statement of the Prime Minister who said:

> Have the powers, but in order to assure that no individual shall be discriminated against and denied equality before the law, to assure that the individual shall not be a puppet in the hands of the minister, give to the individual who is able to establish that he has been discriminated against a right of review by the courts of the land. Surely we have not arrived at a state of mind in this country when parliament is asked to abdicate the rights of the courts for an indefinite time in the future in order to satisfy the desire for power of any minister or of any government.

Mr. Fulton: Can you give us the page reference?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have already given it, page 4563, June 9, 1955. These are words which I am sure the Minister of Justice recalls very well because, if I remember rightly, he too made some speeches in that same debate complaining about the power given to the executive. I ask him tonight as Minister of Justice, in charge of the law offices of the crown, as the minister supposed to advise his colleagues on those matters that have to do with preserving the rule of law, what does he think of a clause in a bill that gives to the governor in council the power by a single act, an order in council based on a regulation that need not be tabled in the house—

Mr. Fulton: Certainly, it must be tabled.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says it must be tabled. Will he point out where, in this clause, there is anything that requires the governor in council to table a regulation or where there is anything in this clause that requires the governor in council to table particular regulations exempting any class or any person or any class of persons or any product or class of products or any transactions, persons or areas from the operations of all or any of the provisions of this part of the regulations.

Talk about government by executive—I say again there has never been—

Mr. Fulton: Has my hon. friend never heard of the Regulations Act?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —on the part of any government less appreciation of the importance of its relationship to parliament. What was that?

Mr. Fulton: Has my hon. friend never heard of the Regulations Act when he says there is no provision that these regulations shall be tabled?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says, have I heard of the Regulations Act? Of course I have heard of the Regulations Act, but I have also seen acts that insist upon a board having this power also making it mandatory that these regulations be tabled. I have seen other acts under which the governor in council had to take such powers as these, making these bodies responsible to parliament.

Mr. Fulton: Does my hon. friend know the provisions of the Regulations Act?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says, do I know this or do I know that.

Mr. Fulton: The answer is obvious, you do not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does my hon. friend not know that one of his first responsibilities as Minister of Justice is to see that the executive arm of government in this country is given powers consistent with the traditional role of the executive in relation to parliament, and powers which will not place the executive in a position where it is capable of overriding the wishes of parliament, the wishes of the people in the country, by order in council? I say to the Minister of Justice, pass this clause and you will have given the best demonstration of the insincerity of the words used by hon. members opposite when they criticized us with regard to legislation which they thought was a violation of the rule of law.

Hon. gentlemen now have the opportunity of proving their worth by changing this clause and making it consistent with the declarations of the Prime Minister and of hon. members who sit opposite, declarations made in this house when they were the great champions of the rights of the people and the rights of parliament itself.

Mr. Pearson: The Minister of Justice finds this very amusing. Let me put on the record—

Mr. Fulton: I find my hon. friends amusing, not the subject.

Mr. Pearson: Let me put on the record—

Mr. McPhillips: Is your lieutenant not good enough?

Mr. Pearson: —what the minister himself had to say on June 13, 1955. What was that witty intervention?

Mr. McPhillips: Is your lieutenant not good enough?

Mr. Robichaud: He is back to his dreams.

Mr. Pearson: That is the kind of intellectual intervention which we are accustomed to expect from my hon. friend. That is what the Minister of Justice had to say on June 13, 1955, page 4732 of Hansard:

> Those who give and those who receive arbitrary power are alike criminal and there is no man but is bound to resist it to the best of his power, whenever it shall show its face in the world. It is a crime to bear it when it can be rationally shaken off . . . Law and arbitrary power are in dreadful enmity.

I suggest the Minister of Justice ought to shake off some of this arbitrary power.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, when I was listening to the hon. member for Essex East rising to those heights of oratory I saw before me what I had often hoped to see, a member of the House of Commons exhibiting, the meaning of that classic phrase that I think was used by Winston Churchill with respect to a member of the House of Commons being carried away by the exuberance of his own verbosity.

Mr. Pearson: That was Disraeli.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, but I believe it was repeated by Winston Churchill. Tonight the hon. member was carried away off the beaten path, away from the root of the matter. He became frightfully excited over what he tried to make out was a vital matter. The Minister of Justice and I were quite pleased at his reference to the debates of 1955. The Minister of Justice said to me, apparently we taught them a lesson which they have not forgotten. Now, they are making us immortal by quoting those words that we spoke in 1955 concerning the rights of parliament.

I should like to mention one or two of the matters referred to by the hon. member for Essex East, the first one of which was with regard to the tabling of the regulations. This is required by the Regulations Act, section 7 of which reads as follows:

> Every regulation shall be laid before parliament within 15 days after it is published in the Canada Gazette or, if parliament is not then in session, within 15 days after the commencement of the next ensuing session.

The regulations, therefore, will be made public. They will be disclosed to parliament. They can be called into question by my hon. friends, if they so desire.

My hon. friends attempted to make us believe that this proposed subclause of clause 85 would take away rights which we have already declared to exist for citizens under clause 18. It has nothing to do with that at all and does not remove any rights whatever. Let us descend from the summit and get down to the facts that are involved. Here we are dealing with part VI, dealing with exports and imports; that is all. We are not dealing with certificates of public convenience and necessity or any of those major matters that the board has to determine. We are dealing here with exports and imports of gas and we suggest that here, by regulation, certain exemptions may be allowed, not for the purpose of burdening the cabinet, as the hon. member for Assiniboia was trying to make out. These regulations will express where the exemptions shall lie and will remove, as I said before, or prevent a great deal of red tape being accumulated in the issuance of permits for small quantities that are exported or imported. Surely, this is a sensible arrangement.

If we accepted the suggestion of my hon. friends in Her Majesty's loyal opposition they would give all the power to the board. We have been debating this back and forth now for seven or eight days, as to who is to have the power. Some of my hon. friends opposite want to give full power to the board. We say it is more sensible to give the board certain powers subject to approval by the governor in council because, the government being responsible to parliament, that is where the responsibility should lie.

However, let us not magnify the importance of subclause (2) of clause 85 which deals with regulations to provide exemptions and simply makes it easier to operate this act under conditions, if and when clause 87 is applied and controls are exercised over oil. This power would not be required to anything like the same extent with regard to gas.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister concludes his argument by appealing to us to leave the section intact on the grounds it would make it easier to operate this act. I do not believe the test of legislation is whether or not it is easy for a government to operate an act.

Mr. Churchill: Not for the government, easier for industry.

Mr. McIlraith: I hope the minister, when he reads his words, will not put on them the meaning of which they are capable, and the only meaning that they can have, that the test is whether an act is easy to operate; that is not the test of good legislation.

There is one point I must correct. He pointed out, with reference to my hon. friend from Essex East, that subclause (2) of clause 85 did not interfere with clause 18 of the bill. I cannot follow that argument at all. Clause 18 is a general clause giving a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada over matters of law and jurisdiction. That applies to all orders under the board. But the minister, under paragraph 2 of clause 85 can exempt all companies from the operation of this part of the bill. By doing that, he completely nullifies the bill in so far as those rights are concerned.

It seems to me that he has made no case at all and no cause that would justify the governor in council rendering inoperative this whole part of the bill which has to do with gas and power exports and imports. The effect of clause 85 (2), as it now stands, is that the governor in council can exempt all companies in Canada from the operation of the part. Surely that is not desirable or defensible legislation. I leave it on that simple ground and ask the minister to make some defence of that extraordinary request for arbitrary power that is quite out of keeping with any principle of legislation that I have ever heard asserted in this house.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister examines this language at all carefully, surely he will see that it would be perfectly competent for the governor in council—if parliament saw fit to accept this subsection (2); and may I say that when I have the minister's attention I shall be glad to continue—to exempt one pipe line and not another, or in other words, to have one come under the law and another not to come under the law. In other words, what the government is doing here is giving itself the power to make one law for one company and another law for another company. There is no limitation whatsoever upon the kind of company or the area or anything else that can be exempted. In other words, under this legislation you can at one fell swoop have a favoured instrument decided in secret in the cabinet, as was pointed out when the amendment was moved. Surely that is an entirely objectionable power to give to the cabinet. If they want to pick some special instrument and to clothe it with some special power and some special exemption, surely they could come to parliament and ask parliament to do that and disclose their reasons.

Mr. Regier: This part of the bill, Mr. Chairman, has to do with, among other things, the export and import of power or gas and also with the price that is charged therefor. The amendment now before us seeks to remove from the act the provision giving the authority to the governor in council by regulation to exempt any person or class of persons or any product or class of products from the provisions of this act.

I can very well recall how, only a limited number of years ago certain members of this house did not want United States buccaneers, as they called them, to be instrumental in the building of the trans-Canada pipe line. Who did they initially have confidence in? It was an individual by the name of Mr. McMahon. They implored the Liberal government of the day please to invite Mr. McMahon and to see whether or not he would not be willing to build the trans-Canada pipe line.

We in the lower mainland of British Columbia have a "beef" against Mr. McMahon. Our complaint was investigated by the royal commission on energy. The royal commission had certain things to say with regard to the prices that were being charged to Canadian wholesalers of natural gas or Canadian distributors, prices in excess of those that were being charged to United States wholesalers south of the line. The Borden commission did not mince words in roundly and soundly condemning the practice of the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited.

Now we see what is happening with regard to this man who was a hero in the eyes of the Conservatives of this house only a limited number of years ago. We now see where this cabinet is asking for authority to exempt such an organization as Westcoast Transmission Company from any decision of the board that would have regard to the price to be charged by an applicant for gas or power exported by him in relation to the public interest. We contend—and we have done so for a considerable length of time on the lower mainland—that the public interest in British Columbia is not being served by the practice of Westcoast Transmission Company Limited. We were confirmed in our contention by the findings of the Borden commission, and now the government is asking us to authorize the company to continue these practices.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what the house will do tomorrow? Might we have some indication of what the business will be for the rest of the week?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we will commence with the motion which stands in the name of the Prime Minister concerning the extension of the times of sittings of the house. Then we will continue with this present debate and, should it be terminated, go on with the order of business which I listed on Friday. On Wednesday we have to take interim supply first.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the leader of the house give us any indication of what estimates we shall take if we get through interim supply?

Mr. Green: I am not sure of that. I will let the opposition know. If we do not finish the energy bill on Wednesday night we will go on with it on Thursday.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. PEARSON—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON JUNE 1

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of a statement I made in the house last night and which is found on page 4224 of Hansard. We were discussing the provisions of the bill before the house which we thought, in the form in which it was, conflicted with a statement made by the Prime Minister on second reading of the bill, and in a rather colloquial and light-hearted way, in order to point out this conflict and try to have it removed, I said—and I am quoting from Hansard—

All we are asking the minister to do is to make an honest man of the Prime Minister by this amendment.

It has been brought to my attention, Mr. Speaker, that this might be interpreted as a reflection on the Prime Minister. Of course it was not intended as such, and if any such interpretation were given to it I would be the first to regret it.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I might be allowed to say just one word. I know that in the course of debate we say things the tone of which is not apparent in the cold print of Hansard. I thank the hon. gentleman for what he has said, and I express my deep appreciation of the attitude he has shown.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Fifth report of standing committee on veterans affairs—Mr. Dinsdale.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXTENSION OF HOURS OF SITTING ON WEDNESDAYS, THURSDAYS AND FRIDAYS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, June 3, 1959, and on every Wednesday, Thursday and Friday thereafter until the end of this session, the hours of sitting shall be as follows:

Wednesdays—11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m., and 2:30 p.m. to 6:00 p.m.

Thursdays—11.00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m., and 2:30 p.m. to 6:00 p.m., and 8:00 p.m. to 10:00 p.m.

Fridays—11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m., and 2:30 p.m. to 6:00 p.m., and 8:00 p.m. to 10:00 p.m.; and that the provisions of standing orders 2(1) and 6(3) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise simply for the purpose of moving the motion to which you have alluded and to express the hope that it will receive the support of the house. In bringing it up at this point in the session I think we follow in general the position that has been established in this house over the years.

No one will be rash enough to conclude with any certainty the time when the business of the house will be completed in any year. I feel, having regard to the fact that this is the 92nd day of sitting, that it is opportune to do those things which are ordinarily done in order to expedite consideration of the matters yet to be brought before the house.

In presenting the motion I would point out that Mondays and Tuesdays are still left untouched. In that connection may I say that I understand there are still two supply motions to be dealt with before this session can conclude. We are leaving Monday and Tuesday mornings open until the supply motions are dealt with, and at the same time we are providing extra time for the holding of the meetings of committees which are still continuing to sit.

I mentioned a moment ago that I am following a course similar to that taken by my predecessors in office. Looking over the record I find that in 1947 Wednesday evening sittings began on the 78th day, May 28, and that morning sittings—this is one exception I want to place before the house—did not begin until July 10, the 109th day. That was the course as well in 1947-48 when the house opened on December 5 and morning sittings did not begin until the 102nd day.

However, in 1949 the session was divided and at the first session, which was prior to the election, morning sittings began on the 38th day and in the second session following the election on the 42nd day. In the regular session of 1950 the house opened on February 16 and morning sittings began on the 69th day, which was June 1. In 1951 the house opened on January 30 and morning sittings began on June 11, the 88th day. In the second session of 1951 morning sittings began on the 45th day. In the session of 1952 morning sittings began on the 71st day, June 16. In the 1952-53 session morning sittings began on the 84th day. In both 1952-53 and 1953-54 sittings began in the fall of the year and in the 1953-54 session morning sittings began on May 31. In 1955 morning sittings began on June 9, the session having commenced on January 7. In 1956 the session opened on January 10 and morning sittings did not begin until July 16.

Generally speaking this is approximately the time when this motion has been moved. I for one do not want to do anything to place the opposition in an impossible position. I realize how much preparation must be made by an opposition member. I know something of the difficulties involved in not having a secretarial force attached to the civil service to provide the necessary research information. However, taking all these matters into consideration I hope that without in any way indicating that we are trying to rush the conclusion of the session, which is farthest from my mind, I think now is the appropriate time to make this motion. We still have available two mornings in the week, and Saturday sittings do not begin until we are closer to the end than it is apparent at the present time. Wednesday evenings as well are still not taken up.

No one wants to push consideration of the measures that are before the house or which will come before the house. We want the fullest possible discussion, but in order to bring the session to an end within the reasonable period for which we all hope I make this motion at this time, and I am asking for general support.

If on the other hand the attitude is that we do not want to get along, well, the motion will still be in its position on the order paper. However, I hope we can secure that degree of general support which will assure the fullest discussion and the most complete and mature deliberation of the measures that come before us, coupled with that expedition which, I am sure, it is always desired to achieve.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has asked me to say a word or two on this motion, and I am happy to do so. I am sure that all of us on this side of the house will agree with the general position that it is not only necessary but advisable that we conclude the sittings of this house, having regard however to the amount of work that is before us on the order paper and having regard also to our responsibilities as an opposition to parliament.

I agree with the Prime Minister in some of the suggestions and some of the ideas which he expressed a moment ago. There are, on the other hand, some matters which I believe should be brought to the attention of parliament and which were perhaps not brought forcibly to the attention of the Prime Minister. Some of them are as follows. In the first place, I think the moment this motion is put on the order paper it is indicative that the end of the session is in sight. This has been my experience, at least, when I sat on the other side of the house. However, when I look at the order paper, and when I look at the estimates unpassed, and at the work of the committees, as well as some of the other things which I will mention later, I cannot see the end of this session in sight before anywhere from six to eight weeks, or perhaps more than that.

I shall tell the Prime Minister why. All one has to do is glance at the order paper and at the other matters with which parliament is concerned. The first of these is the estimates. Thus far only three departments have been concluded, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, the Department of Agriculture, and I believe the Department of Labour. All the other departments still remain to be dealt with. I am not suggesting for one moment that the other departments should take as long as these three. I hope they will not. We will certainly give the fullest co-operation to the consideration of these estimates with the dispatch which is necessary to their proper consideration.

But I remind the house that the remaining departments alone constitute enough work for almost four weeks, if not more than that. Then from amongst those departments I single out the Department of National Defence which is one which certainly should take as much time, because of its importance, as the Department of Agriculture. There is the Department of External Affairs, upon which we have had some debate but which has not been completed. There are many other departments, including the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I am sure my friend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) will have a long statement to make which will be highly contentious—

Mr. Hees: There is nothing contentious in it.

Mr. Chevrier: —and which will take some time. But be that as it may, there are these estimates which deserve consideration. Then there is the work of the committees. It seems to me that the practice in the past has been to bring in a motion of this kind when the work of the committees was about completed or on the verge of being completed. My understanding of the work of the committees is that it has hardly begun.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friends say "Oh, oh". Let them look at Votes and Proceedings of yesterday. There, on the last page but one, they will see what committees are meeting on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week. There are no less than eight such committees meeting. How we can perform our duties in the House of Commons and be at those committees is rather difficult to understand, particularly now when the house is going to sit in the mornings beginning on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday. It therefore seems to me that little or no consideration has been given to that fact.

Then I am informed by the hon. member for Essex East that in the committee on industrial relations a motion was made, which fortunately was not passed; at least an attempt was made to have that committee sit while the house was sitting. That is a repetition of what was done in the public accounts committee last year. Although the attempt was made it was not successful. I submit that this procedure is a mistake. With deference I submit to the Prime Minister that it is a mistake to ask the members of the opposition while we are responsible for our work in the house, to sit in committees while the house is sitting and to consider matters of importance in those committees.

An hon. Member: Why don't you work?

Mr. Chevrier: It seems to me that procedure is not consistent with the work we have to perform in the house. Then all I need say in response to those on the other side of the house who are interrupting, is to ask them to remember what attitude was taken by those who now sit on the government benches under similar circumstances when they sat on this side of the house. I know they protested bitterly under those circumstances. Having regard to the information I have just given here, I do not see that the circumstances are at all different.

Then, Mr. Speaker, would you allow me to say a word about the legislation which remains to be dealt with by the house. The Leader of the Opposition asked the Prime Minister—I believe it was on April 21 of this year—what the remaining business was. Just listen to this, Mr. Speaker; this is what the Prime Minister said six weeks ago, as reported at page 2877 of Hansard:

> I would say that in addition to the items which are already on the order paper the following will be introduced: the bill of rights, a bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, a bill to establish a national energy board, a bill to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act, a bill to provide additional grants to the province of Newfoundland, an amendment to the Bretton Woods Agreements Act; bills respecting the superannuation of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and members of the Canadian forces; a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act, and a bill to bring in certain amendments to the Criminal Code.

Then he went on to say this:

> In the field of agriculture, amendments will be introduced to assist the provinces in implementing crop insurance, as well as a bill to extend and improve farm credit facilities, and a bill to allow veteran farmers to take greater advantage of modern agricultural practices will be introduced by way of amendment to the Veterans Land Act.
> In addition there will be, of course, the budget legislation—

Which, of course, has been disposed of.

> —and the usual measure respecting the financing of the Canadian National Railways. Consideration is also being given to certain other measures of lesser importance.

Much of the legislation appearing in the list I have just mentioned is contentious, and the vast majority of it is still not before the house. The only items mentioned in this list which are now before the house are the bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, which is under consideration by a committee, and the bill which is now under consideration in this house to establish a national energy board. All the rest—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And the Bretton Woods Agreement Act.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. I agree there are some non-contentious matters which I have not time to deal with, such as the one the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has just mentioned. That matter is entirely non-contentious, and I can assure the minister at once that we will give the fullest co-operation to that matter in its passing. In addition to that, sir, there are two motions to go into supply. They may take two days, they may take one day, I do not know; that will be a matter for the house to determine.

What I deprecate in particular is this. If this legislation which was announced by the Prime Minister six weeks ago, much of it contentious, is brought down now, this legislation, a lot of it important, will be brought down in the last days of the session. I refer particularly to the federal-provincial tax-sharing agreements. There is an example of an agreement upon which there has been a good deal of debate, that is true; but it seems to me that is a matter which should not under normal conditions take the time it has taken.

I say this to the government, with respect. I believe in my mind and in my heart that it is not the intention of the government to change in any way the formula that was established in that legislation. That being the case, why is it necessary to renew this agreement each year? Why is it not possible by one piece of legislation to dispose of it in one session? That is why I say it is a contentious matter which comes before parliament each year.

I presume I will be told after I have resumed my seat that we take far too much time in discussing the matters which from time to time come before the house. But let me assure my hon. friends opposite that members on the government side also take up a great deal of time. I am not complaining about that; that is their right and their privilege. However, I can point to two or three debates where they did take up a great deal more time than we on this side of the house. That being the case I do not think complaint can be made that we are taking undue length of time.

In my opinion, sir, this motion is premature. It seems to me that the motion is aimed at ending the sittings of this house by a fixed date. I may be wrong in that assumption; if I am, then I will accept the correction. But what I think the house should be reminded of is that we on this side have a job to do. We feel that that job cannot be done within a few weeks. We feel that because of the legislation, contentious as much of it is, announced by the Prime Minister, because of the remaining departments which have not even yet been touched, and because of the committee work, most of which has not been reported upon, this motion is, as I say, premature.

I do hope the Prime Minister will accept these remarks in the spirit in which he made his opening remarks a moment ago. With that in mind I ask the Prime Minister if he will not give consideration to this suggestion, because I am sure that when he rose a while ago he rose with no other intention but that of being helpful. At least that is what I gathered from the tone of his remarks.

The suggestion I make is that until the majority of the committees have reported on their work for this session, this motion should be allowed to stand on the order paper. If that were done I am sure there would be a greater disposition on the part of those of us who sit on this side of the house to find ourselves in agreement with the government on a motion such as this at this stage of the session.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is true to say that this is approximately the usual stage during a session when a motion is brought forward to provide for morning sittings. However, I do believe that at least some hon. members in this house are slightly in error in their thinking and in their hope that being a member of parliament is really just a part time job. It seems to me that as the nation expands and parliament has to deal each session with an increasing volume of legislation, the fact becomes more and more clear that being a member is a full time job.

If this is the case I think we should attempt to get away from the practice of trying to cram the work of the session into five or six consecutive months. Rather, the government in consultation with other parties in the house should consider whether or not the business of parliament can be more efficiently dealt with by a longer session and more frequent recesses. This would, of course, have the advantage of permitting the employees of the building, the members of the staff and the members of the House of Commons, to enjoy holidays during the summer months, which is the normal time when holidays are taken by most Canadians.

I also think that in closing the debate the Prime Minister should inform the house as to whether or not there are new pieces of legislation to be advanced during this session and, in general, whether there is to be any greater work load given parliament than we have been told about heretofore.

In fairness I should also say that this motion to a substantial degree is a compromise motion. It is not a motion to call for morning sittings five days a week, nor does it call for evening sittings five days a week or on Saturdays. Instead it is asking that parliament sit Wednesday and Thursday mornings as well as Friday evenings in addition to the regular hours of sitting. At this particular stage of the session and in view of the attitude of the parties generally as to how sessions should be managed, we feel this is an appropriate time to bring forward a motion of this nature.

We wish to point out, however, in the strongest possible terms that there is an excellent argument for those who say that committees of the house should not sit while the house is sitting. We know that certain committees are sitting when the house is sitting. I believe there should be a reluctance on the part of the members of all committees that are not now sitting while the house is sitting to accept this extra burden, at least for another couple of weeks until we see how the session progresses.

The greatest objection to this motion arises from the possibility that after this motion passes there might be a further endeavour to have more committees meet while the house is sitting. This would make the work of all hon. members of parliament completely impossible, and would bring parliament into critical view on the part of the Canadian public.

With these reservations and with the hope that the Prime Minister will give consideration to the suggestion we have made, we are prepared to give this motion our support.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is very little for me to add to what my colleague has said, but it seems to me the consideration that weighs most in our minds is the difficulty of combining committee work when there is so much of it in progress, with our duties in the House of Commons. The Prime Minister himself earlier in the session said it was not his intention to make impossible the reconciliation of the duties of committee members with their duties in the house, but with eight or nine committees sitting and with some of them sitting more than once a day it is extremely difficult if not impossible for members of the official opposition to do full justice to their work in the committees and in the house.

Having regard to what he said earlier in the session about this matter I would therefore ask the Prime Minister if he would not be fair enough to have another look at this situation next month in the light of the progress made by the committees, and if the progress that has been made is satisfactory a motion of this kind would surely be more acceptable to all hon. members of the house then than it is now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank all hon. gentlemen for the contributions they have made to the discussion of this very important matter. I fully understand the position that is advanced by the hon. member for Laurier. To summarize his words, he said there might be some who say we spend too much time discussing matters that come before the house. I do not belong to that school, nor have I ever adhered to the suggestion that beneficial discussion shall not take place on every measure that comes before the house.

Sometimes I think all of us are prone to error in that regard, in believing that prolixity and repetition take the place of full and careful consideration and deliberation on the matters that come before the house, but the latter is of the essence in the discharge of the responsibilities of parliament. I wish to do nothing that would in any way reduce the opportunity of those in the opposition to engage in the fullest discussion, nor do I wish to coerce the opposition in any way.

I was very impressed by the views expressed by the hon. member for Assiniboia. The group he represents is small in number, and naturally members of that group have a variety of matters to discuss that would tax the energies of a group three or four times the size of the one in question.

In general our viewpoint is that we do want the fullest possible consideration. I do not want to be in the position of pressing upon the opposition the acceptance of this motion. The hon. member for Laurier said it looks like six weeks and possibly more. It is the responsibility of parliament to discuss and consider these matters to the full. There is no question of a target date such as he suggested. I for one would not to the slightest degree concur in any suggestion that we determine upon a target date and thereby fail to do what is required of us, so we can banish that thought.

Of course, whether the house takes until September is an open question. When sitting in opposition I was told that the length of the session is always determined by the opposition. The entire field of legislation has been set out, in so far as it is possible to do so, in the outline referred to by the hon. member for Laurier. Some matters may arise that at the moment cannot be contemplated, but with due regard to that possibility I may say that that which was set out some weeks ago represents the program of legislation which will be submitted to parliament.

Mention was made of the difficulty of attending committees while the house was sitting. This motion, as the hon. member for Assiniboia has said, is a compromise one. Instead of going the whole way, as has been the custom in the past, of providing in the beginning for sittings in the mornings throughout the week and on Friday nights, to begin with, the only possible interference with committees would be on Wednesday and Thursday. We will not sit on Wednesday evenings. Committees do not sit on Wednesday evenings or on Friday evenings; at least it was not my experience throughout the years that there was ever any desire for committees to sit particularly on Friday evenings.

However, hon. gentlemen opposite have taken very strong objection, as I say, to the course suggested. I think it would tend to meet the needs of the opposition to assure them that in every way they will have the fullest possible opportunity to thoroughly discuss the measures that will be brought before the house. The hon. member for Laurier, speaking for the official opposition, has taken a very strong stand on this.

I am not going to be put in the position of having a vote forced on the house and thereby the opposition take the stand that if it had not come to a vote things might have been different. The C.C.F. group are prepared to support this; the official opposition are not.

In the circumstances, therefore, I am going to suggest that we might possibly come to an agreement whereby in this motion, if the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Assiniboia would agree, we might alter the date from June 3 to June 10, thereby enabling both sides to get together; because I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I am not going to adopt the attitude that has been adopted in years past by which the majority in a matter such as this has been pitted against the opposition. I suggest an alternative in the spirit which was apparent in the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier.

By leave of the house I would ask, providing there is going to be support in that direction, that the amendment be made accordingly.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, seeing that the Prime Minister has suggested that the motion might be changed, perhaps I can say an additional word. The suggestion made by the Prime Minister is that the date of the motion should be postponed from June 3 to June 10. In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, this seems to me a reasonable compromise between the two points of view that were put forward this afternoon. I would ask the Prime Minister, in stating our agreement with this change, that everything possible be done to ensure that committee work should not be of a type and held at times which would make it impossible for members on this side to do their whole duty in the House of Commons itself. I mention that to the Prime Minister because he himself mentioned it this afternoon. I know it is in his mind. Perhaps I should also add that we are assuming, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister is not proposing to bring in additional legislation at this stage.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to be clear on this. I have not anything in mind nor has any member of the government; but the hon. gentleman knows from his experience in the cabinet that there are occasions when matters arise which require attention. Should such a matter or matters arise they will be kept to a minimum, but I know of none at the moment that could arise. I would not expect that anyone would suggest that there is a complete undertaking that those eventualities should not be taken cognizance of today.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I quite understand there may be an emergency which will require legislation. I would not try to suggest to the Prime Minister that that might not happen. All I am doing is mentioning those two difficulties. Having mentioned them, I am quite willing to tell the Prime Minister that as far as we are concerned the change he has suggested in this motion is satisfactory.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Just to make sure where we stand, I understand the hon. member is speaking to the proposed change from June 3 to June 10, before I ask the house for its unanimous consent.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to accept this compromise suggested by the Prime Minister. I think it is a good move by the Prime Minister, since apparently it is obtaining the acceptance of the official opposition. We would like to urge two things; one, all legislation that the government intends to introduce at this time should be put before parliament immediately; two, there should be no move within the next week, until at least June 10, to provide that any further committees of the house in fact sit while the house is sitting. If we can have this further period when no additional committees are meeting while the house is sitting and have a chance to see all the proposed legislation as soon as possible, we think these things will expedite the business of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Will the house give unanimous consent to the substitution of the figure "10" for the figure "3" as it stands in the motion now, so the motion will read, "That on Wednesday, June 10" instead of "June 3"?

Mr. Diefenbaker: So that there will be no misunderstanding I would like, if I may, with the consent of the house, to say this. If I understood him right the Leader of the Opposition asked that an undertaking be given that no legislation except any that is now on the order paper shall be introduced. That was not my undertaking. None additional to that referred to six weeks ago by myself, except under the circumstances mentioned, will be introduced.

Mr. Caron: What about committees?

Motion as amended agreed to.

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS TO FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to ask the Minister of Agriculture. There is in the speech from the throne a very interesting passage that has long held farmers' attention. It reads as follows:

> You will also be invited to make a comprehensive review and revision of the legislation concerning farm credit, in order that credit may be more effective in assisting in the development and maintenance of an efficient and prosperous agriculture.

Can the minister inform us if he intends to introduce amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act at this session?

An hon. Member: Why didn't you people do it at the time?

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, if I understood the hon. member correctly I think he asked about the improved farm credit scheme which it was predicted in the speech from the throne would be introduced at this session. That will be introduced.

AIRPORTS

DORVAL—REPORTED FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR DELAY IN CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him whether he is aware of the statement which is reported in the morning's press by the Montreal tourist and convention bureau, which is a very strong organization in the city of Montreal, concerning the airport at Dorval, in which it is said that the federal government alone is responsible for the delay in finishing the new terminal building at Montreal. The report goes on also to state:

> Transport Minister Hees has made many statements indicating full speed ahead on the project, while actually there is no speed at all.

Has the minister seen this report, and would he care to comment on it?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I read it this morning. I can only again say to the hon. member for Laurier that the work on the Dorval airport terminal building is proceeding with all speed. It is expected that it will be completed next year and, as I pointed out, it is going ahead at a much faster pace than was the case when we took over two years ago.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question, having regard to the last part of the minister's statement. Does the minister realize that this report of the Montreal tourist bureau is confirmed by a Gallup poll taken in the province of Quebec, which indicates that the position of his own party has dropped by 21 percentage points in the last seven months?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is taking advantage of the opportunity presented for the purpose of asking questions.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIR TRANSPORT

GANDER—STATEMENT ON REPORTED IMPOSITION OF FINES ON AIR LINES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Laurier directed a question to my colleague the Minister of Transport, relating to fines levied against two air lines at Gander for infraction of the quarantine regulations. This matter comes within my jurisdiction and I feel that my department's position should be made clear.

I can appreciate the air lines' desire to have their passengers go through quarantine inspection as quickly as possible, but for the protection of the public adequate arrangements must be made. The procedure adopted now that the new terminal is operating has not been criticized by most of the air lines and, in fact, is essentially the same as at major airports all over the world.

Difficulties centre around the refusal of pilots of certain air lines to arrange to have their passengers escorted into the terminal for clearance and customs by the route provided. This is their responsibility, and by their failure to co-operate they have caused a great deal of confusion for their own passengers and others using the terminal. Infractions were repeatedly pointed out by my officers, and as no improvement was forthcoming fines were levied against two air line companies.

I trust that as airport routine settles down, following the problems that were only to be expected with the start of operations in the new building, the air lines will be able to organize a more effective procedure.

[Later:]

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising out of the statement he made earlier. Since the former practice of having a nurse board the plane and check passengers' vaccination certificates appears to be more acceptable to the air lines, is there any good reason why that practice should not be continued and, if not, would the minister give consideration to having this procedure reinstated?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to look into the suggestion of the hon. member, but I would point out that the procedure now being followed at Gander is the same procedure that is followed at all other international airports.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

CAPE BRETON—REPOSSESSION OF HOUSEHOLD ESSENTIALS BY LOAN COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of a telegram I have received from Mr. William Marsh, president, district 26, united mine workers of America, Glace Bay, in which he states that finance companies in Cape Breton are repossessing household essentials such as kitchen stoves, bedroom suites, etc., and that affected miners will be unable to return to work when work is available. Would the minister be prepared to have the superintendent of insurance investigate this deplorable situation, or take other appropriate action?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to give a clear answer to an inquiry of this kind. We have not been furnished with the names of the companies, or any information whatever. These may possibly be companies that are under provincial rather than federal jurisdiction; but if we were furnished with adequate information we would certainly be glad to give the matter prompt attention.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for his statement. I shall endeavour to procure the information he has requested.

STATEMENT ON LOANS TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): On May 29, Mr. Speaker, on page 4146 of Hansard, the hon. member for Essex East is reported as asking me a question concerning the total loans then outstanding by the Minister of Finance to the unemployment insurance commission. Offhand, I indicated that the amount was "around $75 million". On May 14, at page 3645 of Hansard, I had given the details of the loans up to that date. Since that time there have been two additional loans, one on May 19 for $10 million and one on May 27 for $7 million. The total outstanding is, therefore, $72 million.

POLYMER CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Labour if he can tell us whether or not Mr. Taylor, the conciliator, has returned to the dispute at the Polymer Corporation, and whether the minister has any report to make as to the progress of his work and of the negotiations with respect to this strike, involving so many men who have been out of work for such a long time.

Mr. Murphy: You are worried a lot about that.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I was informed last week that Mr. Taylor had to leave the negotiation table for a few days in order to make a necessary trip to the west. I was also told that he would be back early this week. In answering a question last week I assumed that he would be back yesterday. However, I am told that he did not return as expected, but is probably there now. I have no further report on the progress that has been made, except to say that the talks that have been held up to now have shown progress.

AGRICULTURE

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS TO PRODUCERS SELLING TO CO-OPERATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of various statements made by the minister indicating an attempt to change his policy on agricultural stabilization prices by substituting thereto deficiency payments made directly to farmers, as was done in the case of milk, hogs and eggs, could the minister inform the house if farmers who enter into contracts with co-operatives will be eligible for deficiency payments?

(Text):

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I am clear as to what is behind the hon. member's question but certainly the deficiency payments we are going to make with respect to pork and eggs will be paid directly to the producer. If he is selling his products through a co-operative I think he will be in exactly the same position as though he were selling his products through an ordinary commercial concern.

GRAIN

REPORTED DROP IN EXPORT SHIPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister now made further inquiries to corroborate, or otherwise, his statement yesterday that Canadian exports have not fallen since the opening of navigation? Would the minister care to comment on the statistics in the weekly board of grain commissioners report which show that from April 22 up to May 20 exports this year are just 15.9 million bushels compared with 25.1 million bushels last year?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether the hon. member is seeking information or attempting to give it. If there was a question sandwiched between the two bits of information perhaps the minister would like to reply to it.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will give a direct answer without any sandwich, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Argue: Don't make it the boloney in the sandwich.

Mr. Fulton: You have supplied that.

An hon. Member: You had better talk about wheat, boy.

Mr. Churchill: I hope the remark of the Minister of Justice got on Hansard. It may well be that exports of wheat during the month of April have been slightly lower than a year ago, but as I pointed out yesterday total export of wheat for the crop year up to the end of May is running just 9 million bushels below a year ago, and that still gives us an opportunity to reach our target of 300 million bushels, because we exceeded it last year by 16 million bushels.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether he anticipates an improvement in Canada's export position in the weeks ahead from a drop of almost 40 per cent as compared with last year?

Mr. Churchill: We cannot accept any statement that there was a drop of 40 per cent.

Mr. Argue: Since the opening of navigation.

Mr. Churchill: You do not look at these things week by week or anything like that. You take a long range view, which is unfamiliar to my hon. friend. The export position of Canada is very good all round, including wheat, and the prospects are very good for maintaining the record we established last year.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED COMMENT ON PURCHASE OF WEAPONS SYSTEMS IN U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister seen the statement by United States defence secretary Neil McElroy before the United States House of Representatives appropriations committee that Canadian defence industry has been adversely affected by the government's decision to buy complete weapons systems from the United States?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not seen that statement.

Mr. Hellyer: May I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister have officials of his department who follow closely the proceedings of these United States committees?

Mr. Pearkes: We have officers in the United States who observe the departments of the United States government.

FEDERAL-MUNICIPAL CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT IN HOUSE OF MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister, who is about to leave for the mayor's conference and who takes with him our good wishes for a safe flight to North Bay, if in the event that he intends in his speech tonight to accept the proposal of the municipalities assembled there that there should be called at once a conference of the provinces and municipalities, would the Prime Minister not consider it desirable to make that announcement in this house before he leaves?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has constructed an edifice of hypotheses on which to ask his question or perhaps to give an admonition, I am not sure which.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker; does the Prime Minister intend to make such an announcement tonight?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The Prime Minister has always tried to assure that any announcements on matters of relevance to the house be made to the house.

TRANSPORT

GREAT SLAVE LAKE—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION OF RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder if the Prime Minister could answer the question I asked yesterday in regard to the Pine Point railway and the announcement made by the minister for northern affairs in the Powell River Digester to the effect that the government had decided to extend the railway?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I asked for the particular journal to which the hon. gentleman alluded. I believe it is on my desk, and after perusal I will make a statement.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—CONCURRENCE OF QUEBEC CONSERVATIVE MEMBERS IN GIFT OF FLOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): May I ask a question of the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Canada has made a gift of $10 million worth of flour to NATO, could he inform the house whether the Conservative members from Quebec were consulted and if they agreed to that gift of $10 million?

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING TERMS OF UNION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the Prime Minister whether he could tell the house how soon the government expects to be in a position to introduce the legislation to implement the terms of union with Newfoundland.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all of the legislative program, including the item in question, will certainly be before the house whenever the house is in a position to consider it. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that if each piece of legislation takes the number of days that the energy board bill has taken, then I am unable to predict how far in the future it will be before the legislation in question will be before the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask a supplementary question. Does the Prime Minister realize that until the payments are made under that legislation very serious interest charges are being made upon the taxpayers of Newfoundland?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can only repeat what I said a moment ago. This legislation before the house has taken a very long time, but I have no complaint whatever. I am in such agreeable good humour that the house can take all the time possible, but the hon. gentleman is the last who should complain about certain favourite pieces of legislation he has in mind.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker; I was not complaining at all, I was asking a simple and respectful question of the Prime Minister. I do not believe he is called upon to lecture any hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has no question of privilege.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Since the Prime Minister is in such agreeable good humour, as he indicated a moment ago, would he consider giving the subsequent legislation that is to come before parliament first reading some days before he proposes bringing it on for second reading, so that we might have an opportunity to read and consider the bills before they are brought up for second reading?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the course of action this government always follows.

Mr. McIlraith: Except on the energy bill.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed from Monday, June 1, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-49, to provide for the establishment of a national energy board—Mr. Churchill—Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clause 85—Regulations.

Mr. McIlraith: I believe there is an amendment before the Chair.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak to the amendment which is before the committee to clause 85, subclause 2. In the discussion of this clause, which is an exemption clause, yesterday the hon. member for Essex East said this, as reported at page 4229 of Hansard, when he was criticizing what he called a far-reaching clause:

> Yet this present government, with less than two years in office, comes to parliament and puts before us a clause like this, the like of which perhaps no government in the history of Canada has ever tried to put before parliament.

I should like to draw attention to the fact that this type of exemption clause is not unfamiliar to the House of Commons. In 1955, when the hon. member for Essex East was a member of the government of that day, a meat inspection act was before the house; it is chapter 36 of the statutes of 1955. In it under the heading of "Regulations" there was a section, namely section 5, which reads in part as follows:

> 5. The governor in council may make regulations for carrying out the purposes and provisions of this act, and without limiting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations—

Then I read subparagraph (g) which is as follows:

(g) for exempting any person or meat product from the operation of all or any of the provisions of this act—

According to the argument of my hon. friend last night this destroys the act in whole. Then in the same year—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What was the chapter?

Mr. Churchill: That was chapter 36 of the statutes of 1955. Then I have another reference for my hon. friend. It is chapter 47 in the same book of statutes, which is the International River Improvements Act. Section 3 of that act, dealing with regulations, reads as follows:

3. The governor in council may, for the purpose of developing and utilizing the water resources of Canada in the national interest, make regulations—

Then I read subparagraph (d) which is as follows:

(d) excepting any international river improvements from the operation of this act.

In the hon. member's argument that means that the act is destroyed by that exemption.

Then just to refresh his memory further may I draw attention to an act which, when I mention it, will perhaps stimulate his memory. I refer to the Food and Drugs Act, being chapter 38 of the statutes of Canada, 1952-53, introduced into this house by the then minister of national health and welfare, our genial friend the hon. member for Essex East. As he piloted that bill through the house he came across, under the heading "Regulations", section 24, which reads as follows:

24. (1) The governor in council may make regulations for carrying the purposes and provisions of this act into effect, and, in particular, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations—

Then I go to paragraph (j):

(j) exempting any food, drug, cosmetic or device from all or any of the provisions of this act and prescribing the conditions of such exemption;—

That bill was introduced into and passed by the House of Commons under the direction of the hon. member for Essex East, who now tells us that never before had a clause such as that which we have in this bill been put before the House of Commons. He himself put similar clauses before the House of Commons and they were passed by the house.

Then in the course of his argument the hon. member talked about the regulations. I dealt with that matter last night, but for the purpose of clarity may I repeat that the regulations by law, under the Regulations Act, must be printed in the Canada Gazette and subsequently tabled in the House of Commons, a fact of which the hon. member was quite aware. When the debate was taking place on April 21, 1953, on the Food and Drugs Act, when the question was asked him about the regulations, as reported at page 4150 of Hansard he replied as follows—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would my hon. friend just help me by giving me the chapter of the Food and Drugs Act?

Mr. Churchill: I beg the hon. member's pardon.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would my hon. friend be kind enough to remind me of the chapter?

Mr. Churchill: Your famous act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Food and Drugs Act. What chapter?

Mr. Churchill: Chapter 38 of the statutes of 1952-53. I am referring now to Hansard of April 21, 1953, when this Food and Drugs Act was under discussion and when the regulations were being dealt with, as reported at page 4150, where I read as follows:

Mr. Martin: The regulations are not in the bill. The regulations are contained in a very thick document which I table every year.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is it. I tabled it every year.

Mr. Churchill: The regulations under any bill, if new, are tabled following their publication in the gazette.

I thought I should make that matter clear in order that those who are unfamiliar with the regulations may be aware of the situation. I realize that the hon. member for Essex East last night in the course of his remarks became a little bit carried away.

However, with regard to the amendment before the house may I say this. Considering the debate we have had on clause 85(2), we had earlier considered placing that subclause under clause 87, to which it applies more strictly. In the course of my remarks last night I indicated that this subclause 2 would become operative if and when parliament approved the following clause 87, and that subclause 2 had application largely to oil and matters pertaining thereto and not to gas. Consequently, in view of that situation I am suggesting that the amendment now proposed be accepted, namely that this subclause 2 be struck out.

But I want to go further and say to hon. members of the committee, so there will be no confusion, that when we come to clause 87 my colleague will move an amendment in somewhat different phraseology dealing with substantially the same exemptions. When that amendment is moved to clause 87 the hon. member who has moved the present amendment, which is to strike out the new one, of course is at liberty to move a further amendment. But as the situation stands at the moment we are prepared to accept the present amendment now before the committee to strike out subclause 2 of clause 85.

In order to save time and trouble, with the consent of the committee I would suggest that the following words be added to that amendment, or at least that the amendment might read in this way:

That clause 85 be amended by striking out "(1)" after the figure "85" in line 34 on page 24 and striking out subclause (2) thereof on page 25.

Mr. Argue: As the person who moved the original amendment I wish to thank the minister for the consideration the government has given to our contention that this paragraph should be deleted. We are extremely happy that the government is so moving. We shall take a look at the proposed amendment to clause 87 of the bill when we reach it. We feel—and I repeat what I have said before—that far too often throughout this bill the governor in council has maintained a power of veto, a power to set aside any regulations or any decisions of the board and to substitute therefor decisions and regulations of the cabinet.

We think that in general this is a bad procedure. Anything that will reduce the power of the cabinet to make a plaything of the board is most acceptable to us. Of course we shall have to see to what extent the government recovers this power when their proposed amendment to clause 87 is before the committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am sure my hon. friend recognizes from what has been said already what satisfaction we derive from his acceptance of the argument we made last night. I can only say that what the minister has done now is consistent with what he called, as far as I am concerned, an argument with which I was carried away. However, that argument, along with observations made by others, has obviously had the kind of effect which we thought in the circumstances it should have on the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Reference was made to the Food and Drugs Act and to the section—section 16, I presume —where the board is given power subject to the approval of the governor in council to make regulations. I am afraid the minister can hardly consider the Food and Drugs Act and what was done under section 16 as in any way a parallel to the complaint registered last night by me. In any event, assuming that my hon. friend's argument was correct, and assuming I had been guilty of the very act I complained about last night, this would not of course in any way preclude me from taking the position I am taking now, any more than it precluded the hon. gentleman from taking a particular position in 1955 in connection with one of the many debates to which he made reference a few moments ago.

I have had the opportunity since we met last night of reading not only the observations of some of my hon. friend's colleagues in that debate, but more particularly the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he sat on this side as a private member of this house. In comparing what he said on that occasion with what I said last night I note a similarity of theme. But I congratulate the minister because he spoke about that theme much better, and I am sure with even greater force and fervour, than I did last night.

In any event, perhaps I may recall his words to him, because I realize his preoccupation with this bill and with other matters, and he has not had an opportunity of rereading his words. I think at a time like this where we are discussing such an important measure the minister would want to be reminded of words which my humble researches have disclosed. At page 4688 of Hansard for June 13, 1955, almost at the top of the page I find these words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. They apply forcefully at the present time because we have so many new members in this house. The minister said:

I think it is incumbent upon the senior members of the house to be the foremost to defend the parliamentary system, to exercise moderation with respect to any suggested changes, and to restrain newcomers to the house when they appear to be impatient with the parliamentary system.

That was very good advice in 1955, and undoubtedly last night I was suffering somewhat from an impatience to see that our parliamentary system was not in any way violated.

Mr. Lambert: You were making floss candy last night.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What was that?

Mr. Lambert: I said you were making floss candy last night.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have not heard what my hon. friend said, but I am sure it will bear waiting and I will read it in Hansard tomorrow. Further down on the same page the minister said:

Actually he is attempting to reverse the process. Normally ministers come to parliament and ask for extension of their powers or for special powers for special purposes and parliament examines the situation, makes the grant of power and withdraws it when the crisis has subsided.

There is another quotation, but I will not put it on the record at this time as there may be some opportunity later on, unless my hon. friend finds it desirable to take the proper course which he has just announced.

Before I take my seat I can only say to my hon. friend that I have no doubt that the value of discussion, the value of persuasion and debate, has had its effect today as a result of the insistent position taken by members of the opposition last night, who looked upon this particular subclause 2 in clause 85 as one that violated our concept of what was the proper relationship between the executive and parliament. That my hon. friend has accepted our proposal is, I say, the best demonstration one could have of the value of parliament and of the opportunity of continued free discussion, and of the recognition by the executive of its obligation and its traditional constitutional relationship to parliament itself.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member for Assiniboia the unanimous consent of the committee to change his amendment to read as follows: Mr. Argue moves:

That clause 85 be amended by striking out "(1)" after the figure "85" in line 34 on page 24 and striking out subclause (2) thereof on page 25.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I also want to express my pleasure at the agreement of the minister to the amendment. As I indicated yesterday, the people in the lower mainland of British Columbia have been very much concerned for some considerable time now at the realization that natural gas was being exported and supplied to United States wholesalers at a lower price than was being charged for the same product to our own British Columbia consumers. Representations were made to the royal commission on energy, and the royal commission has roundly condemned the practice of the Westcoast Transmission Company.

In the bill as it was originally before us authority was being granted to the energy board to consider and determine the price to be charged by an applicant for gas or power exported by him, and the energy board had the responsibility of assuring itself that the price to be charged by an applicant for any natural gas to be exported was reasonable in relation to the public interest. What we were afraid of was that the cabinet would have the authority to grant an exemption to such a company as the Westcoast Transmission Company, and we are now very happy to note that the cabinet does not want the authority to grant such an exemption.

As consumers of natural gas in the lower mainland of British Columbia our responsibility now is to present to the national energy board the same arguments that were presented to the Borden commission, and we hope the national energy board will realize, as did the Borden commission, that the supplying of our natural heritage to those outside our borders at a lower cost than that charged our own people is not in the public interest. We are now assured that once we can show the energy board that Canadians should not pay any more for their natural heritage than outsiders, the cabinet will not interfere by allowing an exemption to such a corporation as the Westcoast Transmission Company.

I note that the minister, in agreeing to the removal of this right of the governor in council, is intending to add something to clause 87. We shall have to look at this very closely when we come to that stage because there have been instances where Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company Limited has sold oil to refineries in Washington for less money than has been charged our own refineries in Burnaby. We feel that if at all possible a situation of that kind ought to be avoided as well.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have one question to put to the minister. Can the minister assure the committee that if this amendment is adopted there will be no way in which any gas or electricity exporters can be exempted by order in council under any other provisions of the bill?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I believe this question should be deferred until we reach clause 87 when I will suggest a new amendment. If the hon. member would raise his question then I believe we could answer it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I cannot have made my question clear in that case, Mr. Chairman. Without regard to what there may be in clause 87, which after all refers exclusively to oil, my question did not relate to oil but to exports of gas and electricity. I just wanted to be assured that once this amendment was adopted there was no other provision anywhere in the bill as it now stands that would permit the governor in council—I am not saying the board but the governor in council —to exempt any exporter of gas or electricity from the requirements of part VI of the bill.

Mr. Churchill: I misunderstood the hon. member. It is quite true that clause 87 will refer specifically to oil. The question was under what circumstances might an exemption be allowed in view of the fact that we are striking out this exemption clause in subclause 2.

It is difficult to say categorically that there will be no exemption of some sort or other in the future and I believe clause 81 would be the governing clause in case it seemed advisable to make some exemption. That would have to be stated in the regulations which would be published in the Canada Gazette and tabled in the House of Commons and everyone would know exactly what was being undertaken. I could not say at this stage that something in the way of an exemption might not be permitted depending on the circumstances.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure that the minister would agree that the governor in council cannot make regulations that will have any legal effect unless they have a legislative foundation. That is to say there must be something in the bill that empowers the governor in council. What I am asking the minister is if there is anything anywhere in this bill that will, once we adopt this amendment, give the governor in council power in any circumstances to make exemptions so far as gas and electricity are concerned from part VI of the bill and, if so, what are they?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, elsewhere in the bill there is no exemption. There are certain restrictions which might occur under clauses 81 and 82 when licences are issued.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the nature of what the minister has in mind? I am afraid I do not understand what he has in mind.

Mr. Churchill: We could give an example of that. I refer to the case of an emergency. Not very long ago a breakdown in a supply line occurred and an emergency import permit had to be granted to bring gas in from the United States until a cleaning station was repaired. That importation of gas occurred over a period of just a few days. An emergency like that is what I had in mind where you have to do things rather quickly but there is no other exemption clause in the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Even in an emergency of that sort there would have to be some kind of legal authority to permit action to be taken. I would apprehend that the legal authority would be the board.

Let me put my question in another way. Is there any provision anywhere in the bill whereby the governor in council can dispense with the board in so far as the exports or imports of gas and electricity are concerned?

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Churchill: The answer to that is no, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the clause as amended carry?

Mr. McIlraith: There is another point in connection with this clause that I want to raise. Perhaps I should read the relevant part of the clause before making my argument. The clause now reads:

> The governor in council may make regulations for carrying into effect the purposes and provisions of this part and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations respecting (b) the duration of licences, not exceeding 25 years, the quantities that may be exported or imported under licences and any other terms or conditions to which licences may be subject.

The point I want to deal with is that under the existing legislation it has been the practice to limit the duration of licences for the export of electricity to one year. I believe that to be a fact. Of course, permits for the exportation of gas are not limited as to time, as I understand it, or at least they do not terminate after a year. There may be some correction in that regard but that is my understanding of the present method of issuing export licences.

With respect to gas, however, because of the nature of the product and in order to finance the enterprise and indeed to have the type of contract we want entered into it is probably necessary that an export permit be for a longer duration than one year. But as to electricity, I am somewhat concerned with granting the power to grant licences for a longer period at one time than one year.

As was clearly illustrated in the discussion last night on another clause by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the electric power that is usually exported is surplus power. I can see no consideration that would arise that would demand that licences for the export of electrical energy be for a longer period than one year. Indeed, with respect to electric power there is a danger of having electricity exported from Canada which we should be using as a basis for our own development, instead of merely exporting the surplus which by the nature of the product is not likely to be nearly as extensive as in the case of gas.

The export permit for electricity is incidental to the development and operation of the plant for the use of Canadians whereas the export of gas in certain areas may be a major undertaking in its own right, the rights and interests of Canadians having been protected through other means by gas supplied from other areas.

One way to assure development of Canadian industry of course, is the permit for the export of such gas, bearing in mind that the protection of the Canadian interest is assured by supply from other areas, but no such case or argument exists when we are dealing with hydroelectric energy. I therefore propose moving an amendment to provide for the limitation of the electricity export permit to one year. Before doing so, I want to know whether the minister has any real case to make for the change in the practice with respect to the export of electrical energy?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I think it is well that the hon. member for Ottawa West has raised this question because it is an important one. He is quite right. For many years now electrical power exports have been on the basis of annual export licences. I anticipate that that will be the case with regard to most of our hydroelectric stations in Canada where surplus power goes across the border. At the present time in quantity it is very limited. Six per cent of the total amount of hydroelectric power produced in Canada is exported, and exported on the basis of an annual licence. But there are two developments which are likely to take place in the future which might change that picture. I think there would be a great reluctance on the part of the energy board to grant a licence for more than the present arrangement of one year unless some very large development of electric power took place, as could happen out in western Canada. The negotiations taking place now with regard to the Columbia river is a case in point. There might be an arrangement between the two countries where in exchange for some advantage to Canada electrical power produced on that great river system might be exported to the United States on a licence basis longer than one year.

The second development which might take place in the future is in thermal power plants which might, using coal in Alberta, in British Columbia or in other provinces in Canada, produce electricity for export beyond the requirements in Canada. These are two things which might influence the energy board to grant licences longer than on a one-year basis. Then, in connection with either of the two possibilities that I have mentioned, for financing purposes a guarantee extending over a 20 or 25-year period of export of electricity might be necessary if the company were to become operative. That is the reason for not making the section here restrictive in so far as hydroelectric power is concerned.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for his statement on this point. It seems to me that there is such a great danger of the hydroelectric power being alienated from the use of Canada through the grant of a long term export licence that we should have some restriction on it. The two examples the minister gave in asking for this authority for the board are examples that, while they are of a major nature are not affected by this provision. I would point out to him that the hydroelectric power from the Columbia river is not sufficiently developed to warrant us granting the permission now, and I am going to suggest that if the need arises there for a long term permit the government can come back to parliament and ask that that subject be dealt with specially. The same thing would apply to coal. If there is electricity developed from coal and the requirement, in order to finance such a development, is for a longer term permit, it is a subject matter that should come back for discussion in parliament. Both of these examples are of such a nature that they require discussion in parliament.

For some 50 years now parliament has been very jealous to retain control over the export of hydroelectric energy, and I think the debates over the years show the correctness of that position. It has been a position maintained by all governments. I therefore suggest that this clause should be amended and I accordingly move the following amendment:

That clause 85, subclause 1(b) be amended by adding after the words "twenty-five years" the words "for hydrocarbons and not exceeding one year for power".

This will, I think, accomplish the objective I have sought to indicate we consider necessary. It seems to me it is desirable and the subject of the export of power is so important that it should not be given away to this board, and that if the necessity arises in the future for a longer export licence than the one year, the matter should come back to parliament.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I represent a constituency which is particularly interested in the development of the water resources of the Columbia. I was very interested in the minister's remarks and also in the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa West. As the minister no doubt knows, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company has for some years sought a licence to export some 75,000 kilowatts to the United States. That licence has been refused because the whole question is related to the proper settlement of all issues surrounding the development of the hydro resources of the Columbia on a basis of equity between Canada and the United States. What interests me particularly is this. If this bill is passed and if the clause is carried as it is printed in the bill, would the national energy board have the right or the power to grant such a licence even for a period of one year? No one today has even thought it wise, under the particular circumstances that exist on the Columbia river, to grant a licence for even one year. Would this national energy board have the right to issue a licence for such export for a period of one year? If so, will the minister explain what would be the procedures in this respect? Is there any relationship in the administration of this legislation between the national energy board and the international joint commission and, of course, the government of the day in question? This is a very important aspect of this legislation. I oppose the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in support to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Ottawa West. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works will recall that just about the time I first came to Ottawa—it was not long after he first came to Ottawa—this was a most lively issue in politics, and it had repercussions that are still not forgotten in some parts of the country. From the time that the parent act of the electricity and fluid exportation act was first enacted in 1907—that is over 50 years ago, as the hon. member said—parliament has been very jealous and all governments have been very jealous of the right to export electric power. The legislation gave the power to the governor in council and—I anticipate that the Minister of Public Works or the Minister of Trade and Commerce might remind me of that, and I know it to be true—every government bound itself by a self-denying ordinance not to grant these licences for more than one year at a time. I know that the Gordon commission did suggest that circumstances might well arise when power could, in the national interest, be exported for a longer period but it does not seem to me that we should make a change in general legislation of this sort in a lighthearted way and that we should wait until an actual situation arises.

This matter is of compelling importance to this country because hydroelectric energy is one respect in which we really have a competitive advantage over the United States. I am trying to be as moderate and persuasive as possible about this but it does seem to me that the government should accept the amendment, make formal what has been the practice up to now and remove any temptations that there might be to any future government to take hasty action which might commit the country and be a source of very great regret in the future.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, ordinarily I would not take part in the discussion of this bill as it is being put through the house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. However, the amendment raises a point which is of vital importance to the province of British Columbia and if it should carry it might be disastrous to that province. The position at the moment with regard to the Columbia is that after many years of wrangling and of impossibility of getting within any distance at all of agreement with the United States concerning the development of power on the Columbia river we have now been able to make great strides.

Hon. members will remember that in December of last year I made a statement as acting prime minister concerning the possibility of reaching agreement with the United States, and in that statement it was suggested that the international joint commission should be given the task of working out the details of an agreement for the payment of downstream benefits arising out of power developed on that river. The United States government agreed to this suggestion and for some months now the commission has been working very well in the direction of reaching an agreement on the payment of downstream benefits.

Not only has there been co-operation between Canada and the United States but there has also been excellent co-operation between the federal government and the provincial government. A policy committee has been established on the ministerial level between the two governments. That committee met in Ottawa some weeks ago and it met again in Victoria on Friday last. The two federal ministers on that committee are the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and myself. Unfortunately I was unable to go west for the last meeting. But they had another good meeting at which the ministers and officials of both governments co-operated in a splendid spirit to work out the proposals that should be submitted on behalf of Canada to the international joint commission. I believe there has been a meeting of the international joint commission within the last two or three days. I believe they met in New York on May 31.

Fundamental in this whole question is that Canada shall get back power produced in the United States as downstream benefits for the storage of water upstream on the Columbia river in British Columbia. This is where the cheapest power will come from. I would say that power cannot be produced in any other way anywhere on the North American continent that will compete with it as to price. What position are we going to be in if we write into our statute that Canada can give an export permit only for one year and yet we are expecting to get power back from the United States by way of downstream benefits? They will write into their law just as tight a restriction as we write into our law and this very provision, if it should be accepted by the house, might very well be taken by the United States authorities as being an attempt to hamper negotiations or to cut down on the terms of any agreement. That is a position in which Canada simply cannot afford to be put.

This is the biggest development that has ever been possible in the province of British Columbia. It is a huge development which will involve the expenditure of perhaps a billion dollars in Canada when all of the projects have been installed. But the very foundation on which this development rests is downstream benefits from the plants on the Columbia in the United States of America, and I do suggest that to put in an amendment of this kind would be most unwise.

Furthermore, this works both ways. There is a plant owned by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company on the Pend Oreille river, a tributary of the Columbia, just a few miles north of the border. Why they built that plant there I never could understand when there was such a prohibition against exporting power. There they have a large plant and there is a possibility of a big increase in the size of the plant. All the possible installations have not been made, and sooner or later some of that power will have to be exported to the United States. It is produced because of storage on the Pend Oreille river in the United States. That river rises in the United States and flows through Canada for a few miles. In those few miles this plant has been built, so that there you have exactly the opposite position to that which you find on the main stem of the river.

When all these projects on the Columbia are installed power may have to be exported from other Canadian plants, say at Mica creek. Should there be a big power project installed there I doubt whether all the power would be required in British Columbia at that time. Some of it might have to be exported to the United States for the time being.

The Conservative party is the last party in the country to want to adopt any policy which would be against Canada's interests in so far as dealings with the United States are concerned. The whole history of the party proves that, but in this case I submit it would be folly to adopt the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Ottawa West. I realize that he puts it forward with the best of motives, but he puts it forward without an understanding of the facts of life in 1959 in the western part of Canada.

Mr. McIlraith: That is a pretty strong statement.

Mr. Green: That is my belief. He simply does not understand how vital this is to those of us who happen to come from western Canada. I would hope that for the sake of merely doing something which was done in 1907 the committee would not see fit to adopt this amendment. Policies have to be changed as conditions change. This is a case where a change becomes necessary.

We have been very co-operative in dealing with the amendments put forward by the two parties in opposition. I think that they can see now that there is no evil intent behind this bill. We are trying to set up a national energy board which will be able to give leadership in the handling of these sources of energy in Canada. The clause which is now under review has been worded with that main objective always in mind. I do suggest to hon. members that the provisions of the clause as they now read are sensible provisions and should not be altered in the way suggested by the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if I might raise one question with the Minister of Public Works, as an easterner who does not agree that all the facts of life are within the exclusive purview of those who have the fortune to come from British Columbia. He will have noticed that I was careful to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he had any special reason for changing the practice with respect to the exportation of power. He would have noticed that if he had been paying attention.

My question is this: I share his view as to the importance of the development of the Columbia river. I have, perhaps, some different opinions on one or two of the details concerning how it should be done, but as to its importance I quite share his view. According to my understanding, it is going to be necessary, when that development comes to the stage of being carried out, to come to the parliament of Canada for special legislation to authorize what will require to be done. If that is the case, I do not see why general legislation which has protected the interests of so much of this country and so many of its 17 million people should be changed for the sake of meeting that one case which is going to have to come before parliament in any event. If it is not going to have to come before parliament, I wish the minister would clarify the position of the government on that point. I have always understood the Columbia river project would be the subject of legislation before this parliament. In any event, I am subject to correction on the point and I wish he would deal with that narrow point before we pursue the argument on the amendment.

Mr. Herridge: The members of this group take the strongest exception to this amendment. We support the arguments of the Minister of Public Works. It is not necessary for me to restate the situation because it was covered very fully, and from our point of view, exactly. In our opinion the acceptance of this amendment would be most disastrous in view of the great importance of the development of the Columbia to British Columbia and the country as a whole.

Mr. McIlraith: May I ask a question of the hon. member for Kootenay West?

Mr. Herridge: Certainly.

Mr. McIlraith: Does he believe the Columbia river project has to be brought before parliament before coming to the final stages of development?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, that may be so, but when the giving of authority to a board to limit the export of power to a one year period is part of the statutes of Canada, representatives of another government or any persons negotiating with this government or the I.J.C. would have in mind the fixed period of one year, in the statute.

Mr. Chairman, I was saying that we have made such excellent progress in recent years by resuming negotiations for an equitable distribution between Canada and the United States of the benefits of the Columbia, and with the change in the atmosphere between the government of British Columbia and the government of Canada, all of us who are very interested in this question are most anxious that nothing is done to disturb the excellent progress on this question that has been made between Canada and the United States and the excellent relationship that has been developed in considering this question as between the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment was introduced by members of the Liberal party as a result of some ignorance of the importance of this question—

Mr. McIlraith: Your understanding is quite wrong.

Mr. Herridge: —and the relationship of it to the situation on the Columbia with which we are so concerned. I suppose this results from the fact that they have not any representatives from British Columbia to keep them informed of the matters that are of particular importance to British Columbia, and particularly the Columbia river. I suggest that if the former member for Coast-Capilano were in this house he would join with us in taking strong exception to the amendment proposed. I suggest we can understand that this amendment was proposed with the best of intentions, but in ignorance. After listening to the explanation of the Minister of Public Works and noting our concern, and realizing that standing together on this question we know what is best for the people of British Columbia and for the development of the hydro resources of British Columbia and Canada, perhaps the hon. gentleman would rise in his place and withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I imagine that the reason the hon. member for Kootenay West has spoken in the way he has is that his party has not any representatives in this house anywhere east of North Bay. He cannot help but raise in the minds—

Mr. Argue: How did you do west of North Bay?

Mr. Pickersgill: A lot better than you did east of North Bay. You have zero east of North Bay and we still have members, including my seatmate, west of North Bay. We have better prospects too. However, Mr. Chairman, I suspect that I am a little out of order.

I wanted to deal quite seriously with the serious, but I think mistaken argument put forward by the Minister of Public Works. The minister knows quite well, even if the hon. member for Kootenay West may not, that it would not be possible for Canada to embark on an enormous scheme like the Columbia scheme without legislation; that is quite clear to anyone. It does seem to me that at that time or at the time that any other project, even a much smaller project which may be in the national interest, is brought before parliament, there will be an opportunity to alter the policy if that is desirable in the national interest.

After all, it has been a time-honoured and historic policy of the two major parties, at any rate up until now, that there should be no licence for the export of hydroelectric power for a period of more than a year at a time. Any change should be made in the presence of a concrete problem, and not to weaken what, after all, is to some degree a bargaining advantage. I would remind the hon. gentleman, who boasts about his vision stopping at the rockies, and who says he knows best what the people of British Columbia want, that after all we are legislating for all the people of Canada and not just for the people of British Columbia.

There might easily be aroused in the minds of some of us a suspicion that some of the valuable power in other parts of the country was going to be exported by a government some day without coming to parliament in order to facilitate something being done in British Columbia. I am not suggesting that the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the present government has any such thought in mind; I am sure they have not any such thought in mind and I hope there would never be a government that would have such a thought. But the Minister of Public Works will recall that it is not very many years ago that the government of British Columbia, under the present premier, with respect to the Columbia river was going to do something of which the minister strongly disapproved and which he considered was not in the national interest. We should not make legislation just for this government or for a hypothetical situation. We should make legislation in the light of all the facts. I suggest that no present case has been put forward for changing the historic policy of this country in this respect over the last fifty years.

Mr. Churchill: I should just like to say one further word on this matter. I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate knows as well as does anyone here that one parliament can change what another parliament has done. Hence even if you write everything into statutes you are not protecting the future forever, for you do not know what might happen.

The hon. member is quite right in saying that the Canadian people and parliament have been very jealous with regard to their rights concerning the export of electricity. That statement is true. I have read the story of electricity over the last fifty years. Parliament has taken extreme care to see that there was no carelessness in the export of electricity to the disadvantage of Canada.

The hon. member for Ottawa West was incorrect in stating that the annual licence was in legislation and that we were now changing legislation by this clause in the bill that is before us. That is not so. In the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act there is nothing that restricts the export of electric power to one year. It is part of the regulations.

May I say one further word. Although there has been a good deal of discussion with regard to the development of hydroelectric power, I mentioned the fact—and I want to emphasize it again—that there is great opportunity ahead of Canada in the development of electric power by thermal stations using our abundant supplies of coal. I have knowledge of a proposed development scheme of that kind where action is necessary in order that the proposal may be carried a step forward. The financing of that proposition is like the financing of a gas pipe line or an oil pipe line. It must be on a long term basis, extending over twenty years or twenty-five years. Unless the authority is given to the national energy board to have licences running up to twenty-five years it seems to me that a development such as the one I have heard about could not take place. Here again we are leaving the matter flexible.

We are leaving it to the national energy board to weigh the facts, to size up the situation and to make its decision; but we are not restricting them to a one-year matter in so far as electric power is concerned. We are expecting that they will be just as careful as Canadians have been in the last fifty years with the export of our power resources and that they will be just as careful as any member of this chamber would be. But why put into legislation restrictive clauses when you cannot be sure of the developments that are ahead of us? It seems to me that these two examples that we have used this afternoon give weight to the suggestion that the clause should remain as it is printed.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 14; nays, 46.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 86—Penalties.

Mr. Herridge: Subclause 1 of clause 86 reads as follows:

(1) Every person who violates any of the provisions of this part or the regulations made under this part is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction as provided in the Criminal Code.

I presume that the persons who would violate the provisions of this part would be officers of a company, agents of a company or employees of a company. Can the minister explain how these penalties would be applied? If it was an official of the company or an agent of the company who did so, would not the company itself be guilty? From reading the section I am not quite clear as to just how it would operate with respect to the application of penalties.

Mr. Churchill: It is a hypothetical question. You cannot answer that question clearly and concisely until you have the facts as to who committed the offence.

Mr. Herridge: What I mean is this. The clause provides that a person who violates the provisions or regulations is punishable on summary conviction as provided in the Criminal Code. Would the company itself be guilty or would it be officers of the company or agents of the company or employees of the company?

Mr. Churchill: It is possible that any of the categories mentioned might be guilty of an offence under this act. But there again the facts would have to be known before we could determine the matter.

Mr. Herridge: But it would be persons; you could not escape the penalties under this act by the company being charged?

Mr. Churchill: I am not quite sure whether we follow the hon. gentleman. The offence could be committed by the company or by the officials acting for the company. The company could be charged, but it would be the officials of the company who would have to answer the charge.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, that would indicate, then, as I read it, that on summary conviction you would have violated some very important provisions of this part and get actually a very small fine indeed, and if it were a company it would be inconsequential as a form of punishment.

Mr. Churchill: If it is a company that violates some of the regulations, we have clause 84 which provides for revocation and suspension of licences and which reads in part:

—if, in the opinion of the board, the person to whom it was issued has violated or failed to comply with any term or condition thereof.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 87—Extension of part to oil.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, on clause 87 I would like to make a few introductory remarks and then ask my colleague to put an amendment before you which I judge hon. members would be able to study between now and the conclusion of the supper recess.

When I was discussing this clause the other day, at the conclusion of the second reading debate last Thursday, there was considerable discussion and criticism on the part of hon. members opposite. At that time I said there was no concealment intended, that there was no intention to seize arbitrary powers, and then I went on in this way, as reported on page 4114 of Hansard:

If it seems advisable at some subsequent date to proclaim clause 87, the document which does that will be immediately tabled in the House of Commons and debate permitted with regard to that action.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Then the member for Ottawa West asked:

How would debate on that document to proclaim be permitted? Under what procedure?

Then I went on:

It has been done before, Mr. Speaker. It would be open to the house at the time that document was tabled or subsequently, on recognition of the place in the program for a debate of that nature, to debate it. It has frequently happened that the government of the day has agreed to the debate of a subject on the request of the opposition. We are suggesting that can be done under these circumstances.

It is in order to make it clear in the bill that that situation will prevail that the amendment which hon. members will hear of in a minute or two is going to be proposed. Quite a bit of reference has been made to the 1955 debate, and the opposition has praised us for the way in which we, then in opposition, upheld the rights of parliament, and we shall continue in that noble cause.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What the minister means is that we were reminding him of his eloquent words.

Mr. Churchill: My hon. friends opposite have learned so much from that debate in 1955, which incidentally will go down as one of the most historic debates in the life of our country, because from that time began the decline and subsequent fall of the Liberal party. In that defence production debate, after we had pressed the government very hard, the prime minister of the day, Mr. St. Laurent, finally came before us and indicated to us how regulations published under that Defence Production Act might be discussed in the House of Commons, the very type of thing which we were discussing the other night. In the interval I have looked up the method by which that was done, and we propose incorporating that in the amendment which my colleague will now propose to the chair.

Mr. Green: I move:

That clause 87 be amended by adding thereto the following subclauses:

"(3) The governor in council may by regulation exempt any class of oil or oil products or any area from the operation of all or any of the provisions of this part.

(4) A proclamation issued under this section shall be laid before both houses of parliament as soon as may be after it is issued, and a notice of motion in either house signed by ten members thereof and made in accordance with the rules of that house within seven days of the day the proclamation was laid before that house, praying that the proclamation be revoked, shall be debated in that house at the first convenient opportunity within the four sitting days next after the day the motion in that house was made; and if both houses of parliament resolve that the proclamation be revoked, it shall cease to have effect and the provisions of this part shall thereupon cease to be applicable to oil."

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, an amendment to the minister's motion very quickly comes to my mind. He suggested ten members. I think that under the rules of this house if five members rise a division is held. In most instances five members can call for votes on various stages in debate. Certainly for a group of our size five members would be more acceptable. I merely ask the minister to take that into consideration. I think the purpose he has in mind is to allow a political party in this house to call for such a debate.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROTECT VOTING RIGHTS OF INDIANS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howard for the second reading of Bill No. C-13, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the mover of this bill had in mind taking it as an adjunct to Bill No. C-15, to amend the Indian Act, because the purpose of Bill No. C-13 is in effect to take out of the present provisions of the Canada Elections Act those restrictions which presently exist in so far as they prohibit an Indian as defined in the Indian Act from casting his vote at a federal election.

On June 10, 1958 a somewhat similar bill designed to amend the Indian Act was before the house and I made certain remarks in connection with our consideration of that bill which I submit to the house showed that the amendments sought thereunder were impossible of implementation because they had not considered deeply enough the legal status, in effect, of the Indian people whom the legislation was intended to affect.

I think it important for the house to consider before passing on this legislation just what is the legal status of an Indian. The Indian Act is chapter 149 of the revised statutes. Under this act an Indian is defined as a person who pursuant to the act is registered as an Indian or is entitled to be registered as an Indian. In section 5 the Indian Act sets forth that an Indian register shall be maintained by the department which shall consist of band lists and general lists in which there shall be recorded the name of every person who is entitled to be registered as an Indian.

A qualification to the definition of an Indian can be found in section 12, subsection 1, paragraph (b) of the Indian Act. There it is set forth that a woman who is married to a person who is not an Indian is not entitled to be registered as an Indian. Under section 14 of the act a woman who is a member of the band ceases to be a member of that band if she marries a person who is not a member of the band; in other words, if she marries either a white person or a person who is an Indian entitled to be registered but in another band. The point I wish to make in this regard is that an Indian woman who marries a white person ceases to be a person registered as an Indian upon marriage. When her husband dies, however, her status could well be argued to revert.

The explanatory notes of Bill No. C-15 read as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is complementary to another bill of this session to amend the Canada Elections Act. It is to provide that Indians, as defined in this act—

I submit that those words are important, "as defined in this act". I continue:

> —shall be entitled to vote at federal elections without detracting from their hereditary, treaty, aboriginal, or other similar rights.

In order for this suggested legislation to have effect at all the Indian whom it purports to touch must be an Indian as defined in the Indian Act. I have attempted to show that the definition as it presently stands in the Indian Act falls somewhat short of being an all-inclusive definition.

In that regard the companion legislation, Bill No. C-17, does not by its provision cover this eventuality. In considering what is the legal status of a Canadian Indian it should be pointed out that not all so-called Canadian Indians have special legal status as Indians. I have already attempted to show that in order to have that status an Indian must be registered with the federal Indian affairs department in accordance with the provisions of the Indian Act as it now stands.

There are three groups of so-called Indian people in Canada who are not eligible to be registered at all and therefore do not have Indian status. They are the Indians whose ancestors have left the Indian reserve or who do not have a residential status on the reserve; the Indians who have mixed blood in their veins—and of course we are not concerned with this group in our discussion—and married women who by reason of marrying away from a band cease to be regarded as Indians.

Those persons who are not registered as Indians have a great many problems both socially and financially and very unhappy problems they are, too. The courts through the years have held that when these Indians are off the reserve the laws of the dominion and the province shall apply to them, while on the reserve the laws of the dominion and the province shall apply unless they are in direct conflict with the rights given by a treaty or by the Indian Act itself. I shall attempt to show the nature of this problem if hon. members will bear with me.

Both by treaty and by the Indian Act the Indian is given a legal status which is inferior to that of the ordinary Canadian citizen. Perhaps this is just as opportune a time as any to say that the hon. member who moved this bill certainly has my full support because the principle he is seeking to have established through the bill is a proper one. The Indian is just as much if not more a Canadian citizen than any of us and certainly the right to vote in a federal election should be his. The Eskimo people should also have the inalienable right to vote.

There are approximately 165,000 treaty Indians in Canada today according to a recent count, one-half of whom live in eastern Ontario. This entire group is a minority in our midst and as I said the Indians suffer from a greatly inferior legal status. I submit that the blame for this situation does not lie entirely with the white man alone; the red man, the Canadian Indian, is just as responsible for his lack of adequate legal status today. This is a product of history and in order to examine why this is so I propose to refer to some of that history very briefly.

The French by the Treaty of Capitulation of 1760 and the Treaty of Paris in 1763 admitted the Indians' claims to hunting rights and to land. In 1790 the English began taking surrenders of land from the Indians, paying money and wampum for these lands. In 1792 Governor Simcoe surrendered a crown grant of land to the Indians of the Six Nations in return for a surrender of a large area of land over which that tribe had dominance. In eastern Canada these capitulations and exchanges of land were called "surrenders", and in some cases were crown grants. In other cases the title was held for the Indians by the crown.

That is pretty well the situation today. The Indians signed the treaty expecting the justice of the white man's chief and instead they were to find the restrictive laws of Canada were to apply to them but not those guaranteeing them legal status as Canadians in all of the implications of that latter phrase.

By the treaty he had been made a ward of the crown, and he could obtain land, but not land held in fee simple, outright. He could earn a livelihood by hunting. There is much concern, as suggested by the mover of this bill, as to whether the treaty rights have been upheld. The Indian has the right to hunt. The federal government, under the British North America Act, had exclusive jurisdiction as to Indians. However, the federal government transferred its resources in 1930 to the provinces, and with this went the jurisdiction over hunting and fishing rights. The Indians were charged by game wardens and others in charge of resources for hunting without a permit and hunting out of season. Most of those cases were undefended and the Indians were levied pretty hefty fines. Today, this is not the situation, as is evidenced by a recent decision in the case of an Eskimo at any rate by a judge of the territorial court of the Northwest Territories. In any event, suffice it to say the courts today uphold those long preserved treaty rights of the Indians.

The right of occupation of certain areas of land, now commonly known as Indian reserves, has not been diminished in so far as those having treaty rights are concerned. At the time of the signing of the treaties to which I referred great emphasis was placed on the fact that this land was preserved to be available to the Indian and his children and his children's children. It was a great inducement to the Indian people at the time to sign the treaty. Under those treaties the Indians obtained an inferior legal status. I will come back to this point again.

To revert for a moment, may I say that that particular status in effect was derogated upon the signing of the treaties. The passage of the Indian Act simply compounded this situation. The first Indian Act was passed in 1868. The government soon realized that if they were to make the Indians their wards there must be a special act to govern. I do not propose to review the past Indian acts but simply to consider the parts of the provisions which I have already placed on the record.

In the past undoubtedly special legislation was necessary to protect the Indian but now thousands of Indians have been to Europe to fight for our country in the second world war and even in the first war. They can read and they do read newspapers; they have radios. They live in a democracy and they would like some of the democracy on their own reserves as well as outside. Hopes ran high among the Indian people that they were at last to get a new act. They hoped—at least a large portion of them—that they would get the vote. They hoped that they would also be able to run their own affairs. Some advantages were given to them by the new act, but actually Indian affairs in most cases are still being run in much the same manner as they were 90 years ago.

The new act really did not give the Indians the vote. The courts have held that an Indian's property, both real and personal, off the reserve is taxable, while on the reserve it is not. Under the Indian Act if he takes the vote he will be taxed on his land and on his personal property on the reserve and he must pay succession and inheritance taxes. The Indian can, with the consent of the minister, apply for enfranchisement and become a Canadian citizen under the present provisions of the Indian Act. If he does that he will then have the vote but he must transfer his land to another Indian on the reserve within 30 days and sell any improvements that he may have made on it. If it is not sold by then it is auctioned off and he must take what he can get for it. Once enfranchised neither he, his wife nor his children can ever return to the reserve. They receive compensation for the income they would have received had they stayed on the reserve for the next 20 years but of course this is much less than the children would have eventually received.

These terms in the present Indian Act make the Indian people themselves—a large portion of them at any rate—dread enfranchisement. These terms, the terms which I suggest the mover of the bill has not taken into consideration in his companion legislation when he proposes certain amendments to the Indian Act, are such that there is not much purpose in the house acceding to this bill being passed when the companion legislation which purports to effect the amendments which are necessary is lacking.

To get back to what enfranchisement would do to the majority of the Indian people resident on the reserves. To the Indian, as I said, enfranchisement is a threat rather than a privilege and the section of the Indian Act which allows an individual or a whole tribe to be forced into enfranchisement without their consent is truly a threat over their heads. It is difficult for an Indian to give up his only home and the only way of life he knows to receive the privilege of the vote. With his limited experience he usually feels the price is too high. He cannot foresee that without the vote he will never have a voice in running his own affairs or enacting the laws governing him.

Not only is it extremely difficult for the Indian to obtain the vote, but he also lacks that fundamental right we all cherish, namely the right to own our own property. Off the reserve the Indian may own property but on it he may not. It matters not whether the title for the reserve is held in the name of the crown or whether it is a grant, as long as the property is for the exclusive use of the Indians, it is under the jurisdiction of the department of Indian affairs and from their decision there is no appeal under the present provisions of the act. The minister of the department, before this government came into power, in the past decided what the reserve will be used for; that is, this purpose or that purpose. Under the provisions of the act the minister may decide what portion may be divided into lots or sections, or whether it should be divided at all. He decides—in this case she decides—where roads will run and what portion will be set aside for schools and hospitals.

No Indian may even hold a small portion of his own reserve as his own. If the tribe votes a portion of the reserve to any one Indian the minister may, if she so desires, take the land from that Indian and give it to another. If the minister does take it she will pay to the Indian the amount she decides for the house and any improvements which have been made on the land. Even on the Indian's death his widow cannot stay on the land unless the minister consents to her presence, nor can the Indian's heirs; nor can the Indian lease any portion of the land the tribe may have voted him without the minister's consent. He may, with the consent of the minister and of the whole tribe, surrender his land back to the crown and the minister will then dispose of that land in the manner in which she sees fit. If the whole tribe desires to leave the reserve, they cannot sell their reserve without the minister's consent. The minister may even lease the Indian's land to a white man, if she so desires, for one year, without the Indian's consent.

In the new act there is a section which says that a tribe, if they get the government's consent, can secure control of the land on their reservation and supervise its allotment, but as this consent can be withdrawn at any time it offers little hope to the Indian of ever getting permanent control of his property. The fact that the Indian must always be a tenant of the crown discourages him from improving the land or taking pride in it. In other words, the minister and the department have complete control of the land of the Indian people. The Indian, because he has no vote, has no real voice in the appointment of the minister and from the minister's decision there is no appeal.

One does not have to look very far for justification of the principle behind the legislation before the house. Extending to the Indian people the right to exercise the franchise would give them some voice in the actions of the federal government in these matters relating to the disposition of the land which has been preserved for the Indian people by treaties of 100 years ago and more.

These provisions of the Indian Act to which I have referred are only a small portion of the provisions of that act which must be considered as companion amendments to the legislation before the house before the bill should go forward in its present incomplete form, incomplete inasmuch as the companion bill is incomplete, and much more consideration must be given to the matter.

I might refer here to the committee on Indian affairs which has been established and which is composed of members of this house and the other place. At this time that committee is in the process of considering all aspects of the life of the Indian people of Canada. It is a committee that has been wanting for a long time, a committee upon which is sitting a very distinguished member of a well-known Indian band of the west who is also a very distinguished member of the other place. For the first time in Canada's history the Indian people will have a voice of authority on this committee. This is a great stride forward in the achievement of an understanding of the problems confronting the Indian people.

I have no doubt whatever that the enfranchisement of the Canadian Indian will be one of the subjects which will be considered by the joint committee, and perhaps at this juncture it would be proper for me to suggest to members of the house that this bill should not go forward now and, indeed, at any time until the findings of the committee which is now sitting are made known. Undoubtedly the committee will delve very searchingly and deeply into those provisions of the Indian Act to which I have referred during the course of my remarks. Once the committee has done that I am quite certain it will come up with all these factors I have mentioned which have a bearing on the far-reaching results that the passage of this bill would have, having in mind the fact that the bill might conflict with the provisions of the present Indian Act. As I have already pointed out, quite conceivably substantial disadvantages might accrue to the Canadian Indian people if the bill were to pass in its present form without very searching consideration being given first to all the relevant provisions of the Indian Act.

I wish to make it quite clear before resuming my seat that the Yukon Indian people as well as the Northwest Territories Indian people have the right to vote in federal elections. I would venture to say that that right is cherished by the Indian people of the Yukon. Certainly they would not want to see anything done to disturb it and certainly I would do my utmost to oppose any such move vigorously. Having lived among the Indian people of the Yukon I can assure hon. members that they have as much grasp of the issues involved in federal elections as a good many of their white brothers, and on that score no member of the house should have any hesitation in supporting the principle involved in the bill.

I wish also to make one further point. There are Indian people in this country above the 60th parallel and, indeed, a good number of Eskimo people residing in areas of Canada who have no representation in this house at all. I am speaking of the Indian people who reside east of the 102nd meridian on the mainland of Canada and of the Eskimo people who reside on the Arctic islands. There are some Indian people east of the 102nd meridian. It is my intention to propose in the very near future that this area of Canada, now unrepresented in the house, be included as an electoral district and that the people residing there be given the opportunity of voting in federal elections. They are Canadian citizens as much as any hon. member of this house and as such they are entitled to the same rights and privileges.

I might mention here that by our neglect in not having taken this area into the collective consideration of Canada a large number of white citizens are also deprived of the vote in federal elections. I refer now to Royal Canadian Mounted Police stationed in these areas as well as defence personnel, personnel manning weather stations, scientists and the like. All of these people in this area are disenfranchised because there is simply no representation. However, I think chiefly of the Indian people, the subject of this bill, when I speak of this particular area. In the north there is certainly no doubt that above the 60th parallel all the Indian people cherish the right to vote and, speaking in full support of the principle behind this measure, I wish to suggest to the hon. member who has introduced the legislation that, because of all the reasons I have mentioned, the bill should be deferred until the findings of the joint committee of this house and the other place have been made known.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, the intent of Bill No. C-13, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, is to extend the franchise to Indians now living on reservations. As the previous speaker pointed out, the Eskimos of the northern lands, the Indians of the Yukon and Northwest Territories and those Indians who have left reservations have the vote but Indians who are still on reservations, numbering some 165,000 or 170,000, have no vote. Their affairs are managed by government officials under the supervision of a minister of the crown and they have no recourse against that minister's decision through being able to express their pleasure or displeasure by the way they cast their ballots.

The mover of the bill has pointed out that this bill is a companion piece to Bill No. C-15, an act to amend the Indian Act, and that both bills have to be considered together. He has pointed out also that at the present time there are six provinces which extend the vote to Indians on reservations.

In 1949, the province of British Columbia extended the vote to Indians on reservations. In that year, the first native Indian, a Mr. Frank Calder, was elected to the provincial legislature from the constituency of Atlin. Other provinces which have extended the vote to Indians on reservations are Ontario, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Manitoba and New Brunswick. The history of the Indian nations, who are the original people of Canada, is a proud one. Their loyalty to the crown, their loyalty to Canada, has been unquestioned in wars starting with the war of 1812-14 and continuing through to the second world war.

I can hardly agree with the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) about the difficulties which can be encountered in implementing this bill, and I listened most intently to what he had to say. It seems to me the purpose of the bill is very simple. It simply says the federal government will do what these six provincial governments have done, that is give the Indians on reservations the right to vote without the loss of any of their treaty rights. He has pointed out that at the present time there is a standing committee on privileges and elections which has been set up to consider and recommend revisions to the Canada Elections Act. Undoubtedly the field covered in this bill will be considered by that committee, and for that reason it is perhaps very apt that this bill should come before us now. The debate which has occurred on this bill has covered most of the aspects of the problem and should provide this committee with a wealth of information when they are considering the revision of the Canada Elections Act.

It has been pointed out also that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has appointed the Hon. James Gladstone, a full-blooded Indian, to the other place. This is the first time that has happened. It does indicate that the government is conscious of the obligation to give our original Canadians representation in the government. I would think the logical follow-up from this point would be to pick out the essence of these two bills, that is Bill No. C-13 and Bill No. C-15, and implement their provisions in the relatively near future.

It has been pointed out also that there is a joint committee of this house and the other place set up to study the Indian Act. It seems to me that we would be ill advised to press either of these measures at the present time until these two committees, which have the power to send for people and to investigate very thoroughly, make their reports to this house. I expect the hon. member who sponsored this bill will be a member of both of those committees. I believe the problem can be cured at that time and some of the difficulties which the previous speaker has foreseen can be overcome as a result of the consideration given to these problems.

In my riding, which is a city riding, I do have an Indian reservation on the western boundary. The Indian children on that reservation attend a school where they mix with white children from a very fine area of the city. I am assured by the principal of that school that these young Indian boys and girls take second place to none in their ability, in their application and in their potential as good citizens of this country. There are numerous examples of the tremendous contributions made by Indians in the development of art, literature, business, finance, and in almost every field of Canadian endeavour. I have no hesitation in saying that I support the idea behind both of these bills. I am most anxious to see what I consider to be an injustice, that is the failure to give Indians a franchise, corrected. I believe that the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) has made a worth while contribution in bringing forward these two bills.

Mr. John Charlton (Brant-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, on many previous occasions I have taken part in debates on bills similar to this one dealing with the same objectives as this one has. I compliment the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) for being so persistent in bringing this bill forward in this session as well as the past several sessions. I do agree with, and I am in sympathy with, the objectives of this bill.

I have the honour to represent the Indian reservation with the largest population in Canada. I refer to the Six Nations reservation near Brantford. Before going farther, however, it might be well to go into the history of the voting privileges of the Indian people in Canada. It is interesting to note that in 1885 a Conservative government gave the Indian people the privilege of voting. This privilege was based on a property qualification, and as near as I can understand it the qualification was that the Indian had to own a house to the value of around $150. This permitted almost any Indian to vote at that time.

It is interesting also to note that in the year 1898 the Liberal government of that day changed the law and made it necessary that the names of the Indians appear on the provincial enumeration lists. Of course I would presume that in 1898 there were very few provinces that permitted Indians to vote, and in that way the vote was taken away from most of the Indian people. After the first world war, of course, the veterans' names were added to the list of those having voting privileges, and after the second world war their spouses were permitted the privilege of voting. This is the position so far as federal elections are concerned now, outside of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

Ontario gave Indian people the privilege to vote in 1953. It is interesting to note the results of that action in the number of votes polled on the Six Nations Indian reservation in the three elections preceding 1953 and the one election that has followed 1953. In 1945, 89 votes were polled on that reservation; that is in the 1945 provincial election. In 1948, 97 votes were polled in the Brant portion and 3 in the Haldimand-Norfolk portion of the reservation, or a total of 100. In the election in 1951, in the Brant portion 89 votes were polled and in Haldimand-Norfolk 15 votes were polled, making a total of 104 votes. In the 1955 election, after the privilege of voting had been extended to the Indians, out of a total of 1,447 names on the list in the Brant section and 209 names on the list in the Haldimand-Norfolk section, it was found that 223 voted in the Brant section and 55 voted in the Haldimand-Norfolk section, making a total of 278 voting out of a possible 1,656.

That is an indication of the result. While not nearly all of those Indian people voted, a considerably larger number voted in the 1955 election than did in the previous elections. As I say, while not nearly all voted, there was a considerable increase in the numbers who did so. We know that all will not vote. It is against the religion of some of them to vote. Hence, they do not wish to do so for anything.

The Indian people of Canada, being the first citizens of this country should be entitled to the same right and privileges as other citizens. I have said that on many occasions. A high percentage of those on the Six Nations reservation served in both world war I and world war II. They fought for their country. They are interested in the affairs of the country. As they became educated more fully over a number of years I think perhaps they will take a greater interest if given the privilege of voting.

It has been said that this proposal is trying to force the vote on the Indian people. I am sure there is no such intention. No one else in Canada is forced to vote. Why should the Indians be forced to vote either? As I said before, as to some of the people, namely those who retain their original religion and who are known as pagan Indians, it is against their religion to vote for anything; and, of course, they will not vote for the council on the reservations. You could not expect them to vote if it is against their principles to do so. But as time goes on the situation may change. I might say here that the educational system on that Six Nations reservation at or near Brantford is far better than that of most townships in that vicinity.

Some fear the loss of some of their privileges if they vote. Among those privileges, of course, would be the right not to pay taxes on the reservation. Indians, of course, pay all other taxes anyway except the personal income tax on money earned on the reservation and property tax on the reservation. They also enjoy a dual citizenship as between Canada and the United States. They fear that if they voted in a Canadian election they might lose that dual citizenship. I am sure they would not do so, but if they feel that way it is rather hard to convince them otherwise.

We have an Indian affairs committee set up to study the problems of the Indian people. I am sure that committee will go into this problem fully within the next year or so and I am sure that they will find a solution to this problem. Although, as I said before, I am in thorough agreement with the principle of this bill, I feel that it would perhaps be better if it were left over until after this committee has sat, completed its deliberations and brought forward its recommendations. I am sure that something will come out of its study. In view of the fact that many provinces now give the Indians a vote, probably something will be done with respect to the federal elections act. I am happy to have had the opportunity to take part in this debate. I hope that something constructive will come out of the committee hearings.

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, having listened to hon. members who have spoken previously on Bill No. C-15, I felt possibly they were speaking from experiences in their own constituencies. I think we must all make a contribution on the basis of the experience we have gained. While it is obvious that a great deal of research has been done, especially by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), and while certainly my contribution will not compare with his in erudition, I might admit to some close ties with the Indian people. I refer not to blood ties but to social ties. My father was able to speak the Cree language when he was a young man and went to school with the Indians some seventy years ago. The school at that time was in the Qu'Appelle valley and was integrated probably seventy years before its time. However, I just wanted to give the background for my contribution.

We must deal with Indians of many different types and temperaments. The need for the franchise must possibly be analysed at a local level. In this situation we must face some cold hard facts. It seems to me that there are some things which the Indian needs much more than he needs the franchise. In the next few minutes I intend to introduce some facts which will bear out that statement. In the province of Saskatchewan last year, in the Qu'Appelle valley there was a large gathering of Indian representatives. While in the process of discussing the affairs of the Indians they were met by a delegation of the provincial government led by the premier of that province. The premier at that time offered the franchise to the Indians and the right to buy liquor. I can say, Mr. Speaker, that 95 per cent of the Indians on the committee rejected the proposal. In the light of a decision of that nature we cannot be too hasty in suggesting that those Indians would prefer to have the franchise.

I think it has been found that the Indian is still afraid of losing his treaty rights. We have been unable to convince the Indian that we are not putting his inherent rights in jeopardy when we offer him the franchise. A great many Indians are still unwilling to accept the full responsibility which is assumed by the enfranchised citizen. We must realize that with privileges go responsibilities. We cannot withhold from the Indians the voting privilege when they are willing to accept their full responsibility.

We as legislators have the responsibility to encourage every worthwhile piece of legislation in order that the Indian will be integrated; but, as I mentioned before, the situation must be analysed possibly at a local level. When I look at the situation in my own area I do wonder what is the best plan. The Indians like many other people are having difficulties. Our Indians are experiencing the pangs of growing pains in learning how to conduct their affairs of local administration along the same lines as other citizens. A great advancement is taking place, we must admit, but they are still a long way from being able to legislate for themselves.

As I mentioned in dealing with the local situation with which I am possibly more familiar, and reverting to the point which I made about the Indian getting something more than a franchise, I would remind the house that on a reservation of possibly 300 families only 120 of these are engaged in farming and the raising of livestock. The remainder of those families make their living or are sustained by old age assistance income, casual labour, domestic labour and by the sale of hay and other available products on their reservation. The other 180 families are living on the bounty of the government. When we have Indians in that situation, we wonder whether there is some more helpful means of bringing them along into integration than merely by the franchise.

Again looking at it from a local level, we must realize that we have different groups of Indians even on the one reservation or in the one tribe. First of all we have the older group, and many of these are bewildered people who cannot understand the technical and social advances and will always be for the rest of their natural lives a charge on society. We wonder what advantage the franchise would be to them. We have the middle aged group with a limited form of education and probably very little technical knowledge. Sometimes they are apathetic to self-government and they have, as I say, little technical knowledge. This, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced is a result of living under a welfare state. As a result of living in this situation we cannot analyse the reaction of the Indian toward the franchise. We cannot comprehend how an Indian of this type will treat his right to vote and become a citizen in the same way as other citizens. We have possibly as the most enlightened group the students of today, and certainly it is a great deal of encouragement to all of us to see the progress which is being made in the academic institutions. Only recently I attended a graduation at the school of the Oblate fathers and saw a group of young Indians graduate, and they would do credit to any school in Canada. It seems to me that education is certainly the means by which we can place the Indian in a position where he will be able to appreciate the franchise and exercise it to the best of his ability.

We see as time goes on in the department of indian affairs that Indians are receiving the right to look after their own affairs. They are being given more responsibility, and only recently I noticed in my own area that several have been placed in positions as assistant farm instructors. In this type of development naturally the time will come when the Indians will be able to look after themselves, and I believe it is only a matter of time until the Indians of Canada will be in the position to accept in its full meaning the right to vote, the franchise which we all enjoy, and until the Indians themselves are ready and willing to accept that responsibility, I do not feel it should be thrust upon them.

Mr. Small: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-49 to provide for the establishment of a national energy board—Mr. Churchill—Mr. Rea in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

On clause 87—Extension of part to oil.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few observations not only on this clause but on the amendment proposed by the minister. If I may be permitted to do so I should like to make these observations in French. The minister will understand that it will be easier for me although it will be more difficult for him. Perhaps by this time, however, he has grown accustomed to these difficulties and no doubt will follow the meaning of my words on the simultaneous translation device.

(Translation):

It is section 87, Mr. Chairman, which has to do with oil, and I think it is the first section in the bill which deals with oil. I shall read subsection (1), which says:

The Governor in Council may by proclamation extend the application of this Part to oil.

The part now being discussed, is, of course, Part VI, and section 81 provides that:

No person shall export any gas or power or import any gas except under the authority of and in accordance with a licence issued under this Part.

Under section 82, licences for power or gas export are mentioned and subsection (b) reads:

(b) for the importation of gas.

Before the amendment, we were being asked to give the government, or to the governor in council, very far reaching powers. Now we, on this side of the house, were opposed to the granting of such powers to the government. We were being asked to let the government decide when, where and how the act, or regulations thereunder, would apply to oil. We were being asked further to let the government decide what kind of control should be exercised with regard to either import or export of oil. Then, on second reading, we strongly objected to legislating in that manner.

(Text):

At this point I should like to refer to what was said by the hon. member for Ottawa West on Tuesday, May 26, as reported at page 4028 of Hansard:

I am one who believes that parliament should have the right to deal with matters of this kind, and I am at a complete loss, remembering the argument used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) when they were in opposition, to understand how they could seek the kind of arbitrary power they are now seeking, and let this proposal get past the draft bill stage and be introduced into this house, having regard to all they said against arbitrary power in the situation which was related to a national emergency and to the national defence of this country.

Those were the words spoken by the hon. member for Ottawa West on Tuesday, May 26. The next day with regard to the same matter the Leader of the Opposition, as reported at page 4084 of Hansard of Wednesday, May 27, had this to say:

Finally, may I mention the situation regarding section 87 having to do with oil imports and exports. It has already been dealt with in great detail and I do not propose to do so in detail at this time.

My leader then made reference to remarks made by the hon. member for Calgary South the previous evening. I shall pass over these without reading them, although not because I dislike the hon. member for Calgary South who is a nice gentleman. I continue reading from the words of the Leader of the Opposition:

I know that he was no doubt thinking of an emergency which would require action with regard to imports so that western oil could be moved east under certain circumstances.

That kind of situation would require government action at the time perhaps with regard to the import of oil but it would be of such a far-reaching character that our complaint is that this action should be taken with the knowledge and consent of parliament.

(Translation):

At this stage, Mr. Chairman, I want to stress the considerable amount of work done by my leader, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and by my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) who exerted pressure upon government leaders for the improvement of this bill, especially section 87, but also section 85 (2).

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberge: But for the amendment suggested this afternoon, before adjournment, by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), we ourselves would have had at least three amendments to suggest; now, however, we shall not move them. We believe that the amendment moved by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) is, on the whole, acceptable.

(Text):

I was saying that we on this side of the house having regard to the arguments we put forward are prepared to accept the amendment proposed by the minister to clause 87 of the bill by which amendment subclauses 3 and 4 are added to clause 87. Before proceeding any further I have a suggestion to make to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The minister said that clause 85 (2) which was deleted from the bill referred specifically to oil. Subclause 3 that is now proposed reads as follows:

The governor in council may by regulation exempt any class of oil or oil products or any area from the operation of all or any of the provisions of this part.

Subclause 4 refers only to the proclamation referred to in subclause 1 and 2 of clause 87.

In view of the fact that under the proposed amendment parliament would be seized of the proclamation as soon as it has been issued, would it not be a good thing to also include the regulations mentioned in subclause 3 so that parliament would be able to judge whether the government is right or wrong in exempting a certain class of oil or a certain area from the application of this part?

I should like to make this suggestion to the minister and I hope he will consider it in the spirit in which it is offered, that the following words be added to subclause 4: After the word "section" in the first line the words "and regulations made thereunder". Of course, in the third line the words "it is" should be changed to the words "they are". In the fourth line from the bottom after the word "proclamation" I should like to have the following words added, "or regulations made thereunder". The word "it" at the end of the line should be changed to the word "same".

This will have the effect of enabling parliament to judge exactly what had happened in the recess and what is happening with these regulations that exempt a class of oil to the extent that the entire part of this bill applies to oil.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member who has just spoken has made a very useful contribution to the debate and I appreciate the co-operation of the opposition in working with us on this bill and making it clear where it was perhaps vague. Also, as I mentioned last night, we have had considerable assistance from people in the oil and gas industry in suggesting amendments which did not change the basic factors in the bill at all but simply spelled things out a little more clearly.

I am very glad to hear that the opposition is prepared to accept this modification of clause 87. I think it indicates that we are, as we were throughout this debate, pretty much of a mind concerning the general principles underlying the bill but had some differences of opinion regarding clauses here and there. However, the hon. member has suggested that with regard to subclause 3 of the proposed amendment that the regulations made under that clause might be put forward for debate in the same way in which we are suggesting the proclamation might be.

I hope the hon. member will not press that too far for two reasons which occur to me immediately: one, there might be a number of regulations subject, perhaps as time goes on, if this clause becomes operative, to amendment; two, the regulations will be in the normal course and according to law published in the Canada Gazette and subject to debate at the same time that debate occurred under subclause 4. Under subclause 4, if and when a debate is called according to that procedure, any regulations that had been drafted would be open to consideration, to criticism and to amendment. Then, too, as a third reason, if under subclause 4 following debate it is resolved that the proclamation be revoked, the regulations under clause 87 would fall automatically. Therefore, I hope the hon. member will not press us too hard on that if my explanation appears to him to be satisfactory.

Mr. McIlraith: Because I spoke so strongly on the principle involved in this clause on second reading I should like to say a word or two about it. I said that the clause in the bill as printed and presented to the committee was in that form most offensive and could lead to a great many difficulties that would be damaging to the country in certain circumstances. The minister has now come forward with an amendment which, while it does not do all the things we asked in that it does not permit a decision by parliament on the question of whether or not oil import control should be established before such action is taken, it does go a long way in ameliorating the difficulty of which we complained. Because it goes such a long way I think it is perfectly proper to accept it as a compromise. It can, I think we must admit, be argued that it is a wholly reasonable compromise of two conflicting points of view and it certainly will permit the minister to take action to have the government provide for the possible difficulties of which he thought there was some danger and for which he thought provision should be made. At the same time it permits parliamentary control over the action even although that parliamentary control may be a second-class method in that it comes after the action has taken place.

Since it is put forward as a compromise and does go a long way toward meeting the difficulty we raised at the earlier stages of this bill, I am perfectly content to accept it, and I must acknowledge to the minister our appreciation of his bringing it forward. Possibly, there are some small objections which could be taken to subclause 3, but those are guarded against by the fact that it is limited to oil only. It is possible to make out a hypothetical case against it but I think legislation has to be practical. While our objections to the clause 85 (2) as it existed before that subclause was deleted stands in its full force and vigour, I think having the clause limited as it is here to oil removes most of the objections to it, or sufficient of them that we are not going to press the matter further.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the amendment moved by the Minister of Public Works, coupled with the deletion of subparagraph (2) of clause 85 goes a long way toward meeting the objections of the C.C.F. group to the arbitrary, sweeping powers that had been retained by the cabinet. This suggests to us that our very strenuous and vigorous protests have been very much worth while.

The provision in clause 87, as contained in the amendment, limits the regulations that the government may make to exempt any class of oil or oil products to the clause on oil. I think that subparagraph (4) of the suggested amendment is one that is very much in keeping with the rights and supremacy of parliament. In the terms in which it has been stated it does give to the House of Commons and the members thereof an opportunity under the rules to have the proclamation issued under this clause brought before the house for debate. The main value very likely of this subparagraph will probably by experience be found to be not that many debates will arise thereunder but rather the very knowledge that this provision is contained in the act will make the cabinet rather careful not to issue proclamations that will likely result in a protracted debate in parliament. We congratulate the government on having listened to the opinion of the opposition as far as this particular provision is concerned. We hope that the government will keep an attentive ear tuned to the suggestions of the opposition in the future.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, having used strong words in connection with some phases of this bill I would feel I was lacking in sportsmanship if I did not say to the minister that I too wish to join with others in expressing the satisfaction we all have over the decision of the government in the face, if I may say so without any way detracting from the richness of my acknowledgment, of the strong representations made by the opposition regarding this and other clauses. I note on reading the amendment that the principle incorporated and, indeed, much of the language are not unlike that introduced by the Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent when he was prime minister on the occasion of a debate in this house on a bill to which these words were made applicable. Just as on that occasion he acknowledged the co-operative effort of those then sitting on this side, it is not without propriety that there should be a similar acknowledgment of the readiness of the minister to listen to representations made by the opposition groups.

This amendment, while not perfect in its entirety in view of the observation made by the hon. member for Megantic, nonetheless remedies substantially the objections that were noted on this side and on that account, as one who last night said that he believed there was a proper constitutional relationship between the executive and parliament, I cannot help but note with great satisfaction the acceptance by the minister of these views.

Clause 88 agreed to.

On clause 89—General regulations.

Mr. Argue: On clause 89 I have a general question I should like to ask the minister. The clause reads as follows:

> The governor in council may make regulations for carrying the purposes and provisions of this act into effect.

I had intended to ask this question under clause 85 but during its discussion I was called to the telephone and while I was out the clause was passed. However, I think it is quite appropriate to ask my question under this clause and that is why I raise it at this time. It has been reported from Washington, I understand, that it is the opinion of usually well-informed people in the capitol that the Canadian government has arrived at a policy with respect to the exportation of gas to the United States by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, and the report suggests that the Canadian government is desirous of an increase in the proposed rates for gas that may be charged by this company. Would the Minister of Trade and Commerce care to comment on any decision the government may have taken in this regard or on any opinion the government may have as to policy? I do not wish the minister to reply that I am now suggesting that the Canadian government adopt a policy without any reference to the energy board. I had these notes on my desk before subclause 2 of clause 85 was deleted and I have had a number of requests to ask the minister this question. I said that I would ask the government this question and I have now done so. I would appreciate learning whether the government has gone ahead in its thinking as to export rates for gas that will be charged United States consumers and whether in the opinion of the government there should be an increase in the suggested charges.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, reports are constantly being circulated with regard to matters pertaining to the oil and gas industry and sometimes you hear rumors about what the government is intending to do, what it has decided and things of that nature which actually are in the realm of speculation. The answer to the hon. gentleman's question is that no decision has been made along this line and, as he pointed out, it will be the problem of the energy board to look at the entire situation and then examine the licence applications that are before it and inform us as to what in their opinion should be done. That is about the situation as I see it. There has been no decision on the part of the government. The policy of the government has been expressed in the course of the debate which has gone on now for so many days.

Mr. Argue: That is really what I had reference to. I do not want to put words in the minister's mouth but I took it from his statement the other evening that that was the intention of the government in rejecting the amendment proposed by the Liberal party and that even though the circumstances might be considered similar the policy of the Canadian government would be to get the very best price possible for Canadian gas.

Mr. McIlraith: This clause seems to be extraordinarily wide and I am wondering whether the minister has in mind any particular type of regulations that would be required, bearing in mind that clauses 7, 42, 85 and 88 give quite extensive powers to make regulations. Clause 7 provides for rules being made by the board covering its own hearings and the procedure in relation thereto. Clause 42 provides that the board may, with the approval of the governor in council, make regulations respecting the location of international power lines, the registration of plans, and so on. Clause 85 gives rather extensive power to make regulations to the governor in council limited to the export and import of power, gas and oil. Clause 88 gives the board, with the approval of the governor in council, power to make regulations on a very extensive variety of subjects. Indeed, it seems to me to be taken mostly from the Pipe Lines Act. At the moment, I am unable to visualize the requirements for clause 89, and I wish the minister would clarify just what type of regulations he has in mind that are not provided for in the other rather extensive clauses that provide for the making of regulations by the different authorities concerned.

Mr. Churchill: Yes. The hon. member has drawn our attention to clause 89, which is expressed in general terms, and has indicated four clauses in which regulations are also mentioned. Those four, clauses 7, 42, 85 and 88, deal with specific matters concerning which regulations shall be made. This one, clause 89, is intended to cover the administrative details, the internal organization of the board itself, and is put in just in case the governor in council may find it necessary to make some regulations covering any specific matters such as have been outlined already for the organization of the board, its staff, and things of that nature.

Mr. McIlraith: There is one further question I should like to ask the minister. The language used in clause 89 is general, and very broad. I am wondering if it is the intention of the government in council, by regulations under this clause, to supplant the authority of the board, or the board with the approval of the governor in council, as indicated under the other clauses. This is a possibility which I think is contrary to the scheme set out in the bill but yet is possible under the language of this clause as drafted.

Mr. Churchill: I doubt that it would go that far. It does not confer any powers beyond those that are to be found elsewhere in the bill. It is not intended that it should override any of the other powers in the bill.

Mr. McIlraith: Has the minister satisfied himself this clause is in language which does not permit the governor in council to override the other authorities? I point out to the minister, to illustrate what I mean, that it is not stated to be subject to clauses 7, 42, 85 and 88. It is not made subject to the four clauses and I wonder if that was deliberate, if it was intended.

Mr. Churchill: In our judgment it could not run contrary to those specific clauses because it states here it is for carrying out the purposes and provisions of this act. Our examination of it indicates that it would not go as far as the hon. member has suggested and is warning us against. I believe it is intended solely for administrative purposes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think this is a rather unusual clause. As the hon. member for Ottawa West has pointed out, there are four other clauses of the bill which deal with regulations that may be made by the board, in some instances with the approval of the governor in council, or as in clause 7 without the approval of the governor in council. Clause 88, of course, is one that hardly touches the kind of purpose that the minister stated conceivably could belong to clause 89. But certainly, clause 7 in particular and clause 42 would seem to embrace what might be contemplated in clause 89, in order to make effective the purposes and provisions of this act.

One wonders certainly whether this clause is needed at all. I am particularly impressed with this observation made by the hon. member for Ottawa West. When you look at clause 7 the board may, under that clause, make rules without any reference to the governor in council with respect to the sittings of the board; with respect to matters having to do with the procedure in relation to applications, representations and complaints made to the board; the conduct of the hearings before the board; the manner and conduct of any business before the board. Likewise, in subclause (c), the board may make rules, again without reference to the governor in council, with regard to the division of work amongst the members, the assignment of hearings and so on. I suppose that means, as the minister said the other night, amongst the various members of the board, and this was the argument he used, in part, for a five-man board as opposed to a three-man board. The clause refers to the assignment to members of the board of various responsibilities with regard to hearings.

Then, subclause (d) is so general as to be almost synonymous with the intent of the language in clause 89, that is to say, generally carrying on the work of the board, the management of its internal affairs, duties of its officers and employees. Now, what point is there in keeping clause 89 unless it is clear that the purposes intended and the objectives covered in that clause are different from the powers given for making regulations in the four cited clauses. It is conceivable that there may be a conflict between regulations drawn up by the board, either on its autonomous authority as provided for in clause 7 or after having received the approval of the governor in council. The governor in council may decide upon particular regulations and the board may decide upon another set of regulations, and there would be a conflict. There is nothing in this act, unless I am unmindful of the earlier provisions, which would give priority in law to those regulations drawn up under clause 89 by the governor in council.

It seems to us, in the absence of more precise information, that there could be no reason for this clause. Another objection to this clause, I believe, is that there is no limitation on the extent of time it may run. It could easily be argued by the governor in council that for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the regulations must be not only those enacted by the governor in council at the beginning but regulations which the governor in council might, from time to time, in the long future enact. There is no limitation whatever. It could be argued by a cabinet that wanted so to argue that these regulations envisaged long after the act came into being, long after it was in operation, were necessary under the literal interpretation of this clause to enable the governor in council to carry out the purposes and provisions of the act.

I suggest to the minister that if there is no real reason for this provision, in the face of these other enabling clauses, this clause perhaps ought to be modified or dropped.

Mr. Churchill: I just say in reply, let us not overlook the fact that regulations made under this clause or indeed the other clauses, will be published in the Canada Gazette and tabled in the House of Commons. They can be scrutinized and I presume will be scrutinized with the same care with which my hon. friends have looked at the bill.

The second thing I should like to say is that two days ago my hon. friend asked me to consult the law officers of the crown with regard to a point which was quite as technical as is this one. On this occasion I have followed that advice. I have consulted with the law officer of the crown who incidentally drafted in 1955 the concessional clause which my hon. friend mentioned a little while ago in connection with the Defence Production Act and which was pressed upon the government of the day by an effective opposition and who has in turn drafted the concessional clause which appears before the house tonight conceded to by the government of the day under the pressure of a very effective opposition today. Having consulted him, I discover that this is a common provision and is usually associated with specific powers. If you look at section 5 of the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act you will find there the following:

> 5. The governor in council may make regulations for carrying into effect the purposes and provisions of this act—

There is the general clause. Then under former drafting that used to go on to read, "and without restricting the generality of the foregoing", and then listed specific matters. Under the present drafting methods, under very experienced guidance, the clauses have been separated and for the expressed purpose that the summary conviction penalties would not apply, they are not mentioned here. I am informed that the authorities are quite clear that a provision like this one is subject to all the other provisions of the act and subservient to it.

I think that this is an explanation of clause 89 which here appears separately and yet in other acts has been expressed like that with subclauses underneath it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister for this explanation. On reflection I think he may be right. In so far as conflict is concerned the regulations passed by the governor in council would have a priority of position. As to this general power given to the governor in council with regard to making regulations which he says is to be found often in statutes, I wonder whether the minister will not agree that this particular kind of power given to the governor in council is not often found in legislation where in the body of the bill—that is to say in other bills—power is given either to the governor in council under certain contexts or to a board acting on its own to make regulations? Is it not a fact that one would not find in legislation generally a provision such as this, namely the provision in clause 89, that is only in cases where there was not a general empowering in other sections of a bill to subsidiary bodies acting on their own or to bodies acting subject to the governor in council? I admit that this general language is often to be found in the statutes but I doubt whether it can be found in many statutes where a minor body has been given the wide powers given to the board in this bill in section 7.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is quite right when he says it is found in many statutes. I could give him another example to the one I quoted this afternoon, namely the Meat Inspection Act, chapter 36 of the statutes of 1955, section 5 of which reads as follows:

5. The governor in council may make regulations for carrying out the purposes and provisions of this act—

Then it goes on to list certain things under it. I think this is just a different method of drafting which I have already explained. It separates this general clause from some of the specific ones.

Mr. McIlraith: The point, Mr. Chairman, really is as to the conflict of authority to make regulations. This clause is undoubtedly in many other acts in the form in which it is found here but in such cases there is no other authority or power to make regulations. But here we have four other provisions for making regulations and by different authorities, namely by the board itself in one case or by the board with the approval of the governor in council. All we feared was that under this section the governor in council might come in conflict with the other authorities having power to make regulations. But in the face of the minister's explanation and in the face of it being clear that it does not appear to be his intention that the governor in council should be seeking to make regulations in any field that could come under the specific sections dealing with the power to make regulations, namely sections 7, 42, 85 and 88, I think perhaps there is nothing more I wish to say.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 90—Her Majesty bound.

Mr. Crestohl: I should like the minister to explain this odd section which reads as follows:

Her Majesty is bound by this act.

In his reply will the minister please address himself to one or two anomalies that I see. I refer now to clause 86 which speaks about penalties. Does clause 90 mean that the Queen is exposed to the penalties enumerated in clause 86 and would that destroy the doctrine that the Queen can do no wrong? I think it is a matter which is a little bit unusual. It is a doctrine in Canada that we have certainly always lived up to. In this clause provision is made to bind Her Majesty by this act, which means that she would necessarily be bound by every section of the act and hence would be exposed to the penalties which the act declares are imposable on anyone who is in breach of the act.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to say that I was going to ask the minister exactly the same question as those that were asked by the hon. member for Cartier but I thought it was necessary for me to ask them as an ordinary countryman and layman. I am delighted to find that an hon. gentleman with legal experience is as befogged as I am and I shall await the minister's answer with interest.

Mr. Churchill: Under the Interpretation Act it is required that clauses like this one be inserted in order to make it apply to crown corporations. Hon. members will discover that in clause 101 the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation Act is referred to. Clause 86 having to do with penalties, the crown would not be subjected to the penalties outlined there.

Mr. Crestohl: I did not quite catch the reply which the minister gave. May I also ask him whether this clause 90 also eliminates the necessity for applying for a bill of rights or at least for—

Mr. Pickersgill: A petition of right.

Mr. Crestohl: —a petition of right in order to proceed against Her Majesty. We require to do that now. If she becomes an ordinary subject, will it still be necessary to apply for a petition of right to proceed against her?

Mr. Churchill: This has nothing to do with applying for a petition of rights. A crown corporation that is set up would come under the provisions of this act. My earlier explanation was that according to the Interpretation Act this clause is required in order to make the act apply to crown corporations.

Mr. Crestohl: Does the minister offer the opinion that the Queen is exposed to the penalties imposed by this act?

Mr. Churchill: I said no.

Mr. Crestohl: Then how is she bound by this act?

Mr. Churchill: A certificate of public convenience and necessity would be required by the crown corporation before it could operate a pipe line.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to prolong the argument, but with deference to the minister the definition of the word "company" governs, and I do not think this clause includes the crown agency in that definition. Therefore the effect of it, as I see it, would be that the crown is bound, for instance, by the right given to a company to expropriate land. The crown would be found in that case, but if any pipe line owned by the crown was not incorporated by a special act it would not be required by this legislation to obtain a licence.

Mr. Churchill: I am informed that clause 25 (1) would apply in the instance the hon. member has drawn to our attention.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. minister if this will bind the crown in the right of a province?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: What actual effect would that have? Could the minister explain?

Mr. Churchill: There is no difference in that case, in those circumstances.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Except with respect to the matters in those clauses which the minister has kindly held over, where it was suggested on this side that there was a violation of the property and civil rights clause in the British North America Act. I understand the minister will report on that later on.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 91—Report to parliament.

Mr. McIlraith: I think this clause would permit an amendment which would provide for the tabling of the reports under clauses 22 and 23; that is, the studies and reports of the advisory board. Since we argued that case when those clauses were before the committee, perhaps it is unnecessary to repeat the arguments on this clause. I would merely content myself by asking the minister if he has considered our arguments made on the earlier clause about the minister being compelled to table the reports and studies under clause 22 (1), and if he is willing to provide for it under this clause.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, we did give that serious consideration and discussed it at some length the other day and reached a decision with regard to it. I have nothing further to add to what was said then.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 92 agreed to.

On clause 93—Commencement of act.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it it is the minister's intention to proclaim the act as soon as it is through all stages and receives royal assent.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is the intention.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 94 agreed to.

On clause 95—Certain companies entitled to certificate.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, on clause 95—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Before the hon. member speaks on this clause I might ask the hon. members to please lower their voices. It is extremely hard to hear the hon. member who is speaking.

Mr. McIlraith: On clause 95, I just want to clear up a very small point. I take it it is purely a transitional clause and nothing in it takes away any of the existing rights or orders that are now outstanding and were issued by the board of transport commissioners? I take it that no one holding those orders will be compelled to reapply and to argue his case again?

Mr. Churchill: That is the whole purpose of clause 95, in order to protect the rights of companies now in existence and operating.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Was that not already provided for by an earlier clause? I cannot put my hand on the clause, but I do recall that, the other night we dealt with a clause which seemingly covered part of this at any rate.

Mr. Churchill: I think the hon. member is referring to clause 25 (2), which deals with companies in existence and operating before the first day of October 1953.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is it? That is not the same as that provided in this clause?

Mr. Churchill: No, it is not the same.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 96 agreed to.

On clause 97—Application of part IV.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, clause 97 reads as follows:

(1) Part IV of this act does not apply to any person who, on the day this act comes into force, is operating a pipe line, until the board so orders.

Mr. Chairman, as far as I can see this clause actually removes the tolls of common carriers or pipe lines from the regulations under which they are at present. It does not make in my opinion too much sense as far as other oil pipe lines or gas pipe lines are concerned. I presume that this is designed to give the board time to set up its administrative machinery, but I suggest to the minister this proposition. Would not a better way to deal with the initial heavy work load be for the board to approve the rates on an interim basis and then review them later, at which time the rates could be suspended or otherwise be revised if the board found it necessary? In any event, the fact that the act, as I see it, will not come into force until it is proclaimed by the governor in council will give the board a considerable amount of time to establish its administrative machinery. It is because we view this clause from that angle, Mr. Chairman, that I want to move:

That clause 97 be amended by deleting subclause (1).

The Deputy Chairman: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Herridge: Has the minister any explanation to offer with regard to that clause in reply to our criticism of it?

Mr. Churchill: Clause 97 (1) refers back to part IV which deals with traffic tolls and tariffs. My hon. friend may be under the impression that the oil pipe lines now operating are subject to tolls but that is not so because they were not declared to be common carriers by the board of transport commissioners. If his amendment were adopted these companies would immediately be subjected to part IV and would immediately be in default. The intention here is to give a little time so that part IV will not become applicable to these companies now in existence until the board so orders.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it that the purpose of clause 97 (1) will at least go part way in meeting the difficulty about which I spoke on an earlier clause in the bill as to a company that is not and does not intend to operate as a common carrier being required to file its tariffs and tolls.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the minister's explanation, Mr. Chairman, have I the permission of the committee to withdraw my amendment?

The Chairman: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the committee to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

[Mr. Herridge.]

On clause 98—Pending applications.

Mr. McIlraith: Can the minister tell us how many applications are now pending before the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. Churchill: There are, I believe, five applications or perhaps six before the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. McIlraith: Are those applications for leave to construct?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, they would be for leave to construct.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 99 to 101 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall we now revert to clause 27?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 27—Approval of board.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, clauses 27 and 29 were stood over at the request of the hon. member for Villeneuve in order that we might consider whether or not a clause should be written into this bill which appears in the Railway Act and which did not appear in the Pipe Lines Act. He wondered whether that was an inadvertent omission in the Pipe Lines Act and whether or not that clause should appear here.

My understanding is that under the Quebec civil code the minister of lands and forests furnishes each registry office with a plan accompanied by a book of reference showing each lot by number. Transaction may then take place by reference to these lots by number without further description. The book of reference referred to in this legislation, however, and in the Railway Act, is a different document and is intended only for expropriation proceedings under this legislation. No difficulty has been expressed in this regard under the Railway Act or the Pipe Lines Act.

With reference to subsection 7 of section 171 of the Railway Act, this provision which the hon. member drew to our attention was not included in the Pipe Lines Act. It was probably intended to provide for a special situation in Quebec but under the Pipe Lines Act and in this bill the plan, profile and book of reference must be prepared to the satisfaction of the board so that the board may meet special requirements or situations in all provinces.

The Railway Act does not have a provision like subclause 4 of clause 29 of this bill. Our conclusion, therefore, was that there was no need to put in any special clause such as that the hon. member was asking about.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I have looked at the record and read the remarks of the hon. member for Villeneuve. I also checked the civil code as did the minister. He read to us article 2166 of the civil code. Paragraph 3 of article 2168 of the civil code reads:

As soon as such plans and books of reference have been deposited and notice thereof has been given, notaries—

Of course the minister knows what notaries in Quebec are. I continue:

—passing acts concerning immovables indicated on such plan are bound to designate such immovables by the number given to them upon such plan and in the book of reference—

I take it that in Quebec the book of reference is more or less the act of birth of the land. The notaries go by that. If a property or part of one is sold or expropriated the description of that part of the property is in the book listed under the number given by the minister of lands and forests. Am I right in assuming that the words "book of reference" in this bill and in the Railway Act mean only the technical description of the land one wants to expropriate?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, the technical description is correct.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 29—Plan, profile, book of reference.

Mr. Robichaud: Would the minister give us an explanation?

Mr. Churchill: Clause 29 was held over for the same reason clause 27 was held over and the explanation is the same.

Mr. Roberge: And the reference is to the book of reference?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Clause agreed to.

The Chairman: We go now to clause 51 and the amendment thereto.

On clause 51—Tolls to be approved.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, clause 51 was held over in order to consider an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kootenay West. As the clause now stands a tariff would be effective without any action by the board. Under the proposed amendment it would be necessary for the board to approve the tariff before it became effective and there would have to be an application and a hearing.

The discussion on clause 55 referred also to clause 51 and the hon. member for Ottawa West asked what would be the position of a pipe line company that carried oil for only two or three companies and was not actually a common carrier. Under the bill the tariff provisions would apply but I think there would probably be little or no occasion for the application of the anti-discrimination and other rules respecting tariffs. Such a company would be inconvenienced if it had to make an application to the board and have a hearing before its tariffs could be effected. Under clause 51 as it stands such a company would simply file its tariffs and they would be effective unless the board took some action. We think the amendment will be ineffective for the reason I stated earlier, that there would have to be an application and a hearing.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 20; nays, 74.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 54—Suspension of tariff.

Mr. Churchill: I asked that it stand. At that moment I was considering an amendment that had been placed in front of me. I have no amendment to suggest to clause 54.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 58—Contracts limiting liability of company.

Mr. Churchill: This clause was held until we had decided what to do with clause 51. The hon. member for Ottawa West pointed out that it would be necessary to determine 51 before 58 could be passed. We have now decided with regard to 51.

The Deputy Chairman: There is an amendment to clause 58. The Minister of Public Works moved:

That subclause (1) of clause 58 be amended by inserting the words "is included as a term or condition of its tariffs as filed or" after the word "notice" in line 32 on page 16.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 61—Tolls for transmission of gas.

Mr. Churchill: This clause was held up at the special request of the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Winch: I still do not understand it.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 62—Powers of company.

Mr. Churchill: An amendment has been moved to this clause, but the hon. member for Essex East asked certain questions concerning clause 62 and also clause 66. The first question was whether the expression "crown land" applied to provincial crown land, and he suggested that parliament would have no jurisdiction to deal with provincial crown lands.

The authorities are quite clear that parliament has jurisdiction to provide for the taking or expropriation of provincial crown lands. The whole of part V consists of company powers, which are carried forward from the present Pipe Lines Act. We did not make any changes that would reduce the powers the companies now have because that would, in effect, be retroactive legislation interfering with vested rights.

Whether the particular clauses in this bill do or do not apply to crown lands is a matter of interpretation and that is something for the courts to decide if any question should arise.

That is the explanation my hon. friend was asking for concerning clause 62 and clause 66. If my hon. friend is satisfied with that I have something to say with regard to the amendment which we ourselves moved.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Churchill: Will you read the amendment, please.

The Deputy Chairman: The Minister of Public Works moved:

That clause 62 be further amended by inserting (1) after the number "62" in line one on page 18 and by adding thereto the following subclause: "Lines for transmission of sulphur."

(2) for the purposes of this part the expression "pipe line" includes a line for the transmission of sulphur or sulphur compounds obtained from an oil or gas well, any product thereof, connecting a province with any other or others of the provinces or extending beyond the limits of a province.

Mr. Churchill: In connection with this there was some discussion the other night. I think, perhaps for clarification, I should add that this subclause confers powers under part V on companies operating an interprovincial pipe line for the transmission of sulphur. The objection made to this was that it would confer wide powers on many small companies. It should be pointed out that the amendment would apply only to a "company" as defined, namely a company incorporated by special act of the parliament of Canada operating an international or interprovincial pipe line for the transmission of gas or oil. Under the proposed amendment such a company would be able to exercise its powers in relation to a sulphur pipe line if it has one. The amendment would therefore apply only to those companies that already have these powers in relation to an oil or gas pipe line. The proposed amendment to clause 75, which is related to this, will ensure that the company will be subject to the same control in exercising its expropriation powers in relation to sulphur pipe lines as it is in relation to other pipe lines.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 66—Crown lands.

Mr. Churchill: An explanation has been made with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East. An amendment will be moved by my colleague.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clause 66 be amended by adding thereto the following subclause:
Exception.
(4) This section does not apply to anything done pursuant to leave obtained therefor under section 76.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 75—Expropriation provisions of Railway Act incorporated.

The Deputy Chairman: There is an amendment to clause 75.

Mr. Robichaud: Was clause 75 allowed to stand on account of clause 76 which has to do with the same problems that will affect clause 75?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, that is correct, but there is also an amendment to clause 75.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS ACT

FURTHER EXTENSION OF INCOME TAX RATE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the second reading of Bill No. C-41, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the legislation we are now discussing and which has been discussed before, on various occasions in this house, is the federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements act.

Tonight, and before coming to the particular section mentioned in the bill, i.e. clause 12, I would like to deal to some extent with certain general principles connected with the sharing of taxes between the provinces and federal government.

The fiscal problem now existing between the federal government and the provinces, Mr. Speaker, is both very significant and very simple.

It is very significant because, it is a basic aspect of our constitution, and also because one of the main sources of financing the provincial and federal governments depends on its being solved.

The problem is also very simple to my mind, except for those who want to confuse the issue in order to be able to say later that it cannot be solved, at least for the present. There are also those perfectionists who agree to consider drastic and permanent solutions only. They should, however, realize that it is impossible to have such solutions accepted, and that their unbending attitude frequently remains sterile and prevents any gradual improvement, which very often is the only one possible.

All serious-minded people, who have made the effort to study those arrangements and to consider the over-all aspect of the matter will admit today that, according to our constitution, the federal and the provincial governments have concurrent rights in the field of direct taxation. There are not—though some people will maintain there are—any priority rights in this field; such rights, indeed, cannot exist without limitation, as otherwise they would lead up, through their exercise, to exclusive powers. In fact, if, for instance, the provinces had a right to some priority, or else, if they had a priority right to direct taxation, such priority would not necessarily stop at 50 per cent, nor at 75 per cent of that source of taxation; it could go as far as 100 per cent and, indeed, it would then become an exclusive right.

Our constitution therefore provides for concurrent rights in that field, and even if some of us wish that it be otherwise, I am convinced that this aspect of our constitution will not change in the near future. I am convinced, and the experience of the past proves it—the experience of the past is conclusive in that regard—that neither the federal government nor the provinces will agree to surrender the rights which the constitution recognize as being theirs in the field of direct taxation. Those who seek a solution of such a sweeping nature to the fiscal problem lack realism or sincerity. Contending to aim at perfection, as they see it, and which is impossible of achievement, they do not seek to achieve improvements which, indeed, would be possible.

Therefore, faced with those consequences and in presence of the situation as we find it today, we must accept, in a practical way, the existence of those concurrent rights. Such is, in my opinion, the basic fact at the root of the whole fiscal problem.

Another fundamental aspect of that matter is the fact that the federal government and the provinces will wish to go on exercising concurrent rights. Besides, the very exercise of those concurrent rights, without any limitation or corrective action, would end up in a double taxation pattern which would become excessive and would lead to unacceptable regional discrimination, in view of the highly different returns from direct income in the various provinces. Now, we know, by experience, that all Canadians, in every province, are opposed to double taxation which would result in adding unduly to the taxpayers' burden, but on the other hand, they support the steps taken by the federal government to equalize the yield of direct taxes as between the various provinces.

Out of this general desire of Canadians, there arise two basic considerations underlying any practical solution to the fiscal problem. In view of the fact, as I said earlier, that both the federal government and the provinces can be expected to continue exercising their concurrent rights in the field of direct taxes, there must be specific arrangements between both levels of government so as to mitigate, and if possible to avoid, the problems involved in double taxation. Furthermore, such arrangements should provide for a system of equalization payments as a means of equalizing the tax yield between the provinces, through a redistribution of tax revenues for the benefit of the less favoured provinces, so that such provinces too may face their constitutional responsibilities.

From these findings, Mr. Speaker, there arise two definite requirements. I should like to discuss both these requirements which, I think are of equal importance in this discussion. First, there must be fiscal arrangements as between the federal government and the provinces, to enable both levels of government to exercise their rights, while avoiding as much as possible the serious problems involved in double taxation. Second, such fiscal arrangements must involve equalization payments, because otherwise, tax revenues will be neither fair nor equitable.

But there is more. I do not think it is possible, nor indeed desirable, that either the federal government or the provinces should accept a limitation in the exercise of their constitutional taxation rights. The sovereignty of those governments and the flexibility that is so necessary to a fiscal policy, especially in a federal state, are inconsistent with such limitation. But then, if fiscal arrangements should not be such as to limit taxation rights of both types of government, other than the limits already set out in our constitution, the only practical result that we could expect of such arrangements is the establishment of a reasonable area within which the provinces could exercise their taxation rights, while avoiding double taxation and an increased tax burden for the taxpayers.

It is in that way that the main purpose of the fiscal arrangements is to fix the limits within which double taxation will be avoided, but those arrangements should in no way limit the right for the exercise of this right by the parties concerned, that is, the provincial and federal governments.

I submit that all the basic requirements of an acceptable and practical solution of the taxation problem were met in the fiscal arrangements introduced under the government of the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent.

Those unquestionable merits were recognized by Mr. Drew himself when in 1956, speaking in the house, on the bill then before parliament, he said the following as found in Hansard of July 16, 1956, page 5993; I quote:

(Text):

—I wish to make it quite clear that the present formula has some merits in the acceptance of certain very important principles. As the minister pointed out, the proposal contemplates the continuance of a form of tax rental agreement, arrangements for federal collection of payments under those agreements, a tax equalization plan, a provincial stabilization fund which will protect municipalities against a severe drop in their revenues, and in turn an abatement in the federal taxation fields of personal income, corporation taxes and succession duties. The acceptance by the federal government of the place of the provinces and the right of the provinces in the field of income tax, corporation tax, succession duties and other direct taxes is, in itself, a welcome evidence of a return to the position which was always accepted without question over the years between 1867 and 1941, when the wartime tax agreements were signed.

(Translation):

Those were the words spoken by the leader of the opposition at the time. Even Mr. Duplessis who, you will agree, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, since you have a wealth of experience in politics, even Mr. Duplessis, who is not easily satisfied when making requests of others, stated at the end of the conference in March 1956 that the solution suggested by the federal government of the day was a great step in the right direction. However many of his followers in this house are still bitterly critical of the spirit and the substance of the arrangements then introduced. Criticism is easy, of course, especially when it is vague and when it is voiced from a particular standpoint. But I still have to hear in this house any of those hon. Conservative members from Quebec make a concrete proposal which stands the least chance of being accepted by the government concerned.

Mr. Speaker, they are opposed to the substance and to the very principle of the present arrangements. The Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) stated in the house, on October 18, 1956, that he was still opposed to the subsidies derived from the present fiscal arrangements, and that the fiscal proposals which would be submitted by the Conservative government, during the conference held in November 1957, would have a basis quite different from the one on which was predicated the formula put forward by the Liberals. However, the province of Quebec is still receiving this year, in 1959, about $55 million from the federal government in the way of subsidies which the Solicitor General described as ultra vires when he sat on this side of the house, in the opposition.

As for the Conservative members from Quebec who were elected for the first time in March, on March 31, 1958, to be accurate, they must remember that during the last election campaign they bitterly denounced the present fiscal arrangements as recognizing the theft by the federal government of provincial taxation rights. They must also recall that they took the solemn undertaking to denounce these fiscal arrangements and to see to it that the constitution be complied with. They now have the opportunity to carry out their solemn pledge to the Quebec voters and they cannot do it any other way than by voting against this motion whose fundamental aim is to extend the very fiscal arrangements that they condemned, and to come up with another formula. I hope, Mr. Speaker that they will have the courage to carry out their solemn pledge.

Mr. Denis: They have the courage to stay behind the curtains.

Mr. Chevrier: During the last election, they set themselves up as champions of provincial autonomy which they promised to defend any time and anywhere. It was easy for them to make such statements in the province of Quebec during the last election. This is the place and now is the time for them to fight, here in parliament, on that bill now before us, and to show that they have the courage that befits honest and sincere people.

So far, in this debate, they have been conspicuous by their silence. We have heard but a single speech, very brief and very mild, by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Flynn).

Is that how they mean to fight the great battle for autonomy? They will not always be able to escape their responsiblities by remaining silent. When the time comes for them to vote on the principle of this bill, I hope that they will not have the cowardice to leave the house as they did on that occasion that we all know about, and to abstain from voting. But then if they stay here, they will have to make a choice: either they will vote against the bill in order to keep their solemn pledge, or they will have to admit that they made a mistake before the last election and that thereby they have misled the voters of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Denis: Especially that.

Mr. Chevrier: Whatever the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) may think, public life also requires the respect of the pledged word. Those hon. Conservative members from the province of Quebec might say, in self-defence, that they have not changed their position, but that they want to support this bill pending the introduction by this government of a better formula. It is in this way, for instance, that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) has justified here the new position he has taken on the matter of grants to universities.

However, such an attitude is not only wrong, it is unacceptable. To my mind, such an attitude cannot be countenanced, neither by us who are aware of the situation nor by those to whom promises were made. Mr. Speaker, when some legislation allegedly violates a country's constitution, when such arrangement is held to be an usurpation of provincial constitutional powers, when anybody states his opposition in principle to any bill, he cannot decently favour the legislation by merely waiting, under the pretext that in some hazy future, a more acceptable formula might turn up.

As a matter of fact, even that unjustifiable pretext cannot be advanced under the circumstances, because it is clear that the government is not attempting to improve fiscal arrangements in the manner indicated by Conservative members from Quebec before the last election. As a matter of fact, by failing, as we have tried to point out on many occasions on this side of the house, to call a real conference of premiers, which could take decisions in this matter, and by organizing a series of meetings of officials who cannot even discuss the true issues, because they have not enough authority to do so, the government reveals its desire to multiply delays, without seeking a new solution, so as to avoid too much embarrassment to certain provincial premiers.

It is indeed rather improbable, Mr. Speaker, that an entirely new solution can be found which would be acceptable to all the governments concerned, or even that fundamental aspects of the present fiscal arrangements might be improved, in view of the divergent interests and attitudes of the various provinces and the federal government. From the viewpoint of the provinces, the best way to improve those arrangements would, as I said a few moments ago, consist in widening the area within which provincial governments may apply their rights of direct taxation without resorting to double taxation. Besides, that is the kind of improvement that all provincial premiers did propose, except, of course, Mr. Duplessis, who proposed nothing definite at the conference of November 1957, which, as we all know, was adjourned after two days, and it is the kind of improvement that the federal government refuses, in spite of everything and everybody, notwithstanding the requests made from this side of the house, to reconvene the provinces in order to discuss and consider that matter.

As we know, the field within which the provinces may exercise their rights without imposing double taxation, amounted last year to 13 per cent of the personal income tax, to 9 per cent of profits, or about 24 per cent of the corporation federal tax and finally, to 50 per cent of federal estate tax. It should not be overlooked, however, and that is the important point, that the rate of 13 per cent on personal income tax does not change every year with the rate of the federal tax. Under present arrangements, it is 13 per cent of the federal tax, as determined in 1956, so that the field of taxation exclusively entrusted to the provinces increases as the federal tax decreases, but it decreases, on the other hand, as the federal tax increases.

During the 1957 election campaign the Conservative party promised to treat both the provinces and the municipalities with generosity. It pledged itself, on behalf of the federal government, to vacate a greater part of the direct taxation field, in order to allow the provinces to better utilize that source of income without increasing the total burden of taxation.

We recall that the arrangements, as set up by the Liberals, were on the basis of 10-9-50, but that the premier of Ontario, who claimed he was certain to obtain what he wanted if the Conservatives came into power in 1957, demanded a 15-15-50 arrangement. But what happened, Mr. Speaker? In January 1958, the Conservative government, facing a new election, took a very timid step in the direction it had promised to follow, and raised from 10 to 13 per cent the provincial share of the federal tax on personal incomes.

Today, the government puts forward a measure aimed merely at extending for a further year the arrangement made in 1958. That is the purpose of the amendment now before the house.

However, there is another angle to the situation, and it is one which should not be overlooked, because it does reveal the present government's true attitude on the problem of sharing direct taxes. Last year, as I said, the provinces received 13 per cent of the federal tax on personal incomes, in accordance with the figure set in 1956. On the other hand, the federal government this year increased the rate of its tax on personal incomes, and as a result will be receiving, on an annual basis, approximately $130 million more than last year. However, the share of the provinces remains the same, because it is still based on the year 1956. The upshot of all this is that in 1959-60, the federal government will be increasing its share of the tax on personal incomes over last year's figure and, as a result, the provinces will have to be satisfied with a much smaller share than last year in that field of taxation.

However, that is not all. It will be recalled that under the tax arrangements introduced by the Liberals, 9 per cent of corporation profits went to the provinces, while 38 per cent of those profits went to the federal government. The provincial share was therefore about 24 per cent of the federal share. The Conservatives made no change to that situation last year. This year, however, the federal government raised the tax on corporation profits by 3 points. Now, what does this mean? It means that the share granted exclusively to the provinces remains at 9 per cent of profits, whereas the federal government share is now raised to 41 per cent. The provincial share in this field, therefore, is now only 22 per cent of the federal share.

Before the 1958 election, the federal government had thus done something in favour of the provinces. But that like so many other things done by this government, was to a very large extent purely electoral and, once the election was over, the federal government quickly took to a course diametrically opposite to the one that it had solemnly pledged to follow.

I do say now—and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) himself will correct me if I am wrong—that the federal government will receive this year a larger proportion of the revenues from direct taxation than it would have received on the basis of the taxation rates established by the former federal administration.

It is true that we must not expect the Conservative government to do all it has pledged to do during its first years of administration. We already have heard that we should learn to wait. We should learn to be patient. But we have a right to ask, at least, that the government aim its policy in the direction that it has pledged to follow. Well, it is precisely the contrary that is happening now. Having pledged to aim its policy in this direction, the government follows another course. How can we trust a government that says one thing and acts differently? And, I might add, not only in the field of taxation, but in many other fields. How can the government be sincere in organizing meetings, the sole purpose of which can only be to give more room to the provinces in the field of direct taxation, when it decides, even before those meetings are held, to take a larger share in this field?

In fact, the new attitude of the federal government in the field of federal-provincial relations becomes increasingly clear since the budget speech of the Minister of Finance. As I have said earlier, the Minister of Finance has announced at that time that he would take from now on a larger share of the revenues from direct taxation. Such is the inevitable effect of the tax increases which were then decreed.

However, the Minister of Finance has gone further, he has decreed his own new formula. Here is a statement he made in a speech delivered at the Seigniory Club on May 26 last:

(Text):

One reason for bringing the budget this year into better balance was our desire to reduce the heavy pressure of new federal government borrowings on the bond market and on the interest rate structure and to leave more for essential financing by provincial and municipal governments and business.

(Translation):

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance then stated that the federal government had decided to levy further taxes in order to allow municipalities and provinces to borrow more. Such is the new deal the Conservative government suggested to the provinces at that time. The government tells them: "Borrow,—borrow more; as for me, I shall tax". The government takes up more space in the taxation field so as to leave municipalities and provinces a wider range in the borrowing field. What it doesn't say, however, is that it is not costing the government any more to tax more, while thanks to its monetary policy, borrowing becomes every day more costly to the provinces and the municipalities.

As may be noted, Mr. Speaker, the election promises made by the Conservative party in the field of fiscal relations in 1957 and 1958 have been completely disallowed. The Conservative government, far from treating the provinces with more generosity than did the Liberals, as it had promised, takes over a greater share of direct taxation. It completely ignores the concrete proposals put forward by the majority of provincial premiers in November 1957. More than that, it even refuses to meet them again.

It is for all those reasons that the Conservative members from Quebec should now have the courage of their convictions and denounce such betrayal. They must do so, in the name of their principles; they must do so on account of the solemn pledge they made during the last federal election; they must do so for the sake of their electors to whom they gave that pledge, but they must do so also, and perhaps above all, on account of Mr. Duplessis, who is responsible for their presence here in the house.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) spoken before in this debate?

Mr. Regier: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: If I can get the attention of the house—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Chevrier: Did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) want to say something?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was going to ask if the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was moving the adjournment of this debate?

Mr. Speaker: I asked the hon. member if he had spoken before in the debate. It seemed to me that he had spoken on May 6.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is my hon. friend speaking on this subject?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Evidently I shall not have the opportunity tonight.

Mr. Speaker: We will deal with this matter when it comes up again.

FINANCE

STATEMENT ON RECENT TREASURY BILL ISSUE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): May I ask the leave of the house to revert to motions for the purpose of making a brief announcement which I am prompted to make by reason of the interest in the subject expressed yesterday by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) in a question he asked on orders of the day. I have very much pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in announcing to the house that—

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. minister leave of the house to make the announcement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the announcement—

Mr. Caron: No. Mr. Speaker, you asked for the permission of the house and I refuse to give my permission.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In that event, Mr. Speaker, the announcement will simply have to be made outside the house. I was asked yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition to make an announcement on the subject in the house, and I am endeavouring to do that. If I am precluded from doing so, the nature of the announcement is such that it will have to be made now outside the house. It could not be made earlier, and therefore I am in that position. As the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) is not prepared to accord me permission to revert to motions for the purpose of making this very short announcement, then the announcement will have to be made outside the house. I am entirely in the hon. member's hands.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask for the unanimous consent on this side of the house to allow the announcement to be made?

Mr. Speaker: Under the circumstances, will the house give the minister leave to make the announcement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caron: I will still oppose it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the announcement is brief. I have much pleasure in informing the house that on our invitation for tenders for one-year treasury bills which closed at five o'clock this afternoon the offering of up to $200 million has been very heavily oversubscribed. The full $200 million has accordingly been allotted. The average price is $94.780 and the equivalent yield 5.492 per cent.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the house, of course, will be pleased at the acceptance of the minister's requirements, but it is obvious that there seems to be a very heavy discount with respect to price, and the effective rate is exceedingly high for the short term. I was wondering if the minister could inform the house whether or not these bills would be eligible for deposit by the commercial banks for the central bank for their reserve requirements, whereas the short term bonds which are offered for suggested conversion would not be so eligible for that deposit.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, we will look at the implications of the minister's announcement and we expect we will have a number of words to say on it at the time of interim supply. I should like to point out as a question of privilege that on May 6 last I entered the debate only on a point of order, and I did not in any way participate in the debate.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Finance would reply to the question I raised as to whether or not the treasury bills would be allowed as reserves for the chartered banks unlike my understanding that the 2½ per cent 1959 bonds invited for conversion would not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the leader of the house what will be the business for tomorrow? I presume the house leader will realize that we have co-operated to the fullest extent today and got through with a great deal of business. I hope he will do likewise with us in the business he has to announce.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall commence with interim supply and then take third reading of the national energy bill; following that, second reading of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act; then second reading of the act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act; then item No. 17 on today's order paper, the resolution providing for additional judges; item No. 12, a resolution preceding an amendment affecting pensions for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; item No. 11, a resolution concerning the Defence Services Pension Act and item No. 14, a resolution concerning the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We close tomorrow at six.

Mr. Green: I was hoping the hon. member would be away. On Thursday, unless third reading of the national energy bill has not been concluded, we will take estimates commencing with the estimates of the Department of Public Works, and then those of the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. Chevrier: May I presume on the house leader's good will and ask him if he would indicate what we will do on Monday.

Mr. Green: The intention is to take a one-day supply motion. This again is provided that the national energy bill has gone through.

Mr. Argue: With the vote at 8:15?

Mr. Green: That is the understanding.

It being seven minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

STARRED QUESTIONS

BOARD OF REFEREES CHAIRMAN, UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION, TORONTO

Question No. 88—Mr. Hellyer:

1. Has the chairman of the board of referees of the unemployment insurance commission at Toronto been relieved of his duties?
2. If so, what was the reason for his dismissal?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker there are five chairmen of the board of referees in the city of Toronto. If the hon. member will be good enough to submit the name of the referee to whom he refers, we shall then be in a position to answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Question stands.

R.C.M.P. PENSION PAYMENTS SINCE 1945

Question No. 95—Mr. Howard:

On January 1, 1945 and for the same date of each subsequent year how many, if any, former Royal Canadian Mounted Police were receiving pensions under (a) part 2; (b) part 3; (c) part 5, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, and of these, how many recipients pursuant to part 3 were covered by the provisions of part 4?

R.C.M.P. WIDOWS' AND CHILDREN'S PENSION PAYMENTS SINCE 1945

Question No. 96—Mr. Howard:

On January 1, 1945 and for the same date of each subsequent year, how many (a) widows; (b) children, of former Royal Canadian Mounted Police were receiving pensions under (i) part 2; (ii) part 4; (iii) part 5, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether by leave of the house I might deal with Nos. 95 and 96 together. On Wednesday last the hon. member asked three somewhat similar questions, to which I gave answers. At that time I expressed a reservation as to whether or not it was appropriate that these questions involving long statistical answers should be asked at this stage of our proceedings. However, these two questions call for answers which will complete the information requested and therefore, subject to the same reservation, I would be glad if I might have permission to table the answers, which are purely statistical, so they could appear in Hansard at this point.

Mr. Speaker: I take it the minister would like to have them printed in Hansard at this point?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreeable to hon. members that the answers be printed in Hansard at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES SHARE OF DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

Question No. 98—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Have any steps been taken since March 31, 1958, to place a more equitable share of defence contract expenditures within the Atlantic provinces?
2. If so, what are those steps, and what has been their effect?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of this question is yes, steps have been taken since March 31, 1958 to place a more equitable share of defence contract expenditures within the Atlantic provinces. The answer to the second question, describing these steps and their effect, involves a fairly extended explanation which I had planned to give when the estimates of my department were dealt with in committee. However, since the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has chosen to raise this matter I am quite prepared to deal with it now or, if it is agreeable to the house, to have the answer printed in Hansard.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that the answer be read.

Mr. Speaker: I take it this is a rather extensive answer, is it?

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that perhaps the answer is longer than is contemplated by the rules, and that if he would permit, it be printed in Hansard.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be quite agreeable, sir.

[Editor's note: The answer referred to above is as follows]

The member for Bonavista-Twillingate may recall that when he raised a similar question in the estimates committee last July, I informed him that the matter was under study but there had been no over-all change in departmental procedure. I can now add to this that there is unlikely to be any over-all change in our procedures, but we have found it possible within the existing system to improve the Atlantic provinces' share of defence contract expenditure.

My department continues to rely, wherever possible, on country wide competition to obtain the best value for the money spent and to provide an opportunity for all competent and interested Canadian suppliers to compete for defence supplies. There is no policy of discrimination either in favour of or against any particular area. Suppliers in the Atlantic provinces are given no more than an equal opportunity to compete for orders awarded on this basis, but may enjoy a transportation advantage in cases where delivery is required to the large supply depots at Halifax and Moncton.

Other types of requirements, for which competitive tendering is not practical, involve some degree of allocation, and in respect of some of these it has been possible to give special attention to the capabilities of the region. The outstanding example of this is to be found in the field of shipbuilding and ship repairing. One of the six destroyer escorts in the new program will be built in the region, and in addition the bulk of the ship repairing contracts awarded since March 31, 1958 have gone to yards in the Atlantic provinces. These awards, of course, are made on the recommendation of the Canadian maritime commission.

Regional facilities have also been considered carefully in the award of contracts for repair and overhaul of service equipment.

For example, all airframe repair and overhaul for aircraft operating in the Atlantic region is performed by regional firms, except in the case of Argus aircraft, where a modification program is involved requiring the use of the manufacturer's facilities. It must also be recognized that a number of our large prime contractors have subcontracted to Atlantic province firms, with the approval of my department. More recently, in connection with the production sharing program, we have been drawing the resources of the region to the attention of United States contractors and will continue to do so.

A substantial portion of our procurement of general supplies and services is undertaken by the 14 district offices of the department, three of which are situated in the Atlantic provinces. During the past year or two we have placed greater emphasis on the use by these offices of local sources of supply, with the result that the great bulk of their orders are now placed with firms within the Atlantic region. The value of district office purchases within the region reached an all-time high, in the last fiscal year, of over $15 million, compared with $13.6 million in the previous year. I might add that expenditures on all other procurement contracts with firms in the region amounted to $21.8 million, compared with $16.4 million in the previous year. Expenditures on procurement in the Atlantic provinces have therefore shown a general increase of more than 20 per cent in the past year, although total procurement expenditures by the department fell by 6 per cent over the same period.

Defence construction expenditures are additional to all this. It will be appreciated that the geographic impact of construction spending is governed essentially by the location of the works involved. Because of the number of defence establishments within the Atlantic provinces, a sizeable proportion of our construction and maintenance activity continues to take place within that region. Since March 31, 1958 contracts awarded for construction and maintenance in the Atlantic provinces have amounted to $22½ million, representing more than 22 per cent of the total awards for the period.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ALLEGED INTERFERENCE BY HOUSE LEADER WITH COMMITTEE MEETINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the house leader, and ask him if it is a fact that the house leader has interfered with meetings of the committee on mines and forests. I have had shown to me the minutes of yesterday's meeting, a portion of which read as follows:

Upon instructions from the house leader—

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Chevrier:

—the meeting is adjourned because the members are required in the house.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member allow me to hear the point of order?

Mr. Fulton: I am not aware as to whether or not this committee has yet reported to the house. Perhaps it has, although I do not believe that it has. If it has not, then I believe I am correct in saying it is out of order to refer to its proceedings at this stage.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, the question is not whether or not the committee has presented its report; the question is whether or not instructions were given to a committee to have the members come into the house, contrary to the discussion which we had yesterday. The question I ask is this. Did the minister, in accordance with the minutes of the meeting, give instructions to the chairman to adjourn the meeting because the members were required in the house at that time?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): The answer to that question is no. At one stage yesterday afternoon we needed reinforcements and I gave instructions to the whip to round up members wherever he could get them. It may be that that is how this question came up.

FINANCE

CAPE BRETON—REPOSSESSION OF HOUSEHOLD ESSENTIALS BY LOAN COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of a further telegram I have received from Mr. William H. Marsh, president of district 26, united mine workers of America and in which he says that Industrial Acceptance Corporation and Trader's Finance Company are the companies in question that have been seizing household articles of unemployed workers in Cape Breton. My question to the minister is this. Will the minister inquire into the situation? Will the minister consider the facts? Will the government consider taking appropriate action?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is already aware, from the conversations that have been held today, of the fact that no company under federal jurisdiction is involved in the complaints that have been made by Mr. Marsh. No licensed lender under federal jurisdiction is involved. The two companies he has mentioned and whose names were mentioned in the course of the inquiry today are companies which are engaged in the business of instalment sales financing and are not under federal jurisdiction.

Mr. Argue: In the light of the facts I have brought to the minister's attention, will the government give consideration to introducing legislation to bring such companies under federal jurisdiction in the same way that small loans companies are now dealt with?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is obvious that the question raises serious constitutional questions. I think the hon. gentleman's question should be directed to the provincial authorities.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, if I may I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is the Minister of Finance aware of the fact that the deputy minister of justice a few years ago gave it as his opinion that the federal government could have jurisdiction in this field by passing appropriate legislation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Speaker; I am not aware of that.

Mr. Argue: You were a member of the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Having been a member of the committee, I think I would want to have something more than my hon. friend's reference to a legal opinion on an important question given from his recollection of some years ago before basing any statement on it in the House of Commons, if he will permit me to say so.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to send the minister evidence of what I have just said.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

CHIPPEWA INDIAN RESERVE, SARNIA—LAND DISPOSAL—SALE OF LAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Can the minister say when the papers respecting the sale of part of the Chippewa reserve at Sarnia will be available?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when this order was passed I told the hon. member that it would take some time to procure copies of those papers. It is quite a voluminous file. I think it will be at least another two weeks.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister say when the contract of Dimensional Investments Limited for the purchase of part of the said lands will be tabled?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, I think that contract could be secured before the other papers. I will look into the matter.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

OTTAWA—DEMOLITION OF BUILDING TO PROVIDE PARKING AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct to the Minister of Public Works a question of which I regret not having sent him notice. If notice is required, perhaps the minister could take this as notice. Has the Minister of Public Works noted the report in the press that the old Free Press building formerly occupied by the film board in Ottawa is being demolished in order to make a parking area for the Bank of Canada? If this is so, this being in a high rent area of Ottawa, will the Minister of Public Works inform the house how much it cost for acquisition and demolition of the building, and also the cost of establishing a parking area?

Mr. Speaker: I would suggest that the hon. member put the question on the order paper, as it is asking for statistical information which cannot be given offhand.

Mr. Winch: The question is based on a report in the press yesterday.

[Later:]

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Public Works, and I am keeping in mind what you said. Are press reports correct that the old Free Press building in Ottawa is being torn down to make way for a parking lot for the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member in his second attempt does not seem to have got much further, because he is simply asking for verification of a press report; and if he refers to Beauchesne he will see it is not the type of question which is in order on orders of the day.

Mr. Winch: Then may I ask the minister if it is correct that the old Free Press building is being torn down to make a parking lot for the Bank of Canada?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member certainly deserves full marks for his persistence. I will be very glad to make inquiries.

Mr. Winch: The minister also deserves full marks.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

WELLAND CANAL—REPORTED PROTESTS RESPECTING IMPOSITION OF TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of two strong protests from Premier Frost of Ontario, followed by those of Hon. Charles Daley and others, that tolls on the Welland ship canal have made lake Ontario a toll-locked lake and have created a ridiculous distortion in the pattern of costs of moving commodities to lake Ontario destinations, could the minister say whether he himself has taken up the matter with the cabinet, as he is reported to have promised last Saturday at Port Weller, and can we anticipate an early announcement with regard to this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not want to limit questions unduly, but it seems to me that the hon. member is asking about a matter concerning meetings of the cabinet, which are confidential and privileged; it is not a matter which can be asked about in the house. Beyond that, the question raises a matter of policy which is hardly appropriate to be dealt with at this time.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to intervene and point out to you that the matter is of importance and urgency in the constituency of Welland. The point has arisen because of representations which are alleged to have been made and which the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated, at a public meeting which took place less than two days ago, that he too would make. It does seem to me that the hon. member is in order in asking the minister what he nas done about it. That is in effect the purport of the question.

Mr. Speaker: Unfortunately that was not the question asked. I am sure the hon. member could phrase a question on that subject which would be in order, but as it is expressed at the moment it cannot be accepted.

Mr. Chevrier: Then may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and ask him if, following the representations which he is alleged to have received when he was addressing the meeting recently, he has protested the imposition of tolls on the Welland canal, and whether he did carry these representations further and made them to his colleagues?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, that is a highly involved and tortuous supplementary question. I hope the hon. member for Laurier will get the facts straight before he asks another question.

[Later:]

Mr. W. H. McMillan: I wish to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Did the minister receive representations against tolls on the Welland canal last Saturday at Port Weller?

Mr. Churchill: The answer is no.

[Mr. McMillan.]

AGRICULTURE

MILK—SUPPLEMENTARY PAYMENTS ON SHIPMENTS TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

As a result of a statement made recently by the Minister of Agriculture regarding the Agricultural Stabilization Act, there is some confusion among milk producers. Here is my question: If a producer ships milk or cream to a retailer in Montreal or in any other city, is he eligible for a deficiency payment? If not, why should he keep shipping his milk to that retailer if he can get a deficiency payment of 25 cents per hundred pounds by sending it to a milk powder, butter or cheese manufacturer?

(Text):

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, to begin with there is no such thing as a deficiency payment as far as milk is concerned. There is a payment, a flat payment which is not a deficiency payment, of 25 cents per 100 pounds of whole milk delivered for manufacturing purposes.

The situation essentially is this. A man who is delivering cream for butter making is in exactly the same position as he was during the year previous to May 1 of this year, and should be receiving exactly the same price. The milk producer who is delivering fluid milk for consumption and who is thus receiving the fluid milk price, which runs from 75 to 100 per cent more than the price for manufacturing milk, is not eligible to receive the 25 cents per 100 pounds payment. Producers who deliver their milk for manufacturing purposes are eligible, however, for this payment of 25 cents per 100 pounds of whole milk delivered.

TRANSPORT

GREAT SLAVE LAKE—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION OF RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I wonder if the Prime Minister is now prepared to answer the question I asked on Monday, and again on Tuesday, with regard to the extension of the railway to Great Slave lake.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The question of Monday and Tuesday will be answered on Thursday.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

That towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1960, the sum of $634,617,069.94 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in the committee of supply.

That a sum not exceeding $634,617,069.94 being the aggregate of

(a) one-sixth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1960, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parlament, $606,770,511.84;

(b) seven-twelfths of the total of the amounts of items 66 and 102 of the said estimates; $350,000.00;

(c) one-third of the total of the amounts of items 136 and 263 of the said estimates; $824,276.67;

(d) one-sixth of the total of the amounts of items 25, 133 and 358 of the said estimates, $1,492,983.34;

(e) one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of items 6, 27, 161, 190, 191, 192, 194, 196, 200, 204, 205, 210 and 282 of the said estimates, $5,090,992.42;

(f) one-sixth of the total of the amounts set forth in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1960, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $20,088,305.67; be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1960.

He said: The aggregate of the various sums which I am now asking the committee to vote by way of interim supply is $634,617,069.94.

The committee will recall that one previous vote of interim supply has been made in respect to the present fiscal year in the amount of $616,654,878.69, to provide for the expenses of government for the first two months of the fiscal year. The proportion of nearly all the items voted on that occasion was, accordingly, one-sixth. There were, however, 12 items of a rather special nature for which additional proportions were then voted.

In the present resolution the committee is asked to vote an additional one-sixth of all items, both in the main estimates and the supplementary estimates, plus additional fractions in respect of 20 items. These 20 items are, of course, of a special or seasonal nature in so far as the programs to which they relate are affected. As to those 20 items, the additional proportions vary according to the nature of the program. The maximum which will be voted, if this present resolution carries, will, in the case of no item, exceed eleven-twelfths, and there are only two items in respect of which the vote proposed today will bring the proportion appropriated to that fraction of eleven-twelfths. They are items 66 and 102. The committee accordingly retains its full right to discuss and debate all items in the estimates.

I give also, Mr. Chairman, the time-honoured undertaking that the passage of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize any item in the estimates when it comes up for consideration in committee of supply, and that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure. That undertaking, Mr. Chairman, is given, if I may remind the committee, for the purpose of avoiding duplication of debate. What is expressly acknowledged in this way protects the rights of hon. members to discuss every item when it comes up in due course in committee of supply.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the Minister of Finance and the committee, too, will be gratified to hear me say that my remarks will be brief. As far as I know, although each individual member has considerable rights under this particular resolution the official opposition, certainly through me, is not launching any major debate at this stage. We recognize that while three departments of the government have already passed through the committee of supply, it happens that in the supplementary estimates there are items with respect to each of those departments and very shortly we shall be discussing all the other departments in committee of supply. Therefore, as I say, we are not taking advantage of this motion to launch a debate which might be in the nature of a duplication. We want to facilitate the processes of the house in that way.

As the minister has stated, Mr. Chairman, there are one or two items that provide for more than four-twelfths of the appropriation in the book of estimates. There are just one or two on which I should like a little more information. I was wondering about item 66. As the minister has stated, we are here providing eleven-twelfths of the year's appropriation for the item with respect to additional service to the Indians of British Columbia. I wondered whether the minister would just put on the record a little more information in that respect. Then I would be a little curious about item 358. It is the public works item, general. The reason is that it seems early in the season to be asking for more than a normal advance on this item because it is entitled, "Balances re building projects undertaken in previous fiscal years for which no specific provision is made in fiscal year 1959-60." I wonder whether the minister would just give us the detail on this item.

While we are getting reminders of the items that we have to make appropriation for in stages, I think none the less all of us recognize that even these fractions are for very considerable sums. We see now why the supplementary estimates were introduced the other day. It makes it possible for the minister also to obtain one-sixth of each of the items in the $120 million of supplementaries. But when we compare the first supplementaries of this year with those of last year, we are comparing $120 million with $58 million. This means an increase of $62 million in the first stage of the supplementaries, and we all know that when we compare the main estimates of this year with those of last year they show an increase of $416 million. Therefore when we take these two first stages of appropriations through the estimates we can see that as of this short period of time in the new year we have an increase of $478 million in over-all expenditures.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I realize it is usual to have a rather limited debate take place at the resolution stage having to do with interim supply. However, we are unable to ignore the fact that the minister is asking for a little in excess of half a billion dollars to be voted.

We have a matter which in our opinion is rather urgent at this time. For years now it has been the habit of the house to delay the estimates of the Minister of Finance until very near the end of the session. Since the interim supply bill has to do at least in a measure with the estimates of the Minister of Finance, including the estimate providing for the administrative expenses of the department he heads, I feel that I have to raise a matter that we consider of urgent national public importance at this time. It has to do with the policies now being pursued by the minister in regard to the management of the debt of the government of Canada.

I would like immediately to express our understanding of and our sympathy with the problems of the minister. This year he has to raise on the money markets on behalf of the government of Canada by way of loans an amount in excess of $2,000 million. This is a very large amount for any year excepting a year of war. We realize what are the minister's responsibilities. In the first place, he has to get the people of Canada or elsewhere to express enough confidence in the government to lend him another $2,000 million in this one year. He also has to assure the Canadian economy that its credit needs are going to be met. He has to assure that out of the available investment money, in addition to the $2,000 million that he himself needs, enough will be left over to meet the needs of Canadian enterprise and of provincial and municipal governments as well as of individuals who need credit.

We also realize that, apart from the minister's responsibility, in addition to getting in excess of $2,000 million for the federal government, and in addition to assuring that all the other credit needs of Canada, municipal, provincial, industrial and personal will be met, the overriding desire of the minister is to restore and maintain public confidence in our monetary system.

I could use various terms or forms of language in making my appeal to the minister. I could appeal to him in the language of one ex-Sunday school superintendent to another ex-Sunday school superintendent. However, I realize immediately that the minister would say that what we say on Sunday does not necessarily hold on a cold and frosty Monday morning.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have never said that.

Mr. Regier: I might use the language of the Marxists and attempt to educate the minister as to some of the teachings of Karl Marx. However, I realize that would not be of very much value in this house under present conditions. Therefore I shall do my utmost to express our opinions in the minister's own language. I hope it will not be the language of Bay street or St. James street but the language of ordinary, patriotic Canadians. I should like to say that we have abiding confidence in the ultimate wisdom of the electorate of Canada.

I should like to refer to an announcement the minister made last night respecting the result of the bids on his latest treasury bill offering. Yesterday the minister announced that he had been able to borrow $200 million. That is less than 10 per cent of the amount he will have to borrow in the current fiscal year. He announced that the price obtained for one year treasury bills was $94.78 per $100, which produces a yield to those who invested of 5.492 per cent. In other words the Minister of Finance admitted that in order to borrow $200 million for the government of Canada for a period of one year he had to pay an effective interest rate of 5½ per cent, or very nearly that, on a one-year federal government issue.

I know the minister likes to sugar coat the pill, and he has used a number of devices. He called this an issue of treasury bills when in fact it was an issue of bonds. To all intents and purposes and for all practical purposes it is a one year government bond. However, I suppose the minister, acting on behalf of the people of Canada, had the idea that he might get a better rate by calling it a treasury bill rather than a bond.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The two things are quite different.

Mr. Regier: He admitted that it was something new in Canadian government financial history to issue a treasury bill with a duration of 365 days when treasury bills are usually of 90 days' duration. The minister admitted further weakness in his position when he indicated that those who converted the 2½ per cent 1959 bonds for the new treasury bills would be able to collect on June 10 the payment falling due at the end of that month. In other words a 20-day bonus was given to the holders of the 2½ per cent 1959 bonds.

The minister also announced last night, in response to a question by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, that this treasury bill issue was one that might be used by the banks of Canada for deposit as a reserve with the Bank of Canada. Thereby the minister admitted that the issuance of these treasury bills was highly inflationary, in that an issue was being made that might be used for purposes of reserve with the Bank of Canada, replacing in effect a bond issue that was not acceptable for reserve purposes by the Bank of Canada.

Our complaint is that the minister is facing increasing difficulties and that in the light of that situation he is doing nothing about it. He is burying his head in the sand and, as far as we know, the government is not contemplating any action to head off the crisis that is approaching. The government seems to think that by a little bit of sugar coating, such as making bonds acceptable at par on June 10 when they should only be acceptable on June 30; such as making the new bonds acceptable by the Bank of Canada for reserve purposes, replacing bonds that were not acceptable; such as calling a bond a treasury bill rather than a bond, and by hiding our heads in the sand we may be able to avoid the growing crisis in the matter of government financing. The government, as far as we now know, is placing its undying faith in the money market place and hoping that events and circumstances will rescue it from the dilemma in which it now is.

I read in the newspaper this morning that at North Bay last night the Prime Minister had recited a number of instances that to him were signs of the return of prosperity to the Canadian economy. I know the Prime Minister is equally aware that he might also have used all kinds of figures, facts and statistics to prove exactly the opposite of the main tenor of his remarks last night. On a number of occasions we have asked the government to produce evidence of the return of prosperity to the Canadian economic scene, and we have received very vague replies indeed. For every instance of a return to a growing prosperity that the government is able to report, the opposition is equally able to record other enterprises in Canada that are on the downgrade at the present time.

One of the main evidences of a return to economic prosperity put forward by the minister over the past several months has been the demand being made at the present time on the resources of the banks. The remarks of the minister have had a strange uniformity. A number of us are asking ourselves, who is making all these demands on the banks now? Is it possibly the government itself which is absorbing all the available resources of the banks at the present time, or is there really a grass roots expansion of the economy and are Canadian enterprises really asking for additional loans from the banks with which to expand?

When I look at the rate of interest the minister announced last night I can appreciate that the banks might not be very interested in making any loans to Canadian industrial enterprises, that the banks might not be very interested in helping the Canadian economy expand. After all, if banks are able to make their resources available to the Minister of Finance and obtain a rate of interest of 5.5 per cent, why should the banks be interested in any way, shape or form in making their money available to Canadian enterprises at the maximum rate of 6 per cent?

I am referring now particularly to a fear that is rather widespread that the government of the day may very soon be seeking the authorization of parliament to amend the Bank Act. I have in my hand a copy of the Toronto Telegram for the day before yesterday, and the headline on the business and financial page is "Would boost rate on Bank and N.H.A. loans". I know the minister will agree with me that if he has to pay 5.5 per cent on one year treasury bills, he cannot possibly very long delay permission to the banks of Canada to raise the maximum allowable interest rate. He cannot very long delay the day when the maximum interest rate will be raised under the National Housing Act. He cannot very long delay the day when the maximum interest rate allowable under the Canadian farm loan board, as well as many other enterprises, will have to be raised. He cannot delay the day much longer, unless he changes his approach to the basic problem of public financing, when he will have to raise interest rates for all the major segments of the Canadian economy.

I realize that the Minister of Finance is possibly the most important man in the government, Mr. Chairman. I realize that the government must have a front, a showman at the head of it. However, over the years it has been hammered home to the Canadian electorate that the real man guiding the destinies of all of us is the federal Minister of Finance. Why our Prime Minister decided to select one of the most orthodox, one of the most faithful of men, who subscribes to the outmoded and discredited economic and financial policies, as Minister of Finance is beyond me. We have seen how month after month the tension has been mounting. We know our Prime Minister is a progressive. We know he is a westerner. We know he is willing to experiment, that he is willing to explore the unknown. We know, Mr. Chairman, that he was even able to take the remains of a completely dead Conservative movement and catapult it into office. However, why he ever decided to select as the most important minister in the government a man who is dedicated to pursuing outmoded and outworn economic policies is beyond our comprehension.

Mr. Henderson: He should have got you; you are the smart guy.

Mr. Regier: I know the minister is willing to concede—

Mr. Henderson: You are from B.C., a real wizard.

Mr. Regier: —that if we are going to relieve unemployment in Canada, if we are going to maintain economic prosperity, our economy has to grow. There is no such thing as standing still. Our economy must expand. I also know that if we are going to follow a policy of aiding production we will have to develop markets, and in this day and age the development of markets is going to cost us money. The other day the Prime Minister announced that there was $10 million available for flour here and so many million dollars available for milk products there. The development of markets to meet growing production is going to mean more money from the federal government.

Hitherto we have relied on investors in the United States for the expansion of our economy, with the result that our dollar is worth more than the United States dollar. This is imposing a hardship on all our exporters, and it is also imposing a hardship on Canadian manufacturing enterprises. Our reliance on the United States is going to cost us a great deal in the years ahead. Indeed, it has already proven very expensive in so far as earnings are concerned in the form of dividends, profits and interest. The interest on what we owed south of the border last year took over a billion dollars away from Canadian production. I know the minister realizes that the all expansion of the Canadian economy has to come from the production of Canadian workers, out of unused production here, out of the savings of the people of our own land. We should like at this time to appeal to the minister for a little bit of leadership in order that we might eventually be masters of our own destiny.

Our proposal in this regard is that the minister, in the first place, should admit that he is in serious difficulty.

I should like to see him make a confession to the people of Canada. We realize that he alone is not responsible. Other governments and other ministers before his day have also added to the situation. Rather than to make a gamble or a play with the future welfare of the Canadian economy and the lives of our Canadian workers we should like to see him make a confession and the confession would say in effect that our riches have not expanded with the growth of the country. Our Canadian economy has expanded but, unlike the wise parent, we have failed to supply the boy with a new pair of britches annually and now in many parts of his anatomy the young lad is exposed and is at the mercy of others. Advantage is now being taken of our predicament.

I am sure that no Conservative regime in other areas of the British commonwealth would place such faith in the money market as our minister is doing. The investors of Canada are not misled. They are men who know what they are doing. They know that they have the minister over a barrel, and they know that they can extract even more blood than they are obtaining right now. That is why the minister yesterday was obliged to pay almost 5½ per cent on a one-year issue of the federal government. I had a phone call out of the municipality of Coquitlam over the noon hour and learned that they were able to issue 20-year bonds and all they have to pay is an effective rate of 6.3 per cent. I asked the municipal clerk what was the reason for that. He said that after the let-down which the people of Canada have experienced at the hands of the federal government over the years, you cannot blame the investors of Canada for having almost as much faith—in effect it is a greater expression of a faith—in the issue of a municipal government as they have in an issue being placed on the market by the Minister of Finance.

Anyone who knows anything about the investment field at all knows that a 6.3 per cent rate on a 20-year issue is in effect a lower rate than a 5.49 per cent rate on a one-year issue that has the backing of the federal government. We have therefore now arrived at the stage where the investors of Canada are expressing greater confidence and faith in our municipal governments and in our provincial governments than they are expressing in our present Minister of Finance.

We say that the investors are not misled. We say that the people are lacking in faith in the government of the day. We say that it is high time that there be an assessment of the credit needs of the Canadian nation, the federal government, all other levels of government, all levels of Canadian enterprise and of individuals. We should like at this time to ask the Minister of Finance this question. He has now financed a tenth of his needs for this year. What plans has he in mind to meet his needs for the rest of the year? How in the world is he going to be able to borrow $1,800 million more or less at an adequate rate of interest?

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take very many minutes of the time of the committee but I want to refer to interest rates. On Monday when questions were being asked the Minister of Finance regarding the current treasury bill rate, as reported at page 4192 of Hansard I asked him this question:

> Is the minister aware that the highest United States short term treasury bill rate is 3 per cent, while our own exceeds 5 per cent, a differential of over 2 per cent?

Then the minister replied as follows:

> With respect, Mr. Speaker, a very misleading impression has been left by the observation which the hon. gentleman has just made, and I would ask the opportunity to set that right. Evidently the hon. member is not aware of the situation with respect to treasury bill rates in the United States. I happen to have them with me in a statement which reached my desk only today. On the 340 day bills in the United States the rate is 3.835 per cent average; on the 220 day bills it is 3.565 per cent average, and on the 1 year certificates, the 4 per cent coupon is offered on a 4.05 per cent basis.

The minister is right except that he has assumed his old trick of comparing apples with oranges, as he did when he tabled the estimates for this year. He compared this year's estimates with last year's estimates plus the supplementary estimates plus supplementary estimates No. 1 and supplementary estimates No. 2. When I asked him the question my reference was to the 91 day treasury bills and not to the treasury bills for six months, 220 days or over seven months or to those running one year or slightly under one year.

Mr. Benidickson: Short term treasury bills.

Mr. McMillan: For treasury bills those are considered to be long term. In the financial papers on Saturday—I do not want to read them but I have them here—it is stated that Canada had to pay 5¼ per cent for 91 day loans while the United States government needs to pay only 3 per cent for 91 day or short term borrowings in treasury bills, and that in the United States it is expected that the supply of short term money will increase this year, thus forcing down interest rates in that country.

I learned from the Bank of Canada that Canada had sold six months treasury bills to yield 5.26 per cent. In comparing the last sales of 91 day treasury bills in the United States and ours I find that Canada on May 22 sold treasury bills to yield 5.05 per cent and that the United States on May 25—three days later—sold treasury bills that yielded 2.88 per cent, which showed a differential of 2.17 per cent.

I realize that last week—and I have heard it since—the Bank of Canada obtained a more favourable rate than the 5.05 per cent, that the rate had gone down to slightly under 5 per cent and that in the United States it went up slightly. Therefore that differential could be decreased. But I was certainly surprised to hear the minister announce with some pride last night that this treasury bill loan was over subscribed. I wondered why it would not be over subscribed with such a high rate of interest of almost 5½ per cent. I was wondering if this would augur well for our provinces, our municipalities, our school boards and business organizations generally having to borrow money here in Canada. They will certainly have to pay a much higher interest rate.

In the financial press last Saturday I saw two or three references to the banks crediting the terrific spread between interest rates in Canada and those in the United States to the ballooning of the Canadian dollar premium. One report said that more money was coming in from the United States to Canada for investment in projects for high interest rates, and that tends to keep up the premium. According to Mr. Ambridge of the Abitibi Power and Paper Company, this makes it very hard for primary producers to sell their products in the United States. He goes on to say that each one cent increase in the premium slashes the income of our newspaper industry alone by more than $6 million a year.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the committee, but I heard the previous speaker making reference to the amount of money which had to be raised or refinanced this year along with the amount of money which had to be raised on capital and current loans. I know that the minister told us in a three-hour speech that the government had nothing to do whatsoever with setting interest rates. I also recall that the minister came into the house on November 14, 1957 and told us that no previous government in Canada's history had accomplished as much in five months for the good of the people of Canada as this government, and I know a lot of hon. gentlemen here will agree with that. But in support of his thesis on that day he said he was happy to report that in the weekly issue of treasury bills at that date the government had achieved a reduction of at least two-tenths of 1 per cent. The Prime Minister also said on the hustings and in Calgary that the interest rates in this country had fallen sharply as the result of government action since last June. I would think that if both these gentlemen have any control over interest rates and have magic wands, now is the time to use them because interest rates are going up week after week. Talking of interest rates—

Mr. Chevrier: The government is not doing much about them, not even the Minister of Finance.

Mr. McMillan: —the $100 million loan of the government last February cost this government an effective interest rate of 6.6 per cent. I say that the farmer and the corner grocery man can go down and borrow money from the bank at the present time at a cheaper rate than the government did on that occasion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River asked me for some further information as to the reason why an additional fraction on items 66 and 358 is now being asked. Item 66 is an item of $100,000 described in the estimates as a grant to provide additional services to the Indians of British Columbia. I may say to him that interest in this particular program, which embraces irrigation and agricultural products, is greater than ever before. It is essentially a summer program and the bulk of the funds are expected to be spent before the end of July.

As to item 358, may I remind the house that this is an item of $800,000 described in the estimates as:

> Balances required to complete any projects undertaken in previous fiscal years and for which no specific provision is made in the fiscal year 1959-60.

May I point out, Mr. Chairman, that by its nature this vote is used in the early months of each year to complete projects carried forward from the previous fiscal year.

I also noted the remarks of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River concerning the supplementary estimates. Some reference was also made to that by other speakers. I think, Mr. Chairman, that there has been some oversight here on the part of the hon. gentlemen. It is important that the basis of comparison should be clear and fair. In comparing the non-statutory items in the 1959-60 main estimates with the 1958-59 main estimates, plus supplementary estimates Nos. 1 and 2, there was in this year's estimates, as I pointed out when tabling them in February, a decrease of $39.1 million.

Mr. Benidickson: Let us compare main with main. As somebody said, let us compare oranges with oranges.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): But let us talk about things which are controllable. I am talking about that when I draw the attention of the house to the relationship of fairly comparable items. In comparing the 1959-60 main estimates—

Mr. Benidickson: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —plus the supplementary estimates—

Mr. Benidickson: Take out the pluses.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —which I tabled on Monday, with the 1958-59 estimates plus the supplementary estimates Nos. 1 and 2, there is an increase of $15 million in non-statutory items. In comparing the 1959-60 main estimates plus the supplementary estimates which I tabled on Monday with the 1958-59 main estimates plus the supplementary estimates Nos. 1 and 2 and final supplementary estimates 1958-59, there is a decrease in 1959-60 of $267.8 million in the non-statutory items.

Mr. Hellyer: Does not the minister get confused from using so many different sets of figures?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. These are all plain figures which are on the record, if the hon. gentleman takes the trouble to analyse them.

Mr. Hellyer: To pick out the right ones.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Now, Mr. Chairman, I will direct my observations to the remarks made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. He prefaced his remarks with a statement somewhat to this effect, that he was capable of giving me some instruction in the language of Marxism. If so I must confess I have no reason to pursue him into that field. I regret to say in general of his remarks today that I have rarely heard more unadulterated nonsense talked in the House of Commons.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister says that about every speech.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): First of all, he began with the curious statement that a treasury bill and a bond are the same thing. Mr. Chairman, everybody else in the House of Commons, I am sure, knows that while these are both Canadian government obligations, they are different in their nature. A bond is an obligation put out by the government with a coupon rate set by the government. A treasury bill is an invitation by those interested to buy at a price to be stated by them in their tender. It is an obligation on the part of the government of Canada to pay them a fixed round sum at an appointed date, whether it be at the end of three months, six months, nine months, or a year, as the case may be.

The hon. gentleman then went on to—

Mr. Regier: What is the difference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If it is not apparent to the hon. gentleman, then all I can say, speaking in sorrow rather than anger, is that I think it is perfectly clear to everybody else in the house and that perhaps we had better proceed. The hon. gentleman seemed to take some satisfaction from what he said was the lack of faith on the part of the people of Canada with regard to these obligations issued by the government.

Mr. Regier: I did no such thing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I heard a great deal from him about lack of faith on the part of the Canadian people.

Mr. Regier: No satisfaction.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will simply take what comfort I think can properly be taken by the government and by hon. members of this house and I think by the great majority of the Canadian people from the fact that yesterday's invitation to subscribe and tender for treasury bills up to $200 million resulted, as I had pleasure in announcing in this house last night, in a very heavy over-subscription.

Mr. Regier: What does that mean?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It means something that evidently the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam does not understand and does not like.

Mr. Regier: I dare you to explain it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These are tenders on the part of persons who were prepared to indicate their confidence with regard to obligations to be discharged by the government of Canada one year from the date of issue.
