(d) To enter into partnership or into any arrangement for sharing of profits, union of interests, co-operation, joint adventure, reciprocal concession or otherwise, with any person or company carrying on or engaged in or about to carry on or engage in any business or transaction which the company is authorized to carry on or engage in, or any business or transaction capable of being conducted so as directly or indirectly to benefit the company; and to lend money to, guarantee the contracts of, or otherwise assist any such person or company, and to take or otherwise acquire shares and securities of any such company, and to sell, hold, re-issue, with or without guarantee, or otherwise deal with the same;

(e) To take, or otherwise acquire and hold shares in any other company having objects altogether or in part similar to those of the company or carrying on any business capable of being conducted so as directly or indirectly to benefit the company;

(f) To enter into any arrangements with any authorities, municipal, local or otherwise, that may seem conducive to the company's objects, or any of them, and to obtain from any such authority any rights, privileges and concessions which the company may think it desirable to obtain, and to carry out, exercise and comply with any such arrangements, rights, privileges and concessions;

(g) To establish and support or aid in the establishment and support of associations, institutions, funds, trusts and conveniences calculated to benefit employees or ex-employees of the company (or its predecessors in business) or the dependents or connections of such persons, and to grant pensions and allowances, and to make payments towards insurance, and to subscribe or guarantee money for charitable or benevolent objects, or for any exhibition or for any public, general or useful object;

(h) To promote any company or companies for the purpose of acquiring all or any of the property and liabilities of the company, or for any other purpose, which may seem directly or indirectly calculated to benefit the company;

(i) To purchase, take on lease or in exchange, hire or otherwise acquire, any personal property and any rights or privileges which the company may think necessary or convenient for the purposes of its business and in particular any machinery, plant, stock-in-trade;

(j) To construct, improve, maintain, work, manage, carry out or control any roads, ways, branches or sidings, bridges, reservoirs, watercourses, wharves, manufactories, warehouses, electric works, shops, stores and other works and conveniences which may seem calculated directly or indirectly to advance the company's interests, and to contribute to, subsidize or otherwise assist or take part in the construction, improvement, maintenance, working, management, carrying out or control thereof;

(k) To lend money to customers and others having dealings with the company and to guarantee the performance of contracts by any such persons;

(l) To draw, make, accept, endorse, execute and issue promissory notes, bills of exchange, bills of lading warrants and other negotiable or transferable instruments;

(m) To sell or dispose of the undertaking of the company or any part thereof for such consideration as the company may think fit, and in particular for shares, debentures or securities of any other company having objects altogether or in part similar to those of the company;

(n) To apply for, secure, acquire by assignment, transfer, purchase, or otherwise, and to exercise, carry out and enjoy any charter, license, power, authority, franchise concession, rights or privilege, which any government or authority or any corporation or other public body may be empowered to grant and to pay for, aid in and contribute towards carrying the same into effect, and to appropriate any of the company's shares, bonds and assets to defray the necessary costs, charges and expenses thereof;

(o) To procure the company to be registered and recognized in any foreign country and to designate persons therein according to the laws of such foreign country to represent this company and to accept service for and on behalf of the company of any process or suit;

(p) To remunerate any person or company for services rendered, or to be rendered, in placing or assisting to place or guaranteeing the placing of any of the shares in the company's capital, or any debentures, debenture stock or other securities of the company, or in or about the formation or promotion of the company or the conduct of its business;

(q) To raise and assist in raising money for, and to aid, by way of bonus, loan, promise, endorsement, guarantee of bonds, debentures or other securities or otherwise, any other company or corporation with which the company may have business relations, and to guarantee the performance of contracts by any such company, corporation, or by any such person or persons;

(r) To adopt such means of making known the products of the company as may seem expedient, and in particular by advertising in the press, by circulars, by purchase and exhibition of works of art or interest, by publication of books and periodicals and by granting prizes, rewards and donations;

(s) To sell, improve, manage, develop, exchange, lease, dispose of, turn to account or otherwise deal with all or any part of the property and rights of the company;

(t) To do all or any of the above things as principals, agents, contractors or otherwise, and either alone or in conjunction with others;

(u) To do all such other things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects.

(2) All or any of the powers set out in subsection 1 may be withheld by the letters patent or supplementary letters patent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where are the forms taken from?

Mr. COPP: From Palmer's Company Law.

Mr. SPENCE: The minister was criticising the cost of advertising in the Canada Gazette. Why does he advertise there? Is it for the purpose of wanting nobody to see it?—because nobody ever reads it.

Mr. COPP: It is the official organ for publishing these notices.

Mr. SPENCE: It is a poor organ. Just a few members of parliament see it.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 8—Commission for procuring subscriptions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we should hear from the minister as to this section.

Mr. COPP: This section is copied verbatim from the English Companies' Act. Under the present act a company may pay a commission to brokers for the sale of stock or work of that nature. The present amendment broadens the effect so that companies may sell their own stock and allow a commission to the purchaser.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To what extent may they allow commissions?

Mr. COPP: The payment will be limited by the charter entered into.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the practice with respect to limitations?

Mr. COPP: I am informed that it depends on the nature of the company. A mining company, for instance, would have to pay a much larger commission than other companies. The companies make the best arrangement they can with brokers for selling their stock.

Mr. MARTELL: They file a statement with the department declaring that certain commissions will be paid for disposing of the shares. That is in accordance with the English act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not only the English but the Ontario act also. It must be shown in the prospectus that so much commission has been paid. I was just wondering what the general administrative idea of the department is. This becomes a depreciation of capital before the company is earning anything; these commissions have to be paid out of capital. In the case of mining companies you have to deplete your capital a good deal in order to sell your stock. What maximum would be allowed in a case of a financial or manufacturing company, for example, and then again in the case of a mining company.

Mr. COPP: In the case of a mining company, operating under the Ontario act, I am informed the maximum is 25 per cent and it runs down to probably 6 per cent according to the character of the company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then what would it be in the case of a manufacturing company?

Mr. COPP: I am informed by the Under Secretary of State that the maximum runs from about 6 per cent, up to 25 per cent in the case of mining companies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the case of manufacturing companies that maximum would not be allowed?

Mr. COPP: No.

Mr. CALDWELL: The maximum must be set forth in the letters patent?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then it cannot be exceeded?

Mr. COPP: It must be stated in the prospectus too, and it cannot be exceeded.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It should be shown in the advertising. Is that not looked after in the section?

Mr. COPP: That is a matter of regulation.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is there any "follow up" by the department to see that they do not exceed the amount, or is it left to their sense of honesty?

Mr. COPP: The maximum commissions they pay are set out in the prospectus.

Mr. CALDWELL: And the department has a "follow up" to see that is done?

Mr. COPP: No, that is for the individual himself to see about. The department cannot follow it up.

Mr. MARTELL: The individual buys on the basis of the prospectus and he knows what he is doing?

Mr. CALDWELL: We say that the capital shall not be depleted below a certain amount for the purpose of selling stock. I think it is up to the department to see that is carried out. We pass an act and we say "You are selling stock to the public and you must not deplete your capital." They want to sell stock and if they put up a big amount in order to do so it would not be worth so much. I can see where there might be a very great taking in of the public in matters of that kind.

Mr. COPP: If the details are set out in the prospectus I do not see that there can be much ground of complaint.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As I recollect the act, I have not read it recently, the prospectus is the basis of all advertising. The prospectus must show the maximum amount of commissions which may be paid, and it is an offence under the act to advertise stock for sale without doing this.

Mr. MARTELL: If the prospectus of the company is misleading that governs a person's liability for his call.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 3—Payment of brokers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is not a case of selling stock to a broker, is it?

Mr. COPP: If they sell stock through a broker they pay that broker.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In that case why is he not getting a commission?

Mr. COPP: The broker will get the commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we should have a little explanation about this subsection.

Mr. COPP: The subsection reads:

> Nothing in this section shall affect the power of any company to pay such brokerage as it has heretofore been lawful for a company to pay, and a vendor to, promoter of, or other person who receives payment in money or shares from a company shall have and shall be deemed always to have had power to apply any part of the money or shares so received in payment of any commission, the payment of which, if made directly by the company, would have been legal under this section.

This is taken word for word from the English act.

Mr. HANSON: Has there been any limitation of commissions heretofore?

Mr. COPP: Yes, there was always a limitation.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is when the commissions are paid out of capital. There is no limit when paid out of earnings, I take it?

Mr. COPP: That is provided for in the charter.

Mr. HANSON: What is the limitation under the act?

Mr. COPP: The amount to be paid for commissions is fixed in the charter.

Mr. HANSON: The Dominion act provides for a memorandum of association. That means simply subscriptions for the initial shares. That is all it amounts to.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend knows that the memorandum of association sets out the objects of the company. The articles of association set out what can be done among the people who are shareholders.

Mr. HANSON: That is true of the Nova Scotia act, but not in regard to the Dominion act.

Mr. MARTELL: It is true of the English act.

Mr. HANSON: Yes, but not of the Dominion act. You apply by a petition for the formal letters patent, and that is accompanied by an application for letters of association.

Mr. MARTELL: The memorandum which accompanies the petition is practically embraced in the charter of the company afterwards. They say they want power to do so and so, and they enumerate these powers. The procedure here is very much the same.

Mr. HANSON: It has the same effect. What is the limitation of commission in the statute now on a sale of shares?

Mr. COPP: It is not limited by statute.

Mr. HANSON: How is it limited under this bill, and what is the limitation?

Mr. COPP: This amendment provides for that, and we are adopting the English act authorizing commissions. My hon. friend knows that these commissions are being paid now, and there has been no authority for it.

Mr. HANSON: No limitation in the present statute?

Mr. COPP: No, and no authority for it. But this amendment adopts the English act entirely, which provides that commissions may be paid; and in the charters granted under this provision the limitations will be fixed.

Mr. HANSON: By regulation?

Mr. COPP: By regulation.

Mr. HANSON: You are legalizing what has been the practice, but you are going to put a limitation on it?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Is the minister going to fix any arbitrary limitation? What is proposed to be done? That is an important point.

Mr. COPP: We discussed this question before my hon. friend came in; and it has been suggested by the departmental officers that different kinds of companies should be given different authority for paying commissions, some commissions being larger and some smaller. For instance, a mining company might pay twenty-five per cent. That is a speculative company. Probably the commission would run from five to ten to twenty-five per cent, according to the company.

Mr. CALDWELL: It would depend on how hard it was to sell the shares.

Mr. HANSON: What is the object in fixing a limit at all? Is it not a matter to be arranged by the company after all?

Mr. COPP: It may be.

Mr. HANSON: This may be a good provision, I am not objecting at all. I do not think we should be so much concerned about people buying speculative stock. Let them buy and get their fingers scorched if they want to.

Mr. MARTELL: If there is no misrepresentation in the prospectus and no fraud or deceit, then a person knowing that he was buying speculative stock, if he got stung, should take the consequences.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair, and the House took recess.

After Recess

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT

The House again in committee on Bill No. 118, to amend the Companies Act—Hon. Mr. Copp. Mr. Gordon in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 8, is amended to read as section 9, subsection 3,

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Repeal.

The CHAIRMAN: This section is now amended to read as section 10.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the section that is dropped?

Mr. COPP: It is subsection 2 of section 30 of the principal act, as follows:

Notice of the situation of such principal office and of any change therein shall be published in the Canada Gazette.

It is felt that this provision is no longer necessary.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is provision made for publication of notice of the change in the local press, for instance?

Mr. COPP: No, the shareholders have to be notified of the meetings in the regular way, so that it is not necessary to publish the notice in the Canada Gazette.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—How private company may become public company.

The CHAIRMAN: This will now be known as section 12.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any need for publicity here as in the case of the incorporation of the original company? It is quite a change, that of making a private company into a public company that can sell by prospectus or otherwise.

Mr. COPP: It is only necessary that the prospectus be filed. Notice is not required.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The original incorporation is advertised in the Gazette.

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My point was that in view of the fact that there is a radical change in the character of the company, and its powers are being extended, whether it should not be advertised as in the case of an original incorporation. It is a matter of administration, and I would be guided very much by what Mr. Mulvey says.

Mr. COPP: I think it is worthy of consideration. I think it would be well to have it advertised.

[Mr. Martell.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want to hold up the bill. Mr. Mulvey might have an amendment made on the third reading if he thinks it wise.

Mr. CALDWELL: Take the case of a private company with non par value stock. What would the procedure be if it was turned into a public company?

Mr. COPP: If they incorporated without par value, they could continue.

Mr. CALDWELL: In the case of companies without par value stock, their liability is not limited.

Mr. COPP: Oh yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: The par value stock company is limited, but not the non par value stock company. In what way is it limited? A limited company is limited to the value of its stock.

Mr. COPP: The stock is sold and paid for.

Mr. CALDWELL: There is no further liability.

Mr. COPP: They pay up all they agree to pay.

Mr. LOW: The common stock is of value. Did I understand my hon. friend to say it was of no value?

Mr. CALDWELL: We were discussing before recess companies in which the stock was issued without money value.

Mr. LOW: There is no par value to them.

Mr. CALDWELL: I was asking what the procedure would be in the case of a company of that kind which was turned into a public company. Their stock must remain as it was before. If it was non par value before, it would continue the same.

Mr. COPP: Their liability would be what the stock was sold for, or what they agreed to pay.

Mr. CALDWELL: Suppose they go into liquidation, and their assets do not meet their liabilities?

Mr. COPP: If their stock is fully paid up, that ends it. If it is not paid up, they will have to pay the liquidator what they agreed to pay for the stock.

Mr. CALDWELL: But there is no value set on that stock. It is non par value stock.

Mr. COPP: But they pay for it.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is, the directors set a price on it, and if they have paid the company that, their liability ceases?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Supplementary letters patent granted.

The CHAIRMAN: This now becomes section 13.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That question of advertising might be considered in connection with this clause also.

Mr. COPP: We are providing for it here.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then it is all the more necessary in the other case.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Requirements as to particulars in prospectus.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: This now becomes section 14.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is to avoid the publication of the whole prospectus, I understand, and to allow the publication of a summary?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The former law was that everything had to go in, and if they did not put in everything they took the risk of liability. Now under this clause they may contract. I wonder whether the under-secretary has considered whether or not in cases of contraction it would be in the public interest to have that contracted form submitted for approval to the department, or whether that would make too large a volume of work. This is removing a substantial safeguard, which may or may not be properly observed. It is leaving it a bit loose. It is leaving it a matter for construction afterwards, whether the information has been given as indicated, and also leaving it open as to the extent of the information to be given in the classes indicated. Maybe it would be too big a matter of administration to undertake, but if it is not, it would be in the public interest, I think, to have the summary approved by the department.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the clause is rather specific. They have to publish a summary of the main objects of the company, as set forth in the letters patent, and of the capital stock provisions, and of any special clauses therein, with the names, descriptions, and addresses of the signatories to the petition for incorporation, and the number of shares subscribed for by them respectively; the number of founders' or management or deferred shares, if any, and the nature and extent of the interest of the holders in the property and profits of the company. I think that is a pretty full summary of everything that I can think of, and if that section is complied with, there should not be any danger.

Mr. CALDWELL: To my mind there is one very important thing left out, and we were discussing this before dinner; that is the amount of commission that is allowed to be paid out of capital for the selling of stock. That is a very important matter, and I would like to point out to the minister how this might work out. Suppose a company had a quantity of stock still unsold and they got into rather a difficult position; there was the possibility of liquidation, we will say, and they conceived the idea of putting the balance of the stock on the market. They might say: It will pay us to allow fifty per cent commission on the sale of this stock; if we get fifty per cent we shall save something. I think the public should know whether they are allowed to pay fifty per cent of the capital for selling the stock, because it is the public who are buying the stock, and it would be an indication to the public that the company was in rather a difficult position.

Mr. COPP: In the charter the amount of the commission is limited to twenty-five per cent

Mr. CALDWELL: It is provided that that shall be set forth in the prospectus, and I think it should be provided that it shall be set forth in the summary also.

Mr. COPP: We are only amending the first paragraph, which provides for the prospectus. We are not interfering at all with the commission that can be paid. That is limited to twenty-five per cent.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am not finding fault with that, but I say it should be set forth in the summary as well as in the prospectus. We have provided that in the case of the prospectus, and here we are providing for a summary of the prospectus to be printed and issued to the public, and in that summary this very important point is left out. It is in the prospectus, I admit, but the company is allowed to substitute a summary of the prospectus for the whole prospectus, and this very important point does not appear in the summary.

Mr. COPP: The question of what shall be in the prospectus is not interfered with by this amendment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was in difficulty in defining to myself what a special clause was. There might be a variety of ways in which one could well hold a clause to be special. It would be something upon which a good many people might differ.

Mr. COPP: Our only idea is to make the act as workable as possible, as my hon. friend, of course, realizes. The deputy informs me that he thinks this provision will cover the case and protect both the company and the stockholder.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the meaning of the word "special" in this section?

Mr. COPP: It has to do with the clause relating to share warrant, preference shares or shares of that kind.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That would be a special clause then relating to the issue of stock?

Mr. COPP: It would have to do with the transfer probably.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think this is a matter of sufficient importance to have an addition to this clause which will leave it in the hands of the department to issue regulations in connection with summaries under the section for the purpose of seeing that every one shall know what he is doing. I do not want to cumber up the legislation but it is certainly open to question what the word "special," there means. Anything which makes for the protection of the public cannot be condensed very well; it ought to form the subject of a special clause. I do not know anything more important than the point raised by my hon. friend from Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell). Take the case of a mining company. If there is a commission of 25 per cent the purchaser of the stock in that company ought to know that the company is only getting 75 per cent on the dollar.

Mr. COPP: I am informed that every suggestion my hon. friend makes will be provided for. The conditions will be set out in the charter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If I recollect rightly provision for the protection of the public is made in subsection 2 of section 8.

Mr. LOW: The commissions paid for the sale of shares must be set out in the prospectus.

[Mr. Caldwell.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the case of shares offered to the public for subscription the commissions paid must be disclosed in the prospectus under this bill. What we are now considering is another section altogether. I draw the attention of the minister to the section allowing the company to depart from the prospectus in their advertisement, allowing them to give a résumé of their general purposes and so on. I should like something added here to make it sure that the prospectus as advertised gives the public full notice that the capital is reduced by whatever commission is paid.

Mr. SHAW: This might be an appropriate time in view of the fact that we are discussing the protection of the public under this section, to draw the attention of the minister and hon. members generally to the situation with regard to the sale of shares so far as Dominion corporations are concerned. Everybody is familiar with the regulatory legislation passed by some four or five legislatures in Canada providing restrictions in connection with the sale of shares. May I be permitted to refer to the nature of that legislation. We have, for example, what is called the Sale of Shares Act in the province of Alberta passed in April 1916. Under this a company which proposes to sell its shares to the public must make application to the Board of Public Utility Commissioners, and these are some of the requirements which must be satisfied before the necessary certificate is given:

> A company applying for permission to sell shares must satisfy the board as to the bona fides of the enterprise; that the company has a reasonable chance of success; and that the subscribers will have a fair run for their money.
> In the case of a mining company the board requires a report by a competent engineer or, if a mere prospect, possibly a report by a geologist. The board may also require a report by an engineer or geologist of its own selection.
> Promoters are frequently required to put up substantial financial assistance themselves. Promoters or vendors' stock must be put in escrow until the company proves its claim. Extravagant commissions are not allowed.
> The minimum subscription upon which a company proceeds to allotment must be a substantial one. Experience has shown that many companies never obtain anything like sufficient to begin operations, and upon winding-up proceedings the proceeds of the stock subscribed are eaten up in costs, commissions, and other expenses.

Now, similar legislation has been enacted, in various provinces of Canada including the province of Ontario, where the legislation became effective some short time ago. So far as the Dominion is concerned there is no provision in the Federal Companies Act which is at all comparable with the legislation which I have indicated. The promoters of a company need only seek incorporation, and then they have the right to sell their shares practically without any limitation. There are some minor limitations, but, as I suggest, nothing which at all compares with the restrictions imposed by the provincial acts. The next thing is that some of these provincial legislatures have sought to make the legislation they have passed applicable to Dominion companies. That was tried in the province of Saskatchewan where a case of this character arose: A company validly incorporated under this very act, amendments to which we are now considering, sold some of its shares to a resident of Saskatchewan. He was not able to pay in full so he gave a promissory note for the balance remaining unpaid. He did not pay the promissory note when it fell due, and the Dominion corporation consequently sued him. He defended the action on the ground that the Dominion corporation had not prior to the sale of the shares secured the necessary certificate from the local government board in Saskatchewan. The company replied that the Sale of Shares Act of Saskatchewan was ultra vires of the province so far as it attempted to interfere with the Dominion corporation. It was urged that the right to sell shares is an inherent right in a corporation, and consequently a corporation validly incorporated under the Dominion Companies Act has the inherent right to sell its shares without any restriction by provincial legislation. The case went to the Appeal court of Saskatchewan, and that court unanimously held that the Sale of Shares Act of Saskatchewan, so far as it purported to affect the selling of shares by a Dominion corporation, was absolutely invalid. The case was appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, and judgment was given some months ago affirming the decision of the Appeal Court of Saskatchewan.

Mr. HANSON: What was the case?

Mr. SHAW: The case before the Saskatchewan court was the Ruthenian Farmers Elevator Company vs. Lukey, with the Attorney General of Saskatchewan intervening, and the report will be found in volume 3 of the Weekly Western Law Reports (1923) at page 138. That is the situation, and the result is that when a company which is formed for a speculative enterprise or a questionable purpose, is unable, under the existing provincial legislation in some provinces, to sell its shares, all it needs to do is to come down to the Dominion government and seek incorporation; then it is permitted without restraint of any kind to sell its shares in any part of Canada. I think that is a highly undesirable state of affairs. Not only does it permit these speculative companies to so sell their shares to the public, but, in addition to that, it largely nullifies the provincial legislation; because of course when such legislation is passed by the provincial government it becomes absolutely ineffective, for the reason that these companies immediately seek Dominion incorporation. I regret that the minister has not taken some steps to meet that situation and to provide some sort of organization or some regulation which will be comparable in its nature to the legislation I have indicated, and which is now in force in, I think, at least six provinces of the Dominion. I bring it to the attention of the minister because it is a matter of vital importance. It is important that in this respect the interests of the public should be protected. Some other hon. gentlemen are interested, I believe, in presenting some other phases of the matter for the consideration of the minister, but I bring to his consideration primarily the legal situation that exists; so that he may if he deems it advisable, take the necessary steps to provide a remedy, either by incorporating the necessary legislation in the Dominion Companies Act, or perhaps by giving power to the provincial governments to control the sale of shares by Dominion corporations.

Mr. HANSON: This very same question has recently been the subject of a judicial decision in the province of New Brunswick, and arose directly under the provincial legislation in that province providing for the issue of certificates by the Public Utilities Commission before stock could be legitimately sold. The promoter of the company was fined in the police court in St. John, and the conviction was taken up, by way of certiorari, to the Court of Appeal and quashed on the very ground stated by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw). That is now the law of the province of New Brunswick, and the provincial act is practically rendered worthless. The provincial legislation which sought, as everybody is aware, to control the sale of wildcat shares, has been thereby rendered more or less of a dead letter, because corporations of this character immediately become incorporated under a Dominion charter and place the provincial laws at defiance. I think the time is opportune to have an expression of opinion as to the policy of the government on this so-called blue sky legislation, and I would invite the minister to make a statement to the House and the country on this point.

Mr. COPP: This matter has been under consideration, and is being considered now by the departmental officials, and I have a very long and voluminous opinion here containing some fifteen pages in regard to the matter; but we thought the investigation had not been carried sufficiently far to come to a conclusion as to whether or not legislation should be brought down at the moment. I can say to my hon. friends we have before us the legislation of the province of New Brunswick which has been referred to by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). We have my hon. friend's statement that a conviction made under the act has been quashed by the Appeal court which renders the provincial law practically a dead letter. But nothing definite has been decided by the department in regard to it. The same thing, I presume, is true with reference to the western provinces. I have before me copy of a letter from the Attorney General of Saskatchewan in the case referred to by my hon. friend for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw); but inasmuch as this matter is not touched by the amendment being proposed at the present time, I suggest to my hon. friend that a little more time should be given to the study of the question, and if any legislation can be brought down to the House amending the Companies Act, or new legislation introduced, I think we should take a little more time and give the matter a little more thought; so that we can introduce something that may be more acceptable than we would be able to do with the study we have been able to give to the matter at the present time. I would not like to say to the committee just what legislation should be brought down with regard to it, but the officers and legal officials of the department have given a great deal of thought to the matter. They are still studying the question, and are communicating with the attorneys general of the different provinces in regard to it.

Mr. HANSON: That is to say, the minister and his department have not any opinion on the subject. That is about what his statement amounts to. This matter has been before the public for quite a number of years, as stated by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw). It is a matter of legislation in five or six different provinces and while the province of Ontario prepared an act, I believe it was never legislated upon by the Drury government; at any rate it was never proclaimed in Ontario. In New Brunswick the act is on the statute book and may be brought into effect by proclamation.

Mr. SHAW: Did the present Ferguson government not pass an act called An Act respecting the Sale of Securities?

[Mr. Copp.]

Mr. HANSON: My hon. friend may be right. My recollection was that the so-called blue sky law of Ontario was the product of the brain of ex-Attorney General Raney, of unhappy memory, and that it had never been proclaimed.

Mr. SHAW: The bill is No. 218 of the Ontario legislature, and is called The Sale of Securities Act, 1924.

Mr. HANSON: My information is that it was not passed, but I speak subject to correction. I think it is of sufficient importance to have an expression of opinion from the department, if it has an opinion. If the minister is not prepared to go any further than to say that the department is studying the question, we will have to be content with that for the present, but the matter is of very great importance, and I know that there are two schools of thought in connection with the matter. I have not much sympathy with a lot of paternal legislation that is on the statute books at the moment. I think we have altogether too much of it. At the same time there is a great deal to be said in favour of such legislation.

Mr. GOOD: It seems to me this is a matter of very great importance, and I should like some declaration from the minister as to his intentions next year, if not this year. He says that his department is studying the matter. Well, I can quite understand the desirability of considering the details, but surely it would be easy enough to make some statement as to the general intention, as to whether or not they consider legislation in this direction desirable. Surely the House is entitled to some declaration in this matter; and I hope the declaration will be favourable, because it is a scandalous thing that companies should be able to evade the intention and effect of provincial legislation by incorporating under Dominion charters. I hope the minister can give the House some assurance that this matter will be dealt with in the right way at the earliest possible date.

Mr. COPP: I can assure my hon. friend that, so far as the department is concerned, when the matter is dealt with it will be dealt with in the right way, if the right way can be found. But I regret I am not in a position to make any definite statement to-night. The department is in communication with the attorneys general of the different provinces and we shall be delighted to co-operate in every way possible with a view to devising some legislation that will be satisfactory both to the provinces and to the Dominion. The matter has been more particularly brought to the attention of the department by reason of the recent cases to which hon. gentlemen have referred. The law officers are giving the subject their best consideration, and I trust that before long we shall see our way clear to introduce legislation that will fully meet the situation, providing protection to all parties concerned, both the companies and prospective shareholders. As my hon. friend (Mr. Hanson) has rightly said, there are two schools of thought, and the matter is of sufficient importance to call for the utmost consideration.

Mr. SHAW: To which school of thought does the minister adhere?

Mr. COPP: I am not expressing a personal opinion.

Mr. MARTELL: I gather from the minister that this section is copied from the British act; and there is a similar section in the statutes of Ontario relating to companies. There is also a section very much to the same effect in the Companies Act of Nova Scotia. I agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hanson) that there are two schools of thought, and he says that he has very little sympathy with much of paternalistic legislation. The hon. gentleman and I cannot always concur on matters of political dogma, but when it comes to a question of this kind I am heart and soul with him. I do not believe that there is any country whose laws are better fitted, as a model after which we can frame our own so that they may be acceptable to our people, than are the laws of England. We in the province of Nova Scotia claim that our general laws have been moulded on those of the Old Country; and after that, if we have no particular law of our own regarding some special matter, we sometimes seek advice from Ontario. But we do not always do that; my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) and I would not always agree in that respect. In the interpretation of statutes it is well to have precedents to guide us and if we have this section drafted after the British and Ontario sections, should a case come up under it we can consult our precedents as found in English and Ontario decisions. So that we will have a continuous system of law coming down to us. But if we are going to follow those people whose heads are up in the clouds and who are constantly looking for something to reform we shall never have any stability in the jurisprudence of the country. It is all very well to say that we should have blue sky laws; but does not the act itself go as far as men should go? Are we not going to leave something to the intelligence of the people? We do not want parliament or the government to be a sort of godfather or godmother to every citizen in the country; we should give some of the people at least credit for having a little common sense and business acumen. And this very often is not displayed by a great number of those people who want legislation to meet every possible phase of any question that might arise. They seem to be afraid of the lawyers; but I notice that when matters come up in the House of Commons the lawyers have very little to say from the legal standpoint; we usually find lay lawyers giving advice on these points. My hon. friend from Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) laughs, but there is no man who is as much a self-constituted philosopher and legal luminary as is the hon. gentleman, who speaks on everything under God's heaven. I am a humble member of the bar of Nova Scotia and I am going to say that the barristers of that province can hold their own with the lawyers of any other part of the country. I should have very little conceit in the ability of my fellow practitioners from that province if I did not say that. I am sick and tired of hearing people dictating to us on questions of legal interpretation and trying to tell the House what the law of the country on this and that subject ought to be, when they know absolutely nothing about it.

There are laws for the incorporation of companies in this country and there are divers kinds of corporations or incorporations. My hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) could tell us the nature of ecclesiastical corporations because I understand he is the chancellor of the Anglican diocese of Algoma.

Mr. BOYS: I should be delighted to accept that compliment if I were entitled to it, but I do not want the House to have the impression which my hon. friend conveys. The hon. gentleman is thinking of a former member of the House, Mr. A. C. Boyce, then representing Algoma, and now on the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. MARTELL: Well, I know there are various corporations and I thought that probably the hon. gentleman could tell us what ecclesiastical corporations were. There are different ways in which corporations can be brought in esse in this country; you can constitute them by act of parliament or by royal charter, and you can also have an incorporation under the Companies Act. The latter is usually brought about by what is termed a memorandum of association, which sets out what are to be the powers of the company; and there are also articles of association setting out rules for the internal government of the company. Under this bill we are declaring what shall be set out in the memorandum of association and in the so-called prospectus; certain clauses are to state what the commission for selling shares shall be and what the prospectus shall disclose. But apart from what may be put into a statute regarding the prospectus there is also the common law. Every lawyer in the House is familiar with the case of Derry vs Peek. Under the common law, if a man makes a fraudulent representation in the prospectus as to a matter of fact and is guilty of deceit or fraud there is a common law action against him in consequence. There is also action against the directors of a company if they do not act intra vires of the memorandum or charter of the company. These things are only fair. In this case the company in a certain prospectus offers shares and the people know what the prospectus states and what the memorandum of association contains; thus they know the powers of the company. If people are selling shares by making statements contrary to the authorized prospectus or are guilty of fraudulent representations of fact, they are liable under this bill; and there also lies action under the common law.

Surely in the name of everything that is fair we should leave something to the individual who wants to invest. Do not come here and circumscribe business with so many restrictions that people will not be inclined to invest at all. A good many members in this House seem to think that after they have taken the so-called gambler's chance the country should prosecute company promoters simply because these gentlemen who invested of their own volition did not exercise good business ability. For heaven's sake do not surround business with too many restrictions. It is only fair that men should have complete freedom in their business transactions so long as they do not break the criminal law or infringe upon the common or statutory law rights of others. I claim that my hon. friend in introducing these amendments has adopted the principles of the British Companies Act, which are also to be found in the Ontario Companies Act—and Ontario is only second to Nova Scotia in matters of jurisprudence; you all know that —and surely we as legislators should be prepared to follow British precedents, because we acknowledge that Great Britain has the fairest and most equitable administration of justice of any country in the world, that there justice is always swift and impartial to poor as well as to rich. This being so, why should we, because owing to what I might describe as the fruits of the overheated brains of some people in this country, a new system has arisen—why should we, I say, think that we have a God-given right to disrupt the whole system of British jurisprudence on which our laws are founded? If we follow what has been been found to be sufficiently good in England in matters of law administration, I am quite confident that the people of this country will be well satisfied, because they will then know that their rights are protected and left equitably inviolate and that rich and poor alike, will enjoy liberty, equality and justice.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) on his very able speech on the subject of the incorporation of companies, whether under provincial or federal jurisdiction. This is a matter of very grave concern to the business interests of the Dominion and to the people in general, and I sympathize very much with the minister in his desire not to express a very definite opinion on this very important question either in his own behalf or in the behalf of the government. We must realize that the parliament of Canada has inherent jurisdiction over the incorporation of companies, and I trust the day will never come when this parliament will surrender that jurisdiction to any province; on the contrary, I hope that at all times it will conserve that right which was given to it when the constitutional act was passed for the confederation of the Dominion. Were we to follow the suggestion of my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) and adopt the varying views of the provinces, we would sap that federal jurisdiction to its very foundation.

Mr. SHAW: Does my hon. friend imagine that I suggested that the right of incorporation which exists in the Dominion government by reason of the Act of Confederation should be handed over entirely to the provinces?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I do not think my hon. friend suggested that; but, as I understood him, his suggestion was that the right which we have should be circumscribed to fit in with the desires of the various provincial legislatures, and I think I am right in saying that in no two instances have the provinces passed the same legislation in regard to what is known as their blue sky laws. It is an accepted doctrine that within their sphere the provincial legislatures have the right to incorporate companies, and it is well known that they have gone beyond their powers in that respect; but so far as they have acted within their powers no objection can be taken. When, however, they seek to affect jurisdiction here to meet conditions in their own provinces and not generally applicable throughout Canada, then I submit they do seek to limit the jurisdiction and the authority of this parliament. I was under the impression that the Ontario legislature, while it had passed a blue sky law, had never yet brought it into force. My hon. friend from West Calgary mentioned that a law in respect of the sale of securities was passed by that legislature last session. I was not aware of it, although I remember seeing something in the newspapers that a bill for the purpose was introduced. But I accept my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. SHAW: Might I say to my hon. friend, because I do not want to have any misapprehension on the point, that I observe in this particular act, which I am informed was passed by the Ontario legislature last session, that it is to come into force on a date to be named by proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor in Council. So it may be as the hon. member suggests, not yet in effect.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, perhaps it has not yet been proclaimed. But the point I desire to impress on the minister is that this is a jurisdiction in respect of the incorporation of companies which this parliament must maintain; it is our duty to do so. We are not to be influenced by the whims of any government in any province. We must at all times be in a position to legislate for the benefit of the whole Dominion in matters which the British North America Act recognizes to be for the general advantage of Canada. That is an inherent duty on the part of this parliament, and I trust no government will ever surrender the right. New Brunswick has a law respecting the sale of securities in that province; another law exists in Saskatchewan; another in Alberta; another, I think, in Manitoba. Are we to be asked to frame a measure under our Dominion jurisdiction to meet all the requirements of these various provincial laws? Why the question has only to be stated to be denied. I submit it is not practicable, and I think if the government and the minister and the deputy minister,—whose familiarity with this question is far greater than that of any member in this House—if they devote themselves to framing a law which will be applicable to the whole Dominion on broad general principles such as we have always enjoyed, with such reasonable safeguards as may be properly employed, then that is the extreme length to which this parliament should go in matters pertaining to the incorporation of companies.

I do not know that I have any very strong opinion with regard to paternalism, although I do believe that at the present time we are going to the very limit in that respect. But whether it is paternalism or not I do think there is wisdom shown in that which is offered to the public by the requirements of the proposed bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member (Mr. Martell) is very much afraid of the result of overheated imagination, but it is rather strange that down in Nova Scotia they have actually passed blue sky legislation, also in New Brunswick, Quebec—

Mr. MARTELL: Tell us what the Nova Scotia Act is and its effect.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Whatever may be the details of the acts in these provinces or however much they may differ, evidently the people there recognize the necessity of guarding the interests of the public. I take it that the hon. member (Mr. Shaw) was not urging that this Dominion should adopt exactly the clauses of these provincial acts but rather we should recognize that as the needs of the case have driven the provinces to legislate along this line, so the same needs should lead us to take action adequately to safeguard the interests of the people. I do not intend to speak with regard to the protection of the public from wildcat legislation, although I could instance some cases in my own province of Manitoba where I think many people are glad that they were saved from some schemes that were advanced a few years ago. I think particularly of one that was brought down from the city of Calgary, the home of my hon. friend (Mr. Shaw). Another very important problem closely related to this matter is the protection of the public from the mergers that are taking place, in the course of which the companies are being greatly over-capitalized. In the Farmer's Sun of October 15, 1921, there was published a study of some of the mergers that had taken place a few years ago, chiefly from 1905 to 1912, the period during which we had a very large number of consolidations in Canada. I quote:

Capital of the 200 companies before being merged	$115,442,000
Capital issued after being merged into 40 companies	227,197,000
Capital authorized, and which may yet be issued	330,000,000

Already there has been put in equal quantities of "watered" stock and actual capital, and authority is given the companies to issue twice as much watered stock as actual money paid in. This is one of the most fruitful causes of the high cost of living. Every manufactured article is more or less affected by these mergers and the stock watering.

The public in my section of the country, whatever may be true of other parts of Canada, have awakened to the evils arising from this kind of thing. In the Grain Growers' Guide of November 16, 1921, there was a study based upon some articles that had appeared in the Monetary Times, which must be familiar to many in this House, showing the mergers which have taken place in the case of a number of leading corporations. I would like to ask permission to read a few of these as illustrating this particular point:

Name of Merger	Capital of Companies Absorbed	No. of Companies Absorbed	Capital Authorized to be issued by Merger
Amalgamated Asbestos Corpn..	$ 3,550,000	5	$ 25,000,000

Note.—The increase in capital values of above companies authorized under the Companies Act is $142,861,500 or 324 per cent.

I think it is recognized by all that undoubtedly over-capitalization increases the cost of commodities. The companies are of course, anxious to make their dividends on these high figures, figures that have no relationship to the amount of capital really put into the concern. I would like to point out also a hardship that is frequently worked upon the industrial population. Not only do the workers, as consumers, carry a heavy load in the enhanced cost of commodities, but they also frequently carry an additional burden in decreased wages. Many of these companies state they cannot afford to pay higher wages and at the same time pay dividends. The following figures are interesting in this connection. They are taken from the Labour Gazette for May, 1924, pages 404 to 406:

Number of Employees and Wages Paid in Various Industries in Canada

Name of Industry	Number of Employees 1922	Amount of Wages, 1922	Average Yearly Wage for each Employee
Cotton textile..	19,941	$14,635,249	$739
Cotton yarns & cloth.	18,504	12,529,766	677
Cotton thread..	659	514,747	750
Boot & shoe..	11,968	10,237,400	855
Macaroni & vermicelli.	140	85,549	611
Cocoa & chocolate.. ..	541	465,850	861
Mens furnishings.. ..	4,781	2,699,525	565
Or yearly average for all employees engaged.			$5,058
In seven industries..			$722

This living allowance of ($722) must be compared with the necessary living allowance of $1,783.60 for a family of five (See pages 431 and 433 Labour Gazette, May, 1924).

It is not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to detain the committee with pointing the moral contained in these figures. I think we all recognize that the public ought to be safeguarded in some way against what might properly be called, irresponsible companies, companies that are not in any sense under existing regulations directly responsible to the people. These companies have very considerable power in their hands. They may make representations to the department, and so far as I can gather these representations are taken at their face value. There is no way, apparently in which the general public may be protected from—what shall I say?—the extortions of these companies. I think the member for Hants stated that we ought to be protected merely from deceit or fraud. I do not claim that from the strictly legal standpoint as the law now is on the statute books these companies are always guilty of deceit or fraud, but I do urge that if we consider the question from a higher aspect, we must admit that the companies have no moral right to charge prices for commodities that are not based on actual capital invested. We must realize that people all over this country are recognizing that there must be a change. We are told, and my friends in the Farmers' group are told, again and again that the cost of living is high on account of the high wages. I submit that high wages are only one factor, and not the most important factor, in the cost of living to-day.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish to add my voice to the protest of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) and that of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) in this matter. In opening let me refer very briefly to the remarks of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell). He was particularly critical of those who would come down here and attempt to impose what he called paternal legislation or restrictive legislation so far as business is concerned. He, perhaps, has overlooked this fact that the securities of the companies that are perhaps to be controlled are largely created and sanctioned by the state itself. Therefore the state must continue, and when necessary to extend that control and it is fully justified in doing so. We must adhere to that principle.

I might quote an authority, Professor King, instructor in statistics in the University of Wisconsin. In a book called "The Wealth and Income of the People of the United States," at page 102 he states:

> If wealth can be concentrated by law, it might equally be dispersed by law. . . . In fact, in a hundred ways, legislation might be used to secure greater equality of possessions. If we deem the present gross inequality of distribution decidedly evil, then remedial legislation can be enacted none too soon.

That remedial action is required will be apparent, I think, to those who will study the mergers that have taken place in recent years, and the tremendous consequent loss to the consuming public. Why do I say there is a loss? Let me quote from the Monetary Times of January 6, 1912, page 47:

> The payment of dividends on unreasonable capitalization must in some way be wrong from the public. Common stock issues often fail to represent an investment, yet dividends are expected to be paid thereupon. Only the consumer can pay them.

That is the point we have got to let sink into our heads.

> The position of the individual manufacturer may also suffer unless large aggregations of capital are properly regulated.

I trust these will be sufficient answers to the hon. member for Hants. The article goes on to suggest certain reforms which I will briefly summarize in closing.

In following up the view taken by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg, let me remind the House that in this country, in the United States, in Great Britain, in all countries so far as I know, there is a tremendous disproportion between the wealth possessed by individuals and classes of individuals therein. I am not going to quote very many figures; I shall just endeavour to give the House a bird's eye view of the conditions that exist. We find, for example, in France, in the year 1909 largely due to the overcapitalization of industries controlled by capitalists and others who, by exploiting the general public, pressing down wages, charging highly for their goods, have concentrated wealth in the hands of a few who control these industries, that 26 per cent of the population control only .470 of the total values, whereas 3.9 per cent of the population control 69.9 per cent of all values. These figures are taken from Table XIV, page 87, of the Professor's book to which I referred a moment ago. Table XVI, page 89, shows in the United Kingdom, from 1907 to 1911, 79 per cent of all estates valued at less than £100, or 4.57 of all values; in other words, 79 per cent of the population controlled 4.57 of the total values, and 6.55 per cent of the population, on the other hand controlled 88 per cent of all values. Similar conditions prevail in Canada and the United States.

Coming now to the estimated percentages of the total national income in the United States, received respectively by labour, capital, land, and the entrepreneur, we find that in the year 1900 47.3 per cent of the total income went in wages and salaries, 15 per cent in interest, 7 per cent in rent, and 30 per cent in profits, out of a total of 100. In 1910, 46.9 went in wages and salaries, 16.8 in interest, and 8.8 in rent, and 27.5 in profits, or an average in wages and salaries of 45.9 per cent.

Now it must be obvious to those who are studying this question that conditions of this kind cannot much longer continue and the public remain quiescent under them. I now refer to one or two of our Canadian industries, and quote from the Labour Gazette, May 1924, pages 404 to 406, following up the line taken by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg. I find in the cotton yarns and cloth industry the total production for the year 1924 was $72,174,728. Out of that $72,-174,728 there was paid in wages only $12,-529,000 and in salaries $1,234,000, or in wages and salaries 19 per cent of the total production. In the macaroni and vermicelli industry the total production was $1,318,037, and the total paid out in wages $85,549, and salaries $51,940, or only 10 per cent of the total production. In the clothing industry the production amounted to $59,287,000. Wages inside amounted to $8,765,000, and wages outside to $405,000, or a total including salaries —$3,286,267—of $12,456,000, or only 21 per cent of the total production.

In the mens' furnishings industry a similar condition arises with only 23 per cent of the total production coming back to the producers of the value. Similar conditions prevai' in almost all our Canadian industries.

Mr. FOURNIER: Are you sure your professor is right?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am quoting these figures from the Labour Gazette, not from the professor. Now let me impress upon the House this conclusion that we come to after studying these figures. We are returning to labour only 20 per cent of its average production. The percentage varies slightly in different countries; in the United States it is somewhat higher than in Canada at the moment. But, and this is my point, as long as you return to the producer of values only 20 per cent of those values how can they have consumptive power? The result must be stagnation. These things must be taken into account.

In conclusion let me submit, it is advisable that this government, and the minister particularly concerned, should take steps to stop this over-capitalization, and to protect the public from wildcat schemes. I would submit that a sworn statement should be demanded from incorporated companies showing the actual value of all tangible assets, and also an estimate of the value of all intangible assets, this sworn statement to be signed by an auditor. That would give the public some protection. We might then prohibit the giving of common stock as a bonus to the purchasers of bonds or preferred stock. I cannot for my life understand what justification there is for permitting companies to issue bonuses to those who will buy bonds or preferred stock. It looks very much like the giving of a prize, or something of that nature, with every pound of tea. Again why not insist that all common stock be sold at par and be fully paid up. I think that if these ideas were carried out they would form exceedingly valuable additions to the present legislation. An exception might be made in the case of highly speculative development industries such as mining, because enterprises of this character are required in the development of the country. But even in these cases supervision should be exercised by the department, and there should be a close examination undertaken by government officials before they were given the right to sell stock below par under any conditions. In the issue of the Monetary Times from which I have already quoted there are certain further recommendations which I desire to place on record.

1. More information than hitherto afforded as to the past history and actual earnings of companies absorbed, must be given in the prospectus.

2. The investor must know what was paid for the properties acquired by the consolidated company, and whether the consideration was cash, stock, bonds, or all three.

3. Greater discretion and conservatism must be used in estimating the economies likely to accrue from amalgamation.

4. Capitalization must be based upon the cost of acquiring properties, real assets, a reasonable amount for future development, and legitimate profits to promoters.

5. Capitalization should be such as to enable the predicted dividends to be paid even in times of moderate trade depression.

And watering stock must be prohibited.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. COPP: I want to add another section to the bill as section 29. It is to make a verbal change in the amendment made last year. The first line of subsection 2 of section 2 of the act of last year reads as follows:

Nothing in this section shall prevent a company—

I want to change the word "section" to the word "act." It will then read:

Nothing in this act—

And so forth.

Mr. SHAW: Shall prevent the company from what? We have not the reference here?

Mr. COPP: I will read the first part of last year's section:

Section seventy of the principal act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

(2) Nothing in this section shall prevent a company incorporated for the chief object of mining from declaring or paying dividends out of its funds derived from the operations of the company, notwithstanding that the value of the net assets of the company may be thereby reduced to less than the par value of the issued capital stock of the company—

And so on. It applies to mining companies and the word "section" was used instead of the word "act."

SUPPLY

TRADE AND COMMERCE

The House in committee of Supply Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure) in the chair.

Inspection and Sales Act, administration of, $3,000.

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This is to provide for the administration of the Inspections and Sales Act. The expenses provided for are:

E. Côté, inspector of hides, Quebec	$1,620
Expenses	750
Expenses, W. D. McDermid, supervisor of binder twine	630

No salary is paid Mr. McDermid under this vote. He combines the duty of supervisor of binder twine, manufacture and sales, with his duties as supervisor of crude petroleum bounties, for which his salary is $1,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this the Inspection and Sales Act as to binder twine?

Mr. LOW: This covers inspection and sale of binder twine, hides, hay and straw, pot and pearl ashes. There are two hide inspectors, one at Quebec and one at Montreal. There is an inspector of fish oil, C. W. Thompson, St. John, who receives expenses of about $42. Then there is E. Horsnell, Montreal, $135. Then on hay and straw, R. Macgillivray, Alberta, $164.05, W. J. McNeill, Toronto, $842, and Nelson Bickerdike, Montreal $1,600.

Mr. CALDWELL: We are interested in the names of the men but what does the inspection of hides consist of? Why does the government have a man inspecting hides? What is the idea?

Mr. LOW: I think it is more for the protection of the farmer than anybody else, to ascertain the quality of the hides, and to see that they are properly cured. I fancy it would be more in the interests of the farmer.

Mr. CALDWELL: The farmer is selling hides, not buying them.

Mr. LOW: Yes, but if they are not properly cured or packed, it may react on the sale of Canadian hides.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is that paternal legislation?

Mr. CALDWELL: Is there any supervision to see that the farmer gets a living wage or price for the hides? I will give an example of what I saw happen within the last two years. A farmer brought a hide into town and sold it. The hide weighed fifty pounds, and he got a cent a pound for it. The buyer was in the harness business and the farmer said, "I do not want the money, I want a hame strap." The harness man said to him, "All right, the price of the strap is seventy-five cents; you will owe me twenty-five cents." And the man gave the cow hide and twenty-five cents for a hame strap. I do not know how many hame straps a cow hide would make, but the labour in making these straps is not very great. It is simply a buckle riveted on one end of the strap. I am anxious to see that this inspection should extend to something in the shape of equity in the dealing in hides as well as in the curing of them.

Mr. JELLIFF: What is the nature of the inspection of binder twine? Is it the length or weight or quality?

Mr. LOW: We have an inspector who travels round to the factories to see that the binder twine is made of the proper quality, and I think that work is in the interest of the agriculturist.

Mr. HANSON: How many binder twine factories are there in Canada?

Mr. LOW: I think there is only one.

Mr. HANSON: How many twenty years ago?

Mr. LOW: I do not know.

Mr. COOTE: Does the inspection and grading of hay come under this vote?

Mr. LOW: Yes. I am now negotiating with the Department of Agriculture, because I think that the inspection of hay and straw should properly come under that department, and for that reason I made the suggestion to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister give me some assurance that this transfer will be made as promptly as possible, if it is to be made; because there are a number of men in western Canada who are anxious to have something done in regard to changes in the grading of hay, and I know that this cannot be accomplished until the transfer is made. I would like to have an assurance that this transfer will be arranged as promptly as possible.

Mr. LOW: As far as the Department of Trade and Commerce is concerned, it will be transferred; but I represent only one department. I have discussed the matter with the Minister of Agriculture, and he is quite willing to take it over—I think I can safely assure my hon. friend that it will be transferred. Of course that matter will be settled by order in council.

Mr. CALDWELL: Do I understand that the inspectors under this vote grade hay, or set the grades of hay in any part of Canada? I know they do not in the province from which I come, but I think there is a provision under this vote that men who press hay into bales must put a tag on the bales and put their name on the tag; so that if there is any shortage in weight they can trace it to the man who pressed the hay and weighed it. In our province I understand that is the only function of our inspectors.

Mr. LOW: Would the hon. member suggest that the item be struck out?

Mr. CALDWELL: No, I think it is a very necessary thing. Do the inspectors under this department set the grades of hay? I do not think they do.

Mr. PRITCHARD: I think this matter comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce. Has it something to do with the hides which come in free of duty? Is there not some inspection in connection with that? How does the dumping clause apply in that respect?

10 p.m.

Mr. LOW: The hide inspector has to pass on that.

Mr. PRITCHARD: How are they valued? The same as binder twine?

Mr. LOW: The home market price is usually taken as the standard of value.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Could the minister amplify that explanation, by telling us how the dumping act can come into operation in connection with the importation of free hides?

Mr. LOW: If hides are on the free list, the dumping act would not apply to them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would have thought so.

Mr. COOTE: Does the minister assure the committee that the dumping clause does not apply to goods on the free list?

Mr. LOW: I do not see how any dumping clause could apply to anything on the free list.

Mr. COOTE: The minister should read the act.

Item agreed to.

International Customs Tariffs Bureau, $1,800.

Mr. SPENCER: What is the reason for the decrease?

Mr. LOW: This item is reduced by $662. The amount voted for a number of years was $662, $600 being the annual amount payable for Canada under the agreement, plus $62 contributed towards a superannuation fund for the benefit of officials of the bureau. The government of Belgium, through its Consul General at Ottawa, reported to the government of Canada a marked increase in the expenditure of the bureau and requested that Canada, along with other countries, should increase its normal allowance by four times the pre-war rate in order that the work of the bureau might be performed with complete accuracy and expedition and that full satisfaction should be given to the various states which are parties to the agreement. The Canadian government was later advised by the Acting Consul General for Belgium at Ottawa that after the estimates for 1923-24 have been passed by parliament steps will be taken to cut down the expenses of the bureau. This makes it possible to reduce the amount of the contribution from each of the different countries for the year 1923, from four times to three times the pre-war figures.

Mr. CALDWELL: Where is the bureau situated and what benefit has Canada derived from it?

Mr. LOW: I believe it is located in Brussels, Belgium.

Mr. CALDWELL: I suppose the purpose is to obtain readily the tariffs of the various countries that belong to the association.

Mr. LOW: Yes, that is the idea.

Item agreed to.

Printing of parliamentary and departmental publications, $90,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am glad that the minister is making an attempt to get rid of this item; I see there is a reduction. This is an item to which we have frequently drawn attention, and I have often commented on the multiplicity of governmental publications. I would direct the minister's attention to vote No. 39 which provides for general printing, printing paper, binding and so forth. I can understand that provision should be made for departmental publications, but why should the Department of Trade and Commerce have anything to do with taking care of those publications? Perhaps a further reduction might be advisable, as this seems to be another instance of overlapping.

Mr. LOW: I have been eliminating a number of publications, as I said a few nights ago, and I have succeeded in reducing this item alone by $60,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have given the minister credit for that.

Mr. LOW: There is a great deal in what the ex-Minister of Finance says, and no doubt there is duplication in many quarters which I should like to eliminate.

Mr. HANSON: How many different publications were put out by the department in the last year?

Mr. LOW: I do not know the exact number.

Mr. HANSON: Which ones were cut out?

Mr. LOW: From the Bureau of Statistics we have eliminated twenty different publications.

Mr. CALDWELL: Where is the printing done?

Mr. LOW: It is done at the Printing Bureau.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does the Printing Bureau do all the government printing?

Mr. LOW: Yes, unless there happens to be some special rush.

Mr. CALDWELL: Possibly the recommendation I made regarding the Bureau of Statistics might apply to the printing of governmental documents as well. I think there is a considerable duplication and I am glad that the minister is taking steps to reduce this item. I look forward to his being able to amalgamate all the printing under one head.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much was actually spent last year?

Mr. LOW: We spent $165,946.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was it all spent?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: How was the other $15,000 provided for?

Mr. LOW: Probably by a supplementary estimate.

Mr. DOUCET: The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) is continually complaining about the nuisance of whispered conversations between hon. gentlemen, and we are being treated to this sort of thing to-night; a conversation has been going on between the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) and the minister, which it has been impossible for us in this section of the House to hear. However, I rise to ask the minister whether the printing of the Commercial Intelligence Journal comes under this vote. If it does, what steps have been taken to have the printing of the French version done simultaneously with that of the English version? It is notorious that during the past year the French copies reached the commercial interests of the Dominion who use the French language between six and eight weeks after the English version had reached the commercial men who subscribe to it. I do not think that should have existed but in fairness to the minister I must add that to-day the French version is printed about the same time or only a few days later than the English version and for this improvement I am sure our commercial interests using the French language will be gratified. But I would remind the minister that during the last twelve months the French version has not contained all the subject matters printed in the English section the shortage ordinarily running from eighteen to twenty-four pages. For instance, in the issue of May 31 last such questions as —British Trade Commissioners in Canada—Record Mineral Output for 1923 in New South Wales—Export of Rabbit Skins—Reported Find of Valuable Mica Deposits—Import of Motor Cars into Australia—Fruit Shipments to South Africa—Business and Financial Conditions in Belgium—Trade Improvements in Costa Rica—Parcel Post Shipments to British Honduras—Business Conditions in Sweden—were not translated and reprinted in the French section. In the issue of June 7 last I find that—Economic Conditions in Jamaica—Indian Tariff Board Recommends Protection in Steel—Foreign Trade of the United States—Import Conditions in Netherlands East Indies—Barbadoes Customs Duties Surtax Required—Tanning Industry in Chile—were not translated and reprinted in the French version. Coming to the issue of June 14 last I find that—The Royal Agricultural Society's Annual Show at Sydney, Australia—The Oil Question in Australia—Recent Business Conditions in South Africa—Production of Sugar in Japan—Market for British Columbia Apples in Belgium—The New Russian Customs Tariff—were not translated and reprinted in the French section. If these items are worth publishing for the benefit of the commercial interests of this Dominion, I submit that those who subscribe only to the French version, or to the Bulletin des Renseignements Commerciaux, should receive a full translation of the English version, for I submit, and I think the committee will agree with me, that what is worth doing at all is worth doing well. If approximately only half of the English version is to be republished in French, we might as well discard the whole publication. I believe, Sir, after the fairness and promptitude which the present minister displayed when he assumed office, in expediting the publishing of the French part of the Commercial Intelligence Journal, that my reminder will be sufficient and that he will take proper means to bring to the immediate attention of those in authority the necessity of issuing a complete French translation of the journal.

Mr. LOW: I agree with my hon. friend that the French edition of the Commercial Intelligence Journal should be published at the same time as the English version. We were handicapped last year by reason of an insufficient appropriation for this purpose. As my hon. friend knows, the publication of the French version costs considerably more than the English, and our vote being too small our staff was reduced, resulting in the delay complained of. The whole question of publication has been referred to a committee of which Mr. Speaker is the chairman, and I hope something will be done to consolidate many of the publications upon the same subject which are at present issued from various departments. As I said before, this vote is reduced by about $60,000. Next year I hope we may be able to reduce it still further without affecting the efficiency of the service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister tell us what documents he is ceasing to print in order to effect this reduction?

Mr. LOW: In the Bureau of Statistics there are about twenty publications which we feel might well be dispensed with. I have not the list at hand to-night, but I shall be very pleased to place it on the Table at any time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How long have these publications been printed that are being cut out?

[Mr. Doucet.]

Mr. LOW: Some of them a year, others two years, four years, five years. It was a matter of deciding whether the utility of these pamphlets warranted the expenditure on their publication.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government's course has been somewhat variable on this question. The first time any item appeared corresponding to this item of printing and stationery for the Trade and Commerce department was in 1922, the amount voted then being $125,000. This government then increased the vote to $145,000. Next year they increased it to $200,000.

Mr. LOW: That increase was something over which the government had no control. As my right hon. friend knows, the census publications in 1920-21 accounted for a large portion of the increase.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the whole point. It is because we are through with the census that the diminution is made. The item had to be put in in 1921 for the 1922 census publications, and then as the census proceeded the vote had to be increased. Of course now the vote for census publications is not necessary. That is the real explanation for the decrease.

Item agreed to.

Weights and Measures inspection, including International Bureau of Weights and Measures, $300,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: What was the revenue and the expenditure for the past year in connection with this service?

Mr. LOW: The total revenue for the year ended January 31, 1924, was $260,868.40 and the expenditure $248,082.69, without bonus, leaving a surplus of $12,785.71. The vote shows a decrease of $10,000 but there is an actual decrease of $27,000, because the advances in the civil service re-classification amount to about $17,000. Adding that to the decrease we have an actual reduction of about $27,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: I do not follow my hon. friend's reasoning. He may mean that the expenditure outside the salaries has decreased $27,000, but in fact the total expenditure last year was not as much as he is voting this year.

Mr. LOW: This is the first time that there has been a surplus. In 1919-20 there was a deficit of $77,378, and there were deficits in succeeding years as follows: 1920-21, $1,037.73; 1921-22, $14,028; in 1922-23, $1,596.21.

Mr. HANSON: How many inspectors are there in New Brunswick, how many are full time men and how many are part time men, and what are their salaries?

Mr. LOW: The inspectors for the district of St. John are: William Balcom, district inspector, $2,040; H. E. White, inspector; J. O. Leblanc, J. A. Bernier. Then there is an inspector of petroleum for a short time in the year; his remuneration amounts to $100. The first four I named are full time men. I may say that last year the bonuses allowed to the men amounted to $22,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is that bonus cut off now?

Mr. LOW: It is still in effect until the Civil Service Commission make their report.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does this vote include the grant to the International Bureau of Weights and Measures, and what is the amount of the grant?

Mr. LOW: The usual grant of $400 is continued. It is included in this vote.

Mr. CALDWELL: What is the function of this bureau?

Mr. LOW: It is something similar to the bureau respecting tariffs that was referred to a moment ago, except that it deals with weights and measures.

Mr. CALDWELL: I can understand that in the matter of tariffs it is well that we should have information from other countries, but I do not see what it matters to us how many ounces go to the pound in Belgium or how many quarts it takes to make a gallon of gin in Holland.

Mr. BELAND: They have the metric system there.

Mr. CALDWELL: Are we going to adopt the metric system? What benefit do we derive from this bureau? I am asking for information.

Mr. LOW: It has continued from the year 1907. If my hon. friend is particular about the location I will be glad to get details for him.

Mr. CALDWELL: What benefit do we derive from this bureau?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the minister tell us how much of this is for salaries of the inspectors and the staff, and how much for other expenses such as rent of buildings, travelling expenses, postage, stationery, fuel and so forth. The reason I ask is I want to compare with previous years, and in previous years the vote was divided into three items, salaries, other expenses, and then this grant of $400.

Mr. LOW: The salaries of 118 officers amounted to $160,000; contingencies, $87,000; International Bureau, $193.76 to January 31. I presume that is the amount that was spent in connection with the vote of $400. The item of $400 for the International Bureau of Weights and Measures is to honour an international obligation.

The International Bureau was established after a conference of 19 nations in Paris in 1875. Its objects are research work in the science relating to primary standards and the perfecting of the accuracy and relation of international units of weights and measures of electricity, heat, and so forth. The Bureau has been primarily concerned with the perfection and extension of the metric system, but this is not its only interest. Exceedingly useful work has been done in establishing beyond question the absolute values of English and American standard pounds, yards, and gallons and their absolute relation to the standard kilogramme and metre. I think that answers the question of my hon. friend (Mr. Caldwell).

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would ask the minister to take a look at his notes again and see if he is right. He said the salaries last year were $160,000, and the other items collected together, fuel rent and so on, $87,000 and $193 for the Bureau. The total of that is only $247,000. Is that all that was spent?

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend perhaps did not hear me say that was up to January 31, 1924.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The books are complete up to the end of the year. The information to that date is valueless.

Mr. LOW: That is the expenditure that was given me.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does the minister really think he is doing? Is he cutting down the salaries, or are they going up? Take 1921; are we going back or gaining compared with that year?

Mr. LOW: It is entirely controlled by the Civil Service Commission. The statutory increases must be paid.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend knows that what he has said is giving an absolutely wrong impression. I am not talking about statutory increases, because of course statutory increases have to go on all the time. It is perfect nonsense to say that the Civil Service Commission passed the statutes to provide for the increases; we have always had these statutory increases, and I have never heard this excuse given before by any other minister. The Civil Service Commission has absolutely nothing to do with statutory increases. That has never been calculated before by a minister wanting to show a reduction.

Mr. LOW: That is not shown.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But my hon. friend showed it and said there was a real saving of $27,000, which was real moonshine, If my hon. friend will look at the figures for 1920-1921 the salaries were $163,000. The next year the amount was higher, because that was our worst period of inflation; it was then $192,-000. But my hon. friend is right. The proportionate rate of his salaries to-day, taking the figure he gave us of $160,000 for the year, would be far greater. It is at least $212,000 on the figures supplied by my hon. friend. There is absolutely no reason for any talk of economy in this particular matter because the salaries have gone up if the minister's figures are correct. Is not the real fact, as I suggested before, that there was a change made in the schedule of charges in 1920 or 1921, and my recollection was that it was 1920? Was it not also in 1920 that the rearrangement was made of combining the departments? I think my hon. friend will find that there was an increased tariff put in, and that is shown by the greatly improved figures for the following year.

Mr. LOW: Ninety-one statutory increases amounted to $5,025; 107 changes in classification amounted to $12,140; 5 positions filled at higher rates, $420, making a total of $17,585. If we had been carrying on as heretofore we would have had to add that much extra to the amount that was voted last year. Deduct from the total of last year's vote these statutory increases and my hon. friend will find that there is a cut of $27,000. Let me also point out that while in the main estimates my figures show an increase of $433,741.31, when you deduct the capital expenditure that is included this year I have an actual reduction of $766,259. There is an item of $1,000,000 for an elevator at Edmonton, and an item of $200,000 for an elevator at Halifax, or $1,200,000 in those two items. Deducting these two capital expenditures that are included in the current expenditure of this year, I have succeeded in making an actual reduction of $766,259.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a first rate way of lathering yourself up to lather yourself down. The items are charged as they always are.

Mr. LOW: We do not have them every year through.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Were there none last year or the year before? I have no doubt my hon. friend's predecessor the Acting Minister of Finance, if he had wanted to could have made just the same kind of argument that my hon. friend has made to-night.

Mr. LOW: He could not have made that argument because it was not there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it will be found there were some. Does my hon. friend say there were no individual items in the vote last year?

Mr. LOW: One.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What one?

Mr. LOW: One of $200,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a hardy annual for decorative purposes, and used whenever there is the possibility of an election. But take Edmonton, there was an item for that in last year. We will probably find some other items if we take the necessary time to go through the estimates. But what difference does it make? I should think my hon. friend would not want to be boasting a tremendous lot about reductions. Now, I want to get back to this vote. Was not the rearrangement made in 1920 that my hon. friend spoke about?

Mr. LOW: Rearrangement about what?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend explained to the committee that there was a surplus which was produced as a result of a rearrangement. When was that rearrangement made?

Mr. LOW: Towards the end of December, 1923.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What rearrangement was that?

Mr. LOW: The cutting down of the staff.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To what extent?

Mr. LOW: The cutting out of publications.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are not worrying about that. These publications were cut off because the work had stopped. I made a mistake a short time ago—

Mr. LOW: I have already told my hon. friend that in many cases districts were joined and the staff reduced.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us get one thing at a time. My hon. friend talks about publications cut off. That has nothing to do with this vote. Publications were cut off with the census publications which stopped after the census was concluded. I made a mistake in saying my hon. friend was entitled to some credit for $60,000. I was wrong; the census looked after that, or rather after its disappearance. So far as weights and measures are concerned how many less officials have we this year than we had last?

Mr. LOW: We have 109 as against 124 in the year 1920-21, although the service is always extended.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: One hundred and nine as against 124. What was it last year?

Mr. LOW: The details of all these matters should properly be discussed under the civil government estimates. When we come to discuss them I will be able to show my hon. friend that I have made a total reduction of from 235 to 250 in this department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend gave us a reason for a surplus in connection with this vote, and I am trying to find out what there is in this statement. We have now 109 men employed under vote 390; is that right?

Mr. LOW: The number of inspectors, and others in connection with the staff, in 1920-21 was 124. In 1921-22, the number was 120; in 1922-23, 119; and this year, 109. Notwithstanding the fact that the service has been extended we have made a reduction of 10.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many more machines are there? Is not a great deal of this business being done by adding machines or mechanical devices of that character?

Mr. LOW: No, there are no automatic machines.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So we saved 10 men as a result of the re-organization made last December? Is that right?

Mr. LOW: November or December.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What other departments came into that? What was the change that was made?

Mr. LOW: Some of the districts were united and some—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Any offices closed?

Mr. LOW: I think there was an office closed, I think the one at Sherbrooke, if I remember rightly, was transferred to Montreal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Any transfers to other departments?

Mr. LOW: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The work was continued just as it was.

Mr. LOW: All the work is being continued and is greater in volume.

Mr. CALDWELL: I put a question last year under this vote, and I should like the minister to tell me whether any change has been made in consequence of it? That is in regard to the inspecting of gasoline measuring pumps. When you use such a pump you turn a crank round so far and it is supposed to measure a gallon.

Mr. LOW: I think the regulations are just about the same as last year.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think the minister last year, if I remember rightly, promised some change. I gave a good illustration at that time of how the system of measuring works out. I do not know how often these pumps are inspected, but I remember driving into a garage once to fill my tank. That tank held, I think, ten gallons of gasoline and there were already two or three gallons in it. The garage man pumped in ten gallons. I told him I did not mind paying for the extra gallon of gasoline, but I did not like to have my tank spoiled. I told him to put the measuring pump to work because there were already two or three gallons in the tank. He got a gallon measure, turned his pump on, put the gasoline into the measure and found that the tank was a little more than two thirds full. He seemed very much surprised. I do not think he intended to wilfully defraud anybody.

Mr. LOW: Has the hon. member a copy of the regulations adopted last year? They may provide for the suggestion to which he refers.

Mr. CALDWELL: My suggestion was that after licensing the use of these pumps an inspection should be frequently made, because anybody who has had any experience with pumps knows that the valve in the pump sometimes gets out of order very quickly. Although the pump may be inspected and found perfectly right to-day, in a month from now it may be out of order and in some cases absolutely wrong. Gasoline is a very hard thing to regulate. A pump that will pump water accurately might fail to pump gasoline, because gasoline will work out through an iron tank frequently. It certainly will work out through a wooden barrel. I urged last year very strongly that these devices for measuring gasoline should not be licensed without—

Mr. LOW: You want the measuring made visible?

Mr. CALDWELL: Exactly.

Mr. LOW: I may say to my hon. friend that I think the order in council that was passed in April this year contained such a provision as he speaks of. I think that feature is provided for in the new regulations.

Mr. CALDWELL: You have not a copy with you?

Mr. LOW: I would be very glad to send the hon. member a copy of the regulations. I think he will find they contain such a clause.

Mr. CALDWELL: I will admit this pump is a very handy device; I think it saves a lot of labour. I should like to make a suggestion to the minister along the lines of what should be done. I do not think it will be necessary to do away with these pumps entirely. I think he should insist that there should be a glass receptacle that will hold a gallon of gasoline so that the gasoline might be visible as it flows into the tank.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think some of them work that way now.

Mr. CALDWELL: We do not have them in the East, we are still using the old kind. I think the department should insist that if a license is granted to a pump of this type it should have a visible addition of the kind I have mentioned.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister has not yet told me whether there was any increase in 1921 in the rate of fees charged.

Mr. LOW: None since I came into the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I know that, but the minister has been there only a very short time.

[Mr. Caldwell.]

Mr. LOW: The Minister of Trade and Commerce does not recall that there was any change.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was there a change in 1920 or 1921?

Mr. LOW: I think my hon. friend will know.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a sharp betterment according to the figures read by my hon. friend for 1921-22, and I think the reason was an increase in the fees.

Mr. BELAND: Was it the late government?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. BELAND: Did they increase the fees?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes. There was an increase in efficiency also, which is sadly lacking to-day.

Item agreed to.

West India cable, $19,466.57.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is this for repairs?

Mr. LOW: The vote last year amounted to $29,199. This covers a period up to the 30th of September. At that time the contract was under the Post Office Department. At present most of these cable companies are under that department. It was thought well to transfer this to the service. Shortly after this agreement was signed war broke out and the company's operating expenses consequently increased in a manner not contemplated when the agreement was signed. The company's financial condition was carefully looked into by the Canadian High Commissioner in London in 1921, and he reported that their position was precarious and not likely to change materially during the remaining years of the contract. Last year we had a communication from the British government stating it was the intention to build a new cable and they asked the Dominion government if they would participate in the cost. They sent forward a figure, our portion of which would exceed the amount we had been paying. I cabled back to our High Commissioner stating we were ready to contribute as long as the amount was not in excess of the amount we had been paying for a number of years. Tenders had been called for some time ago which showed a very much increased amount, and I suggested to the members of the Imperial conference when they were going over—the Prime Minister and other members of the government—that they should point out to the British members of the board that new tenders should be called in order to see if the price would not be reduced, with the result that I think there will be a saving to this country. In the amount which was first suggested by the British government according to the tender they had received, there was not. As the result of my cable asking assurance of no increase the British government re-examined their tender. There will now be a saving of from $16,000 to $20,000 in which Canada will share.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will we have an interest in this cable?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have a proprietary and contractural interest in the cable, if my memory serves me right, and the whole thing is based on a contract which extends over a number of years, and which fixes our liability and also our rights, and I well recall that the condition was improving for us year by year. We had a certain amount to pay, but we had an interest in profits, and I am satisfied from memory that a large sum was coming about the time we left office. I would like to know how that has worked out. The venture was proving very successful, and the Canadian interest improved considerably.

Mr. LOW: It was found that the cable would have to be renewed, and when the Prime Minister went to London last year, I pointed out to him that tenders had been called for. The matter was taken up by the Prime Minister in London last November, and he expressed the final consent of the Canadian government to the scheme stating that drafts of the proposed legislation in the British parliament as to the final scheme and powers of the Pacific Cable Board were satisfactory. That was the cable received from London, I might say. The Minister of Trade and Commerce replied by cable to the Prime Minister in London agreeing to the proposed arrangement, providing that the cost of the subsidy to be paid would not be in excess of that now paid for the service. That cable I addressed to the Canadian Prime Minister in London. The proposal is not that Canada should pay a subsidy, but that she should assume her share of the annual deficit which would be considerably less than the subsidy paid at the present time. The Pacific Cable Board will construct and operate the new system which is expected to be ready by October first, when the West Indies and Panama Telegraph Company will go out of business. Canada's interest in regard to the Pacific cable is looked after by the Post Office Department and Canada's representative on the board reports to that department from time to time. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has accordingly written to the Postmaster General asking if this department will take over Canada's share of this service from October first, 1924.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know whether the minister has the date of it, but I would like to get if possible the contractual relationship, not in detail but in the large—the main features of it. I think we have a contractual interest in it, and there were expectations, if I could not use a stronger word, that we should not be paying half of what we were paying before, but rather by this time we should be getting a revenue. I am only making this statement as a matter or recollection, and I should like to get the facts.

Mr. LOW: The agreement with the West Indies and Panama Telegraph Company expires on September 30th, 1924, and we have therefore to provide for only one-half the usual vote. The above amount is Canada's share, £4,000, of the cost of cable communication with the West Indies, under the joint agreement between the British government, the Canadian government and the West Indies and Panama Telegraph Company. The agreement with this company came into operation on October 1, 1914, for a period of ten years and the payments since its inception have been gradually increasing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister is right about that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is right on one point, I know that; nor do I say that any part of what he has read is wrong. The reason for the reduction by half this year of what it was last year is simply because the contract expires in a half year.

Mr. LOW: I explained that to the committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not get the explanation. The minister was trying to impress the committee at first that it was due to some arrangement which the Prime Minister had made in England.

Mr. LOW: No, I explained that this covered only to the 30th of September of this year. I said that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister said that the last time.

Mr. LOW: I also said that it accounted for the vote being so small this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister says that the expenses have been going up; but I noticed that the amount voted was, as I expected, exactly the same to a cent. Every year as far back as I can trace the estimate —as far back as 1918—it has been exactly the same. This year it is just half as much, to a cent.

Mr. LOW: How does the hon. member figure out that it is just half?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amount before was $38,933.33 and this year it is $19,466.67.

Mr. LOW: But that is for the half year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, of course it is for the half year, and this is in pursuance of the contract. There has been no extra expense year by year, or at any rate none has been yet revealed. The minister however spoke about its costing more each year.

Mr. LOW: I said it was gradually increasing. For example, in 1919-20 it was $33,723; in 1920-21 $34,066; in 1921-22 $38,917 and in 1922-23 a little larger. Probably this year it will go up slightly. My hon. friend said that it should be a profitable investment by this time but it has not turned out that way so far as money goes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amount voted every year has been the same to a cent up to this year, when for half the year it is exactly half the annual amount. It does not seem reasonable that if we were only estimating the amount we should estimate it to the accuracy of a penny.

Mr. ROBB: We do that in most departments; we always estimate a little more than we spend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But you estimate in round figures, in hundreds or thousands.

Mr. ROBB: This probably was based on a contract.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, of course; it is based on a contract and we are paying the same amount each year. I will not press the point further. Will the minister answer this: What will happen after October? Does the contract fully expire? Have we no rights from October 1 on and if we have, what has the department in contemplation as respects this cable?

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. LOW: The British government expects to build a new cable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are we going to do about the matter?

Mr. LOW: We shall pay this amount to the British government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We shall continue the same payment?

Mr. LOW: As I have said, there may be a slight increase.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are going to pay on the same basis after October 1 as before?

Mr. LOW: Yes, I insisted that it should not be higher.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am disappointed that it is not a great deal lower.

Mr. LOW: How does my hon. friend expect it to be lower when it is going up a little?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the earnings of the cable have been far greater. I know it was expected that we should get a profit soon.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend knows that the company is in bad condition financially.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not know it. Is that the case?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Has the government ever got any revenue from the cable?

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. CALDWELL: Has the British government accepted the offer of the minister that we shall pay the same in future as we have done in the past?

Mr. LOW: Yes, I think they have accepted it.

Mr. CALDWELL: I understand that at the end of September, 1924, the service will be handed over to the Post Office Department and a vote will be provided in their estimate.

Mr. LOW: Yes, there will be an item there to cover the rest of the year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is not really a saving but a transfer.

Mr. LOW: There is no saving. I stated at the outset that this would cover the period to September 30, 1924, when the matter would be transferred to the Post Office Department and a further vote would appear.

Item agreed to.

Amount required to recoup A. E. Bryan, $4,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who is Mr. Bryan, and why should he get $4,000?

Mr. LOW: Mr. Bryan is our trade representative in Japan. He lost all his household effects during the earthquake, and he asked the department to allow him a certain amount to recoup his loss. He presented a bill for 13,575 yen.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A yen is 50 cents.

Mr. LOW: At the time that was equivalent to about $6,786. I thought we should at least do something to compensate him and I suggested this amount of $4,000.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—Patent Record, $35,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, we were here last night until a quarter past one, the night before until ten minutes to one, and the night before that until about twelve twenty-five. The minister should not carry us into something else to-night.

Mr. CAHILL: It is only eleven o'clock now.

Mr. LOW: There are not many items in the patent vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the minister not going to adopt the suggestion which I made? It is a good deal earlier than usual I know, but it is after the hour which the Prime Minister set as a reasonable hour for adjournment. We have not gone on very fast,—

Mr. LOW: We certainly have not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —but the delay has not been here.

Mr. LOW: I certainly have taken more time with my estimates than I expected. However, I am not complaining. But we are all very anxious to get through with the work of the session, and I think an hour or so more would not be wasted in passing the estimates of the Patent branch.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is all right for the minister, when he gets his estimates through he is done; but we have to sit here and watch every item.

Mr. LOW: I am never done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not want to be imposed on. We have been very reasonable with the minister. Every time when we went past eleven o'clock with our estimates a terrible row was raised.

Mr. BELAND: In this connection there is a consideration that perhaps will appeal to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a member of the Redistribution committee, and the province of Ontario is now under consideration by a sub-committee of which he is a member. I am informed that this sub-committee expect within three or four days to be able to present a unanimous report to the whole committee The idea of proceeding further to-night is to enable my hon. friend to take up his work on the sub-committee next week.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would seem to me that if the minister is engaged on that work it is strange that his bills and his estimates should have been before us continuously during the last three days.

Mr. BELAND: The hon. member felt that he would be a good deal more at ease with his work on the Redistribution committee if he had his estimates disposed of.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He has been furthering its work by keeping away from it for the last two or three days. I appreciate the point.

Mr. BELAND: But he expected to get through with his estimates a good deal earlier. We do not complain; it is nobody's fault in particular, only reasonable and regular information having been asked for by hon. members and supplied by the minister. As I have said, he is anxious to get through with his estimates in order to devote his time for the first two or three days of next week to the consideration of the readjustment in Ontario.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think in view of the fact that we are not yet sitting Saturdays we might very well go on for another hour. I cannot believe the right hon. leader of the opposition is serious when he says there was fault found if he went past eleven o'clock when he was in charge of the administration, because I sat here for two sessions while he was in power and I think I am safe in saying that I never remember the House adjourning at eleven o'clock. Indeed, I have seen new estimates brought down after twelve o'clock and discussed for two hours. He should not object very strenuously, especially towards the end of the session. We are all anxious to get through some time this summer, and if the right hon. gentleman would not object too strenuously it seems to me we might dispose of some of these estimates. To-morrow is Saturday, and we can very well afford to sit until twelve o'clock to-night.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is perfectly true that we did sit after eleven, often after twelve o'clock, but we never did it with the acquiescence of the opposition and were always met with a row. And what is more, we were met with something altogether different from the reception which we have given these estimates. If the minister would have some one in front to supply him with information it would very much expedite progress; no minister can hunt up information with the detail required without creating serious delay. Then we devoted an hour or two to-day and an hour or two yesterday to another bill of the minister's, and nobody in this House would suggest that the delay was the fault of any member on this side. I do not think it would be necessary for me to suggest whose fault it was. Then why should we, who sat last night until one o'clock and who have committees every morning, be called upon to go through that process every night? It is unreasonable, it is irrational, and it does not conduce to the expeditious conduct of business.

Mr. ROBB: My right hon. friend is quite right, we have been working overtime and have done fairly well. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce recognizes that. He suggests that we might put through this Patent Record item, and then adjourn.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If we can get that through without any explanation, I would let it go.

Mr. SPENCER: When this item was up last session I think the minister told me that the fees charged took care of the expenses. Is that the fact?

Mr. LOW: The item amounts to $35,000 and has been reduced by $10,000. The expenditure for 1922-23 was $36,397.20; for the current year to February 29, 1924, it amounted to $31,365. The Patent Record is a publication issued pursuant to section 60 of the Patent Act. It appears every Tuesday, which is the only day that patents are issued. It gives to the public a brief description of every patent on the day it is issued. This is useful in enabling the public in general and inventors in particular to ascertain what inventions are covered by patents without the trouble of visiting the patent office. One thousand copies are printed, the distribution being as follows: subscribers, 364; exchanges, 48; free list, libraries, 231; government, 106. It is sent out only to those on the free list who have expressed a wish to receive it. The annual subscription is $4 and the price of a single copy is 10 cents. The amount received last year from subscriptions and the sale of single copies was $1,859.19.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is being cut out to effect the reduction?

Mr. LOW: It is economy in service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What answer is that?

Mr. LOW: It may not suit my right hon. friend, nevertheless it is true.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What information does one get from that? This is why there is delay and why we are kept here all hours of the night. I asked, what is cut out? Are there men cut out? Is some part of the publication cut out? The answer I get is that there is economy in the service.

Mr. LOW: There has been a reduction of about thirty in the staff. The temporaries were retired first and some were retired under the Calder Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are the patents issued fewer now?

Mr. LOW: I do not think so. It does not necessarily follow that fewer men will not do the same amount of work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I notice that previous to 1921 it was $61,000 and that it was then cut to $45,000. Some different system must be adopted and I would like to know what it is. Apparently under the late government there was a reduction of $16,000; now the reduction is $10,000.

Mr. LOW: There is quite a reduction in the staff.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is in connection with records—do not mix them.

Mr. LOW: A number of clerks are paid out of this vote. The permanent staff and the temporary staff amount to 84 to-day as against 114 on the first of April, 1923. For salaries last year there was voted $177,000; this year we ask for $149,000. For contingencies last year we asked for $35,000 and this year $30,000. The Patent Record cost $45,000 last year and this year it has been reduced to $35,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now we will come back and see if we can get the information, though I am really not very hopeful. This is the Patent Record. The minister talked all round the bush about the employees of his department in the Patents branch, which has nothing to do with it. We tried to tell him that it had nothing to do with it, but he persisted. If the cost of publishing the Patent Record is less, there must be a reason for it. Perhaps the reason is that it is smaller, that the patents issued are fewer, that the information given is less, or that the cost of printing is less. I have asked which it is and I have been given all sorts of talk about something that does not pertain to it at all. I cannot get an answer to the simple question.

Mr. LOW: Well, a reduction has been made in the issuing of the Patent Record, we will agree upon that. As to the details of how it is arrived at, if my right hon. friend wishes this item to stand over I will get the information for him to-morrow, or perhaps he will accept my word that I will get it, and in the meantime allow the item to go through.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, we will let the item go through, so far as I am concerned, if the minister will get the information for to-morrow?

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

Monday, June 23, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the Table of the House the French edition of the report of the Department of National Defence, together with several orders in council relating to the department which, under the statute, are required to be also placed on the Table.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by Mr. Pelletier:

That this House doth concur in the third report of the joint committee of both Houses on the printing of parliament, with the exception of the last paragraph thereof.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that the proper procedure would be to refer the motion back.

Mr. SPEAKER: The same question came up in 1884, and in the drafting of the motion I followed the form which will be found in the journals of the House of that year, namely:

On motion of Mr. White (Cardwell), seconded by Mr. Bergin, resolved, that this House doth concur in the Sixth Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the printing of Parliament, with the exception of the last paragraph thereof.

It is the usual procedure. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbinière): I beg to move that the tenth report of the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

STRIKE OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. C. St. PERE (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Stewart) if he has received a telegram from the Montreal postal employees to the following effect?—

The post office employees of Montreal are ready to return to work provided the government will grant an independent board of arbitration with equal representations to employees, findings to be accepted by all concerned; pending negotiations all employees to return to work to former positions. This proposition similar to demands of Toronto.

Now, may I add a few words—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member will understand that he can only put a question at this time.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil) (Acting Postmaster General): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of that telegram as well as one of a similar character from the striking postal employees of Toronto. I replied that the government would not under any circumstances consider arbitration with the striking employees.

Mr. Speaker, in fairness to parliament I think I should make a short statement with respect to the strike of postal employees. At the moment all points at which a strike was declared are normal, except Toronto and Windsor. For some reason or other we have had considerable difficulty at Windsor. At Toronto on Saturday, in compliance with the order sent out by me, a number of men endeavoured to get back to work. They had a meeting at night, and of course were unable to offer themselves before eight o'clock the following morning, but owing to the crowd then gathered around the post office they were unable to register. Having definitely assured myself that that was the case, I have extended some leniency to employees at Toronto and Montreal who exhibited a desire —indeed, so expressed themselves to the postmaster—to return. In their cases we are giving the postmaster the right to exercise his judgment as to whom he shall take back, the men to go back as new recruits.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the minister's justification for saying that things are normal in Montreal, in view of the telegram just read?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That telegram was despatched Saturday.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It got normal since?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Absolutely. I think I can assure my right hon. friend that mail despatched from Ottawa this morning will be delivered by carriers this afternoon in Montreal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not mean that. I mean, is the strike over in Montreal?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Well, those men who went out, 560 odd, are still out.

Mr. ST. PERE: Mr. Speaker, I was at a meeting of the local strikers in Montreal. I hate to call them "strikers"—a word which is much misunderstood in certain quarters—because I consider their cause is just. They represented to me that they had never been informed of the contents of the telegram sent by the hon. minister to the federation on the day previous to the strike, because if such had been known to them they would not have gone on strike. I think, therefore, that there must be an embroglio somewhere and that their present claim for an arbitration board is justified. It seems very strange that the Montreal men were not informed of the contents of that telegram. Are we to infer from that that they were misled by members of their federation? I would like an explanation from the minister.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have no knowledge as to whether the striking post office employees were informed of the contents of that telegram. It was forwarded to the Canadian Federation of Postal Employees at Toronto, who were the head and front of the organized effort in connection with this strike. In addition, the postmasters at Montreal, Toronto, Windsor and Kitchener and other points where the men were on strike were sent copies of this telegram and instructed to give it the widest publicity. We also endeavoured to secure publicity through the press so that all might be informed. I am sorry if the employees at Montreal were not informed by their chief executive, but I took every step in my power to make the matter public.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTINGS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. J. LOVETT (Digby-Annapolis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister when the government intends holding Saturday sittings. It would certainly expedite business, and I understand that very many hon. members favour this course.

Mr. GAUVREAU: And morning sittings also.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government contemplates beginning morning sittings on Monday of next week. As to whether we shall sit on Saturday of this week I cannot say at the moment; the probability is that I will be in a position to state definitely by Thursday next.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is customary to sit mornings or Saturdays until an arrangement has been made for the close of the session. When we are able to make that arrangement, of course I shall have no objection to the usual practice being followed.

Mr. T. W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I apprehend that the government does not contemplate morning sittings until the work of the committees is over. At the present time several important committees are sitting every morning except Saturdays. I think we might more conveniently sit Saturdays until these committees conclude their business.

Mr. GAUVREAU: What difference does it make? They are sitting whether the House is sitting or not.

Mr. CALDWELL: Not many of them are sitting when the House is in session.

Mr. GAUVREAU: We can have morning sittings just as well. We want to go home.

FURTHER LEGISLATION

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if he has any other legislation for this session besides that announced to the House on the ninth of June?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As far as I recall at the moment, the announcement I made on that occasion covers all the legislation that the government contemplates bringing down this session.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Will my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) explain the reason for the delay in bringing down the Supplementary Estimates? The British Columbia election is now past, is there any further necessity for withholding the information in connection with the elevator at Vancouver? Everybody apparently wants to get home, but we do not know what we can do until these Supplementaries are brought down. Of course, if my hon. friend can tell us that there are to be no further estimates, the announcement will expedite our proceedings.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was in hope that there would be no Supplementary Estimates, but the persistency of my hon. friend has chased away that hope. There will be Supplementary Estimates, and I hope to place them before the House within a few days.

THE SOVIET AND UKRAINIAN REPUBLICS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, on June 16 I asked the Prime Minister whether the agreement between England and Russia of July 3, 1922, was endorsed by Canada, and whether the government of Canada had definitely recognized the union of the Soviet Socialist Republics; and, further, whether the government recognized the so-called Ukrainian People's Republic. I put the question because of certain actions now before the courts. It seems to me only reasonable that we should know where we stand in this regard.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I regret having been absent from the House one or two days last week and thus unable to answer my hon. friend's question. By minute of council of December 26, 1921, the Canadian government approved a formula suggested by His Majesty's government to make applicable to Canada the provisions of the trade agreement between His Majesty's government and the Russian Soviet government of the 16th March 1921. Effect was given to this decision by an exchange of notes dated the 3rd July, 1922, between the foreign office and the Russian trade delegation in London, so that the agreement should apply to the Dominion from that date. Canada's formal recognition of the union of Soviet Socialist Republics was conveyed to their offical agent in Canada, Mr. A. Yazikoff, in a letter from the Prime Minister dated the 24th March, 1924. Among the States included in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics which Canada has recognized is a Ukrainian Socialist Soviet Republic. Canada has not, however, recognized the Ukrainian People's Republic.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I would ask the Prime Minister to lay on the Table the papers, especially the letter—I presume it was—in which we recognized the states referred to.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Bill No. 196, for the relief of Annie Thirde.—Mr. Hocken.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MR. MARTIN T. O'BRIEN

Hon. Mr. BAXTER:

1. For what reason was Martin T. O'Brien of Noel, Hants County, dismissed from the Department of Customs?
2. Is it true that he was notified that it was on account of active political partisanship?
3. If so, what constituted such active political partisanship?
4. What evidence did the department have of it?
5. Who supplied the proof and in what form was it?
6. Was O'Brien given a hearing? If so, before whom and when?

Mr. LAPOINTE (for the Minister of Customs and Excise):

1. Active political partisanship.
2. Yes.
3, 4 and 5. On statement of member of parliament.
6. No.

NEWS STAND—WINNIPEG

Mr. McQUARRIE:

1. Has space in or in front of the post office in the city of Winnipeg been rented for a news stand? If so, who received the privilege?
2. What rental does the government receive?
3. Is he a returned soldier?
4. Were any other applications for this space received, and if so, from whom?
5. Is it the policy of the government to give preference to returned soldiers in matters of this kind?

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay): Owing to representations from the Winnipeg Board of Trade and other bodies, the government decided not to permit a news stand in front of the Winnipeg post office.

If a number of applications were received the privilege would go to the highest bidder. If a returned soldier bid were equal to highest tender it would be policy to give the returned soldier the preference.

MR. W. M. CORY

Mr. CHAPLIN:

1. Is W. M. Cory an employee of the Department of the Interior?
2. If so, when was he appointed to said department, to what position was he appointed and at what salary?
3. Was his appointment to said department made as the result of on open competitive examination?
4. Is the said W. M. Cory a son of the Deputy Minister of the Department of the Interior?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1. Yes.
2. January 1, 1916, clerk, Dominion Parks branch, $600.
3. First appointment under authority of Section 79, Dominion Lands Act. Engagement ratified by Civil Service Commission and Auditor General. Appointed to present position by Civil Service Commission as result of promotional competition.
4. Yes.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY—SHARES HELD BY SENATORS

Mr. GERMAN:

1. Are any members of the Senate of Canada shareholders in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company?
2. If so, what are the names of such Senators?
3. How many shares of stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company stand in the name of each of such Senators?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: This question refers to a situation existing or that might exist between the Senate of Canada or its members and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That information could only be secured from that company, and I suggest that if the question is to be asked at all it should be asked in the Senate.

MILITARY AND CADET CAMPS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Have the June military and cadet camps for the militia at Niagara and other places been abolished or discontinued for this year?

2. Why has no announcement been made to the House up to date or to the militia interested until recently of said abandonment?

3. Will the department recompense any boards of education in Ontario who have spent funds for camp preparation and training purposes in expectation of these camps being held this year and for failure of the department, to notify these Boards of the camp's discontinuance?

4. What military and cadet camps in Ontario were held in the year 1913, and for the years 1921-1924?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou):

1. The June military camps are being held throughout Canada in the form of camp schools and camps of instruction. Camps for cadets are not being held this year.

2. The usual practice has been followed—instructions were sent to military districts as soon as information was available.

3. Boards of education are not put to any expense in preparing for camps or training purposes as both these items are ordinarily borne by the cadet vote.

4. 1913. Military: Petawawa, Niagara, London, Barriefield. Cadets: London, Niagara, Barriefield, Fort William.

1922-23. Miltary: Port Elgin, Petawawa, Carling Heights, Niagara Camp, Owen Sound, Borden, Rockcliffe, Peterborough, Prescott.

Cadets: Nil.

1923-24. Military: Niagara Camp, Connaught, Peterborough, Iroquois, Petawawa, Barriefield, Picton, Muncey Indian Reserve, Arkona. Cadets: London, Long Branch, Barriefield, Silver Islet, Fort Frances.

HONOURARY COLONELS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is the office of "honourary colonel" still in existence in Canada for civilians, or has it been abolished?

2. Does it entitle this class of officer to wear a military uniform on all occasions, both civil and military and at will, and what is the rule regarding these officers' right to wear uniform?

3. Have any applications been received for leave by militia units to use pre-war uniforms of their respective units instead of khaki?

4. If so, has such leave been refused, and why?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou):

1. Still in existence.

2. Uniform may be worn on the following occasions: (1) On a definite military duty or parade; (2) Other occasions when on the special authority of the District Officer Commanding the Military District concerned.

3. Yes.

4. Units of the non-permanent Active Militia, other than the bands thereof, are not permitted to wear pre-war uniform, having due regard to funds not being available to outfit the whole of the non-permanent Active Militia with this uniform.

LEASE OF LAND AT MIDDLETON, N.S.

Mr. HANSON:

1. Has the government leased the lot of land in Middleton, Nova Scotia, purchased as a site for a public building, or granted any right or privilege therein to any person, and, if so, to whom and upon what terms?

2. If the said land has been leased, was the town council or other local authority consulted before such action was taken?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. To Mr. Phinney for an ice cream stand, at a rental of $3 per month.

2. No.

INCOME TAX REVENUE

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What was the gross income tax collected in each of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, for the year ending the 31st March, 1924?

2. What was the net income tax collected in each of the same three provinces for the above-mentioned period?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. Alberta, $1,369,224.24; Saskatchewan, $1,090,395.70; Manitoba, $3,731,074.78.

2. Alberta, $1,270,287.79; Saskatchewan, $927,194.04; Manitoba, $3,625,930.37.

AMOUNTS DUE CANADA BY ROUMANIA AND GREECE

Mr. RINFRET:

1. What is the actual amount due to Canada by (a) Roumania; (b) Greece?

2. What amount of the said sum represents unpaid interest due by each of the above-mentioned countries?

3. What amount of interest has been paid, and on what dates, by (a) Roumania; (b) Greece?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. (a) Roumania, $23,969,720; (b) Greece, $8,174,274.57.

2. (a) Roumania: In consolidating the Roumanian debt as of October 1, 1922, at the above-mentioned figure, unpaid interest of $3,502,213.29 was added to the original principal. There have been no arrears since consolidation. (b) Greece: In consolidating the Greek debt as of December 31, 1922, at the above mentioned figure, unpaid interest of $625,973.90 was added to the original principal. There have been no arrears since consolidation.

3. (a) By Roumania:

April 1, 1923	$ 479,390 00
October 1, 1923	479,390 00
April 1, 1924	479,390 00
	$ 1,438,170 00

(b) By Greece:

August 24, 1920	$ 7,834 79
October 8, 1920	53,160 61
January 15, 1922	273,949 14
February 22, 1922	141,327 75
August 4, 1923	225,000 00
December 29, 1923	225,000 00
	$ 926,272 29

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—COAL

Mr. CARROLL:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, receipts, vouchers, tenders, awards and other documents having reference to or bearing on an item of $8,907,846.06, Canadian National Railways, Toronto, coal, as appears in Auditor General's Report, year ending March 31st, 1922, volume III, at page W-165, including the names of the persons, firms and corporations from whom the Canadian National Railways purchased said coal and the prices paid therefor and any contracts in writing relating to said coal.

DESTRUCTION OF BARBERRY BUSHES

Mr. LOVIE:

For a return showing the names and addresses of persons residing in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta growing barberry bushes or hedges, who have been requested by the federal Department of Agriculture to destroy them and have failed to comply with the request.

WEMBLEY EXHIBITION—CANADIAN SPACE

Mr. CHURCH:

For a return showing (1) All rules, regulations, ordinances, regarding the allotment of exhibit space by the officials in charge of the Canadian section of the Wembley Exhibition, copy of any available correspondence on space allotment between the government of Canada and its agents in charge of this building, and a copy of the order re allotment of space, showing the amount assigned to each province.

(2) A statement showing the estimated cost to the government of the Canadian exhibit, (a) for buildings; (b) for government exhibit and incidentals; (c) a list of the chief officials and their salaries.

(3) A statement or copy of any agreements between the provinces and Dominion as to space, or between the government of Canada and any city in Canada or Canadian fair as to space, showing the allotment.

ISENBERG LEASES

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents passing between J. A. Schryburt and the Prime Minister or other members of the government, relative to the Isenberg leases.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT 1906, AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Bills of Exchange Act, Revised Statutes, 1906, Chapter 119, by providing a tariff of fees to be charged by notaries for their services in all the provinces for presenting and noting for non-acceptance or non-payment any bill of exchange or promissory note, for protesting the same, keeping the same on record, furnishing copies and sending notices, and other matters incidental thereto.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of the resolution recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS ACT, 1906, AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (for the Minister of Customs and Excise) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Customs Act, Revised Statutes, 1906, Chapter 48, by providing that in estimating the damage by breakage upon brittle goods, such as crockery, china, glass and glassware, under the provisions of the said act, such allowance or damage shall only be made and allowed for the amount of loss in excess of fifteen per cent of the whole quantity damaged, and a period of fourteen days from date of entry or arrival of such goods shall be allowed within which to claim abatement for damage.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of the resolution recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Bank Act and to provide for the payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the costs incident to a system of government inspection of banks, with provision for the recoupment of such expenses by assessment upon the chartered banks.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of the resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE AND AUDIT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 198, to amend the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. ROBB: This is the bill I explained to my hon. friend the other day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this the one about the signatures?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All right.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Signatures to debentures, bonds, etc.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would remind the minister that this is not among the bills announced on Friday night, but as it is not of a contentious nature I am not going to press the objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it was the first one announced.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I just want to have the effect of this clause clear. I understand that the whole effect of it is to enable the bonding signature to be affixed to these bonds without going through the form of signing—for there is a tremendous lot of them—but using mechanical means instead. I just want to be sure that we have the same safeguard in connection with this process of signing bonds that we have to-day in connection with our bills and notes.

Mr. ROBB: Exactly the same.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Signature of deputy.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is necessary, I presume, in order to give effect to the first clause.

Mr. ROBB: It is also necessary so that if, for instance, we were required to sign issues outside Canada we could authorize someone to replace the deputy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am no authority on the question, but is it not necessary to take greater precaution with bonds than with bank notes? The science of bank note printing has become so highly technical and perfected that forgery is very, very difficult; with bonds the same is not true. One would think that this allowing of stamps on bonds might be very risky.

Mr. ROBB: The officials of the department, from their experience, contend that it can be worked just as well with bonds as with bank notes, and the same precautions will be taken as we now take with Dominion notes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but my point is this: That the bank note construction is very complicated and technical, designed through many, many years to make anything in the way of duplication impossible. Consequently the actual signature of a very important official is not so important as would be the actual signature of a very important official on the bonds, because a bond can be duplicated quite easily.

Mr. ROBB: This arrangement is optional, and I imagine the department will not exercise it unless they are perfectly satisfied they can safeguard the interests of the country.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT, 1908, AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 27, to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1908.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Explain.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The purpose of this bill, as my right hon. friend will see, is to make some minor changes in the existing act. It was proposed to substitute an important clause, clause No. 4 for section 23 of the present act, but it was objected to in many cities, and I have therefore decided to withdraw the clause. The remaining changes have been asked for by the various associations interested in child welfare, and by the various courts that deal with juvenile delinquents.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that the historic clause which was strongly supported by Mr. Scott?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Scott was strongly in favour of that clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the one that is dropped?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is dropped.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How does Mr. Scott feel about that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—"Juvenile delinquent" defined.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is proposed here is simply to add to the existing clause the words:

Or who is guilty of sexual immorality or any other form of vice.

The act as at present framed does not cover such cases, and the judges have asked that these words be added.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On a hasty reading of the amendment, I gather that it virtually constitutes, as respects a juvenile, a new offence. I am not saying that, even if it does so, it is wrong, but the effect of it should be clearly understood. The Criminal Code clearly defines immorality of this character, but heretofore no juvenile guilty of it was a juvenile delinquent within the meaning of the act. If this goes through it virtually makes the judge the arbiter of what constitutes a vice on the part of a juvenile delinquent. This bill will take the matter out of the hands of parliament and the judge will be made the arbiter. Are we not going to get into a condition where we will have a rather variegated system of jurisprudence under which we will have a Nova Scotia magistrate deciding a thing is all right, and a Manitoba magistrate deciding it is all wrong?

Mr. LAPOINTE: A tribunal for children must be considered in quite a different light from a tribunal for other persons. It is not proposed to send children to gaol, or anything of that kind. The object is to have young boys and girls under the supervision of probation officers with the object of trying to reform them. A discretion will be given to the magistrates which they did not formerly possess. I do not think the provision is likely to be abused. In any case, the amendment is in the interest of the children themselves, and for the proper administration of the act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could the minister give us a definition of a "juvenile delinquent" as it has been used in legislation up till now?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Any child who violates any provision of the Criminal Code, any Dominon or provincial statute, or any by-law or ordinance in a municipality for the violation of which punishment by fine or imprisonment may be ordered, or who is liable by reason of any other act to be committed to an industrial school or juvenile reformatory under the provisions of any Dominion or provincial statute. We propose to add the words already quoted, which is really in conformity with the spirit of the clause it enlarges.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are trying to make a new offence for children. We may be saying that something is a vice which possibly heretofore has not been regarded as such.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend knows that violation of the ordinance of a municipality is not a vice or a crime. Still under the present law, it is enough to constitute a child a juvenile delinquent. This is simply to broaden the meaning of the act, and apply it to something which is really more important than the violation of any municipal law.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, but we know what we are doing in the case of a municipal by-law.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The addition of these words has been suggested not only by the courts, but by all the organizations such as the Big Sisters and the Big Brothers, and associations for the protection of children, in Toronto, Montreal and all the big cities, especially in western Canada. All the probation officers and juvenile delinquent judges had a conference, I think last year or the year before, and they unanimously asked that this amendment should be made. I am not especially anxious to have the amendment placed in the statute if there is any objection; I am simply proposing to parliament what all those who are interested in child welfare work have asked for.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not objecting; I am simply trying to find out what the amendment means. Does my hon. friend say that the term "or other form of vice" will be confined to offences under the Criminal Code?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not think he would. Then are we not permitting magistrates—some of whom may be and undoubtedly are very estimable men, although they are not all of that class—to assume the functions of parliament and to say that such and such an act is an offence? It may be a good thing to do; it may be a good thing to say that the whole list of actions having regard to children ought to be looked upon as vices. But if we are going to do that we might consider the child himself to some extent, and also the child's parents. I am afraid this might permit a magistrate to take a child from its parents under circumstances which the parents themselves might say were perfectly harmless. In other words before the Criminal Code is invoked against any individual should it not be plain that it is in connection with some offence we already know about, some statutory offence which is already defined, and which will limit the possible intervention of a busybody? If the hon. gentleman would just point out what is meant by these words, we would understand it. What kind of an offence could his own child be arrested for? He cannot tell us. The former limitation was fourteen years, what is the present limitation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Sixteen years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend not think that it would be a good thing if the children of Ontario should know that they would be treated the same way as the children of Quebec, and vice versa, and that they could be given to understand that they are being looked after by the lawmakers of their country upon some well-recognized principle in regard to the offences with which they may be made accused? Does my hon. friend really realize that what we are doing here is asking each magistrate to define what vice is, and to legislate in effect upon each kind of vice and form of conduct, irrespective of any action of parliament? Suppose for example you have a child who engages in a game on the Lord's day—that game might consist of trundling a hoop. Some magistrate might absolutely conscientiously think that that was a vice, and might consider that the child was breaking a sacred law. Under this section could that child be taken from his parents and treated as a child requiring influences other than his home influence, in fact treated as a juvenile delinquent, while in the very next township you would very likely find a magistrate who would think that childish games on the Sabbath were not a vice and were not heinously illegal? There is also the other rule which might be applied. A magistrate might read this statute and consider himself bound by the old rule of ejusdem generis, which would confine use of these words to vices of sexual immorality. But if you read it in that way, the previous paragraph is so broad that I would have thought that these other words would be sufficient. I want my hon. friend to thoroughly understand my point before he replies. My suggestion is not that I think these children should not be looked after by the juvenile court; it is not that we should not do everything we reasonably can do in order to strengthen the hands of those administering justice in the juvenile court; there is no question we ought to do that. But, having regard to the very important question, ought there not to be a rule for juvenile offenders and ought there not to be a law for them? Ought not a child to have just as much protection as an adult before it can be arrested?

Mr. LAPOINTE: As I stated, this amendment has been suggested by associations for the protection of children. I have one letter from the Toronto League of Women Voters, suggesting the words "or who is guilty of sexual immorality or any other form of vice". I agree with my hon. friend that in ordinary legislation and in ordinary cases it would not be desirable to leave the words "or any other form of vice" in that vague form. But the point must arise that the whole spirit of the act is to protect children, and to give the magistrates who are appointed for the purpose of presiding over these juvenile courts more latitude and larger discretion. It is not designed to do any harm to children or their parents, but to help them. It has been considered, in the experience of those judges who are spending their time in that social work, that the clause as it stands on the statute is not sufficiently broad to give them all the latitude which they require. After discussing the matter with those who are promoting the legislation, and after offering the suggestions which my hon. friend has offered, I thought there were good and sufficient reasons in support of the amendment, and I have taken the responsibility of presenting this bill to the House. But I did not originate the clause myself.

Mr. BOYS: What is the right of appeal? I think there should be a right of appeal. I imagine in the main the clause would work out all right. I can conceive of cases where perhaps injustice might be done, but so long as protection by way of appeal is afforded, I would be disposed to support this amendment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not see any right of appeal in the Juvenile Court Act.

Mr. CRERAR: I am inclined to agree with the criticism of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). I can quite understand the desire of certain people and certain organizations to strengthen the legislation in this respect, and if I were certain that magistrates would always exercise a wise discretion I think I would have no objection to this provision. But it seems to me to give too much latitude to the magistrate as the provision stands at present. For instance, a young boy of fifteen years might be caught smoking cigarettes, and some person whose sensibilities would be outraged by such conduct might lodge a complaint. That boy might be brought before the magistrate; the magistrate might be of the same turn of mind as the complainant, and the boy consequently would become a juvenile delinquent. I am not overstating the case when I give that as an illustration. I do not know that it is wise to clothe magistrates with that extensive power. As it stands it would incorporate a rather dangerous principle into our criminal procedure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think I would be disposed to go as far in this direction as any hon. member of the House, as long as I felt that our footsteps were safe. I have the greatest sympathy with the organizations which have been conferring with the Minister of Justice, and I can realize their difficulties. I presume they encounter cases of depravity that do not come within the provisions of the code, and that cannot very well be brought within the terms of the code, as the code necessarily is applicable to all people old and young. The law as it stood up to the present time has been in brief this: That wherever an offence against the law is charged, we have never yet gone so far as to say to the magistrate: In the case of people below a certain age you shall be the judge of what is right or what is wrong; although this child may have offended against nothing within the purview of the code or a by-law or an act of a legislature, still if you think the child is committing what is not morally in its interest, we leave it to you to take care of it under the Juvenile Delinquents Act. That is very dangerous.

Mr. PUTNAM: Is the age not fourteen instead of sixteen?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister says sixteen. I would go this far, because I am disposed to go just as far as we safely can,—include the words "who is guilty of sexual immorality," but I would not like to allow any magistrate to define in his own mind what an offence is.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am quite willing to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend and to amend the section as suggested. I move that the words, "or any other form of vice" be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

[Mr. Crerar.]

On section 2—Release on probation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is to authorize the court to adjourn from time to time the disposition of the case as well as the hearing. As the old section stood, the hearing could be adjourned; but when all the witnesses had been heard the judge had to dispose of the case immediately, although it might have been better that sentence should be suspended or judgment deferred and the boy or girl placed under the supervision of some probation officer or in charge of some good people. There is nothing contentious about this.

The second change in the section is that the fine which the court may impose is increased from ten dollars to twenty-five dollars. The judge, of course, still has discretion in regard to the amount, and he may impose a fine of one dollar if he thinks proper.

The last change is to give authority to the judge to impose such further or other conditions as may be deemed advisable. This was not in the original act. One condition, for instance, may be when the case is one of theft that the deliquent should make restitution of the money.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If that is the only matter that is sought to be covered, it is not necessary at all. As a matter of ordinary practice, my hon. friend well knows, a judge has often adjourned sentence in order to see whether restitution will take place or not. I know we always did that in the old days.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But no harm will be done by having that inserted. It may be for other purposes too, conditions in a general way. I am simply quoting this.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It cannot be for that. It must be for something else. Is it intended that further and other punishment may be inflicted?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The word "condition" I suppose, has to do with the child's conduct. One condition you put on a man or on a child is restraint. Does this mean that there is the possibility of other penalties being inflicted?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No. I do not think my hon. friend is doing justice to those who are asking for these amendments. They are not trying to punish the children; they want to protect them, to help them. This is rather so that they may have more discretion for the child's own benefit. My hon. friend seems to think there is something mysterious about the whole matter and that they want to punish somebody. If that were the spirit of the amendments, my hon. friend would be right; but it is not. I do not think there is anything very dangerous in this.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that there is. I am trying simply to find out what the minister really wants done.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will give my hon. friend the reasons that have been given to me by those who are really promoting this bill:

The fourth amendment proposed to subsection one of section sixteen by adding the words "and may impose upon the delinquent such further or other conditions as may be deemed advisable," is again for the purpose of giving the court wider discretion in dealing with children for their betterment. The right to impose conditions as, for instance, the making of restitution—

I was not so far astray.

. . . .etc., has been questioned and while such a right probably exists—

As my hon. friend rightly says:

—under the present act yet it is better to make the matter clear by the suggested amendment.

Mr. HANSON: Why is it deemed necessary to increase the maximum fine from ten dollars to twenty-five dollars? What little experience I have had has been that the parent always has to pay the fine and very often a parent who can least afford to pay it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The judge of the Juvenile Court at Regina, who is secretary of the association, has written us as follows:

In the western provinces where people are isolated, many of them living on farms removed a considerable distance from town or city, when a boy is proved to be a juvenile delinquent, it is impossible to place him properly on probation, for the simple reason that there is no probation officer near him to whom he can report. Many of the delinquents belong to the new Canadian type, and to simply return them to their parents when they are not sent to an industrial school, with merely a warning and no probation and no fine, means, that they do not realize they have committed an offence. The only possible way to touch some of these people is through their pockets. And some of same boys work on farms and in harvest time especially earn large wages, and it was thought that in cases where a boy is earning his own wages a fine of ten dollars was too small. It was for these exceptional cases that the amount was suggested changed to $25.

And further on:

The question was fully discussed, and while we felt that possibly some of those acting as juvenile court judges might take advantage of the large fine, yet we felt on the whole that most of the judges would not.

It is also stated:

The idea of a fine is somewhat foreign to the juvenile court system, where the action taken is always what is best in the interests of the boy; but there are of course exceptional cases where it is desirable to impose a fine, and the association—

That is, all the judges.

—considers that the limit should be $25 instead of $10 as at present.

It is suggested especially to cover western cases.

Mr. FORKE: I think that when a fine is imposed on a boy under sixteen years of age it simply means a fine upon his parents.

Mr. PUTNAM: The punishment of the parent through payment of the fine, although sometimes undeserved, is indirectly the best punishment that can be imposed for the offence. A fine of twenty-five dollars for some parents might be less felt than a fine of ten cents in other families. I think I can see a fair reason for increasing the fine to the limit. It does not necessarily follow that the magistrates will impose the maximum.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Support of child—proviso.

Mr. BOYS: This imposes a responsibility upon the municipality. I do not know whether the minister has had experience of similar provisions with regard to hospital expenses, but if he has he will be aware that exceedingly nice points arise as to what constitutes "residence." Personally I would not be in favour of this clause unless there is some very distinct provision in the bill defining what shall constitute a resident of a municipality.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have myself had experience to which my hon. friend refers. In the province of Quebec when the government is claiming from a municipality the cost for hospital patients there is sometimes much difficulty in deciding which municipality is responsible. But in this case we are doing something for the advantage of the municipality, because the clause in the original act reads as follows:

In every such case it shall be within the power of the court to make an order upon the parent or parents of the child or upon the municipality to which it belongs to contribute to its support such sum as the court may determine.

When the means of the parents are not known, the order has always been against the municipality. This amendment is to give the municipality the right to reclaim the money from the parents, a right which the original clause did not give.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I do not think that settles the point raised as to whether the child belongs to a certain municipality. In other cases it has been found necessary to define residence as meaning, say, one year's residence in the municipality. The act says simply "the municipality to which the child belongs." Does one day's residence give a municipality a claim upon the child?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The ordinary law of domicile and residence does apply.

Mr. BOYS: It would, of course, where there is no definition of what constitutes residence, but in some acts and regulations there are definitions.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There must be some rule of practice in Ontario as to that; the courts must decide what length of residence is considered necessary in the case my hon. friend referred to. The same jurisprudence would apply there.

Mr. BOYS: As a matter of fact regulations have been passed for dealing with the question; where there is no regulation, one can become a "resident" of any place the very moment of setting foot there. That of course, is another feature. I must admit that when I first looked at this section I did not quite appreciate its significance, but we have often to look at these things in a great hurry. I see that all this section does is to give the municipality the right to recover from the parent or parents any money paid by it in the first instance. Cases might arise where there are no parents but only guardians. What about such a case? And, further, what about a Barnardo boy?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid the municipality would have to bear the cost as it does in the case of hospital patients.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Juvenile court committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I move that clause 4 be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My mind keeps running back to clause 1. I certainly would not like to be instrumental in disarming the organizations that have to do with these matters. I have been thinking that possibly the chief offence which these organizations are trying to control might not be held in a court of law to be within the meaning of the term "sexual immorality." With the consent of the minister, I will be prepared to move that the committee return to the clause for the purpose of having the words restored, but accepting the suggestion made by my hon. friend to my left from Glengarry and Stormont (Mr. Kennedy) to insert the word "similar" before the word "form".

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then it will read:

Sexual immorality or any similar form of vice.

I am willing to accept that.

The CHAIRMAN: By unanimous consent we will return to clause 1. It is moved in amendment that the words struck out, "or any other form of vice", be reinstated to read: "or any other similar form of vice."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Leave out the word "other".

The CHAIRMAN: "Or any similar form of vice."

Mr. BOYS: The minister will probably know from the correspondence whether or not that does cover the situation. I am disposed to think there is some doubt about it, and I think my leader (Mr. Meighen) is of the same view.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried as amended.

On section 5—Adults liable who contribute to delinquency.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the reason for the change, and what does the change involve?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will give the reasons as they have been communicated to me by the association:

Section 29 making adults liable for causing delinquency in children is a most useful section but one sometimes difficult to work under. It is the view of the association that if a parent or guardian neglects to prevent a child's becoming a juvenile delinquent that should be an offence and that proof should not be made more difficult by the retaining of the word "wilfully."

The proposal to insert the words "or are likely to render" in the ninth line of the section is with the object of making more certain and effective the amendment to the same section contained in section 3 of the amending act of 1921 11-12 George V, chapter 37. This amendment was adopted in view of certain decisions in western courts which rendered the section practically nugatory.

It is to punish those adults or guardians who act in such a way as to render children juvenile delinquents even though the children do not actually become juvenile delinquents. The word "wilfully" is omitted to compel those who are charged with proceeding in such a way as to make their children juvenile delinquents to prove that they should not be punished.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would direct attention to the distinction between a mere act of omission which the conditions might make excusable, and an act of commission. This provision would seem to place in the same position the Fagin who teaches children to steal or makes finished criminals of them, and the unfortunate man who is not able to give his children proper support, proper care or proper teaching.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would not go as far as that. The other offence my hon. friend refers to is punishable too.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, by a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment for a period not exceeding two years. That is not a sufficient punishment for a person who turns out children as thieves or who is trafficking in their bodies; the punishment there is entirely out of proportion to the seriousness of the offence. It is certainly very much worse to behave that way with children than it is with adults, yet there would be a far heavier punishment under the Criminal Code for such an offence in the case of an adult.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This legislation will not do away with the penalty imposed by the Criminal Code against the parent or guardian if what he does is criminal. Surely he can be convicted under the ordinary law.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know. I am inclined to think that where you have a provision dealing with crime generally and then a subdivision dealing with juvenile delinquents, and when in addition to dealing with the juvenile delinquent himself you further deal with the abettor or creator of the juvenile offender, if you like, then you are creating a particular offence. We are here creating an offence which has particular regard to the juvenile delinquent, but we go further and we say to the person who has had an active hand in making the child a thief or directing him into immoral practices: "You are a person who not only wilfully encouraged but aided and abetted and connived at the commission by this child of an offence under the Criminal Code"—for we say that a juvenile delinquent is any child who violates the provisions of the Criminal Code. Let us at least know what we are doing here. We are treating in the same way the person who is actively engaged in the promotion of criminal acts of the vilest character against children and against society, and the person who, perhaps through ignorance, perhaps through poverty, neglects to do something which ought to be done for the child. Does my hon. friend not think that this section ought to be broken up with a view to our taking some cognizance of that distinction? Should we not have a very heavy penalty for the Fagin, and deal gently with those who are doing perhaps the best they can but who by mere neglect place themselves, under this provision, in the same category with those who commit the criminal acts to which I have referred?

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are not doing what my hon. friend suggests; we are not changing the law with regard to such criminals as he has described. They have been subject to the penalty inflicted by this act, and they will still be subject to it. My hon. friend seems to think that the penalty should be increased I do not know that we should go further than the people who are interested in this work are asking us to do. It has not been suggested by anybody that those who are acting in a more nefarious way than others should not be more heavily penalized, all that the amendment purports to do is to make it easier to obtain a conviction under the circumstances, by not making it necessary to prove that the conditions complained of actually rendered the child a delinquent, nor that there was wilful neglect—the mere fact that the conditions exist renders them subject to the penalty, unless they prove that they are not responsible for those conditions.

Mr. BOYS: The minister says that the design of the amendment is to make proof easier, and that the penalty is not being increased.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is the same.

Mr. BOYS: The marginal notes, no doubt quite unintentionally, are misleading in this case. They are supposed to cover the amendments as well as the words which are underlined, but the minister will see, if he looks at the very last of the section, that the penalty is increased to two years, whereas in the original act it is only one year.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There was an amendment to the act in 1921, and I think the penalty was then increased to two years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would not blame the minister at all for increasing the penalty; I think some of our penalties are entirely inadequate. I think, for example, the penalties for indecent assaults are inadequate—only two years, for a crime which you could not fittingly describe. But what I resent is to put in the same category with an unspeakable villain like that some poor unfortunate who has not been able to give his children the benefit of better conditions. I do not think the real criminals get enough, and I really fail to see why a person should be charged with neglect which he knows nothing about, and be put in exactly the same class we were discussing a moment ago, for that is the effect of taking out the word "wilfully". I do not think that is proper legislation. I want to make it easy to look after the children, but in doing that we ought to have proper penalties for those who offend against the statute.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend may be sure that his remarks will be drawn to the attention of those who are interested in this work, and will be considered by the department also. I am almost sure that there will be further amendments to this act next session, because the clause which I have agreed to drop will be submitted to the next convention of the association of the judges for approval. The main reason why there was so much objection to clause 4 from Toronto and Montreal was that it had not been approved by the association, and that is why I have moved that the clause should be stricken out. I find that my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) is right. The penalty was one year even after the amendment of 1921, and obviously that is being increased to two years.

Mr. BOYS: Does the minister think that it should be increased? Of course, there might be cases where two years would not be enough, but in the main one year is a severe penalty, and when you consider that a fine of $500 may also be imposed, together with one year's imprisonment, I should think that ought to be sufficient; especially in view of the further fact, which is a fact so far as I know, that there is no appeal.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) seems to think the penalty too lenient. My hon. friend knows that the magistrate has discretion. It is not exceeding two years, but it may be only one month, it may be fifteen days.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. BOYS: I do not know what the minister's experience is, but I have had a good deal of experience in matters of that kind, and it is astonishing how many of the magistrates seem to think that if they divide the limit in two it is about all right. I do not say they always do it, but there is a tendency to compromise always, and if the fine is $50 they are apt to strike it at $25, and if it is $20 at $10. Apparently the minister did not intend to make the penalty two years. There was evidently no intention to change the law in that respect, which provided a penalty of only one year.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have no objection to leaving it at one year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The explanatory note says the word "wilfully" is struck out before the word "neglects" in the seventh line, but there is no word "neglects" in the seventh line.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I noticed that myself. It is a mistake. I think it is in the twelfth line.

Mr. FORKE: I think "wilfully" ought to be struck out. The clause seems strong enough when you have in the word "neglects".

Mr. BOYS: I think the note is correct. In subsection 1 of section 29 of the act appear the words "wilfully neglects to do that". What must be looked at is the act itself, and you have both the words "wilfully" and "neglects" there. "Wilfully" is struck out, and the words "and being able to do so" are inserted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not in this subsection.

Mr. BOYS: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Could the minister tell us whether he would regard as neglect such a neglect as would make a child a "neglected child" within the meaning of the Ontario Act? Would he make that a criminal offence? I am not dealing with the child who commits an offence against the code, but with the parents who may be prosecuted under this act. Would the minister consider that an offence under this section? And if not, why not? Because if a child is neglected, obviously that is more likely to render that child a juvenile delinquent.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would say that it all depends on the degree of negligence on the part of the parent; and that should be left to the discretion of the magistrate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to get my hon. friend's idea of that, though. Negligence, of what character? Negligence in looking after the physical welfare of the child? Negligence in providing proper religious or moral instruction? or negligence in what other regard?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I myself would not go as far as that. It would all depend on the circumstances, which will always be known to the local man who will be in charge of the administration of this act. The local juvenile court judges are well acquainted with the conditions in their community. They have probation officers who report what is going on in the homes where there are juvenile delinquents, and their decision will be largely influenced by the circumstances of the case. I do not think that there can be, in a matter of this kind, a definitely fixed set of conditions necessary to constitute the offence which is contemplated by this section.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I agree, it is pretty hard to do that, but it is not hard for the House to have some idea what it is legislating about. Suppose we take it in the simplest form; that there is a neglect to do that which would directly tend to prevent a child being a delinquent or likely to become a delinquent—I think that is fairly paraphrasing the clause—now, what neglect are we endeavouring to legislate against? We can say offhand that we are endeavouring to legislate against such neglect that a magistrate might say was a neglect; I do not think that, from our present discussion, we would go any further than that. Are we really leaving the definition of "neglect" in the hands of the bench, or are we dealing with "neglects" which could properly be looked upon as connected with some criminal matter or likely to bring about some criminal affair? Going a little bit further, I come back to my former query: Is the neglect legislated against here a neglect to furnish the child with such necessaries and the like as would prevent its being a dependent, neglected child under the Ontario Act or any other similar act? I think they go a little bit further than we do—is it to be confined to a neglect to give instruction to a child as to the meaning of a crime, or is it a neglect to move a child from conditions which might suggest crime to it? What are we really trying to do?

Mr. LAPOINTE: All the things my hon. friend has described would influence a judge in giving his decision.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But the magistrate will not be legislating. We are.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The conditions my hon. friend has mentioned may be such as to justify a judge in convicting a man, but they may not warrant the sending of the man to prison or fining him severely. I repeat, the circumstances surrounding every case must govern. This legislation is for the purpose of administering the act and it is certainly for the protection of the children.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The words in the bill "or are likely to render a child a juvenile delinquent" should have been underlined, because they are additions, and also the word "two" in the last line.

Mr. PUTNAM: As to the question asked by the hon. member (Sir Henry Drayton) I am inclined to think the danger he fears would be remote and that the parent would not be punished unless he was, by his own action, directly aiding the child to become a delinquent. However, I think we can easily imagine a class of cases where the parent would be an agent in the commission of offences by the child as the latter left the home from day to day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I quite agree with what the hon. gentleman has said; that is how the section ought to be read. I agree also that we should have a distinction between a course of conduct where there is not direct connivance and a course where the parent wilfully aids and abets the child to become a delinquent. If my hon. friend will look at the section again he will see that persons who knowingly or wilfully encourage or connive at offences are properly dealt with. But I draw my hon. friend's attention to the language farther down as to a parent or guardian who "neglects to do that which would directly tend to prevent a child being or becoming a juvenile delinquent or to remove the conditions which render or are likely to render a child a juvenile delinqent." Now, instructing the child as to the difference between right and wrong, properly grounding in him moral principles, are likely to influence his conduct for the better. Here, unless that is done, it would appear there is going to be an offence.

Mr. PUTNAM: My hon. friend will concede, perhaps, that the word "directly" is a very illuminating one. The mere failure of perhaps a very ignorant parent to teach a child proper ethics would only indirectly tend to produce the conduct sought to be corrected. Let us take a concrete case; my hon. friend may, perhaps, argue that it is too elemental in character but it will serve to illustrate the principle involved. If the father knew his child was going out stealing pennies, even though he himself did not receive the stolen money, he should be punished. If he knew the child was committing this offence and did not reprimand him or prevent him, he is guilty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I quite agree.

Mr. PUTNAM: But, as to teaching the child and making him to understand the difference between right and wrong, if we went into that matter I think we would be on visionary ground, and the parents should get the benefit of the doubt. The magistrate, of course in such cases, should have common sense to do the right thing. He would have to take into consideration the environments of the boy and the parents. If the father were an illiterate man the magistrate should not deal with him so strictly as in cases where the father was not illiterate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would go even further than my hon. friend. He says the magistrate should have common sense to do the right thing. I say we should have common sense to do the right thing here in the first place. I point out also that in the first case referred to, if the parent knows the child has gone out to commit an offence he is accessory before the fact and is already liable.

Mr. PUTNAM: Yes, if he abets the commission of the crime.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: His mere knowledge makes him liable under the Criminal Code. He is liable as an accessory before the fact and subject to the same punishment as the young offender. The duty to stop that sort of thing is cast upon him, as the duty is thrown on every citizen to prevent crime. If a person knows a crime is about to be committed, it is his duty to see that it is prevented. I was pointing out that that cannot be the case here because that is already covered.

Mr. PUTNAM: I am afraid a great deal of this is already covered by some severe punishment already.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It ought to be.

[Mr. Putnam.]

Mr. PUTNAM: I agree with my hon. friend. The danger is that the lesser punishment here might displace the present severer punishment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My impression is that it is removed by this legislation. I think that is the most dangerous part of this legislation, because I do not know whether it can be done under this.

Mr. ROBINSON: I think, rightly or wrongly, that this is more or less experimental legislation, and whether we should enact a law of this kind or not I do not know. I am not quite sure that these societies are able to handle the child problem. It is a very difficult matter, and they have not had as much experience perhaps as they will have. Whether it is wise or unwise to pass a law that is more or less experimental I would not take upon myself to decide. Yet that is the position here. We are making this experiment and bringing the child under this law.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not object to it being experimental, and I do not object to doing anything I can to advance the interests of the child; but I am objecting to the provision with respect to adult offenders, who, I think, are not severely enough dealt with in this section, and the mixing up of a real adult criminal with an innocent man.

Mr. BOYS: The more I think of this provision the more I am convinced that the section is going too far, although I am convinced the section is framed with a desire to do what is best for the child. It cannot be argued for a moment that this is anything but a criminal section, because when the punishment to be imposed is one year's imprisonment or a fine of five hundred dollars, or both, it becomes very serious, and surely it is unwise to drop the word "wilful." I quite appreciate the effect of the addition of the words "or are likely to render." But I say do not strike out the word "wilful." Take an illustration: A parent who would bring himself within the facts I am going to outline could certainly be convicted under this section. We will assume that curfew rings at eight o'clock, or nine o'clock. Suppose a father permits a boy of fourteen to remain out between nine and ten o'clock and to continue that course of conduct, and that boy commits a theft or some crime which brings him within the interpretation of the section, that boy becomes a juvenile delinquent, and the father could be convicted under this section. But I doubt if the father could be convicted if the word "wilful" were there. Surely, before we render a man liable to imprisonment for one year and to a fine of five hundred dollars, he should be guilty of something wilful. It should be proved that there was some animus in his mind, because that is the foundation of all criminal acts. I suggest that we should restore the word "wilful" after the word "child," and eliminate the words "and being able to do so," leaving the other words "or are likely to render." If you are going to make the punishment one year, that punishment should only be imposed in cases of gross neglect. The father might be away, and he might have left instructions that the child should not be permitted out at night. Before the father could be convicted under this provision I think it should be proved that he was a party to the offence.

Mr. GORDON: I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys). The words "or to remove the conditions which render or are likely to render a child a juvenile delinquent" have been inserted on account of a series of cases in which the father of the family persisted in allowing one member of the family, who was notorious in the community to remain at home. The effect was to corrupt the younger members of the family. The mother may have desired to have one daughter removed from the household, and the father persisted in having her at home, although her society no doubt corrupted the younger female members of the family. No provision then in force, however, could deal with that case. The case was brought up before the Police Constables' convention, or the facts of the case were forwarded to them, in order that some action might be taken to prevent a recurrence of a case of that kind, where there was no provision which would deal effectively with it. This provision may go further than was perhaps actually intended, but it seems to me to deal with that particular class of case, if it is so interpreted and read by the judicial officer before whom such proceedings might be taken.

Mr. BOYS: I am not familiar with the case mentioned by the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Gordon), but I would have thought from his recital of the facts that such a parent would come absolutely within the provisions of the former section. Surely, under this section, the parent, knowing that such a state of affairs exists in his house and permitting it to exist, is doing so "wilfully." The strong point that I desire to make is that a severe penalty is provided here. I am not objecting to it; I am commending the minister and all those behind the provision in their efforts to do what they are seeking to do. My one point is that if we make a man a criminal and put him in prison for a year and fine him five hundred dollars, without any evidence to connect him and to show he is the guilty man, we are going too far. I would not be prepared to pass this section on the suggestion that this is a matter for the magistrate to consider. We know there are many magistrates of experience, but there are many magistrates who are not lawyers and who have not had experience. They are tremendously influenced by their surroundings and they become considerably worked up at times. In this way a man might suffer where he never should suffer as a criminal. If the word "wilful" is restored I feel satisfied that any case will be met in which a parent should be subjected to imprisonment for one year.

Mr. GORDON: What could be done in the case of a father where a daughter, say over eighteen years of age, was boarding at home, a member of the family, where no act of immorality was committed in the home, but who was notorious for her immoral conduct, who came home for her meals and lived there and who must necessarily exercise an evil effect upon the younger female members of the family? The former act does not deal with such a case, because there is no act of participation by the head of the household in anything which would tend to the moral delinquency of the child; but under this amendment the section would deal with a case of that kind because the father was failing to remove from the family the source of the influence that tended to cause the delinquency?

Mr. BOYS: That raises in a very neat way the very point that I wanted to raise. If I understand my hon. friend aright, he goes this far: The girl in question is notorious, but apparently her notoriety has not reached the mind of her father. Would it be proper, under those conditions, that the father should come within this section and be imprisoned for a year? The whole thing is one of knowledge. If the father knows that he has such a girl in his household, then he is within this section and his neglect is "wilful". If he does not know this—and that is the case put by my hon. friend—surely he should not be held responsible. A man cannot be guilty of a crime if he is not directly associated with it. In the case cited, I submit with all respect, the father cannot be held to be a criminal.

Mr. GORDON: In the twelfth line of page 3 of the bill there are these words:

> Being the parent or guardian of the child and being able to do so, neglects to do that which would directly tend to prevent a child's being or becoming a juvenile delinquent.

The expression "being able to do so", having the power, must mean, it seems to me, having the knowledge, because he would not be able to exercise that power unless knowledge was brought home to him.

Mr. BOYS: I agree with my hon. friend that that implies knowledge. That is my exact point. The moment you get knowledge you get wilful conduct. That is why I want to see that inserted in the bill.

Mr. GORDON: While wilful conduct is implied in this, the actual word "wilful" is not used. But it indicates there is power of suppression of the evil condition that exists, and if he is able to suppress that evil condition and does not do so, my suggestion is that he becomes guilty of an offence under section 4.

Mr. PUTNAM: I should think the word "wilful" should, in any event, be restored. The question of ability is ambiguous. He might be able if he had the knowledge. "Being able to do so" means, I think on fair reading, that he is in a position of authority to straighten out the regettable state of affairs provided that he knows about it. I would strongly support the idea of removing the ambiguity by restoring the word "wilful".

Mr. GORDON: I have had some cases under this act. The word "wilful", as my hon. friend knows, has a peculiar signification before a judge. It means a deliberate act, a knowledge brought home in such an emphatic way that there can be no question that the person guilty of the offence had it brought home to him, not in a constructive way, but in a most definite and positive way. The defence in many of these cases is that the person did not know. Take the ordinary case of a father who has young children at home, who is guilty of a persistent course of profanity, of assault upon his wife, assault upon the children and generally a course of conduct of that character. That would bring him within this section. But it does not deal with those peculiar cases where the mother, perhaps, wishes to have the home wholesome, but some member of the family, perhaps a sister of the father or some other member, a boarder, is kept there in defiance of the wife's wishes.

5 p.m.*

Mr. BOYS: With knowledge?

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: Then it is "wilful."

Mr. GORDON: I have had a case in the city of Peterborough, where, in spite of the mother's attendance on the chief of police, the father deliberately persisted in keeping this person in the household, and he had a right to do so.

Mr. BOYS: Will my hon. friend not agree with me that that is really a case of wilful conduct?

Mr. GORDON: I do not think "wilful" goes that far. "Wilful" is such a deliberate, determined refusal to accept the condition as laid down that it goes far beyond the interpretation which might be constructively put upon knowledge, that is, knowing that a condition exists. Supposing this case existed: Knowledge is brought from the chief of police to the head of the family that a certain member of his family is of the type of character that would cause delinquency of the younger children. After that notice had been given to him, he would be put upon inquiry and would be guilty of an offence under this legislation unless he satisfied himself in every reasonable way that there was no ground for the suspicion that was indicated to him, say, by the chief constable. That would be, perhaps, a wilful breach of this section. I am submitting that to my hon. friend in order to prove that wilfulness must go far beyond what must be real knowledge brought home by evidence of members of the family who have learned from time to time the evil conduct of this person who has been kept in the family in spite of knowledge being brought home to the head of the household. It might be said that this is not wilful because it was a sin of omission, not of commission; that is there was not the positive act, but neglect in permitting the matter to drift. It is just to deal with those cases, it seems to me, that this particular section is worded in this manner.

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend, I think, is putting upon the word "wilful" too severe a construction. But, lest he be right and I be wrong, I would suggest to the minister that, instead of the words "being able to do so," he insert the word "knowingly". My whole point is, knowledge; I think it must be shown that the man has knowledge. To convict a man of crime and take any chance of sending him to prison for one year without showing that he has any knowledge of the wrong is abhorrent to me. I do not think the word "wilful" is too strong. It was in the act before, but if it is thought that it is too strong, let the wording be as follows:

Being the parent or guardian of the child knowingly neglects to do so.

Mr. PUTNAM: I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Boys), and I think as respects almost every crime you could bring forward the same argument about the deletion of the word "wilful" ingeniously used by the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Gordon). Careful as he generally is in language, I agree with the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) that he went too far in his definition of "wilful". The word does not necessarily mean a determined wilfulness; it means a substantial degree of knowledge. You bring home to the accused that with that degree of knowledge he lets this thing go on from day to day. I can see no objection to putting in the word "wilful", for we must assume that the judge or magistrate will at least be of average intelligence and that on the evidence he will be able to decide as a juror the issue of wilfulness.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The word "wilfully", the elimination of which is proposed, was discussed by the association to which I have referred at its last convention. It was then unanimously decided to ask for the elimination of this word because in Rex v Hoffman, 1919, 1 Western Weekly Reports, page 625, and Rex v Limoges, 1921, 1 Western Weekly Reports, page 293, convictions could not be secured against the offenders because of the word "wilfully" in the section, although in the opinion of all the members present at the convention the conditions justified convictions.

Mr. PUTNAM: Was there something peculiar in the facts in those cases?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have sent for the law reports. I find that I made a mistake a few minutes ago when I said that two years instead of one was a change; I was right in the first instance when I said that the amendment of 1921 covered it, section 3 of chapter 37, which substituted the word "two" for the word "one". So, as it is now, there is no change in the term of imprisonment.

Mr. BOYS: That only emphasizes my contention that it makes the offence all the more serious.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is my reason for withdrawing my assent to the change.

Mr. BOYS: Quite so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In the two cases I have mentioned the word "wilfully" in the section prevented convictions.

Mr. BOYS: That in itself would not perhaps warrant the dropping of the word here I do not argue for one moment that the use of the word "wilful" in statutes does not frequently stand in the way of convictions; I say it does, and I say it should when we are talking of crime. Under the Ontario Temperance Act we find provisions that a man shall be presumed to have knowledge of this, that and the other thing, and he can be convicted of many offences without the Crown actually proving that he had knowledge of any guilty actions. But that is a different state of affairs altogether.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree to "knowingly."

Mr. BOYS: I think that would be fair under the circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 5—now section 4—be amended in the thirteenth line by adding after the words "to do so" the word "knowingly."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do you think that would work out well?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Putting "knowingly" before neglects."

Mr. BOYS: It is just merely inserting the word "knowingly" instead of the word "wilfully."

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Section as amended agreed to.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT

The House resumed from June 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. 116, to amend the Exchequer Court Act—Hon. Mr. Lapointe—Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When this bill was in committee before, the minister withdrew it for the purpose of considering the questions then raised.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is my hon. friend still objecting?

Mr. BOYS: We are suggesting, not objecting.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As I said, the other day, the reason why the words "or any person" are included is to anticipate a case where the Crown has to compel its contractors to pay to a third person damages which might be caused to him by a public work. On the other hand, I think it could not be construed as against the rights of any third person. However, I am inclined to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) as far as that goes. But when he suggested that we should include the word "company," I think that is unnecessary, because it is included in the Interpretation Act. I agree, therefore, to the amendment suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Boys), that the words "to any person or to the Crown" in the thirteenth line of this section be omitted.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GOLD AND SILVER MARKING ACT, 1913, AMENDMENT

The House resumed from June 20 consideration in committee of Bill No. 176, to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act, 1913—Hon. Mr. Low, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—"Platinum" to be applied only to articles of defined component parts.

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): When this matter was previously under consideration I maintained that what the Jewellers' Association had in mind was that the word "platinum" was to be applied to any article of which 95 per cent of the total quantity consisted of platinum. In a report received from Mr. W. J. Ryan, Inspector of the Gold and Silver Marking Act, among other things he states:

> At the fifth annual convention of the Canadian Jewellers' Association, which was held at Windsor, February 13, 14 and 15, 1922, and at which over 300 jewellers from all parts of Canada were present, among the business problems discussed was a proposed amendment to The Gold and Silver Marking Act regarding the stamping of platinum goods. At a meeting of the executive committee held on the 5th of December it was decided that application should be made at the next session of parliament for an amendment to The Gold and Silver Marking Act to provide for the marking of platinum articles. The committee recommended that the title of the act be changed to read "The Precious Metals Marking Act, 1924," and that a new section be inserted to cover platinum articles, worded as follows:
> "The word 'platinum' or any contraction, abbreviation or colourable imitation thereof shall not be applied, either alone or in connection with any other word, to any article of merchandise composed wholly or in part of any metal unless 950/1000ths of component parts of the metal appearing or purporting to be platinum of which said article consists are either the pure metal and element platinum alone or in conjunction with iridium."

[Mr. Lapointe.]

I always thought that the jewellers had in mind that the article should be 95 per cent platinum, but the leader of the opposition in several statements ridiculed the idea. When the Deputy Minister of Justice came into the House the other day the right hon. gentleman put certain questions, and the deputy agreed with the interpretation placed on it by my right hon. friend. I had not the slightest doubt in my mind at eleven o'clock in the morning that he had told me that it meant 95 per cent of the whole article. But he whispered to me that since I had been in his office he had read the debates of the day before—I did not question him as to whether the opinion of other lawyers had impressed him or caused him to change his mind. He further added that these sections were not drafted with the idea in view that they should be interpreted by the ordinary layman in the House; rather was it intended that the courts should interpret them. I allowed him to go out of the chamber. But the leader of the opposition made this statement:

> There can be no possible two opinions on the subject. The opinion is just what the Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice told the minister a while ago, and what we have contended for for two days, I do not think it is the object of either the Jewellers' Association or the framer of the bill that the whole article should be 95 per cent platinum.

And again he said:

> The minister is wrong as to his conception of what the draftsman intended. The draftsman who drew this never in the world intended the whole article to be 95 per cent platinum—never.

I had stated in the House that the president or the secretary of the association had told my deputy over the long distance telephone that what the section meant was 95 per cent of the whole article, but again the right hon. leader of the opposition disagreed with me. I was glad to know that there were a few hon. gentlemen who did agree with me. If hon gentlemen will refer to page 3395 of Hanusard they will find that the hon. member for Kings, N.S. (Mr. Robinson) said:

> The intention doubtless was that it should be 95 per cent of the element platinum, but it does not say so.

He agreed that that was the intention. Again, on Friday last, the 20th, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) stated:

> That is the meaning I put upon this clause. In other words, whatever metal it is composed of, 95 per cent pure platinum or platinum in conjunction with some other metal shall form part of the whole composition.

In order that there might not be any mistake, I telephoned to the secretary of the Jewellers' Association, to satisfy myself that the opinion my deputy had conveyed to me was correct, and the secretary replied: "There is absolutely no doubt that was the intention." I said, "Come down here to Ottawa, so that you may be able to verify it." He said, "I will send the chairman of the association." The chairman of the association came down, and afterwards I addressed the following letter to Mr. John C. Strachan, chairman, Canadian National Jewellers' Association, Toronto District:

I attach hereto a question asked by the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen in the House of Commons on Friday. Will you be good enough to advise me which of the questions he asks is correct? I shall esteem it a favour if you will give me the answer in writing.

And the question I attached to the letter was the very question asked by the right hon. leader of the opposition on Friday last. I did not wish to put it in my own words, because I knew my hon. friend would probably doubt it had been properly put, so I simply attached the following clipping from Hansard:

Mr. Meighen: As to the plainness of the clause it is a matter of opinion. As to the meaning of the clause it is not a matter of opinion, it is very clear, I would not have risen but I see the Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice here, and I am going to put the two interpretations in his hearing and ask him to give the opinion of the department as to which it is. The question is this: Whether in the case of an article, a single article, as respects which part purports to be platinum and part not, this bill insists that the whole article shall be 95 per cent platinum or part platinum and part iridium, or whether only the part that purports to be platinum shall be 95 per cent platinum and iridium? I want the assistant deputy minister to answer himself.

The reply I received to that letter was as follows:

Hon. THOS. A. LOW,
Minister of Trade and Commerce,
Ottawa.

Sir,—In reply to the question asked in the House, a copy of which you attached to your letter, I beg to advise you that the intent conveyed in the first question correctly represents the desire of the jewellery trade—i.e. that an article to have applied to it the word—"platinum, or any abbreviation of the word platinum," must contain 95 per cent of the gross weight, or total contents of platinum, or any combination of platinum and iridium.

I have the honour to remain,

Your obedient servant,

JOHN C. STRACHAN,
Chairman Canadian National Jewellers' Association,
Toronto District

That, I think, bears out the statement that I made as to the intention of the jewellers. I also informed the right hon. leader of the opposition, that that was what the president of the Jewellers' Association had told me over the long distance telephone, but he doubted me. I perhaps have given the act more attention over the week-end than before, and I have discovered that it contains a clause providing that:

The Governor in Council may, from time to time, make such regulations as to him seem necessary or expedient for declaring articles to be exempt from the application of this act.

I am sure that the right hon. leader of the opposition knew of these orders in council that had been passed; he knew a great deal more than I did; he knew that if there was any remedy required in connection with this section it could be provided by order in council. However, in view of the opposition raised by certain members of the House, I desire to withdraw the bill.

Mr. BOYS: So far as I am concerned I do not propose for one moment to be under any such cloud as that. Surely to goodness it is not fair to suggest, when we on this side of the House make suggestions regarding the phraseology of a clause appearing in a bill, that we are objecting to the bill itself. We were just making some suggestions a few moments ago to the Minister of Justice in connection with a bill he had before the House, and it is only fair to say that he accepted some of those suggestions. The Minister of Trade and Commerce now says definitely, and I think if he is fair he will admit he did not say it quite so definitely a day or so ago, that 95 per cent of the whole article, or as the chairman of the Jewellers' Association perhaps better puts it, 95 per cent of the gross weight, shall be platinum or iridium. Now all we have been endeavouring to do here is to point out to the minister that we want the wording of this section made so definite that a layman can construe it and understand it. It may be that a jeweller or a judge might understand it as it stands, but you want to think of the public who are not experts, too. The very beauty of legislation is that its wording shall be such that any man of reasonable intellect can read it and understand what it means when he reads it. I made a suggestion the other day to the minister, and I am going to make it again before he presses for withdrawal of this bill, because there is not the slightest desire on the part of any one on this side, and I think I can speak for every one, even for my Progressive friends, to interfere with the provisions of this bill in any way. We are simply trying to make the wording definite, and I would ask the minister to consider this suggestion. I would suggest that the section be amended to read as follows:

The word "platinum" or any contraction, abbreviation or colourable imitation thereof shall not be applied, either alone or in combination with any other word, to any article of merchandise composed wholly or in part of any metal unless 95 per cent of component parts of the metal of which the whole of said article consists are either the pure metal and element platinum alone or in conjunction with iridium.

I think this does exactly what the minister says he wants. Surely the minister will be fair, and when at least eight or ten members of this House, all acting in good faith, express a doubt as to the meaning of the section, he will admit that there is some doubt. I am certain that he has the desire to have this section made definite, and now that we know that the 95 per cent applies to the gross weight, if the language I have suggested, or some similar wording of which the English language is certainly capable, is used, there can be no further doubt. I would ask the minister to consider that suggestion before he presses for the withdrawal of this bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As far as I am concerned, I make no request at all; the minister can withdraw his bill or not, just as he likes. All I am concerned with is that he is not going to put me in any false position. I made a certain contention as to what the bill meant in its present form, namely, that the exaction of the bill applied only to the portion of the article which purported to be or was apparently platinum. The minister disputed it. I asked the minister to get the opinion of the justice department. He called the Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice in and he agreed distinctly with me after the minister had told the House that the Justice department were all against it. Not only did he agree, but virtually everybody in the House agreed with the contention. Yet the minister persisted and persisted. Now he makes his appeal from the Justice department as to the effect of the clause to the Jewellers' Association. Well, I decline to submit myself to the jurisdiction of the Jewellers' Association. The Jewellers' Association may be a very fine institution, but it never was created for the purpose of determining the meaning of a legal statute. It may have been their intention that the whole article should be 95 per cent platinum or platinum and iridium, I do not know as to that, but the Jewellers' Association is not a court of appeal as to the meaning of a statute. Nor did I express any opinion as to what the chairman of the Jewellers' Association would say. I am ready to submit to the opinion of the Justice department, but after this in the case of the minister I would rather somebody else would endeavour to carry that opinion to the House than he. He misapprehended what the Justice department told him, and the department's representative came here and distinctly said so in his own hearing.

Mr. LOW: I endeavoured to adhere to the opinion not only of the Justice department but of the Law Clerk of the House.

The bill was referred to the Department of Justice and Mr. Newcombe wrote as follows with respect to it. The letter is dated 12th January, 1924:

> Referring to your letter of the 24th ultimo, asking that a draft bill to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act, 1913, be prepared by this department for your minister's consideration, I have the honour to enclose same herewith.
> I have the honour to be, Sir,
> Your obedient servant,
> E. L. NEWCOMBE.

For three days I stood behind the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, the Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice, another member of the legal branch of that department, and also behind the Law Clerk of the House of Commons. But my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and other members of the House, insisted that the section was, to say the least, very clumsily framed. On many occasions during the last few days you will find the clause characterized by the right hon. gentleman in that way. Now, an hon. gentleman, who is a lawyer I know, gets up here and suggests that the amendment be drafted in a certain way. Is it possible that one hon. member of this House can, in a few minutes, draft a better section than the Department of Justice was able to do in two or three months.

Mr. BOYS: If the minister will permit me I will convince him that the suggestion made was not unusual or unreasonable. Not thirty minutes ago, when we were considering Bill No. 116, to amend the Exchequer Court Act, introduced by the Minister of Justice, a suggestion was made—as the minister says here more or less hurriedly—but it appealed to the Minister of Justice. He accepted it, struck out certain words, and amended the section. Are we to understand that if a bill is brought forward, even if it has passed through the hands of the Deputy Minister of Justice, that we are debarred from criticising it or from offering any suggestion for its improvement? That is practically the attitude of the minister. As far as I am concerned these suggestions are made in good faith. I want to see the bill go through in the interests of the public as well as in the interests of the Jewellers'

Association. It is most important that the word "platinum" or the word "sterling" or the words "solid gold" and so on should not appear upon articles of jewellery unless they contain exactly what they are supposed to contain. I have taken that attitude mainly on behalf of the public. The intention of this bill should be made absolutely clear and not be left in the slightest degree in doubt.

Mr. LOW: The Jewellers' Association submitted a certain wording and surely they knew what they wanted, and gave proper instructions to their attorney. I submitted the clause to Mr. Newcombe, the Deputy Minister of Justice, to the Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice, to another member of that department, and to the Law Clerk of the House of Commons, and they all agreed as to its effect. Surely the Association knew what they were about when they drew that clause.

Mr. BOYS: Of course if they want the article to consist of 95 per cent platinum. That is one thing, but the wording by which it was sought to give effect to their desire is something entirely different. That is what the minister has overlooked.

Mr. LOW: Would not men who understand their business word such a clause properly? There is no doubt that an association consisting of four hundred members must have had some legal assistance in drafting such a clause as this.

Mr. BOYS: My object in suggesting an amendment was to carry out what was desired. The minister is an experienced business man who conducts large interests. In practically every case where he has a contract drawn up does he not have that work done by a lawyer?

Mr. LOW: Every time.

Mr. BOYS: That being so is it unreasonable to expect that lawyers should have the opportunity of expressing their views regarding the wording of clauses in bills coming before this House? That is all that is suggested here.

Mr. LOW: I can only say to the House that when the bill is again presented there will be no question about the correctness of the legal phraseology. I regret very much that the Deputy Minister of Justice is out of the city at the moment. Had he been here I think he would probably have supported my position. I went into the office of the deputy minister with just one thing in my mind and that was to provide that in articles made of this metal there should be 95 per cent of platinum. That is what I understood the Jewellers' Association wanted and that is what I had in my mind. And yet one of these gentlemen in the department when he came here and was questioned told me and told the House something different. He said that he had read Hansard since I had been in his office earlier in the day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know whether my hon. friend looks upon this as the most fitting end to what might be a very good plot for a comic opera, but is a fitting wind-up to the nonsensical farce that has been going on in connection with this bill. The whole trouble is due not to what the bill says but what the minister thought it said. He has grumbled about the proffering of suggestions by lawyers. Well, the minister had the hon. member for Kings N.S. (Mr. Robinson) behind him and he knew what it meant. He had the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) in front of him and he knew what it meant. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) he knew what it meant. Everybody knew what this bill meant except the minister who introduced it. That is the extraordinary feature of the situation—nobody but the minister had any doubt as to what the bill meant. We sought to find out what it was the minister wanted. The bill said one thing, and the minister said it meant something else and stuck to it all the time. I am quite sure he was not doing that simply to delay the business of the House; the trouble was that he had never got the effect of the section into his head. I am just as sure as I am of anything that he honestly believed the Department of Justice said what he thought they said. The trouble was he did not understand the Justice department.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend cannot say that I did not understand the request of the Jewellers' Association, because I placed it in writing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend did not understand the Justice department, nor could he understand what the hon. member for Kings, N.S. (Mr. Robinson) said. He could not understand anybody in the House. He could not understand the Department of Justice in regard to this section, and I am quite sure the Department of Justice did not understand the instructions which he sent to them.

Mr. LOW: The Jewellers' Association, the people who were most interested in the bill held the same view as myself.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course they understand what they want. Now we have wasted three afternoons, and the minister is peeved because he has been put right. Why? Because the deputy read over what had been said in the House, and after reading over what had been said in the House, he found out for the first time what the issue was. That issue the minister had never been able to get across. I had a better opinion of the minister than that. I think he has had his fingers crossed, or something of that kind in connection with this matter. There is some sort of hoodoo in connection with it. I am quite certain that if the Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice had been here he would not have agreed with what the minister said, although I have no doubt he made the statement in good faith. We had an extraordinary statement from the minister this afternoon, and everybody knows it must be absolute nonsense. Legislation ought to be drawn so that everyone could understand it, not even excluding the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I would like to know what my hon. friend's idea is? Here he introduces something which he says has been sent to him from the Justice department. The Justice department knew what it meant. There is no difficulty in understanding what it meant—not the slightest—but there is difficulty in getting the minister to admit it, and saying that was what was wanted. That is the whole difficulty. I wonder if we are to understand from this letter that in connection with the bill brought down by the Department of Trade and Commerce we are not to look upon that as serious, but that we are to look upon it as a fitting setting for a comic opera, something by which the business of the House can be indefinitely delayed, and then dropped, something in connection with which there is no public interest one way or the other, just something that can only be justified as a means of taking up the time of the House at the minister's whim. If it be that kind of legislation, he is quite right in withdrawing it, but if it is intended to be legislation in the public interest, it was his duty to put the legislation into proper shape. I venture to say that the real reason why the minister does not want to go on with the bill is that it has to be redrafted, in order to make it conform with the other sections. The deputy minister said that in connection with the interpretation clause and in connection with applications that ought to be covered.

Mr. LOW: Why did my hon. friend not suggest the amendments?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He was willing to suggest them, if it would do any good. The minister was no more fortunate in getting that understanding of the situation into the head of the Justice department than he was in getting it into his own. Everybody else was at one. The whole trouble was with the minister. His own deputy, I have no doubt, would say the same thing as the Deputy Minister of Justice said, and if he would accept a sporting proposition I would ask him to go over to the deputy.

Mr. LOW: I went over the whole matter with my deputy, and when the memorandum was presented to me, I said it was a technical matter and asked him to take it over to the Justice department and have a bill properly drawn to cover it. I knew nothing more about it until the bill was introduced into the House. However, when it is introduced again there will be no question about the wording of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want to prolong the discussion; it has been too prolonged; but I desire to say a word anent the minister's remark, which apparently conveys the impression that he had it in for the Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice, and particularly because that assistant deputy told them he was wrong here in the House, and had even committed the unpardonable offence of reading Hansard. I have not any brief for him. We did not appoint him; but having acted in the Justice department for a very considerable time, I want to say that this government has not any more faithful and few more competent officials than the same gentleman, nor has any government a more conscientious official. He is there early and late and has no affiliations of any kind. I had no communication with him nor had anyone in my behalf, but I knew he had a head on him, knew he was honest, and I appealed, without the slightest hesitation, to what he said, when I knew who it was that was referred to. The Deputy Minister of Justice did no more than his absolute duty, and if the minister is withdrawing the bill to get a better one, I compliment him.

The CHAIRMAN: It is understood the bill will not be reported.

Mr. LOW: I beg to move that this committee rise.

Progress reported.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 190, to amend the Canadian National Railways Act, 1919.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This item was not included in the business mentioned on Friday night. I do not know whether we ought to press the objection or not. What is the bill?

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend will remember that last year the Guarantee Act of the Canadian National Railways, was amended in the Senate in reference to the guarantee of the equipment bonds. The amendment to the bill raised the question whether it did not take away altogether the right of guarantee equipment issues, the Justice department was consulted, and they thought it did.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Guarantee only on authorized issues.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) and myself have discussed this matter a good deal. The other day I read the brief that counsel for the Canadian National Railways had put into my hands, as follows:

Paragraph 4 of section 2, of this last-mentioned bill reads as follows: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed as granting power to guarantee any securities the issue of which has not been authorized by parliament."

The trouble with this paragraph 4 was that it prevented, in the opinion of the Department of Justice, the issue of equipment securities for the reason that equipment securities are obligations of the Canadian National Rolling Stock Company, Limited, which is a company incorporated under the Dominion Joint Stock Companies Act. General power is given the Dominion Joint Stock Company to issue securities, but the Justice department considered that paragraph 4, as above quoted, was dealing with specific authority to issue a specific amount of securities and that the general power in the general act to issue securities did not comply with the wording of the paragraph. Consequently we propose to amend the paragraph to read this way:

"Nothing herein contained shall be taken to authorize the guarantee of any securities the issue of which has not been authorized by this act or some other act of parliament."

The "some other act of parliament" covers the provisions of the Companies Act, and we have added the words "this act" so as to overcome the objection which was raised, but not seriously pressed, that the provisions of paragraph 4 destroy the power to issue securities given to the company by the Canadian National Railways Act itself.

For the purpose of further restricting the company in its issue of equipment securities, I have added the second clause to the draft bill to the effect that where parliament has authorized expenditure on equipment to the extent of 25 per cent of the cost, the company may make, or cause to be made, one or more equipment issues for the remaining seventy-five per cent of such cost; that means that in order to make equipment issues in the future we will have to go to parliament and obtain an appropriation of the 25 per cent down payment, which is always made in cash. When this appropriation is passed no further legislative authority is necessary to enable us to issue securities and, if deemed desirable, to have them guaranteed for the remaining seventy-five per cent.

That is, that the requirement of the act that parliamentary authority must be obtained will be complied with when parliament passes an appropriation for twenty-five per cent of the proposed issue.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When the bill was up before, the minister stated that the government was ready to engage itself not to guarantee securities under the act of last year or under this amendment except to the extent that the amount was included in the estimates of the year. I hope I have not misunderstood the minister on that?

Mr. GRAHAM: That does not include equipment issues. They are made on what is called the Philadelphia plan under which 25 per cent cash is paid and 75 per cent is issued as securities, the rolling stock purchased being the security for the 75 per cent. But these issues never go in the estimates. What I said the other night, and what I think my right hon. friend is referring to, is that we have no idea of departing from the practice of putting regular railway issues in the estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is to say, for all other purposes except equipment—

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —the amount shall be in the estimates. I may say that equipment security guarantees have not been in the estimates before, for the simple reason that there were none. I think the minister will search in vain for any.

Mr. GRAHAM: There were last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, $22,500,000, but there were none by the previous government. My opinion is that they ought all to appear in the estimates. If we adopt this practice it will be very hard to get away from it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Bonds are issued for 75 per cent of the equipment, and under what is known as the Philadelphia plan the amount due is amortized and so much paid every year into a sinking fund to repay the bonds at the end of a certain term. I do not think you will find that they were ever placed in the estimates. Of course, branch lines are dealt with in separate legislation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They never were in the estimates because there were no equipment guarantees until last year.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. Mr. Fielding the year before advanced about a million and a half dollars for equipment purchases, and the previous year we advanced about fourteen million dollars odd. This money of course was in the estimates, but at no time until this past year was any guarantee given of equipment securities. I do not say there were not equipment securities issued, but they rested on their own feet. I am not objecting to the principle of guaranteeing equipment securities, but I am not convinced that there is any real difference merely because a different system of payment is adopted. Every security issued has got to be paid. The equipment issue is given special security on the equipment, and I know other issues give a special security of their own. The equipment security provides for yearly payment; other securities do not, they provide for payment at maturity. But what difference that makes on the principle of including our liabilities in the estimates I am not able to see. My contention is that until the hour comes when the National Railway securities that we are responsible for are themselves assets to us equal to their face value, the amount of our responsibility we ought to always include in the estimates, and include in our debts our liabilities as respects the road. If we do not do that we may just as well take all our other securities which already have been added to our national debt, and which no longer are regarded as active assets, and regard them as active and deduct them from our debt. In a word, we have no right to say to the people of Canada that our responsibilities are such and such until the asset we take for our responsibility is equal to the amount of our liability. Consequently, it seems to me, the minister would be well advised to put all these things into the same catalogue exactly and include them in the estimates, and in our debt, until he is able to recover from the company interest on the mortgages we hold.

Mr. GRAHAM: Unlike the loans to the Canadian National Railways, the government is asked to contribute nothing directly to this particular loan except the 25 per cent that it pays in cash, and the securities for the balance of 75 per cent are issued against the new rolling stock purchased. As I said before, a certain amount has to be paid annually over a term of years until the whole is amortized. Now, putting it in the estimates would of course imply that the government must guarantee, otherwise there would be no necessity for it being placed there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But it is just the same as any other estimate, if the government does not guarantee it the expenditure is that much less.

Mr. GRAHAM: But my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) and I the other night when discussing this matter agreed that it is well to have in the act a power to guarantee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think so.

Mr. GRAHAM: As far as the New York market is concerned, the government guarantee practically amounts to nothing, the United States understanding so well the system under which these securities are issued, but in Canada it does make a perceptible difference.

Mr. HANSON: As a matter of fact, does not the government guarantee the other 75 per cent?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is authority to do so.

Mr. HANSON: What has been the practice in the past? Did the government guarantee the issue last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Does the government say that these equipment issues of the National Railway would sell on the New York market at equally as good a price if the government did not guarantee them?

Mr. GRAHAM: On the New York market I would say yes; but not on the Canadian market.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister says there is a great difference because there is provision for annual payment of these equipment securities. Suppose the Canadian National Railways issued a mortgage for $12,000,000, and instead of making the mortgage bonds repayable in twenty years, with interest at 5 per cent yearly, they made them repayable so much every year, or provided a sinking fund for the purpose, would the minister consider that a sufficient reason for not including in the estimates for that year the guarantee of these bonds by the country?

Mr. GRAHAM: I should not like to give an opinion offhand, but as a matter of fact these equipment issues are under a different system and a different principle altogether from other securities. They are an obligation of the Rolling Stock Company. The Rolling Stock Company primarily has its charter under the Companies Act, and that is one of the reasons for one of the changes in this act. These securities are treated in a separate and distinct manner altogether different from the guarantees of the Canadian National Railways themselves, and they are looked upon with such favour in the United States that a government guarantee is not considered to be of any assistance at all in marketing them. It did not enter my head that it would be necessary to put equipment issues in the estimates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think the former government guaranteed any equipment issues.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think I am wrong in my recollection. We used to get just as good prices for those issues on the New York market as was got in any other way, and I think my hon. friend is quite right when he says that in the New York market a government guarantee is not of any practical use. Since then a new situation has arisen in Canada in connection with the growth of our war financing; to-day we can raise large amounts of money without guarantee. There is a marked difference between a security issued on rolling stock and any other security. A security issued on rolling stock is one that can be readily realized upon, one of the very few things that a creditor can take in connection with the operation of a railway under the trust deeds. In connection with an ordinary guarantee or ordinary security, summary proceeding is out of the question; receivership is all that can be got. With regard to the amortization, I presume these are ten year bonds?

Mr. GRAHAM: I assume they would be ten, yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My recollection is ten; sometimes they are seven. Ten is about the longest that should be considered. The theory is that as you pay 25 per cent cash and as each year you have to pay a certain amount into sinking fund, there is not much risk. That is the plan the Americans have worked upon in connection with practically all their loans, and practically without loss. Loss on an equipment issue is a very rare thing; I do not offhand remember any. Frankly I do not think we are in very much danger of losing anything over and above the 25 per cent. But there is a great deal more to this bill than that. When the matter was being discussed the other day I pointed out that under the general act of the Canadian National Railways, which defines their present bonding powers, the right was given to the system to issue bonds to the extent of $75,000 per mile, and that I had been told by one of the railway officials that practically the whole of that privilege of issuing bonds had been exhausted. In connection with these regular bonds, which are the major part of the bonds of the system—the equipment bonds are very small compared to the regular bonded obligations of the system—there is a very sharp difference between the position we took in the past and the position of the hon. gentleman. Our position always was that the practice we initiated was right, namely, to include in the annual vote the amount of money required to help the railway out, whether in connection with guarantees or in connection with the furnishing of cash. We drew no distinction between guarantees and cash, and under the legislation of this very year my hon. friend availed himself of the practice that we had followed. Take, for example, his guarantee of equipment securities; he made that guarantee last year under the authority of the vote of last year. At least, that is as I understand it; if my hon. friend has any other legislation I wish he would tell us about it. However, I do not think he has. Now, I was not quite sure that the officials of the road were right about the limit of $75,000 per mile being nearly exhausted, and I put a question on the order paper, the answer to which I received to-day. The answer shows the outstanding funded debt of the Canadian National Railways, exclusive of the Canadian government railways, to be $856,147,056. The owned mileage, which is the mileage on which the right to borrow money would be calculated, is given at $15,668.41. The average per mile of bonds is given at $88,775.41. If these figures were correct I would have no objection to this legislation, because the government would have to come down and get parliament's authority before they could give these guarantees; there would be no right on the part of the company to issue bonds. As the right to guarantee is limited by the right to issue bonds, if the right was exhausted then we should be squabbling over something which is not at all material. But my hon. friend's officials do not figure in such a way as to show that, or if they do they figure in such a way as to make for their argument and not for the facts. The average per mile of bonds I have given as $88,775. If you divide the amount of owned road mileage, 15,668.41, into the amount of the outstanding funded debt, it is obvious that that gives the amount of bonds per mile. If hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to check these two figures they will find that the amount issued is under $55,000 per mile—$54,643, to be exact. So that the effect of the legislation that my hon. friend is now introducing is, first, to give the right of guarantee after the voting of 25 per cent of the amount to be expended in the equipment. As I say, I do not think there is much issue there.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not quite follow that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are two questions involved. First there is the matter of the guarantee of equipment securities. In that connection the House is to be informed, because under my hon. friend's own proposal 25 per cent of the whole cost is to be voted in cash.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is on equipment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On equipment. So we there do get some control of the system; we do get these figures submitted to us; we have the opportunity of check and we have the duty of voting. Then, the next proposition is to get an untrammelled right of guarantee. That general right of guarantee, in its turn, is held down by the $75,000 per mile. The figures submitted would show that it had been altogether exceeded, but that figure of $88,000 odd is incorrect. The correct amount is, as I have stated, $55,000 odd per mile. So the effect of this legislation is to give the government the right to issue these guarantees without the considered consent of parliament to the extent of $20,000 per mile on a mileage of 15,668. It does not require a very close figuring to show the tremendous extent of the blank cheque which this legislation would entail. If my hon. friend is well advised he will go back to the old practice so far as these votes are concerned. He did it last year and it did not hurt him at all. He is getting the advantage now in connection with his guarantees of 25 per cent. If he would just take section 2 of his bill and drop section 1 he would then be in a position to carry on business as we have always carried on, plus the right of issuing guarantees on securities when there was only 25 per cent voted.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not quite follow my hon. friend when he says it would give us carte blanche to issue securities without the sanction of parliament. But let me refer to the other matter first, for my hon. friend's criticism of the figures needs a little elucidation.

My department errs very often in giving more information than is asked for. In this case we were asked only for the bonded indebtedness, but in addition to that they added an amount of something like five hundred odd million dollars that the railways owed the government for loans from the government, not being bonded indebtedness, and they made the amount of indebtedness per mile $88,000. That was not the question asked. The question was, what was the bonded debt? So, deducting the amount of government loans in cash from the totals given in the statement my hon. friend has in his hand, would leave the amount of fixed debt at $856,147,056; dividing that by the mileage, exclusive of the government railways, on which there is no bonded indebtedness—on the Central Vermont there is something like $40,000 per mile indebtedness—would leave $55,000 per mile as the bonded indebtedness That does not include the loans in cash from the government to the railway, these having no bearing on the question of indebtedness

It will be remembered that last year Mr. Fielding introduced a bill taking power to grant certain securities. That bill was amended in a way that the Department of Justice informs us possibly takes away all the powers of bonding from the Canadian National Railways, so far as equipment is concerned anyway, and it is rather to restore that power, without depriving parliament of any rights that were purported to be guarded in the bill of last year, that we are introducing this legislation

This bill is amending subsection 4 of section 2 of the Canadian National Railways Guarantee Act, 1923, and that subsection reads:

> Nothing herein contained shall be construed as granting power to guarantee any securities the issue of which has not been authorized by bond.

The amendment proposed is this, and I shall submit it to the committee after the explanation I have made:

> 1. Subsection four of section two of The Canadian National Railways Guarantee Act, 1923, is hereby repealed, and the following enacted in lieu thereof:—

"(4) Nothing herein contained shall be taken to authorize the guarantee of any securities the issue of which has not been authorized by this act or some other act of parliament."

Some other act of parliament, I presume, refers to—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The general bill of 1919.

Mr. GRAHAM: Or the powers of the rolling stock companies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The company has the right with respect to rolling stock.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not understand that this gives us carte blanche to authorize guarantees without coming to parliament.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it does, and I think I can carry the judgment of my hon. friend. In the first instance, I will come back just for a minute to the question of the guarantee clause my hon. friend has referred to. They are two distinct matters entirely. In so far as the guarantee is concerned, I have pointed out that in that connection parliament's advice is taken, and a vote of 25 per cent of the guarantee has to be passed. That guarantee, I do not think, is subject to very much risk at all. It is something which has not been found necessary to use in the past. It was used once this year under the regular form which we have used for many years, under which railway assistance, whether by way of direct grant, guarantee, or anything else, has been given in a supply bill. Now my hon. friend's government, last year came to the conclusion that they did not want to bring down in a supply bill any question of guarantees. We thought they were wrong at the time we took our stand.

Mr. GRAHAM: That was on the branch lines bill?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, on this very issue. Last year we passed a law, which deals in the first instance with the securities of the company. Perhaps I had better read it all:

No securities, as defined in this section including in such definition equipment certificates or obligations in any form intended to be issued to the public, shall be issued for the purposes of or by the company or any of the companies designated in the schedule hereto except those approved as to form, terms and amount by the Governor in Council.

I may pause there simply to say that there was no objection to that at all. As a matter of fact, there was no need for it, because the company always had to come to parliament, and we had complete control over it, but there was no harm in taking further control, and so there was no objection. The next clause reads:

The said securities so approved may be guaranteed by His Majesty and any such guarantee may be in such form and on such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may determine, and may be signed by the Minister or Acting Minister of Finance on behalf of His Majesty.

The effect of that legislation was to give the government the right to guarantee, without coming back to parliament at all, any securities of which they approved and which were issued by any of these companies. That was the thing we objected to. We said, "You should incorporate this in the supply bill, come back to the House, and in the usual way get your right of guarantee." But the government did not agree with us at all. The matter was taken up in the Senate, and the Senate and government have agreed to this clause:

Nothing herein contained shall be construed as granting power to guarantee any securities the issue of which has not been authorized by parliament.

One would naturally think it would be imprudent indeed for any government to want to do anything more than that. The form is not the form in which we thought it should be in at all. We thought we should still have our supply bill, we should still have our vote, and that parliament should still know exactly where the railways were to be, and what the country's commitments were. That was our position and, speaking frankly, I do not think the amendment in the Senate was a proper or a sufficient one. However, it was something that pleased the government and they took it gladly.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, my hon. friend perhaps was not here but no objection was raised by the government at all; they accepted it immediately. The difficulty the government find themselves in is this: In consequence of the opinion given by, I think, the law officers of the government—this is their considered view after this question had been taken up by the legal gentlemen that look after these issues—the construction was put upon this section that the power to guarantee securities is one limited not to the case of the general right of issue but to the specific right of issue. I think my hon. friend will agree with everything I have said so far. That is where the whole difficulty is—that although it may have been thought that this would give a blank cheque, a blank authorization, the lawyers have since held that there being a term of limitation on the powers of guarantee, the specific right of issuance must be first shown before there is the right of guarantee. I think in this I still carry the judgment of my hon. friend. Now, the minister says he does not understand when I point out that this is a case of general right to the government. What has been done is this: Under the former bill we have the limitation, as construed by the law officers, that I have already mentioned. The government want to get away from that so they propose:

Nothing herein contained shall be construed as granting power to guarantee any securities the issue of which has not been authorized by parliament.

The use of these words is to show that a specific right was not required, was never wanted, but that the general right of issuing securities either under this act—which would apply to equipment securities—or under any other act which would apply to the general rights of issue, was the only thing that had to be considered. I think my hon. friend will agree with me that is the situation down to this point. I would ask him if we are at all at variance down to here.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am a little afraid to agree with my hon. friend, because perhaps I have not sufficient grasp of the legal side of the matter. I will read him Mr. Ruel's opinion instead of giving my own, not in reply but as an explanation:

The trouble with this paragraph 4 was that it prevented, in the opinion of the Department of Justice, the issue of equipment securities for the reason that equipment securities are obligations of the Canadian National Rolling Stock Company, Limited, which is a company incorporated under the Dominion Joint Stock Companies Act. General power is given the Dominion Joint Stock Companies to issue securities, but the Justice department considered that paragraph 4, as above quoted, was dealing with specific authority to issue a specific amount of securities and that the general power in the general act to issue securities did not comply with the wording of the paragraph. Consequently, we propose to amend the paragraph to read this way:—

Nothing herein contained shall be taken to authorize the guarantee of any securities the issue of which has not been authorized by this act—

That is the act in question.

—or some other act or parliament.

Now, what I cannot get thoroughly through my mind is this: The suggestion that this does away with the necessity of getting an authorization by act of parliament for the guaranteeing of bonds.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the only reason it was put in here; we do not need it for any other purpose.

Mr. GRAHAM: But why "the issue of which has not been guaranteed by this act." That is the Canadian National Railways Act.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend does not propose to take away any rights guaranteed that way in the Canadian National Railways Act?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are no rights there.

Mr. GRAHAM: If that be true I cannot see where this makes any change. I want to point this out to my hon. friend: He stated that last year $22,000,000 was not in the estimates but 25 per cent was explained in the House, and voted, as being for the purpose of the purchase of rolling stock. I do not think that was in the estimates at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not in terms but we had an amount of money then large enough to enable my hon. friend to do just what he did. The very putting of the vote gives the right of guarantee for any of these purposes right up to the amount of the vote. My hon. friend therefore had the right to go on in the case of the money that was paid in each year.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think that is the case.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that was the case.

Mr. GRAHAM: When I say that, I have reference to the case as I have stated it; my hon. friend has reference to the case as he has stated it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are practically at one down to this point. Now, my hon. friend agrees he has got to get amending legislation for the simple reason that the act of last year was read in the narrower sense which required specific authorization of an issue before the government could get a guarantee. My hon. friend no doubt agrees with that also. Where we cease to be in agreement is merely as to the effect of this legislation. In the first instance let me point out this one fact which is perfectly clear—that unless a general right of guaranteeing is given by this legislation, which to-day does not exist or which to-day is limited in the manner I have pointed out, there is absolutely no object in the legislation. There is no object in asking the House to pass it or in taking up the time of the House in considering it. If these rights exist to-day why waste time unnecessarily?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not want to appear as discussing any legal point with my hon. friend, but the Justice department tells us that the legislation of last year took away any rights of issue we had. This legislation is to restore the rights and in addition to provide that parliament shall have the protection—shall have the further restriction—that any equipment issue must first be approved by parliament to the extent of voting 25 per cent of it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is right and he is wrong. He is right to this extent, that the law officers apparently have advised him—I am not saying they have not advised him absolutely correctly—that we have got a statutory limitation worked by section 4 of the government's right of guarantee; my hon. friend is wrong when he says the legislation of last year took away the right of guarantee. It did not. It never existed before. Why, the right of guarantee in the government of itself, and apart from this House and the votes of this House, never existed until the legislation of last year. The right of guaranteeing in the railway estimates and in the supply bill always had to be given to us by parliament; so that it is not right to say that the legislation of last year took away the right of guarantee. It did not, because it did not exist. The legislation of last year first gave, on the one hand, the omnibus right of guarantee; and then, through a mistake to which I think the government fell heir, the general right was restricted, and it ought to be. My hon. friend says he does not think this gave any general right. I point out, that under the legislation with regard to the Canadian Northern system—and I am not now going into all the other different companies—there might be arguments as to whether they did not still have the right to issue securities. I am not going into the question of whether, by order in council or in some other way, the right of issuing bonds could not be given on the Transcontinental, Intercolonial, and so on; but I will simply take up what is absolutely beyond question or doubt. Under the legislation of 1919 the Canadian National Railway has the right to pledge the road and issue bonds to the extent of $75,000 a mile. I do not think the minister will disagree with that statement.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, $75,000 a mile.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the plain fact as I recollect it, and I do not think my memory is faulty in that regard. There is the right to issue up to $75,000 a mile just on one part of the system, some 15,668 miles. All my hon. friend has to do is to take that right to issue $75,000 worth of securities, take this legislation in the way he now proposes it, and this government would be in the position, without the slightest say-so of this parliament at all, of guaranteeing the bonds to the extent of $313,000,000. I really think that if my hon. friend sees what he is doing, and sees the extent to which these figures run, he will consider that the government would be very much better without this right. Surely parliament ought not lightly to put into the hands of any government the right to guarantee railway securities to the extent of $313,000,000. It is an absolutely unheard-of proposal. We did our best last year to make the point clear on the closing day of the session. This time we have the accurate figures, and I ask my hon. friend to check them. We have a little under $55,000 a mile of bonded indebtedness. I take the figure roughly at $20,000 and if my hon. friend will just multiply that—

Mr. GRAHAM: I have figured it all out.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:—he will find that I am right in saying that he would have the right to issue guarantees to the extent of $313,000,000. It is idle to talk about parliament voting 25 per cent of all these things. It does not do that.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The only thing it passes is the vote for equipment securities. I am not objecting to that. There is the right of parliament to have the say in all these matters, railway or finance. Let the minister do as I suggest, and we will be able to say something on the 25 per cent. We will know what we are doing; but there is not one single sou marquee to be voted in connection with that enormous guarantee of $313,000,000. All the minister has to do is to drop the fourth section and put through section 2, to give him the right in connection with the guarantee. That is, if he will properly observe, as I submit he ought to, the right of parliament to pass on these things, and not take such tremendous powers.

Mr. GRAHAM: Section 4 of this bill of course was prepared by the counsel for the Canadian National Railways. I have had no idea of any intention, near or remote, of endeavouring to get for the government the power to guarantee $20,000 a mile without the consent of parliament. I would not recommend an order in council, and would not agree to it myself, no matter what the act was, unless I was ordered to do it, for any such purposes; because I believe the parliament of Canada is supreme in all these things, so long as we are shareholders of the road. We will leave that. I have not yet got through my mind that the bill does what my hon. friend says it does. I think he has probably mistaken the meaning of the words. There is no suggestion or desire to do what he suggests. Last year the bill as first introduced by the Minister of Finance was more for the purpose of imposing a check on the railway company, in order to have control of the bonds. However, we will let section 4 stand till to-morrow. We will agree to section 2, and I will get a further explanation, because I have no further explanation on the part of the government at present. In fact the government would not want to take the responsibility of issuing securities of that kind without the consent of parliament. I move that the committee adopt section 2, let section 4 stand until we get some further information, and report progress.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suggest that nothing be accepted yet. If the section is allowed to stand, which I think is the proper course, let the whole bill stand. I have a high appreciation of the point raised by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). I had not observed the effect of the bill as fully as I do now, and I am satisfied that the minister will find the effect that my hon. friend from West York describes naturally flowing and inevitably resulting from the legislation.

Mr. GRAHAM: What will we do if the Justice department says the act as it now stands has the effect of taking away all power from the railway to guarantee any securities?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not attempt to paint the lily, but I will put the matter as I understand it, and it may be of some value to the department when the minister lays the matter before them. What the minister started in to do last year—

Mr. GRAHAM: It was not my bill at all last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I refer to the Minister of Finance. What the Finance minister proposed to do last year in respect of the general guaranteeing is just what the minister this session sought to do in respect of his Branch Lines bill; that is to say, to obtain power to advance money in the one case, and to guarantee it in the other case, without having the authority specially mentioned and the amount voted in the estimates That is the course the Minister of Finance started to pursue last year, and we resisted. The Minister of Finance took a general power to so guarantee, and if the bill as it passed this House had gone through the Senate, the very general power the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) now describes would have been in the hands of the government. However, the Senate attached a rider, the effect of which turned out to be that that general power is restrained; and restrained how? Just to this extent, that it can apply only to issues for which there is specific authority.

The minister this year wants that restriction removed because, he says—and I do not at all dispute his bona fides—"unless I get it back the way intended last year, I cannot get my equipment issue guaranteed." The reason is that the issuing of his equipment securities lies in territory beyond the restriction of last year; it lies in territory covered by the general power of guarantee, not by the specific power. But a great deal more lies in that territory, even the amount between the $55,000 a mile and the $75,000 a mile. So, when he removes the restriction of the Senate, he opens up the whole thing, and he is able to guarantee not only his equipment securities, but the extra $20,000 a mile over the whole 15,000 miles. That is the effect of the amendment that is set out in this legislation.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot see it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister wants only what his object is, he can secure it without opening up that tremendous field of guarantee that is opened up by the removal of the restriction. All that he need say is that the government may guarantee equipment issues such as may be authorized by the act incorporating the Rolling Stock Company, and which are covered by the 25 per cent. I do not advise him to do the thing in that way. I would advise him to go back to his supply bill every time and to include his equipment in his supply bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think this is right but it is subject to correction. In 1921-22 the Canadian Northern Railway had an equipment issue guaranteed by the government of $11,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think we ever guaranteed them.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is in the list.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It may be. If it is, it has escaped my memory. I think it is a mistake.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think that is an equipment issue.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think so.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will find out before this bill comes up again because that will be of some importance as to the practice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If so, it was included in the authority voted in the estimates, but I do not think it existed.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am going to ascertain that. I do not think it was in the estimates. I think it was guaranteed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The reason why I say I do not think there were any equipment guarantees is because, for the purposes of the debate on the budget, I asked for a statement in the premises and the statement did not show any guarantee prior to 1923. If the minister is ready to do as to equipment issues what he is ready to do as to all other issues, that is to say, to have them voted, he will not need any such act as this. If he is not prepared to do that all he requires is a bill providing authority to guarantee wherever parliament votes the 25 per cent.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not going to argue the question any more. I am going to let it stand until we get the thing right. But in 1921-22, the Canadian government guaranteed a loan of $25,000,000 for the Canadian Northern Railway Company, and they guaranteed a loan for the Grand Trunk Railway Company of $25,000,000. Consequently, I am inclined to think that this amount of $11,000,000 was equipment issue, but I will see whether it was in the estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have no objection whatever to the minister guaranteeing equipment issues. All we ask is that they be included in the estimates the same as was done there if there was a guarantee.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think it was in the estimates.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair:

Immigration and Colonization—British Empire Exhibition, $300,000.

Mr. ROBB: I have called this item first because I understand some hon. gentlemen are to be absent to-morrow who are interested in this appropriation. The British Empire Exhibition, as hon. members know, is an exhibition at Wembley Park, London, England, representative of all the British dominions as well as the Mother Country. It is said that the idea originated with a former Canadian High Commissioner, Lord Strathcona. Canada was invited with the other British dominions to take part in this exhibition. I think the minister last year explained that fully and I will not go into it any further than to present to the committee what we have accomplished. It will be generally admitted that Canada is on the trade routes to different parts of the British Empire. No other British dominion is so favourably located geographically as Canada to trade with the other parts of the Empire, so it is fitting and, we believe, profitable that Canada should take part in that exhibition. I have been told by those who have been over there that we have one of the best sites in Wembley Park, and it is generally admitted by those who have called at the office, by those who have written to us, and by the press despatches, not only of the United Kingdom, but coming from other parts of the Empire, that Canada's exhibit is recognized as the best of all exhibits at this exhibition.

As has been the custom for many years in connection with the Canadian Immigration Commissioner, who was one of the commissioners in charge of exhibits from different parts of the Empire, his was the exhibit that was ready and complete on the opening day. Mr. Tolmie, the commissioner in charge, advises us that the building is divided into two parts, one part containing government exhibits, that is the natural resources of the country, agriculture, forestry, fisheries, minerals, fruits, water powers, educational exhibit and art, and the other is devoted to our manufactured products. From a list sent me I find there are 268 exhibitors of these products. The building is 451 feet long by 280 feet wide with an annex at each end 110 feet long by 90 feet wide, one belonging to the Canadian National Railways and the other to the Canadian Pacific Railway, containing exhibits of their railway equipment, national parks, natural resources, and whatever else would attract tourists.

Based on our experience at the Milan exhibition of 1906, the Dublin exhibition of 1907, the Franco-British exhibition in London of 1912, the Ghent exhibition of 1913 and the San Francisco exhibition of 1915, we gave the contract for the building to the contractors who had erected our buildings at those exhibitions, and that is one reason why we were ready, on the opening day at Wembley.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who were the contractors?

Mr. ROBB: Humphreys Limited.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where from?

Mr. ROBB: I really do not know. They are a British concern.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is the Mr. Tolmie in charge?

Mr. ROBB: He is the Commissioner of Exhibitions, and was trained under Mr. Hutchison. He has been attached to the Department of Immigration for many years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: W. T. R. Preston?

Mr. ROBB: Don't re-open that old sore to-night; we wasted too many hours over it last week. Our building represents Canada as a whole, but every exhibit is distinctly labelled showing the province and the locality in that province from which it comes. In other words, we have a Canadian exhibit as a whole with provincial representation. It is thought that this being an Empire exhibit, it would be a fitting occasion for us to send from this parliament a small deputation consisting of representatives of the different parties, who might have an opportunity of associating with representatives from the other outlying portions of the Empire. There is little use putting so much money in this exhibition without trying to get from it the very best advertisement we can. While we will leave it to each party to make its nomination, it has been thought that the chief whips might form the delegation.

Mr. HOEY: Are the provinces concerned paying the expenses of their representatives?

Mr. ROBB: When Major Belcher was sent around the Empire to organize this exhibition he reached Canada with the idea that every province should have its exhibit. He had fostered that idea in South Africa, New Zealand and Australia, and in fact had convinced the Australians that that was the proper system to adopt, but we pointed out to him the advantages of organizing these exhibits on a dominion or commonwealth rather than on a provincial or state basis, and finally he adopted our view. I may add that Australia recognized the merit of our suggestion and theirs is a commonwealth exhibit. Many years ago we had the provincial idea and found it a failure. I am not sure when we made the change, but I remember that our Canadian exhibit at San Francisco was recognized to be the best on the grounds, because we had the one outstanding idea—Canadian. It was proposed to the provinces that they should share in the expenses on the basis of population, and after considerable correspondence some of the provinces were willing to do so but others were not. Finally, last fall when we had our Immigration conference here I suggested to the provincial representatives, and confirmed it in writing, that each province might send an accredited representative and deduct his expenses from its share of the contribution which it would make to the federal treasury. So to that extent the provinces are represented, but if they do not make such contribution they will pay the expenses of their representatives.

Mr. LEWIS: How many delegates is it proposed to send to the exhibition, how many groups are to be represented, and what is to be the total expenditure for this purpose?

Mr. ROBB: I had in mind a very small delegation. The total expenditure will be the cost of transportation and a living allowance while in England.

Mr. LEWIS: How long are they to be there, and what is the estimated expenditure?

Mr. ROBB: I imagine about forty days.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What is to be the amount of the living allowance?

Mr. ROBB: Twenty dollars a day, and $400 for the return fare.

Mr. LEWIS: Has the number from each group been decided upon?

Mr. ROBB: No; but I should like to say right now that we do not feel we should send the whole parliament, much as we would like to; we think it should be a very small delegation.

Mr. HOEY: Would the expenses be paid out of this item of $300,000?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: Has it been possible to allot space in the Canadian building at Wembley to all the Canadian manufacturers who applied for it?

Mr. ROBB: Space was allotted by the commissioner, working with the different government representatives of the natural resources of the country and with a representative of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. We charge $2.50 a square foot for show case space and $1.75 a square foot for the other space. At the time the exhibition was opened the space was all allotted. Recently some exhibitors who had been given not one opportunity but no less than three opportunities to take space, having learned that the exhibit was a great success, have been demanding that space be given them. It was not possible to accede to their request, the space having been all allotted to those who had early in the year intimated their desire to exhibit.

Mr. LEWIS: Are these members going over as a responsible body, or are they going in a sort of social or fraternal way? Is parliament to be responsible for what the delegates say when they get overseas?

Mr. ROBB: Oh well, they would go over as a representative body. Parliament is not responsible for what anybody says in parliament; every man is responsible for his own statements. They will go over as a body representing the parliament of Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As I belong to the smallest group in this House, a group that will not be asked to go over and that would not go if it were asked, I want to oppose this vote. I speak as representative of one of our western cities where we believe that the time has come for economies along certain lines. We cannot see any reason why certain members of this House should be picked out and sent overseas on what is ordinarily termed a joy ride. If these particular persons were to be placed for five weeks in the Canadian building as an exhibit, there might be something to be said for the proposal, but if they are simply to go over there, look around, make speeches and have a good time, I think there are some expenditures that might better be made for which there is crying need throughout the country. Again and again we have asked that something be done to relieve the pressure of unemployment that persists out in our western cities, but the government cannot see its way to do anything of that kind. This exhibition itself may very well increase unemployment in Canada by bringing over a number of people who are unfitted for life in this western country. However, that is another matter which I may touch upon later. For the present I should like to protest against the precedent which would be instituted by picking out a number of men to go over there without any ostensible purpose in view.

Mr. ROBB: It is not a precedent; they have been sent before.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What will be the estimated total cost of this trip? Surely the minister has some idea of the number that are going and of the cost involved. That at least is due to parliament.

Mr. ROBB: I should think it would not cost more than $15,000 or $20,000. It would depend on the size of the delegation. It may cost less, possibly not more than $11,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Are there any particular duties resting upon this group? I understood they were to be connected with the Immigration department, in the way of giving a certain amount of information to people in the Old Country. Or is their trip purely of a social character?

Mr. ROBB: Very naturally a Canadian going over there would, if he had the opportunity, tell of the advantages of the country he lives in.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Then the government will find itself facing a definite responsibility for the statements of these men, if they are expected to give information about the country.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish to join the protest of the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) against this vote. It is a disgrace that we should adopt a procedure of this kind when we need so many things in Canada. We need relief for agriculturists; we need rural credits; we need transportation; we need unemployment relief—we need anything that any country needs; yet we turn round and vote $20,000 for three or more persons to go over to England whose principal duty apparently will be to tell how employment may be secured in Canada. I do not think that is fair either to Canada or to those over there. I have no doubt the idea would be to select some—what we might call awful examples, to show how splendidly they have done in this country. I do not like the idea of this vote at all. I am going to move, Mr. Chairman, that the item be reduced by $20,000.

Mr. ROBB: It is quite true that we need much in this country. If there is one thing we need more than another it is markets, and we need to give out a knowledge of the products that we have to sell.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Surely there is a sufficiently large staff of technical men over there dealing with the marketing problems. If these men are unable to secure markets for us, how can we expect these parliamentarians to do it?

Mr. GARDINER: I want to protest against the spending of money for sending delegates from this parliament over to the Old Country. I know the conditions that exist in western Canada to-day; I know of many families out there who do not know where the next meal is coming from. If parliament is to vote money to send some of its members across to the Old Country merely as a social event, I think it is a crime against the interests of the Canadian people as a whole. A few years ago the government or parliament undertook to open up certain areas in western Canada, areas on which it was impossible to make a living. People went in there at the invitation of the government and spent ten or fifteen years in an effort to make a living, without success. Only a few days ago I interviewed the Minister of Agrculture (Mr. Motherwell) to see if a small advance could not be obtained to assist these people to go to some other part of the province or some other part of the West where they could get a better location or where they would have some opportunity to make a living and be enabled to stay in this country. But the minister said, "No, we could not vote any money for that; that is an impossibility." Yet to-day parliament is asked to vote approximately $20,000 to send members of parliament on a junketing trip. I object to the proposal.

Mr. EVANS: I rise also to oppose this scheme for sending delegates to the Wembley Exhibition. If the government want to send anybody over they should appoint them and take the responsibility for them. I take it that the whole scheme is one of immigration. I cannot take part in any scheme of immigration under the conditions that prevail in agriculture throughout this country—conditions that could very largely be alleviated by the government. It may be said we need markets, but we shall not extend our markets very much by taking a trip over there for five weeks and spending $20,000. We have marketing agents in every country in the world at the present time, but our trade policy in this country diminishes our markets rather than expands them.

I am opposed to the present scheme of immigration, and did I go over to England I could not take part in it. I could not point out the advantages of this country to intending immigrants, not because this country is not worthy of more immigration, but simply because of the conditions that this government could remove in that the earnings of these immigrants, through unjust legislation, are year by year filched from them, so that after a lifetime of work we have many in Canada to-day who are no better off than when they first emigrated. To me the present immigration scheme—well, it is practically a white slave traffic, and I am not going to take any part in it, and until these conditions that are removable are removed, I shall raise my voice in protest against any such scheme.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A glance at the past will, I believe, indicate that it has been customary for the government, where Canada has had a Canadian exhibit at some international exhibition, to have the country represented by distinguished citizens, members of parliament or a parliamentary delegation, or others as commissioners representative of the country as a whole. As far back as the Centennial at Philadelphia in 1874, this parliament sent at the expense of the country some of its leading citizens as commissioners representative of Canada to the international exhibition held in that city. At the time of the World's Fair at Chicago, in 1893, this parliament sent two of its members to represent the parliament of Canada at that exhibition which was also in the United States. I have before me the Hansard which contains the debate at that time, and the question that arose then was as to the amount that the members of parliament were to be paid. Parliament appears to have agreed that it would not be proper to allow anything for "services" so called, but that on an occasion of the kind it would be proper that there should be a liberal allowance for expenses, and accordingly members of parliament were sent from Canada under the Conservative government of the day to represent this country at that exhibition in Chicago.

There have been inter-Imperial gatherings in England at which this country has been represented by members of parliament, gatherings which afforded opportunity for gentlemen in public life in this country to become acquainted with fellow British subjects, citizens of the Empire resident in the Old Country, and others from other of the self-governing dominions. At the time of the coronation of King Edward VII., the parliament of Canada was, I think, represented by several ministers. At the time of the corona- of King George, in addition to the ministers who were present, there was a large delegation representative of both houses of parliament. That event was not looked upon as a junketing expedition, but as one of those much to be desired opportunities of bringing together members of parliament from different parts of the Empire to interchange ideas on matters of common interest in the expectation that in the sum of things, in the long run, all parts of the British Empire would gain from a representation of the kind.

Last year when I was at the Imperial conference, members of the British government of the day and some of the members of parliament spoke to me as to the possibility of having a representation of the Canadian parliament visit England during the holding of the British Empire Exhibition. It was intimated that an effort would be made to have representatives of the different parliaments of the self-governing dominions present in London during the months of the exhibition. I was asked to convey to my colleagues and to the members of the House an invitation on behalf of the British members to visit the exhibition, and to say that if an official delegation were sent over they would be sure of a very hearty welcome from members of the British parliament.

When the government was considering the representation of Canada at this exhibition, it was thought at first that representation might be best effected by appointing, as was done in some other cases, commissioners, that some half-dozen or more prominent persons in Canada might be appointed to represent our country overseas as commissioners at the British Empire Exhibition. It was realized that Canada was likely to have one of the finest exhibits of all the self-governing dominions; it is now admitted, I think, to be the finest of all. As a government, we felt that rather than appoint special commissioners outside of parliament, and rather than have the country represented exclusively by ministers of the Crown, we could not do better by way of representation of Canada than to choose from this Dominion House of Commons, irrespective of parties, a few of its members, and have these gentlemen represent the Dominion of Canada at the British Empire Exhibition. We felt were it understood that the party that was to go were chosen in the manner I have indicated, as representative of the main divisions in the House, we would be taking a course of which the public generally would strongly approve. There are occasions when a country stands to gain by indirect as well as by direct methods. I think it may be assumed that members of parliament going from Canada to the present exhibition in England, particularly if they are selected from among the more active members of the House, will come back with a knowledge of other parts of the British Empire and with ideas which will be useful to this country, and at the same time that while they are in England they will carry with them and be able to impart to others ideas with respect to Canada and her relations with the other parts of the Empire which will be all to the good.

I would respectfully express the hope that the House will see its way to take a large view of the matter, not look upon it in any small way, but rather take pride in the fact that we have a country that we may well be glad to see represented abroad by its members of parliament, and agree to allow the minister the opportunity of making the arrangement which the government proposes. It is not one which involves a large expenditure.

May I add this further word, since the minister himself has spoken of the possibility of having the whips of the different parties in any group that may go. Very few of us, I think, appreciate just how much the work of parliament, the orderly carrying on of business here, is dependent upon and facilitated by these gentlemen who give their service without any thought of what it costs them in time and effort, and without expecting anything in the way of recognition or remuneration from their fellow members in the House or from parliament itself. It is a very little thing for us to attempt to recognize in this way a part of the great service which they render not only parliament, but the country. I hope parliament will respond to this very fitting request in a liberal manner.

Mr. SPENCER: Unfortunately I had to be a little late coming into the chamber, and I have not heard what groups in this House are supposed to be represented. I should like to know what groups have been suggested—how represented, and how many from each group—and what the expenditure per member will be for the members it is suggested shall be sent.

Mr. ROBB: A few moments ago I gave the estimate that the expenditure would run from $11,000 to $20,000. It depends upon the number that will be sent from the three different groups in the House. While I am on my feet I should like to put on record some of the statements that have come in to us as to the work that Mr. Tolmie, the Exhibition Commissioner, is doing. That is only an act of justice to Mr. Tolmie, who is an old employee of the government of Canada and has had charge of exhibitions under different administrations. In the first place the High Commissioner for Canada writes as follows:

24th April 1924.

Dear Mr. ROBB,

The British Empire Exhibition was opened yesterday and I can vouch for it that the Canadian building is beyond compare. It was the only building on the grounds that was absolutely ready to the last tack. Mr. Tolmie did wonders and deserves the utmost credit.

Sir James Stevenson and Sir Travers Clarke, the two real managers of the exhibition, are simply delighted, the latter telling me that the building itself and its completeness just show the capacity of the people it represents. This was a very neat compliment indeed.

I am proud of the Building; proud of its management and everything connected with it and I want again to say that Mr. Tolmie and Mr. McKinnon are wonders.

Your sincerely,

PETER C. LARKIN.

The Honourable JAMES A. ROBB, M.P.,
Minister of Immigration and Colonization,
Ottawa.

P.S.—Sir Joseph Cook, the High Commissioner for Australia, was telling me he had gone through the building the day before and he said he absolutely had to acknowledge that we were far and away the best thing in the grounds. Yesterday, after the ceremony in the stadium, the hundred odd thousand people seemed to make a rush for the Canadian building for it was jammed.

P.C.L.

Then on May 5, this message was addressed to Mr. Tolmie:

2 Garden Court Temple,
London, E.C. 4. 5th May, 1924.

Dear Mr. TOLMIE,

I went to the British Empire Exhibition on Saturday, and I must write to congratulate you on the Canadian pavilion. I think that it far surpasses anything else in the exhibition.

Yours sincerely,

BEAVERBROOK.

Here is a message from the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce who was over there:

Ottawa, May 28, 1924.

I have not had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Robb since I came back, for I wanted to add my testimony to the wonderful exhibition that Tolmie has put up at Wembley. He is the greatest living showman, and he has had a heart-breaking time of it. I hope the government can find a way of giving him a bonus in appreciation of his work. He has riveted Canada into the picture before the Empire and the world of tourists that visit Wembley.

Here is a cable to the Prime Minister from Sir Newton Moore, who is an ex-Prime Minister of one of the states in Australia:

London, April 30, 1924.

Rt. Hon. MACKENZIE KING,
Ottawa.

Canada's section exhibition reflects greatest credit all concerned Splendid advertisement Dominions wonderful resources and potentialities.

NEWTON MOORE.

I shall now read a letter from Mr. F. W. Hay, of Listowel, Ontario:

Listowel, Ont., May 6th, 1924.

Honorable JAS. A. ROBB,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. ROBB,—

We are just in to-day from London, England, and while there attended the opening of the Wembley exhibition, and went back a second time.

I am prompted to write you, only to express to you what we all felt in reference to our Canadian building—that it is altogether the best building on the grounds, and almost completed, and I feel those in charge of the work there, should receive a word of encouragement, and appreciation, first because of the beauty of the building, and then because of its practical completeness, when this cannot be said of any of the other buildings.

In Mr. Tolmie, who I understand is in charge, although I did not see him we have an excellent representative, and Mr. McKinnon, who is in touch with the exhibits has shown splendid organization to have everything so far advanced.

With kind personal regards,

Your faithfully,

F. W. HAY.

I now give a letter from Jenkins Brothers, Limited, manufacturers of London to the following effect:

13th May, 1924.

The Hon. J. A. ROBB,
Department of Trade and Commerce, Government Building,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Sir,—As a Canadian manufacturer's representative and an exhibitor at the British Empire Exhibition, Wembley, London, I would like to call your attention to the very excellent work that has been done by the representatives of the Canadian government, Mr. A. W. Tolmie and Mr. J. S. McKinnon, and express to them through you my personal appreciation of their co-operation and help in our very small effort.

The Canadian building is in itself the most complete and artistic in the whole exhibition to my way of thinking, and this is the opinion that I have heard and read as expressed by the official as well as the private individuals who have seen the exhibition, and does Canada a vast amount of good, even at this early stage of the exhibition.

Mr. Tolmie and Mr. McKinnon have been extremely kind and considerate, as well as helpful to the exhibitors in getting their materials together, arranging their exhibits, and were always, not only helpful but cheerful and pleasant whenever approached, and I feel that they should have the thanks of the responsible members of the government as well as the manufacturers who are exhibiting at Wembley and who have not had the opportunity of personally observing the splendid work which they have done.

Yours faithfully,
Jenkins Bross, Ltd.

W. H. UTZ,
V. P. and Managing Director.

Next I shall quote a letter from the Winona Fruit Growers', Limited:

Winoma, Ont., June 16, 1924.

The Deputy Minister of Immigration and Colonization,
Ottawa.

Sir,—Have just returned from a visit to England during which I, of course, went to Wembley.

This letter is written for the special purpose of expressing appreciation of the splendid exhibit made by your department, the fruit display in particular appealing to me very strongly. Whoever is responsible for it, Mr. Tolmie, I think, but am not sure, is to be congratulated.

Yours faithfully,

J. W. HEWITSON,
Manager, Winona Fruit Growers, Limited.

Next I shall quote a letter addressed to Mr. Tolmie himself:

London, May 21, 1924.

Canadian Government,
Exhibition Commission,
Canadian Pavilion,
Wembley Park.
Attention: Mr. Tolmie.

Dear Mr. TOLMIE,

I wonder if you would be kind enough to let me have a list of the exhibitors in the Canadian pavilion, if such a list is available.

Many of the companies are our clients in Canada and I would like to write them all a letter offering them the facilities of our office while they are in England.

This good weather should be helping things along at Wembley and I hear nothing but praise for the Canadian building. In fact, one prominent Scotch manufacturer whom I have been trying to interest in Canada for the last year or two came in to me the other day and asked for a plan for advertising his products in Canada. He said that he had just come from Wembley, had gone through the Canadian building, and had no idea that it was such a country as it was, and that he was sorry that he had not been in the market long ago.

Yours faithfully,

A. McKim Limited,
ALAN R. COLE,
London Manager.

Finally there is a letter from the Canadian Authors' Association expressing their appreciation of the work of the staff. I should like to say that while these letters convey a well deserved tribute of appreciation to Mr. Tolmie and Mr. McKinnon, the man who more than any other is responsible for the scenic effects and transparencies is Mr. Turcotte, who has been for many years attached to the Canadian Exhibition staff.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have been from the beginning very strongly in favour of Canada taking part in the exhibition and also of her part being such that it would properly reflect the importance of the Dominion and the Empire, and I see no reason to criticise the success with which Canada's work has been done. I have not, of course, been able to visit it, but such reports as I have had, let me frankly say, reflect credit on the Dominion. I do not oppose any vote that is essential to the complete success of the undertaking. As respects the feature of the vote which covers a proposed official representation there by members of both Houses and the press, I take a different view from that of the government but not in any truculent way. I think the government would be well advised to withdraw that feature of their proposal. The Prime Minister has referred to a precedent when we sent to Chicago an official representation of two. He has referred, as well, to a representation of much larger dimensions that went to attend the Coronation of King Edward, and a similar representation that attended the coronation of the present king. These, if I understood him correctly, were all parliamentary representations.

I distinguish between functions of that kind and an exhibition—this exhibition, the Chicago exhibition, or any of a similar kind. The coronation of His Majesty was an event in a category by itself. The reason we were properly represented in such a fashion was to attest the fealty of the Dominion to the person of His Majesty. I think considerable reflection might have been made on Canada, and justly so, had we not sent such a representation of the parliament of Canada as attested the fealty of parliament to his person and his throne.

Of course the Chicago exhibition is a case in point. We were represented there. I would have no objection to similar representation here. In fact, I think it is quite right that a member of the government should be there, so that at functions he may speak as representing the Dominion, and I have not the least doubt that as soon as parliament prorogues, which will be as soon as anyone else can readily go, a member of the government—probably more than one—will go over and represent this country. But that is different from sending a delegation of from eight to twelve members of parliament to the exhibition in any special capacity. To do so would not in my judgment strengthen the confidence of the electors and taxpayers in the country in the good faith and fidelity of their representatives in this House. It seems to me that all that is requisite, in so far as parliament and the government are concerned, is representation which should fittingly be by a member of the government itself. There will be members of parliament there; doubtless many contemplate going. It is to be hoped that they do go, but I do not think there should be a group of others placed in any special position and sent at the expense of the treasury. That is the view I have held and the view I will have to support, and in all earnestness I suggest to the government that they themselves withdraw from the vote such amount as covers what they have in mind with reference to an extended parliamentary representation.

Miss MACPHAIL: I wish to associate myself with those who have opposed the principle of this vote of probably $20,000, to send a delegation of parliamentarians overseas. I believe it is true that the whips have a good deal of extra work to do and we as members of parliament should appreciate that. I am sure we are all willing to do all we possibly can to discharge our obligation to these gentlemen, or at least to show them in some way our appreciation of their efforts in our behalf. But it would put those members of the opposition who went overseas in a most unhappy position once they returned home and that is a fact that cannot be denied by anyone. We can all imagine ourselves in the same position. I was quite amused by the folder which came to me in the mail to-day, headed "Canada, the New Homeland." If the word pictures of Canada which these gentlemen give when they go overseas are as beautiful as the pictures on this folder we should have a rush of immigration to our shores——such a rush that we would be entirely swamped by unemployment. It is quite an amusing thing. If it were not a tragedy it would be humorous. They give four methods of getting homesteads, but they do not say how you keep your homestead when you get it. I oppose this vote vigorously. I am against the whole principle of the thing. We need to do something to show our sympathy for the people of Canada who suffer, and that means most of the working people, whether on the farm or in the factory. They are the sufferers. They will bitterly resent such a thing as this. It is their money that is being used. What right have we to pay members for their services to us with the people's money? If the government want to take the responsibility of sending ministers over there, they are at liberty to do so. They believe in responsible government; then let them take the responsibility. I think it would be entirely foolish of parliament to become so subservient as to support this vote, and I personally will oppose it.

Mr. McBRIDE: I wish to dissociate myself from those who are opposed to this vote. I think it is a proper thing that we should show some appreciation of the services of these gentlemen who have done so much to conduct the affairs of parliament in this House and who have done it so satisfactorily. It is no easy task for any man. I think it is fit and proper that these men should be sent to the exhibition. We have heard a good deal of talk about the unemployed in this country. I noticed last fall that a large number of people in Winnipeg were looking for employment, while we in British Columbia were sending people out to the prairie provinces to harvest the grain. There is a certain class of people in this country who will never hold a job when they get one, and it is unfortunate they were ever allowed to land. The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) some time ago made reference to some man who had five jobs, and then was hauled up in court for stealing a gun, and the magistrate sympathized with him. If I had my way, in dealing with that type of character, I would give him six months at hard labour, and then send him home to the country from whence he came. He deserves no sympathy—a man who had an opportunity to make good on five occasions and failed to do so deserves no sympathy—I remember the time of the World's Fair at Seattle; the City Council of Vancouver went over in a body. Every member of the city council and many of their friends took the trip. We did not even go as ordinary passengers. We hired one of the liners that ran to Australia. When we were over there we kept the liner as our headquarters. We hired busses and went through the city and the exhibition grounds, and represented Vancouver in a proper way. I may say it had its effect, and Vancouver had more prosperous times after that than it has had for many years.

In regard to the immigration question, I hope the exhibition in London will have the desired effect of bringing immigration to this country. We want millions of immigrants in Canada, but we do not want the milk-fed type who expect the government to take care of them all the way through life. We have a certain number of immigrants who were no use in the country they left and less use in the country to which they came. I wish to associate myself with those who support this vote.

10 p.m.

Mr. MORRISON: As a western representative, I am very sorry to hear the pessimistic remarks of other members from the prairie provinces. I think I have as good a perspective of the whole situation as those dissenting representatives, and when the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) says there is so much unemployment in Canada which should be taken care of before we bring in any more immigrants, I do not think he is representing the viewpoint of the majority of Canada's best citizens. I know that in Winnipeg and other cities there are hundreds, and may be thousands, of men who do not want to work, but want something handed to them on a platter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask whether the hon. member has read the official letters which have gone out from several leading citizens of Canada in reference to the unemployment which they face at the present time? I refer particularly to Toronto and Winnipeg.

Mr. MORRISON: No, I have not read the articles which the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg refers to; but I will tell him what I think is another of the causes of so much unemployment. Many of those who employ these men cannot get them to earn the money they are asking. A lady keeping a boarding house told me not a month ago that she called a plumber in. He was not in the house more than fifteen minutes; he did not put any new material on the job, yet he charged her eight dollars. That is a sample of some of your unemployed men. They cannot get steady employment and they do not deserve it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Perhaps he was a lawyer, not a plumber.

Mr. MORRISON: He may have been a political agitator too. If the whips go over to the Old Country they can honestly make representations to thousands of people who will be glad to come to Canada and who will, in that way, improve their material conditions very much. With all the hardships we have in Canada—and I admit there are many—conditions are much better here than in the Old Land. We want to give those people an opportunity to come to Canada, and while I am well aware that a small percentage that come will not make good, I believe the great majority will make good. This country needs hundreds of thousands, aye, millions of men who are not afraid of hard work. We want men who will work more and talk less than some people we have in this country. I am going to vote for sending those delegates because I think this will be a good investment for the country and we shall get our money back a hundred fold.

Mr. BOYS: As I am more or less associated with this vote I think I should not remain in my seat without saying a word or two. If there is one thing I regret, it is that if the invitation were extended to me as a whip to go over to England, for certain reasons that I need not trouble the committee with, I would not be able to go. I would, nevertheless, appreciate the opportunity of going and enjoying the honour of representing Canada at that exhibition. When one reflects that Canada has invested a million dollars in this proposition and when we are told that other colonies in the Empire are sending delegates, it would be somewhat extraordinary if the largest and most important colony in the Empire had no delegation there whatever. I may be under a misapprehension as to the number that are going, but what information I have indicates that six are going, four from this House and possibly two from the Senate. I will support the appropriation heartily, and I regret that circumstances beyond my control will prevent my going if the invitation should ever come to me as whip of the party, because I would enjoy that very decided distinction on the part of my country.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The discussion has wandered entirely out of its proper channels. The discussion was on the question of immigration, and I am not convinced that this has anything to do with immigration at all.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the British Empire Exhibition.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) cleared up at least one point, namely, that the visit was purely a social one. It is based entirely on tradition and precedent, and I would understand, when we are compared with the other colonies that this is just a matter of keeping up with the Jones's. If it were of particular interest as regards immigration, I would say that it would probably be right and proper to take a certain amount of the Immigration estimates for this purpose. I am not convinced of that however; I think our friends who propose to go over to England are going just to have a good time and, perhaps, incidentally to represent Canada. As to how they are going to represent Canada and what particular good they are going to do, I am just a little at sea. I tried to secure from the minister some time ago statements regarding the number of Canadian employees already in England, connected with the various departments, Immigration, Trade and Commerce, and the number of special men they propose to send over in connection with the exhibition. I did not secure that information and I would be obliged if the minister could give it to the committee now.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I have not lost confidence in our fellow Canadians nor in our fellow members of parliament. Whatever action a member of parliament would take on behalf of Canada at the British Empire Exhibition would be creditable to himself and to Canada. I cannot support for several reasons the amendment that has been moved. In the first place, no concrete reason that I can support has been given and I cannot follow the line of reasoning of those who support the amendment. In debating the amendment they referred to the duties of different members going to the exhibition in connection with immigration. There are more factors in building up Canada than immigration and people do not come out from the Old Country only for the purpose of engaging in farming. I look on this vote for the British Empire Exhibition and upon the money that would be spent for individuals who might go to the exhibition as money well spent. We living in British Columbia are interested in other questions than that of immigrants coming here for the purpose of farming. The people of British Columbia, particularly the fruit growers, have gone to a great deal of expense, time and trouble to send exhibits to this exhibition. The fruit growers of British Columbia have prepared one of the most wonderful exhibits of fruit at that exhibition that any one would want to see. This is the advice that has come to me directly from those who are at the exhibition at the present time.

In British Columbia they have also preprepared a wonderful exhibit of minerals, and I hope hon. members on this side of the House will sometimes take into consideration that in Canada there are other factors than farming. I appreciate the position they take on behalf of farming and their farmer friends, but I feel that sometimes they lose sight of the fact that in Canada we have many conditions outside of farming, although I will admit that it is one of our greatest assets. We all want to promote in Canada every asset we have and in British Columbia two of our greatest are minerals and fruit growing. At this exhibition, they have done themselves proud in preparing these exhibits with the co-operation of the provincial and Dominion governments. I feel that the procedure taken by the present government in departing from the custom that has been followed in the past is a good one, by appointing certain representative members of the House of Commons, members of the Senate and members of the press gallery so that when they visit this exhibition they will be able to interchange views and accomplish a great deal of good in that way.

In British Columbia we have many undeveloped mineral resources, and at the present time every effort is being made to endeavour to get our Old Country friends to invest money in our mineral resources. With the mineral display on exhibition in England and with the different representatives visiting the exhibition on behalf of Canada, I believe a great deal will be accomplished towards promoting an interest in Canada's natural resources. For these reasons I cannot support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland).

Mr. SPENCER: Can the minister give an answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) as to the number of employees from the various departments? Also, can he give the number of the provincial representatives whose expenses are being paid by the Dominion?

Mr. ROBB: I have already stated—I do not think my hon. friend was in the House at the time—that we told the provinces they might send official representatives and deduct the expenses from their contributions to the federal treasury on account of the exhibition

Mr. SPENCER: That is practically the same thing. But could the minister answer the other question put to him by the member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell)?

Mr. ROBB: My recollection is that that question was placed on the order paper some days ago. It has to go through the Secretary of State, and I do not carry the information in my head.

Mr. SPENCER: How many members do the government suggest should be sent, and from what groups will they be selected?

Mr. ROBB: I stated a few minutes ago that the number would not exceed seven, including representatives from the Senate. The different groups in the House will be represented.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Chairman, I hope that the item before the committee will satisfy the people of this country, and I think the government would have been recreant in their duty had they not seen that Canada was well represented at the Wembley exhibition. I do not know of any better opportunity to advertise Canada than this exhibition presents, and I am glad to know that the Canadian building is a very creditable contribution.

But I am sorry that I cannot commend the other feature. I have no doubt whatever that many members of this House will visit the exhibition during the summer, and I do not think it is fair to those who go over at their own expense that they should find there a more distinguished band of fellow members, as impliedly they could be placed in an inferior position by not having been included in this band of official representatives of the Commons. This, I think, is possibly the most objectionable part of the proposal. I thought that when a few years ago we abolished titles we had become very democratic indeed, but I am afraid that a distinction will be drawn between those members who go over at their own expense and those who attend nominally as the representatives of parliament—a distinction that is not at all desirable. The members of this House who belong to the British Empire Parliamentary League will meet with a very cordial reception from the other members of the league in London, but I have been picturing in my mind the position in which our members will be placed who are not nominated as the representatives of parliament to attend the exhibition. The Prime Minister has intimated that a good deal will be expected of these official representatives on their arrival in England. Well, it may be so. But I have no doubt that the government will follow their usual practice and that most of them will visit the Old Country immediately after prorogation. They are the people whom we expect to represent Canada rather than the parliamentary delegates. Personally I do not see the slightest reason for a selection of this kind, for it will discriminate very severely against those members who visit the exhibition at their own expense. At this particular time it is not wise for us to encourage any expenditures that can possibly be avoided, and I think it is the duty of this government, perhaps as it never was the duty of a government before, to practise the most rigid economy. I objected the other night to an "exhibit" being sent over there—one of the most widely known men in the Dominion—but my hon. friends at the other end of the chamber took exception to my motion to reduce the item by $4,000. I might refer to some other "exhibits" sent over to Great Britain. Certainly I would be sorry to think that our whips, genial, affable and well-liked by everybody in this House, should go across as "exhibits," considering some of the "exhibits" we have already sent across and whose expenses we are still paying. I would hesitate to vote against any item for this exhibition, but I am absolutely opposed to a grant for the purpose of sending over selected members of this House on the mission stated. Many people in this country are to-day bringing pressure to bear on the government on the plea that they are not receiving a living wage—I do not know whether they are right or not—but when they learn that members of the House of Commons are being sent over on an expedition of this kind at the country's expense, I do not think it is likely to increase their respect for our system of government. If the government wish to send a parliamentary delegation, why do they not introduce in the estimates a separate item for the purpose and accept responsibility for it?

Mr. SHAW: I have not had the advantage of hearing all the discussion, but I have been apprised of the purpose for which the vote is proposed. I think in order to consider the matter in its proper perspective we must first of all realize that we stand here as the trustees, the custodians of the monies raised from the people of Canada, monies raised for the purposes of national government, and I think it is highly improper, indeed highly immoral, for parliament to use money so entrusted to its care for the purpose of spending it in the manner indicated. Consequently I oppose the expenditure as a matter of principle. In these latter days we hear a good deal about the "honour and dignity" of parliament. I am quite satisfied that we are not enhancing either the honour or the dignity of parliament by using these trust funds to give a pleasant month or so to a few members of this House, however desirable that may be to them personally. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that I believe parliament would be recreant to its trust should it for a single moment countenance this expenditure.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to practically all the debate on this item, but I am not sure yet just what is the necessity for sending the proposed delegation to the Wembley exhibition, and I think the government is making a mistake in bringing the proposal forward. I understood from the speech of the Prime Minister that he thought we should reward the whips by giving them this trip. While I feel the House is often indebted to the whips, yet I think the proper way for the House to reward their services, if some reward is to be given them, would be to increase their salaries. The people of Canada—that is, those of them who give any thought to this matter—will say that this House is spending money in an improper manner in sending certain of its members on this enjoyable trip. I would like the minister to state to the committee a definite amount that will not be exceeded should these delegates be sent to England. Then, how will members who do not belong to some of the parties mentioned by the minister have a chance of being represented? I take it from the speech of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Morrison) that these members are being sent over as immigration agents. When he said we needed millions of men brought into this country I could not help thinking how inadequate this estimate was, when we know that from a grant of $200,000 made to the Canada Colonization Association we secured the large number of 35 settlers.

Mr. ROBB: That answer was subsequently corrected.

Mr. COOTE: I have not the corrected answer.

Mr. ROBB: It is on Hansard.

Mr. COOTE: It has been suggested by some hon. member that the press men are to have a representative sent over. Is that correct?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: Can the minister justify the sending of a representative of the press gallery to this exhibition at the expense of the people?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, I surely can. I should think there would be no cheaper method of getting advertisements for our country than through the press; in fact, it is almost the only way you can get it. The press helped to make my hon. friend; surely he does not object to the press doing a little advertising for Canada?

Mr. COOTE: No, but I expect the minister to give us some better justification than that for spending the money of the people to send a representative of the press gallery to the exhibition at Wembley.

Mr. ROBB: We expect to get returns for our investment.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister has not yet answered the question, put on several occasions, as to how many groups in this House were going to be represented—how many from the Liberal party, how many from the Conservative party, how many from the Progressive party—and whether labour was to be represented.

Mr. ROBB: I will be frank with my hon. friend. We started out on the assumption that there were three recognized groups in this House. I think the representatives will be decided on the same basis as that on which the committees of the House are decided.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There are four groups.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the Labour group not recognized in this House or in this country?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, there is no objection to recognizing the Labour group, but if we follow the rule that prevails in the appointment of committees I am not sure that the members of the Labour group are sufficient to bring them in under the quota.

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. GARDINER: Then are the labouring classes of this country not to have a representative from this House?

Mr. ROBB: I did not say so. I said that the Labour group were not sufficient in numbers to enable them to be included in the quota on the basis of the nomination of committees. There is no reason why they should not be recognized.

Mr. SPENCER: What is the quota?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend can figure that out for himself. He knows the basis on which the committees are appointed.

Mr. IRVINE: Seeing that the Labour group has been brought so prominently into this discussion, let me say this: I understaand that the grant under consideration is to go toward sending the whips of parliament over to the Wembley exhibition. As the Labour whip I want to say right now that I will not go, because I am opposed to the principle of taking a trip like that at the expense of the public.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not want to give a silent vote on this proposal. I am opposed to sending whips or any other body of members of this House to this exhibition at the expense of the country. This is a year in which I think we can hardly justify any expenditure for that purpose. One has only to look at the estimates, at pages 60 and 61, to see how necessary it is that we conserve our resources. We have found it necessary this year to reduce our annual vote to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind from $20,000 to $10,000. If we must reduce that vote for the blind I certainly would not feel justified in voting $5,000, $10,000 or $15,000 for this little trip. I find on the same page that we have had to reduce our vote this year in the interests of economy from $20,000 to $15,000 as a grant to the Canadian Tuberculosis Association. If we have to pare down that vote by $5,000 this year in the interests of economy, I would not feel justified in spending $5,000 for the expenses of this trip. So with the vote on page 60, Canadian National Safety League, a vote the application of which is familiar to every member of the House. That is reduced this year from $25,000 to $10,000 in the interests of economy. With such a statement as that in the estimates laid before parliament by the government, I think the government should reconsider this matter and follow the suggestion of my right hon. friend and leader that the proposal be withdrawn.

Mr. COOTE: I will ask the minister once more to tell us whether or not he will limit the amount which may be expended for this purpose. I understand he places no limit on the expenditure; it may go to $50,000 or $100,000 if he cares to have it go that far.

Mr. ROBB: That is nonsense. I have said two or three times that there would not be more than seven.

Mr. COOTE: The minister has not yet stated any amount that would not be exceeded.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. COOTE: Surely we are entitled to get an answer.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister contends that he has answered the question already. He is not required to answer it a second time.

Mr. GARDINER: I have been in the House while this discussion has been in progress and I have never yet heard the minister state the total amount that will be spent. That is a very proper question when an item is under consideration, and I trust the Chairman will see to it that members are given an opportunity to get answers to their questions when money items of this kind are going through.

Mr. ROBB: I do not want to be discourteous to my hon. friend, but he must have been out. I have already stated twice that the cost was estimated at from $11,000, and not to exceed $20,000. But if the number is limited to only seven, it will be less than even the $11,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. member (Mr. Coote) has had no answer to a question he put with reference to others who were to be sent over besides members.

Mr. ROBB: The press.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Are any others represented except members of the House and the press.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, the Women's Council of Canada have a representative there now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Would it not be just as well to be frank and to give the committee all the information without our being compelled to extract it in this way?

Mr. ROBB: So far we have only been discussing the representatives of parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How is the minister going to restrict them to seven if it includes the press and representatives of the various parties?

Mr. ROBB: The seven were the members of parliament under consideration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, and then the press besides? That makes a difference in the minister's estimate. The point is this: Here is an estimate for $300,000. If this estimate were for $20,000 the House would know that amount could not be exceeded, but when the minister merely says, I estimate it will be from $13,000 to $20,000, that is no undertaking on the part of the minister, much less to this House, that the $20,000 will not be exceeded. Would the minister give that undertaking? I am only saying this to emphasize that the member for Macleod is quite within his rights in asking the minister to say yes or no.

Mr. ROBB: I will tell my hon. friend the estimates we have. It will cost $400 for return fare. We will give them $20 a day for forty days, or $800; that makes $1,200, and seven times that makes $8,400.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But what about the press besides? How many of them are going?

Mr. ROBB: I think there are five members of the press going.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who selects the press? Does the government select the press men of all shades?

Mr. ROBB: I really did not inquire into the politics of the man sent from eastern Canada. He is the president of the Newspaper Publicity Association of the Maritime provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is he?

Mr. ROBB: I do not recall his name, but that is his position. There was also a man sent from western Canada, from Vancouver.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is he?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Hodge, the editor of one of the papers there. We propose sending three men from the press gallery.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know either of the first two, and the minister does not know one of them himself. Who are these other three in the press gallery?

Mr. ROBB: We propose to send Mr. Mears, Mr. Fraser, and Mr. Fortier.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government selects all these?

Mr. ROBB: We have sounded out some other gentlemen who were unable to go, some very prominent, true and loyal friends of my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would not hurt.

Mr. DOUCET: I did not intend to say anything on this question, but when I hear that the press is to be represented by five members, apart from the seven members of parliament, and when I take into consideration the fact that when the suggestion was made to the government that a representative of our Canadian National Railways, representing the Atlantic section, should be present at the exhibition, and that only two representatives of the railway were chosen, and those two representing other sections of the railway, I contend that we are possibly not doing justice and acting fairly to all parts of this Dominion. I intend to vote for the amendment. I do not think we should spend this amount of money in view of the financial condition of the country. Furthermore, I do not see how this government can select five members of the press and seven members of parliament to visit the exhibition, when they cannot select a representative of the Canadian National Railways representing the Atlantic section.

Mr. GARDINER: The more we discuss this item, the more information we get. It would seem the committee would be justified in asking the minister to give the various items that go to make up this estimate, so that the committee will know exactly what it is voting for. I would ask him to give the House all the items contained in this one vote.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, I rise for only one purpose. I am not opposed to the vote. I am only sorry the House cannot be unanimous with regard to it. If we are to send representatives, I think the basis upon which the representation is to go is quite proper.

Some question has been raised with regard to representation from the members of the Labour party in this House, as they call themselves, consisting of two members. For my part, if the whips from the other parties are sent overseas, I would be quite prepared to send a member of the Labour group, but I do resent, and this is the purpose for which I rise, that the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gardiner) should intimate that if no member from the so-called Labour party in this House is sent, the working people of this country will not be represented. I would say this: In every case where a member of this House, and I think it includes them all, has among his constituents working people, he represents that class whichever one of the various parties he belongs to, and I resent any such significance being given to the representation that is being sent over to the British Empire Exhibition.

Mr. ROBB: The estimated balance of expenditure on the British Empire Exhibition for the fiscal year, 1924-25, is as follows:

Balance interior finish, including sheeting, painting, showcases, plumbing, water, drainage, emergency fire apparatus and heating..	$20,000
Estimated consumption electric current.. ..	15,000
Balance installation of exhibits and grain decorations..	20,000
Return freight on exhibits..	25,000
Balance cost of collecting and preparing exhibits..	5,000
Upkeep of grounds outside building and decorative plants inside..	4,000
Consumption water and gas..	9,000
Signs and bulletins..	8,000
Salaries and expenses, staff (permanent).. ..	50,000
Twelve temporary employees for information bureau for six months, based on $10 per day..	22,000
Guards, attendants and cleaners for six months..	25,000
Literature..	50,000
Advertising..	15,000
Art exhibit..	12,000
Unforeseen expenses..	20,000
	$300,000

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Did I understand the minister to say it would cost $8,000 to send seven members of parliament over?

Mr. ROBB: No, $8,400.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Then I would ask this question: Have we not spent about $12,000 or $15,000 talking about this thing?

Mr. FORKE: I want to say just a few words before this debate closes. I had and have no intention in anything I may say of embarrassing any member in this part of the House for quite properly taking an independent view of this matter. I wish first to concur in what the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has said that labour would be represented by almost any member of this House. I have no hesitation in saying that I represent labour in the constituency of Brandon perhaps just as adequately as the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) represents it in that constituency.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Three times better.

Mr. FORKE: To digress for a moment, I think perhaps one of the great battles of the future will be between highly organized labour and another standard of labour in which agriculture is included.

On the question of immigration, I do not intend to enter into any debate to-night; it is readily recognized that there is a fundamental difference of opinion in regard to this matter. I only wish to repeat that the solution of a great many of our problems depends upon having a great many more people come into Canada and help bear our burdens. It would be better for those who come and for those who are here.

I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that this discussion has taken a little different aspect from what I expected when first this question was mooted. I understood at that time that the representation would be from all three parties in the House, and if necessary, include some other gentlemen who think they are entitled to representation. But it seems to me from what I have gathered that one of the large groups in this House is unanimously opposed to this vote. Well, practically unanimous; the only member who has spoken has made the statement that he could not go.

Mr. BOYS: I said I was in favour of it just the same and I meant it.

Mr. FORKE: I think, perhaps, there is a reason.

Mr. BOYS: I do not know what my hon. friend means by that. I should like him to explain what he means; that is a reflection.

Mr. FORKE: I can assure my hon. friend that I do not mean it as a reflection.

Mr. BOYS: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. FORKE: There seems to have been some misunderstanding about this question; the hon. member will admit that fact anyway. When this question was mooted I understood —and I understood also the information came from the hon. member—that it was likely his party would be represented in this group. Am I wrong?

Mr. BOYS: I would not have thought that the leader of a great party would be disposed to pass on what his own whip may have said to him when I had a private conversation with that whip. It is a fact—I will be frank about it—that there was some discussion as to what the attitude of this party might be, and I intimated there would be some opposition. I did not know for certain what its attitude would be. My own course has been consistent from beginning to end.

Mr. FORKE: I have no reflection to cast upon the hon. member; I did not mean to do so anyway. It does seem to me however, that the matter assumes a different aspect when one of the parties in this House is not likely to be in that group. I may be wrong but I do not look upon this as a question of principle, it is a matter of expediency. Is it a wise thing, is it the right thing, that Canada should be represented at the Imperial exhibition? I do not think that Canada has descended so low yet that she is not in a position to send delegates that will uphold the dignity and honour of this country in connection with the exhibition. On the other hand it does seem to me that some little difference is made when we have not the unanimous or the nearly unanimous support of the House. I would not care whether there was a minority, but when we find that one of the large groups in this House is utterly opposed to the proposition I think it requires some reconsideration. While sitting in my chair I have changed my mind several times.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FORKE: It is clearly evident why I should do so in this case because, as I said before it is not a question of principle it is a matter of expediency. Is it expedient, is it the right thing to do in order that this country may be well advertised and properly represented. There is no principle at stake; I do not look at it in that way at all. But if there is strong opposition, if in this matter parliament does not express the voice of the people as a whole. I think we ought to reconsider the matter. That is the position I take, and I feel inclined to vote for the amendment at the present time.

Amendment Mr. Garland (Bow River) negatived: Yeas 48, Nays 86.

The CHAIRMAN: I declare the amendment lost and the vote carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the amendment is declared lost the question is now on the main motion. Does the minister expect that this money will take care of all Canada's liabilities in respect of the exhibition, and if so what will the whole exhibition cost the Dominion?

Mr. ROBB. I rather think we will have to have a small supplementary vote. My right hon. friend will notice that in the figures I gave a few moments ago there was mention of $50,000 for literature and I think we will require a further sum for that purpose. I think I shall be able to tell my right hon. friend this week what the amount will be. We may require another $100,000 to $150,000 but a great part of this will be for literature, pamphlets, maps and so on. I suppose the total cost will amount in round figures to $1,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was the first vote last year?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much has been spent?

Mr. ROBB: The sum of $649,859.09 has been spent. It is pretty close up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The supplementary estimate will be approximately $50,000 then?

Mr. ROBB: Probably $100,000, although it may be $150,000. I told my right hon. friend there was some of it charged; we are paying advertising out of part of it. That is the $50,000 already announced for literature.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then the cost will be $1,100,000 altogether?

Mr. ROBB: I said one million in round figures. It will be $1,100,000 or $1,150,000 but we expect to get part of that back from the provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was just going to ask about that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How many of the permanent employees of the Civil Service of Canada are on duty at the Wembley exhibition and paid by the Dominion?

Mr. ROBB: I think there are eleven of the permanent staff of the Department of Immigration and Colonization.

Mr. GARLAND: (Bow River): Outside of that the minister does not care to give any information?

Mr. ROBB: In addition to that I think there are nine or ten men and one officer of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who are over there as a guard. They are guarding the building and the exhibits.

Mr. GARLAND: (Bow River): What is it estimated their salaries will amount to during the period of the exhibition?

Mr. ROBB: I think I answered that question a moment ago.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, I do not think so.

Mr. ROBB: The deputy tells me there was a question of that nature put on the order paper and it is on the way through; it has not come across yet. At any rate I gave my hon. friend an estimate a moment ago of the wages involved in this vote. Yes, $91,813.54 is the expenditure that we have for the fiscal year 1923-24.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are the minister's hopes of getting some money from the provinces based on, and what is the division between the provinces? Has the minister received anything yet, and if so from whom?

Mr. ROBB: There was a very fair understanding at one time that the provinces would contribute. Later on they met in Quebec city and stood out for, or thought they should have, their own provincial exhibit. They took the ground that unless they got their own provincial exhibit they would not exhibit and would not contribute. We went on and gathered the exhibit. Later on there seemed to be a modified view of that; but I will be frank and say to my hon. friend that while some of the smaller provinces by population have intimated a willingness to contribute, some of the larger provinces have not given us that hope. I think my hon. friend will agree with me, that it would not be fair to call upon the smaller provinces unless at least those provinces that will benefit most by it and are the largest exhibitors contribute their share. That will be a matter for adjustment afterwards.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are the larger provinces who are behind in supplying the hope?

Mr. ROBB: The provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Most of the larger provinces. I think the minister may just about as well let that mirage disappear. He will never get anything from the other provinces unless Ontario and Quebec come forward.

Mr. ROBB: It would be hardly fair to ask them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We may count that we are paying the whole shot.

Item agreed to.

Buildings at St. John, N.B., $22,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What buildings are these?

Mr. ROBB: An arrangement has been made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company by which the department is to bear half the cost of constructing and maintaining the following buildings for the proper handling of immigrants arriving at the port of St. John:

	Cost to Department
Baggage	$88,048 28
Detention quarters	58,748 68
Waiting room	20,419 11
Total	$164,216 07

The total cost to the department, extras already totally paid by the department, is reduced by $5,748.68, which makes the item $58,439.38. This is payable over a period of ten years. The cost this year is $22,000 and the whole thing has to be paid in ten years.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Can the minister give us some explanation of the occurrences recently at Halifax in regard to the deportation of Italians? Some large number were found unsatisfactory for some reason.

The CHAIRMAN: That does not come under this vote.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is in connection with Halifax.

The CHAIRMAN: This is St. John.

Mr. ROBB: I will answer the question. These immigrants were brought unauthorized to Canada. We were advised by the authorities before they arrived that their papers had not been properly viséd. They were not deported, but the steamship companies that brought them over returned them—at least they were supposed to go back with them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Were representations made by the Italian government to the Canadian government asking that these men be returned, or was there any complaint? What are the facts?

Mr. ROBB: The British ambassador advised us of the irregularity of these sailings, and visés were secured by misrepresentation. I think it was represented to us that they were going to farms and that they had positions.

Mr. LEWIS: Were they physically fit otherwise?

Mr. ROBB: We admitted some 400 of the previous lot that were examined, but when we discovered that an attempt was made by the steamship companies to make false representations as to immigrants getting into Canada we simply said, "You cannot land these people here." We had been advised in the matter, and the steamship companies were supposed to take them back.

Mr. LEWIS: It seems to me that these visés should be attended to at the other end before they start.

Mr. ROBB: Probably the hon. member is right; but the government does not allow Canada to have a representative in that country.

Mr. HOEY: How many were there?

Mr. LEWIS: If we are anxious to get people into this country a few episodes like this will do a great deal of harm to immigration to Canada.

Mr. ROBB: In answer to the hon. member for Springfield, (Mr. Hoey)
11 p.m. there were 240.

Mr. SPENCER: Were these immigrants turned back simply because they came here ostensibly to go into one employment and wanted to go into another? Were they physically fit?

Mr. ROBB: We admitted 75 who were physically fit, and the others were returned.

Item agreed to.

Relief of distressed Canadians, $6,000.

Mr. LEWIS: Will the minister explain what is meant by distressed Canadians? The amount seems very small.

Mr. ROBB: The different Canadian immigration agents throughout the world are occasionally called upon to help out a person who claims to be a distressed Canadian. The facts come to us chiefly through the office of the High Commissioner at London, England. The total payment last year amounted to $5,815.12.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The Auditor General's statement for the year ending March 31, shows there was $11,881.50 paid for the relief of distressed Canadians.

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend has the reference for the year before. The amount expended for the year 1922-23 was $10,975.74. My hon. friend has the Auditor General's report. I may say that, getting away from the period of the war, the amount for 1923-24 was $5,815,12.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: At the head of the list there is an item of $1,109.95, house rent, London, England, W. T. R. Preston, vote 480. Is that a type of distressed Canadians referred to?

Mr. ROBB: Is that charged in this vote?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is on the same page of the estimates.

Mr. ROBB: Let my hon. friend come out in the open and say whether it is charged in this vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am asking the minister what this item is for.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not in this vote. The question is out of order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Just a minute ago the minister informed the committee that a certain sum around fifteen or nineteen thousand dollars was included in this vote for salaries. We now find that there is a vote for exhibitions, salaries and contingencies, $140,000. On further examination the minister stated that the total for salaries was $91,800. An explanation would, perhaps be in order.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend must realize that the British Empire Exhibition is a separate account. There will be charged up to it the permanent staff, a vast number of char women who are engaged all the time in keeping the building in proper shape, and labourers, some of whom are engaged for a few hours. The hon. member has overlooked that feature.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the total of the salary bill?

Mr. ROBB: I will give the details:

A. W. Tolmie, Exhibition Commissioner.. ..	$4,320
A. W. Despard, Chief of Agricultural and Exhibit Division..	3,240
W. D. Dalglish, Chief of Mineral Division..	3,240
J. O. Turcotte, Chief of Designing and Decorating Division..	3,240

Mr. Turcotte is one of the most valuable men in that class of work. In recent years the great success of Canada's exhibits has been largely due to Mr. Turcotte. who is in this work a specialist in a class all by himself.

A. Pereira, Assistant to Chief of Designing and Decorating Division..	$2,340
P. A. Corkery, Fruit Exhibit Specialist, (Transferred from Civil government salaries)	2,040
R. G. Brown, Exhibit Decorator..	1,365
Miss. E. M. Livingston, Clerk Stenographer..	1,140
O. Joubarne, Caretaker..	1,080
Total..	$22,005

Item agreed to.

Exhibitions—salaries and contingencies, $140,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is any of this amount for exhibitions in the United States?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What amount is being expended for this purpose in different countries?

Mr. ROBB: Exhibitions at state and county fairs in the United States, $50,000, and permanent exhibits in the United States, $5,000.

Mr. SPENCER: What comes under contingencies?

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. ROBB: Collection of exhibits, materials for same, certain wage expenses, freight, express and so forth. Some of the exhibits might be destroyed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What amount was spent in the United States last year?

Mr. ROBB: I have not the details. I will get them and send them to my hon. friend if he is interested.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What other exhibitions did the department send representatives to and have expenses in connection with last year?

Mr. ROBB: We spent $926.10 on an exhibit at Paris at the conclusion of the French train that was run under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is that the only additional exhibition that was attended by representatives of the government last year? Was there none in the United States, for example?

Mr. ROBB: We have exhibits in other countries as well as in the United States. We have exhibits at many fairs in Scotland, Ireland and England. We have some exhibits on the continent. We have exhibits on the little boats that go through Holland. We had some in Belgium last year.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is any of this money to be spent for exhibitions in this country?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. CALDWELL: I take it that these exhibits are all for the purpose of inducing people to come into Canada. The department is exhibiting the resources of Canada in countries from which immigration is expected?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, and they are advertising Canada's resources.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister has mentioned Holland and Belgium. He has not mentioned the United States at all. I think the United States is by far the best country for Canada to seek her immigrants in. We get perfectly acclimatized people, suitable for Canada, from the United States.

Mr. ROBB: I will give my hon. friend the names of the states that we have been operating in. We have had exhibits, some small and others larger, in these different states, at the various stock shows and other fairs wherever there is a large gathering of people: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, Wyoming. We have agencies in: Kansas City, Mo.; Harrisburg, Pa.; Columbus, Ohio; Indianapolis, Ind.; St. Paul, Minn.; Fargo, N.D.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Omaha, Neb.; Syracuse, N.Y.; Spokane, Washington; Des Moines, Iowa; Chicago, Illinois; Detroit, Michigan; Boston, Massachusetts; Great Falls, Montana; Watertown, South Dakota; Manchester, New Hampshire; San Francisco, California.

Mr. COOTE: Do these executive officers come under this vote?

Mr. ROBB: They have charge of the exhibits.

Mr. COOTE: What class of people does the minister expect to attract to Canada as a result of these exhibits?

Mr. ROBB: These minor exhibits are largely agricultural, and perhaps some person who desires to buy seed wheat or seed oats or something else which Canada has to offer becomes a purchaser by reason of seeing the exhibits. They serve a double purpose, being of advantage in securing immigration, and an advantage in advertising our products.

Mr. COOTE: As a matter of policy, does the minister think that the farmers of Canada are not at present producing plenty of agricultural produce? And what benefit is it going to be to them if they produce ten or twenty per cent more, or whatever increased production may result from the bringing in of new immigrants and placing them on the land? Last year the farmers of Canada produced 70,000,000 bushels more wheat than in the previous year, but it brought them $25,000,000 less.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend cannot prove that because the wheat is not all sold yet.

Mr. COOTE: I should have stated that that is an estimate prepared by the officers of this government. If the minister will explain to us just in what way this expenditure is going to benefit our farmers I should appreciate the information. It seems to me that the farmer has always been singled out so far as our immigration policy is concerned as the one class of the community that should have some more competition. We have for years spent money to bring in more farmers, but many leading men in the United States to-day are on record as stating that overproduction is the principal cause of the farmers' financial distress. If the minister disagrees with that opinion, would he give the House some reason why the farmers who are now in Canada will be benefited by bringing in more immigrants and placing them on the land?

Mr. ROBB: That is all a matter of opinion and we discussed it fully last session. At that time we heard hon. gentlemen opposite decrying their own provinces to such an extent that their premier came down and apologized for them and asked us not to pay too much attention to them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ROBB: But that is only a side issue. In answer to my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) as to the price of wheat being affected by increased production, I can recall buying No. I Northern Manitoba wheat at 67 cents a bushel, delivered Goderich, at a time when the northwest country was producing less than 75,000,000 bushels, while last year it produced over 400,000,000 bushels of wheat. I speak subject to correction, but I do not think any of that huge crop ever moved much below a dollar at Fort William. While I do not offer any opinion—if a man were sure of his opinions he could get rich quick—yet I may remind my hon. friend that within the last few weeks wheat has advanced from 14 to 16 cents a bushel.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, when it is all out of our hands.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the minister state the province and the premier?

Mr. ROBB: That is disposed of.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May we have an answer? Mr. Chairman, if the minister is not going to answer that—I am not quite sure whether he was referring to any members in this corner of the House—I want to tell him quite distinctly that last session I heard no members decry any portion of Canada.

Mr. ROBB: Hansard is full of it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): They decried conditions in this country, and they will continue to do so until those conditions are remedied. We have artificial barriers and restrictions against the farmer and the worker in Canada, and we will continue to decry such conditions until they are changed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am wondering if the minister is going to reduce the amount which his department usually spends in the United States, in view of the fact that it is not immigration from, but emigration to, the United States that has been taking place? Surely a great deal of this money has been wasted. With regard to the grain growers, I recall reading in a New York newspaper a short time ago an article which pointed out the advantage accruing to the United States by the exchange of certain of their citizens for Canadians. It stated that that country had got a good deal the best of the bargain in that the great problem of the United States was to reduce their wheat production, and they got rid of many of what were known as "wheat miners," people who would not adapt themselves to diversified farming and had obtained in exchange a class of citizens from Canada who adapted themselves to conditions in the United States much better than those who had left. The United States have signified their intention of discouraging commerce with this country by raising a tariff barrier which is almost insurmountable. In view of this fact and the further fact that our people are going there in large numbers, and have been for a long time, I think this expenditure should be cut down to the very smallest possible proportions.

Mr. McBRIDE: I should just like to correct a statement in connection with our people going to the United States. On the Pacific coast over nine thousand people have come back from the United States into British Columbia this season. Indeed, there is a steady flow into British Columbia at present and those people seem glad to come back to Canada.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I think the minister should answer the question asked by the member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). Surely in all fairness he should give the name of the premier who, he said, came to Ottawa and apologized for those federal representatives of his province who had decried it in this House.

Mr. McBRIDE: Mr. Chairman, I may say that I had to apologize with respect to remarks made in this House by some Progressive member last session.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. COOTE: Has the minister had any manufacturers ask him to use his immigration officers in an endeavour to get more manufacturers to locate in Canada to produce more manufactured products and so compete with them?

Mr. ROBB: They would go to the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, if we are going to spend taxes to bring in more farmers, I do not see why in all fairness we should not spend a little money to bring in more manufacturers. Possibly we could bring some from England who are used to manufacturing without the protection of a tariff as high as 30 or 35 per cent. I think it is only fair to the people I represent that I should ask the minister whether he is limiting his exertions to bringing in farmers or whether he is trying to bring in people of every class.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the vote carry?

Mr. COOTE: I hope it will not carry until the minister replies.

The CHAIRMAN: I intend to rule that that question is not relevant to the item under consideration.

Mr. ROBB: I do not want to be discourteous to my hon. friend. He comes from Alberta. We had a conference last fall attended by representatives of all the different provinces. Alberta was represented by Mr. Hoadley, the Minister of Agriculture in the Alberta government, and Mr. Hoadley was most insistent upon it that we should get more immigrants, particularly for his province. I would like to satisfy my hon. friend, but I am bound to say I do not think he represents the views of the people of Alberta. I believe the people of Alberta desire more immigrants, more people to go on the land. The people of Saskatchewan desire more; the people of Ontario and Quebec desire a prosperous Canada. We are not among those who are afraid that our country will be filled up with thrifty and industrious people.

Mr. COOTE: I hope the minister does not insinuate that I am afraid of filling up this country with industrious people. But we have been endeavouring by this policy to fill it up for a number of years and we have not filled it up yet. The United States is often referred to as an example, but I am told that the United States has never spent one dollar for the purpose of bringing immigrants into that country. What the United States did was to make the condiitions in that country such that people were anxious to go there.

Mr. GRAHAM: By a high tariff?

Mr. COOTE: This immigration policy as at present carried out in Canada is class legislation. If we are to have immigration why should we have it limited to one class? Surely the farmers of Canada are producing enough now. I have been told by a gentleman from British Columbia that they are producing more fruit in that province than they can sell. I have seen potatoes left in the ground because of a lack of market for them. I have seen cattle sold for one half what it cost to raise them, because there was not a market in Canada for them. There is no question that a great deal of agricultural produce is turned out in Canada which cannot be sold at the cost of production because there is not a sufficient market. Why should we go on trying to get more farmers into Canada? If all other classes of people in Canada had done their share as well as the farmers, there would be no lack of prosperity in this country. To answer what the minister has said about my representing the people of Alberta, I do not pretend to represent the people of Alberta. But I do pretend to represent the people of my constituency, and I say without hesitation that the majority of them would tell the minister just as frankly as I have done that his immigration policy is a class policy; that it is directed against one class. I have resolutions here from farmers' organizations in my constituency protesting against the government spending any more money on immigration until the financial condition of the farmer is made easier and until conditions generally are such that the farmer can make a decent living as well as the other people in this country.

Mr. SPENCER: None of us on this side want to stop voluntary immigration. What we are against, though—and we think a good deal more attention should be given to it—is any condition which results in a great number of people leaving this country. We consider that people who have been in Canada anywhere from ten to twenty-five or thirty years are far more valuable to the country than any people brought in with no experience. I wonder if the minister is aware that in spending $3,500,000 last year to bring people into this country Canada lost the entire number she brought in and 45,000 besides? That is why we are anxious to see a change made in the government's policy. It is not because we do not want people in this country; what we want to stop is the exodus of people from this country.

Mr. ROBB: It is true that people were leaving the country, and they will do it again next year or any other year if similar conditions prevail: a man who can get $15 a day or $1.50 an hour in New York is not going to work in Canada for $5 a day. My hon. friend would not do it. But the tide is turning the other way: the records show that in the last two months, 9,815 Canadians returned. These are the reports from ten ports.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I object to the implication of the minister's remarks that hon. gentlemen in this section of the House are opposing immigration. If I understand the situation rightly, no hon. gentleman in this section of the House is opposed to immigration. What we are trying to point out is the absurdity of taking people in who have no money and no means of being placed on the land. If the government are determined to carry out a policy of immigration and to bring in some good, hardy, vigorous types of settlers they must at the same time provide some financial means for settling those people upon the land. I came originally from Prince Edward Island. There was a time in the history of that province when they were faced with an almost complete breakdown of agriculture. The difficulty was solved by the provincial government of that day financing the farmers of the whole province—and in this I believe they were assisted in some of the borrowing arrangements by the Imperial authorities—through a system of rural credit which enabled the farmers to buy their own land under long term loans at a low rate of interest. That resulted in resurrecting agriculture throughout the whole of Prince Edward Island, and I understand that the provincial government lost not one dollar. That is one of the things the government must face to-day; if they are prepared to carry out an immigration policy it must be coincident with some means of putting the people on the land and enabling them to remain there. The assumption seems to be that when a remark is made from this part of the House with regard to immigration we are saying something derogatory to the country, something defamatory of the country. But I think a search of the pages of Hansard during the last three years will show that not one single remark in any way reflecting upon western Canada came from this part of the House. The very fact that we are in the country shows that we have confidence in it; the very fact that we are here in this House shows that we have confidence in it and that the people have confidence in us. We have a country second to none in the world. In the district in which I live we are growing fruit which cannot be equalled in most parts of Ontario. On the farm on which I live wild grapes are growing, all kinds of wild fruit—we can produce almost anything. Gentlemen to our right and hon. gentlemen on the other side refer to us as wheat miners, and all that kind of thing, but the day will come when some of those hon. gentlemen will be down on their knees praying to heaven that we be wheat miners again. What is happening your farmer to-day? Trainloads of our western butter are coming to the East and swamping your markets. Last year seven or eight carloads of dressed poultry came to this part of the country from the West and were marketed in Montreal. What did that do to the eastern farmer? It cut his price just in half.

Mr. ROBB: They are not grumbling.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Thirty or forty years ago the eastern farmer was almost put out of business when the prairies were opened up and they commenced to grow wheat and oats out there. I have heard the old people talk about it; I have heard them talk about it in the Maritime provinces, and those who lived through that period will remember it as long as they live. They finally got into mixed farming, and they have now weathered the gale and re-established themselves. We are going through that period in western Canada to-day. We have a hardy, vigorous, virile type of people, and they still have a low standard of living, no matter what nationality they are. They work long hours, and deny themselves a good many of the things that you think are necessary in eastern Canada, and they are producing beyond the limit of this country to absorb. Now, what is the government doing? Last year our exports of butter to England dropped from about 17,000,000 pounds the previous year to 4,000,000 pounds. We have a host of trade agents on the other side trying to get us business, but they are failing because we are losing that business to New Zealand, Denmark, Holland, Argentina, and other countries. I am quite convinced that if the government would put a little bit of energy behind an effort to go after that trade, they would secure it. I made a suggestion to the Minister of Agriculture when his estimates were before the House, and I give him credit for admitting it, but he stated that the people of eastern Canada were not prepared to submit to the regulations that were necessary to bring our butter up to the same grade as New Zealand butter in the Old Country market. The consequence is that we are losing the English butter market to-day.

[Mr. Campbell.]

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask the hon. member to confine himself more strictly to the item under discussion. I think his remarks do not bear very closely on this item for exhibitions.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I think this has a very direct bearing on the question of immigration, Mr. Chairman. However, if that is your ruling I will sit down.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): We can have the real discussion on immigration when the second or third item farther down is called. I would ask the minister whether the figures he gave a moment ago with regard to the re-flow of Canadians from the United States are official, or simply newspaper estimates.

Mr. ROBB: They are official figures.

Mr. GARLAND Bow River): He stated, just before he gave those figures, that the whole question of emigration from Canada was very easily explained by the natural flow; it was going on every year, he said; there would be departures from the country month by month. Well, exactly the same answer can be made to his figures. The tourists are just coming over now to see Muskoka.

Mr. ROBB: These are immigrants, not tourists.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the minister give us some idea of the value of settlers' effects brought in during the last few months?

Mr. ROBB: I can give my hon. friend the number of cars; there were 120 cars from Fargo, North Dakota.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the minister give the number going out the same months? Surely he has those figures.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend was inquiring as to the number coming in. From April to March the total value of the settlers' effects was $6,962,739.53.

Mr. COOTE: Is the advertising which the minister is doing at these exhibitions in the United States responsible for this flow of ex-Canadians from the United States back to Canada?

Mr. ROBB: That is a method of advertising. It is not a new policy; it has been going on for years.

Mr. SHAW: Of the 9,807 ex-Canadians repatriated, are there any who have not found employment in Canada in the last few months?

Mr. ROBB: I have no complaints before me.

Mr. SPENCER: I notice that when people are going over to the United States they are asked whether they are going to stay or whether they are just going for a holiday, and if they say for a holiday, they are allowed to go through and no record is kept; but when people come back from the United States, whether they have made their home there or are just returning from a holiday, they have to fill out a form, and thus a record is kept and filed in the immigration office of the flow back to Canada. Does the minister think Canada can possibly keep a real check on her citizens who are leaving, when no record is kept of those who are crossing into the United States just for a holiday?

Mr. ROBB: I do not think we can. I do not think that is kept in any country, except through ocean ports.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it not quite possible we have been losing a great many more people than we have a record of? I know of a certainty of a number of families who have gone over to the United States intending to stay there, but who have said they were just going for a holiday, and if that is the case with others, we may be losing many thousands more than we have a record of.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I asked the minister a short time ago in regard to the amount spent in the United States, and I did so for this reason: Although the money is spent for exhibitions the main object is really to promote business and emigration from the United States to Canada. There was spent in the last four years $1,830,669.32 to promote emigration from the United States to Canada.

Mr. ROBB: What was the amount for each year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: For 1920-1921, $456,870.41; 1921-1922, $419,946.02; 1922-1923, $525,363.90; and from April 1, 1923, to January 1, 1924, $428,488.99. What I am pointing out is this: In view of the amount which has been spent over there we have not really been getting value if the tide of immigration is from this country to the United States. Possibly this may have been the effect of the money that has been spent, and I presume the same condition existed before this four-year period ended. In view of all that is taking place between our neighbours to the south and ourselves, it appears to me that this money could be spent to much better advantage in the Old Land, where we could get a much better class of citizens who would come out here and likely make homes in this country. I do not agree with those who say we do not need people in this country to help develop our latent resources. This country was never so much in need of willing workers as it is at this hour, and any one who desires employment in this country can get it at short notice. In the case of those who have not found employment, it is largely because they cannot obtain a certain kind of work they desire. If they were as handy at adapting themselves to conditions in this country as the people of twenty-five or thirty years ago you would not hear much about unemployement in Canada. For that reason I have no sympathy with those who would put up the bars and exclude from Canada those who would make desirable settlers. We have in the Dominion a tremendous undeveloped area, and it is quite evident that our people, or at least many of them, are not inclined to indulge in the manual labour necessary to develop the resources which that area contains. That is the reason I would urge upon the minister to consider the wisdom of curtailing expenses in the country to the south.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

Tuesday, June 24, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Lapierre be substituted for that of Mr. Bourassa on the select standing committee on Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 199 (from the Senate), to incorporate Shantung Christian University.—Mr. Ryckman.

Bill No. 200 (from the Senate), for the relief of Florence Castle.—Mr. Duff.

Bill No. 201 (from the Senate), for the relief of Frances Hadenka.—Mr. Duff.

Bill No. 202 (from the Senate), for the relief of Louise Powell.—Sir Henry Drayton.

Bill No. 203 (from the Senate), for the relief of Margaret Johnston.—Mr. Hocken.

Bill No. 204 (from the Senate), for the relief of Hilda Girdler.—Mr. Harris.

STRIKE OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of again directing the attention of the government to the postal strike at Toronto, where the situation is most desperate. Mountains of mail are piled up. Great difficulty is being experienced by the banks in the clearing of cheques by mail. Cheques for accounts are held up, mail order departments are without work, business is stagnant and at a standstill. The people are lined up for hours five or six feet deep but cannot get near their mail. The situation is so acute that I feel I would be quite justified in again moving the adjournment of the House to discuss the matter. I do not propose, however, to do that, but I want to direct the attention of the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Stewart) to the matter to see if something cannot be done—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member should be satisfied to put the question.

Mr. CHURCH: If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I would like to complete my question. Now, the situation is so desperate—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is simply making a comment. Will he put his question?

Mr. CHURCH; What is being done to move the mails? The people of Toronto cannot stand this for twenty-four hours longer. What conciliation has been or will be used in the matter?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil), (Acting Postmaster General): I think my hon. friend is unduly exercised. The despatch mail is all moving in Toronto. There is no delivery of mail, but mail is prepared and delivered to the business houses and banking institutions. It is quite true that for two or three days cheques mailed could not reach their destinations, but that matter is cleared up to-day.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: I rise to a point of order. I contend that under the rules of debate on the orders of the day that is not an answer to the question I asked. I say this is a matter of most urgent public importance to the city I represent. The service is intolerable. No conciliation has been used. Will the minister not give us some more definite statement than he has just given? That is simply the reply he gave the other day.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order is not well taken.

WITHHOLDING ASSENT TO PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if any correspondence, official or otherwise, has been received from the government of Prince Edward Island or the Lieutenant Governor of that province relating to the Lieutenant Governor withholding his assent to any legislation passed by the Legislature of Prince Edward Island during the session of 1924, and if such has been received will the hon. Minister of Justice please lay on the Table a copy of the correspondence, orders in council if any, or any other documents relating thereto?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The refusal of the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island to give his assent to a bill which had been passed by the legislature of that province—or rather, to speak more accurately, his withholding his assent to that bill—was referred a few weeks ago to the Department of Justice. The Minister of Justice has made a recommendation to the Governor in Council in that regard and I believe an order in council has been passed which has been transmitted to the Lieutenant Governor and to the government of Prince Edward Island. I shall be pleased to give instructions that all the documents referring to that matter be laid on the Table.

INTER-ALLIED CONFERENCE ON DAWES REPORT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HENRY SPENCER (Battle River): I would like to ask the government if a communication has been received from Mr. Ramsay MacDonald with reference to the inter-allied conference to be called in London during July to consider and give effect to the Dawes report. Is it the intention of the government to send representation? And when will the Prime Minister give the House an opportunity of discussing the subject?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I saw by the press this morning that Mr. MacDonald had intimated that the British government were in communication with the government of Canada with respect to the inter-allied conference, and I have no doubt that a communication will be received in due course. Up to the present time, however, the government has received no communication from the British government with reference to this conference.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 47, to incorporate The United Church of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—Date of coming into force subject to decision in pending action and reference to Supreme Court.

Mr. J. F. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Chairman, it is my desire to move in connection with this clause an amendment which will have for its purpose the striking out of the clause and the substitution of another.

This is one of the most important bills that have ever been before the parliament of Canada; and for this reason, that perhaps a greater number of people in the Dominion of Canada are interested in this bill than have ever been interested in any other—certainly any other private bill—that has been before the House. This bill has for its purpose the consummation of the union that was agreed upon by three negotiating bodies of Christians, known as the Presbyterian Church in Canada, the Methodist Church of Canada, and the Congregational Churches of Canada. This bill passed through the Private Bills committee, and in the course of its progress through that committee certain amendments were made to it which alter the bill very materially, and which are considered by the promoters to change in very large measure its effect.

Before entering upon a discussion of these amendments which now appear in the reprinted copy of the bill—a slight change in the preamble, together with the amended clause which now appears as clause 2—let me indicate what I think should be the guiding principles of this committee in approaching the subject, and what the attitude of parliament should be in connection with this bill. It is not the function of parliament to decide upon questions of doctrine or church polity. Unfortunately, during the discussion before the Private Bills committee, perhaps because there was some little mistake in the wording of the original bill, and because some of those opposing the bill introduced these matters in connection with their opposition, the discussion for a time did centre around questions of doctrine. In my judgment, these things should never have been considered at all. While there was a little misunderstanding in regard to the bill as first drafted, it is now made quite clear that in the request that the basis of union be ratified as such, there is no thought that parliament should ratify this or any other form of doctrine or belief. Nowhere in the British Empire, neither in the Motherland nor in any of the great self-governing dominions, will it be seriously contended that the civil power has any right to dictate to men the religious beliefs they shall hold or the manner in which they shall give expression to their thoughts and aspirations in things spiritual.

I have been frequently asked why it is necessary to get power from parliament in order to consummate church union. The fact that such a question should be asked indicates the deep-rooted conviction that matters of faith and worship lie outside the jurisdiction of the civil power, and woe to that government or parliament that shall attempt to lay unholy hands on the Ark of the Covenant. What then is the purpose of this measure? It is not to define our creeds. Is it, then, to define our polity, the manner in which the church shall carry on its affairs? No. It simply asks that Methodists, Congregationalists and Presbyterians shall be given legal sanction to administer their affairs according to the terms that have been mutually agreed upon. In coming to a decision as to whether this sanction should be given, members of parliament, as such, have a right, in my judgment, to ask only two questions. Members of parliament should approach this question as members of parliament. We are here, not as individual members of any of the negotiating churches, not to give expression to our individual views; we had that opportunity when the matter was before our various churches. We are here now as members of parliament to decide whether this legal sanction shall be given; and I say that in my judgment we should ask two questions, and two only: First, has each one of the contracting parties, in the various steps that have been taken in arriving at the conclusion that organic union with the other two is desirable, followed the course that best harmonizes with its constitution and accepted method of procedure? Second, does this bill make a proper provision for the rights of minorities who may not desire to enter into the union?

I shall not discuss that second question at this time, because that will come up as we discuss the various clauses of the bill, but I would just like to make this general assertion at this time: That never before in the history of the various unions that have taken place has such generous provision been made for the rights of minorities. Having satisfied ourselves that the correct procedure has in all cases been followed and that minority rights have been properly protected, parliament in my judgment has nothing else to do but to pass this legislation. To do otherwise would be to arrogate to itself functions it does not possess.

In considering the question of the procedure that has been followed it must be borne in mind that it is not necessary that all the churches should have followed the same lines. Congregational procedure would, of necessity, differ from Methodist procedure, and Presbyterian procedure would differ from both. Perhaps I might indicate briefly just what these differences in procedure are. Under Congregational polity, which recognizes each local church as a self-contained and self-governing unit, the only way by which these units could enter into a union was by each local church voting itself in. That was recognized from the very beginning. There was no central body made up of delegates or representatives of these local bodies that had any authority except to carry out the instructions given by the local churches. It is true that the Congregational Union of Canada on more than one occasion voted for union with the Methodists and Presbyterians, but that carried no authority; it was simply an expression of opinion by the delegates from the local churches that this union was desirable. I mention this matter because it has an important bearing on the question whether the proper procedure was observed by the other negotiating churches. The Methodist church is a well organized body under representative government. The authority derived in the first place from the people and vested in various church courts known as quarterly boards, district meetings, conferences and the General Conference. Thus when the General Conference of the Methodist church votes in favour of union it is representing a decision that has been arrived at progressively through the lower courts of the church. Under the Methodist system it is inconceivable that any local Methodist circuit should have power to vote itself out of the union, except as a matter of grace after union had been accomplished. To take any other course would be to do violence to what has always been the genius of the Methodist system.

The procedure provided by the Presbyterian church is similar to that of the Methodist church, except that in the case of the Presbyterian church there is an additional safeguard against hasty action provided by the Barrier Act. Under the operation of this act a decision arrived at by the assembly does not become binding upon the church until the matter has been again passed upon by the presbyteries. It must be clearly kept in mind that in the Presbyterian system there is no provision for a plebiscite of the membership before submission to the church courts, or for a referendum after the matter has been passed upon by these courts. True, a vote of the members and adherents was taken, but this had no constitutional effect and was solely for the purpose of enabling the presbyteries to arrive at a decision as to whether or not union was desirable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to enter into a discussion as to the relative merits of these different methods of procedure. It would be expected that, as a Congregationalist, I would be in favour of the congregational system. But that is neither here nor there. I would have no right at this time, and I think the House would have no right, to dictate to any church the method by which it shall arrive at its decision. My only concern, and I think the only concern of this House, should be as to whether each one of the negotiating bodies followed its own method of procedure.

Let me now proceed to answer the question: Has each church observed the proper procedure in arriving at its decision? There can be no question as regards the Congregational church. It is true, there are individual churches, one or two, that have not voted to come into the union; but the great majority of the united membership have voted in favour, as also the great majority of the individual churches. There can be no question then but that the procedure is in harmony with the Congregational system; neither can there be any question as to the procedure followed by the Methodist church; and neither in the case of the Congregational nor of the Methodist church is there any organized opposition to the consummation of the union through the bill that is now before parliament. But it is different in the case of the Presbyterian church. From the very beginning of this movement looking towards church union there has been in that church a very considerable element that has been opposed to such steps being taken, and this element is to-day offering opposition to the passage of the bill.

Now, as I am not, and never have been a member of the Presbyterian church I did not, during the progress of the church union negotiations through the various courts, pay very much attention to the matter except in a general way. Recognizing however, that I would have duties to perform as a member of this House I felt it incumbent upon me to put myself in a position to answer to my own satisfaction the two questions alone that seem to me to be vital: Has the proper procedure been observed? Have the rights of minorities been protected? By personal conversation and by reading union and anti-union literature I have satisfied myself that the course followed by the Presbyterian church has been in harmony with its own constitution, and that the proposed bill makes all reasonable provision for the protection of minorities' rights. I shall therefore not attempt to recite in detail the various steps taken by the courts of the Presbyterian church by which they reached their final decision. These steps were not taken hastily. They were taken after the utmost deliberation covering a long period of years; and there is no question in my mind that the action taken by the church leaders in carrying out the decisions arrived at through the various church courts meets with the requirements of the Presbyterian constitution and the wishes of the great majority of the members and the adherents of the church. Knowing little of the Presbyterian system, except in a general way, I entered upon the study of this subject with a good deal of interest, and I may say that I gained an increasing admiration for the Presbyterian system when I noticed the calmness and deliberation with which they dealt with the question. Every step was taken in an orderly manner: First from the lower courts up to the assembly, then back again to the presbyteries; and in all the steps they took, those steps, it seemed to me, were characterized by the utmost deliberation; and I can come to no other conclusion than that the bill is in perfect harmony with the procedure provided by their own church. It is somewhat significant that little if any objection has been offered to the procedure. It is true that objection was taken to the thing itself. It has been urged that the Presbyterian Assembly had no power to do the thing it did; that to do what it did really meant the destruction of the church. I do not think that assertion can be considered as well founded. There is no thought of destruction of any one body, when it unites with another. It never was felt that a branch of the Presbyterian church was destroyed when the union of 1875 took place, neither was it felt that any branch of the Methodist church was destroyed when the union took place in the early eighties. If it is a fact—and it would seem to be a fact—that there is more difference in faith within the bounds of any one of these churches than there is between any two, it would seem that there is no reason to hold that the identity of any one of the negotiating churches would be sacrificed, any more than was the identity of those churches that entered into the former unions.

Now I come to the amendments that were made to the bill. One amendment proposes that instead of bringing this bill into force by the sanction of this parliament certain matters shall be referred to the civil courts. This would seem to be a direct challenge to the right of each church to determine its own doctrine, its own polity and its own destiny. When such a challenge as that is issued it seems to me it behooves not only one church but all churches to assert the right of the church to determine for itself through its courts what its destiny shall be. Much has been said of the House of Lords' decision in the case of the Scottish church, rendered in 1904. It will be remembered that decision was rendered by those who lived in an atmosphere entirely different from that which prevails here. The conception of the relationship of church and state that prevailed in the Old Land until this decision was rendered was entirely different from that which has prevailed among us, and we may safely say that such a decision never could have been accepted in Canada as final. Canadian sentiment in this respect is much more closely in harmony with the sentiment that has prevailed in the United States. I had thought at one time to read a number of extracts from various judgments rendered by United States judges in regard to the relations of church and state which seemed to very clearly harmonize with our own. I shall not however, take time to do that this afternoon, but would only assert that the decision rendered by the House of Lords in 1904 was abhorrent to our conception of the relations of church and state. The situation which arose at that time was corrected, and the conception of the relation of church and state which now prevails in Britain is represented by the declaratory articles passed by the church and ratified by the Imperial parliament by the act of 1921.

Why do we object to these amendments that were added to the bill? It should be remembered that the negotiating bodies, from the time that they began their negotiations, had very clearly before their minds that the union would be consummated only by an act of the Imperial parliament and concurrent legislation on the part of the provincial parliaments. That was recognized, and during the whole course of the negotiations the thought was to avoid the difficulty that arose in the case of the Scottish church which is very clearly set forth in the appendix to the law on the basis of union. I shall just read one clause making clear that the United church shall have the powers of legislation mentioned in sub-paragraph (2) of paragraph 24 of the polity section of the basis of union, subject to the safeguards thereby imposed, in such full and ample manner as to render impossible the existence in connection with the United church of the conditions which have arisen in Scotland in connection with the United Free Church of Scotland, under the decision of the House of Lords, touching its property and doctrine.

The purpose of those who entered into the negotiations leading up to this bill was to avoid litigation, and now the Private Bills committee of this House has forced upon them, or would force upon them, the very thing they sought to avoid. We may, I think, learn from the bill to which I have referred, the Imperial act of 1921, affirming the declaratory articles of the Scottish church what ought to be our proper course at this time. This act is very brief, and I think it would be well that not only the act itself, but the declaratory articles as well should be inscribed on the pages of Hansard. I am going to read the act—since it only contains four clauses—and briefly summarize the declaratory articles. In my judgment it throws a great deal of light upon our present situation. This is an act to declare the lawfulness of certain articles declaratory of the constitution of the Church of Scotland in matters spiritual, prepared with the authority of the General Assembly of the church. The preamble reads:

> Whereas certain articles declaratory of the constitution of the Church of Scotland in matters spiritual have been prepared with the authority of the General Assembly of the church with a view to facilitate the union of other churches with the Church of Scotland, which articles are set out in the schedule to this act, and together with any modifications of the said articles or additions thereto made in accordance therewith are hereinafter in this act referred to as "the declaratory articles".
> And whereas it is expedient that any doubts as to the lawfulness of the declaratory articles should be removed:
> Be it therefore enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty by and with the advice of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:
> 1. The declaratory articles are lawful articles, and the constitution of the Church of Scotland in matters spiritual is as therein set forth and no limitation of the liberty, rights and powers in matters spiritual therein set forth shall be derived in any statute or law affecting the Church of Scotland in matters spiritual at present in force, it being hereby declared that in all questions of construction the declaratory articles shall prevail, and that all such statutes and laws shall be construed in conformity therewith and in subordination thereto, and all such statutes and laws in so far as they are inconsistent with the declaratory articles are hereby repealed and declared to be of no effect.
> 2. Nothing contained in this act or in any other act affecting the Church of Scotland shall prejudice the recognition of any other church in Scotland as a Christian church protected by law in the exercise of its spiritual functions.
> 3. Subject to the recognition of the matters dealt with in the declaratory articles, as matters spiritual, nothing in this act contained shall affect or prejudice the jurisdiction of the civil courts in relation to any matter of a civil nature.
> 4. This act may be cited as the Church of Scotland Act, 1921, and shall come into operation on such date as His Majesty may fix by order in council after the declaratory articles shall have been adopted by an act of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland with the consent of the majority of the presbyteries of the church.

Now the declaratory articles themselves are contained in the schedule. I shall briefly refer to them, although I think it would be as well for the information of the country if the whole of them were inscribed on Hansard.

Section 1 declares the Church of Scotland to be part of the Holy Catholic Church that it adheres to Scottish reformation, that its supreme standard of faith is found in the Old and New Testaments.

Section 2 declares that the Westminster Confession is a subordinate standard, and that it approves of the doctrinal statement therein contained, and the prescription of government therein described.

Section 3 asserts the historical continuity of the Church of Scotland and declares that the continuity of the Church of Scotland and its identity are not prejudiced by the adoption of these articles.

Section 4 deals with the office bearers and mode of election and their authority, and it concludes with these words:

> Or give to the civil authority any right of interference with procedure or the judgment of the church within the sphere of its own government and jurisdiction.

Section 5 asserts the inherent right of the church to interpret and to frame its own statement of faith, to interpret and adopt its own subordinate standards, and to modify these always in relation to the condition of faith set forth in section 1.

Section 6 is simply a general recognition of the church and state, each having its own jurisdiction.

I will read section 7 in full, because it has some important bearing upon this case:

> The Church of Scotland believing it to be the will of Christ that His disciples should be all one in the Father and in Him, that the world may believe that the Father has sent Him, recognizes the obligation to seek and promote union with other churches in which it finds the Word to be purely preached, the sacraments administered according to Christ's ordinance, and discipline rightly exercised; and it has the right to unite with any such church without loss of its identity on terms which this church finds to be consistent with these articles.

That is left for the church itself to determine.

Section 8 reads:

The church has the right to interpret these articles, and, subject to the safeguards for deliberate action and legislation provided by the church itself, to modify or add to them; but always consistently with the provisions of the first article hereof, adherence to which, as interpreted by the church, is essential to its continuity and corporate life. Any proposal for a modification of or addition to these articles which may be approved of by the General Assembly, shall, before it can be enacted by the assembly, be transmitted by way of overture to presbyteries in at least two immediately successive years. If the overture shall receive the approval, with or without suggested amendment, of two-thirds of the whole of the presbyteries of the church, the assembly may revise the overture in the light of any suggestions by presbyteries, and may transmit the overture when so revised to presbyteries for their consent. If the overture as transmitted in its final form shall receive the consent of not less than two-thirds of the whole of the presbyteries of the church, the General Assembly may, if it deems it expedient, modify or add to these articles in terms of the said overture. But if the overture as transmitted in its final form shall not receive the requisite consent, the same or a similar proposal shall not be again transmitted for the consent of presbyteries until an interval of five years after the failure to obtain the requisite consent has been reported to the General Assembly.

Section 9 reads as follows:

Subject to the provisions of the foregoing articles and the powers of amendment therein contained, the constitution of the Church of Scotland in matters spiritual is hereby anew ratified and confirmed by the church.

Now turn back to the second part of the preamble which says:

Whereas it is expedient that any doubts as to the lawfulness of the declaratory articles should be removed:

That is, in order to set at rest any doubts as to the lawfulness of these articles, the Imperial parliament passed this statute.

That is very similar to the situation which confronts us. These negotiating churches came together. They recognized there might possibly be some doubt and they came to parliament asking parliament to pass an act in order that the doubt might be removed and that it might be settled for all time. The Private Bills committee, in its wisdom, or otherwise, said, "You have asked for legislation, but we will give you litigation; go to the courts". Instead of this parliament doing what the British parliament did, setting all these matters at rest as regards the Church of Scotland and any other churches in Scotland, this parliament is asked to take an entirely different course. But we say, no; we object to being forced into the courts when our purpose from the beginning was to avoid litigation.

I will just briefly indicate one or two other reasons why this clause should be deleted from the bill. The churches have now been twenty years in a period of negotiations. The work of the churches has been carried on not perhaps in the orderly and systematic manner in which it was carried on previously. Temporary arrangements have been made. It is not desirable that this condition should any longer continue. Not only is it true in the West, but it is also true in eastern Canada in many districts, that until this legislation is passed the churches cannot carry on their work with the system, the orderliness, the force, that they otherwise could have done. Therefore, it is not wise that we should ask them to accept, or that we should force upon them, the delay that would necessarily be incurred if this clause were allowed to remain in the bill. Because it is by no means certain how long it would take to reach anything like a decision. "The law's delays" we know are proverbial, and we have no right to force any longer delay upon these churches.

And does any one imagine for a moment that even if an adverse decision should be given in the courts that that would finally settle the matter? I cannot imagine for a moment that the Presbyterian church or any other church would be satisfied with a decision of the civil courts that would impugn the rights of its own courts to decide its own doctrine, polity and destiny. If doubt should be thrown upon the authority of its General Assembly, the Presbyterian church would come back to this parliament, just as the Church of Scotland went to the British parliament, and would ask, and would have a right to receive from this parliament, legislation confirming it in the exercise of its rights as a church. Therefore, we cannot think that the matter would be settled even if an adverse decision should be given. Parliament has the authority to settle the matter right now, so why should that not be done?

Other reasons might be urged. It might be worth while pointing to the recent vote of the General Assembly at Owen Sound. It has been contended that the General Assembly has not represented the Presbyterian church; but for the benefit of those who are not familiar with church procedure, it might be indicated that the personnel of one General Assembly is never the same as that of the one that preceded it. I am not certain of the number, but four or five times the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church has pronounced on this question in one phase or another and always by large majorities, the last vote taken at Owen Sound showing the largest majority of all. The General Assembly represents only one-sixth of the ministers and an equal number of the elders. These are chosen in turn, so that you have not the votes of a body of men meeting together year after year, but the votes of a body that differs absolutely in its personnel every year. Surely that is a reason for holding that the General Assembly does represent the will of the Presbyterian church.

One matter which has not been referred to during the course of the debate, but to which I would wish to refer just at this point, is that this question has been discussed almost altogether from the standpoint of the Presbyterian church and the opposing element in that church; but it should be remembered that there are three negotiating bodies, not only the Presbyterian church, but the Methodist church and the Congregational church. Hitherto, those representing the other churches have stood aside. But they have some rights now that should be recognised by this parliament, and delay should no longer be forced upon the Methodist church or the Congregational church. I do not think this parliament would be wise in ignoring those rights. While we have not asserted them very strongly up to this point, I think that at this time it is fitting that it should be made very clear that this is not simply a matter in regard to which the dissenting minority of the Presbyterian church are interested; but it is a matter in which a very large proportion of the Presbyterian church are interested as well as these other two negotiating bodies; and, speaking for the other negotiating bodies, we are satisfied that no civil court will declare the inadequacy of the Presbyterian courts. We are satisfied that the legislation that we are asking for is good legislation and will hold, and we are asking this parliament to give us this legislation.

There is no question of the right of parliament in this matter. Parliament may pass this legislation or it may refuse it. But I want to point out that there is absolutely no precedent for refusing legislation when bodies of Christians, desiring to have their union consummated, come before parliament or any legislature. The request has always been granted as a matter of course. When churches through their own action or by the means provided by their own constitution, have determined to enter a union, parliament has always ratified those unions. So, we say: You have power to pass this legislation; you have power to refuse it; but do not send us to the courts to meet litigation which is exactly what we have been trying all these years to avoid. Therefore, I beg to move the following amendment:

That the whole of section 2 of the said bill be stricken out and the following substituted therefor:

2. This act shall come into force on the 10th day of June, 1925, except the provisions required to permit the vote provided for in section 10 being taken, which shall come into force on the 10th day of December, 1924.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): I should like to deal for a few moments, not only with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), but with the history of the negotiations which have led up to the introduction of this bill, that is the first bill as introduced into parliament and considered by the Private Bills committee, with the bill as amended and reported to parliament by the chairman of the select standing committee on Private Bills and also with the amendments which have been moved thereto by the hon. member for Lisgar. In order to understand this question properly, we have to go back a good many years. The hon. member for Lisgar told us in a few words some of the things which happened in regard to this great question. But before this parliament can give an intelligent vote on this question, we must look at the question from every angle. What are the facts with regard to the negotiations as mentioned by the hon. member for Lisgar? In the year 1904, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada and the Methodist Conference met in the same city, and three members of the Presbyterian Assembly were instructed by that assembly to go over to the church where the Methodist Conference was meeting and extend to them the felicitations of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. During the course of the remarks made by these three gentlemen, the last speaker, Principal Patrick, without any instructions from the Presbyterian General Assembly, in his remarks held out the hope that the union between those two great churches might be consummated at some time in the future. The next day the Methodist church sent an official delegation to the General Assembly asking that they discuss the matter. For several years negotiations were carried on, with the result that in the year 1911 it was decided to take a vote of the Presbyterian church. Before I read the result of that vote, might I say this? In 1905, the union committee appointed by the Presbyterian Assembly made its report telling of its meeting with the committees of the Methodist and Congregational churches. Among the closing words of that report were these:

It was universally recognized in the joint committee. . . .

That is including Methodists, Congregationalists and Presbyterians.

. . . . that a union of the churches to be real and lasting, must carry the consent of the entire membership.

The assembly adopted that report, sending it forth to the church, and its statements were accepted as the statements adopted by the assembly.

In 1911, however, a vote of the Presbyterian church was taken, the membership at that time including sessions and moderators, being 298,916. Of these, 113,000 voted yea and 50,733 nay. Hon. gentlemen who were in the Private Bills committee and heard Sir Robert Falconer speak on the subject will no doubt remember that, instead of giving the total vote on both sides as well as the full information with regard to that vote, he told us that only 16 per cent of the total vote of the Presbyterian church was against the union in 1911. Of course that statement was true; but he should have gone on to tell us that only 37 per cent of the total membership of that church voted in favour of union. He also told the committee about the vote in 1915, stating that only 22 per cent of the total membership of the church at that time voted against the union; but he refrained from mentioning the fact that in the 1915 vote the percentage in favour of union fell off from 37 to 33 per cent. Coming from Sir Robert Falconer it may have been right and proper that the matter should be stated in that way, but I am giving to the House my idea as to the proper way in which the facts should be set forth; the vote on both sides ought to be stated, showing what percentage voted for and what percentage was against the union.

After the vote had been taken in 1911 the General Assembly on receiving the result stopped the movement, and this is what they stated in 1912:

In view of the extent of the minority which is not yet convinced that organic union is the best method of expressing the unity sincerely desired by all, the assembly deems it unwise to proceed immediately to consummate the union—

At that time, remember, only 16 per cent of the church voted against the union, and yet the General Assembly, when they met the next year, deemed it unwise to proceed to its consummation.

—but believes that by further conference and discussion practically unanimous action can be secured within a reasonable time.

In other words, the General Assembly distinctly declared in 1912 that unless a practical unanimity could be obtained on the part of the whole church they would not consider it advisable to go on with the movement. In 1915 another vote was taken, and here are some of the opinions which were expressed with reference to the condition of things then. I quote first the words of Principal Patrick:

They wanted to carry all the members of the three churches into the union. From first to last the question must be a people's question.

That is to say, he felt that the minority against union was too considerable, or the majority in favour of union, too slight, to warrant the General Assembly's proceeding to consummate the movement. Next I give the views of Dr. Clark:

He thought the second vote of the people ought to be taken. He declared that if it was proved by such a vote that a considerable minority was not in favour of union he would regret the fact, but he would not force the issue. He went on to say that there is no such thing as attempting to force union on the church.

Let us see what was stated by Sir Robert Falconer himself, the gentleman who came before the committee and endeavoured to show there why at this time union was a good thing. He is reported thus:

From the commencement he had put it in the forefront, that it would be utter madness to go forward to a union that did not carry the whole church with it. It was absurd to think that the assembly could force its will on the people.

I want my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) to note these words:

It was absurd to think that the assembly could force its will on the people.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Was that after the last vote had been taken?

Mr. DUFF: Yes. Now, they talk about the people of the West wanting this union. Well, let me tell the House that out of a total membership of 80,000 Presbyterians in the West only 32,000 voted for union in 1911. That is not the unanimity which Professor Falconer and other leaders in the church wanted in the movement; and yet they come to-day and ask parliament to pass a bill when, not 22 per cent but, I am confident in saying, at least 75 per cent of the total membership of the Presbyterian church are opposed to union; for I have no doubt whatever that if a vote were taken to-day it would reveal that percentage of the Presbyterian body who are against the movement and anxious to remain in their own church.

At this stage it may be just as well for me to explain my own position in relation to church union. It has been stated that I am opposed to the union; the statement has also been made that I have been and am opposed to the passage of a bill to incorporate the United Church of Canada. I desire to deny that latter statement; so far as the union of the churches is concerned, my opinion is that no more good will result from the union of the three churches named than could be attained if each preserved its separate identity and worked as it has done in the past over a long period of years. In view of the history of the Methodist church, the Congregational church and the Presbyterian church, respectively, my own candid opinion is, as it has always been, that these churches will do far better work in the world as they have been going on in the past than they would do if they were united into one merger or composite organization. But so far as the church union bill is concerned, I want to say that as a member of parliament and as a citizen of this country I think that this House should pass the measure to incorporate the United Church of Canada. I have never opposed any such bill and I am ready to-day as I have always been ready to assent to the passage of a measure for the purpose of incorporating the United Church of Canada and giving to that body under a corporate act all the powers necessary to enable it to conduct its affairs in whatever way it might see fit. My objection has always been, and the objection of those for whom I speak is the same, that those who do not want to go into the union, whether they be Methodists, Congregationalists or Presbyterians, ought not to be forced or coerced, as the present bill proposes to force or coerce them.

Possibly I have had a different experience from that of any other hon. member in this House. I was born and bred in a little town where there was no Presbyterian church and where my people were the only Presbyterian family in the neighbourhood. Consequently I had a double training. Every Sunday morning when I got out of bed I had first to eat a big plate of porridge and then to learn the Shorter Catechism; after I had got up my allotted lesson, and when the Methodist church bell rang, my mother took me by the hand, I being too small to go alone, and took me to the Methodist church. And I attended the Methodist church and Sunday school for twenty years. So that if there is one man in this House who should give thanks to the Methodist church, I am in the position to do so. I have nothing against the Methodist church; and if that church, the Congregational church, and any part of the Presbyterian church want to unite, I say that so far as I am concerned they can do so.

[Mr. Duff.]

But I do not want those who are opposed to entering that union to be forced into so doing by legislation or by the courts of the Presbyterian church.

This bill No. 47, was introduced into this parliament by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke); I hold in my hand a copy of that bill as introduced by the hon. gentleman. It is being contended by the hon. member for Lisgar and by other hon. gentlemen that we should pass this bill because forsooth the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church have asked us to do so. And my hon. friend from Lisgar in his closing remarks also intimated that the Methodist church and the Congregational church had also requested that the bill be passed. I say that neither the Methodist church, nor the Congregational church nor the Presbyterian church ever asked parliament to pass that bill; and I will prove that statement to the satisfaction of every hon. member within the next five minutes. That bill is not the bill which the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church passed in 1923. I have here a copy of the bill, which was prepared by no less a personage than the Hon. N. W. Rowell, assisted by two other gentlemen, and which was forwarded to the Presbyterian General Assembly and the Methodist Conference and approved by those two bodies. And I will prove that somebody for some reason or other deliberately emasculated that bill. I will prove that in several clauses the bill is entirely different from the bill which was approved by the Presbyterian Assembly and the Methodist Conference. If I can prove that, then why should this bill be passed by parliament? It is not the bill which the Presbyterian General Assembly asked us to pass, even if we had the power to pass it and it was constitutional for us so to do. Let me establish my point. If you turn to the preamble of the bill, leaving out the underlined words, which constitute the amendment, you find it reads as follows:

Whereas the Presbyterian Church in Canada, the Methodist Church and the Congregational Churches of Canada have by their petition represented that, believing the promotion of Christian unity to be in accordance with the Divine Will, they recognize the obligation to seek and promote union with other churches adhering to the same fundamental principles of the Christian faith, and that, having the right to unite with one another without loss of their identity upon terms which they find to be consistent with such principles, they have adopted a basis of union which is set forth in schedule A to this act and have agreed to unite and form one body or denomination of Christians under the name of "The United Church of Canada;" and have prayed that it may be enacted as hereinafter set forth; And whereas it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petition: Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

That is the bill as introduced by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), in the form, no doubt, in which it was handed to him by one of the lawyers acting for the United church committee. Now, here is the preamble which the Presbyterian church and the Methodist church adopted at their general assembly and conference:

> Whereas the petitioners hereinafter named have represented that the Presbyterian Church in Canada, the Methodist Church, and the Congregational Churches of Canada have agreed to unite and form one body or denomination of Christians under the name of "The United Church of Canada," in accordance with the terms and provisions of the basis of union set forth in schedule "A" to this act, and have prayed that it may be enacted as hereinafter set forth;
> And whereas it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petition;

Are these two alike? Of course they are not; they are entirely different. So that even if the General Assembly had the authority to proceed as they did, I say this bill should not be passed by parliament because it does not carry out the wishes of the General Assembly of Canada. Let me go a little further. The Methodist Conference recommended that the following words be added to section 7:

> The persons entitled to vote at any meeting of such congregation shall be persons in full membership who are of the age of eighteen years or over.

That part of the section does not appear in the bill as introduced by the hon. member for Brandon. They recommended also that section 9 be amended by inserting after the word "membership" in the fifth line thereof the following words, "who are of the age of eighteen years or over." Then, in section 10, subsection (k), after the words "superior court of any province of Canada" they have struck out "or corresponding courts of Newfoundland or Bermuda". This was in the original bill but was deleted, evidently by the lawyers who prepared the draft and handed it to the hon. member for Brandon.

I was discussing this bill with two Presbyterian ministers a few days ago and they tried to show me that that doctrine as set forth in it embodied no change from the present Presbyterian doctrine. I mentioned the fact that there was a difference in regard to the calling of ministers. I showed them that in addition to the congregation calling a minister it was necessary under this bill for what was known as a settlement committee to approve of the "call". But they said that could not be; that that had not been put in at the assembly. I said to them, "Well, it is in now." They argued that such a provision had never been put in; so I came to my room, turned it up, and proved to them conclusively that this clause was entirely different from what had been passed by the General Assembly of 1923. Such being the case, how can the hon. member for Brandon and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) argue that we should pass this bill, even if the Presbyterian Assembly had the right to take this course?

Having been moved in this House, the bill went to the committee. The committee spent some six weeks hearing evidence and discussing every phase of the preamble. I think I can compliment the representatives of both sides in that they all made very excellent addresses; while we could not perhaps agree with all they said, yet we felt they had put up a very good case. The opponents of the bill, those Presbyterians who wanted to remain in their own church, felt at first that the bill should not pass at all. I am referring now not to the members of the committee who voted for my amendment but to gentlemen outside who came there opposing the bill. To show you, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment which I moved and which passed the committee was not an amendment which had been approved of by the Presbyterians who wanted to remain in their own church, I want to put on record the first amendment which these Presbyterians thought should be moved to the bill, and also to show that the amendment I subsequently moved was a compromise and was, as I say, drafted without my consulting the wishes of the Presbyterians who thought that the bill should not pass in any form. Here is the amendment which opponents of the bill thought should be passed by this House:

> That before proceeding further with the bill the promoters of the bill be instructed to draft clauses by which the bill will be amended by providing for the preservation of the Presbyterian Church in Canada as a separate entity and for giving to any congregation of such church the right by vote of its members and adherents to go into the United Church of Canada, and providing that after ascertaining the number of those who have left the Presbyterian Church in Canada and joined the United Church of Canada, an apportionment or division of the property shall be made so as to render substantial justice, having regard to all the equities in so far as the jurisdiction of this parliament extends.

You will notice that that amendment which the opponents of the bill thought should be moved is entirely different from the present provisions of the bill. For instance, one thing the opponents of the bill wanted was that Presbyterians should vote themselves into the union and not out of the union. Under the bill as at first introduced everybody was taken into the United church, holus bolus, whether he wanted to go in or not; the property was taken in and then those who desired to do so were given six months to vote themselves out and would afterwards have to fight for goodness knows how long in order to regain their property. This, I say, was the resolution which the opponents of the bill would like to have seen passed. Personally I think it is a fair amendment, but after listening to all the discussion and after consulting with different members of the House I felt we should endeavour to make some compromise which would be acceptable to both sides in this dispute. Consequently after a good deal of earnest consideration I moved this amendment, seconded by the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter):

That the preamble of Bill 47 be amended by adding after the word "petition" in line 16 the following:

"Subject to the following conditions.—Provided that this act shall not come into force until and unless

(1) The courts shall have finally decided that the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada has the constitutional power to form a union of the Presbyterian Church of Canada with the Methodist and Congregational Churches upon the terms of this act.

(2) The courts shall have finally decided that the parliament of Canada can constitutionally enact this act in whole or in part and if the courts should decide that this act is constitutional only in part, then it shall come into force only as to such parts as are declared constitutional, provided further that the latter question shall be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada by a reference by the Minister of Justice."

What was my reason for moving this amendment? It was this: As I said a moment ago, after the committee had listened attentively practically every day for two or three weeks to argument on both sides of this question by legal advisers and others, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that no member of that committee was in a position to judge whether the Presbyterian church had the constitutional power to force all its members into this union or not. That is the reason I moved the amendment. It was only to get something which I thought would be satisfactory to the committee. But after moving the amendment and hearing the discussion which took place upon it, I found that objection was raised to it on the ground that it went too far in the opinion of some members. Their idea was that it went too far in that no definite time was set in regard to the action in the courts. They said, if that amendment passes, and if parliament agrees to the bill with that amendment, there may be endless litigation. I saw at once that was a good point, and a small subcommittee was appointed to go into the matter and endeavour to draft an agreement which would be acceptable. That subcommittee spent a whole day trying to reach an agreement, but in vain. However, after further consultation another amendment was drafted, and that is the one which appears in the bill as it is now before the House, and which the hon. member for Lisgar desires to be stricken out.

Now I want to emphasize this: In my opinion we, as legislators, outside of perhaps a few lawyers in the House, are not competent to judge whether or not the Presbyterian church has proceeded constitutionally, and if that is the case, how are we going to vote? Why should we strike out my amendment, and replace the amendment in its original form, if in our opinion we do not know to our satisfaction whether the Presbyterian church had the constitutional right or not. The hon. member for Lisgar and others in favour of the bill have been arguing all along from the time this bill was introduced that they were perfectly sure that the Presbyterian church did have the power under their constitution to bring the whole church in, and to ask for this legislation. Well, if that is the case, what have they got to fear from the courts? Is it not far better for the courts to decide whether or not they have the power, than to have this matter settled by parliament and then taken to the courts afterwards? The hon. member for Lisgar in his remarks said that to pass my amendment would mean litigation. Does not my hon. friend know that this question is already in the courts? It was in the courts before ever this bill was introduced, and consequently, whether we pass this bill in its original form or pass it with my amendment, there is still a suit pending in the courts, and neither this parliament nor the Presbyterians who want to go into union can get away from that action which is in the courts at the present time. That action is going on, and is going to be settled, and I can tell my hon. friend I am positive the Presbyterians who desire to remain in their own church are just as anxious to get that action settled as the Presbyterians, or anyone else, who want to go into the union. They are anxious to have the whole question settled so that the church can go on with its work.

We have not only had a good deal of discussion with regard to this matter in the committee, Mr. Chairman, but it has also been discussed a great deal outside of the committee. You will perhaps remember, Mr. Chairman, that in the old days we used to hear a lot about lobbying around the halls of parliament, but I think you and every member of the House will agree that never was there such a lobby as was conducted around this parliament with regard to this bill. Not only was there a lobby conducted around this parliament, but members of parliament were told that if this parliament did not pass this bill—my hon. friend from Lisgar told us the same thing practically to-day—something awful was going to happen to the members of parliament. Now I do not think any member of parliament is going to be intimidated by anything anybody says either outside or inside of this parliament, because we are a hard-boiled lot, and whether it is a clergyman or a layman, we are going to do what we think is right; we will not be intimidated by anybody inside or outside of the walls of this parliament. I think, Sir, it was a most undignified thing for clergymen in this city and outside, whether they met in the Presbyterian General Assembly or in Chalmers church in Ottawa, at the very time this bill was being considered by the Private Bills committee, to get up and make the remarks made by some of them on those occasions. I want to put on Hansard a few of the remarks that were made at that time, so that the committee may know what was said. I repeat, it was a most undignified thing for these gentlemen to try in any way to force parliamentary action. There was a gentleman named Smythe who spoke at Chalmers church, and here is what he said:

The speaker warned the legislators in advance of the consequences which he said would be sure to follow if the bill is defeated. "This country will be plunged into a religious war, the extent and bitterness of which no man can foretell," he said. "If the union bill is defeated or has to be withdrawn, the next general election in Canada will be fought on an issue of the spiritual independence of the churches in this country."

Was not that a nice remark for a gentleman of Mr. Smythe's standing in the community to make?

Mr. CRERAR: Will my hon. friend vouch for the accuracy of the report?

Mr. DUFF: In reply to the hon. member, my wife was there and heard him say it.

Mr. CRERAR: That is very good evidence.

Mr. BROWN: I am glad to know that there is somebody who can make the hon. member for Lunenburg believe certain things he may not want to believe.

Mr. DUFF: I always believe the truth, and that is perhaps the reason I cannot believe all my hon. friend says. Now, on the heels of this statement by Mr. Smythe, followed the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church, meeting at Owen Sound, and listen to what they say:

If the Private Bills committee at Ottawa finally brings in a majority report unfavourable to union, the minority of the Private Bills committee will bring in a minority report, which is already fully prepared—

Perhaps my hon. friend from Lisgar knew something about that. This was long before the Private Bills committee had decided on any report.

—and will, if possible, commit every member of the House to the hilt on this issue.

That session of parliament will be followed quickly by an election, and the subject will then be fought out in the various regions wherever the matter can be introduced. It is apparently not the intention of the committee on church union to enter the courts voluntarily under any circumstances or to submit the matter at issue to the courts—it is maintained that the subject is one which must be settled by parliament and not by the courts.

And that is from no less a body than the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church! Think of it, Mr. Chairman, ministers of the gospel, sitting in Owen Sound, in a church which was strongly anti-union, and daring to send that out to members of parliament.

Mr. BROWN: Is that the report of the assembly?

Mr. DUFF: That is the report of the assembly, yes. I think even my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) will admit that is not quite satisfactory. I will tell you what Dr. Pidgeon said at the assembly. He said that the church in its development would bow to no civil authority. Now, Sir, there are other people who wanted to get into this discussion and into the limelight. For example, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) started to give the members of parliament a hint.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUFF: He butted into the discussion like a billy goat at a billboard, and he warned Liberal members of parliament to be careful of what they are doing. I should like to know what politics have to do with this bill we are now considering? Opinion concerning it is divided among the Liberals. Opinion among the Conservatives is also divided—some are for and others against the bill—and I think the Progressives are divided in a similar manner. So, I ask what right had the Minister of Agriculture, or anyone else to write such a letter to the members of this parliament?

Mr. IRVINE: Read the letter.

Mr. DUFF: Do you want me to read it?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DUFF: The letter has been published in the press and no doubt all my hon. friends have seen it. A good deal has been said about the vote of the assembly on this matter a few weeks ago, and my hon. friend (Mr. Brown) mentioned the fact that the vote in question was overwhelmingly in favour of this bill. Well, I am very doubtful if five members of the assembly ever saw the measure. It reminds me of the petitions which came into this House by the hundreds asking hon. members to pass this bill. I am quite positive that of the names on those petitions not one man out of ten thousand had ever seen the bill when he signed the petition in question.

Mr. FORKE: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUFF: I am glad my hon. friend agrees with me. Now, what about the meeting of the assembly. It is quite true, as the hon. member (Mr. Brown) has said, that the assembly voted overwhelmingly in favour of union and in support of this bill but that —to my mind and to the minds of Presbyterians who know the government of their own church—does not amount to very much. My hon. friend said that the composition of the assembly changes every year. Let me tell him that it does not change very much, and it has not changed very much since the question of church union has been up; the gentlemen who are strongly in favour of church union, and who are trying to force this bill through, have gone to every meeting of the assembly that has been held for the last ten years. But let us look into the matter a little further.

Mr. THURSTON: Had not those opposed to church union a perfect right to be represented at the assembly?

Mr. DUFF: They did not have the same opportunity to be represented as those who were in favour of church union.

Mr. THURSTON: Why not?

Mr. DUFF: Because those who were in favour of church union could practically settle who were to go to the assembly.

Mr. THURSTON: Why?

Mr. DUFF: This is the reason why: It is a well known fact that the majority of clergymen in the Presbyterian church are in favour of church union, and when the Presbyteries met to select commissioners who were to go to the assembly my hon. friend can very well realize that they would select their own friends.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. HALBERT: There are elders of the church who go by virtue of seniority.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member knows that there are very few elders who go, and if they did they would not go by virtue of seniority. There is what is known as the ruling elder; he is the one that usually goes to the assembly.

Mr. CALDWELL: The ruling elder is elected by his congregation.

Mr. DUFF: Perhaps fifty years ago, perhaps forty-five, perhaps forty, perhaps thirty, perhaps ten, perhaps one.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is not correct because I have been elected ruling elder of my congregation several times, and I know the procedure much better than that.

Mr. DUFF: All I can say is that I am surprised at the church. Now, let us look at the composition of the assembly. For instance the presbytery of Pictou sent fourteen commissioners to the assembly, out of which number eleven voted for the resolution of Dr. Pidgeon and three against it. Well, in spite of that fact, out of a total membership of 8,000 in the presbytery of Pictou only 1,790 voted in favour of union. Take another example.

Mr. CALDWELL: How many voted against?

Mr. DUFF: The number that voted against was 3,345. Take another example, the presbytery of St. John. It has 5,640 members of whom only 1,513, or a little more than one-fourth voted for union.

Mr. McMASTER: What vote was that?

Mr. DUFF: I am talking about the vote that was taken in 1915. Now take the presbytery of Glengarry. My information is that twenty-three commissioners went to the assembly from that presbytery. Twenty of these commissioners voted for Dr. Pidgeon's resolution and in favour of church union, whereas it is a well known fact that in the presbytery of Glengarry some twenty congregations are opposed to church union. Yet twenty ministers went to the last assembly and gave a vote diametrically opposed to the wishes of their congregations.

An hon. MEMBER: Do they still hold their jobs?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, I think that is the mistake that was made. That shows conclusively that the vote of the assembly does not mean very much. It is also a fact that at the last assembly, when the vote was about to be taken, some of the commissioners suggested that it should be taken by ballot but the majority of members of the assembly refused a vote by this democratic method. They did not want to have a vote by ballot taken because had that course been followed instead of ninety-four commissioners voting against Dr. Pidgeon's resolution the result would have been very much different.

It has been said that the Methodist church is a unit in favour of church union. The Presbyterians do not want to deny that fact; but it is well known to people on the outside that a great many Methodists in the Methodist church would be quite willing to remain in their own church and not go into the union. Let me read what was said by Sir Robert Perks at the last Ecumenical Methodist Council. He said:

> British Methodists look with utmost dismay upon the rash precipitancy of the Canadian Methodists on the matter of organic church union. What? Would you cut off all the hallowed associations of Methodist history? Would you in Canada be a consenting party to the annihilation of your identity for the sake of merging it with a colorless compromising Presbyterian nondescript?

In other words Sir Robert Perks knows very well that if a vote were taken to-day at least 75 per cent of the Presbyterians in Canada would not go into this union. I will give another instance. I have here a letter from a Methodist lady who writes as follows:

> To the Editor of the Chronicle:
> Sir,—I have read with interest the argument of Hon. D. A. Cameron, Provincial Secretary, against church union. I quite agree with the honorable gentleman that union of the churches means destruction of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, and with him I do not believe that Christ meant the destruction of the different churches and their doctrines when He spoke of unity. For does the same thing not apply to other churches as well as to the Presbyterian? The Methodist church, of which I am proud to own myself a member would be destroyed, too. There are in this church as good doctrines, sacred rites and as true heroes as in any church. The Tree is Christ, the churches are the branches of that tree and each has its own particular function to perform. The sainted John Wesley would rise from his grave in protest were the Methodist church to be swallowed up in a Union church. I cannot see what good can come of it.
> Mrs. Stewart MacLean.
> Londonderry Station,
> March 31, 1924.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Could the hon. member tell the House whether John Wesley was a Methodist or not?

Mr. DUFF: Will the hon. member for South York answer the question himself?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): He was an Anglican.

Mr. DUFF: This letter is signed Mrs. Stewart MacLean of Londonderry Station, Nova Scotia.

Mr. McMASTER: In Lunenburg county?

Mr. DUFF: No, Colchester county. There are many Methodists in Lunenburg, and they are the largest denomination in my constituency but they are quite willing to remain in their own church, and would rather do that than go into the union. Not only are the Methodist women opposed to this union, but we must remember that in Canada to-day there are at least 100,000 women in the Presbyterian church who are not only opposed to union—that is as far as going into the union themselves is concerned—but are determined to carry the fight to a finish.

Mr. HALBERT: Are they old maids?

Mr. DUFF: I am sorry to hear that question asked. I think the hon. member had better withdraw it. It is a foolish remark to make. These 100,000 women are determined to carry on this fight. They are not going to give up their church. They have fought for their church for years. They have kept in it, and have taken more interest in it than the men, and no matter what parliament does or what the courts decide, these women are going to maintain the Presbyterian Church in Canada.

Mr. THURSTON: Are there any women in the Presbyterian church in favour of the union?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, my hon. friend knows without asking that there are a number of women in favour of the union; they have a perfect right to their views; they have a right to join any church they want to join, and the other women and myself have no objection to that. I say there are 100,000 women determined to stay in the church, and despite what parliament or the courts may do they are going to stay there. With regard to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lisgar, it must be remembered that when this amendment which has been embodied in the bill was passed and the bill was reported to the House, the chairman, the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. McGiverin) presented the report in the following words:

> Your committee have considered Bill No. 47, incorporating the United Church of Canada, and have agreed to report the same with amendments.
> Your committee have found it advisable to amend the preamble of the said bill so as to indicate the reason for some of the amendments which were made to the provisions of the bill.

This House accepted that report. In other words they accepted Bill 47 as amended by the committee. If that is the case, what is the usual parliamentary practice with regard to private bills reported from committee? In the first place in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms I find that instead of moving an amendment, as the hon. member for Lisgar did, the bill should be referred back to the select standing committee. It is most unusual to alter a report from a select standing committee. At page 208 of Beauchesne's Rules and Forms, we find rule 712, which reads as follows:

> It is the correct course, in all cases where it is necessary to make material amendments, to refer the bill back to the select committee, to which it had been previously sent, instead of considering the proposed changes in committee of the whole.

> No amendment may be proposed, which could not have been proposed in committee without an instruction from the House.

Bourinot, at page 617 says:

> It is very rarely that the committee of the whole on a private bill will interfere with the bill as it comes from a select committee.

That quotation is from Todd's Private Bill Practice, 101-103. Then I refer to Todd's Private Bill Practice, 1862, page 69, where I find the following:

> A bill after it has been reported, may be referred back to committee, but this is very rarely done.

At page 72 he says:

> It may be well to remark here that while it is of course, competent to the House to amend or reject any bill after it has been reported by a select committee, and to amend or reject any amendment agreed to by the committee, practically this right is but rarely exercised.

I think I have proved that my hon. friend's motion is not in the proper form, and if a very serious injury has been done the promoters of this bill it might have been in order for him to send the bill back to the select standing committee. I contend no injury has been done the promoters of the bill. In fact my amendment protects them just as much as it protects the opponents of the bill who want the matter referred to the courts. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think the promoters of the bill should have followed the advice of the Montreal Witness. That paper is edited by John Dougall, and, if I am not very much mistaken, he is a real good Methodist. An hon. gentleman says he is a Presbyterian. Well he may be a Presbyterian, but I am sure he is a Methodist. Both religions are all right. I thought he was a Methodist. The hon. member for Brome agrees with me. Here is what the Witness says:

> Yet all this was thrown open to parliamentary inquiry by the construction of the bill itself, which had appended to it a confession of faith and, strange to say, challenged parliament to ratify the same. Thus the charge of failing to grasp the issues applies not only to the floundering of newspaper- correspondents, or to the bewilderment of members of parliament before whom old theological or rather philosophical perplexities were thus gratuitously thrown, but to wise people behind the bill who put the cart before the horse in asking parliament to constitute a church and to stereotype its creed, as being to all appearance, in their view, a necessary step to union.

If a man like the editor of the Witness gives this kindly advice to the promoters of the bill, and says that they have evidently drafted a very bad measure, it seems to me the proper procedure for this House is, as I suggested, or as proposed in my amendment, to withdraw the bill and redraft it as it should have been drafted, and give everybody a fair and square deal. But Mr. Dougall goes on:

> What the churches ought to do at once is to begin over again, proclaiming their union. It may be possible even yet to rid the bill of these mischievous features and get it passed. Should that fail at this session, a new and simpler bill should be drawn up, disposing of the properties for parliament to act upon according to its wisdom and sense of equity. As revealed in the discussion, the present bill looks as though it had been drawn up by some one who had not got rid of the old world notion of a state church.

Will the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) listen to this:

> As revealed in the discussion, the present bill looks as though it had been drawn up by some one who had not got rid of the old world notion of a state church, for which people of all religions and none, and of all moralities and none, would determine how it should worship and what it should believe.

I do not think for one moment that the bill was drafted by someone who had not got rid of the old notion of a state church. I would take the other view and say that the hon. gentleman who had most to do with drafting this bill had in mind something to do with a state church or a church which should come to parliament year after year and say what parliament should or should not do. I contend that the Presbyterians in this country who are fighting to remain in their own church are fighting the battle of religious liberty for all the churches in Canada. For if parliament, on an eight-year-old vote of less than one-third of the Presbyterian membership, should blot out their church, and make that entire membership, however unwilling, members of a new and different church, taking away their religious liberty, then next year parliament might do the same to any other church. There would be no safety for any church, and no assured religious liberty for any member of any church.

To have a great church thus blotted out by act of parliament, and its entire membership, however unwilling, made members of another church and compelled to remain there or go out homeless on to the street, their church gone for ever, would be religious coercion unknown in the history of free peoples. Let all change who wish, but keep Canada free.

Further, Presbyterians are fighting the battle of civil rights for all people of Canada. For if parliament, on an eight-year-old vote of less than one-third of the Presbyterian membership, should confiscate all trusts held by that church and should divert these trusts to other control, then parliament might, in the same way, divert all trusts held by any society or church, for educational, benevolent or religious work of any kind, to any who might ask for them, a thing which no government, in a free country, has ever done, and which would make Canada's statutes and laws no protection to her people. These two great wrongs, wholesale coercion and confiscation are the chief features of the church union bill.

What would be the result of such wholesale coercion and confiscation? It would mean the denial of religious liberty and civil rights to a great body of the Canadian people on the demand of some other people. It would mean life-long bitterness and resentment on the part of that great body of the people, against such unjust coercion and wrong. It would mean the breaking up of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, which has ever stood for liberty and good citizenship. It would mean a lessening of that religious life and work which is the safeguard of good morals everywhere, for if people are not free there cannot be the same free effort. It would mean less incentive for any to organize for the good of their fellow men, for to-morrow, on the demand of some one, within or without, their organization might be wiped out by act of parliament. It would mean fewer men and women leaving their money in trust, to carry on their good work when they are gone, for they would have no assurance that it would be used in accordance with their intention and will. It would mean no safety for any institution, school, hospital, asylum or church, depending in any measure upon trust funds. It would mean that this new incorporated combine, born of coercion and confiscation, and claiming the right to coerce and confiscate, would in future, be a menace to the freedom of statesmen and parliaments in their efforts for the well-being of our country.

So far as I am concerned and so far as many other people are concerned, we have no idea of saying that a bill to incorporate the United Church of Canada should not pass this parliament. If the Methodist church is desirous of forming a united church and entering union, it has a perfect right to do so. If the Congregational church desires to become part of that United church, it has also that right. We are willing to give it to them; but we say: If there is a small minority, or a large minority in the Presbyterian church who are opposed to that union, this parliament should not put anything in their way to prevent them from getting their just rights, and allowing them to worship under their own vine and fig tree and the church of their choice.

I say, in closing, that the amendment which I moved and which was adopted by the committee is a very simple one. It protects the rights of all Presbyterians, whether they are anti Presbyterians or union Presbyterians or those Presbyterians who want to remain in their own church. The amendment refers specifically to the action which is in the courts at the present time. Consequently, in view of the fact that that suit is referred to and that action is going on, my hon. friends, who are in favour of union and who think that the Presbyterian church should go in as a whole church, if they believe that the Presbyterian Assembly and the courts of the church have power to do the right and proper thing, have nothing to fear from my amendment, nothing to fear from the courts, and, therefore, they ought to be fair and reasonable and allow the courts to decide whether the Presbyterian church has the constitutional right or not.

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): It is my intention to support the report of the committee that has examined into this bill. Perhaps that statement might be quite sufficient without any discussion whatsoever of that report; but as I am adverse to giving a silent vote on such an important matter as this bill is, I desire to give certain reasons why, in addition to others, I intend to take the course I have stated. What does this bill propose to do? It proposes possibly one of the most momentous movements which have ever taken place in the Dominion of Canada. It proposes to unite three great religious bodies, the Presbyterian church, the Methodist and the Congregational church. Each of these bodies has millions of adherents; each has traditions which many of those self-same adherents hold sacred, just as other religious bodies have traditions which they also hold sacred. Certain petitioning churches come forward and say that these three religious bodies shall be united together under the name of the United Church of Canada. I do not question for a single moment the good faith of those gentlemen, ministers of the gospel, or of those church members who desire a united church. I admire their sincerity, their ambition; I have not the slightest doubt that there are many good and valid reasons why unity should take place in religious matters as well as in any other.

But, on the other hand, we have been told, and told with great distinctness and clearness, that although these gentlemen come forward and promote this bill and desire to have a united church of those perhaps in the majority, there is a great minority who oppose this bill being put forward in the shape as originally drafted,—not in the shape as it is now before this committee. I think it is perfectly safe to say that that minority as existing in the various churches, principally in the Presbyterian church, is imbued with precisely the same spirit of religious tolerance, the desire to do the right thing and to preserve traditions, as imbues the other great majority who desire this bill to be passed into law subject to the amendment moved this afternoon by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). Surely the rights of these minorities must be considered. They are a large body; they have large property rights. And, coming as I do from the province of Quebec, I am urged, perhaps, as much if not a little more than others coming from other provinces are urged, as regards the protection of the rights of minorities.

I happen to be one of what are known in the province of Quebec as "separated brethren;"—in that province we do not admit that there is any such thing as a minority at all; we proceed in our ordinary way of life, in our relationships, in the prosecution of our daily affairs, with a feeling of certainty that whether we be French Canadians or English Canadians our respective rights will always be respected no matter what may happen. Perhaps, therefore, I am imbued a little more than others with a strong regard for minority rights, having been brought up from my earliest youth, inculcated and steeped, in the desire to see those rights in all cases protected. And, after all, what are we here for in this House of Commons? Are we here always to put forward the rights of majorities? Are we not here equally for the purpose of protecting the rights of minorities? Are we not here for the purpose of seeing to it that such rights, whatever they may be, good, bad or indifferent, shall be given a fair hearing and a fair reading in any bill which may be brought down before the House?

Mr. BIRD: Will the hon. member go a little more into the question as to what constitutes the minority in this case and as to what are the rights of that minority as he conceives them?

[Mr. Marler.]

Mr. MARLER: Yes. I am speaking of the minority interest in the bill as originally brought down. My hon. friend who interrupts me must bear in mind what I stated at the opening of my remarks, that I intend to support the report of the committee. In my opinion the report of the committee on the bill as now brought down in its amended form does to a certain extent at least help the minorities and does in some measure guard the rights of the minority interest. It is true that the bill as brought down does not guard all minorities, but it does guard what are known as congregational majorities; that is to say, under section 10 of the bill, any congregational majority before the bill becomes law may decide not to enter into the United church at all. But some say that all these churches should come in. My hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) spoke about the rights of the Congregational church, the rights of the Methodist church, and the rights of certain Presbyterians. I do not for a moment deny any of these rights; I do not deny the good faith of any of these bodies who come forward and state that the churches might do better going forward as a united body. But what I do say, and what I desire to impress on the House, is the importance of considering this question: Had the Presbyterian General Assembly the right to bind the Presbyterian church, as it did attempt to bind that church, and to come forward as one of the promoters of this measure? That alone is an exceedingly serious question; it is a point which I for one feel entirely incompetent to answer. It is a legal and constitutional question which has been debated by the very best counsel in the length and breadth of the country. Some say that the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada had the right to bind the church, and others declare that it had not. Can we in this House decide for ourselves which side is right and which is wrong? Can we, with our knowledge of law, state that those who hold that the General Assembly had the right to bind the Presbyterian church are correct in their view?—or, on the other hand, that those who hold the opposite opinion and declare that the General Assembly had not the right so to bind the church, are right? I do not think we can very well decide the question; the point is a legal one and involves many complications; and for us in this House to assume the great knowledge of constitutional law and of the technicalities of this question which it would be necessary to possess in order to decide the matter satisfactorily is a position which I for one do not propose to assume.

Now, what was done? Those who desired the amendments placed in the bill came forward and said, "We are not opposed to the United church; we are not opposed to having the bill go through. We desire to see unity in religion as in all other matters. But we do say that there are a great number of Presbyterians in Canada who are not of this opinion and that the Presbyterian General Assembly had not the right to bind the whole Presbyterian church. We therefore ask that these matters be submitted to the courts and by them decided". My hon. friend from Lisgar stated that he doubted very much whether the civil courts would make any other declaration than did the Presbyterian General Assembly. If that is the case, what do those who are in favour of the bill fear? Do they fear a slight delay? Is a matter of a few years going to make much difference in this great movement?—one of the greatest movements that have ever taken place in Canada. Is there any harm in waiting a short time until the constitutionality and the legality of the measure, and the right of the Presbyterian Assembly to bind the Presbyterian church, are decided on by authority in regard to whose competency there can be no doubt whatever? Is that an unreasonable attitude even for one who is not a member of any of these petitioning churches? Would it not be more unreasonable for me to say that these churches shall be amalgamated and shall go forward as a united body, while I myself know nothing about the constitutionality of the matter, whether the power rests in this parliament to pass the bill, or whether it is legally competent for the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church to act in such manner as it did? It seems to me there can be no question at all about the course which is wisest in the circumstances; there can be no question in the mind of any hon. member who, like myself, desires to view the matter in a purely impartial and fair spirit, that it would be very much better not to put a measure through a House constituted as this is, but rather to place the whole subject before the courts of highest authority and obtain their decision upon it. And that is all that is asked. That being done the act can come into effect, and then the whole question is settled without further turmoil or any necessity to resort to parliament.

There is another question which has borne upon my mind and which to me at least is of very great consequence. Indeed, it is of consequence to me inasmuch as I have been brought up in the province of Quebec to regard as sacred those dispositions made under wills or donations in favour of any religious sect or any religious institution. I do not say, of course, that they are never changed; I do not say that the legislature of the province of Quebec never makes any such changes. I do not say that in Quebec we are bound altogether by what has actually taken place under wills or under donations; but I think I can say without fear of contradiction from any member from the province of Quebec that our legislature hesitates to change any bequest made in a will or under a donation. If the amendments as brought down are not adopted, if the report of this committee does not carry, the result is to affect large donations made under deeds in the province of Quebec in a form surrounded with all possible solemnity, a form peculiar to the province of Quebec and in accordance with its laws. Donations of this kind have been made to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars—I might even say millions—under wills and in the form of such donations as I have described. I wish again to emphasize that this is one of the essential reasons why the report of this committee should be adopted; it guards at least in a measure against any casting aside of the wishes of those who are dead and gone, wishes specifically stated in writing. Surely we should respect those wishes to the fullest possible extent. Take, for example, a donation made by one of our most prominent citizens of the city of Montreal, the late Mr. David Morrice, with whose name is connected the David Morrice Hall and Library on McTavish street in that city. Under the solemn form peculiar to the province of Quebec he stated—I have here an extract from the donation—that he gave to the Presbyterian College of Montreal the David Morrice hall and library, valued at the time of the donation at certainly not less than $100,000. Under similar donations there have been given to the same hall and library by other prominent citizens of that city amounts which run into a total of about half a million dollars. Under what terms was this donation made? What did the donor wish to have carried out? He stated clearly that the donation was made to the Presbyterian College of Montreal for the particular purposes of that college. There was no ambiguity about it; there was no uncertainty as to what he intended. The Presbyterian College of Montreal was a body incorporated under the legislature existing under the old Act of Union of Canada. There was no doubt when this donation was made what the Presbyterian College of Montreal was intended to teach; no doubt as to what this donation was to be used for. The act is definite and express in its terms. I read from "The Public Statutes Relating to the Presbyterian Church in Canada," published in Toronto, Canada, 1879. The Act to incorporate the Presbyterian College was assented to on 18th March 1865, and it states:

> The Presbyterian College of Montreal shall continue to be a body corporate, with perpetual succession, and a common seal, and with the powers vested in corporate bodies by the Interpretation Act, and also with power, under the said corporate name, and without license in mortmain to hold and to purchase, acquire, have, take, and enjoy by gift, grant, conveyance, devise, bequest, or otherwise to them and their successors, any estate or property, real or personal, to and for the use of the said college, in trust for the promotion of theological learning and education of youth for the holy ministry, under the authority, and according to the principles and standards of the Canada Presbyterian church aforesaid.

That is stated in the preamble of the act. That is one of the reasons why the Presbyterian College of Montreal, was incorporated. The act goes on to say:

> It shall be lawful for the synod of the Canada Presbyterian church at its next ordinary meeting after the passing of this act to declare by resolution or a by-law to that effect and record in the register of proceedings of the said synod—

I will not read the whole section, but it goes on to deal with the rules and regulations under which this property shall be held. Later the synod did adopt rules and regulations relating to the Presbyterian College of Montreal. They also stated—I am reading from page 163 of the same publication:

> That the principles and doctrines to be taught in the Presbyterian College of Montreal by the professors and tutors, or other persons who shall from time to time, and at all times hereafter, be employed or appointed in giving instruction in the said college shall be such and such only as are consistent with and agreeable to the "Confession of Faith," the "Larger and Shorter Catechisms," and the "Form of Church Government," all of which are called "The Westminster Standards," and shall comprise all theological learning consistent with the said standards.

It is only fair to say that in the same section there is a provision which gives the right to deviate somewhat from those standards, but those deviations can only be taken in matters of direction, not in matters of doctrine. The act makes it abundantly clear that the teachings in the Presbyterian College of Montreal shall be in accordance with this act of incorporation, which teachings are distinctly laid down as based upon the Westminster Confession of Faith and the regulations of the synod.

Mr. HOEY: When was that donation made?

Mr. MARLER: On the 28th of November, 1882.

[Mr. Marler.]

Mr. HOEY: The hon. member is aware, I suppose, that that college is being used for the education of men who intend to enter the ministry of the three churches, for several years?

Mr. MARLER: The college is being used as all other theological colleges in Montreal are being used, namely, for the education of those who desire to enter the ministry in a number of churches. My hon. friend probably has in mind the fact that students of the Montreal Diocesan Theological College also attend that college and that Presbyterian students also attend the Montreal Diocesan Theological College. But on essential questions of doctrine these students are taught separately.

Mr. BIRD: When was the college originally founded?

Mr. MARLER: I do not know. I am not speaking about the foundation of the college.

Mr. BIRD: If the founding of the college dated back some considerable time before that donation was made, that would be important.

Mr. MARLER: I think my hon. friend has altogether missed the point. I was pointing out that under a donation made in 1882—and I am only citing it as an example—the late Mr. Morrice specifically gave the Presbyterian College of Montreal certain properties, valued roughly at $100,000, for the purposes of the act incorporating the Presbyterian college which I have just read.

Mr. BIRD: The statute to which my hon. friend referred dated back to 1865, did it not?

Mr. MARLER: Yes.

Mr. BIRD: And it laid down the trust to which this donation was made?

Mr. MARLER: That does not affect the situation.

Mr. BIRD: What effect had the union of 1874 and 1875 upon that trust?

Mr. MARLER: I would say, no effect whatsoever in any way. That was not a case of union of the Methodist and Presbyterian churches. There may have been a union of certain Presbyterian bodies, but the essential doctrine was not affected.

Mr. BIRD: Did that union of the three Presbyterian churches in 1874 and 1875 have no effect on the original trust?

Mr. MARLER: Exactly the same doctrines were taught.

Mr. McMASTER: They were all supposed to adhere to the Westminster Confession.

Mr. MARLER: They all adhered to substantially the same doctrine. I am not giving this in a spirit of hostility at all; I am simply stating points of fact which appear clearly on the face of these proceedings, namely, that donations were given for the propagation of certain articles of faith.

Mr. CRERAR: If I understood my hon. friend, a bequest was made to the college in question on condition that certain doctrines should be taught in that college. Am I correct in that?

Mr. MARLER: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: Adherence to the Westminster Confession of faith, for instance, was one of the conditions of the bequest? Am I correct in that?

Mr. MARLER: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: If that is so—

Mr. MARLER: May I interrupt my hon. friend so that there will be no misapprehension on this question? The actual donation in question does not state what doctrine shall be taught. It is given to the Presbyterian College of Montreal, a body incorporated under a particular act, which I have read. That particular act refers to what shall be taught at the Presbyterian College of Montreal. In other words, you have to read not only the donation but also the act of incorporation, as well as the regulations which the Senate of the Presbyterian Church in Canada brought down after the incorporation of the Presbyterian college itself.

Mr. CRERAR: Very well. I think it is generally admitted by all parties that the Presbyterian church has the right to change its basis of doctrine; that in that matter it is supreme. If that is true, and it should change its basis of doctrine, what would be the position of the bequest my hon. friend refers to?

Mr. MARLER: Has the Presbyterian church changed its basis of doctrine?

Mr. CRERAR: It has the right to do it, and supposing it did do it, what would be the position of the bequest?

Mr. MARLER: Has it the right to do it?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think that is denied.

Mr. MARLER: In what way has it the right to do it? I understand my hon. friend's question to be this: If the Presbyterian church did change its basis of doctrine, what would be the position of this donation? Now if the act was put through as originally framed, this donation would go in with the rest of the property, because the act distinctly cites the Presbyterian College of Montreal. Parliament can certainly do that. But the point I am making is this, that unless the power of the Presbyterian General Assembly to bind the Presbyterian church is certain and distinct —and the only way it can be made certain and distinct, as far as I can see, is by reference to the courts—the terms of this donation should not be altered. Once the courts decide that the Presbyterian General Assembly have the right to bind the whole Presbyterian church, it follows without the slightest doubt that this donation would then be merged in the United church. Have I answered my hon. friend to the fullest extent he desires?

Mr. CRERAR: Not very clearly.

Mr. MARLER: I am sorry I cannot convince my hon. friend, but there are other matters on which I cannot convince him, as he is very well aware.

That is the situation, Mr. Chairman, without any doubt as regards numerous donations, and I have only quoted one. I repeat again, I do not make any argument or cite this donation in any spirit of hostility, but merely for the purpose of definitely and absolutely citing facts which do exist, and which, it seems to me, would be fully covered by the amendments which are brought down in this amended bill.

There is one other point which I desire to urge. I think that under our parliamentary practice a report of a committee, is as a rule —not always—accepted by the House of Commons. There is a reason for that, and a very good reason. Committees are appointed for the purpose of hearing witnesses and going into all the facts of the case fully, and understanding the situation far more thoroughly than can possibly be done by members in this House assembled. I think that is admitted. Various authorities speak on that question in no uncertain terms. I have here The Government of England by A. Lawrence Lowell, a man of very great note, a professor of the Science of Government in Harvard university. At page 265 of volume 1 of this book this point is brought out very clearly. The author clearly states that the actual reason in parliamentary government for committees, great and small, is for the purpose of sifting the facts, for the purpose of understanding the situation, for the purpose of bringing forward into the House itself a measure which has been thoroughly digested, so that the House would only have to decide on the main issues. That idea is also borne out by many other authorities. Therefore I repeat, that for us to attempt amendments in a bill of this description means that we would be making amendments the full effect of which it would be utterly impossible for us to understand, amendments which would be of a most far-reaching character, amendments which possibly do not harmonize with other parts of the bill, amendments which without hearing witnesses and counsel it is impossible for us fully and properly to digest and understand. For those reasons it seems to me that we should be prepared to accept the report of this committee. As far as I am concerned, for the reasons which I have given, I intend to vote for the adoption of the report as now brought down.

Mr. R. J. WOODS (Dufferin): Mr. Chairman, I think we are discussing one of the most important measures that have come before parliament, at least, in my parliamentary experience. I was surprised at some of the arguments the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) brought forward in his address against the amendment that has been proposed by those advocating union. The necessity for a united front has been insisted upon. It has been argued that there should be absolute unanimity before such changes as are contemplated here are carried into effect. Let me point out that such a demand is not customary—is quite unusual—in connection with the proceedings of any organization. We believe in majority rule in this country; it is the principle which obtains in connection with the management of every organization whether of a religious, a social or a political character. Majority rule is the rule which prevails and absolute unanimity is rarely demanded. So far as the present bill is concerned it has not been opposed by the Methodist church, the Congregational church, or the United committee. Hence we must assume that the measure is satisfactory to the various churches interested. The movement for unity has involved considerable time, anxiety, labour and expense. The changes embodied in the bill are the fruition of strenuous efforts and of the deliberations of the best minds in the several churches identified with the movement. These churches now come to parliament and ask to be incorporated in the United church. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) sought to argue that the United church was taking something away from the Presbyterian community and that there was practically no recognition of the rights of those who dissent to union. My reading of the bill convinces me that ample provision is made for the protection of rights of minorities. Dissenting churches need not enter union if they do not so desire, and six months is granted to them before the bill comes into operation in which to determine whether they shall go into union or remain out. If they do not enter union they will receive their proper share of the church assets. The opponents of the bill are asking that the measure shall not come into effect until an opinion has been obtained from the courts as to its constitutionality. That demand comes from a small minority only. The wish of the majority is that the legislation asked for should be enacted. The United church is asking for incorporation by parliament. That is no new thing. The Methodist church came to parliament for incorporation in 1884. The Presbyterians came for a similar purpose. The Orange society and other bodies came to parliament for incorporation. All the United church is asking for is the right to transact its own business through its own organization. Parliament is not asked to decide any questions of doctrine, or church polity or church government. All the United church asks for is the right to legally transact its own business, and it seems to me we have no right to tell it to go to the courts for a decision. In my opinion parliament would be acting wisely to say to the supporters of this bill, "We will give you the right, as a United church, to carry on your own affairs and transact your own business." To adopt any other course would be virtually dictating to the United church what its course should be.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): The opponents of this bill are making a direct challenge to the right of a Christian church, a religious organization, to exercise its corporate authority in matters of doctrine or church government. The many objections which those who represent the opponents of the bill in this House have presented are just so many variations of that basic position. Whether they talk of the rights of minorities or of breaking trusts or of the significance of votes, or in whatever other manner they chose to express their grievances, it all comes back to this primary proposition: That an organized, religious body has not the right in these respects to exercise its corporate function. That is a very serious proposition, and goes right to the very structure of voluntary churches as we have conceived of them up to the present time. As individual members of this House, we may with perfect legitimacy hold our own views as to the justice or historical truth of the various internal arrangements that are adopted by different churches in this country. It is within the rights of every one of us to hold our personal views as to the character of the principles on which the various churches have constituted themselves; but in our collective capacity to assume the role of an ecclesiastical court of appeal and to sit in judgment upon these matters is a very different thing in my conception, Mr. Chairman. If this parliament is going to take unto itself that function, I say it strikes at the very foundation of church economy. It strikes at the very principle of cohesion that binds the voluntary church together, and in so doing, if, whether mistakenly or otherwise, it presumes to do that, I believe that, without intending it, it will open up a vista of ecclesiastical recrimination which every Canadian honestly shrinks from. As to this right of the churches irrespective of the principle of their constitution—I do not care what the principle of that constitution may be,—as it happens we are dealing now with a church which is based upon the Presbyterian system,—it is a serious thing for that church to admit for one moment that any exterior authority can step in and dictate to it as to the wisdom, as to the justice, or as to the truth of that principle.

Mr. McMASTER: Does the hon. member go so far as to state a legislature would not have the right to restrain a church that was endeavouring to treat a minority with real injustice? I am asking the abstract question. I am not saying whether the bill is just or not. I want to know if the hon. member carries that proposition as far as he appears to carry it.

Mr. BIRD: I will go so far as to say that this House of Commons might very well be left until such a situation arises, and I think if it did arise at any time it would be settled in the wisest possible manner. But we are dealing at the present time with a totally different situation, a situation which I have taken for granted is straightforward, in which one of the prominent churches of this country, united with others, has petitioned this House, in accordance with the constitutional principles that govern that church, for a certain measure that commends itself by an overwhelming majority to the minds of this country. I was proceeding to say that it is a very serious thing for any church to admit for a moment the right of any exterior authority to trespass upon this sacred ground, and I will go so far as to say that this right, which has been a very contentious one throughout the centuries, is no mere right to follow the prescribed routine of any written constitution. It is the right of the church to adapt itself to its environment in time and in place, and there is not a church on this continent which at bottom does not claim that right to the very last letter. How else could a church exist if that right were taken from it? It could not exist. The law of organization is the same as the law of natural organisms. They can only live in the truest sense by adapting themselves to the circumstances in which they find themselves. If the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) could succeed in his attempt to bind the Presbyterian Church in Canada to the standards that were proved to be good and necessary in the seventeenth century in the Kingdom of Scotland, he would forever condemn that church to inaction, and in my judgment if we are to follow his advice, we may as well at once assign the Presbyterian Church in Canada a place alongside those huge fossils which adorn our National Museum at the foot of this street. Those relics of the prehistoric times ceased to exist and became fossils because nature deprived them of their right to change their constitutions, and that is what the hon. gentleman would do with respect to the Presbyterian church in Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: He is an Anglican anyway.

Mr. BIRD: You can confer upon him all the honours you choose. There is one surprising thing which I find on inquiry, namely, that many hon. gentlemen who are leading in this matter of church union shrink from carrying out the logic of their position with regard to themselves personally. They would bind the church to antiquity, but they themselves would move abreast of the times. They dance along to the lively measures of German criticism, and all the most up-to-date views that can be expressed in the theological realm. Yet, at the same time they would bind their lowlier brethren down to the more staid, but not less worthy, music of the simple oaten pipes of John Knox away back in the seventeenth century. I do not understand the position of these gentlemen, leaders in this movement against union, these men who would bind burdens grievous to be borne upon their fellow Christians and who yet refuse to touch those burdens with their little finger. I cannot conceive where the integrity of conviction comes in. It reminds me of the position of those Roman patricians who sacrificed to the ancient deities to meet the opinions of the common herd, but who in private conversation poured contempt upon those things. I do not think that any of those gentlemen are prepared to carry out the logic of their situation to its final issue. We admire the seventeenth century. There is no century in the annals of Anglo-Saxon history which is more admirable. There is something about its atmosphere which is always beautiful to contemplate. But we cannot go back to the Scotland of that time. Providence has placed us in Canada in the twentieth century, a totally different century and a totally different place, with its own problems and its own necessities. Providence has laid it upon us as living, active people to meet those problems as best we know how.

If I may, perhaps, take the discussion into rather a different realm, in dealing with a question of this kind, I should like to deal with those interior and intangible forces which have gradually produced the movement which to-day is held in question. I do not for one moment hold light the fundamental motives of those who are opposing us on this question. Undoubtedly, they are sincere; but those who undertake to oppose a movement in the direction of religious reunion are in a very difficult situation as compared with those who are putting their energies behind a movement such as that. Surely the stars in their courses are arrayed on the side of those who are bent on overcoming the non-essential differences that exist between religious peoples in this country and in any other country in the world.

In the preamble of the bill, in very solemn and earnest language, it is stated that this petition is the outcome of a profound sense of religious obligation directed by what they term as the expressed will of the Almighty Himself. A statement of that kind is very difficult to gainsay. Ever since Apostolic times, Christians in all countries and all ages have refused to part with the aspiration of ultimate Christian reunion. That has obtained through the centuries. It has been opposed only by little, exclusive, insular, out-of-the-way sects at any time or in any age. There is no church in the history of Christendom that has not, throughout its history, maintained that bright dream before its mind. How otherwise could it be when you understand the fundamental character of our common faith? This movement is based on a universal conviction in the hearts of religious people of all denominations, of all sects, of all countries. Not only is there the force of an overwhelming conviction behind this movement, but there is the impetus of a historical movement that is world-wide in its scope and irresistible in its career. Ever since in Great Britain a hundred years ago the final seal was laid upon religious liberty—and I would take your minds back to that period and the period of conflict that preceded the final triumph of religious liberty—the course of Christian reunion has gone on unhindered. In Great Britain itself the movement has not been so speedy as has been the case with other movements in that country, but union proceeded slowly and, maybe, fitfully until the Great War itself came on and gave a new impetus to it. Christian union since the Great War has been one of the most vital issues in British public life. In Canada ever since the time I referred to, this movement towards Christian reunion has gone on steadily and with gathering volume.

If you take the family tree of any one of those united churches, you will be amazed to see of what it is the product, of all the different converging lines of ecclesiastical traditions that come together in each of those churches. Those ecclesiastical genealogies themselves are proof to any reasonable mind that this movement with which we are dealing this afternoon is one that has its roots away back historically, and that it has gained upon the convictions of Christain people a hold which cannot be wrenched away. This movement has not only an unconquerable conviction behind it—and I would remind the committee that is a very important statement of mine, but it is true—but the impetus of an historical movement that is written plain right over the history of the British people.

More than that, I believe it appeals to the common sense of the Canadian people. They tell us that when we adduce instances of previous unions, which to me are in no sense different from this union, they were unions of similar churches, of churches with similar doctrines, similar polity and so on. Let that be granted. Then we appeal to the common sense of the Canadian people and say: What is this union but the union of churches with similar doctrines and similar polity? I should like the committee to apply whatever fair test they would wish to apply to the situation. I would ask the hon. member for Lunenburg on Sunday to go to a Presbyterian church in the morning and a Methodist church in the evening. Let him go in the morning to Knox Presbyterian church, where the pastor is a prominent anti-unionist, and in the evening to the Dominion Methodist church where the pastor is a prominent unionist, and let him come back and tell us wherein the difference lies.

Mr. DUFF: I do not need to go to either of these churches, but if I were a young married man with three children I should like them to go to a Sunday school and I should want to know whether, if this union bill is passed, the Shorter Catechism would be taught in any Union Sunday school.

Mr. McMASTER: It is not taught in many of the Presbyterian Sunday schools now.

Mr. BIRD: I was interrupted while the hon. member (Mr. Duff) was putting his question. He did not accept my suggestion, and I suppose the reason therefor was the gist of his remarks.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member said that if I went to Knox Presbyterian church in the morning and to the Dominion Methodist church in the evening I should not know the difference in polity or doctrine between the two. I said that if I were a young married man with three or four children I would want to have them attend a Union Sunday school; and the question I asked was whether if this bill were passed the Shorter Catechism would be taught in that Sunday school.

Mr. BIRD: The question reminds me of the story of the little child who begged its mother for an egg. The mother beat the egg and put it in a pudding and when dinner time came the little girl cried and asked her mother where the egg was.

Mr. DUFF: That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. BIRD: We will change the figure; perhaps the test is too hard on the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. DUFF: You cannot answer my question.

Mr. BIRD: Let me put it another way. What is the difference between the doctrine of a Methodist minister who is taught in a Presbyterian college and that of a Presbyterian minister who is taught in a Methodist college?

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend being a Methodist does not know what the Presbyterian colleges teach. But before I answer his question will he answer mine? He deliberately put a question to me with regard to the respective churches. Will he be good enough to say whether the Shorter Catechism will be taught in the Sunday schools of the United church?

Mr. BIRD: No, and it is not taught now. The children of Presbyterians and Methodists are taught with the same literature issued by the same printing press at the present time.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BIRD: When the committee rose before dinner I was proceeding to show that the attitude taken by the opponents of this bill was a very serious one, having regard to the right of any voluntary religious organization to exercise its corporate authority. I went on to say that the movement which had given rise to the bill sprang from motives deep in conviction and almost universal amongst religious people in this age and was the outcome of an historical movement dating back quite one hundred years, if one considers only the modern phase of it. It is a movement which commends itself, as I was pointing out, to the common sense of the Canadian people, because there is practically no difference between the churches united; in every important sense they are already one. At that point I was interrupted by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) and I was doing my best to convert him from the error of his ways. I will admit that the effort was somewhat discouraging.

Mr. DUFF: Did you unscramble that egg yet?

Mr. BIRD: I was proceeding to enlighten the hon. gentleman in regard to the doctrinal similarity of these uniting churches. I will turn for a moment from the position taken by the hon. gentleman and give some attention to the views expressed by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). That hon. gentleman referred to the traditional attitude taken in the province of Quebec towards the rights of minorities. I thought at the time he was making that reference that he was departing somewhat from his usual candour in argument, because the sacredness of the rights of minorities is not at the moment concerned. If the rights of minorities were concerned in this issue a good many of us would be as strongly on the side of the minority as the hon. gentleman himself, because the sacredness of the rights of minorities has been stamped on every fibre of the being of us who have inherited the traditions of the free churches of Great Britain. There is no need to appeal to that sentiment in our nature, because it is indelibly placed there. In times gone by our forbears stood shoulder to shoulder with the forbears of the people of Quebec on this question. So that is not the issue at stake. It is not the rights of minorities that is at issue, but the position of a faction within an ordered community. If the hon. gentleman in the name of the sacred rights of minorities is going to exalt faction above church order, then that is where we take issue with him, and that is where I believe his friends in Quebec will take issue with him. That is simply by way of disentangling the issue.

I wish now to proceed along the lines I had been pursuing, and to say a word or two with regard to the national aspect of this question, because a question which involves such a large proportion of the Canadian people does assume a national aspect. It seems to me that the welfare of our country as a whole is involved in this very matter. I should be making a trite remark if I said that Canada was a difficult country to govern; the statement has been made so often as to become commonplace. But the fact remains that whether you consider Canada geographically or economically, to govern it is the despair, I am sure, of all earnest minded statesmen. Now in this proposition to unite the great Protestant churches of this country we have something that may very well make every patriotic Canadian think. In a country like this I think it is very well indeed that we should lay emphasis upon those invisible bonds which bind us together in spite of distance, in spite of physical obstacle, in spite of sectional points of view, nay, in spite sometimes of economic differences. I think we Canadian people, we members of parliament, ought to lay stress upon these invisible bonds of citizenship which bind people together in spite of sectional differences and divergent points of view. In this proposition to unite the great Methodist church of this country with the great Presbyterian church, including the Congregational churches, you are creating something that is going to weld this country together from coast to coast. Every connectional officer that travels from ocean to ocean will be a living symbol of the unity of Canada, and the message he will take from one end of Canada to the other will be a message of unity.

I would go a little further, Mr. Chairman, and mention a subject which I believe that every Canadian, whatever his religious affiliation is, has begun to take very seriously indeed. I refer to the flowing tide of materialism that is swamping this country, in common with other countries, from one coast to the other. We may not look at this thing in the same light, and it is not necessary that we should. Sometimes when on the floor of this House we are dealing with moral questions there is a manifest difference of view between, say, myself and my hon. friends over here; but no matter what the point of view is, the thing viewed is the same, and it is a very serious consideration. I have heard sometimes my hon. friends from Quebec, who are of another faith from that of my own, speak very seriously about certain aspects of the moral life of this country, and I have never listened to them except with the greatest of respect, although I may differ from them; and they, in their turn, have listened to me expressing my view as to the moral life of this country, and though they may not have agreed with me in my views, they with me are agreed that the moral life of this country, in common with the moral life of every civilized country, is showing certain marked tendencies which may well cause serious consideration in the minds of all serious-minded citizens. Now what I want to say, Mr. Chairman, is this: Right throughout the length and breadth of this country I want to see a united Protestant church working alongside a united Catholic church, each working within its own sphere, and their spheres are well defined, each working according to its own traditional conception of the problems involved, to maintain as far as they can, and it needs all the effort of both together, in the soul of the Canadian people that reverence for moral sanctions without which no nation can ever prosper. Do not let us bring this subject down to a level where it becomes confused in ancient and petty rivalries. That would be a big mistake.

This is a subject, Mr. Chairman, which while it concerns every patriotic Canadian, concerns primarily I suppose the churches concerned, and it is to be hoped that we as a House will have the greatest possible respect for the expressed will of those great churches, because they have acted in the best interests of those churches; they have acted for their own good. I know it has been hinted, but I think not worthily, that this movement has taken its origin in some overweening ambition on the part of the churches concerned, but I think nothing could be more absurd if you look at the thing fairly. How can this movement which has begun in the spirit of tolerance bear the fruits of intolerance? I think the very opposite will be true. To whom should we, as a parliament, go to ask what is in the interests of the churches concerned? To whom shall we go to settle this question? I have the greatest possible respect for those who are opposed to this bill, but I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, to whom I would go to ask an opinion as to what is for the good of the Presbyterian church and for the good of the Methodist church in Canada. I would first of all go to the missionaries of those churches who are holding the outposts of Christendom in China and in India, those men who, if any men do at this day, represent the original spirit that created Christianity, those men who, at sacrifice to themselves, are holding fast and firm the principles of Christianity on the outposts of civilization. When you think of names like St. Francis Xavier, Father Damien, Livingstone, Moffat, and Carey, you are recalling men whose names will remain firm in the annals of the race long after the names of our warriors and statesmen have faded away. Those are the men of whom the House ought to be proud, and I would ask the opinion of the living descendants of these men. They have been asked, and what have they said? With almost unanimous voices they have voted in favour of church union. How could they do otherwise? Then I would go to the thousands of ministers who are working in the rural parishes of this country, that great body of Presbyterian and Methodist ministers who are working in the rural fields of this country. They have a right to be asked, because they are bearing the burden and heat of the day, these men who with their families have given their lives to this cause. I know that a good many of our city ministers have generously given their support to this movement, and they are to be honoured for it. But what is the reason? It is because they have been through the mill themselves. They know what it is to work out on some rural charge and to bear the heartache and humiliation of trying to carry on their work in competition with their brother ministers when there was no necessity for that competition—men with the same message, with the same methods, on the same ground, compelled by our denominationalism to carry on their work under those conditions. It is a serious matter, Mr. Chairman.

In this Canada of ours it is becoming more and more difficult to get the young men coming out of our universities to enter the ministry, because they believe our divisions and narrow denominationalism has rendered this sacred calling less than a man's job. Now this bill which is before us proposes to do away with that obstacle, and to make a thousand parishes, nay, two and three thousand parishes in Canada, a field whereto we can invite our young men to give their life's work. And then I would speak also of the great body of laymen who have to foot the bill. We sometimes talk about the unsupportableness of taxes. But people outside the churches know very little about the impost that is laid upon the average church member in trying to carry on work which after all is national work. And I think the laymen of our churches—who are sometimes paying two, three and sometimes four times the amount which they could reasonably be expected to do in order to carry on the work of the congregation—I think those men have a right to be consulted. They have been consulted, and their answer has been overwhelmingly in favour of church union.

I want to say in conclusion that this movement not only commends itself to us from a national point of view, not only from that deference which is due to sister Christian churches endeavouring to carry on a work under very onerous conditions, but also from a strictly legal point of view. The legal side has been almost exclusively discussed this afternoon. I did not enter into it at the beginning, because I thought possibly I might deal with the question from another angle; but I wish to say in conclusion that this bill as introduced is in perfect harmony with the law, as the law is understood by the average lay mind, and contains the most generous provision for minorities. The counsel for the opponents of the bill based his argument, his legal argument, almost exclusively on the Scottish church case. He said in his speech that the principle underlying the Scottish church case was that no general assembly, no matter how unanimous the vote, has the power to destroy the church it was commissioned to preserve. I want to say very respectfully that the learned gentleman when he made that statement was simply filling up a gap in his argument by his forensic imaginings, because there was no such principle embodied in the judgment given. The judgment as laid down by the law lords contained two very clear principles which I ask this House to apply to this case. The first principle was identity of doctrine. The second was that there should be power to change doctrine. They laid upon themselves the onus of proving both and to the satisfaction of themselves, with certain dissentients, they decided that there was no identity of doctrine —that is, in this specific case there was no identity of doctrine—and there was no power to change doctrine. Those are the two principles upon which that case was decided.

Now, I do not need to appeal to anyone in particular because it seems to be so plain: Here are these two principles. Let us apply them to the Presbyterian Church in Canada, and let me remark that the Presbyterian Church in Canada is not the Presbyterian Church in Scotland. But let us apply these two principles. First as to identity of doctrine. Well, I have already dealt with that and I did not convert the hon. member for Lunenburg, but I think I showed to the ordinary common sense way of thinking that there is absolutely no difference between the doctrine of the Presbyterian Church in Canada and the doctrine of the Methodist Church in Canada—absolutely no difference. They teach the children out of the same text books in the Sunday schools; the missionaries divide the work between them, signifying that no longer have they the consciousness of any special message to deliver; and they use also each others parsonages, and no doubt they borrow each other's money. Now, leaving all technicalities aside, I do not think that any man can stand up here and say that the doctrine, the working doctrine, of these churches is in any way different; they are absolutely identical.

But then, what about the power to change doctrine? Well, with regard to the Presbyterian Church in Canada I might, perhaps, endeavour to enlighten the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler)) if he were here; but he is not here. If he were here I might tell him that the Presbyterian Church in Canada, whatever was the position of the uniting churches in Scotland, has the right to change its doctrine. That right is set forth in a very clear legal decision that was given in the Dobbie case. That right is couched in unmistakable terms in the rules and usages of the church; that right has been exercised in two specific instances; and what is more, that right is stamped indelibly upon the consciousness of the Presbyterian church in this country. Well, if that is the case, if we have identity in doctrine, if we have power to change doctrine, why should this parliament confront the Presbyterian church with the technicalities it is trying to get away from?

With respect to this amendment I could have understood the member for Lunenburg, and others, if they had attempted to get a vote against the petition. If they had come straight out against the petitioners in the first place and said "This bill must not go through this House" I could have understood it. But they bring in this amendment, and they have very cunningly laid a snare before the members of this House. What they despaired of doing in the open light of public discussion they thought they could do at a subsequent date in the twilight of legal disputation. They remind me of a carnivorous wasp which never kills its prey outright but just sticks in its probe at the right place and waits for another day to finish the job. I cannot understand an attempt of that kind to mislead this House, for after all the intention and the motive behind the amendment is to defeat the bill and that is all there is to it. If this parliament yields to the amendment it will be shirking a duty, a clear duty, which belongs to it; a duty which the British parliament just two or three years ago accepted in the Scottish church bill. The very thing these petitioners are asking us to do this evening is the thing which the Scottish church asked the British House of Commons to do three years ago, and the British House of Commons did it without demur. They did it in deference to the expressed will of a great Scottish church; and if the thing that is expedient and right for the British parliament to do is wrong and inexpedient for us to do, then I fail to understand the situation at all.

And then, Mr. Chairman, finally, if this parliament accedes to the movers of this amendment they will be, as I have already indicated, taking away from the church the responsibility that rests within the church, that has always rested within the church, and which no church in Canada would consciously allow to pass out of its hands. They are taking this matter which concerns doctrine and policy, the most sacred right of all Christian bodies, and wresting it out of the sacred realm to which it belongs, and they are hurling it ruthlessly and thoughtlessly into the maelstrom of political controversy. I appeal to the House with the very highest of motives not to accede to the individuals who have been pressing this matter upon us for some weeks, but to accede to those who have sent them here, and to accede in particular to the great Presbyterian church as that church has expressed itself through its historic General Assembly, and has expressed itself so decisively and so finally only about a week ago.

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (St. John City): We have heard this afternoon a quotation from Bourinot which states that it is very rarely that the committee of the whole interferes with a bill as reported by a select committee. Now in this case the select committee has heard a great deal of evidence and has given much consideration to the matter; so much so that one of the points on which all members of the select committee will agree, is that the matter has been thoroughly presented to them, in so far as was possible under the circumstances. Now then, if it be the procedure with few exceptions that the committee of the whole should accept the report of the select committee, and in view of the great amount of evidence which has been presented to the select committee, I think the committee of the whole will exercise the greatest caution before accepting the amendment which has been placed before us this afternoon. The amendment which was placed in the bill by the select committee is a safeguard. It is eminently fair to all parties. It ensures, I believe beyond doubt, the fairest decision that can be obtained in a matter of this kind, and therefore I would submit that there is much reason to accept the bill as amended and presented to the committee, and not to depart from it.

There are several subjects which I will refer to before dealing with the amendments as such, because there are several incorrectly stated propositions and certain misunderstandings in the matter. First of all, a word on the subject of union. All anti-unionists are favourable to union. I have said that and I repeat it. They are favourable to union, and not only so but it is their duty to favour union in so far as possible. That being the case, all Methodists, all Congregationalists, and such Presbyterians as so desire, are free tomorrow to enter into the union. And under what circumstances will they obtain more Presbyterians because it is evident that Presbyterians will remain out of the union and that the Presbyterian church will continue. I say it is some obsession on the word "union" in the case that prevents a settlement on the point. As I say, we are favourable to union, but we are not favourable to union beyond the rights of those who are petitioning, nor are we favourable to the proposal to interfere with the rights of those who are opposed to it. We are not favouring union at the expense of taking away a church which we consider belongs to those who wish to retain it. We are not favourable to a union compelling a large number of people to go into a church who are not willing to do so. It is one of the great principles that comes to us, one of the great heritages, that we have not only civil but religious liberty. It is no use saying "This is a great idea, therefore go to it." It must be dependent on the circumstances, and must be dependent on people's own desires. Each one must judge for himself. It is a common saying that union is a good thing; the bill is for union; vote for it. That is altogether subject to various conditions. Are the petitioning churches entitled to it, or have they authority to ask for it Have they authority to do away with their own church? Is it right to put into that church people who are not prepared to go there? Those are important questions. If there is something that is more important than union, it is the principle of religious freedom.

The next point I desire to refer to is the question of majorities, and there is a good deal of misunderstanding on that subject. First, let me say that the General Assembly does not represent the sentiment of the people, and I will try to demonstrate that in a moment or two. The General Assembly does not represent the sentiment of the people, nor do the votes of the General Assembly authorize the General Assembly to enter into union. And all I am saying, or nearly all I propose to say, is from the Presbyterian standpoint, because that is the section that is entering the protest. The union movement in the Presbyterian church was what? It was clerical and official; it never arose from the people. The explanation of the twenty years taken with the proceedings is the best evidence that it never received the support of the people as a whole. As I say, it was official and clerical. Therefore that influence has naturally had a great restraining influence on the people, and in the process of time, when they saw especially the nature of the bill that is before us now, they broke through the influence and control of the clergy. It is not now possible to say which is the majority.

The General Assembly does not represent the sentiment of the people, because it is not in any sense representative in numbers. A congregation, no matter how small, if it has only a score or two score members, has its minister and elder in presbytery and a congregation of two thousand has its minister and elder in presbytery. Now, two thousand members in one part of the church may thus have only two representatives in the presbytery, and two thousand people in other places may have two hundred representatives in the presbytery, and those representatives in the presbytery have their corresponding places in the assembly. Then, again, the members of the assembly do not represent the people in any issue such as church union because the members of the assembly are not elected by the people on any such issue, or any issue contemplating the blotting out of the church, but for its upbuilding and continuance. Members of the assembly, both ministers and elders, are chosen from the presbytery and not from the people.

I wish to place before the committee some recent examples showing how far the commissioners have differed from their congregations. A few of them were given by the member for Lunenburg this afternoon. I would like to add to them. I am quoting from the last vote taken in 1915, and when I am mentioning this it reminds me that one of the members to my left said that there was no procedure for taking a plebiscite in the Presbyterian church. If that be true, it certainly is not laid down in the Blue Book. The fact is they have taken two plebiscites. They took one in 1911 and one in 1915, nine years ago, and if they took two plebiscites, it seems to me it would have been rather an easy matter for them to have taken a third, to have ascertained positively how the church stands at the present day. Let me give the committee the votes of 1915, because those are the last that can be obtained as the official vote:

			Commissioners at General Assembly Owen Sound
Presbytery	For union	Against union	For union	Against union
Pictou..	1,790	3,345	11	3
St. John..	1,513	1,779	7	0
Montreal..	4,085	4,174	22	4
Toronto..	7,434	7,780	28	5

There are other figures such as those for the presbytery of Peterborough, but I have not them here. Here is an analysis of the vote in Ontario at the General Assembly of this year:

	Number
The following ministers voted for union in the assembly, the churches having recently recorded themselves as against union..	11
The following ministers also voted for union representing no Canadian congregations.. ..	17

Partly retired ministers, partly professors and so forth. The elders' vote could not be determined accurately without personal knowledge of the churches represented by those elders, but the number of those who voted for union from anti-union congregations was six. These figures, I think, demonstrate to a very very large extent what a small relationship there is between the majority in the General Assembly and the sentiment amongst the general people of the country. I shall not give you the plebiscites, because they have already been given, but I wish to remind the committee that in the second vote of 1915, there was an increased vote over the previous one of over 23,000 opposed to union. What was the increase in the number of those in favour of union? Six hundred.

During the last year or two, ever since this bill or the nature of this bill has been known to the people, congregation after congregation has had informal votes and has shown a majority against union where the votes were formerly in favour of union. Such is a certain indication of how the people stand in the "Kirk" at the present day.

Let me say a word about the union of 1875 which has been frequently quoted as a justification for the proposed union of to-day. The union of 1875 was a union of four Presbyterian churches, not different denominations, not different churches. When I say that it was a union, that is not quite an accurate term. It was a reunion. Those churches had formerly been one and they came together again. That is one difference and a very vital substantial difference it is. But there are others. Those Presbyterian churches were not incorporated. The Presbyterian church of to-day is not incorporated. There is no need of its being incorporated. Another difference is that when that union took place, the congregations that decided to go in went in, and those that decided to remain out—and they were not many—remained out. What became of those congregations that remained out? Were they cast adrift as isolated congregations without their church? Not at all. They remained in their mother church. In Pictou, especially, where they decided not to go in, there was formed for the two presbyteries a synod in which the church continued in connection with the mother church, the Church of Scotland. There was no taking away of their church from those people, and one of the great difficulties and hardships at the present day is the threat of their church being taken away from the people.

I am altogether of opinion that this committee has had the great advantage of acquiring a wonderful amount of useful ecclesiastical knowledge this afternoon. As regards the Free Church Act of 1905, the Free Church of Scotland and the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland proposed to unite. They did unite, but a certain portion of the Free church protested. The case was tried in the courts, and finally in the Privy Council it was decided that the Free church could not unite with the United Presbyterian church and take its property with it into the union. What was the size of the minority? Twenty-six or twenty-seven ministers and their respective congregations. There is no comparison between that situation and the present situation in Canada. In Canada there are hundreds of congregations that are not prepared to go into the union now. Those that stayed out of the union in Scotland were called from their small numbers, the "Wee Frees." It was held by the Privy Council that the Free Church of Scotland could not unite. Why? Because their doctrines were not identical. My hon. friend on my left (Mr. Bird) put the matter in this way, that it had said that there was no identity of doctrine. I presume he did not mean that. There are no Christian churches in regard to which you can say that. What he meant, I presume, was that their doctrines were not identical, and that is a very different thing. Their doctrines were not identical, but they were very similar. They were both Presbyterian churches and yet there was sufficient difference to warrant the Privy Council in holding that union could not take place. That law still holds good; it has never been changed, although one would think, to hear the discussion which took place in the committee and the debate which has taken place in the House to-day, that the law had been proved to be faulty and that in consequence parliament had to step in. That is not the case. What happened was this: All the trusts and the church property could not be carried on by 26 ministers and their congregations and there was such an enormous amount of trust funds that could not function that parliament necessarily had to take notice. Parliament therefore appointed a commissioner, and I may read to the committee the following paragraph in the preamble to the act making the appointment:

Whereas a royal commission appointed to inquire into the matter have reported that the Free church are unable adequately—

Note, they are unable "adequately"— —to carry out all the trusts of the property and that it is desirable to provide for an allocation thereof, provision being made for the equipment of the Free church, and whereas it is expedient to make provision for such allocation by means of the appointment of a commissioner.

That is a different thing altogether; there were so few to carry on the affairs of the church that they failed in their trust and parliament had to step in and make allocation so that the properties might not go to waste but should be usefully employed. But the law still stands with regard to these churches, that on the question of their doctrines they could not unite. Let me come to the Church of Scotland Act of 1921. Personally I do not think that it is very material to the present discussion, but those who are in favour of union have seized almost frantically on that act to help them in their case. My opinion is that it will not. I listened to my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) this afternoon when he said that he would like to put something on Hansard; and he did. But I thought that there were some very important things which he might have put on Hansard and which he did not submit. I therefore want to supplement his statements on that point. The Church of Scotland at the present time seeks union with the church I have been speaking of, the United Free Church; but the Church of Scotland is an established body, a national church, in that respect the same as the Church of England. So that naturally it requires authority to unite with another church. Parliament therefore has passed an act in a schedule to which appear what are called declaratory articles—articles declaring the constitution of the church in matters spiritual. What does article No. 2 say in full?

The principal subordinate standard of the Church of Scotland is the Westminster confession of faith—

Is that in the proposed union?

—approved by the General Assembly of 1647, containing—

Mark this.

—the sum and substance of the faith of the Reformed church. Its government is Presbyterian and is exercised through kirk-sessions, presbyteries, provincial synods and General Assemblies. Its system and principles of worship, orders and discipline are in accordance with "The directory for the public worship of God," "The form of Presbyterial church Government," and "The form of Process," as these have been or may hereafter be interpreted or modified by acts of the General Assembly or consuetude.

This is an article setting forth that the principal subordinate standard of the Church of Scotland, containing the sum and substance of the faith of that church, is the Westminster Confession of Faith, and the act enables the church to join or form a junction with another Presbyterian church. Now let me read the remainder of the fifth article:

But always in agreement with the word of God and the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith contained in the said confession, of which agreement the church shall be the sole judge, and with due regard to liberty of opinion in points which do not enter into the substance of the faith.

I think it is pretty clear, if I may venture an ecclesiastical opinion, that, in these declaratory articles, are laid down the doctrine of faith of the Church of Scotland and its principal and subordinate standard, the Westminster Confession of Faith, and that any changes that take place in the church must conform to the faith as set forth therein.

There are two great objections to the bill, but before I consider them I want to supplement the views I advanced a moment ago. I have a note on the subject and it might be just as well if I gave it to the committee. The British act of 1921 did not give the Church of Scotland the power to abandon its Presbyterian standards; any changes in doctrine which it authorized had to be in harmony with the fundamental doctrines of the church as laid down at the Scottish Reformation, and as indicated in article 5. It would never have authorized such changes as appeared in the basis of union. The fact that legislation was necessary for the Church of Scotland indicates that without such legislation the Church of Scotland had no power to institute any change. The Presbyterian Church in Canada never obtained any such power from any parliament, but the church courts assumed to have that authority and, what is more, exercised it without any prior legislative sanction. The promoters of the bill before the Private Bills committee asserted and attempted to sustain the position that all that had been done by the church courts had been legally done and within the competence of such courts. Any action of the church courts in Canada was taken long before the legislation of 1921 was enacted, so that those actions could not have been based upon that precedent. In any event the British legislation of 1921 has no application to Canada and should not influence our decision.

9 p.m.

Now I come to the two great objections to which I think the bill is open, and the first is that the action of the General Assembly is unconstitutional. And it seems to me there is a great deal of confusion on this point. I notice that some hon. members speak of the General Assembly as if it were the church, while others refer to it as a corporate body with certain functions. We shall see in a moment what the extent of its functions is. When the union of the four Presbyterian churches in Canada took place in 1875 those churches united under what was called the basis of union, and therein it is stated that the scriptures shall be the infallible rule of faith, and the Westminster Confession of Faith the subordinate standard; and then reference is made to the form of Presbyterian church government and "The directory for the public worship of God." That is the basis of union and the basis of their faith I want the committee to consider also what vows the ministers have taken in entering that church. They sign a vow that they believe in the Westminster Confession of Faith as adopted by this church in the basis of union, and the government of the church by sessions, presbyteries, synods and general assemblies, to be founded on and agreeable to the word of God; that they own the purity of worship at present authorized by this church and that they engage to adhere faithfully to the doctrine of the said confession, to maintain and defend the said government, to conform to the said worship, to submit to the discipline of the church. And then listen to these words:

To follow no divisive course from the present order established therein.

The elders take a somewhat similar vow when they are ordained. Now, what is laid down for the General Assembly to do? The General Assembly receives and disposes of petitions, overtures, references, complaints, and so on; prescribes and regulates the course of duty of students having the ministry in view; corresponds with other churches, and so on; reviews the records of synods, deals with matters respecting doctrine, worship, discipline and government of the church. Its duty also is "to preserve the unity of the church;" that seems to have been overlooked in the recent years. Now, in view of what I have read—and all these things must be considered together: the basis of union; the vows of the ministers and elders of the church, their duties and the duties of the General Assembly as laid down in the Rules of Procedure—is there any authority to abolish their church? In all that I have read is there the remotest suggestion to that effect? On the contrary, the requirement to maintain and defend the church and to follow no divisive course therefrom is clearly laid down, and there is the requirement also to accept the Confession of Faith. There is every authority for the continuance of this church, but in my humble opinion there is no authority for its extinction. The General Assembly is not the church; it is a committee of the church to carry on the church's business affairs.

Now, a word about the free church case because two things are clearly shown. First of all, in the General Assembly no vote, no majority vote, not even a unanimous vote, can destroy the church that it is its commission to serve. Mark these words: No majority, not even a unanimous vote, can abolish the church. That is an entirely different view from what we have heard this afternoon. What does it mean? It means that the General Assembly has no authority to disturb the continuity of the church. The General Assembly is merely a committee carrying on the business of the church, acting within its vows, dealing with matters affecting internal management. It is beyond its power and its authority to destroy the church which by their vows they have undertaken to serve and to maintain. No majority of the General Assembly, no church court of the Presbyterian church, can give power to divert property to a different purpose from that for which it was originally intended. There is a good deal of loose talk about this question of trusts. I have heard a man say, "Oh, well, it was a good many years ago that that condition was laid down; you really do not need to carry it out." Surely an attitude of that kind is no less blamable than any departure from the rigid interpretation of a will. The conditions surrounding the disposition of these properties must be scrupulously carried out.

I do not propose to read many quotations, but I would like to read from a decision of Lord Lindley of the Privy Council in the Wee Free case. This is what he said.

> If, therefore, a synod or council, under colour of exercising their authority, were to destroy the church which they were appointed to preserve, or were to abrogate the doctrines which they were appointed to maintain, their acts would be ultra vires and invalid in point of law, and it would be the duty of every court in the United Kingdom so to hold, if the question ever involved a controversy as to civil rights and so arose for judicial decision.

In other words, this matter of union is not a question of preference. Somebody gets up and says this is the greatest thing that ever happened, but that is not enough; that will not do. We know that union has been set aside in Australia, in New Zealand and South Africa; we must have regard to the facts. This so-called sweep towards union has not gone on; it has fallen through. The unanimous decision of the Privy Council in the case to which I have referred was that churches must have identical doctrines to unite. Two of the Privy Council held that there was no difference, but on the question of law they all agreed. Two said there was no difference, and five said there was.

I want to remind the committee that there is a legal action pending in the Ontario courts. If the amendment of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) carries, then an opportunity of continuing the action in the Ontario courts will be lost to the anti-unionists. Is that a fair and proper thing? Is this matter so urgent as to take away the right of these people to have their case decided in the Ontario courts? And even if it were urgent, is it right and proper, is it just, to do anything else than to see that this action is allowed to proceed at law?

I want to refer to a few subjects that have been mentioned by those who are in favour of union. It is stated by the unionists that all constitutional steps have been taken. A great many steps have been taken, no doubt, and so far as they go I presume they are constitutional. But on what basis do they rest? They are a series of steps resting in the air. You must have a basic authority for your procedure. You may proceed to the presbytery and from there through the various stages to the synod and to the assembly; that sort of performance is constitutional enough—provided that the General Assembly has the necessary power . The basic question is have they that power? That is what is in dispute. I venture to say that what I have stated makes out a strong case, but I do not wish to make other men accept that; let us have the question settled where it can best be settled, and that is in a higher civil court.

I would say also that the General Assembly has no power to transfer to another church property which has been given for a specific purpose. That is a breach of trust. That is a matter that should also be sent to the courts. Does the committee consider it a proper thing to decide on the question of a very large trust fund, the existence of a church and the happiness of hundreds of thousands of devout people in this way in the House of Commons? Or does it not appear to the ordinary common sense man that this matter should be sent to the courts, where it can be argued out fully pro and con, and a decision be taken which I submit under all ordinary circumstances cannot be as fairly and as properly and sanely arrived at in this committee. To those who are interested in legal cases I would mention a Canadian case, Anderson versus Gislason. That was a Manitoba case concerned with the union of two churches, but the Presbyterian church was not involved. Legal action was taken, and this is what the appeal judge, Judge Dennistoun, said:

> The guarantee of religious freedom has nothing to do with the property. It does not guarantee freedom to steal churches. It secures to individuals the right of withdrawing, forming a new society, with such creed and government as they please, but it does not confer on them the right of taking the property consecrated to other uses by those who may now be sleeping in their graves.

That is a Canadian case. I said that the first great objection to the bill was that the General Assembly has not the power to do what it is attempting to do. Secondly, parliament has not the power to pass the bill. Can parliament incorporate and merge together people who do not wish to be merged? Is that not an infringment of the liberty of the subject, which will not be allowed under the British North America Act? And so with regard to incorporated congregations that have not asked and do not wish to go into the union; and so as to the diversion of trust funds, which is provincial property. There are some important quotations in this connection in the Free church case which I shall not detain the committee to read, although they are in strong support of what I am saying, and would well repay any one who chooses to read them. They are to be found in the judgments of Lord Halsbury, the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Alverstone Chief Justice of England.

It is also said there is no need of this conditional clause in the amended bill, that is the clause I am speaking of as being ultra vires of parliament. There is no need of such a clause in the bill, it is said, as action can be taken in any case. Of course, it can be taken in any case. Does anybody suppose it could not? We all know that it could be taken. But it has been pointed out to the committee that it was urged that parliament had not the authority to pass this bill, and strong reasons were given in support of that contention. Is parliament then prepared to shut its eyes to that and go on and effect union, and then let somebody else attempt and perhaps succeed in upsetting the action of parliament? Is that justice, is that equity, to those who are protesting against this bill? I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it is only proper and fair and just that this question of the authority of parliament be settled before the bill is brought into force, if it should pass this House. There is no use in saying that can be done some time. It is the duty of parliament to see that that provision is in the act.

Furthermore, there is no need of incorporation. The Presbyterian Church in Canada is not incorporated. There is nothing to prevent this union we are speaking of taking place without incorporation. Why is that not done? I will give you the only possible explanation, and that is that such a union as they are asking parliament for could not otherwise take place, because the courts would not allow it any more than they did in the Free church case. The courts would not allow the transfer of property and trusts, and that is why they are coming to parliament and asking for a power which I do not think they could obtain in the civil courts of the land.

It is stated that passing the bill as it now stands—it was stated only a few moments ago—would not settle the matter. Certainly not. Whoever expected it would settle the matter? The only course then would be to come back with an amended bill. This bill should not pass in my view, because it would not settle the matter. Let them come back with an amended bill, and it would go through. But when a man says: Pass this bill because it is coming up again next year, does he mean to say—and this is the only interpretation—give him the bill to keep him quiet, to please him, or whatever you like, so that he does not come back to parliament. Give him the bill granting him powers and privileges that he does not possess and that takes away powers and the church from others, just to satisfy him. Surely the committee will not approve, cannot approve of any such iniquity as that; and that is what it all means. I can understand the committee would be very glad indeed if they could get rid of this question, if they could free our House and these corridors of a great deal of solicitude that has been shown all the members during the last few weeks. They would do a great deal to do that, but we cannot get rid of it at the expense of people's rights, and that is what we are doing if we go on any such argument as has been placed before us. Then it is said that if the General Assembly had not the necessary power, the passing of this act would give the supplementary and additional power necessary. Is that the way we wish to treat those who come to parliament protesting that this union is against their rights and that their church is being seized? I think not, Mr. Chairman. Again, it is asked, why was legal action not taken before? And because it was not taken before, it is argued that parliament cannot be expected to wait. I have heard this said several times. It implies that the action of the petitioners has been dilatory. It implies that they have delayed so that this matter can be held up. I have taken the opportunity of asking Mr. Chrysler, who I think is certainly a man of repute in this community, to give some facts in this connection, and this is what he says:

> Some question has been raised as to whether proceedings in the action of Cunningham et al vs. Pidgeon et al should not have been taken at an earlier date.

That is in reference to Bill No. 47.

> I was asked before the Private Bills committee, with regard to the time taken in commencing the action, but I understood from the questions then asked that the time referred to was that between the publication of the notice of application to parliament and the issuing of the writ. I explained then that there was only the necessary time occupied in the preparation of the statement of claim and the printing thereof.
> I understand now that it is said that the present plaintiff (or some plaintiff) might have proceeded at any time after the passing of the resolutions by the General Assembly adopted on the 11th day of June, 1923, which are quoted in paragraph 37 of the plaintiff's statement of claim.

I am pleased to have the opportunity of placing this matter before the committee because I think it meets the many criticisms that have been repeatedly made on this point. Mr. Chrysler goes on to say:

If this view were correct it might lead to the conclusion that an action should have been commenced at any time after the resolutions adopted by the assembly in 1916, which are in substance very similar to those of 1923. (paragraph 29 of the statement of claim).

In each case there is the assertion of the intention to take very bold and definite action by the assembly, qualified in each case by the condition that no such action should be final until confirmed by legislation.

This matter was very carefully considered, and in my view no action could be maintained in a court of law merely because resolutions had been adopted by the General Assembly, or other courts of the church, which might or might not be acted upon or be repealed or modified by a subsequent meeting of the assembly.

The resolutions of 1916 and 1923 were each of them, upon their face, provisional and conditional upon legislation being obtained.

The resolution of 1923 affirms the decision of the assembly:

"To proceed forthwith to the consummation of union upon the terms of the draft bills which are hereby approved in principle and generally as to form as necessary to give legal effect to the said union, and to furnish the United church with legal authority requisite to corporate action and as by said bills provided."

These proceedings are set out in paragraphs 37 to 50 inclusive of the statement of claim, and the notice of application to parliament in paragraph 56.

The action was commenced as soon after notice of application to parliament had been given as practicable, the proceeding being one in which it was convenient and proper, according to practice, to provide for the service of the statement of claim along with the writ of summons, as several of the defendants were not resident in the province of Ontario, the legislation was intended to terminate the existence of the Presbyterian Church in Canada by merging it in a new statutory corporation, and to invade the constitutional rights and property of the church and its corporate bodies holding property, provincial and local, and to take away the congregational property held in perpetuity in trust for the use of the members of the Presbyterian church.

Until the representatives and agents of the assembly themselves applied to the civil power to enforce their resolutions, either by action in court, or by applying for legislation, any action taken to test the pretended powers of the assembly would, I think, have been premature.

The decisive step, taken to enforce the resolution of the assembly, was first taken when the notice of application to parliament was published.

Yours truly,

F. H. CHRYSLER.

Mr. McBRIDE: Will the hon. member not admit that when Mr. Chrysler was under cross-examination he made the statement "I have not had time to examine this bill; this bill is beyond my comprehension", and that Mr. Mason, the solicitor for the union party, made a straightforward and honourable statement of the matter?

Mr. MacLAREN: No, I do not admit anything of the kind. It is also stated that the amendment which has been made to the bill in section 2 is an evasion. If ever a fair or honourable amendment was introduced into a bill it is the one that was inserted before the Private Bills committee. It says in effect "You can have your bill, but if there is any doubt as to the constitutional powers of the General Assembly the question must be submitted to the courts". What can be more fair or more honourable than that? Where is the evasion? I think the man who says there is evasion in that shows symptons of astigmatism if you know what that is.

Mr. GRAHAM: Explain please?

Mr. MacLAREN: The Minister of Railways is so well informed that I need not explain the term to him.

Summing up I ask what is the position now of the Presbyterian church? Notwithstanding official pronouncements at the early stages of union negotiations that practical unanimity would be essential, in spite of steadily increasing opposition so that now probably one-half the church is opposed to union, in spite of there being no vote for nine years, and that over 100,000 new members have joined the church since the last vote, regardless of the assembly failing in any fair measure to represent the people, regardless of the power of the General Assembly being challenged as its constitutional authority in seeking union and there being strong evidence to support that step; regardless that the power of parliament itself is distinctly disputed, and that the existence of the church of thousands of devout people is threatened—with all these facts before us an amendment is presented to eliminate section 2 which would mean, if the bill is passed along with it, that there is not only confiscation and coercion but infringement of religious liberty. I think it may be said of those who are in favour of union that they have "followed too much the devices and desires of their own hearts". They see this ideal before them. They think that what they are striving for will be the solution of everything. They are pressing towards that goal without due regard to the liberties and rights of others, without vouchsafing to other people the right to choose and worship as they think best. There is no use in attempting to tell anybody how they must worship; what they should do in regard to religious matters. That is an impossible idea. The question is now before us for settlement, and surely this parliament is not going to dictate to any body of people as to what church they should belong.

Mr. H. B. McGIVERIN (Ottawa): I would like to make a few remarks on this bill. In the debate so far this afternoon and this evening, this matter has been very ably and very fully discussed. I had the honour of being chairman of the Private Bills committee to which the bill was referred. As several hon. members have mentioned, for many years no private bill has caused such a tremendous interest as is taken in this measure. The committee gave both sides a very fair and full hearing. Six days were occupied in presenting the case to the committee. The arguments were well presented from both sides. While there was keen feeling in the matter, there is no question that courtesy and kindness were shown on both sides, and that was only to be expected from men of such high standing in the church, at the bar and among the laity. The committee discussed this bill for the equivalent of another four days, and went into the question very carefully.

There is no doubt in my mind that the Methodist and Congregational churches are practically unanimous in asking for this church union bill, but gentlemen appeared before the committee and presented a very grave difference of opinion on the part of communicants and members of the Presbyterian church. They claimed that the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church had not the legal and constitutional right to enter into such an agreement with the other churches. Excluding this question which is now before the committee in regard to the amendment of my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown), I think the remaining provisions of the bill were very carefully considered and thought out, and practically follow what was asked for by the promoters of the bill. But on the question of this amendment to the preamble and section 2 which is now sought to be eliminated, the committee felt—and I agree with the committee—that there was grave doubt as to whether the Presbyterian General Assembly had the right to enter into this agreement.

I am not going to enter into a long legal argument, but I would like to draw the attention of the committee to the questions which are raised in the case of Cunningham versus Pidgeon, which is now before the Ontario courts. The case mentioned subsection 1 of section 2 of this bill. The reason that I am going to read some of the points presented in that case is that these were the points that were brought before the committee and argued, and are on record in this case in the courts of Ontario. Another reason why I read from this record is that I desire to show that there is a grave doubt, to put it fairly, and I want to show, Mr. Chairman, that the questions which are involved in this case are questions of doctrine and faith, which hon. members who are for this amendment said the committee and parliament should not discuss, the point being that these legal and religious questions should be submitted to the courts of the land, to men who are trained to consider these very questions, trained to weigh the evidence and to take these matters in hand. Paragraph 63 of this statement of claim reads:

> The covenant of the Presbyterian church in 1875 and its constitution and rule contain no provision for any alteration being made in the principles of the said church or for union with any other church or association of Christians holding different principles.

Paragraph 64 reads:

> The plaintiffs further submit that the said assembly had not, nor has any assembly of the Presbyterian church, power to appoint delegates or any committee of delegates or agents to apply for legislation designed and intended to annihilate the identity and continuity of the Presbyterian church by merging it in a new corporation and to bring about the alienation or spoliation of the property of the church, nor to take proceedings to procure the conveyance by act of parliament or legislatures of such property to such new corporation.

Paragraph 66 reads:

> The plaintiffs submit that it is not within the power of the courts of the Presbyterian church or any combination of them, or of any majority of its officers or members to alter or vary the trusts upon which the property vested in or acquired by it, or by trustees for it, is held, or to alter the purposes for which it was founded and established.

That refers more particularly to subsection 2 in regard to the constitutionality, which was referred to by my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). Then I turn to paragraph 86, which is purely one in regard to doctrine, and reads:

> In place of the standards of the Presbyterian church, namely the Confession of Faith, which is a statement of a system of doctrine, in the form of a creed or covenant, and the longer and shorter catechisms, provided for the instruction of its members the proposed basis of the United church substitutes a statement which purports to set forth not the creed of the church but the substance of the Christian faith as commonly held among us.

There is a question solely of doctrine or creed or faith, which I submit should go to the courts. Then I refer to paragraph 96 which reads:

> The plaintiffs submit that the twenty articles which follow the preamble are not identical with, but a departure from the doctrine of the Presbyterian church as set forth in its standards.

Paragraph 101 reads:

The following differences and departures from the Westminster Confession of Faith in the proposed basis of union are set forth in the opposing statements or propositions which follow:

And here are ten very grave differences of opinion on doctrine as between the United church and the Presbyterians. I maintain that these are not questions which should be settled by a committee or by parliament, but are questions which should be decided by the courts of the land. Paragraph 102 recites these ten grave differences which I will not repeat, and states further:

The above instances do not constitute the whole sum of the differences between the Confession of Faith and the basis of union, but are given only to illustrate the opposition between these two documents not only in their superficial features but even more in their fundamental conceptions.

In other words, there appears to be a vast difference in regard to the two conceptions as regards doctrine and faith. At a meeting subsequent to the General Assembly of 1923, a reply was presented by those in favour of union to the dissent of those gentlemen who opposed union, and as appears on page 9, the chairman of that committee in his report said amongst other things in section (2):

This assembly maintains that the General Assembly held in Winnipeg in 1916 did act within its rights and powers in approving of the said basis of union.

(3) The assembly denies that its acts in this behalf are illegal, and denies that it has in effect seceded from the Presbyterian Church in Canada.

Section (5) reads:

The assembly, claiming that its acts have been legal and within its powers and rights, holds that those who dissent from this deliverance and not the majority are the parties responsible for this threatened schism in the church and for any consequence which may flow therefrom.

In other words, they joined issue in regard to the legality of the proceedings of the assembly. When the gentlemen appeared before the committee, they argued that the General Assembly had acted in a legal and constitutional manner in carrying this out. It is true that the case of Overtoun and the Free Church of Scotland has been cited before the committee, and I will only mention the fact that the decision apparently was directly against the General Assembly to make any particular change in doctrine. The gentlemen who appeared before the committee in favour of union said that they could differentiate this legislation from the Free Church case. All that I am concerned in showing from these statements is, first, that there was a serious doubt as to the right of the General Assembly; secondly, that parliament and this committee are not the authorities to decide questions of doctrine and of faith, and that such questions should go to the proper tribunals set apart by the constitution of this country, namely the law courts of the land.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When were the law courts set apart to decide questions of faith and doctrine?

Mr. McGIVERIN: This question has arisen between parties in the Presbyterian church under their own system of government, under the laws and obligations laid down in the church, and, therefore, any question of dispute which would arise between one section of that church and the other, any legal rights that they would have, would have to be tried by the courts. If the question of doctrine comes into this question, it would naturally be tried by the courts as was the case in the Overtoun case.

The Barrier Act has been referred to. The Barrier Act is simply an act of the Presbyterian Church in Canada which is used as a check of legislation. The General Assembly passes a law, and then it is sent down during the following year to the different presbyteries for assent or dissent before it is put into effect. But it does not give any additional power to the General Assembly as regards legislation outside of whatever rights and powers it may have.

I would have thought that the reference to the Supreme court would be welcomed by the promoters of this bill, because there is no doubt that in this legislation we are dealing with property and civil rights in the provinces, with education in the provinces and with trusts in the provinces. It is true that legislation has been obtained from many of the provinces and legislation is still to be obtained in two or three more. But the point I attempt to make is this, that if the question is referred to the Supreme court, this will prevent litigation in the other provincial courts of this country until the Supreme court has decided whether the legislation we have granted is ultra vires or not. This will save money to both sides and it will save delay by having the matter referred. I have supported and I am supporting the report of the committee, but the question of delay was brought up. The committee tried to meet that point in the reference to the courts by limiting the time to two years. But if a reference of both of those legal questions in subsections 1 and 2 of section 2 to the Supreme court is put forward, as it is following the principle adopted by the committee, I would agree to it because it would avoid delay and expense. I am in favour of church union, but I think that in granting church union you cannot take away whatever legal rights may belong to the minority in the Presbyterian church.

The question of the General Assembly has been touched upon. I have a great respect for the opinion of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church and for the system of church government; but the gentlemen who make up the General Assembly are elders appointed for life. They go to the General Assembly, and in all honour, without any question of their good faith, they have a perfect right to vote for or against church union as they see fit whether their congregation is in favour of union or not. The point I wish to make is that they are not instructed by the congregation to make a direct vote. Why did the General Assembly, I suppose in its wisdom, ask for a vote in 1911 and again in 1915? Surely it was to get that advice from the great mass of communicants and members of their church. In the last vote of 1915, out of 336,822 communicants, 106,534 voted for church union and 69,000 against it. That meant about one third of the communicants of the Presbyterian church. Now, there is a general law in this country governing corporations providing that when any serious move is made, in order to protect the minority, there shall be a two thirds vote of the shareholders. I would not go quite so far as that in this matter, but all that is shown as regards the democracy of this question is that nine years ago one third of the communicants of the Presbyterian church voted in favour of union. We are the representatives of the people and it seems to me it would have been of great assistance to us, even apart from the legal aspect of the matter, if a vote had been taken at a later date than 1915.

As has been stated this afternoon and repeated over and over again during the past few weeks, the state cannot interfere with religion. I want to read a statement from a pamphlet entitled "Parliament and the Church" addressed to members of parliament by Professor R. E. Welsh, D.D. of the Presbyterian College, Montreal. He says:

> Parliament is not a court of appeal from the churches upon any ecclesiastical matter. Their creeds or any modifications therein, and their procedure according to their constitution, are determined solely by themselves as free, self-governing religious communities, having neither political nor commercial aims and uses. Any intrusion upon the action of General Assembly, General Conference, or other church court, in respect of its own functions, would be a violation of the sacred principle of the spiritual independence of the church of Christ and would never be endured in a free country.

Well, I agree with that, with this important addition that as between the members of their own communities or sects or religions the governing body of the church has acted legally according to the agreement or the basis upon which they all join. It is for that reason that I believe in referring this question to the courts. If you accept the amendment of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) and you forbid any reference of the matter to the courts you are deciding a religious question without any consideration for the minority, the thousands of communicants of the Presbyterian church who are opposed to union, and that I maintain would be an interference on the part of this body with the religious opinions of a large section of the Presbyterian church in this country. For that reason and for others which I have advanced I will support my committee and vote against the amendment of my hon. friend from Lisgar.

Mr. LADNER: The hon. gentleman makes no reference to an important contingency. Suppose that through a technicality the courts should decide that the procedure of the General Assembly was not in order; how does he provide for the carrying out of what is practically the unanimous will of the Methodist and Congregational churches and those Presbyterians who want union? The nature of the bill denies the possibility of union to those large numbers who are in favour of it.

Mr. McGIVERIN: If the decision of the courts were against the action of the General Assembly it would then be the duty of parliament to meet the situation. There has been a great deal of talk in regard to the remedial legislation passed in connection with the Free church. That decision, as has been pointed out, left a very small minority, so small that a commission was appointed to inquire into the question, and it was that commission that decided that the trusts of the church and the management of its affairs could not be carried out by those who were legally entitled to the control of that body. It was then that the commission advised parliament to pass a law covering that contingency. I understand that in that case it was found that one-third of those who were by law declared to be the rightful members of the church were entitled to take all the property. I say therefore that the question would have to be settled by the courts. This legislation provides that, if the General Assembly acted in a legal and constitutional maner, then the bill should become effective.

Mr. LADNER: That is not the point. Having provided in the bill for many contingencies so as to obviate any repetition of this controversy, which is not in the interests of the churches, of religion, or the welfare of the country, why not 10 p.m. go further and provide for another very important contingency? If the courts should decide that the procedure of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church was not in order, should not the remaining bodies who wish the union be free to unite? Why is that provision omitted from the bill?

Mr. McGIVERIN: I do not see how you can arrange for a contingency of that kind until the matter has been settled in the courts and you know where you stand.

Mr. McBRIDE: When this bill was before the committee why did the hon. member refuse to hear counsel that was opposed to the amendment when he heard counsel on each and every one of the other sections in the bill?

Mr. McGIVERIN: That is easily answered; after the public hearing it was decided by the committee that we should not hear any outside the committee on the preamble, and I was simply carrying out that arrangement as I did in every instance.

Mr. McBRIDE: Counsel for the union came to me and requested me to obtain for him the right to be heard on that question before the vote was taken.

Mr. E. GUSS PORTER (West Hastings): It is not my intention to speak at any great length on the question before the chair. Since the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. McGiverin), has expressed his views, I should feel inclined to refrain from saying anything whatever on the subject, as I find myself fully in accord with what he has stated in his speech. Every opportunity was given by the chairman of the committee to both parties to the controversy to make the fullest statement of their case. I feel that every member of the committee gave the most careful consideration to the evidence that was offered. When the amendment that now appears in the bill was moved by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) I took occasion to second it after giving a good deal of thought to the matter, and I do not think that this House is commissioned to revise or repeal the decision of that committee. Every phase of the question was fully argued in the committee by the ablest counsel who could be procured.

The CHAIRMAN: I would like to direct the attention of the committee—not particularly of the hon. member who is speaking—to a reference in Bourinot which I fear may be disregarded in connection with this discussion. I quote from page 357:

> Neither can a member, in speaking, refer to anything said or done in a previous debate during the same session—a rule necessary to economize the time of the House, and a restraint upon members to prevent them from reviving a debate already concluded. Neither is it regular to refer to arguments used in committee of the whole, nor to any amendment proposed in the same.

I do not suggest that the hon. member is disobeying or disregarding that rule, but from some comments that have been made I fear there is a danger that it may be disregarded. If the hon. member will excuse the interruption, I simply want to draw that to the attention of the committee.

Mr. PORTER: I have no intention of repeating any part of the argument presented by counsel to the committee; I merely mention the fact that argument was made before the committee, without stating what it was. As I have suggested, the House is not conditioned to determine the question now before us as the committee was conditioned to determine it. The committee had all the evidence before them; they had an opportunity of discussing it among themselves and of considering it fully. This House has never had that evidence before it and therefore has had no opportunity of weighing it. Nor has the House had the advantage of the arguments of counsel made before the committee. It seems to me that the safest thing for the House to do is to rely upon the action of the committee. The House cannot, upon the arguments presented here this afternoon and to-night, undertake to decide on the matters involved; that cannot be intelligently done unless all the evidence and all the arguments are taken into consideration. So that to ask this House to undertake to annul or repeal what the committee has done seems to me, in the circumstances, to be asking the House to do altogether too much.

Before this bill was brought into parliament there was an action pending, and the fact that that action is pending is the strongest possible evidence of the bona fides of those who instituted that action. On the other hand those who are promoting this union bill are endeavouring to get through the House a reversal of the opinion of the committee and to stifle the litigation to that extent, to prevent those who have confidence in their action from having it properly brought before the courts and adjudicated upon. They would have this House, which has not the information, the argument or the evidence before it, pass legislation that would altogether wipe that provision out of the bill. That does not seem to indicate the same amount of good faith or of confidence on their part in the success of their cause as is exhibited by those who have taken the action and are now maintaining it before the courts.

Is there a real bona fide question involved in the motion now before the committee? Can this parliament, can this committee say that there is no question to be determined by the courts? No doubt it has the power to do so, but will any hon. member say that no question is involved in this bill that is in controversy between the parties and that ought not to be settled—settled by the courts, if you will? If there is such a question, then is this parliament going to aid the one in evading litigation or assist the other in succeeding in the litigation? The fairest possible course parliament could take is to maintain the statu quo between the two parties, leaving each his own rights to be determined upon the evidence in the way that matters of that kind are usually determined.

I am in favour of voluntary union of the churches, but I am not in favour of compulsory union, and I cannot think I ever will be. I do not think the greatest good comes from compulsory union in anything, and that applies to churches as well as to anything else. If this church union is to be compulsory, they cannot expect to get from it the benefits that would otherwise accrue if it were a voluntary measure. Now while that is so, there is this question between the two: The unionists say: We have no desire and no intention, and we have never attempted, to coerce those who do not want to become unionists. On the other hand, the anti-unionists say: You are by this bill compelling us to do something we do not want to do. Now there is the issue. How are you going to determine it? Is parliament going to say the anti-unionists are right, or is parliament going to say that those who are in favour of union are right? Is parliament going to determine that question at all? Is not that a question that is right and proper, and that should only be decided by the courts of the land constituted for that purpose?

[Mr. Porter.]

I have spoken longer than I intended. I merely want to repeat, the committee was in a position to decide this matter, to protect the rights of minorities, and if there is a fundamental principle of British government, it is that the rights of minorities must be protected. That is what the committee was in a position to do in this matter. Will parliament undertake to say that they were wrong in doing that, and deprive the minority of their rights as determined in the courts?

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): As a member of the Private Bills committee I have been trying to analyze the somewhat extensive evidence which has been placed before us in the past few weeks. I propose very briefly to outline some of the main points as they appeal to me, not merely from the legal standpoint, but from that of the wider aspects of the case. The heart of the bill, I take it, is contained in the words of the preamble, that the three churches desire to unite "without loss of their identity." That little phrase is the very key to the whole situation. It is that which causes the greater part of the controversy. The churches claim the right to unite without the loss of their identity. The petitioners came to parliament in the first place, we are told, in order that they might avoid litigation. In this apparently they have been disappointed, as the case is now before the Ontario courts. They make the claim that the steps which have been taken towards union have been taken constitutionally, that is, as provided by the regulations of the various churches concerned, and I think that their claim along that line has not been successfully disputed.

They claim secondly that they have made provision for non-concurring congregations. I might say that certain modifications that were made in committee make it clear that no one was to be forced to go into the union but rather that he might stay out. That announcement seemed to clear that point somewhat. Moreover it is pointed out by the advocates of the union that there is provision for the division of general church property; that is, colleges and certain trust funds of various kinds that are general in character, and are controlled by the church at large. It would seem as if there has been fairly generous provision for the division of general church property of this character.

Then finally the unionists laid a good deal of emphasis on the fact that this union might be in the interests of the country at large, and particularly in the interests of the West. It does not seem to me that it is a question for parliament as to whether or not this union is in the interest of the country. It is our work to deal with this bill.

Those opposed to the union, representing one section of the Presbyterian church, claim through their counsel and through others who spoke for them, that the proposed legislation was beyond the powers of parliament. They emphasized the fact that the bill was concerned with property rights, and that property rights was essentially a provincial matter. Further, they argued that parliament cannot divert the trusts from the original purposes, and many eminent authorities were quoted, including Lord Halsbury, and other law lords. They argued that the assembly had no power to annihilate the church—that word "annihilate" was used again and again—that however wide the recognized powers of the assembly, it had no right to annihilate the church, and here again we had quotations from Lord Overtoun in the Free Church of Scotland case.

Further, they laid great emphasis on the fact that the church must retain its "identity of doctrine." The Westminster Confession is recognized as the subordinate standard of faith in the Presbyterian church, and it was said that no church might deviate from this standard and remain a Presbyterian church.

Finally, the opponents of union made the sentimental appeal, and I use the word in the best sense, that they must not be deprived of the church of their forefathers, the historic church in which they had been brought up.

Then there came from the anti-unionists the amendment which is now incorporated in the bill as it is before us. That amendment would result in a delay of action until the case before the Ontario courts is decided —probably two years, or that time might even be exceeded. I quite admit that when prominent legal authorities differ, it may seem presumptuous for a layman to have anything to say on the matter, and yet on the other hand perhaps it is well that these questions should not be decided entirely by lawyers. There are other than legal questions to be considered, and some of us who have not had legal training, desire to emphasize some other than the strictly legal aspects. I cannot see that it is right that we, as a House of Commons, should permit our powers to be abrogated and relegate this whole matter to the courts. Here is a straightforward proposition that is brought before us, a bill to unite three Canadian churches. It is not a matter for the courts to decide whether the bill is in order or not. We are the people who should decide that. I admit there are certain legal and technical difficulties, but supposing the courts should decide that this bill was not constitutional; what would happen? The whole matter would be delayed for several years, involving an immense amount of friction, and finally it would undoubtedly come back to parliament again, because parliament would be the only body that could ultimately decide a matter of this kind. This was done in the famous Scottish case where the whole question was referred to parliament, which went behind the merely legal points to secure substantial justice.

Let me comment very briefly on a few points. In the matter of provincial rights I believe the bill is very carefully drawn. An effort has been made in every instance to avoid any trespass on provincial rights as they affect local church property, and moreover concurrent legislation is being sought in all the various provincial legislatures. I should like to point out in passing that if the bill meets shipwreck on this ground of provincial rights it may possibly result in some good, as it may give the general public a little more sympathy with some of us who have brought forward measures in this House only to be told again and again that we cannot act because of provincial rights. It was only the other day that we had the eight-hour day issue before us, and again it was a question of our not being able to take action because such matters were within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

With regard to the question raised by the chairman of the committee (Mr. McGiverin), and others, on the administration of trusts there appeared very clearly two fundamentally divergent conceptions of what the church really was. On the one side the church was regarded as a fixed organization irrevocably based upon one unalterable standard of doctrine. On the other hand the church was regarded as a living organism, adapting itself to the new conditions in which it finds itself existing. Now, I would ask if all these matters are to be settled on the ground of precedent, as the lawyers generally do settle these things; —as their training inclines them to settle them. —How are we to decide which of these two conceptions of the church is to prevail? If we are to regard the church as a fixed organization based upon unalterable doctrine, one decision must be given. If, however, as some of the law lords pointed out in the Scottish case, the church is an organization that may modify its creed and policy from time to time as all other human institutions do, then another decision would perforce be given. On the general question of trusts why should we allow the dead hand of the past forever to tie action in the present? Because some man one, two or three decades or two or three hundred years ago gave a certain donation in all good faith, and notwithstanding changed conditions must we tie the hands of the people of to-day who are trying to grapple with the problems that meet us from day to day? That is really the argument that is brought forward, and that argument, I believe, a great many of us cannot possibly subscribe to or allow to prevail.

As to the statement that the assembly has no power to annihilate the church I would suggest that this takes the whole question for granted. Surely the church itself is the best judge of what its real life is. I think I may lay that down as a general principle—that the church itself must remain the judge of what its real life is. We are told that if the church unites it loses its name, it loses its identity. Well, let me give an illustration in regard to that. A young woman is married. She loses her name. Does she lose her identity?

An hon. MEMBER: I should say not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is she annihilated?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Surely in practice we recognize that sometimes there may be a merging of one life into a fuller life. That is the attitude that we take in regard to other matters and surely it is not right to say that because there is a change of relation, the individual or corporation which enters into the new relation is thereby annihilated. The changes have been rung on two terms. I do not pretend to distinguish the exact meanings of these terms—"identity" and "entity". I submit that these are metaphysical and legal abstractions. So far from the lawyers saving us from the difficulties in the case they are largely responsible for the tangle into which we have got ourselves. Let us view the situation from the practical standpoint. The unionists say that the church must go into the union as an entity, and as the bill was first drafted I confess it seemed to me that the people who would not go in were left suspended between heaven and earth. As there could be but one entity, if the Presbyterian church went into that union the whole church went in, and there was nothing left out. But some of the anti-unionists feel that they are very real personalities and they did not know where they were. I do not blame them for feeling that way as it is a legal interpretation that since the entity had gone into the union there was nothing left outside.

On the other hand the anti-unionists, the non-concurrents, claim that they are the only true Presbyterians and hence the entity is outside the union and the individual people that go in, go in on their own account but that it is not the Presbyterian church that is going in. So we have the one group saying they are "it" and they are going in, and the other group saying they are "it" and are staying out.

Now I want to look at this matter not from the legal or theological standpoint but from the standpoint of common sense. The fact is that the Presbyterian church, as far as we on the committee could judge, is irrevocably divided; it is divided into two groups. One group has gone into the union, the other has stayed out of the union. And what is the reason for all this talk of identity? The real reason is because certain property rights lie at the basis of it. If the unionists can establish that they are the true church, they carry the property with them; and if the anti-unionists can establish they are the true church, then they retain the property. That is the real reason why there is so much stress laid by the lawyers on this question of identity. Mr. Lafleur, the counsel for the anti-unionists built up the greater part of his legal argument on what he called the doctrinal basis of identity. Every Presbyterian minister is required to answer this question on his ordination or induction:

> Do you believe the Westminster Confession of Faith, as adopted by this church in the basis of union, to be founded on and agreeable to the word of God, and in your teaching do you promise faithfully to adhere thereto?

A similar question is asked of the elders and deacons. The Westminster Confession of Faith, according to the basis of union of the present Presbyterian church, forms the subordinate standard of the church. I am inclined to think that there is something in the charge that the anti-unionists bring in this case because no less an authority than Sir Robert Falconer said that 90 per cent of the ministers in the Presbyterian church subscribed to that basis of faith only with reservations. On the other hand I want to ask whether all the anti-unionists really believe in the Westminster confession? There are very few copies of the Westminster Confession of Faith now available to the public. We have had certain clauses of it read before the committee and in order that the House may know what are some of the things for which the anti-unionists stand and to which they pin their whole legal argument I should like to read one or two of these clauses. Chapter 3, section 3 reads:

By the decree of God, for the manifestation of His glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death.

Chapter 6, section 1 reads as follows:

Our first parents being seduced by the subtlety and temptation of Satan, sinned in eating the forbidden fruit. This their sin God was pleased, according to His wise and holy counsel, to permit, having purposed to order it to His own glory.

Chapter 10, section 3 and 4 reads:

III Elect infants dying in infancy are regenerated and saved by Christ through the spirit, who worked when, and where, and how he pleaseth. So also are all the elect persons who are capable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the word.

IV Others not elected, although they may be called by the ministry of the word, and may have some common operations of the spirit, yet they never truly come unto Christ, and therefore connot be saved; much less can men not professing the Christian religion be saved in any other way whatsoever, be they ever so diligent to frame their lives according to the light of nature, and the law of that religion they do profess; and to assert and maintain that they may is very pernicious, and to be detested.

Chapter 25, section 6 reads:

There is no other head of the church but the Lord Jesus Christ; nor can the Pope of Rome in any sense be head thereof; but is that antichrist that man of sin and son of perdition that exalteth himself in the church against Christ and all that is called God.

Now it is not for us in this House to say whether that doctrine is correct or not, but my point is that the whole legal argument of the anti-unionists is built upon the idea of the identity of doctrine—a doctrine that cannot be altered—and that the subordinate standard of faith is the Westminster confession, one or two clauses of which I have read, and which every minister must promise not only to believe but to teach. I ask in all fairness whether the men who adopt this position subscribe unreservedly to every word of this creed. If they do—and I can scarcely conceive it—their case from their standpoint of unalterableness of doctrine is won; but if they cannot subscribe to that without any reservation, I submit that the legal argument on which they have built up their case absolutely falls to the ground.

There are one or two larger issues that are involved which I must mention very briefly. There is the whole relationship of church to state. We as a state claim to be sovereign. The church as a church claims to be sovereign. Now can you reconcile those two sovereignties. I take it that the only possible way of doing so is by remembering that each must be sovereign in its own sphere. I asked a question of the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. McGiverin) a little while ago, when he suggested that the courts should decide the questions of doctrine and of faith. Surely no self-respecting church could submit to a decision by the courts. The church must maintain its supremacy in spiritual matters, and it cannot allow itself to be induced to submit its doctrines to a court or even to parliament. On the other hand, there is undoubtedly the danger that we may build up an ecclesiastical organization that may imperil the state itself. There have been whispers going around the corridors—they have not come before the House perhaps to-day that one of the dangers in this proposed merger is that we should establish a body that will be strong enough to dominate or at least to influence the political life of this country.

Mr. FINN: Might I ask the hon. member what ecclesiastical organization he refers to?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I refer to the proposed church merger which three strong churches might become powerful enough in this country to influence the political life of this country.

Mr. FINN: And endanger the national life?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The question has been discussed as to whether it is wise for parliament to sanction a strong merger of this kind, lest it put a strong church in the field which would have an adverse influence over the policies of the country.

Mr. FINN: What is my hon. friend's opinion?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would say that such a danger is not quite so fantastic as perhaps my hon. friend might imagine.

Mr. FINN: I did not deal with it fantastically.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Since my position has been questioned, I would read in this connection a circular which was sent out several years ago by one of the churches that proposes to enter the union. It was sent out by the Department of Social Service and Evangelism of the Methodist church, and was dated Toronto, December 7, 1917, addressed as follows:

To the Methodist people of Canada. Declaration by the executive committee of the General Board of Social Service and Evangelism.

The present duty and paramount responsibility of Canada is to render every possible assistance made for the very highest sacrifices and unity in the most determined purpose to contribute its full share to win the war, and thus protect the smaller nations against the menace of an aggressive militarism, save democracy from German autocracy and despotism, and establish the dominance of the principles of Christ in international relationships.

And again:

All our annual conferences were imbued with this spirit. Each adopted strong declarations in favour of selected conscription and Union government.

At the polls on December 17, 1917, every Methodist elector, women as well as men, should conscientiously meet personal responsibility and both vote and work for the election of the candidates who stand with the Union government.

And again:

With enthusiastic unanimity, believing the present duty of every Canadian citizen is to support Union government at the forthcoming election, this executive committee of the Board of Social Service and Evangelism of the Methodist church requests that this statement be read from our pulpits and published in the daily and weekly press. We also urge that every Methodist having the right to vote will support the candidates who are supporting the Union government.

I would submit that if a body is to take that attitude of interfering with political matters it might very well be that it might become a danger to the state.

The only possible solution of this question is what has been expressed in the well-known phrase, "A free church in a free state" I believe the church has an absolute right of freedom of self-determination, of deciding whether or not it wants to enter into union with other bodies. I believe that is an inherent right; but on the other hand I urge that we as representing the state have a right to insist that the church must keep its own place and deal with what have been termed spiritual matters, rather than entering upon these definitely political alignments. As we were struggling in committee with these questions of property rights there kept running through my mind the old saying that is attributed to the one who is claimed as the founder of the Christian church:

And one of the company said unto him, Master speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me.

And he said unto him, man, who made me a judge or a divider over you?

And he said unto them, Take heed, and beware of covetouness; for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.

I submit that essentially the struggle before parliament to-day is a struggle for certain property rights, for the control of certain very valuable properties in this country. The emphasis on the question of "identity" by these churches is not because of the idea of apostolic succession which is common to the Episcopal churches. The struggle is not one for the right to use a particular name, for there is no reason under the sun why the non-unionist Presbyterian cannot go out to-morrow and use the name Presbyterian. The only name that they may not use is the exact name Presbyterian Church in Canada, and that for purely legal reasons, lest there should be some question over property rights. A great deal has been said by both sides each claiming that the struggle is a struggle for religious liberty. I cannot see that this is at all a struggle for religious liberty. Presbyterians who want to remain Presbyterians and to accept holus-bolus the Westminster confession can remain Presbyterians and no one in this country will say them nay. The unionists, if this bill is defeated, can go into union with every provision in this bill except property clauses and no one will say them nay. Let us face that fact. The real situation is that the rival groups are not content with regard to property arrangements.

That brings me to the point which I should like to emphasize before I close. I cannot think that the present bill contains a sufficient safeguard for the minorities. As far as I can judge the division of the general property is as fair as can be arranged. In fact, it is more generous than any provision that has been made in any previous union. But when we come to the property of minorities within congregations, it does not seem to me that the bill is quite fair. That, after all, is the question with which we are concerned in this parliament. I have mentioned doctrine, not because I wish this parliament to discuss doctrine. I have mentioned church organization, not because I believe this is a matter that we are asked to decide. But we are asked to decide the question of a fair division of property between the two sections of the Presbyterian church,—the other two churches apparently being satisfied with the union arrangement. So, my suggestion is—and I should like to offer it, perhaps, as an amendment at a later stage in the bill if no one else does so—that we should, where necessary, go below the congregational unit and endeavour to provide that no minority is penalized by the proposed union. At the present time a congregation may vote itself into union or out of union, but it goes as a congregation. If in any congregation there is, we will say, 40 per cent of a minority, that minority of 40 per cent has no legal claim on the property. That seems to me to be a hardship and none the less so because it works both ways. If the majority is a unionist majority, it is a hardship for the minority that remains Presbyterian. On the other hand, if the majority is Presbyterian, it is undoubtedly a hardship for the unionists.

I will give a particular example of this in my own city of Winnipeg. I am given to understand that in that city every Presbyterian congregation is in favour of church union, but in a number of local churches there are very substantial minorities. I am told that a somewhat similar situation prevails in Saskatoon, Regina, Moose Jaw and Edmonton where the vast majority are in favour of union, but where there are substantial minorities. What happens in such a case? It means that people who have worked for years to build up a common cause would be, by this bill, if it becomes law, deprived of all rights in that local church property. They would not have a right as a minority even in the general church property. I am told by the lawyers—and I suppose I must accept their ruling in this regard—that it will be impossible for us in the Dominion House to legislate with regard to local congregational property; that that is a matter for the provinces to decide. If this ruling is correct, we cannot do anything with regard to congregational property, and that will have to be dealt with by subsequent legislation in the various provinces. But these local minorities within congregations have, in my judgment, certain claims upon the general church property, and we might introduce an amendment to this bill which would recognize those claims and make provision so that as little hardship as possible would be worked upon the minorities. I know that this is said to be impracticable; that it would create a good deal of talk and trouble in the various local congregations; that it might maintain dissension for many years; but any dissension that might take place would not be nearly so serious as the sense of injustice which would rankle in the minds of many minorities if this bill is allowed to go through in the form in which it now comes before the committee.

As regards the bill as amended, let me say again that I think, in referring the matter to the courts, we are not by any means settling the problem; we are merely deferring what must ultimately be settled by this House, and further we are putting into the hands of lawyers questions that must be settled on other than purely legal grounds. I shall have to vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown).

Mr. W. G. RAYMOND (Brantford): As a member of the committee, I should like to associate myself with the committee's report that was I think, well explained by the chairman. I am not a member of any of the churches that are proposing to effect this union, and consequently I have not been affected as much as some others, perhaps, by the explanation of the various doctrinal points that have been raised. I think, in fact, that in that we have rather gone outside of our sphere, if I may be permitted to say so. A very plain question presents itself to me in connection with this matter and it has done so from the first. It is presented shortly and clearly in a circular sent out by those in favour of union after the bill has been amended in committee. In the very first sentence of that you will read that the object of the promoters of union in introducing the measure is that it will prevent litigation.

That may seem to some a very harmless phrase; but to me it conveys a good deal, and I think we should look into it very carefully, because in it I believe we shall find a reason why every man, who understands the principles that are at the very basis of our constitution, would see that he would stand by the report of this committee. We should ask ourselves: What litigation is it that is proposed to be prevented? Have the parties to that litigation a right to enter upon it and is it within the province of this parliament to prevent the exercise of what I have always understood to be the inalienable and inherent right of every subject,—the right to apply to the courts of the land for justice and more than that, to carry his appeal to the Lords Justices of Appeal, to the Privy Council, as we say figuratively, to the very foot of the Throne I think those principles are assailed in the prevention of the receipt of the report of this committee. I think the matter that was taken up was very carefully considered, as was pointed out by the chairman, the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter), and the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), who gave a good resume in part of what took place, and the report that is presented to the House was not obtained without a great deal of earnest consideration. It does not seem to me, therefore, that hon. members who have not followed the matter up should now, without the same opportunity of hearing both sides which members of that committee had, vote for an amendment to the bill which would destroy the bill as it came from the committee.

Now, the three churches that have been applying for union are old historic churches; it is not necessary at this time of night to remind any one that each of these churches has a very creditable place in the history of our race both in the Old Country and in Canada. But it is claimed that these churches have entered into union and that they have done so by means of their own courts and their own organization, and I do not think there is any difference of opinion in that regard in the case of either the Congregational church or the Methodist church. In the case of the Presbyterian church however there is a minority, we will call it a section of the church, which has entered an appeal to the Supreme Court of Ontario, complaining that the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in entering into union did so ultra vires of the laws and the constitution of that body. What right has this House to take away from that minority the undoubted right of appeal in this case? If the minority consisted of only one individual citizen this House in my opinion would have no right to deprive that person of the right of appeal to the courts of the land for justice. But the minority consisted of more than one man. I do not know offhand what the membership of the Presbyterian Church in Canada is, but it has not been claimed at any time that more than one third of that church has been in favour of union; and consequently the appeal is made on behalf of the remainder of the church which would constitute as I believe a considerable majority of the members. It might possibly be within the legal power of parliament, because we know that parliament is supreme, but certainly it is not within the moral right of this House to prevent that section of the Presbyterian church, a majority as it would seem, from applying to see if they can obtain what they consider justice at the hands of the Supreme Court of Ontario.

This is not a question of the court or of this House deciding upon the creed of these people. The question that the courts have to decide is whether the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church have acted within the constitution of that church; and if points of doctrine come up to be decided upon I think that any man of common sense who has listened to this debate so far will agree with me that the cold minds of trained judges would be far better to consider such points than would a committee of the whole of this House. I say this without any disrespect to the members of this House, but because the judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario are men who have been elevated to the bench by reason of their great ability, their fairness and their judicial powers and because they have trained minds and are able to know what is evidence and to make the necessary comparisons in these matters.

[Mr. Raymond.]

I do not think therefore that we have any right in this House, indeed I think parliament would be exceeding its moral right, and its public sense of duty, if it interfered with that appeal being taken to the courts.

I do not know that we need go much further than that. It is pointed out in this circular to which I have alluded, containing the objections to the bill as amended and as now before the committee, that parliament is the highest court of all in the land. Well, we know that parliament is above any other body; it was not necessary to learn this from the circular in question, because we know that nothing under heaven is above the power of parliament. That was set forth nearly three hundred years ago when it was established that the government of the land under God was in the hands of parliament; and we know that parliament has arranged royal marriages, the union of countries, the succession to the throne and, on one occasion, has even brought the king to the block. So that we cannot very easily put much above the power of parliament. We will grant that parliament has all this power. But I maintain that the more power we have the more carefully and the more considerately should we use it. We should not use that power to block the right of any person or any section of persons who wish to appeal for justice to the courts of the land.

It has always been considered the inalienable right of the British subject to appeal for and to obtain justice at the hands of the courts. And the history of our constitution, the history of the development of our race, show clearly that it was the passion for liberty and the respect for justice going hand in hand that made our people great, so that British justice is the word that is used the world over when people wish to speak of that earthly kind of justice which is regarded as most nearly like the divine. When you go back in the history of the race long before there was such a thing as printing and before there were schools or education, you will find that there was a kind of belief in justice among the people, the principle being almost a settled faith with them; it will be remembered that in the trials by ordeal and the trials by combat appeal was made to the justice of the cause. I look upon justice as a sacred quality and one which this House should revere; I venture to say we should revere it just as dearly as we do any church whatever or any combination of churches.

But in my opinion we are asked now to violate the principle of justice in not putting this bill through as it came from the committee. As the bill came from the committee it does not deny the right of appeal to the courts, which as I say is the inherent and inalienable right of anyone in the land who wishes to avail himself of it and to carry his appeal if necessary to the very foot of the throne. It may be because I have not made a study of theology or of anything of that kind, but I find it difficult to understand how one set of Christian people who read the teachings of Jesus Christ as I read them would want to take a church or a minority of a church and force it into union against its will. That in itself, it seems to me, is not a Christian principle, and I do not think there can be any satisfactory and beneficial union of these churches unless that union is made entirely voluntary upon the part of the contracting parties. Indeed, that was the principle set forth in 1911 by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church. I do not think that any section or part of any church should be forced into union, as those Presbyterians complain who object to the union on the ground that the church of their fathers is being annihilated. These people state that the union has not been properly and legally consummated according to the laws and the constitution of their own church, and they have the right to make the objection they do.

It would be far better in the interests of real religion if time were given for a union, until a feeling of union could be effected and the difficulties overcome. I do not see why there is so much impatience on the part of those in favour of union to have this measure consummated immediately. They have not taken the bill up fairly as it is before us this evening; they have not shown us what is the difference between the original bill and the amended bill, except that the amendment proposed will take away the right of litigation from those who think they are aggrieved by the passage of the bill in its present form.

A parallel was drawn a little while ago between marriage and the union of the churches. It was said that a woman in getting married did not of necessity lose her identity or become annihilated. I do not think she does in every case. But I could not help thinking when I heard the parallel drawn that in some countries marriages are contracted by the parents and guardians of the young people. To carry the parallel through, it would seem to me as if in this case such a contract had been made and that at the last moment it was found that the bride objected. No consideration. however, is being given to her objection; those enthusiasts who believe in union assure her that she is not going to be annihilated, and they proceed to take her by the scruff of the neck, drag her up to the altar and have the union consummated. I am reminded of a case which occurred in British history a number of years ago, when a royal marriage was conducted on something of the same plan. The royal bride was forced into the marriage against her expressed will, and the comment made at the time by the Marquess of Huntly was that he did not dislike the match but he hated the manner of wooing. That is the case with this union bill. I believe every man in that committee was in favour of church union. From what has been stated here it would seem as though some were in favour of union and some were against—were anti-unionists. But that was not the case so far as I observed the work of the committee; all were in favour of union, but all wanted it to be a union that would be fair and just and equitable, one that would not deprive any persons or any groups of persons of what they considered to be their rights.

The Presbyterian church is an old historic church, the history of which has endeared it to more than a usual extent, I believe, to its members. I have seen strong men with tears in their eyes protesting against the destruction of the church of their fathers. What answer could we give to such men if we lightly legislated that church out of existence or allowed it to be legislated out of existence by taking away from them under this bill that right to appeal to the courts which naturally belongs to them?

I shall not further take up the time of the committee at this late hour. I have indicated sufficiently my stand on the bill. Hon. members can see the real reason why no one who values the traditions of the House can support the bill or vote for it, namely, that the legislation prevents litigation, that is to say, prevents or interrupts the right of certain persons to appeal to the courts, something which should be the inherent and inalienable right of every citizen. I therefore wish to support the report of the committee. The basis of our whole constitution, the greatest boast of our land and of our race, has always been our recognition of the principle of justice. If that principle was ever lost sight of we could not continue to carry on the proceedings of this House. The chairman as he presides over the meetings of this committee represents that principle, just as the king as he presides over the country represents it, in poor imitation of that greater justice which is divine. As far as we can we imitate that justice, and we should not at any time depart from it. We should regard it as the sacred right of any man to obtain justice as far as he can from the courts of the country, and it is because I feel that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lisgar would have the effect of departing from that justice that I shall have to oppose it.

Mr. HAROLD PUTNAM (Colchester): It is always a pleasure to hear the rare diction and the exceptionally pleasing delivery of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond). In this instance, however, I feel that much of his doctrine is wide of the mark and lacks a concrete application to this case. I would say of the hon. member, with all the respect due to any clever and distinguished layman, that had he been a lawyer I do not think he would have made such an ill-conceived application of legal principles as he has to the particular case in point. But for the fact that I was unavoidably absent from the Private Bills committee during the discussion and the vote on the amendments which it is now sought to delete, I think I should have given a silent vote on this occasion. It happened that that was almost the only sitting of that committee which I missed.

I listened with care to the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) when he argued that this was not a proper case for the committee of the whole to review. He said that the committee below have heard the witnesses and on that point he attempted to build up an analogy with the taking of an appeal from a minor court to a supreme court. Where there is any question with regard to the credibility of the witnesses of course the court below has a tremendous advantage, and the court above will seldom interfere in that respect. But this, Mr. Chairman, is by no means a case of that kind. Let us not on an occasion so important as this forget to be practical. The honesty of the witnesses who gave their evidence before the committee below is unquestioned. Having regard to the character of those witnesses, to their demeanour and to the well-nigh sacred nature of the subjects with which they at times dealt, I am sure that nobody at any time thought of raising a question as to their credibility. In that respect, therefore, the committee of the whole is in the same position as the committee below. Then we have to take into account that, in substantial part at least, the committee below was concerned with questions of law and procedure, with questions of theological doctrine. Does anybody suggest now that we are not in just as good a position as the committee below to decide these things according to that doctrine, according to that theory, and according to the facts?

Mr. PORTER: When did this House ever hear the evidence given before the committee or have an opporunity of reading it so that they would know what it was?

Mr. PUTNAM: I concede that the evidence was not printed, although if anybody had really insisted upon it that might have been done. But the doors were wide open to the public, the gallery of spectators was exceptionally large, and a battery of newspaper reporters was present who synopsized the proceedings and wired them out every few hours. So that there was the utmost publicity, and it is merely an academic argument for the hon. gentleman to say that we are not now in as good a position to look into the facts, theories and doctrines, the law and justice of the case, as was the committee below.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make my remarks brief, and to make them revolve rather strictly around the immediate clause under discussion. As to that clause it is significant that we had a statement from the chairman of the Private Bills committee to the effect that counsel were not heard upon it. I will join the preamble with that clause. I will gladly lay at the feet of the chairman of the Private Bills committee my tribute to the spirit of justice which he displayed, to his fair demeanour, to his attempt to be impartial. I was informed by some of the committee—I have already said that I was not there on that precise occasion, although I attended at all hours all the other sittings—that counsel were denied the right to appear before the committee on this particular amendment. As to the reason for that I am not going to inquire. I know that the chairman had conscientious reasons. Whether they were right or wrong—

Mr. DUFF: It is not fair to blame the chairman. The committee decided that, not the chairman.

Mr. PUTNAM: If the hon. member would weigh what I have said, he will find that I was careful not to blame the chairman. I heard the explanation of the chairman that that was by arrangement, but I do wish to be practical to-night, and all the way through, and it is a fact that members of that committee, largely laymen, found themselves at that point, and only at that point, without the expert advice and assistance of counsel as to the exact meaning of that amendment. I will not say they misapprehended the clause; I think I could give evidence on that. I will say it is only too easy a matter of inference that they, as laymen, could well have misapprehended that clause, and it was a thousand pities that the able and reputable counsel for the unionists or against them were not heard on that particular amendment, as to which the committee made it very plain they wanted to hear counsel.

Mr. DUFF: The committee decided against hearing counsel.

Mr. PUTNAM: Members of the committee insisted counsel be heard.

Mr. DUFF: One.

Mr. PUTNAM: It may have been one or more. One may have expressed the wish of many. The significant fact is that counsel were not heard as to that amendment, though heard fully on everything else in this bill, and I ask the House to remember that.

Earlier in the history of this bill there were a great many people in the country, and I admit there are substantial numbers yet, who were absolutely opposed to this bill, and for its rejection in toto. I wish to show that those in favour of these amendments and those against them are much nearer together to-night than perhaps they realize. I think it is scarcely necessary for me to say that I believe this dispute and this conflict has been carried on with the best of good faith on all sides. I saw no evidence of anything else in the committee, and I have seen no evidence of anything else in this House. I am going to assume that that common honesty and that common good faith existed and still exist on both sides. There was a time when the opponents of this union throughout the country were opponents whom I might call out-and-outers. There were witnesses before the committee who wanted, not a modification of the bill, not an amended bill, not a compromise on the bill, but an absolute rejection of the bill.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUTNAM: That opened an impassable gulf between the one side and the other. The hon. member for Lunenburg says "hear, hear." He himself—

Mr. DUFF: I said it this afternoon.

Mr. PUTNAM: And he says it now. There was at one stage that impassable gulf. Now the gulf is pretty nearly bridged, and I say it in all good faith, because in this report coming from the committee you get no echo of the voice of the man who may call himself an anti-unionist. Why? There are two classes in this discussion now. There are those whom I will call the unionists, and there are the conditional unionists who say, not that they are opposed to this bill, but that they will consent to it on two conditions; if the bill will successfully run the gauntlet of those two conditions they are unionists too, and will vote for the bill, with all its main features and all its incidentals. Now, can people who take that position really in their reflective moments believe that this bill is fraught with great injustice or any great evil? If they did, what should be their attitude? Independently of what the civil courts might say, or a church constitution might say, their attitude would be: We shall not suffer injustice; we shall not suffer wrong of a substantial kind; we will still be opposed to the bill and opposed to it without any modification of our attitude. Now I wish to tell this House and the country that so far as that attitude is concerned it completely disappeared in the Private Bills committee, and it has completely disappeared so far as this House is concerned. The anti-unionists have completely disappeared, and we have now two classes of unionists.

Now what are those two conditions upon which the conditional unionists are willing that the bill pass? I am not going to be told, I shall not believe it if I am told, that when those who support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lunenburg, setting up as a first condition that if this bill will successfully run the gauntlet of the civil courts and it is thereby decided that the Presbyterian church proceeded constitutionally, according to the church meaning of that term, say the bill will be all right under that condition, they had any intention of fraud whatsoever. It would be, I contend, a species of deception, a species almost of fraud, if they felt or if their counsel felt certain in the back of his head that the issue would be sure to be determined against the unionist and that it would be found that the church courts had not proceeded constitutionally. The very conscience of the gambler will recoil from betting on a certainty, and I say these men were not betting on a certainty. They were acting in good faith, and they said: We are willing to submit a fairly divided probability to the civil courts, and if they decide that the highest court of the Presbyterian church has acted constitutionally we will let the bill come into force. I say it was a fairly divided proposition, because I do not think anybody here is dogmatic or arbitrary enough, I well-nigh said foolish enough, to say there would be any certainty as to the issue of that law suit which would ensue. No man could be sure of it.

Well then, Mr. Chairman, here we have our pure unionists, and our conditional unionists; and our conditional unionists are merely laying down that if it turns out from the pronouncements of the civil courts—I want to emphasize this—that the Presbyterian church in the strictly narrow sense has proceeded constitutionally, they will let the bill go through with all its blessings; and if the conditional unionists really believe that the bill is fraught with any of its alleged evil or injustice they would let it go through with these too, would they? They are willing to help it through if the civil courts will do so. I say that proves that nobody in this House is unalterably or unreasonably opposed to union. It proves that not even the conditional unionists consider that this bill is really a very bad one.

Perhaps I am compelled to withdraw the word "unreasonably," because after all I think our attitude should be to treat this matter largely on its merits, not to make an idol of the constitution of the church to the extent of saying that the technical reading of its constitution shall determine the life or death of this bill, quite independent of the merits or the demerits of the conflict and controversy which have been created around this particular measure. It is true that they ask us to run the risk of another conflict which is this: That if the Supreme Court will say that this parliament has jurisdiction to pass the bill as respects that part thereof which professes to deal with federal legislation, then they will be prepared to allow that part to go into effect and take the results. I say that in this respect it is another place wherein those who support this amendment,—the conditional unionists as I term them for the want of a better name, and I do not say that with any disrespect,—will find themselves under the most grave danger that the union bill would run that little risk. Because—and I think I may say this without incurring any risk of being guilty of bad taste—there is a statement from the Deputy Minister of Justice and there is no sounder lawyer within the bounds of the Dominion. He has given his opinion that there is no question that on this second branch of these two conditions the unionists are in the right and that this parliament has jurisdiction. I do not profess for a moment to be anything more than a very humble lawyer but I will say this—that if as between the provincial and the federal jurisdiction we have not the power to unite bodies of this kind it is high time we knew why, and it is high time that our constitution in that respect should be amended. Personally I have the belief that there is ample power, and that if the conditional unionists are counting on only a bare chance on that branch of their amendment they would lose.

Mr. BOYS: The hon. gentleman has referred to the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice. That is very important. Was that opinion committed to writing, and is it available?

Mr. PUTNAM: I could not say as to that. I am very credibly informed that the Deputy Minister of Justice gave that opinion, and I asked my informant whether it would be proper to make this statement on the floor of parliament.

Mr. BOYS: The hon. member has stated that the deputy minister has given such an opinion, and I have not the slightest doubt that when he makes the statement he is correct. But I think other members are entitled to the information if it is available. It is certainly very important inasmuch as it involves one of the very amendments to this bill.

Mr. PUTNAM: I cannot guarantee that we can get the opinion in writing; I have had no immediate experience in regard to that sort of request. I feel absolutely certain, however, that the opinion was unequivocally given by the Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. BOYS: Will the hon. member tell me to whom the information was given?

Mr. PUTNAM: If I gave the name it would carry absolute respect throughout Canada, but perhaps the hon. gentlemen will excuse me from linking up any further name in this connection.

Mr. BOYS: I am not trying to pry into anything of a private nature, but if we can get the information it will prove advantageous to every member of this House. If this is a private matter I can assure the hon. member I do not wish to press my request, but I would have thought, however, that if the Deputy Minister of Justice had been asked for an opinion on this very important matter that opinion would have been available to all the members.

Mr. PUTNAM: I can only say that when I have completed my few rambling remarks I shall be very glad to see the hon. member privately and ascertain whether Mr. Newcombe's opinion can be again disclosed and whether we can get it in writing. I do not doubt the good faith or question the courtesy of my hon. friend in pressing his question as he has done. Now then, if we admit that there is at least a fair probability that on the last branch of this amendment the conditional unionists would lose and the real unionists would win, it simply resolves itself into the sole remaining question of whether we are going to make such an idol of the strict technical interpretation of the constitution of the Presbyterian church as that it must permanently hold back a great movement of this sort, as that it must be considered as something upon which human hands may scarcely be laid at all.

Our friends who support the challenged amendments to this bill appeal to the case of the Scottish church in the Old Country. I have no quarrel with that except that those gentlemen do not go the full length of the experience there. That is to say they settle upon the result of the litigation: they will not go to the next step and look at the result, and look at the initiation, of the legislation. It is true that the two Presbyterian churches which tried to unite in Scotland—the Free church and the United Presbyterian—made a constitutional mistake. It turned upon a very small matter indeed, and as the case ran through the Scottish courts each one of those courts said that no mistake had been made; that the churches had perfect authority to unite as they did without any recourse to parliament. It came up to the House of Lords, because that body of course is the highest court of appeal in such a matter. They weighed the matter and they were divided three to three. In that event, but for the death of Lord Shand, the decisions of the Scotch courts would have stood and it would have been proclaimed to-day that those churches united properly without any recourse to parliament. When Lord Shand died there was a re-hearing and the majority by four to two decided that because the Free church departed in a slight particular on a question of what was called patronage from the doctrine which it had believed in former years, but which even then had lain dormant for many years, it could not carry property with it, and therefore in a practical sense the union could not be consummated. What did they do? They immediately went to the Mother of Parliaments herself, and she gave corrective legislation upon which I am not going to dilate to-night. But when this Canadian Presbyterian General Assembly sought to bring about union they apprehended this very thing. It is in their appendix of law, and there they categorically refer to the unfortunate and technically unconstitutional experience of the Scottish church in getting into that little blunder and they said "We will make that right by making the legislation supersede the possible law suit". In Scotland the law suit came first and the corrective legislation afterwards. Here we are putting the legislation first. We cannot prevent anybody from going to law, but we want to make it humanly certain that nobody can disrupt this union by carrying tedious litigation into our civil courts for a pronouncement.

Mr. BOYS: Would my hon. friend permit me a question on the second clause? He has dealt with the reference which the present bill provides to the courts on a constitutional question under the British North America Act. Would he agree with me that is a question that those who are opposed to this act can have tried no matter what this parliament does?

Mr. PUTNAM: That they can have tried—is that what my hon. friend is asking?

Mr. BOYS: Suppose we put the bill through with that clause out, it would be quite proper in the pending suit to have that very question decided in the courts; in other words to ascertain whether or not the act would be ultra vires; and if the act were held to be ultra vires, you would then have the whole union which it was sought to consummate upset; and that is a right which they would have no matter what is done in this House.

Mr. PUTNAM: I do not understand that there is any pending litigation now which would settle the question. The pending litigation would settle only at most the present constitution of the Presbyterian church in one or two particulars. Of course I am willing to stand corrected. Does the hon. member say the suit now pending would deal with the wide question of the jurisdiction of parliament to pass the bill?

Mr. BOYS: I have no hesitation in saying that the action which was commenced last January, in which issue has been joined, and which is now pending for trial in Toronto involves the two questions, namely the right of the General Assembly to do what they did, and also the question of property and civil rights. It is alleged that this very act assumes to deal with property and civil rights, and that therefore this act is ultra vires.

Mr. PUTNAM: If I could feel that there was any doubt about that latter point, I would think it a great pity that the point could not be decided before this measure is further dealt with.

Mr. BOYS: That is the way I feel about it. That suit will be pressed to a decision in any event, and is it not better to obtain a decision and know where we are, rather than to have union consummated, and then to have the courts decide that union is ultra vires? Such a decision would produce a chaotic condition.

Mr. PUTNAM: I find myself unable to take that view very seriously, namely as to whether this federal parliament has the right to go as far as it professes to go in this bill. I now therefore come back to my first position, that I do not think there is anything in the doctrine of the Presbyterian church which would tie the hands of this church forever if it wanted to consummate a union with some other body of worthy Christians. That is the effect of one branch of this amendment: Submit that to the civil courts and see what they think about it. Quite apart from that immediate aspect of the matter, the church is not supposed to run to the civil courts to have those courts pronounce upon its own constitution. In the Old Country it was decided, perhaps narrowly, that the church must do that. In the United States we find that the civil courts would refuse to review the constitution, the discipline, the procedure, or any such cognate matters, of the church as has been done in Britain. The matter simmers down to this: If you could submit to an American court the question of the constitutionality, the first branch of the amendment, to the United States courts, they would say, "We will not interfere with what the General Assembly of the church in the United States has done". That matter was decided in a case in the Supreme Court of the United States. I will read a few lines from the judgment in that case to show the view they held as compared with the British view. I refer to the case of Watson versus Jones, Supreme Court of the United States Reports, volume 80, pages 679-789, and I read from the controlling judgment as follows:

> We can very well understand how the Lord Chancellor of England, who is, in his office, in a large sense, the head and representative of the Established church, who controls very largely the church patronage, and whose judicial decision may be, and not unfrequently is, invoked in cases of heresy and ecclesiastical contumacy, should feel, even in dealing with a dissenting church, but little delicacy in grappling with the most abstruse problems of theological controversy, or in construing the instruments which those churches have adopted as their rules of government, or inquiring into their customs and usages.

Then the judgment gives the American view as follows:

> It is not to be supposed that the judges of the civil courts (in the United States) can be as competent in the ecclesiastical law and religious faith of all these bodies as the ablest men in each are in reference to their own. It would therefore be an appeal from the more learned tribunal in the law which should decide the case to one which is less so.
> We have said that these views are supported by the preponderant weight of authority in this country, and for the reasons which we have given, we do not think the doctrines of the English Chancery court on this subject should have with us the influence which we would cheerfully accord to it on others.

Now when we consider that the Presbyterian Church in the United States is many times as large and wealthy an organization as the Presbyterian Church in Canada by reason of the population and wealth of that country, and when we consider that that church in the United States is renowned for its generosity and philanthropy, that it will not bow to the civil courts there upon any question of its own constitution, and is not compelled to do so, it is a fair question whether in Canada the Presbyterian church should not follow the rights of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, rather than to go to England for its law in an extremely close decision in that respect. In England the Lord Chancellor is technically head of the church and not afraid to grapple with questions of theology and church constitution.

The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) spoke very feelingly about the rights of the minority. He thereby made the confession that those who are not unionists are in the minority, which in a sort of hesitating way has been widely denied by those whose attitude is extreme. Now we have to take into account the rights of the majority as well as the rights of the minority. What chaos would follow, and what an abnormal condition of affairs would ensue, if the majority of the Presbyterians, and the overwhelming majority of those who speak in the Presbyterian church courts, and ostensibly all Canadian Methodists and Congregationalists, would find that, after all this preparation they were thrown back where they were before, and that they must therefore in the future lie helpless behind a strict interpretation of the constitutional procedure in the Presbyterian church. There is no question the Presbyterian church has the right to change its procedure. There is a question whether it can change it and carry with it the property.

I was sorry to hear the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) go as far as he did in his contention, because he strongly suggested that this was largely a question of property or a struggle for property. As far as I have watched the motive of both sides in this unfortunate conflict, I think that is furthest from their thoughts. I think their motive is to do more good in the world by the agency of their United church than they have been able to do in the past. I am utterly at a loss to know whether their ambition will be accomplished. I am an adherent of the Presbyterian church myself, although I never felt myself worthy in spirit to enter into the full communion of that church, but from the evidence before me and from the spirit which I see on both sides, I resent the imputation that this is any squabble for property, and I hear men on both sides say that they wish they could divest themselves of the question of property and that they wish they could stand up and convince the onlooking public that they were animated by very much higher motives. I know that some of the leaders on both sides would be willing to walk out without scrip or purse as regards the church property if thereby they could advance the kingdom which is so dear to them. Whether the unionists may realize their splendid ambition for the results of this union I myself have doubts. I have grave doubts whether to some extent they shall not be disappointed. But I am asked by the supporters of this amendment to take the responsibility of holding back those people who wish to go forward in this great and spontaneous movement, because the constitution of the Presbyterian church, by a strict interpretation, must be held, as it might be held by a civil court, as forever impossible of being changed or departed from. I intend to look at the movement on its merits and to agree incidentally that if the technical church constitution must be over-ridden, it must. It was over-ridden in the Old Country, in Scotland the home of Presbyterianism, and it can be here, without violation of the conscience of any reasonable man. We have been told that there is injustice here. If anybody even at this stage can show wherein that injustice lies and can propose feasible amendments whereby, on the property question or on any other question where injustice is alleged, this bill can remove that injustice, I shall give it my support. But for the meantime—and I came to this decision after a great deal of thought; I have kept an open mind on the subject all through the hearings I have attended—although as an adherent I had at an early stage voted against this proposal for union, I have come to the conclusion that it is my undoubted duty to support the bill with this cardinal amendment removed.

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): In the remarks which I propose to address to the committee at this stage, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am not speaking for the government of which I am a member. It is well understood that upon this great subject there is a division of opinion amongst the members of the government just as there is amongst members of the party to which we are attached, and amongst the members of all the parties which are to be found in this House. Personally, my attitude in regard to this matter is that I am opposed to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). I wish to point out to the committee the position in which that amendment stands and to raise the point that it should be ruled out of order. If the committee will direct its attention for a moment or two to the matter which I am about to submit to it, I feel sure that hon. members will agree with me in the conclusion at which I have arrived after considerable deliberation. I hesitated about bringing this question to the attention of the committee before I had thoroughly and completely satisfied myself as to the impropriety of the amendment of the hon. member and as to the position which I am taking being absolutely correct. The position of the matter is as follows: Section 2 in this bill is the matter under consideration and the question has been put by the Chairman. The hon. member for Lisgar gave notice that, in regard to section 2, he would move this afternoon as follows:

> That the whole of section 2 of the said bill be stricken out.

The committee will notice that the proposition is that the whole of section 2 be stricken out:

> And the following substituted therefor:
> 2. This act shall come into force on the 10th day of June, 1925, except the provisions required to permit the vote provided for in section 10, being taken, which shall come into force on the 10th day of December, 1924.
> 3. And that section 10, subsection "B", be amended by adding thereto the words, "On matters affecting the disposal of property."

My hon. friend proposes first that the section be stricken out, and he proposes this by way of amendment. He also proposes that two distinct substitutions shall be made.

Mr. BROWN: The last part of the amendment No. 3 is not part of the amendment that I moved this afternoon. That is an amendment that was intended to be brought up when that stage of the bill was reached.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): If the hon. member wants to have the section that he has marked here, section 3, considered at a later stage of the bill, he had better give a new notice, because the notice is applicable to two distinct sections. I take it, of course, that my hon. friend moved only that portion of this clause of which he gave notice which is contained in the two proposals, first:

That the whole of section 2 be stricken out.

And second:

And the following be substituted therefor:

"This act shall come into force on the 10th day of June, 1925."

The question is whether, under the rules of the House, it is possible absolutely to strike out a section in a bill or the whole of the terms of any motion or question that comes before the House for consideration and to substitute some other proposal for it. If we look at the rules in regard to the question, we shall find that in Beauchesne's book, rule 36 on page 93 states:

When a question is under debate, no motion is received unless to amend it.

That is, by changing in some way the proposed resolution or section or question:

To postpone it to a day certain; for the previous question; for reading the Orders of the Day; for proceeding to another order, to adjourn the debate; or for the adjournment of the House.

Other than for those purposes no motion can be made affecting a section or a question. Clause 331 goes on to state:

A motion may be amended: (a) by leaving out certain words.

In an existing resolution or section.

(b) By leaving out certain words in order to insert other words; (c) by inserting or adding other words.

My hon. friend does not do any of those three things. He proposes to destroy the clause altogether and to substitute another clause for it. In other words, he proposes to do two things at once; to strike out wholly section 2 of the bill and, second, to insert a new section in the bill. Under the rules he cannot do this. As to that the authorities are so clear that there can be no question about the matter. First in May at page 258 there is this statement:

The object of an amendment may be to effect such an alteration in a question as will obtain the support of those who, without such alteration, must either vote against it or abstain from voting thereon, or to present to the House an alternative proposition either wholly or partially opposed to the original question. This may be effected by moving to omit all the words of the question after the first word, "that", and to substitute in their place other words of a different import.

If my hon. friend had moved that section 2 of the bill should be amended by striking out all the words after the words—

This act shall not come into force.

—and then substituted the words which he proposes, he would be within the rules, because he would be altering in some way a section in the bill and leaving the origination of that section, so that his substitution would be regular. But my hon. friend was proposing to do two things. This is the position that the House would be in. A resolution to strike out a section in a bill absolutely is a matter to which we might all give adherence. That is one issue. It would remove from the bill a section which provides certain things. But when my hon. friend goes further and moves not only to strike out a section absolutely, but to insert an entirely new and different clause, the House is asked to vote for two propositions at the same time, one way or the other. It is up to every hon. member to say first whether he is in favour of striking out the clause or not. That is a substantive proposition. He is also compelled by reason of my hon. friend's proposition to consider whether he would vote for the substitution. Now, that is where my hon. friend runs counter to the rules. The point is so clearly stated by Redlich, third volume, page 94, that if the committee will follow me closely they will agree that no language of mine could make the situation more obvious. Redlich says.

It is irregular to move by way of amendment to omit a whole clause and to substitute another. Such a proposal is equivalent to proposing a new clause. The rules insist upon such a substitution being carried out in two stages: the old clause may be struck out first and the new one inserted afterwards. But the insertion of the new clause may only be made after the whole text of the bill has been gone through and all the amendments thereto disposed of.

According to Redlich therefore my hon. friend is clearly out of order. It is positively stated that it is irregular to move by way of amendment to omit the whole of a clause and substitute another, and that is what the hon. gentleman is proposing to do. That rule is observed for a very necessary and obvious reason which I have already given. If the hon. gentleman desired to have clause 2 struck out he should have moved that it be deleted, and given notice of a subsequent motion at any time for the substitution of a new clause. He could not, however, move at one and the same time that the old clause be struck out and the new one substituted therefor, because the two things cannot be done simultaneously under the rules. Therein my hon. friend has failed. Now, we have had a debate on this matter all afternoon and evening touching the merits of clause 2. How many hon. gentlemen have discussed the new amendment proposed by the hon. member? I do not think I have heard any hon. gentleman who has addressed the committee throughout the debate give any consideration for one moment to the new amendment which, if it were in order, my hon. friend is asking the committee to adopt. The course open to my hon. friend, if the committee is agreeable, is to withdraw the amendment he has moved. If he wishes to attack the existing clause in the bill he must do so by a specific notice of motion for the purpose, but he cannot by any possibility under the authorities I have quoted do the two things at once. As hon. gentlemen are aware, it frequently occurs in this House that an amendment is moved to a motion which is under consideration. What is the nature of such an amendment? It is to the effect, "that all the words after the word 'that' be struck out and that the following words be substituted therefor". That is the proper form in which an amendment should be stated. But if an hon. member moved that a resolution under con-

12 m. sideration should be amended by its being struck out and another resolution substituted in place of it he would be out of order, as would readily be seen. The ordinary practice in these matters is to preserve the integrity of the original motion by asking, in the amending motion, that "all the words after the word 'that' be struck out and that the following words be substituted therefor". My hon. friend however does not propose to do that in this instance and he runs counter to the rules; he asks the committee on a distinct issue to wipe out an existing clause in the bill. He can do that of course; but he cannot, as he is attempting to do, ask the committee to adopt a second clause in substitution therefor. The authority I have quoted from Redlich is positive on the point. Let me refer also to Blackmore's Speakers' Decisions wherein the rule is laid down:

> A proposition which is of the nature of a substitution rather than an amendment cannot be put unless the question which it seeks to amend be negatived, when it is competent to submit the motion.

My hon. friend's motion is therefore not in order for the reasons I have given and I submit that the chairman should so rule.

The CHAIRMAN: Does any hon. member desire to speak to the point of order? The objection advanced by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald, Pictou) has reference to a notice of motion by way of amendment appearing in the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons of June 17.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): May I interrupt you for a moment, Mr. Chairman? I want to make it clear that the objection I am taking is based not only on the ground of irregularity; my hon. friend is proposing a new clause altogether, which he cannot do.

Mr. McMASTER: Do I understand the minister to advise us that if the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) had left the word "that" in the amendment everything would be all right, but that the fact that he strikes "that" out as well as all the rest renders his motion out of order? In other words, that that "that" makes the difference?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The position I take is supported by the authorities I have already quoted.

Mr. BOYS: Would not the minister consider this a notice of motion of a twofold character? I have my own idea as to what the committee did, and everyone knows that I support the committee. But I should think it a misfortune if we lost all this afternoon and evening's discussion and if the committee were obliged to go all over the subject again perhaps to-morrow or the next day. I have not had the opportunity of considering the authorities but one is impressed by what the minister has quoted and it would seem that the amendment is not in order. But if a notice of motion had been given to strike out the clause as it stands and a further notice were given that a substituted clause would subsequently be moved I take it from the authorities quoted that such a procedure would be in order. I do believe that it is the sense of the committee that we should get on with the bill and have it disposed of, and I would respectfully suggest to the minister that he treat this as a double-barrelled notice and that we now proceed with the only thing which as he says, has been under discussion namely, the striking out of the clause as it now exists. That can be disposed of and we can then take up the second phase of the question and deal with it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I have not raised the point of order without a sense of the importance of having the debate expedited as much as possible, for I am just as anxious as any other hon. member to facilitate the business of the House. But I considered it my duty to bring to the attention of the committee the irregularity of the hon. member's amendment. Otherwise the rules of the House might be violated and the present procedure might possibly be regarded at some time in the future as constituting a precedent. Personally I have no objection whatever to any course by which the hon. gentleman can bring himself within the rules. As the hon. member has pointed out, if my hon. friend from Lisgar had given notice of motion simply that clause 2 of the bill be struck out he would be in order, and if he desired to propose a new clause later on he could do so. It is a matter for the committee to decide.

Mr. BOYS: I do not rise to take exception to the objection urged by the minister. I said that so far as I could size the situation up from the quotations he had made, he was quite right. But I do make that suggestion, though I realize it could not be adopted without unanimous consent, and as the minister raises the point his consent would perhaps be necessary above all. If my suggestion is favourably considered we could simply treat this to-night as a notice of motion that we are dealing merely with the striking out of that clause and with nothing else.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It is entirely a question of the consent of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: As I have stated, the Votes and Proceedings of the 17th of June contain notice of this amendment. The question arises whether the amendment is therefore in order or whether it is objectionable upon the ground stated by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald). Rule 112 of the House provides that no important amendment may be proposed to any private bill in committee of the Whole House or at the third reading of the bill unless one day's notice of the same has been given. That rule applies only to private bills, and it puts private bills in an altogether different position from that of resolutions or any other matters that come before the House or the committee for discussion. Beauchesne, in his book on parliamentary procedure, cited by the hon. Minister of National Defence, at paragraph 331 states what is also indicated in May and in Bourinot:

[Mr. E. M. Macdonald.]

> A motion may be amended: (a) by leaving out certain words (b) by leaving out certain words in order to insert other words; (c) by inserting or adding other words.

The expression "certain words" would in my opinion mean those that are specifically designated or named or identified in such a way that no one could be misled. In May's Parliamentary Practice, at the same page as quoted from by the hon. Minister of National Defence, the reasons and the objects of an amendment are indicated and the manner in which it may be made. Such amendments are usually made by striking out all the words or a number of words after the word "that;" because all resolutions, as hon. members are aware, begin with the word "that." Of course in this particular section of the bill that word cannot be struck out because the section does not begin with "that." Hon. members will note that the wording of the section is as follows:

> This act shall not come into force until the first day of July 1926, and not then—

And certain sub-paragraphs follow. The amendment proposed is that this act shall come into force on the tenth of June 1925—after clause 2 is struck out, if the amendment carries. The effect of ruling this proposed amendment out of order would be this: The vote taken in the committee would be taken directly on clause 2, which is the section providing for the act coming into force. If that clause was struck out the act would come into force upon receiving the royal assent. The amendment proposes to postpone the coming into effect, not, it is true, until the date mentioned in section 2, but until a different day. If I understand the minister correctly, Redlich does not go so far as to say that such an amendment would be out of order, though he does say it would be irregular. I am strongly inclined to doubt that its being irregular would mean that it would be out of order. Webster states that amendments are made by substituting something else in the place of what is removed. As was suggested by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), the matter really comes down to the point that if the first word of the section was left in, the amendment would be in order. With all due deference to the objection raised by the hon. Minister of National Defence, I cannot think we are bound by what may be interpreted as the English practice and that we are tied down to an objection of so highly technical a character, and I so rule.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I bow to the ruling of the chairman, though I entertain my own opinion as to whether he is correct in overruling Redlich. I would venture to address a few words to the committee on the general principle of the bill.

I happen to represent more members of the Presbyterian Church in Canada than any other hon. gentleman here.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I doubt that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend disputes the honour with me; we will check up the census figures and see who is right. I make that claim because I represent a very large constituency, three-quarters of whose people are adherents or members of the Presbyterian church. They have given to Canada and to the church in Canada a number of very distinguished men, men who have played a great part in the history of this country. When I hear hon. gentlemen talk about getting away from the hand of the dead past, I wonder whether it is a good thing for Canada that the achievements of the great men who have gone before should be entirely forgotten, and that we should enter upon a period in which materialism should run rampant and in which all that has stood for solidity of institutions and for advancement in Canada shall have disappeared.

We have given to Canada from the Presbyterians of my constituency men like Sir William Dawson, the first president of McGill University; Doctor George M. Grant, of Kingston, Doctor Falconer, president of Toronto University, Rev. Doctor D. M. Gordon, second president of Queen's University. The Presbyterians of my county are opposed to church union. They voted against it by a large majority in 1915, and since that time they have been misrepresented in the assembly of the church by ministers and those who have the right to go to the assembly and who did not carry out the principle that ought to prevail in a democratic church of speaking for the people who are behind them. Out of ten congregations in my constituency, 3,222 people voted against union and 342 for union, a few months ago. That is an indication of the feeling of the people whom I represent, and I am here to speak for them. I therefore ask this committee, I ask this parliament, to hesitate before taking any step by which that church would be absolutely blotted out.

Let me read to the committee a statement which has been sent to me by the distinguished ex-principal of Queen's, Dr. D. M. Gordon; it puts the story reasonably from the standpoint of those who believe in the church, in its history and in its great achievement. The statement reads:

Dear Mr. MACDONALD,

Permit me to draw your attention to some considerations connected with the bill at present before parliament for the incorporation of the United Church of Canada.

For ten years (1905-1915) I was a member of the Union committee of the Presbyterian church and a warm advocate of the movement, believing that, if it could be accomplished with the general consent of the members, it would tend to promote very greatly the spiritual life of our people and the progress of the Kingdom of God in our country.

At the outset it was stipulated that the church would enter into the proposed union only on condition of the practically unanimous consent of the members. In the report of the Union Committee submitted to the General Assembly in 1905 it is stated that, "It was universally recognized that "a union of the churches to be real and lasting must carry the consent of the entire membership" (Assembly Minutes, Appendix, p. 280) and this was adopted unanimously by the assembly. (Ass. Minutes, p. 46).

I can say with the utmost confidence that if we had imagined that the proposed union could be secured only at the cost of the disruption of the Presbyterian church the movement would have ended with the initial proposal of it in our General Assembly.

That is a very important statement.

As negotiations proceeded year after year and the basis of union was gradually drawn up, opposition to it developed in the courts of the church, so that it was determined to submit the matter to the members to ascertain the mind of the whole church concerning it. Accordingly, the assembly remitted it to presbyteries, in 1911, to consult all the congregations of the church.

It has been contended that the constitution and laws of the church did not require the assent of the members, and that the judgment of presbyteries, synods and General Assembly should be a sufficient guide and warrant for procedure in this matter, as in other important movements within the church, these bodies being entitled to represent the entire membership. No organized society, however, makes provision in its constitution and forms of procedure for its own extinction, and, as the church consists not merely of its official courts but of its entire membership, and as it was now proposed to merge the Presbyterian church in an entirely new ecclesiastical organization, this action in asking for the judgment of all the congregations and members was both wise and essential. Moreover, the pledge given at the outset of the negotiations to consummate union only with "the consent of the entire membership" could not be evaded.

When, in the assembly of 1912, the votes of the members were received and considered, we were greatly surprised to find a substantial minority opposed to the union. Out of a total registered membership of 287,944 only 155,033 voted; and of those voting only 106,755 approved, while 48,278 were opposed. That is, 54 per cent of the total membership voted: 37 per cent of the total membership for union; 17 per cent of the total membership against union. (See Minutes of Assembly for 1912, Appendix, p. 330).

In view of this opposition, the assembly resolved as follows:—"In view of the extent of the minority which is not yet convinced that organic union is the best method of expressing the unity sincerely desired by all, the assembly deems it unwise immediately to proceed to consummate the union, but believes that by further conference and discussion practically unanimous action can be secured within a reasonable time". (Min. of Ass, 1912, p. 45). Meanwhile closer relations might be fostered between the churches and greater co-operation promoted in missionary, educational and social activities.

In 1915 it was again agreed by the General Assembly to consult the members of the church, but when the vote was received and considered by the assembly in 1916, we were surprised to find that the opposition had greatly increased, that while 106,534 members voted in favour of the Union proposals, 69,913 voted against them. (Ass. Min. for 1916, Appendix, p. 279).

Evidently it would have been wise at this stage to halt further proceedings, even although a majority of presbyteries favoured union. Clearly the time was not ripe for the proposed change. The mind of the church was not prepared for it; and organic union under such conditions would tend rather to hinder than to promote spiritual unity.

Instead, however, of calling a halt in the movement, the assembly in 1916 asserted its adherence to union as the policy of the church; but later, in 1917, the assembly agreed to suspend further action in connection with it until a year after the close of the war. It was expected that the experiences of the war, in uniting all citizens more closely for other purposes affecting the national life, might also move the members of all churches to closer unity.

No further action has been taken since 1916 to ascertain the mind of the members of the church regarding union. Within these intervening years many members have returned from service overseas and thousands of new members have been enrolled, so that we cannot say what are the present proportions of advocates and opponents of union. Whatever weight we may attach to the many arguments that may be urged in favour of union, and whatever may be our personal predilictions in regard to it, the outstanding fact is that there is resolute and apparently increasing opposition to it on the part of the membership of the Presbyterian church. The opponents are probably still in the minority, but they are quite determined that the Presbyterian church must be continued in its present organization.

It is evident, therefore, that if church union is consummated according to the bill for incorporation now before parliament, it must result in the very serious disruption of the Presbyterian church.

I will ask the committee to note the significant utterance of this father of the church in Canada, one of the most honoured and respected men that ever held a high position in the educational and religious life of this country, when he says:

It is evident, therefore, that if church union is consummated according to the bill for incorporation now before parliament, it must result in the very serious disruption of the Presbyterian church. And when it is stated, as in the preamble to the bill, that the Presbyterian church is a party to the petition for the act of incorporation, it should be noted that this is very far from being the petition of the entire church. Indeed, according even to the figures of 1916 (which now it is believed fall far short of representing the entire number of opponents) there is a smaller proportion of members in favour of the act of incorporation than would be required for the merging of two banks or other commercial institutions under the Joint Stock Company Act.

[Mr. E. M. Macdonald.]

Will the minority, who are determined to maintain the existence and activities of the Presbyterian church, be denied the right to preserve the name of the church as hitherto known? This is to them a matter of serious moment. The advocates of union claim that by the act of incorporation the Presbyterian church is merged in the United church and therefore ceases to exist as a separate organization. The minority claim that they will continue to be the Presbyterian church after the others have entered the new ecclesiastical organization. Of course, the minority could agree to form a Presbyterian church: not even parliament could prevent this, and the advocates of union admit it. And, for that matter, the body so formed would come to be known as the Presbyterian church. But the retention of the name and the claim of the minority to continue the present organization of the Presbyterian church might, if admitted, be held to carry with it the right to all the property of the Presbyterian church.

This has been one of the chief obstacles in preventing any conciliation between the two contending parties. It might, however, be a matter of agreement between the two parties that the minority should still retain the name but that the estate should be divided according to some equitable arrangement. The advocates of union might fitly be requested to make some agreement with the minority so that they would come before parliament with a united petition for the legislation required in the circumstances.

As to the terms and provisions of the act:—It may be noted that parliament is asked to pronounce upon the spiritual functions of the church as well as upon the tenure of property. This, however, is to ignore the proper functions of parliament. The church has the right to live and act as a free self-governing body with supreme jurisdiction in spiritual matters. It is only in connection with the tenure and administration of property that the church is in any way subject to the decisions of parliament or of courts of justice. In the proposed act, however, parliament is asked to ratify and confirm the Basis of Union and to guarantee to the church freedom to deal with her doctrines and teaching as the courts of the church may determine. While it is a grievous mistake for the church thus to ask the sanction of parliament in spiritual matters, it would surely be a mistake on the part of parliament, even at such a request, to take action outside of its own proper jurisdiction.

Parliament has, however, certain rights and jurisdiction in regard to the tenure and administration of property by the church, as by any other body of citizens, and much of the act is devoted to the transfer of the property of the negotiating churches to the United church.

The attempt is made to arrange for the assignment of certain properties to the "non-concurring" congregations. A commission is to be created to deal with all questions that may arise in connection with the division of the properties of the church, and the decisions of this commission are to be absolute and final, subject to no kind of review, civil or ecclesiastical. The effect, and manifestly the purpose, of this provision is to forestall and prevent any litigation between the contending parties by closing against them all the constituted courts of justice and forcing them to accept the decisions of this irresponsible commission. The appointment of such a commission could be justified only with the entire consent of both parties, otherwise it is grossly unjust. The minority, however, are not asked whether they agree to this arrangement, although they may, if they choose, be represented on the commission. It is offered to them as the only way to have their share of the property determined, and they are deprived of the right, which every citizen is supposed to possess, of access to the courts of justice. This is compulsory arbitration with a vengeance! Surely such a proposal cannot be sanctioned by the parliament of Canada as parliament stands for the protection, not for the coercion, of minorities.

Believe me.
Yours very faithfully,
DANIEL M. GORDON.

I ventured at this late hour to read that letter to the committee because it is the statement of a man who stands apart from all the controversy that has been waged around this question—a venerable man whose long life has been spent in the service of the church and in behalf of the educational institutions of this country. Retaining in their entirety the magnificent faculties with which he was endowed he tells us that he started out captivated by the idea that it would be a great thing to have union subject, however, as he put it, to the fact that that union in order to be efficacious should be unanimous. He tells the story of his disillusionment and to-day, in the evening of his life, he tells this parliament, after having viewed all that was likely to happen, that to pass this bill would lead to the disruption of the Presbyterian Church in Canada and inflict the evils that he complains of.

Is that picture a true one or is it not? It seems to me that some gentlemen in regard to this measure forget the genius of the people who for centuries have been connected with the Presbyterian church, the men of Scottish extraction who cherish with great devotion all the traditions of their race, and whose devotion to their church is of the very warp and fibre of their being. They forget the women who have had their children baptized within that church, who have been married according to its rites and the many over whose mortal remains its clergy have spoken the last word. They forget the older men and women who to-day stand looking out into the future. There comes to them some gentleman who says to them "All these treasures of which you are so proud are mere figments of the imagination; they amount to nothing. We will have an act passed in parliament whether you like it or not. We will take your religion from you and when you go out into the great unknown you will have nothing to solace you such as you have been accustomed to depend upon in the past."

There are hundreds of men and women in the constituency from which I come who are moved by intense feeling in this matter. I am here to speak on their behalf and to urge the House to hesitate before they take away from those people what they regard as the priceless things of life. Are minorities and their rights to be disregarded in this country? Sir, I have been in parliament for almost twenty years. I have seen occasions when the rights of minorities were menaced, and the men who stood up for those rights are those who uphold the rights of minorities to-day. I ask every fair-minded man here to realize that the rights of minorities must be religiously preserved in this country if we are going to maintain Canada as a happy and united country and if it is ever to realize the future we anticipate for it.

I do not propose to speak at any great length. One hon. gentleman in the early part of the debate spoke of the amendment under which this matter is referred to the courts as a challenge to the church. I think that was an unfortunate expression to use. A very large body of men connected with the Presbyterian church originated in good faith in the Supreme Court of Ontario an action to have it declared that the proceeding of those who constitute the General Assembly for the time being in coming to parliament and asking that their church should be destroyed was illegal. I understand that the pleadings in that suit have been closed, and the case stands ready for trial. I cannot recall any occasion in my experience in parliament in which parliament undertook to step in and take away from any litigant any right which in good faith he asserted he had. Hon. gentlemen will search the records of parliament in vain to find where this parliament in its long history ever passed legislation destroying the bona fide rights of any party who, in accordance with the laws of the land, has gone into court to seek remedies and justice. Yet that is what would be done if this bill is passed and the amendments that were made by the committee are disregarded.

These amendments are reasonable and fair. I am not going to travel over the ground that has been so well covered by hon. gentlemen who have discussed them from the standpoint of the view which I entertain, but they provide for an early and speedy determination of the issue on matters of right. That was the object of these amendments. It must be conceded that it is not fair to deprive people of rights which they are asserting in the courts. If we are going to have it laid down as a matter of law and practice in this country that people can be deprived of the rights which they are asserting in the courts that will be a very unfortunate thing indeed. It is proposed to strike out from this bill the provision for a speedy termination of the suit which has been entered relative to a very grave constitutional question that exists, as for instance the right of this parliament to interfere with trusts that have been created and which have been operated under the provisions of the laws of the provincial legislatures dealing with properties and civil rights. Surely it is not an unfair proposal to ask that this question be determined before the rights of individuals are destroyed and before the claims of those who want to remain Presbyterians are fully considered. That is why these amendments are fair and reasonable, and I submit this committee should not strike them out.

Of what use is a union if it is to be a forced one? The happy illustration given so eloquently by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) in regard to the result of coercive unions is so clear that I am sure it was patent to all. Surely nobody in this committee believes that any union which absolutely destroys or takes away the legal rights of those who want to be Presbyterians will be of any value. If they do, then I regret to say they utterly mistake the genius of the men and women who belonged to the Presbyterian church in the past. It cannot be done. If the action contemplated by the unionists is persisted in all that we have heard about the glories of union will vanish into thin air. There will be perpetuated in this country an embittered feeling, an antagonistic attitude between two great religious bodies; whereas if we act upon the lines of sanity and good judgment, enabling those who have legal or constitutional rights to have them determined before they are forced into a position where their identity is gone and all their property becomes merged in the new organization a very different feeling will prevail. I appeal to the House to seriously consider before it takes a step that would accomplish no good but would produce evil and injurious effects in this country.

Mr. BOYS: I should like to move with the consent of the Prime Minster that the committee report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The CHAIRMAN: It has been moved by Mr. Boys that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again. Is it the pleasure of the committee that the motion carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member who introduced the amendment should have something to say, I suppose, before the question is decided.

Mr. BROWN: A little while ago I took the matter up with the Prime Minister as to the possibility of taking a vote to-night and he indicated that that would not likely be done. Moreover a number of hon. members have gone home. I think it would be very unfortunate that this vote should be taken at a time when a great many members interested understood it would not be taken. We would like to have an expression from the Prime Minister on this point.

Mr. BOYS: I think it was understood that the committee would not sit later than twelve or a little after.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have been given to understand that a considerable number of members who have not yet spoken on this question desire to do so, and I do not think it would be altogether in the interests of the question before the House that the discussion should be kept up until an early hour in the morning. I think it would be better that we should follow the rule of adjourning at midnight, if possible, and resume the discussion on this question at another time. I hope, however, that members who have spoken will not consider it necessary to traverse the same ground on a subsequent day. I think the House will appreciate that it is important to get through the business as quickly as we can, but we should take up the business in good order and in good temper.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps we could take up this matter to-morrow while it is fresh in everybody's minds and get rid of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it would be advisable to proceed to-morrow, were it not for the fact that there is an understanding already that the report on Privileges and Elections will be considered to-morrow afternoon. That is an important matter and should be disposed of as early as possible. However, I see no objection to taking up the church union matter on Thursday, if the House will agree to it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was going to suggest that this discussion should have the right of way and the other could come up afterwards. I think we would get through the business far quicker than by interrupting this debate in order to proceed with another.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think where a matter has been standing over by agreement between the different sides of the House it should not be delayed and in the end it would make very little difference.

Mr. FORKE: There is a good deal of disappointment in the House, owing to the fact that it was arranged that this debate should commence on Tuesday and proceed until it was finished.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. FORKE: That is the understanding I had.

Mr. DUFF: It will take a long time to finish it.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is that a threat?

Mr. DUFF: No.

Mr. FORKE: However, it may have been a misunderstanding. I think the right hon. leader of the opposition understood that the debate was to continue. I think we made that arrangement on Monday. Probably the chairman heard it and he will know.

Mr. GRAHAM: I want to straighten out that difficulty. The report of the committee on Privileges and Elections was presented to the House some days ago, and the chairman was prepared to move its adoption on the subsequent day, but the member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) was ill; it was postponed till Thursday, and the announcement was made in the House several days ago. The hon. member for West Hastings and other members interested in that question are all prepared to go on to-morrow, and I think, after making that arrangement with the consent of the House, under the peculiar condition, it would not be wise to change it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So far as the member for West Hastings and members in this section of the House are concerned, we are quite willing to give the church union bill the right of way. We think the House will make better progress by so doing, but it is a matter entirely in the hands of the House.

The CHAIRMAN: This motion is not debatable.

Mr. SHAW: It has been debated quite a bit already. I desire to point out to the Prime Minister that a debate which has been adjourned on numerous occasions has already been fixed definitely for Thursday; so that I would suggest to the Prime Minister that his resolution should be that this debate be adjourned until Friday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was that debate?

Mr. SHAW: A debate on the Banking and Commerce committee report, which has been adjourned several times and definitely fixed for Thursday of this week.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not heard of it.

Mr. MARLER: I can substantiate the statement made by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw). The report was to have been presented on numerous occasions by the chairman of the Banking and Commerce committee but for various reasons it was postponed, and next Thursday was definitely decided to be the date on which the debate was to take place.

Mr. GRAHAM: By whom?

Mr. MARLER: I understand the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) made that statement. It is quite immaterial to me, but I am simply substantiating what the hon. member for West Calgary says.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I think the House should resume, and we could arrange this matter with the Speaker in the chair.

Progress reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg to move that Private Bills be the Order of the Day for Thursday, 26th of June next.

Mr. GOOD: There was a very definite understanding by a number of members with the chairman of the Banking and Commerce committee and the Acting Minister of Finance, and every possible assurance that could be given was given by the Acting Minister of Finance that the report of the Banking and Commerce committee would be considered on Thursday next. I wish to protest, with all the vehemence of which I am capable against this motion. It will be a great injustice to those to whom the assurance was given if the report of the committee is not considered on Thursday.

Mr. MARLER: I see personally no necessity for this debate taking place on Thursday; but that is not the point. The statement of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) is absolutely correct. Definite assurances were given time and time again that the report of the Banking and Commerce committee would be taken up on that date. It was postponed on numerous occasions and finally Thursday was definitely settled, and an assurance was given to the gentlemen who desired to debate it. I am not particularly interested because I do not care if the debate does not take place. I merely rise to confirm the statements which have been made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to these various representations that have been made, the only object I have is to try to arrive at some agreement that will best suit the general convenience of the House. It is perfectly obvious that if the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) gave an assurance—and I have no doubt as to the correctness of the statements by hon. members that he did—that the debate on the Banking and Commerce matter would be fixed for Thursday, he understood that the present debate would be concluded to-day. I have no doubt he did expect it to be concluded. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham), who was leading the House at the time, intimated that he expected the debate would conclude in one day. It is very obvious it is going to take a considerably longer time, and I think there are as many hon. members who are interested in getting the church union question out of the way as there are hon. gentlemen who are interested in having the banking and commerce matter decided. As the church union question has come up first, it seems to me that it ought to have the right of way in a matter of this kind.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What business will be taken up tomorrow besides the Murdock charges?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After the the House has considered the report of the Privileges and Elections committee, we shall proceed with the resolution that appears in the name of the Minister of Justice respecting an amendment to the British North America Act; the bill in the name of the Minister of Railways and Canals to amend the Canadian National Railways Act, 1919; second readings of Bill No. 172, to amend the Indian Act, Bill No. 187 to amend the Dominion Lands Act; Bill No. 188 to amend the Land Titles Act and Bill No. 191, for the settlement of certain questions between the governments of Canada and Ontario respecting Indian Reserve Lands, in the name of the Minister of the Interior; a resolution in the name of the Minister of Justice to be taken up in committee of the whole with respect to the Bills of Exchange Act. If we conclude those measures, we shall go on to estimates and take up Mines and Trade and Commerce.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A good many people are interested in the Post Office estimates. Is it proposed to bring them down at an early date?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am unable to say when the Post Office estimates will be brought down. As my hon. friend knows, the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) unfortunately has been ill most of this session. We are still hoping that he may find it possible to be in the House before the close of this session. I know that it is his desire to take up the estimates himself if he can be here, and I hope he may be here to take them up himself.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 12.45 a.m. Wednesday.

Wednesday, June 25, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

HON. MR. MURDOCK AND HOME BANK

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères) moved:

That the second report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in making a motion of this kind it is customary that the chairman should give his views to the House regarding the proceedings and the report of the committee. I shall do so briefly and impartially. The charge made by the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) is as follows:

The Honourable James Murdock, Minister of Labour, did withdraw from the Home Bank at its Ottawa branch on the 15th day of August, 1923, two days before such bank's failure, thousands of dollars on deposit therein to his credit, using certain information he had received, as such minister, of the likely immediate failure of said bank, and had received advantage and profit to himself to the extent of such withdrawals, contrary to his obligations as such minister in derogation of his office and the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament.

I wish to state at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that I have nothing but praise for the hon. members of the committee, who throughout the proceedings of the inquiry have conducted themselves in the true spirit of the high traditions of parliament. I say this without any reservation whatsoever. The members of the committee had to inquire into the action of one of their fellow-members, and it is to their credit that, following in the footsteps of the hon. member for West Hastings when he made his speech in the House, they have avoided personalities and partisan feelings, and used throughout the whole proceedings a most temperate and sober tone.

The committee had several meetings and summoned a number of witnesses. The report which I now beg the House to concur in reads as follows:

> The evidence taken by the committee shows that Hon. James Murdock on the 15th of August, 1923, drew out of the Home Bank of Canada at its Ottawa Branch, the sum of $4,050, but there is no evidence to show that before so drawing out said sum he had received information as a cabinet minister of the probable failure of said bank. The evidence also shows that the only information Mr. Murdock had of the probable failure of said bank was received as a private citizen, from Hon. G. N. Gordon, in a friendly interview on the 9th of August, 1923.
> The committee finds that Hon. Jas. Murdock did nothing in connection with the withdrawal of such money from the Home Bank contrary to his obligation as a minister of the Crown, or in derogation of his office and the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament, and that the charge submitted to this committee for investigation, so far as it affects the honour of Mr. Murdock, is not only not proved but entirely disproved.

Every hon. member will realize that in order to substantiate his charge, the hon. member for West Hastings had to prove three things: First, the withdrawal of the money under the circumstances mentioned in the charge; second, that in doing so the Minister of Labour used information that he had received as a minister, of the likely failure of the bank; and third, that by using such information he has received advantage and profit to himself to the extent of such withdrawals, contrary to his obligation as a minister, and in derogation of his office and the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament.

May I be allowed to point out that in order to maintain the charge, not only one, but all of those three things had to be proved. May I also point out that the first two questions are questions of fact, and the third question is more a question of appreciation in the light of precedent, in the light of jurisprudence, more a doctrine or proposition than a positive fact.

Before considering the evidence on the facts, and the soundness of the third proposition in the light of the law, I wish to state that I endeavoured to conduct this inquiry in a judicial way. I based my reason for doing so first on section 2 of the Canada Evidence Act which reads as follows:

> This Part shall apply to all criminal proceedings, and to all civil proceedings and other matters whatsoever respecting which the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction in this behalf.

This seems to be clear. I followed the rules of evidence contained in this act. Secondly, I followed also the jurisprudence. I assumed that the members of the committee were the jury. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman), and the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), speaking before the vote was taken in committee, contended that the rules of evidence at a judicial trial should not apply; that it was not for the member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) to prove his charge but it was for the Minister of Labour to prove his innocence. The hon. member for East Toronto drew my attention to the Marconi debate in the British House of Commons in 1913 where no such rules were observed. But I wish to draw the attention of the House to this point,—the hon. member for East Toronto overlooked the fact that we were proceeding with an inquiry where all the witnesses were sworn, while in the Marconi case in the British House of Commons in 1913 it was not an inquiry. In that case there was no inquiry whatsoever; there was no charge made and referred to a committee; it was an ordinary parliamentary debate where no witnesses were heard, where members simply spoke and gave their opinion. The proposition here is quite a different one. I may say that I was gratified to hear the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), although he voted against the report, express the opinion on this matter which he did. That opinion is to be found on page 154 of the report of the proceedings of the committee. The hon. member for Leeds, as there reported, said this:

> I assume, Mr. Chairman, that this committee is here as a court of justice, that we have all the powers, all the privileges, all the rights, all the responsibilities, and all the duties of a court, and if that be so, then the rules of evidence must apply and we must discharge our duties as a court and not in any other capacity or from any other motives than those which would characterize and must characterize judges and jurors in determining a question which is brought before them.

This doctrine is sound; it has been followed in every inquiry of this kind since confederation. It was followed in the McGreevy inquiry in 1891; it was followed in the Lanctot inquiry in 1911; it was also followed in the Yukon inquiry presided over by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). I repeat, it is sound doctrine. The suggestion that the ordinary rules of evidence should not apply, that they should be put aside, that the inquiry should be conducted in a haphazard and go-as-you-please manner is a most astounding proposition. Before I leave the subject I will quote the opinion of a man who has occupied one of the highest positions in this country, whose eminent character, fine legal mind and wide knowledge are undisputed. I refer to Sir Allen Aylesworth, ex-Minister of Justice. Speaking on the Lanctot case, as reported at page 7,900 of Hansard, 1911, he said:

Every one knows that it is the privilege of the person accused either to remain silent or to say: Not guilty, prove your case. Nothing is to be inferred against a man because he may choose to take that course.

I am therefore satisfied that the course which I followed was the proper one.

Let us now examine the first allegation: Hon. Mr. Murdock, two days before the failure of the Home Bank, withdrew the sum of $4,050 of his money. As I said before, and according to all rules of evidence, the hon. minister was not obliged to appear as a witness. But he did appear, and admitted that on 15th August, last at about one o'clock, two days before the failure of the Home Bank, he withdrew from the bank the sum of $4,050, his parliamentary indemnity, which he had deposited in the Royal Bank, and that later on, on 1st October, he used that money to pay a mortgage on his property. The mortgage itself, with evidence of the payment mentioned, was produced at the inquiry by Mr. Cuthbertson, the holder. The first allegation, therefore, was proven, but minus the frills and insinuations of the partisan press. Mr. Murdock did not withdraw his money after banking hours as stated in the liquidator's letter to him—and in the speech of the hon. member for West Hastings, a very material incident in the case as stated by the members for West Hastings, and York-Sunbury. Both these hon. members expressed their opinion as to this fact and the evidence on the point is to be found at page 13 of the committee's proceedings, where Mr. Clarkson, the liquidator, was being examined by Mr. Porter. I will cite it:

Q. Did you get any information of that character from the officials of the Home Bank in Ottawa?—A. Not until after that letter was written—after settlement was made.

Q. Then what knowledge had you when you wrote this letter that the money had been withdrawn after banking hours?—A. I say, "the statement was made to me" that was so. The statement was made to me by some officer of the bank that it was after office hours.

The Chairman: Mr. Porter, I do not want to limit you, but this is hearsay evidence. There is only one fact to be proven before this committee if you want to make your case, and that is that the money was withdrawn. Whether the money was withdrawn before hours or after hours makes no difference—

Mr. Porter: I would think it would make a very material difference.

The Chairman: It makes no difference because the reference is to the effect that money was withdrawn before the failure of the bank on the 15th day of August, 1923. That is the only thing we have to look for.

Mr. Porter: The time of withdrawal would be a very material consideration for the committee to consider.

Mr. Hanson: I think it would be very vital. It shows the intent.

The Witness: Mr. Porter, the manager of the bank informed me yesterday that the withdrawal was not made after banking hours; it was made in banking hours, and the previous statements made to me were incorrect to that extent.

The evidence also shows, that without any obligation whatsoever in my opinion the Minister of Labour sent back to the liquidator every cent he had withdrawn. The evidence as to this is to be found at page 15 of the report. Let me quote it:

By Mr. Porter:

Q. Then the account, Mr. Clarkson, shows a balance at that time due from the Hon. Mr. Murdock of how much?—A. On May 16th it shows a balance of $3,000, excluding interest. Then we gave him a credit for $1,035.23, being 25 per cent of $4,140.94. That left a balance of $1,964.78. The interest on that was $150.30, which left him owing $2,115.08.

Q. Has the balance been returned to you as liquidator?—A. Yes sir, with that letter which you have in your hand.

Mr. Porter: I file a letter dated May 26, 1924.

Document filed as Exhibit No. 6.

Mr. Porter: This letter reads:

"May 26, 1924.

Dear Mr. Clarkson:

Acknowledging your letter of May 16, and your memo of May 20, re the amount which you compute is still due to you as liquidator in connection with my withdrawals from the Home Bank on August 15, 1923. I send you herewith cheque for $2,115.08."

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the depositors of the Home Bank have not lost one farthing, and the people of Canada have not lost one cent, through the action of the Minister of Labour.

Now let us look at the second fact. Was it proven that the hon. Minister of Labour withdrew his money from the bank using certain information that he had received at a meeting of council of the immediate failure of the bank? Every hon. gentleman must admit that if the second fact is not proven the case must fail. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is not one tittle of evidence given in the inquiry to show that the Minister of Labour had received any information as a minister of the near failure of the bank before he withdrew his money—nothing to show that he received any information as such minister. You can search the whole evidence and you will not find one witness who proved this fact. The directors of the bank came to Ottawa on the 14th August. They had an interview that evening with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), Mr. Graham, Mr. Robb and Mr. Saunders. They had not seen the Minister of Labour, and no information as to the state of the bank was given to him by any of his colleagues or by Mr. Saunders. The Minister of Labour only learned of that meeting much later. On page 85 of the Report of Proceedings evidence will be found to substantiate that fact, as follows:

By Mr. Porter:

Q. Just one more question, Mr. Chairman. I think that is all I want to ask for the moment. Mr. Murdock, I want to ask you one further question: Were you aware of the fact that the directors of the Home Bank met certain members of the cabinet at the Premier's house?—A. Not until after it came out generally.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Labour did not have that information, or was not aware of the meeting of the Home Bank directors on the night of the 14th, before he withdrew his money from the Home Bank.

Mr. SHAW. May I ask a question for information?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes, certainly.

Mr. SHAW: Is the expression "Not until after it came out generally" interpreted subsequently by the minister (Mr. Murdock).

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes. I surmise it would mean, "Not until it was known generally by the public".

Mr. SHAW: When would that be?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That would certainly be after the next day. The Minister of Labour withdrew his money on the 15th, and that meeting was on the evening of the 14th. It is evident that he could not and did not know that that meeting had taken place until after he had withdrawn his money.

Mr. IRVINE: Before the hon. member leaves that point, I would like to ask a question, just for information. I understood the hon. member to say there was no evidence that the action of the Minister of Labour was affected by any information received at the cabinet council meeting. I want to know if it is not a fact that the only source of that information would be some member of the cabinet council, and they were not permitted by their oath of office to give that information. Is that not so?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I am coming to that point. After the meeting, or during the meeting, of the Home Bank directors at the house of the Prime Minister, the Prime Minister decided that under the circumstances no assistance could be given to the Home Bank, and it was suggested that the Acting Minister of Finance should go to Montreal the next day, to interview the Bankers' Association, in order to get some assistance if possible. The matter was finally settled there. True there was a meeting of the cabinet next morning, at which the hon. Minister of Labour was present, but no evidence was given to show that the matter of the Home Bank was discussed at the said meeting. I ruled, according to all precedents and according to jurisprudence, that nothing could be asked of the minister of what transpired at that meeting. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that I was bound to make that ruling. The members of the Privy Council are bound by the oath of office to keep all matters which engage their attention at the meetings of the cabinet strictly private and confidential. I do not need to refer to all the authorities in this matter. May I, however, first ask the attention of hon. members to the oath of office which says:

—you will keep close and secret all such matters as shall be treated, debated and resolved on in Privy Council, without publishing or disclosing the same or any part thereof, by word, writing, or any otherwise to any person out of the same council, but to such only as be of the council, and yet if any matter so propounded, treated and debated in any such Privy Council, shall touch any particular person, sworn of the same council upon any such matter as shall in any wise concern his loyalty and fidelity to the King's Majesty, you will in no wise open the same to him, but keep it secret, as you would from any person, until the King's Majesty's pleasure be known in that behalf.

I desire also to direct the attention of hon. members to the work of Alpheus Todd on Parliamentary Government in England, second edition, volume 2, page 240, where I find the following:

The deliberations of the cabinet upon all matters which engage their attention are strictly private and confidential; being kept secret even from other members of the administration, who have no seat in the cabinet, and who therefore are not directly responsible for the conduct of the government. Upon their first introduction into the Privy Council ministers are invariably sworn to secrecy.

At page 84 of the same work Mr. Todd says:

The obligation of keeping the King's counsel inviolably secret is one that rests upon all cabinet ministers and other responsible advisers of the Crown by virtue of the oath which they take when they are made members of the Privy Council.

A judgment was rendered recently on the same matter by Mr. Justice McKeown who presided at the Home Bank inquiry, and I will refer to that judgment later on. The exclusion of such evidence may be unfortunate; but there are other circumstances when certain evidence cannot be accepted from witnesses, and other circumstances where certain evidence is not legal. Counsel, solicitors, attorneys cannot be compelled to disclose communications made to them in professional confidence by their clients; nor can doctors; nor can priests nor ministers of religion be compelled to disclose secrets confined or confessed to them under the regulations of their respective churches and religious persuasions. Hon. members who voted against the report in committee admitted that. The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), as reported on page 149, states:

It will be said that my learned colleague (Mr. Porter) did not prove affirmatively that the matter was discussed in cabinet council that morning. Unfortunately the absolute privilege given by the cabinet ministers' oaths closes the transactions in cabinet council and precludes us from even asking the question as to who was there.

In face of that jurisprudence, in face of that ruling by Mr. Justice McKeown, I was bound to prevent anything that had transpired at the cabinet meeting from being disclosed at the inquiry.

Mr. SHAW: The hon. member has compared the relationship between a minister of the Crown and the Crown with the relationship existing between a solicitor and his client. My hon. friend will realize that the relationship between solicitor and client is a qualified privilege only. I should like to know, as a matter of information, if the relationship between a minister of the Crown and the Crown is a matter of absolute privilege or a matter of qualified privilege.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Ministers of the Crown may not divulge anything that transpires in council even by mutual consent. I would refer my hon. friend again to Todd at page 84:

As has been already observed, this secrecy is not a mere personal privilege or protection, either to the Sovereign or to the minister, that may be waived by mutual consent.

Now, not only has the prosecution not proved that the Minister of Labour used information that he received as a minister to withdraw his money, but the evidence shows conclusively that the withdrawal was made because of some other information. The Minister of Labour, although under no obligation to do so, as any member with any legal knowledge will admit, volunteered to make a statement. His evidence is to be found at pages 75, 76 and 77 of the inquiry. I will crave the indulgence of hon members for a few moments because this evidence is very important. At page 75 this is the statement of the Minister of Labour:

By the Chairman:

Q. Do you wish to make a statement to the committee, Mr. Murdock?—A. All right, I will do that. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I attended two meetings of the cabinet council on August 15, 1923. One meeting commenced at 10.30 a.m. and lasted until about 12.40 p.m., and the next meeting from 3 p.m. until 4 p.m. I withdrew from the Home Bank of Canada, Ottawa branch, around one p.m. on August 15th, the $4,050, which have been referred to. Neither at the time I made that withdrawal nor since did I for one moment think that I had in any way been untrue to my obligation as a cabinet minister or a member of parliament. However, having noticed certain newspaper reports in, I think, February or March, when the liquidator of the bank wrote me the letter of May 7th, which is in evidence, I decided as per my letter of reply dated May 14, and proceeded to return the money as promptly as it could be arranged. I think, Mr. Chairman, that covers the statement necessary. I might say of course, that I am precluded by my oath as a cabinet minister from intimating in any way whether any questions in relation to the Home Bank of Canada were or were not discussed at either of the cabinet meetings on August 15, which I have said I attended.

By Mr. German:

Q. Had you not prior to August 15th, had any information of the financial standing of the Home Bank, or as to its solvency or insolvency?—A. Yes, I had some days prior to that received what looked to me to be very conclusive information that it was not a safe place to leave my sessional indemnity.

Q. This was your sessional indemnity?—A. Yes. I drew it as a lump sum on July 3rd, deposited it in the Home Bank, and changed its location on August 15th.

Q. Did you receive that information in your official capacity as a minister of the Crown?

Mr. Porter: That is a matter for the committee.

Then there is a long discussion. Further on:

By the Chairman:

Q. Have you any objection to stating, Mr. Murdock, under what circumstances you received that information?—A. I have no objection to stating anything that will be of assistance to the committee.

Q. Just answer my question.—A. I received that information from a member of parliament some few days before, or, to be exact, on the 9th of August.

By Mr. Porter:

Q. Would you tell us who the member was?—A. The Deputy Speaker.

Q. The Hon. G. N. Gordon?—A. Yes.

By the Chairman:

Q. What information did you receive?—A. Mr. Chairman, my memory would be faulty to indicate just exactly what I received but I did receive that from hearing Mr. Gordon recite various facts in connection with the Home Bank, its then present condition and references to some of those who were connected with the Home Bank, and this gave me to understand that it was not by any means a safe institution. Further than that I do not think I should say definitely—

By Mr. Porter:

Q. And after getting information from Mr. Gordon did you get any further information?—A. No.

Q. You say "No"?—A. "No".

Q. Of any kind or description—or anywhere?—A. Not that would form my opinion in regard to the matter.

Q. It may not have formed your opinion, but did you get any other information?—A. No one else had discussed that matter with me at all.

Q. Had you any better knowledge on the 15th as to the condition of the bank than you had on the 9th?—A. I would say not.

Q. Why did you get in such a hurry on the 15th?—A. Well, I do not know whether it was a question so much of getting in a hurry—

Q. It seems to be—

The Chairman: Let the witness finish his answer.

The Witness: I proceeded to do on the 15th what I intended to do, and no doubt would have done, excepting that I neglected it for several days.

This evidence is corroborated by the Deputy Speaker whose evidence is to be found at page 109 of the evidence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member tell the House now whether he considers the evidence he has just quoted as intended to be a denial that the information was received at a meeting of council?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I certainly do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then how does the hon. member explain the statement of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), which he quoted just before, that his oath forbade him to say what was discussed at the meeting of council?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I do not think that it would have been proper to ask the Minister of Labour to make any such disclosure, but in answering a question put directly to him, whether he had more information on the 15th than on the 9th, he could do nothing but tell the truth, and he answered that he received no further information on the later date.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member take the view that the answer constituted a breach of the minister's oath of office?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I am not the judge and I will not decide that point. This evidence was confirmed by the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Gordon) whose testimony is to be found at page 108.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before the hon. member leaves that point he might tell us what significance he attaches to the answer at page 77 in which the Minister of Labour stated:

There were other circumstances that brought the matter to a head on the 15th.

What were the "other circumstances" except the cabinet meetings?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The minister stated that he proceeded to do on the 15th what he had intended to do on the 9th, and which he did not do on that date owing to exceptional circumstances that prevented him. Surely my hon. friend cannot infer from that answer that the Minister of Labour received his information at the cabinet meeting. The hon. gentleman has been practising at the bar a long time and he should know what legal evidence is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the face of the minister's statement that he considered himself bound by his oath not to divulge whether or not the subject had been discussed at the meeting of the cabinet, does the hon. member think it is fair to argue from the quotation, as he has done, that it constitutes a denial that the subject had been so discussed? Does he think that argument is fair in view of his own repeated rulings in which he refused permission to the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) to question other ministers on the very point, or to cross-examine them?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: In answer to the right hon. member I must say that I stand by the ruling I gave. I have already explained, and I will explain again, that the question was put point blank by the hon. member for West Hastings to the Minister of Labour, whether he had any more information on the 15th than he had on the 9th. Probably it was not legal for the Minister of Labour to answer in the way he did, but the question was put and he answered it frankly without considering whether it was legal or not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not this the only honest explanation—that the Minister of Labour considered that answer subject to his first reservation, that he would not say anything as to whether or not the matter had been discussed in council?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That is hair-splitting. At all events, the House will consider the evidence and will form its own opinion upon it. I was going to refer hon. members to the testimony at page 108 wherein the evidence of the Minister of Labour is confirmed by that of the Deputy Speaker. Let me quote the following:

By Mr. German:

Q. Did you see the Hon. James Murdock in his office in Ottawa on the 9th of August last?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you have a conversation with him regarding the Home Bank of Canada?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you at that time know that Mr. Murdock had any deposit in the Home Bank?—A. No, I did not know it then.

Q. What did you tell Mr. Murdock in respect to the Home Bank?—A. I am not very clear what I told him about it, but my recollection is that I intimated that it was a lame duck and, I thought, the next one to go.

The evidence is therefore corroborated. Now, some hon. members who voted against the report have argued, as probably they will argue to-day, that the very fact that the Minister of Labour withdrew his money immediately after the meeting of the cabinet creates a strong suspicion that he had received further information at that meeting regarding the state of the Home Bank; and it is further contended that this suspicion is sufficient to convict the minister of the charge. This strikes me as an astounding doctrine; it is a doctrine which is contrary to every principle of British justice. Who ever heard of convicting a man on a mere suspicion even though that suspicion be very strong? It is fundamental law that the presiding judge at a jury trial must instruct the jury that they cannot convict the accused on suspicion; and if the judge fails so to warn the jury and they do convict, then their conviction is invariably quashed by the court of appeal.

I desire to touch upon another point which probably is not of very great importance now, except in justice to myself. I ruled in the course of the proceedings that the minister could not even be asked to say who were the members present at the meeting of council. It is quite true that I gave that ruling, and mention of the fact is not important now, except for the reason I have stated, inasmuch as the Minister of Labour himself admitted that he was at the meeting. Let me, however, draw the attention of the House to the ruling of Chief Justice McKeown in the inquiry into the Home Bank of Canada, which ruling will be found at pages 562-3 of the proceedings of the royal commission that investigated that matter:

Q. At what time of the day was the meeting held? —A. I think we met in the morning.

Q. You were there?—A. I was.

Q. What other members of the cabinet were there?

Mr. Lafleur: (Objects).

Right Hon. Mackenzie King: I have taken an oath as Privy-Counsellor to disclose nothing that transpires in the cabinet.

Mr. Reid: I am not asking about anything that transpired, I want to know who was present?—A. I could not say, I do not know, and I do not know that it would be proper for me to say if I did.

Q. Did the directors of the Home Bank come to that meeting of the Dominion cabinet?—A. No.

Mr. Lafleur: I respectfully submit that it is not proper to ask the Prime Minister what occurred at a meeting of the cabinet.

His Lordship: I think not.

Mr. Reid: I understand that is the ruling, but where there is a matter of such public importance as this it is important for the public and the shareholders and depositors to know what took place.

His Lordship: You need not argue, it will be excluded, I have a very strong feeling about it.

Mr. Reid: Does your lordship also rule that Mr. King is not allowed to tell us who was present at a meeting sitting as a cabinet.

His Lordship: I do not think that would be admissible.

Mr. Reid: There is a record of the attendance.

His Lordship: Perhaps you can get it some other way, but nothing that took place in the Privy Council would be admissible. I remember having that same question before me in connection with Mr. Fleming's investigation at the time when his acts as premier of the province were challenged. It was sought to be shown that certain things had taken place in the meetings of the government, it did not seem to me then to be admissible and it does not now.

Mr. Reid: Then on the night of August 14, 1923, when you had this interview at your house with Messrs. Robb and Graham and Low, I suppose in the ordinary course the result of that interview would be placed on record in the files of the government.

[Mr. Archambault.]

Mr. Lafleur: That is objectionable also.

His Lordship: The Prime Minister has told us all that took place there, you know.

Right Hon. Mackenzie King: There was no record kept of it, I made no record and there was nothing placed on file as a result of it.

Mr. Reid: Did you bring it to the attention of the other members of your government?

Mr. Lafleur: That is objectionable also.

His Lordship: I do not think you can proceed any further.

So in justification of the ruling which I gave, I would point out that Mr. Justice McKeown, who, as everybody will admit, is a gentleman of high legal attainments, ruled that the minister could not name even the other members who were at the cabinet meeting. Therefore I had to follow his ruling.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that I might rest the case right here without examining the soundness of the third proposition when the second was not proven by the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter). However, I purpose making a few remarks in regard to that proposition. Even if it had been proven that the Minister of Labour had received at the meeting of council further information respecting the position of the Home Bank, and afterwards had withdrawn his deposit there, I very much doubt whether his action could be regarded as something contrary to his obligation as minister and in derogation of the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament. I do not say that he would have been justified in doing so, but I entertain very grave doubts as to the absolute impropriety of such action. I may be wrong from a technical point of view, but I feel that I am right from a human and Christian viewpoint. Some people are under the impression that the oath of office taken by a member of the cabinet prevents him using information obtained in that capacity to avoid personal loss. There is no ground for such impression I quoted part of the oath of office a minute ago; in order to make the case clear I will read it in full. It is in these words:

You do solemnly promise and swear that you will serve His Majesty truly and faithfully in the Place of His Council in this His Majesty's Dominion of Canada, you will keep close and secret all such matters as shall be treated, debated and resolved on in Privy Council, without publishing or disclosing the same or any part thereof, by Word, writing, or any otherwise to any Person out of the same council, but to such only as be of the council, and yet if any matter so propounded, treated and debated in any such Privy Council, shall touch any particular Person, sworn of the same Council upon any such matter as shall in any wise concern his Loyalty and Fidelity to the King's Majesty, you will in no wise open the same to him, but keep it secret, as you would from any person, until the King's Majesty's pleasure be known in that behalf. You will in all things to be moved, treated and debated in any such Privy Council, faithfully, honestly and truly declare your mind and opinion to the honour and benefit of the King's Majesty, and the good of His Subjects without partiality or exception of persons, in no wise forebearing so to do from any manner of respect, favour, love, meed, displeasure, or dread of any Person or Persons whatsoever. In general you will be vigilant, diligent and circumspect in all your doings touching the King's Majesty's affairs; All which Matters and Things you will faithfully observe and keep, as a good Councillor ought to do to the utmost of your power, will and discretion.

So Help you God.

Hon. members will see that the oath contains nothing which could be construed as preventing a minister from withdrawing a bank deposit on information which he might have received at council. It must, I think, be admitted that a minister in choosing an investment could not make use of any special information so received; for instance, he could not invest in a company whose profits were to depend directly or indirectly upon a contract about to be entered into with the government; nor could he receive directly or indirectly in relation to his investment any favour from a person proposing to contract with the Crown; in a word, he is precluded from making any profit through information that he receives as a cabinet minister. But is he precluded from using any such information for saving what belongs to him by right? Would it be contrary to his obligation and in derogation of his office and of the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament if, through such information, he were to remove his property from one place to another place where he has a perfect right to put it? I know that some hon. members have expressed a view to the contrary. I respect their opinion, but I have grave doubts whether this simple and human act of self-preservation, an act which was performed by hundreds of depositors of the Home Bank on the 14th, 15th, 16th and 17th of August, would be contrary to the oath of office of a minister of the Crown and in derogation of the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament. A very effective way, Mr. Speaker, of examining the soundness of a proposition is to cite some examples of its application. If I understand aright the contention of the hon. member for West Hastings, and also, I believe, of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) in their opinion a minister of the Crown is, under no circumstances whatsoever, allowed to use any information received in his capacity as minister to save a loss or avoid something that may be detrimental to his interests, as pointed out by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman) during the inquiry. The latter gentleman stated that under no circumstances should a minister use any information which he obtains as a minister for the purpose of furthering his private interests or avoiding a loss. To show how absurd it would be to make no exception whatever to such a rule—and I say this with all respect—I will ask a few questions of the hon. member for West Hastings. Suppose, for instance, that at a cabinet meeting the hon. member heard that there was going to be a riot and that the House of Parliament might be ransacked and burned, could he not go to his room and take away his personal effects? If he does so, he is acting on private information that he has obtained at a meeting of council to further his own interests. I will go a step further. Suppose my hon. friend becomes a minister of the Crown in a Tory government—he might have to wait twenty or twenty-five years, but suppose he does—and suppose he has a bank account in his home town of Belleville and another in Ottawa; and suppose before leaving Belleville in the morning he has received in cash a sum of $4,000, but has no time to deposit the money in his bank at Belleville; and suppose he puts the money in his pocket and during his journey to Ottawa he decides that, it not being safe to keep so much money about his person, he will deposit it in his bank in this city; and, suppose further, that on his arrival here he proceeds towards the bank and on his way there he notices it is pretty late. The cabinet is sitting, and he changes his mind and says: I will put that money into the bank after the meeting of the cabinet. He attends the meeting of the cabinet and there learns that the bank where he usually deposits his money is going to fail. Now I am going to ask my hon. friend one question: Would he, under those circumstances, after having attended a meeting of the cabinet, proceed to the bank and deposit his money?

Mr. PORTER: If I got my information there only, yes.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Do I understand that the answer is "yes?" Then, Mr. Speaker, parliamentary rules prevent me from saying what I think of this answer. If the hon. member was going to say "no," it would mean that he would avoid a loss through not depositing his money there because he would have learned at a meeting of the council that the bank was going to fail. I hope for the sake of my hon. friend that there will be a few people in this country naive enough to believe that, having learned of the imminent failure of the bank, he would proceed to put his money into that bank that he knew was going to fail.

I have only this to say in conclusion. I recall a sentence which was uttered by one who I think was the greatest student of humanity, Saint Francois de Sales, who said: "Nous sommes des aigles pour decouvrir les defauts d'autrui, mais des taupes pour decouvrir les notres," or in English, "We have the eyes of the eagle to discover the failings of others, but we have the eyes of the mole to discover our own." Were I not chairman of this committee, I would not fail to commend this sentence in regard to certain actions which took place during the last administration, but my position as chairman prevents me from doing so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You cannot go any harder, can you?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: It would be very easy for me—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Go on; I would.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: —but I contend that as chairman it would not be proper for me to do so. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, convinced of the righteousness of the report, and having in mind that a man's reputation and honour is his most precious asset, I have no hesitation in moving the resolution which I have placed in your hands.

Mr. E. GUSS PORTER (West Hastings): Mr. Speaker, it is almost needless for me to say that I entirely disagree with the report that has been presented by the committee to this House upon this matter. I do not know that it will add particularly to my reputation that the chairman of the committee has paid me the compliment he did to-day, but still, I accept it. I cannot say that I am as enthusiastic or that I agree at all with the sentiments that the chairman has expressed in moving this motion regarding the conduct of the committee when this inquiry was made before it. I have very grave objections to the way in which that investition was conducted, but I have endeavoured both in introducing this matter to the House and in my conduct of it before the committee of inquiry, to merit the compliment the chairman has paid me of conducting it in a fair impartial manner, and I think I have fairly well succeeded in doing that before the committee. The chairman himself pays me that compliment.

I do not want a verdict or a judgment from this House upon suspicion. As the chairman has stated, I have never asked, nor did I ever expect, a finding in favour of the charge I made against the hon. Minister of Labour upon the ground of suspicion; far from it. I would be one of the last to ask this House or to ask anybody to convict a man upon suspicion alone, but what I do ask from this House, and I ask it in all fairness and in all sincerity, is to give a judgment upon the facts, and upon the reasonable inferences and conditions and circumstances surrounding the facts that have been presented in this case.

I am not here asking for sympathy. This is not my case. Do not be confused on the issue. This case is just as much the case of every man sitting in this parliament as it is the case of myself. It was I who brought the matter to the attention of parliament, but the facts affect parliament just as much as they affect me. If those facts have been proven, then it is the duty, it is the obligation of parliament, to apply the proper remedy. It is not for me; I am only one of you. I have my voice and my say in the matter, but the responsibility in the last analysis rests upon every member of this House of Commons, and I propose in dealing with the matter to-day to pursue the very same course that I have endeavoured to pursue throughout this inquiry, and present the case in a moderate way, not asking for sympathy, not expecting political bias, but expecting a fair, square, and honest judgment upon the facts as I shall endeavour to present them to the House.

This matter comes before the House to-day in a very different manner from the question that came before the House last night, upon which I took occasion to say a few words. The church union question came before us without this House having had the opportunity of either hearing or reading the evidence or of hearing the argument of counsel upon the matter, and for that reason I argued last night—and I want to show my consistency—that the committee was better conditioned to decide that matter than a body of men who had not had the privilege of hearing or reading the evidence, or of hearing the argument in the case. But the case now before us is entirely different. In this case the precaution was taken and an order of the House was procured by which every word and syllable of evidence offered before the committee was printed and circulated and placed in the hands of every member of parliament. The evidence, the argument of counsel, the observations of the chairman, the cross-examination by counsel who appeared on different sides—everything is there. Full information is before every member of this House, and there is no reason for any member to say, nor is there any excuse for him saying: I did not hear the evidence; I do not know what the facts are; the facts have not all been brought out, therefore I am not in a position, perhaps, to pass as fair a judgment on the matter as members of the committee.

This House is not in that position to-day; the precaution was taken to guard against that. Hon. gentlemen will observe that I moved before the investigating committee that the evidence be printed. That was done in order that it might be in possession of every hon. member so that he would be in a position to study the testimony and arrive at a fair and accurate judgment upon the matter. That is the position but it has entirely changed since I rose in this chamber on the 22nd May last and made the disclosures that I did make, and preferred the charge that I did based on those disclosures. I shall have occasion to refer to that later on. During the almost twenty-five years that I have occupied a seat in this House I have had the privilege of seeing and hearing a great many reports of committees brought in. I have heard reports upon almost every conceivable subject that could come before parliament; I have heard reports made by committees of every possible political stripe; I have heard reports that I and everyone hearing them knew were influenced wholly or largely by political exigency, and political feeling, and that were characterized by political bias. One can well understand that. Matters of commerce, questions of political policy, issues relating to the development of our country, all these and many other subjects may properly be viewed from one political angle or the other and considered from the point of view of the results to be brought about—some good, others bad. But in all such cases it was possible to at least give credit to one political party or the other for an honest endeavour to carry out what that party believed, and honestly believed to be for the benefit of the country. But this is not a question of that character no matter from what point we view it. Here is a question which involves the honour and the dignity of parliament, and there is no political standard by which the conduct of the accused can be gauged or governed. The one standard, to my view of thinking, by which such conduct must be appraised is the standard of common honesty and respectability as it is known to the ordinary people of this country. I am asking the House to apply that standard to-day. I am asking it to divest itself of all political feeling in this matter. It does not signify whether the Minister of Labour sits upon one side of the House or the other; whether the administration concerned is a Liberal cabinet or a Conservative cabinet; the question to be determined is this: Has the Minister of Labour, in view of all the facts that have been disclosed in this investigation, acted in such a manner as to meet the approval of the House, in such a manner as the House would like to have him act? Has he done the honest and proper thing. Has he done what any one of us would do? Unless we are in a position to answer that question in the affirmative there is only one course, it seems to me, for the House to take.

Now, in an ordinary matter—and I speak of it as an experience that might happen to almost any parliamentarian—where a member of parliament, or a minister of the Crown, has committed an error or made a slip, has done something that would not meet with the approval of his fellows or the approval of the public, but with no wicked intent, for no criminal object, and with no desire to do somebody else a wrong—under such circumstances the ordinary public, and members of parliament in particular, would adopt a sympathetic attitude. I would have found myself in that very position to-day had the Minister of Labour, in view of the evidence that has been given against him in this matter, taken a course such as would warrant the extension of sympathy to him. But to my view he has entirely forfeited any right, which under other circumstances he might have earned, to the sympathy of members of this House and to the sympathy of the public. From the very inception of this case he has pursued a course that has been defiant, he has adopted an attitude that has not enlisted the sympathy of any one. When first faced with this charge in the public press what position did he take? Did he come frankly before the people—because the matter having been ventilated in the press the charge was in the public mind—and say "I took this money" and tell exactly what the facts were? Did he say, "I admit I did this, but I did not think I was doing anything wrong"? No, he did not. When the charge was made he said, "I drew the money out to pay for a house, and I should like to know whether I have not got the right to do that?" Was that an honest straightforward answer to the charge? But the minister did not adhere to that; he has retracted the statement so far as—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Will my hon. friend point out where in the evidence the Minister of Labour ever stated that he withdrew this money to pay the mortgage on his house? Is there anything in the evidence to show that?

Mr. PORTER: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is there.

Mr. PORTER: I will come to it in good time.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Newspaper talk.

Mr. PORTER: I do not want a snap verdict in this case. If any hon. gentleman desires to ask me a question and will be good enough to make a note of it I shall be very pleased to give him an answer, if I can, when I conclude my speech. The first statement of the minister was that he was going to pay the money on his house. At the investigation before the committee, after witnesses had been subpoenaed to prove the fact, he was obliged to admit that the statement was not wholly true; he intended to pay the money upon the house at some time but did not pay it at that particular period. The time he intended to pay it was sometime about 1st October. That was the statement he made at that time, and that went unchallenged—not a word about it, until it came before this House upon the charge made by me and upon the request made to this House to grant me an inquiry to ascertain what the facts were. When he came before this House and made his statement, what was the attitude of the hon. minister at that time? Was he frank? Was he fair? Did he make a full and honest statement? Let us just examine for a moment and see what he did.

When he came before the House the only excuse, the only possible defence, the only semblance of a defence that he offered was to read two letters and a statement that passed between himself and Mr. Clarkson, the liquidator of the Home Bank. One letter showed that the liquidator of the bank had discovered, by conversation and otherwise, that the Minister of Labour had withdrawn his money from the Home Bank under circumstances that required explanation, circumstances that constituted a suspicion of wrongdoing, circumstances that would show the liquidator and did convince the liquidator that the money had been withdrawn illegally and improperly from the bank. As far as the bank's position was concerned, Mr. Clarkson, having discovered these facts, writes him a letter making a demand for a return of the money. Did the Minister of Labour have any intention of returning the money before that? Now listen to the false and untrue excuse that he gave in that letter. He wrote to Mr. Clarkson stating that he was going to return the money. And why? Not because he thought he was legally liable, but because he would not have any depositor or shareholder of the Home Bank suffer by reason of his action. He had a wonderful amount of compassion and consideration for the widows and orphans who were depositors in the Home Bank when he took the $4,000 out, knowing the bank was going to fail! He did not change his mind when the newspapers came out and charged him with it. He stuck to the money for months after the publication in the papers; he stuck to the money until the matter was brought up on the floor of this House. But when he was charged on the floor of this House, he said, "Oh I will give it back for the sake of the depositors."

Mr. CANNON: He gave it back before.

Mr. PORTER: He gave it back a few days before.

Mr. CANNON: The hon. gentleman is making a misstatement.

Mr. PORTER: I am not making a misstatement. He read the letter on the floor of the House and that was the contents of the letter.

Mr. CANNON: He returned the money before.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. PORTER: Mr. Clarkson's letter was written on the 7th of May and the Minister of Labour answered it on the 14th of May, and on that very day it came out before Mr. Justice McKeown in the Home Bank inquiry that the hon. Minister of Labour had withdrawn his money from the bank. He paid it back after the fact had been discovered in an inquiry. And then he endeavours to say, "Oh, out of consideration and compassion for the Home Bank depositors I am doing this." But that is not all. He did not pretend when he was charged upon the floor of the House —which quite possibly might have ended the whole matter—to set up a defence that any reasonable man would say was a defence. He did not say then "Why the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Gordon), told me six days before I withdrew the money about the apparent failure of the bank, and I drew the money out six days after, in consequence of what the Deputy Speaker told me." He gave no excuse or reason of that kind. It was absolutely withheld from this parliament and from the public. If it is a defence now, why was it not stated at that time? What would any man who desired that the public and this parliament should know the full facts do under these circumstances? Hide it? Hide his light under a bushel? Or would he come out and say, "Here are the facts; if I have done wrong I regret it." But no, he kept the facts away from parliament. Then at last parliament grants the inquiry and he is brought before the committee. He comes before the committee. True he was not bound to appear there, but he did appear. And what did he do? When parliament had forced the matter to an inquiry and the facts were bound to be discovered, he sat there day after day while the inquiry was going on and evidence was being adduced before that committee, and it was only when he must have felt the noose tightening round his neck, metaphorically speaking, and when he thought discretion was the better part of valour, when he thought it was better to come from under cover, he said to me through his counsel, "I would like to make a statement to the commission." He has had the fairest of fair treatment from me, so far as this inquiry is concerned. When he made that proposition I said "Yes, come on and make your statement;" and he did so. He made a statement that covers about half a dozen lines in the evidence taken before that committee. Did he tell the whole facts then? He came before the committee when the evidence was closing in upon him, when it was getting closer and closer every moment, and he said, "I did draw my money out of the bank, $4,050 on the 15th day of August." That is the statement that he made. Did that statement set forth all the facts we were after? We knew that fact and had proven it, and had the witnesses there prepared to prove every line and word of the statement made before the House on the 22nd of May. No, he does not see fit to answer that statement. He only added to that such facts as were forced from him on cross-examination, as members of this House will see on reference to the evidence. He did, however, add some things there, and he added some things that are very material. Then he having completed his statement at that time —the third attempt at defence—we went on with the evidence. I was not satisfied to let the matter rest there. I knew that all the facts had not come out, and I went on to prove the additional fact—and I did prove it —that when he took the $4,000 out of the Home Bank and deposited it in the Royal Bank, he deposited it in the name of his secretary, Miss McCool. Why? Another attempt to evade discovery, to hide it away somewhere where it would not be so easily discovered. He felt the importance of this because again he said to the committee: "I should like to come in and make a statement; I should like to clear this up." If it needed clearing up, why did he not clear it up in the first instance? Why did he not tell the whole story, the whole facts? He was again allowed to come into the witness box and to add a fourth edition to the defence that he was trying to make to this charge. It turned out that when he made the deposit in the Royal Bank he deposited it in the name of his secretary in order that she might draw this money out.

Mr. LOGAN: I do not think the hon. gentleman wants to be unfair, but he will remember that the evidence was that he did not deposit the money himself; that he handed the money to his secretary in his office to deposit.

Mr. PORTER: My hon. friend is quite right.

Mr. LOGAN: Then why not say so?

Mr. PORTER: The minister carried the money in his coat pocket from the bank. He said that he was carrying it in his outside coat pocket; he did not want to carry it there, so he handed it to his secretary to make the deposit.

Mr. CANNON: Is it not a fact that it has been proven in evidence that the secretary had a power of attorney and has had a power of attorney for some time previously?

Mr. PORTER: On an account in another bank, but she had no power of attorney in the bank in which the money was being deposited. The money in the Home Bank was in the minister's name and she had a power of attorney to draw on that. She had no power of attorney in the Royal Bank and she deposited the money in her own name in trust. I cannot conceive of any honest reason for doing that. One can conceive of reasons for doing it. The only one that appeals to me is that it would have been much easier to discover the facts of this case if the money had been deposited in the name of the Minister of Labour rather than in the name of the secretary of the Minister of Labour. That has been the conduct that has characterized the Minister of Labour all through this matter, and it is for those reasons, and just speaking generally in regard to them, that I say I think the Minister of Labour has forfeited all right, all claim, to the ordinary pleadings for sympathy that would go out from the ordinary man to a man who had made, say an innocent or a bona fide mistake. If I was assured as I was on the 22nd May when I made this charge against the minister, I am doubly assured now, because not only have the facts occurred as I related them to the House on that occasion, but they carry with them as the only reasonable and fair inference, a dishonest intent, and I am not putting the matter a bit too strong when I say that.

Hon. members will remember that when I first brought this matter to the attention of parliament, I dealt with the case in three different branches. I first endeavoured to lay down certain principles that should govern the conduct of cabinet ministers and stated what those rules were. I supported the statement that I made at that time by reference to the remarks or statements of some of the ablest statesmen known to the British parliament. When I had finished stating the principles that should apply to this case, not an hon. member in this House undertook to contradict or question in the slightest particular any one of those principles that I had enunciated and asked to have applied. In fact, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke on that occasion, he not only agreed absolutely with the principles that had been so stated, but said that he would go even further if that were possible; he was in absolute accord. I then took up the position of what the duties of a minister were as a trustee of the Crown, as a trustee of the people, and in his personal or individual capacity. And no question whatever was raised in regard to that; there was absolute accord again. Then I took up a statement of the facts, and in order that there might be no dispute, no cavil or controversy about the question, I numbered the paragraphs 1 to 12, twelve paragraphs of fact; and I made the assertion upon the floor of this House that I was credibly informed and believed, as I did believe, that I could prove every one of those statements of fact. I want hon. members to realize the position that the House is in just at this time in regard to this matter. We were in absolute accord in regard to the principles; we were in absolute accord in regard to the duties; the only question that then remained was the question of facts and the deduction to be made from those facts. I stated the facts, and I will take occasion to read them again. After having stated all those facts, I drew the conclusion that:

> The Hon. James Murdock, Minister of Labour, did withdraw from the Home Bank, at its Ottawa branch on the 15th day of August, 1923, two days before such bank's failure, thousands of dollars on deposit therein, to his credit, using certain information he had received as such minister, of the likely immediate failure of the said bank, and had received advantage and profit to himself to the extent of such withdrawal, contrary to his obligations as such minister, and in derogation of his office and the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament.

That was a deduction from the series of facts that I had stated. That is the only deduction that could reasonably be drawn from the facts as presented to this House, and I asked this House on that occasion practically this in so many words: There are the facts and I can prove them; and it is a fair deduction, if they are proven to be facts, that the minister has been guilty of the wrongdoing with which I have charged him. I said to this House then: Will you grant me an inquiry to find out whether these statements are true or not? And what was the verdict of the House? Every hon. gentleman said, "Yes, have the inquiry."

Now, what onus or obligation did that impose upon me? What obligation did it impose upon the House? So far as I was concerned, it left it incumbent upon me to prove the facts I had alleged; and the obligation was upon this House, if I did prove those facts, to apply the remedy. The position has changed just to this extent—the obligation still rests upon this parliament, and upon every hon. gentleman who wishes to see the honour of parliament vindicated, to declare whether or not the facts are proven. Every hon. gentleman must say for himself, "If these facts are as alleged, then I must perforce apply the necessary punishment if punishment should be meted out. And if the facts are not proven then it is my duty to declare that the charge must go by the board." I made my statement, bearing willingly as a member of parliament the whole responsibility in so doing. I am not in any manner shirking that responsibility now; I am perfectly ready and willing to take whatever may be coming to me in consequence if I have made a false accusation against the Minister of Labour. But I do hope and I expect that I shall get a fair, unbiased expression of judgment from this House.

Just before coming to questions of fact I want to refer for a moment to the only defence which it seems to me the Minister of Labour has attempted to set up in all four of the efforts he has made to clear himself in this matter. The thing has narrowed itself right down to a statement of alleged fact, that he received information from the Deputy Speaker on the 9th day of August; and he would have it inferred that by reason of that information received on August 9 he withdrew his money on August 15. But hon. members will search in vain throughout all the evidence to find one single word from the Minister of Labour to the effect that he did withdraw that money from the Home Bank as a result of what he was told by the Deputy Speaker. The minister has never made any such statement although he has had at least four opportunities of doing so.

Let us now examine for a moment or two just what the charge is, because I want the House to understand fully and precisely what I did charge; the House will hold me accountable only for the charge which I did make and which I am prepared to stand by. What is the charge I made?—and I am speaking now more particularly with reference to the oath of office. It was argued in the committee, and it has been argued to some extent on the floor of the House to-day, that so far as the oath of office is concerned the acts which it has been shown that the Minister of Labour committed do not constitute an offence. I wish to take issue with that point of view; I say that they do. But even if they do not, let me point out that I have never yet charged that the Minister of Labour violated his oath of office; I never used such an expression at any time. I want hon. members to understand that, because the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) argued the point before the committee. He read the oath of office and he said: "Why, gentlemen, there is not a single word within the four corners of that oath that prevents James Murdock from going and getting his money as he did." The hon. member went further: "Why," he said, "you would not hang a cat on evidence of that kind." Well, I do not believe that he ever would hang a cat on such evidence, or that he would have a chance to; indeed, I do not think that any self-respecting cat would be guilty of such a thing. But be that as it may, the hon. member for Welland thought that this was the right and the honourable position to take —that a minister might not be guilty because the oath of office did not say in so many words: You must not rob a bank, you must not defraud the widows and orphans who are depositors in the bank, you must not use the knowledge you secure as a minister in council, or out of council, you must not utilize the information you get as a minister, to your own advantage. Because the oath does not say that in so many words, therefore the position is taken that no man can be guilty of any offence in that direction. But what did such men as Sir Rufus Isaacs and Lloyd George say in a similar situation? When it was brought up in the British parliament in a resolution to the effect that the House regretted the fact that these gentlemen had been guilty of an indiscretion in buying Marconi shares, what did the men do whose honour was involved? Did they take the position which as I have just indicated the Minister of Labour took? No; they came before parliament on the first occasion on which the resolution was moved and admitted every single statement that was made against them; they admitted the principle which the Prime Minister has admitted here; they admitted their duty; and they expressed their deepest regret that they had been guilty of such an indiscretion. And what did parliament in its charity do? Just as I argued a few moments ago that this House probably would do had the Minister of Labour pursued the course which those gentlemen adopted; had he expressed his regret, that would probably have ended the matter. But he has taken the very opposite course; he has taken a course of defiance of parliament; he has taken a course of defiance of what the common people of this country believe to be the right and straight thing.

To proceed with the question of the oath of office. As I have stated, I did not use the expression that the minister had violated his oath. This is what I said:

> —using certain information he had received, as such minister, of the likely immediate failure of said bank, and had received advantage and profit to himself to the extent of such withdrawals, contrary to his obligations as such minister—

Not contrary to his oath. I said:

> —contrary to his obligations as such minister—

In all fairness and in all decency let me ask every hon. member: Is it not contrary to the minister's obligation of office for him to conduct himself in this case in the manner in which he is proved to have conducted himself? If this House is prepared to say that that sort of conduct is to be approved, and that any other hon. member can do the same thing and justify himself, I must be content.

But it is not necessary for this House to find that the minister violated the obligations of his oath. I submit that I have proven to the very hilt, as I shall presently show, every one of the statements of fact that I made there. Having done that, I ask: Is it possible for this House, after having said on the 22nd May, "If you do prove those facts, a wrong has been done, and it must be remedied," to now turn round and say, "Well, although you have proven those facts, no offence has been committed?" I intend to argue, and I think conclusively that not only has there been a violation of his obligations as a minister, but that he got from the cabinet the information which enabled him to violate his obligations. He may have got some, too, from Mr. G. N. Gordon. But either is sufficient to prove my argument. I call attention to the fact for this purpose. I charged that the minister had violated his office—not his oath—that he had as a minister done that which ought not to receive the approval of this House. Now, if he got from the Deputy Speaker such information as he swore to, even then he has brought himself within the charge that I made, because the evidence shows that he got the information from the Deputy Speaker in his, the minister's office, when they were together upon official business, he as Minister of Labour and Mr. Gordon as a member of parliament. Let me refer briefly to the evidence to show the information which the minister then obtained. At page 75 of the report will be found the following:

By Mr. German:

Q. Had you not prior to August 15 had any information of the financial standing of the Home Bank, or as to its solvency or insolvency?—A. Yes. I had some days prior to that received what looked to me to be very conclusive information that it was not a safe place to leave my sessional indemnity.

Q. This was your sessional indemnity?—A. Yes. I drew it as a lump sum on July 3, deposited it in the Home Bank, and changed its location on August 15.

In cross-examination by myself he is asked this question:

Q. Would you tell us who the member was?—A. The Deputy Speaker.

Q. The Hon. G. N. Gordon?—A. Yes.

Now this is what he asks this House to believe influenced him to withdraw his money from the Home Bank and deposit it in the Royal Bank:

By the Chairman:

Q. What information did you receive?—A. Mr. chairman, my memory would be faulty to indicate just exactly what I received but I did receive that from hearing Mr. Gordon recite various facts in connection with the Home Bank, its then present condition, and references to some of those who were connected with the Home Bank, and this gave me to understand that it was not by any means a safe institution. Further than that I do not think I could say definitely—

There is the information he got, and that is the impression which it made on him. Now, let us turn for a moment to Mr. Gordon's evidence and see what he adds to that. I quote from page 108: 5 p.m.

By Mr. German:

Q. Did you at that time know that Mr. Murdock had any deposit in the Home Bank?—A. No, I did not know it then.

Q. What did you tell Mr. Murdock, in respect to the Home Bank?—A. I am not very clear what I told him about it—

[Mr. Porter.]

He is not clear; neither he nor the minister can say clearly what the conversation was.

—but my recollection is that I intimated that it was a lame duck, and I thought the next one to go.

Then he is asked further:

By Mr. German:

Q. What did you notify Mr. Murdock regarding this?—A. I did not notify him.

And again he is asked:

By Mr. Hanson:

Q. The conversation you had, Mr. Gordon, with Mr. Murdock, that information regarding the Home Bank was purely casual?—A. Yes.

. . . . . .

Q. That was an opinion you picked up from people other than those connected with the bank?—A. Yes.

Q. Those who would have no intimate knowledge of the exact condition of the bank?—A. Not exactly. About a month before the session adjourned Mr. Herb Daly and I sat up on the C.P.R. train for a couple of hours and talked matters over.

Q. That would be about a month previous?—A. I would think so, before the House adjourned.

Q. Where was that?—A. We left Ottawa—

Q. Did Mr. H. J. Daly who, I understand, died this morning, state to you on that occasion that the bank was about to fail?—A. No.

Mr. Gordon had no evidence from any one that the bank was about to fail; he had picked up the information casually, as he says in another place, from lawyers whom he had talked with on the train and from other people that the Home Bank was one of those banks that would likely need nursing or help to keep it going.

Mr. CANNON: In order to follow my hon. friend's argument rightly, may I ask him this question: Does he contend, even assuming that the reason for the withdrawal was the conversation between Mr. Gordon and Mr. Murdock of that date, that in view of the fact that Mr. Gordon went to Mr. Murdock to see him in his capacity of a minister of the Crown the minister violated his obligations by acting on that information?

Mr. PORTER: Perhaps I could answer my hon. friend's question best by putting another. Does anybody believe that, sitting in his office as Minister of Labour, and discussing a matter of official business, as the minister himself put it, with Mr. Gordon, it would be possible that the minister could hear with one ear only what appertained to official business, and with the other ear only what applied to the Home Bank, and keep each separate and distinct so that one would not influence his conduct more than the other?

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend put a question to me?

Mr. PORTER: You have asked the question. There is no use in pursuing it.

Mr. CANNON: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend—

Mr. PORTER: Then wait till I am through.

Mr. CANNON:—but I understood my hon. friend put a question to me.

Mr. PORTER: It is not possible, to my mind, for an hon. minister of the Crown to be James Murdock at one moment, in one part of the conversation, and to be the Minister of Labour in the other; it is impossible for him to entirely dissociate himself from one character or the other on the spur of the moment just as he might see fit to do. That, Mr. Speaker, is not possible. The rule goes this far, and it has been cited over and over again: It is if he gets information as a minister of the Crown; and he was acting there, with Mr. Gordon present, as a minister of the Crown, on official business, and he got information in that conversation. He is there well within the rule, and if that was the only defence that he was setting up, that he got his information from Mr. Gordon, there would be ample and sufficient in that to have him convicted of what I have charged him with, namely, of making use of information that he received as a cabinet minister to his own advantage. In the exact words in which I have charged him, it has been admitted and proved by both Mr. Gordon and the minister that he got that information on that occasion.

Now, the oath goes considerably further than the chairman of the committee would have the House understand. In the very first clause of the oath I read:

> You will serve His Majesty truly and faithfully in the Place of His Council in this His Majesty's Dominion of Canada, you will keep close and secret all such matters as shall be treated, debated and resolved on in Privy Council, without publishing or disclosing the same or any part thereof, by Word, Writing, or any otherwise—

It is not necessary for the Minister of Labour to use words in order to violate his oath. It is not necessary for him to disclose these matters in writing, but if his acts and conduct, as have been shown in this case, disclose the fact that he got his information in that way, and acted upon it, it is just as much a violation of his oath of office as if he had disclosed it by word or by writing. He must not do it in "any otherwise", and I submit that after I have dealt with the offence more fully, this House will come to the conclusion—it cannot well come to any other conclusion—that by his acts and by his conduct, apart altogether from anything he has said, he has disclosed the source of his information, and that he has acted upon that information.

It is singular and worthy of remark that after all the attempts at defence that the hon. minister made on the various occasions in the House and committee, he never mentioned, and the committee never heard, of a conversation with Mr. Gordon, the Deputy Speaker, or of the minister acting upon any conversation with him, until the morning after Mr. Daly, the man from Toronto, died. You could not call Mr. Daly. It never was mentioned before, but the next morning after Mr. Daly was dead this evidence was given. It is rather a remarkable feature, to say the least.

Now then, let me come down to the question of the facts, and I want the House to see that the question of fact is proven, as I have said before, right up to the hilt. At the risk of being somewhat tedious, I shall have to take the members of the committee through the various stages, but I shall do it as hurriedly as I can. If hon. members will look at Hansard of May 22nd, they will see what these statements of fact were.

Fact No. 1. That the Home Bank on the 14th day of August, 1923 held a meeting of its directors in Toronto, when it was made evident that the bank must fail unless it received assistance, and this position apparently was known for some time before.

Now if hon. gentlemen will refer to the evidence that was given in this case, they will find on pages 33, 34, 47, 48, 49, and on following pages, that the directors, Mr. Stewart, Mr. Gough, and Mr. Wood all three of them, swore positively and distinctly that on the 10th of August and for some days prior to their visit to Ottawa they knew the condition of the bank. They knew that it had to have help or it would go to the wall, and they had received a written report to that effect, advising them to bring the matter before the government. That is fact No. 1. Now can anybody say that that fact is not proven? I need not argue that further.

Fact No. 2. On the same day, about ten or eleven o'clock at night, certain directors of the Home Bank having proceeded to Ottawa by order of its directorate, to consult the government with regard to obtaining assistance, one or more of the directors met the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and other members of the cabinet at the Prime Minister's house, when the disclosure of the bank's affairs was made in such a manner and to such a fearful purpose as to leave the Prime Minister aghast, and under the impression that if demands were made upon the bank within the next few days the bank could not meet them; and assistance was positively and absolutely refused—on which date the government became fully aware of the serious financial condition of the bank, and on that date the members of the government became aware by the statement of the directors themselves as to what the financial condition of the bank was. There was no pleading want of knowledge after that.

I need only add that that statement of fact is entirely borne out by the evidence of the Prime Minister himself. I can read his evidence, if anybody desires it read. In his evidence the Prime Minister stated that, by arrangement made with the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), he met Mr. Stewart, the bank director, with the hon. Minister of Railways and the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) at the Prime Minister's house, and there they discussed the affairs of the bank, and to use the Prime Minister's own words, the disclosure "left him aghast," and under the impression that if demands were made upon the bank within the next day or two it must fail. Now is that fact proven? I undertook to prove fact No. 2. Can anybody say that it has not been proven—for that is what somebody must say in order to arrive at what they are asked to arrive at here.

(3) On the following day, the 15th of August, the cabinet held a meeting having all this knowledge before it, which was doubtless fully discussed. I do not think I need even to state that undoubtedly such an important matter as this would be fully discussed. That the cabinet meeting was held there is no doubt whatever. It is sworn to by the Prime Minister himself, sworn to by Mr. Graham, sworn to by Mr. Robb, and is admitted by Mr. Murdock himself. Now, there is the fact proven, as I said before, right up to the hilt.

(4) Not obtaining assistance from the government the directors and the Acting Minister of Finance proceeded to Montreal on the evening of the same day, the 15th August, and consulted financial interests there for the purpose of obtaining help. The interests consulted in Montreal could not give answer until the following morning, the 16th of August, and when they did so, no help being forthcoming, the directors returned to Toronto, and I presume the Acting Minister of Finance returned to Ottawa. Is there any controversy about that?

[Mr. Porter.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the inference which my hon. friend is seeking to draw, does he allege that the cabinet meeting was the result of the meeting held at my house the night before or in any way related to it?

Mr. PORTER: I stated earlier in my speech that I intended to confine myself solely to matters of fact first and to state the inferences that I thought I was warranted in drawing from them last. Fact number 4 has been proven by the directors and by Hon. Mr. Robb himself. I need not go any further than that.

(5) The next day, the 17th of August, the bank failed and closed its doors, and I need only mention the sickening trail of suffering, poverty, hardship and alleged crime left in its wake.

That has been proven by the statements of the Minister of Finance, Mr. Clarkson, the liquidator, the directors and others. The fact is well known, too well known to be questioned for one moment. The evidence shows beyond any question that from 17th August the bank was insolvent, and it was sworn in evidence by the liquidator that 80,000 depositors and 16,000 shareholders were the sufferers from this condition of affairs.

(6) The Hon. James Murdock had a deposit in the Home Bank, Ottawa branch, savings account, of several thousand dollars from about the 1st July, 1923, to the 15th August, 1923, the day of the cabinet meeting at which the financial condition of the Home Bank was fully known and doubtless was discussed, and on the same day and very shortly after the cabinet meeting adjourned, and just before the close of banking hours, the Hon. James Murdock withdrew from his deposit in the Home Bank, Ottawa, having knowledge as such minister of its financial condition, thousands of dollars, and leaving only a small sum remaining to his credit, and from which he made further withdrawal, leaving only the infinitesimal sum of $89 there when the bank failed.

This was proved, except only as to the matter of knowledge. I may say that I am reserving the question of knowledge for the last of my argument. I intend to take that up separately, so that the House will have before it all the evidence, so far as I consider it important, upon that one subject as to the minister's knowledge. In the last paragraph I have dealt with the fact: I want to deal with the minister's knowledge from another source altogether. The fact is proven by the evidence of several witnesses; there is absolutely no evidence from any source to contradict the statement of fact that I have made.

(7) That in making such withdrawal the Hon. James Murdock refused to accept a marked cheque in the usual course of business, and demanded cash or legals for the amount of his withdrawal, and it being near the close of banking hours, the strong box of the bank had to be re-opened to obtain the cash which was paid over to the minister.

What took place was this: The minister went into the bank with his cheque and handed it to the teller. The teller handed it to the ledger keeper who marked it and handed it back to the teller. He was asked after the cheque was marked and was current in any bank if he wanted cash. He said he did. The teller had to get the accountant to go into the vault, open up the cash box, count the money, carry it back to the cashier's cage and hand it over. These are the facts brought out in detail in the evidence.

(8) That immediately after such withdrawal the Hon. James Murdock re-deposited the same cash or legals he had withdrawn into another bank in Ottawa to his credit.

That is not strictly accurate. He did not deposit the money himself. The evidence is that he sent the money by his secretary to the Royal Bank and had it deposited in the name of his secretary in trust.

(9) That on the following day, 16th of August, the same legals withdrawn by the Hon. James Murdock from the Home Bank were returned to it by the Royal Bank through the clearing house at Ottawa.

That is proven absolutely by the testimony of the teller of the Royal Bank; there is no contradiction to that.

(10) That the Hon. James Murdock did not use the said withdrawal at that time for any purpose, but deposited it in another bank.

His own evidence covers that point exactly. He did not use the $4,050 immediately but left it in the bank until the 1st October.

(11) That thousands of depositors in the Home Bank lost their deposits, entailing poverty, hardship and ruin. Many of them lost all they had in the world.

This statement has been fully established by Mr. Clarkson, the liquidator, who has shown the hardship suffered and the losses sustained by 80,000 depositors and 16,000 shareholders.

The final fact stated by me is that the Minister of Labour saved his deposit. It has been stated that I said he made a profit. I do not see that there is any difference between saving his deposit from an absolute loss and making a profit. I made the charge in the following words:

> The Hon. James Murdock saved his deposit, thus profiting to the extent of thousands of dollars by making use of knowledge confidentially obtained as a minister of the Crown, through the means aforesaid; and in breach of his obligation as a minister of the Crown, and in violation of the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament.

I ask in all fairness, is there a member of this House who can say that one single fact that I stated when presenting the case to this House has not been proven right up to the hilt? Did this House not say by its action in granting me the inquiry "If you can prove these facts a wrong has been done, and the facts should be investigated." Those facts have been investigated. Have I drawn the right conclusion and the right inference from those facts?

I want to put the matter in a logical and succinct manner so that members can follow it easily, and see whether the conclusion I have drawn is a fair one or not. Where did the minister get the information upon which he acted? It does not signify whether he got his information from one source or another, unless he acted upon that information. That is the gravamen of the offence. It is no offence for him to receive the information but if he acted upon that information he committed a wrong. Where did he get the information upon which he acted? I will present the facts which I have proven and if any hon. member of this House will say the facts I have stated have not been proven, I will be glad to have him say so. I am going to assume these facts are proven, and I court any interruption if any hon. member will state that any one of those facts has not been proven. Here is the first fact: The directors of the Home Bank were aware on the 14th of August, 1923, that the bank was insolvent. That was proven by Messrs. Stewart, Gough and Wood, three of the directors. I was prevented from proving the records of the Home Bank. The committee would not allow those records to be put in evidence, but the fact was proven outside.

The second fact is that three directors of the Home Bank were directed by the board of directors to go to Ottawa to see the government. I have underscored those words "to see the government," and to prove that they did go to see the government. I refer hon. members to the evidence of the Prime Minister. He said in his evidence that they came to see him as representing the government, although the chairman of the committee and some hon. members would not have it that way. They wanted to put it that the directors came to see him simply as a cabinet minister and not as representative of the government, and it appears both ways in the evidence the reason being no doubt that if they came to see the Prime Minister simply in his capacity as minister and not actually in cabinet there would be more liberty than there would be if they saw him as a representative of the government. But they came to see the government as the Prime Minister stated, on the night of August 14, 1923. Mr. Stewart came to Ottawa, and by arrangement made by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) met the Prime Minister, the Acting Minister of Finance, and the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Saunders, at the Prime Minister's home, when a disclosure of the condition of the Home Bank was made. These facts will be found stated at page 40 of the evidence. Hon. members will note that when the matter was discussed at the Prime Minister's house, three of the ministers of the Crown had practically all the information that was necessary to advise them of the condition of the Home Bank at that time. At that meeting it was arranged, on account of the fact that Mr. Gough and Mr. Casey Wood, two of the directors were coming down that night with a more detailed written statement of the condition of the Home Bank, that they were to meet Mr. Wood the following morning. Now there is no getting away from that fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did I understand the hon. member to say that the three ministers who met Mr. Stewart were to meet Mr. Wood?

Mr. PORTER: No, I meant Mr. Robb. They were to meet Mr. Robb, but Mr. Robb came to the hotel in the morning before they had an opportunity to meet him. That was the point I was coming to. They were to get a more elaborate and detailed statement in writing from the directors, Gough and Wood on the following morning. The cabinet meeting was called for the following morning, the 15th. Before the cabinet met and before going to the cabinet meeting, the Acting Minister of Finance went to the hotel where Messrs. Stewart, Wood and Gough were staying, and there he got, as Mr. Stewart swore, the detailed statement in writing of the affairs of the Home Bank. Then he left Messrs. Stewart, Wood and Gough and attended the cabinet meeting.

Mr. ROBB: May I correct my hon. friend to this extent, that Messrs. Wood, Gough and Stewart came to my room at the hotel where I was living.

Mr. PORTER: I accept the correction. I think it is immaterial; nothing turns upon it.

[Mr. Porter.]

Mr. ROBB: No, but I want to make it clear.

Mr. PORTER: The point is that Mr. Stewart says that the following morning the Acting Minister of Finance was good enough to come to their room.

Mr. ROBB: No, he did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. PORTER: He may be mistaken. That is the way he puts it. He says the Hon. Mr. Robb was good enough to come to his room and make the statement.

Mr. ROBB: Let us have the evidence where Mr. Stewart made that statement.

Mr. PORTER: Page 41 of the evidence. He was cross-examined by myself as follows:

Q. What was done there?—A. A word might straighten this out, Mr. Porter. My visit on the Tuesday night was really for the purpose of arranging for an interview with some member of the government on the following morning when Mr. Wood and Mr. Gough would be there. On the following morning you refer to now, Mr. Robb was good enough to come to my room at the hotel with the deputy minister, and there met in conference myself, Mr. Gough and Mr. Wood.

Q. What was the object of the meeting?—A. To give to Mr. Robb in more detail information that the other directors brought down with them that night.

Q. Was that done?—A. Yes sir.

Mr. ROBB: My recollection is that Mr. Stewart is wrong. He came to my room. That is not material, however.

Mr. PORTER: No. The fact is that the Acting Minister of Finance got the detailed information in writing of the condition of the Home Bank at that time. We have this situation. We have the Prime Minister calling a cabinet meeting and he was present himself. We have the Minister of Railways and Canals at the meeting. He swore so himself. The Acting Minister of Finance was at the meeting, for he swore so himself. The Minister of Labour was there, for he swore so himself. Although the chairman was most assiduous in trying to keep from the committee the fact as to who was at the cabinet meeting, each one of those four ministers, in contradiction to the chairman's ruling, swore that he was present.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I correct my hon. friend at that point? To show the kind of inference that he is trying to leave, may I say that my hon. friend has just used the expression: "You have the Prime Minister calling a cabinet meeting." In other words, he tries to leave the inference that the meeting of the cabinet held on the morning of August 15 was a meeting called in consequence of the interview at my house the night before.

Mr. PORTER: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's words are plain. He says, "You have the Prime Minister calling a cabinet meeting." I wish to make plain to the House that the cabinet was in session the day before, the morning of the day on which Mr. Stewart arrived and had an interview at my house. This was during the summer. We had held a series of meetings; we had not concluded the business of the cabinet on that day, and we continued the business on the day following. The meeting held the day following had nothing whatever to do with the conference held the night before.

Mr. PORTER: I am quite willing to accept the statement of the Prime Minister. It is of no importance why the meeting was called. The important fact is that there was a meeting of the cabinet on the 15th August. The Prime Minister, with all the knowledge he had, was there; the Minister of Railways and Canals with all the knowledge he had, was there; the Acting Minister of Finance was there with all the information he had of the night before and with the written detailed report in his pocket, and the Minister of Labour was there. Those are the facts that I wish to bring to the attention of the House. Let us see what each one of these cabinet ministers said in reference to that meeting, and let me turn first to the evidence of the Prime Minister which will be found beginning on page 91. A number of questions were asked in regard to the importance of the matter. He was asked as to the meeting as reported on page 93:

By Mr. Porter:

Q. Then at the very bottom of the page (reading): "Q. It was of such enormous proportions. . . .

That is the condition of the bank.

. . . . that it appalled you at the time?—A. If it had been of small proportions, having been told what I had been told about the condition of the bank, I would have felt the government would not be justified in using public funds for purposes of that kind."

At the middle of page 94;

Q. "And that the government."—A. (Reading). "—and that the government was being asked to make a deposit of public funds to meet a situation of that kind."

I did not consider the amount, I looked at the principle of it and considered it was impossible to entertain any idea of any amount large or small. I think it is important to make that clear, because the amount that was asked for, I do not recollect at all; what did impress me was the circumstances that we should be asked to put in any amount.

Q. I take it from your answers as a whole, which I have read and which you have read, that the disclosure which was made to you at that time was of such a serious and important nature, or was of such an important nature that you would naturally desire to consult with your colleagues about it?—A. Yes.

Q. You would not feel justified in withholding that from the cabinet?—A. I felt that Mr. Stewart had spoken to me as a member of the government.

Q. And you would not feel that you were doing your duty in not disclosing that to your cabinet? —A. I should certainly wish to confer with my colleagues about it, yes.

There is a statement of the Prime Minister with the information all in his possession of such grave and serious importance that he would want to consult his colleagues about the matter, that he would not feel justified in withholding it from them, and he goes to council on the morning of the 15th with all that in mind. Could I ask you to believe that the Prime Minister was so derelict in his duty that he did not bring that matter before his colleagues? His oath of office compelled him to bring that matter before them if he believed that it was a matter that should be brought before them. Do you think he violated his oath? I do not believe it. I refuse to believe such a thing as that. He says that he would feel derelict in his duty if he did not bring it before them; that it was a matter of such transcendent importance that he could not keep it from them. Do the people of this country want to believe that the Prime Minister, the head of this government, is a man of that character that he would keep such a matter away from his colleagues? Not only had he the facts only the night before, but his colleague, the Acting Minister of Finance had the written documents in his pocket. He took them right from the directors at the hotel to the cabinet meeting. Is it possible that the Acting Minister of Finance would sit still with those documents in his pocket which, he says, he got the following morning, that is the 15th and not bring the matter to the attention of the Prime Minister and his colleagues? Is it believable? Not only that, but the Minister of Labour was there himself. If the Prime Minister, the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Acting Minister of Finance all desired to consult with their colleagues, as they swore they did with whom would they consult? There is no evidence that anybody else was present but the Minister of Labour. With whom would they consult? Mark the significance of this. He had word from the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Gordon) on August 9 and he went to sleep thereafter and slumbered soundly and comfortably, never waking up until August 15. Where was he on August 15? There is not a single word or tittle of evidence throughout the whole inquiry that he was anywhere else than at cabinet council. There is not a word of evidence that he met and discussed the subject with anyone else. I say, there is not a word of evidence to that effect and I defy any hon. member to indicate anything of the kind. So there you are. After this peaceful slumber from August 9 to August 15, the Minister of Labour woke up very suddenly. What disturbed his rest? Look at his evidence at page 77. First of all the evidence deals with the facts which the minister got from the Deputy Speaker. It proceeds:

Q. I understand, Mr. Murdock, that you said you received that information on the 9th of August?—A. Yes, the 9th of August.

Q. And you allowed from the 9th of August till the 15th of August to elapse before taking any action in regard to the withdrawal?—A. I did not withdraw between those dates. . . .

Q. But it was so important on the 15th—

That was the day of the cabinet meeting, remember.

Q. But it was so important on the 15th that you thought you could not leave it any longer?—A. There were other circumstances that brought the matter to a head on the 15th, yes.

Let hon. gentlemen ask themselves how they can square that. The minister went to sleep on the 9th and never woke up until he was at the cabinet meeting, when circumstances arose that "brought the matter to a head." It had not come to a head before; it could not have two heads; but circumstances occurred then which prompted the minister to action. He had not seen fit to act before, but the matter was brought suddenly to a head then, as he swears himself. And I do not ask the House to believe any one else but him. What did the minister do when the matter did come to a head? He rushed from the cabinet meeting to the bank, the meeting having adjourned at 12.45 p.m.; and before 1 o'clock he had gone down to Sparks street to the Home Bank, had drawn his cheque, passed it in to the teller, the teller had passed it over to the ledgerkeeper, the ledgerkeeper had marked it and handed it back to him, then they had looked up the accountant and there was drawn out of the vault the strong box from which there was counted out $4,000 which was carried to the teller's cage and then handed over to the minister. And all this happened inside of fifteen minutes. A terrible hurry, after the minister had slept from August 9 to August 15.

Now, as a matter of fact, what were the "other circumstances" that induced the minister to withdraw the money? He could have told us in a word if he had dared to do so. He could have told us in a word if it would have helped his case, when he violated his oath to such an extent as to admit that he was at the cabinet meeting. Is there any reasonable conclusion which any fair-minded person can come to other than that the circumstances that moved the minister to action on that occasion had arisen in the cabinet meeting? If they did not occur there where did they occur? I repeat, the minister could have told us, but he has not done so. There is no suggestion of any other place where he could have got the information; and it is the duty of this House—I want to make this perfectly clear—not to decide this matter only upon the sworn word of the witnesses; it is just as important that the House should draw reasonable inference from the facts and the circumstances that have been elicited as it is proper to consider the sworn testimony itself. That is the duty of every hon. member of this House; and how can any hon. gentleman, in the face of the facts that have been sworn to, draw any other reasonable conclusion than that the minister must have got his information at the meeting?

Is it not reasonable to infer that he acted upon that information therein received? Or, if you will, that he acted upon both the information he got at the cabinet meeting and the information he received from the Deputy Speaker? Is it not a fair inference that he acted at any rate upon both and that he has come within the letter of the charge I have made and has violated his obligation as a minister of the crown? Yet, notwithstanding this, the committee has seen fit to declare not proven the facts I alleged in this House on May 22. Dare any man in this House get up and say that one of those facts has not been proven, and point out wherein it is not proven? But not satisfied with that,—and this is the part I regret most of all—not satisfied with having found as a fact, upon the evidence, what the evidence would not warrant for a moment, indeed totally in disregard of the evidence, that the charge was not proven, in their anxiety to whitewash the Minister of Labour, if I may use that term, they have gratuitously gone away and beyond the commission given them by finding as a fact that the charge has been wholly disproved,—a declaration which there is not one single word or tittle of evidence from start to finish to support. I move seconded by Mr. Stewart (Leeds):

That all the words after the word "the" in the first line be stricken out and the following words be substituted:

committee, having considered the resolution referred to the select standing committee on Privileges and Elections on the 22nd day of May, 1924, as follows:—

"Thursday, May 22, 1924.

Ordered,—That the following:—

Mr. Porter, seconded by Mr. Guthrie, moved, That, E. Guss Porter, member representing the electoral riding of West Hastings, in this House, having declared from his seat in the House that he is credibly informed and that he believes he is able to establish by satisfactory evidence that:—

The Hon. James Murdock, Minister of Labour, did withdraw from the Home Bank at its Ottawa branch on the 15th day of August, 1923, two days before such bank's failure, thousands of dollars on deposit therein to his credit using certain information he had received, as such minister, of the likely immediate failure of said bank, and had received advantage and profit to himself to the extent of such withdrawals, contrary to his obligations as such minister in derogation of his office and the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament.

be referred to the select standing committee on Privileges and Elections of this House to inquire fully into the said allegation with power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath or affirmation, and that the said committee do report in full the evidence taken before them and all other procedure on the reference, and the result of their inquiries to this House for such action thereon as this House may determine.

Attest.

W. B. NORTHRUP,
Clerk of the House of Commons."

and having heard the evidence given by all witnesses submitted in support of the charge contained in said resolution and all evidence and statements made in answer thereto, and examined all exhibits filed on such inquiry, beg leave to report as follows:—

(1) That the charges contained in the said resolution have been proven and sustained.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. GERMAN: It is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): Mr. Speaker, after what was said by the hon. mover of the report (Mr. Archambault) this afternoon in support of his motion for its adoption, it would hardly seem that very much more is required to be said to convince hon. members that it should receive the support of the House.

The hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) took an hour and a half in stating a very large number of things with which no person had any quarrel or any dispute. He made some statements, however, which I think I should take the time of the House to correct. When the operations of the committee were over, the hon. member for West Hastings moved the adoption of the report as prepared by himself, and stated that though he had a speech prepared in support of it he did not intend to make it then, but would reserve it for another occasion. So the lesser lights on that committee argued the case on behalf of the hon. gentleman's contention, and I thought to-day, after listening to his remarks, that I could very well understand why he had not made that speech on the former occasion. I believe he felt that it was a speech that would not stand, to use a French expression, being "réchauffé." I believe he felt that after having made it once he could not make it a second time, and I believe that with that every one who heard his remarks this afternoon will pretty consistently agree. He did the best, however, in my opinion, that any one could do in support of a very bad case and of a forlorn hope. He made some statements regarding Mr. Murdock which I believe even he, upon reflection, will feel like retracting. He stated that Mr. Murdock could have made a statement before the committee in the beginning, but did not do so. Now he knows as well as every other member of the committee, and as every one who will read the evidence must know, that Mr. Murdock was in the committee prepared to make his statement when the proceedings of the committee first began, and desired to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But did not say so, nor did anybody else.

Mr. GERMAN: The right hon. gentleman says he did not say so, nor did anyone else. His name, it is true, was not mentioned in express terms. I was at the committee when the hon. member for West Hastings suggested calling a large number of witnesses, whom we thought it was absolutely unnecessary to call because the facts were not in dispute, but were admitted. Mr. Murdock was there and every member of the committee knew he was prepared to make a statement and desired to do so. That went on for a few days until this calling of witnesses to establish something that was not in dispute became rather wearisome to the members of the committee, to the majority of them at any rate. We said "Mr. Murdock is here and he admits all these things; call him." The offer was made that Mr. Murdock should go into the witness box and give his evidence, but the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter), said "No, I will not consent to that until I have had fifteen or twenty minutes to consult with my companions." Apparently a consultation was necessary before my hon. friend could decide as to whether or not Mr. Murdock should be allowed to go into the witness box and give his evidence. Later on the minister did give testimony and his statement was a truthful one; it impressed every one who heard it as being true, and I believe that is the opinion of the people throughout the country.

The hon. member made another statement regarding Mr. Murdock which I believe on reflection he will consider should not have been made, and which every member of the committee feels should not have been made —that Mr. Murdock in having the $4,000 deposited in the Royal Bank in the way in which it was deposited was doing something in secret, was trying to cover up the fact that the money was so deposited. The facts are—as stated by Mr. Murdock himself, and by his private secretary, Miss McCool—that this money was in Mr. Murdock's hands in his office. He was engaged with an attorney from Toronto in connection with an injunction proceeding in which the government was interested. He called his secretary and said "Take this money and deposit it in the Royal Bank so that you can draw it; deposit it in the same way that you have always done." She said "I have no power of attorney to draw money out of the Royal Bank." "Very well," he said, waving his hand, "go and deposit it in your name as you have done before:" and the evidence shows she had deposited the money in her name on prior occasions. My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) shakes his head as to that. Let me read just what was said and I will make the quotation as short as possible. This is the evidence given by Miss Sadie McCool:

By Mr. German:

Q. I believe you are the private secretary to the Hon. James Murdock?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. On the 15th of August you took $4,000 in money from him to deposit in the Royal Bank?—A. Yes.

Q. It seems you deposited it in your own name in trust?—A. Yes.

Q. Will you explain to the committee why you did that?—A. I came in from lunch and Mr. Murdock called me into his office where he was eating lunch. He had an appointment with a man and he said, "I have not time to go out, will you take this money and deposit it in the Royal Bank so you can draw it like you are drawing on my other account?", and I replied, "I cannot do that without a power of attorney unless I put it in my own name in trust."

Q. What happened then?—A. He said, "All right," and waved his hand, and I went out.

I will now quote the evidence of Mr. Murdock himself. This is his statement:

I will give it in another way. I was sitting in my office with $4,000 in 400 ten-dollar bills in an envelope, which I expected to place in a safe depository. As a legal gentleman from Toronto was waiting to see me in connection with an injunction in which he had been engaged by the government, and this was the only time I could see him—right between the two meetings of the cabinet—I rang the bell and called in my secretary and handed the envelope to her with the money in it, and said, "Go and deposit that money in the Royal Bank so that you can draw on it as you have been doing on the other account."

By Mr. German:

Q. Had she been drawing in other banks?—A. She had a power of attorney since about September, 1922, just before I went overseas to Geneva in 1922.

Q. She had a power of attorney to draw on your account?—A. Yes, and you will notice that eighteen of those cheques out of the twenty are drawn by her.

By the Chairman:

Q. Is that all you wish to say, Mr. Murdock?—A. I think that is all.

By Mr. Hanson:

Q. You did not tell her to put it in her name in trust?—A. I told her to put it in the Royal Bank so she could draw on it as she had been doing before.

Q. The other deposit was in her own name?—A. Yes.

Q. You know now that this was not in your name? —A. I do, and I knew before she went out of the room that this would not be in my own name.

How anyone can attempt to say, in view of that evidence, that Mr. Murdock was trying to keep this matter secret or do anything different from what he had been doing in the past I cannot understand. I cannot even think that my hon. friend (Mr. Porter) has any such idea himself, but being led away, perhaps, by his feelings he said something more than he really intended to say. There was another remark made which I think was equally uncalled for.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member still say that there is evidence to show that other deposits were made in the name of the secretary? He knows that other deposits were not in her name at all.

Mr. GERMAN: All I can do is to call my right hon. friend's attention to what Mr. Murdock says.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member knows himself that they were not.

Mr. GERMAN: I beg my right hon. friend's pardon?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member knows himself, it is proven, that the deposit was in the name of Mr. Murdock.

Mr. GERMAN: Is the right hon. gentleman referring to the deposit in the Home Bank?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. GERMAN: Certainly the deposit in the Home Bank was in the name of Mr. Murdock, but I am saying that the other deposits were in the name of Miss McCool.

Mr. HANSON: What other deposits? There is no evidence of any.

Mr. GERMAN: I propose to argue this case from the evidence on the record and not from the suppositions of hon. gentlemen opposite. Let me quote again:

Q. You did not tell her to put it in her name in trust?—A. I told her to put it in the Royal Bank so she could draw on it as she had been doing before.
Q. The other deposit was in her own name?—A. Yes.

That is easy enough to conceive. Mr. Murdock had confidence in his secretary; she had a power of attorney to draw on his account. She went to the Royal Bank and deposited this money in her own name in trust. I am sure hon. gentlemen will not feel that there was anything done in an improper or dishonourable way in that connection.

There is another matter which I think the hon. member for West Hastings referred to this afternoon which did not do him very much credit, and I regret very much that he made the remark. I think he himself will regret it when he comes to consider it. He said that the statement made by the Deputy Speaker of the House (Mr. Gordon) was not made or heard of until after the death of the president of the Home Bank. The remarks he made were as follows:

It is singular and worthy of remark that after all the attempts at defence that the hon. minister made on various occasions in this House and before the committee he never mentioned and the committee never heard of a conversation with Mr. Gordon, the Deputy Speaker, or of the minister acting upon any conversation with him until the morning after Mr. Daly, the man from Toronto, died. You could not call Daly. It never was mentioned before, but the next morning after Mr. Daly was dead this evidence was given. It is rather a remarkable feature, to say the least.

It is a most remarkable thing that a man of the legal standing of the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) should draw on his imagination to such an extent as to insinuate against the Deputy Speaker of this House that he would make a statement after the death of Mr. Daly that he would not make during Mr. Daly's life. I think that statement should certainly be retracted.

Now coming down to the concrete facts of the case, what do we find? The hon. member for West Hastings mentioned a number of statements that he had made. He said, "I want to convince hon. members of this House that everything I have said has been absolutely proved". He read a large number of the statements that he made to the House when he first made his allegations and said, "Is this statement not true, is that statement not true, and is the other statement not true"? He might have gone on with a hundred other statements, and everyone would admit they were all true. There was no contention about the fact that there had been a meeting of the directors of the Home Bank and that they declared the bank insolvent. All these statements were admitted, but he has failed to produce any evidence to prove the very crucial point in dispute in this matter. He appears to think that if he can convince the House that he has made a large number of statements which are true consequently the one statement which he made which is not true will be believed, even without evidence. In that I cannot agree with him. He started out to prove one particular statement, but not all the statements he made on the floor of the House when he made his accusation. The allegation which he must establish as true in evidence is this:

The Honourable James Murdock, Minister of Labour, did withdraw from the Home Bank at its Ottawa branch on the 15th day of August, 1923, two days before such bank's failure, thousands of dollars on deposit therein to his credit, using certain information he had received, as such minister, of the likely immediate failure of said bank, and had received advantage and profit to himself to the extent of such withdrawals, contrary to his obligations as such minister in derogation of his office and the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament.

That is what he has to prove. Every one knows that the bank failed. Every one, or at least most people, knew months before that the bank was likely to fail.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. GERMAN: Every one who had his eye on the financial horizon or had any particular knowledge of the banking situation knew for days and weeks previously that the bank was likely to fail. It is true that the Minister of Labour had four thousand dollars odd in that bank and that he drew that money out of the bank. That fact was never disputed and the Minister of Labour admitted it; but it is not true that he drew out that money on account of certain information he had received as a minister of the likely failure of the bank contrary to his obligations. There is no evidence to establish the truth of that statement. What is the evidence and the only evidence? Mr. Stewart came down to Ottawa on the night of the 14th of August. He met the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham), the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and the Deputy Minister of Finance, and they went to the home of the Prime Minister. The whole situation was discussed at that time. The next morning there was a council meeting. The only allegation put forward by the hon. member for West Hastings to sustain his charge that Mr. Murdock obtained improper information, or information on which he should not have acted is that there was a meeting of the cabinet on the Tuesday morning prior to his drawing the money out of the bank, and after the conference at the Prime Minister's house. How does that figure out? At the most that is only a suspicion. There is absolutely no evidence of it. I call attention to this feature, that the hon. member for West Hastings, when making these charges, stated that they could be proved in evidence, but he had at the same time a knowledge of the fact that he could not give any evidence of anything that took place in the council chamber. He was bound to prove his case outside of what took place in the council chamber, because he could not give evidence of that. What happened in the council chamber is a sealed book. You cannot ask a question as to what took place there. It is not a situation where a question may be asked and you may refuse to answer, claiming privilege; but it is not permissible even to ask a question. The occasion is absolutely privileged, and it is harder as against Mr. Murdock than it is against his accusers. They knew they could not give that evidence when the charge was made and that they had to prove their case outside of that evidence, or fail to establish it. Mr. Murdock is tied down by the secrecy of the council chamber.

Let us see how the situation works out. On the night of Tuesday, the 14th of August, these gentlemen, Mr. Stewart, the Minister of Railways, the Acting Minister of Finance and the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Saunders, were at the Prime Minister's house. They talked over the whole situation. In his evidence the Prime Minister declares openly, emphatically and finally: In view of that situation no assistance can be given by the government to the Home Bank, but the Acting Minister of Finance will go with your director to-morrow to Montreal, and if you can work out something there, if he can be of any assistance to you, all right. The hon. member for West Hastings, drawing on his imagination, thinks the inference must be that the Minister of Labour got the information as to the prospective failure of the Home Bank on the morning of the 15th in cabinet council. I say that the indisputable inference is that nothing was said about this matter in cabinet council on the morning of the 15th. Why should anything be said? The Prime Minister had stated emphatically in the presence of the leading ministers: We are not going to give any assistance to the Home Bank.

Mr. PORTER: Why did he swear that he wanted to bring the matter before the cabinet?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He did not swear that.

Mr. GERMAN: My hon. friend is absolutely wrong. What the Prime Minister said is this: That was a matter of such importance that I would have to bring it before members of the council.

Mr. PORTER: When?

Mr. GERMAN: At any time after that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GERMAN: My hon. friends are drawing on their imaginations to find inferences. Are you going to convict a man on an inference? That has never been done yet in this country or in any other country having British institutions. No one knows that better than my hon. friends opposite who are in the legal profession and no one knows better than the hon. member for West Hastings that no man under the British flag was ever convicted on inference or suspicion. There must be evidence leading indisputably to conviction.

Mr. PORTER: Does the hon. member contend for one moment that a man has never been convicted upon circumstantial evidence?

Mr. GERMAN: My hon. friend knows very well that I did not say that, and he also knows that some of the worst criminals in the country have been convicted on circumstantial evidence and have been hanged on circumstantial evidence. It is very often the only evidence that can be established. Not only must there be circumstantial evidence that points to guilt, but there must be no other reasonable conclusion that can be drawn from the circumstances that have been shown. Take this as circumstantial evidence. Can any one say that no other reasonable conclusion can be drawn from the circumstances in this case than a conclusion of guilt? That would be absolutely absurd. I have no hesitation in putting myself in the judgment of the best legal minds of Ontario that if that evidence was submitted to a court and a jury, the judge would immediately withdraw the case from the jury and say to the jury: This is suspicion and suspicion only. You cannot convict a man on suspicion, no matter how strong that suspicion may be." You can call this strong suspicion if you like, but I am arguing from this point of view. When my hon. friend is talking about drawing an inference, I say that the proper inference to draw from the situation is that nothing was said about the Home Bank in council on the morning of the 15th August, because the Prime Minister on the evening of the 14th had stated emphatically and plainly that the government would not do anything at all about the matter, and the Acting Minister of Finance the next morning at ten o'clock made the statement: I am going to Montreal. There was nothing to talk about. If the Acting Minister of Finance had come back from Montreal with a statement from Sir Vincent Meredith of the Canadian Bankers' Association that probably something could be done, the matter might have been brought up before council and discussed. But prior to that time, I say that the inference is that nothing was said about the matter in council that morning.

You can search from the first page to the last and the only evidence is that Mr. Stewart came to Ottawa; a conference was held in the Prime Minister's house, of which conference Mr. Murdock knew nothing, because Mr. Murdock says in his evidence that he knew nothing about the visit of those directors until long after the visit had been made; the Acting Minister of Finance went to Montreal the next day, and Mr. Murdock at one o'clock the next day drew his money out of the Home Bank and deposited it in the Royal Bank. That is the sole evidence upon which hon. gentlemen opposite ask this House to convict a minister of the Crown of a heinous crime and misdemeanour in this country. No judge would allow such evidence to go to a jury on which to convict him, and this House will reject it, as I am certain the country will reject it when they have an opportunity to speak about the matter.

When the report alleges that there is no evidence to prove these charges, what I have stated confirms that allegation. Evil minds will have evil suspicions. My hon. friends opposite may have evil suspicions. We regret that, but we cannot help it. We hope they will change. But simply because they have a suspicion, let them not run away with the idea that a man is guilty of a crime. What does the Minister of Labour say as reported at page 77 of the evidence:

Q. And after getting information from Mr. Gordon, did you get any further information?—A. No.

This is about the failure of the Home Bank.

Q. You say: "No."—A. "No."

Q. Of any kind or description—or anywhere?—A. Not that would form my opinion in regard to the matter.

Q. It may not have formed your opinion, but did you get any other information?—A. No one else had discussed that matter with me at all.

Q. Had you any better knowledge on the 15th as to the condition of the bank than you had on the 9th?—A. I would say not.

Q. Why did you get in such a hurry on the 15th?—A. Well, I do not know whether it was a question so much of getting in a hurry. . . .

Q. It seems to be. . . .

The Chairman: Let the witness finish his answer.

The Witness: I proceeded to do on the 15th what I intended to do, and no doubt would have done, excepting that I neglected it for several days.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) this afternoon rather intimated—at least I took his remarks in that way—that when the Minister of Labour was making these answers, he was making them with a mental reservation as regards what might have taken place in the council chamber. I do not think so. That is another inference. When he answered that question by saying that he got no other information from any source, he did not seem to me as though he was making any mental reservation whatever; I took it that he was excepting no place, not even the council chamber. I thought at the time that the question was objectionable, but it was not objected to and it went through. In my opinon there was no mental reservation on the part of the Minister of Labour in his answer to that question. He further says:

By Mr. Porter:

Q. Just one more question, Mr. Chairman. I think that is all I want to ask for the moment. Mr. Murdock, I want to ask you one further question: Were you aware of the fact that the directors of the Home Bank met certain members of the cabinet at the premier's house?—A. Not until after it came out generally.

Q. When did you first become aware of that?—A. I could not say, Mr. Porter.

Q. You cannot give me approximately the date?—A. No, I am sorry to say I could not.

Q. It was prior to your withdrawal?—A. Withdrawal?

Q. Prior to your withdrawal of the money from the bank?—A. Oh, no.

Q. What? I said it was prior to your withdrawal on the 15th of August?—A. No.

Q. Are you quite certain of that?—A. I feel quite certain of that.

The Minister of Labour not only did not know that these directors were here but he got no information of any sort except that which he received from the Deputy Speaker, according to his own sworn statement. And who among hon. gentlemen who sit in this House is prepared to stand up and say that the Minister of Labour was deliberately lying when he gave his evidence in that regard? I do not think any hon. gentleman is ready to do that. Everyone thought that the minister gave his evidence in a most truthful manner. Why, the very cheque on which he drew the money was dated August 14, and all that the minister had to do if he wanted to be deceptive was to keep his mouth shut concerning that cheque. He was not asked the question as to when it was drawn but he volunteered himself the information as to its date; and if the statement had gone down in the evidence that the money was drawn on August 14 instead of August 15 it would have answered this charge almost conclusively. But the minister, in his desire to be absolutely frank with the committee, said: "I do not want to be misunderstood; although that cheque is dated the 14th the money was drawn by me on the 15th. I went to the bank and drew the money that day." The minister appeared before the committee with absolutely clean hands and he was perfectly prepared to give a truthful statement in regard to everything that had taken place. He did not desire to conceal nor did he conceal any one particular circumstance in the whole matter. He answered all questions openly and aboveboard and the committee believed, as I am very much inclined to think the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Porter) himself believes, that he was telling the truth and was actuated by nothing but the purest motives. There is no evidence against him; there is no truth in the charges. He has spoken and refuted those charges and I say that not only have they not been proved but that they were absolutely disproved.

Let us take the other side of the shield for a moment. When any one stands up and asserts that a minister of the Crown shall not use any information that he has obtained in council for any purposes whatever, even for the protection of his own property, his life or that of his family, I must say that this is a proposition from which I dissent entirely. I would not subscribe to any such preposterously inhuman doctrine. Suppose for example a member of the council happened to learn, in council, that a riot would almost certainly take place in the town in which his family resided: would it be improper for him to telegraph his wife and get her and the rest of his family out of the place as quickly as possible? Hon. gentlemen smile; but why should not a man use such information just as he would use information acquired in any other way? Suppose, again, that a minister of the Crown had heard in council any time during the war that a ship leaving Quebec was likely to be torpedoed: would he be acting in any violation of his oath if he took steps to prevent his wife and family from taking passage on that vessel? Shall a minister not use information he has received in council for any purposes whatever? I say, I will not subscribe to any such doctrine.

Miss MACPHAIL: In such a case would not the cabinet minister be perfectly within his right in attempting to save the lives of many others besides his wife and children?

Mr. GERMAN: Most certainly he would, and that is the point I am coming at. I may remark in passing, however, that my hon. friend from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), who is getting particularly interested in this matter now, did not take so prominent a part in the whole course of the proceedings in the committee. We did not have the pleasure of hearing her. Now, references have been made to the statements of English statesmen, and with those statements I have not any fault to find. Mr. Asquith for instance has said:

> No minister is justified under any circumstances in using official information that has come to him as a minister for his own private profit or for that of his friends.

With that statement I am in absolute accord. But I should like to remind hon. members that there is a very great difference between that and the question we are now discussing. In that case members of the cabinet, after having received information as cabinet ministers, purchased shares in a company out of which they made thousands of pounds; and there is a clear distinction between that situation and the case of a minister going to a bank and drawing out his own money, to which he has an absolutely perfect right. The Minister of Labour had an absolute right to withdraw his money any minute he saw fit; it was his own money and he had a right to draw it out. And how in the name of all that is intelligent could the Minister of Labour on that day have had any knowledge that the withdrawal of his $4,000 would injure in the slightest degree any other depositors in the bank? No one else thought it would. It was known that the bank was likely to fail; but who would lose in consequence of such a withdrawal? The shareholders would lose, and that is the utmost that any one supposed, the utmost no doubt that the minister himself supposed. It would not appear to anyone that the minister's withdrawing his $4,000 would injure in the slightest degree any other depositors.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member explain why the minister drew out the money?

Mr. GERMAN: He drew it out for the same reason that my hon. friend or I or any one else would draw out a deposit—because he wanted it in a safe institution and did not wish to have it tied up in a bank that might become bankrupt.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the money of other depositors was safe where it was, the minister's deposit would also be safe and he would not be running any risk.

Mr. GERMAN: That is all right as an ethical proposition. It is mighty easy to be wise after the event, but if my right hon. friend found that his wagon was likely to break down I am sure he would get out before it did break down. I say therefore that there was no reason in the world why the minister should not draw out his money. It was his own money. He is not a legal gentleman like my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition and my hon. friend from West Hastings; they in their superior knowledge—and virtue, perhaps—would not have withdrawn their deposits, but he in his innocence of business matters withdrew his money. Now, even supposing he got the information in council—and I am accepting for the moment the very supposition that he got the information from this source—I would be prepared to stand up and say that he was justified in acting as he did, because the withdrawal of his deposit would not under ordinary circumstances injure other depositors; in this instance the failure of the stockholders injured the depositors. As soon as Mr. Murdock found out there was likely to be injury to other depositors by reason of his action he said, "Very well, I will pay the money back." He made a supreme endeavour to do what he thought was right. He has been criticised by my hon. friend from West Hastings for not paying back the money sooner. Mr. Murdock saw notices in the newspapers, but he said, "I take no stock in newspaper reports." He thought, like most of us, that the reports were merely political tactics, and therefore he paid no attention to them, but when he found that other depositors were likely to be prejudiced, then he, like the honest man he has shown himself throughout these proceedings, said, "Very well, Mr. Clarkson, I will return you the money, although I do not feel that I am legally bound to do so."

Without taking up your time any longer, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the report of the majority of the committee is the report that should be adopted by this House. And I know mighty well that it is the kind of report that will be adopted by 90 per cent of the people of this country.

Mr. SPEAKER: When at six o'clock I read the amendment and translated it, there seemed to me to be something irregular in its drafting. By rule 46, as the House is well aware:

> Whenever the Speaker is of opinion that a motion offered to the House is contrary to the rules and privileges of parliament, he shall apprise the House thereof immediately, before putting the question thereon, and quote the rule or authority applicable to the case.

The amendment recites the reference which was made to the committee on Privileges and Elections, and proceeds as follows:

> That the charges contained in the said resolution have been proven and sustained.

While the section of the report, concurrence in which is asked by the motion of the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault), is in this form:

> That the charge submitted to this committee for investigation, so far as it affects the honour of Mr. Murdock, is not only not proved but entirely disproved.

The rule is that when a report comes from a committee a motion is made by the chairman or by any other member of the committee asking the House to concur in the report, and if objection is taken to the motion by some other hon. member he moves in amendment, that the report be referred back to the committee with instructions to amend the same. In the present instance the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) has, in my humble opinion, forgotten that formality. Let me quote from Bourinot, as set out at page 141 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, No. 559:

> When the motion is proposed the report may be referred back to the committee for further consideration or with instruction to amend the same in any respect.

The essential part of the report is contained in the section which the hon. member wishes to supersede by his amendment. I find no fault with him in this respect, for it is his right and privilege to ask the House to concur in the views of the minority of the committee. But there is a technicality which must be observed, and I would suggest that in order to live up to the precedents and rules of the House the hon. member alter his amendment to read as follows:

> That all the words after "that" in the first line be stricken out and the following inserted instead thereof:

the second report of the select standing committee on Privileges and Elections be referred back to the said committee with instructions that they have power to amend it by striking out the last three paragraphs thereof and substituting therefor the following:

The last three paragraphs are those to which objection is taken by the hon. member.

and having heard the evidence given by all witnesses submitted in support of the charge contained in said resolution, and all evidence and statements made in answer thereto, and examined all exhibits filed on such inquiry, beg leave to report as follows:—

That the charges contained in said resolution have been proven and sustained.

Of course, the hon. gentleman would have to have leave of the House to amend his own amendment, or another hon. member might move it for him. It is true that 9 p.m. the amendment is merely defective as to form, but it is essential in parliamentary procedure that we should adhere to our forms. Therefore I would ask that the hon. member be allowed to amend his amendment in the way I have suggested.

Mr. PORTER: Mr. Speaker, upon reflection I feel quite satisfied that the course suggested by you is well advised. The intention of my amendment was identical with what you have expressed, but perhaps it was not aptly worded to carry out that intention. I will ask another member to move an amendment in proper form so as to comply with the rules.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps the House might be willing to allow the hon. member to amend his amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: If there is objection, another member might move the amendment. The amendment moved by the hon. gentleman is out of order, and the question is on the main motion. Of course, it is competent for another hon. member to move an amendment in proper form.

Mr. GRAHAM: May I ask a question, Mr. Speaker? Suppose all the members who have spoken on what was thought to be an amendment ask the right to speak on that which is really an amendment; will they have the privilege?

Mr. SPEAKER: Certainly.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In conformity with your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move:

That the word "adopted" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

Referred back to the said committee with instructions to amend same in such a way as to report the charge against the Minister of Labour as proved and sustained by the evidence adduced.

[Mr. German.]

As a member of this committee, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make some very brief observations on the subject matter of the resolution and of the amendment thereto. But before doing so, I desire to make one or two comments only on the observations which have fallen from the lips of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German). I can only say that his contribution to this debate has been quite on a par with his contribution to the argument that took place in the committee, when he constituted himself counsel-in-chief for the defence, and descended in my opinion, to the depths of the police court lawyer. I shall not follow him along that avenue. I desire to approach the consideration of this subject matter in the same spirit that characterized the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) when he laid his charge on the floor of this House on the 22nd day of May last, in the same spirit which characterized his conduct of the case throughout the committee, and in the same spirit that characterized his observations made on the floor of this House this afternoon, and I venture to say that no more convincing argument was ever adduced in the House of Commons.

I expressly dissent from those who in the committee and out of the committee, in this House or elsewhere, have taken the view that this was a criminal charge against the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). I have never so conceived it to be; I do not now so conceive it to be; but I do conceive that the charge made against the Minister of Labour was a charge against his personal honour, and a charge against the honour and proprieties of parliament. It is from that standpoint that the subject matter was approached by the hon. member for West Hastings, and dealt with by him in this House and in the committee, and by those associated with him.

Inasmuch as the charge was not a charge of a criminal character, inasmuch as the Minister of Labour was not charged with a breach of any section of the criminal code of this country, I have been of the opinion from the very first that it was incumbent upon the minister to take the first opportunity that could be availed of either to give assent to the statement of fact that was alleged against him or to give it the most unqualified denial; and I say the first opportunity, because his personal honour had been attacked, and because to do otherwise was to create in the minds of the public and of members of this House, the impression that his silence in a matter of personal honour and propriety would lead some people, at all events, to believe that the charge against him might have been well founded. I believe, further, that it was incumbent upon him at the very earliest opportunity to have stated in language so emphatic that none would be under any misapprehension, just what his attitude and what his position was. But to the utter astonishment of every gentleman who sat in this House when the charges were levelled against the minister on the 22nd of May last, there was not one single word of denial of the specific allegations that were then and there made against him, but there was, if I may so term it, in the words of the old common law, a plea of confession and avoidance. There was a statement to the effect that he had taken the money out of the Home Bank under circumstances, inferentially at all events, such as the member for West Hastings had stated, and there was an avoidance by the plea that he had repaid the money; but unfortunately for the credibility of the hon. gentleman in any subsequent statements that he might make, when he disclosed the correspondence which he had had with the liquidator of the Home Bank, written as a result of a legal demand made upon him for the return of the money, he made one statement the truth of which has been challenged, and challenged from the very beginning, and the untruth of which would lead any sober, sensible man in this House or in this country to take with the very gravest degree of care any subsequent statement the hon. minister might make. I refer to that paragraph in the letter of the minister to the liquidator of the Home Bank, written on the 14th of May last, in which he stated:

> On August 15th last I withdrew from the Home Bank, Ottawa branch, $4,050, and made this withdrawal in the ordinary course of business.

Is there a gentleman within the sound of my voice, is there any man who has followed the evidence in this case, who believes for one minute the statement made in that letter by the Minister of Labour to the curator of the Home Bank? Not only that, it now appears that in a previous statement made by the minister to a newspaper reporter, and which he has not denied, which during the course of the testimony he stated was in effect correct in practically every detail, he said that the money had been withdrawn for the purpose of paying for a house, whereas, as a matter of fact, when placed under oath he admitted, and had to admit it because all the record is the other way, that he had withdrawn the money on the 15th of August for the purposes of safety, and safety only.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have some observations to make as to the manner in which this investigation was carried on. I have not been a member of this House very long, and I have not had very much experience in the political arena, but I had had some political ideals and some ideals with respect to parliamentary practice and procedure, and what should be done on certain occasions, and it had occurred to my simple mind that when a charge was made specifically against the honour of an individual, which per se had no political significance, the investigation of that charge would be surrounded with all the sanctity of a judicial procedure. I was not originally a member of the committee in question, and was only appointed to relieve some gentleman who had to be absent from the House of Commons. But I attended all the meetings of the committee, save and except the organization meeting, and I wish to say, without fear of successful contradiction, that from beginning to end the atmosphere of the committee was charged, and charged as with electricity, with partisanship of the most blatant character.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CANNON: I rise to a point of order. I do not think any member in this House should describe the conduct of the committee in the way the hon. gentleman is doing now.

Mr. HANSON: I do not say anything about the conduct of the committee. I do say that the atmosphere of the committee was charged with partisanship. If the expression is unparliamentary I desire to withdraw it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think a charge of partisanship gives rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member was speaking for his own party.

Mr. CANNON: He was speaking for himself.

Mr. HANSON: I am not speaking particularly for myself but if it were necessary I could easily mention names. However, it is not necessary to go that far; the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) will know exactly what I mean—

Mr. CANNON: I was sitting next to the hon. member.

Mr. HANSON: —and if he desires to recall the circumstance all he has to do is to read the records. On the whole, I am glad to be able to say, after the first session or two of the committee better counsels prevailed. One or two of the cabinet ministers were absent after the first session or two, and a better feeling prevailed in the committee. It seemed to me as a newcomer in this House, as a new member of the committee, as one lacking in parliamentary experience, that after those old and trained warriors had left the scene we made better and fairer progress. Nevertheless, no one will say with any seriousness that the committee was conducted with that judicial decorum necessary in the premises, because certain gentlemen constituted themselves defenders of the faith, while others of us who had had no experience sat by contributing a word from time to time only. It is true that the hon. member for West Hastings conducted his own case, and he did so in a manner which reflected great credit upon him.

With regard to the rulings of the chairman I have criticism to make of one ruling and I do this with considerable hesitancy because of the strong position he took at the time. That was the ruling with respect to the rejection of questions—not only their rejection but even the right to put them—as to who were present on a certain privileged occasion. In passing let me say that in his remarks this afternoon the hon. member who was the chairman of the committee read a passage from the report which indicated that I had adhered to the view—in making the few remarks which I did to the committee—that not only was a certain occasion privileged but the fact as to who were present on that occasion was a matter of privilege also. I am surprised to have been so reported, but those who were present at the committee at the time referred to will recall that an appeal was taken from the decision of the chair and that I supported those who made the appeal. I want to make this correction as complete as possible and have the correction appear as a matter of record. While I always recognize—and while I recognize to-day—that any communication passing between cabinet ministers in council is privileged the fact that there is an occasion, which might be regarded as privileged is not to be accepted of itself as an evidence that it should be so considered. The fact that a certain gentleman was or was not in attendance has never yet been the subject of a judicial decision on the lines laid down by the chairman. It is true that some observations of Mr. Justice McKeown were read which would seem to support that view, but I venture the assertion that no legal gentleman present who has anything to do with this class of jurisprudence, on reflection, will assent for a moment to a proposition such as that laid down by the chairman. I have no further cause to complain of the conduct of the chairman save and except as to that one decision which he gave.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Does my hon. friend mean to say that the ruling of Mr. Justice McKeown was not a ruling on exactly the same point?

Mr. HANSON: If it were I would just as emphatically dissent from his ruling as I did from yours.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I would rather follow the ruling of Mr. Justice McKeown than yours.

Mr. HANSON: That may be true but it does not alter the circumstances.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a prefectly absurd ruling.

Mr. HANSON: I suggest with all respect to the hon. gentlemen, that he himself does not believe in the ruling.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON: The ruling in fact is grotesque.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON: So grotesque in fact that the gentleman against whom the charges were levelled, on reflection, did what he conceived the proper thing to do and, despite the efforts—the misguided efforts—of some of his friends, frankly revealed to the committee that he himself was present on the alleged privileged occasion in question.

Mr. CANNON: Does my hon. friend contend that the conduct of the Hon. Mr. Murdock governs the law in the matter?

Mr. HANSON: No, I do not contend that for a moment, and the hon. member should not ask such a foolish question.

Mr. CANNON: I am not calling the hon. gentleman to order; I suppose that is his natural way of expressing himself.

Mr. HANSON: Now, Mr. Speaker, I stated a little while ago that this being a charge against the personal honour of the minister himself it was incumbent upon him, at the earliest possible moment, to have made either a distinct denial of the gravamen of the charge itself, or to have stated all such circumstances as would have satisfactorily explained the situation and the allegations. Did the minister avail himself of that opportunity? I have already adverted to what took place here on the 22nd May last, and referring to the statement made a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) that the minister, at the first meeting of the committee, was ready to make a statement, I may say that I myself was present and observed pretty accurately everything that went on. If the minister had any such intention as that now disclosed to us, all I can say is that he most skilfully refrained from showing his intention and it was not until the hon. member for West Hastings had methodically, logically and step by step, built up the case which he has outlined in his opening remarks on the 22nd of May that the Minister of Labour came forward through his friends, and offered to make a statement.

What was his statement? It is true a very large number of the questions of fact involved in this matter are not in dispute, because the member for West Hastings had the evidence available from independent, reliable sources to place them beyond the pale of dispute. But as to the question of the intent of the minister, which is a very important element in the whole matter, the facts were not so evident. Approaching the crucial point in the whole matter, let us ask ourselves this question: What was the immediate cause of the effect upon the mind of the minister that induced him to withdraw his money? Two views may be taken in regard to this matter. There is the inference that naturally follows from the mere statement of the facts and the circumstances that the minister, being present at the cabinet council on the 15th day of August, went directly from the meeting of the council to the Home Bank and withdrew his money. There is the other view that he obtained whatever information he had and whatever information he acted upon by reason of a conversation held in this city on the 9th of August with the Deputy Speaker. I do not care which view you take. I say whatever view you take, whatever communication reached the minister reached him in his capacity as a minister of the Crown. Why did the Deputy Speaker go to see the Minister of Labour? He went to see him on official business, and in the course of a conversation on official business he mentioned casually the course of parliamentary legislation respecting banking in the preceding session. If anyone doubts the nature of the evidence as to why the Deputy Speaker went to see the minister, all he has to do is to read the statement of the Deputy Speaker that he went there on public business, the business of printing the revised statutes, and he went to the head of the printing department; he went there to see him, not as an individual, not as James Murdock, but as the Minister of Labour in charge of the public printing of this country.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: If my hon. friend were convinced that the Minister of Labour acted only upon the advice of the Deputy Speaker on that occasion, would he blame the minister for what he did?

Mr. HANSON: I would still think he was within the purview of the charge, it being not a matter of relevancy, but a matter of the strength of the charge. That would be the only difference there would be between the two positions. But is there anybody in this House or out of it who believes that the action of the minister during the lunch hour on the 15th of August was actuated by anything that was divulged to him by the Deputy Speaker? Is there anybody who will search his heart and his conscience and say that the minister's action in withdrawing his deposit, human though that action may have been, was the result of anything that had been communicated to him on any other occasion than the day in question? It is stated that the member for West Hastings failed to prove that the minister had any information other than that which he received from the Deputy Speaker. I want to make it plain that on at least three different occasions it was open to the Minister of Labour to declare, without the violation of any principle or of any oath, that he had not received any information from cabinet council. He would not be violating this oath if he made that statement. What was to prevent the hon. minister from being frank not only with the committee but with this House, on the 22nd day of May, and stating "I did not, on my honour, receive any intimation in cabinet council with reference to the Home Bank, and I was not actuated in making the withdrawal by any disclosures of any character that were made to me". Surely no hon. gentleman will argue that he was prevented by his oath from negativing anything in that regard. The oath only deals with disclosure and not with non-disclosure. Not only could he have made that statement to this House on the 22nd of May, but he could have made the statement on the two or three different occasions when he was on the stand in the committee under oath. To me it is more than a passing wonder that the minister, surrounded as he was by astute legal gentlemen who left no stone unturned in his defence, who left no stone unturned to advise him—and there were lawyers there by the dozen defending him—never once took us into his confidence and told us he had not received an intimation from the source to which I have alluded. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the action of the minister in leaving cabinet council at fifteen minutes to one, on the afternoon of the fifteenth day of August, and going to the Home Bank and drawing out his money intact, followed absolutely, as the morning sun follows the night, information recently received on the situation such as I have suggested. To draw any other conclusion is, I submit, to do violence to one's own judgment of what would be done in like circumstances by a private individual, if he were not under the ban of trusteeship, such as this minister was.

It is all very well for the minister to say "I had information as to the condition of the Home Bank from the Deputy Speaker". What information had he from the Deputy Speaker? It is true they met in an official capacity, so far as the minister was concerned, but what does he say the Deputy Speaker said to him? Why he frankly states, in his roundabout, redundant style, that his memory would be at fault to tell the committee what the Deputy Speaker said. The only thing he said to the committee was that he gathered from the statement made by the Deputy Speaker that the Home Bank was not a safe depository for his sessional indemnity. If it was not a safe depository for his sessional indemnity on the 9th, I submit it was not safe on the 10th, or on any of the intermediate succeeding days. However, it suddenly became very unsafe on the 15th of August after the cabinet meeting at which the minister was present. I suggest to hon. members of this House in all sincerity that they had better not do violence to the better judgment of the people of this country by resorting to a coat of whitewash on this occasion, because you may say what you like, no man who reads the evidence, who has discussed the situation, will believe anything but that the laws of cause and effect were in force on the 15th day of August, and that the cause of the effect was a communication that was disclosed to the minister and was by no means affected by what transpired on the 9th day of August.

There is one other feature to which I should like to refer. By some specious method of reasoning, by some casuistry or another, one hon. gentleman has sought to show that, because the minister did not positively and affirmatively make a profit for himself but only saved himself from possible or impending loss, therefore, there is a distinction, and that under the authorities, in the one case, he would be to blame and in the other he would not be to blame. Such reasoning as that is beyond me. What I apprehend to be the true position is this: That the minister by reason of his position as such, whether he acquired the information in cabinet council or in his official position in any other manner, did acquire information whereby he attained a privileged position over and to the prejudice of other depositors, and all the illustrations that have been suggested in this House both by the hon. member (Mr. Archambault) who was chairman of the committee, and by the hon. member for Welland, who suggested in effect that the minister would be foolish, that he would have been doing something which would not be a proper thing to do, repugnant to his reason, in fact, if he had not gone out and saved his money, absolutely ignore two considerations. The first is the position of the minister himself; the second, and far more important from the standpoint of the public, is that by his action he obtained and retained for months a privileged position over and above any other depositor. Therefore, his action was to the prejudice of other depositors, and it is not on that principle, if it was on any principle, that the minister must have been induced to return the money.

Just a word with respect to the repayment of the money. One would assume from the remarks of the Prime Minister when this matter was first brought up in this House, that because the money paid over, forsooth, was paid back, therefore no wrong had been committed. I have had a little to do with the administration of the criminal law, and I have seen many a thief, many an embezzler who, when caught with the goods on him, made restitution and, therefore, pleaded that he should be let off.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is an entirely false interpretation to put on my words. I made no such reference at all. I spoke of the minister's high sense of honour, in that when he learned officially that these losses had occurred, he should, without having any legal obligation so to do, have returned the money. I was illustrating the high sense of honour the minister had. I was not talking about restitution.

Mr. HANSON: If that was the impression the Prime Minister wished to convey, he was not very happy in the language he used. I have read the Prime Minister's language and re-read it, and in the question which he asked of the hon. member for West Hastings, and by what he left unsaid more than by what he said, he intimated to the hon. member for West Hastings that, having heard the statement of the Minister of Labour that he had returned the money, it would not be necessary to go on with the investigation. Only one conclusion can be drawn from that, namely that the Prime Minister himself was of opinion that because the money was paid back, the wrong had been corrected.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My words do not bear any such interpretation.

Mr. HANSON: Possibly not, but the Prime Minister's attitude and all the surrounding circumstances led me to believe that at all events.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member may speak for himself.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: He is easily led.

Mr. HANSON: It is true that the Minister of Labour repaid the money and I want to know why he repaid it. If the Minister of Labour did not have inside information, then I suggest that, as a matter of law, he did not have to pay the money back. If the Minister of Labour did not obtain the information which he obtained in any other way than that of an outsider, if he had no inside information which would put him in the position of a privileged depositor, then he need not have paid the money back. That is the policy underlying preferences in assignments and in bankruptcy proceedings in this country. The minister did not even contest the legality of the demand that was made upon him.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes, he did.

Mr. HANSON: What did he do? Such is not disclosed by any of the proceedings.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Will my hon. friend look at the letter the Minister of Labour sent to Mr. Clarkson?

Mr. HANSON: I have looked at that letter a good many times.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Will he look at it again?

Mr. HANSON: Yes, I will. I say that he did not contest the situation. He says:

> I may say that I do not think I am under any legal obligation to do so.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What is that?

Mr. HANSON: That is what he states in his impression. What I said was that if the minister did not obtain payment of his deposit on a privileged occasion as a privileged depositor, there was no legal liability on him, and he should have contested the demand as a matter of justice and fairness to himself.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: We say that there is no legal liability.

Mr. HANSON: That is the first time anybody has suggested that outside of the letter of the minister. The very fact that the minister paid the money back without a contest before the official referee is evidence in the mind of the ordinary public, in the mind of the ordinary man, although it may not be in the mind of a legal gentleman, that he knew his position in retaining the money was untenable.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Did the minister in his letter not state that he remitted the money from an entirely different motive?

Mr. HANSON: I suppose he drew the money out from the same motive—to save the other depositors of the Home Bank from loss?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That is no answer.

Mr. HANSON: All the facts of the case show that the minister was occupying the position of a privileged creditor, a position that was untenable in law. Even had he gone before the official referee with the Deputy Speaker, having regard to the fact that they were communicating, one as a member of parliament looking for something for his newspaper, the other as Minister of Labour charged with the public printing of the country, and even assuming that the Deputy Speaker had some inside information regarding the affairs of the Home Bank, which he had not, then I suggest that a court of law would have found that, even on that occasion, the minister would have received a preference, and it was because he knew that he would be exposed in the courts of this country as having received a preference over and above other depositors that he paid this money back without a struggle. More than that, the evidence of the record is that he was advised by certain of his colleagues to pay back the money, because he had received it under circumstances that he could not justify in a court of law.

I do not desire to say very much more about this matter. I am of the opinion that the statement of fact submitted by the hon. member for West Hastings this afternoon, in cogency, in thoroughness, in continuity of thought, presents what is really an unanswerable case, so convincing that in the mind of any disinterested jury in this country there would be but one opinion. I have no hope however that I shall be able, or that what the hon. member for West Hastings has said will tend, to convince hon. gentlemen opposite. That was very apparent all through the hearings before the committee and it has been apparent here to-day. I want to say to hon. gentlemen opposite however that there is a great tribunal before which this case will be tried, the tribunal of public opinion in this country, and it may come sooner than some hon. gentlemen think. Let me say to the Prime Minister that he will be doing no greater service politically to gentlemen on this side of the House than if he retains the Minister of Labour in his government, for he will have to defend him on every platform from Vancouver to Halifax. The Prime Minister will have to defend his colleague on every platform and I wish him much joy in the effort. I see no better political strategy, if you want to put the matter on that plane, more favourable to gentlemen on this side than keeping this government on the defensive with regard to its personnel. God knows it is weak enough and it cannot smell much worse by the retention of the Minister of Labour.

Some hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad I have not to defend my hon. friend.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): As a member of the select standing committee on Privileges and Elections I voted against the finding of the committee, that the charge submitted to the committee for investigation, so far as it affects the honour of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), is not only not proved but disproved. To me, on the evidence submitted, the charge was neither proved nor disproved; nor could it be, without the vital evidence, withheld by cabinet secrecy, as to whether or not the matter of the Home Bank failure was discussed at the cabinet meeting on August 15. One can think or suspect much, and naturally the question arises as to why the Minister of Labour did not sooner act on the "lame duck" tip given him by the Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons. It is altogether natural to suppose that the chief subject of discussion of the cabinet on the day of August 15 would be the failure of the Home Bank; when a great calamity happens people talk about it a good deal, especially where those who are very much affected by it are gathered together. If I were contemplating what I would do in the same circumstances I should decide that I would never go to a bank and withdraw money a few minutes before mealtime unless the need were very pressing; and if I took the money especially in such a large sum—which I would not have to take anyway—and I intended to deposit it in another bank, I would not in the meantime carry it up to my office and give it to someone else to deposit in my name, but would go directly when I was down town and get the thing off my mind.

If parliament is ever to be able fairly to judge such a case as this all the evidence must be laid before us; that is to say, the awful silence surrounding cabinet discussions must be broken. If at the beginning of the session the Minister of Labour had frankly put himself in the hands of the House I believe he would have been most generously dealt with; he would have been by me at any rate. His evasion has led to suspicion, however. It was a shortsighted policy for a minister of the Crown to withdraw his money no matter where he obtained the information regarding the bank's condition. Such action was sure to react on the minister and upon the government of which he was a member. A public man should in any crisis so act that his conduct will be an inspiration to others and will inspire them with faith and hope in public servants. And that faith and hope are at a dangerously low ebb to-day. People have almost lost confidence in public servants, and the finding of someone not guilty by this committee will not add anything to their trust. But we are told that we can form no judgment on suspicion. And all that I have been supposing is really after all just suspicion. But if we are not to be influenced by suspicion, if suspicion must be set aside entirely and the matter judged purely on the evidence submitted, then, if no further amendment is offered, a group of us will be forced to vote against the amendment that has already been submitted and as well against the report of the committee.

Mr. HANCE J. LOGAN (Cumberland): There is no doubt the members of the official opposition are somewhat angry. The Murdock bubble has burst; the great scandals that were foretold in all their newspapers over four months ago, about four cabinet ministers who were to be driven out of public life, have vanished into thin air, and now they are trying to make a case of the only matter which they have investigated during this long session. My hon. friend from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) is going to vote to drive a fellow member out of public life, simply because he did not get up four months ago and make some kind of statement upon ethereal charges which no one could get hold of; and she is also of the opinion that there is considerable ground for convicting the minister on the strength of suspicion. I am not going to refer to the speech of my hon. and fair friend on this matter any further than to say this to her: I do not blame her, living as she does in the province of Ontario where an ex-provincial treasurer is now on the way to the penitentiary, that she has lost faith in public men in this country. I have not however heard her so far make any condemnatory references to those whom she knows best.

Miss MACPHAIL: I shall be glad to if I have the opportunity.

Mr. LOGAN: My hon. friend, I think, has the opportunity. Now, let us examine the state of mind of hon. gentlemen of the opposition. Let me take for instance my old colleague—I do not say "old" in point of age but from the point of view of parliamentary comradeship—the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter), who is generally a gentleman of very congenial and jovial disposition. I can hardly believe that the hon. member for West Hastings would refer to any public man, especially a brother member of parliament, in the terms he has used; he declared that what the minister had said was false—and this upon oath, mark you—that certain matters were indecent, that he was dishonest, and that he ran for cover. Surely this cannot be the member for West Hastings! What is the matter after all? Why all this wrath and rage? It is all explained, as I said a moment ago, by the fact that the bubble has burst.

Let us for a moment without prejudice look at the matter calmly. What crime has the minister committed? The crime of which he is guilty in the eyes of hon. members occupying the corner opposite is that he is a man of labour who has risen by his own intelligence and ability, and through the faith of his fellow workmen, to be a cabinet minister in this country. I never expect any sympathy from that party towards a man who has risen from the ranks in that way and who still is a labouring man. But why condemn him at the present time? What heinous crime has he committed? Has he dealt in public offices in this country by endeavouring to get remuneration for transferring a man from one service to another? Has he charged large fees for selling junk to the government of which he is a supporter? Hon. gentlemen strain at a gnat but they swallow a camel. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour—and I am proud to call him my friend—had $4,050 in a bank in this city. It was about all the money he had, and he had a mortgage on his home. He was told by the Deputy Speaker of the House on a certain day that the Home Bank was in bad condition. And the Deputy Speaker was not the only one who knew this; many of us, and I can speak for myself personally, had been able many weeks before to discern that the Home Bank was on its last legs. The Deputy Speaker approached the minister in his office, and in a casual conversation about banks told him this particular bank was in bad shape. And at this juncture, let me say one word which I think is necessary in reference to the Deputy Speaker himself. I was surprised above everything else—and I have heard many surprising things in this House—to hear the hon. member for West Hastings infer that if the Deputy Speaker had not known that Daly was dead he would not have said what Daly had stated. It is not to the hon. gentleman's credit to make such a statement in reference to an hon. member occupying the position which the Deputy Speaker holds in this House, and I am here to speak for the Deputy Speaker who does not take part in the debates. He informed me a few moments ago that when he went into the committee room to give evidence he had not the slightest idea that Mr. Daly had passed from this earthly sphere. What information he got in reference to it he obtained some time during the examination when the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) remarked to him, "Don't you know that Daly is dead?" Mr. Gordon replied, "No, I hadn't heard that." Yet we are told to-day that the Deputy Speaker said certain things because he knew that Daly's lips were closed for ever.

Mr. Gordon made a statement to Mr. Murdock on the ninth of August last, a few days passed—days go very quickly in Ottawa, especially in the life of cabinet ministers—and on the coming of the fourteenth Mr. Stewart, a director of the Home Bank, came to Ottawa and, knowing the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) as a leading minister from his province, got in touch with him and said he wanted to secure help for the Home Bank; the Minister of Railways telephoned to the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb); the Acting Minister of Finance sent for the Deputy Minister of Finance, and together they went to the home of the Prime Minister where Mr. Stewart repeated the request; without hesitation the Prime Minister gave an emphatic "no"—nothing would be done for the bank as far as putting up a deposit was concerned. It is to the eternal credit of the Prime Minister that he had the backbone to say "no" right there and then. The next day at a quarter to one Mr. Murdock went into the Home Bank and presented his cheque for $4,050 payable to cash—as we all make out our cheques when we are drawing money ourselves—had it marked by the ledgerkeeper in the usual way and proceeded with it to the wicket of the paying teller. He had been seriously alarmed by Mr. Gordon's statement to him regarding the stability of the Home Bank—apart altogether from any argument that may be made as to what took place in council—and drew the money out. A gentleman was waiting for him in his office on a very important matter as he explained to the committee and he rushed there, not even having time to go anywhere for his lunch but having it sent in to his office where he partook of it while he was discussing business with that gentleman. He knew he would not be able to go over to the Royal Bank, so he called in his trusted secretary, the secretary who had paid all his private bills—as most private secretaries do for their ministers. If ministers had to look after their small personal affairs they would have very little time to devote to public affairs. He handed the money to her saying, "Go and deposit that in the Royal Bank in a way so that you can draw on it." She said, "I cannot do that because I have not any power of attorney as I have with respect to your account in the Home Bank." He replied, "Go and deposit the money in trust,"—and waved his hand in a manner suggesting, "deposit it any way at all so you can draw on it to pay my personal bills from time to time." So the secretary deposited the money in the Royal Bank in her own name in trust. That is not at all an uncommon proceeding. There was no crime committed, no indiscretion in taking this course; in fact it was the only way that I know of by which the money could be deposited so she could draw on it without a power of attorney.

We are asked to infer—as a matter of fact the whole argument against the minister is based upon inference—we are asked to infer that after the Prime Minister and the Acting Minister of Finance had said "no," next day in council this one matter of the condition of the Home Bank was discussed. What do they do in council? Is it a debating society? Do they bring up all kinds of gossip? They have, I presume, an agenda in their minds, even if it is not put in writing, and carry on according to that agenda. This was a financial matter, and I have no doubt that in regard to financial affairs the Minister of Finance does not always take his colleagues into his early confidence. But at any rate after it had been decided the night before that nothing was to be done to aid the Home Bank, I submit that the inference may fairly be drawn that there was no discussion of the matter in council that forenoon. But, upon the inference that the matter was discussed we are asked to condemn the Hon. Mr. Murdock.

The hon. member for West Hastings has no reason to complain of the report adopted by this committee. I undertake to say that never in the history of parliament has a man been treated more unfairly than the Hon. James Murdock, for he has been kept out of this chamber since May 22—more than a month—largely to suit the convenience of the hon. member for West Hastings. I would be the last man to object to that, because the hon. member was ill, and I know what that means. But I do not think it is fair for him to say that the widest latitude has not been given him and all the time given that could be reasonably expected to enable him to prove his charge.

But, Mr. Speaker, may I call your attention and the attention of the hon. member to a few things that he has not proved. It will be remembered how, four months ago, the papers were filled with wonderful stories about "Murdock and the Home Bank." The stories grew bigger and bigger until finally we were told that some kind of timelock had to be forced in order that the Minister of Labour could get at those wonderful things known as "legals." I commend this word particularly to the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) —"legals." That word has become very common in Ontario during the last few months. Well, when my hon. friend from West Hastings made his charge against the minister he used this language, which will be found in Hansard of May 22, 1924. He said:

—and just before the close of banking hours—

Mysterious time, just before the close of banking hours. It was proved it was in the middle of the day, not just before the close of banking hours at all. It goes on:

That in making such withdrawal the Hon. James Murdock refused to accept, a marked cheque in the usual course of business—

I say, Mr. Speaker, that that is not proved, and that accepting a marked cheque payable to cash is not done in the usual course of business in this country. No bank in this country will certify to a cheque payable to cash to be presented at another bank. You cannot go to the bank where you keep your money and draw a cheque payable to cash and have the bank certify that cheque. It is a rule of the bank that a cheque shall not be payable to cash if it is to be certified. The minister handed in a cheque payable to cash; he was not asking for anything else. Then the hon. member for West Hastings says that he "demanded"—listen to this:

The Hon. James Murdock demanded cash or legals—

Awful word, "legals."

—for the amount of his withdrawal, and it being near the close of banking hours, the strong box of the bank—

Aha! The strong box of the bank! This is not newspaper language but that of the hon. member for West Hastings.

—had to be re-opened to obtain the cash which was paid over to the minister.

That immediately after such withdrawal the Hon. James Murdock re-deposited the same cash or legals he had withdrawn into another bank in Ottawa to his credit.

That on the following day, 16th of August, the same legals—

He has got away from cash then.

—withdrawn by the Hon. James Murdock from the Home Bank were returned to it by the Royal Bank through the clearing house.

He goes on to say that by his action the Minister of Labour profited to the extent of thousands of dollars. Now, if the hon. gentleman desired to be fair, why did he not state $4,050 as everybody in this country knew that was the amount of the withdrawal? The hon. member pretends to be fair in this matter, but he is just about as fair as a man who would kiss a child and then strangle it. I say this was not fair towards the minister, referring to statements which the hon. member has not proved, and could not prove, and I say to him to-night not only have these charges been disproved, but he owes an apology to this House for making statements which he is not able to prove, and I challenge him now to read the evidence to show where he has proved the charges he made on the 22nd of May.

Mr. PORTER: What charges do you say I did not prove? I used the words "cash" and "legals" synonymously. There is no difference between the two. Cash is legal tender, and cash is legals; I used them synonymously, and in no other sense whatever, and I proved that $4,050 was taken out of the bank in cash.

Mr. LOGAN: On the following day the same bills were returned.

Mr. PORTER: That was proved by the manager of the Royal Bank. The same bundle of bills was taken back.

Mr. LOGAN: The fact of the matter is that the money Mr. Murdock drew out of the Home Bank was in notes of the Home Bank itself. That was proved in this investigation.

Mr. PORTER: What distinction does the hon. member make between them?

Mr. LOGAN: The implication in the original charges was that he was demanding Dominion notes. The fact is the hon. minister did not ask for any kind of notes. He was paid Home Bank notes in the usual way, and we have the evidence before the committee that the next day these were returned through the clearing house.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member say bank notes are not legals to-day?

Mr. LOGAN: I am not saying they are not legals, but the right hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that during the past few months there has been a peculiar notion of what legals are in this country. Legals are supposed to be Dominion notes of $500 and $1,000 denominations. This money was returned the next day to the Home Bank through the clearing house.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we might be fair in this matter. Let us remember, in the first place, that Mr. Murdock, when he drew this money, did not intend to deprive anybody of benefit. It was not presumed for a moment then that anybody but the stockholders and shareholders would be mulcted in this matter, and Mr. Murdock drew this money out in the ordinary way, for what purpose? We have had so many cases in this country where there is a real grievance that it does seem to me remarkable that the time of this House is to be taken up in discussing this matter, when after all, if you put the very worst construction upon it, you can only say that his action might have been indiscreet. But here we have been considering this matter week after week before the committee, and if the hon. member for West Hastings had called all the witnesses he desired, we would have been calling them yet; on my motion we at one meeting adjourned for fifteen minutes in order to see if we could not shorten the inquiry and get admissions put in to save the calling of witnesses. Time was saved in that way, but every latitude has been given. Is the hon.

minister, because he wanted to get his all, not merely a fraction of his fortune, to pay upon his home, to be condemned? Oh, what a difference it makes whose ox is gored, and how different the punishment meted out to certain gentlemen in parliament from what is asked to be dealt out to the Hon. Mr. Murdock at the present time!

Someone says he did not need to pay out the money, because he kept it in the Royal Bank until October. He could not pay the mortgage until it was due, and the day the mortgage was due he paid it. He was trying to get money in order that he might be able to pay off the mortgage on his home. I say, Mr. Speaker, this House is too fair and too just to condemn this hon. gentleman upon such evidence as this. As I said a moment ago, if you put the very worst construction upon it, you can only say that he was indiscreet. At the same time I believe the feeling of this country from one end to the other is that there was no criminal intent, no harmful intent, on the part of the minister in this matter. I believe the Hon. James Murdock is an honest man before the bar of public opinion in Canada.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) will not take it amiss if I say that there are other tasks in this House at which he excels much more than he does in the analysis and the presentation of evidence. I will not review the case in the order in which he has presented it, because really I do not think it was a very good order. Nor will I refer much to his address, save incidentally as I proceed. I do want, though, to make one protest against a position he assumed and a reference he made. We owe the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) fairness, and we owe him justice. In what I say I shall be scrupulously careful as to both and will not make my language as strong as it would be were the minister here. But we owe others the same, and among others to whom justice is due is even the ex-Provincial Treasurer of Ontario. I do not think it becomes an hon. member of this House to refer to a man as on the way to the penitentiary while he is awaiting trial. I am no admirer of the ex-Provincial Treasurer of Ontario but I am not able at the same time to fall down and worship the fairness of an advocate who pleads for the hon. Mr. Murdock in the circumstances in which he is now placed and refers to a man, as yet found guilty of nothing, as on the way to the penitentiary.

[Mr. Logan.]

Mr. LOGAN: I quite recognize that probably the expression, used in the heat of debate, was not a proper one and therefore I desire to withdraw the reference I made to the ex-Provincial Treasurer as being on the way to the penitentiary. I admit with the right hon. gentleman it is hardly fair to make use of such an expression.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I compliment the hon. member on his promptness in this respect. May I refer to another matter though which I was not going to mention: I do not think it was much better to make vague and indeterminate references to other members of this House, without mentioning their names, as having been guilty of offences worse than this and still remaining members. I do not know to whom he refers but I think I do and if I am right—and there is no one else he could have had in mind—those hon. members paid the full penalty of their offences. If the Hon. Mr. Murdock pays an equal penalty, or in the same proportion, for his, nothing more will be asked on this side of the House. I think an explanation or an apology is equally due in respect of those references of the hon. member for Cumberland.

Now I come to just a few preliminary words as to what was said by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German). He gave us some wonderful samples of argument; I really find difficulty in stating some of the things which he presented under that guise. When he was calling upon the House to be extremely careful before finding the minister guilty, when he wanted to get the House in a cautious mood—one of sympathy to the minister—he then referred to the charge laid as a heinous crime; begged us to go slow before we convicted him of this heinous crime—those were his words. But when he was on the other tack and wanted to minimize the offence in the minds of those who thought it was proved he said "There is really nothing wrong about it at all; he was quite justified even if everything alleged is true."

This sample though is not a bit better than some others. I could not help but smile when he called to his mind the position of the minister. "Imagine," he said, "picturing this minister as doing something when he drew that money that might hurt the other depositors. Why, nothing could have been further from his mind. He had no reason in the world to think that the other depositors would lose any money. Why, all he could ever have to fear was that the stockholders would lose." It never seemed to occur to the hon. member for Welland that if the minister did not fear the other depositors would lose he need not have feared he would lose himself. But the minister was on oath as declaring that he feared he would lose his money, and that is why he went there. Consequently he feared the other depositors would lose also, and fearing that he nevertheless drew his own money and let the others take the consequences.

But before I leave these real gems of logic I want to read a statement made by the hon. member for Welland before the committee. I marked it; I should like it to be submitted to the delectation of hon. members for a moment. Here it is on page 68 of the proceedings. All through this investigation the member for Welland was exceedingly solicitous about the privileges of cabinet ministers. He argued vigorously that you cannot state anything that took place in council. In the broad sense that is correct. He argued equally vigorously that you could not declare who were there. If you ventured to name anybody who was at council you were breaking your oath; you had not the privilege of refusing to do so or not. He said that a minister was debarred by his oath of office from even telling who went to council. Well, this was about the acme of absurdity unless one excepts the specimen I am about to reveal. The Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) had been examined, and the member for West Hastings was endeavouring to ascertain at what hour council adjourned on the morning of the 15th of August. The minister had expressed his inability to tell at what hour it adjourned and continued in that attitude notwithstanding the pressure of the hon. member. I now quote from the proceedings:

> Hon Mr. Macdonald: What is the use of arguing with a witness like Mr. Robb?
> Mr. German: There is another point which occurs to me. Supposing Mr. Robb makes the statement as to the time he remembers the council to adjourn and some other minister comes in with an entirely different impression as to the time. It would bring the ministers directly in conflict, which is against the very object of their oath that everything is to be kept secret.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FINN: Is there not a clerk of the Privy Council who knows when council adjourns, and is he not the proper officer to give that information?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, there is a clerk and a whole lot more who know, but what does the hon. member think—

Mr. FINN: I do not think, I know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —of a member of parliament or even any intelligent or semi-intelligent person suggesting that it is a breach of a minister's oath of office to say when council gets through with its work, on the ground that two ministers might speak differently and there would be disclosure of secrets?

Mr. FINN: Does not the right hon. leader of the opposition, as an ex-Prime Minister, know that the clerk of the Privy Council is aware when the cabinet adjourns—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course.

Mr. FINN: —rather than the ministers of the Crown who attend cabinet meetings?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course the clerk knows, and the reporters outside know, and anybody else can know who wants to. The ridiculous thing is that anybody would suggest that it is a breach of oath to tell.

Mr. FINN: I did not say that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know the hon. member never suggested that. The only suggestion I make to him is this: If he has a question to ask I will be willing to answer it. If he has not he can make long enough speeches himself without interjecting still others into my remarks.

Mr. FINN: If there is any gentleman in this House that can make lengthy speeches without saying very much it is the right hon. leader of the opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now, I desire to come to a review of what is before the House for a decision, a decision as far-reaching in its importance, as impressive in its nature, as any at which this House has ever been called upon to arrive. It is first necessary that we fully understand just where we are placed and what it is we have to decide. We all recall the circumstance of the 22nd of May. We recall the definite allegation advanced in constitutional form against a minister of the Crown by an hon. member of this House. I will read the summation of the allegation and the importance of these words I desire with all deference to impress as forcibly as I can upon hon. members. They have been quoted frequently, but I am unable to make my remarks orderly without inflicting their repetition upon the House once more. The allegation is in the following words:

> The Honourable James Murdock, Minister of Labour, did withdraw from the Home Bank at its Ottawa branch on the 15th day of August, 1923, two days before such bank's failure, thousands of dollars on deposit therein to his credit, using certain information he had received, as such minister, of the likely immediate failure of said bank, and had received advantage and profit to himself to the extent of such withdrawals, contrary to his obligations as such minister in derogation of his office and the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament.

This was the charge made. The precise facts which the hon. gentleman set out to prove are there stated, that the money was withdrawn on this date, that this date was two days before the failure, that the result of the withdrawal was to be of advantage to the minister to the extent of thousands of dollars, and that the money was withdrawn by reason of information received by the Minister of Labour as minister of the Crown. The hon. member for West Hastings said, "These facts I am prepared to prove on my responsibility as a member. I call upon the House to give me a committee, on the assumption therein recited that those facts establish that the minister's conduct was contrary to his obligation as such minister and in derogation of his office and the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament. I submit that the House having passed the resolution took the ground that those facts if they could be established did bring home to the minister that he had acted contrary to his obligations and contrary to the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament

Mr. FINN: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. FINN: I ask the hon. member whether it is not a fact that evidence was given before that committee that the Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons (Mr. Gordon) had been in conversation with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock)?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. FINN: I do not mind hon. members opposite interrupting me, because they want to back up the leader of the opposition. I ask whether or not the Minister of Labour had information—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Denis, Joliette): Although I suppose the right hon. leader of the opposition is well able to defend himself, I would ask the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) to allow him to proceed.

Mr. FINN: When the hon. member makes assertions that are not correct, surely I have a right to correct him.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would suggest that some hon. members be delegated to take care of the hon. senior member for Halifax.

Mr. FINN: The only answer I have to make is that the country should be delegated to take care of my hon. friend—to put him where he belongs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are past the time for discussion as to whether these acts constitute a violation of the obligations of the office of a minister of the Crown. We have already referred those allegations for investigation, to ascertain whether they are true or not, on the assumption that they do constitute a violation of the obligations of a minister of the Crown, and in derogation of his office and the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament. Consequently it is only wasting time to debate whether or not, providing the facts are true, an offence has been committed. The House has passed on that already. But if it were a matter of argument, is there any hon. member of this House who is going to say, or who believes, whether he will say it or not, that a minister of the Crown can use information obtained as such minister to his own advantage, whether to avoid a loss or to make a profit? I do not say that because a minister hears something in council he therefore never can use it. Nobody suggests that, but if it is something which he receives as a minister of the Crown, which he would not otherwise be entitled to receive, then he cannot use it whether for his profit or to save a loss.

Mr. FINN: He did not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the minister receiving this information, being forbidden under the act to make use of it for the purpose and advantage of others, certainly could not make use of it for his own advantage. What I am seeking to impress upon the House is that the whole question is whether the information received was received as a minister, and must be treated as secret information when so received. The point made by the member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) does not come in at all. Certainly if one hears about a ship going down, that is something which he is at perfect liberty to tell his neighbour, his wife or anybody else, but information which he cannot divulge to anybody else, he cannot use for his own advantage. It is an absurd argument to be addressed to the intellects of intelligent people to say that he can use this information to save his own money, to see that he does not lose anything, but cannot use it to make a profit. I do not really know how to argue a matter of that sort. It does not appeal to one's mind at all. For example, suppose I am in the stock market, and I know that a duty is going to be imposed upon certain goods made by a firm in which I have some stock. I get that information as a minister of the Crown. I am not at liberty to tell anyone else. Would anyone suggest that I am at liberty to go out and buy more stock in that concern, knowing there will be an advance in price the minute the budget is delivered? An hon. member (Mr. Archambault) shakes his head in the negative. Let me put another question. Suppose I am a large stockholder in another concern, and I find that the tariff is going to be taken off the article it manufactures. I receive the information in council, and I know that the minute the budget is delivered, down will go the stock. Am I at liberty to go out and sell my stock so as to avoid a loss?

Mr. FINN: That is never done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Archambault) shakes his head in the negative. Certainly I cannot. The moment he shakes his head he admits, and his intellect would compel him to admit, that both these cases are precisely in the same category—the making of a gain and the avoiding of a loss. When one is brought home it has the same effect precisely as the other. The point is that the minister cannot use for his own advantage information he receives as minister. There is no use wandering into other fields. This matter is closed, I think, so far as this point is concerned.

I ask hon. members to note that there is no crime charged, no offence against the criminal code. An offence is charged against the traditions, the honour and the dignity of parliament. The offence charge is a malfeasance in office on the part of a minister of the Crown. What another man can do a minister of the Crown cannot do. The traditions of parliament, his duty to the public, deny him that right. When he goes into a cabinet he takes upon himself an obligation never to use information received there, an obligation to which he does not swear, but one which is as binding upon his conscience as any obligation man ever took upon himself. Therefore, we know the measure of the offence charged. The consequences of guilt we all know. I do not think I need expound them, either by textual reference or precedent. I therefore come to discuss whether or not these allegations of fact, which undoubtedly if proved, establish the guilt charged in the indictment, are brought home. I say, first of all, that they are brought home, if anything can be brought home at all, by circumstantial evidence. We find the person charged proven guilty of this offence, whatever it is, by inference from circumstances proven. The hon. member for Welland says: "Did you ever know of a man being found guilty by inference?" I say in this House as one who has had some experience in law—but if one had none at all, the ordinary reader would know this just as well—that ten men are convicted on inference for one who is convicted by the seven senses. Ten are found guilty because of circumstantial evidence out of which the inference of guilt comes for one found guilty in any other way. Let us inquire: Are the circumstances such that the reasonable man will know that guilt is established or are they not? The undisputed facts, of course, I do not need to rehearse—the fact of the deposit of the money, of its lying there from about the 3rd July until the 15th August, only trifling amounts being withdrawn in the meantime. Its withdrawal on the 15th day of August—this is admitted. Its withdrawal in cold cash on the 15th day of August; its withdrawal and deposit immediately in a larger and stronger bank—all this is admitted. It is admitted moreover that its deposit was in the name of a secretary "in trust". There is an explanation of this given and I will discuss the explanation later. It is admitted still farther that the fact of the impending failure of the bank came to the knowledge of members of the government, not all, on the night of the 14th August, in all its horror and all its pregnancy, and that those facts were so startling that the Prime Minister, to use his own words, stood aghast. That the bank failed is, of course, admitted. That tremendous suffering and hardship have followed in its trail, everybody knows and everybody has known right back from the last days of August to this hour. The loss of those depositors, thousands of them poor working people, the sufferings and agony entailed, all have known and known, not since the 17th or 14th of May but since the bank failed in August last. It is known as well that, upon there being mooted in the press an allegation that a minister of the Crown had taken advantage of his position to save his own money, and the Minister of Labour being accosted by a reporter and asked if he was the man, he stated that he withdrew the money, but that he withdrew it in the ordinary course for the purpose of paying on a house. I have used his language on the record. Of course nothing can be disputed which took place in this House on the 22nd day of May.

I now come to the one fact around which the discussion, so far as it is relevant or useful, revolves. Has it been established by satisfactory evidence that the minister acted on information gained as a minister of the Crown? I do not think anything else is worthy of debate. All other talk will only confuse. Is the evidence on this feature satisfactory or is it not? What is the evidence? First of all there is the evidence of the directors who, on the night of the 14th, informed at least three ministers of the Crown of facts so startling that, on the admission of all three, they were facts that should be brought to the attention of their other colleagues of the government, facts so startling and important that two of them stated on their oath that, if they failed to bring them before their colleagues, they would be derelict in their duty. I will quote to prove this, if I am asked or challenged, from the evidence sworn to here by these ministers, evidence they could not help but swear to, evidence every word of which was undoubtedly true. And even if that evidence had not been given, every one of us would have known that it was a fact anyway. Is anybody so childish, so hopelessly innocent and mentally uncouth as to imagine that, it being brought to the attention of the government that a bank was to fail in the course of one, two days or hours, they would not have brought the subject before their colleagues at their first meeting? No one who has ever had anything to do with a government will ever be told that, or, at least, not face to face. The absurdity of such a suggestion affronts the intellect, affronts one's common sense. This bank collapse was the most startling event in two years in the commercial life of Canada, and imagine, after ministers are apprised of it, they conceal it from their colleagues for any time at all! No, they frankly say: Our duty certainly was to consult them. The Prime Minister tells us the view he took of the matter and the view he expressed to the delegates who came from the bank. That was his view; but he very properly, inevitably stated, could not avoid stating that before anything final was determined upon as regards a subject of such colossal importance to the people of Canada, he was bound to lay the matter before his colleagues.

On the afternoon of the 15th August, the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) was to go to Montreal on this very matter and, associated with the Home Bank delegates, to lay the truth before the Bankers' Association. For the purpose of their discussion of the subject, for the purpose of his own information, he acquires from the directors that morning in the hotel a written statement of the position, supplementary, perhaps, or perhaps only complementary of the presentation of the night before. It was already arranged that he was to go to Montreal. That is the evidence on record. What are his instructions to be down there? Those will be determined, and I ask hon. members: Where? Would they not be determined in cabinet council? Why, for the government even to intimate to this House that the final action, the final conduct of the government in this regard, even before the meeting with the Bankers' Association in Montreal, would be determined save when all council were consulted, would be an admission of an inappreciation of public duty. No, one only needs to argue simply for the sake of putting it in print that the matter came up in council. Common sense teaches everybody that it must have come up in council before the Acting Minister of Finance could go to Montreal, especially in view of the impending almost instantaneous collapse of a financial institution in this country.

But what is the other evidence? Immediately the sitting is through, about 12.45 p.m., the minister takes his route right across to the Home Bank, signs his cheque, lays it down, demands his money, demands $4,050 in bills. I ask hon. members to remember not only the bills, but the exact amount, $4,050. The haste of the minister immediately after council is some indication in itself of what council considered while in session. There is the evidence of the minister and, perhaps, I had better read it exactly. I will read first what the minister says in respect of what he considered his duty. At page 75 the minister after reciting the fact of the withdrawal and the fact of having heard reports in February and March, and having intimated his decision to pay back the money, says this:

> I think, Mr. Chairman, that covers the statement necessary. I might say, of course, that I am precluded by my oath as a cabinet minister from intimating in any way whether any questions in relation to the Home Bank of Canada were or were not discussed at either of the cabinet meetings of August 15th which I have said I attended.

Thus in his first carefully prepared statement, the only statement he made save on cross-examination, he emphasized in the clearest, simplest terms that he was precluded by his oath of office from saying a word as to whether this matter was or was not discussed. And in the face of that every hon. member who has stood to defend him in this House has asserted that, a page or so afterwards, he violated what he considered his oath, stating that the matter had not been discussed there at all. Are those gentlemen doing justice to the minister who stand and plead in his defence, what would be a violation of what the minister himself believed to be his oath? Or are those doing the minister justice who refuse to believe that he deliberately violated that oath? The whole circumstances show that when the minister stated, as reported on the next page, that he had not discussed the matter with others, he meant others outside the cabinet council; and they who argue otherwise attribute to him a breach of what he believed to be his oath of office.

Mr. CANNON: Am I to understand that the right hon. member's contention is to the effect that the Minister of Labour under oath stated that the matter had not been discussed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I do not think that he said so. Does not the hon. member agree that the Minister of Labour never intended to say that the matter never was discussed?

Mr. CANNON: Knowing my right hon. friend so well, I would rather not give an answer just now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the safest course, perhaps. I stated very clearly what I thought the minister wished to convey. I do not think that the minister wanted to leave that impression at all; if he did then he is guilty of something which I think is worse than even what he is charged with by the hon member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter). I do not think he violated his oath, but in view of his own statement he did violate it, if those who have spoken in his defence are right in their contention. Let me quote from the evidence. The conversation with the Deputy Speaker had been under review—this conversation which referred to the Home Bank as a lame duck, the nearest approach to the specific that was brought out in evidence. Then the evidence continues:

> Q. And after getting information from Mr. Gordon did you get any further information?—A. No.
> Q. You say "No"?—A. No.
>
> Q. Of any kind or description—or anywhere?—A. Not that would form my opinion in regard to the matter.
> Q. It may not have formed your opinion, but did you get any other information?—A. No one else had discussed the matter with me at all.

It is manifest what the minister meant; the only one he had discussed the matter with was the Deputy Speaker. And this was only two minutes after he had declared that he was unable by reason of his oath to divulge whether this subject was or was not discussed in the cabinet council by his cabinet colleagues. It is perfectly idle to argue that the Minister of Labour went on oath one minute and swore that if he said a word as to whether or not the matter was discussed at the cabinet meeting he would be violating his oath, and that the next minute he would step right forward and violate that oath as he understood it by stating that the matter had not been discussed. The minister meant nothing of the sort. The circumstances show that he never intended to convey such an impression; and those of us at least who do not wish to believe him guilty of perjury—must dismiss that view. Up to this point there is no denial at all. The facts show however that he proceeded post-haste to the bank and got his money out. These things are a clear indication, if we had not all these other facts as to the circumstances which would compel discussion that morning, that there actually was a discussion.

There are many other circumstances just as convincing as any I have cited and I am going to review them. I wonder. has it any significance that the minister withdrew $4,050? He had more than that on deposit; he had $4,150 odd on deposit at the very moment that he withdrew the amount I have stated. Now, the minister wtihdrew the money for the purpose of saving it. He admits that; there is no argument about it. Well, was he anxious to lose the other hundred? Was he wanting to contribute that to the widows and orphans who had their deposits in the bank? Does anyone accept that explanation? The minister wanted to leave a little money in the bank. Why? The answer is, so that it would not appear as though he had withdrawn it to save it; he wanted to have at least one feature of the case which would disarm suspicion. Another circumstance worth observing is this: I could not help thinking that the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) had her mind centered on one very pertinent fact. Why did the Minister of Labour when he got his money out of the Home Bank walk right past the Royal Bank to his office and not forthwith deposit it? Is anyone present with a suggestion? Here is a case for the fertile mind.

Mr. LOGAN: He would not have to walk past the Royal Bank.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was just two or three doors away.

Mr. LOGAN: His office is west, and the Royal Bank east, of the Home Bank.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, half a block away, just a few doors. Why did he go to his own office with that money in his pocket? The hon. member has not offered any suggestion and he cannot.

Mr. CANNON: He was still afraid of banks.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The humour of my hon. friend never fails him. But the minister's confidence in banks was quickly restored as soon as he met his secretary in his office. On entering his own office he instructs his secretary to take the money over and deposit it in her own name in trust. This evidence did not come from the Minister of Labour; it came out afterwards. It apparently was believed that when the minister made the statement that he had withdrawn the money after leaving the council, everyone would be satisfied and there would be no need of calling witnesses from the Royal Bank. But those witnesses were called and this evidence came out, that the money was deposited in the name of the minister's secretary in trust. Then came the minister at last with an explanation. I ask hon. members to keep in mind the fact that he said not a word about this in his own evidence in chief. The explanation given of this incident is this: The reason he put his own money in the name of another was to enable that other to draw it out without a power of attorney. He wanted the money deposited in such a manner that the other person could draw it out. And, mind you, he could not withdraw it himself without a power of attorney. I ask the House to reflect whether that is a satisfactory explanation or not. I ask hon. members to inquire of their fellows how many in this House have their own personal and private funds in the name of a secretary, of a stenographer.

Mr. FINN: Some are too cute.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I would think so. What I say is, and I say it in all charity, this explanation does not satisfy. This explanation is not an explanation at all. A man puts his money in his own name. If he trusts someone he may give that someone a power of attorney to cheque against his account, and he directs that attorney what to draw. But why would a man residing here put his money in the name of another person so that that person would be able to draw on his funds at her will, and he could not draw his own funds himself? He would have to have a power of attorney from his stenographer to draw his own money! There are other circumstances, but the significance of this cannot be and is not lost on any mind in this House. This method was adopted simply as a safeguard that the facts would not so likely get out.

But there are other circumstances too. I want hon. members to keep in mind that although the money was transferred to the Royal Bank on August 15, virtually nothing was drawn out of that account until October 1. The first time any publicity was given to the circumstance was, I think, in the month of March, 1924, some six months after the occurrence itself, some six months after the whole Dominion knew of the suffering entailed in the crash of the Home Bank. When the facts came out in the press of the money going right over to the Royal Bank, the very same bills rolling back the next morning through the clearing house into the Home Bank, those facts—those allegations rather, to be fairer, came out in Toronto—I do not think they were out the same day in Ottawa—then Mr. Murdock is interviewed by a reporter of the Ottawa Journal. The reporter did not give evidence because Mr. Murdock admitted the facts. He was asked if he was the man, and he answered "yes." His explanation, and the only one, was that he drew out the money in the ordinary course of business to pay on a house. Mr. Murdock was not then on oath. I ask hon. members of this House if they think he told the truth in that statement.

Mr. LOGAN: Certainly he did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He took the money out to pay on a house?

Mr. LOGAN: On a mortgage which was not due until October 1.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why, the hon. member says Mr. Murdock took the money out to pay on a mortgage. Mr. Murdock says on oath now that he did not, that he took it out to make it safer in another bank.

Mr. LOGAN: He took it out to make it safer and to eventually pay off a mortgage on his house. Why don't you be fair?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, he took it out that it might be safer in another bank because he needed the money to pay on a house. Would it be any different if he needed the money to pay on something else? I suppose if he did not need it to pay on a house he would have left it where it was? How absurd! The whole house idea was a shield put up to cover the withdrawal. The house had nothing on earth to do with the withdrawal of his money. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) knows it. If he wanted the money later to pay on another debt would he not have withdrawn it just the same? The withdrawal of the money was to make it safe. That is what he said. The simple fact is that he did not pay it until October 1.

Mr. LOGAN: When the mortgage became due.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes; but this is all beside the point, it does not affect the issue at all. The fact is he did not pay a dollar on the house until October 1, although he protected the money on August 15. Was it frank, was it truthful on his part to tell the public that he was withdrawing the money from the Home Bank to pay on a house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was it not a fact that the Minister of Labour at the time was expecting to make a trip to the West and be absent from Ottawa about the time the payment on his house would become due, and that this was his reason for removing the money as he did and leaving it in the name of his secretary who, being in Ottawa while he was absent, would be able to make the payment when it became due?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not in evidence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the minister's statement to me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps he did. I do not like this habit of the Prime Minister of fetching in evidence second hand from somebody else. But even if all that was stated in his evidence, why could he not leave his cheque to be payable when the payment became due, or why could he not send the cheque from where he was? I wonder if the Prime Minister has his money in the name of some secretary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As a matter of fact, my secretary is the only one who has had my bank book for the last two years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So has mine, but the bank book is in my name.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not seen mine for the last two years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Whose name is it in?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In my name.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should think so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My secretary has a power of attorney to draw on my account.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very good, that is the way Mr. Murdock's was before. The Prime Minister has no intention of changing that, has he? If the Prime Minister wants to pay anything on a house he would not have any very great trouble, I suppose?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes he would.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he has money in his account he would not have any trouble. What a paltry excuse to give to the Prime Minister, that he wanted the account in the name of his secretary so he could easily pay money on a house on October 1! Why this is only added evidence against the minister. To tell that to his chief is simply adding to the evidence of his guilt. The conduct of the minister from the beginning is just the conduct of a man who knew he had done something which he should not have done. Right from the moment that he got the money out, if he felt it was something he should have done and was quite right in doing, he would not have gone to his desk first in his office, farther away, he would have gone to the Royal Bank right beside him and put the money there. There is other evidence still, although I do not attach the importance to it that some do. In his evidence he stated clearly that "other circumstances developed" that day which brought the contemplated withdrawal to a head. Is it conceivable that he would not have told what they were, if they did not take place in council?

But there is other evidence more important still. Here are facts which I know will sink into the minds of any one who has ever had to do with a trial of any kind. If this matter never was discussed in council on August 15, it was within the power of his colleagues to have cleared Mr. Murdock in five minutes without any violation of their oath at all. The fact of evidence not coming forth which if innocence existed is available to prove innocence, is always taken in a court of law as the very best evidence of guilt. Does anybody suggest that if the matter of the Home Bank had never been discussed at that council meeting on the morning of August 15, there was anything in the oath of any minister to prevent him saying so? Nothing could be more absurd, nothing could be more ridiculous unless it be to talk about anybody being forbidden to tell who goes to council, or when council gets out. Those things are perhaps still more grotesque. I do not care what Judge McKeown said. He did not give any ruling anyway, for the matter never came before him for consideration. He was just asked whether argument in council could be given publicity to, and he very properly said no, it could not. Then incidentally he was asked, "Could they say who was present?" and he said, "I don't think that could be given in evidence." Still if he had been doing any thinking he would not have said it. I do not like to refer even to what was purely an aside by the judge as ridiculous, but hon. members will on a moment's reflection agree that such an aside is ridiculous. In the British cabinet, where the oath is the same as here, there is announced every morning in the papers who was at council, and officially in books I have before me it is announced who was at council day by day; and any man, at least in our time, could stand right outside the council door and report to anybody who went into council. The oath of office does not say a word as to who went to council. The oath says you cannot give out what takes place in the deliberations of council. It has nothing in the world to do with facts as to who where there, much less as to facts as to when they went in and when they got out.

Now then, does any one suggest a minister cannot say what did not take place in council? I do not claim he is compelled to say what did not take place, but he is allowed to say it if he wants to. There is nothing in the world in the oath of office which precludes the minister from telling what did not take place in council. As a matter of fact, ministers do it all the time. They stand in this House, in all governments, and say that such and such a matter was not discussed. They even, indeed, say what was discussed, and it is no violation of the oath even then. It was the practice in our time, and I do not doubt it is yet, to give to the Press a statement as to subjects that came up at council. This was very often the practice, and a proper practice, but you cannot go further and say what this member of council said about it, and this one, and that, or give out anything that is manifestly of a confidential nature. This is what is forbidden. Now does any one really suggest that a minister cannot say what does not take place in council? If I am asked: Did you discuss in council the South Sea bubble, am I breaking my oath if I say no? The thing is too ridiculous for assertion. So that every member of the government, if the fact was that this subject was not under review, was at absolute liberty to come before that committee and to declare before the committee: We never discussed the Home Bank in the forenoon at all; the subject never came up. And once he did so, he had gone very far to clear his colleague of suspicion in this matter. But not one of them did so. To their credit be it said they did not. Not one of them ventured even to intimate that the subject did not come up. What is the inference? I want to ask, could inference be any stronger, could circumstantial evidence be more complete? I venture to ask those having to do with the courts of trial in this country if they could imagine evidence which would be better or more convincing evidence of the facts stated in this allegation.

The circumstances are complete from beginning to end. The evidence, I know, convinces this House. The minister may have heard something. I am not now calling in question the honour of the Deputy Speaker, but I must say it seemed very, very strange to me that this information was delayed so long. It seemed very strange to me that Mr. Murdock did not say anything about it in March, very strange. It seemed strange that he said nothing about it in this House on the 22nd of May, but assuming it is correct, does anybody imagine that he went there on the noon of the 15th of August because of a statement about the bank being a lame duck on the 9th of August? Why, these general statements of rumour are current all the time. We have heard them about various banks. Everybody knew, anyway, that the Home Bank was one of our weaker banks. We all knew the Home Bank was not a strong bank of the nature of the larger banks, but there was nothing in what the Deputy Speaker said which disclosed any fact at all upon which any man would think of anything special in the way of danger existing at the time, and the fact that the minister never bothered about it, but let all the money stay there till the whole peril was reviewed right before his eyes on the morning of the 15th—the fact that he left it there till that time shows that he did not act at all upon anything of this casual indefinite character which he heard from the Deputy Speaker away back on the 9th.

Now, the minister's contention all through has been such as adds mightily to the web that binds him to this offence. The minister has not been frank with parliament from the beginning. The minister's duty when the facts were disclosed first, when the allegations were made, was to make a statement which was true, a statement which was frank and full. It was his duty to make a statement by which he could abide; but he failed to do so. On the contrary, he made a statement which was not true at all. When the matter came up in this House, by all precedents—and the minister doubtless was warned by his colleagues; he certainly should have been—his duty then, if he was not guilty of this offence, was to enter a frank denial and make a plain statement to the House of the facts, so that those facts could be submitted side by side with these allegations to the committee; but he did not do so. He read two letters to show that he returned the money, and thereupon he sat down. Was that treating parliament correctly? Was that treating parliament the way an hon. member would whose conduct in this whole concern was without blame?

There is another circumstance to which I might refer, and this is the returning of the money itself. I ask hon. members to review that fact in all its bearings. When was the money returned? On the 14th of May, 1924, in response to a letter dated the 7th day of May of the same year. A part was returned then. To the fact that a part was returned I attach no significance at all; it is just the same to me as if he had returned all on the 14th. Now I want to know if the minister would have returned that money if his conduct in withdrawing it was in his own mind absolutely right? If he did not get any information as a member of the government, would he have returned that money? Why did he return it? He tells us he returned it because he did not want others of the Home Bank to suffer while he did not. Why was he of that mind on the 14th of May, and not of that mind on the 15th of the previous August? On the 15th of the previous August, on his own statement he drew it out so that he might save himself and others suffer more. Now, didn't he? On the 14th of May he wants us to believe he returned it so that he would suffer more and others suffer less. Is it reasonable? Why was he not of that mind on the 1st of May, the 1st of April, the 1st of March, the 1st of February, and all through the intervening six or seven months? Ah! he gets a letter on the 7th day of May from the liquidator, and he is told by the liquidator that facts are alleged to him which require him to ask that the money be returned; "Is it your will," the liquidator asks, "to return it or to fight the case before the referee?" Mr. Murdock was face to face with the legal battle if he did not return that money. He was face to face with a revelation of the facts in the courts of law before a judge, face to face with a revelation of all the circumstances surrounding this withdrawal; and so face to face with that revelation, sure to come, Mr. Murdock returns the money. Now I ask hon. members, did he return that money because his heart was moved for the other depositors or because of that revelation which otherwise was to come? I appeal to the common sense, the cold reason and sanity of hon. members of this House. Was he affected by a different comparison on the 14th of May from any that ever affected him before? Or was he not affected by the threat of the liquidator, that if he did not return the money he would have to face and establish his bona fides before a court of law? Thereupon he returned the money. Therefore I say, to return it under those circumstances is still another cord which binds him to the offence embodied in this allegation.

Now this House owes justice to the hon. member for West Hastings just as much, and no more, as it owes justice to the Minister of Labour. It will not do for this House to treat these matters lightly. If the House goes on record as stating that in the face of all these circumstances a minister can so act, and be acquitted, then so much the worse for the conduct of cabinets and public men in the years to come; so much the worse for the honour and repute of parliament; so much the worse for the standing of our political institutions throughout the Empire and throughout the world. A man who enters the cabinet of this country must be governed by a standard consistent with our traditions. Such a man must be governed by a standard which appertains not to others; and when he falls from the standard he must accept the penalty. Hon. members will do themselves most justice will do this government most justice, and will do the minister himself most justice to pronounce a verdict in accordance with the facts.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): At this stage of the debate, and especially after the very complete summing up of the case by the right hon. leader of the opposition, my remarks will be very brief for two reasons: First, because most of the facts have been brought before the House; secondly, because the plea of the right hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has shown beyond any doubt that the report of the committee should be upheld. I am quite sure that my right hon. friend is not aiming at such a result; but I think that when hon. members will have scrutinized his speech, when they will have weighed his arguments, they will come to the conclusion that the decision of the committee on Privileges and Elections was a good one and should be upheld.

Questions of privilege are probably the most important questions that could come before us. They are generally questions where the honour of one of our fellow members is at stake. We may be divided on political grounds, we may differ in principle on public questions; but in the daily intercourse among fellow members even if we are political opponents we are all personal friends. Therefore, whenever the honour of a fellow member is at stake it is always with a sense of our responsibilty, with a very heavy feeling of our parliamentary responsibility, that we approach the question and give our views thereupon.

Not only are questions connected with parliamentary privileges questions of great moment and importance on account of the reasons I have just given, but there is this other fact to be borne in mind: Since the great upheaval of 1914 to 1918 the institutions which have governed the world have been menaced in so many directions and by so many means, that it is the duty of every public man in any country to try and do his very best to safeguard those institutions. Therefore, whenever a question arises here which might shake the confidence of the Canadian people in their parliament that question should be dealt with in a calm and dignified manner, and without any display of partisanship. If my hon. friend from West Hastings, (Mr. Porter) whom I have know for several years, had approached this matter in the spirit which I have indicated, if hon. members on the other side had conducted this question as it should have been conducted, and had taken the attitude which they should have taken, they would have risen far above any party spirit. I am sorry to say I believe this whole matter loses the importance that it might otherwise have had because it has been a political means adopted by the Tory party in this House to try and ruin the reputation of one of the ministers of the government. Had hon. members opposite risen in this House to uphold the privileges of parliament, if they had asked us to punish one of our fellow members whose conduct had been undignified, I would have been the first to support their contention and try and help them in the achievement of that object. But since the inauguration of this matter every word which has been uttered, every move which has been made, has shown that the object of hon. gentlemen opposite is not to safeguard the dignity of parliament but simply to murder politically one of their political opponents.

[Mr. Cannon.]

What was the reason for bringing this charge before parliament? How does it come that the hon. member for West Hastings has presented himself before you, Mr. Speaker, as the champion of parliamentary dignity? I have sat in this House for seven years, I have followed the actions of the hon. gentleman throughout the proceedings of parliament whenever I was present. He has been always a very pleasant, genial, agreeable fellow member, but never before have I seen him showing such zeal and ardour in protecting the dignity, honour and traditions of parliament. When did the hon. gentleman discover that his parliamentary honour was ruffled, that his dignity was slighted? When did the hon. gentleman discover that our parliamentary traditions were disregarded? The hon. gentleman discovered it when he thought he could bring before this parliament a matter which would hurt the reputation of the Hon. Mr. Murdock, a political opponent who had encountered the enmity of the Tory party on account of his having resigned from the Board of Commerce in 1921. It has been said that the reason why the Bourbon régime in France did not succeed after the downfall of Napoleon was that the Bourbons had not forgotten anything and had not learned anything. The Tory party in this country are the best Bourbon representatives we have. They never forget a man who has hurt the party; and the Hon. Mr. Murdock, having resigned under circumstances which were hurtful to the Tory party, is to be made the victim of their revengeful spirit.

Now, examining the proceedings of the committee I will advance first the proposition that as a matter of fact the charge laid by my hon. friend from West Hastings has not been proved. In this House we cannot proceed on suspicion. We cannot base a judgment on inferences. The leader of the opposition made an appeal to those who had experience in court rooms. I have had a certain experience in the courts, and never have I heard a lawyer of any standing at the bar in my province or in any other province asking that a prisoner be convicted on suspicion or on inferences. The evidence which has to be brought before a court—and this, Mr. Speaker is the highest tribunal in Canada—is positive evidence of facts. We have the proceedings before the committee. Every word that has been uttered by the witnesses has been printed. I challenge any member of this House, no matter on which side he sits, to show that it has been proven in any way that the Minister of Labour as a matter of fact has taken an undue advantage of any knowledge he might have acquired as a minister of the Crown. We have to restrict ourselves and limit ourselves to the pertinent evidence lawfully adduced before the committee. All the witnesses who were heard were precluded from giving evidence as to what happened in council. When the decision was given by the chairman in regard to whether the witnesses could divulge the proceedings before council, my hon. friends who sit opposite to me were unanimous in saying that it was privileged—not only privileged in a qualified way, but absolutely privileged. Therefore we have no evidence whatever in the printed proceedings of what happened in council. No man in this House, no matter where he sits, or who he is, can say that it has been proven that the Home Bank matter was mentioned in council. There is no such evidence. Can we say, as we are asked to do by the leader of the opposition, "It is true there is no evidence but we can suppose." This is no matter of supposition. We have no right to suppose. We are the judges and we must weigh the evidence.

My second proposition is that even though every allegation of my hon. friend from West Hastings had been proven, even admitting for one moment that witnesses had come before the committee and told us that the Home Bank had been discussed, even admitting that after having heard the discussion among his colleagues, the Minister of Labour had left the cabinet chamber and gone to the bank to withdraw his money, and even admitting the whole case presented by the hon. member for West Hastings, I say that in law the charge which he has made is absolutely non-existent. There is no offence. A most extraordinary contention was brought forward by my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). He contended that although no evidence had been brought forward as to what had happened in council, yet taking the evidence given in relation to the conversation between the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Gordon) and the Minister of Labour, if the Minister of Labour had spoken to the Deputy Speaker in his capacity of minister of the Crown, he had taken an undue advantage of his quality as minister, and he was therefore equally guilty. Let us, Mr. Speaker, consider the first proposition which is purely supposition, and then deal with the second proposition, which is totally absurd. Recently the Right Hon. Winston Churchill wrote a book about his experiences during the war. I understand that he sold his rights for an enormous sum. In that book he divulged happenings at council during the war and published certain documents. Would my hon. friend contend for one moment that Winston Churchill should be expelled from parliament, if he were a member of parliament to-day?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What on earth has that to do with this case?

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend does not see it—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not.

Mr. CANNON: Then I am sorry. I thought his legal intendment was much brighter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think anybody else sees it.

Mr. CANNON: Let us go further. The ex-Prime Minister of England, Lloyd George, also published articles for enormous sums. He also has obtained financial advantage by using his knowledge acquired as a minister. That is a well known fact. His articles and publications are read by millions of people. Has any man in that Imperial House of Commons had the excessive sensitiveness of the member for West Hastings and raised the question as to his moral turpitude. Let us go further, Mr. Speaker. In the Marconi affair it was proved beyond any doubt that ministers of the Crown had taken advantage of the knowledge acquired as such to speculate in stock. Did the Imperial House ever raise that question? Lloyd George was mixed up in it. Lord Reading and others were also mixed up in it. Were these gentlemen ever expelled? They surely were not, because there was no offence, such as is claimed by the hon. member for West Hastings.

When gentlemen become members of the cabinet I understand they take two different oaths; the first as ministers, to the effect that they will administer their departments in the best interests of the public in general, and the second as privy councillors. The member for West Hastings has a right to ask the members of this House to condemn the Minister of Labour if he proves, first that his conduct was of such a nature that his departmental administration might have suffered. The hon. member certainly will not pretend that for one moment. If the department has not suffered, has the public interest suffered? Has it been shown here that the public in general has suffered through the conduct of the Minister of Labour? Has that been proved here to the satisfaction of hon. members? Has my hon. friend from West Hastings or his fellow-members in the House produced one tittle of evidence to the effect that the conduct of the Minister of Labour was against the public interest in Canada? If, therefore, the Minister of Labour has acted in such a way as not to hurt departmental affairs with which he is entrusted, and if he has behaved in such a way as not to injure the public in general, we have no right to interfere. Where would be the offence?

I come now to my third proposition. I stated first that in fact the case was not proven. I stated secondly that in law the case does not exist, and I state thirdly that the case is not practical, and we should not bother about it in parliament. Who can go to the Minister of Labour and complain of what he did? The depositors? My hon. friend from West Hastings is not a depositor. My hon. friend from York-Sunbury is not a depositor. I hope my right hon. friend, for whom I have great esteem, is not a depositor either.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, nor anywhere else.

Mr. CANNON: The same here. Then what are we arguing about? Every cent that the depositors might have lost, Mr. Murdock has sent back, from a practical viewpoint, why are we wasting our time to-day? To have the hon. member for West Hastings show us that as he is getting older, he is getting wiser and purer, may be interesting, but it is costly. Has it been proven that Mr. Murdock took an undue advantage? That money in the bank was his property. He had a right to it. It did not belong to the shareholders. It did not belong to his fellow depositors. It belonged to him and he went and got it. Supposing the hon. member for West Hastings owned a horse, and supposing he was a member of the municipal council and at a meeting of that council he heard that a thief had gone to his stall in the stable to steal his horse. He would go to the stable and, finding the thief going away with the horse, he would grab it. He would be doing only what he was entitled to do. Let us come down to ordinary common sense.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CANNON: Unfortunately, we have had very little from the other side. Leaving aside partisanship, can any man in this House, being a real man, not a politician, stand on his feet and seriously, without the risk of being laughed at, claim that he would not have done the same thing as James Murdock? I say that any man who would have done otherwise would not be fit to sit in this parliament.

I come to the most extraordinary contention of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, who says that when the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Gordon) spoke to the Hon. Mr. Murdock, it was two political authorities meeting, and, therefore neither of the two should move on account of knowledge interchanged. It was not two men, two friends, meeting; it was my good friend the Deputy Speaker meeting the Minister of Labour. Therefore, if Mr. Murdock knew from the Deputy Speaker at that time that there was something wrong with the Home Bank he should not have spoken about it, and if he did, he ought to be kicked out of this House! Supposing Mr. Speaker, that instead of talking about the Home Bank, the Deputy Speaker, after having spoken about business with Mr. Murdock, had said to him: "Look here, Murdock. I forgot, your house is on fire." Mr. Murdock would have had to stay in his seat until he had ceased to be a minister! If the Deputy Speaker, instead of talking about the Home Bank, had said: "Jim Murdock, it is pouring rain," if Mr. Murdock had gone out as a minister, he would have had to leave behind his overcoat and umbrella! Are we here in parliament going to believe such nonsense, or are we going to listen to such arguments and vote accordingly?

I come now to the most farcical feature of the whole affair. To-day we have been given a standard of political morality by people who have been begging in such matters for twenty or thirty years gone by. We are going to be told what is the honour, dignity and tradition of parliament by the Tory party! I have seen good comedies, but I do not regret not having gone to any show in Ottawa to-night. I have seen a better comedy right in this House—this Tory party, this old party which is practically crushed under scandal after scandal, the party to which belongs the Canadian Pacific scandal, the McGreevy scandal, the Canadian Northern scandal, the War-time Elections scandal, the war-time scandals. Why did the hon. member for West Hastings, instead of dragging before the bar of this House the honoured name of the Minister of Labour, if he wanted to be sincere and to reform political morality in this country, not bring before the bar of this House and of public opinion his former leader, Sir Thomas White? If the hon. gentleman had exhibited the same standard of morality with the same strictness in the case of Sir Thomas White as in that of Mr. Murdock, instead of its being an honour for Mr. Murdock to resume his seat, something quite different might have happened to Sir Thomas White, and my hon. friend knows what I am referring to. The Tory party is going to tell us what political morality is!

Mr. MEIGHEN: Sir Thomas White is not a member of this House. If the hon. gentleman is making a reflection on him, he should make it at least specifically. I do not know what the hon. member is referring to, but as an associate I do not know of any more honoured name that ever adorned the public life of Canada than that of Sir Thomas White.

Mr. CANNON: I know whereof I speak. This was a Minister of Finance, amongst whose followers was the hon. member for West Hastings and who knowing the condition of the Home Bank, never moved, never did anything to save the depositors, a man who, as minister of the Crown, had the whole responsibility and who, after being a minister, became the lawyer of the same bank and received $1,500 for coming here to try to get a Liberal government to save from ruin a bank that he, as a minister, refused to interfere with, for what reason I do not know. The hon. member for West Hastings should find out from his friend himself. This is the party in front of us, the reformers, the moralists, the scrupulous people who, meeting the Hon. James Murdock, have to cross the street because they are afraid of being contaminated! The spectacle that we are being shown to-day is one at which the people of Canada will have a good laugh because it is a joke. It is ridiculous, not only on account of the party, but on account of the leader of that party. I was listening to my right hon. friend, for whom I have great consideration; but when my right hon. friend started talking about morality, if it had not been for the honour, dignity and traditions of this House, I might have burst out laughing. Here is a gentleman who in 1917 did things of such a nature that to translate them he used language that nobody knew in Canada. Are we going to hear from this gentleman what political morality should be?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would advise the hon. member to have some regard for the truth. The hon. member now is stating what he must know to be untrue. I suppose he refers to a miserable filibuster of the late hon. member for Cape Breton which failed about as ignominiously as anything ever did in this House, an allegation which not only he failed to prove but which was absolutely denied and which turned out to be based wholly on a forgery.

Mr. CANNON: Is my right hon. friend in a position to tell us what language the telegram was written in?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had nothing to do with the telegram at all. The signature to it was not mine. There was no signature except initials, and they were not mine, they were never written with my authority, and I knew nothing about the matter. The hon. member knows that.

Mr. CANNON: The right hon. gentlemen's secretary no doubt had power of attorney.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would suggest to the hon. member that he adhere to the issue if he has anything to say about it.

Mr. CANNON: I am sure my right hon. friend is not very well pleased to have the issue enlarged with himself included in it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have detained the House long enough.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Go on.

Mr. CANNON: Let me sum up the case thus: First, the facts do not bear out the charge in law; secondly, there is no charge; in the third place, there is no practical advantage in discussing the matter; fourthly, it is ridiculous and absurd for our friends opposite to presume to teach us anything touching public morals. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that this incident is to be regretted. Our friend who sits on this side (Mr. Murdock) has been out of the House for a considerable time; and not only has he been absent from the House, but in his own home I am sure that much anxiety must have prevailed by reason of the very hard conditions under which the Tory party conducted this investigation. Let us hope that this will be the last instance of excessive partisanship.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, oh.

Mr. CANNON: I hope the hon. gentleman will take this matter seriously; it will do him a whole lot of good.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am still thinking of you.

Mr. CANNON: Let us hope that should political warfare continue it will at least stop at the door of private life and before the sanctuary of family ties.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This whole matter has been so ably and fully reviewed that it would be short-sighted, indeed, to attempt in any way to go over the ground which already has been so fully and comprehensively traversed. However, I should not like the debate to conclude without saying a word or two as to the significance of the decision we are being asked to make. As has been mentioned, it is not only the character and the good name of an hon. member of this House that are at stake in the report which the committee on Privileges and Elections have brought in and which we are being asked to pass upon; there are also involved the honour, the dignity and the traditions of this parliament. We are called upon to consider very carefully principles of which account should be taken in judging this matter. I shall not attempt to give views of my own as to the principles that should govern the House in coming to its decision, but I shall refer to one or two authorities whose names are greatly respected and whose opinion should be respected in reference to the judging of matters of privilege and personal reputation of members of parliament.

In 1891 a charge was brought against an hon. member of this House who was a minister of the Crown. The charge, which was a very serious one, was to the effect, not, that while he was in office as a minister, but that previously as a private member of the House, he had had an interest in a government contract and had profited materially from the fruits of that contract. That was the charge that was brought against him and which the government of the day was being asked to investigate. In answer to the request for an investigation, no less a parliamentarian than Sir John Thompson, who a little later led the party which my right hon. friend opposite (Mr. Meighen) leads at the present moment, gave his views to the House as to the principles which should govern in determining a matter of this kind. I shall read one pertinent paragraph, I think hon. members will recognize in a moment wherein it bears upon the question we are considering. Sir John Thompson said, as reported in Hansard of September 23, 1891, volume 3, page 5946:

> I am willing to treat this motion coming now, as if it were a motion placed on the order paper and reached in due course, and I shall ask the judgment of the House upon it with regard, not to any technical rule of order, but to the decision that the House should come to as the judge of its own privilege, and the judge of its own jurisdiction; feeling sure that the House will be careful to keep in mind the cardinal principle laid down from the time that the privileges of members and the privileges represented by members came to be appreciated—the cardinal principle that the House has power, where members have been guilty of a positive crime, or have offended against the laws and regulations of the House, or have been guilty of fraudulent or other disgraceful acts which proved that they were unfit to exercise the trust which their constituents had reposed in them, and unfit to continue to associate with the other members of the legislature:—to exercise its control: but remembering, too, the cardinal principle which runs side by side with it and is of equal value for the preservation of the liberty of constituencies and of members, that it is not for the House in the exercise of that jurisdiction to create a new disability or to enquire into the private transactions of members of the House.

That was the view Sir John Thompson took of how parliament should consider its rights and its duties in discussing matters affecting its honour and traditions; he held that it was not for parliament to create a new disability or to inquire into the private transactions of members of this House. I ask hon. members whether, the particular act to which the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) has referred, falls into any category other than that of a matter in the nature of a private transaction, an action which, as the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) has just pointed out, was one that concerned wholly and exclusively the minister's own property. The minister was dealing as an individual with property that was exclusively his own in a transaction which was entirely a personal and private one. It was not a public transaction or concerned with any public matter, it was altogether personal and private with respect to property which belonged exclusively to the hon. member concerned. Now, that is true wholly irrespective of where the hon. member got the information, how he got it or any question of the kind. Are we at this time in interpreting the principle of upholding the honour and traditions of parliament, to declare that in so doing it is part of the duty of parliament to inquire into the private transactions of a member of the House with respect to a matter which relates itself entriely to his own private business?

May I cite one other authority, also greatly respected, the late Dalton McCarthy. Mr. McCarthy who was recognized as of independent judgment in public matters said, as will be found at page 5961 of Hansard of the date I have already quoted:

> I think my hon. friend will admit that when the hon. member for South Lanark sits here under the writ which called on the people of South Lanark to return their representative, it does not lie with this parliament to turn out that representative and disfranchise that constituency except under the law, under the constitution, or under precedent which any man can cite.

Let me repeat:

> It does not lie with this parliament to turn out that representation—

And that is the effort of hon. gentlemen opposite—so to defame the good name and honour of the Minister of Labour that it will be impossible for him longer to sit in this House.

> —and disfranchise that constituency except under the law.

And they propose to do that, although it is admitted in this case that no law has been violated. If any has been violated, will my hon. friend or any other gentleman opposite tell us what that law is?

—under the constitution.

Where under the constitution has the hon. member offended in any particular with respect to any charge that has been made against him? Had he violated his oath of office as a minister of the Crown it might have been stated that under the constitution, he was liable to be censured or expelled from this parliament because the oath of a cabinet minister may well be regarded as a part of the constitution under which our parliamentary government is carried on. But there is nothing under the constitution which has in any way been violated by the hon. member with respect to the charge which has been brought against him.

—or under precedent which any man can cite.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have not cited a single precedent applicable in this case, which would justify the dismissal from or censure by this House of the Minister of Labour in connection with the transactions which are being discussed. If we were to take the attitude that hon. gentlemen opposite would like us to take, we would be establishing a new precedent. Now, we have responsibilities in maintaining the honour and traditions of this House, not merely with respect to the observance of precedents already established, but also with respect to establishing new precedents. The hon. member who has made the charge against the minister and who has brought in this amendment says that when the Minister of Labour talked with the Deputy Speaker in his office and was there told that the bank was about to fail, and acted on that knowledge, that of itself proves the charge. If we support the amendment which is before the House we are establishing that as a precedent. Will any hon. member say that we should make it an obligation upon members of the House and ministers of the Crown that, with respect to their own private affairs, they are not to be permitted to exercise the same prudence or the same discretion that they would be expected to exercise as private individuals? A minister of the Crown makes a good many sacrifices in the public interest that he may give his entire time and attention to public affairs. But I submit that it is going very far to suggest that a minister of the Crown must not, in that capacity, exercise the same prudence with respect to his own property and his own family as he would be expected to exercise as a private individual.

Now I ask hon. members if they disagree with that view. If they do not disagree with it, how can they, regardless altogether of where the Minister of Labour may have obtained the information which led him to act with respect to his own property as he did,—how can they, I say, assert that he has violated some obligation as a minister of the Crown and thereby has violated the honour, the dignity and the traditions of this House? That, it seems to me. is a broad principle we are called upon to consider, and I submit that members should in this matter exercise just the same reasonableness and fairness in forming their judgment as they would in regard to any other matter which may come before them for consideration.

Speaking of these matters of honour and dignity and tradition, there is a motto with which, I think, we are all more or less familiar; it is a motto which finds its place on the royal coat of arms, it is a motto which we have learned to respect from our earliest days—honi soit qui mal y pense; let evil be to him who evil thinks. We can start out with the assumption that the hon. Minister of Labour is a dishonest man, that he has criminal instincts, that his purpose in public life is to enrich himself; or we can start out with the belief—which those of us who know him best hold in strongest measure—that he is among the most scrupulously honest of men and the most fearless and chivalrous. What has been the record of the Minister of Labour? He started life with very little in the way of personal means, with very little assistance at his command, but by his industry, his integrity, and his honesty he won the confidence of his fellow working men, not in tens or in hundreds but in thousands over the whole of this continent. He was entrusted with part control of the trust funds of the great organization of railway trainmen of which he was one of the honoured officers and leaders. When, some few years ago, he entered the service of this country as a member of the Board of Commerce he drew a salary from the government which meant a great deal to a man of his limited means. He resigned that office of emolument and refused to draw another dollar as salary when, as he told the government of the day, he found it impossible to discharge his duties in the interests of the public, because of the restrictions placed upon him. Hon. gentlemen opposite who wished Mr. Murdock at their bidding to occupy an office and draw a salary, but at the same time not carry out the duties of that office, or serve the public as his position demanded, now seek to drive him out of public life. Instead of attempting to drive Mr. Murdock out of public life, those who wish to see honest and fearless men in public life should do their utmost to retain Mr. Murdock in office.

My right hon. friend takes the actions of Mr. Murdock and interprets them all in his own way, he starts with the assumption that there has been some criminal intent from the outset; in imagination, he follows him from the council chamber, watches him go to the bank, notes whether he turns to the right or to the left, and finally discovers that he allows his secretary to deposit in another bank the money withdrawn from the Home Bank, and attributes this last action to a design to conceal what was done. Mr. Murdock is the last man in this world to conceal anything. The difficulty sometimes is to prevent him from saying the things that he wants to say in the freest and readiest way. Hon. members opposite have been saying, "Why didn't he answer the question: Did you withdraw this money on information other than that which you received from Mr. Gordon?" Let me ask them, why didn't they ask him that question, why didn't my hon. friend who laid this charge against Mr. Murdock, ask him that question? The reason they did not ask it was because they knew Mr. Murdock's answer would be "no", and the moment they gave him an opportunity of making that direct reply all their suspicions would be publicly dispelled and they would no longer he able to weave a case on purely circumstantial evidence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the Prime Minister thinks we did not ask him, will he tell us why Mr. German did not put the same question to his friend?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. German asked Mr. Murdock the circumstances under which he took the money out, and he said he got the information from Mr. Gordon and acted on that information. And Mr. German believed him. Mr. German was not filled with the suspicion of mind and nature which characterizes my right hon. friend. Moreover, when the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman) was speaking before the committee he used the following words: I read from the proceedings of the Committee page 138:

> The onus is on him, and he is convicted, if I may use the word, by his refusal to give us particulars of this matter, nor to say, and his counsel would have been very alert to have him say, that it was not through an official communication. It would not be disclosing anything that took place in council, if he were to say "It was not through any official communication that I withdrew the money. But there has not been one word of the minister's that has touched upon that point. I say he has carefully refrained from mentioning that, when his duty was to disclose fully and freely his position in the matter.
> Hon. Mr. Murdock: Put him back on the stand and ask him those questions.

That is what Mr. Murdock said. Try to conceal information? Fail to give the committee an answer to any question they wished to put? No, Mr. Speaker. He said: Put me back and ask me the question whether I took that money out on information that I got from any official source, and I will answer it for you. And yet these gentlemen to-night who would try to drive him out of public life, not one of them would ask that he should be put back on the stand and be given a chance to answer that question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the Prime Minister be good enough to say that that was long after the case closed and during argument, and that the hon. member who was chairman of the committee told Mr. Murdock —I have not his exact words—to keep quiet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just exactly what I was saying. The trouble with Mr. Murdock is that he is always ready to tell everything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At the wrong time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was open to any member of the committee, at any time, to put him back on the stand, but that does not alter the fact, Mr. Speaker, that all the time he was on the stand not one of my right hon. friend's friends would ask him that question. They took good care not to ask him that question, knowing full well what the answer would be. Everyone now realizes that this is an inquiry on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, not of a character to help maintain the dignity and honour and traditions of this House, but rather of the nature of prosecution and persecution. For over a month the Minister of Labour has been denied his seat in this House in order that hon. gentlemen opposite might seek to make it appear before the country that in some way he was guilty of some serious offence.

The right hon. leader of the opposition to-night intimated that the government by allowing this matter to go to investigation had admitted that the facts upon which the inquiry was being based did constitute an offence which would violate the dignity and honour and traditions of this House. We never admitted, never suggested anything of the kind. What we endeavoured to do was to give to hon. gentlemen opposite every opportunity that could be given to prove the serious charges that the hon. member for West Hastings had made. They have now had that opportunity, and not only have they not proved them, but the charges have been entirely disproved, and it is, I submit, best maintaining the honour and dignity and traditions of this parliament, when it is found that you are unable to prove charges, to admit in a free, ready and candid manner that you are glad to be able to report that having inquired into the matter you find nothing derogatory on the part of the minister affected, but that the charges made have not been substantiated. The fact is the honour, dignity and traditions of our parliament are so high that having searched through all the transactions of the years since this government has been in office hon. gentlemen opposite have only been able to find something of a character to which their suspicious minds have attached importance, and then they have not been able to prove the charges which they have made. I say, Mr. Speaker, it is best maintaining the dignity and honour and traditions of parliament to admit that candidly. This investigation has been made by a committee of this House appointed for the express purpose of taking evidence under oath in regard to the charges that have been made, and reporting upon the facts. That committee has reported, and the charges have been not only not proved, but entirely disproved. Let us, then, if we have regard for the honour, dignity and traditions of this House, hasten to support the committee and endorse its report.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I had thought I would be able to get along without having to talk again to the House. So far as the speech of the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) is concerned, there is no occasion to rise. Admiring him, as we do, as a stump orator and barn-stormer, he gave a wonderful exhibition to-night, and we all enjoyed it; but so far as having anything to do with this case, there was nothing in his speech to answer. We had an appeal to party prejudice, yes, an appeal to party prejudice and passion worked up to the last degree in respect to what ought to be a judicial function of this parliament.

The Prime Minister started out better. He really had an argument this time, but the trouble was he lost sight of it very, very soon. He had a pretty good argument. He took just about the best argument he could take in view of the fact that neither he nor one of his colleagues, called as they were before that tribunal, would state to the committee that the matter of the Home Bank's condition was not discussed in cabinet. He was on safe ground, therefore, when he did not deal with the facts but gave us the only defence he really is in a position to make. He gave us the words, for example, of Sir John Thompson, and the words of Mr. Dalton McCarthy. If my right hon. friend had stopped there, it would have been a great deal better. If he had only had enough confidence in his own case and in his own argument to continue to appeal to reason instead of to passion, instead of appealing to party prejudice and the like, his subject would have been very much more befitting his high office. After all, is there any room for this kind of conduct in a Prime Minister who is really concerned with the honour and dignity of this House? Can nice questions of honour and dignity be dealt with in a flood of passion, loud language, and vituperation? It cannot be done at all. My right hon. friend would have done much better if he had rested upon his argument and had not made the declamation that he has made. Why, it is an admission that his case is such that it can only be answered by declamation, by stirring up prejudice. When declamation is attempted, it is an admission that the case cannot be answered on the facts. It is the old, old idea of doing everything that can be done to prevent anything like a decent consideration of what we have got before us, and it has gone on the whole time. We have had the same attacks made all the time. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, did you ever know the chairman of a committee, a gentleman who in his position is supposed to act in a judicial manner on a question of this kind, come down here and fight through his report? That is what was done. Not only did he come down here and fight through his report, but he goes to the political lengths of making insinuations as to what would be done in other quarters. That is how this whole thing was done. Mr. Speaker, it is just as well sometimes that we keep our feet on the ground. That is not the kind of thing one expects, assuming that anything like fairness, propriety and a decent judicial attitude is to be maintained. I wonder what the right hon. the Prime Minister, the custodian of the honour and dignity of this House, thinks the actions of Sir Thomas White, what he did or did not do, have to do with the propriety of Mr. Murdock's conduct. Does my right hon. friend honestly think it has anything to do with this case? He pounds his desk when that illustration is brought up but does he honestly think it has anything to do with this matter? He knows it has not. Does he honestly think that the question of the propriety of Mr. Murdock's conduct is met by making attacks on the Conservative party as to what happened at the time of the Canadian Pacific scandal and other matters? Does he honestly think that has anything to do with the rectitude of Mr. Murdock's conduct? This thing has degenerated into a farce, a perfect farce.

Mr. FINN: That is only one of the scandals.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says "hear, hear." Well, he has done his best and he has had his party do their best to preclude anything like a proper consideration of this subject. Now I am going to get down to where my right hon. friend talks business. He actually did talk business in connection with one argument. That was to the effect that nothing could be done with a man's private business, even though he happened to be a minister of the Crown. That is the effect, I think, of my right hon. friend's argument in that particular matter. He pointed out in the commencement of his remarks that questions relating to the honour of members of the House of Commons could not and should not be considered in the light of a new disability. I hasten to agree with my right hon. friend. Apparently he thought the only thing that ought to be considered would be a violation of the law and an offence against the constitution or an offence against a minister's oath.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, not against a minister's oath but where there is no precedent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, I will drop the point as to a minister's oath and take the case of violation of a law or an offence under the constitution. My right hon. friend says nothing should be done unless some precedent can be given for it. Proceeding from that point he argues that you could not inquire into a man's private business. Well, I am going to give my right hon. friend some precedents, and I am going in the first instance to lay down one or two propositions. First I submit, and my right hon. friend can object to it if he wants to, that no minister ought to engage in transactions which may bring his private interest or his private sense of obligation into conflict with his public duty.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. FINN: What is the ex-Minister of Finance quoting from now? Is he laying that down as a principle or is he giving a quotation?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend will allow me; just at the present moment I am putting this up to the Prime Minister. At present I am submitting a proposition.

Mr. FINN: What is the proposition?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I really think, Mr. Speaker, that the remarks of my hon. friend are just as much in point on the issue here as anything that has been said from that side. If he wants to go on interrupting it takes less time than some of those speeches.

Mr. FINN: Is the ex-Minister of Finance dealing with questions of law or of fact? If he is speaking as a lawyer let him keep close to his task. If he is speaking as ex-Finance Minister he is dealing with something he did not know very much about when he was in office.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do you think, Mr. Speaker that we can get on without any more interruptions of this kind, or must we put up with them a little while longer. I am quite content to act in accordance with what the chair says.

Mr. FINN: That is what I should like.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very well, we shall make another trial.

Mr. FINN: Try again.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I repeat, no minister ought to engage in transactions which may bring his private interest or private sense of obligation into contact with his public duty. My right hon. friend will find no statute relating to that; he will find no law that I know of.

Mr. FINN: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): An hon. member who has the floor cannot be questioned without his consent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid the speech of the right hon. Prime Minister has had a bad effect upon the senior member for Halifax. As I was saying, I do not think my right hon. friend will find any statute for the proposition I spoke of a few minutes ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a precedent for that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes there is a precedent for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I admit all the cases where precedents are given.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Furthermore, I maintain that a cabinet minister should not make use of any special confidential information that comes to him in his capacity as a minister of the Crown.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister cannot use the information that comes to him in his position as a minister of the Crown for his own profit or advantage. My right hon. friend does not dispute the proposition that such is improper. I do not say it is illegal but it is improper for a minister of the Crown to make use of information which he gets as such for his personal profit or advantage. My right hon. friend will agree that that proposition is covered by precedent. I am going to proceed a little bit further in the matter of precedent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it to a man's profit to recover his own coat after it has been stolen from him? Is there not a great distinction between possessing the thing that is one's own and going out to recover something one has never possessed before?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am much obliged for my right hon. friend's query; it gives me an idea as to what is in his mind. His position is that there is a distinction between hanging on to your own, even if otherwise you would have lost it, in the one case as against getting a profit in the other case. That is exactly the same distinction my right hon. friend made before but I thought he had abandoned it.

I thought he had abandoned it when he allowed this committee to go, but my hon. friend sticks to it. I submit there is no more difference and no higher right of property in money deposited in a bank than there is in shares in a company. I do not think my right hon. friend would dispute that proposition. Further, if it be right to take advantage of information which you get for the purpose of saving money in a bank, it would also be right to take advantage of information you get to sell shares that you know are going to be worthless.

Mr. BUREAU: Where is the information got? That is the question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has not been following this matter at all.

Mr. BUREAU: I have.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think he has been listening to campaign speeches. There is not very much trouble about the question as to where the information was obtained. My hon. friend knows where it was got all right.

Mr. BUREAU: That is the gist of the whole thing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend was at the cabinet meeting on the morning of the 15th he knows where the information was obtained. I do not know whether he was there. Yet again he says he could not tell. He could tell easily enough if nothing was said, and the answer could be given very, very quickly. In connection with this Marconi case which was referred to—

Mr. FINN: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise to a point of order. Are the proceedings of this House to be turned into a buffoonery, or have we any rights?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): I have called the hon. gentleman to order several times, and I hope he will respect the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. FINN: I certainly will, but my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has been turning the House into a burlesque.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the Marconi case the charge was not disposed of at all in the way mentioned by my hon. friend. In that case there was an investigation as to whether or not a proper contract had been entered into with the post office authorities and the British Marconi Company, and the then Attorney General, Rufus Isaacs and the Master of Elibank, who are ministers interested with the Postmaster General, gave evidence before that committee, and it was found that in connection with that contract there was no impropriety and that the charges which had been made in connection with it were altogether wrong. Then it was stated in the House that six weeks after that contract was entered into shares were bought by the attorney general and by the Master of Elibank. The shares were bought long after the contract was entered into and the charge was made against them. What was the charge? Simply that the House is entitled to full information from its members. That was the whole charge, based upon the principle that as soon as anything comes up which calls in question in any degree at all the propriety of the conduct of a member it is immediately his duty to give a full disclosure of everything that has to do with it. The opinion of the Conservatives, the opinion of the Liberals and the opinion of everybody in the House was that as a matter of common honesty, as a matter essential to the proper carrying on of public business, hon. members must be frank in their disclosures to the House and tell everything they know.

Mr. FINN: Why did not my right hon. friend—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Order, order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are to have another interruption.

Mr. FINN: Why did not my right hon. friend—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): I would remind the hon. the senior member for Halifax that I have called him to order several times, and if he persists in these interruptions I will have to apply the rule.

Mr. FINN: I can assure the hon. Speaker that I will abide by the rules of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It was the absolute duty of all members to make full and free and frank disclosures of everything that had any connection with any matter that had to do with their personal honour or their conduct in the House, and although those shares were bought six weeks afterwards, and although the whole of that inquiry had to do with private business, the matter was dropped on the ministers making the fullest and most ample apologies, the ministers saying that they were wrong and that that statement had to be made to the House. Does my hon. friend want any more precedents. He can find them here. I can give them to him at great length if he desires to have them, but he has already said that there was a precedent for the statement I have made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member is talking about the matter of speculating.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The right hon. Prime Minister is entirely wrong. That was not the offence. It was not what was considered in this case.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Will the hon. member allow a question?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Did I hear the hon. member say there was an inquiry into the action of the attorney general, Rufus Isaacs and the other minister?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No I did not say so. I said there was an inquiry whether the original contract was properly let or not, and the matter came up incidentally. Here is the resolution, and the House will see how absurd the proposition is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was speaking about precedents for inquiries, and now the hon. member says there are no precedents.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am speaking about precedents which have to do with decency and the very matter my hon. friend was speaking about, matters which have to do with the decorum of the House. They need not be sent to a committee for inquiry. They can be dealt with by the House. The principles are the same. There is no use drawing a red herring over the trail. The principles are the same whether they are considered in the House, as they were in this case altogether, or whether they are considered in committee first and in the House afterwards.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why did not the hon. member adopt that method, instead of the process of a parliamentary inquiry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that there is very much difference.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: What were they accused of?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The motion of Lord Cave was this:

> That this House regrets the transactions of certain of His Majesty's ministers in the shares of the Marconi Company of America.

This motion was rejected. Is that not the fact?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we had better go on. The motion was a motion regretting the purchase of these shares, as I say six weeks after the contract. My hon. friend read that and stopped. There was absolutely nothing to show impropriety at all. The only thing shown in all these hundreds of pages is that there was not a frank, open disclosure to the House of the facts. My hon. friend stopped at a convenient point.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The resolution goes on:

And the want of frankness displayed by ministers in their communications on the subject to the House.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: And it was rejected.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is, I think, wrong. The apology of the ministers was taken and, perhaps, I had better read the apology. We had better see what these accused ministers themselves thought just as to that one charge of lack of frankness. This is what the Attorney General said:

Let me not formulate rules, because nothing is more dangerous in cases of this character. Let me state the rule which I think is the one which I have been most in danger in breaking in reference to this matter. I should not state it as the hon. and learned gentleman stated it. I should not state it in those terms. I think, as I shall state it, that I shall command the assent of all members of this House, and I think it imposes as high a test as you can impose. I certainly would say, first, not by any means exhaustive, that no minister should use any information which he obtains as a minister for the purpose of making private profit or of furthering his private interests.

I think my hon. friend agreed with that proposition or one very similar to it. Then again he goes on. I do not read solidly through, but he lays down this principle:

A minister should not place himself in a position which might reasonably expose him, in the opinion of fair-minded men, to the suspicion of corruption, even though his conscience is clear that in taking that position he is acting honestly and without a corrupt motive.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Everybody admits that.

Mr. HEALY: Where is the corrupt motive?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What a trifling admission? We have the query from the hon. member for North Essex: Where is the corrupt motive?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: In this case?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have just pointed out that it is not necessary to have any corrupt motives. The question of corrupt motives has nothing to do with the matter.

Mr. HEALY: Why refer to it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I know my hon. friend is hard to please. I am reading from a report that goes this length, and hon. gentlemen cannot get it into their heads that we are not treating this whole matter as if it was a criminal case, as if Mr. Murdock ought to be behind the bars. This is no criminal charge at all. The whole question is whether or not, according to the specified traditions of parliamentary life, this conduct is becoming or not. We can have unbecoming conduct without the slightest corrupt motive. I have never for one minute urged that you could not, but I am pointing out how different things are sometimes. This is what the other person charged says: He does not want any act to be turned up such as the chief custodian of the honour of this House wants turned up, before he knows that the honour and dignity of this parliament is affected. He says this:

A minister should not place himself in a position which might reasonably expose him, in the opinion of fair-minded men, to the suspicion of corruption, even though his conscience is clear that in taking that position he is acting honestly and without a corrupt motive. I have formulated that rule so that I might place it as the highest test that a minister could impose upon himself.

That is what one defendant in this case says his standard is.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I cannot understand how my hon. friend can compare this case with the Marconi case. Is it not a fact that in the Marconi case Mr. Rufus Issacs and Mr. Lloyd George had bought shares of the Marconi Company of America which was a subsidiary company to the Marconi Company of England?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, entirely separate.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: And the government was entering into a contract with the Marconi Company of England. Is that not a fact?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, my hon. friend is wrong. In the first instance the contract with the British Post Office was made six weeks before this purchase of shares was made.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Not completed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: If my hon. friend will look at the report he will find that it was not completed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is the evidence of the attorney general. Besides that it was also shown that they were separate and distinct corporations.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes, but subsidiary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, they were not subsidiary.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The progress of the American company was in relation of the progress of the English company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no doubt that if one succeeds the other is likely to make a success. I will agree with that at once. I would also point out though that it was shown and admitted by everybody against the attorney general and the Master of Elibank that there was nothing wrong with that purchase. What was being urged against them all the time was that they had not made an honest disclosure to the House. If there is any doubt about that, I will go back and read the statements of the mover. Take for example at page 407:

In the second place—

And this is what was pressed more than the first a good deal.

—they showed a lamentable lack of candour in their dealings not only with this House, but with the public.

Mr. Rufus Isaacs says exactly the same thing.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I heard my hon. friend state that the shares were bought after the contract had been entered into. If my hon. friend will look into the report he has now, he will find out that the tender was accepted from the Marconi English Company on the 7th March, 1911; that the contract was completed in July of the same year, and that on the 9th March, two days after the contract was accepted by the British government, Mr. Godfrey Isaacs sold shares to Mr. Rufus Isaacs, his brother, and Mr. Lloyd George.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The evidence of Rufus Isaacs is at page 435 where he says that he purchased the American Marconi shares six weeks after the British Marconi tender had been accepted.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: But the contract was only completed in July.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know about that.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That is very important.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The tender was accepted. The contract was merely a matter of form. If the Prime Minister is correct in saying that the private affairs of members cannot be considered, he is absolutely denying the efficacy of the principles he believes in.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the hon. member believe that the obligation not to make private gain carries with it the obligation to incur personal loss?

[Mr. Archambault.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It involves this necessity, that a minister cannot escape personal loss by reason of the obligation. It certainly does that. For the life of me I cannot see any difference between a member making $500 out of the knowledge that he has gained as a minister, and his using knowledge gained in that capacity for the purpose of saving a loss of $500. Either way it is exactly the same. And if the Prime Minister is right in saying that you cannot consider the private transactions of a member there is no good in having any of these principles at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never said that; I simply quoted Sir John Thompson and Mr. McCarthy.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, but the Prime Minister was quoting for a purpose. He attacked the mover of this resolution for bringing the matter up and going into the withdrawal by the Minister of Labour of his deposit from the Home Bank, and he certainly made the point that we had no right to consider any member's private affairs. Well, if we have not that right there is no use in having these rules, and without such rules any one can speculate with information he obtains in his capacity as a minister. If we have not these rules budgets may be anticipated and all sorts of improprieties may occur.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I implied nothing of the sort.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the Prime Minister says he does not say that, he is in effect withdrawing his argument against taking the matter up on the ground that it is an inquiry into the private business of the Minister of Labour. He cannot hold both views. I agree that the position of the Prime Minister is a difficult one; as pointed out by Mr. Asquith, in similar circumstances, he is in a peculiar degree the keeper of the conscience and the standards of honour of the House. Does he not really think that it would be very much better if he would even at this late date counsel his colleague to admit what the facts are and to say that so far as he was concerned he did not think they amounted to anything? Would it not be better to do that than for the government to put itself in this position? The government has to do certain things with this coat of whitewash; they will lay down precedents with it. Let us see what kind of precedents they will establish for the future with this coat of whitewash.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: We will buy it from Mr. Ballantyne.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The money was returned. Why? It was returned after a threat of legal proceedings, and it is idle to suggest that such a threat had not to do with it. No one will believe it except perhaps a very close political friend who might have some object in believing it. No one would believe that the man that took the trouble to go through all that has been gone through here did so just for the purpose, months and months afterwards, of wholly voluntarily returning the money. It was returned because a demand was made; and what was the justification for that demand?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was not returned for that reason at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: May I point out that the Prime Minister is not asking a question but is attempting to make a speech? I do not intend to yield the floor.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member was making a statement which was untrue.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Prime Minister has no right to say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have a right to say it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have every right to argue what every man with common sense knows the facts to be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member can make any argument he likes, but he must not misrepresent things.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend has no right to say that I am making a misstatement; I can say a good deal in reference to misstatements.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Say all you wish to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not believe in that sort of nonsense.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not want my hon. friend to make any misstatements.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the Prime Minister doing on the floor at the present time while I am addressing the House; is he copying his supporters in the back seats?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Come back to earth.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why was that money returned, I ask?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: From a high sense of honour and an obligation on the part of the minister to his colleagues.

An hon. MEMBER: It was returned because he was honest.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is why he took it originally of course—because he was honest.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The money was returned from a sense of honour which the hon. gentleman seems unable to appreciate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Am I to be bombarded with interruptions from all quarters? There seems to be a private caucus on the opposite side, but I do not blame hon. gentlemen for people in their position are usually perturbed. I ask, why was the demand made for the return of the money? The liquidator is not interested in the Minister of Labour's honour as a member of this House; he is not interested in that question at all. The liquidator is interested in seeing that there shall be no offences in the way of frauds and undue preferences. That is what he is interested in. Just see what kind of precedent this government is going to make: It is compatible with the dignity and the honour of parliament for members to be guilty of fraudulent and unjust preferences!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend whether he thinks I should be expected to sit here and listen without protest to accusations against a colleague who is unable to be present by reason of the action of my hon. friend's party, when those accusations are entirely false?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Prime Minister knows he has no right to make that statement; if the rules are fair and equitable they should apply to the government just as well as to the opposition. But why did not the Prime Minister get up when he was a witness and give the kind of evidence he wants to give now? Why did he not when he was in the box swear as he could have sworn that there was not one thing said about the Home Bank at that meeting?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I answered every question asked me and hon. gentlemen opposite had all the privileges they could desire in the matter of examination.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have heard a good deal about the ruling of the chairman. Do we want to go back to that ruling? Was the ruling a farce entirely, and were we to pay no attention to it? No; this was to be a sanctuary; there was not to be one word said about it. And now we are taunted because we did not ask questions on the point.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Does the hon. gentleman doubt the soundness of Chief Justice McKeown's own ruling?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no doubt that my hon. friend thinks he is making a valuable suggestion.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I am not suggesting anything; I am asking a question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a question that would never have occurred to me. But the Prime Minister is asking why we did not put these very questions that were ruled out of order, and when he does so the matter becomes of some importance. The Prime Minister says here, when he is not under oath, things that he would not say when he was in the box.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BUREAU: I rise to a point of order The hon. gentleman has no right to say that when the Prime Minister gets up in this House and makes a statement he is saying what is false.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not say that.

Mr. BUREAU: That the right hon. gentleman would not say under oath what he says in the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. BUREAU: That means that you are lying when you say in the House what you refuse to say under oath.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, I submit that what I stated is absolutely in order. I did not say what the hon. gentleman imputes to me. I simply stated what the fact is that the statement made here to-night, if I understand my right hon. friend right, is not to be found in his evidence.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not what you said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that he is speaking about the question of Mr. Murdock returning the money. That was not a matter that had anything to do with cabinet proceedings at all. No question of cabinet privilege was ever urged in connection with it. That is the question which he said I refused to say anything about. I was not asked the question. Had I been asked I would have answered that the conversation I had with Mr. Murdock on that subject was not a conversation in the cabinet at all; he was giving me his own reasons for what he did.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Supposing we start again—

Mr. BUREAU: I want a ruling on the point of order.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): The hon. member for West York has put the point of order beyond dispute; he has given an explanation which I consider is satisfactory.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might be a point of order also to inquire how it is that the Prime Minister is always privileged to assert an untruth against the member for West York.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take exception to that statement, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. leader of the opposition has no right to say that I ever stated an untruth about the member for West York.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Apparently my right hon. friend is not able to understand English at this late hour. What I stated was that the Prime Minister was continually privileged to assert an untruth against the member for West York.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He has never asserted an untruth.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He attributed an untruth to the hon. member.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): I think if the right hon. Prime Minister insists, the right hon. leader of the opposition should withdraw that assertion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have nothing to withdraw. I have stated what is absolutely correct, that the Prime Minister to-night has been repeatedly asserting that the member for West York stated an untruth.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is different.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is exactly what I said at the beginning.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is another twist and turn of my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is no twist or turn. I said the Prime Minister was asserting an untruth against the hon. member for West York.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw. Question.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Order. We are not able to carry on the debate with these interruptions.

Mr. CAHILL: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, I object to the remark of the member for Pontiac. I am subject to the rule of the Chair.

Mr. CAHILL: You seem to have to be called to order quite often.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has not any right to say that. I have not so far been called to order.

Mr. CAHILL: You withdrew just now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to point out to my right hon. friend that he is making what I do not think is a very safe precedent for parliament to follow. He asserts that it is quite right for ministers to obtain a fraudulent preference. The report itself covers that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend making that as statement or as argument?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am making it as argument, but I am also making it as statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend may argue as much as he likes, but I ask him to be careful in the statements he makes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is my right hon. friend threatening about now? What is this nonsense? What is the trouble with my right hon. friend?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not intend to sit here and have my hon. friend attribute fraud or anything of the kind to any action of mine.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I may have to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He may argue as much as he likes, but any time he makes a statement of that kind I shall not let it pass.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I point out to my right hon. friend that in connection with this very report he will find the following:

> The committee finds that Honourable James Murdock did nothing in connection with the withdrawal of such money from the Home Bank contrary to his obligation as a minister of the Crown, or in derogation of his office and the honour, dignity, and traditions of parliament.

That is the report. Now, the money was paid back after demand had been made for its return as money received under circumstances which made it a fraudulent preference. Does my right hon. friend realize that he is asking this House to set the seal of approval upon that sort of thing? We might just as well know what we are doing. I want my right hon. friend to think this over. I am addressing myself to him, not because I suppose for one minute that he is in a frame of mind to listen to me, Mr. Speaker, but because, after all, he is the chief repository of the dignities and traditions of parliament. I am asking him to consider whether he thinks the statement given by his colleague the hon. Mr. Murdock to the newspapers "that the withdrawal of the money was made in the ordinary course of business for the purpose of making a payment on a house" was correct? My right hon. friend knows it was not correct; and Mr. Murdock's own evidence shows that it was not correct. Does my right hon. friend think that that is not an offence within the principles laid down in the Marconi case? There the question was not false information, it was the withholding of information. Here we have information which admittedly was false.

1 a.m.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend, having read the proceedings, knows that the question was as to whether the persons concerned used information they had received as ministers to make money by speculating on the stock market. It was not a question of withholding information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is quite wrong. There were the two charges, but most of the discussion was on the question of withholding information. The charge of corruption was very quickly dropped and apologized for.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: If my hon. friend will look at page 398 of that report he will find that the accusation was the following:

> That the ministers had become interested in a company, the profits of which undoubtedly depended upon the conclusion and the confirmation of the contract that was then being negotiated.

And at page 391 Lord Cave moved:

> That this House regrets the transactions of certain of His Majesty's ministers in the shares of the Marconi Company of America.

Surely my hon. friend will not maintain that it was only an accusation of the withholding of information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I never said so.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Oh yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, my hon. friend is wrong. He is awfully excited tonight or he would not be making such a statement.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I am not excited, I am as calm as my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The charge was just lack of frankness. There was no charge of misinformation. I want my right hon. friend to consider one or two other things.

Mr. MARTELL: Does my hon. friend think that Hon. James Murdock violated the dignity of parliament in greater degree than did Mr. Wigmore when he was Minister of Customs and wrote a letter soliciting business for his own firm?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not remember that there was any whitewashing business in connection with that case.

Mr. MARTELL: There was whitewashing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not remember any whitewashing at all.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Do you remember the purchase of Sherwin-Williams paints?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question, question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder do hon. members opposite think they are advancing the proper consideration of this matter by the tactics to which they are resorting. I admit that I like to hear their voices now and again, but I question whether we shall get very far if these interruptions are persisted in. If I had been left alone I should have finished long ago.

Mr. POWER: We like to hear your voice.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose I might just as well wait until the interruptions subside.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question, question.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): I must remind hon. gentlemen again that the debate cannot be carried on unless these interruptions are discontinued.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I first pointed out the facts in regard to the matter of fraudulent preference. I then pointed out the misinformation given to the newspapers and absolutely admitted. That is something we are asked to set the seal of our approval on. We are asked to approve of the giving of a false statement to the newspapers in connection with something that is a matter of public record. Then I come down to the question of the honour of parliament and I point out when the withdrawal of this money really took place. The meeting of the cabinet was on the 15th August and the cheque was drawn on the 14th.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That was explained.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a first rate way of showing, on the face of it, that the cheque was signed before the cabinet meeting was held.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That was all explained.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend please let me continue; I will deal with that point; I am trying to wind up.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am glad to have my hon. friends feeling so pleasant. But let me continue. That was before the cabinet meeting. The next thing we have in connection with this matter is the manner in which the money is handled, and the difference of name. It is quite true that after the charges were made and practically known the minister admitted the date of the 14th August was a mistake. But I will put this one question: Was anything left undone that could be done in order to hide the transaction, and do we really want to act from partisan motives? Do the government or the House want to put the seal of their approval on that sort of thing?

Hon. JACQUES BUREAU (Minister of Customs): As a member of the committee I desire to add one word to what has already been said. First of all I take exception to the statement of my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) in which he tries to impute certain motives to the chairman of the committee. It was my privilege to attend the meetings of the committee and to observe how the proceedings were conducted, and I must confess that I never attended a committee where the chairman was fairer than my hon. friend (Mr. Archambault). If I may be permitted to use the expression of a former Prime Minister the chairman was a little more than fair to the accusers. The ex-Minister of Finance seems to think it strange that the chairman of the committee should defend his report. Surely my hon. friend has been a member of this House long enough to know that when the chairman of a committee presents a report from that body he generally explains its recommendations, and the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres did so in a very fair and impartial manner. The ex-Minister of Finance is a very astute man. He must consider his cause rather desperate when he resorts to the so-called arguments that he used to-night in answer to my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon). The latter was absolutely right both in his facts and in his law. But the ex-Minister of Finance characterized those statements as "barnyard talk." Surely my hon. friend forgot himself. Such language as that is unworthy of his position in the House and the place which he formerly occupied in the cabinet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Barn storming.

Mr. BUREAU: He charged the Prime Minister with "long loud language, declamation and vituperation". The defence by the Prime Minister of one of his colleagues is characterized as vituperation; and the same with every one of the arguments of the leader of the government. Well, if that is vituperation I shall have to forget my English.

Coming down to facts the Minister of Labour is accused of having taken advantage of his position for private gain which involved loss to others. What are the circumstances? He had drawn his indemnity, and he is not overwhelmed with the goods of this earth. In that position he is like myself. He had deposited this money in the Home Bank, but he learned from a colleague in the House, Mr. Gordon, that the institution was on the eve of failure and he withdrew the money. The hon. member for Dorchester rightly asked the question, and I repeat it: What man will stand up in this House and conscientiously say that if he had been in that position he would not have drawn that money. I shall not go to hon. gentlemen opposite for a standard of honesty but I freely say that I would have done it. I am not ashamed to say that I would have done it, and any man with a heart in his body would have done the same. The Minister of Labour is a man with a family, he has children to protect, and in drawing this money he was defrauding nobody. The bank was only the custodian of money which belonged to James Murdock who saw fit to take this money out; he owed it to his family to do so. I ask what is wrong with that proceeding? Every other man would have done the same. But now that the thing is over how easy it is to be good! No hon. gentleman opposite would get up and say he would do that and yet in so saying he would be guilty of hypocrisy.

My hon. friends opposite reproach him with having paid back the money. Well, he went one better than I would because I would have waited for the verdict of the court before I would have done so. By what right did he pay it back? Naturally the liquidator said, "Gentleman, pay back." In his own interest and to show how clever he was, Mr. Clarkson was willing to take money in any way he could get it, to recoup the depositor. I said to an hon. member this afternoon, "I am not sure that Mr. Clarkson will get judgment against any of the depositors." That money belonged to the depositors. It was in the bank for safekeeping, and there was no obligation, legal or otherwise, to pay it to the liquidator.

Now my hon. friend terms withdrawing the money a fraudulent preference. Well, I think that is pretty hard language. He did not mean it. He was a little fatigued by the interruptions, and he went further than he would go if he were cool and talking business. He argued that the minister was using information obtained as a minister to get a fraudulent preference. I claim he did not get a fraudulent preference. There was no preference. He was handling his own money. He went and got the money that belonged to him. There is a rule of this House which provides that when a member gives his word in the House it must be taken. Are we to suppose that the moment a member comes within the doors he changes his conscience, changes his mentality and becomes a better man, and that we have to take his word just because he has passed inside the door of the chamber? The Minister of Labour was on the stand. He was asked a question. Hon. members are trying by all sorts of means to establish the fact that he took the money out of the bank because he obtained the information in council in the morning. My hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) read from this evidence this afternoon, but I think it is well to repeat it. In the printed evidence I find the following:

Q. And after getting information from Mr. Gordon did you get any further information?—A. No.
Q. You say "No"?—A. "No."

There is no equivocation about that, and that question is asked by my hon. friend, the guardian of the honour of this House, the hon. member for West Hastings, who is trying to get the admission from him, that he used the information he got as a cabinet minister to withdraw that money. Then the examination continues:

Q. Of any kind or description—or anywhere?—A. Not that would form my opinion in regard to the matter.
Q. It may not have formed your opinion, but did you get any other information?—A. No one else had discussed that matter with me at all.
Q. Had you any better knowledge on the 15th as to the condition of the bank than you had on the 9th?—A. I would say not.

What information could he get from council that he did not have from the Deputy Speaker? None. My hon. friend says he paid back the money and therefore he pleaded guilty. That is poor argument. I would not have paid it back until the court said that I had to, and I do not know that Mr. Clarkson had any right to ask it. It may have been an excess of zeal on his part. That is his business. I do not think any man would pay back the money unless the judgment of the court went against him, except the Minister of Labour, who, as the Prime Minister says, in a sense of honour and out of consideration for his colleagues, thought he would pay it back, and did so. Now when a man does the right thing, an honourable thing—and I doubt very much whether he could be compelled to pay back—he is going to be charged with pleading guilty to an accusation of fraudulent preference on account of the information he got from council. My hon. leader quoted the words we see on the coat of arms, Honi soit, qui mal y pense. On this side of the House, among my friends from Quebec we have an old proverb, "To the pure all things are pure." But we have another motto: Evil be to him who evil thinks. My hon. friend must think much evil.

Referring to the Rufus Isaacs case, I may say that gentleman had a brother called Godfrey Isaacs who formed the Marconi Company in England at the same time they were forming a company in America. They said these were not subsidiary companies. They may not have been. They had the same objects and were formed for the same purpose. Godfrey went across the ocean and bought some of the American company's stock because he thought in view of the contracts being obtained by the English company, the other company would naturally do a good business. They went in for the purpose of making money—speculating. The government were giving contracts to the English company or about to give contracts to them. That was the information obtained in council. They did not go into the thing to get what belonged to them. That case does not apply to the present case. Here is a case of a man who goes to the bank and deposits his money.

[Mr. Bureau.]

He has never parted with the title. He did not deposit his money for speculation. He did not make any profit when he drew it out, or cause anybody to lose anything. That is the whole case. Now because this man acted like any other man would have done, the hon. member for West Hastings, who is the self-constituted guardian of the honour of the House, proposes that we shall say to Mr. Murdock, "Your political life is over, you will have to get out of the House, because you have acted as an honest straightforward loving father and have done what a good citizen would have done under similar circumstances." That is my way of looking at it. The right hon. leader of the opposition was asking if we were going to turn parliament into a burlesque show. My hon. friends have been doing much in that direction by their efforts to blacken a white man. My hon. friends spoke of whitewash. It is not a question of whitewash. It is a question of justice. It is a question of showing that this House and the committees thereof are not constituted for the purpose of singling out one man on suspicion—not even a suspicion—and making him the goat for political advantage at the cost of his future. I do not think that is a fair way of dealing with the matter. I think my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) saw he had a bad case. As the Prime Minister said, when the Minister of Labour came before the committee and gave his evidence contradicting the charge, it would have been more dignified for hon. members who were making the accusation to have said, "Well we wanted to protect the House and the public from any suspicion and we are now satisfied." But when hon. members come to speak of a whitewash, I do not know how to express myself. If rendering justice is whitewashing, and if rendering of justice cannot be understood by my hon. friends opposite, then let us call it a whitewash. In the case of every judgment which is rendered declaring a man not guilty we might, according to the hon. gentleman's logic, call it a whitewash. A peculiar theory has been advanced by my hon. friend from West Hastings in this matter. I was in attendance at the committee when he put forward a theory. It was to this effect: "Mr. Murdock, we have a suspicion against you. It is up to you to show you are innocent." That is practically what the hon. member said.

Mr. PORTER: I beg pardon I never said or suggested such a thing in committee. The minister cannot find that anywhere in the evidence, and I defy him to do it.

Mr. BUREAU: I may not use the exact words, but the argument made by the accusers was that it simulated a criminal proceeding.

Mr. PORTER: I did not say that even.

Mr. BUREAU: That was the position taken by the accusers.

Mr. PORTER: Not a word. Show me the evidence. Read it.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not going to read the evidence.

Mr. PORTER: No, the minister cannot.

Mr. BUREAU: But I am going to judge by my understanding. Persecution was the order of the day in all these proceedings, and the anxiety to find the minister guilty was oozing out of every one of these gentlemen. It was not a prosecution, it was a persecution and it was a wilful, malicious prosecution, trying to make out a case when they knew they had none. That is the result of the evidence and of the arguments to which I have listened. Where, in a British country, Mr. Speaker, have you seen a man taken up and told: I charge you with being a thief; now come on and prove that you are not. If my hon. friends want to keep up the dignity of the House, they had better start by showing that they are fair-minded men themselves, and that they, first, are going to observe the rules that will maintain the dignity of this House and of the members thereof. I do not think that men have any right to come here under the cover of upholding the dignity of the House, the standard that we ought to live up to, and pick out one man and persecute him. I do not believe that when I go out of this chamber I am a worse man than when I am in it, and I believe if we were to investigate every action that is done by a man, many members would be out of this House. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) cited the case of a Mr. Wigmore who took advantage of his position to seek business. That was one case where the hon. member for West Hastings ought to have called the attention of his leader to the matter and asked that such things should not happen in the House of Commons, because it was against the dignity of the House. There are other men who have been guilty of offences in the transaction of public affairs, who have sat in this House and who are sitting in this House.

Mr. MARTELL: What about Sir George Foster?

Mr. BUREAU: I am not talking about him, but I am talking about a man who had to leave this House and who is now again in this House.

An hon. MEMBER: Denounce him.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not going to denounce anybody. The question is whether we are going to submit to malicious argument, by gentlemen who are endeavouring to convict a man who is not guilty. I sat in that committee; I listened to the evidence, and there was a denial of the matter by Mr. Murdock. The only trouble is that these gentlemen who tried the case would like to call Mr. Murdock a perjurer and they dare not do so. The answer he gave when he was asked if there was any other information is unequivocal. He said that he had received no further information from any other source. These gentlemen would like to say that he is a perjurer; but they dare not say that because James Murdock is too well known throughout the country, and the people know that he would not perjure himself. But these gentlemen desire to take a roundabout way of saying that. If what they argue were the case, two members of parliament would not be able to speak together, or two members of the cabinet would not be able to consult one another about private business without trespassing on the dignity of parliament. Such arguments are childish. If the hon. member for Dorchester, (Mr. Cannon), as the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) has said, has spoken barnyard stuff, I say that this is childish stuff that is being spoken, and if I were allowed by the rules of the House, I would say in some cases, dishonest stuff, and wilfully dishonest, but I am not allowed to say it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not be justified in remaining silent when such language is used in this House. This is a flagrant breach of the rules of debate. I have never witnessed such disgraceful conduct in parliament as I have on the part of some hon. gentlemen during this debate. If an hon. member is to be allowed to say that but for the rules he would refer to the conduct of hon. members of this House as dishonest, then we might as well abandon all rules and allow parliament to be a mere burlesque.

Mr. BUREAU: I never said that. I said "statements," not "conduct." There is a difference. If I could by a circumlocution use the word "dishonest," I would repeat it. I have nothing to take back as far as that goes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): The rule is that an hon. member must not endeavour to say indirectly what he has no right to say directly. In the present case, I understand the minister is giving an explanation which I trust is satisfactory.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. He has made no explanation whatever. The rule might as well be abandoned.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): I understand that the Minister of Customs and Excise said that he had no intention of referring to the conduct of hon. members as being dishonest. He said that what he referred to as dishonest was statements.

Mr. BUREAU: My right hon. friend called me to order because he said I had charged hon. members on the other side with dishonest conduct. When I used the word "dishonest," I said I am very sorry it was not parliamentary; that I would like to use it, but I could not. Therefore, if I used it, I would take it back. As far as the word "conduct" is concerned, I used the word "statements."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Might I ask how long this is to go on?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): I understand it to be merely an explanation. The hon. member is withdrawing the word.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is substituting the word "statements" for "conduct."

Mr. BUREAU: I never said "conduct."

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister used the word "dishonest."

Mr. BUREAU: I used it, but I take it back. With my limited knowledge of the English language, there was no other word at my command which I could use.

Certaines de mes expressions ne sont peut-être pas parlementaires, lorsque je parle en anglais. Eussé-je employé ma langue maternelle, j'aurais pu énoncer clairement toute ma pensée; que les subterfuges, les sophismes et les insinuations dissimulées ne constituent pas un plaidoyer juste et raisonnable.

No charge was proven. A malicious accusation has been brought and they want us to convict a man on a mere suspicion. It is not circumstantial evidence that they bring, but mere suspicion, and as long as I shall sit in this House or on that committee, I may err,—and I am willing to own up to my errors—but I will never commit the crime of trying to induce my fellow members to condemn a man who is innocent.

Mr. E. GUSS PORTER (West Hastings): Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed just for a few moments to close the debate, it is not my intention to argue the case at any length; but some statements have been made during this debate that I think it only fair and right that I should have an opportunity and should take the advantage of explaining. The Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Bureau) was a member of the committee investigating this matter, and he was exceedingly anxious, if one may judge from his statements made in committee, that the investigation should be carried on in a dignified manner, just such a dignified manner as he has exhibited in the House to-night. The words he used as reported on page 18 of the inquiry are:

> Hon. Mr. Bureau: If we are going to have a parliamentary inquiry, let it be dignified, and let not these little subterfuges come before this tribunal. We want to know everything.

A point of order was being discussed and I said:

> Mr. Porter: Before you make your ruling, may I say a word? I do not want controversy over this question. I am not here determined to prove my case at all hazards. That is not my object.
> Hon. Mr. Bureau: Oh, tut, tut.

That is the same dignity shown by the hon. member who has just spoken. I shall not take time to refute the statements of evidence by the hon. member, because he has not in a single instance where he quoted the evidence, quoted it as it is printed in the record. Where he quoted the evidence he did not read from the record and I am contradicting the statement he made.

Mr. BUREAU: I rise to a point of order. I quoted the evidence from page 77 of the report of the committee of June 6, 1924, and if there is any word that I have not correctly quoted the mistake will appear in Hansard in due course.

Mr. PORTER: The hon. member made a statement which I am contradicting. He did not read from the record although I asked him to do so when he made the statement.

Mr. BUREAU: I read from the report of the proceedings of June 6, at page 77.

Mr. PORTER: The hon. member also charges that I am the self-constituted guardian of the honour of the House.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, I said that.

Mr. PORTER: Well, what is wrong with that? I want to know from the hon. member what is wrong about my constituting myself the guardian of the honour of this House. Does he complain of that?

Mr. BUREAU: I said that the hon. gentleman was the self-constituted protector of the honour of the House.

Mr. PORTER: What is wrong with that?

Mr. BUREAU: Why ask me that? If the hon. member does not like the appellation he need not accept it.

Mr. PORTER: The hon. member will not answer the question and therefore I will not press it. Now, the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) stated that I did not exhibit the same amount of zeal during the years I had been in parliament that I have done on this particular occasion, to safeguard the honour of members of parliament. He did not however cite, nor can he cite, one single case that came to my knowledge or attention which I neglected to bring to the notice of parliament. It is simply a bald statement without any foundation in fact.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What about the case of Wigmore?

Mr. PORTER: I do not know.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The hon. member was in the House at the time.

Mr. PORTER: There was never any charge brought on the floor of the House and no investigation was held.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Why did the hon. member not bring a charge?

Mr. PORTER: No one brought any charge at all. Reference has been made to books written by the Right Hon. Winston Churchill and by Lloyd George. The book written by Churchill gave away certain things, if I may use that expression, and it is significant that Churchill has never been in the British parliament since he wrote that book, and parliament has never had an opportunity of bringing him before its bar. And so far as Lloyd George is concerned, he has never been accused of giving away state secrets; I defy any man to produce any record to prove that he has ever done so. What is the use of referring to such matters to determine the question which is involved here? It seems to me nothing but stage play; it does not answer nor touch the question at all. Let us be manly in this matter.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes.

Mr. PORTER: The hon. member for Dorchester and one or two others have advanced what they term the human argument. I am not objecting to that, but the argument does not apply in a case of this kind. To put it in a word, they say that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) did nothing more than thousands of others would have done in the same circumstances. Do hon. members realize that this parliament is not the keeper of the conscience or the honour of the thousands of other men who are out in the country? There is only one Minister of Labour here and the conduct of that minister in so far as it touches the honour of parliament is in the keeping of this House. Parliament must therefore investigate matters of this kind, and when a minister or a member of parliament transgresses the rules, or sullies the traditions of parliament, or impinges upon its honour, we must take cognizance of such conduct. To use the argument that thousands or tens of thousands of others would have done the same thing does not make one bit of difference to the case as it stands.

Now, just one word in reference to what the Prime Minister has said touching the precedent he cited in the case that occurred in 1891. He did not state the name of the case but I think I know it; I think he had reference to the Rykert case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it was the case of Hon. John Haggart.

Mr. PORTER: Will the Prime Minister say that the punishment was not applied?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; the government of the day even refused to investigate the charge, holding that the offence if proved would not show that Hon. John Haggart had violated any law, and that no precedent could be cited to afford a ground for his removal even if the charge could be proved.

Mr. PORTER: That is what I expected the Prime Minister to say with reference to the Haggart case, but that is the reverse of what this parliament did. The facts as disclosed before parliament in that case did not constitute an offence in the first instance in the opinion of the House, and an investigation was refused. In this case however the facts do constitute an offence in the opinion of every hon. member of the House who has voted for the investigation.

Mr. BUREAU: No, not at all.

Mr. PORTER: If hon. members were of the opinion that the investigation would amount to nothing at all, what would be the sense of ordering one?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What would the hon. gentleman have said if the government had refused to grant the investigation?

Mr. PORTER: If the government had declared that they were satisfied that no offence had been committed, I should say they would be right in refusing to grant an investigation.

Mr. BUREAU: You would have charged the whole government with being guilty.

Mr. PORTER: When however the government ordered an investigation, thereby admitting that the facts as stated did constitute an offence if proven, it is clear that it must have been the opinion of every hon. member who voted for the inquiry that on the face of it an offence had been committed which should be looked into.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At the time I pointed out to the House that power had been given to a royal commission to make an investigation in so far as the facts were concerned; but it was the insistence of the hon. gentleman that this would not satisfy him and those about him that led me to say in the name of the government that we were prepared to grant an investigation.

Mr. PORTER: The Prime Minister knows better than I can tell him that the power of this House, the right of this House, to inquire into any charge affecting the honour of any member of parliament as such or of any minister of the cabinet is not a matter that can be delegated to a royal commission or a judge of the supreme court. It is a matter within the keeping of this House. It is a matter of the honour and conscience of the members of this House, and of nobody else. For that reason a royal commission would not be accepted, and the House agreed with that position. Instead of insisting that it go to a royal commission, the House granted an investigation by the committee on Privileges and Elections, and here we are with the facts as I have endeavoured to prove this afternoon.

Now my right hon. friend addressed this further argument to the House: Is this House upon the evidence that has been submitted going to turn this man out of public life, is it going to punish him in that way? And he repeated the question. It is not for me, it is for the House to say whether it will turn him out of public life or what other punishment it will inflict. It may be that the House will be of opinion that some other punishment should be meted out, but it is up to the House to declare what punishment the minister deserves at its hands for an offence that he has been proven guilty of; nothing more, nothing less. So far as I am personally concerned, as I have stated over and over again, I have tried to conduct the case fairly against the Minister of Labour. But as to this, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) differs very materially with the chairman of the committee (Mr. Archambault) who this afternoon was so loud in his praise of the manner in which I had conducted the inquiry all the way through.

Mr. BUREAU: It is a question of appreciation.

Mr. PORTER: The member for Three Rivers differs from him entirely.

Mr. BUREAU: Absolutely.

Mr. PORTER: So they are not on the same basis there.

Mr. BUREAU: If my hon. friend will allow me—my reason for differing from the chairman of the committee is that my hon. friend's actions were so contrary to his words that they forced me to that conclusion.

Mr. PORTER: It is easy for you to make the statement, but you have absolutely no evidence to prove it.

Mr. BUREAU: The evidence is to be found in your argument and in your conduct of the case.

Mr. PORTER: I am willing to submit to the opinion of this House whether I have conducted the case fairly or not.

Now, the right hon. Prime Minister addressed this further question to me, and it is a very pertinent one: Why didn't you ask the hon. minister himself if he got his information from the cabinet or as a minister? Well, the chairman of the committee laboured this afternoon for half an hour to show by precedent, by rule and by law that he would not permit—and he did not—questions along that line at all. Over and over again he ruled as is shown in this evidence. What is the use of asking me why I did not put the question when I was not allowed to?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was not the question I asked my hon. friend.

Mr. PORTER: I so understood it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, my hon friend is mistaken. I quoted these words which will be found at page 138 of the report:

> It was not through any official communication that I withdrew the money.

Was the minister asked: Was it through any official communication that you withdrew the money?

Mr. PORTER: I would not be allowed to ask that question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why not?

Mr. PORTER: Because I could not ask a question at all in regard to any information coming from the cabinet, I was precluded by the ruling of the chairman. The only one who could give that evidence would be the minister himself, probably by a negative answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that his own colleague on the committee used this expression:

> That would not be disclosing anything that took place in council, if he were to say, "It was not through any official communication that I withdrew the money".

Mr. PORTER: That was what was endeavoured to be proved, and that is what was proven by the facts and the circumstances of the case. What was the use of proving he got the information somewhere else? Now, this hair-splitting about getting the information out of the cabinet or in the cabinet prompts me to put this question to the Prime Minister himself. The Prime Minister got information, so did the Minister of Railways so did the Acting Minister of Finance—they all got information as to the condition of the Home Bank. They all got it out of cabinet; two of them got it in the Chateau Laurier hotel, the other got it in his private residence, Would any one of them undertake to say that next morning, if he had $10,000 in the Home Bank, he would have drawn the money out to the detriment of the other depositors? Speak up and say so if you would. I should like to know.

Mr. FINN: That is not the evidence before the committee.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Order.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): The question is now on the main motion.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): Before the main motion is put, I desire to move an amendment, as follows:

That the second report of the select standing committee on Privileges and Elections be not concurred in, but be referred back to the said committee with instructions that they have power to reconsider the same and to strike out the words "not only" and "but entirely disproved" in the last line of the third paragraph thereof.

I wish very briefly to explain the difference this would make in the main motion, and to take a very few minutes to give my reasons for moving it. I can assure the House that at this hour I shall not impose upon them, but I feel it is necessary for me to make my position clear on the issue before us. The difference that would be made by the amendment, if adopted, would be this: That the charge submitted to the committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation, so far as it affects the honour of Mr. Murdock, would be simply found "not proved." The amendment would delete the words "not only" and "but entirely disproved."

It may be, Mr. Speaker, that my lack of experience in parliamentary life is responsible for the fact that I have taken this charge and this discussion very seriously.

Mr. MARTELL: Is not what the hon. member is endeavouring to do is to bring into this country the old Scottish verdict of "not proven?" That is about all that he is getting at.

[Mr. Porter.]

Mr. IRVINE: If the hon. member will just contain himself, if possible, I shall endeavour to explain exactly what I am getting at. When interrupted I was pointing out that I am taking this charge seriously, both in the interests of the hon. member against whom the charge has been made, and in the interests also of the honour and dignity of parliament, which it is alleged has somehow been impaired. I say I feel as a member of this House a great responsibility first when I think that perhaps by some vote of mine the honour and dignity of parliament may be impaired; and in the second place, I feel a great responsibility when I think that a vote of mine may possibly inflict an irreparable injustice upon an hon. member.

I have listened to the arguments of the prosecuting attorney, so to speak, and also to the arguments of those who have defended the hon. gentleman who has been charged. I have tried to have regard to the legal aspects involved in the honour and dignity of parliament, and I have been trying also to pay due attention to the human phase of the situation, and I have come to a certain conclusion. That conclusion may not be, strictly speaking, a legal conclusion, but I hope it will be regarded as possessing reasonable common sense, and that it will be as human as the situation will permit. The evidence required either to prove or disprove the charge that is made against the hon. Minister of Labour by the hon. member for West Hastings has been properly or improperly withheld. The evidence that would have made clear the situation to the House would hinge upon this question: Did the Minister of Labour use information received at a cabinet meeting in such a way as to lead to his own financial betterment and to the disadvantage of others? That is the question that in my mind leads us to the very crux of the charge. This question has not been answered. The only source from which the evidence implied in that question could have been received was from the cabinet itself, and it has been ruled that the members of the cabinet could not be questioned. That ruling, so far as I have heard has not been challenged. I am not claiming sufficient legal knowledge to say whether the members of the cabinet were improperly or properly not called, but I have to say this: Without the evidence which they might have given, if they had been called, it is impossible to decide either the honesty or the guilt of the Minister of Labour. That being so, in the absence of the only possible evidence that could enable us to come to an intelligent decision, the door has been left wide open for all kinds of suspicion. I feel that if I were to follow suspicion I would undoubtedly have voted for the amendment that was moved by the opposition, but not being inclined to follow suspicion what is there left for one to do? If I take the action itself it would seem to lend itself to the conclusion that there was indiscretion, weakness, or perhaps worse, on the part of the Minister of Labour. Certainly it would exhibit a type of action that is far below that which we hope from honourable and responsible public servants in Canada. If the drift of the suspicion be unfair to the minister then he must be content to suffer the disabilities that follow the privileges of secrecy, and the onus must be placed upon the cabinet itself to remove that suspicion from him. The secrecy which has been maintained and sustained with regard to the cabinet council may be advisable in some instances to a reasonable degree, but I maintain that such secrecy should not hold when the character of a member of the cabinet is at stake. The point is that there is not enough evidence to ensure an intelligent decision, and in the absence of evidence we are called upon to make a guess. But it will be argued, I suppose from a legal point of view, that if this is the opinion that I hold why not exculpate the hon. gentleman and vote for his exoneration? It may be contended that it is a practice, a well established axiom in law in this country that a man must be held to be innocent until he is proved guilty. I understand that is a generally accepted and wholly admirable rule in criminal cases. But I do want to suggest that I would be very willing to apply that same rule to this case if all the evidence that might have been given had been permitted. However, in this case I do not accept the parliamentary practice of old as a final thing, that when the character of an honourable gentleman is at stake, the cabinet could not reveal the secrets they were talking about in order to give him his liberty, or rather to clear him of the suspicion cast upon his character. I think that the evidence which the cabinet could have given had it not been considered contrary to parliamentary practice to permit their evidence would have been indispensable in arriving at a verdict and in the absence of that evidence I find myself unable to simply say the Minister of Labour must be absolutely exonerated since we cannot have sufficient evidence to prove him guilty. Now, the other side may say "But you are bound to find him guilty since he cannot be exonerated." To that I also reply briefly, that I cannot justify myself in drawing an inference from evidence that was not submitted. There is the situation as briefly as I can put it before hon. gentlemen. What about the fact then, someone will ask? Is it not so that the money was taken out? I know that this is made light of by the Prime Minister himself. It was also held as a very trivial matter by the hon. member who preceded the Prime Minister in debate. I cannot look upon the charge as being so trivial a thing as the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) endeavoured to make out. Even though I beg the question to the extent of saying that there is no imputed guilt to a minister who may use information which he receives in the cabinet council for his own advantage, still I am bound to say that the action of the minister in question was indiscreet and perhaps worse than indiscreet. It has been argued that he only took his own money. That is not true strictly speaking. The fact is that he put $4,000, or a little over, into this bank. Really he had only the right to withdraw one thousand of that since the bank could only pay 25 cents on the dollar. Only one thousand of that under the circumstances was his money. Here you may advance the human argument and say "Would not all of us have done the same thing?" I for one would not have done the same thing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. IRVINE: Wait until I explain what I mean by that. I am willing to admit that I, like the minister in question, would have taken the action that in my opinion looked to be best for myself. I believe that is what he did. I believe every hon. gentleman in this House in a similar position would have done the same thing. It has transpired, that the minister was very short-sighted, he took the course that was really the worst for himself. That is one reason why I hesitate to vote complete censure upon him; because if he had been politically wise he would not have taken that course. Whatever else he may be his action certainly proves the hon. Minister of Labour is not a good politician because if he had been a good politician he would have seen at a glance that in taking out his money he was placing himself in the position in which he now finds himself. Yes there is a human side to this question, and I want to give consideration to that very briefly. I know that the hon. member for West Hastings, who moved the amendment, did say that Mr. Murdock had forfeited all right to the sympathy either of the public or of this House. In regard to that I want to say that a man has got to go a long way before he forfeits his right to human sympathy.

I certainly do not agree with the view that, even if the charge had been proven to the hilt, the minister has placed himself beyond the pale of sympathy of hon. members of this House.

In closing I say that we are called upon in the lack of evidence to take a chance on the one hand of doing an injury to the honour and dignity of parliament of which we are all professedly so very jealous. On the other hand, we are called upon in the lack of evidence to take a chance of doing irreparable injury to one of our fellows. I therefore have moved an amendment which neither exonerates nor condemns. It takes the position of the old Scotch practice which permits a finding that the case is not proven. There is no other logical conclusion to which I can come. If it is argued or suggested that this position leaves a cloud of suspicion on the head of the minister, then I reply that the course is open for the minister if he be innocent and the cabinet concerned to take such action as will immediately dispel that cloud, and that action will be to give the evidence that is necessary to enable this House to come to an intelligent conclusion. That is briefly the reason for this amendment.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The amendment moved by the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) sets out definitely and finally the view of those whom I have the honour to lead in this House. We have voted in support of that amendment which represents our position. The amendment now moved does, I admit, reduce somewhat the absurdity, the enormity of the original motion, but still it does not represent what we feel should be the finding of the committee and of this House, and inasmuch as it does not, I purpose to vote against it, and certainly against the main motion as well.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The amendment proposed by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) clearly does not go as far as the committee has stated in their opinion we should go in this House, and so far as the government, and I imagine all members on this side of the House who wish to support the report of the committee are concerned, we will not be able to support the amendment of my hon. friend.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): I desire to say a few words in support of the amendment before the House. As I conceive it, the question before us resolves itself into two or three propositions. In the first place, we have to ask ourselves what the charge is, and in the second place, has it been proved; and in the third place if proved, what can we attach to it? I am not going to trouble the House with any definition as to what the charge is. I would much rather endeavour to see what its quality is and what its definition is. To my mind it is purely a partisan charge, and that puts the impartial onlooker in a difficult position. As far as I can see, it was introduced purely in a spirit of partisanship, and as far as I have been able to see, on the other hand, it has been defended purely in a spirit of partisanship, and that makes it very difficult for the impartial onlooker to make up his mind with regard to it.

I think that it is not the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) that is being tested at the present time. It is this system of running the business of this House, known as the two party system, whereby for nine or ten hours we have these partisan charges bandied to and fro across the House, while the business of the House at the end of the session is being neglected. That is the thing that is being tested before the country to-night.

There is a real human element in this discussion to-night, and that is the position of the Home Bank depositors. We have the spectacle of the two great parties in this country standing on a point of honour, and I believe the human element has been forgotten altogether. I was in the committee this morning when the Home Bank depositors appeared before us presenting their case. We begrudgingly, perhaps of necessity, gave them two or three hours to state their case. We had to hurry them up, in order that they might place their sad story before us. Since that time we have spent nine hours in discussing a question of honour and of dignity, and in discussing it we have shot the dignity of this House all to pieces.

Now has this charge been proven? Of course, it has not been proven. Has it been disproven? Of course it has not been disproven. We have been denied access to the very place where the evidence resided. How can we form an intelligent opinion on this question when we are not allowed to enter secrets of the cabinet where the evidence rests. I think that the government made a very serious mistake in not taking this House straightforwardly into their confidence. Taking the defenders of the Minister of Labour at their own estimate, they say this thing after all does not amount to anything. If it does not amount to anything, why not make an open breast of it? I do not think the country at large will understand the defenders of the Minister of Labour standing upon precedent. Who is Judge McKeown? He may be a dignified judge of great ability, but I do not think invoking Judge McKeown or any other precedent in order to shut out inquiry will commend itself to the people of this country. I think this House has a right to know what went on inside the cabinet that night.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is not a question of Judge McKeown's ruling or the chairman's ruling. The ministers could not give that information without violating their oath. Would the member advise us to do that?

Mr. BIRD: I do not see the point of my hon. friend's remarks.

Mr. GRAHAM: The members of the cabinet are sworn to secrecy as to what takes place in council.

Mr. BIRD: Notwithstanding its importance or unimportance.

Mr. GRAHAM: It makes no difference; that is their oath. Does my hon. friend advise that the members of the cabinet should have violated their solemn oath?

Mr. BIRD: If that is so, and if the cabinet is bound by an oath of that kind, I must withdraw my remarks, and I do so straightforwardly. I was speaking in my ignorance of the situation. But it is a very peculiar situation that forbids the cabinet to disclose its proceedings in a case of this kind.

Mr. VIEN: Did not my hon. friend take cognizance in the committee of the fact that the oath of office was read and was printed as part of the evidence?

Mr. PORTER: There is nothing in the oath to prevent a negative answer being given, as was pointed out this afternoon and not contradicted.

Mr. BIRD: I suppose that oath of secrecy is imposed in order to safeguard the interests of the nation, and I think the interests of the nation are involved in this very question. It seems to me a very far-fetched interpretation of the intention of that oath to deny the cabinet the opportunity of doing something which I think the public would have been glad to have justified them in doing. However I will leave that. I made an error in making that statement, and will pass on to other questions. If this charge were proven, what weight would be attached to it? Shall we look at this thing through the thick end of the telescope with our friends here, or through the thin end of the telescope with our friends over there? Here is a tendency to magnify the thing out of all proportion, and over there there is a tendency to belittle it. I think that on a question of this kind it is beside the point to inquire what any one of us would do under the circumstances. I will agree that none of us is so virtuous that he could stand up here,—unless it is my hon. friend from East Calgary, (Mr. Irvine)—and say just what he would have done or would not have done under the circumstances. I think perhaps I have done worse things in my past life than the Minister of Labour did on that occasion. But I have no desire to repeat those things. I do not admire them, and while what Mr. Murdock did is apparently satisfactory to some hon. gentlemen over there, if he had felt self-possessed enough not to have done it. I think I interpret the minds of hon. gentlemen correctly when I say that it would have been more satisfactory to them if he had not done it. There may be some kind of red-blooded virtue which says: Now that is just the kind of thing I would have done; I would have followed the human nature that is in me and have done that thing. But that is not the kind of talk that commends itself to the people of this country, because the people of this country—and we are proud of the fact—demand a high standard in our public men, and I hope that standard in our public men may remain, no matter what degree of virtue exists in us. We are not here as individuals. We are here to uphold a standard of public virtue. I am not disposed to overestimate this thing that Mr. Murdock has done. As I said, perhaps any one of us would have done it; very likely we would, but I think there is a medium course. We must look at this thing as it is. We must not underestimate it as I am sorry to have seen some of my hon. friends here to-night, nor overestimate it as some of my hon. friends to my right have done, and, I am afraid, with something of a partisan motive. Do not let us twist it out of its proper shape. I am not here to judge Mr. Murdock at all, but I think, perhaps, he made a mistake. I do not think the heinousness of it was so great as our friends to my right tried to make out. I think it is something that we as a House could have left to his constituents to judge upon if they thought fit. But to make this thing an issue on the floor of this House; to say that the dignity of the House is involved in it, and then to throw the dignity of the House aside and to make it a moment for partisan fray, I think is what every mind here to-night that is in possession of itself must decide against, and this is the only opportunity that I can see for such minds to decide. Personally, I am going to vote for the amendment.

Mr. T. H. McCONICA (Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I thought that this was a Progressive day in parliament; that the two old parties would tear, rend and devour each other; that we would be left alone in our glory, and that it would be really a pleasant occasion. But it seems now that there is a Progressive angle to this complication. We have heard the discussion of the testimony as to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). After listening to it for a day, we have decided that he is not guilty. That is, we have decided by a very large majority of this parliament that he stands before us to-day innocent of the charge that has been laid against him.

There is this angle to the testimony that was introduced before this committee. Mr. Murdock testified that on the 9th day of August that he got certain information from the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Gordon). The Deputy Speaker testified that he gave him certain information. Mr. Murdock testified that at the time he drew out this money he had no further information on the subject. It is now proposed to say that the charge was not disproved. If the charge is not disproved, Mr. Murdock is a perjurer; he has sworn falsely to that point. Are we, who, a few minutes ago, voted that he was innocent; that he was an honest man, to vote now that his testimony as to that point was false? I do not think such a course is consistent, and I believe this amendment that the charge is not disproven should be voted down. If Mr. Murdock is an innocent man—and we have so voted—then his testimony upon that point is entitled to credit and we should give him a clean bill of health. For that reason I shall vote against the amendment.

On motion of Mr. MACKENZIE KING the House adjourned at 3.30 a.m. (Thursday).

Thursday, June 26, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo) presented the second report of the select standing committee on National Railways and Shipping recommending that it be granted leave to sit while the House is in session.

On motion of Mr. Euler the report was concurred in.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

Mr. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce) presented the second report of the special committee appointed to consider Bill No. 122, to provide for the superannuation of civil servants, as follows:

Your committee having carefully considered the bill report the same with amendments.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac) presented the seventh report of the select standing committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph lines as follows:

Your committee having considered Bill No. 145 (E3 of the Senate), have agreed to report the same with an amendment.

Your committee have also considered Bill No. 11 to amend the Railway Act, 1919, and have agreed to recommend that the bill be not proceeded with at the present time as in their opinion it is not in the public interest to do so.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi): I move, that the first report of the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization be concurred in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before this report is concurred in we should be told what it recommends.

Mr. KAY: The report was presented on Friday last. It recommends the printing of certain evidence taken before the committee on the subject of wheat rust and potato diseases.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. KAY: I move that the second report of the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization be concurred in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend kindly tell us what the nature of this report is?

Mr. KAY: The report recommends to the government that an appropriation of $50,000 be granted for scientific research into the subject of wheat rust.

Motion agreed to.

SOVIET AND UKRAINIAN REPUBLIC

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the Table a copy of the correspondence regarding the recognition of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

HOME BANK DEPOSITORS

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): I beg to present a petition from 175 depositors of the Home Bank in my riding praying to be indemnified for their losses.

Bill No. 209 (from the Senate), for the relief of Patience Oldfield.—Mr. Duff.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PRINCE RUPERT LOTS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Having reference to question No. 18, answered May 7, referring to the sale of lots in Prince Rupert, owned by the National Railways, did the National Railways sell a large block of lots numbering upwards of one thousand about a year ago; if so, how many?

[Mr. Kay.]

2. Was the price at which these lots were sold $7 per lot; if not, what was the price?

3. Were the said lots sold to a man named J. F. Duthie directly or indirectly; if not, to whom?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: The above questions were brought to the attention of Mr. Gerard Ruel, Vice-President and General Counsel, Canadian National Railways, at the meeting of the select standing committee on National Railways and Shipping on Tuesday, June 24, when Mr. Ruel made the following explanation of the transfer by the Grand Trunk Pacific Development Company of the property in question:

The property in Prince Rupert was assessed at a very large assessment. We appealed against the assessment for a number of years with the intention of getting it reduced, but were unsuccessful. We did not consider the property of much greater value —rather a lesser value than the actual taxation— less than the assessment against it. We tried to give that property to the city, to have them take the property in discharge of the taxes. They said no, they would not do that; the taxes were assessed against the company, and we had no remedy, no redress. We said "Will you take the property and sell it to anybody to discharge the taxes?", and they said, "No, you have to pay the taxes." We, therefore, paid all the taxes, and then transferred the property to Duthie. If the city wants to get that property to-morrow, we will give it to them, we will get it back and hand it over to them, but we do not want to pay taxes on property that should not be assessed.

Mr. Ruel proceeded to explain to the committee that a conference of provincial treasurers was being arranged in order that a uniform basis of taxation of Canadian National Railways property rights might, if possible, be reached. At that conference the question of municipal taxation would also be considered.

A. P. FORSTER

Mr. HARRIS:

1. Why were the services of A. P. Forster of Welland, government inspector on section 5 and sections 8 and 9 since 1915, on the Welland canal, dispensed with?

2. Who has been placed in charge of the inspection service in place of Mr. Forster?

3. Is Mr. Forster's suspension permanent or temporary?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. A. P. Forster was Inspector of Dredging, section 5, Welland Ship canal. His services were no longer required as dredging operations had ceased.

2. No appointment made.

3. Permanent.

BRIBE-TAKERS AND PERJURERS

Mr. DUNCAN:

1. Is the government aware that representations have been made to the Attorney General of Quebec in protest against bribe-takers and perjurers appearing before the Montreal courts as King's Counsel, and that the bar of Montreal and certain judges there, federally appointed, have also received a similar protest?

2. Has the government received any protests of like nature? If so, when?

3. Has any action been taken?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. No.

2. A printed letter from Brenton A. MacNab was received on June 9, 1924.

3. No.

COLONEL REID HYDE

Mr. DOUCET:

1. What position does Reid Hyde hold in the High Commissioner's office in London?

2. What is his salary and what allowances does he receive?

3. Was he appointed by or with the concurrence of the Civil Service Commission?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Col. Reid Hyde does not hold a position in the High Commissioner's office, but is retained by the Canadian government in the capacity of an auditor or counsellor from time to time.

2. He is not paid a salary, but receives a retaining fee of $100 and an allowance for his services when engaged on work by the High Commissioner's office at the per diem rate recognized by the Accountant's Association of England, viz., £7 per day.

3. The nature of the services rendered from time to time by Col. Reid Hyde are not such as to bring him within the class of employees appointed by concurrence of the Civil Service Commission.

INDIAN RESERVES—TIMBER DUES

Mr. SIMPSON:

What timber, and of what kind and quantity, has been cut since the year 1915, for which dues have been paid, on the Indian Reserves on Christian, Hope and Beckwith islands in the Georgian bay, and what dues have been paid annually therefor since the year 1915?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROPOSED LEGISLATION ON THE TRANSFERABLE OR ALTERNATIVE VOTE

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): An item appeared in the press the other day to the effect that the government had decided to drop the proposed legislation in regard to the transferable or alternative vote. In view of the fact that hon. members in this part of the House are anxious that this legislation be passed at this session, has the government any assurance to give to the House that this measure will be carried through, or that a bill will be introduced this session?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Any intimation that the government has decided that this measure will not be proceeded with is wholly inaccurate. The government has been considering how best to arrange matters in order to conclude the session. As my hon. friend knows, the whips have been discussing with each other the question of the remaining programme for the session, and this particular piece of legislation has been considered in connection therewith, but no decision has been reached with respect to not proceeding with the legislation already introduced.

ROYAL GRAIN INQUIRY COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Victoria): Has the government received any interim report from the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission, and if so, when will the said report be available for a member of the House.

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I expect the report will be in our hands in the next few days, and will be tabled early next week. I have had a communication to that effect.

INTER-ALLIED CONFERENCE

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Could the Prime Minister give us any further information with respect to the Inter-Allied Conference to be held in London in July. Has the attention of the government been drawn to the following statement in the Ottawa Citizen of to-day?

> United States Ambassador Kellogg at London was instructed to-day to attend the forthcoming premiers' conference to discuss execution of the Dawes plan.
> His appointment was announced in a White House statement which said that Mr. Kellogg would attend the conference "for the purpose of dealing with such matters as affect the interests of the United States and otherwise for purposes of information."
> This action was determined upon after the state department had been advised by the ambassador that an invitation for the United States to participate had been handed the United States embassy in London. The White House statement declared that it was "the desire of the administration that the Dawes plan should be put into effect as speedily as possible."

Can the Prime Minister tell me if Canada has been invited to participate and is going to be represented, and if a day will be given us to discuss this matter in the House?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I imagine the article my hon. friend has read is a despatch from Washington which appears in this morning's paper.

Mr. SPENCER: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have seen the despatch, but the attention of the government had not been officially directed to it. Yesterday I received from the Secretary of State for the Colonies a communication directing my attention to, or rather intimating that I would probably have seen in the press despatches the remarks of the Prime Minister in the British House of Commons on the subject of the Inter-Allied Conference. The communication stated that the Prime Minister was absent from London at that time, but that on his return to London a further communication would be sent to the government of Canada in reference to the matter. As I was coming into the House this afternoon I received from the Secretary of State for the Colonies a despatch to the effect that the Secretary of State hoped to telegraph again before the end of the week as to the Inter-Allied conference. Up to the present time however, the government has not received any official communication to the effect that a conference has been called, or as to the parties who are being invited to it, and until we are invited, I am afraid I cannot say to my hon. friend whether we will be represented or not.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): That communication is signed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. Has the Prime Minister ever drawn the attention of the British government to the need of a more appropriate term than "colonies" for those who make up the associated dominions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have never drawn attention to that particular title. It is an old historical title. Perhaps some day it will come up for discussion in this House, but I have not thought of making any intimation on the subject.

STRIKE OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

MOTION TO ADJOURN TO DISCUSS A MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

On the Orders of the Day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I beg to make the motion which I have placed in your Honour's hands.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have received from the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) the following statement:

> I ask leave to move an adjournment of the House under rule 39, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely that the arrangements made by the post office authorities for the handling of His Majesty's mails are wholly inadequate and do not provide for the proper and sufficient delivery of mail matter.

Rule 39 paragraph (1) reads:

> A motion to adjourn (except when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance), shall always be in order, but no second motion to the same effect shall be made until after some intermediate proceeding has been had.

Paragraph (c) of section (7) of the same rule states:

> The motion must not revive discussion on a matter which has been discussed in the same session.

It is true that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) on the 17th June asked for leave to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the application or request of the postal employees. On reading that motion of the 17th June, one will see at once that it had reference to a strike to be, not a strike in existence. Since then the strike has taken place, and if I understand aright the purpose of the present motion, it is to discuss the arrangements consequent upon the strike. I call the attention of the House to section (4) of rule 39. Referring to the member who makes the motion it says:

He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the House. If objection is taken, the Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places and if more than twenty members rise accordingly, the Speaker calls upon the member who has asked for leave.

Personally, I have some doubts as to the raison d'être of the present motion; but comparing the two motions, that of the 17th June and the present one, I see that the motion of the 17th June has reference, as I have stated, to a strike about to take place, while the present motion refers to the postal arrangements taken after the strike has occurred. Certainly it is a matter which is of grave importance but I have strong doubts as to its urgency, and for that reason I will ask the members who support the motion to rise in their places in order that I may see if the hon. gentleman shall have leave from the House to proceed with his motion.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I rise to object to this proceeding. It seems to me that all the information that the House really desires to have on this matter can be obtained by a question on the part of my hon. friend and answer on the part of the government. We have set apart to-day to continue the debate on the church union bill, and I think it is the general wish of the House that we should carry out that intention. Apart altogether from the wording of the motion in its reference to the strike, I submit that the position in which the postal service is at the present moment is not one to be characterized as constituting a question of "urgent public importance" sufficient or such as to cause this House to change or delay the order of business for to-day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my right hon. friend were at all familiar with the situation that actually exists, he would never say that this matter is not one of grave public import. I have never yet heard any one take the position that the carrying on of an important section of the business of the Crown and its cessation, or partial cessation, is not a matter of grave public import. I do not think there is the slightest doubt that the motion is in order. The position on the 17th of June was entirely different from the—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Now that the objection has been taken, no discussion can be had on this motion for adjournment. The only question to decide presently is whether there are twenty members supporting the stand taken by the hon. member for West York. If there are twenty members, he is entitled to proceed with the motion.

Mr. GAUVREAU: What about those who are against it, if we have the majority?

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to be perfectly clear. I desire hon. members to understand that I am not at liberty to refuse the motion even if I have a doubt—and I have expressed my doubt—when twenty members express a desire that the debate should go on.

The Clerk Assistant having stated that more than twenty members had risen:

Mr. GAUVREAU: I rise to a point of order. I want to know if according to your decision twenty members shall rule this House; and if there is any point of order, I am ready to stand by it. I say that we should consult the will of the House and have the majority one way or the other.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is very clear. There is no point of order in the point taken by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau). Subsection (4) of rule 39 reads:

He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the House. If objection is taken...

And objection was taken.

...the Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places and if more than twenty members rise accordingly, the Speaker calls upon the member who has asked for leave.

Mr. VIEN: I rise to a point of order. The motion presented by the hon. member for West York covers the same subject as that which was raised the other day when the adjournment of the House was moved. I should like to have a ruling on that point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I gave my ruling at the beginning, that, in my judgment, the first motion moved on the 17th June by the hon.

member for North Toronto had reference to a strike to take place, whilst the present motion of the hon. member for West York is really quite distinct, it having reference to the postal arrangements made consequent upon the strike. Therefore, the question is not the same. I said, however, that I had my doubts as to the raison d'etre of the motion. But I have no liberty; I am obliged to follow subsection (4) of rule 39, that, if twenty members rise in support of the motion, the House must listen to the hon. member who moved the motion.

Mr. VIEN: Can we not appeal from your decision on the point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: Certainly, you can appeal from my decision.

Mr. CARROLL: Did I understand the Prime Minister to raise the point of order whether the motion was or was not a question of grave public importance at the time?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a question for the House to decide.

Mr. CARROLL: Is that not a question of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: No.

Mr. CARROLL: I understood that you ruled out discussion on that question of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule says that when objection is taken, the Speaker calls on those members who support the motion to rise, and if more than twenty members rise, the debate goes on. But you can always appeal from my decision and I would not be in the least offended by the vote given.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to speak to the point of order. Before doing so, I should like the House to be informed that we on this side have no desire at all to withhold or to defer the debate on church union. A very brief time will suffice for our purpose. On the point of order: It is true that Your Honour has the ruling in the first place as to whether the motion is one that can be described as relating to a matter of urgent public importance. Your Honour has decided in favour of the mover. Then we proceed, and objection is taken. Thereupon twenty members rise to overcome the objection. That proceeding having taken place, it is too late now for any hon. member to appeal against Your Honour's ruling on the point decided some little time ago. The only time the appeal can be taken is immediately after the decision is given.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. BELAND: Does the leader of the opposition say that His Honour the Speaker held that this was a matter of such urgent public importance as to justify a motion for the adjournment of the House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: His Honour so decided.

Mr. BELAND: I did not understand him to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The question before the Speaker in the first instance was as to whether or not in his view the matter was of such a nature as to come within the category of "questions of urgent public importance." His Honour having given his decision in favour of the mover, objection is taken, whereupon twenty members overcome that objection. At that point it is too late to appeal from the decision of the Chair as to whether the motion is in order or not.

Mr. G. N. GORDON (West Peterborough): May I be allowed to direct the attention of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) to section 5 of rule 39:

> If less than twenty, but not less than five, members rise in their places, the question whether the member has leave to move the adjournment of the House shall be put forthwith, without debate, and determined, if necessary, by a division.

The next preceding section provides that the member who wishes to make the motion must hand a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order, reads it and asks whether the member shall have leave of the House to discuss it. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) failed to hand such a written statement to Your Honour and therefore has not complied with the rules governing this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for West York has perhaps transgressed the letter but not the spirit of the rules. I must inform the House that the hon. member handed me the necessary statement before three o'clock, as soon as I reached the House.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Handed it personally?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: In view of what the leader of the opposition has said I will withdraw my request to appeal from the decision of the Chair. We shall see, however, whether hon. gentlemen opposite will keep to their word and be brief.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I regret with every hon. member of the House that it is necessary to make this motion at the present time; I am sure that this necessity must be a matter of regret to hon. gentlemen in every section of the House. However, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I shall not detain the House very long. In view of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has stated, I want to point out that we have already tried in every way possible to have the solution of the present difficulty hastened. We have asked questions and have received no answers; we have done all that we can possibly do, but without avail. There is an appropriate way in which this question can be brought up, and that is in the consideration of the estimates of the department. We have not had that opportunity. In connection with those estimates my right hon. friend the other day said that the Postmaster General, was still away, ill. That is true; but it is also true that we have an intolerable situation in this country just now. We have mail which is accumulating in vast quantities; we have a situation in which it is impossible for business men to carry on their affairs; we have a situation in which families are utterly unable to correspond one with the other. In Toronto we have a situation in which business is being retarded through a practically complete cessation of the postal service. It is true that there are a few letter carriers in service at the present time; there are a few in the business section of the city. But as far as the city generally is concerned it is not getting postal accommodation. Now this is a matter of very grave moment to the city of Toronto and to every one there who has anything to do with business. And the situation is not improving; my information to-day is that the mails are not moving. Speaking for myself, I may remark that I am unable to get my Toronto mail; I have been writing to members of my family in that city and have received no replies, and over the long distance telephone I learned that they have not been getting my letters, either. It is idle to say that the business of the country is being carried on as usual; it is not. This is a matter which this government ought to look into at the first possible opportunity; for after all it is only this government that can deal with it. I say therefore that it is the absolute and the immediate duty of the government to take steps to provide some remedy for the present state of things.

Let me point out to the Prime Minister that this strike, which undoubtedly we all deplore and which it is true we feel was very unnecessary, was after all not a "Red" strike; there are some first-rate men among the postal employees who have gone out. I admit that these men made a mistake; they were misguided in going out. But cannot something be done to-day to bring them back? If my right hon. friend took a trip to Toronto and visited the post office in West Toronto he would see there for himself an utterly impossible situation, where people are unable to get their mail. I am sure that the Prime Minister if he saw things in that city with his own eyes would be convinced that the present intolerable condition of things demands an immediate solution. I am not exaggerating the gravity of the situation for a moment when I say that, and I want to appeal to the government to take action without further delay. I am not going to delay the House any longer; I simply want to urge upon the Prime Minister and his colleagues the existence of an urgent responsibility which it is incumbent upon them to discharge immediately.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil) (Acting Postmaster General): I think in fairness to the House I should make some comprehensive statement with respect to this matter. On June 18 and on previous days we noticed from press despatches that a strike vote was being taken throughout Canada, on the part of all postal workers in the country, against the adjustment of the Civil Service Commission's scale of salaries. I am not going to go at length into the details of the matter because I do not want to detain the House, but I want to state the main facts. On June 18 I was in consulation with the executive of the Postal Workers of Canada in this city and discussed very fully with them their difficulties, and their chief complaint was that the minimum wage as provided for under that schedule was not adequate and that the scale of wages did not run high enough. I want hon. gentlemen to remember that the scale demanded by the postal workers was very much higher than that granted by the Civil Service Commission. The executive of the postal workers made no intimation on that occasion that they would be willing to accept any lower scale. In fact I told them, and I think they agreed, that it was useless at that moment to discuss wages.

We did discuss some of the difficulties that they complained of most bitterly, the principal one being that a portion of the bonus which they had been in receipt of since April 1 would have to be refunded on the lower grade salaries if the scale set by the Civil Service Commission was to prevail. We agreed that no man should suffer by that reduction, but that we would immediately put into effect an order in council to provide that the bonus adjusted in 1924-25 would be continued until final adjustment of the whole matter, that is, at the point where the Civil Service Commission would have completed their duties and filed a new scale for the entire Civil Service. Not only that, but, as I mentioned in the House some days ago, the executive of the postal workers objected very strenuously because they did not have an opportunity to discuss all their difficulties with the Civil Service Commission in an intimate way—and I want to emphasize that expression,—in an intimate way. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I had some sympathy with that contention. They also asked that the law be amended so that their particular case would be taken out of the hands of the Civil Service Commission. I pointed out that there was no necessity for any amendment of the Civil Service Act, that, as has been stated so often in this House, it already provides a course for dealing with matters of this kind, in that although the Civil Service Commission has jurisdiction over the adjustment of salaries and conditions generally in the service, yet the government of the day must either approve any action taken by the commission, or refer the matter to parliament for final consideration. I told the men that the government were prepared to appoint a committee as soon as the final adjustment was made, and that committee would sit around a table with them and discuss all their grievances, and that if the report by that committee to the government was to the effect that an adjustment was needed, the government would take the responsibility of recommending to parliament such adjustment. Those were the two things outlined in a letter which was handed to the executive of the postal workers when they returned to Toronto.

In the midst of the discussions the Toronto workers went on strike. Perhaps it is only fair to say that before the executive came here they had already issued a strike order to go into effect at five o'clock the following day. They did endeavour to get a twenty-four hours' stay, and, generally speaking, that request was heeded by the service, except in the case of Toronto and Windsor and a few other towns throughout Ontario. There never was any strike in western Canada, or any cessation of work, and there was very little cessation of work in eastern Canada with the single exception of the city of Montreal.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the history of the case up to date. I want again to say what I said in the House on a former occasion, that in my opinion the Civil Service Commission is the proper body to deal with matters of this kind. Until their investigation is completed, I am not prepared to say definitely whether or not there are inequalities in the case of the postal workers which should be adjusted.

I will deal now with the strike itself. In the city of Toronto practically every man in the service, 1,600, walked out at 5 o'clock Wednesday evening, June 18. In the city of Montreal less than half the staff went out, scarcely 600 all told. The difference between Toronto and Montreal to-day is that in Montreal we have the nucleus of a trained staff to carry on business so that recruits can be taught much more quickly; but of course there is no such nucleus yet available in Toronto. As to Montreal, to-day mail is moving almost up to normal. Undoubtedly there will be difficulties for some time with a new staff hastily recruited and put to work under conditions such as prevail during a strike.

But in Toronto the situation is entirely different. The day after the strike took place we recruited 600 new men. There is no trouble in securing men for this work; there are more men offering themselves than we are able to take on, except in Windsor only, where there is apparently a disposition on the part of the citizens to back up the strikers in their attitude that their demands must be met before they return to work. I will deal with the Windsor situation in a moment or two because I think most hon. members will agree that I am not of a fighting disposition. In the city of Toronto up to the present moment, so far as I am aware, there has never been an offer from the leaders of the strikers to return to work; they insist that first of all their demands shall be met. They have insisted upon this from the start, and if the government must surrender to strikers, then those demands must be met. True, yesterday and to-day there is evidence that the strikers are not going to be so insistent.

With respect to moving the mail—and that is what my hon. friend dwells upon most—the government and the officials of the department have done everything in their power to move mail in the city of Toronto. What my hon. friend says is correct, there is a large amount of mail still undelivered, but we are sorting mail in this city in order to relieve congestion in Toronto, and we are delivering that to the large business and apartment houses in the centre of the city in bags for distribution by some individual in each building, and that distribution is going on throughout the central area of the city. It is true that in the outlying portions of the city we have not been able to reach business houses and manufacturers. But in the person of Mr. Lemon, the postmaster of Toronto, we have an excellent civil servant, a man who thoroughly understands his business, a man in whose hands we have placed the responsibility for the reorganization of this service, and a man who has shown that he is resourceful in meeting the tremendous odds and difficulties which handicap him at this time. These difficulties are indicated in a letter lying on my desk which I received a moment or two ago. It contains a report from substation E. It is pointed out that in that office there is a disposition on the part of the men who stayed on duty to delay delivery —which is what my hon. friend is complaining about—to hold up the public in line in order that they may be inconvenienced as much as possible in receiving their mail, although that mail is sorted and ready to be passed out through the wicket. I think the public ought to know this. I have no complaint to make about the police, I think they are rendering every assistance, but there are difficulties in places, and when you have a thousand strikers organized for the purpose of preventing delivery of mail, it is only natural to expect that they will do their best to create as much public inconvenience as possible.

As I say, no one wants trouble, and I am anxious to avoid it as much as possible. I hope that we shall soon be able to give a better service than we have so far been able to give. The key men, those who are the most valuable to the service, are the sorters in such large offices as that of Toronto. Every one of those men walked out, and it will take at least three or four raw recruits to do the work of one sorter who is trained in his business. It takes days to teach a man to do that work thoroughly. The trained sorter knows every street in the city; he can stand with a bundle of mail and sort it into the various bags for the different streets for delivery by the carriers, and he can do it much quicker than the man who does not know the city, who is not familiar with the streets, and who must proceed slowly in order to make a careful distribution of the mail. We are overcoming that difficulty as fast as we can. I am informed that Postmaster Lemon is recruiting a good staff, that he has obtained the services of men of intelligence and reasonable ability. I have no quarrel with the old staff; it was a splendid staff and very well organized. But they decided that they were going to take the law into their own hands and to proceed against the constituted authority of Canada, and by that decision they will have to abide. But it is my intention to give service and to give it as rapidly as possible. There will be inconvenience for some little time, but we now have almost 1,200 men recruited in Toronto. My hon. friend says there are men on delivery to-day. I question the advisability of starting a delivery before we have thoroughly organized the inside services; perhaps a delay of a day or two longer might have been advisable. But in his desire to restore the service as quickly as possible Postmaster Lemon has placed men out on delivery to-day, and I am willing to back him to the fullest extent in restoring the service in Toronto.

With reference to the strikers themselves, lest it be inferred that I have taken a position of intolerance with regard to them I may say that I was visited yesterday by the mayor of Toronto and I gave him a copy of the letter forwarded to the strikers. I do not believe those men were advised of the full purport of the letter given to the executive; I do not believe it was fully explained to them. I thought it advisable to give a copy of the letter to the mayor. Three other gentlemen were here who represented themselves as members of a Liberal club—Mr. Ross, Mr. Collins and Mr. Maguire. I gave those gentlemen copies of the letter, because they said they were in constant touch with the strikers and thought they could bring about a return to service of some of them. I noticed in the press this morning some statements that would indicate that again these men may not have been getting proper information, and again I hastened to get into communication with Postmaster Lemon and to tell him that my offer as made in the letter stood, and nothing else. We welcome everybody who will assist in a difficult situation like this, but I do not want it to be inferred that influence is being brought to bear in the matter by any section or any political party. Postmaster Lemon is in complete charge; he will remain in charge and will carry out the instructions contained in the letter which I delivered to the secretary of the strike committee when they left this city on Wednesday evening, June 18.

Mr. HARRIS: Will the minister read the letter?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It was published in all the newspapers, but I will read it presently. This situation is a very serious one. For my part I do not think any government can countenance an organized strike among their workers. My letter is to the men on duty. I put no bar in the way of any man returning, but I will not treat with a man until he goes back on duty. I take that stand because I firmly believe that no government can afford to give way to a group of persons who undertake to dictate to them in a matter of this kind.

Mr. McQUARRIE: If the minister will permit a question, will he state the government's reasons for declining to agree to an arbitration board?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. My letter makes reference to all that is involved in that connection, which was a conference with the strikers. What I want to make clear is that men who go off duty, who leave the employment of the government as civil servants, breaking the oath that they took as servants of the Crown, cannot be dealt with until they return to duty.

4 p.m.

Now, let me first read a letter sent by the strikers to the Prime Minister—and I may say in this connection that the executive of the postal workers did not get into communication with the government from the day on which they received the schedule from the government until they wrote the letter, when they arrived in Ottawa on June 18th, that I am about to read. Here is the letter:

Dear Sir:

Acting on the wishes of the membership of the organizations concerned, as expressed in a Dominion-wide ballot, a general strike in the postal service has been called to commence at five o'clock this afternoon.

It is regretted that the late hour at which this decision was arrived last night, and the necessity for haste in entraining for Ottawa in response to a call from the government, made it impossible to convey this information to you sooner.

The necessity for the action taken is deplored by all our officers and members who trust that immediate favourable consideration by the government may yet enable us to assist in averting the move called for by the postal employees.

To that the following letter was given to Mr. J. E. Archer in reply, at about 3.10 in the afternoon. We had spent considerable time in consultation with the committee. I quote:

Mr. J. E. ARCHER,
Secretary, Canadian Federation of Postal Employees,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir,

This acknowledges receipt of a copy of your letter of even date addressed to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister advising him that:

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

"Acting on the wishes of the membership of the organizations concerned, as expressed in a Dominion-wide ballot, a general strike in the postal service has been called to commence at five o'clock this afternoon."

After discussion of this matter with the government, I am authorized to state that we regret the decision arrived at by your committee, and it is a matter of additional regret that your committee have not prior to this date officially indicated to the government your dissatisfaction with the recent salary revision for postal workers as authorized by the Civil Service Commission and the government.

Since the receipt of your letter of even date, a sub-committee of the cabinet has had the opportunity of discussing these matters at some length with your committee and have heard the views of your committee that further consideration should be given to the claims of the postal employees by the government.

In connection with this matter the Prime Minister in parliament yesterday stated as follows:

"We are prepared, when the Civil Service Commission has submitted its report upon the salaries of the entire civil service, to consider that report carefully in the light of all the material which we have before us and to make to parliament, if we think it advisable so to do, recommendations supplementing those which are contained in the report of the Civil Service Commission. But we do not feel that we are in a position to make any recommendations to parliament at the present time with respect to the postal employees; and I hope that the employees of the Post Office department will see that the position which the government is taking is one which is in the interests of the entire civil service of the country and in the interests of the taxpayers as well."

We also in discussion of this date learned of the dissatisfaction of the postal employees due to the fact that in certain cases the present salary plus 1924 bonus was higher than certain rates proposed by the Civil Service Commission for the same class of employees; and I am authorized to state that in the case of employees whose revised rates, as determined by the Civil Service Commission are less than the former rate plus 1924-25 bonus, such bonus shall be continued until salary revision for the entire service has been consummated.

I am further authorized to say that in carrying out the plan and action proposed by the Prime Minister in the above quoted paragraph that the government policy is that when the Civil Service Commission has submitted its report upon the salaries for the entire civil service, that opportunity will be given to the representatives of the employees in the postal department, or in other departments of the government who have objections to file against salary revision proposed by the commission to fully present their views to a sub-committee of the government, and to discuss such matters of differences as fully as may be necessary to ensure a thorough understanding, and it is hoped, a final and satisfactory agreement on the points in dispute.

I trust that your committee will at once take the necessary action to see that continuous operation of the postal service is maintained.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister answer this question? Embodied in his letter is there a notification that the government is prepared to restore last year's wage and bonus schedule?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, it is the bonus of this year that is mentioned here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does that mean the bonus of this year in addition to what is recommended in the Civil Service Commission's report on salaries?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, only to the extent to which the salary in the lower grades may be below the salary plus this year's bonus. Does my right hon. friend follow me? There were cases amongst the lower-paid employees, those with salaries about $1,200, or under in which the revision cuts the salary below what the postal employee was receiving under this year's vote, to some extent at least. What we agreed to do was to maintain that bonus to the extent that has been approved by the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was the letter sent out before notification of the strike was received?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It developed in the discussion that day that that was what had happened, and it was one of the serious complaints made by the executive. In order to overcome that we arranged to do what is proposed here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To do it though after the notification of strike?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, or rather I should say this. The first official intimation we had of dissatisfaction from the executive of the employees was received about twelve o'clock that day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Wednesday?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, in a letter, stating—

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was the day before.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):—that notice of a strike had been issued the night before. That is the point I was trying to make clear.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Will the minister explain the statement which appeared in the Toronto press this morning?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That relates to a letter a copy of which I gave to Major Hiltz, to Mr. Maguire, to Mr. Collins and to Mr. Ross. I gave them this letter because each one of these gentlemen informed me that as citizens of Toronto they had been endeavouring to induce the men to go back to duty and are very keen to have them do so. I want to make it perfectly clear that personally I have put no barrier of any kind in the way of the men returning to work. The only condition is that if these men's places are filled we cannot overlook that circumstance; but they will have to go back to duty without any promise on my part. I want to make it abundantly clear that that letter was written on the understanding that the men whom it affected were the men in the service, and that understanding will be carried out to the fullest extent. That letter was not intended for strikers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At the time it was written all were in the service.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, all were in the service when the letter was written, that is what I want to make clear. I also want to point out that the worst situation is in Toronto. There is, however, a serious situation in Windsor and the Border cities, and the mayor of Windsor is here waiting to discuss the matter with me now. In all fairness I must say that I have no two positions to occupy; I can only occupy one. It is that the men shall return to duty. As hon. gentlemen who have had to deal with matters of this kind know there is always a great deal of discussion about what shall be done but ever since this trouble arose I have invariably said to the men "Go back to your duty unconditionally." They have done so in Hamilton, and in Montreal, forty-five of them have returned in Toronto, and they are returning to duty elsewhere. They have done so in Brantford, Kitchener, Belleville and Peterborough. I cannot say anything different to the striking workers in the city of Toronto from what I have said to the men who have returned to duty elsewhere. In conclusion let me assure the House that every effort that is humanly possible will be put forth to give a delivery of mail in the city of Toronto. I regret, as every other citizen of Canada regrets, any inconvenience which has been caused, but at the earliest possible date service will be restored.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (East York): I want to assure hon. gentlemen to my left and hon. gentlemen opposite that I shall not occupy very much time in discussing this question. When some resolution on an academic subject is proposed from either of those quarters there seems to be ample time for discussion, but that is not the case apparently when a matter of vital importance to the city of Toronto, one of the largest industrial centres in the country, a matter which threatens to paralyze business operations there, calls for consideration. At this time some of these hon. gentlemen arise in their dignity and frown upon discussion of this vital question. We should have a thorough discussion of a matter which so seriously affects the industrial life of the country. The Acting Postmaster General says that in this case he does not want a fight. The Prime Minister had a letter written to him on June 18, but where was he at that time? Was he here to receive that letter? I question whether he was or not. If he had been a big man—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HARRIS: —if he had been equal to the occasion he would have stayed in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman asks where I was on June 18? I was fulfilling an engagement that I had made three months before.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must be aware of the well known rule that he must confine himself to the subject matter of discussion. The question here has reference to the arrangements made by the post office authorities, and the hon. gentleman cannot go beyond that, otherwise I shall be obliged to call him to order.

Mr. HARRIS: Mr. Speaker, I bow to your decision. We will come right to the point, then. I will give the House an illustration. At 9 o'clock last night I went to the telephone desiring to telephone to Toronto. Do you think I could get through to Toronto? Not until twenty-five minutes to twelve last night could I get Toronto, because all the lines were busy. Doing what? They were carrying the communications necessary to hold together the business of the parties engaged. And why? Because in this country we have a postal strike. The telephone lines and the telegraph lines to Toronto are all tied up, because the business houses are trying to do their business by telephone and telegraph. I left Toronto on Monday night, and what did I see in front of the magnificent monument called the Union station? I saw a line of people four abreast stretching from Bay street to York street. What were they doing? Standing in line waiting for this government to have a little more action, to do something to give industries of the city of Toronto their mail. The minister admitted some three or four minutes ago that in this case it took four or five raw recruits to do the work of one man. He stated that he had about 1,200 in the service, and that it took about 1,500 men to do the work. What will happen in the course of seven or eight days? Multiply the four by the number of days and by the number of men, and what have you got? You have an aggregate of mail and material held up that is something appalling. It must appeal to the common intelligence of any man in this House when I say that this condition paralyzes the whole industrial fabric of that city, and as the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) would say when you paralyze Toronto you paralyze the whole of the province of Ontario.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. HARRIS: Do I hear some hon. members say no? I have great deference for my hon. friends from Quebec. I grant that Montreal is a very beautiful city. But as far as postal service is concerned hon. gentlemen will remember what I stated about a year ago, namely that the postal revenue in Toronto is equal to the revenue of Montreal and every town and city in the province of Quebec added together. It is the people of the city of Toronto who are producing this revenue, and this government says that the Civil Service Commission has jurisdiction. Is the Civil Service Commission responsible for this condition of affairs?

Mr. VIEN: Where does the hon. member get his statistics when he makes the statement that the city of Toronto brings as much money to the Post Office department as the whole of the province of Quebec?

Mr. HARRIS: I take it from the Canada Year Book, 1921, which I had in my hand at the time. Hon. members will find that is the fact.

Mr. VIEN: Canada Year Book, 1975.

Mr. HARRIS: I appreciate the hon. member's point. We will be there "with bells on" in 1975. I submit, Mr. Speaker, with all respect to the hon. minister that the government is responsible for the condition of affairs at the present time, inasmuch as they are not putting enough energy into the matter to see that the city of Toronto gets the mail service to which they have been accustomed. Any one in business knows that there is not very much done in a business house in the morning until the first mail is received. What do we do? We bring our staff down at eight or nine o'clock and wait for the mail. When the mail comes in we get busy. I could tell you a score of houses which have been paralyzed because the mail is not coming in. Some of them are getting it. I will give the House an example. On Saturday last week one business house got their commercial traveller to leave his home at seven o'clock in the morning, so as to be in line to get the mail. He waited there until twelve. When he got to the wicket they said: "Your mail was taken half an hour since." He went home with that for an answer. He got two or three letters which came in during the half hour. When he got to his place of business he found that no mail had been received by them. He went back to get into line, but he had to stand in line till three or four o'clock before he could get in again, and when he got in he got two or three more letters. I have word from that house to-day that they had not received one-fourth of their mail during this last week.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If hon. gentleman who have inside knowledge of cases of that kind will give them to me, in twenty minutes I will have it transferred to the city of Toronto, and deliver the mail to these houses, as we are delivering to the inside circle of the city. If the hon. gentleman wishes to assist me he can do so very materially in that way.

Mr. HARRIS: I submit that I have been trying to assist my hon. friend in this situation from the very beginning. I am trying to do so now, but I want the government to grasp the situation and feel the responsibility of it. I do not want them to sit here inert. I would like to see the Prime Minister stay here and do his best to cure the situation—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I object to the word "inert". I trust that in circumstances such as these there is something coming to a man. I defy my hon. friend to say that I have been inert in this matter. I have been up night and day since this trouble arose, and I intend to stay on the job till it is through. I say to my hon. friend as one of the members for Toronto, and I think I am safe in making the assertion—and I say it on the authority of the man who is handling the situation, Postmaster Lemon, in whom everyone has confidence, and on the authority of the officials who went through the same situation in Winnipeg and know something about striking conditions—that you are getting a much quicker service than you did under similar circumstances previously. These men say that and I say it. I have not been in bed very many hours during the night since this matter came up.

Mr. HARRIS: No one would fail to appreciate the remarks of the hon. minister, but we might stay up night and day—the whole House might sit up night and day—and, if there is not some more action than we have been getting in the last week—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The hon. member has been doing a lot of talking as to what ought to be done. Will he tell us just what should be done?

Mr. HARRIS: I have been taking the minister's word for it when he says that it takes four to five raw recruits to do the work of one man, and he only had 1,200 enrolled to give the service which they require—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We could put 1,500 men on the work in Toronto, if we had the men to train them. Surely my hon. friend will be fair in the matter. We cannot take on more men than we have men to train. It is useless to have men standing round in the employ of the government if you cannot use them. As fast as these men can be trained for the particular job, we put them on. It is not lack of men. Lord knows, there are more men unemployed in Toronto than we can employ but the difficulty is in training them. I want the hon. member to be fair in that respect.

Mr. HARRIS: I take the acting minister's word that he cannot train them any faster, but I think there is something radically wrong with the service and with the Civil Service Commission. In my opinion there is too much bowing down to the Civil Service examination and to Civil Service jurisdiction.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The Civil Service examination does not prevail. Men who have not yet taken their examination have been taken on and put right on the work when they pass the examination by Mr. Lemon.

Mr. HARRIS: I submit the government is not making fast enough time to serve the industrial fabric of the province of Ontario, not so much in regard to settling the strike as in regard to getting the mail through in the different districts of the country.

Mr. MARTELL: I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Hammell):

That the House do now proceed to the Orders of the Day.

Mr. CHURCH: Is this motion debatable?

Mr. SPEAKER: Rule 35 reads:

A motion for reading the Orders of the Day shall have preference to any motion before the House.

Under that rule in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms hon. members will find the jurisprudence of procedure. Section 329 reads:

This motion cannot be debated nor amended under rule 17A. If it is resolved in the affirmative the original motion is superseded and the House must proceed at once to the Orders of the Day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wish to speak to a point of order. It is not that I am certain that anybody cares to speak; I do not know of any one; but I submit that a motion to proceed to the Orders of the Day cannot be taken in the middle of a debate. It takes precedence over any other motion, that is true. That is, as between one motion and another, this motion has precedence. But if we are to say that any member during any debate can move that we proceed to the Orders of the Day and thereby put an instant closure to the debate, that has never yet been done in our parliament, and if it is done, all our closure rules go for nothing.

Mr. SPEAKER: Rule 36, "Privileged Motions," reads:

When a question is under debate no motion is received unless to amend it; to postpone it to a day certain; for the previous question; for reading the Orders of the Day.

That is exactly the case in the present instance. A motion made by the hon. member for West York is before the House, and now another motion is made during the debate by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) under rule 35. I quite agree that under ordinary circumstances a debate cannot be interrupted by another motion. But this is a privileged motion, and if the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) will read rule 36 carefully, he will find that this motion is receivable at any time and is not debatable nor amendable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I just wish to lay before you the consequences of the decision. It is not that the significance now is very great; but if this motion is approved by the government and carried, under the interpretation given, it means that the government can, by the right of a mere majority, stop debate at any time without notice of any kind. This is on the part of those who fought for weeks against a mild closure requiring two weeks to put it into effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not capable of the interpretation my right hon. friend puts upon it. Once the Orders of the Day have been reached, this rule does not apply. The object is to get on to the Orders of the Day, the business which the country has decided to go on with.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have not yet reached the Orders of the Day.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Martell) which was agreed to on the following division:

YUKON—LIQUOR IMPORTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Is the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, signed at Washington on the 6th day of this month, which provides among other matters that liquors may be transported to Yukon Territory by way of Skagway across Alaska, now in force? And if not, what is the earliest date upon which it can be put into force?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The treaty is not in force and cannot come into force until it is ratified by both countries, and this will necessarily be after another session of the United States Senate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the idea of Canada's minister hurrying down to Washington, either the day of the adjournment of the United States Senate or the day before, when the treaty could not have been ratified anyway?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He did not go the day of the adjournment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The day before.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He was there a day or two before. It was hoped that the American government would find it possible to ratify the treaty and it was their desire that it should be ratified; but there was so much business apparently at the last moment of the session that the Senate did not reach it.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I want to ask a further question of the government in elaboration of the one I have already put.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may not do so except by unanimous leave of the House. This is the practice according to Bourinot; he should place his questions on the order paper. But with the indulgence of the House he may proceed to put a further question provided it is reasonably brief.

Mr. BLACK: In view of the Prime Minister's answer, would the government endeavour to obtain from the government of the United States an admission of Canada's right to import liquor into Yukon by way of the Yukon river? I asked the government this question earlier in the session and the Prime Minister replied that, in view of the fact that he hoped to announce soon that a treaty had been made between Canada and the United States on the subject, it was not deemed expedient to further inquire as to the interpretation placed on the Treaty of Washington by the government of the United States. Now that the treaty probably cannot be ratified until next December, an admission of Canada's right to import by way of the Yukon river is most important.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The matter is the subject of communication between the governments of the two countries at the present time.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

The House resumed from June 24 consideration in committee on Bill No. 47, to incorporate the United Church of Canada,—Mr. Forke —Mr. Gordon in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee has under consideration section 2 and the amendment thereto moved by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown).

Mr. ALFRED STORK (Skeena): This bill has been before the House since the 10th day of April. I had the honour and privilege of being a member of the Private Bills committee before which the bill in question was discussed, and I think I am saying nothing new when I observe that we are facing a very difficult problem in the consideration of this measure. Three churches in Canada, the Methodist church, the Congregational church and the Presbyterian church, appear before parliament and ask that legislation be passed to incorporate them into one body. We should have a very easy matter to settle if all of these three churches were unanimous in this request. Unfortunately, however, only two of them are unanimous; one of the three, the Presbyterian church, is very badly divided on the question. I need hardly refer to the great number of petitions and protests which have been submitted to parliament on behalf of those Presbyterians who do not hold that this union should be carried through. I believe that Bill No. 47 has attracted more attention in Canada than perhaps any other bill which has been before parliament in the last few years. The difficulty that now faces us exists largely within the Presbyterian church itself; a grave dispute has arisen in that church, a large proportion of the members and adherents being apparently in favour of the proposed union while a large percentage have declared their objections to it. There appears to have been no way of settling the matter except by appeal to law. When a dispute arises over any question the logical conclusion is to try it in the courts; the courts are established for that purpose and in this particular instance I believe that no other course was open. It becomes more evident every day, at least to me, that the attempt on the part of the Presbyterian church, or of those who are in control of its affairs, to force that body into this amalgamation was an ill-timed one. I believe that the proper course would have been to let matters take their own logical course. But others thought differently and forced the issue, with the inevitable result that we are now faced with a tremendous split in the ranks of the Presbyterians.

It is not my intention to indulge in vain recriminations, because I do not think that any good purpose can be served in that way. We are faced I say, with this grievious trouble; and the way to approach the matter if we hope to secure a settlement is certainly not by aggravating the situation and trying to prove which side was right and which wrong. The discussion of this bill in the Private Bills committee has disclosed problems for which apparently no reasonable solution can be offered. No question can be settled, Mr. Chairman, unless it be settled right. I am confident that our friends the Methodists and the Congregationalists have no desire to force any unfair bargain on the Presbyterian church; I believe that they want to do only that which is based on right. One of the principal objections raised in the Private Bills committee was that there would be no finality in the court proceedings which had been instituted, that they were likely to be prolonged, and were started merely for the purpose of delaying the union.

I purpose, Mr. Chairman, to move an amendment to provide for definite action in the shortest possible time. I believe that a judgment handed down by the Supreme Court of Canada will be accepted by all parties concerned. This is a sincere effort on my part to reduce the friction, bitterness and hostility which have grown up over the proposed union. The division in the membership of the Presbyterian church is in itself a tragedy. My only purpose in presenting this amendment is to secure a definite verdict to clear up the question of legal right, for when this question is settled I am sure it will do away with the present controversy which is so ruinous to the best interests of the whole church movement. I trust that the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) will find in this amendment common ground for a basis of settlement. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. MacLaren, in amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for Lisgar:

> The the amendment moved on June 24 by Mr. Brown that section 2 of bill No. 47, being an act incorporating the United Church of Canada, be amended by adding thereto the following words immediately after the words, "tenth day of December 1924":
> "Provided that as respects the Presbyterian Church in Canada, the provisions of this act shall apply only when all doubt has been removed as to the power of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada under its constitution and rules to agree to a union of the Presbyterian Church in Canada with the Methodist and Congregational churches upon the basis of union as set out in schedule A of this act:
> "Provided further, that this question shall be submitted for decision to the Supreme Court of Canada by a reference by the Minister of Justice."

Mr. HAMMELL: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I submit that this amendment is out of order by reason of the fact that the necessary notice as required by rule 112 has not been given. This rule states:

> No important amendment may be proposed to any private bill, in a committee of the whole House, or at the third reading of the bill, unless one day's notice of the same has been given.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the committee has not had the requisite one day's notice of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: Does any other hon. member desire to speak on the point of order before a ruling is given by the Chair?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I desire to point out, Mr. Chairman, that Votes and Proceedings of yesterday contained notice of this amendment, and I submit that that is compliance with the rule quoted by the hon. member for Muskoka.

Mr. STORK: Mr. Chairman, I submitted this resolution in an endeavour to find a solution for the difficulty which confronts us. Although we have wrestled with this problem for three or four months, I regret to say we have not got very far along the lines of compromise. I was convinced that I had got something that would at least bring us together on common ground. I trust that mere technicalities will not be allowed to upset this amendment, because, if so, we will be compelled to fall back upon the Duff amendment, which perhaps will not be altogether as acceptable and agreeable. I have no desire to utter any threat. I earnestly implore the committee to accept my amendment in the spirit in which it is offered as a sincere effort to effect a solution of the problem before us.

Mr. IRVINE: What is the essential difference between this amendment and the amendment of the hon. member for Lunenburg.

Mr. STORK: Time is the essence of the agreement.

Mr. IRVINE: How much time?

Mr. DUFF: At least a year.

Mr. PUTNAM: The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) has implied that his amendment would probably lead to a solution of our difficulties; that is to say, that everybody would accept the bill as so amended. Have I correctly interpreted my hon. friend?

Mr. STORK: I think that the whole question before the court deals very largely with property rights. So far as I am concerned personally, I would accept the verdict of the court, whether it be for me or against me, because I believe in the kind of fight where the winner takes all.

Mr. PUTNAM: My question practically was whether the hon. gentleman is guaranteeing that the decision of the court, whatever it be, would be accepted by all parties concerned. He used the strong word "solution" in commending the probable success of his suggestion.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I understood that the Chair desired to hear hon. members as to whether the point of order raised by my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. Hammell) was correct or not. My hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. Putnam) is proceeding to discuss the merits of the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN: Undoubtedly the point or order to be dealt with is whether the notice of this amendment given in Votes and Proceedings of yesterday, and delivered to hon. members this morning, constitutes the one day's notice required by rule 112.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, before you make a ruling, may I direct the attention of the committee to the fact that only on the ground of a technicality at most would the amendment be ruled out? Should it be ruled out by your decision, the hon. member who presented it will not be prevented from moving the amendment at a later stage of the debate. As the Minister of National Defence has pointed out, notice does appear in yesterday's Votes and Proceedings, and a broad interpretation of that notice would indicate that the rules of the House have been complied with. This notice was given yesterday, and it appears in printed form in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday. If that time is not sufficient, certainly this amendment would be in order to-morrow, and I cannot see that the time of the House would be saved in any way by our taking up this amendment to-morrow instead of disposing of it immediately. As the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) has just pointed out, this amendment is more likely, in his opinion at all events, to bring the parties as near toge her as they can be brought in view of the unfortunate difference that exists between them. In any event it will serve to determine quickly the fate of the amendment and the clause now before the committee. All parties are anxious that a decision on this question be quickly reached, and I should hope therefore that the committee would agree to allow this amendment to stand. The only effect of my hon. friend's objection if sustained will be to have this debate continue for a longer time; it will not assist the argument one way or the other, while it may occasion a little more acrimony in discussion and, generally, serve no useful purpose. If we can in this matter, which is of great concern to all of us and to the country, take any step of a conciliatory character, one which will expedite a final settlement, I believe it is the will of the committee that we should do so.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I was looking in Beauchesne's book for the purpose of finding out whether there was any statutory definition of the word "day." The rule says that a day's notice of a resolution or amendment to a private bill shall be given. Now, in the record of the Votes and Proceelings of yesterday, Wednesday, the 25th of June, there is contained a notice of this motion, and that, I submit, is substantial compliance with the rule. The Votes and Proceedings, which record what was done yesterday, contain this notice, which was filed with the clerk the day before its proposed consideration by the committee. The night before last when we were discussing this question, I rose to a point of order which, I was then satisfied, as I am satisfied now, was a proper point to raise and should have been decided in accordance with my contention. As was suggested, however, we were dealing with a measure which the committee desired to consider in the broadest and fairest possible way to all parties concerned, and notwithstanding the fact that I was buttressed by authorities of the strongest kind, in deference to the suggestion of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Boys) I did not appeal from the decision of the Chairman to the whole House. I do not know what view you hold, Mr. Chairman, in regard to this matter, but I submit that for the Chairman to rule in accordance with a rigid compliance with the rules would be to assume an attitude entirely diffrent from that which the Chair adopted two nights ago when we were dealing with the question I brought up, because upon a rigid interpretation of the rules and having regard to the authorities cited, the point was decisively in my favour. In dealing with this question we must listen to any reasonable suggestion that is made by hon. members in good faith, having regard to the importance of the matter involved, touching as it does the interests of a large proportion of the people of this country more intimately than any question I have known of in my parliamentary experience. I have not the least doubt that the rule has been substantially complied with, and I think it would be in the interests of the promoters of this bill if the hon. member (Mr. Hammell) would withdraw the objection he has raised.

Mr. COOTE: I do not know very much about the rules of the House, and I must say I am no stickler on rules. But this notice which has appeared in the Votes and Proceedings should not be considered a day's notice to hon. members. Speaking for myself, I never saw the notice, and I think the same would apply to the majority of members. It is a matter of some seriousness that hon. members should be asked to pass on an amendment of such great importance without having notice.

Mr. CALDWELL: May I ask the Chairman when the copies of yesterday's Votes and Proceedings were placed on the files, yesterday or this morning?

The CHAIRMAN: I do not know.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I may not be quite in order, but may I ask when this debate is to be finished? I think the committee is ready to settle the question, and if we can come to some understanding as to this amendment I think we should do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Rule 40 of the House, requiring two days' notice for certain classes of bills and motions, is as follows:

> Two days' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for the putting of a question; but this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction, or to private bills, or to the times of meeting or adjournment of the House. Such notice shall be laid on the table before five o'clock, p.m., and be printed in the Votes and Proceedings of that day.

I understand the custom has been that where the Clerk of the House has received notice in time to have it appear in the Votes and Proceedings of the day following, the two days' notice has reference to the appearance of the notice in the Votes and Proceedings of the day previously. Where one day's notice is required of amendments to private bills, the rule is:

> No important amendment may be proposed to any private bill in a committee of the whole House, or at the third reading of the bill, unless one day's notice of the same has been given.

I think, Mr. Chairman, the same interpretation should govern with respect to one day's notice. I understand that the Clerk of the House is quite prepared to state that he is following exactly the same practice with reference to the one day's notice in this regard as he follows with reference to the two days' notice in other cases.

The CHAIRMAN: Objection is made by Mr. Hammell that the amendment moved by Mr. Stork is out of order under provisions of rule 112, which says:

> No important amendment may be proposed to any private bill in a committee of the whole House, or at the third reading of the bill, unless one day's notice of the same has been given.

It seems to be agreed that this is an important amendment and therefore requires notice.

While it is true that Votes and Proceedings in question, number 77, bears yesterday's date it was delivered to hon. members in the regular course of events at about ten o'clock this day. The rule requiring notice for private bills puts those bills in a different position from that of any other bills, or resolutions or motions. Notice is required of this particular matter and the object of that notice is to permit publicity and prevent surprise. The Votes and Proceedings were delivered this morning, and the fact of whether or not notice of the amendment was sent in before five o'clock last evening cannot, I think, influence my decision in this matter. The day, notice is handed in, is considered the first day, the day the notice is printed the second day, and on the third day following the matter dealt with may be debated. I cannot bring myself to the view, notwithstanding the arguments which have been so well presented, that a notice of motion of an amendment to a private bill, filed with the Clerk last night, or at any rate before five o'clock, and delivered to the members on the morning of this day, is a sufficient notice under rule 112. For that reason I must rule that the amendment moved by the member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) is not in order. It has been said that if the debate continues the amendment will be in order. It would be, of course, operative to-morrow and on each subsequent day its regularity would be as strongly established, but I feel that I am acting according to the requirements of rule 112 to-day when I rule that the notice of motion in question is out of order. The debate therefore continues upon the amendment of Mr. Brown to section 2, and the hon. member for Swift Current has the floor.

Mr. A. J. LEWIS (Swift Current): As a member of the select standing committee on Private Bills and one who has been vitally interested in the subject that is being debated at the present time I wish to make my position plain. We have heard many views expressed by members of this House and by members of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, but it is not as a minister of that church that I wish to place my views on record. Of course I am not speaking ex-cathedra or ex-officio but as a member of parliament.

Mr. CANNON: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has just stated that he was addressing this House as a minister of the church. He is therefore interested in this question.

Mr. CRERAR: No, no.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the point of order is so highly technical that I have failed to grasp it.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member stated that he was not speaking as a minister.

Mr. LEWIS: In my opinion arguments for or against union—

Mr. MARTELL: I rise to a point of order. I think the point taken by the hon. member for Dorchester is absolutely correct. No hon. gentleman has the right to address the House as a minister of any denomination; he must address it as a member of this Chamber.

The CHAIRMAN: Of course an hon. gentleman must address this body as a member of the House, not as a minister of any particular denomination. I did not quite catch what the hon. member said and therefore do not entirely comprehend the objection raised by the hon. member for Dorchester.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for Swift Current stated explicitly that he was speaking as a member of this House not as a minister of the church.

Mr. LEWIS: The report in Hansard to-morrow will clearly indicate what I said. I made it quite plain that I was speaking as a member of this House.

Now, in my opinion the arguments for or against union do not or should not enter into this discussion. This is a religious prerogative over which no parliament under the British flag has any jurdisdiction. Moreover it is conceded by the chief counsel of those opposing the bill that those Presbyterians who wish to unite with the other bodies have a perfect right to do so. What they object to, is the taking of the whole Presbyterian church into organic union with the Methodist and Congregational churches while a considerable minority are opposed to it—and they have attacked the promoters of union on the following grounds:

1. That the church has not the power to change its constitution.
2. That it exceeded its constitutional authority in negotiating with the other churches with a view to organic union.
3. That the bill would cause a violation of the church's trusts.
4. That it destroys the doctrine of the church, the Westminister Confession of Faith.
5. That it is clercial coercion.

These arguments have been advanced by various members and in divers ways, and it is my intention if possible to prove the falsity of their claims. Quite a number of speakers have suggested to the committee that it is not a wise thing to reverse the judgment of the standing committee. It has been claimed that the committee who listened to the arguments both for and against union is the best judge of the situation and they have quoted Bourmot and May in support of their argument. Now, I do not think that the argument presented in support of such a position is well founded, for the following reasons. In the first place, when any amendment is proposed to the preamble of a bill that has been accepted by parliament and sent to the select standing committee, it must be specially reported to the House, so that the members may know that such an amendment has been added. Why do the rules of the House demand that attention be drawn to the amendment, if it is not for the purpose of giving the committee the opportunity of rejecting or accepting an amendment that has been added to the bill? In the second place, it is well for this committee to know that the promoters of the bill do not agree to have this clause inserted in the preamble, and it was only inserted by a majority of the committee at an opportune time, when those opposed to the bill had a majority in committee. The same can be said of the section under discussion. Anyone who reads the original bill that passed the first reading in this House and was referred to the select standing committee, will know that it is entirely new, and was placed there in spite of the opposition of those who supported the measure. Under these circumstances, it seems to me to be one of those exceptional cases mentioned in Bourinot and May, and which was quoted at least twice during the course of this debate, by those opposed to the amendment of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). Therefore, in my opinion, this committee have a perfect right to reject this added section and to accept the proposed amendment that is before them.

Another argument advanced against the repealing of this clause is that the General Assembly is not the church; neither does it represent the people. Well, one might ask the question; "If it is not the church or the government of the church, and does not represent the people, what is it, and whom does it represent?" The people who are opposed to this bill, and who claim to be the stalwarts who champion the perpetuation of the Presbyterian Church in Canada by their arguments are striking at the very foundation of Presbyterianism. One member in his zeal for the church declared it clerical and official and ecclesiastical. Well, it might be well for such members to adhere a little more closely to that precious but much abused document, called The Westminster Confession of Faith. Let us see for a moment what this document says in regard to it. Section 31 of the Westminster Confession of Faith deals with the government and edification of the church. These assemblies are called synods and councils.

Section 3 reads as follows:

> It belongeth to synods and councils ministerially to determine controversies of faith, and cases of conscience; to set down rules and directions for the better ordering of the public worship of God, and government to His church; to receive complaints in cases of maladministration, and authoritatively to determine the same: which decrees and determinations, if consonant to the word of God, are to be received with reverence and submission, not only for their agreement with the word, but also for the power whereby they are made, as being an ordinance of God, appointed thereunto in his word.

I shall have occasion to refer to this question again when dealing with another argument which has been advanced against the constitutionality of this bill, but for the present I am endeavouring to show to this committee that the assemblies and synods are peculiar to the Presbyterian form of government, and in the Westminster Confession of Faith have specific functions in regard to matters of faith and public worship. And, the conclusion reached by these same assemblies, if consonant with the Word of God, must be received with reverence and submission of the faithful.

So far, I have never yet heard the statement by my hon. friends and brethren that the union of the churches is inconsistent with the Word of God, and if this is not so, upon what ground do they attempt to oppose the union of the churches?

I, myself, as a Presbyterian minister was opposed to union during the early negotiating stages, but after the church had spoken with no uncertain sound through her courts, presbyteries, synods and assemblies, I acquiesced in the judgment of the majority, and as an obedient servant of the church and true to my vows at ordination, I could not conscientiously do otherwise.

The statement was made that: "If another vote was taken 75 per cent of the people would vote against it"; This is a mere guess and at least problematical, and the recent vote in the assembly does not bear out the argument.

It was further stated that the vote of 1916 is eight years old, and therefore, its value as a criterion of what the people want to-day is useless. Now, at the first glance this argument seems very plausible, but, on the other hand, I think it was clearly shown by Dr. Pidgeon in the committee that since that vote was taken, the church has proceeded just as fast as it was constitutionally possible for the Presbyterian church to do. I do not wish to take time to explain this, but let me say that a compromise was made at Winnipeg that the union question should be laid over until after the war and, when that time had elapsed, the assembly again took up the question of union and you are all familiar with the results.

Mr. PUTNAM: My hon. friend stated that formerly he was opposed to the union, and that when the judicial attitude of the church was for union, he as a follower of the church fell into line for union. Does he support this bill on his personal view of the merits of the bill or for the mere reason which he has advanced?

Mr. LEWIS: It must be remembered that this question has been before Canada for at least twenty years, and my own experience as a missionary of the church goes back twenty years. In the early stages I was against it, as I admit, but in view of my experience as a missionary in the West I am heartily in favour of union. It has been stated by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) that the personnel of the assembly is much the same. For some mysterious reason or other the commissioners chosen are always in favour of union. It may be true that a certain number of prominent members who are officials, are usually found at the assembly, but as regards the personnel of the assembly, seven-eighths of the commissioners are changed every year. Let me give this statement in regard to the vote of the General Assembly which met at Owen Sound in 1924.

Principal Fraser's motion approving the Duff amendment to the union bill was defeated by 444 to 92 in the assembly. Dr. Pidgeon's first motion was adopted by 427 to 96, and the names were recorded. Of the 523 voting 431 had not voted on union at the assemblies at Winnipeg in 1916, Toronto in 1921, or Port Arthur in 1923, where decisive votes on union were given and the names recorded.

In these four assemblies 2,094 votes were cast on union by 1,883 different persons as follows:

	For	Against	Not Voted Previously
1916..	404	90	494
1921..	414	107	460
1923..	427	129	498
1924..	427	96	431
	1,672	422	1,883

The percentage of duplication is less for those voting for union than for those voting against. Of the 1,672 votes for, 1,504, or 90 per cent, were given by different persons. Of the 422 against, 369, or 87½ per cent were given by different persons. Two were privileged to vote at all four assemblies—a venerable leader of those opposing, and a missionary superintendent favouring union. The duplications are largest in the Presbyteries of Halifax, Montreal and Hamilton.

I think I have stated that the members of the assembly, in the four assemblies that have voted for church union, are not the same each year the vote is recorded. I think it is well for this committee, especially those who are not familiar with the Presbyterian system of government, and who perhaps belong to different churches, to weigh very carefully the appeals that are made by those who are opposed to the bill when they speak of the vote of the people. That people have become Presbyterians instead of belonging to some other denomination is due to the fact that they believe in the system of government which is peculiar to the church. Surely no member of this committee would seriously say that we must adopt another method or form of government, in order to pass this bill. To me, it is preposterous that any body of men should say that the church, through her courts, presbyteries, synods and assemblies has not the right to change or control the destiny of the church

What would the Anglicans and Roman Catholics say to a body of men, whether members of parliament or otherwise, who dictated to them in regard to the rules and regulations governing their church, or who declared, when a bill was brought before parliament that before it could pass its promoters must prove that it had a majority of the members of the church behind it and, on top of that declaration, insisted that it should be sent to the courts?

How would you expect us to act if the situation was reversed? That is the question we have to consider, and if it can be proved that the church has acted constitutionally from the beginning to the time this bill came before parliament, I see no reason why this bill should not get the unanimous consent of this parliament.

The argument was raised by the chairman of the committee that the settlement of the union question is not for parliament but for the courts. I count the hon. member who was chairman as one of my most personal friends in this House, and his conduct during the very trying session was beyond reproach. I do not, however, agree with him, when he stated on Wednesday night that the matter of faith and doctrine was not for this parliament, but for the courts, to settle. I do not think the hon. member, on reflection, would repeat the statement. It surely is not for this parliament, or any parliament, or the Supreme court, or the Privy Council, to judge in matters of faith and doctrine. It is distinctly stated in the section which I read from the Westminster Confession of Faith that, the matter of faith and doctrine, as well as matters of conscience shall be settled, not by civil courts but by the courts of the church, and it is a privilege and prerogative that every church claims in Canada. Thus parliament to my way of thinking would be very unwise to force such an issue in the courts at the present time.

The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) also made the statement that the bill before parliament was not the same bill that had been presented to the General Assembly at Port Arthur in 1923, and in support of his argument he read the two preambles. I will admit the church did not ratify the amended preamble as in the present bill before the committee, but the original preamble that was introduced into the House by the hon. member for Brandon was essentially the same in principle, but possibly couched in different language.

This bill, as we all know, was repeatedly amended by the committee and that, of course, is their prerogative. But, with two exceptions, the bill has been agreed to by the lawyers and officials, who have been here representing the church. And moreover, the bill, I understand, with the two exceptions—the amendment to the preamble and the new clause added by the committee—has been ratified by the last General Assembly with an overwhelming majority. Therefore, there is really no value in the hon. member's claim.

The statement has been made during the debate that the bill is coercing a substantial minority into a united church to which they are opposed. Now, I understand from the committee that the present bill had been amended by the committee and that that difficulty had been overcome to the satisfaction of both sides. It is now understood that any congregation has the right to vote on the subject, before the bill becomes law, and if the vote is against union, it is understood that it never became a part of the united church. The same is true of non-concurring members, if hon. members will read section 4 (e) of this bill.

Mr. MacLAREN: In reference to compelling people to go into a church into which they do not wish to go, how does the hon. member explain the action that the bill would have on the minority of a concurring congregation? That is to say, in a congregation in which the majority is in favour of union and in which there is a minority against union, how does he regard the treatment of the minority?

Mr. LEWIS: It is not my intention to discuss the details of the bill; but if the hon. member will read section 4 (e), he will find that provision is made for non-concurring members of a congregation that decides to go into union. When we come to that part of the bill, that will be the time to discuss the question.

Mr. MacLAREN: This is not a detail. I am referring to a principle—the treatment of the minority of a concurring congregation.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. LEWIS: I think it is perfectly right to say that any member of any church has a right to withdraw if he so desires, and unite with another church.

Mr. MacLAREN: According to the hon. member, he has two options, one of remaining in a church which is forming a union into which he does not wish to go; the other of leaving the church.

Mr. LEWIS: The hon. member has a right to draw his own conclusions, and since he was on the committee and knows that the committee endeavoured to adjust this question satisfactorily—and I believe did to all intents and purposes to the satisfaction to all in the committee—I do not think it is wise for me to discuss this matter any further. When the details of the bill are up for consideration that is the time to discuss that question.

Mr. MacLAREN: I thought it would be a rather awkward question to answer.

Mr. LEWIS: It may be awkward for the hon. member who takes the position he does, but for me it is a very simple matter.

The hon. member for Lunenburg made the statement that the West is not favourable to union, as the committee was given to understand, and in support of his claim, he stated that only 32,000 out of a total of 80,000 membership of the church had voted for union. His figures may be substantially correct, but the hon. member did not give us the number that voted against union, so for that reason, unless he supplies both figures, it is difficult for anyone to make a comparison.

It is further stated that only 51 per cent of the total membership of the church has voted either for or against union, with the other churches. That is true. But how can we gauge the public opinion on any subject, unless it is by those who have interested themselves sufficiently to make it worth their while to vote? In an election of any kind, whether upon prohibition, the election of a member of parliament, or any other great public question, it is the actual vote that counts, and the governments of our land act accordingly.

The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) waxed quite eloquent in his appeal for the minority to have the right to go to the courts for redress, and he said that if only one member was against union, he should not be denied that right of redress by this parliament. I certainly agree with him, but surely the hon. member is not serious in such a statement with respect to this bill. There is quite a difference between parliament giving the individual the right of redress through the courts of our land, and, on the other hand, forcing the issue and making the bill dependent upon a decision of a court of law. This bill does not deny the right of any minority to proceed to get redress from the state, but it does ask parliament to exercise its prerogative, and assume that responsibility in the case of this bill that it is doing every day of the session in regard to other legislative acts.

I wish to say a few words in regard to the amendment made to the bill by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) because that is the one we are speaking against, and we are speaking in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown).

I was one of those seven members who were appointed a sub-committee to inquire with three representatives from both sides of this question. The hon. member for Lunenburg was quite frank and correct in his statement to the House, that the representatives failed to agree. The result of the deliberation, however, was a clarified amendment. Now there is one very grave weakness in the amendment. It has been claimed that if we are sure that the church acted in a constitutional way we should have nothing to fear from the action of the court. There may be a certain force in that argument; but let me say that the church through her constituted courts does not believe that the civil courts have the right to say what is the constitutional power of the church. The assembly is the sovereign power of the church.

For support of that statement I refer to the Westminster Confession of Faith and also to the documents and authorities given in the Blue Book. Section 122 says:

> The General Assembly being the supreme court of its church, its decisions are final.

It seems to me that the church has a right to say what its constitutional power is in regard to this bill.

The weakness of the amendment, however, is this. The proclamation of the act depends upon a final judgment of the court or courts—the Supreme court and finally the Privy Council. It makes no provision, however, if the courts refuse to make a decision either one way or the other.

The result of a non-decision would be disastrous to all the churches and could only bring turmoil to her people and a general chaotic condition on her frontiers.

The Scottish Wee Free case has been quoted very extensively by those who are opposed to the bill in support of their claim. Now I do not wish to enter into any extended arguments about it but I think it is unanimously agreed that the case holds good only if it can be proved that the Presbyterian church had not the power to change its doctrine.

The learned counsel, Mr. Lafleur, of those opposed to this bill admitted that, in the case of the House of Lords decision of 1904, if the doctrines and governments had been identical no case could have been made out against the promoters of the union of the Free and the United Free Churches of Scotland. But no one has proved so far that the Presbyterian church has not the constitutional right to change its own doctrine and order. Even the Westminster Confession of Faith in the sections that I have quoted gives it that power, and the Blue Book, which lays down the regulations and rules of the Presbyterian church, assigns it that authority; and in two cases at least, the Westminster Confession of Faith has been amended so as to conform to the changing times. There is, of course, protection against any ill-advised changes; and before any radical change, either in doctrine or procedure, becomes the law of the church, certain rules and regulations must be complied with. To those familiar with our churches this is known as the Barrier Act. But when the Barrier Act has been removed then the assembly has the constitutional right to proclaim the doctrine submitted to the presbyteries, under the Barrier Act—the doctrine of the church.

Now it is a fact well known to the committee that the basis of union was submitted to the presbyteries, under the Barrier Act, for their approval and that it received the almost unanimous consent of the presbyteries. And the General Assembly since that time have acted accordingly. Therefore in my judgment the basis of union is the real doctrine of the Presbyterian Church in Canada and of the other two churches which have approved it. So that the doctrine and policy of the three negotiating churches being identical, the argument of the Scottish case falls to the ground, as not applicable to the Presbyterian Church in Canada.

The arguments for the trusts of the church fall into the same category and thus the conclusions reached in my former arguments have the same force here; that is to say, the trusts of the original church have not been violated by the entrance of the Presbyterian church into organic union with the Methodist and Congregational bodies.

Mr. PUTNAM: Does the hon. gentleman believe that the basis of union brought into being with the consummation of the union of the three negotiating churches is some tangible change from Presbyterian doctrine as it has been hitherto?

Mr. LEWIS: I do not know that that has very much bearing on the subject; as I have endeavoured to prove, the Presbyterian church has the constitutional power to change its doctrine.

Mr. FORKE: There is no conflict anyway.

Mr. PUTNAM: I am interested in the hon. gentleman's argument but I gather that he has doubts as to that constitutional power.

Mr. LEWIS: I have absolutely no doubts or I would not take this position to-day.

Mr. PUTNAM: I cannot say that I am entirely free from doubt on that point.

Mr. LEWIS: Well, the hon. gentleman may have his doubts. As one who has attended church courts and who has sworn in his ordination vows to respect those courts I say that in my own opinion, in my own conscience and in my own belief in religious liberty, the church has that power and there is no doubt about it.

In closing, let me say this. I think the members on both sides of this question are to be congratulated on the way in which they have carried on the debate. They have manifested a high degree of sincerity and fairness. The debate has reached a high level, worthy of the best traditions of the church and the honour and dignity of this parliament. Let us as we vote on this question remember that we are living in a strenuous age. Time is rapidly moving onward; many great changes are taking place around us; it is an age of progress; and if there is one thing that we as a parliament should remember it is that old Latin proverb, "Tempora mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis"—"The times are changed and we are changed in them." What therefore we claim for ourselves we should concede to the three great living churches which have presented to us their request for incorporation, that as a united church they may better accomplish the great work for which they exist.

Mr. G. C. WILSON (Wentworth): I did not intend to take part in the debate, but on reflection, having been a member of the Private Bills committee and having given considerable attention to this matter, I feel it incumbent on me to express my views on the bill before the committee. In the first place let me state most emphatically that I have never been opposed to church union; I agree that those who are in favour of union should have the right to join any church to which they might wish to belong. But I also reserve the right to any minority, or any majority for that matter, to remain in the church of their fathers. It has been stated, and it was stated in the committee, that the object of this amendment is to kill the bill. Having voted for the amendment that was submitted by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) I want to make it clear that it certainly was not my intention in supporting that amendment to destroy the bill, which I think ought to be passed. I believe, however, that technicalities should be brushed aside; and it should be realized, as I believe it is realized, by the people of the Presbyterian church and those of the Methodist church as well, that we have come to a parting of the ways. In my opinion there are two factions in the Presbyterian church that are irreconcilable and you might as well meet the issue now as at any other time. I regret very much that the hon. member (Mr. Lewis) objected to the amendment of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork). In hurriedly glancing over the amendment since I saw it this morning I believe it is in the right direction; I think it must meet the view of every hon. member who is anxious to see the matter settled rightly and justice done to all parties concerned. Minorities have their right just as majorities have, and I think it is the duty of this parliament to see that those rights are respected and that justice is meted out to every one. The hon. member has said that if a vote were taken 75 per cent of the people, it had been asserted, would vote against the union. Whether that is correct or not I am not in a position to judge.

Mr. LEWIS: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I did not say that. I said it was stated by the other side that if another vote were taken 75 per cent of the members would vote against the proposal. I said the matter was problematical at best.

Mr. WILSON: I did not make any statement so far as the hon. member himself was concerned, I was just saying exactly what the hon. member repeated himself, that it was stated that if another vote were taken at least 75 per cent of the membership of the Presbyterian church would vote against church union. Whether that is correct or not, no one can prove, but I do say that there has been a large and growing feeling in the Presbyterian church against church union, and the votes taken during the past year go to prove that the feeling has been growing.

Mr. WOOD: Did the vote at the General Assembly at Owen Sound very recently bear out that idea?

Mr. WILSON: I am glad the hon. member brings up the question of the vote at Owen Sound. Far more importance apparently is attached to that vote by members who do not understand the Presbyterian Church in Canada than it deserves, and they imagine that that vote carries a greater amount of weight than it really does. We maintain that the Presbyterian Assembly at Owen Sound does not represent the Presbyterian church and, furthermore, that the delegates at the assembly did not vote in accordance with the wishes of the congregations which they represented. I wish to take that up a little later, and I will therefore ask the Chairman to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WILSON: I am not in favour of prolonged litigation; the sooner this matter is settled the better for all concerned. If the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Skeena would have had that effect I believe it would have been in the best interests of the church union cause; therefore I regret that I shall not have the privilege, at this time at least, of voting for such a resolution.

The previous speaker (Mr. Lewis) referred to the recent vote at the assembly and suggested that that assembly was representative of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. In other words, he as a minister of the church, would lead us to believe that that assembly did represent the feeling and the views of the Presbyterians of this country. To that statement I take exception. During the last year at least, many people have turned from the views they formerly held; a considerable number of those who had been unionists are now in favour of remaining within the Presbyterian Church in Canada.

As I have said, I regret that so many technicalities have been raised in connection with this discussion. I think the matter should have been settled without ever coming to parliament; the Presbyterians themselves should have settled it before applying to parliament. Of the three bodies, the Presbyterian church, the Methodist church, and the Congregational church, the last two are not so much interested, or are not interested in the same way as the Presbyterian church seems to be; very little opposition to the proposal is offered by them. But it has been stated to me by leading Methodists in my own locality that had they known this movement for church union would bring about a disruption of the Presbyterian church, they would never have voted for it. I think that is the opinion of every sane and thoughtful person in the Dominion of Canada to-day. In my opinion, it is not in the interests of Christianity, it is not in the interests of religion, that the scenes that have been witnessed within the precincts of this House during the last few weeks should have taken place. Personally, I regret the matter was not settled. I still think there is time for reconciliation. I still think that if those leaders, or those so-called and self-appointed leaders, would listen to the views of the people of their churches they would realize that a settlement should be made in the best interests of Christianity.

The last speaker argued that the vote at the General Assembly meant a great deal. I take issue with him. I am not considering the present situation in political terms. I wish to keep the question out of politics, although some members of the cloth are very anxious to bring it into the political arena and have so threatened. In the present instance I do not believe the assembly represents the thought of the people of the Presbyterian church; in other words, it is not a people's movement. I will prove to you by figures that the vote taken there, which was largely one-sided although practically in the same proportion as it has always been, does not represent the church, and I mean by the "church" the adherents and the communicants of the Presbyterian church. Take the assembly of last year and what do we find? We find that Toronto which voted 7,565 for union and 7,829 against was represented at the assembly by a vote of 24 for union and 5 against. The presbytery of Barrie, which voted 2,418 for and 2,252 against was represented by 6 to 4. The presbytery of Guelph, which voted 2,171 for and 2,886 against, was represented at the assembly by 6 votes for and by 1 against. Linsday, where the vote was 1,329 for and 1,192 against, was represented by 4 for and I against. In Peterborough, where the vote was 1,835 for and 1,990 against, the representation was 4 to 4. In the presbytery of Pictou, where the vote for was 1,884 and the vote against 3,364, there was a representation of 11 votes for the union and none against. In St. John, where the vote was 2,066 for and 1,922 against, there was a representation of 8 votes for and 5 against. These figures go to show that the commissioners to the assembly do not represent the views of the people.

Take the last assembly to which the preceding speaker referred. Although the list is not complete, we find that circumstances such as these took place: For instance, the lists contain the names of 11 ministers whose churches had recently put themselves on record against union and also 17 ministers who voted for union but who represent no congregation at all. Therefore, I do not think it is fair to spread the idea throughout the country that the assembly at Owen Sound represented the views of the people of the churches. Let me take what has happened in the district from which I come; let me refer to the vote taken in the city of Hamilton, and see if the vote there is coming out more strongly for union, whether the people there are to a great extent in favour of union or against it. I will only cite one or two instances. In St. Andrew's church in 1915, there were 279 for and 140 against. In the vote taken this year there were 176 for and 572 against. In St. John's church, in 1915, there were 67 for and 244 against. The vote has now changed to 106 for and 552 against. In Knox church the vote was 78 for and 368 against in 1915. In 1924 the vote stood 54 for and 745 against. In Central church, 1916, the vote was 142 for and 169 against. In 1924, the vote was 125 for and 476 against. In the town of Dundas, from which I come, the vote on the first occasion was in favour of union. On the second occasion the vote was in opposition to union.

When they tell you that this is a fair representation of the voice of the people, let me state that the vote taken nine years ago does not in any way represent Presbyterian sentiment to-day. Why? Because the people who voted then are not there now. I contend that in that congregation half of the members who were there when the vote was taken are not there to-day. Yet it is said we must give up our church in response to the vote that was taken in 1915. I remember when the union representatives were before the committee as witnesses I suggested to one of them: "If it is a fair proposition to abide by the result of a vote taken in 1915, are you willing to accept a vote in the case of the temperance plebiscite or referendum on the lists of that same year?" The reverend gentleman in question at once said, "No." I say myself, it would not be fair. What we want to-day, and I think we will get it, is an expression of the views of the people of the Presbyterian church, or of any other church for that matter, obtained through the medium of an up-to-date list and the vote should be by ballot, and not by having a meeting called at which the vote that particular night will decide the fate of the congregation. In the election of elders in the Presbyterian church in the past, there has never been any suspicion as to what would happen; and I was surprised to hear counsel for the unionists say that a vote by ballot might lead to a scandal. I never heard of any scandal in connection with the election of Presbyterian elders. The ballots are distributed perhaps for two weeks previously, and they are signed ballots. I believe that when a vote is taken all communicants and adherents should be allowed to record their opinion. If there is a sincere desire to ascertain what the opinion of the people of the church, not only in the province of Ontario but throughout Canada, is upon this question, a vote should be taken by ballot and the session of the church should see to it that every person is given a ballot and afforded an opportunity of expressing his views on this most important subject.

What has brought about this serious and regrettable condition of affairs in the Presbyterian church?

Mr. PUTNAM: When the hon. member says there should be a vote by ballot, does he mean ballots should be cast at a meeting called for the purpose of voting, or does he mean that ballots may be marked at home and sent in?

Mr. WILSON: I have such implicit faith in the people that I would distribute the ballot, either by mail, or by the members of the kirk session, deliver it to all the members of the church, and let them return that ballot within one week or two weeks, or whatever time the session fixed. I consider that would bring about a decision in the congregation and give every person the right to vote.

Mr. PUTNAM: Does the hon. gentleman see any reason for that procedure which would not also be a reason for taking a vote in a general election in that same way? And secondly, if there were a general election, and the vote were taken upon the direct question of whether the bill should pass, would the hon. member be content with a vote taken in that way? I give this supposition only by way of illustration and apprehending a barely conceivable possibility.

Mr. WILSON: Certainly not. In the Presbyterian church the vote for elders is by ballot. No exception has been taken to it in the past, and I do not see how exception can be taken now. I would further agree, that as on the occasion of the last vote, there should be an expression of opinion by the adherents of the Presbyterian church. I believe they should be given the right to vote. In the discussion of this bill we were told by counsel for the union committee that the adherents would not be given the right to vote, although they may be some of the principal subscribers to the funds of the church. Personally I still think that the subscribing adherents should be given the right to vote.

Mr. PUTNAM: Does the hon. member see any reason for that suggestion which would not also be a reason for changing the system of voting in a general election in Canada and allowing the people to vote at home?

Mr. WILSON: Under the present election act we make provision for travellers, sailors and other classes. The idea of the act to-day is to see that every man has the right to express an opinion, and that should be carried out as far as possible in church affairs as well as in state affairs.

Mr. PUTNAM: Is the hon. member going the full length of saying that he would go in for the same reform in election contests?

Mr. WILSON: I do not know whether I am going to be drawn into a controversy with the hon. member, but the first thing I will be asked, I suppose, will be whether I am in favour of open voting. We will be going back to the days of the past.

Mr. PUTNAM: The hon. gentleman will not be asked that question by me.

Mr. WILSON: No, but the hon. gentleman is asking me questions which may lead to some other controversy. I say the vote by ballot should be the vote of the people of the churches and everybody should be given the right to express his view one way or the other. That is the position I take and I am prepared to stand by it.

Mr. MacLAREN: Is it not a fact that in the two previous plebiscites in 1911 and 1915, the method adopted was by signed ballot, extending over a period of ten days or two weeks?

Mr. WILSON: It certainly was. If the basis of union brought about by a vote taken in 1911 and 1915 was satisfactory at that time, I do not know why a vote taken in the same way would not be satisfactory again. I asked the question, what has brought about this unfortunate position in the church? I am speaking now principally as to the Presbyterian church, because I am not as well known in or associated with the other churches, and I would not wish to express an opinion in regard to their organizations. I ask what has brought about this regrettable position in the Presbyterian church? It is largely brought about because the leaders of that church have failed to fulfil the promises they made to the people, and I wish to prove that. I have a great deal of respect for the men who made the statements they did, but I regret that they have not carried out the principles to which they gave expression at that time. Principal Patrick, speaking at the assembly in 1905, said:

> They wanted to carry all the three churches into the union. From first to last the question must be a people's question.

President Falconer in 1906 is reported as follows:

> From the commencement he had put in the forefront that it would be utter madness to go forward to a union that did not carry a whole church with it. It was absurd to think that the assembly could force its will on the people.

The next quotation is from Dr. W. J. Clark in the assembly of 1914, as follows:

> The Reverend Mr. Clark said he thought a second vote of the people ought to be taken. He declared that if it was proved by such a vote that a considerable minority was not in favour of union he would regret the fact, but he would not force the issue. He went on to say, that there was no such thing as attempting to force union on the church.

I have a great deal of respect for the Reverend Dr. Clark, because he happened to be my Sunday school and Bible class teacher. I know that no man stands higher than he does or did in the counsels of the Presbyterian church and I regret to learn that he is not in as good health as he formerly was.

I made the statement that the condition we are in to-day was brought about because some of the so-called and self-appointed leaders of the Presbyterian church had not lived up to the promises they had given to the people. Now what was the vote? The vote was:

	For union	Against union
1911..	113,000	50,733

In 1911 the Presbyterian Assembly and the members of it thought the opposition was too great and they would not proceed with union. They took another vote in 1915, and what was the result? It was as follows:

	For union	Against union
1915..	113,600	73,735

There was an increase of 600 in favour of union, and an increase of 23,000 against it. Now look at the history of the case. In 1911 they said the opposition was too great and they would not proceed. But in 1915, with a vote of 23,000 more against union, they decided to go on with it. Now that is regrettable, and I say that the so-called leaders of the Presbyterian church have largely brought about the condition of affairs that exists to-day.

If this matter is to be settled—and I claim it can be settled—there are one or two ways of doing it. In this so-called union what takes place? The Presbyterian Church in Canada is taken unto the union. The name is not going to be used; but the unionists will not allow those who do not want to go into the organization to call themselves the Presbyterian Church in Canada. I maintain that if they allow those who wish to remain Presbyterians to stand and hold the name, one of the greatest difficulties will be removed. They say "What is in a name"? What is the difference between "in" and "of"? It means practically all the difference in the world. It means that when they take the Presbyterian Church in Canada they take their record, they take their trusts and everything with it, and then they say in their generosity afterwards, "You can call yourselves Presbyterians, but it must be the Presbyterian Church of Canada, because we have absorbed in the United Church of Canada the Presbyterian Church in Canada." What is in a name? There is a great deal in a name, although some people do not think so. Some people that were formerly called Smith, now call themselves Smyths. Some people that were formerly called Gander now call themselves Gandier. The new idea, modern thought, modernism, has brought this about. But some of us are satisfied to remain known by the name that we received and we are proud to try to uphold the honour of that name.

Mr. PUTNAM: Will the hon. gentleman permit what I think is a correction, and I would ask him to take my motives as entirely artless? He stated a moment ago that the United church would prescribe for the dissentients a new name, the Presbyterian Church of Canada. They do not arrogate any such thing to themselves. They give that merely as an example of a name that might be used, very closely allied to the present name. The word "of" is substituted for the word "in." They say: You may use any name in heaven or earth except the name the Presbyterian Church in Canada.

[Mr. Wilson.]

Mr. WILSON: If there is no difference, why do the unionists not allow us to use the name the Presbyterian Church in Canada? If the matter is of minor importance to the unionists, why do they not leave that name to those of us who wish to remain in and to uphold the traditions of the Presbyterian Church in Canada? Why have they adopted the policy of taking the name in and abandoning the child on the door-step?

Mr. PUTNAM: Is that question to me?

Mr. WILSON: I do not know. I am making the statement. If the hon. member wishes to interrupt me again, I am prepared to answer any question provided that I am able to do so.

Mr. CARROLL: What is the present name?

Mr. WILSON: The Presbyterian Church in Canada.

Mr. CARROLL: You want that to remain?

Mr. WILSON: Yes, and I do not think any good reason can be given why, if this new church does not intend to use that name, the name should not rest with those who want to remain in the Presbyterian Church in Canada. The Presbyterian church is not a national church, it is an international church. It has its branches in all parts of the world. It has a proud record, and those of us who have been associated with it for years are satisfied to remain in it. We have no objection to others taking any other name they like; but we think that the doctrines which we have been taught in the church of our fathers should be left to us and to us alone and not given to those who intend to take the name in merely for the purpose of destroying it.

It is stated that this question has been under discussion for about twenty years and also that it is regrettable that a year or two years' delay is proposed in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). It is a strange thing that while they have been considering this question for twenty years and we have been told that it is being done in the interest of economy, all through the hearing—and I do not think I missed five minutes of all that hearing—I never once heard any of the witnesses put forward the argument in favour of economy. In fact, they know better. Although they try to tell us that this has been in the air for twenty years; that we have to keep our pledge with the other churches; that this and that should be done, and that it is all in the interest of economy, they know that we have found the different churches—I do not refer to any one in particular—building a church right under the eaves of another church. There is no question about that. Yet they would lead us to believe that this is all in the interest of economy. I have heard some of the advocates of union, speaking on behalf of this movement, state that they were so much imbued with the idea that the union movement was the correct thing that they were prepared to leave the Presbyterian church if they did not take a stick of property with them. But that situation is entirely changed when you come to the Private Bills committee of this House. As far as I have seen those who want to remain in the Presbyterian church, no one is opposed to a fair division of the property; and if any bill can be introduced into this House or any amendment drafted whereby the minority, or the so-called minority, because I doubt very much if to-day it is a minority, of the Presbyterian church may be allowed to use the name the Presbyterian Church in Canada if the churches are allowed the right to vote themselves into the union, and if provision is made that a commission shall be appointed, not of nine men, because that is simply adding to the expense, but of one, I am satisfied that the Presbyterian Church in Canada will abide by the decision of that commissioner. All that they are anxious for is to retain their name, because they believe in the traditions and the history of their church, and they are proud of the record of the Presbyterian Church in Canada.

One of the most regrettable incidents that I have ever experienced or ever expect again to experience is to hear the so-called leaders of the Presbyterian church do what before the Private Bills committee? Ridicule the doctrines of the Presbyterian church, say that they took the vows with a mental reservation. When that statement was made by one of the leaders of the church, it could not help causing indignation in the breast of everybody that was at that meeting, because if it is modernism, for men who take a vow to uphold the doctrines of the church into which they were ordained, to come before a committee and ridicule and, for other reasons, make light of their vow, then I prefer to stand by the religion that I was taught at my mother's knee rather than to follow the leaders of the Presbyterian church who appeared before the Private Bills committee.

It is said that a minority in the Presbyterian church is opposed to union. We do not agree that such is the case, but for the sake of argument, let us admit that there is a minority. If one of the contracting parties to this union is less in number than the so-called minority and if they are looked after, why should this minority not be looked after? I looked up the records of the Congregational church, and so far as I can obtain them, there are about 32,000 members. Yet their rights are to be protected, and rightly so, in going into this union; but those that form the so-called minority are much greater in numbers, and I do not think any one would gainsay that the Presbyterians in the Dominion of Canada far outnumber those who belong to the Congregational church.

I maintain that the minority has its rights, and you cannot force anyone into a church to which he does not wish to belong. To-day I happen to be a Protestant. Why? It is a question of environment; I am one because my people happened to be Protestants. Similarly, I happen to be a Presbyterian because my people were Presbyterians and largely because I was taught the doctrines of the Presbyterian church. I am not one of those sticklers who believe that it will be a question of the church to which people belonged when it comes to the final summing up; I do not believe that. I certainly do believe however that every person should enjoy civil and religious liberty. I do not deny that right to anyone and I demand the same right for myself; and I defy any church court, any legislature or any parliament or individual to take it from me. It cannot be done. You may pass all the laws you like but you can never take away my liberty of conscience. I owe that to no earthly potentate.

I saw in a newspaper this description of a meeting:

> Inter-party intrigues by crafty strategists; cross-currents of racial origins and creeds; propaganda reduced to its most subtle, insidious and consummate ends; excited, turbulent delegates.

When I read that I thought that possibly it was a descriptive introduction to a report of one of the meetings of the Private Bills committee, but as I read further on I discovered that it was only a description of a Democratic convention in the United States. It is a well known fact that you cannot make two clocks run alike; nor can any state or church compel people of different qualities and different calibre of brain to think alike. It is impossible. I say, therefore, to those who are insistent upon this church union that while they have a perfect right to exercise their own will in matters that concern themselves, while they have an undoubted right to enter the United church, they have no right to attempt to coerce me or anyone else into joining that church. I cannot see what objection there can be to referring this matter to the courts. We struggled with the bill in the Private Bills committee and heard the viewpoints advanced by the different factions; and having considered the whole subject I have come to the conclusion that the report of the Private Bills committee should be approved by this House and the bill as submitted adopted. I do not believe that any organization should come to the lawmakers and ask them to become lawbreakers. I say that the law of trusts is one of the most sacred laws which this or any other country can possess; I do not think it is right for anyone to come and ask parliament to pass a law to provide that property which John Brown left to the Presbyterian Church in Canada should be handed over to the United Church of Canada. This church union proposal will have far-reaching effects, and it is a matter of regret to me that so many things that should not be done are being done in the name of religion. Those who are anxious to see the movement consummated should abide by the law of trusts in so far as it relates to this matter. Let me read to you the Act of Incorporation of Knox College:

> It shall be lawful for the synod of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, at its next ordinary meeting after the passing of this act, to declare, by a resolution or a by-law to that effect and record in the register of proceedings of the said synod, the theological doctrines and principles which shall be taught in the said college, or what are the books and documents in which the said principles and doctrines are contained; and such declaration so made and recorded shall be irrevocable insofar as the said college shall be concerned, and shall be held at all times thereafter to contain the theological doctrines and principles to be taught in the said college, and for the propagation of which the property now held for the said college, or hereafter acquired for the same, shall be appropriated, and to no other.

"And to no other." Yet we have them coming before parliament and asking us to change the law of trusts—asking the lawmakers to become lawbreakers. Let me refer once again to the regrettable fact of the ridiculing of the doctrines of Presbyterian faith. Does any hon. gentleman think that this will have any good effect in the missionary work of this or any other church? When the missionaries come to knowledge of the fact that men who have taken vows to uphold the doctrines of the Presbyterian church declare that they took those vows with a mental reservation, I am sure the heathen world will be edified to learn that the so-called leaders of the Presbyterian church have stultified themselves before the Private Bills committee of this House in making a declaration in the hope—of what?—in the hope of getting votes. We have been threatened; unquestionably. Here is the threat, which every one has seen, that members of parliament at the next general election will find this question made an issue.

Mr. PUTNAM: Who made that threat?

Mr. WILSON: Dr. Chown.

Mr. PUTNAM: Will the hon. member read it?

Mr. WILSON: Yes. Referring to the action taken at Toronto he said:

> We appreciate Mr. Nickle's zeal for union, but we cannot forget that fifteen out of seventeen Anglicans were opposed to it, and at present there is a prospect of one of the liveliest religious controversies being thrown into the political arena, and fought to a finish at the next election. The unionists are not seeking this, but if it is forced upon them they will certainly not decline it.

Any leader of a religious denomination is ill advised to make such a threat. Let me tell you what happened forty years ago, when I was a lad, when the chief magistrate in the town tried to prevent the Salvation Army from holding its meetings on the street. One of my forebears took part in that controversy, which was made a political question at the next election. The result was never in doubt; the men who wanted to deny the minority civil and religious liberty were simply cast out; the people would not stand for any such thing. I believe in the rights of minorities and I believe, as we all believe, that under the Union Jack we have every right to enjoy and in fact do enjoy civil and religious liberty. I am proud to live beside friends who do not believe in the same doctrines I hold. I may not believe in theirs, but probably they are more devout than I am, and possibly their views may be right. Only in the final analysis let us all remember that no one has ever come back. You may be right, I may be right, but I certainly will say to the minority or to the individual: You have a perfect right to worship the way you wish, and I for my part will always respect your viewpoint.

Mr. PUTNAM: If I may interject an observation—it is important that Dr. Chown should not be misrepresented. I take it that the true interpretation of the passage which the hon. member read a moment ago is that if somebody else made this an issue in the next election the unionists would meet the issue; but it is no threat from Dr. Chown that he will precipitate the issue, as my hon. friend inadvertently represented.

Mr. WILSON: I do not wish to inadvertently misrepresent any one. The same threat has been made by others,—it has been made by members of the Presbyterian church.

Mr. PUTNAM: I ask that that passage be read. I submit that it does not bear the construction which my hon. friend places upon it.

Mr. WILSON: An incident took place right in this city after the meeting of the Private Bills committee, when a reverend gentleman made a threat of the same nature. But they are all idle threats. I have more respect for the intelligence of my constituents than to think that any of them would be carried away by a threat that at the next general election church union will be introduced as an issue. This is a question for every one to decide as his conscience dictates. As far as I am personally concerned, I do not care who makes such a threat in my constituency, I am prepared to stand by the rights of the minority, and to give that minority freedom to worship in the way they wish.

Mr. PUTNAM: Will the hon. member retract or again read the statement by Dr. Chown which he interprets as a threat?

Mr. WILSON: I read the statement which is said to have been made by Dr. Chown. I am not putting it up to him or to anybody else.

Mr. BIRD: Was the reference by Dr. Chown to a Dominion election or a provincial election in Ontario?

Mr. WILSON: It would not make a bit of difference what election he was referring to; the issue was certainly to be brought into the political arena.

Mr. BIRD: The statement was not made in reference to the Dominion at all, but to a specific instance in Ontario.

Mr. WILSON: He was making a reference to what took place before the Private Bills committee of the Ontario legislature, but it is the same thing.

Mr. BIRD: He made the threat after the committee had met and decided to amend the bill.

Mr. WILSON: Yes.

Mr. BIRD: In what way was it a threat, then?

Mr. WILSON: Any man who will say that how I voted on church union is going to be an issue in the next general election is making a political threat. What has that got to do with the government of the country or with politics?

Mr. BIRD: The Rev. Dr. Chown is a very responsible person, and I am sure he is not given to making foolish statements. I have read quite frequently the statement attributed to him, and I ask the hon. gentleman to give his opinion as to whether that was not fair comment upon something that had been already decided.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What did Ralph Connor say?

Mr. WILSON: You have had an opportunity to speak, and you heard this man in committee as I did. My reference was to a statement issued by the Rev. Dr. Chown. He is wrong in his statement of facts, because he refers to Mr. Nickle as an Anglican, although that gentleman as a matter of fact is a Presbyterian; he comes in for blame all the same. I do not care whether Dr. Chown, Ralph Connor or anybody else made this threat—and there are others who made it; it has been made throughout the length and breadth of this country—it will not make a particle of difference to me personally, for I believe in the intelligence of my constituents and that they will judge according to the facts. Therefore I am not afraid of the issue in any case. I believe that conciliation is the proper procedure. I believe, and I said so in the Private Bills committee, that any course that would bring about a settlement of this matter should be adopted, I still believe it is the right course to follow as regards the Presbyterian church. I would say to the members of that church, quoting the words of a text that I once heard preached from Genesis 13, verses 8 and 9:

> And Abram said unto Lot, Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen; for we be brethren.
> Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me: If thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left.

That is the spirit of conciliation in which this bill should have been framed, and if the bill had been framed in this spirit, with equal rights to all and special privileges to none, we would not have been in this turmoil today, and we would not have brought disgrace upon Christianity and religion in this country.

Mr. FORKE: My hon. friend will notice that in the passage of scripture he quoted Abram gave the opposition the first and the best choice.

Mr. WILSON: I would remind the leader of the Progressive party that there are two irreconcilable factions in the Presbyterian church, and that the only way out is for those two factions to agree to separate and to say to each other: Let the separation be fair, and let us part as friends. That is the stand I take.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, I very much regret the circumstances which make it necessary for me to state to the committee the reasons why I propose voting contrary to the report of the Private Bills committee in so far as the clause now under consideration is concerned. As a general rule, 9 p.m. when an important bill such as this is referred to a committee of the House, I am inclined to accept the decision of the committee, especially when, as in this case, the committee has given very intimate and close study to the subject matter of the bill. However, on this occasion I find myself in a position where I cannot agree with the findings of the committee in some respects, indeed I think only in regard to this clause, and it is my intention to make clear the reasons why I shall support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown).

Before doing so I desire to say a word or two in reply to the observations made by my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Wilson). I very deeply appreciate the intensity of feeling and the sincerity of purpose which actuated him to take the stand he does, and to me it is most painful to find myself in any sense in a controversial position with relation to him. But I do not wish to accept his final dictum that we must part company, one going to the right hand and the other to the left. I want to sit beside him here with all the cordiality that has characterized our companionship during the past, and at the same time exercise the privilege of differing with him—and perhaps several others—in respect to this matter.

My hon. friend refers to the desirability of another ballot vote. This I conceive to be within the polity, within the jurdisdiction of the church itself; I do not think it is the function or the right of parliament to interfere with the method of handling the church's own business. I take a very clear stand in that regard: It is the right of any organized religious body to determine within itself just what form of procedure it shall follow with respect to its action in any given matter. So I cannot agree with my hon. friend that this parliament is called upon to decide whether or not another ballot should be taken, nor would I arrogate to myself even the passing of an opinion upon the course pursued by the Presbyterian church in that regard.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is the hon. gentleman aware that already the Private Bills committee have directed how ballots shall be taken in this same church?

Mr. STEVENS: I assume that that question has reference to something made necessary in order to give effect to the bill itself.

Another question arose in connection with my hon. friend's observations, to which I wish to refer. I earnestly and heartily concur in his desire to preserve inviolate the religious liberty which has characterized the practice of all sections of our Empire for many years. That right of personal religious liberty was bought some centuries ago, and I will step forward with my hon. friend in preserving it.

Now let me turn to the question itself. I have before me the bill as introduced to parliament. The question before us is section 2 of the bill, which is an innovation introduced by the committee having the bill in charge. In amendment to that is the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) which simply states that—

> This act shall come into force on the 10th day of June, 1925, except the provisions required to permit the vote provided for in section 10 being taken, which shall come into force on the 10th day of December, 1924.

Now, Bill No. 47, introduced into this House and given a first reading on April 10, 1924, has a certain preamble which sets forth the principle of the bill. I wish to quote this preamble:

> Whereas The Presbyterian Church in Canada, The Methodist Church and The Congregational Churches of Canada have by their petition represented that, believing the promotion of Christian unity to be in accordance with the Divine Will, they recognize the obligation to seek and promote union with other churches adhering to the same fundamental principles of the Christian faith, and that, having the right to unite with one another without loss of their identity upon terms which they find to be consistent with such principles, they have adopted a basis of union which is set forth in schedule A to this act and have agreed to unite and form one body or denomination of Christians under the name of "The United Church of Canada;" and have prayed that it may be enacted as hereinafter set forth; And whereas it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petition: Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

That was the preamble, and in passing the second reading of the bill parliament placed itself on record as accepting the principle of the bill. Let us examine this matter a little more minutely. Parliament by the second reading has formally adopted the principle that the Presbyterian church, the Methodist church and the Congregational church have the right to unite. That being the case parliament cannot further consider whether that right exists; we have already definitely disposed of that question by the adoption of the principle.

Mr. MacLAREN: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Private Bills committee could either accept or reject the principle of the bill as stated in the preamble?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, the Private Bills committee could have rejected the preamble and could have reported to this House that they had done so.

Mr. MacLAREN: Could they have modified it?

Mr. STEVENS: They could. But let me pursue my argument. My point is that we have adopted the principle of this bill.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Was it not agreed that the bill should pass its second reading without discussion as to principle?

Mr. STEVENS: I think that was agreed.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Then why say that the principle has been accepted?

Mr. STEVENS: I think it was agreed not only by this House but everywhere; not only in parliament, but universally throughout the country it was recognized that this union should be brought about.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Will my hon. friend permit me—

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to complete my argument on this point.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend but may I be permitted to ask him whether he is attempting to assert that parliament committed itself to the principle of this bill, when it was distinctly understood by every one in the House that the bill was simply going to committee for consideration without any commitment as to principle?

Mr. STEVENS: I think my hon. friend will recognize in my next point an answer to his question, if I may be permitted to pursue it for a moment. I have stated that the principle of the bill was accepted by the House.

Mr. MacLAREN: I challenge that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps we might admit it for the sake of argument.

Mr. MacLAREN: No, I challenge my hon. friend's statement on that point.

Mr. STEVENS: That is quite all right; my hon. friend has a perfect right to differ. I think, however, that I am arguing from a sound parliamentary basis. My next point is this: This is a private bill. It is not a bill that found its origin within parliament as a public bill, brought here for a public purpose. It is a private bill; it is exactly the same as a bill brought into this House to amalgamate three industrial concerns, three commercial concerns, three insurance companies, three banks, or three railways—any industry that you choose to name. It is a private measure brought here by three recognized bodies. Let us for a moment leave the question of religion and church out of it.

Mr. MacLAREN: Will my hon. friend permit a question there? I will not ask it unless he is quite agreeable.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite all right.

Mr. MacLAREN: Is it not the case in the matter of private bills that the second reading does not involve an acceptance of the preamble?

Mr. STEVENS: I am not a final authority, but subject to correction by those who are better versed in the matter than myself I would say this: Whether it is a private bill or a public bill, the second reading of the bill by the House is an adoption of the principle of the bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. STEVENS: I submit that is sound. I should like some much older and more experienced parliamentarian than myself to offer the correction. Let me pursue my point. This is then a private bill brought to this House as it is the right—I want this point to be made perfectly clear—brought to this House as it is the right of any private citizen to bring legislation here. That is, the public have a right to bring to this House their petition, in the form of a bill, and ask that this petition shall be given consideration and shall be made law by parliament. Now then, what is the duty of parliament in considering the petition? In connection with private bills it is not the duty, it is not the function, of parliament to take that private bill and change it and make out of that whatever it likes. I assert that it is the duty and function of parliament to scrutinize such private bill and to ascertain that there is nothing in it that violates the rights of others not included in the petition. Now, that is the function of parliament. But let me get this point clear in the minds of hon. members: It is not the duty or function of parliament to take a piece of private legislation and change it or mould it to suit itself. It can do it, it has the power, I do not deny that; but I say in dealing with private legislation the function of parliament is to take that private legislation and examine the petition. If the petition is in order, if it is constitutional, if it does not violate the rights of the people or the constitution of the country, then it is the duty of parliament to grant that petition.

This bill comes before us in that form. It comes from three recognized bodies. Let us leave the churches alone for a moment; it comes from three recognized bodies. They present the bill to parliament. It is read a first time, then a second time by common consent, it is true. Then, recognizing that the detailed features of the bill are perhaps controversial it goes to a special committee for consideration, but here is where I challenge the right of the special committee. Not that they are not empowered to scrutinize every word, every line of the bill and see that it is in harmony with public interst and public right, but I do say that I question the right of the committee to so alter the bill as to change the principle and the intention of the measure itself. Now, let me explain what I mean.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Does the hon. member think that the bill of an industrial concern coming to parliament and being referred to the Private Bills committee in the form that this bill was, and in the face of so much opposition, would be considered for one moment by the Private Bills committee?

Mr. STEVENS: Undoubtedly it would. In my brief experience of some fourteen years in this House I can recall many bills which, while perhaps not arousing the general interest that this bill has, did evoke the most intense opposition and controversy. Other members who have sat here for many years will particularly recall many instances in the years gone by where bills have been fought most bitterly and over long periods of time. Let me say to the hon. member who asked the question that I am not for one moment disputing the right of anyone to attack or resist the passing of legislation in this House private or public.

Now, let us come to the amendment. I have cited these three bodies, now I must name them—the Presbyterian church, the Methodist church and the Congregational church, long recognized as three great religious bodies; not religious bodies only, but groups of citizens banded together for religious purposes and also possessed of large property rights and interests in the country. Because of this it was necessary that they should come to parliament in order to secure this legislation. What for? In order that this united body might be put in a position—shall I say socially as related to the rest of the people?—where it can function as a body, not only as a church but function as a body—receive moneys, spend moneys, hold property, dispose of property, carry on social welfare work, carry on missionary institutions, and all these various appendages of a religious organization. So they come to parliament and ask parliament, a well recognized necessity—to clothe them with certain powers and with certain rights. Now, then, the amendment injected into this bill in the committee to my mind attacks the very principle of the bill.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Is my hon. friend aware—seeing that he is endeavouring to draw an argument from the proposition that this bill is just the same as if we were dealing with three companies who desired to come together—that under the laws of the Joint Stock Companies Acts before any such combination as asked here can be brought into effect in regard to these incorporated companies there must be a vote of two-thirds of the shareholders?

Mr. STEVENS: Not necessarily.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Absolutely, that is the law.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will pardon me for a moment—I do not want to be too dogmatic, although he appears to be pretty dogmatic himself—not necessarily. We will assume there are three railway companies. I recall instances—I cannot recall the names and the dates, but I do recall the instances—where the Railway committee, not necessarily, have in their private acts so clothed these companies with powers to transact their business and conduct their affairs in a certain way. Now, I deal with my hon. friend's interruption in this manner. My contention is that we have no business to go back into the polity or the rights and the procedures of any of these churches. All we have to ask is: Have these organizations come before parliament clothed with proper authority within their own constitutions? Have I made myself clear? I happen to be more familiar with the Methodist church than with the Presbyterian. I am not going to argue anything about the internal polity of any of them but I say that the Methodist church come before parliament and say "We have done thus and so. Our constitution, our church laws, demand that we should pass certain resolutions and that we should go through certain procedure." All that parliament is called upon to do is to say to them "Have you gone through that procedure"? They say "Yes, here is the procedure." The Congregational church says the same and the Presbyterian church. Now, what I contend is this—

An hon. MEMBER: That is disputed.

Mr. STEVENS: If the hon. member will let me complete my argument. I claim it is not my business as a member of this House to go into the question whether the Methodist church in its method was wise or unwise. That is not my business. All I have to do is to see whether or not these applicants come before parliament in the proper manner. I contend that so far as I am able to judge they have done so in this case. I do regret, just as profoundly as my hon. friends who take a different view, the schism that has grown and developed in the Presbyterian church over this question. Furthermore I have the profoundest sympathy with any minorities whether Presbyterian, Methodist or Congregational. I say further—coming back to the interruption of the Minister of National Defence—whether it is a church or a private company, if it can be shown that there are certain minority rights that appear not to be safeguarded then it is the duty of parliament to safeguard those rights.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: Undoubtedly it is the duty of parliament to safeguard those rights.

Mr. MacLAREN: While the hon. gentleman is on that point I will ask a question. Is he aware that the authority of the General Assembly to proceed to union was disputed strongly before the select committee, that there were many representations made before the Private Bills committee to the effect that the General Assembly had not this power or authority?

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite aware that there was undoubtedly criticism of the method and so forth within the Presbyterian church, but I cannot say that evidence has been brought forward to show that the Presbyterian church acted contrary to its own constitution.

Mr. MacLAREN: Was the hon. gentleman present during the taking of the evidence?

Mr. STEVENS: Only at times. I heard a very brillant and able address by Mr. Lafleur of Montreal, who, I thought, with his usual brilliancy, presented a case that was certainly very, very fine and sound; but I did note in that very excellent address, which I think everybody admired, that Mr. Lafleur made the declaration that it was unquestionably and undoubtedly the right of the Presbyterian church to change its doctrine, and he went so far as to say, when asked the question, that it was their right to change the doctrine to the extent that it might harmonize with or adopt the doctrine set forth in the basis of union. I am quite certain of that.

Mr. MacLAREN: Is the hon. gentleman quoting from the evidence?

Mr. STEVENS: From my own memory of it.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think the hon. gentleman's memory is very defective.

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite clear on the matter, because I followed Mr. Lafleur's address with intense interest. However, I only interjected that remark. I do not think it is essential at all, but I still claim it is not the duty of parliament to inquire into it. I merely interjected that statement in response to an interruption a moment ago. I want to point out to the committee that we have adopted, and I still insist that we have adopted, the preamble of the bill. We sent it to a committee. What was the preamble? That these three bodies claimed the right to unite. We accepted the position. We said, "Very good, we adopt your bill, and send it, so far as the details of the measure are concerned, to the Private Bills committee to work out". I find that that committee inserted a clause to this effect:

> This act shall not come into force until the first day of July, 1926, and not then unless the courts shall have finally decided the action now pending in the Supreme Court of Ontario that the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada had the power under its constitution and rules to agree to a union of the Presbyterian Church in Canada with the Methodist church, and Congregational church upon the basis of union, including the appendix on law as set out in schedule A of this act.

I quite appreciate that there are those who will differ with me, but I want to put my position clearly that we are not called upon to determine whether the Presbyterian church as a church had this right or that right within itself; but the question of its polity, or the question of its procedure, is something which it must determine itself; and furthermore the applicants for this measure representing the Presbyterian church undoubtedly show that they did follow the constitutional procedure of the Presbyterian church. That is my contention. Therefore I contend that this committee had no right to insert in the bill a clause that virtually declares that only two of the churches are right, and that the whole bill must be suspended until certain things are determined in the courts. My answer to that is that the right of appeal to the courts exists without any doubt, just the same whether this clause passes or not. They have the right of appeal just the same whether this clause is inserted in the bill or not, and no such right is being taken away from them.

I would like to say a few words about another feature of the bill. When this measure was introduced one of the things that appealed to me very strongly was the contention made by those opposed to the bill that the bill as it was introduced brought in the Presbyterian church—becoming specific for the moment—and gave a right to a minority to vote itself out. This minority claimed that this was an unfair advantage to take of them. In other words, they claimed that we were legislating to put them into the new United church, and that they were called upon to vote themselves out, and they contended—and to my mind contended properly—that they ought to have the opportunity of voting on the question as to whether they should come in or not. When that point was conceded it removed from my mind perhaps the most important obstacle that I saw to the passing of this act. When that was granted and first incorporated in the bill, the principle was reversed, and it was provided that before the Presbyterian church was incorporated in the United Church of Canada, they must do so by a vote, of their own volition, bringing them into that body. That, Mr. Chairman, seems to me to meet the more serious opposition that was presented to this House.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The way the evidence was taken does not appear to my hon. friend as being unfair?

Mr. STEVENS: I think not, no. I think the manner in which the evidence was taken is fair, indeed I would go to the extent of saying that it is not only fair but generous. I want to make clear to my hon. friend that this is not a light matter to my mind. It has been a very serious matter and I might say a painful matter to witness the dispute that is going on. I am simply trying to make my own position clear.

The suggestion is made that the passage of the bill will result in schism and division. Unfortunately I am afraid it is necessary to agree with that suggestion, and I regret to say that it is so. On the other hand, I want parliament to understand that that is not a fair appeal to parliament. It is not necessarily a ground upon which parliament should reject a bill. If that is to be presented as an argument for the rejection of the bill, then I am justified in presenting the argument that the rejection of the bill will undoubtedly work far greater hardship, and induce greater schisms than the passing of the bill. I do not admit that either one is a sound argument for or against the bill. We must not blind our eyes or be diverted from the path of duty which I think parliament should pursue by an argument of this kind.

An amendment was suggested a moment ago which virtually means this: The Methodist and Congregational churches to be joined, but that reference of the Presbyterian church and its dispute be made to the courts for further consideration. I appeal to the committee, let us give consideration to this matter. I think too little emphasis has been laid upon the fact that the Methodist church and the Congregational church have hitherto, throughout this whole matter presented themselves consistently and steadily in favour of this bill. They are applicants for this bill just as much as the Presbyterian church, and it would not be treating them with fairness to reserve one section, a very important section, for further consideration, and to say to the other two: You go ahead and join. I want parliament to remember that the basis of the whole matter is the union of these three bodies.

Mr. HOEY: Will the hon. member say that the Methodist and Congregational churches have the legal right to unite, seeing that the vote was taken on the union of the whole three? I do not think they have.

Mr. STEVENS: I would not like to express an opinion offhand on that; but as my hon. friend raises the question, it is one that might very well engage the attention of parliament. It would appear to me, at least offhand, that this suggested amendment must inevitably result in the withdrawal of the bill from parliament. I cannot see how the promoters of the bill, having in mind and working for years for the consummation of an ideal, that ideal being the union of these three bodies, could possibly carry on with, perhaps, one-half of it held in abeyance indefinitely by an action of this parliament.

My hon. friend (Mr. Wilson) a moment ago said that no evidence had been brought forward regarding the question of economy. I cannot speak so thoroughly for eastern Canada, but for thirty-one years, I have been passing through this Dominion from the East to the West very frequently. I know conditions in the three prairie provinces and in British Columbia, I think, fairly well, and I know that there are literally hundreds, and I believe I can say thousands of places where this union is and has been functioning. Why has it been functioning? Because the recognized authorities, within their own right, and constitutionally within their own right, declared that they were going on to the consummation of union; that they were going on to bring this union about, and these bodies found it necessary, for the sake of economy if you like, for the sake not only of economy, but of a better spirit in those isolated communities, to go ahead and unite. Throughout the whole of the West, in British Columbia and the three prairie provinces, you can find hundreds and thousands of places where the one pivotal point for religion and morality is to be found in a union church functioning under the basis of union, functioning by mutual agreement and arrangement between these three great bodies. This is what I want to impress once again on the committee. Is parliament, because of an internal dispute regarding, not the correctness, but the wisdom of a certain course of action on the part of one of the bodies, determined within their own rights, to reject this bill? That is the question which this committee must decide. I cannot bring myself to that viewpoint at all, and therefore I shall support the amendment and vote against section 2 of the bill as it is reported by the committee.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Has the arrangement that the hon. member spoke of in regard to the churches working in harmony been due to this union movement, or was it in operation for years before, by mutual agreement?

Mr. STEVENS: I think I can claim the right to answer that with a fair degree of definiteness, if my hon. friend will permit me to take a moment or two to do so. Any one acquainted with conditions, not only in the West, but in any new section of this country, northern Quebec or northern Ontario, but particularly in the West, knows that conditions themselves forced the churches to the consideration of this problem many years ago. It was the impetus of conditions, the impetus of the needs of the people from a monetary standpoint, from a standpoint of Christian unity, that made the parent bodies, the head offices at Toronto, recognize the need of getting together, and it was impelled by that that the officials, the leaders of the church, who from time to time, were brought together in connection with conferences, assemblies and congresses in various parts of the country, came to the conclusion that the only solution was an organic union of the whole of the three bodies. That is my answer to my hon. friend's question.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is not an answer.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Was that same union arrangement not in existence in Ontario and in the eastern provinces long before the question was broached?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot speak of Ontario. I can speak only of my personal experience. For the last twenty years, to my own knowledge, this has been a live issue in the West.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): As a member of this House who has no special interest in the bill other than to do what seems to be the right thing by all parties concerned, I cannot support the amendment of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). The hon. member, in proposing his amendment, suggested that there were only two points that should be considered. The one was whether the contracting parties had the right to enter the union, and the other was whether the minority in each of the congregations was being protected. From my point of view there is only one question to be considered, namely, whether the three parties had the right to contract the union, and whether the organization of the Presbyterian church as constituted had the right to agree to the amalgamation. I cannot surely be accused of voting against my hon. friend's amendment and wanting to support or promote the Westminster Confession of Faith. I cannot be accused of supporting those who are opposed to union on the ground that I may lose votes in my constituency. But I do not feel that it has been proven, either in the committee or in the House that the elders of the Presbyterian church had the right to consummate the amalgamation. No hon. member here has presented anything to show that the Presbyterian elders or the assembly had the right to consummate the amalgamation of these churches. That seems to me to be the only question to decide in the mind of a member who is not directly interested in the subject outside of his obligation as a member of parliament. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) contends that the assembly had the right; members of the Presbyterian persuasion contend that the assembly had not the right, and I would rather take the opinion in this case of members of the Presbyterian church than that of a member of one of the other contracting churches.

Mr. LEWIS: Will he not take then the opinion of members of the Presbyterian church at the last assembly, if that is what he is after? They have claimed for the last four years by an overwhelming majority for the last four years that they have that right.

Mr. CAHILL: My difficulty is exactly that. Had the Presbyterian Assembly the right to consummate the amalgamation? Can my hon. friend say yes?

Mr. LEWIS: Most decidedly.

Mr. BROWN: Does the hon. member consider that the Presbyterian church has any right at all or any other way of expressing itself? Perhaps he might indicate some other way by which the Presbyterian church could express itself, than through its courts.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): With the permission of my hon. friend I wish to say on that point in order to relieve any doubt: As regards my own constituents, a majority of the Presbyterians are opposed to the union of the three churches and three-fourths of the representatives who went to the assembly voted in favour of union. That did not represent the people.

Mr. CAHILL: The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Wilson) made the statement, as I understood it, that the assembly had not the right to consummate this amalgamation.

Mr. WILSON: That is what we claim and that is what we want to have settled by the courts.

Mr. CAHILL: The contention was made in the committee and it has been made in this House that it is well nigh impossible for any hon. member to come to a decision in this matter in view of the fact that members of parliament themselves hold contradictory views in regard to the powers of the General Assembly; some say that the assembly has the right to consummate the amalgamation while others are of the opposite opinion. Am I qualified then to sit as a judge in this matter? I am not, and what is more I contend that very few members are able to arrive at a really satisfactory conclusion. After all this is not a national question; it cannot be so considered by any stretch of the imagination. The next question is, so far as I am concerned, what will be the attitude of my constituents? No matter how interested a member of parliament may be in any question, when that question is not of a purely national character and one in regard to which he is in honour bound to take a national point of view, he is most apt to take the point of view of his constituency. I do not say that hon. members will necessarily do that, nor that the vote will be taken on that basis. So far as my constituency is concerned I do not think that it will make any material difference, and I do not say this because there are not a number of very estimable people in my constituency who belong to all of the churches concerned. I do not feel however that I am competent to sit as a judge in this matter and to determine whether or not the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church has the right to consummate this amalgamation. The bill as reported from the committee provides for judges in properly constituted courts to determine the question, and I should much prefer to take the judgment of those courts than that of members of parliament, especially members whose knowledge of the subject, like my own, makes it impossible for them to come to a sound decision. I therefore propose to vote against the amendment of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown).

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Had my name not been attached to the bill I would not venture now to offer any remarks on this subject. It has been so well and ably debated by hon. members both in the committee and in the House that I do not think I could add anything that would be of any great service in helping hon. members to come to a proper conclusion in the matter. Before I go any further I want to pay a tribute to hon. gentlemen on the character of the debate which we have had in the House on this measure, and I also desire to acknowledge the great respect I have for the sincerity of those who are opposed to the union. When I consider the zeal and the earnestness with which my hon. friend (Mr. MacLaren) advocates the retention of his church I can assure him he has my sympathy and my respect; I do not know whether he wants my sympathy but at all events he has my respect.

Mr. MacLAREN: I should like to have your co-operation.

Mr. FORKE: During the past few weeks, ever since this matter has come before parliament, most hon. gentlemen have been in receipt of numerous letters both for and against the bill. As my name has been coupled with the bill I think possibly I have received as large a number of letters as any other hon. member in the House. All through these letters from those who are opposed to the bill, and more especially I think from the women, there has run the one refrain—why cannot we leave things as they are, seeing that we are doing all right under present conditions? That seems all right, but it is impossible to go back; you cannot turn the wheels of progress backward and begin things anew. This might have been possible twenty years ago, but it is not possible to-day. I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Wilson) that there is a division in the Presbyterian church at the present time, and we have tried to settle the matter in the best way possible. I only hope that when the present situation has passed and when we have reached a decision there will be no hard feelings and that we shall each settle down to the work which is best calculated to advance the coming of the kingdom. But, let me emphasize, things cannot be left to drift; we have settled this question up to a certain point, and we must have it disposed of according to the dictates of justice.

In listening to the remarks of my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Cahill), I was struck with the difficulty which they must experience who are outside the bounds of these three churches in trying to understand the position in which the parties concerned find themselves to-day. Those who are familiar with the Presbyterian church and its doctrines and who have examined into the rights and wrongs of the case will no doubt conclude at least that the matter has gone through the different courts of the church in a regular manner. My hon. friend (Mr. Lewis) speaking this afternoon made a good argument to show why this decision had been reached by the Presbyterian General Assembly in a regular, constitutional way by the pursuit of Presbyterian procedure all through the various stages of the discussion until the question came to the supreme court of that church and was finally decided in favour of union. And this decision was arrived at after years of consideration. Sometimes those who are opposed to union talk about taking a plebiscite. Well, one of the things that has surprised me during the debate—and I want to speak with all due caution and without hurting the feelings of any one—one of the things, I say, which has surprised me has been the fact that those who are opposing the union, the ultra Presbyterians as we may call them, are the very Presbyterians who are finding fault with the courts of their own church and the decision that has been arrived at. It seems strange to me that those Presbyterians who are willing to enter into a union with the other churches admit the constitutionality of their course while those who desire to retain the church as it is question the right of those courts to legislate in the interests of the Presbyterian body. A good many statements have been made regarding the delegates who attended the General Assembly, and any one who has followed the argument advanced by the hon. member for Swift Current this afternoon will be convinced I am sure that the personnel of that assembly had been changed year by year and that it was not the same people who were voting. Another point that has been emphasized is that the same members went back year after year. But, Mr. Chairman, what fact strikes us most in human history? Is it not the fact that the older people grow the more conservative they become and the more opposed they are to change in any direction? Are not the older people more opposed to change than the younger folk? Naturally one would have supposed that if the same people were going back year after year the older people in the Presbyterian church, the conservative element, would be most opposed to making the change.

I want to say just a word touching my experience in my early years. An hon. member, I think my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), told us that he ate porridge in his youth and learned the Shorter Catechism. I can shake hands with the hon. member so far as that goes; I got the same sort of training, having been brought up in all the tenets and the doctrines of the church. My father was an elder of the church for over forty years, and there is not an hon. gentleman in this committee to whom the traditions and all the past history of the Presbyterian church are more dear than they are to myself. I can think of a little church at the foot of the Lammermoor hills in Scotland, the Free Church of Scotland, over the door of which there was an inscription telling that in the years gone by the minister had gone out from his church to gather with his congregation in the open air because they wanted to worship God as they saw fit.

These are some of the traditions of the Presbyterian church of which we are all proud. However, listening to the speech of the hon.

member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), I could not but be impressed by some of the remarks with relation to our experiences on the prairies. I admit, Mr. Chairman, that when I allowed my name to go on this bill as its sponsor I did not anticipate the strong opposition that it was going to meet with in this parliament. My experience had been that of the West, where I now realize that the sentiment for union is very much stronger perhaps than in other parts of the Dominion. But what happened in the little village of Pipestone where my home is may be interesting to hon. members. There we had a Methodist and a Presbyterian church, and during the war years the women met together to do war work, as all the women of Canada were then doing, working together patriotically for their country. From them came the first talk of union. They said: If we can work together for patriotic purposes, why cannot we unite on the great and wider field of religious tolerance and religious help. As a result a union of the two churches was brought about there.

We have denied the right, and I think every church has denied the right of the civil authority to interfere in any way with church polity or doctrine. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that that is not a subject for this parliament to take into consideration, that the three churches came as three bodies seeking merely for power to carry on their business as a single corporation. Now to refer this matter to the courts will lead to religious chaos and political confusion. All over the country to-day we have hundreds of churches where Presbyterians have been worshipping with Methodists, and Methodists with Presbyterians, looking forward to the time when this union would be accomplished and so bring about that greater union to which they all earnestly look forward.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend said a few minutes ago that there would be political confusion. How does he make that out?

Mr. FORKE: I think if this matter was once settled all our political difficulties and religious confusion would disappear.

Mr. DUFF: I can understand religious confusion, but where would political confusion come in? How is this a matter that can be dragged into politics?

Mr. FORKE: If the hon. member does not want to drag it into politics, I am sure I do not.

[Mr. Forke.]

Mr. DUFF: You just mentioned it, you spoke of political confusion.

Mr. FORKE: That probably was not an apt term. I hope the matter will not enter into politics, and I believe it will not. I realize that those who took part in the Private Bills committee and heard all the arguments both for and against are in a much better position to discuss this bill than those of us who are only taking it up now on the floor of the House, but I want to refer to two or three points. A good deal has been said about the traditions of the church and how dear they are to us. There are some grand things in human history; no great man belongs to any particular country; no great and noble traditions can be claimed by any individual, corporation, church or country: "We are the heirs of all the ages." If the Presbyterian church were to pass out of existence to-morrow, its traditions which we admire so much would still be the heritage of those who follow us. We have a Presbyterian hymn book, and naturally we think it is the best. But look over its pages, and you will find that its most beautiful hymns were written by members of all churches—one by a Roman Catholic, another by a Unitarian, and so on. We sing the hymns of Methodists and of Lutherans, and they express our feelings in the very best way possible. We talk about our doctrines and our beliefs and what we are ready to sacrifice for them, but, Mr. Chairman, the great and broad principles of religion are pretty much the same. To do justice, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with your Maker: That is the basis of any religion.

Mr. PUTNAM: Am I to understand that the hon. gentleman who is sponsor for this bill has no doubt in his mind that the General Assembly had power to seek this union?

Mr. FORKE: I have no doubt in the least, and I think I know something about the government of the Presbyterian church. The Blue Book of the Presbyterian church has been in my father's house ever since I remember the world. I think I know something about the government of the Presbyterian church, and I believe confidently that the General Assembly had full power to consummate this union.

Mr. PUTNAM: But suppose the hon. gentleman had a doubt, and believed that the suggested legislation would supply the "missing link", would he then want the bill passed? Because that is my attitude at present.

Mr. FORKE: If there was any doubt, of course it would have to be settled. I have no doubt as to the power of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church to bring about this union. But I am perfectly convinced that to get this matter settled in the courts is not quite so simple as some people think. There is no question that the taking of this matter into the courts would lead to endless confusion and waste of time. If you read the bill carefully you will find that by certain manipulation court proceedings could be prolonged for years. But while the decision of the courts is pending what is going to happen to those union churches that are now functioning by hundreds and by thousands all over the prairies? Settlements by resort to the courts seems all right in theory, but in practice I claim it would be a failure.

I hope there is no bitterness in this controversy. I thoroughly respect those who are opposed to the union. I believe all are sincere and all are working for what they believe to be best for our common country. But I would remind those who are 10 p.m. opposed to the union that the history of Scotland has been a history of fighting for lost causes. It fought against political union with England years ago, and it lost, but that apparent defeat turned out to be a great victory. I have no hesitation in saying, Mr. Chairman, that even if those who are opposed to church union lose their cause, I believe that in the years to come they will realize that through defeat they won a great victory, in that eventually there will be one united protestant church in Canada.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. gentleman stated that the history of Scotland is the history of fighting for lost causes. Is it not true that Scotland is still Scotland, and perhaps one of the greatest countries of the world?

Mr. FORKE: It is Scotland still, but it is part of Great Britain. You will notice that the three churches will retain their identity in this union and that the Presbyterian church will still be the Presbyterian church inside the United Church of Canada, just as Scotland is still part of Great Britain. So I think my hon. friend's analogy breaks down.

Mr. DUFF: But is Scotland known as Great Britain?

Mr. CALDWELL: It is part of the British Empire, but still Scotland.

Mr. DUFF: Absolutely; and the Presbyterian church would be part of the protestant church but still the Presbyterian church.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, I have tried to express why I believe in the union of the three churches into one united Protestant church in Canada. I am aware that it has been better argued from both sides than I could argue it. However, as a closing thought I want to say that I do believe good will come from this controversy. Some people have thought that there would be a schism among these great religious bodies of our country and that each one was going to suffer. I do not believe that is the case. I think the future will bring forth a renewed interest in religious life and that, union or no union, no harm will result from the steps that have been taken.

Mr. WILLIS KEITH BALDWIN (Stanstead): As I have listened to the discussion of this church union bill in the Private Bills committee and in this committee, I have thought that we should feel ourselves on consecrated ground. Indeed, the present circumstances are analogous, in a sense, to those surrounding the crucifixion of our Lord. His mental anguish in the Garden of Gethsemane was as great as His physical suffering when nailed upon the cross and when the spear entered His side. I believe the mental anguish of some hon. members has been great in listening to the discussion of this subject. We cannot forget the tens of thousands of people throughout Canada who have been hoping, waiting, and praying, for the uniting of these churches; that is something that we cannot treat lightly. I have been a church unionist for a long time. I was a church unionist long before the organic union of these three churches was discussed. The greatest sermon I ever heard on church union was in the city of Winnipeg nearly thirty years ago. It was the time of the great Silcox when you could not get into the Congregational church, when you could not get into the Methodist church, unless you got there long before the service started. I was invited to go to the Anglican cathedral. It was filled to overflowing, and had I not gone with friends I could not have entered. A young man stepped on to the platform dressed in tweed, who I believe is now Dr. Symonds, while the dignitaries round about wore their robes and surplices. Such a sermon for church unity I never heard. Through the mist of tears in my own eyes I could see the wet eyes of others, those who believed in comradeship and fellowship, who believed there was one Saviour and one Heaven, if we could ever be so unspeakably happy as to get there.

We are laying the foundations of one of the greatest countries on earth, that is Canada, and this church union movement is something that will promote the unity of our people. More than two millions of people are awaiting the consummation of this proposal. Let me paint a picture from the country to the south of us and see if we are not on the eve of one of the greatest advance movements in the history of the world. In New England there are many places with six churches and four hundred people. There are places in Pennsylvania with sixteen churches and less than a thousand people. There are places in Colorado, Idaho and Montana, where hundreds of people are asking for religious services that cannot have them. They are amalgamating in New England by calling themselves Community churches.

I heard a man say that there could be no United church in this country, that it could not be worked out. Now, I am not here to-night for controversy; I have no desire to be harsh with those who differ from me. But I want to tell that man that in a certain place in California there was built within two years a large Congregational church, because some wealthy people settled there, a Methodist church and an Anglican church. Subsequently they closed the Methodist and the Anglican churches, and joined up. That is only one instance among thousands in that great country to the south. They have in Alaska twenty-six missionaries of different denominations ministering to 50,000 natives. There is tremendous overlapping, tremendous waste, and the result is that the young men of our country will not take up the greatest work in the world, that of the glorifying of God. If this House was filled with ministers of the Gospel to-night and I asked them what they were created for, they could not give a better answer than that we were created to glorify God.

Some one has said that there would be no economic advantage in the unity of the churches. But think what a blessing it would be to have these churches united all over the country, with one head and one management. People have thought that the Christians of the world could have saved the Great War with its loss of nine million people on the battlefield and with its thousands of people broken hearted. Let me point out that the United States are seeking to disarm their churches so that they will not be proselytizing and working one to snatch from the other. They believe in the disarming of the churches, just as there is a growing belief in the disarming of nations in the interests of peace.

Now, some things have been said here that would make a person's blood run cold. If an hon member spoke with any spiritual ardour it was said that he hurt the cause. We know that we are in a materialistic age, and we should take heed lest we forget. Let us remember the fall of the Roman Empire, of Tyre and Carthage, and Babylon, and the dark ages which followed. Some hon. gentlemen smile, but if we cannot talk to-night as we feel, then the whole thing is a farce, and our having the Speaker at the opening of the day's sitting supplicate the Throne of Grace to guide us in our daily deliberations is also a farce. It seems to me terrible if the churches cannot unite, because I believe that when these people can unite it is an evidence that all who believe in the Lord Jesus Christ can unite.

A matter such as this should be discussed in a conciliatory spirit. I have heard six different members who had been anti-unionists declare that they now believe in the union of these churches. God help the churches unless there is a real spirit of unity abroad. I cannot see how you can have real unity if you argue against it. There is an amendment now before us to subordinate this parliament, the highest tribunal in the realm, to the Supreme Court of Ontario. So long as I occupy a seat in this House I shall never agree to a court of law overriding this legislative body. Notice has also been given of another amendment proposing to turn the question over to the Supreme Court of Canada for decision. I cannot see the wisdom of any such proposal as that. This movement is only the beginning of a united church in Canada. It is an exemplification of the spirit that is abroad throughout the world to-day. I ask hon. members to take notice and mark how this movement will grow. The spirit of Christ will eventually predominate in the hearts of men to the same extent as the waters stretch from continent to continent. May we all live to see the day when not only churches but nations will be united, when there shall be an international disarmament, in the real sense of the word and when race hatred and national hatred shall have passed away forever.

Mr. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I did not intend to take part in this debate but the rather unique position assumed by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has brought me to my feet. He has told us that if the House passes the second reading of a bill it immediately adopts the principle of the measure. Let me read what Bourinot has to say on that point:

> The second reading corresponds with the same stage in other bills, and in agreeing to it, the House affirms the general principle or expediency of the measure. There is, however, a distinction between the second reading of a public, and of a private bill, which should not be overlooked. A public bill being founded on reasons of state policy, the House, in agreeing to its second reading, accepts and affirms those reasons; but the expediency of a private bill, being mainly founded upon allegations of fact, which have not yet been proved, the House, in agreeing to its second reading, affirms the principle of the bill, conditionally, and subject to the proof of such allegations before the committee.

In respect to this particular bill the hon. member did not seem to be familiar either with what transpired in this House or in the committee. When the measure was introduced the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) spoke as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the hon. member agreed with me that there would be no discussion at this stage of the bill, on condition that I did not speak. The hon. member came across here and agreed with me that there would be no discussion on the second reading.

After some passages between the hon. member for Brandon and the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) the hon. member for St. John and Albert (Mr. MacLaren) spoke as follows:

> There is a great deal to be said on this bill, but I consider it more suitable to have the discussion at a later stage, and this is the reason I do not propose to discuss it just now, because as this is a private bill the second reading does not concede the principle of the bill.
> One point I wish to mention is this: I do not think that there is objection to the incorporation of the United church, provided that the church is for those who wish to go into it, and provided further that those who do not so desire may remain in their mother churches.

In the face of this the hon. member for Vancouver Centre tells us that when the bill has passed its second reading we have adopted the principle of the measure and therefore, forsooth, cannot change it; we cannot change the preamble or the principle of the bill. Well, any change that has been made in the bill does not change the principle; it is practically only postponing the coming into effect of the measure until the courts have decided the legal questions involved. And yet my hon. friend comes in hurriedly from participation in a political contest in the West, immediately gets busy upon the bill, and proceeds to enlighten us as to what has been going on in the committee and in the House for many days. Of course, he is not troubled with temerity on the subject of the church union bill. The hon. gentleman also made some remarks as to what happened in the Private Bills committee. I am rather surprised at what he said because I have been at the committee when bills of a commercial character were considered and were so cut up that when they emerged they did not in the slightest degree resemble their original character. Yet the hon. member says we cannot change the provisions of this particular bill; we cannot, as another hon. member suggests, lay our unholy hands upon it. Let me tell my hon. friend that while he has been absent from the House this matter has been discussed and we have absorbed some information in regard to it. Of course it may be that while he was away in the West, he, himself, obtained some information that he did not tell us about.

I have heard the remark made by hon. gentlemen around this House two or three times that the church majority should rule; they have argued that right from the beginning. Yet after this bill came to the House from the Private Bills committee it would seem they would not want a majority at all. I even doubt whether they want the wishes of a majority of hon. members here to prevail. The effort is being made here to upset something that the Private Bills committee have recommended after weeks and weeks of consideration.

There is only one more thing I wanted to draw attention to and that was in respect to the inquiry of the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill). I want to read a sentence from an argument that was used, because it is put in language much better than I could employ. I read first from the bill the following:

> That the union has been formed by the free and independent action of the said churches through their governing bodies and in accordance with their respective constitutions.

And the reply of Mr. Lafleur was as follows:

> Now my submission is that that declaration is not proved. Not only is it not proved, but I submit with deference that it has been actually disproved here. I do not profess to know what the constitutional powers of the Methodist and Congregational churches are. I am not concerned with that because there is an apparent unanimity on their part to join this United church. But what I do assert with confidence is that within the Presbyterian church there is no power given to the church court and to the highest of the church courts, the General Assembly to put an end to this church.

Mr. T. G. McBRIDE (Cariboo): One or two things have struck me very forcibly in the discussion in this House. One in particular is that hon. members who claim themselves to be Scotch fail to realize that they are now living in a civilized country and they seem to try to impress upon the House that they are responsible for establishing the Presbyterian Church in Canada. Allow me to tell them that they can claim no such credit as it was the Presbyterian Church of Ireland that established the Presbyterian Church in Canada. The Reverend James Murdock of the county of Donegal was the first permanently settled minister in Canada. His parish was the whole of the province of Nova Scotia. But the pioneer work of the Irish Presbyterian Church did not end in Nova Scotia; for while the Church of Scotland was hesitating and debating the advisability of undertaking missionary work in the far West, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland sent the Reverend John Hall, a licensed minister of Bailiboro, as a missionary to Vancouver Island, and to him is due the honour of planting the Presbyterian church west of the Rocky mountains. Not only so, but when the great rush of people left for the Yukon the call of the wild was heard for the Gospel, and again a member of the Irish Presbyterian Church was ready to answer the call. The Reverend Mr. Dickie, of Kildare, was the first to leave for the Klondike to carry the church work into that far north land.

Another matter I desire to draw to the attention of the committee has reference to the way this amendment was brought before the committee when the bill was under consideration. We had the bill before us for some three weeks. We had every opportunity to study it but this amendment was brought in, and inside of an hour after it was submitted it was put to a vote. It has been said by the chairman that it was an understood thing that counsel should not be heard with regard to the amendment, but the fact remains that counsel were heard on every other item in the bill from start to finish, with the exception of the preamble. I had understood the counsel could be heard and asked for this but the chairman ruled that he would not allow counsel to be heard. I maintain that the committee did not have the opportunity to study the amendment that they should have had, and that it was forced through that committee without giving those in charge of the bill a fair chance to consider it.

Mr. LEWIS: In fairness to the chairman, I think it ought to be stated that the committee decided against hearing counsel before he ruled that counsel should not be heard.

Mr. McBRIDE: Can the hon. member point that out in the evidence?

[Mr. McBride.]

Mr. LEWIS: I understood it was stated the other evening.

Mr. McBRIDE: In connection with remarks which have been made that 75 per cent of the Presbyterians are opposed to church union—

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. member says that the chairman was unfair in the committee in regard to the matter he was discussing. I object to that statement. The chairman is not here. The records will show an entirely different situation. If Mr. Mason had a certain time and was not allowed to speak, it was because of a pre-arrangement, and the records will show that. I want to correct the hon. member.

Mr. McBRIDE: I have no apology to make for the statement I have already made. I state that in my opinion the amendment was rushed through the committee, and the proof of that is that it was carried in less than an hour after it was brought in by the hon. member for Lunenburg. It was read, handed to the chairman and read by him. What time did they give the committee to study that amendment? We had the bill before us under consideration for about three weeks.

It has been said by hon. members that 75 per cent of the people of the Presbyterian church are opposed to church union. I state here to-night that not one per cent that I know of, in the constituency that I represent, are opposed to church union. If any hon. gentleman will stand up in this House and say that 75 per cent of the Presbyterians are opposed to church union, that is enough to discount any evidence or anything else he may have to present to the House. He has no right to make such a statement. The action of the General Assembly has proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that that is not correct, and the vote taken proves the same. I do not think it is the business of this House to work contrary to the action of the General Assembly, the head of the church. I ask those who are opposed to this union and who favour the continuance of the Presbyterian church, what government they want in the church? Do they recognize the General Assembly as the head of the church? If they do not, what authority do they place at the head of the church? What other organization is there that has not a head? The General Assembly is the head of the church, and I think it is up to this parliament to vote down the amendment and pass this bill as originally introduced.

Mr. T. H. McCONICA (Battleford): We have heard a good deal since this debate began about the rights of the minority and doing justice by the minority, and it comes from our Presbyterian brethren. I have perused with some care the rules and regulations governing the Presbyterian church, and I do not find that those rules and regulations recognize that there is such a thing as a minority. If the minority have rights they fail to show it in the regulations of the church. The rule of that church is that the majority govern, that I think is the rule in every Protestant church, and the rule is absolutely necessary to the continuance of any Protestant church. Otherwise, what have we? If the minority can impose its will upon the majority, what will be the result? Why, we may have half a dozen or a dozen minorities and each one will be ruling the roost. The only method by which a Protestant church can survive is for the majority to rule. When a man becomes a member of the Presbyterian church, he does so voluntarily. He does not acquire any property right in that organization. It is not like going into a business enterprise. The arrangement is purely voluntary on his part. He continues his membership and he retires when he sees fit. He is accepted if they see fit to take him. He is expelled if he does not behave himself according to the rules and regulations. The whole arrangement is an association at will. As I have said, he has no rights in the property. When he retires he takes none of it with him and, therefore, I say that he is merely there subject to the rules of that church. When he joins he agrees to be subject to the rules of the church, and those rules provide that the majority shall rule in the election of officers and so forth.

The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) is distressed because he cannot tell whether the proper procedure has been followed by the assembly of the Presbyterian church, and he, therefore, proposes to submit the matter to the courts. Let us go back of that a little. The hon. gentleman will find upon examining the records that two elections have been held and a very pronounced majority of those voting in both cases voted in favour of union.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Why was the second vote taken?

Mr. McCONICA: Because there was some complaint about the first. That is all there is about it. When a man joins the Presbyterian church he has the right to vote upon matters of that kind. He can vote which way he chooses, or if he feels so disposed, he may stand aside and let others determine the question for him. He is under no obligation to vote. He may feel that he is not competent to decide the proposition, or he may feel that he is not sufficiently interested to take the trouble to vote. But the point is that a very pronounced majority of those voting favoured the union. Whether that has been carried through in all respects regularly or not is not so important. What we want to know is: Did the Presbyterian church want the union? The vote taken upon two occasions, with ample opportunity for the members to exercise their right, shows that they did. Whether they exercised it or not, they acquiesced in it, and the union has been effected. The doctrines of the Presbyterian Church in Canada to-day are set forth in schedule A, and they will continue so to be, no matter whether this bill passes or not.

What is the proposition? We shall take this thing to the courts. They say: There is a serious division in the Presbyterian church. I am sorry to say that there is a good deal of division, and the longer this thing keeps up the more serious it will become. There is no question about that. If it goes to the courts, will that cure it? Supposing the court decides that the proceedings have been regular; that everything has been done in order, and ratifies the union, and some four or five years from now the union is perfected. Will that cure the wounds of hon. gentlemen who are complaining to-day? Certainly not. There will be a more serious division then than there is now. The sooner we get this thing consummated, the sooner we wind it up, the better it will be for the church, both the majority and the minority, in my opinion.

The hon. member (Mr. Wilson) complained that one minister made fun of the doctrines of the Presbyterian church, and he is seriously distressed about that. If this union fails and that gentleman continues as a minister in the Presbyterian church, will that heal the wounds of the hon. member; or, will the situation not be just as serious if he continues as a Presbyterian minister as if he goes with the union? I do not think that is a thing that could be settled one way or the other by the result of this vote. This matter has been hanging fire for twenty years. Everything has gone along with due deliberation. The Presbyterian church has voted upon two different occasions, and the terms of union have been agreed upon. It has been ratified by the General Assembly; it has been referred back to the presbyteries and ratified by them. It is to-day the doctrines of the Presbyterian Church in Canada and it will continue to be so. What will be the result if we do not pass this bill? We shall have the union. It will be a crippled, disordered affair; but it will be in existence, and when the courts have threshed the matter out, it will ultimately come to its full fruition.

But the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is distressed about his constituents. He says that they are against union. That is quite probable. He says that they voted against union. I quite agree with him. But what of it? If this bill goes through, they will still be Presbyterians. They will still worship just as they have been worshipping. They will still have their church. They will carry on their affairs as they have in the past. And I suppose they will continue to elect him to parliament just the same as they have done in the past. It is the proper thing that they should do so. But if a resolution should be introduced there that the minority candidate should go to parliament, there would be trouble in Pictou.

No one goes into this union unless he sees fit to do so. If they remain out, they keep their church; they keep their share of the general property; they go on as they have been doing. But one hon. gentleman says: They cannot use the word "in" in the name. The name must be the Presbyterian Church of Canada instead of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, and it is an international church. The Presbyterian church is international, but the Presbyterian Church in Canada is not international. It is a Canadian affair and it will be a Presbyterian Church in Canada whether the word "in" or the word "of" is used in connection with it. I hope that we can bring the matter to a decision now. Do not let us hang it up in the courts indefinitely because a church matter must be settled by the church. I seriously doubt whether any court will take cognizance of the proceedings that have gone on in the Presbyterian church looking to the consummation of the union.

Mr. LEON J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I do not propose to take up very much of the time of the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LADNER: Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear," but that is an easy and cheap way of shirking responsibility. This is not a matter that can be treated lightly, for it concerns nearly three million Canadian people who are adherents and members of the churches which are parties to this proposed union. In my own constituency there are a number of these people and I am going to express what I consider to be their prevailing will in this regard. There is not the slightest doubt in the mind of any one who reads the brilliant address delivered by Mr. Lafleur to the committee that the main objections of that gentleman to the bill are of a legal and technical nature: the loss of the identity of the church, and the powers of parliament, are what concern him most. I think there comes a time when parliament, which is the lawmaker in the country, must function without too much restriction by consideration of the technicalities of the case.

Some three million people concerned in these churches have been considering the question of church union for about twenty-two years, and during a considerable part of that time they have struggled to find a common ground of agreement on this question. We as members of parliament are asked now to face the responsibility of passing this legislation. What are we to do? Are we to express the prevailing will of the people who are concerned in the proposal, or shall we be impelled to a course of action by our own personal ideas and prejudices? We know that the Congregational and the Methodist churches and a large proportion of the Presbyterian body are desirous of having a union upon a certain basis. I think most members of the committee have heard much of the evidence and have read the propaganda which has been circulated in this matter; they have also seen authoritative data and are consequently in a position to consider and determine the fundamentals of the question just as well as the Private Bills committee which divided in the proportion of 27 to 23 after a consideration of the whole subject. Some hon. members say they will support the committee; that may seem the dignified thing to do. They say that the committee heard the evidence and know more about it than they do. No doubt the Private Bills committee heard the evidence, but apparently they were about evenly divided in their decision; and that is not the sort of verdict that will determine me in coming to my conclusion on this question.

We know that in 1915 a general vote was taken—no doubt the figures have been put on Hansard—and a conclusion was reached at that time as to the will of the communicants. I have here a paper containing the basis of union and all the essential facts relative to the events which would ensue upon a vote which should prove favourable to union. This document cites the basis of union which is now the basis of this bill. That vote was taken in 1915 and in an appendix there appears the following:

When a basis of union has been agreed upon by the negotiating churches the union shall be consummated and the United church incorporated by special act of parliament of Canada.

So that due notice was given of the procedure which would be adopted. What happened? There was a popular vote in the Presbyterian church favourable to union. There was unanimity on the part of the Methodists and the Congregationalists, and pursuant to the vote an agreement was worked out satisfactory to the committee of each of the churches concerned. The action of these committees was endorsed time and again by the constituted authorities of the Presbyterian church, and from 1916 until the present time they have been considering the matter and now have reached a conclusion. A certain number, the minority, do not agree with the decision and they come to parliament and say that although the petitioners ask for union they should be handed a lawsuit; because that is what it amounts to. Not only that; the bill is so framed that if the courts should declare that there has been some irregularity in the procedure of the General Assembly, then the whole legislation falls and those interested in the union will be unable to consummate their purpose without coming back to parliament again and going through the whole procedure which we have witnessed during the past few months.

Mr. MARTELL: Is it not true that litigation is pending at the present time and does the hon. member think that it would be fair for parliament to pass an act in such a way as to put out of court the other people who have begun action?

Mr. LADNER: In my opinion the writ is merely an excuse.

Mr. WILSON: That is not a fair statement and the hon. member should withdraw it.

Mr. LADNER: I will not withdraw it. That vote was taken, the agreement was arrived at during the war and there was a postponement of the controversy. At the next General Assembly following the close of the war the General Assembly met and pursued a course of action which was clear to all concerned. Why was that writ not issued in June of 1921 when it was known what was taking place? Why was it not issued in 1922 or 1923? Why did they wait until the last minute and then issue the writ and make it the basis of their opposition before the committee?

Mr. MacLAREN: If the hon. gentleman will allow me I will try to answer his question. The General Assembly can repeal, or change, or modify the decisions of the previous year as much or as little as they see fit; and there was no final decision until the application was made to parliament. Therefore no action could be taken. I would ask my hon. friend as well as others to read the letter, which I read the other day, from the learned counsel in the case, giving a full statement of the matter.

Mr. LADNER: Well, I submit that the principles and the basis of the agreement were determined about 1916. And how can the General Assembly change an agreement to which three churches are parties? I never heard of such a legal doctrine as that before. When three bodies, be they corporate or not, come to an agreement and execute it, and actually form unions among three thousand churches throughout the Dominion, surely there can be no authority in the General Assembly to alter the agreement without the consent of all parties concerned.

I return again to the writ issued in this matter. Some of the opposition to this measure comes from my friends sitting near me, and perhaps they will be interested in giving a satisfactory explanation of this significant fact, that a man having the power of the courts in his hands, and knowing the course of events, knowing that legislation was going to be sought to carry the union into effect, waits until parliament sits before he takes this remedy which he believes he has. He had three years to think over it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is it not a good time for him to do so now?

Mr. LADNER: Yes, but it does not carry the weight of a man who is really sincere in his motives. It reminds me of a man who fails to pay his notes for about five years, and then when he is sued comes back with a counterclaim which perhaps you never heard of before. I really think we must get beyond the technicalities of the law. Parliament is here to carry out, if it can, the prevailing will of the people, with due regard to the rights of the minorities concerned.

Mr. WILSON: Should litigation be the first or the last resort in a case of this kind?

Mr. LADNER: For my part I do not think there should be any litigation at all. There is no doubt that if these institutions are to be run in a practical and common sense way the democratic rule must be accepted—the rule of the majority, with fair treatment of the minority.

Mr. WILSON: Was there not a majority in the committee?

Mr. LADNER: Not when the majority is 27 against 23, and about 14 members rushed in at the last minute who did not know much about what they were voting for.

Mr. WILSON: I draw the attention of the committee to the fact that that statement is not correct.

Mr. LADNER: I am afraid my hon. friend is getting too serious about this.

Mr. WILSON: It is well to be serious and to stick to facts.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Chairman, my opinion regarding the vote is based upon information which I readily and willingly accept. I do not think I shall have any very serious dispute with my hon. friend as to that. The real objection to the proposal contained in this bill is to be found in the very able and brilliant legal address of Mr. Lafleur. He says that the church is losing its identity, and because of that the minority have a right to be heard. On the other hand, those urging the adoption of the measure contend that the identity of the church is not lost, that it is merged into a bigger organization in order that it may the better carry out the purpose for which it was founded. Mr. Lafleur also contends that it is beyond the power of parliament to enact certain legislation dealing with the question of property and of indemnity involved herein. That contention was answered conclusively by Mr. Tilley and by others to the effect that the bill proposes to deal only with property under the federal jurisdiction, so far as the federal powers apply, and with property under provincial jurisdiction so far as provincial powers apply. The argument of Mr. Lafleur is largely legal and technical, and I submit that the real point which concerns us as public men having the interests of all these people at heart is,—what the great majority of those interested in the churches concerned wish done. If there is fair and reasonable treatment of the minority, I think we must show the courage of our convictions and the sense of our responsibilities and make a conclusion of this matter before the controversy reaches a degree of bitterness that will bring neither respect nor good to the religious institutions of the country.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word or two in reply to the remarks of my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Ladner). He undertook to dispose of Mr. Lafleur's very learned argument before the committee by saying that it dealt entirely with technical points. I am sure that his description will not be borne out by any hon. gentleman who were present before the committee, nor by those who have read the printed address. Because my hon. friend does not happen to belong to any of the religious bodies which are affected by this bill, he assumes to take a detached view, but I would point out to him that one of the essential features of the whole controversy is that the Presbyterian church with its century-old traditions is held by its adherents and members in great respect and devotion. After the distinct undertaking given in the General Assembly during the war that nothing was to be done until after the war was over, to contend to-day that because a vote was taken nine years ago, parliament should assume that the opinion then expressed indicates the exact views of the men and women who compose that church to-day is, I submit, a very weak argument.

Mr. LADNER: Does the minister take into consideration the fact not only that the vote was taken but that pursuant to the vote an agreement was made in 1916?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): If my hon. friend will read the statement of the events in regard to this matter, submitted by me to the committee, from Rev. Dr. Gordon, former principal of Queen's university, he will find those events detailed with accuracy and he will be better informed in regard to what the real situation is. Suppose two companies with vast commercial interests had taken a vote nine years ago upon some question looking into the consolidation of their interests; would anybody seriously suggest that parliament could be expected, in view of the changes which have taken place in the business life of this country and of the other events that have occurred during the last nine years, to treat that expression of opinion as being the view of the shareholders of to-day? A great deal has been said about what the majority of the church said. There was a distinct resolution after the vote of 1915 by the assembly to the effect that nothing would be done on account of that vote.

Mr. LADNER: Where is that resolution to be found?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend will find it in a letter from Dr. Gordon that I quoted two nights ago. The assembly refused the request of those who wanted to maintain the Presbyterian church that another vote should be taken in order to determine what the views of the members and adherents of the church are to-day on this question. There has been no means of ascertaining what the real opinion of the church is to-day. Much has been said on all sides about the majority being in favour of this action,, but there is no evidence that there is such a majority. If those who compose the assembly felt that the majority of the church were in favour of union, why should they not take a plebiscite as they did in 1915? It may be said they did not have to do so, but if they did not have to do so, why did they do it on two occasions before?

Mr. LADNER: Does the minister say that the constitution of the church is such that a popular vote is required?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend is getting away from the main point. The last vote was taken in 1915, and following that the assembly decided they would take no action. Since 1915 there has been no expression of opinion on the part of the members and adherents of the church upon this question.

Mr. CRERAR: Is it not a fact that those opposed to union have stated even within the last year that if another vote was taken and that vote was in favour of union, they would not consider themselves bound by it?

Mr. BROWN: And is it not true that the responsible officers of the Presbyterian Church Association have taken that stand?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am not acquainted with the views of everybody who is opposed to action in this matter. I am simply arguing that it is not reasonable that an opinion expressed by a plebiscite in 1915 should be regarded as the opinion held by members and adherents of the church in 1924. At least 100,000 persons have come to manhood and womanhood and have joined the church since that time. Many changes have occurred as a result of the war, and I say that those who argue that a decision arrived at in 1915 is an indication of the view held at present is basing his argument upon very weak premises.

Mr. LADNER: What would the minister say with regard to the agreement or arrangement arrived at by the three churches following that decision? What would he do with regard to that agreement? What would he do with respect to the action taken by these three churches on the strength of that agreement?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend is evading the point.

Mr. LADNER' I am asking a question based on pertinent fact. The minister always says I am evading the issue.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): At the moment I am arguing that the assertion that a majority of the Presbyterian church is in favour of this legislation is not based upon any evidence. Those who are promoting this bill, the basis of which is supposed to be a spirit of true democracy, say that they come to parliament with legislation which has behind it the views of the majority of people. Why, then, did they not ask the people to express their views as they did in 1915?

Mr. HOEY: How would you make provision for taking the vote of those who have actually effected a union of the churches in different parts of Canada during the last ten or fifteen years and who are neither Presbyterians nor Methodists?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The great mistake that has been made by those who are promoting this measure is the attempt to coerce the alleged minority. In Western Canada they tell me there has been co-operation, not so much union.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Well, under what statute?

Mr. FORKE: No statute, but it is a union all the same.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What is the basis of it? It is a question of the different churches agreeing to co-operate and have only one church in the locality concerned.

Mr. FORKE: That was never the basic idea. It was simply a question of getting together, of uniting while awaiting the consummation of the greater organic union that they were looking forward to.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Well, my hon. friend misses the point that I make in that regard. I say that the action which has been taken was based upon mutual co-operation and understanding. If you have either co-operative churches or union churches in localities in the West, you have them by reason of the fact that men have respected each others views and have agreed to co-operate. The trouble with the measure now before us is this: There came a time when certain men who wished to dominate the whole situation, ignoring the views of an undoubtedly large number in the church who did not desire union and the decision of the assembly not to take steps to proceed to union—these people, without taking a vote in 1923, as they did in 1915, without taking any intervening step to ascertain the views of the people of to-day, now come to parliament and ask parliament to coerce the minority and to take their rights away.

Mr. MacLAREN: Is it not a fact that in the early stages when union was proposed it was agreed officially that in order to enter into union there should be practically unanimity?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend states what is actually correct. I read an extract from the minutes of the Assembly recorded in the very beginning of this discussion on union in which it was stated that it was universally recognized that a union of the churches to be real and lasting must carry with it the consent of the entire membership.

Mr. LADNER: The minister has not answered a question which I put. It is this: What would he do with respect to the arrangement or agreement made between these three churches following the vote and the action of the committee—not only the arrangement but the carrying of it out in many respects? Would he allow one of the churches to abrogate that agreement and back out of it?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What occurred in the matter was that in 1917 the assembly agreed to suspend further action in connection with union until the year after the close of the war. Consequently, if any action was taken without going to the people the parties with whom they were dealing knew very well that such a course was adopted without obtaining the necessary expression of opinion from the people as to whether they were in favour of union or not.

Mr. D. A. MACKINNON (Queens, P.E.I.): I was a member of the Private Bills committee which had this question before it for six weeks. The chairman of that committe in his address to the House expressed the conclusions of the committee in a very fair way, and I must say that in his conduct as chairman throughout the whole time the bill was under consideration he discharged his duties admirably and to the satisfaction of the entire membership. For my part however, I have come to the conclusion that we should not by legislation compel our brethren to go into the courts to have a matter like this decided. If we do that it seems to me that we demonstrate one of two things; that we are incapable of deciding this matter ourselves, or that there is a danger of perpetuating strife. If we can avoid litigation I think there is a peaceful and prosperous future ahead of both the Presbyterian and the United churches. I believe it is not generally known that under the bill as first introduced Presbyterians were practically legislated into the union whether they are willing or not. None of us cared to see such a course as that adopted. Accordingly the clause was amended in such a manner that every Presbyterian congregation from sea to sea has the right and the privilege to vote itself into union or to continue Presbyterian as it wishes. The last speaker urged the importance of leaving this matter to the votes of the people. Let me point out that the bill in its present form does leave it to the vote of every congregation in Canada to decide whether they shall or shall not join the union. That is the result of the amendment made to the tenth clause of the bill, and I consider that was the fairest thing that could be done. In this matter there has been a proposition to refer this matter to the Supreme court or to the Privy Council. Supposing that were done and a decision favourable to the minority was rendered; is it contemplated in that event that the minority shall hold all the property of the church? Is that their position?

Mr. DUFF: That is not their position. A fair division is proposed.

Mr. MACKINNON: Is not that what the bill proposes? We have gone into that matter as a committee very carefully and I for one would not agree to any proposition that did not extend fair treatment to all concerned. Personally I do not care for a reference to the courts on such a matter as this. Getting into litigation means the creation of enmities and not friendships. Recourse to litigation means the continuation of the present ferment. There may be a delay of six months or a year or more if the case goes to the Privy Council. Contention may have an attraction for some Scotchmen but it does not appeal to me, and I am as full of the Scottish spirit as any man. I am speaking here to fellow Canadians and I plead for the display of a broad and generous spirit. I think that those who do not come in under this bill will be treated generously and that is the right Canadian sentiment.

A great misunderstanding has arisen over the disposition of property. This legislation does not touch a church or a manse from ocean to ocean; that is a subject for the provincial legislatures. What is dealt with here chiefly are the funds of the churches. To listen to some arguments that have been advanced one would imagine that these funds were the property of the minority, whereas they belong just as much to the majority of the General Assembly as they do to those who are opposing union; in fact the unionists have a greater right to a share of the funds when it comes to the question of division. These moneys certainly are not owned by the minority. As to the appointment of a commission what is the situation? The membership might have been chosen on the basis of five to one. But a fairer decision than that was made. Those in favour of union said "We will only appoint three and the minority may appoint three. These six will choose the remaining three." What fairer arrangement, as between Presbyterians, could be arrived at.

I regret some of the remarks which have been made this evening with respect to some of the distinguished clergymen who have been here supporting church union. They have been working incessantly for a fine ideal, and they have not merited the criticism that has been passed with respect to them. They are men of vision, they look out and see the church of the future and they hope that their anticipations will be realized. But we shall not get very far along the path of progress in this country if we have strife where there should be unity, if we have discord where there should be peace. Only by working together in a spirit of amity and goodwill can we proceed in this country towards the goal of prosperity and success—Not by might or by power but by the spirit of conciliation and love may Canada be regenerated religiously, socially and nationally. Let us pass the bill and allow the Presbyterians and United churchmen to go forward to their duties courageously and with good cheer.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: My hon. friend has stated that the question at issue relates to church property. If the courts provide a true and impartial method of settling disputes, why do you fear the result of an action in the courts? Would it be fair for parliament to take a position that might be contrary to the decision that might be given in the courts?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): I feel that I cannot conscientiously give a silent vote on this great question. To my mind we have been discussing a great deal to-day, matters that should have been discussed in the church courts. We have been discussing the question of union and whether we are in favour of union or not. That is not the question before the House. That is a question to be decided by the church courts. There has been a division of opinion as to whether that has been decided by one of the churches or not. Again I say that is the business of that church; and we as a parliament have no right, though we can exercise the privilege, to trespass upon the ground of any of the churches that wish to become a party to this union. The questions to be decided by them within their own jurisdictions are the questions of union, and we are here as a parliament, not to say whether we are in favour of union or not, not to say whether union of the churches would be a good thing or not, but we are here to give a decision which means that we say to these churches, either "You can unite as you agreed to unite," or "You cannot unite"; because this union cannot take place without legislative sanction of this House, even though its provisions may be somewhat restricted.

Have the proper courts of these churches decided? In other words, have the courts of the churches formed by the members of the churches themselves given their decision? The question is not for parliament to decide whether the General Assembly represents the views of the people of the Presbyterian church or not. That is the church polity of the Presbyterian church. If the machinery that church has provided through which to express its views is imperfect, that is the misfortune of the Presbyterian church, and this parliament has nothing to do with it. There must be some head, some mouthpiece, if you care to use that expression, some court through which the Presbyterian church can legally express its opinion. What is it? The General Assembly of the Presbyterian church. This parliament has nothing to say about how it is formed. That is the prerogative of the membership of the Presbyterian church, and I say it in all kindness, if during the twenty years since this matter has been inaugurated and discussed the membership of the Presbyterian church has been satisfied to allow the General Assembly to remain the legal mouthpiece of that church, then we ought to take the expression of view and opinion of that mouthpiece as the expression of opinion of the Presbyterian church. I do not possibly see how we can do anything else, unless we propose to pass a bill to reorganize some of these churches. Take the Methodist church: it has its quarterly official boards. Then it has its districts with their district meetings. It has its annual conferences, then its General Conference. If we are not to take the voice of the General Conference of the Methodist church, what voice are we to take as the voice of that church?

Mr. HOEY: We cannot take any.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is no voice and no court to which we can appeal for an opinion, if it be not the court set up by the members of the Methodist church itself. This parliament did not set up that court, it had no right to set it up; but within the jurisdiction of the Methodist church itself has been created a tribunal called the General Conference. That General Conference, in the name of the Methodist church of Canada as its official mouthpiece, said "We want to go into this union". Can we go behind that, even though a number of Methodists said they did not want to go in? It is for the churches themselves to reorganize their own organization and get a proper mouthpiece to express their views, if they have not got it at the present time. The Congregationalists have the same method to which I will not allude, because I am not as familiar with it.

We are in a very grave and responsible position to my mind. We are not here voting as unionists or anti-unionists. we are here to adhere to the prerogatives of parliament and not to encroach on the prerogatives of the churches. These churches have said, through the only organizations that we as a parliament know of; through the organizations that they have erected, constructed and maintained themselves from time immemorial, that they desire this union. We are here to ask ourselves, should we allow these three great churches to carry out their own expressed wish, or are we as a parliament to interfere and place a barrier in the way to prevent those churches doing what they have asked us to allow them to do? If it had not been essential to have legislation here, these three churches would have been united, and we are only an incident in the machinery provided to allow this union to take place. I say it is a difficult situation. Perhaps I should not say that, but it is an important moment, not only in the history of the churches, but it is an important moment with reference to the constitution of our parliament and the definition of its rights. If we are going to take the position that we can legislate to encroach upon the rights which we in Canada have given to the various churches, and which is one of the bulwarks of our freedom in this country, then we are taking a new stand and we are taking the position that we have the right to create a state church in the Dominion of Canada.

I have not said whether I am in favour of union or not but I do maintain—and this is the only position I take—that as a member of parliament it is my duty, I believe, to respect the rights of the Presbyterian the Methodist and the Congregational bodies in this country, and they, through their courts instituted by themselves, have decided that it would be a good thing for the great cause which they represent that they should be united in their efforts instead of being divided. I believe I am doing my duty as a member of parliament by keeping myself aloof from the differences between the churches and saying to these churches: I am prepared to support you in carrying to a consummation through this bill, the objects for which for years you have striven, and which in your considered judgment are best for the churches and best for humanity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the vote is taken, may I say a word with respect to the attitude of the government and my own attitude on this important measure?

It is hardly necessary again to draw the attention of the committee to the circumstance that this bill is in no sense a government measure. It is a private bill introduced in this House by one of its most respected members, at the instance of the governing authorities of three great churches that have asked for the right to be united into one church. Prior to the present moment, only two members of the government have spoken, and each of them, I think, has spoken emphatically. They have not been on the same side in the controversy. When the division comes later in the evening, I have no doubt hon. members will see that the government itself is very much divided on this question. I should like to make this clear, because throughout the discussion of the last month it has come to me that rumours were being circulated that I was taking a certain attitude and requesting members of my party to adopt likewise a similar attitude. At other times, rumours have come that my attitude being otherwise, the difference of view expressed by some members of the party was due to that different attitude. I wish to make it perfectly clear, that in this matter, from the beginning of the discussion until this moment, I have not desired that any member of parliament and particularly any member on this side of this House should in this matter vote other than as his conscience and sense of duty and right impel him to vote. I cannot make it too clear that the government as a government is assuming no attitude in this matter.

has no responsibility for the outcome; and that as I speak here to-night I am voicing my opinion only as one member of this House, and on this question I wish to express that opinion with the utmost humility.

May I say first of all that the bill having come to the House in the manner described the first question we are obliged to ask ourselves is: Is the purpose one which commends itself to parliament? The object of union of churches, the incorporation of churches for the purpose of union, is a great purpose, and if incorporation is needed to give effect to that purpose, I think all hon. members will agree that in accordance with what is legal and right we should further that object in so far as it is possible for this parliament so to do.

We have next to ask ourselves the question: Has this parliament jurisdiction in this matter? And have the churches that are applying to this parliament for incorporation jurisdiction or power to consummate the union which they have asked this parliament to give effect to by the bill which is before us? Having considered these points, we have also to ask ourselves: Have the churches complied with their own constitutions and established procedure in the steps they have taken to effect union; and, in the bill which we have before us, has due regard been had for the interests of minorities that may be affected? As to the last question, whether the rights of minorities have been safeguarded, we can deal with that when we come to the sections of the bill in reference thereto. I think it will be found that if in other particulars the bill is satisfactory, those who have had to do with the measure, have endeavoured to consider in a broad and generous way, the rights of minorities. As to the question of compliance with procedure in seeking union, as nearly as I can gather, there is pretty general agreement, that the procedure so far as it relates to matters other than the power of the Presbyterian church to ask for union, or rather to form the union contemplated, has been regular and in accordance with the constitution and polity of the respective churches.

As to jurisdiction, it is important that the interested parties not less than parliament should understand clearly that, under the British North America Act, certain rights of exclusive jurisdiction are assigned to the provinces; others are assigned to the federal parliament. The well known section of the British North America Act, section 92, under the heading of the exclusive powers of provincial legislatures, reads as follows:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say.

Then follows an enumeration of the classes of subjects and number 13 is "property and civil rights in the province." Therefore, this federal parliament has no power whatever to legislate in regard to any matters concerning property and civil rights within the different provinces. This bill necessarily concerns property and civil rights in many particulars, and I think it is important, we should make it perfectly clear, in any legislation that may be passed, albeit such a clause be but declaratory, that in the provisions of this measure, this parliament is not going beyond the scope of its jurisdiction in any particular. I have, as possibly hon. members may have noticed, drafted an amendment which I think will be sufficient to cover that point and which I believe the House will accept without question when we come to the later stages of the bill.

As to the one remaining point, the power of the churches to effect the consummation of union, from what I have heard and read of the committee's proceedings, from what I have gathered in communications that have come to me, not by tens or hundreds, but I might say almost by thousands from all parts of this country, and from what I have gathered from the discussion in this House during the course of this debate, I believe there are two extreme positions, neither of which is deserving of support. There is one extreme which maintains that, under no circumstances, under no conditions, should union of these three churches be permitted. There are those who as respects one of the churches concerned take the position that its constitution concerning principles is such that its members, those in authority, have not the right to effect a union with the other two churches. They say that that is a condition that cannot be changed. Let me be quite plain. That question has not arisen with respect to the Methodist church nor with respect to the Congregational church. It has arisen with respect to the Presbyterian church. There are some who take the position that the Presbyterian church, even by the will of the authorities duly constituted, has not the power to ask for union, to form a union with the other two churches. Those who support that point of view seem for the most part to be unwilling to permit that question to be decided except in the courts, and as the result of litigation which, to appearances, might extend over a number of years.

Personally I have little sympathy with such a point of view. Personally, I do not see why it should not without litigation be possible to decide whether or not that power exists in the Presbyterian church. If such a power does not exist, I cannot see why, knowing the nature of the disability, unless it be of a character which commends itself to parliament, a means should not be found by parliament of speedily removing that disability. That is the reason why, having regard to what is customary in such references, much to my regret, I find it difficult, indeed impossible, to support the amendment which has been made to the original bill by the committee of this House to which it has been referred. That amendment provides that this question must be settled by carrying a particular case, which is in the courts at the present time, through the Supreme court and if need be, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and by mentioning the first of July, 1926 as a possible date at which parliament might deal with the question again suggests a period of litigation seemingly interminable. Who is there in this House this evening who can believe it to be in the interests either of church or state that a great religious controversy should be carried on in this country for the next three, four or five years? I think such a controversy would be the greatest misfortune for our national life, and certainly a very grave misfortune, for the religious life of the churches concerned; and for my part I am not willing to support any proposed legislation which contemplates litigation over a term of years. I think the gentlemen who in the name of their churches asked us to enact this measure are right in the position they take in regard to the amendment suggested by the committee, not so much on the ground of principle, as on the matter of time and the amount of litigation involved in what it proposes. They say, "We came to you for legislation and you are giving us litigation." I do not think we should give litigation. I think we should find means of settling this controversial point without the necessity of prolonging controversy in the courts.

What is the other extreme position? At the other extreme you have a number of gentlemen who say, "We wish to have this union consummated, and we ask the parliament of Canada to consummate it whether or not the Presbyterian church has the power to form a union with the other two churches." They ask us to use the might of parliament—because parliament, they contend, is all powerful—to consummate the union irrespective altogether of whether the Presbyterian church as at present constituted has the power to form such a union with the other churches. They ask us to compel the Presbyterian church to enter that union. Now, speaking again in all humility, may I say that such a method of proceeding does not appeal to me at any time; and it appeals to me less with respect to matters concerning the Christian religion and the Christian faith than in regard to anything else. My hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Raymond) last night, speaking in this House, said very truly and wisely that the more of power we have the more careful we should be in the manner in which we exercise it; and when I am asked to use the might of parliament, regardless altogether of whether the power does or does not exist in the Presbyterian church to unite with the other churches, to compel that great historic institution, while a large proportion of its following say and believe the church has not the power, to go into union with the two other bodies, I for one cannot see my way to support such a method of proceeding.

May I draw the attention of the House to this circumstance. The Presbyterian Church in Canada has suffered disruption through this controversy. Let us remember that this great church is split in twain; its membership is irrevocably divided; never again will there be in this country the one Prebyterian church which our fathers and our forefathers have known in this Dominion. We are standing at the parting of the ways and we can help to bind the wounds that have been inflicted in this process of disruption, or by our action to-night we can help to make more difficult for all time the position not only of those who stay out of the union but also of those who go in. It is a time for conciliation not coercion. There are hundreds and thousands of men and women in the Presbyterian church who want to go into the union; but do they want to enter the union in virtue of a power which their church does not possess or concerning the possession of which there can be a shadow of doubt? Does the Methodist church, does the Congregational church, do the Presbyterians who desire union, wish to found their new church upon a doubt, not to use a stronger term? Is that to be the foundation for a great church propagating the teachings of Christ—a foundation of doubt? Or is it rather the desire and the aim of all who seek to carry out the teachings of the Master that whatever they do shall be done in a spirit of conciliation and goodwill and in a manner which, if such can be found, will remove all doubts whatsoever?

You ask me, how are these two extreme positions to be reconciled? That is the problem. I do not believe it is difficult of solution, certainly not in a Christian spirit; I believe the solution will be found in a practical application of the central tenet of the Christian religion, following what is known to us as the Golden Rule, to do unto others as we would have them do unto us. I believe that the Methodist church in this country and the Congregational church both wish that rule to be observed; I believe that the Presbyterians are anxious to see it applied in this instance in a solution of this question. Personally it is the only rule I wish to be guided by in reaching a decision as to my attitude on this matter; and it is because I wish to govern my own thought and action in accordance with that rule that I regret that this afternoon the amendment which was proposed by my hon. friend from Skeena (Mr. Stork) was not permitted by common consent of the committee to be moved and to be put before us for the purposes of debate. I believe that the amendment which that hon. gentleman offered provides a way out, a way which should be satisfactory to all who really desire the consummation of union on a foundation that will be enduring and above criticism in any regard. What was his proposed amendment? It was that this bill should become law. He accepts the amendment of the hon. member for Lisgar that the bill should go into force in July of next year; he accepts that. But he adds one proviso, namely, that as respects the Presbyterian church the question of the power of that church to unite with the others, which is the only matter in doubt, shall be settled by a reference by the Minister of Justice of a stated case to the Supreme court.

Mr. GOOD: Who outside of the Presbyterian church can determine that power?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Members of the Presbyterian church say to-day that there is a doubt as to whether that power exists; some of those who wish the union admit that there is that doubt. Those who are opposed to union say that their opposition is founded on that doubt, most of those who are asking for the union are as emphatic in their view that the Presbyterian church has the necessary power as the opponents of union are in the view that with the church as constituted, it does not exist. If those who are favourable to union are confident in this belief, what is there for them to fear from a reference of that particular subject to any tribunal?

Mr. FORKE: In the event of the Presbyterian church going to the courts, and the courts deciding against the General Assembly having power to go into this union, we would have two churches united. What would happen to the third?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad my hon. friend has asked that question, for now I know what is in his mind, and it is one of the points which if I can I should like to make clear.

The suggestion of the amendment—and it would have been my own suggestion to the committee had it not found its place in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday—is that this House refer this particular question, which is the only matter in doubt, by means of a stated case to the Supreme court. That case can be submitted to the Supreme court and finally determined before the end of the present year. Assume it is settled as the unionists say, or believe, that it will be settled; that it is determined that the Presbyterian church has the necessary power, then this entire bill becomes operative and no one, whether anti-unionist or unionist, can reasonably cherish ill-will towards his fellows as a result of the conclusion which has been reached. Some tribunal sooner or later has to decide the question, and if parliament refers this matter to the Supreme court for decision, it is simply prescribing the method that by and large has to be taken in all great controversies—that of ultimately referring to arbitration disputes that cannot be otherwise settled. If you object to the Supreme court, for my part I would not mind whether the tribunal was in the nature of a specially constituted commission of judges or lawyers or any other class of persons to be agreed upon. As I have already said, if such a tribunal were to decide that the church has the power which is now in doubt, the legislation would become effective and the union would be consummated in a manner to which no one could take exception.

But suppose the tribunal were to decide that the church has not the requisite power, what then? It will have to give reasons for so deciding. We will then know, the church will then know, the country will then know, what those reasons are. Is it because of some doctrine fundamental or otherwise of the Presbyterian church that union is impossible?

Is it because of some rule of organization that union with other churches is impossible? We will know what it is, and knowing, parliament will be in a position to act. If it is a disability of a character that should be removed, all that has to be done is for Presbyterians who desire union to come to parliament and ask that such disability be removed. Does any hon. member of this House believe that if parliament were asked to remove a disability which did not commend itself to the judgment of parliament and which prevented a great church, after following its regular methods of procedure and complying with its duly constituted rules, from participating in a union with other churches, that parliament would refuse so to act?

I hold the view, Mr. Chairman, with respect to matters of church and state, that the church within its sphere has powers and jurisdiction just as complete with respect to its doctrine, polity and destiny as the state has with respect to its own constitution and destiny. I would never support interference by the state with the right of any church to determine its own destiny, to shape its own polity, to do what it wishes with respect to its own doctrine. I know there are many who will not agree with me in that, but I believe that this House would be prepared were it shown wherein the Presbyterian church cannot control its own destiny, shape its own polity, and do as it will with respect to its own doctrine, to come to its relief and unless the reasons to the contrary were unanswerable would give it the fullest powers possible, and do so in a manner which would remove altogether any possibility of further doubt in this regard. Then the Presbyterian church, under the legislation which is already on the statutes, would go into this union not in an atmosphere of doubt and uncertainty but as a matter of fully established and recognized right.

Now, have I answered the question which my hon. friend wishes to ask?

Mr. FORKE: I cannot say that it is answered satisfactorily. Provided the decision went against the Presbyterian church, then we would have the Methodist and Congregational churches united—something which was never intended by the church courts.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. FORKE: It would not be legal. They have no authority to enter into any engagement of that kind. Their engagement is for the uniting of all three churches, and the courts deciding against the Presbyterian church, we would have to come back to parliament, and parliament would be still forcing upon us the very same thing we are objecting to to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We would be in a very different position. What we are being asked to do to-night by those who wish church union under this legislation is to declare that that union shall be formed whether or not the Presbyterian church has power to enter into it.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We cannot get away from that. We are being asked to compel that union whether the Presbyterian church has the power to enter into it or not. Now, inside of two or three months we can settle whether or not the Presbyterian church has that power. If it is found that the 12 m. Presbyterian church has not that power, and the majority of its members want that power given to their church, and ask this parliament for it, I believe parliament will be prepared to give the necessary powers to form a union. Then the union can be formed in accordance with legal rights and be in every particular above doubt and suspicion.

With respect above all else to the foundations of a new and great church, it seems to me that we shall be serving the interests of all concerned, if we take care to see that the church is formed on a secure foundation, a foundation that is beyond any question of doubt, a foundation that can give rise to no questionings or misgivings on the part of its membership, or to recriminations on the part of those who have not become of its membership.

In conclusion, may I remind this House that next to the sacred association—

Mr. LADNER: Before my right hon. friend concludes his address, may I present my question regarding a stated case? How is he going to prepare a stated case in which the facts are at issue and which involve questions of doctrine and origin? Stated cases are prepared when the questions at issue are readily agreed upon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am informed on what I believe to be as good legal advice as one can obtain that it is possible to form and submit a stated case in this matter.

Mr. LADNER: Who would do it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under the amendment which has been moved by the member for Skeena, the burden of having the case prepared would rest upon the Department of Justice, and I should be prepared to advocate that the government bear the total expense of having this particular matter settled in that way. What I am aiming at in the point of view I am suggesting to the committee is to find some way of quickly and effectively resolving any doubt. Having resolved the doubt one way or the other, union can then be made possible in a legal way and in a manner which will leave no room for criticism or heart burning after union has been effected.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Would that decision require subsequent legislation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the decision is in favour of the unionists, the legislation which we are passing now settles everything. If it goes the other way, then what will be necessary will be for the duly constituted authorities of the Presbyterian church who feel they are being hampered in the matter of union through some disability that has been discovered, to come to parliament and ask that the disability be removed. Unless the disability prove of a character which parliament should not remove parliament may be expected to act favourably upon such a request and when parliament has removed the disability then they will come into the union, and the new church is formed in a regular and unimpeachable way.

Mr. HOEY: The Prime Minister has alluded to the necessity of referring a stated case to the Supreme court. There might be some doubt, he said, with respect to the right of the Presbyterian church to change its doctrine and consummate union. Does he want us to take him seriously when he contends that the people of Canada would accept the judgment of a civil court in matters respecting doctrine?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the proposed reference to the Supreme court does not appeal to my hon. friend's judgment, I have already said that I should be glad to have suggested any other commission, any other tribunal, a commission of any character to be agreed upon, to which this question of doubt might be referred and settled. Let that body whatever it may be by deciding the nature of the disability give a decision which will guide parliament. Surely if we want to find a way out that will help to reconcile differences it can be found in that way

Next to the sacred associations of home, the most sacred associations in the lives of men —to some perhaps more sacred even than those of home itself—are the associations of the Christian church. This parliament cannot afford to be indifferent to the feelings entertained by hundreds of thousands of men and women throughout this country with respect to the attitude of parliament toward their church. At all times parliament has to be prepared to recognize great bodies of opinion. What about the group of hon. gentlemen opposite, led by the hon. member who introduced this bill (Mr. Forke)? They represent a great interest in this country, and we hear them continually speaking of the need of the nation, whilst legislating for others, to consider their special interests. What about my friends at the far end of the chamber opposite? They speak about the interests of labor, another class, another group. All through our national life we recognize that whether or not we see eye to eye with the different groups that go to make up this great nation, we are nevertheless bound to respect the feelings and the beliefs and the convictions of the great bodies who constitute minorities. In the Presbyterian church there is from one end of Canada to the other, a great body of earnest and God-fearing men and women who feel very deeply in this matter. They may be a majority, they may be a minority. If we can help, as I have said, to remove from their minds the feeling that their church is being torn asunder and substitute for it a feeling that whatever division is now inevitable is being made in accordance with what is reasonable and right and in accordance with the best traditions of parliament, then we will be rendering a great service not only to the parties interested in the consummation of this important union, but also to our country as a whole.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The nature of the question under review to-night is such as has never in my time been before parliament. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is only expressing appreciation of the real position when he says that there are wide differences of view, sunderings of sentiment, and that on both sides of a great controversy are ranged some of the very best people of our country. Of course we all respect the views of those who differ from us, and we must carry that respect to even greater lengths and depths in relation to a question such as now agitates us all. I regret exceedingly that any words have been uttered impugning the high motives or the personal conduct of any connected with either side of the controversy. For myself I am in disagreement with very many of the best friends I have. My inclinations lead me naturally to cling to the church with which my family for many generations has been associated. Personal ties bind me closely to those, both in this House and throughout the country, who seek earnestly, even passionately, to maintain in its present status the church of our fathers. But I must say very frankly that after the closest thought I have been able to give to the subject I find the line of reason leading me the other way. I feel bound to state, at once, so that there may be no misapprehension, that in my judgment the duty of parliament is to pass this bill and that parliament cannot usefully evade that duty by any amendment either such as is suggested by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork), supported by the Prime Minister, or that sponsored by the hon. member for Lunenberg (Mr. Duff), and now embodied in the bill.

This is one of those questions which require the most careful reasoning; where confusion of thought is not only possible, but almost inevitable; where men are easily driven from the straight path of logic by sentiments which are powerful and by passions which are deep. I do not claim to be in the least exempt from these influences myself; I only endeavour to dispel them to the best of my power and to get at what I feel we ought to do by as simple and careful a route as I can find. In what I say to-night I am not expressing my views with any idea of changing those of others; indeed, so firm have convictions been rooted that I could not hope to do so. The most I aspire to accomplish is briefly and simply to lay down the considerations which guide me, in the hope that in the future, when the result of our action now shall be reaped in all its fruits, these reasons may be looked back upon as adequate and appropriate.

We have a bill before us the purpose of which is, as I express it, to confirm the union of three great denominations of religion—the Presbyterian church, the Methodist church and the Congregational church. I find myself in agreement with the argument presented to-night in very clear and forcible form by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham). I do not think he fully explored the question, but to the extent that he did I find myself unable to diverge from his line of thought. These three churches come to parliament, having expressed their will through those tribunals which alone are empowered to express their will. Not only have they expressed it to us, but they have taken action upon it themselves. To the utmost of their power they have formed a union—indeed they have consummated the union—but, as all agree, legislation is necessary because of the civil rights involved, because of properties over which in some cases the legislatures and in other cases the federal parliament have jurisdiction, and because of the necessity of bringing those properties and the corporations which control them into conformity with a new relation created by the union.

Those appealing for the legislation say: "The question of union or non-union is ours, it is not yours. It is a matter for the exercise of our rights within our spheres. All we call upon parliament to do is to consummate our action because of the necessity involved in the existence of these properties, and as well, because of the desirability of putting into corporate form the union so effected." The Minister of Railways argues that these bodies have expressed their will through their definitely constituted authorities, their courts. No one disputes that to the extent to which those courts could accomplish their end they have acted in proper form. That is to say, if we admit that they had power to do what they have done they have gone about it through the proper route; they have taken all the precautions; they have paid heed to all the safeguards, and expressed the will of their churches as best they could. They come to parliament then and claim that we have no right to deny them the consummation of the union which they themselves have effected.

It is contended on the other side that one of those churches, namely, the Presbyterian, has exceeded its powers in taking those steps essential to the union. It is curious enough to reflect that no such contention is levelled as respects either of the other denominations—the Methodist or the Congregational—and the reason given is because there is no dispute, no great division of opinion in those two denominations. But does that reason really dispose of the question? If the power to unite did not exist in the one I, as yet, have never found any reason to conclude that it did exist in any of them. I have not found in what investigation I have made any possible disability affecting the Presbyterian church, which did not equally affect the Methodist and the Congregational church. If it appertained to one, it appertained to the others and merely because it has not been drawn attention to by the supporters of those others would not prove that parliament should be troubled about the matter in the one case and utterly ignore it in the case of the rest.

In this discussion the general expression has been that this church—the Presbyterian church—has not had the power to take those steps necessary for union. I do not know whether those using this expression intend always to say that the General Assembly of the church did not have the power delegated from the church itself to take those steps. Usually those who argue on the question of power contend that the assembly never received from the church itself—I suppose the people of the church—the power to take the action which it did take. There is some difference between that and arguing that the people could not give to the assembly the power to take the action. Personally I am of the view that not only had the church the inherent power but that the church had delegated such power to the assembly. But as I proceed to discuss very briefly this point and buttress my opinion I ask hon. gentlemen to remember that I do not rest my support of the bill on the foundation of this opinion. Others may have just as good and as strong a feeling the other way. I will contend later that it does not matter which is correct, the bill ought to pass, but I do take the view that the church inherently has the power and, as well, that it has expressed the authority and created the court by which the power may be exercised.

What after all is this power of union? Does it consist in anything more or less than the power to change doctrine? I ask most earnestly hon. gentlemen to reflect on that sentence. Does the power to unite really embrace anything more than the power to alter doctrine, to modify doctrine? If the power to modify doctrine is conceded what is there between that and the power to unite with any other church holding the doctrine so modified? I say, once the church is conceded power to modify doctrine we have ended the discussion as far as the power of union is concerned.

Mr. MacLAREN: May it not be that one can change a doctrine to a limited extent, not being a fundamental or a radical change? No one questions the right to make minor changes, but I ask the right hon. leader if he asserts that it is possible for every General Assembly to change fundamentally while there is a basis of doctrine that is accepted by the church?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is in the mind of the hon. gentleman is not a question of the power of the church itself to change fundamentally but whether there is a power in the assembly to change fundamentally. I will discuss that, and while I know I cannot convince my hon. friend, whose views I respect profoundly, I will explain why I am convinced myself. I think the power to change is inherent in the church and that the assembly has the power delegated to it to express the will of the church in this regard, and that there is no limitation, as respects at least the subordinate standards of the church. I entirely dissent from the theory that there exists in the parliament of Canada, or in any court in this country, the right to say what is fundamental in doctrine and what is not. What in parliament would appear to one secular mind fundamental, would appear trifling to another. In a court of law it would be just the same. Those prerogatives are the prerogatives of the church. The church must have power to determine how and to what extent it exercises those prerogatives, a power unrestrained by any authority whether of parliament or of civil court.

The reason I contend that the power must be inherent is, first that it is impossible to suppress or direct the conduct of any church, in this respect. I put it in this way: if a church exercises the right, who is to say it nay? If a church exercises it through the tribunal it creates to exercise it, who can say to such tribunal, nay? Who can dispute its power? It is said that in England the courts did so in 1904. The courts did not decide in England in 1904 that the church did not have the power. They decided that the church had not delegated to the assembly the power; because looking into the practices, records and precedents of the church, they found no case of its exercise, and no expression of its will such as would have empowered the assembly. I am not going to argue whether, even on the ground stated by those judges, their decision was right or wrong. I have my opinion, but it is not pertinent whether they were right or wrong. The basis upon which the Lords of the Privy Council decided that there was not in the Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland the right to change its doctrine, is wholly absent in the case of the Presbyterian church in Canada. With all humility I express that opinion—because both textually and by precedent there has been evidence of the existence and of the exercise of such power throughout the history of the Canadian church. It is true that such exercise has been in cases where it could not very well be said—at least where I would not say—that there was any very fundamental or radical change. But I do not think this fact argues anything. I do not think indeed there is ever likely to be any very fundamental or radical change. The whole tradition, the constraint of tradition and the safeguards which tradition imposes, always protect a church against hasty or violent change. But if it wishes to alter doctrine through the authority it creates for that purpose, ther there is no other authority to say it nay Consequently the church must have the power. The case decided in England in 1904 was decided on the conclusion of the judges, one and all, that, looking back at its practice and looking at the constitutional records of the Free Church, there was nothing to indicate that that church ever intended the General Assembly to exercise such a power. Looking into our practice and constitutional records in Canada, there is indication in both that such intention has existed.

Referring to what is called the Blue Book, which is accepted certainly by the assembly, and I think we can say by the church, as constituting its code, sections 112 and 120, cannot be read in such a way as not to express both the inherent right of the church and the delegation of that right to the assembly, to restate or to alter doctrine. Section 112 contains the procedure for restating doctrine; but in the case of change section 120 applies, and provides an added safeguard ensuring tha: there cannot be, by the mere uncontrolled act of the assembly, a change of doctrine. There must be a reference back to the presbyteries, a series of bodies standing between the people and the assembly, and a confirmation of the change by a majority of these presbyteries, in order that it be effective. This safeguard is known as the Barrier Act. However, it does not really come into this argument. The point is that granted compliance with this Barrier Act whatever its terms, the authority to change exists.

Again I am confronted with the question, which I know is in the minds of many, was all this intended to apply to fundamental changes? I do not know where to draw the line, nor do I feel that we have any business to draw the line. It seems to me it is for the church to say what change is to be made great or small, and I feel that if parliament adopts any other principle we are launched upon a sea where the storms will be heavier and the dangers greater than those which surround us now.

I stated some moments ago that even were it true that the General Assembly in Canada was not so authorized—that is to say, even if it were arguable that our church, or rather the Presbyterian Assembly, does not, as it exists today, enjoy this power such a thing would mean only that the courts of Canada would decide as to the Presbyterian church, as the Lords of England decided as to the Free church. In this event it still seems to me it would be our duty to pass the bill. Why so? Let us look back over the history of the Free church case. As soon as it had been decided, a condition arose where the intervention of parliament became necessary. The condition was this: First that the church stripped of its membership to a very considerable degree, was deemed by parliament incapable of administering the trusts committed to it—I mean the trusts mainly of a property character—and the trustee being so incapable, the church having been forsaken by its members, save to the extent of a remnant, parliament was compelled to step in and take those trusts in large degree from that church, and repose them in another institution. Parliament as well by the same act of 1905 went on to declare that certain rights in relation to the alteration of doctrine were hereafter to be considered as existing in the Church of Scotland.

I do not need to dwell on this act longer, but I come to the act of 1921. This was an act passed by the Imperial House, which recited certain declaratory articles of faith of the Church of Scotland, declaratory articles which themselves affirmed the right of that church through its assembly to alter doctrine, and the parliament of Britain placed upon those articles the seal of legislation. The significance of this conduct of the British parliament is very great. It is very great when we remember the decision of the Lords in 1904. It shows that the parliament of England came to the conclusion that if, by reason of such judgment, there was imposed a restraint upon the power of the church through its assembly to alter its creed, such restraint should be removed; that it was not fit or right that the parliament of Britain should be in any position whereby it could superintend or censor alterations of doctrine made by the church itself.

Now let me at this point ask: Are we to go through any process, whether on the lines suggested by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) or on the lines now suggested by the Prime Minister, and as a result of one legal process or the other come after some length of time, to the conclusion, or rather have handed to us the conclusion of a court of law, that the Presbyterian Church of Canada through its assembly cannot alter doctrine, as was the result in the case of the Free Church of Scotland? If so what then would be the attitude of parliament as respects the situation created? The Prime Minister says, "Well we could meet the situation whatever it might be." I have to say immediately, our attitude necessarily towards any church in Canada in such circumstances would be the attitude which the British parliament took towards the Free Church of Scotland. If I have been entirely wrong in my contention as to what exists to-day and if the courts were to hold that the inherent right of change does not exist, could this parliament for a minute refuse an application from the Presbyterian church to be given that amplitude of power which became vested in 1921 in the Free Church of Scotland? I submit we could not. The Prime Minister brings in a condition that if a majority of the members of the church would come to us and ask for it, we would do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say a majority. I said if the constituted authorities of the church came and asked for it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am really very anxious not to get into a controversy with the Prime Minister over this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my right hon. friend take my word for it at the moment, that that is what I meant?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly. I notice he said the majority—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Keep up the controversy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am most anxious to avoid a controversy only I noted it and I thought it was wrong. When the Prime Minister says "the authorities", I agree with him. If the recognized authorities of the church come and ask for it, we would do it. Very well, the recognized authorities of the Presbyterian church are now right at the doors of this parliament asking that we do this very thing. So I say, why throw the church into litigation even though we pay the costs of the litigation? Why prolong this controversy if it is bound to end after years of turmoil where it will end if we pass this legislation now? Why prolong the whole thing through tedious months or years, whether it be done by the litigation proposed by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) or that proposed by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff)?

Let me, before I pass the subject, impress upon the committee, if I can, again, the absolute necessity of our presuming from the beginning that we must concede to the church, whether it exists to-day or whether it does not, the full and unrestrained right to alter its creed. How are we to take a position which says to a church: Bound as you are by a regimen of doctrine, you must remain there no matter what your own courts may feel to be right in the light of advancing years. Though you, through your constituted courts, decide that you desire to modify this or modify that, you cannot do so. If you so alter, you are violating trusts, you are diverting to the teaching of other doctrines moneys or property committed to you for the propagation of the doctrine of your fathers. I am referring now particularly to the argument of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). Can we possibly assume for a day that sort of censorship over any church? Can we say to a church: Though your majority desire a modification of doctrine, you cannot make such modification because it is diverting trust funds which you possess? If we say such thing we merely condemn that church to drift lifelessly on the reefs of time while its children abandon its altar and its creed. A majority goes first and then a majority of the remnant goes, until finally the church is left a shell. In this unhappy predicament we a parliament would be compelled, as was the parliament of Great Britain in the case of the Free Church, to invade the empty temple, disrobe the stranded church of its trusts and allocate them somewhere else. This course is the only alternative to conceding to every denomination its full right to alter doctrine and to have its trusts follow the destiny of the church itself. Between these two courses will hon. gentlemen reflect which they would prefer to pursue—to hold the church within a strict regimen, the rigid restraints of any statement of doctrine which it had years before accepted and say that we must do such a thing because of trusts which that church has had under its care; or to hold that the church itself shall be the author and master of its creed and that its trusts will follow the destiny of the church? It is the latter course which I choose myself and that course I commend earnestly to parliament to-night.

I come now to the two amendments. I would prefer to oppose this bill direct rather than to vote for either of the amendments suggested. I think it would be a more sensible treatment of those who come before this House. The amendment which is now part of the bill and which was inserted on motion of the hon. member for Lunenburg provides that, in respect of certain litigation now launched in Ontario, any legislation which we pass shall not take effect until, as a consequence of this litigation, the courts finally declare that the assembly had power to enter into union upon the Basis of Union and the Appendix on Law. I take exception for this reason, that even if the defendants succeed, succeed right to the last court of appeal, there is no reason to be certain at all that there will be any judgment of the court on that question, yes or no. I call attention to the fact that this action is an action not between the General Assembly and the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs are not suing the General Assembly. They are suing a committee of the General Assembly, and the committee takes the ground in its defence that the pleading is not properly based, and does not constitute a cause of action at all. If the committee win on this ground, then of course there is no decision of the court as to what were the assembly's powers. In this event we would have the church committee winning against the plaintiffs and still no possibility of the legislation going into effect. The committee might win its case on almost any other ground but inasmuch as the assembly is not a party to the action at all, it is very doubtful if the courts would give any judgment as to what the powers of the assembly were.

Moreover, I think that these plaintiffs should have moved sooner and not waited until the eve of the opening of parliament. I think they were in a position to launch their action two years ago. It is true that they could give certain reasons for not doing so, for example, that they did not know the exact terms of this bill. But they knew all those things to which chiefly they take objection in the litigation. They knew that the church was negotiating for union on the Basis of Union and the Appendix on Law. Against this they direct their fundamental objection. They could have launched their litigation at that time, and their litigation then would have been on just as strong a footing as it can possibly be on to-day. Next, when they did commence about the middle of January, 1924, they asked for an injunction to restrain further proceedings towards securing the legislation. But we are now nearly four months in this session and there has been no application, no motion for an interlocutory injunction although such a step would have been the only way to take practical action to get the restraint. Application for interlocutory injunction was open to them, but they let the time go by and were content to hold the sword of litigation over this parliament. There is the further fact that the plaintiffs could absolutely defeat this law by simply dropping the action. For these reasons, I do not think we should be asked to abide the event of this lawsuit.

But again I emphasize: Above and beyond these arguments there stands the great dominating truth that no matter what the result of litigation, unless we are prepared to allow a condition to remain where a church is denied the right to change its doctrine, for that right alone is involved in the question of union, we would be certain to find ourselves back in just the position we are in to-day where we would be asked and bound to decide in the affirmative what we are asked to decide in the affirmative in this bill. I therefore look upon the amendment now under review as an evasion.

The Prime Minister has another motion pending on the order paper to the effect that this bill shall take effect only to the extent of the powers of parliament. Well, whether such motion passes or not I really do not care, because the result is exactly the same in either event; no bill takes effect beyond the powers of parliament. Parliament cannot do any more than it can do; so why inject mere surplusage into the body of this legislation?

Now, I want to discuss briefly the amendment suggested to-day,—though it is not technically before the House.—by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork), an amendment to which the Prime Minister to-night gave his unqualified endorsement. I think this amendment is even more objectionable than the one embodied in the bill; and I am at this advantage in discussing it, that its fatal features have been recognized already in the questions put by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) and by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). Let me read this amendment so that there be no question in the mind of any hon. member as to its words. The motion is that there be added to the amendment of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) these words:

> Provided that as respects the Presbyterian Church in Canada, the provisions of this act shall apply only when all doubt has been removed as to the power of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, under its constitution and rules, to agree to a union of the Presbyterian Church in Canada with the Methodist and Congregational churches upon the basis of union as set out in schedule A of this act; provided, further, that this question shall be submitted for decision to the Supreme Court of Canada by a reference by the Minister of Justice.

My objections to this amendment are these: If the "stated case," as this is described by the Prime Minister, is made and the courts hold that there is no jurisdiction, what results? We have then a union effected by this parliament of the Methodist and Congregational churches, alone, a union which neither of them made at all and which neither of them wants, a union forced upon them against the expressed will of the recognized authorities of both churches. Does anyone dispute that this will be the outcome? Undoubtedly it will. Parliament has no right to do such a thing; and I venture to say that no hon. member comprehending the full meaning of this amendment will be likely to give it support. I come also to the objection suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I do not know who has advised the Prime Minister, and I do not want to pose as a great constitutional lawyer; but I say that this clearly is not a matter for a "stated case." There would be no difficulty in framing a "question" for the Supreme Court of Canada. This question could be put: "Had the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church power to negotiate for or to effect a union upon the terms of the Basis of Union and the Appendix on Law? The framing of this question would be simple and thus it could be put to the Supreme court. But that is not a stated case; a stated case involves the setting out of admitted facts. You cannot set out such facts because they are not admitted. On the other hand if you put the bald question—not a stated case at all, which is really intended by this amendment and what the Prime Minister himself has in mind—if you just put the bald question to the court, what is the court going to do about it? The court then has to get down and ascertain what are the facts upon which its judgment is to be based. These are in dispute, and there at once you have a law-suit. This subject I repeat is not appropriate for a stated case at all. One side will affirm, "Here is the Blue Book; this is the recognized authority, the discipline and law of the Presbyterian church. Read what it says." The other side will say, "No, this Blue Book does not represent the law and the prophets of the Presbyterian church." Which side is right? The resultant is really a law-suit; it is not a stated case for the decision of the Supreme court. No matter how you go about to settle this matter in the courts, it is a law-suit, where the facts are in controversy and where you have two sides arranged in battle array against each other. Throughout all this controversy you will have two opposite contentions; you travel far over a long and stony road; you start in the Supreme court and you land at length in the Privy Council before the law lords there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where does my right hon. friend get that opinion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I so interpret the suggested amendment, although the Prime Minister may interpret it differently:

> Provided that as respects the Presbyterian Church in Canada, the provisions of this act shall apply only when all doubt has been removed as to the power of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada.

You do not remove "all doubt" on such a point until you have persevered to the last court. This is my interpretation of these words. The Prime Minister may have intended to stop at the Supreme Court of Canada but I do not think such is the legal effect of the amendment offered by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would wish to have it so worded at any rate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Even so, it would only mean that the path to be traversed would be a little shorter. It would be dangerous and expensive and finally inconclusive. For as a final word let me say that the end of the road in any event is exactly the end of the road indicated by the hon. member for Lunenburg. We land at the end of the one exactly where we do if we take the other course. If therefore as the final episode of either the one journey or the other the court finds that the power of the General Assembly does not exist; does any one fancy that the church will not return to parliament for that power? Does any one fancy that any church will be content to live under such a conscious disability? Will any church recognize the smallest assertion of authority in parliament as respects its own doctrine? No. Therefore why delay?—I had almost said why evade, but I wish to avoid every term that savours of offence. Why not rather face the real situation and end this matter now? Why not do now what undoubtedly in any event we will later on have to do, even according to the words of the Prime Minister himself, after months or years of confusion and estrangement, after all this litigation has been suffered and all this agony endured? I ask hon. members to consider the reasons I have advanced and to give them such weight as they feel to be their merit.

Mr. STORK: Yesterday, Mr. Chairman, I moved an amendment which you declared to be out of order but which you stated would be in order "to-morrow". As this is to-morrow, if I may put it that way, I move that the amendment be now considered.

The CHAIRMAN: With regard to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork), I did say that the amendment which he submitted earlier in the day would be in order "to-morrow." "To-morrow" has not yet arrived, however, inasmuch as the present day lasts until the sitting is concluded, I regret therefore that I must rule the amendment still out of order.

Amendment (Mr. Brown) agreed to. Yeas, 110; Nays, 58.

Section 2 as amended agreed to.

Mr. ARTHURS: Mr. Chairman, the hour is very late and I would suggest that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That private bills be the first order of the day at the next sitting of the House.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 1 a.m. (Friday).

Friday, June 27, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Fourth Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament.—Mr. Gauvreau.

WITHHOLDING ASSENT TO PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I desire to lay on the Table of the House copy of the bill passed by the Legislature of Prince Edward Island, referred to a few days ago by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean); the letter of the Lieutenant-Governor stating that he is compelled to withhold his assent to the bill; and copy of order in council passed on the 5th of May, 1924, with regard to the matter.

HOME BANK DEPOSITORS

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (East York): I desire to lay on the Table of the House a petition signed by 132 Home Bank depositors praying for indemnification.

[Mr. Stork.]

HON. MR. MURDOCK AND HOME BANK

PRIVILEGE—RESIGNATION OF MR. E. GUSS PORTER

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. GUSS PORTER (West Hastings): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the Orders of the Day I have a communication which I desire to present to you and to the House, as a matter of privilege. It is as follows:

Ottawa, June 27, 1924.

To His Honour,
The Speaker of the House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Honourable Sir,—

On the 22nd day of May last I took upon myself from my seat in this House, as member representing the constituency of the west riding of Hastings, the responsibility to charge the Honourable James Murdock, a minister of the present government, in the terms following:

"That he did withdraw from the Home Bank at its Ottawa Branch on the 15th day of August, 1923, two days before such bank's failure, thousands of dollars on deposit therein to his credit, using certain information he had received as such minister of the likely immediate failure of said bank, and had received advantage and profit to himself to the extent of such withdrawals contrary to his obligation as such minister in derogation of his office and the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament."

Having made such charge I was granted an inquiry before the standing committee of this House on Privileges and Elections, and produced on such inquiry evidence under oath which I believe fully proved the said charge to be true. Certain members of such committee, being general supporters of the government and being a majority of such committee, having failed to regard or give effect to such evidence, reported to this House a finding by them that the said charge so made by me was not only not proved but was entirely disproved, and a majority of this House, being general supporters of the government, voted on the 25th day of June approval of the said report and adopted the same contrary to the evidence and the weight of evidence. Believing, as I do, that in the opinion of the people of Canada a higher standard of honour and of fidelity to duty, and of the dignity and traditions of parliament is required from cabinet ministers than has been thus sanctioned and approved, it becomes my duty by the only means in my power to appeal to the people, the highest tribunal of this country. I shall therefore place myself without delay in the judgment of the electors of my constituency, the west riding of Hastings, and ask them to pronounce upon my conduct, upon the one hand, and the conduct of the Minister of Labour and the government and its supporters, on the other. I respectfully invite any member of the administration, or any member supporting the administration in this matter, to submit himself to the electors of such riding in opposition to me, and I make a special request that in view of the clear, definite and immediate purpose for which I take this action, the government will do me the justice of having the writ for such election issued forthwith.

Therefore, Honourable Sir, by reason of the facts above set forth, I hereby submit my resignation as member for the electoral district of the west riding of Hastings in the House of Commons of Canada.

Faithfully yours,
E. GUSS PORTER, M.P.

Witness:

STRIKE OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Has the Acting Postmaster General any information to give to the House regarding the settlement of the postal strike, with particular reference to Toronto?

Hon. CHARLES A. STEWART (Argenteuil, Acting Postmaster General): I have no new evidence to submit except to say that to-day we have in the neighbourhood of sixty carriers delivering mail in that city. Of course, I do not want the impression to go abroad that we are anything like covering the city, because ordinarily 450 are engaged in delivering mail. Two of the postal stations are being manned to-day and delivery other than by carrier is improving all the time. A personal letter mailed in the afternoon of the 25th instant was delivered to my family this morning. True, it ought to have been received yesterday, but the report the postmaster gives me is that the matter is improving every minute and in a very short time complete mail delivery, not complete carrier delivery, will be re-established.

As regards the men, I have a communication that would indicate that the only grounds upon which they will return are for all of them to be completely re-established.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): How much mail has accumulated in the Toronto post office?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is very little mail accumulation in the post office at Toronto at the moment.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): Would the acting Postmaster General care to state to the House just how many strike breakers, if I may call them such,—or perhaps I had better put it this way, how many men are employed now in the post office at Toronto and how many men were employed prior to the strike? My purpose is to get the situation there. I do not know whether a strike is on or not.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot give my hon. friend a definite statement as to the numbers of employees that are working, but there are somewhere in the neighbourhood of 1,000 at the moment. Ordinarily about 1,400 are employed in Toronto. Indeed, it is such an important mail centre that the number sometimes runs up to 1,600.

MARITIME PROVINCES—EXPORT TRADE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce contemplate sending a person from his department to the Maritime provinces to investigate conditions concerning export trade? I understand such an investigation is going on and I am informed that the delegate was going to a number of places in Nova Scotia, but that the important county of Hants, with its great gypsum quarries, fruit growing and all that sort of thing was being absolutely ignored. I want to give my hon. friend fair warning that if he undertakes to ignore the constituency of Hants, he will receive a good many kicks from the member.

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It is the policy of the department to send junior trade commissioners to different parts of Canada so that they may acquire a knowledge of the goods they have for export to such countries as the trade commissioners are likely to go to. If one has not been sent to Hants, I shall be glad to look into the matter, because we do not want to overlook any important part of this country.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DOMINION DAY SITTING

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might mention to the House that it is the intention of the government that we should sit on Tuesday the 1st July. I know a number of members have asked the question.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

The House resumed from June 26 consideration in committee on Bill No. 47, to incorporate the United Church of Canada—Mr. Forke—Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 3—Definitions.

Mr. McGIVERIN: Counsel for the promoters of this bill, in fact counsel on both sides, have drawn my attention to a number of clerical errors that have appeared from the changing of the numbers in the bill. I move that the word "section" in line 25 on page 2 of the bill be amended to read "act."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4, subsection (b)—Corporations and local union congregations.

Mr. McGIVERIN: I move that the subsection be amended by substituting the word "three" for the word "two" in lines 20 and 22.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Property of congregations.

Mr. McGIVERIN: I move to amend the section by striking out the word "seven" in the first line and substituting the word "eight."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—Special property of certain congregations.

Mr. McGIVERIN: I move to amend the section by substituting in lines 8 and 9, in place of the words "four" and "five", the words "five" and "six".

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 9—Existing trustees continued.

Mr. McGIVERIN: I move to amend the section by substituting in line 15 the word "six" for the word "five".

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 10—Property of non-concurring congregations.

Mr. DUFF: This section provides that the vote shall be taken by call of a meeting of the congregation. During the discussion in the Private Bills committee some of us thought that this was not the best method of taking the vote; we considered it would be far better to have it taken by ballot. If the meeting were held on a stormy night a great many people might be unable to attend. There might be others too who would be unable to be present at the meeting owing to sickness or for any other valid reason; and some again might be out of town. I would suggest to the hon. member (Mr. Forke) who introduced the bill that he accept an amendment to have the vote taken by ballot instead of at a regular meeting of congregation. I therefore move to amend the section by adding:

Provided always that if any congregation in connection or communion with any of the negotiating churches shall, upon a vote of such congregation to be taken by ballot in accordance with the regulations set out in schedule "D" to this act, decide by a majority of the votes cast not to enter the United church, then and in such case the property real and personal belonging to or held in trust for or to the use of such congregation shall remain unaffected by this act, and provided that any church formed by the non-concurring congregations shall stand in the place of the respective negotiating church in respect of any trusts relating to such property. Any vote of any such congregation taken in accordance with the provisions of any act of any province of Canada respecting the United church passed before the passing of this act shall be deemed to be a valid vote for the purposes of this section.

In the two previous votes taken in 1911 and 1915 in the Presbyterian church the ballot was used; ballots were distributed either by session or otherwise to every member in the congregation whether they were able to attend church or not, or even if they were out of town at the time the vote was taken. This ballot was regularly signed and witnessed by someone and was returned either to the clerk of session or to some other authorized person. I think this is a reasonable suggestion and I hope the member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) and the rest of the committee will accept it.

Mr. MILLAR: How does the hon. member propose to apply this to those persons whose names are still on the church register as members but who have moved a distance away?

Mr. DUFF: If I remember rightly the bill provides that members who are in full communion at the time of the passing of the act shall be deemed competent to vote for the purposes of the act. Take the hon. gentleman's own case for example, or mine; this vote might be taken while we were in Ottawa. I do not think it would be fair to require either the hon. gentleman or myself to go back home to attend a meeting in order to vote either to remain in the church or to leave it. I think he will immediately see with me that the suggestion I make is only reasonable; I think the right method is to have ballots distributed to the congregation and returned.

Mr. MILLAR: I was thinking more of those who have changed their places of residence permanently.

Mr. DUFF: I believe it is provided in the bill that any one who has changed his residence may still vote. Probably the hon. member did not intend to suggest it, but there seems to me to be a flaw in the bill in that respect. If any one has moved from his home town and taken up residence permanently in some other place it is not fair that he should be able to vote with the congregation in the church from which he has removed. That, however, appears to be in the bill and perhaps we shall have to take it unless we are prepared to amend the present provision. The amendment I propose would meet the difficulty of railwaymen or fishermen who might happen to be out of town on the night the meeting was being held. Then, take the case of parents with young children, either the mother or the father would have to stay home, and this would create a great hardship on many people interested in their church. It seems to me, in view of the fact that the two previous votes were taken by ballot, that this vote should be taken in the same manner.

Mr. McBRIDE: I would suggest that this amendment is out of order; we have had no notice of it.

The CHAIRMAN: That question arose in my mind a few minutes ago, but rule 112 applies only to "important" amendments, amendments which are very material to the principle involved, such as were submitted yesterday. But this amendment, it strikes me, is of minor importance. The manner of taking a vote does not affect the principle of the bill at all, and therefore I do not think that this is an important amendment within the meaning of the rule. The amendment before the committee deals purely with the question of procedure.

Mr. DUFF: Of course, if the hon. member objects I will ask you, Mr. Chairman, to let the section stand, but I would rather see the bill go through quickly.

The CHAIRMAN: I rule that this amendment does not require notice.

Mr. HODGINS: Who are to have the privilege of voting—members of the congregation or members of the church?

Mr. FORKE: It is set out in clause (b). I do not think it is necessary to read it. It seems to me that to accept the amendment that has been proposed would open up a good deal of confusion in taking the vote. All parties concerned have the same chance to vote and I think anyone who is sufficiently interested will be at the meeting where the vote is taken. I cannot agree to this amendment, Mr. Chairman, and I would ask that the section be passed as it stands.

Mr. McGIVERIN: Mr. Chairman, this matter was very fully discussed from all angles in the Private Bills committee. The method of voting was not challenged. As chairman of that committee I strongly support the bill as it stands.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the request of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) is a most reasonable one. I was not in attendance in the committee, but it would strike the ordinary man that the proper way to vote under circumstances of this kind would be by ballot. In almost every society and every incorporated company absentees are permitted to vote by proxy, and certainly the whole membership of the church should be entitled to cast a vote on such an important question as that involved. What injury is going to be done the promoters of the bill if this privilege is accorded? What difficulty is going to arise? The privilege will apply to both sides, those for and those against. It is the course adopted by the church authorities on two former occasions, why not follow it on this occasion? I think the hon. member for Brandon is taking rather an odd course in opposing what would appear to an ordinary member of this House to be a most reasonable proposal.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: May I point out that the votes taken in 1911 and 1915 were not decisive votes, but were intended to be merely a guide for the courts. This particular vote will be decisive.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is not that all the more reason why everybody should have a chance to vote?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Of course they will have a chance to vote. If we are going to have a real test of the wishes of the congregation, we must have something more systematic than the rather loose method of distributing ballots to the congregation to be signed at pleasure, I quite agree with the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. McGiverin) that the discussion in the Private Bills committee was quite full. The reason for leaving the section in its present form was that it comes nearest to what is the practice in the church now. In my experience I have never known any important question determined by ballot, it has always been by a vote of the members of the congregation present.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am going to put a case to my hon. friend, and I think it is typical of what might happen in many other families. There are five votes in my family. If this meeting is called some time in the autumn or during the winter, four of these votes will in all human possibility be scattered in various parts of Ontario. Is it incumbent upon me to pay the expense of bringing my family to the meeting to vote? I think the case has only to be stated to be refuted. Voting by ballot is the rule in universities, in churches, in joint stock banks, and the like. What objection is there to the proposal? If there is a valid objection we will consider it, but let us hear what the objection is.

Mr. GOULD: I am sure my worthy leader (Mr. Forke) knows as well as I do that in our western country where the villages and towns are small—and I call this to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell)—the majority of the congregations are composed of people living in the surrounding country. Just picture, in our western plains, a meeting being called and only 40 or 50 per cent of the people having an opportunity to attend it owing to a storm. That very serious handicap would be obviated by the method suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Duff). If I have a complaint to make it is that the whole attitude in this matter is based altogether upon an urban point of view; I want the committee to be broad and to have some regard for the interests of the people in the country who would find it impossible to attend this meeting called at a specific time for a specific purpose.

Mr. ROBB: Having been a supporter of church union—indeed, in the congregation where I worship we have had church union in practice now for three or four years—it does seem to me that the proposal of the hon. member (Mr. Duff) is most reasonable. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) refers to his own family; there are cases in my family that I know of where the people are unable to attend church, although they are very strongly attached to their church. I venture to say that if the congregation wanted a contribution for missionary work or for the minister they would not hesitate to provide those people with an envelope to be sent in. There is no good reason why this amendment cannot be accepted; it will give people who are unable to attend church an opportunity of voting upon this question.

Mr. BROWN: I think there is very real objection to the proposal. We shall make a great mistake if we seek to reason from analogies drawn from the practices of other corporations, because they follow the practice prescribed in the rules and regulations under which they are constituted. In my judgment this House should not seek to impose upon the churches any method of taking a vote that is not prescribed by their own rules and procedure. The method adopted by all churches in arriving at a decision of such importance as this is just the method that is here indicated. Even if we did not indicate in this bill the method by which the vote should be taken, the vote would be taken in such a way as to achieve the best results. I do not think the House should undertake to say to any of the churches: You must take your vote thus and so. It is true we have put this provision in the bill, but that is simply adopting the method that is followed by all churches in coming to important decisions at regularly called church meetings.

The minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has answered the objection that was raised, and I am sure the answer was given more than once in the committee when reference was made to former votes. It is true that votes were taken by the Presbyterian church.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Do they not always vote for elders in the Presbyterian church by ballot?

Mr. ROBB: Always.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member (Mr. Brown) is not a Presbyterian; he does not know our rules.

Mr. BROWN: Apart altogether from that, there are very real objections. This is a matter upon which important issues depend, and I can see objections to distributing ballots loosely throughout the country. It is urged that it would be just as fair for one side as the other; well, the same may be said for the other method. In all elections taken for any purpose it is inevitable that some people lose their franchise. and in this case it seems to me that the vote should be taken in harmony with the procedure commonly observed. I know that elders are elected in the way that has been indicated, but is that true when it comes to the disposition of property? I rather think not. And, remember that great property interests are involved in this matter; large interests are at stake involving not only local congregations but the property of the church generally all over the Dominion. I think it is desirable that we should adopt the system set forth in this clause.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It would be a very bad thing to allow the impression to go abroad throughout Canada that there is a desire on the part of anybody in this parliament or out of it to limit in any way the vote of the people interested in this movement. In the circumstances related by the hon. member (Mr. Duff), a large proportion of the membership could not possibly attend the meeting. We know from common experience in regard to voting at elections that in most cases the husband and wife cannot go together: the woman cannot be taken from the home where there are infant children unless some grown person can be left with them. We know that from every family there are absentees who cannot get a chance to vote. A large number of our population constitute a travelling population. These people are usually at home on the Lord's day, but may be miles away during the week when this meeting is called. Is there to be a deliberate attempt to deprive that large and interested population of a vote in regard to what is to them perhaps one of the most sacred things in life? When we ask for objections to my hon. friend's proposal, all we get is the suggestion that loose methods may be employed in regard to these ballots. Surely not, in the hands of church dignitaries. Surely we can trust somebody in the churches to see that everybody gets a fair, full and free vote. Why oppose it? What have we to fear from it? The object of everybody should be to get as large and influential a vote as possible on these questions. Do not try to hamper it; do not try to limit it. Get the inclusive idea into your head, not the exclusive idea. See that everybody who has a vote is given every facility to register that vote, and that no obstacle is placed in his way.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not going to differ from the excellent opinions expressed by my hon. friend, but so far as I can judge, this amendment, which is vital in its character, means something more than merely providing for a vote by ballot.

Mr. DUFF: I am not a lawyer, and of course I do not know as to that. This was one of the amendments submitted in the committee, and it is quite possible that it may go a little further than it should. But if the amendment does go further; if it interferes with anything else, I am quite willing to have that additional thing struck out. All I want is that the vote be taken by ballot instead of at a congregational meeting. I am not trying to put anything over on the committee at all.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not suggesting that. But the amendment does appear to me to go much further than simply to provide that the vote shall be by ballot. First the amendment says:

In accordance with regulations set out in schedule D of this act,—

Mr. DUFF: The schedule was attached to the amendment. If my hon. friend will permit me, I would like to read that schedule, because it would be part of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: A schedule cannot be put into this part of the bill.

Mr. DUFF: It can be put in somewhere.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the committee is very much confused. There is no such schedule in the bill. Schedule "C" is the last section we have in the bill as it is now before the committee.

Mr. DUFF: I might explain that I attached it when I sent it up, but it was sent back to me. I wanted to read it and explain that this vote is not going to be a loose vote as the Minister of Agriculture said it was going to be.

Mr. STEVENS: What I am coming to is this: In considering this amendment, with the proposed schedule attached thereto, we are considering a vital amendment to the bill. Whether it is good or bad, I am not going to express an opinion for the moment, but we are considering what is undoubtedly a vital amendment to the bill, and I think we ought to be very careful—not with the idea that the hon. member is attempting to put anything over at all—to see that we do not interject into the bill an amendment which will vitally affect what is the intention of the bill at the present time. Let me read the amendment:

That section 10 be amended as follows:

I pause at that point to say that one would gather from the reading that that meant a substitution, but when I go a step further I gather that the intention is to add to the clause. Am I correct in that?

Mr. DUFF: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Then the intention is to add to subclause (a) of section 10 the following:

Provided always that if any congregation in connection or in communion with any of the negotiating churches shall upon a vote of such congregation to be taken by ballot in accordance with the regulations set out in schedule "D" of this act—

Which schedule, I understand now, is to be added.

—decide by a majority of the votes cast not to enter the United church, then and in such case the property real and personal belonging to or held in trust for or to the use of such congregation shall remain unaffected by this act and provided that any church formed by the non-concurring congregations shall stand in the place of the respective negatiating church in respect of any trust related to such property. Any vote of such congregation taken in accordance with the provisions of any act of any province of Canada respecting the United church passed before the passing of this act shall be deemed a valid vote for the purpose of this section.

What I want to point out is that the nature of this amendment is so far-reaching that before I would even attempt to pass approval or disapproval I would like to know whether the counsel pro and con in this case have given it consideration, and whether those who are promoting the bill and those who are resisting it have been fully consulted and are conversant with the nature of the amendment.

Mr. BROWN: There was no clause discussed more fully in committee than this particular one.

Mr. STEVENS: And the amendment was rejected by the committee?

Mr. BROWN: And rejected by the committee.

Mr. DUFF: It was not rejected.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to make my point clear. I am not in a position to offer any criticism of this amendment without a good deal of study, but I would hesitate to give immediate approval offhand to its inclusion in the bill.

Mr. BRETHEN: As a member of the committee in which this clause was discussed, I might say that the petitioners are not opposed to a ballot. The ballot might be taken at this meeting or the people might declare their wish by open vote. But, as I understand it, in six of the provinces legislation has already been passed prescribing a certain method of voting, and the clause in the bill is in harmony with that method. To alter it, I think, would only cause confusion. I might add that it is a provincial matter.

4 p.m.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend means that the clause as it now stands is in harmony with the provincial law?

Mr. BRETHEN: Yes, the clause as it now stands.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps we could defer consideration of this clause and see if we could not get together on it. It seems to me most unreasonable to take away the right of ballot from these people. We have been extending the franchise in this House; it is a principle we have ourselves adopted. We allow certain classes to vote two or three days before election day. Perhaps my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) would be willing to compromise and let the congregations decide whether they wanted to vote in congregation meeting; have it optional; give them local autonomy. I suggest that we might let the clause stand and perhaps hon. members might get together upon it.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the suggestion a very good one.

Mr. FORKE: Voting for elders by ballot has been mentioned. The ballot has always got to be held at a church meeting, the ballots are never sent out.

Mr. GUTHRIE: At my church they are put on the collection plate.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend from Brandon is mistaken. The ballots are taken out by members of the congregation to people who do not come to church, and they send their ballots in by their friends, who put them on the collection plate.

Mr. FORKE: I happen to be an elder myself.

Mr. DUFF: I cannot help that. You do not follow the rules of the church in your congregation.

Mr. LOVETT: Does that hold good in the other two churches, Methodist and Congregational?

Mr. DUFF: I do not know.

Mr. WOODS: It appears to me that the hon. member for East Peterborough (Mr. Brethen) has mentioned a point that is of very great importance, and that is that legislation has been passed in six provinces providing for a method of voting. If this amendment of the hon. member for Lunenburg were adopted, it might cause two votes to be taken in several congregations in these provinces where legislation has already been passed. To my mind, it is of vital importance that this clause stand as it is, on account of the conflict the amendment might bring about. In regard to voting by ballot, I see no reason why a congregational meeting could not be called for a full day.

Mr. DUFF: How would the people who are sick in bed or out of town get to that meeting?

Mr. WOODS: How do they get to a government election now?

Mr. DUFF: We are not talking about that.

Mr. WOODS: They would be in exactly the same position as if it were a Dominion or provincial election. Persons who wished to vote and were in a position to vote could vote if you had a congregational meeting for the full day. In view of the provincial legislation, I think it is absolutely essential that this clause should stand as it is.

Mr. HOEY: Would the hon. member for Lunenburg allow me a question? In view of the provincial legislation that has been passed, does not this relate wholly to property in the Territories?

Mr. DUFF: What do you mean by Territories?

Mr. HOEY: I mean outside the provinces.

Mr. DUFF: Oh no. It is the congregational property.

Mr. McGIVERIN: Great stress was laid by counsel for the promoters on the provincial legislation that had already been passed, and that this clause was an exact reproduction of the clause that had gone into the provincial legislation, and that to have two methods of voting would cause confusion. There was a long discussion in the committee, and a vote was not challenged. Having decided in that way in regard to the voting, and particularly in view of the provincial legislation that has been passed, and as my hon. friend from East Peterborough has just stated as civil rights and property are concerned, it seems to me it would be wiser to adopt the clause as it stands.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Does the chairman of the committee contend that because this clause was not particularly challenged in the way of a vote in the committee, we are estopped or debarred from asking this House to amend the clause?

Mr. McGIVERIN: Not at all, but I say the question was threshed out in the committee.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes, but it was never satisfactory to those who were objecting to it, at any point. I might point out that another matter was decided in the committee and decided by vote, and yet this House changed it.

Mr. McGIVERIN: I am not saying for a moment that this House has not the right to amend the clause. I am simply as chairman supporting the action of the committee on this clause, as I did on the other clause. That does not mean that the House will follow my advice, as was seen last night.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): As one who did not take part in the discussion yesterday or previously, and as one who has no serious objection to union, provided the rights and privileges of the minority are protected, and following the promise of many members who spoke last night that a fair deal would be given, I think the proposition by the member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) is only right and fair. At the time of the last vote I was in France and had not the privilege of voting, and when I returned home I found my church voted away from me. Furthermore, this would be about the only case in which the members of the Presbyterian church, especially the non-concurring members would have the right to vote. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) said that the last vote of 1915 was only a slip vote and nobody paid much attention to it. If we are desirous now of having the matter go through with some kind of harmony, I think it would be in the interests of those promoting the bill to see that a fair opportunity be given to people to express their views. I would like to call attention to the fact that the lay people of the Presbyterian church—and this vote will probably refer to them—had not as a body the privilege of voting. The voting element lies in the kirk session of the congregation to begin with—the ministers and the elders. Next it is in the presbytery—still the ministers and the elders; in the synod it is the minister and the elders, and in the General Assembly it is the ministers and the elders. By the Barrier Act the vote of the General Assembly is referred back to the presbytery. It is only referred back to the people who voted on it previously. I should like to see this matter settled with unanimity and harmony, and I do not think that, as far as the Presbyterian church is concerned, anything except a ballot would be accepted by them. That is the commonest method we have in the church of voting at the present time. The tendency of the time is to extend the ballot to as many people as possible. The taking of a vote at a church meeting would, in my opinion, be a haphazard method, and if a mistake were made they could not rectify it. It is important at this time to have harmony, and if possible to repair a slip which is a very serious matter for the community at large. It is not so much a general thing as it is a congregational matter. I say that vote should be made as large as possible, and I know of no other way that will satisfy the congregation, who will likely be the non-concurring ones, as the ballot, and I would appeal to those who stated that they were willing to give the minority the best possible deal. I think a vote would go a long way to satisfy many who are dissatisfied at the present time.

Mr. HOEY: As far as congregational property and the disposal of that property are concerned, the question must be determined by provincial legislation. I may be stupid but I cannot see how this provision affects it at all.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The ballot is the system we are all contending for politically and in every other way, and it is the system in the Presbyterian church at the present time.

Mr. HOEY: That must be determined by provincial legislation.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I think another matter which is lost sight of is the provision in the first part of subsection (b) which says that only those persons who are in full membership and whose names are on the roll of the church at the time of the passing of the act can vote. There is no possibility of stuffing the ballot box under that section. The ballots will be checked up by the church roll. I do not see that any objection can be taken to the proposal. This does not interfere with provincial rights, because it is a provision that will govern the administration of the act when it comes into force.

Mr. MARTELL: I quite agree with the hon. member, but the legislature of Nova Scotia passed a bill this year which was practically the same as this measure, but they provided that not only communicants but adherents should have the right to vote.

Mr. LEWIS: Is the hon. gentleman speaking as a lawyer?

Mr. MARTELL: Yes.

Mr. BROWN: Or as a member of parliament?

Mr. MARTELL: I am speaking as a member of this House who happens to belong to the legal profession. I have no quarrel with the hon. gentleman's proposition to decide the dogmas of your respective churches, and I have felt during the whole course of this debate that hon. members were getting far away from the points which should be discussed.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is this section (b) the hon. member refers to?

Mr. MARTELL: No. I was coming to the point when the hon. gentleman interrupted, that under the provisions of the Nova Scotia act adherents have the right to vote. Under this act as we are passing it only communicants have the right to vote.

[Mr. A. E. Ross.]

Mr. LEWIS: The section says that wherever it has been passed by the provincial legislature a different form of voting takes place.

Mr. MARTELL: Is the hon. gentleman satisfied that the provincial legislature should provide the method of voting where the provincial legislature gave the adherents the vote?

Mr. BROWN: It is not the method, it is the qualification.

Mr. HAMMELL: I desire to point out to the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) that this clause further down contains the following provision:

> In any province whereby an act of the legislature respecting the United Church of Canada passed prior to the passing of this act, a different qualification for voting has been prescribed, the qualification for voting under this section shall be as provided in such act.

That clearly covers it.

Mr. MARTELL: Probably it does.

The CHAIRMAN: We are anticipating section (b) in this matter, and the question of voting by ballot, and also the provision dealing with property rights, to be a proviso to attach to section 10 (a).

Mr. MARTELL: The qualification for voting does not imply the provision of a method of taking the vote.

Mr. DUFF: All I wish to do is to provide some method whereby every possible member in every individual church will be able to record his judgment whether he wants to go into the union or not. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) that, perhaps, the amendment which I moved goes a little too far. We might be able to work this out better by leaving section 10 as it stands in the bill, and if you will be good enough to turn to it, I will move a short amendment to that section which, perhaps, will cover the ground if the committee will agree to it.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member withdraw his amendment?

Mr. DUFF: Let us just see whether we can agree to this thing.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment will have to be withdrawn and another one substituted for it, or the vote will have to take place on this amendment, because it has already been read to the committee and the question is on that amendment.

Mr. DUFF: My idea is to suggest a different amendment from the one I moved. If the committee will agree to what I suggest now, I will withdraw the first amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member can withdraw the amendment and submit another. He cannot have two amendments.

Mr. DUFF: I will consent to withdraw it.

Amendment (Mr. Duff) withdrawn.

Mr. DUFF: I move that in section 10 paragraph (a) at line 33 the words "or by ballot as under schedule (d)" be included after the word "thereat." I think I can prove to the committee that if they agree to my amendment and allow the vote to be taken by ballot, every precaution is provided under my proposed schedule (d), so that no "loose" votes, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) says, will be taken. The schedule gives explicit directions, and everybody will find, when the vote is taken by ballot, that it will be satisfactory and in the best interests of the people concerned. This is the proposed schedule (d):

Schedule "D"

Regulations for vote by Ballot provided for in section 9 (a):

1. The ballot to be used in taking the vote provided for by section 10 (a) and following of the act shall be printed in black type on white paper of good quality at the diligence of the Clerk of Session or Recording Steward of the Quarterly Board, or should there be no such official in office then by the minister for the time being in charge of the congregation.

2. The ballot shall be in the form following or to the same general effect:—

Presbyterian Church

The (or as the case may be)

Are you in favour of this Congregation entering the United Church of Canada?	Yes.
	No.

N.B.—Voter should mark an X opposite the answer which he or she wishes to give to the question submitted and sign this ballot in the presence of a witness and return to the Clerk of Session (or as the case may be) on or before the day of , 19 , when the vote will be closed.

Witness..... Signature.....

3. The said Clerk of Session or Recording Steward or Minister of any Congregation in which a vote is to be held shall personally deliver a copy of said ballot to each member of said Congregation entitled to vote, or shall mail a copy of such ballot to each such member, postage prepaid, and addressed to the last known post office address of such member at least two weeks before the day for the closing of said vote, and the said Clerk of Session or Recording Steward or Minister shall keep an accurate list of the names of all persons to whom such ballots are delivered and of the names and addresses of all persons to whom such ballots are mailed, and shall verify the accuracy of said list by solemn declaration.

4. The said Clerk of Session or Recording Steward or Minister shall likewise deliver or mail at the same time to each said voter an envelope addressed to himself in which the said ballot may be returned to him and upon which the words "ballot paper" shall be printed for purposes of identification.

5. Should any person entitled to vote not receive his ballot in due course he shall be entitled to personally require the said Clerk of Session or Recording Steward or Minister to deliver him a ballot at any time before the close of said poll.

6. Should any ballot of a voter or the envelope for the return thereof be lost, defaced or destroyed before having been deposited, the voter, on establishing said fact by affidavit or solemn declaration, shall be entitled to a new ballot or envelope at any time before the closing of said vote.

7. The said ballots shall be signed by those entitled to vote in the presence of a witness, and shall thereupon be returned in the envelope aforesaid properly sealed to the said Clerk of Session or Recording Steward or Minister either by personal delivery or by mail with postage prepaid.

8. At 8 o'clock in the evening of the day mentioned on said ballot, which shall be not sooner than two weeks from the said date of mailing or delivery, the said vote by ballot shall be closed and the Clerk of Session or Recording Steward or Minister shall thereupon cause to be summoned a meeting of said Session or Quarterly Board without delay for the purpose of verifying the result of said vote.

9. To this meeting of Session or Quarterly Board when convened the said Clerk of Session or Recording Steward or Minister shall produce all said envelopes containing the ballots received by him before the closing of the vote and shall verify the accuracy of this fact by solemn declaration.

10. At said meeting of Session or Quarterly Board the said Session or Quarterly Board or a sub-committee thereof of not less than five members appointed for the purpose shall open the said envelopes and verify and count the said ballots, and shall determine and declare the result of said vote, and shall prepare a list containing the names of all voters who may have cast a vote upon said ballot and showing whether said voters have answered the questions submitted Yes or No.

11. The result of said vote by ballot as so determined shall thereupon be certified by the Minister in charge and by the Clerk of Session or Recording Steward of the Quarterly Board (if any) of said Congregation, and any person who may have cast a ballot upon said vote shall be entitled to obtain upon request from said officers a copy of said certificate.

12. On the two Sabbaths following the verification of the result of said vote by ballot as aforesaid the Minister presiding at all diets of worship then held shall announce from the Pulpit the result of said vote, and a copy of the certificate of the result of said vote as aforesaid shall be posted at or near the entrance to the church edifice, and a copy of said certificate shall be forthwith deposited with the Clerk of Presbytery or Secretary of the Conference having jurisdiction over such Congregation, and also to the Clerk of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada or to the Secretary of the General Conference of the Methodist Church or to the Secretary of the Congregational Union and/or to the Secretary of the General Council of the United Church as the case may be.

13. All ballots cast upon said vote shall be retained in the possession of the said Clerk of Session or Recording Steward or Minister, as the case may be, for one month following the close of said vote, and the said ballots and/or the list of votes cast may be examined in the presence of said officers by any member who may have cast or been qualified to cast a ballot upon said vote.

14. Failure or omission to strictly observe any of the detailed requirements of these regulations shall not entail the nullity of the vote in the congregation in question, provided that the Superior or County Court of the Province having jurisdiction over such congregation shall decide, if appealed to within thirty days from the first public declaration of the result of said vote, that said vote has been taken substantially in accordance with these regulations and that no such failure or omission has materially affected the result of such vote.

They will mark an "X" after the "yes" or "no". There is a place for the witness to sign and a place for the communicant to sign the ballot.

Section 3 does away with the objection raised by the Minister of Agriculture and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), because those ballots must be returned within a fixed time, and if they are not so returned they are not counted by the officials of the church.

If this schedule were adopted, I think every precaution is taken so that a proper ballot will be recorded and everybody in the congregation will be given a chance to vote either "yes" or "no" on this great question.

Mr. BAXTER: The idea of allowing people to use the ballot who wish to do so appeals to me strongly; I think it is absolutely fair and I desire to support it. Has the hon. member for Lunenburg any provision—I did not catch from his remarks anything to indicate that he had, and I do not find any from the insertion of the words which he proposes—which will determine whether a vote of any particular congregation is to be taken at the meeting or by ballot? In other words, who is to determine the question as to which method shall be adopted in any particular congregation? If I caught rightly the proposed words which the hon. member wishes to have inserted, they are these: "Or by ballot as under Schedule D." If that is right then it leaves it that the congregation may decide by a majority of the votes of the persons present at such a meeting and entitled to vote thereat, "or by ballot as under Schedule D." Apparently there is an alternative form, but I cannot gather who is to settle the question whether the vote is to be taken by ballot or at the meeting. I do not see any objection to the ballot system; on the contrary, I see a great deal of merit in having that system made universal. The ballot seems to me the fairest because I think that all of the members who are in favour of union and who will have accomplished it by their vote would naturally feel very tender of the susceptibilities of the people who hold a different view. The whole thing is a very delicate and painful question, and the best way to approach it, in my opinion, is to give every one the utmost and the fairest opportunity to express his or her view upon the subject. That can be done better by ballot, I believe, than in any other way. I would with all deference suggest that the ballot alone should be used; but if there is to be an alternative form, then at least let us have some authority, designated in the bill, who shall prescribe whether the ballot or the meeting system is to prevail in any congregation.

Mr. DUFF: I think there is a provision in another section whereby the session or the quarterly board on the request of certain members of the congregation shall call a meeting, or decide whether to have the vote taken by ballot.

Mr. BAXTER: The hon. member proposes to move an amendment.

Mr. DUFF: The provision is covered now, I think; I am not positive but I believe it is.

Mr. McBRIDE: I am opposed to any change in connection with the way the vote shall be taken. I hold in my hand a telegram from the Rev. W. MacLean of Newcastle, New Brunswick. There were certain people who had influence and who were good talkers, and they went through his congregation and secured 171 names in opposition to church union; they took an active part, mixed amongst the congregation, and obtained this result. When Rev. Mr. MacLean called on some of these same people, he states, he found that out of 39 whom he interviewed there were 34 who were in favour of church union when they heard the case presented to them as it should have been.

Mr. DUFF: That shows that both sides canvassed.

Mr. McBRIDE: I can see a danger if the vote is taken by ballot; some good-looking gentleman like my hon. friend from Lunenburg, with his pleasant manners, would have no difficulty in getting the ladies in the congregation to vote his way.

Mr. DUFF: I will do my best.

Mr. McBRIDE: I believe that the ballot system would cause friction, and those people who could make the best canvass would secure the most votes. In my opinion the proper way is to call a congregational meeting, and, if you like, have the ballot taken there. But have both sides present at the meeting to hear the subject discussed and then let them decide there and then. I am opposed to any amendment in this respect.

Mr. LOVIE: I am very much in favour of the ballot but my experience leads me to believe that the best and the most practicable way of taking a ballot would be at a congregational meeting. I say this because last February the congregation to which I belong and the congregation associating with it in entering the union were asked to vote on the question. Six hundred ballots were distributed by mail among the members of these congregations and two weeks were allowed for their return. Out of these 600 ballots only 230 were sent back and quite a number of them were too late coming in. I do not think that there would be any greater vote by means of the ballot than at a congregational meeting, and certainly those who were interested in the matter would make a point of attending the meeting. That, at any rate, has been my experience.

Mr. BROWN: It has already been indicated why we desire the vote to be taken at a congregational meeting. It is significant that when this matter was before the committee reference was frequently made to the fact that at one meeting of the General Assembly it had been indicated that it might be desirable to have a wider method of taking the vote than would be afforded at a church meeting. That was emphasized strongly. But it was also pointed out that when the union committee came together they found that some of the experiences which they had had showed that this loose method of taking the vote was most undesirable. With this before them, and many other facts that might be adduced, I understand, the Presbyterian General Assembly at Owen Sound a few weeks ago stood for the provision of taking the vote as it appears in the bill. I would rather not say these things, although evidently we must say them; but I can well understand how it might be possible for those who would like to secure a vote against the union or in favour of it to make misrepresentations in regard to the subject.

Mr. ROBB: Does the hon. member wish to leave the inference that the members of the Presbyterian church would deliberately misrepresent the situation?

Mr. BROWN: I did not mention the Presbyterian church.

Mr. ROBB: Or any other church?

Mr. BROWN: I did not refer to any church specifically. I came across an instance in which a person had been deliberately told —this was in the province of Quebec—that if this bill went into force the property of the church would be subject to state taxation. That was one of the things that had been stated. In another case representation was made that the congregational property was going to be taken away entirely from the church. It is in view of some of these statements that the General Assembly at Owen Sound decided that it was not desirable that their former recommendation should be carried out and they therefore stood for the bill as it now appears.

Mr. BAXTER: I want to point out to my hon. friend (Mr. Duff) that having looked through the remainder of the section I fear there is no such provision as the one he thinks there is. There is provision for calling a meeting but I do not think it goes further. Personally my attitude on this matter is one of indifference; if the giving of proxies to the meeting would serve the purpose I would be in favour of the proxy. I am in favour of the ballot or the proxy; I am in favour of anything that will give the people a fair, honest opportunity to express their views. I stood up last night in a state of grave doubt in some particulars and voted for the consummation of the union, believing that after all it would in the long run be far the better thing. But because I voted that way I am not prepared, and no one can carry me in a spirit of intolerance, to treat people who are not in sympathy with union as if they were vanquished and all their right of expression and of representation blotted out. That surely cannot be the attitude of any great Christian body. I do not propose to do that. I want to vote for some intelligent, well-safeguarded means of expression, and I do not think that because there may be in churches, as there are outside of them, some people who occasionally do unfair or dishonest acts we ought to brand an honest attempt to give people an opportunity of expression as a mere opportunity for someone to do something that is wrong. That cannot necessarily follow, it does not necessarily follow; if it did, the ballot system of this Dominion would be a veritable farce. Surely, in a Christian body assembled for a deliberate and great purpose such as this, we ought to expect the very minimum of trickery instead of the maximum. I think we may fairly assume that people will handle their ballots honestly, and that there is no intelligent member of the congregation today who does not know pretty well what the issue is in regard to this subject. The great principle of union has been achieved, and I think rightly achieved, by this committee. Surely, there ought to be absolute generosity and fairness in regard to the details.

Mr. STORK: Those who advocated this bill before the Private Bills committee referred quite frequently to the vote taken in 1911 and 1915, and for myself I cannot see why the method which was then so successful should now be obnoxious to those who apparently thought the earlier votes by ballot quite satisfactory. It is quite likely that an expression of opinion might be taken on a stormy night, or on a holiday, or on some other occasion when perhaps only a small portion of the congregation could be present. Surely such an important matter as this should be decided by the democratic and up-to-date method of expression of opinion, namely, by ballot, and I am strongly in favour of this method.

Mr. STEVENS: I would point out to the committee again the rather complex nature of this change as it affects the succeeding sections describing the method of calling the meetings, and so forth, which do not harmonize with the form contained in the amendment. I would suggest that section 10 might stand over until such time as those intimately acquainted with all the clauses of the bill could harmonize their views. I have very grave doubts about the wisdom of amending this clause as proposed, in view of the references made to the provincial acts. This is not only a question applying to the taking in of a given congregation, but it also applies to the disposition of its property.

Mr. BAXTER: This only applies to the vote to enter.

Mr. STEVENS: I would suggest that the committee be given an opportunity to study the clause as a whole so that we may deal with it after mature and careful consideration.

Mr. GOOD: Mr. Chairman, I think the amount of discussion which has arisen over the point would indicate the propriety of letting the section stand until we are better seized of its significance.

The CHAIRMAN: If there is no objection, this clause will stand and the other clauses will be proceeded with.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the amendment be typewritten and distributed. I am sure half of this committee do not know what the suggestions mean.

Mr. DUFF: I read it clearly enough for everybody to hear.

[Mr. Baxter.]

The CHAIRMAN: I think it should be typewritten and distributed to every member of the committee.

Mr. LEWIS: Could it not be circulated for eight o'clock to-night?

The CHAIRMAN: Section 10 stands in the meantime, with all the subsections.

On section 11 (a)—Commission to determine equities of non-concurring congregations.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, I beg to move an amendment to this clause. It is intended to protect the rights of minority non-unionists who have been voted out of their church by the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: Does that mean as to division of property among congregations?

Mr. DUFF: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: I shall have to rule that such an amendment comes within the meaning of rule 112.

Mr. DUFF: This is the amendment I propose, Mr. Chairman:

That section 11 (a) be amended to read as follows: "Notwithstanding anything in this act contained, non-concurring congregations and non-concurring members shall be entitled to a fair and equitable share, to be determined by the commission hereinafter mentioned, of the property, real and personal, rights, powers, authorities and privileges of or in connection with the respective parent church or churches, that is to say, the Presbyterian Church in Canada, the Methodist church or the Congregational church, as the case may be, vested in the United church by this act, or of or in connection with any congregation of any of the said churches, or to compensation to be determined in like manner in lieu of such share."

In view of the fact that this federal law proposes to set up a commission of nine persons to deal with property, it seems to me that my amendment should be in order. If it passes, the commission, wherever it is deemed practical to divide the property, could give to the minority any fair share to which they might be entitled.

The CHAIRMAN: Under rule 112 no important amendment may be proposed to any private bill in committee of the Whole unless one day's notice has been given. This amendment is so material and so vital to the principle of this bill that in my view it comes within the rule.

Mr. DUFF: Will you allow the clause to stand to enable me to give the required notice?

The CHAIRMAN: Everything will have to stand, apparently.

Mr. DUFF: No.

The CHAIRMAN: I think this amendment requires notice of motion under rule 112. There is no notice before the committee.

Mr. BROWN: In regard to the division of congregational property, I do not suppose any phase of church union has been more widely discussed in the provincial legislatures and committees which have dealt with it. We may just as well recognize that so far as congregational property is concerned it is impossible to consider any smaller unit than the congregation.

The CHAIRMAN: I have ruled that amendment out of order. The question is on subsection 11 (a).

Mr. BROWN: Carried.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have an amendment along somewhat similar lines but not touching the matter of local church congregational property. It seems to me that in the case of minorities who wish to form a congregation there should be some recognition of their rights in the general church property. My resolution would be as follows:

That paragraph (a) of section 11 be amended by adding thereto after the word, "congregations" in the second line thereof the following words:

"and any minority number of members of any non-concurring or other congregation as determined by the result of the vote taken under section 10 hereof, who constitute themselves a congregation."

That paragraph (b) of section 11 be amended by adding thereto after the word, "congregations" in the second line thereof the following words:

"and of any such congregation so constituted of a minority."

That paragraph (d) of section 11 be amended by adding thereto after the word "congregations" in the second and third lines thereof the following words:

"and of any such congregation so constituted of a minority."

The CHAIRMAN: My present view is that the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg is out of order, because it is an important and vital amendment to this bill requiring notice. If any hon. member desires to speak to the point he may do so.

Mr. DUFF: What about allowing the clause to stand until we get a chance to go into this?

The CHAIRMAN: That may be done if it is the unanimous wish of the committee that the clause shall stand. Is that the committee's wish?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It does not need to be unanimous.

The CHAIRMAN: What rule is there that a clause can stand if that is not the unanimous wish of the committee?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The committee always has control over its own actions. If the committee desire that the clause shall stand, it is not necessary that there be unanimity.

The CHAIRMAN: It is a new rule to me. I thought we had to continue the clauses of the bill right through.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The committee has control of the matter.

The CHAIRMAN: There is no motion before the committee to change the order. The present question is on 11 (a).

Mr. DUFF: I move that 11 (a) stand.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by Mr. Duff that paragraph 11 (a) stand for further consideration.

Mr. GUTHRIE: An amendment of some consequence has been moved and notice has not been given. I think the Chairman's ruling is right on that point. But we are all anxious to reach a reasonable settlement and to produce a good bill, and if possible we should avoid having any reasonable proposals ruled out on some technical grounds. It would be far better in the interests of everybody, if we are going to get this bill through, to let the matter stand in order that the motion may be presented regularly after notice, and in the meantime let the notice be given. This bill is not going to be jammed through; it is going to be fully considered.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member move that the whole section stand, or simply subsection (a)?

Mr. DUFF: Just as you like; 11 (a) will suit me.

The CHAIRMAN: The motion is that section 11, subsection (a) stand for further consideration by the committee.

Mr. GOOD: In view of the amendment—

The CHAIRMAN: This is not a debatable motion, any more than is a motion to adjourn.

Mr. GOOD: I am not debating it; I am simply calling attention to the fact that the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) has moved an amendment referring to other subsections. It would seem to be better to have the whole section stand rather than the part.

The CHAIRMAN: I have ruled that the amendment of Mr. Woodsworth, being a vital and important amendment to the bill, and having been given without notice is out of order.

Those in favour of the motion that subsection (a) of section 11 stand for further consideration by the committee will please stand.

Amendment (Mr. Duff) negatived: Yeas, 29; Nays, 42.

The CHAIRMAN: I declare the motion lost. The question is now upon section 11, subsection (a).

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is an important clause, and it will require some discussion. Some of us who were not on the committee which dealt with this measure have not had that opportunity to consider some of the involved clauses that members of the committee have. This, I fancy, is one of them. I note the following opposite the section on the blank page of the bill:

The establishment of a commission is suggested in the report of counsel for the Presbyterian Church in Canada. A commission with wide powers was established by The Churches (Scotland) Act, Imp. Statutes, 1905, c. 12.

The section seeks to make provision for a commission to determine the equities of the non-concurring congregations. It certainly will deal with the property belonging to the various congregations of the church and also with the funds of the church held not by individual congregations but in the name of the church itself. The amendment which has been ruled out of order, and which I am referring to only by way of argument, provides as follows:

Notwithstanding anything in this act contained, non-concurring congregations and non-concurring members shall be entitled to a fair and equitable share, to be determined by the commission hereinafter mentioned, of the property, real and personal, rights, powers, authorities and privileges of or in connection with the respective parent church or churches, that is to say, the Presbyterian Church in Canada, the Methodist church or the Congregational churches, as the case may be, vested in the United church by this act, or of or in connection with any congregation of any of the said churches, or to compensation to be determined in like manner in lieu of such share.

I think the provision of the proposal now ruled out of order is rather better than 11 (a) in the bill, the lauguage of which is as follows:

Notwithstanding anything in this act contained, such non-concurring congregations or any one or more of them as may be determined, shall be entitled to whatever the commission hereinafter mentioned shall determine to be a fair and equitable share of the property, real and personal, rights, powers, authorities and privileges of or in connection with the respective parent church or churches, that is to say, the Presbyterian Church in Canada, the Methodist church or the Congregational churches, as the case may be, vested in the United church by this act.

The commission under the clause has practically unlimited power to deal as it sees fit with the whole property, real and personal, and with all the rights, powers, authorities and privileges of the church. These are very, very wide powers to give a commission. The appointment of the commission is dealt with in the next section, which, speaking from memory, provides that a commission of nine shall be appointed, three by those of the united church, three by those opposed to it, and the remaining three by the six so appointed. I think that the powers given to the commission in regard to the distribution of the property are rather too ample. In my opinion there are churches which have something in the nature of vested rights almost more sacred than the ordinary rights of property—cases where churches hold property by reason of bequests, or under trusts drawn in the strictest language and for the most specific purposes. My opinion is that under this clause the commission would be empowered to deal with trust property, to set aside trusts, nullify the last wishes of testators, and the like. I doubt very much if any commission should be given powers as broad as that. If there are churches, and I believe there are,—in fact I know there are—where property is held to-day under special trust for special congregations, I do not think these trusts should be disturbed by any commission.

Mr. BROWN: Is the hon. member speaking now of trusts for special congregations?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, for specific purposes.

Mr. BROWN: This commission does not touch them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then I do not think the clause is well drafted, or if it is well drafted I have misunderstood it. It says:

Notwithstanding anything in this act contained, such non-concurring congregations or any one or more of them as may be determined, shall be entitled to whatever the commission hereinafter mentioned shall determine to be a fair and equitable share of the property, real and personal, rights, powers, authorities and privileges of or in connection with the respective parent church or churches, that is to say, the Presbyterian church in Canada, the Methodist or the Congregational churches, as the case may be, vested in the United church by this act.

If it is intended that this section shall not apply to special trusts or gifts of property to individual churches, I think that should be made clear. I have in mind now the case of a trust in favour of a particular church, where the money is at all times to be employed for the maintenance of a Presbyterian burying ground. The amount of the trust is fairly large. The man who settled the fund is many years dead, and the trust has always been held by that particular church and to that particular use. I do not think any commission should be permitted to disturb a trust of that kind.

If it is intended that this clause shall refer only to the general property held in the name of the corporate body, as it were, then perhaps my remarks would not be applicable. But as I read it, it would apply to all property held by any individual church, and the commission would have power under the language of this section to say that the trust shall fall into the general fund, and shall be devoted to this cause or the other, to this use or that, just as it sees fit, and there would be no relief for any person. Last wills could be set aside and trusts of the most solemn and definite kind could be broken. I would suggest that words of limitation of some kind be inserted in this section so that the individual property of individual churches cannot be interfered with by the commission which will be appointed under this clause. I am only at the present time discussing the provisions of subsection (a). Perhaps as we proceed to the rest of the section I may find something that may change my view, as I see there are a great many subclauses to this section; but I would like some clear statement by the promoter of the bill or someone interested in it that subsection (a) does not give the commission power to set aside or otherwise dispose of property held by individual churches in trust for specific purposes.

Mr. LEWIS: Probably if the hon. member had taken the trouble to read section 8 he would have found his question answered. I do not think the section under discussion has anything to do with the individual property of a congregation. It has reference to the real and personal property of the church, trust funds, and so on.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I do not think section 8 applies at all to the property of individual churches, but to property that is received after the coming into force of this act. Section 8 says:

> Any real or personal property belonging to or held by or in trust for or to the use of any congregation, whether a congregation of the negotiating churches or a congregation received into the United church after the coming into force of this act solely for its own benefit, and in which the denomination to which such congregation belongs has no right or interest, reversionary or otherwise, shall not be subject to the provisions of sections four and five hereof or to the control of the United church, unless and until any such congregation at a meeting thereof regularly called for the purpose shall consent that such provisions shall apply to any such property or a specified part thereof.

If the words which I have suggested as being appropriately added to section 11 were put in there, it would serve my purpose.

Mr. LEWIS: I understand that the lawyers representing both sides were agreed that section 8 covered the point my hon. friend mentioned.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is, that no commission in dealing with the property under section 11 shall have any power to deal with private trusts or the private property of any individual congregation?

Mr. HAMMELL: Unless a meeting is called for that purpose and the congregation so decide.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think the congregation has any power to deal with such gifts. If they accept a trust they cannot change it. I do not think the congregation or the commission has any power to change it. I want to make it clear that the commission has no power to change it. Unless someone states authoritatively that that is the meaning of section 8, I think words should be added to provide that the commission shall not have power to change these trusts.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member, as a good lawyer, will gain some light on the matter if he reads section 5 and 6. Any property that is vested in any individual congregation is absolutely within the control of that congregation, and the commission has no power to take it away from them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is there any objection to making that clear under section 11? I stated a concrete case. Take the case of a trust settlement many years ago in favour of the Presbyterian church, where the money is held expressly for the purpose of maintaining a Presbyterian burying ground. Would the commission under section 11 have any power to deal with that trust or the trust estate in any way? If that is made clear, I think that is all I desire to know.

Mr. HAMMELL: It was made perfectly clear by the legal gentlemen.

Mr. LEWIS: It seems to me that any commission that is to be appointed will naturally be guided by the sections in this act dealing with property, trusts, and so on.

Subsection (a) agreed to.

On subsection 11 (b)—Appointment of commission.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You have not read this section and I would like to understand it. The section reads:

(b) All the equities (if any) of the non-concurring congregations, or any of them, under this section, shall be determined exclusively by a commission to consist of nine members, of whom three shall be appointed by the non-concurring congregations at a conference of representatives thereof, three by the United church from its members, and the remaining three by the six members so appointed. The names of such persons shall be submitted to the Chief Justice of Canada, and if he is satisfied after making such inquiry as he deems proper or desirable that they fairly represent the parties so appointing them, their names shall be approved by him in writing and they shall thereupon be deemed for all purposes to be duly appointed. In case the said six members are unable to agree, or in case of failure or refusal on the part of the non-concurring congregations or of the United church to appoint the required number of members as aforesaid within twelve months after the coming into force of this act, the Chief Justice of Canada, upon the application of any interested party, shall appoint sufficient members to complete the commission of nine members,—

Mr. LEWIS: What is the object of reading all this? Hon. members have the bill before them, and we are all able to read.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) has the right to read the clause if he desires.

Mr. LEWIS: If the hon. member has any amendment to propose, let him propose it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am well within my rights in reading the section. Many hon. members here have not had the pleasure of hearing the clauses read in committee, and I do not see that anything will be saved by interrupting. I think in view of the interruption I had better go back and read it all over again.

An hon. MEMBER: Go to it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The sub-section continues:

—and any appointment so made by him or to fill any vacancy among the members of the commission, or any order of the chief justice on the application of any interested party confirming the appointment of the commission, shall be final and conclusive and shall not be subject to review by any court. If a vacancy occurs in the commission by reason of death, resignation, incapacity or otherwise, it shall be filled by a member to be appointed as in the case of the original appointment of the member whose office is so vacated, and in case of inability to agree or of failure or refusal to appoint as aforesaid, as the case may be, the Chief Justice of Canada may appoint a member to fill the vacancy and so from time to time as occasion requires.

It was suggested in the committee that instructions should be given in respect of the appointment of the chief justice, and that the three members who were to be appointed by him should be outside of any of the churches interested. Certain people of the committee did not seem to want that change made. It seems to me that suggestion should be considered by the House. Inasmuch as three of the members out of the six original members are from each of the churches, it seems to me that if you want to get a fair expression of opinion amongst the nine members, you should balance the commission, with people outside of any of the churches in question. Surely it would not be a hardship to ask that the chief justice appoint people who are not in any way connected with the churches in question.

Mr. LEWIS: It seems to me that this would be just a little reflection upon the members who might be appointed if they happened to be from any of our congregations. I think that if the men who are appointed and who are agreed to by both sides of the commission, free from negotiating churches and free from those opposed to the union, could agree on three men irrespective of the denomination to which they belong, surely they would act in a fair capacity, and I see no reason why that section should not go through.

Subsection (b) agreed to.

On section 11 (c)—Conference of non-concurring congregations.

Mr. McGIVERIN: I move that in subsection (c), line 21, the word "The" be inserted before the word "conference."

Amendment agreed to

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 13—Colleges.

Mr. McGIVERIN: I move that in the first line of this section the word "four" be stricken out and the word "five" substituted therefor.

On section 28—Declarations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move, in accordance with notice of motion given on the 23rd June:

(d) That inasmuch as questions have arisen and may arise as to the powers of the parliament of Canada under the British North America Act to give legislative effect to the provisions of this act, it is hereby declared that it is intended by this act to sanction the provisions therein contained in so far and in so far only as it is competent to the parliament so to do.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What does that mean?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a declaratory statement. It simply makes perfectly clear that so far as this parliament is legislating in the matter, it is not interfering with the jurisdiction of the provinces as respects property and civil rights.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the Prime Minister not really think that whether this is inserted or not, the fact is clear that parliament could not legislate to interfere with the rights of the provinces or to do anything contrary to its powers? I do not, however, see that there is any objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I admit that the powers of parliament are not extended or limited by this declaration; but the sections immediately preceding are declaratory sections, and I think it would be well to supplement them with this one.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): No parliament can legislate outside of its responsibilities, whatever they are.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS: Will section 10 come up immediately after recess?

The CHAIRMAN: We have not taken the schedules yet. We shall have to come back to section 10 and the committee decide on that.

Schedules A, B and C agreed to.

LATE DR. ALPHEUS TODD

LIBRARY COMMITTEE PROPOSE ERECTION OF A MEMORIAL TABLET

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following report from the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament:

The Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament met on June 25, and report as follows:

The Joint Librarians explained to the committee the economies which had been effected in regard to the re-arrangement of the periodicals and the work of the bindery. The work of card-indexing the large collection of pamphlets was being proceeded with.

The following resolution was unanimously passed by the committee:

"That it is desirable and fitting that a memorial tablet should be erected in the library to the late Dr. Alpheus Todd, LL.D., C.M.G., former Librarian of parliament, in recognition of the valuable contributions made by him to the study of constitutional government, particularly in the publication of his two works, Parliamentary Government in England and Parliamentary Government in the British Colonies."

RESIGNATION OF MR. PORTER

WARRANT ISSUED FOR WRIT OF ELECTION

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the resignation of Mr. E. G. Porter, member for the electoral district of West Hastings. I have accordingly issued my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer to make out a writ of election for the said electoral district.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. A. B. Copp (Secretary of State) moved the third reading of Bill No. 118 to amend the Companies Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Bills of Exchange Act, Revised Statutes, 1906, Chapter 119, by providing a tariff of fees to be charged by notaries for their services in all the provinces for presenting and noting for non-acceptance or non-payment any bill of exchange or promissory note, for protesting the same, keeping the same on record, furnishing copies and sending notices, and other matters incidental thereto.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister explain?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Section 124 of the Bills of Exchange Act provides that notaries in each province may charge the fees heretofore allowed them. In the eastern provinces those fees were fixed before confederation. In the West the fees have been regulated by usage. The result is that there is lack of uniformity in the fees charged by notaries for protesting bills of exchange, the scale being different in each province. For instance, in Ontario the fee for protest is 50 cents, for each notice 25 cents; Quebec, $1 and 50 cents; Nova Scotia, 50 cents and 25 cents; New Brunswick, $3. covering protest and all notices; Prince Edward Island, 50 cents and 25 cents, and for outside bills a lump charge of $2.50; Manitoba, $1 and 50 cents; Alberta, Saskatchewan, Yukon and the Northwest Territories, $2 and 50 cents; British Columbia, a lump charge of $2.50. The amendment proposed is for the purpose of having a uniform tariff for all the provinces, and the basis which has been adopted is that prevailing in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Yukon and the Northwest Territories, namely, $2 for protest and 50 cents for each notice. This amendment has been requested by the bar of Ontario and by the Chamber of Notaries of the province of Quebec. The bill has been submitted to the governing body of these professions and has been accepted by them.

Mr. BAXTER: I am in entire concurrence with the idea of uniformity. I wonder however if it is such an integral part of the law relating to bills of exchange that it is within the constitutional power of this parliament. A notary is of course a provincial officer; he receives his commission from the province and his duties may be defined by the province. I think a provincial officer has a right to fix the fees. I wish I felt otherwise, because I think the proposition is a beneficial one. Has the minister given consideration to the constitutional standpoint?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. I know in the province of my hon. friend a statute has been passed fixing the fees.

Mr. BAXTER: That was done some years ago.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes; and Maclaren on Bills, Notes and Cheques says regarding the New Brunswick statute:

As the parliament of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction over bills of exchange and promissory notes, the constitutionality of this provincial act is open to question. It is said that the charge still usually made in this province is that in force before the act in question.

So I really think there is no doubt that this parliament has full jurisdiction in every matter relating to bills of exchange.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not want to protest, because in one sense I agree with this legislation. I think there is quite a distinction that we undoubtedly can make, and that is that a protest shall occur in a certain event, and the fixing of remuneration for a provincial officer performing a service by virtue of his provincial commission. I am not making an objection, but let us hope that the differences are not so great that any one will be compelled to raise the question before the courts.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It seems to me the minister should take into consideration that the business people of the country are being taxed pretty well now and the fees are large enough at the present time.

Mr. LEADER: I should like to endorse that statement. Has the minister had any application from Manitoba to increase the fees in that province? I understand the fee is only about half the amount fixed in the bill. Is the minister going to increase the fees in Manitoba?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have not heard from Manitoba, but the fees which will be adopted are those prevailing in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. LEADER: But not in Manitoba.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. COOTE: I have no objection to the resolution, but I warn the minister that when we go into committee I shall object to the scale of fees he proposes.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee on the resolution, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bar association appears to have petitions for a uniform schedule, and the schedule provided in the resolution appears to be the highest in force anywhere. I must say I do not believe I would have yielded to that if I had been the minister. It seems to me the lawyers have never needed any help to raise their fees.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In this instance they cannot do it without this legislation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If a Manitoba notary is charging one dollar for a protest, does the minister say he cannot charge two dollars, unless we pass this legislation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No. In Manitoba the fees are regulated by usage only. In Quebec and Ontario they come under a subsection of section 124; they must charge the fees which were heretofore allowed them. These fees existed before confederation. The fee of fifty cents for a protest, which is charged in Ontario, is not a proper fee when compared with two dollars which is charged in my right hon. friend's province.

Mr. CHAPLIN: This is not a case of reduction of tariff.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is a case of jacking the fees up pretty well.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why does the minister not make it one dollar?

Mr. COOTE: Does the minister think it is right to raise the fee in Manitoba by law? —to double the amount which is now charged simply as a matter of usage? Is that not what he proposes to do?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I really believe it is a good thing to have a uniform fee for notarial protests on bills of exchange in all Canada.

Mr. COOTE: As I understand the minister, the rate now in force in Canada varies from fifty cents up to two dollars. I have no objection to the minister making the rate uniform, but I object to placing the rate at the highest figure which now obtains in Canada. I think the fee of two dollars which is charged in Alberta is unreasonable, considering the amount of work connected with a protest. The notary simply takes a printed form, which probably costs one cent, inserts a few figures and words in it, puts his seal on it, hands it out and charges two dollars. I think the service is not rendered commensurate with the fee, and I would suggest to the minister that before the bill is brought down he should give careful thought to the matter of fees charged, and place them at not more than one dollar.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is making sure I will not prolong the session on account of this bill. I have had requests from the Bar of Ontario, from the Chamber of Notaries of Quebec and others for this legislation.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the bill fix two dollars and fifty cents?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Or is that the maximum?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, that is the fee fixed. In all the provinces the notaries may charge a fee for their services in accordance with the tariff provided, I am almost sure they will charge that fee.

Mr. LUCAS: I understand in Ontario the fee is fifty cents.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. LUCAS: Does the minister not think Ontario would be well satisfied with an increase of a hundred per cent? Then the minister could bring the other provinces down to the level.

Mr. COOTE: Say one dollar.

Mr. HOEY: One dollar, and we will make it unanimous.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would suggest that the resolution be carried and the bill be introduced, and when it comes back to committee the objection might be raised then. Perhaps it will not be objected to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 212, to amend the Bills of Exchange Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INLAND WATER FREIGHT RATES

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Inland Water Freight Rates Act, 1923, and to provide,—

1. That it be enacted in lieu of the provisions of section three thereof as to filing with the Board of Grain Commissioners of a tariff of rates to be charged, that every shipper (including a corporation) shall immediately after entering into any charter party, bill of lading or contract for the carriage of grain from Fort William or Port Arthur to any other port or place in Canada or the United States by lake or river navigation, and before the grain shall have been laden in pursuance thereof, file with the Board of Grain Commissioners of Canada a true copy of the said charter party, bill of lading or contract for carriage.

2. That the provisions as to posting up statements in detail of cargo space, time of shipment and destination, as prescribed by section six, be repealed, and that the penalty clauses of the said act be amended.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. LOW: When this act was passed last session, it was passed with one object in mind, and that was to secure information regarding tariff rates and charges between Fort William and Bay, and American ports. As frequently follows in implementing new legislation we found some difficulty during the fall, and that was when the question arose as to whether the American vessel owners would comply with the provisions of the act. They hesitated for some time, but ultimately came in. The object of the amendment is to enable us to secure the information from the source from which it is possibly most easily secured, that is from the shippers, who will be compelled under this amendment to file with the Canada Grain Board a copy of their tariffs—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Shippers have not a tariff.

Mr. LOW: They have a copy of the contract made with the ship owners.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a charter party; that is not a tariff.

Mr. LOW: It is a tariff so far as they are concerned. The information would be obtained perhaps a little more easily in that way than through the American ship owners.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is my hon. friend quite sure that he is giving the real object for passing the legislation last year? The object, we were told, as I recollect it, was that we were going to regulate these rates on the lakes, not merely get information regarding them.

Mr. LOW: The object last year was to secure, so that the public would be able to secure it, the information. It proved perhaps a little difficult to secure it through the American vessel owners, and we are therefore amending the act that we may secure it from the source from which it is perhaps most easily secured, and that is from the shipper. When the bill comes down the object of the amendment will be fully explained to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we had better call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Mr. Low.]

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion was made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) that the House go into committee to consider the resolution in reference to Inland Water Freight Rates. I understood the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) desired to speak to the question, but he is not present.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee on the resolution, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not quite clear as to why there should be any amendment to the bill to accomplish the purpose. Has the bill not been interpreted to mean this already?

Mr. LOW: It has been so interpreted by the chairman of the Canada Grain Board, but some legal gentlemen have raised a question, on the interpretation and we thought it well to have the matter settled.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What legal gentlemen?

Mr. LOW: Legal gentlemen connected with the Grain Exchange in Winnipeg. The idea is simply, as I stated earlier in the day, to provide a means to obtain necessary information, as I stated, also the American vessel owners hesitated for some time about coming in this autumn but ultimately came in. The object of the proposed amendment is to provide that the shipper will be compelled to file a copy of the contract or charter. The words are very simple. The vessel-owner will not be called upon to file a tariff.

Mr. STEVENS: Do I understand the minister to say that the American vessel owner on the Great Lakes will not be compelled to file his tariff?

Mr. LOW: He will not be compelled to file his tariff, nor will any other vessel owner; but the shipper will be compelled to file the contract.

Mr. STEVENS: It is really an abandonment of the idea in last year's legislation to fix and control rates.

Mr. LOW: Yes, so far as the vessel owners are concerned.

Mr. STEVENS: It is an abandonment of the idea of controlling rates on the Great Lakes?

Mr. LOW: No, not at all. The main object last year was to secure information in regard to the rates which they were charging and the space they were selling.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister said that was the main object. What good was that information going to be? How would it be used? Information is not a thing in itself; it is a means to an end. What was the information for?

Mr. LOW: In order that the public might know the rates that were being charged, and that the Canada Grain Board might have this information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister's answer to the question is that the information was wanted so that the public might have it and the Canada Grain Board might also have it.

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What good was it to be either to the public or the Canada Grain Board?

Mr. LOW: I do not think anybody will deny that it will be some benefit to the people of the country, particularly the grain growers, to know the rates that are being charged and the space that is being let from time to time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This information is of no use to them unless it serves some purpose. What is to be done with it?

Mr. LOW: Information as to the price actually paid for some commodity sold throughout the country is of decided advantage. As regards the grain trade to-day, information concerning the price of wheat can be received by telegraphic communication.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am free to admit that the people ought to know what is being paid, but they want to know it for a purpose. What good does it do to the western farmer to know that he is paying, say six cents a bushel for wheat shipped on the lakes unless he can make some use of the information?

Mr. LOW: Does my right hon. friend attempt to argue for one moment that it is of no interest to the farmers of the West to know the rate or the price of wheat that prevails from day to day?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never argued that. It is of great interest to them to know that, but I would not think it would be worth while putting a statute through just so that they should have that information. I do not think the farmers have had very much difficulty in obtaining that information all along. The farmers know that they are being charged this rate, and I have never heard the farmers complain of lack of information. What they are complaining about is that they are being charged this rate. They thought the act of last session was for the purpose of enabling a government body to reduce the rate. Of course the minister contended that the old act was to regulate the rates, but he says now that it is just for the purpose of getting the information as to the rates. It is quite evident that he had abandoned all idea, if it ever did exist, of regulating the rates, because I do not know how he could regulate rates with the interpretation of last October and with this new act which makes the interpretation law.

Mr. LOW: Does my right hon. friend not know that the Canada Grain Board can say to the shipper that the rate is too high? If the rate reaches a point which they consider too high, they can intervene and fix the rate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I admit that the board can say to the shipper that the rate is too high. This reminds me of the Shakespearian phrase:

> Why, so can I, or so can any man;
> But will they come when you do call for them?

When they do say that the rate is too high, does that make it any lower?

Mr. MARTELL: Where does that quotation come from in Shakespeare? Can he quote it all?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot compete with the hon. member on some things, but I am inclined to think that on that subject I can.

> I can call spirits from the vasty deep.
> Why, so can I, or so can any man;
> But will they come when you do call for them?

Where does the hon. member think it is from?

Mr. MARTELL: Owen Glendower.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I fear he is wrong. I should like him to look it up. Now, if we will come from Shakespeare to the bill—

Mr. DUFF: Shakespeare's name was Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So is that of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). How is the board going to fix the rate after the rate is fixed? What I mean is this: When the charter party is made, everything is completed, and the board is told that it is completed at a certain rate. What can the board do then?

Mr. LOW: Should the rate have reached a point which the board thinks too high, it can step in and fix the rate. Is there anything in this legislation that the right hon. member would like me to drop? If there is, I would be glad to hear it. I do not think the right hon. gentleman opposed the old act of last year very strongly. Does he take objection to anything that I did in connection with that act last fall? One thing, at least, was accomplished, and that is that the rates of last year were lower than the rates of 1922. The act had at least that effect upon the rates. I should like to quote a few words from the Free Press of Winnipeg, of January 10, 1924. Speaking of the investigation that had taken place, this paper says:

> As a result of the investigation the Dominion parliament passed the Inland Water Freight Rates Act of 1923 which requires vessel owners to file tariffs of the rates charged for the shipment of grain from Fort William and Port Arthur and gives the Board of Grain Commissioners power to fix maximum rates. This legislation, faithfully prepared, has been found in some details defective. But its effects on the whole have been beneficial, and in spite of a temporary difficulty owing to American vessel owners objecting to file their rates, a much larger tonnage of grain was moved on the lakes in the fall of 1923 than in the previous year, and at a substantially lower rate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would just refer the minister to the Free Press on the one hand to himself on the other and what he said only a few weeks ago on this very question of rates, when he admitted that there was a very substantial increase in rates in September, when he again admitted that there was a substantial increase in rates in October. There is no doubt about the truth of this thing.

Mr. LOW: You cannot pick out one thing. The average is the only thing that counts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Supposing we get down to facts. What I said and what he agreed to was that ordinarily the rates from Fort William to Buffalo and from Duluth to Buffalo were the same.

The minister agrees. I showed that owing to this hastily rushed through and improvident legislation, American boats would not participate in that business. That was not business of a kind that was at all affected by coastal business one way or the other. It was a movement from a Canadian port to an American port, and American boats always took part in that movement. They stopped for the simple reason that they would not submit themselves to Canadian jurisdiction as was contemplated by the legislation. While under ordinary conditions the rates were always exactly the same, in September last the Duluth-Buffalo rate ranged from 2 1-2 cents to 2 3-4 cents; and on September 20 the Fort William-Buffalo rate had reached 5 cents. The admission was made the other day that the average of the Canadian rates for that month was, from Fort William to Buffalo, 4.9 as I recollect it, and I am sure that is correct. The minister's admission was 4.5 as against 2 1-2 and 2 3-4 from Duluth. These were admitted facts. Then in October the Fort William-Buffalo rate reached its peak of 6 1-2 cents, while the Duluth-Buffalo rate was 3 cents. And that again is admitted. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) was here the other day and said he saw no sense in the minister's making out that the rates were low at that time when every one knew they were high. And why were they high? They were high simply because the American boats which had always been in the business and held down the Fort William rate to a parity with the Duluth rate would not enter our ports as a result of this legislation. What was done then? The result obtained last year was altogether in spite of this legislation, that is all. Under this legislation the American carrier had to file his tariffs and submit himself to the jurisdiction of the board so that the board could reduce his rates if they were too high. By filing his tariffs he would place himself in that position, and he would not do so. How was the difficulty overcome? Was it overcome by means of this bill? No; the thing was adjusted in spite of this half-baked and hasty legislation. Why, we had the nonsensical ruling which said that in addition to the carrier filing his charter party and tariff, a further burden was to be placed on the trade: the shippers were to be put in the position of defending the carriers' rates. We usually think there is an issue between the carrier and the shipper; here under this nonsensical ruling, which I admit had to be done under the circumstances as a result of this legislation which was largely ludicrous—

Mr. LOW: Why does my hon. friend not quote some Canadian rates from Fort William to bay ports? If he does he will find they were lower than in the previous year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister knows very well that he could not affect these rates one way or the other by the bill; not one order was made, not a single thing was done. I took the place where the rates were affected by the bill, and they were affected just as I say, in connection with that movement. Why was this nonsensical ruling made? Why should the Canadian governments's representatives have found it necessary to go to Cleveland begging and praying that the American owners of vessels should do something to get them out of the mess they put themselves in? That was not in connection with a domestic movement; it was in connection with the very movement I am talking about. And everybody knows it. There is where the difficulty was. Does the minister want the committee to understand that the commission had to swallow itself, in connection with the domestic movement, and make this change? He knows very well that there is no difficulty in connection with the domestic movement; there is no difficulty as a result of this legislation, and the Canadian boats are looking after that traffic. If this act had done anything in connection with the domestic movement there would have been some order, some fixing of prices; there would have been something definite of the kind. The whole truth is that we had a piece of legislation which was intended to apply generally in ease of the situation; and so far as the movement to Buffalo is concerned, which represents a very large proportion of the trade as my hon. friend knows—some years indeed it is as high as 62 per cent—the prices were raised as a direct result of last year's legislation. It was the only thing that threw Fort William for the first time out of line with Duluth on the Buffalo movement. Why not admit it? It was admitted the other night. We have statements from hon. gentlemen to the left that the rates were increased and they remained at the higher level until the government swallowed itself and said to the American ship owners that they need not file their tariffs; in other words, the American ship owners were virtually told that they could look upon the legislation of this parliament as a perfect joke.

Let me ask the minister this pertinent question: Why does he not confine his jurisdiction to the carrier and have him file the tariff? What is the good of getting after the shipper? He says that the shipper must file his charter party; but what is the shipper interested in? Why, he is interested in getting the lowest rate he can in every instance; he wants to get as low a charter party as he can possibly obtain. What therefore is the use of penalizing the shipper? It is the carriers that we should get after if we are to do anything, and if we do not get after them I do not see why we should keep up the sham.

Mr. ROBB: Hon. gentlemen will recall that the legislation of last year was the result of the prevailing high rates of the year previous and the discrimination then as between rates charged by Canadian vessels plying between Fort Wiliam and Buffalo and between Fort William and Port Colborne or bay ports. If it will help my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) to get his bill through and let us get on with the business of the House I will admit at once that the legislation of last year was not as complete as it might have been.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is meant by that?

Mr. ROBB: I will tell the hon. gentleman. The committee will recall that when putting the measure through last year I explained the situation to the House. And by the way, I may observe that I did not notice any opposition last year from gentlemen directly opposite; the opposition came from behind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That should be an everlasting lesson to us to oppose in the interests of the government.

Mr. ROBB: Hon. gentlemen will recall that it was stated last year on behalf of the government that the real force of the measure was in another bill put through. There were two bills running concurrently, one giving the government power to suspend the coastal laws and when we found that they were discriminating against Canadian ports we took power to suspend the coastal laws. My right hon. friend asked the minister (Mr. Low) a moment ago what was the object in gathering the information. It is so that the grain commission may be enabled to advise the government when there is unjustifiable discrimination against Canadian ports, and when the government are so advised they will be in a position to decide whether or not they shall suspend the coasting laws. That is all there is in it. The measure which my hon. friend is seeking to put through has been working successfully since last fall.

Mr. MILLAR: It will be remembered that there was complaint that the carriers were aiming to dictate to the companies shipping grain just where they should insure their cargo at charges that were said to be double the ordinary rates. I have been told, I think by the chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners, that the effect of this legislation was to cut the insurance rate in two, that last season it was exactly half what it had been previously. Could the minister give us accurate information as to that?

Mr. LOW: The rates are lower; and, furthermore, we have had no complaints, which is the best evidence that the legislation must be working satisfactorily.

Mr. MILLAR: How much lower?

Mr. LOW: I cannot say.

Mr. STEVENS: If the act is working satisfactorily why take out its very essence and render it virtually ineffective?

Mr. ROBB: It is working satisfactorily under existing conditions. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) made the statement a moment ago. The shipper files the tariffs now.

Mr. STEVENS: I apprehend it is working satisfactorily to this extent: There was discrimination during the year, and the act was ineffective. Just as I told the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), who was the Minister of Trade and Commerce when the bill was in committee, it would not have the effect which he was suggesting; and it did not. What occurred? Why, there was congestion, and there were complaints about rates, and an effort was made to have the ship owners comply with the act. They bluntly refused.

Mr. LOW: I think if my hon. friend will make further inquiries he will find that there was no congestion of any kind at the head of the lakes.

Mr. STEVENS: Then why that hurried trip to Chicago, or Cleveland, or Detroit?

Mr. LOW: The minister did not go to Cleveland, or Detroit, or any other American port.

Mr. STEVENS: It was the chief commissioner of the Board of Grain Commissioners.

Mr. LOW: The chief commissioner is free to go wherever he likes. Quite frequently he goes to Buffalo and Cleveland.

Mr. STEVENS: He went at the request of the government, simply because this act, passed last year, proved to be wholly abortive. Let us see what this change means. Last year this clause 3, referred to in the resolution, provided that shipping companies, American, Canadian or otherwise, operating between Canadian ports on the Great Lakes or inland waters, should file a tariff of rates. Then the Board of Grain Commissioners reviewed those tariffs, and the shipping companies were not allowed to make any changes without filing such changes immediately. If it was complained that the rates were too high, the Board of Grain Commissioners were empowered to fix the rates, and a penalty was imposed for failure on the part of ship owners to comply with the requirements of the act. That act did not work; we might as well admit it. The minister should come up to parliament and state frankly: This act was ill conceived, we could not apply it, and it was abortive. That was the net result. Now he tells us he is proposing this amendment in the interests of the shippers of grain. But this resolution says, in effect, that he is going to relieve the shipping companies from filing tariffs at all. He says: We will wipe that out; that has proven to be a gruesome failure. Instead, he proposes this amendment:

—that every shipper (including a corporation) shall immediately after entering into any charter party, bill of lading or contract for the carriage of grain from Fort William or Port Arthur to any other port or place in Canada or the United States by lake or river navigation, and before the grain shall have been laden in pursuance thereof, file with the Board of Grain Commissioners of Canada a true copy of the said charter party, bill of lading or contract for carriage.

Now, there are not very many small shippers of grain who have a complete charter party. This amendment will simply make the individual who buys space in a vessel at any time and who has that space to sell to the real shipper, file his tariff of charges. That is what it amounts to. I venture to say that not a single step will be taken towards controlling rates in the interests of the genuine shipper of grain any more than was done by the act of last session, which has proved to be a wholly abortive piece of legislation. Not only is that the case, but knowing from experience the uselessness of last year's act, the minister now makes it doubly useless by removing the penalty clauses, as is apparent on a perusal of the second clause of this resolution:

2. That the provisions as to posting up statements in detail of cargo space, time of shipment and destination, as prescribed by section six, be repealed, and that the penalty clauses of the said act be amended.

Mr. CRERAR: What is the original clause 6?

Mr. LOW: The penalty clause is not cut out; it is contained in clause 8.

Mr. STEVENS: The penalty is in clause 3.

Mr. LOW: It was covered by clause 3 when the vessel owner had to file the tariffs; now it is covered by clause 8.

Mr. STEVENS: What amendment is the minister making to the penalty clause? He is repealing clause 3.

Mr. LOW: The penalty, so far as the vessel owner is concerned, will be cut out, because he is not now asked to file tariffs; the shipper is.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is taking out the penalty against the ship owner now. Is he going to put in a penalty against the shipper?

Mr. LOW: Yes. The ship owner will not be penalized, for the obvious reason that he is not being asked by this act to file tariffs, but the shipper is, and therefore the penalty will apply to the shipper if he fails to file his tariff.

Mr. STEVENS: Very good. Let us suppose there is a shortage of shipping. The ship owner says, "I have space to sell." Thereupon the minister says to him, "All right, you can sell it for as high as you like, we don't care." But the minute the shipper buys that space the minister pounces on him and says, "You register what you are going to pay the ship owner." As to the ship owner—well, there seemed to be an inclination to deal with him under the old act. I admit it was wholly abortive, but the minister and the government claimed credit throughout the country and boasted of how splendidly it worked. Now the minister is going to repeal this splendidly working piece of legislation. I deny that it ever did work satisfactorily. But apart from that altogether, he is now saying to all the ship owners on the Great Lakes. "Charge whatever you like for your space, it does not make any difference; you can form a combine, you can boost your rates up to six, eight, ten cents a bushel."

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend knows that that is not correct. The Canada Grain Board have control of the rates.

Mr. STEVENS: Let me finish. The hon. member for Marquette, for instance, goes to the ship owner and buys space the same as he buys grain or anything else. But the president of the Grain Growers once he has bought that space, comes under this provision:

—shall immediately after entering into any charter party, bill of lading or contract for the carriage of grain from Fort William or Port Arthur to any other port or place in Canada or the United States by lake or river navigation, and before the grain shall have been laden in pursuance thereof, file with the Board of Grain Commissioners of Canada a true copy of the said charter party, bill of lading or contract for carriage.

Now, what protection has my hon. friend got?

Mr. KELLNER: Would the president of the United Grain Growers actually have to file that, or would it be the people he bought from?

Mr. STEVENS: No, we are repealing that. Under the act as it stands, any shipping company or ship owner or person who carries or who offers, advertises or proposes to carry grain for hire—that is, the agent or anybody else connected with the operation of the ship —shall file his or their rates. The minister last year found that that provision of the old act was more or less a joke; it was ill-conceived, poorly drafted and did not work. He sent the chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners, together with some lawyers, I think he said, to the United States to plead with the American ship owners to come and file their tariffs. The American ship owners laughed at them, just as we said they would; they did not file their tariffs. Then the differences were composed by some secret process that we are not aware of. Well, the minister reads the Free Press and says, "Now, look at what I did by my act last year;" and he pats himself on the back for the accomplishment and asks us to believe that the thing was sound because of its results—I am using his own words. He says that the Free Press indicated by its article that there was a slight reduction from the rates of some previous year. Having established that to his own satisfaction he asks the House to repeal that clause, to release the ship owner from all penalty and to compel the president of the United Grain Growers or any other big shipper, the moment he enters into a cargo contract, to file the rate for the space that he has bought. Why, the shipper does not want protection against himself; he wants protection, if he wants it at all, against the unreasonable upholding of rates by the ship owner.

Mr. ROBB: How are we going to determine whether the rates are unreasonable or not unless we have them filed and get the information?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend intimates to the ship owner by this bill that he is free to fix any rate he likes. The ship owners of the Great Lakes, American and Canadian, the day after this measure passes may enter into a convention to hold the rates next season at 7 cents or 8 cents or any other rate they like to fix. My hon. friend has not taken any power to deal with them at all. It is not an offence; it is not even a moral offence, because the minister is repealing the only statute under which it was ever made an offence. This is the absurdity of the whole business: The man who desires to ship his goods over that route by these ships buys the space, then he has to file the contract. The thing is preposterous right through. I cannot for the life of me see what protection the minister seeks to give the shipper by this legislation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Apparently there is no policy, and it is quite natural—there is no room for one. As to this comparing of the rates of 1923 with those of 1922, let me ask, what was done in 1922? In that year we saw the greatest holding up of lake rates that this country had ever been afflicted with. In 1922 a big cut was made in the railway rates on grain, and where did it go to? In large part it went into the lake rates of 1922, which every gentleman in this House who had anything to do with shipping rates knows were raised tremendously. What was done? Nothing. That sort of performance cannot be indefinitely repeated. These rates would have come down anyway to a normal level. The rates of 1922 were on an abnormal level and they took up very largely the economies effected in the reduction of railway freight rates. What a farce it is for anyone to say that because the rates of 1923 were below those of 1922, anyone is to be praised for it. Where were the rates of 1923 in comparison with those of 1919 or of 1920? Although requests were made in 1922 by members of this House and by grain shippers generally that the coastal laws be suspended, nothing was done at that time to bring these rates down to a point where they could be made a basis of comparison with the rates of 1923. In 1912 there was a quick solution of the whole difficulty that then arose. The coastal laws were promptly suspended. The excuse was made by this government that they had not the right to do what the former administration did, because, they said, the former administration acted under the War Measures Act. Well, they did not; that suspension was in 1912. Taking the domestic rate my hon. friend speaks of, and not the abnormally high rates of 1923 to Buffalo, the only consideration upon which a comparison of the figures of 1923 with those of 1922 may be based is the fact that the rates in 1922 were allowed to remain as they were on account of the refusal of the government to take that plain step which was open to them and which had been taken in 1912, namely, to suspend the coastal laws. There is no use in our hiding the facts from ourselves. That would be a further measure of relief to the shipper, yet what are we doing? For the first time I submit, Mr. Chairman, in the legislative history of any country we are making the shipper, the public who are using these public vehicles, subject to fines. We are striking out the old clause which refers to shipping companies; we are changing entirely the basis of the legislation. We are saying that what the government did last year was not right and are now writing "shipper" for 'ship owner." 'We are saying there are to be no penalties whatever on the boat owners, but there are to be further restrictions, with the possibility of penalties, on the trade. Why, under this bill, before any shipper of grain can even commence to load it on the boat, he has to have somebody get a copy of his charter party and go and give it to the grain commission, and there it will be put in a dusty old file and remain, and no one will pay the slightest attention to it, and there will be no more orders or regulations or action taken than has been the case in the past. This ridiculous thing—well, there will be an excuse given for it; somebody's face will be saved—means just a little more trouble for the grain trade.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. MILLAR: In case the rates are found to be too high, and the carrier seems to be responsible, if the authorities endeavour to bring down the rates and the carriers defy them and say they will not bring them down, is there any penalty that this government can apply? Are the ship owners liable in any way under this act?

Mr. LOW: We have power to suspend the coasting laws. That would be a remedy.

Mr. MILLAR: But you could apply no remedy in the way of a fine on the carrier?

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. MILLAR: I think perhaps too much has been made out of comparisons of rates. I have not the rates under my hand, but I remember the average rate for 1923 was very, very slightly over the average rate for 1922, if any.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not to Buffalo; that was admitted.

Mr. MILLAR: That is one point, and an important one too. I do not so much blame the minister for taking any measures he possibly could to keep the grain moving when it was coming down in an avalanche from western Canada. It would have meant a great loss if it had not kept coming down, but I do think, to use the phrase of the leader of the opposition, that any teeth that were in the act of last year have been withdrawn; at least it appears so to me. It seems to be entirely ineffective now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are not even the gums left.

Mr. MILLAR: It would appear that that remark is pretty well justified.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is true.

Mr. MILLAR: As there is no way of getting after the carriers, it seems to me you are going the wrong way about in applying the remedy. I repeat, the act of last year did have a good effect on insurance rates. I am quite convinced that it brought about a cut of fifty per cent in insurance rates, but if you are going to change the act to make it less effective, I am afraid it will amount to nothing, and we shall have the combine operating again as it did in 1922, and perhaps worse.

9 p.m.

Mr. ROBB: Is not the best method of getting low rates, to get as many vessels to come in as you can?

Mr. MILLAR: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: Now, what measure can you suggest that will compel the boat owner to put his boat into your ports if he does not want to?

Mr. MILLAR: Suspend the coastal regulations.

Mr. ROBB: We are doing that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister think his legislation is really sensible? Does he not think it is perfectly laughable? A shipper who finds himself with grain at Fort William that he has to ship, because he cannot help himself, is held up, say for 6½ cents, where the rate ought to be say 3½ cents. And he dickers and does the utmost he can to save his own pocket, but the ship owner stands pat for 6½ cents, and the shipper cannot get a better rate. There is a regulation the grain commission can make compelling the shipper not to pay more than 3½ cents. The minister has a law which enables the grain commission to fine the shipper for paying what he is held up for and has to pay. Evidently the minister thinks the shipper is so anxious to pay money out of his pocket that he has to be restrained by law. This is the law that is going through this House.

Mr. LOW: I would like to say a word in reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. He seemed to lament very much the fate of the poor grain broker at Winnipeg who had to file these rates. I can tell my hon. friend that we have had no complaints from the brokers, so they do not look upon this as involving a great amount of work.

Mr. STEVENS: Has the minister submitted this resolution to the grain brokers?

Mr. LOW: I have not.

Mr. STEVENS: Then how could he get a complaint if they know nothing about it?

Mr. LOW: This procedure has been in operation since last October.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh no.

Mr. LOW: The shipper has filed tariffs since last October.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under what law?

Mr. LOW: Under this act as interpreted by the chairman of the grain board, who is a lawyer. The real thing that seems to worry my right hon. friend and his friends on the same side is that last year when we had the largest recorded crop, I think, in the history of this country, it moved as freely as in any other year when there was a smaller crop. What is worrying my hon. friends is the fact that there was no congestion at the head of the lakes. In reply to one hon. gentleman, I think it was the ex-Minister of Finance, may I explain that there is a penalty provided in the act when the shipper refuses to file a copy of his contract or rates.

Mr. STEVENS: What act is that in?

Mr. LOW: That will be in this act.

Mr. STEVENS: Was it in the act of 1923?

Mr. LOW: There was a penalty in the act of 1923 applying to the ship owners. The ship owners are no longer compelled to file their tariffs. This act will not apply to them.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the act that is to be?

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend asks what benefit is to be derived from the act—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister answer a question? If, for example, a railway company charges more than the railway commission provides for passenger rates, is it the passenger who is fined or the company?

Mr. LOW: We have control over the passenger and freight rates and in this case—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Control over the shipper.

Mr. LOW: The chairman of the grain board has the same powers he had under the act of last year.

Mr. STEVENS: To be applied to the shipper and not to the ship owner.

Mr. LOW: To the ship owner; if my hon. friend will only wait till the bill is brought down.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister said it did not apply to the ship owner just now.

Mr. LOW: When the ship owner exceeds a rate that the grain board think is just, the board have the right to step in and fix the rate

Mr. MEIGHEN: And fine the ship owner if he does not comply?

Mr. LOW: The American ship owner would probably not come in under those circumstances.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is not to be fined under the act as it will be amended?

Mr. LOW: Did we fine him before?

Mr. MEIGHEN: You could under the other act, but it was not workable.

Mr. LOW: How could we collect the fine?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the sense of providing to fine a poor fellow who is mulcted?

Mr. LOW: We had control of the rates, just as we had control of the freight rates last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You did not have any control.

Mr. LOW: The result shown in the latter months of last year, I am sure, would convince any man that we had. We were threatened with a congestion at the head of the lakes, but there was no congestion. I am assured there was none. I received hundreds of letters and telegrams in regard to the matter, but I felt assured that there would be no congestion. As a result of the legislation the grain crop of the year 1923 moved perhaps more freely than in any other year.

Mr. CRERAR: I became a little apprehensive, after listening to my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), lest as a shipper of grain I might land some day in gaol, or be under the penalty of a heavy fine. I think the legislation last year was not very well considered. It was perhaps due to the fact that it was passed, as I understand, in the closing days of the session, in response to a widespread and popular demand that something should be done to control lake rates. After a study of the legislation that is at present on the statute books and which the minister is proposing to amend in the resolution we are now considering, I have come to the conclusion that the legislation was only effective in one way, or it could be effective only in one way. It is true it provided that rates should be filed by the vessel-owners with the Board of Grain Commissioners. It empowered that board, if they thought those rates were excessive, to establish a maximum rate, and it provided certain penalties in the event of the vessel owner violating or refusing to comply with the regulations in this respect as laid down by the Board of Grain Commissioners. That provision, it seems to me is wholly inoperative, and would be wholly inoperative. As is well known, the American vessel owners refused to file their rates with the Board of Grain Commissioners to meet the provisions of the law. I need not enter into the reasons that led them to that action. At any rate, they refused to file their rates, with the result that for weeks American boats refused to come to Fort William and Port Arthur for grain cargoes. But while the law was on the statute books, hastily considered perhaps in its passage through this parliament, it was necessary to provide some relief, in view of the heavy movement of grain from the western provinces, and I must commend the chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners for the versatility he displayed in getting round a difficult corner. It was a construction put upon the law that I do not think had ever been placed on a law before, but at any rate—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Did he get results?

Mr. CRERAR: At any rate it got results. Instead of insisting that the vessel owner should file his tariff with the Board of Grain Commissioners as the law provided, the construction was placed upon it that the shipper might file the rates. Consequently since the day that construction was put upon the law last autumn the shippers have filed the rates with the Board of Grain Commissioners, and the minister in the resolution we are now considering simply seeks to make legal a practice which has been in effect for the last seven or eight months. That is the real effect of this legislation.

Now we come to the point as to how effective this legislation, even when it is amended, will be in the control of rates on the lakes; because, as my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre has pointed out, that is the real thing we are endeavouring to secure. I do not think that this parliament can pass legislation that will control rates on the lakes, or that it can pass legislation under which any constituted body in Canada could go to the vessel owners and say, you must carry grain at such and such rates. It cannot be done, unless the arm of authority is to extend in a way that, as far as my knowledge goes, it has never been extended before. It certainly could not be made to apply to American vessel owners. They are citizens of another country, and as such we have no jurisdiction to say to them, you must come and carry grain from Fort William to Buffalo, and you must carry it at this rate. That is an absolutely absurd proposition, and could not be enforced. We might, by the power of legislation fix the rates at which Canadian vessel owners should carry grain from Fort William, say to Buffalo or to Georgian bay ports or to Montreal. Indeed, I believe that provision is in the law now. But if the government attempted to do that, there is one recourse open to the vessel owners. They could tie up their vessels and refuse to put them into commission for carrying grain, unless the legislation went so far that vessel owners could be penalized for their refusal to carry grain for rates fixed by the Board of Grain Commissioners. So that it seems to me when you boil the thing down in this way, and take the amendment which the minister proposes to put into effect, this legislation has only one virtue. It is not very difficult or onerous for shippers of grain to file their tariffs, or the rates at which they make their charters with the Board of Grain Commissioners. Those charters are filed with the Board of Grain Commissioners, in this sense, that the charter I will make to-day with the vessel owner to carry grain to Buffalo or Colborne or anywhere else is not divulged to my competitor in the trade.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The rate ought to be posted.

Mr. STEVENS. The minister indicates that the main virtue of this legislation is that it gives the information to the public. He told us that fifteen minutes ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only virtue.

Mr. CRERAR: I may be wrong in my recollection. Those tariffs may have been available to the public; I am not prepared to say at the moment, but the virtue in this legislation is that the government through the Board of Grain Commissioners are daily in touch with the rates that are being charged on grain, say from Fort William to Buffalo or to bay ports, and if the rates to Canadian ports exceed the rates to Buffalo, the government can go to the vessel owners who alone can carry that grain under the coastal laws, and say to them: You must reduce your rates or we will suspend the coastal laws and bring in American boats into competition with you in carrying grain from one Canadian port to another. When you boil it down that is the only virtue in the legislation.

Mr. STEVENS: That virtue does not exist in this legislation and is not connected with this at all. That is a separate act altogether.

Mr. CRERAR: That is true; but under that separate act the government have the authority to suspend the coastal regulations.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We always did it.

Mr. CRERAR: Under this legislation they can get the information as to the rates at which charters are made. If they find that the rates, for instance, from Fort William to Georgian bay ports are higher than the rates charged from Fort William to Buffalo, they are in a position, as a result of the information secured in this way, to say to the Canadian vessel owner: You must bring your rates down or we will suspend the coastal laws.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member not think that if the rates are too high, the government is likely to know that anyway. It was never concealed from us.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not want my right hon. friend to get the impression that I am arguing as to the extent of the virtue in this legislation, I am stating what I think is the only virtue in it. Under clause 6, which the resolution that we are considering proposes to repeal, it was obligatory upon the broker who was the agent through which the charter was made, to post publicly in the Winnipeg Grain Exchange the details of the charter. That, I believe, was also suspended in its operation, and for the very good reason that it is not just nor right that one firm's business should be exposed to the gaze of another within half an hour of the time when the charter is made.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend buys 100,000 bushels of wheat on the market in Winnipeg, his competitor knows what he pays for that wheat, and the man who has the wheat to sell back in the country knows what the wheat is worth. Is there any reason why the man back in the country should not know what freight he has to pay on it.

Mr CRERAR: The minister is not quite correct. The price at which 100,000 bushels of wheat is bought is not necessarily known to the trade in Winnipeg. It is true that prices for future months are posted on the board every few minutes and every one knows what these prices are. But no one knows what premium I may pay for cash grain an hour or five hours from now. The same thing holds true in respect to rates. I do not think that is an unreasonable provision, and I cannot see where this is going to bring one iota of protection to the owner of the grain who ships it from the country point. We are seeking to get some effective control over those rates, and there is no question in my mind that Canadian vessel companies have at times charged extortionate rates from Fort William for carriage eastward. The only remedy that the government has now short of passing legislation that will absolutely compel them to accept certain rates and to operate their boats under those rates, is the suspension of the coastal laws. My advice to the government next autumn or at any future time is this, that the moment the rates from Fort William to Georgian bay ports get out of line with the Buffalo rates, they should suspend the coastal laws.

Mr. ROBB: Is it not fair that we should create machinery first to get the information as to the rates?

Mr. CRERAR: As I have said that is the virtue in the resolution.

Mr. STEVENS: While I agree with all that my hon. friend has said as to the facts, the deduction that this is going to effect that, is without foundation. Take, for instance, my hon. friend's operations. He makes a charter rate for a ship in September. He does not want, and he should not be asked, to divulge to the public what, as a shipper, he paid for that charter. Why should he?

Mr. ROBB: Why should we publish statistics stating that we are going to have so much wheat? If it is published to the world how much wheat the farmer has, why should he not know who wants to buy the wheat?

Mr. STEVENS: What is published is simply the market quotations that everyone pays or wants to deal at on the open market. But if I make a special deal in wheat in connection with a special order I want to fill, and I pay one, two or three cents' premium for it, that is nobody's business and it is not posted on the market.

Mr. ROBB: Is it not posted every day how much wheat is running on wheels towards Fort William?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: Why should the other fellow not know what is going out?

Mr. STEVENS: That has nothing to do with the question. I do not think any shipper should be asked to reveal what he pays for a charter. If we can work out an effective scheme of showing what the prevailing rates are, that would be useful. But the minister himself admits that the legislation of last year was absolutely abortive and useless. The present minister comes to us to-day and says that by his action of last fall he ironed out difficulties, and that the wheat moved smoothly and rapidly through Fort William. How did he iron them out? He violated, broke and disregarded his own law, just as we told him last year he would have to do, a law that was ineffective and useless when it was passed. What I am complaining of is that, instead of coming before parliament and frankly admitting that in their haste and desire to do something that would make a show at the tail end of last session, in puitting through a hasty piece of legislation, they had blundered, they come before parliament and ask us to substitute the shipper for the ship owner, and I say to this committee that it is a piece of ridiculous absurdity. The minister ought to abandon this resolution and repeal the act. He ought to rest his case upon the release of the coastal laws where the real remedy rests and always did rest. Let us go back to 1922 when there was a congestion which, if I remember aright, was at the easterly end. Ships were tied up at Port Colborne and other points and were held there so long that they had to raise the rates to make up for the trips they lost. The government appointed W. T. R. Preston, I understand, to wander over the country for about three months, during the very period when the congestion was occurring, when rates were soaring day by day. Instead of taking time to draft an order in council to appoint W. T. R. Preston, they could, with the same time, have suspended the coastal laws. What was the result of Preston's three or four months' operations? That year the shipper of grain paid as high, I think, as 22 cents. Let me read what the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) said in regard to this last year:

> Now, what happened? I am not going to review the whole situation because there will be other opportunities of doing that, but we know that at the beginning of the season the rates had been fixed at three cents per bushel from Bay ports to Buffalo. Then came this enormous crop, and we had that famous meeting that took place in Toronto in May, 1922, when half a dozen shipping companies got together and formed what you may call a combine, because there is no other name that would be appropriate for it, and they agreed to fix the rate at seven or eight cents immediately after.

And so forth. In fact the rates went, at the latter end for a short period, much higher than that. The government appointed W. T. R. Preston, and after he had wandered over the country for a time, they passed this abortive law of last year. Now they come before parliament and, instead of admitting that it was wholly useless, they try to substitute something that will be worse. I predict that nothing but mischief and heart burning can come from this resolution, and I ask the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) to mark my words. It is a subterfuge. It is simply drawing a smoke screen in front of the whole public. It is a difficult problem and we know it; but the courageous thing for the government to do, and the proper attitude for parliament to take, is here and now to notify the ship owners on the Great Lakes that the moment there appears any evidence of excessive rates the coastal laws will be lifted. But do not let us pass any such legislation as this behind which they can shelter themselves perhaps for months while we go through the tedious process of breaking down red tape and hampering and embarrassing shippers. Let me again point out the absurdity of this legislation. The ship owners can fix any rate they like, and so can ship agents and brokers; but the man who buys space, the owner of the grain at the seaboard or at the lake port, must file a tariff. The thing is preposterous; it is an utterly absurd piece of legislation which no parliament should enact. I dislike very much to see parliament taking up its time in passing absurd legislation of this kind. If any good could be gained by it, if any result could be obtained, then although I might not agree with it I should at least be inclined to respect the minister's efforts. But the sole object of this legislation, so far as I have been able to discern its object, is to enable the minister to retreat from a position which he can no longer hold. The former minister's legislation of last year was not only abortive but it was mischievous; and now instead of repealing it my hon. friend substitutes the present measure. He suggested a moment ago that this would be an improvement, but I submit that it cannot possibly be that; all that it can do is to embarrass the shipper. Let me say in defence of the shippers, a great many of whom I represent, that it is unjust to ask them to state the price they pay for their charter. What right have we to demand that? If the shipper is held up by a common carrier he has some grounds to claim protection from the public. But the purchaser of this particular commodity, the shipper who buys space, is the victim in this instance; he is not the offender, he is not the one who is holding the thing up. So why demand from him information as to what he pays for his space?

Mr. KELLNER: Has the hon. gentleman any suggestion as to how parliament could exert any influence over the vessel owners and demand the information from them?

Mr. STEVENS: My attitude in regard to that question was expressed last year and I will state it again. By all means, if we can design a workable scheme to control the ship owner so as to ensure that he will not charge an exorbitant rate, let us do so. But experience teaches us that it is exceedingly difficult if not impossible to draw up legislation that will control this situation.

Mr. KELLNER: This is the only experience we have had.

Mr. STEVENS: No, we had the experience of last year's abortive effort. The Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), who was Minister of Trade and Commerce last year and who fathered the original legislation, to-day admits that the only weapon that is available is the suspension of the coastal laws; in other words, it is applying the principle of competition. That is the only weapon we have. As I pointed out last year, unless you can devise some legislation which is clearly and definitely effective or which is likely to prove effective then let shipping be free, with the understanding that the moment the rates charged are demonstrably unreasonable and unfair the coastal laws shall be lifted to allow competition to have free play. I know of no other way of meeting the situation.

To come back to the suggestion that this shall be secret. The minister has already assured us that the one outstanding virtue of this legislation is that everyone will have this information. My right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) questioned that, and the minister emphatically replied that undoubtedly everyone must have it, because that was the virtue of the bill. I agree with my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar): why should any shipper's charter party be given to his competitor? It is unfair. Suppose a shipper is farsighted enough to make a good charter party now for a September ship which he knows he has a contract to fill in Europe. He wants to safeguard his business and he makes a charter now for 3 cent; and the rate advances in September to 4 cents. But he does not want every Tom, Dick and Harry in the country to know he has that advantage, and I do not think it is anybody's business to know it. He has a right to take advantage of that situation if he so desires as a purchaser of space. But that is a wholly different thing from ship owners getting together and fixing an excessive rate, and I again warn the committee that if this legislation is passed it will constitute an invitation to the ship owners on the Great Lakes to get together and fix a rate at the very highest point possible. We shall have to wait until the bill itself comes down to be able to see the exact provisions of the individual sections; but the resolution which is before us would undoubtedly indicate that.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know that I can quite agree with the rather sweeping assertions of my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens). As I said before, there is no particular hardship on the shippers of grain in filing with the Board of Grain Commissioners the rates at which their charters are made. But while the legislation was ineffective in some respects, noticeably in this, that it could not exercise any control over American vessels, it did have one very excellent advantage in its insurance clauses. If I remember rightly, before this legislation was passed the rates of insurance on the lakes were in excess of 30 cents per $100 value of the grain. As a result of the legislation that insurance ring was broken, and I have been informed that insurance has been written recently as low as 3 cents per $100 from Fort William.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the effect of section 7?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do you not think it might be just as well to keep that section and get rid of all the rest?

Mr. CRERAR: What I am seeking to point out is that the legislation was not so utterly valueless as my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) argues.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about the $2,500,000 the farmers lost in excessive rates during the first part of the year? That was a high price they had to pay for this government's blunder.

Mr. CRERAR: We are remedying that now, or at any rate the minister I think is trying to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But he cannot hand the money back.

Mr. LOW: Grain was not shipped to any great extent until about the first of October so that there was no money lost to the shipper.

Mr. CRERAR: I am not prepared to substantiate the minister's assertion in that respect. I have not the rates with me but I think the absence of the American boats in the early part of the season did have some effect on the rates. At any rate, this insurance provision was of definite value in the bill and unquestionably it saved hundreds of thousands of dollars to the farmers of western Canada last year in the shipping of grain to Buffalo and other eastern ports. I see no way whereby this parliament can exercise control over American vessels, and without question the American vessel is necessary to move our grain crop from western Canada. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre says that the vessel companies, American and Canadian, might get their heads together and fix minimum rates at which to carry grain. That is possible. If that is done I do not see that this legislation will give the Board of Grain Commissioners any control over it, unless they are armed with authority to compel Canadian vessel owners to put their vessels in commission on the Great Lakes, and under this legislation, as I interpret it, they have not that power.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What was the insurance rate before the act came into force?

Mr. CRERAR: My memory is that it was about 33 cents per $100.

Mr. CARRUTHERS: I should like to ask the hon. member for Marquette, as a grain expert—

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. CARRUTHERS: Or rather, as a shipping expert—

Mr. CRERAR: Worse still.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:—what he would think of the government building and operating a line of large grain carriers to Georgian bay ports, and in that way holding some control over even the American lake carriers?

Mr. CRERAR: I think the suggestion is worthy of very serious consideration. The government merchant marine is to-day operating some boats on the lakes carrying grain, and if we are to have shipping combines in Canada whose excessive rates will take a toll off Canadian grain as they have unjustly done in the past, then I think parliament will be justified in saying to the government: We will provide you with the means to enable the Canadian Government Merchant Marine to put ships on the lakes to carry this grain at a fair rate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MILNE: A statement was made some time ago that as not very much grain was moved until October, the farmers of the West had not lost a great deal in 1923. I have here a report prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, from which it appears that the highest average rate in the last ten years was in 1918. The average for 1923 was 4.07, and for the high year, 1918, 4.32—a quarter of a cent lower than at the very peak prices. For the month of October the rate was 4.53. For the year previous, when we had so much trouble about freight rates, it was 3.88. The statement was made a little while ago that the government had control of the rates, and that just as soon as they found them unreasonable they would exercise their power of control. What does the minister think would be an unreasonable rate on the lakes if rates are to be allowed to soar away up beyond the peak rates of 1918, when we were in the midst of a great increase in the prices of everything? If they maintain that such rates are not above what is fair and reasonable, I should like to know where they are going to draw the line.

Mr. LOW: That is a matter for the grain board to determine. They have power to fix rates when they think they are too high.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And if the rates go above that maximum, under this amendment, they will fine the shipper for paying them.

Mr. LOW: I think the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) argued that the effect of this act was to make the rates higher in 1923 than they were in 1922. Let me make a comparison. He said certain months before—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not say that.

Mr. LOW: What did you say?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want to be drawn into a comparison of one year as against another; that is nonsense. I want to take the actual movement made in the same conditions and year. The fact is that the ordinary movement to Buffalo from Fort William on the one side and from Duluth on the other is exactly the same, but I showed him that under this legislation with no American boats out of Fort William that rate was about twice as much as from Duluth.

Mr. LOW: I know that the information, I am going to give my hon. friend will not please him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My information is correct; that is the only difference.

Mr. LOW: Let me quote the rates between Canadian ports—from Fort William to Georgian bay ports. Everybody will admit that in 1923 we had one of the largest, if not the largest, crops in the history of this country. In the month of July there was practically no wheat moving. Let us take the month of August, when the act of last session may be presumed to have become effective, and see what is the difference between the rates in 1922 and in 1923. During the month of August 1923 the rate was one-fifth of a cent per bushel higher than for the corresponding month of 1922. In view of the fact that we had such a large crop, that is not a very great increase; it cannot be attributed to the act.

Mr. SHAW: Can the minister state how much grain was moved in each of those months?

Mr. LOW: I will look that up. In the month of September, when perhaps we heard more about the effect that this act would have upon the movement of grain than at any other time, the rate was just one-half cent a bushel higher in 1923 than for the corresponding month in 1922.

Mr. CRERAR: That is the average?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is to Canadian points?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend likes to refer to Canadian points frequently, but when that does not suit him he would rather refer to American points. We are anxious to build up the trade of our ports, therefore we are more concerned about the rates between our own ports.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will not the minister admit that the rates were very much higher in 1922 than the regular prevailing rates?

Mr. LOW: I am merely showing that the effect of this act was not to raise the rates in 1923.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LOW: In October 1923 the rate was only two-fifths of a cent per bushel higher than in the corresponding month in the previous year; in November 1923 it was 2 cents per bushel higher than in November 1922; in December 1923 it was 2 cents lower than in December 1922. During the whole season of navigation the rate of 1923 was from one-tenth to one-half a cent per bushel less than for the year 1922.

Mr. SALES: How do you arrive at those figures?

Mr. LOW: I will be glad to send the figures across to my hon. friend.

Mr. SALES: I will be glad to see them.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the minister read those figures over again? I think his calculation is wrong.

Mr. LOW: They are all on Hansard. Now, the one regret of my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) seems to be that the broker will be put to some little trouble by the proposed amendment. And he laments too for the shipper, who is always able to look after himself. I do not think that many hon. members will object to the shipper being compelled to lower the rates at any time through the efforts of the Canada Grain Board. The brokers at Winnipeg are finding no fault with the requirement to file their tariffs; in fact they have filed them since last October. The hon. member (Mr. Crerar) knows the feeling of the brokers of that city and he corroborates my statement that they do not object. I assume my hon. friends will take the matter up further when the bill is before the House, and I shall be glad to discuss it with them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So far as insurance is concerned I have no objection at all to the provision made in that regard. That meant something; that is something within our jurisdiction. My hon. friend says this legislation did not cost the farmer one cent. I showed the other day that it had cost two and a half millions. I think it probably cost more than that, but I like to be within the mark in these matters; I know it is at least that. We all know that the prices the farmer gets are based on Fort William and Port Arthur and that the furtherance costs from Fort William and Port Arthur take account of the difference in cost between those points and Liverpool. Is there any dispute about that? Part of that cost, the cost based on Fort William and Port Arthur plus the cost of transportation to Liverpool, is the lake rate. I have already pointed out that in connection with the Buffalo movement, which is a very large movement and on which prices are frequently based, there was in September a range of from 2 to 2¾ cents before to an average as given by my hon. friend of 4.90 cents and a price of 5 cents, as quoted by me, on September 20th. In October the range of prices from Fort William had been advanced from 5 to 5½ and 6½ cents as against 3 from Duluth.

[Mr. Sales.]

Mr. LOW: The rates to-day are perhaps the lowest in the history of shipping, and they are exceedingly low to Georgian bay ports. Will my hon. friend give this act any credit, or will he say it has nothing to do with it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not the slightest.

Mr. LOW: Or is the result attributed to the act only when the rates happen to be a little higher? The fact is that the rates to-day from Fort William to Georgian bay ports and American ports are lower than they have ever been, or at any rate lower than tney have been for a number of years.

Mr. SPENCER: Is that not because there is very little grain moving?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And a lot of boats off?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the act had to do with it, what about the high prices last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: If the act is responsible for high prices, it must be responsible for low prices.

Mr. LOW: That is the point I wished to make.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There was one definite thing this act did, and if the Minister of Railways had been in the chamber he would have known it: it kept the American boats out of business for over two months and as a result shoved up those prices, which came down as soon as the American boats came back.

Mr. LOW: The American boats only come in when they have no cargoes to carry from their own ports. They seldom come in before October.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The American boats come in as it pays them to come in. If our rates are high, they come in at once, and their coming in is one of the things that keeps rates down. I say that the farmer's prices—and I thought everybody knew this—are based on Fort William-Port Arthur plus the cost of moving the grain from there to Liverpool. I do not think my hon. friend will dispute that, but he has to dispute it in order to contend successfully that he has not raised the price to the farmer. He says there was not much movement during September and October. Well, let us see. In September 1923, we had marketed deliveries by the farmers at country points of 83,353,614 bushels of wheat, and of other grains, 10,664,015 bushels; in October, 115,139,096 bushels, and of other grains 19,702,989 bushels. Of course the question is how much of that grain was actually sold by the farmers in those two months.

Mr. ROBB: No, the question is how much of it reached the lake ports in those two months.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We will take that up afterwards. If the farmer has sold his grain, on what were his prices based? If the minister will consider that for one minute he will see how absurd his proposition is.

Mr. ROBB: There are farmers selling their October wheat to-day on the basis of Fort William, but that does not mean it has reached Fort William.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely my hon. friend knows that the farmer's price is fixed when he sells it—never mind when it is shipped or whether it has reached Fort William or not. I am talking about the losses caused to the western farmer as a result of this legislation. As I have said, his prices are fixed on Fort Wiliam and Port Arthur, plus the cost of getting the grain to Liverpool, whether or not it has actually arrived there. So that the minister was ill advised in his interruption. Now, I do not think there is much doubt that everything that was actually shipped to the lakes had been sold by the farmer. Things may have changed very much since, but from my experience when I was on the railway board I would say that at least 50 per cent of the unshipped balance would be sold by the farmers long before it ever got to Fort William.

Mr. McBRIDE: Does my hon. friend think that the Canadian vessel owners on the Great Lakes should have any protection over the American owners?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is another point. I am trying to get at a matter that is challenged, and one that I think is of interest to any one who is growing grain.

Mr. McBRIDE: That is not an answer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not answering my hon. friend now. I am trying to explain a calculation, and I am not going to be turned away from it. Now suppose we assume, against what I know to be the ordinary rule, that they still have 50 per cent; that is 50 per cent forwarded, and 50 per cent still held by the farmers. It would work out that there had been sold by the farmers at the end of October 135,294,000 bushels of wheat and 20,585,000 bushels of other grains. Now the difference between those rates from Fort William to Buffalo, on the one hand, and Duluth to Buffalo on the other, ranges from the Buffalo price of 2½ cents up to 2¾ cents to the Canadian price of 5 cents. The average 4.9 cents is admitted by the minister for the whole month. That produces a difference in price greater than 2 cents a bushel, but let us cut it down to 2 cents a bushel, and if we were to give the real thing it would be a good deal more. In October it ranged from 5½ to 6½ cents from Fort William, as against 3 cents from Duluth; the difference is 3½ cents, but let us cut that down to 2 cents, for I want to be conservative. Cut that down to 2 cents instead of what the admitted figures show, and we have an actual loss to the Canadian grower of grain of $3,100,000.

Suppose you take it another way. Take it on the stuff moved, and my hon. friends are going to find themselves in precisely the same difficulty. There is a movement in September of 19,114,671 bushels of wheat, and 3,729,526 bushels of other grain; in October there was a large movement of 52,000,000 bushels, ex-Fort William and Port Arthur, when we were told there was nothing doing. In October there was a movement of 52,981,781 bushels of wheat, and 7,020,312 bushels of other grains. While we got relief in November because the government read into the Act, instead of the word "ship owner" or "ship broker" the word "shipper," making all the charter parties under which the November shipments moved considerably higher that what the real rate was on the former basis if the charter parties had not been made, there was moved in that month 77,436,635 bushels of wheat, and 14,761,979 bushels of other grains. Now, how any one knowing anything about this business can seriously say that the tragedy which happened in those two months, which effect was carried into November, and I am charging nothing up for what was carried into November, cost the country nothing—well, he must have a great idea of the common sense of this House.

Now, what is the whole defence of my hon. friend? He has none in connection with that heavy movement to Buffalo. He has none in connection with the one thing where American competition is absolutely vital, and that is the one movement where it is. He has not one defence. He goes back to Canadian points where we have the benefit of American competition, unless the coastal laws be suspended, and what can he show there? He shows that in August, 1923 the rates were one-fifth of a cent up as compared with August, 1922; in September, 1923, half a cent up as against September, 1922; October, 1923, two-fifths of a cent up as against October, 1922; in November, 1923, two cents up as against November, 1922.

10 p.m.

Mr. LOW: If I quoted two cents higher for the month of November I must have made a mistake.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was going to point out that that must be wrong.

Mr. LOW: It is two cents lower.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Two cents lower. Now what is the basis of comparison? The basis of comparison is with a year that—why, are our memories so short that we do not know what happened in rates in the autumn of 1922? Are our memories so short that we do not know the attempts that were made to get the rates upon a proper basis? Are our memories so short that we do not know the charges that were made, that the lake carrier was taking up all the economies effected by a reduction in railway freight rates? Are our memories so short that we do not know that a roving commission was appointed because these rates were so tremendously out of line, that roving commission being composed of Mr. W. T. R. Preston? We remember that. One useful thing was done; Mr. W. T. R. Preston again was enabled to draw something out of the public treasury, and the grain rates were still allowed to go on. Very useful! It was simple and easy to do just what was done in 1912, suspend the coastal laws at once, but if that had been done Mr. W. T. R. Preston could not have drawn down anything. But that is the basis that is chosen for comparison, and choosing a basis of 1922, with the rates then charged, was an insult to the intelligence of this House.

Mr. SALES: May I ask under what authority you suspended the coastal laws in 1912?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We did not have much trouble about the authority. We were the administrators of that act, and we did not twist its meaning upside down either. We simply said: That act will not be enforced by us.

Mr. SALES: Then you had no authority?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly. We had authority to step in at any time. Why not?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was anything done because we did? Was any claim of wrongdoing made in consequence? Not the slightest.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend suspended the coastal laws in 1912 just as we did in 1922, near the close of navigation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the year 1912, when we had a precisely similar situation to that which confronted this government in the year 1922 we suspended the coastal laws.

Mr. GRAHAM: At what date?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the autumn of 1912; I do not remember the exact date.

Mr. ROBB: Just for the last trip, exactly as we did in 1922.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In 1912, not at all, not in the slightest. In answer to the hon. member for Saltcoats, if it was perfectly all right to suspend the coastal laws for the last trip, it was perfectly all right to suspend them before.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance bases his case entirely on the American vessels refusing to come in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. LOW: I think I can quote a few figures that will explode any idea that the coming of American vessels into this country during the fall of 1923 had any bearing upon the raising of those rates, if my hon. friend is willing to admit the facts. In 1922, we find that 432 vessels came into this country with cargoes. In 1923, we find that 427 vessels came in, just five less than in the previous year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us have the figures for September and October. They are the only figures of any importance.

Mr. LOW: This was between the first of September and the close of navigation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has the minister the figures for those two months I mentioned?

Mr. LOW: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the only thing of the slightest importance.

Mr. LOW: It simply shows that there was only a difference of five in the number of vessels coming in, in the fall of 1923, as in the fall of 1922.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, they all came later on.

Mr. LOW: A difference of five vessels would not make a loss to the farmers of the Canadian Northwest of $5,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite true, but that is not the point at all. The point is that in this movement for September and October the boats were not there and the rates were up.

Mr. LOW: The whole point is that the act of last year did not work out the way some hon. members prophesied. There was no congestion at the head of the lakes. More wheat moved during the fall months than moved in any previous fall for many years, and the whole reason why hon. members are arguing as they are to-night is because events did not happen, as they had anticipated.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I was rather surprised to hear the minister state that the act should get credit for the substantial drop in rates towards the latter end of the season.

Mr. LOW: I am arguing to-night that the act of 1923 did not have any effect in raising the rates over the rates of 1922.

Mr. CAMPBELL: It would be a remarkable thing if the rates were raised over 1922, because in 1922 the average rate to Buffalo was $4.49, and in 1921 it was only $2.15, less than half. The year 1922 was one of very exceptional conditions. It was not merely the extra volume of grain handled over the year before, but the amount of ore and other freight carried down the lakes from lake Superior to lake Erie was just about double that handled the previous year. I notice in the scale of rates for last season, in the week ending October 13, the highest rate was 5½ cents and the lowest 4½ cents. That runs up until we come to the week ending October 27, when we find a 6½ cent rate. Then in the next week ending November 3, the rates began to drop a little and we find the rate as low as 3¼ cents.

Mr. LOW: What points?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Fort William to Buffalo. My information is that that was the very week in which the American boats first came in, the week in which this particular legislation was suspended, or an interpretation put on it that meant its suspension. The following week, November 4 to November 10 there was quite an influx of American boats and the rates dropped 2½ cents. In spite of the colder weather the following week, ending November 17, we find a rate as low as 2 cents, and that continues on into the week ending the 24th, when we find a 2 cent rate still in effect, in spite of the colder weather. I think it is quite obvious then that what fixes the rate on the lakes is the amount of competition, and this is largely American. That is determined largely by the amount of freight brought down. Iron ore seems to be the largest commodity handled on the lakes, and I would like to read the figures in millions of tons of the freight handled from lake Superior to lake Erie from 1919 to 1923. The figures are:

Year	Tons
1919	41,000,000
1920	51,000,000
1921	23,000,000
1922	42,000,000
1923	55,000,000

We will notice that there was a substantial increase in the amount of ton freight handled in 1923 over 1922, and this might have some effect on the grain rates, but I would like hon. members to notice that the small amount of ton freight handled in 1921, namely 23,000,000 tons, resulted in an immediate drop in rates on grain. The average price per bushel for delivering our grain from the head of the lakes to Buffalo was as follows:

Year	Cents
1919	3.73
1920	5.70
1921	2.15
1922	4.49
1923	4.42

I have here a chart prepared by the Bureau of Statistics with a line, showing the tonnage of ore handled, and below it, grain rates on the lake, one being the rate to Buffalo and the other the rate to the bay ports. In studying this chart hon. members will note that the line of the grain rates goes up automatically with the line of the ore: that is when the amount of ore increased the rates on grain automatically increased. When the amount of ore decreased the rates went down. So that it seems to me for years back the determining factor in fixing rates on the lake has been competition, and the competition again has been determined by a number of other things, but largely by the quantity of iron ore that is handled.

Mr. LOW: I think I said that ore and coal had an effect on the rates as regards American boats.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I think there is no question about that, so far as the ore is concerned. I am not convinced that coal has any effect on rates at all. Last year the ruling rate on coal was 45 cents, compared with an average of 80 cents a ton on ore and $1.45 on grain. This would appear to indicate that coal is carried for ballast at less than the usual price. The figures I have before me are too lengthy to weary the House with; but, according to the information I have, I am convinced that the return cargo has little or no effect on rates. A vessel leaving the head of the lakes loaded with grain simply bases her rates on what she can profitably make the return trip on. If she can get a cargo of coal coming back, it is so much to the good; but I think it has no effect whatever on the rates. This leads us to what appears to me to be the solution, and the only practical solution, of the whole question; that is the suspension of the coastal laws. So long as the American vessels are prohibited from taking part in the trade on the lakes, as between Canadian ports we will always have the recurring period of high rates, during which period the farmer is held up. I quite agree with the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) that the farmer's price back in the country is based entirely on the prevailing price on the particular day he sells, and not particularly the day on which the grain is shipped. He brings it into the elevator; the price the elevator man pays is based on the rate on that particular day, and it would make very little difference whether there was much grain being shipped in August or September. The rate is the factor that determines the price the farmer receives. As long as these coastal laws are in effect we are going to have these conditions repeatedly. If the government want to face this question courageously they have to suspend these coastal laws. I agree with the ex-Minister of Finance that if the laws were used as a club, and if the government were always prepared to use these laws as a club, it would not be necessary to suspend them at all. Our experience in the past has been that governments never do that. They wait until the harm is done, until the farmer has paid the high rate of the season, and then at the end of the season they permit a few American boats to come in, load up and remain in Canadian ports so that they can go out with the first break up in the spring. That is no suspension of the coastal laws at all. It is simply permitting American vessels to come in, store our grain and save us from storage at the head of the lakes.

Mr. ROBB: Why is it necessary to suspend the coastal laws to allow an American vessel to come in to Fort William and Port Arthur in order to go out in the spring. Why is it necessary to suspend the coastal laws at any time?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Surely the minister does not suggest that an American vessel will come in during August, load up with grain and wait until next spring?

Mr. ROBB: But under our laws, without a suspension of the coastal laws, an American vessel has the right to come in, load grain and ship it to Buffalo, but it has not the right to come in and ship it to a Canadian port.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I quite agree with that, but a large part of our grain goes to bay ports.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend said just a moment ago that the government allowed these boats to come in, store the grain in the winter and ship it to American ports in the spring.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I should have said Canadian ports. If they are permitted to load up in the port and remain there until spring, they can take the grain to Port Colborne or any other Canadian port. That is not really a suspension of the coastal laws. I am not sure whether the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) is correct or not, but my information is that the so-called suspension of the coastal laws in 1912 was not really a suspension at all. I do not know of one case where the coastal law was really suspended. What the situation calls for it seems to me, is to create competition.

There is another factor in connection with this which I intended to bring up at a later debate, but since the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) is present, I will suggest it to-night. We have an exceptionally low rate on grain all-rail to Halifax and St. John, but that low rate does not prevail to Quebec. I believe if the regular rate, we will say the present rate prevailing in the prairies, commonly called the Crowsnest pass rate applied to the city of Quebec, a large quantity of overflow grain would find its way there. Not only that, but it would immediately establish a maximum rate on the lakes. There is no question about that. We are carrying grain to-day from the head of the lakes, from Goderich, I believe, to Halifax—I am speaking from memory—a distance of about 1,305 miles for 12¼ cents a bushel, but we are charged twenty cents a bushel from Armstrong on the Transcontinental railway to Quebec. That is discrimination of the very worst kind. It looks to me as if that rate was maintained through the influence of lake shippers, because they know that a reduction to the rate prevailing west of the lakes would immediately establish a rate on the lakes. The government can suspend the coastal laws or use that, as the ex-Minister of Finance says, as a club. If the club is not good enough, they can suspend the coastal laws. Any hon. gentleman who studied the report made last year by the commission appointed to inquire into lake rates, would be convinced of the fact that steamship owners on the lakes are making tremendous profits. The Great Lakes Transportation Company, I think, showed a profit of 11 per cent; but when you write down the value of their investments to the valuation that the commission placed upon them, we find that they made a profit of about 40 per cent. According to the statistics, these vessels were able to carry grain to Buffalo for 2.15 cents a bushel in 1921. Surely they did not require 4.99 cents in 1922 and 4.42 cents in 1923, or more than double. If they made a good dividend in 1921—and their figures show that they made a substantial profit in that year—they must have made enormous profits in 1922 and 1923, and I do not think we should waste any sympathy on them. I would heartily recommend to the government that, first, they reduce the all-rail rate to Quebec to the same mileage rate as the rate basis on the prairies, which is still considerably higher than the rates from the head of the lakes to Halifax and St. John, because those rates are considerably less to-day than what we call the Crowsnest pass rates. In addition to that, they should either suspend the coastal laws in their entirety, or use them, whenever necessary, as a club.

Mr. COOTE: Last year there was a good deal of discussion here in regard to the coastal laws and their suspension, and the statement was repeatedly made that the government in 1922, did not have any power whatever to suspend the coastal laws. I was pleased to-night to hear the Acting Minister of Finance make the statement that they did suspend the coastal shipping laws in 1922. I agree with him in that. I think they did, but I want to point out to the committee just how slow they were in applying the remedy in 1922. As early as July 7 in that year Mr. James Stewart wired to the then Minister of Trade and Commerce asking that the coastal shipping laws should be suspended because he was being charged a higher rate from Fort William to Port Colborne than Canadian vessel owners were charging from Fort William to Buffalo. Mr. Stewart kept on sending wires occasionally to the department. I notice on August 29, he sent the following wire:

J. A. ROBB,
Minister of Trade and Commerce,
Ottawa.

Buffalo now two cents Port Colborne still three and three-quarters. We respectfully ask for suspension coasting laws immediately as American tonnage offered for Port Colborne at two cents. Kindly confirm so as enable Canadian mills compete with Buffalo mills.

A little later on, on September 8, he wired again:

Have had no reply respecting permission load American bottoms for Port Colborne. Combine has already cost us about fifty thousand dollars and respectfully point out we now consider ourselves free use any reasonable method expose and rectify situation.

I do not wish to take up the time of the committee in reading many of these communications, but I have quite a number of them from grain shippers applying to the government for a suspension of these laws. I should like to bring to the attention of the committee a statement made by the Secretary of the Dominion Millers' Association, Mr. C. B. Watts, who, I presume, would be an unprejudiced man in regard to this matter. This is a letter to the Hon. Charles Stewart, Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, Ottawa, it is dated November 4, 1922:

Possibly you are not aware that as high as eleven cents per bushel is being paid to take wheat from Fort William to bay ports or Goderich a government boat, Pathfinder, having been relet by James Richardson and Sons at this figure, due to load in a few days.

The normal freight this time of the year would be four cents, but the general bid rate now is 8 cents.

Further on in his letter he says:

The extra freight, be it 4 cents, 6 cents, or 7 cents per bushel is that much money taken out of the pockets of the western farmers, or equivalent to over $400,000 to possibly $600,000 or $700,000 on shipments the last week in October alone of 10,910,000 bushels.

Further on he says:

The rail freight from the lake ports to Montreal is only 8⅗ cents per bushel, no less than 17 cents per bushel I know and it is reported that 18½ cents per bushel, has been paid from Buffalo to Montreal by water.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has just told us that the rates last year in August were one fifth of a cent higher than in 1922, in September, one half of a cent higher, in October, two fifths higher. But in the year 1922 in these very months the government were receiving wires from shippers at Fort William asking for the suspension of the coastal laws. The government apparently thought that they had not the power to suspend the coastal laws in 1922 and they came to parliament last year and got legislation to enable them to do so. But although the rates were higher in 1923 in these three months than they were in 1922, the government so far as I know did not suspend the coastal laws. These shipping laws are kept on the statute books for the purpose of building up a merchant marine in Canada and I want to quote one paragraph from a letter from the secretary of the Marine and Shippers Association to the minister:

> The coasting law is the only solid foundation on which the shipbuilding industry of Canada rests. Destroy confidence in it and you prevent investments in Canadian ships. Without a rigid coasting law to parallel that of the United States Canadian tonnage would have to take the only means open to it to enjoy equal rights with that of the United States and no more building would take place in Canada.

James Whelan, president of the Port Arthur Shipbuilding Company, in a letter to the government at the time when there was some talk of suspending the coastal shipping laws says:

> Looking to the future we are justified in anticipating a large expansion in the Canadian West with future crops constantly increasing far beyond the amount of the present bumper one.

Although they had a bumper crop to handle in 1922 the Canadian producer was being robbed as was pointed out in Mr. Watt's letter to the government. The government sat here apparently thinking they had no power to act although I find in some correspondence I have here that in November they did allow the American boats to load wheat and bring it down the lakes on their last trip. I urge the minister to remove the coastal shipping law from the statute books because it has been abused shamefully by the ship owners. It has been retained in the belief that it would build up a Canadian shipbuilding industry, and the owners of Canadian shipping and those engaged in the industry have used their power to bleed the Canadian producer. I do not think that term is at all too strong, and if this coastal shipping law has been abused in that way the proper thing is to abolish it. According to a pamphlet issued by the Toronto Board of Trade about 50 per cent of the money invested in the Canadian shipping industry is American capital. So that apparently we are bleeding ourselves for the benefit of these American millionaires. The farmers are getting tired of this sort of thing and it is not to be wondered at. If the government had done their duty in 1922 and promptly suspended the coastal shipping law when asked to do so by Mr. Stewart possibly there would not now be so much agitation for the abrogation of that law and there would not be all this discussion to-night. The suspension of that law in the summer of 1922 would have brought the Canadian ship owners to their senses and taught them that there is some authority in Canada over them.

I think the minister deserves some credit for the action he took last fall when he found that the legislation which had been enacted was not effective. Either he, or the Board of Grain Commissioners is to be commended, whoever it may be that took the action, in endeavouring to circumvent that legislation. I think the first mistake last year on the part of the government was the failure to promptly suspend the coastal shipping law. But when it was attempted to regulate this shipping combine by making the shippers file their tariffs the government should have confined that legislation to Canadian vessels. Had that been done they would not have got into the trouble in which they found themselves, as I understand that the American owners of vessels would have come in and carried grain to Buffalo if they had not been asked to file their tariffs.

Mr. LOW: Would not that have been a discrimination against the Canadian shipowners?

Mr. COOTE: It might possibly be called a discrimination, but we are suffering from discrimination now on the part of Canadian vessel owners, because Canadian vessel owners carried grain in 1922 from Fort William to American ports at a cheaper rate than they would carry it to Canadian ports.

Mr. LOW: The object was to get the Americans as well as the Canadians to publish their tariffs, and there was nothing wrong in that. It is true that the provision has not worked out as we expected but it was considered at the time advisable. I asked the chairman of the board to put the broadest interpretation he could on the act—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In other words, to say that black was white.

Mr. LOW:—and to write and let me know what his views were and he told me that it was quite proper under the act to ask the shipper to file the information which we required. It did not matter where we got the information if we got it.

Mr. COOTE: That may possibly be all true but if this legislation passed a year ago had applied only to Canadian vessels the Americans would have come in and we should not have suffered from these high rates which were charged in August, September and October of last year. I am glad that the minister and his board did place the broadest interpretation they could on the act and that they did the best they could at the time. I still think, however, that the legislation of last year was faulty and I believe that while we are dealing with this legislation we should take every means possible to get it right. If the minister wants to have the tariffs submitted, he should compel not the shipper but the Canadian ship owner to furnish the necessary information. We are protecting the Canadian ship owner with the coastal law and apparently the government will not be in any hurry to suspend it.

Mr. LOW: The Americans were required to give their tariffs as well as the Canadians.

Mr. COOTE: I think there is considerable force in the argument of some hon. members to my right that the minister is asking the wrong man to file it, and if the penalty clause is invoked and the shipper is fined we shall have a peculiar situation to say the least. It is because of that that I suggest to the minister, if he persists in this corrective legislation which is made necessary because of the coastal law, that it is better to compel the ship owner to file the tariff.

Mr. LOW: Then we are getting only half the information we require. The Americans will come in and not be subject to the same regulations. Is it right to ask the Canadian vessel owners to do something which we are not asking the foreigner to do?

Mr. COOTE: You are allowing the Canadian ship owner now to do something which you will not allow the foreign ship owner to do; you are allowing him to carry grain to Canadian ports but not allowing the American ship owners to bring grain to Canadian ports. So that the discrimination against the Canadian ship owner which the minister suggests is more than offset by the privilege which the Canadian ship owners enjoy. If the minister thinks this legislation compelling the filing of rates is necessary, I am not going to labour the point at all.

Mr. MILLAR: I will not say offhand that the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) and the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) were wrong in the point they raised, but I very reluctantly accept their attitude towards publishing rates on the Great Lakes. Sometimes the farmer is urged to be businesslike, to keep in touch with the world's markets, to know the cost of carrying his grain, so he will know what his grain is worth when he is selling it. I believe that is sound advice. But how is the farmer to know what his grain is worth if he does not know the cost of carrying it to Liverpool?

Mr. LOW: The rates will be posted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh no, that is done away with under this amendment.

Mr. MILLAR: That is the very point which the member for Marquette and the member for Vancouver Centre objected to. I think they argued it would be unfair. Apparently they did not object to the publication of the higher rates,—what they termed the regular rates. That is, it is all right for the farmer to know the higher rates, but if his grain is being carried for two or three cents less he must not know that.

Mr. STEVENS: May I make my position clear? I object to the shipper, the individual who buys this space and ships his grain, being compelled to file rates. I do not object to the ship owner or carrier being compelled to do so.

Mr. MILLAR: I am very glad the member for Vancouver Centre takes that stand. He has no objection to the farmer knowing from day to day if necessary, the cost of carrying grain across the Great Lakes.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. MILLAR: That I believe is advisable. But since it is admitted by the hon. member I will not carry the point any further. Another defect in the proposed bill is this. As I understand the minister, he expects that the Board of Grain Commissioners will from time to time get information from the shippers of the charters they have made, and on that information they will base their action if the rates seem to them to be too high. As we heard, men make a practice of engaging space, not intending to use it themselves, but to resell it at a profit. Now, as I understand this proposed legislation, is it not possible that there will be a missing link, that the carriers might not be charging too much, although the shippers might be paying too much, and the Board of Grain Commissioners, in theory at least, might too hastily penalize the carriers whereas they might not be to blame? Is it not necessary to know exactly what the carriers are charging? Is not that the important information?

Mr. LOW: That is the information we will have.

Mr. STEVENS: No, not necessarily.

Mr. LOW: Yes, certainly; it is the contract made with the vessel owner.

Mr. STEVENS: No, it is the rate paid by the shipper, whether he purchases from the agent or from the vessel owner. There might be two or three intermediaries.

Mr. LOW: The information will be published anyway.

Mr. STEVENS: Not under this resolution.

Mr. SALES: Not unless you insert here after "every ship—including a corporation—" the words "or broker."

Mr. LOW: When the bill is completed it will provide for the posting of rates.

Mr. STEVENS: What rates?

Mr. LOW: The information rates supplied by the shippers.

Mr. STEVENS: That information is perfectly useless.

Mr. LOW: A copy of the contract made with the vessel owner.

Mr. MILLAR: I think the minister misses my point.

Mr. LOW: No, I do not.

Mr. MILLAR: Let me try to make it plainer. A contracts for space on a boat; he turns round and sells that space to B, who is the real shipper. B must post the rates with the Board of Grain Commissioners. But what about the rates that A has received?

Mr. STEVENS: And made a profit on?

Mr. MILLAR: Yes, he may have made a big profit.

Mr. LOW: If he makes a contract with the vessel owner it will be published.

Mr. STEVENS: Not under this resolution.

Mr. LOW: If not, we will try to cover it, and will be glad to receive any suggestions from hon. members to that end. We desire to make the bill effective.

Mr. SALES: The member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) raised a very important point. In the return to an order of the House of March 24, 1924, is contained a telegram from Mr. A. E. R. Schneider of the Cleveland Cliffs Iron Company, in which he replies to the secretary of the grain commissioners to the following effect:

Believe American vessel owners will object filing tariffs in accordance with provisions section 3 but see no objection filing copy of charter, personally believe charter should be filed with hopes this will expose and stop speculation on part of vessel brokers who are responsible to neither grain shipper or vessel owner and who have done tremendous harm to vessel interests, some of these vessel brokers not being satisfied with their proportion of about half million dollars a year on insurance, commissions and charter fees try and scalp the market on rates, this is pernicious practice and should be stopped, charters can be made between vessel owners and grain shippers direct in which case both are responsible to each other and any default on either side can be properly taken care of.

If the word "broker" is inserted as I have suggested, we will have the original charter between the vessel owner and the first party filed; then we will have the full information. Unless that is done the pernicious practice which this gentleman complains of will continue and we will not know what the man between is getting, and the minister's object will not be accomplished. I am bound to say that, like my friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote), I have a little sympathy with the minister in what he tried to do last fall. He had rather a lawless gang to deal with. We are trying to pay interest on a lot of watered stock in some of our steamship companies. Last week I happened to be on a visit to Kingston, and I saw a lot of old boats tied up there—I see the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) is in his place—and I asked: "What are these?" The answer was, "This is the graveyard of one of our lake steamship companies." One of the steamship companies, Mr. Chairman, out of which one of those men is reported to have made about $5,000,000. We are trying to pay interest on watered stock by way of those exceedingly high rates.

Mr. COOTE: And we are doing it.

Mr. SALES: Yes, we are doing it by paying these exceedingly high rates charged on our lake shipping by a lawless gang. I think it must be admitted that the minister had a rather hard task to handle that gang. I find on reading this return that the minister corresponded with American vessel owners with a view to chartering vessels in September. I do not blame him for overriding his laws.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite right.

Mr. SALES: I do not blame the late government for suspending the coasting laws.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was doing the right thing.

Mr. SALES: Was not this doing the right thing?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I quite admit that if parliament makes an idiot of itself it should be put right at the earliest possible moment.

Mr SALES: I remember the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) using a very striking phrase; he said, "The man who does not make mistakes does not do anything; he is dead."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite sure that this government is very much alive, if that is the test. They do nothing else but make mistakes.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am sorry I cannot return the compliment.

Mr. SALES: They freely admit to-night that the legislation was not effective.

An hon. MEMBER: Not "freely."

Mr. STEVENS: If they freely admitted it we would admire them.

Mr. SALES: The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) will get freer as he gains experience, and if he is going to do anything effective he will make mistakes occasionally.

Mr. STEVENS: But his predecessor made the blunder.

Mr. SALES: I was in the House at the time, and I thought it was an honest endeavour to meet the situation. But the minister had a very awkward task on his hands and I think he showed considerable firmness and a determination that these rates were to come down one way or another. I am bound to admit, with my hon. friend (Mr. Coote) that the government in 1922 should have suspended the coastal laws. They were asked often enough to suspend them and I do not know why they did not do it. If they would say to-night that at any time when there is a discrimination of half a cent a bushel—because that is as much discrimination as should be allowed between the rates of the Canadian and the American steamships—they will immediately suspend the coastal laws, I think my hon. friends here and our farmers in the west would be satisfied and that the suggestion would act as a very effective club. There would be no hesitation or wondering about it; it would be an effective way of securing action should that discrimination occur.

Mr. McBRIDE: I have been in the steamboat business now for nearly twenty years, but after listening to what has been said here to-night I am commencing to think that I do not know anything about steamboats. I suggest that the government charter a number of the steamers that they have in the Canadian Government Merchant Marine to these prairie farmers who are so anxious to get into the steamboat business and give them a chance to demonstrate that they can put them on a paying basis. If they are sincere in what they say and can manage steamboats as well as their remarks would seem to indicate, why should they not take that proposition over? I do not see why we should have ships of the merchant marine which cost this country so many millions of dollars lying idle when there is a body of people so anxious to get into the steamboat business.

A great deal has been said about the coastal laws, and hon. members advocate their suspension. How would that work out? Will the Americans abolish their coastal laws? Not by any means. You cannot run a Canadian steamer from one American port to another American port; at least, you cannot do it on the Pacific coast. If the Canadian coastal laws were suspended, it would mean that the Americans would run their boats between their own ports when they could get a good revenue by so doing, and when work was slack they could switch over and run our Canadian boats out of business. There is no question about it; if the Americans keep their coastal laws in force we have got to keep ours. If some of those men who are talking so much about the steamboat business went into it they would soon get sick of their job, a great deal sicker than they are of raising wheat.

Mr. SALES: Impossible!

Mr. McBRIDE: Running a boat on the lakes is entirely different from running a boat on the ocean. You have got to figure your interest, your depreciation, your insurance, with respect to the running of the boats during the open season; the rest of the year they have to be tied up.

Mr. SALES: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. McBRIDE: Why, certainly.

Mr. SALES: What experience has he had in running boats on the lakes?

Mr. McBRIDE: Running steamboats on the lakes and running them on the coast is the same thing; a steamboat is a steamboat no matter where it is run. I might say not only have I constructed steamers but I have operated them. I do not claim to know all about the business but I do claim to know a little and I can assure you there is not the money in steamboat work that some people think there is; it certainly takes a great deal of capital to build boats. This government, I think, knows that from past experience. Let these men who talk so glibly about the steamship business take some of the boats of the merchant marine. I suggest to the Minister of Railways that he give them a good charter; that he let my hon. friends have some of these boats for, say, a thousand dollars a year, provided that they keep them in proper repair and insure them, and give these gentlemen a chance.

Mr. GRAHAM: Carried.

Mr. McBRIDE: Now I would suggest to you gentlemen who know so much about steamboats that you take up the business try it and see what the results are.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): A reference has been made to boats at Kingston, and I would not like the hon. gentleman who made that reference to think that those boats were fit for service. Kingston has a very good harbour, to which unserviceable boats can be brought in the fall, put on the beach and left there. The boats that the hon. gentleman saw during the course of his pleasant trip to Kingston and down the river were not serviceable boats. I do not think he could get the impression that they were. When this great combine that he speaks about was formed there was more money in the United States than there was in Canada and the best boats in the Canadian service were bought at that time by the American interests—and I am not going to say that some person did not make some profit. Anyway, these boats passed into the American service.

The trouble at present in regard to carrying grain is this: We may have sufficient Canadian bottoms to carry what grain may go from Canadian ports to Canadian ports, but those boats could not by any means handle the grain passing from a Canadian port to an American port, therefore we are bound to use the American boats. The act which came into force last year and to which I referred in my address previously, was an act which was introduced by the present government without any reference to the companies or any person else connected with the service, and the result was that there were bad points in it which could have been avoided had the government taken the proper course. After the act was passed the government went into consultation with the representatives of the steamship companies and told them that the time had now come when they were going to make them "eat crow," and the American steamship owners left them without a service. I am not going to find fault with the government for upsetting that law, but I think they made a mistake in not doing it sooner. If there was not the expected congestion in regard to this transportation of wheat it was because the people did not buy the wheat, being afraid they would not be able to get the service. If the government had earlier seen the mistake they made and had attempted to rectify it, I do not think there would have been any increase in rates. Once they realized they had made a mistake after the rate pressure got upon them from Winnipeg, they got the benefit of cheaper rates. I for one would not find fault with breaking the law. They did not do it soon enough in my opinion. I think we should do away with the whole thing now, and I think we would get a better service.

Mr. SALES: Irrespective of the coasting law?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Do what you like about that. That is something you have in your hands and can make use of if necessary, but I do not think the act passed last year or this amendment will be any good.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to point out to the committee that the coastal shipping law does possibly more harm than the high tariff. We had a good deal of discussion in this House the other night in regard to shipping Canadian wheat from Halifax and St. John. Let me now read a letter from one of the biggest grain firms in Canada, which shows that this coastal shipping law is driving our wheat to the United States, so that it cannot get to Halifax and St. John. It is from James Carruthers and Company, Limited, and is addressed to the Department of Trade and Commerce, Ottawa. It is dated November 30, 1922:

> Yours of the 28th to hand and note all you say about the suspension of the coasting law in reference to American vessels to load grain in Fort William for winter storage.
> There has been so much delay in getting this matter fixed up—

That is, negotiations had gone on from July to November.

> —we don't believe there will be any American boats load cargoes of Manitoba wheat this year for Canadian ports as shippers could not ascertain just what the ruling was and according to the wires we received from Winnipeg there have been no charters made, in fact nearly all the cargoes are going to Buffalo and other American ports.
> It is too bad this matter was not settled some time ago as it would have enabled us to bring more wheat to Canadian ports and we would have been able to ship it out during the winter months from St. John and Portland.

That is what goes on every year, because we have not enough Canadian boats to carry our Canadian grain down the lakes. Approximately 50 per cent of it must go to American ports, chiefly Buffalo, and then through American ports on the Atlantic seaboard. Once it gets to Buffalo it will never get to St. John or Halifax; it is physically impossible, and that fact must be remembered when considering the coastal shipping law.

Now just one or two remarks in regard to the speech which has been made by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride). First of all, I would like to suggest to the Minister of Railways that he should get into consultation with the hon. member for Cariboo, and possibly he could induce him to manage the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, so that it would show no further losses. It is too late an hour for us to enter into 11 p.m. any discussion of the profits which the ship owners on the Great lakes made in the year 1922, but those profits could, I think, quite properly be called unholy profits. They were profits altogether unheard of before in the shipping business. This shipping combine which bled us in 1922, and again I think in 1923, was one of the worst combines that ever existed in Canada, and I do hope that the minister, if he will not suspend the coasting shipping law, will devise some legislation to control this combine, but I repeat, he will not handle it effectively unless he suspends the coasting shipping law. We have monkeyed with these shippers long enough. They have had their chances to bleed us and they can now stand a little American competition. At one time it was the proud boast of British sailors that they could compete with the world, but apparently our Canadian sailors are not made of that kind of stuff, and they must have this kind of protection.

Mr. LOW: I would just like to say a word in reply to the ex-Minister of Finance, who has spoken frequently of the shipments to Duluth. During the year 1922-1923 we had the largest quantity of grain in any year since 1917-1918. My hon. friend says the rates were higher because of a lack of boats to ship the grain, particularly to the port of Duluth, and yet we shipped to Duluth more grain in that year than in any of the previous seven years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is a little mixed. We do not ship to Duluth, but to Buffalo.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend quoted Duluth time and again.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What I was doing was this, and surely everybody knows it except my hon. friend. The usual rate Fort William-Buffalo corresponds to Duluth-Buffalo; that is the usual thing, but—and I will say this again to my hon. friend, because he has evidently not followed what has been said this evening—by reason of the fact that the American boats could not get into Fort William, their rates, which were practically the same, were almost doubled out of Fort William; that is the Fort William rate was just twice as much as Duluth. I did not say there was no movement. Good Lord, there was movement; I have shown it. The wheat was there and it had to be moved, and the movement took place, and unfortunately there was a direct loss of $3,100,000 to the Canadian grower, on the lowest possible computation.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is a very important matter and there are a few things I was going to say, but I shall defer my remarks for the present. Is it not possible that we could now let this resolution pass so that the bill may be introduced?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Carried.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Low thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 213, to amend the Inland Water Freight Rates Act, 1923.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

The House in committee on Bill No. 190, to amend the Canadian National Railways Act, 1919.

On section 1—Guarantee only on authorized issues.

Mr. GRAHAM: Some days ago we discussed this bill, and after full consideration we decided to drop the following paragraph in section 1:

(4) Nothing herein contained shall be taken to authorize the guarantee of any securities the issue of which has not been authorized by this act or some other act of parliament.

The question was raised whether that subsection did not give the Canadian National Railway Company a power which we did not intend to give them. To make sure, for the present at least we wish to drop this section. We are dropping this subsection and section 2 will become section 1.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That would leave the bill without much introduction. You had better follow the usual form and say, "This act may be cited as the Canadian National Railway Guarantee Act of 1924."

Mr. GRAHAM: Very well.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill as amended reported, read the third time and passed.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 187 to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Pelletier in the chair.

On Section 1—Rights of way across school lands.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like the minister to explain this bill.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The amendment is as set out in the section here. It is confined entirely to giving the privilege of selling school lands for the purpose outlined in the amended section. Formerly we only had the privilege of selling school lands for school sites. If other portions of the school lands were to be sold, they were sold under the provision of the act, and had to be advertised and sold by public auction. We have the consent of the governments of the three prairie provinces to this amendment to the Dominion Lands Act. We are acting as trustees for school lands. The western provinces are vitally interested in anything that is done with school lands.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The act states that the school lands may be sold at a price to be fixed by an officer of the department. Will there be any regulations governing the price? Just on what basis will the price be set?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In case the lands are to be sold by public auction, an upset price is fixed by the valuator before the sale is undertaken, and that upset price is published on the day of the sale and made accessible to bidders. The lands are never sold below that upset price. The same process would be followed here by the officers of the department to fix the price of these lands for sale in this way. It is simply to enable the department to deal more expeditiously with applications for the various purposes set out in the act and for no other. We are confined to those purposes. For example in many cases I receive applications for sand and gravel. Those are not included, and I did not think it was necessary to include them. I put nothing in here except cases of frequent occurrence. There is always that difficulty about the disposition of these lands, unless it be for school purposes, and we have the authority to sell for school purposes.

Mr. STEVENS: Under this section you would have authority to sell the right of way for a railway, a tram line or an electric or telephone pole wire, or any other right of way, or easement, or for any project, or for a reservoir, church, cemetery or hospital site. That is a pretty wide power.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. The section reads:

(4) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this act, the minister may sell school lands required as right of way for any project or for reservoir, church, cemetery or hospital sites, at a price to be fixed by an officer of the department as the actual market value of the land, and upon such terms of payment as the minister may prescribe.

Mr. STEVENS: I am questioning the advisability of passing legislation authorizing an officer of the department to sell school lands for a right of way or for any such purpose. That I call in question. I do not know whether the rest of it is as objectionable. For instance, as regards a church, cemetery or hospital, I do not see so much objection, although I cannot see any objection to the minister calling for tenders for such lands in order to get a reasonable price. This lends itself to what I might term serious errors, if not worse.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the method before? We did not have to sell everything by auction.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Everything except sites for public schools.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Or churches.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think some plan was effected whereby the auction could be got over in the case of small acreages for cemeteries.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Cemeteries, sand pits, churches.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was a method not arranged to get over it for small acreages for those purposes by the province appointing a valuator and the Dominion appointing a valuator to arrive at a basis that was suitable to both? I am pretty sure that I made that arrangement.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have no knowledge of it if my right hon. friend did so. It is not in the statutes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would not be of value if it was not in the statutes. Perhaps I am thinking of something else, but I had a recollection of that and I never ran against this difficulty. How is it coming up now?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am quite prepared to strike out the provision as to the right of way to which my hon. friend objects, but it arose chiefly over the purchase of a right of way for the reservoir line built from the Lake of the Woods to Winnipeg. It crossed a number of school sections and they had a good deal of difficulty. I can quite conceive, however, in connection with a project like that for a railway that, perhaps, it is just as well that the statute does not provide for giving control to the minister, and I am willing to strike that out. If a small site is required for a church, there is, of course, no competition, and the same is the case as regards a school site or a cemetery site. These are the only sites that I am interested in having added to the list that the minister may deal with.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How is the school site dealt with? By valuation?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In the same way, but the valuation is made by an officer of the department, which valuation fixes the upset price of the sale. I move to strike out the words "as right of way for any project or"—

Mr. BAXTER: I see the note on the opposite page reads:

> There is no way in which strips of land across school lands required as rights of way for drainage, irrigation, pipe line, reservoir or other projects.

Just leaving the other projects out, would it not be as well for the minister to substitute at least a right of way for water supplies or drainage? There would not be much use in building a reservoir if there was not a pipe to draw the water out.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am not anxious to take power to deal with what would involve the crossing of half a dozen sections of land, school lands for example, without consultation, at least, with the provincial authorities or the actual owners of the land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the only objection. For the small parcels, this is all right.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): What we want to deal with is those little acreages of land required for such purposes. The other matter can be one of agreement between the federal government and the provinces.

Mr. BAXTER: The only thing I thought was that the limitation that was suggested was a little too narrow and that it would leave the bill up in the air. If the minister wants this for reservoir purposes, he would get it for reservoir purposes, but he would be deprived of any outlet for his reservoir. He might just as well get a pipe for the reservoir, or not build the reservoir at all.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

Monday, June 30, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I beg to present the third report of the select standing committee on National Railways and Shipping as follows:

> Your committee have considered item 137 of the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1925, viz., loans to Canadian National Railway Company, $56,000,000, and have approved of the said item.
> Your committee recommend that 500 copies of the proceedings and evidence taken should be printed, and that rule 74 should be suspended in connection therewith.

I beg to move that this report be concurred in. I might say that, as regards printing, it was stated merely that 500 copies should be printed and, through an oversight, it was not stated how many should be in English and how many in French. I might suggest that 350 of those be in English and 150 in French.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The main part of the report is the recommendation of a large sum of money as a proper vote for the National Railways. I would think the report should have been presented in two parts, this one left apart from the rest. Surely it is not the intention of the House, on the mere report of a committee, to put itself on record as approving a vote of many millions of dollars.

Mr. EULER: In the reference to the committee it is destinctly stated that nothing done shall interfere with the right of the House tc a full debate on the estimate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is very good. But if the House adopts the report, the House is on record. There is no use in our going on record two ways. I think that part of the report should not be subject to adoption at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is that difficulty in it. I am inclined to think that the portion of the report in regard to the vote might be adopted, if it is necessary to adopt it, after the committee of the whole passes on the item. It is awkward to bring in a report and not adopt it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no need of adopting it. We have it before us when we come into committee of the whole.

Mr. EULER: Would it be acceptable if the first part of the report was struck out? We would like to have authority to print.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is as regards printing—yes, that is all right.

Motion as amended agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

Mr. G. H. BOIVIN (Shefford): I beg to present the first report of the select standing committee to supervise the official report of Debates as follows:

Your committee have had referred to them for consideration a communication from the King's Printer, submitting the proposed scale of rates hereto appended to be charged for the printing of special editions of speeches of members in the House of Commons.

Your committee have also considered a report from the Printing bureau showing a net loss to the government in the printing of said special editions of speeches at present rates.

Your committee, realizing in view of the increased cost of paper, the necessity of making a slight increase in the rates for the printing of said speeches, recommend that the rates set forth in the scale hereto annexed be approved, said rates to take effect at the opening of the next session of parliament and remain in force until otherwise ordered by the House. (The scale of rates referred to will be found in the Votes and Proceedings of this date.)

Your committee have had under consideration certain irregularities in the distribution of the unrevised edition of the debates to the members of the House of Commons owing to the absence of any fixed rule adopted by your committee and approved by the House.

Your committee recommend that beginning with the opening of the next session of parliament and until otherwise ordered by the House, each member of the House of Commons be supplied without charge with ten copies of the unrevised edition of the debates, four of said copies to be delivered, as at present, and six of said copies and no more to be mailed by the King's Printer to any six persons, companies, corporations or institutions within Canada, whose names and addresses shall be supplied by such member to the Clerk of the Debates committee.

Your committee have had under consideration certain recommendations providing for a wider and more general distribution of the unrevised editions of Debates at the actual cost of the extra printing, paper, binding and mailing, which has been ascertained to be approximately three dollars per session.

Your committee recommend that the required steps be taken by the proper officers to inform the general public that the said unrevised edition of the debates is available to subscribers, and will be mailed to them daily, upon application to the King's Printer, at the said rate of three dollars per session.

Your committee took up for consideration and report certain matters concerning Hansard which were recently discussed in the House of Commons without formal reference to your committee, but doubt was expressed concerning the powers of your committee to deal with and report upon said matters.

Your committee, therefore, recommend that they be given power to consider the following questions and report their opinion thereon to the House, viz:—

1. Whether Hansard should be a record of debates only, containing such items of the proceedings of the House as may be necessary to make the report of the debates intelligible, or whether it should contain all of the proceedings of the House and of the Committee of the Whole House as well as the record of debates.

2. Whether it is desirable, in the interests of economy of time, labour and expense, that the report of the debates in Hansard should be limited to such speeches as may be delivered when Mr. Speaker is in the Chair, with or without a brief report of proceedings in committee.

3. Whether it is desirable to make Hansard an official record of all the proceedings of the House of Commons, as well as a record of the debates.

The whole respectfully submitted.

GEO. H. BOIVIN,
Chairman.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING

Mr. BOIVIN for Mr. GAUVREAU (Translation): moved that the fourth report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Printing be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: As far as I remember this report has reference to the Baker Memorial ceremonial which took place in the early part of the session, and recommended the printing of the speeches.

Motion agreed to.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): I beg to present the third report of the select standing committee on Marine and Fisheries as follows:

Your committee recommend that for the season of 1925 a further reduction of 15 per cent be made on all commercial fishing licenses issued to other than white fishermen and Indians in British Columbia, and also that, owing to the lateness of the season, and the very small catch of lobsters, around the coast of Prince Edward Island and the northern part of Nova Scotia some extension be made to the season this year.

I move that this report be adopted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not an expert in these matters, but I notice that the report contains a recommendation for the extension of the lobster season, and I know that that is very important.

Mr. DUFF: It has been extended.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government seems to be marching along the autocratic road rapidly.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Does that extension include the province of Quebec, or only the Maritime provinces?

Mr. DUFF: There are several districts, and this extension only applies to the northern shore of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. It does not include Quebec.

Mr. MICHAUD: Nor New Brunswick.

Mr. DUFF: Part of New Brunswick.

Mr. MICHAUD: What part?

Mr. BAXTER: Has any consideration been given to the southern shore of New Brunswick? In this case I took up the matter with Mr. Found, the very efficient overseer, and presented the petition of the fishermen from Chance and Dipper harbours, asking for an extension of the season. Mr. Found did not see his way to recommend it, and I understood he considered the policy of including extensions was too general. My hon. friend informs me now that in a portion of his own province they have been successful in getting some extension. Will that policy be generous enough to include other parts of the Maritime provinces?

Mr. SPEAKER: This matter will stand. The motion can be adopted at this stage only by unanimous consent.

STRIKE OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): An announcement appeared in the press this morning that the government had made a settlement with the strikers. Would the minister say whether this is correct or not, and if so would he tell us what the terms are?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Acting Postmaster General): I have an announcement to make to the House, as follows:

On Sunday afternoon the striking employees at Toronto and Windsor, were permitted to return, each individually signing on under the terms offered by the government. The statement signed was as follows:

I agree to resume duty unconditionally as a postal helper on the post office staff.

As soon as the service is normal, arrangements will be made to adjust the staff to the number of positions available. No payment will be made to the employees for the time they were out on strike.

In order to clear up misunderstandings on account of what appeared in the press announcement this morning, I think it well to make a further statement, as follows:

So that there shall be no misunderstanding it is desired to state that no special offer was made in regard to a sub-committee, as reported in some of the newspapers. The only offer made by the government, and which referred to employees actually on duty, was that contained in a letter from myself as Acting Postmaster General, dated June 18, 1924, to Mr. Archer, Secretary, Canadian Federation of Postal Employees, reading as follows:

When the Civil Service Commission has submitted its report upon the salaries of the entire service, opportunity will be given to the representatives of the employees in the postal department, or in other departments of the government, who have objections to file against the salary revision proposed by the government, and to discuss such matters of difference as fully as may be necessary to ensure a thorough understanding, and, it is hoped, a final and satisfactory agreement on the points in dispute.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister give us any explanation of the grossly exaggerated reports in the press to-day?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot. I gave out no reports, and I have no knowledge of how they were given out. All I want to do is to make clear to the House this statement on behalf of the government.

Mr. SPENCE: Is the minister thoroughly satisfied that these strikers understand they will get no pay for the days they have been off. There seems to be a misunderstanding.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot say as to that. I know that the instructions from Ottawa were very definite.

Mr. SPENCE: That is the minister's understanding?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

THE ALTERNATIVE VOTE

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): In view of the large number of inquiries coming to members in this section of the House with reference to the bill regarding the single transferable vote, is the government prepared to give a specific answer to the question which the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) asked as to when they expected to bring in a bill dealing with that matter?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The bill is before the House at the present time. I mentioned the other day that there had been no decision that the bill would not be proceeded with. If such a decision is reached it will be announced as soon as it is made, but up to the present time no decision has been arrived at.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

The House resumed from June 27 consideration in committee of Bill No. 47 to incorporate the United Church of Canada—Mr. Forke—Mr. Gordon in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose we were considering an amendment moved by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) to section 10 (a). The amendment was, to add thereto, in the 33rd line after the word "thereat" the words "or by ballot under the provisions of schedule D." A copy of schedule D is said to be on the desk of each member of the House. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This point was discussed to some extent on Friday afternoon last, and I entertained a hope that in the interval the hon. gentleman (Mr. Forke) who is promoting this bill would see the reasonableness of the request of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) and agree to the amendment, if not in its exact terms then to a properly drawn amendment that would carry out the intention of the mover. As regards its drafting, the amendment is of sufficient consequence to enlist the services of the law clerk of this House. What we all want is as perfect a bill as possible. I realize that in the drafting of this amendment there may be some difficulties which will require skilled draftsmanship to overcome, but the principle, I submit, should be adopted. We can then leave the drafting over probably until to-morrow or next day, and pass the bill. Apart from this clause, I doubt if there is any other contentious clause in the bill. The principle has now been accepted, and the bill might go through. But this clause is vitally important. The clause as drawn provides that non-concurring congregations shall attend at a church meeting and there decide whether they are to continue their existence as such church, or merge in the union body; and, as was pointed out by the member for Lunenburg, there would be a large proportion of the membership of each individual church not in attendance at that meeting, and consequently those members would be deprived of a vote.

What strikes me as most important is that when this question was twice submitted to the Presbyterian church,—as I know; I do not know how it was submitted to the other churches—it was on both occasions submitted by ballot. Members of the church could deposit their ballots during the course of a couple of weeks with the proper authorities, and those votes were counted. That is the method adopted by the church itself. Now when it comes to the vital point whether action shall be taken one way or the other, the bill takes away the right to vote by ballot and compels attendance at that particular church meeting. What will be the result? A large number of those who have to be away from home from time to time during the week or during the month will not be entitled to vote; that class embraces railway men, lumbermen, fishermen, travellers, students—a large number in our community are attending the universities—the sick, the aged and the infirm. The bill proposes to practically deprive all these classes of a vote upon this important question. When the matter was up on Friday last I tried to elicit from hon. members who support this bill some valid reason why the clause should be adopted. In my judgment none was forthcoming. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) gave a sort of hazy intimation that there might be some bad work in connection with the ballots; he did not seem to be able to trust the people in the various churches to take a ballot vote. The only other objection urged at all upon the point was that some of the provincial legislatures had already passed bills containing a clause of this kind. What matters it to this parliament if a provincial legislature makes a mistake; are we going to be bound by it? Are we to have the rights of this parliament circumscribed simply because a provincial legislature has passed legislation concerning which we have never been consulted? If such other acts have been passed, that circumstance should not tie our hands. Let us do what is right, and if the ballot principle is right, let us adopt it. Then the parties interested might go to the legislatures and have the provincial legislation amended in this respect.

I do not want to use strong language, Mr. Chairman, but in my judgment it would be nothing short of an outrage to impose attendance at a church meeting as a condition to voting on this great question, when we know, if we know anything, that we are going to deprive a tremendous number of the members of the various churches of the right to vote at all through quite unavoidable absence.

Mr. HATFIELD: Might not members on both sides, unionists as well as non-unionists, be deprived of their votes?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not taking sides; I do not want to deprive any church member of his vote, I want to enable every church member, whether for or against, to have an opportunity to vote. We have no right to assume that one class is going to be away and the other at the meeting. No doubt the deprivation will cut both ways, but surely we should furnish ample opportunity for everyone interested to vote.

Now, there is another objection, and a real objection too. We want to have the vote as free, as unbiased, as uninfluenced as possible, and I do not believe you can get a free, unbiased and uninfluenced vote when the voter has to come and stand in front of his parson and declare himself. I think we recognize that in every country there is such a thing as clerical influence. I know that in the Dominion Elections Act we had a clause which recognized this and provided that clerics were not to be allowed within one hundred yards of the polling booth on election day except to cast their votes.

Mr. HAMMELL: That was in 1917.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is many years ago, But here the effort seems to be to bring the voters together under the eye of the parson and dragoon them into voting in the way the parson wants them to vote; while the object should be to make the vote as free, as unfettered, as uninfluenced as it is possible to make it. Oh, I have heard my hon. friend from Brandon refer almost every week to the fact that this is a progressive generation, a day of progress. But what are we doing here? We are turning our back on progress. The whole world knows from experience that the fairest vote is the vote by ballot.

Mr. LOVIE: Does the hon. member know that ballots are taken in church courts?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do know that in the election of elders in the Presbyterian church where I attend they vote by ballot and allow you two weeks to turn in your ballot. I never attended a church court, nor have I ever read the rules, so I cannot give any information on that point. But I do know that the experience of every civilized country in the world has been in favour of the ballot in order to obtain a fair, free and uninfluenced expression of public opinion. By the ballot you get away from influence, you get away from domination, whether it be the domination of the boss, the employer or the parson. And if we want a free vote, why should we turn our back on these years of progress, why should we retrace our steps and adopt this high old Tory principle of the open vote? That is what you are now attempting to do, you, the great Progressive party in the House of Commons. Until someone can produce some weighty reason for changing the recognized principle of the ballot, I think the clause as drawn should be resisted. My suggestion is this: Pass this bill, and let the Clerk endeavour to draft an amendment in lieu of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). I have looked over his schedule D and I think his provisions in regard to the actual vote and the counting of the vote are excellent. But just these words at the beginning, do not, I think, apply to the whole of the bill. The amendment as drawn is that paragraph (a) be amended by adding thereto after the word "thereat" in the 33rd line of page 6 of the bill the words, "or by ballot under the provisions of schedule D." That is an alternative which would be of no avail: If the meeting is to decide whether the vote be taken by ballot or by attendance at the church meeting, why, you have the same difficulty. The meeting will be there under the eye of those who in many instances want the vote to go one way or the other, and it will be decided at that meeting whether the vote shall be an open vote or shall be taken by ballot. The procedure should be uniform in all cases; and the reasons for taking a vote by ballot are so strong in this instance that the suggestion made ought to be adopted.

Mr. McBRIDE: Would the preacher have any influence on my hon. friend as to how he would vote?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not think about that. I said I have not a vote but that I have in my family five votes, and if the meeting were held in the winter only one of those votes would be registered because four of those persons would not be at home. Why should they be deprived of a vote?

Mr. FORKE: It is very refreshing to hear the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) telling this parliament to get away from old Tory ideas and adopt Progressive ideas. I like that, and I am quite prepared to do it at any time. He makes a plea for fair play in the taking of this vote. At first glance his argument seems reasonable, but when you look into the matter you find objections to the taking of the vote in the manner prescribed by the amendment. The amendment provides that the ballot shall be delivered by the clerk of session, the recording steward or the minister. Can you imagine the minister personally delivering the ballots to the members of his congregation without having some influence on those people with respect to the manner in which the ballot shall be marked? That is one thing that the hon. member is afraid of: that the minister may have undue influence in this matter if the vote is taken in the church. But if the minister delivers the ballot to the members of his congregation he has a very good opportunity to do a little canvassing. So also has the clerk, and so has the recording steward. Then we are told that a copy shall be mailed to the last known address of the members who are entitled to vote by ballot and that an accurate list shall be kept of those who receive the ballots. Then, at a meeting of the session or quarterly board the minister, the clerk of session, or recording steward, shall produce all the envelopes containing the ballots—the envelopes have previously been marked with the name of the person to whom it is to be returned—count them and make a statutory declaration as to the number of ballots for and against. There is also a clause in this amendment that failure or omission strictly to observe any of the regulations prescribed shall not nullify the vote. In other words, no wandering away from the direct provisions of this amendment would nullify the vote, and any question in that respect is to be decided by appeal to the county court or superior court. Now, this seems not too bad if one does not go deeply into the matter. But the taking of the vote will extend over a couple of weeks, and if one side starts a vigorous campaign on its own behalf, the other side will be compelled to take a similar course, and we will have the spectacle all over this Dominion of church people waging a contest among themselves as is done in a political election. An hon. gentleman says, "No." But suppose he is on one side and I am on the other; if he fights vigorously for his side I should be prepared to do the same for mine, and why shouldn't we? But it is not in the interests of church work or in the interests of the United church or the Presbyterian church that this should take place. I have no objection to a ballot vote taken at a church or congregational meeting. I believe in a ballot vote; probably it is the right way to take the vote. But if the vote is taken at the church meeting both sides have an equal opportunity; one has no advantage over the other. Everyone I am sure, who is sincerely interested in this matter will be out to vote. The people I am afraid of are the people who have no definite opinions, who are indifferent, who can be influenced by canvassing, or whose vote one way or the other can be obtained by simply going after it as in the case of a political election. I would rather see such people left out; I would rather have the decision of men like the hon. member for Lunenburg, who is in earnest on one side, and others who are equally in earnest in their advocacy of church union than the vote of a great many people whose votes will be got but who do not really care anything about the matter. I want to see fair play. I am thoroughly in sympathy with those who are anxious that this church union question shall be decided without any hard feelings. I assure the hon. member for Lunenburg that I have nothing but the kindliest feelings towards him and the steps he has taken. I should like to have been able to agree to his amendment just to show that we are willing to meet him so far, but candidly I cannot do so, because I think it would not be in the best interests of all the churches, union or Presbyterian. In regard to provincial legislation there is a question which complicates matters; the passing of this amendment would further make trouble in that direction. However, I leave that to be debated by those who are better acquainted with the legal technicalities than I am. I cannot see my way clear, Mr. Chairman, to support the amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is it the principle of the ballot that the hon. member opposes, or merely the provisions set out in schedule D? Those provisions might be changed. If my hon. friend is also of the view that the vote should be taken by ballot, then we could agree as to the conditions surrounding the taking of the ballot; if they are too drastic as proposed, let us modify them. Does the hon. member accept the principle of the ballot?

Mr. FORKE: I made it very plain that I would accept the principle of the ballot provided that ballot was taken at a congregational meeting.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It cannot be seriously argued that the views of those entitled to speak on this question, in the Presbyterian church or any other church, should not be taken by ballot. I understand the hon. member (Mr. Forke) however, to say that while he concedes that principle, he is of the view that everybody must go to the church meeting before he can express his views by ballot. There is a class of people whose opinions on this question seem to have been disregarded by those who are promoting the legislation, and that is the older men and women whose devotion to the Presbyterian church has been an integral part of their lives. Many of these people may be ill or otherwise unable to attend a meeting called for the taking of the vote; is it reasonable that they should not be permitted to express their views? It is of no use to concede the principle of the ballot and then add that if certain members of the church are unable to attend the meeting called for the purpose of taking the ballot, their voice shall not be heard.

Take the case of the men in my constituency who work in the coal mines. I know many worthy sons of the church who work in the coal mines in Nova Scotia; and the same is true of the men who work in the steel furnaces. Many of them work at night. And my hon. friend would say that before they can be permitted to express their opinion on the question of union they must give up their work at night. That is manifestly unfair. It is no use for the promoters of this bill to pretend to the committee and the House and the country that they want to accept the ballot principle, and then proceed to make it absolutely nugatory, or if not going that far, to refuse to include in this bill any provision with regard to an expression of opinion by the ballot. I think the suggestion of my hon. friend from South Wellington is very fair and reasonable, and I appeal to those who are promoting this legislation, in view of the fact that as a result of the vote of two or three nights ago the attitude of the House is pretty well understood, to be at least fair in regard to the minority. If the minority in the Presbyterian church, who believe with the greatest possible sincerity and earnestness in the rightness of their attitude on this question, are to be told, when it comes to a question of giving them an opportunity of expressing an opinion in regard to this matter, that they are not to have the use of the ballot, which every hon. member of this House would insist upon in regard to the most ordinary election that takes place in this country—

Mr. CALDWELL: Would the hon. member be willing to extend this method of voting to Dominion and provincial elections? There you vote by ballot, but you must appear in person at the poll.

Mr. ELLIOTT: (Waterloo): Would the hon. member be in favour of the suggestion of the hon. member for South Wellington, to strike out the word "or" in the proposed amendment? Otherwise, would it not be rather an autocratic position for parliament to take?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): In reply to my hon. friend from Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) all I am asking is that the principle of the ballot as a means of an expression of opinion should be recognized by this House. My hon. friend asks if I would go further and say that people should not necessarily have to go to the polls on election day. I certainly would not say that. The case is entirely different. At a Dominion or provincial election the polls are open from early morning until late at night, and there are special polls held before election day for those who are compelled by their duties to be away from home on polling day, in order that they might have an opportunity of expressing their opinion. In British Columbia there is the system of absentee voting, which has hung up the result of the last provincial election for several weeks. So my hon. friend will see that there are ample provisions in the law for the recognition of the rights of those who cannot be at a particular place on a particular day, and what I am saying now is that there should be some recognition in this bill of the situation of the men who perhaps might not find it possible to be at a certain place between seven and eleven o'clock in the evening of a particular day.

In reply to the question of my hon. friend from South Waterloo, in my judgment what we ought to provide in section 10, is not an alternative method, but we should provide compulsorily that the vote shall be by ballot. I agree with the suggestion of my friend from South Wellington that the Law Clerk of the House of Commons should be asked to draw a proper amendment for the purpose of expressing the intent of the committee on that point.

In regard to the question of conflict with provincial legislation, in view of the fact that there may be in some provinces a provision in regard to the method of voting, I would point out that in some of the provinces adherents have the right to vote, and yet here we do not propose to give them the right to vote.

Mr. BROWN: That is not the point we are discussing.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): If my hon. friend will follow my argument, my hon. friend from Brandon says that we must not provide for voting by ballot because in some of the provinces that is not the method provided, but yet he is perfectly willing to consent to a clause which may prevent adherents from voting, although in certain provinces adherents have the right to vote.

Mr. BROWN: That is not correct.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Certainly it is.

Mr. BROWN: That will be taken care of under subsection (b).

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am pointing out the inconsistency of my hon. friend from Brandon when he raises the difficulty of conflict with provincial legislation. Surely if in certain provinces adherents have the right to vote, as they undoubtedly have in many provinces, the natural argument would be that we should give them the right to vote in this bill.

Mr. CRERAR: I think that is provided for in subsection (b).

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am not discussing that particular point except for the purpose of showing the inconsistency of my hon. friend from Brandon on the question of conflict with provincial legislation, and the use of the ballot being made compulsory by Dominion legislation.

Mr. FORKE: I did not say compulsory.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend indicated that we ought not to provide for the use of the ballot in the way proposed by the hon. member for Lunenburg, because some of the provinces have not provided for the ballot.

Mr. FORKE: That was not the idea. My idea was that the congregation itself at its meeting should decide whether to vote by ballot or otherwise, leaving it entirely to the congregation to decide.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I quite understand my hon. friend's attitude, but he mentioned what had been done in certain of the provinces and the desirability of our not doing anything inconsistent with it, and I was endeavouring to point out that he was perfectly willing to be inconsistent in regard to the question of adherents voting under provincial law, and not being allowed to vote under our law. I do not think it is fair that a congregation should decide whether the vote shall be by ballot or not, because supposing the meeting of the congregation is held on a winter night, with the snow three or four feet high; how is any old lady over sixty, or any old man, for that matter, to get to that meeting and express his view?

Mr. FORKE: My mother is eighty-six and she turned out and voted for me.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): But not on a winter night, with the snow three or four feet deep. That only proves my point. My mother is eighty-three, and she turned out to vote for me, but it was on a nice day in the autumn; I do not know whether she would be able to do it on a winter's night, if there was a snow-storm. My hon. friend would prevent both his mother and my mother from voting on this church union question, because he will not allow the ballots to be taken home. He does not know whether his mother would not vote against church union. He must not be too sure about it. I think the dear old lady must cherish the church of her forefathers with which she has been associated all her life, and if she had the opportunity of voting by ballot I venture to say she would quietly mark it against church union.

Mr. BUREAU: You think she would weaken?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I know what these good old Scottish people feel in their hearts when they are left alone but no matter what their feelings are they would be prevented from expressing them if they had to attend a meeting of the congregation on a stormy winter's night.

Mr. LOVETT: Why not in the afternoon?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I have pointed out the situation of the working men in that connection.

Mr. LOVETT: They will not be working on Sunday.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Some of them have to. Are we to say that we shall not provide this fair and honest method of obtaining an expression of opinion, but that there shall be some other method adopted under which the meeting would be called by some of those interested at a time when they knew their opponents would not be there? That attitude on the part of those who are imposing this action on the church would be tantamount to saying to the members of the church "We will not give you the opportunity that is afforded by the state in the case of questions even of the smallest possible importance." It seems to me that when the supporters of church union take that position it indicates that those opposed to them are not to be given the fullest consideration. The whole complaint in this matter has been based on the adoption of an attitude of coercion on the part of the so-called majority. Why should they not be generous in such a matter as this and accede to a reasonable proposition, which no one can question, to be embodied in a properly drawn amendment and incorporated in this bill so that every member of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, where a vote is to be taken on this question, will be given an opportunity, in a manner entirely unfettered, to quietly mark his ballot and indicate his views on this question in the same way as if the balloting was for the election of members to the House of Commons. Surely we ought to throw around the determination of a question of this kind the same reasonable precautions that are extended to the voter when he marks his ballot for an election of a member to the House of Commons.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): As a member of the Private Bills Committee I was called upon by my constituency to devote more than ordinary attention to this bill. I have had the honour for a great number of years to represent that constituency in which close upon one-third of the people are English speaking Protestants. They were divided in their opinion upon this bill just as the others are who are interested in this question, but not being a member of any of the churches immediately concerned my sole object was to try and bring about an understanding such as would promote Christian union generally. I strove to the best of my ability to effect such an understanding. I was in favour of union, and I supported the principles of union in the committee in deference to the request made by a large number of my constituents; but having received representations from a considerable number of others who are opposed to union I thought I would furnish the dissenters with an opportunity of making good their case. Therefore I supported the amendment that was inserted in the bill. I also had the honour of serving as a member of the sub-committee which sat for two or three days with the idea of trying to bring about an understanding. Having failed in these respects I now appeal to the majority in this the final court of appeal in favour of the idea contained in the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Duff). In my constituency the chief Presbyterian church is located at New Carlisle, but some of the members of the congregation reside thirty and forty miles away from that town. They are scattered over a long coast line and it would be physically impossible for all these people to be assembled together at a certain date at a specific point to express their views on this important question. In fairness therefore to all parties concerned —those in favour of union as well as those opposed to it—I think the House would do well to find a means of giving both sides an opportunity of expressing their opinion. We have a rule in politics in this country which is a good one, which has stood the test of time; it is that the will of the majority must prevail. In church matters I presume the same rule will have to apply, although doubtless there will be dissenters as there always have been. I am old enough to remember when the break occurred in the Presbyterian church in the city of Montreal. I refer to the occasion when Sir Hugh Allan, and other members of the old Scottish Presbyterian church in Montreal refused to enter the Presbyterian Church in Canada, but remained connected with the old Presbyterian Church in Scotland. There will still be a Presbyterian Church in Canada even after the union which this bill accomplishes is brought about. For how long a period this will be no one can tell but it will continue for some time. In the meantime, in the best interests of union, I think all fair means should be adopted, especially in view of the conditions in my own constituency which I have described, to obtain as complete an expression of opinion as possible. It is physically impossible to get all these people, many of them fishermen and lumbermen who are absent from home, together in the one place at a fixed hour—it is out of the question to obtain a complete expression of opinion. Therefore I think the principle of the ballot should be adopted which would be the best means of convincing all parties that the real opinion of the majority has been obtained. What better means could be used than that which is in universal use throughout the country, not only in parliamentary elections but in case of controversies of various kinds and which is secret? That is a vote by ballot. I think it would be wise on the part of the promoters of the bill to adopt the suggestion that the Law Clerk of the House should be asked to draft a clause for insertion in the bill so that when the measure finally passes the House it will have some chance of rallying to its support the majority of those who are interested in it.

Miss MACPHAIL: The case of the absentee voter of British Columbia has been referred to as an argument in favour of the adoption of the ballot in the present case. The citation of that illustration is somewhat misleading because in that very case the voters had to go to church, or some suitable place within a limited time for the purpose of casting their votes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Does my hon. friend agree that it is desirable that there should be a ballot in some form?

Miss MACPHAIL: I think it is a safe way of voting.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Does not the hon. member think it is the fairest method of obtaining an expression of opinion?

Miss MACPHAIL: I wished to clear up what I thought was a misunderstanding in regard to the absentee voters of British Columbia.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I only cited that case as an instance of the fact that voting by ballot was extended to those who were unable to be at their proper place when the opinion of the congregation was sought, and the proper place according to my hon. friend would be the church.

Mr. CALDWELL: When the Minister of National Defence speaks of "the secret ballot" may I suggest to him that ballots sent in by mail are not secret because the voter must sign his name to the ballot and 4 p.m. do so in the presence of a witness. On the other hand those assembled at a meeting can mark their ballots yea or nay and do not have to sign their name to them. Consequently the latter procedure is more secret.

Mr. DUFF: That is a mere technicality.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Of course if the meeting is one where the doors will be closely tiled it will be possible to know what people go there and, in some measure, ascertain what is going on. At any rate it is the practice in the Presbyterian church when there is to be an election of elders to sign the ballots; so that they can find out whether the party voting has the right to do so. Moreover, I may inform my hon. friend that when the voting took place upon the church union question in 1915, I voted against church union at that time, and I signed my name to a ballot. My hon. friend and his friends have been claiming all through this country that union should be consummated because a vote taken in that way was cast with a majority in favour of union.

Mr. CALDWELL: I was not saying that. I was simply pointing out to the minister that this is not a secret ballot.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): All we are asking for is fair play; that the church should not desert the method which it has adopted and ratified in the past in determining who should be elders of the church, and the method which, on two distinct occasions in the past, it used for the taking of a vote on the question of union. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) informs me that the assembly recommended that an expression of opinion in regard to this question should be taken by ballot; but when the legal gentlemen framed the bill, they excluded that provision. Why should we not say that the well-recognized practice of the church should be followed, by which a member should indicate on the ballot what his views are in regard to the question and then sign the ballot, so that the people who have to do with the taking of the vote may know that that member has a right to vote. Surely, you can trust the session of the church—I am willing to do that in each particular church—to determine the accuracy of the vote and the question whether the party who sends in a ballot has a right to vote or not.

Mr. MILLAR: Would the hon. member favour confining this ballot to those resident in the district? As I understand the amendment now, the ballot would go to those who, perhaps, moved away years before, whose names are still on the church register, but whose homes are permanently somewhere else.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The hon. member for Lunenburg says that the act provides in the way the hon. member suggests, but not his amendment. I should think that every person who was a regular member of any particular congregation, would have a right to vote in that congregation. The course usually adopted in the church is this, that where one is a member of a particular church and moves to some other locality, he takes a certificate from the church with which he has been connected and becomes identified with the church in the locality to which he goes to reside.

Mr. MILLAR: Sometimes the names are left on the books for years.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am perfectly willing, and surely my hon. friend is willing to trust the session and elders on that point. I have in my own county a congregation in the country where the people are provided wtih religious services for a distance of ten miles. If a person that lived ten miles away, owing to the day being stormy, or owing to illness, or a death in the family or some other cause was unable to go to the meeting, he would be deprived of his vote. Surely it is reasonable to ask that there be embodied in this bill a provision that every recognized member of the church should be given a reasonable method of expressing his or her view. That is not an unfair proposition. If the promoters of the bill are hopeful of bringing about anything like a union, such as so many of them cherish and conceive is possible, they are throwing very grave and serious difficulties in the way of the attainment of their object if they fail to give fair play and reasonable consideration to every one who is entitled to vote, to enable him to express his opinion in a well recognized way and in accordance with the practice that has obtained in this and every other institution in the country in the matter of expression of views. I am astounded to think that the promoters of this bill should want to adhere to the proposition that nobody shall be allowed to indicate what his views are in regard to this important matter if he happens to be prevented on account of some sufficient cause, from attending a meeting on a certain day. I am sure every hon. gentleman's sense of fair play would at once bring him to consider the reasonableness of the contention that the law clerk should be permitted to draw up a clause which would recognize that principle. That is all we ask.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Can a member be a registered communicant of more than one church? He can take communion in more than one church.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I understand that a person is admitted to the membership of the Presbyterian church in some particular church. If he leaves that church and goes away, a certificate to the fact that he is a member accompanies him to the place to which he goes and entitles him to recognition as a member of the church in that particular locality.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): He connot be a member in that church without that certificate?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): No.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Therefore, it is only one vote.

Mr. McBRIDE: I do not think the time of this House should be taken up any longer on this question. It was very fully gone into in the committee, and after it was gone into very fully, clause 10 was adopted by that committee. We heard arguments in that committee on both sides so why take up the time of the House on this question? Let us have a vote.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is one phase of the amendment that has not been discussed yet. Under section 3, there are possibilities that should be considered before we come to a decision. This section reads:

> The said clerk of session or recording steward. . . .

Which is the same thing;

> . . . . or minister of any congregation in which a vote is to be held shall personally deliver a copy of said ballot to each member of said congregation entitled to vote.

Or he can send it through the mails. If both of those parties happen to be on one side of this question, you will see that they can control the distribution of all the ballots. It may be said that that is not likely to happen. Let me recite my experience. Some citations of a similar nature have been given this afternoon. In our congregation, the clergyman and clerk of session were such strong Presbyterians that they felt satisfied that that was the only route to eternal glory. Imagine the ballots being in their control!

Mr. DUFF: Why do you not write them a letter?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I might do worse. If we are going to seed the countryside down with ballots in this fashion, they should be distributed equitably on both sides of the question. Take the illustration I have given. The clerk of the session was an excellent man and so was the minister, but under this proposed system they would have had all the ballots. Imagine such a condition of affairs! In order to have a fair expression of opinion and an equal opportunity given to both sides, perhaps the ballots should be divided fifty to one side and fifty to the other. There might be something in that, but why depart from the systematic method of doing such things? There are three or four distinct reasons why this amendment should not be adopted. In the first place, it is diametrically opposed to practice of the church itself. It is true that in the case of elders, they may be selected by the method of distributed ballots, but in many places, particularly in rural parts, the elders are selected right at the meeting. But before a ballot can be taken, a congregational meeting has to be held to nominate those elders, and consequently, this is diametrically opposed to the recognised way of doing business.

It is also diametrically opposed to the provincial legislation which has already been passed in six of the provinces. I think somebody has made the remark: What of that? Is this House going to override the will of the provincial houses in the matter of the ballot? I do not think that is contemplated. What is the other alternative? You are going to have two systems of election, and if we are going to be law abiding people, we shall have to abide by both of them. We shall thus have an election under the provincial law, the regular system that has been the rule of the church as long as I can remember. That is either by a show of hands or by standing up, and if they like they can adopt the regular ballot system; and in the election in the village of Abernethy for church union we adopted the latter. We disagreed on the former methods. We said, "Let us have all things done decently and in order", and we borrowed a ballot box from the municipality; we had a returning officer and a polling place and got a decision, and it was all over.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Why do you not do that now?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We can do it—most decidedly we can. It is not a question of the ballot proper. It is a question of distributing ballots or voting at the congregational meeting.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Why will the hon. member not accede to the proposition which has been made that the law clerk of the House should draw up a proper amendment that would provide for an expression of views?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is implied—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Do not go on implication. You must have machinery provided.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know how it has been done in the congregational meetings, but that is not the question at all. It is the principle of voting by the distribution of ballots that I object to. What would be the result of the two methods of balloting? We take one vote under the provincial system, and we have a result under this system. We follow also the system now proposed of distributing ballots and thereby we would have the probability of two decisions diametrically opposite by these two systems of voting. Which is to prevail?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What does the minister say to the situation that arises in provinces where adherents have the right to vote and this bill does not give them the right to vote? Where does the minister land then? That is much more serious.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That right is conceded in certain provinces where the adherents have the right to vote.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): But that is not stated here.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That provincial right was simply preserved in law, which I think was quite proper. But under this proposal you are going to inject an element of confusion; you are going to have two systems of voting which may result in two opposite decisions. If we want a church union with as much harmony as possible, we should not adopt this method of voting. We should not depart from the ordinary method. Why should we intrude the arm of the state into a matter that is so distinctively a church matter?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): In view of the fact that the assembly on the previous occasion in 1915 provided for an expression of the people in regard to church union, will the minister tell me why we should debar them from doing the same thing to-day?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is quite a proper distinction, and hon. members should note the distinction. On the two former occasions it was not a vote, but a plebiscite or referendum, simply for the guidance of the courts of the church.

Mr. DUFF: Is it not a fact that the General Assembly provided to take this vote by ballot?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Which vote?

Mr. DUFF: The one that is coming now. Is it not a fact that the General Assembly decided two years ago that when this vote was to be taken it was to be taken by ballot?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was discussed.

Mr. DUFF: Was it decided?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think not.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, it was.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have to take the wishes of the General Assembly as being provided for in this bill.

Mr. DUFF: The General Assembly never passed that bill.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The committee on Church Union was endowed with assembly powers to confer with the other denominations to make such changes in the bill as would harmonize the differences between the churches. The more we depart from the regular practice of the church in regard to voting which method has been adopted by provincial legislation, the more confusion will result. We should hesitate a long time before we throw this kind of a monkey wrench into the machinery and invite such chaos as this will promote. Are we seriously going to do that? Why spoil a wise and good bill by deliberately passing a provision of this nature?

Mr. CARROLL: If the local legislatures of the various provinces have undertaken to legislate on the question of how the vote is to be taken, why should we discuss it at all?

Mr MOTHERWELL: There is something in that; but I understand there is a reason connected with the larger question of trust funds which comes under Dominion jurisdiction. They are adopting the church provisions in the matter of voting. That is the point. The question is, is this a church matter or is it a state function? Let us render unto the church the things that are the church's and unto the state the things that belong to the state. This is a matter entirely for the church. By this proposed method you are going to interfere directly with the internal administration of the churches and going to adopt two methods of voting. You are going to make it possible for two decisions. What kind of confusion is that going to promote? Would we do that in a federal election? Would anybody advocate the method of voting as proposed by the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) in a federal election?

Mr. CALDWELL: Pardon me, I did not propose that. I asked the Minister of National Defence if he proposed it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I beg pardon, I put it the wrong way. My hon. friend raised the same question. We have an amendment to the Dominion Elections Act now before the House, introduced, I think, by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). Will anybody in the House suggest that the act be amended by invoking this method of distributing the ballots around the countryside and getting an expression of opinion in that way? I think hon. members supporting this amendment should show cause why we should depart from the regular method at this time.

Now, in reply to the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), there is a good deal to be said for the voting method we had in our village. Some voters were ill, one woman particularly, and I wanted to get her to the poll. We figured we would have to take our chance that there was probably somebody ill on the other side. This question of illness does not discriminate against any cause. It is the same in any election. If we can take ill people to the poll we take them. There is no discrimination. As far as that is concerned, we are asking the House to adopt the principles of voting laid down by the respective churches, and any other system is a direct interference with the church in my opinion.

Amendment (Mr. Duff) negatived; yeas 29, nays 62.

Subsection (a) of section 10 as amended agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Then there is a notice of motion to amend subsection (b):

That at the end of subsection (b) the following words be added: "on matters affecting the disposal of property."

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection (a) of section 10 as amended

On the preamble:

The CHAIRMAN: Notice of motion is given by Mr. Brown to amend the preamble by striking out the following words after the words, "set forth" in the fifteenth line thereof:

"And whereas doubts have arisen as to the power of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada to agree to the union mentioned herein and as to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada with regard to certain of the powers asked for."

Amendment agreed to.

Notice of motion is also given by Mr. Brown to further amend the preamble as follows:

To strike out the words "subject to the provisions hereinafter set forth in section two of this act."

Amendment agreed to.

Preamble as amended agreed to.

On the title:

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, I move that the title be changed to "The United Church in Canada." My reason for moving this amendment is that under the present title many people in this country and elsewhere might be under the impression that parliament was incorporating a national church, and I do not think we should do anything that might give rise to such an erroneous idea.

The CHAIRMAN: My opinion is that this amendment comes within the meaning of section 112, and therefore requires notice. I shall be glad to hear the views of any hon. members before I rule on the point of order.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, the title of the bill is perhaps more important than the point of order. If I have not given sufficient notice I would ask that the committee rise and report progress in order that I may have an opportunity to give the required notice.

Mr. BROWN: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that to adopt this amendment would be to reverse the principle which we have already adopted by passing section one which declares that, "This act may be cited as The United Church of Canada Act."

The CHAIRMAN: Section one of this bill declaring that "This act may be cited as The United Church of Canada Act" having been already passed, I feel that that of itself precludes the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) from moving his amendment, it being inconsistent with the declaration.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Next sitting of the House.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS

MANITOBA—APPOINTMENT OF ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. BAXTER (for Mr. Meighen):

For a copy of all correspondence since June 1st, 1924, between the Prime Minister and the government, the Lieutenant-Governor or any judge of the province of Manitoba, relating to the appointment of an administrator for said province, to act during the absence of the Lieutenant-Governor.

STRIKE OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, letters and other documents containing any conciliation in reference to the dispute between the postal employees and the government or Acting Postmaster General or Minister of Labour, from June 16th to date, including all correspondence with the Dominion executive of the men and the Toronto postal employees' committee.

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all reports, letters, telegrams and other correspondence since June 10th, between the government or Post Office officials on the one side and public bodies, individuals or business men, relating to the tie-up of the postal services in Toronto. Also the daily reports made to the minister since the strike began by his officials, and of protests made as to the confusion and damage done by said post office strike to the public at Toronto, and of all correspondence on the files on this question.

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil) (Acting Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) I would ask that these motions stand as I have some objection to offer to them.

Motions stand.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

EXTRA-TERRITORIAL JURISDICTION

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved:

Resolved by the House of Commons,—

That it is expedient that section ninety-one of the British North America Act, 1867, be amended by adding thereto the following subsection in lieu of that set forth in the address of the Senate and House of Commons to His Majesty the King, adopted by the House and Senate, respectively, on the 24th and the 26th June, 1920:—

"2. An enactment of the parliament of Canada, if expressed to operate extra-territorially, shall have and be deemed to have had, that operation, if and in so far as it is a law for or ancillary to the peace, order and good government of Canada."

And that His Majesty's government be respectfully requested to promote the necessary legislation for the sanctioning of the said enactment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is the adoption of an address to the Imperial parliament for an amendment to the British North America Act making it clear that this parliament has the power to enact legislation with extra-territorial effect in matters within its sphere. The question has been much discussed in this country and in the other dominions. It has been recognized that this parliament within its own sphere has all the powers of self-government, exactly as the Imperial parliament has within its sphere, and this opinion is not only admitted by all constitutional authorities but has received the sanction of the highest judicial courts of the Empire. Still, the question whether outside the territory of Canada the legislation of this country has effect or is valid has been discussed, and there has been a marked difference of opinion. The standard opinion, I think, was the case of McLeod in the New South Wales dominion. It was a case of bigamy, and it was decided by the Privy Council that a citizen of that dominion could not be sued for having contracted a second marriage outside the territory of the dominion because the offence had been committed without the territory and the jurisdiction of New South Wales. The question of bigamy has also been discussed in Canada in many instances. It was referred to the Supreme Court of Canada in 1890, I think, and on that occasion two judges decided that Canada had the full extra-territorial power in respect to its legislation, but three judges decided otherwise. In order to institute proceedings against a Canadian who, already married, goes to another country to contract the second marriage, our section of the criminal code says he must leave Canada with the intent of going to the other place for the purpose of entering into a second marriage; the offence then is committed prior to his leaving Canada.

There have been many cases of bigamy, especially since the war. There have been cases in Montreal of Canadian soldiers who, already married, contracted a second marriage overseas and when they came back were sued for bigamy, but the courts stated that they could not be convicted because the offence was committed outside the territory. In New Zealand there was a case of bigamy in 1919, quite a recent case, in which Chief Justice Stout, stated that the dominion has extra-territorial rights and that the accused should be convicted, but the majority of the Supreme Court of New Zealand decided otherwise, stating that the dominion had no such power. In a Canadian case, that of Keyn versus Attorney General of Canada which went to the Privy Council, the decision was otherwise. It was the case of a man who had entered Canada contrary to the provisions of the Alien Labour Act, and when the immigration authorities instituted proceedings to expel him from the country a writ of habeas corpus was taken on his behalf and the Canadian judge decided that Canada had no power to expel a man under such circumstances because an extra-territorial effect was involved in the act of deportation. But the Privy Council decided otherwise, namely, that the legislation of Canada in that respect was valid.

Quite recently the question was discussed in connection with mandates given by the League of Nations and by the Peace treaty to South Africa and New Zealand. New Zealand was given a mandate over Samoa and South Africa over German West Africa. In New Zealand the authorities thought they did not have the power to enact legislation for that territory of Samoa, which was not within their jurisdiction, and they obtained from the Imperial government an order in council giving them such power. South Africa, on the other hand, under General Smuts, contended that they had such power, that they had all the powers of self-government and that that included the extra-territorial effect of their legislation. Their contention was upheld and they legislated for German West Africa, over which they had been given a mandate.

The constitutional authorities allege that there is doubt as to the extra-territorial right of dominion governments. In an article by Sir John W. Salmond who was Solicitor General of New Zealand, he takes the view that the dominions have an extra-territorial power in their legislation. In Canada the question came to the attention of the government in 1920 in a definite manner when the chairman of the Air Board recommended that the government be requested to take the necessary steps to secure legislation by the Imperial parliament provided that any law of Canada relating to air craft registered in Canada may extend to such air craft and personal license as well without as within the territorial limits of Canada. The House will realize then how important it is that our aviators shall be compelled to follow Canadian regulations even when they are temporarily outside of Canadian territory.

Apart from the necessity for having the question definitely settled so far as aviation is concerned, there is also the question of our criminal code, especially with regard to bigamy cases, as I set forth a few minutes ago. There is also the question of our customs laws and regulations. Men should not be at liberty to organize conspiracies to defraud Canada while they are temporarily outside of our territory. There is also the question of the protection of our coastal fisheries. Indeed, in the Northern Pacific Fisheries Protection treaty we have assumed that we have that extra-territorial right, and the legislation enacted under the treaty assumes that we have that extra-territorial right. Surely it is important for the protection of our coastal fisheries that we should be able to prosecute those who violate our laws and regulations while temporarily outside of the territorial limits. The same thing applies to our shipping regulations, when our vessels are temporarily out of our territorial waters. If this was not clearly recognized it would certainly impose fetters upon the self-governing powers of the Dominion, such as to hamper the natural working of our constitution.

In 1920, parliament unanimously passed a resolution for an address to the Imperial parliament for the purpose of correcting this anomaly, not, I take the trouble of stating again, that we do not contend that we already possess that power; we think we do possess it, but it has been challenged and contradicted by strong constitutional authorities and by many judges, so it is important to have a clear and definite recognition of that right by the Imperial parliament.

The amendment which was suggested in 1920 and which was adopted unanimously by this House and the Senate provided that:

> Any enactment of the parliament of Canada otherwise intra vires shall operate and be deemed to have operated extra-territorially according to its intention in the like manner and to the same extent as if enacted by the parliament of the United Kingdom.

The law officers of the Crown in the United Kingdom took some exception to the phraseology of the amendment suggested, and, while I believe they were not right in their contention, thought it might give the parliament of Canada with regard to the other self-governing dominions the same powers as the Imperial parliament has with regard to them. Nobody in this country ever had that intention, and the wording of that amendment clearly could not bear that construction because it stated: "when intra vires," so it could only concern legislation within the power, authority and jurisdiction of the Canadian parliament. There were negotiations between members of the government of the day and the officers of the Imperial government, and a change in the wording was suggested by the law officers of the United Kingdom, which was not acceptable to the Canadian government. Finally, the draft as now proposed has been suggested by the Canadian government. The order in council was passed, I think, a year and a half ago, and only recently the Imperial government has signified its willingness to accept this proposed amendment and to have it carried by an act of the British parliament. I repeat, my own view is that the wording of the first amendment is preferable to this one, but this one will give us all that we need and will definitely recognize Canadian rights of self-government extra-territorially as herein defined.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): I wish to thank the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) for having allowed this resolution to stand over, because I wished to give some expression of my thought with regard to it.

It is not by any means a controversial question. As the Minister of Justice pointed out, the preceding government adopted a resolution in another form, and a form which he thinks is preferable, and now, in consequence of the reasons which he has given us, and which I may say were not known to me before, the resolution appears in a new form.

I know there is one thing the Minister of Justice does not want to do, nor does the government of which he is a member. I am quite satisfied there is no intention in any part of this House to obtain legislation which would enable any possible interference with provincial rights. I am not going to make a charge; I am going to acquit the hon. minister at the same time that I suggest that the particular phraseology gives an opportunity for that. We have under section 91 of the British North America Act general power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada. Then particular subjects are enumerated in section 91; I shall not enter into the category, and by section 92 a limited class of subjects is exclusively assigned to the provincial legislatures. If a thing definitely and actually falls within the categories of section 92, then the Dominion has nothing to do with it, but if it can be said to fall within both, then the jurisdiction of the Dominion is exclusive of that of the province; but there is always a certain jurisdiction on the part of the province that cannot be interfered with by the Dominion, and that ought not to be interfered with.

I think the Minister of Justice will recognize that he is absolutely right in preferring the original draft to the substituted one; the original draft used words to this effect "otherwise within the legislative authority of the parliament." I do not think the British law officers could have taken objection to that part of the phraseology. Their difficulty was more probably with the latter part, which said that our legislation was to be effective "to the same extent as if enacted by the parliament of the United Kingdom." Probably their objection was to that; but I have not seen the correspondence, and it is not necessary to spend much time on it. I would suggest to the minister that in point of form, yes, and with real substance behind it, it would be well to interpolate in his present resolution the words "otherwise within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada," so that if we are to have extra-territorial powers they shall be limited in terms to the exercise of the powers which are vested in the Dominion, in contradistinction to those vested in the provinces by our charter, which is the British North America Act. I am absolutely sure that the minister has not the slightest intention of going any further, but I think he will see—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will my hon. friend suggest in which way there is a possibility of this interfering with provincial rights?

Mr. BAXTER: If the minister has not grasped it yet, I will state it definitely. The moment there is legislation in the words of the proposed enactment I think it is absolutely apparent that we could not interfere with any provincial legislation within Canada, but we could take a provincial subject of legislation and deal with it extra-territorially.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The parliament of Canada cannot legislate on subjects that are not within its sphere.

Mr. BAXTER: We could, under the general provisions of the law dealing with the peace, order and good government of Canada, deal with a subject allocated to the province to the extent of giving it extra-territorial effect. Now, the provinces, it will be said, have no extra-territorial effect to their legislation. That would be the answer that would come to anyone's mind. That is true in a qualified sense but I think it is pretty well established that the provinces have the right to incorporate companies and that while they can only create a company within their territorial ambit yet they may endow it with powers which are capable of being exercised beyond its territorial jurisdiction. That is the result of a series of Privy Council cases decided within the last ten years. That is only one subject that I think of, and the minister will see at once the action that might be taken by some federal parliament in dealing, for instance, with company legislation by the exercise of the extra-territorial power. This language really sweeps away the limitations between federal and provincial legislation. If you accept that extra-territoriality, then your legislation will be introduced on the ground of extra-territoriality and it would open up a line of argument which none of us in this country, I think, wants to have opened up. It is so simple and easy to remedy. I think the minister on very slight consideration will see it is advisable to insert these words.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Where would you insert the words?

Mr. BAXTER:

An enactment of the parliament of Canada otherwise within its legislative authority.

That would be sufficient "otherwise within its legislative authority."

Mr. CARROLL: That is the legislation which they may pass at the present time?

Mr. BAXTER: Enumerated under section 91, and any extra-territorial operation should only be given in connection with these classes of subjects. I do not want to talk at much length and, as I say, there is no complaint or controversy in this matter. But the subject is an interesting one and I have been trying to fix in my own mind where we are going to get to by obtaining this power and attempting to exercise it. I followed my hon. friend in his discussion of the bigamy question. That is the principal one in regard to which any difficulty has arisen; but we seem now to have an effective, or a fairly effective way of grappling with that evil because our legislation is good, in the case of a man leaving Canada with the intent of committing an offence. But supposing he does not leave Canada with the intent at all? Supposing he forms the intent, we will say, in a state of the American union; there is a deserted wife in Canada and the man ought to be punished. But if the wrongdoer remains in the United States we are still helpless; we cannot expect extra-territoriality of legislation to be recognized by any foreign power. It can only be within the ambit of the British Empire, otherwise this legislation will have to be followed up by a series of extradition treaties by means of which we could bring out of a foreign country a man who had done the act which we had determined should be a crime even though committed beyond our territorial jurisdiction and these we are not likely to get.

The principal point of view I wish to impress on the minister is, that we open up almost a network of conflict with every other British state. If we claim this then all other parts of the Empire can equally claim it; and if it is accorded to us, we assume it will be accorded to all others. Then once you get a citizen of Canada outside of the three mile limit of this Dominion there is a possibility of a number of jurisdictions affecting him. For he may go from one part of the Empire to the other and by what law will he be judged if he commits an offence? We read in the Scriptures of St. Paul claiming the rights of a Roman citizen, which brings very vividly before

5 p.m. our minds that which was undoubtedly the principle of the Roman law in early times when a man, so to speak, carried his law with him. But Rome was then the centre of enlightenment, set among a multitude of mere barbarous tribes, and Rome had the power of her legions to enforce her law. Whether it was what we would now call a contract or whether it was a crime the Roman citizen would claim the right to be judged by the law of Rome and by that law only.

But is it possible for us to put the Canadian citizen in that position in all parts of the world, or even in the British Empire itself? If he sets foot in New Zealand he will have to be judged by the local and territorial law of New Zealand; if he sets foot in London he must be judged by the law that obtains at Westminster; if he goes to South Africa the Roman-Dutch law will take care of him both civilly and criminally. Where is our extra-territorial law to operate? It cannot operate in the United States where most of these offences against the law of marriage are committed. It might operate, possibly, on the high seas, but if our citizen is on a British ship he will be then practically within the territory of Great Britain. I see nothing but cross currents of legislation arising out of this. And after all, what has the United Kingdom done itself? Away back, I think about 1878 or thereabouts, there was the criminal case of a man named Keyn who had committed a murder on a foreign ship and outside the three mile limit. The case came before the Central Criminal Court, and it was held the court had no jurisdiction territorially because its jurisdiction stopped at the three mile limit. Great Britain afterwards passed an act, and this seems to be as far as the United Kingdom has attempted to go in the line of extra-territoriality. The act was passed in 1878 and recited as follows:

Whereas the rightful jurisdiction of Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, extends and has always extended over the open seas adjacent to the coasts of the United Kingdom and of all other parts of Her Majesty's dominions to such a distance as is necessary for the defence and security of such dominions.

2. An offence committed by a person, whether he is or is not a subject of Her Majesty on the open sea within the territorial waters of Her Majesty's dominions is an offence within the jurisdiction of the Admiral, although it may have been committed on board or by means of a foreign ship, and the person who committed such offence may be arrested, tried and punished accordingly.

A requirement was inserted in the act that had reference to any other portion of the Empire that the leave of the government of the particular dominion would be necessary to bring a prosecution. That, I think, in general terms, while Canada is not mentioned, applies to Canada. The reference is unmistakable, and it means that the leave of the Governor General would be necessary to bring about a prosecution under this particular act. The act also defines "territorial" in these words:

"The territorial waters of Her Majesty's dominions" in reference to the sea, means such part of the sea adjacent to the coast of the United Kingdom, or the coast of some other part of Her Majesty's dominions, as is deemed by international law to be within the territorial sovereignty of Her Majesty; and for the purpose of any offence declared by this act to be within the jurisdiction of this administration, any part of the open sea within one marine league measured from low water mark shall be deemed to be open sea within territorial waters of Her Majesty's dominions.

So that Great Britain herself, with all the plenary power of the Imperial parliament, did not attempt to legislate any further than a stone's throw from her shores, the three-mile limit. Now we are asking that a sort of unlimited extra-territorial jurisdiction be conferred upon Canada. I see only the possibility of conflict. I see the helplessness, the utter impotence on the part of Canada to enforce this extra-territorial jurisdiction if it leads into a foreign state, and I see some difficulty in reconciling the conflicting claims of jurisdiction which may be set up by the several parts of the British Empire. I can see no real, clear good. Constitutionally, our courts have affirmed the right to go as far as we have gone with reference to the bigamy sections of the code. They have done that, over-ruling a very strong opinion by the late Chief Justice Strong. I noticed that the present Mr. Justice Anglin some years ago contributed a most scholarly and valuable article to the Canada Law Times on this subject, and I take it that his opinion would scarcely be in accord with the legislation that we now have on our statute books. I am not going to oppose the resolution. I only want to point out to the minister some of the difficulties which possibly were not laid before him when his department were giving consideration to the framing of this legislation. I would suggest to him that the matter is not one of immediate urgency, that he might take time and give some further consideration to this far-reaching subject and not rush into Imperial legislation which may confuse us in a tangle that, in after years, we may have some difficulty in unravelling.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to support the view of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in regard to this matter, notwithstanding the very able argument that has been presented to the House by the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter). I remember well when this matter became a real issue, a definite question in this parliament. I happened, at that time, to be chairman of the Air Board and also Acting Solicitor General, and I remember well when we brought the question to the attention of the Hon. Mr. Doherty, who was then Minister of Justice. The question is a large one and one which, I think, it is in the interest of Canada and of all parts of the Empire to have definitely settled. If there is a real doubt as to the jurisdiction of this parliament to act extra-territorially, we should have that doubt removed at the earliest possible moment. It may be, as the hon. member for St. John City has pointed out, that this is not a case of urgency; that we are not bound to act precipitantly. If there are real difficulties in the matter, we shall have plenty of time to consider them; but I think the matter has now been under consideration for at least three or four years between the Department of Justice and the Imperial authorities, and if they have come to some conclusion which is acceptable to both parties, my view is that the matter ought to be settled. It is to be noted that in the drafting of the former address which was passed by this House, provision was made to protect the rights of the various provinces in any jurisdiction which they have exclusively under section 92 of the British North America Act. I cannot remember that the question arose in the discussion of 1920; I am inclined to think that it must have arisen on those words which the hon. member for St. John City has pointed out would not likely have appeared in the address at that time. But I think the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John City that those words be included in the present address should be followed. I cannot imagine that the Imperial law officers would take any exception to the words:

Otherwise within the legislative authority of Canada.

being inserted in this resolution. I think, perhaps, on a strict reading of section 2 as now drawn, it might be held that the language means that we could exercise jurisdiction extra-territorially only in regard to such subjects as are placed under the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada by the British North America Act. The inference from the language is certainly very strong. The presumption would be that we were dealing only with such matters in regard to which we had undoubted jurisdiction, but it would make the matter doubly clear if the words suggested by the hon. member for St. John City were included.

Under our criminal code a number of cases arise in regard to which this extra-territorial jurisdiction is very necessary. It is not very long ago when, in my part of the country, there was a rather important case where a conspiracy to defraud was deliberately hatched in Buffalo by Canadians. They proceeded to Buffalo; they drew their documents there, and entered upon their conspiracy. Afterwards, when they returned to Canada, and were charged in Canada, they were acquitted on the ground that the offence, if any, was committed in a foreign country. If we had had extra-territorial jurisdiction, those men on their return to Canada could have been dealt with under our own law. That is only a single instance but I have no doubt hon. members could recall to mind many instances. There is, of course, the case of bigamy. There are questions arising under our customs laws and the like. I would urge upon the minister to take the question up at once with the Imperial authorities and to see if they will accept the amendment suggested by the hon. member for St. John City. If so, I think we would be justified in going ahead and taking chances in regard to the other difficult questions which might possibly arise at some time in the future. That is only a possibility and, in most instances, a very remote possibility; but in the meantime we are suffering some inconvenience on account of the uncertainty which exists as to the rights of this parliament to legislate now extra-territorially in regard to matters over which it certainly has legislative authority.

Mr. BAXTER: I appreciate my hon. friend's remarks, but I still feel a great difficulty as to how the British parliament can give us any power to legislate extra-territorially except it be within the limits of the British Empire. If people go to Detroit to form a conspiracy, form it and execute it there, I fail to see how the British parliament can give us any power to make criminal an act which was committed in Detroit. The British parliament may resolve the rather vexed question in reference to naturalization of aliens. My opinion—and it may not be worth much—is that when we have naturalized a man in Canada, we have made him a British subject throughout the world. The contrary seems to have been held. But even if I am wrong about that, the British parliament could certainly give us power to enact laws which would bind British subjects resident in Canada wherever they might go, and make our law follow them; but that law would only be enforceable when they came within our territorial jurisdiction. That is rather mixing-up two things. We ask to get extra-territoriality for our laws. That cannot be given by any legislative power in the world but we may achieve the same results by treaty. What we may get is a declaration that Canadian laws shall bind subjects of His Majesty resident in Canada wherever they may go in the world. There is a very radical distinction, and I think perhaps the present resolution is climbing up the wrong tree.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The first amendment—

Mr. SPEAKER: Except by general consent of the House this matter cannot be debated.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The first amendment stated that this parliament would have the same right as the parliament of the United Kingdom with regard to extra-territorial powers, and no exception was taken on that ground. None of the law officers suggested that the Imperial parliament had no such power, as my hon. friend suggests now. There is no doubt they cannot take proceedings against British subjects in foreign countries, but they can bind their subjects for offences committed in those countries when they come back, and the British courts are enforcing such extra-territorial powers when expressed in an Imperial act. My hon. friend says that Mr. Justice Anglin, in a very able article agreed with his own view of the matter; but Mr. Justice Anglin stated that in his opinion we had no such extra-territorial rights. It is exactly because men of high standing have expressed the opinion that we do not possess those rights that we are asking that there shall be no doubt in the matter and that the Imperial parliament should recognize our undoubted right to have these extra-territorial rights validated by legislation.

Mr. BAXTER: What my hon. friend wants is personal application of the law.

[Mr. Baxter.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: When subjects are in foreign countries, exactly as the subjects of a sovereign power have. My hon. friend says it may bring conflict with the other dominions. I do not see how it can bring any conflict. In the other dominions the same question has been discussed, and gentlemen of high standing in Australia and New Zealand have contended that the dominions possess that extra-territorial power at the present time. Others are of a different opinion. There is no possible conflict as between the dominions in that respect. They will have the same right and power that the Dominion of Canada has. All that the former Minister of Justice wanted was a formal definite and clear expression on the subject by the Imperial parliament.

I have really no objection to the amendment suggested by my hon. friend. However, I do not think it adds anything to the resolution. The present wording of the resolution has been discussed for a couple of years and has been finally agreed to by both governments, and it seems a pity that we should change it in any way. However, if my hon. friend insists, I am willing to agree to the amendment he suggests.

Mr. BAXTER: I will not put it on the grounds of insisting. I am trying to let the minister see the way this matter strikes me, and if he finds anything in my suggestion that he considers of value, he is most heartily welcome to it; and if he thinks it is not worth while making any change, I shall have no quarrel.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The words of my hon. friend and my own words will certainly serve in the interpretation of the meaning of this resolution in any discussion in regard to it in the future. Nobody in this parliament desires to interfere in any way with provincial rights.

Mr. BAXTER: The minister will realize that in the English-speaking countries the debates of parliament cannot be referred to as indicative of the intention of the legislature. Only the language employed in the act can be referred to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister say what he purposes doing after the passing of this legislation? There is still another step.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. The Senate will pass a resolution and it will be forwarded to the Imperial parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The reason I asked was that formerly the action of parliament took the form of an address to the throne from both Houses. A mere resolution does not take that form, and it occurred to me that the minister should have an address to the throne, concurred in by both Houses.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There will be a joint address after the Senate passes the resolution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the joint address come before parliament?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Legislation having for its object to amend the Imperial act must proceed by way of an address to His Majesty. But this resolution is only in regard to the principle, and when it comes jointly from the Senate and House of Commons, it will take the form of an address.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 172, to amend the Indian Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This bill is not included in those we have notice of. Is it the subject we dealt with before?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We had a slight discussion upon this last week, but it is not the bill we were discussing at some length dealing with the agreement between the federal government and the government of Ontario.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection to going on with this bill, provided that if later I see an objection of any magnitude, the minister will carry the discussion over to another date.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, I understand there are a number of gentlemen who would like to express their views on this bill, but who are not in the House, relying on the understanding given by the government last week. I would ask that the bill stand until Tuesday.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is no objection to the bill standing over until tomorrow, but I think my hon. friend is under a misapprehension. The bill to which exception is taken by some hon. members is that dealing with the argeement between the federal government and the government of Ontario.

Mr. IRVINE: Then I have no objection.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil) moved that the House go into committee on the bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before we go into committee would the minister state pretty fully the purpose of the amendments?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The first section provides for bringing the Eskimos under the provisions of the Indian Act. As we are now, establishing police posts in the north, we have to deal with the Eskimos to a considerable extent, and therefore I think it wise to bring them under the Indian Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the Indian Act never applied to any band of Eskimos at all?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They are not mentioned in the act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If such is the fact, I have been under a misapprehension.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is the first attempt to bring the Eskimos definitely under the Indian Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Have they not been taken care of?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, they have received relief grants through the agency of the mounted police.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee on the bill, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Superintendent General to have control of Eskimo affairs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the minister will state what advantage this is to be. My impression has always been that Eskimos were considered Indians for the purpose of the Indian Act. The minister may remember that a terrible holocaust swept the Ungava peninsula some years ago and stripped it of the deer which were the principal source of food of the Eskimos, and from that time on we had to take care of them under the Indian Act and provide them with a new supply of deer. If that was done in the past why is any amendment necessary? Will the minister say under the authority of what act the Eskimos were looked after?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Since I have been in charge of the department most of the relief given to the Eskimos has been through the agency of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, under the jurisdiction largely of the Northwest Territories. Where they have been subject to famine, food and other relief has been accorded them. Really no distinction has been made between Indians and Eskimos. One of the chief reasons for bringing the Eskimos definitely under the Indian Act is that at Aklavic at the mouth of the Mackenzie river, where traders from Canada and the United States are active, many of the Eskimos are fairly well off, and it is doubtful whether anyone has jurisdiction over them, although we have been treating them to all intents and purposes as Indians.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the minister before him the definition of Indian in the act?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, this is the definition:

"Indian" means any male person of Indian blood reputed to belong to a particular band; any child of such person; any woman who is or was lawfully married to such person.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then there is no definition of Indian at all, except that a person to be an Indian must be a member of a band, and, I presume, a band with whom we have made a treaty. Well, the Eskimos go in bands, too. I always regard an Indian as a native of Canada; and the Eskimo is certainly just as much a native in that sense—that he was here before Columbus.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): An aborigine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Consequently he appears to be covered by the act as much as he ever need be covered. Then I call this to the attention of the minister: we have never made any treaty with Eskimo bands. Personally I do not feel disposed to treat the Eskimos on that basis. My own opinon would be to leave them alone—make them comply with our criminal law and give them all the benefit of our civil law; in other words, treat them as everybody else is treated. I should not like to see the same policy precisely applied to the Eskimos as we have applied to the Indian.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In what particular does my right hon. friend object?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I object to nursing. I really think the nursing of our Indians has hurt them. The best policy we can adopt towards the Eskimos is to leave them alone. They are in a latitude where no one will ever bother them.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am inclined to agree with my right hon. friend, except that we are forced to assist the Eskimos just as we are forced to assist the Indians. The white man came and took away the Indians' means of livelihood.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: He will never take the Eskimos'.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is being done at the moment. I am not asking that the Eskimos be placed under the department in order that they may be made wards of the government, nor is it my desire that the effect shall be to make them dependent upon the people of Canada for a livelihood. But white men are going amongst them; the missionaries are beginning to require education for the children, and for that reason I think it is advisable that we have the Indian Act apply to the Eskimos. Of course whether they are under the Indian Act or not, if famine strikes a band of these people we must come to their relief.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the minister not doing by this section just what he does not want to do, namely, make the Eskimos wards of the Dominion? I do not want to make the Eskimos wards at all, and in that I agree with the minister. Give them all the rights that our Canadians have. There will be no invasion of their domain on our part and there will be very little invasion of ours on theirs if any at all. So far as they want to come, let them come. The minister is also right when he says that if there is a famine we ought to try to help them, the same as we do anybody else in our country, especially the same as we do the aborigines of our country. But do not let us start on the path making them wards. Perhaps the next thing we hear the Eskimos will be over at the League of Nations.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have never, so far as I know, entered into any treaty with the Eskimos. They have not been treated as a band, although they actually are a band, with their chiefs, following the Indian mode of life. The white trader is going in among them, so much so that we have been forced to establish police posts in those localities. We must have some regulation by which we can deal with these people, outside of any question of their becoming wards of the government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is doing here just what he said he did not want to do. Let me read the section:

The Superintendent General of Indian Affairs shall have the control and management of the lands and property of the Eskimos in Canada and the provisions of Part I of the Indian Act shall apply to the said Eskimo in so far as they are applicable to their condition and mode of life, and the Department of Indian Affairs shall have the management, charge and direction of Eskimo affairs.

That simply means that hereafter the Eskimos are to be considered wards of the Dominion, with all the consequences of that relationship. For example, an Indian to-day cannot be sued; an Eskimo can. I do not suppose he ever is, but if this bill passes he never can be. The government is in possession of his property; the government has made him a child. The minister says that left to their own resources some of them are already pretty well off. Well, there are not any Indians very well of, or mighty few.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Oh yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: After seventy-five years of tutelage and nursing, for the most part they are still helpless on our hands. I do not think we could have treated the Indian differently, and we treat him generously yet. But the Eskimo is different in this regard. The only air he can breathe is the northern air. There is where he is going to stay; there is where we are not going to go in very great numbers. Let us give the Eskimo the full benefit of our civil law; if necessary give him the benefit of special precautions to see that he is not imposed on. But I do think we are taking a pretty serious step when by this bill we put our wings all around his property and tell him he is our ward and that we will look after him.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is the opinion of the officers who have to do with the Eskimos that they would be much better under some such provision as is proposed. There is no doubt that many of them are comfortably off. Some of them own their own fishing boats—and by the way, some of these boats were ordered in Canada this year, costing about $4,000 or $5,000, and were sent north. Of course the Eskimos come under the general law that protects a Canadian citizen, but they do not get the same protection that the Indian Act would provide. If my right hon. friend argues that they should be left as they are, in ownership of their territory, allowing them to protect themselves unless they get into trouble —well, I hardly agree with him. However, I am not particularly anxious to press the bill if there is a feeling that we should not undertake this responsibility and place the matter under the control of some department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection to one of the departments having charge of Eskimo affairs, and I have no doubt that the Indian department is the right one, to see that the officers of the law are there, to see that our general civil rights are given them to the full, and to see as well that they are not left to starve; that on the principle of relief, and that principle alone, we may help them the same as any others who are in distress. But what I object to is that we should make the whole population our wards from this day henceforth and make their property legally ours, they simply enjoying the use of it; bringing them into the category of the Indians, with all the responsibility entailed. I think it is a mistake.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Would my right hon. friend be content with the simple statement that for the purposes of administration the Eskimos should come under the control of the Department of Indian Affairs, without any question of taking control of their lands as is provided in this section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I am not sure that that would get just what I want.

Mr. CARROLL: I was going to ask the minister a moment ago whether any request had been made to the government by the Eskimos through their chiefs that they be brought within the provisions of the Indian Act. But apart from that I do not think that at this stage the government should bring any persons in as wards of this country. If the Eskimo is the person I understand him to be, any such provision would only make him less ambitious to earn his own living. The Eskimos are a thrifty people, and aside from some unforeseen occurrence, such as the loss of the animals which constitute their crop, they have done about as well as most other people. The next thing we shall have here will be the Doukhobors, if they get into trouble, asking to be brought in as wards of the government. These people are really not natives of Canada; they come in from some other place, and they find that in that part of the country they can eke out a living where they could not do it anywhere else. So far as being imposed upon is concerned, there are many people in this country who are imposed upon. If the Eskimos are in hard luck, if their crops are ruined, the government extends a charitable hand to them, but that is no reason why this government should undertake to make wards of such people. There might be considerable difficulty in doing that. As I understand the provisions of the Indian Act, the consent of the Indians must be first obtained before certain things can be done, especially in regard to property and estates, which are owned by the government.

I agree with the leader of the opposition that we should have more information upon this question and ascertain definitely why the Department of Indian Affairs wants to pass this amendment. So far as being imposed upon is concerned, perhaps fifty per cent of the people in this country are imposed on at some time or another in matters of trade and business, but that is no reason for making them wards of the government, and I presume the Eskimos are in the same category. I, for one, with the information that is before us, cannot concur in this legislation. I do not think the fact that we have been giving the Eskimos a little charity, and the further fact that they have been imposed upon, is sufficient reason for bringing them under the Indian Act.

Mr. IRVINE: I certainly agree with the remarks of the previous speaker (Mr. Carroll), and also with the argument put forward by the leader of the opposition. But not only is it a bad thing for us to take the Eskimos on our knee as wards; there is another objection to this clause, perhaps equally as great. What, for instance, are the aboriginal rights of these people? Have they any rights, for instance, to the lands they now occupy? Have they entered into consultation with the Dominion government asking that the Superintendent General should administer their lands? If not, it might only lead to a great deal of trouble if we were to assume the right to administer their lands without consulting with them as to their aboriginal rights.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am afraid my hon. friends have the idea that the Eskimo in his habits is similar to the Indian, but this is not the fact. The Eskimo, except in rare cases, does not live in definite localities. He follows his food, wherever it may be. True, he returns to certain points for fishing, and that sort of thing. On the other hand, the Indians from time immemorial had definite localities where they established themselves as tribes. The Hurons and the Algonquins, for instance, all had definite areas in which they lived long before the white man came to Canada. That is part of the difficulty in British Columbia to-day; these various tribes had definite locations which they called their own. But the Eskimo does not follow that mode of life to the same extent, and so far as I know he has not laid claim to aboriginal rights or title to his land. He is established in Aklavik, which is probably the best settled district where the Eskimos congregate, has established his home there, and undoubtedly through right of tenure could lay claim to that particular locality; but there is the whole of that immense territory in the north over which the Eskimos roam, and to which, just recently, owing to the very great increase in the price of fur, the attention of the white man has been directed. He is trading with them, and is bringing his mode of trade and of life amongst them; there is more contact being had to-day than ever before with the Eskimo tribes in the north. Now, whether or not you strip this amendment of the wording that deals with the land altogether, I do think that some department of the government should be designated to have some supervision over the Eskimo tribes. I am not particular about taking control of the land or bringing them as wards under the control of the government, but whether you do that or not, this government in times of distress must come to the rescue of these people, and in order to avoid that as much as possible, and to prevent disease getting amongst them, if that is possible, it should be made the business of some department of the government to look after these people and render them such protection as the government can afford, for after all they are citizens and natives of that territory, and there is much more trade going on in that territory than ever before.

Mr. IRVINE: I appreciate the difference between the actual position of the Eskimo and that of the Indian, as put forward by the minister, but it is not so fundamental as it would appear. It is agreed, I presume, that the Eskimo is not so definitely fixed at one point, but it is equally true that he is fixed, and very definitely fixed, in a certain latitude, and he looks upon that territory as his home just as much as the Indian looked upon certain areas of this country as his home. I would suggest that the minister take whatever steps are necessary to prevent the white man from robbing the Eskimo, but keep away altogether from taking any control over his land.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We can let this section stand for re-drafting. I would like to consult with the solicitor of the department and have it re-drafted to cover what appears to be the consensus of opinion of the committee, namely, that it should be just a matter of control, without making a ward of the Eskimo.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister should remember that the distinction that really counts is the one that he has not mentioned. In the case of the Indian, there was a certain territory that the Indian occupied and used. We took that territory, and we therefore had to make terms with the Indian. We had to live among him. We could not live among him on an equality, because he was not of a status to warrant it. We therefore made him our ward. There may be some question of the rightness of making him our ward, but it has been done, and we have paid a frightful penalty for it so far. On the other hand, we are not taking the Eskimo's land; we do not need to make any treaty with him. He is in free possession of his territory. It may be he now has facility to sell what he could not sell before, but in so far as that is concerned, it has helped him, and—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): A serious situation would arise if we got into a dispute over the sale of the territory.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I would keep away from that; I would not cross the bridge till I got to it. In the meantime I suggest to the minister that he use the agency we have had all along; I think it is under himself; he is the minister in charge of the Northwest Territories, and has a commissioner there. It would seem to me this commissioner and his organization, very small, if he has any, comes in contact with the Eskimo, and has in the past, and utilizes the mounted police, and this is probably the best means. I fancy the minister's deputy is ill advised in trying to bring in the Eskimo in any special way now.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): All I am asking is that we should settle definitely who is to deal with the Eskimo, because up to now we have been voting sums of money that have been spent upon him, largely for relief purposes, it is true, through the agency of the mounted police. I do not think it would be well to put the Eskimo under the control of the Department of Justice, because as my hon. friend pointed out, the Interior department is in control of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It should be the Interior department.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If it should be the Interior department, I think we should in some way set it out. If it is agreeable to the committee we will let this section stand until I have had an opportunity of discussing it further with the department.

Section stands.

On section 2—Administration of Indian estates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister did not get through with his explanation.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is simply to make clearer the action that can be taken in the case of an insane Indian. As my right hon. friend knows, in most of the provinces some individual is appointed by the provincial authorities to administer the estates of insane persons. This legislation will, to some extent, give us control of an insane Indian's estate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am very much mistaken if the minister has not this power already. In my time we administered the estates of insane Indians. It may have been that something was lacking legally but if so I never knew it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We had not the authority to take the proceeds of any Indian property in order to maintain an insane Indian in a hospital.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister happen to have a memorandum on this one clause?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not other than what is set forth here. I was looking up the act but I think it is evident the law needs to be clarified in order to enable us to do what we contemplate. The act is not sufficiently clear to enable us to use the proceeds from any property owned by the insane person to maintain him in the hospital. That is all that this provides for.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I certainly have no objection to the power being granted, but I am astonished if it does not already exist. What has been done during the past fifty years? Nobody would suggest that no Indians have gone insane, there have been quite a lot of them, and we must have been managing their property?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This provision is to make it clear that we can exercise the necessary authority to pay for the maintenance of the insane person.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Inheritance of Indian dying without issue.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suggest that we call it six o'clock. This clause will take some time because there is quite a lot of explanation required.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 3—Inheritance of Indian dying without issue.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The word "Indian" has been struck out in the fourth line of section 28 to enable the nearest of kin who do not happen to be Indians to share in the distribution of the estate of their deceased relative who may be an Indian. We have a number of mixed marriages amongst the Indians, and whenever an Indian woman marries a white man she ceases to be a member of the band and ceases to have any rights in that connection. If her brother or sister dies possessed of property, this is to enable her to participate in the distribution of that property, the same as other relatives.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was the last clause in the act before, the proviso regarding inheritance rights?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, it is section 28 which reads:

> In case any Indian dies intestate, without issue, leaving a widow of good moral character, all his property of whatever kind shall devolve upon her, and if he leaves no widow, the same shall devolve, upon the Indian nearest of kin to the deceased: Provided that any interest which he may have had in land in a reserve shall be vested in His Majesty for the benefit of the band owning such reserve if his nearest of kin is more remote than a brother or sister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Supposing he leaves a widow not of good moral character, what happens? This act is utterly silent as to what happens then. Who is the judge of her character? Is it the minister?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Usually the Superintendent General is the judge in matters of that kind. The Indian Act gives him pretty wide powers, as my right hon. friend knows.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It seems to me that the word "such" should be inserted before the word "widow" in the fourth line of section 28:

> If he leaves no such widow.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not just follow my right hon. friend there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As the act reads now, in case an Indian dies leaving a widow of good moral character, she gets his estate. The next clause says that if he does not leave a widow at all, his estate goes to the next of kin. There is still another contingency which is not provided for, that is, if he leaves a widow who is not of good moral character. What becomes of the estate then?

Mr. McMASTER: This discussion seems to be carried on in an amiable but almost inaudible fashion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is really on a subject that the hon. member should scarcely hear any way. I suggest that he come closer if he is anxious to hear the discussion. The act is in a form in which it should not remain in that respect. If the minister wants to keep it the way it is—and I have no objection—he should insert the word "such" before the word "widow".

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In that regard the wording is the same as in the old section 28. The only amendment we are seeking to make is to bring in relatives of the deceased who are debarred on account of marriage to white persons.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is wholly wrong. The word "such" should be inserted.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Frankly, I do not see how that is going to change the condition of the widow. She has to be of good moral character now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are three events that may happen. The Indian may leave a widow of good moral character; he may leave a widow of bad moral character or he may leave no widow at all. The first and last are provided for. In the first case the widow gets the estate. In the last, the next of kin gets it, but no provision at all is made for the middle case. There would be if the minister inserted the word "such". Then the next of kin would get the estate. That is what is intended, but the act is silent.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Is it the intention to debar a widow who is not of good moral character?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is no doubt about that, or the words "good moral character" would not have been inserted. As we are letting the others stand, we will let this section stand.

Section stands.

Section 4, sub-section (2)—Powers of superintendent exercised by deputy. When cancellation not invalid or defective.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The explanation simply reads that section 61, which is the section amended, does not provide as it stands for the observance of any formalities in carrying out the cancellation of a sale or lease for violation of the conditions of such sale or lease. This amendment is to embody in the act what has always been the practice with respect to cancellations; that is to say, it is intended to provide a written form which is to be effective for purposes of cancellation. Is this the practice?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is practically following out the provisions of the cancellation proceedings provided in leases in the Department of the Interior. There was a question as to the right or authority under the act of the Superintendent General to cancel. This provision is simply making it clear that he has that authority. A question has been raised as to the delivery of the notice. We have been attacked on two counts, namely that the Deputy Superintendent General had not the power to cancel, and that our notification was not regular; and as there have been a great many cancellations—in fact all cancellations have been made by the Superintendent General—we are making it clear that he has that authority, and validating those cancellations which he has made. We have to read clauses 3 and 4 to get the full sense of the amendment to section 61. While we are doing that we are not affecting any rights of any individual who has entered action prior to May, 1924. This is what we did in connection with the validation of leases in the Mining Act a couple of years ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The English seems to be bad. Take the infinitive in the fourth last line—how does that work in as an infinitive? I cannot see it. I will read it aloud so that hon. members will understand it. It says:

> For the purposes of this section the powers and authorities conferred upon the Superintendent General shall be and be deemed always to have been exercisable by the Deputy Superintendent General.

That is all right. The section continues:

> And in any case where the Superintendent General or the Deputy Superintendent General has heretofore cancelled any sale or lease, or shall hereafter cancel any sale or lease, for any of the causes mentioned in this section, such cancellation shall not be or be deemed to have been invalid, defective, or irregular by reason only of the fact that the purchaser or the lessee, his heirs executors, administrators or assigns, or, if the purchaser or lessee be a corporation, the corporation, its successors or assigns, or any person claiming by, through or under him, it or them, was not notified previously to such cancellation of intention to cancel, or to consider the facts of the case with a view to determining the execution of the power of cancellation.

I can say definitely that it is hopeless. I will not be criticised for using that word again. It makes no sense. To put it briefly, the section says that, for the purposes of this section, the Superintendent General or the Deputy Superintendent General shall be deemed to have had the power of the minister. That is all right. Then it says that any cancellation previously effected or to be effected shall not be deemed to be invalid because the party whose lease was cancelled got no notice previous to cancellation. Up to that point, whether it is good law or not, it is good sense; but it goes on and says "or to consider." Who is to consider? What does that mean? It does not mean anything. It looks as if it had fallen in from some other act. It has no place there.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is dealing with corporations there pure and simple. It may not be very clear, but we have so many cases in which corporations are interested in these purchases that it is difficult sometimes to know who the parties are. So that it is an endeavour to cover any point that may be raised in connection with the communications with the representatives or otherwise of the corporations. Dealing with individuals it is perfectly clear. My hon. friend will remember that a great many of those agreements of sale are made. The agreement of sale is sometimes sold to somebody else. Perhaps two or three individuals have dealt in this property, and then suddenly they all fail to pay, and, in order to clear up the property we are taking this precaution, and they shall be notified. Then we have the case of the corporation which purchases. Any number of complications arise about the purchase of the property, and we are simply seeking to cover the whole of it.

Mr. BAXTER: I see a possible way of getting the language together, but no way that would make it decent English in that construction. I do not know that anybody is finding fault with what the minister wants to do, but whoever has been employed to put the minister's meaning into English has used neither English nor French, the only two languages recognized in this parliament, and we are not conversant with any other.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It makes no sense at all. I think I see what the minister is after, but he has not got it. I could not see it for a long while. What is the sense of saying that a cancellation cannot be invalid merely by reason of the fact that the authority cancelled it under notice previously of such cancellation or intention to cancel? The word "of" should be "or"; that is plainly a misprint. It reads "previously to such cancellation of intention." How could you cancel an intention to cancel?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not having a legal training—

Mr. MEIGHEN: One is better without it in this case.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):— I do not wish to argue it. But I see my right hon. friend's contention.

Mr. MANION: I wonder these sections are not divided into reasonably short sentences. For instance, this subsection contains nineteen lines, averaging about ten words to a line, or about 190 words. No one but a lawyer has any idea of the beginning of the sentence by the time he reaches the end. I would suggest to the minister that he put this bill into the hands of an ordinary sensible layman instead of a lawyer, to recast it in good English.

Mr. BAXTER: Then we will have litigation for the rest of our lives.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Of course, I am not a legal draftsman. I will have the subsection re-drafted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Assuming we have here what the draftsman intended to say, is the minister not going a little too far? I am willing to support him in going to great lengths in validating cancellations the result of mere technicalities, but here he is asking that every cancellation be declared valid even though the purchaser or lessee had not only no notice of it at all, but no notice of intention.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is not the intention.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But that is what is here.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I admit that on the face of it it appears so. It is very difficult to notify all the interested parties in one of these deals, and your cancellation proceedings may be invalidated by the mere fact that although you have been careful to notify the original purchaser, his equity has disappeared by assignment or otherwise and he is no longer an interested party. What I want is to ensure the purchaser being properly notified, and that is always done, but our difficulty is caused by so many transfers having taken place. I am informed that this was drafted by the Department of Justice.

Mr. MARTELL: If we are interpreting a statute in the courts, we cannot say, "Well, parliament intended so and so." The act must speak for itself whether its express words give the intention of parliament or not. I agree with the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) that these lengthy sections should be broken up into various subsections so as to thoroughly convey to the reader what is the intent of the section. Some people may say, "Lawyers want to becloud the issue in order to get cases." That is not so. Lawyers always know what they are doing. They may disagree at times, and their clients may have to pay for such disagreement, but only after a thorough presentation of both sides of the case. It has been said that when a doctor makes a mistake he buries it;—

Mr. SHEARD: Order.

Mr. MARTELL:—but lawyers seldom make mistakes which their clients have to pay for. The average lawyer to-day who has any respect for his profession discourages litigation, for he does not make money by going into court. Therefore statutes should be worded as plainly as possible in order that "he who runs may read". But however plainly the intention of parliament may be stated in a statute, I am sure my fellow-practitioner will agree with me that finally only an intelligent lawyer can interpret its true meaning.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I make this suggestion to the minister in so far as the wording goes, unless he intends to recast the whole sentence, namely, that after the word "or" he insert the words "of intention," so the sentence will read, "or of intention to consider." Then with a reasonable effort a layman can get at the meaning.

Mr. BAXTER: It is badly expressed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not say that that is the only improvement which might be made, but it undoubtedly would be a very great improvement at the most obscure point. Would the minister also bring a statement from his law clerk, Mr. Williams, as to really all that he intends to accomplish by this section? He is accomplishing so much that he is in danger of simply cutting out the rights of the most bona fide purchasers. According to this subsection he validates every cancellation not only if the interested party got no notice but even though he never knew of the cancellation. The minister says, "Yes, but we do not want to do that; all we want is to see that we are not declaring invalid any sale or lease merely because some one holding shares in a company was not notified." Well, no man because he holds an interest in a company is entitled to individual notice; he never was. There must be some mistake about that. But if there are partners, and they are on record in the department, they are all entitled to notice; and the minister would never ask parliament to pass an act which would declare those partners not entitled to notice. I am not at all clear what the departmental officers intend by this section. If I am clear, and it does not extend too far, I am prepared to go a long way with the minister to validate cancellations.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is just possible that the Department of Justice has tried to cover every contingency. All we want to do is to clear up the question whether the Deputy Superintendent General had authority to sign for the department. That is necessary owing to the fact that hundreds of these leases and sales have been cancelled by the action of the Deputy Superintendent General. Then, there is the question of notification. No cancellation proceedings are ever taken until notice has been repeatedly sent to the person in arrears. Some of these sales run over a period of ten years. A short time ago, on the Galician reserve, we could get no response from two or three parties who were interested in a sale —Americans—although an examination of the files showed that they had been repeatedly notified. The sale was cancelled and the land was subsequently sold, and the parties interested have now turned up and make certain demands, one of the grounds of their claim being that the Deputy Superintendent General had not authority to cancel and that notification had not been properly sent them, although they had been notified at their last known address. Then we have the other complicated case where those agreements are sold to or traded in with other parties and we do not know who may have an interest in them. We have no notification of their interest until after cancellation proceedings take place; then the other parties suddenly turn up with an interest in the property and say that they have not been notified. These are the cases that we want to cover in this section.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has made very clear why the first part is necessary, and in that I cordially support him. He has not, however, made clear to me the second part, because if these men are not on the record of the department as purchasers from a purchaser or otherwise they are not entitled to any notice, and though they might hang around here until doomsday the minister would be justified in ignoring them. He does not need the section for this purpose; there must be some other.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am advised by the Justice department that with respect to one case the best thing we can do is to return the money, although we did all we thought was necessary to cover the case. The question is involved there of the Deputy Superintendent General's authority, as well as the matter of notification and a second party appearing in the transaction.

Mr. BAXTER: If an official is charged with the performance of a duty before a right can be cancelled, there is no good reason why that duty should not be performed literally and practically in accordance with the statute. The difficulty with the government and with most public bodies is found in the slipshod work of officials who come to think that anything will do. It is quite right that there should be some notice. I do not think any one wishes to put the law in the position that my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) suggests it would be by this amendment, whereby cancellation could be made without notice of any kind. Very often the courts act without notifying every one in interest. They take what is called a representative of a class, and it is held that where a given class of people have the same sort of interest, service of a notice upon any one of that class is sufficient. A great deal of property is dealt with in that way. The minister might add some provision that the notification, however irregular in form it might be, would be good provided it had been given in accordance with the rules to some one of the class of persons who have an actual interest. But I do not think there ought to be an entire dispensing with any effort to let people know that it is intended to deal with their rights. That ought to be preserved to some extent, though I am willing to facilitate as much as possible the main objects the minister has in mind.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have no desire that the rights of the purchaser or lessee shall not be protected.

Mr. BAXTER: But your section destroys all protection.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This section is not so much for the future as it is for the past. I agree that for the future we might curtail it to a definite procedure, and that I am willing to do. But here we have cases where the officials acted in good faith, not at all in a slipshod manner, as my hon. friend suggests. Cancellation proceedings have always been preceded by an attempt to locate the person concerned and notify him of the condition in which his contract stood. The main object is to prevent any doubt arising as to the validity of what has happened in the past.

Mr. BAXTER: That could be done by a few simple words.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We might argue for hours about this. The best thing we can do is to take it back and have it redrafted.

Section stands.

On section 5—Power of Governor in Council over expenditure of capital.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is to widen the scope within which we may spend band funds for the purchase of implements or machinery, also to provide for the expenditure of capital moneys standing at the credit of the band upon such improvements or works as will when completed properly represent capital, or as the section goes on to say——in the making of loans to members of the band to promote progress, no such loan, however, to exceed in amount one-half of the appraised value of the interest of the borrower in the lands held by him.

Almost every day I have complaints arising out of a rather vicious system that prevails in the Indian department, and that is the agent has authority in case of distress or necessity to authorize the Indian to purchase horses, machinery and equipment in order that he may carry on his farming operations. Members from the prairie provinces have been complaining to me almost every day that these accounts have not been paid. I hope to try and limit this practice to cases of absolute distress; that is, the agent will not have authority to issue these permits except in case of absolute want or distress; and to take the place of that I want to make it a little easier to secure capital moneys for the purpose of assisting the Indians to get started. We have a profit on the greater production scheme of some $60,000, which has been turned into the treasury, and I am going to ask in a supplementary estimate for that sum to be revoted to assist in this very purpose, in order that we may stop this practice of the Indians purchasing from implement companies, from merchants and from farmers stock and the necessary equipment to carry on their farming operations. We will utilize that amount, and in addition the capital funds we have now to the credit of the band, for this purpose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see no objection to this section. I think those additions are probably in the interest of the Indians. I do not quite follow the minister, though, on the other phase, namely that relating to the $60,000 which he proposes having in the estimates. Is that greater production money?

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is profits from the greater production scheme. Under the act we have to pay it into the treasury, and I am asking for it as a grant for the very purpose set out here, in order that we will be able to loan the Indian money rather than have him go to the merchant and get into debt, with all the trouble that involves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want the minister to understand I am not objecting to the section at all; I think it is all right, but when this money is voted is the minister going to allow it to be applied to any cases of the past where agents have authorized purchases where they should not have—in payment of notes given, for example?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There are cases now where band funds have been used for this very purpose. Of course, the band have always loaned the money. It is the clearing up of all indebtedness I have reference to, but there is no authority for me to do it under the act. I want to try and stop this vicious practice if I can.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the minister got my point. I emphasize again, the section is right, to enable the minister to advance money for machinery out of band funds, but when he votes the money he speaks of, is he going to permit any of it to be used, not to purchase new machinery or horses or to make a new loan for the Indian's immediate purposes, but rather to pay past debts incurred by the Indians and never before recognized by the department? If he is, well, there is opportunity for frightful favouritism, and I think the minister would be in hot water from the beginning.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I confess I have a lot of difficulty to know how to straighten these matters out; but no, it is not my intention to use that money for that purpose. What I actually want this money for is to start the younger men farming. My hon. friend knows that when a young man graduates from one of these schools, if he can be induced to marry and settle down, he usually makes a pretty good farmer, but we have no funds from which to loan him money to make a start, and I propose asking for this $60,000 to be revoted to be used for that purpose.

Mr. MILLAR: Did I understand the minister to say none of this money would be available for wiping out past debts?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not the money we are discussing now, that is the profits from the greater production scheme.

Mr. MILLAR: But there will be other provision made for that purpose?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I may say frankly, if money is to be procured for the wiping out of these old debts, if we have to come to that—but I hope we will not; I have been trying to get them squared away and get the practice stopped—the proper thing would be to come to parliament and get money voted for that purpose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister ever intends to apply money to those purposes, I hope he will give me a chance to put in an application on behalf of very many clients.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It would be a rather dangerous thing to do.

Mr. MILLAR: I have seen the minister several times about these debts that have been incurred by the Indians, some of them three and four and five years old. I did not intend to take any part in this discussion, but from the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition it would rather seem to me that he objects to these old debts being paid.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I object to paying them.

Mr. MILLAR: In that case I think I should refer to the matter. Many of these debts have been incurred as long ago as three and four years. Goods have been sold to the Indians on the signed order of the agent, as agent. Horses, goods from the store, and in some cases oil from the oil tanks have been purchased, not at fictitious prices at all, but on the signed order of the agent, as agent, and when these men delivered their goods to the Indians on the strength of the order signed by the agent, as agent, they certainly felt the government was behind the agent and would see that the bills were paid. Now, after waiting for years, and crops having failed—in one case as the minister knows, a man was burnt out and lost his store and stock, involving a loss of some thirty or forty thousand dollars—if there is any money available I think it should be devoted to wiping out these old debts. I know it is a difficult matter, and I believe the minister is using his very best energies to meet the difficulty and to get the old debts paid, but some of the Indians have died, and others have moved away and feel as though they were paying for a dead horse; they are not willing to make the effort. I think there is no possibility of having these debts paid unless the government takes the matter in hand and pays the debts itself. I do not think the government can afford to be so unjust as to see a man take the goods off his shelf for the Indians on the strength of an order signed by the agent, as agent, and then say: We will not pay those debts. I do not think the government can afford to do that. It is setting an example, I was going to say, of dishonesty. I think there is a moral obligation on the government to wipe these debts out, and I think now would be a proper time for the minister to say just how far he has been able to proceed. He has been trying to meet this difficulty he has told me, and has been doing his utmost in that direction, and I have no complaint to make on that score. He has also been in touch with the Indian Commissioner for the purpose of providing a remedy, and perhaps it would be a satisfaction to those who are expecting some remuneration if the minister would make a statement on the subject so that we would know just where we are.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is, of course, one of the very difficult problems that the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs has to face. I point out to my hon. friend that there are faults on both sides. Very frequently the Indians are somewhat easy to persuade that they require horses, implements and food when, perhaps, they do not require them at all; and through the easy methods pursued by the agents obligations were incurred that never should have been entered into at all.

Mr. HOEY: What authority had the agent to endorse these purchases from time to time?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The agent simply issues an order.

Mr. HOEY: Had he authority to do that?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): On this order the agent says he thinks the Indian worthy of credit. Of course I take no exception to the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Millar): there is undoubtedly an obligation on the part of the government through their agents. I have now put a stop to that sort of thing, and confined the relief to cases of dire necessity. What I want to do is to stop the practice and try and clean up this indebtedness that exists in practically all of the provinces. I may say that in the province of Alberta we have the matter pretty well in hand; but in Saskatchewan, for some reason or another—I imagine very largely owing to the bad crops and to the conditions that surround the farmers generally—the Indians, as well as other farmers have been unable to pay their indebtedness. If we have a good agent, and after all that is the greatest asset you could have on a reserve, we will not be very long in cleaning these matters up, except in some particularly aggravated cases. We are endeavouring first to secure the consent of the band for the purpose of liquidating this indebtedness. Undoubtedly before it is finished we will require some assistance in the cleaning-up operations, because as my hon. friend has pointed out in many cases the Indian has died, or otherwise disappeared, and the indebtedness stands. However, I think it will have a good effect if we cease doing that kind of business altogether because there is a temptation on the part of people who have articles to sell to induce the Indian to buy if they can, persuading him that something of the character indicated is needed. The indebtedness is incurred in that way when probably the Indian would be far better off if he were not given assistance at all. That is usually what has happened in the most aggravated cases. However, we are making a real effort to clean up the Saskatchewan situation. It is probably the worst, and it is confined to three or four reserves. The reserve my hon. friend has in his constituency at Broadview is one, the reserve at Touchwood is another, and there are a few other cases which need immediate attention. We hope to be able to clean the entire situation up without having to come to the government for assistance except for a very small amount.

Mr. MILLAR: I think what the minister has said may be true in some parts of Saskatchewan. I could not say positively that there are no cases in the reserve at Broadview, but I know of none. I do know however that in many cases goods were sold that were absolutely needed, goods off the shelf. The man that I spoke of who has the largest account—$6,000 or $5,500—took the goods right from the shelf. I think it would be well if the minister could see some way to use part of this or some other money, to pay part of this obligation in cash immediately, because many of the persons concerned are in dire need and even a settlement at once of a part of the obligation would be a great help. I would ask the minister to give this matter his very best consideration. The district is one where the crop has failed; we have had poor crops for some three or four years, and most of these people are very much in need.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not objecting to the payment, but I warn the minister first that he will be in difficulty if he starts this thing because the number is almost legion. I know myself of many cases—many large and many small—and I protest against any system of picking out a few and providing money to pay them out of the treasury. If the minister is going to pay them all right, but let him come down with a vote for the whole amount; it is the only fair way to do.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Procedure where wife living apart.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have cases where wives have left their husbands and are living in the United States, and it is not desirable that they should be enfranchised along with their husbands. That is why we are asking for this provision.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Enfranchisement of Indians, section 122a revived.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The difficulty here is, the Justice department have informed us that although section 122a is retained in the act it is doubtful if it was not cancelled in the amendments of 1920. We are reviving section 122a and making it clear that it remains.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is section 122a?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is set out here; it is in the old act. This is to make it absolutely clear that the section was not struck out in the amendments of 1920.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The explanatory note does not say what it is.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will read the section:

If an Indian who holds no land in a reserve, does not reside on a reserve and does not follow the Indian mode of life, makes application to be enfranchised, and satisfies the Superintendent General that he is self-supporting and fit to be enfranchised, and surrenders all claims whatsoever to any interest in the lands of the band to which he belongs, and accepts his share of the funds at the credit of the band including the principal of the annuities of the band, to which share he would have been entitled had he been enfranchised under the foregoing sections of the act, in full of all claims to the property of the band, or in case the band to which he belongs has no funds or principal of annuities, surrenders all claim whatsoever to any property of the band, the Governor in Council may order that such Indian be enfranchised and pay his said share if any, and from the date of such order such Indian, together with his wife and unmarried minor children, shall be held to be enfranchised.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the minister the section of 1920?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, I have not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could the minister give the general effect of it?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, I have not the old act here. The purpose is to make it absolutely clear that that section was not cancelled in 1920.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know it was not the intention to cancel it. The reason I ask is that the minister came down in 1922 with some further amendments and I was never very enthusiastic about them. Is the minister quite clear it was not the 1922 amendments?

9 p.m.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. The 1922 amendments as my right hon. friend will remember, cancelled some of the drastic powers of the Superintendent General, but they did not interfere with the mode of enfranchisement. The amendment of 1922 was that the enfranchisement should not be carried out without the knowledge of the band. This affected the whole of 122a, so the Justice department said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The enfranchisement should not be carried out without the consent of the band, and consequently the effect would be to repeal section 122a. I think it is the 1922 section that does the repealing, but it does not matter. We want it restored, and I am satisfied to do that. Does the minister say that it is working out well to have the band virtually in control of the enfranchisement, as was brought about by him in 1922?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We are not having any difficulty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How many is the minister enfranchising?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): A very considerable number. A return was brought down fifteen days after the opening of the session. There was only one band, the Six Nations band, which raised any particular objection. The enfranchisement is still going on amongst the Indians, and I think I am safe in saying that it is working out satisfactorily.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My understanding is that, at the rate at which we are going, the enfranchisement is very slow and that our grandchildren will be in their graves and several generations after them before the Indians are citizens. Was it not a mistake to pay so much attention to a recalcitrant band in Brantford county? It does not seem to have mollified them very much. They seem to be going to the League of Nations over our heads.

Mr. GRAHAM: One of the complaints was that we were enfranchising them against their will.

Mr. IRVINE: The minister has explained the meaning of sections 107 and 122a, and he has given us to understand that a number of Indians have been enfranchised under the provisions of those sections, although he does not seem to be clear as to exactly how many have been enfranchised in the last year or two. He has told us that the tribe has to give its consent before an Indian is enfranchised. Is that so?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, if an enfranchised Indian has common, communal property in the band; otherwise, no.

Mr. IRVINE: To what extent does the enfranchisement of an Indian make him a Canadian citizen?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): He is a Canadian citizen before enfranchisement, but he has not the full right of citizenship, namely the privilege of using a ballot.

Mr. MEIGHEN: After enfranchisement, is it not the case that he has every right that we possess except that he is not a member of parliament?

Mr. IRVINE: That is just what I wanted to find out. Am I to understand that after the Indian has been enfranchised according to this legislation, he may vote?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The full right of citizenship.

Mr. IRVINE: In that case, will the Elections Act be amended to provide for that?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is not necessary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, because the Elections Act merely exempts Indians who are wards. He is no longer a ward; he has all the rights of citizenship. He can even take a drink if he can get it by law.

Mr. IRVINE: Have the provisions referred to under section 7 the effect of breaking up the bands or the tribes, perhaps before they are fit for citizenship? Does the minister believe that this is working well?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is no doubt about that. There are in Canada a great number of Indians who are educated in the various schools that are provided for them and there is no reason why they should not have the full right of citizenship. The trouble arose over the fact that the Superintendent General had power, without the consent of the band to enfranchise an Indian and demand his share of the communal property. If the Indian has not a communal interest in the band, the band has nothing to say about the matter. He has free will as regards that. He himself makes application always for enfranchisement.

Mr. IRVINE: How many Indians have been given the right to vote?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If my hon. friend will look at the return that was brought down, he will find out how many were enfranchised last year. When the estimates are brought down, I shall be glad to furnish that information if necessary.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Trespassing on reserves or cutting or removing.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is simply to assist in the better preservation of timber and other property of the band and to provide penalties for the destruction of such property.

Mr. SENN: Does this mean that any man who buys hay from an Indian living on a reserve will have to have a license from the Superintendent General before he can deal with the Indian in that way?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not necessarily. He can get a license from the local agent or secure permission of the council. This is to provide penalties when destruction takes place when no permission of any sort is given.

Mr. SENN: Will it be necessary for a buyer of hay to have a license for every Indian he trades with or just a general license to do business with the Indians?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Just a general license issued by the agent in charge, which would always be by consent of the council.

Mr. MILLAR: This would not cover the case of an Indian who drives a load of hay from the reserve to a neighbouring town and offers that hay for sale?

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. That is his own property.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One needs to study these provisions carefully to be certain what they mean. Reading this section over, I am of the opinion that it goes too far. I think the minister has a section under which nobody could sell anything off a reserve. It reads:

> Every person, or Indian, other than an Indian of the band to which the reserve belongs, who, without the license in writing of the Superintendent General or of some officer or person deputed by him for that purpose, cuts, carries away or removes from any of the lands, roads or allowances for roads in a reserve, any of the trees, saplings, shrubs, underwood, timber, cordwood, or part of a tree, or hay, or removes any of the stone, soil, minerals, metals or other valuables from the said land, roads or allowances for roads, or who buys any of the above-mentioned materials, shall, on summary conviction thereof before any stipendiary magistrate. . . .

And so forth, be liable. If an Indian on the reserve takes his hay into town and this section passes, nobody can buy that hay unless he has a license to do so. Does the minister intend that?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That the purchaser should have to have a license?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is not intended.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the result.

Mr. BLACK (Huron): It must be an Indian of the band to which the reserve belongs.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is to stop the destruction. In most cases it is wood that is pilfered off these reserves. You require to have a fairly broad provision. Nearly all these men, when they dispose of their produce, have authority from the agent to dispose of it. If it were otherwise the Indian would never keep any money at all. It would be all dissipated. You have to have some control of the Indians, or they would never have a dollar to pay their debts. They would sell their stuff, it would be gone, and that would be the end of it. This is to stop that sort of thing. It may look drastic in the case of a good Indian who is a law-abiding citizen, but you have to make laws for those who are not law-abiding, who will get all the money they can, pauperize themselves by selling everything; their families will get into trouble and the department have to come to their rescue. This measure is intended to cover cases of that kind and to prevent pilfering.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister mean that no man is able to contract with an Indian to take from that Indian's lands trees or shrubbery or anything else which the agent does not wish the Indian to sell?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the agent authorizes the Indian to sell his hay, and the Indian comes to town, and no one can buy that hay unless he has a license.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, that is not the intention.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the way the act reads.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If he purchases without the Indian being able to show his authority to sell then you can prosecute.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the way it should be, but that is not the way it reads.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. Nobody can buy, unless he has a license, any hay grown on the Indian's land. If the man who buys is an Indian of the band, he is permitted to buy, but if not he cannot buy.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If the Indian was not in possession of authority from the agent to sell, he should not buy from him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Even suppose he has authority to sell the hay by license, then the purchaser is not protected according to this section. As a matter of fact, if the Indian is a member of the band he does not need any license at all to sell the hay under this section. It is only one who is not of the band who has to have a license to sell, and very rightly so. But I am assuming now that the man who is selling has a right to sell. The fellow who takes the hay to town has the right to sell it. The minister is preventing anybody buying it under this section. There is no use giving a man a right to sell if everybody is prevented from buying.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Does the hon. member contend that a man must have a license to buy?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: That is the drafting.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The section reads:

> Every person . . . . who, without the license in writing of the Superintendent General, or of some officer or person deputed by him for that purpose, cuts, carries away or removes from any of the lands roads or allowances for roads in a reserve, ... or who buys any of the above-mentioned materials shall on summary conviction thereof before any stipendiary magistrate, police magistrate or any two justices of the peace or an Indian agent, incur in each case the cost of prosecution—

Mr. McMASTER: I think the section is poorly drafted, but if I were called upon to interpret that section I would interpret it in this way:

> —or who buys from someone who has not a license or who is not otherwise authorized—

And so on. I agree with the leader of the opposition that it is not as clearly expressed as it should be, but I think he has put a darker construction upon it than the circumstances of the case really merit.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will have this section examined as well as the others.

Mr. SENN: What do the words "or other valuables aforesaid" mean? Does that include live stock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think it would include live stock.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): What is involved in the section is definitely set out. It does not mention live stock.

Mr. SENN: It says "other valuables as aforesaid."

Mr. MILLAR: Would the minister say that this clause is drafted in such a way that there is no ambiguity about it? The reserves with which I am familiar are not very far from towns of considerable size, and it is a common practice for men to come to town with loads of hay. I have purchased it from them myself. I do not know whether they had a license or not. I may have been liable without knowing it. I think a great many others have bought hay from them without inquiring whether the man had a license or not, and probably did not think he required a license.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The hon. member was not liable.

Mr. MILLAR: If the clause means what the right hon. leader of the opposition thinks it means, we might be liable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no doubt what it means, but if this clause passes in its present form, it does not matter whether the Indian has a license to sell or not. The buyer would require to have a license.

Mr. McMASTER: That is an extreme interpretation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want the minister to report to the Minister of Justice that I have said that the clause is badly drafted. I think it is very clear, but it means the wrong thing.

Mr. McMASTER: I would like to answer the leader of the opposition. The clause is not intended to mean what he says it clearly means. In that respect it is not drafted to meet the desires of the government and of the minister in charge.

Progress reported.

LAND TITLES ACT—AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 188, to amend the Land Titles Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Qualification of registrar and deputy.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This section is simply to permit us to utilize the gold commissioner, who is not a barrister, for the purpose of registering.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never knew there was a Land Titles Act for the Dominion. Does it apply just to the Territories?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): To the Territories and the Yukon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would not the law as to resgistration be included in the Yukon Act?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think not. This amendment is simply to allow us to use the gold commissioner, who is not a barrister, for the purpose of registering all claims that require registration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not mining claims?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Transfers of real property.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection to the present gold commissioner being appointed as registrar; he would be quite capable; but does the minister consider it advisable to make the repeal applicable generally?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It applies only to the Territories and the Yukon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): As my right hon. friend knows, the population of the Yukon is becoming so reduced that the overhead expense of government is enormous. It is in order to cut down the expense that I am asking for this amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All right.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS—HARBOURS AND RIVERS—NOVA SCOTIA

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that this vote be taken item by item?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Apple River—breakwater repairs, $2,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where is Apple river?

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works): In the county of Cumberland. The money is needed for repairs to the breakwater approach.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I notice the vote is for repairs. What happened?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No repairs or improvements have been made to this breakwater since it was constructed in 1907.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has it been much used?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is a farming and lumbering settlement of about two hundred people. The breakwater is to provide shelter for vessels loading lumber, the shipments amounting to between ten and fifteen million feet a year. Shipments are temporarily held up owing to a recent transfer of the lumber property, but will be resumed in the near future.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Were the fifteen million feet shipments lately or long ago?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Shipments are temporarily held up.

Item agreed to.

Babin's cove—wharf extension, $1,700.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a new wharf?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, it is to construct an extension to the crib work for a length of twenty feet. The engineer claims that the wharf is so short that there is no room for teams to turn on it or for vessels to tie up in safety. This is the only wharf on the island known as Madam island, that can be used during the winter months. The enlargement of forty feet is urgently required.

Mr. GOULD: What is the total length of the wharf?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It consists of a block and span one hundred feet long by twenty feet wide, with an "L" twenty-five feet in width projecting twenty feet from the southern side of the outer channel. In 1910 a warehouse twenty-five feet by sixteen feet was built at the head of the wharf, greatly interfering with the turning space for teams. To widen this turning space is the principal reason for the extension.

Mr. GOULD: What industry is carried on on the island?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is a general development carried on. The island has a population of 3,000 people.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was this shed put up in such a way that the wharf could not be used?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Apparently.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was it put up by the same engineer who is now recommending how to undo his mistake?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am not sure.

Item agreed to.

Bass River—improvements, $1,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where is Bass River?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Colchester county.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the improvements to consist of?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is to construct a crib protection work for a vessel bed, to be built in two sections; also minor repairs. The vessels go up on the tide and rest on the mud when the tide recedes, and this bed is to hold the vessel on an even keel when the tide is out.

Mr. GOULD: Will this list take care of all the improvements necessary in the way of harbours and wharves in Nova Scotia? That is, shall we have no further items in the supplementary estimates?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is pretty hard to say.

Item agreed to.

Bayfield—breakwater repairs, $6,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is a reconstruction of both sides of breakwater for a distance of 420 feet, the work to be effected by setting stone in concrete.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When did the destruction take place?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In the storm of October 1, 1923.

Item agreed to.

Bay St. Lawrence—breakwater repairs, $5,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is in Cape Breton North.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What has happened here?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The damage was caused by a storm on October 2nd, 1923. The Department of Marine and Fisheries strongly urged that this breakwater be repaired.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the report from that department?

Mr KING (Kootenay): I have only a reference to a letter written on October 17, 1923, by the Department of Marine and Fisheries strongly urging that these repairs be made. I have not the letter here.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the date of the by-election there?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In August, I think —before the storm anyway.

Mr. GOULD: Of what is this breakwater constructed?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Of native timber crib work filled with stone.

Item agreed to.

Broad Cove marsh—replacement breakwater wharf, $8,400.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What county is this in?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Inverness.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why was the work not done last year? Is this because of an anticipated storm that did not arise?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They had difficulty in getting the labour last fall and the contract was let in March of this year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: For what price?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): $7,329. The contractor is with the Sydney Construction Company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There were hundreds of people out of work; why could not the labour be secured?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the details as to that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the member for the riding will give us the real reason.

Mr. CHISHOLM: The explanation is simple. It is difficult to get the timber there at that time of the year, and that was really the cause of the delay. Labour was very plentiful down there; we were well employed in that part of the country last year. It is a rather rough country and you need the snow in the winter to get the timber out. The timber is there now and the structure is about completed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the timber that has been brought there been paid for?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not yet.

Mr. GOULD: Has the government considered the advisability of making a permanent construction by pouring cement around the rocks in the cribwork?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I hardly think so.

Mr. GOULD: You will find that concrete construction in every stream and every river in this country where abutments are put in to protect bridges from the action of ice.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is solid concrete but to pour concrete around the boulders in the crib would not be effective. Moreover, it would not be satisfactory in salt water.

Item agreed to.

Cariboo Island—breakwater reconstruction, $8,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was this carried away too?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is in the county of Pictou, N.S.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this let by contract?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It will be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is $2,000 already spent on it. What happened?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Certain work was being carried on last year with the vote, following a storm which destroyed not only some of the work that had been done but another section of the breakwater as well. It had originally been intended to do this work by contract, but when the storm occurred we used a certain amount of money to hold what we had remaining of the breakwater.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There were no tenders called for, then?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We were calling for tenders last season when the storm occurred, destroying another section of the breakwater, and it was considered inadvisable to let a contract that season. The engineer was instructed to expend a certain sum of money to ensure the safety of what was left, with a view to asking parliament for a revote to carry on the reconstruction this season.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why could the tender not be gone on with notwithstanding the storm? Is the minister going on with tenders now?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We will complete the work by day's labour now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Because we think it is in the interests of the department to do so. We started to do certain work last fall, and we will continue the work by day's labour, as it is more economical.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why was it more economical to do it by tender before the storm and more economical to do it by day labour after the storm? Did the storm upset the whole principle of the department?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Oh no, but the situation was changed very much after the storm, and we then decided to carry on by day labour to retain, if possible, what was remaining. It is considered by the department that we had better continue as we have begun, under the direction of the engineers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the work being done on a percentage basis?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, the department is doing it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was this the October storm too?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Carr's Brook—breakwater repairs, $1,275.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that the same storm?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No. This is to renew the stringers where necessary. There was a storm in that vicinity that disturbed the structure somewhat, and this vote is for repairs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What storm was that?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): On October 1st and 2nd.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where is Carr's Brook?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In Colchester county.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What river is the breakwater in? Is it out in the ocean?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Carr's Brook enters into Minas Basin. The wharf is at the mouth of the river, I suppose on Carr's Brook, at Minas Basin.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this by tender too?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, by day labour.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has anything been done by tender of all the list so far?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, the larger item for Broad Cove marsh. Tenders were called for that work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the storm not change the minister's idea there?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Item agreed to.

Chimney Corner—wharf reconstruction, $8,000.

Mr. SPENCE: Just why is the minister spending $8,000 on a very unimportant place of this kind? Is there any coal business or any business of any kind being done there? Is there any population there? This is the same thing as last year.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is for the reconstruction of a wharf destroyed by a storm last October. The industries are farming, fishing, and coal mining.

Mr. SPENCE: That storm must have been a cyclone.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A storm on the Atlantic covers the whole coast pretty well. A storm in the vicinity of North Cape Breton, for instance, or on the north or south coast of Nova Scotia is not confined to one harbour, but covers the coast pretty generally.

Mr. SPENCE: This is not on the Atlantic coast at all. The storm could not have hit there too.

Mr. CHISHOLM: This is a very important little harbour. My hon. friend seems to be impressed with the idea that there is nothing going on there. I do not know for a certainty where he got his information, but I think he gets it from someone pretty close to himself.

Mr. SPENCE: I know something about this particular section. I do not have to ask my hon. friend to my left (Mr. Black, Halifax).

Mr. CHISHOLM: There are four fishing establishments there carrying on business through all the open season of the year. There is also a coal mine which is going to be operated just as soon as it is possible to carry the coal away from there, but fishing is the important thing. If my hon. friend will come down to my part of the country I will take him there, and I am sure he will enjoy himself. It is a magnificent spot.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was spent there last year, the year before, and the year before that?

Mr. CHISHOLM: Last year's storm destroyed the whole structure, which was in first-class shape till then.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have been spending money there right along.

Mr. CHISHOLM: No, this is the third time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we did some work there in 1922, and again in 1923.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was expended in 1922-1923, $1,100, and in 1923-1924, $11,885.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a coal prospect there. I wonder if my hon. friend could tell us who control the coal prospect, and whether they have been able to sell it yet?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not any information on that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think if my hon. friend will find out who wants this he will be able to get the information.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have no information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No mystery about it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I know of none.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No coal taken out of it yet at all?

Mr. CHISHOLM: A very considerable amount of coal has been taken out of it. I may tell my hon. friend that the property is owned by an incorporated company. If he wants further particulars I can tell him that I am a small owner there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is just the facts I want.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Well, the property is owned by an incorporated company and I am a shareholder.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who are the others?

Mr. CHISHOLM: It is not necessary for me to give my hon. friend that information is it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not if it is withheld.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there any reason why the hon. member should give his name and not the others?

Mr. CHISHOLM: I might tell my right hon. friend I thought the ex-Minister of Finance was insinuating something, and that he had me in mind. I have no hesitation in saying that I am a part owner, and that I hope to see the property developed on such a scale that it will be a great benefit to the surrounding country. I have put my own money in this proposition with the hope that I would do something by way of developing that natural resource. Does the hon. member find fault with that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it will be a good thing.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I wish to tell my hon. friend that it is not the coal development alone that is looked for at that particular point; good results have accrued to the fishing industry from the construction of the pier there. There are two fishing establishments in vigorous operation now. A very considerable amount of fishing is done in the neighbourhood, and a considerable amount of business has been transacted as a result of the construction of this wharf. The benefit of the expenditure for this purpose is not confined to this particular community, because that part of the coast is far away from any harbours and boats come here for shelter from other sections.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I may be quite wrong but my recollection is that when the present Judge McKenzie was a member of the House he wanted this work undertaken in connection with the coal development which we would all like to see. I think the work was started in 1922. I cannot believe that this coal development is not going on simply for the lack of an expenditure of $8,000. What is the real reason why this coal development, which was expected to take place in 1922, has not come about?

Mr. CHISHOLM: The reason is very clear. There are no railways to that part of the country and just as soon as this wharf is in shape to take care of the export of coal the coal development will take place. The reason no coal is shipped from there now is that the wharf is not in shape to handle it. A very considerable amount of coal was shipped from there one season, three years ago; but the accommodation was not good enough to enable the coal owners to ship anything like substantial quantities from that pier so the operations had to be suspended.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister says there was $1,000 spent in 1922-23. The vote in 1922-23 was $18,000. The vote for 1923-24 was $13,400. The latter was said to be a revote so that there must have been $5,100 spent in the previous year; $11,000 last year, and now $8,000 is asked. What is this coal mine worth?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): An order in council was passed on August 2, 1922 accepting the tender of W. E. Laundry for $12,159 for the construction of this extension. It was under the estimated cost. My notes show that the expenditure in 1922-23 was $1,100. It was late in the season when the contract was let, and I expect that very little work was done until 1923-24.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There must have been $5,100 spent.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, I think not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The $13,400 was a revote the next year.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The tender was very much lower than our original estimate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has any coal been shipped out of there?

Mr. CHISHOLM: I have already told my right hon. friend that considerable coal was shipped from there in 1921. I am not able to give him the exact quantity, but I may tell him in order to really carry on a coal business there it is necessary to have a considerable depth of water. The structure at that time would only furnish sufficient depth for small schooners. It was found in the fall of the year, it being a rough coast, that it was necessary to stop shipping because it was difficult to get a schooner of any size to the pier and large vessels were required for the fall trade. That is why this extension was made. The extension was built last year but it was carried away by a storm in October. It is impossible to carry on a coal business there until this work is finished. Again I want to emphasize that it was not for the coal business alone that this pier was originally constructed. It was for the purpose of providing a harbour of shelter for the fishermen along the coast, and they have taken advantage of it to a very considerable extent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There has been no coal shipped since 1921?

Mr. CHISHOLM: Since 1922, to be accurate. I have given the reason why more coal was not shipped.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When was the pier constructed first?

Mr. CHISHOLM: The first part of it was built in 1921. The coal was shipped in the season following the building of the pier. I might tell my hon. friend that a considerable amount of money was spent there developing that coal property, the expectation being that there would be a sufficient depth of water to permit the shipment of larger quantities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think my hon. friend must be wrong in his dates?

Mr. CHISHOLM: I may be mistaken as to the exact date.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because according to his first statement the shipment was made before the pier was built.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I may be wrong in the date of the construction of the pier, but the shipment took place the year after the pier was built and would have continued if this structure had been sufficiently long to give water enough to enable larger ships to tie to pier. Shipments will start again just as soon as the work is finished.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): I point out to the committee that the expenditure for development at Chimney Corner will benefit Prince Edward Island and not merely that part of Cape Breton. It is the nearest point to Prince Edward Island that contains any coal, and many cargoes of coal were shipped from Chimney Corner to Charlottetown and Summerside. It was good coal. It came from the nearest point to us and the freight was very reasonable; we got it at a much cheaper rate than we could get it by rail from other points. I may say that the great majority of our people now use coal for domestic purposes, very largely on account of the scarcity of wood, and they would like to see the coal mine in question developed in order to obtain cheap fuel. The expenditure at Chimney Corner will benefit not only the people of the immediate locality but also the people in other parts of the Maritime provinces and especially those along the coast who are dependent on coal for fuel.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would my hon. friend tell me the name of the company?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): I do not know the name of the company. I can tell my hon. friend that the coal at Chimney Corner is of very fine quality especially suited for 10 p.m. kitchen use, and it is popular among those in the province of Prince Edward Island who have had the opportunity of using it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In what year was this coal shipment made?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): The same year it was shipped from Chimney Corner.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What year was that?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): I understand it was in 1921 or 1922.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister say it was the late government that started this work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Construction was started in 1919-1920.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was no vote in 1922.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes a contract was let to Messrs. Morrison, Congdon and Company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It must have changed its name.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No. The wharf was originally 170 feet long by 20 feet wide. This new section was an extension of a former work started in 1919-20.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But all this new construction is for the purposes of coal shipments. The place was all right for fish before. There is none of that in the vote under Chimney Corner for 1921-22.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No; the contract was let for 1919-20, and I suppose it was completed in that period.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes and no harm was ever done to that wharf. That was sufficient for the purposes of the fishing industry.

Mr. CHISHOLM: It was necessary to extend it because there was not sufficient space for the boats. It was the initial step in the contemplated plan. The late government started to build it, and I think if the minister will look over his records, he will see that the first item was only a part of the plan at that time. So much was available for that year and the original plan was to be finished the next year. The first original structure would certainly not give enough protection to the boats. Two large fishing buildings were put up there for the purpose of buying and exporting fish. The business enlarged and it justified the extension. It was necessary also to give protection to the additional number of boats that came there as a result of the development that took place.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What portion was destroyed by this storm—the new part or the old?

Mr. CHISHOLM: The new part.

Mr. BAXTER: This seems to have caused a good deal of commotion amongst the people in that vicinity. As I understand the matter, a petition was sent in some time ago, and I have what I think is a copy of it. The residents of St. Rose, who seem to think their place is the one which should be favoured with a wharf, sent this petition to the minister:

We the undersigned citizens do petition asking for consideration for a wharf to be constructed at Saint Rose cove, Inverness county, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, Canada, as already on petitions for two consecutive years to our member of parliament, Dr. A. W. Chisholm, (for nineteen years representing the county) and to Minister of Public Works, asking for a "wharf" to enable our fishermen a place to land their fish, and a place of protection for their boats, and to have a place to ship material. Recently orders of lumber had had to be cancelled, owing to the fact that we had no place to ship via water, railroad, nor any making. It is very hard for us espcially during the present crisis of hard times, when lumber is the only means we have to earn money to support ourselves and families.

This is signed by all the representative people who live in the place. There are excellent names signed to this petition. There are a large number of MacLeods, McRaes, McKenzies, McKinnons, McPhersons. It would be almost like the landing of the Hector to put this on Hansard, so I will forego. I have no doubt that they are excellent citizens. I am favouved with a communication on this subject. I am not responsible for it, but the person seems to be acquainted with certain facts. He says:

For over fifty years money has been spent at Chimney Corner, Inverness county, Cape Breton. Dr. A. W. Chisholm, M.P. for Inverness county has secured $17,000 for a breakwater wharf, and it was built in 1923. The following fall it was destroyed by the fall gales. He had a returned man, Dan McKay, appointed inspector of the wharf works while under construction at $3.50 per day. McKay was at the same time working on the highway with a pair of horses at $6 per day. If he was attending to his job as inspector of the wharf, as freely said, it might be that the wharf would have a different story, than a wreck. Not satisfied with this, McKay was appointed once again by Dr. Chisholm to do the repair work of the old wharf, $800 which was destroyed and six beautiful boats, and lumber on the wharf. Seems strange McKay should be having about all while others get nothing. Dr. Chisholm is interested in the Chimney Corner coal mines, associated with three other colleagues—

[Mr. Chisholm.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does it give their names?

Mr. BAXTER: I do not know. I am just reading through.

—but I am told that owing to water trouble, it cannot be a success yet he gets all this money for the place. We cannot leave any material on the wharf. The beach with a brook running through is bad and not much hauling can be done, especially up a steep hill, with millions of cliff stones hanging above and during half a century all this money is spent there. We have been trying to get a wharf constructed as stated on petition, and do not seem to get in fact anything through Dr. Chisholm, yet he can get money for Chimney Corner. Many other efforts have been tried, but nothing doing for this district. Four contracts for lumber had to be cancelled this winter owing to no shipping place for St. Rose. For years we have been trying to get a wharf, and petitioned for it every year. Last year we do not think Dr. Chisholm introduced the bill.

Of course, we know that this does not come in by a bill unless it is for the services of a wharf inspector.

Mr. HEALY: What is the name of the last writer?

Mr. BAXTER: It was written by Mr. A. J. MacLeod who, I believe, is a near relative of the representative of the country.

Mr. HEALY: That is the reason for it, I suppose.

Mr. BAXTER: I am informed:

That these people have already petitioned twice through the representative of this county to have this expenditure made. They claim Dr. Chisholm has ignored them and instead of trying to get a vote for a wharf at St. Rose bent his energies to get money spent at Chimney Corner where the doctor has coal mining interests. The people of this St. Rose district—

I am sure the other side of the House will be glad to hear this.

—were very strong in the Liberal political faith. At the last federal election, I got only 24 votes in this district and the total vote polled was over 200.

Mr. GRAHAM: Twenty-four too many.

Mr. BAXTER: Too many from the Liberal point of view. The hon. member had better do something, for he cannot expect people to vote for their representative unless they get a vote for a wharf.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I will take my chances.

Mr. BAXTER: The hon. member had better remember Tim and the success of the breakwater. There ought at least to be a wharf of a reasonable size built there:

The majority of the men whose names appear on their petition were strong supporters of Dr. A. W. Chisholm at the last election. They are much opposed to him now on account of this matter.

Think of the chances he is willing to take! Apparently there is no change in their political faith, but there is some dissatisfaction at the lack of activity of the representative of their constituency. It seems to me only fair to give an opportunity to the hon. member for Inverness to explain how soon he will have a wharf built at St. Rose, and why he persists in favouring Chimney Corner at the expense of St. Rose, which, from the petition and the correspondence I have read, appears to be indisputably entitled to a wharf. It is a place where a wharf will stand, where a wharf will not fall out like the one at Chimney Corner. It will be a public utility. The hon. member should give some apology to his constituents to-night and show some signs of repentance.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I am glad my hon. friend has brought this matter up. The fact of the matter is that I have put forth all the efforts in me for four consecutive years in trying to get a wharf built at St. Rose. Reports were made by the engineers setting forth that it was an impossibility to construct a wharf there at any reasonable cost. It is a fact also that the late government made a report in regard to the matter. If they failed to get the wharf, that was not on account of any lack of persistence on my part, because I endeavoured to get the department to see as I saw. I would like very well to have a wharf at St. Rose myself if it could be built at a reasonable cost.

Mr. BAXTER: How did you succeed in Chimney Corner?

Mr. CHISHOLM: I succeeded there because nature helped me, and because the wharf would be a great benefit when it was put there. So far as St. Rose is concerned, it is in my own neighbourhood, and I am very grateful to my hon. friend for his interest in it. I know MacLeod is a relative of mine. My hon. friend will find it one of the most difficult things in the world to satisfy some of his relatives sometimes. So far as his criticism of Mr. McKay is concerned, my hon. friend should be ashamed to read a letter like that, couched in poor English and worse judgment. He was the only returned soldier there. He left home in 1914 and remained overseas until 1918. But let me ask my hon. friend if he knows whether MacLeod went overseas or not. That gentleman took very great care that he remained on his father's farm, when he was just as well able to go when McKay went. He seems terribly distressed because I recognized this soldier who has sacrificed so much for his country. Mr. McKay is possessed of a substantial amount of intelligence. I cannot say that much for Mr. MacLeod as is clearly shown by his letter. So far as the district of St. Rose is concerned, I may tell my hon. friend that I got every vote in that district, twelve miles distant, except Mr. MacLeod's vote. I suppose that may explain why he is so persistent in writing childish letters.

An hon. MEMBER: He was not a warrior.

Mr. CHISHOLM: He certainly was not a warrior in that case, and I do not think his sympathies were strongly in that direction. I will be very glad if my hon. friend will help me to get a wharf at St. Rose. If he goes with me to the department we will try to satisfy the department that there is a justification for the expenditure. We have failed so far. It is impossible to convince the engineer that a wharf should be placed there. I do not know that I can give my hon. friend any more explanation than that, but I am sure he should be satisfied with it inasmuch as his own party when in power never spent a dollar in any part of that district.

Mr. BAXTER: The information is very nice indeed, and the hon. member has his chance now. If he will induce the minister to put a decent little sum in the estimates to put a wharf at St. Rose, I think I can guarantee the support of all the members of this group, and I think I can go him one better. If he will cease accumulating votes in those districts in the way he has been doing in the past, and give us a chance to take over the reins of government ourselves, we will put a wharf there, and we will not find that nature will interfere with it. We will employ returned soldiers in connection with it, but not returned soldiers holding two incompatible jobs at the same time.

Mr. CHISHOLM: That statement is not correct. This man who writes the letter exaggerates. Mr. McKay is a responsible man who would not be guilty of such a thing. He is a leading citizen of that community and he would be the last man who would try to fill two positions at the same time. Mr. MacLeod has not been telling the truth. So far as my hon. friend's graciousness goes, his party was in power previously, and the county of Inverness sent a representative supporting the party. I think there was one pier built in Inverness county during that long eighteen years. His party was also in power from 1911 to 1917.

An hon. MEMBER: Longer than that.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I am talking now about the Tory party with which my hon. friend is associated. I brought the matter to the attention of the Minister of Public Works, and he made every effort to find out if it was a practical thing to put a wharf there. The report is on file in the department. He turned it down. He could not see any reason or merit in the proposition and therefore he rejected it. Now my hon. friend asks me to induce the minister to place an item in the estimates for this wharf, and states that he and his party will support it. I had higher ideas of the Tory party than that. I have known some very honest Tories in this world. Would my hon. friend seriously tell me, in the face of the fact that this expenditure is not justified, according to the report of the Tory official engineers, that he and his party would back it up if this minister would place the item in the estimates? Am I to understand that? Surely my hon. friend's morals and those of his party are higher than that. Surely that is not what he means. His party never did anything for the county but he is quite willing to do wonders for the county when he is in opposition. He and his party are continuously opposing everything that is done for the county.

Mr. BAXTER: I would advise my hon. friend not to worry. If the wharf should not be built there, surely he does not think he could induce the Minister of Public Works to put it in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I did not say I could.

Mr. BAXTER: My proposition is that if the minister would put an item in the supplementary estimates we would vote for it.

Mr. SPENCE: It has been stated either by the minister or my hon. friend on the other side of the House that this coal mine would not pay unless we had boats of large dimensions coming in. I presume this is an endeavour to insert the thin end of the wedge, and next time we will have to spend ten or fifteen thousand dollars in dredging, to allow the larger boats to come in.

Mr. CHISHOLM: No.

Mr. SPENCE: I do not think there was a range of a hundred yards along the whole Atlantic coast where the government did not provide last year to build a wharf. I remember it well. It was the same thing this year. It seems to me there is not a quarter of a mile along the coast where the government is not providing for a wharf. What is the object? To keep them in power all the time?

Mr. PRESTON: Is it a fact that the principal stockholders in this coal company are members of this House and members of the Senate of Canada?

[Mr. Chisholm.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have no information to that effect. I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. PRESTON: Perhaps the hon. member for Inverness might tell us.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Would my hon. friend expect me to give him all the information with respect to my private business or anything else? Would he like me to ask him a similar question? He can find out if he is anxious to do so. It is known as the Chimney Corner Coal Company.

Mr. PRESTON: It is understood in some sections that the colleagues of my hon. friend own the stock in this company, and that they are endeavouring to have public money spent to build a wharf with a view of having large improvements. I understand they want the money spent to build a wharf, in order that they may sell the property.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I may satisfy my hon. friend by telling him that they have no intention of selling the property. It is not for sale, and my hon. friend's informants should get a little better acquainted with the circumstances of the company. They are not trying to sell.

Mr. PRESTON: I am trying to get information.

Item agreed to.

Comeau's Cove—breakwater improvement, $4,900.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What happened at Comeau's Cove?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This item is to build a new cribwork block on the harbour side of the breakwater and a native timber, stone-filled crib. It is to protect the local fishing fleet. The existing work consists of a breakwater built in 1914-15. I think that covers the structure to date.

Item agreed to.

Digby—repairs and renewals to pier, $2,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is to be done this year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Renewals of floors, fenders and freight shed repairs. It is annual repair work necessary on account of great and constant wear and tear.

Item agreed to.

Dartmouth—pier, $120,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is a large item. What is the present position?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is for the construction of a pier 661 feet long, consisting of stone with gravel approaches. The work is under contract to the Halifax Dredging Company and the Standard Construction Company. The amount of the contract is $135,659.54. The probable expenditure for 1923-24 is $25,000. There is a re-vote of $50,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the other figure must be wrong.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That was the probable expenditure when the estimates were being made up. The actual expenditure was $22,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How can that be in view of these figures?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): You have inspection fees as well, and then expenditure for the site, $6,802.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the vote of $120,000 going to clean up the whole matter?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I hope this is not a place where the wharf is going to be carried away by storms.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Halifax is a protected harbour.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No trouble up there at all?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think not.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is this entirely new work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What constituency?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Halifax.

Item agreed to.

East Bay—wharf repairs, $1,600.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Any storms there?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No; this is a renewal of stringers, guard rail covering, and so forth, which are in a decayed condition.

Item agreed to.

East River—repairs to lock, $3,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the occasion for that work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): To repair the lock walls, which the district engineer states are badly disintegrating and may fall into the lock and block navigation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The $4,000 spent last year was to do similar work. What has happened in the meantime?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The repairs were not completed last year. This work is of concrete, there has been a very considerable disintegration, and the engineer recommends that if the work is to be saved these repairs must be made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much money was spent last year?

Mr. KING Kootenay: We spent $4,096.35.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I point out to my hon. friend that the whole of the money that was to be sufficient to repair this work last year has been spent. Now, what has happened?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is additional work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I know; but what has happened to bring about this very bad state of affairs when $4,000 was to put the work in proper condition last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is additional work required this year. The undertaking cost nearly $400,000, and a repair of $4,000 would not be very great.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the same thing be required next year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I cannot say.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should think the minister can say if he has the engineer's report before him.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, that could not be reported at this time. The report from the district engineer covers the requirement for this year. By next November or December we will probably be getting a further report on this work. It is a large work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course it is a large work. It must follow that the minister should know whether further repairs are under contemplation or not. Last year $4,000 was not enough to look after the necessary repairs, although, so far as my memory goes, it was considered sufficient. There has been no storm to interfere with the lock since. The whole trouble we are told was that the work was large and the engineer did not completely cover the repairs. Now I ask the minister does this $3,000 cover it, or is he coming back next year for another $3,000 or $4,000?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am asking parliament to vote what the engineer considers necessary to take care of the repairs this year. The work is of concrete. This concrete is disintegrating, and when disintegration sets in in concrete it is difficult to say what repairs will be necessary year by year. My hon. friend is well versed in that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does this sum cover all the repairs necessary to look after the concrete that has disintegrated?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is what the engineer has asked for this year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am asking, Mr. Chairman, whether this sum will cover all repairs for concrete that is disintegrating.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No one can tell you that at the present time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has any disintegration evidenced itself that it is not now intended to repair?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not had a report on that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does the report say?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I read the report: This amount of $3,000 is required to repair the lock walls, which the district engineer states are badly disintegrating, and may fall in the lock and block navigation if not repaired. That is the district engineer's reason for the expenditure. As to further disintegration, I have not any report, and it is impossible to say that this will be the only amount required for years to come.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am asking if this sum is sufficient to cover the repairs for this year.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We will probably have a report on this work at the end of the season suggesting the requirements for next year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where has this happened?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is a lock between Pictou and New Glasgow. Two ferries operate daily between these towns, and a large number of boats use the channel. This lock was built as part of a general river improvement project carried out from 1908 to 1918. A contract was let for this work in 1913.

Mr. EVANS: What is the cause of the disintegration—bad work in the beginning?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is the effect of salt water.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. EVANS: I did not know salt water would have that effect.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, it has a very serious effect on concrete.

Item agreed to.

Eastern Harbour—improvements, $42,000.

Mr. SPENCE: Do we derive any real benefit from the expenditure of this money? How is it that $38,000 was voted last year and now we have an item of $42,000?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The contract was entered into last year late in the season, but it was difficult to get tenders at that time and very little was done; about $6,000 or $7,000 was expended. This is to continue the contract.

Mr. DOUCET: To whom has the contract been awarded?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): New Glasgow Dredging Company.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In what county is Eastern Harbour situated?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Inverness.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Will this vote complete the work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. LEWIS: What is the nature of the improvements?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Dredging a channel into the harbour.

Item agreed to.

French Village—rebuilding wharf, $3,700.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where is French Village?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In the constituency of Halifax. The vote is to rebuild the pile work of a portion of the wharf, 150 by 25 feet. The district engineer on January, 12, 1924, says that the proposed work is of an urgent nature. The wharf is the only one in that vicinity and is used by the residents to land freight brought by vessels from Halifax, also for the export of fish, cordwood, lumber, and so on.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is there any revenue from this wharf?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Item agreed to.

Friar's Head—harbour improvements, $1,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the nature of the work there?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): $500 to complete payment on contract for the extension of breakwater; $1,000 for the removal of large boulders and ledge rock at the approach to the harbour.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the $4,200 spent for last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The contract last year was for the raising of 105 feet of the breakwater to a further height of 3 feet and the construction of a new section 60 feet in length.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will this complete the work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is nothing more asked for?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not at present.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where is Friar's Head?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In the county of Inverness.

Item agreed to.

Great Village—wharf replacement, $3,500.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Will the minister explain the nature of this work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This work is in the constituency of Colchester. It is to construct a wharf to replace the old structure, which was in a dilapidated condition and was entirely wrecked by a severe storm in October, 1923.

Item agreed to.

Grand Narrows—wharf extension, $2,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How was it we did no work there last year? Is there the same lack of necessity now that there was in 1923-24 as evidenced by the action of the department?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The engineer states that there was difficulty in getting delivery of creosoted timber; that the cost was excessive and he was convinced that a postponement of the expenditure for one year would be advisable.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was his estimate of the cost?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): $2,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the price he indicated as excessive?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He did not state the amount; he simply said that the price was excessive and that he considered it inadvisable to proceed with the work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the present information?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He says that since last summer a new view of the creosote situation has arisen. The plans of Creosote Products Limited of Toronto indicate that they will establish creosote works at Newcastle, New Brunswick, and New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, and the probability is they will be able to supply all the creosoted materials required for these and other works at much more reasonable figures than those received during the past year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where is Grand Narrows?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Cape Breton North and Victoria.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is this work done by tender and contract?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think it is done by day labour.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers generally—repairs and improvements, $55,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much was spent last year under that vote?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): $57,926.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was that work done by tender or by day labour?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Mostly by day labour. The amounts are small, varying from $30 to $1,400.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is to take care of unforeseen expenditures in the way of repairs and so on?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is there any report covering the various items, or is it just a lump sum put in to take care of repairs that crop up from time to time?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A sum put in to take care of repairs that become necessary from time to time.

Item agreed to.

Irish Cove—wharf repairs, $3,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What has happened in Irish Cove?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are replacing the native timber piling in the wharf there with creosoted timber. The native timber has been badly eaten by teredo and the early destruction of the wharf would be inevitable if this piling was not replaced with creosoted timber.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When was that wharf put in?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In 1920 the piling was put in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that a wharf that was put in in 1920 is already so far gone that we have to put in new timber?

Mr. KING (Kootenay: That might easily happen if we have the teredo in that vicinity. The native timber which has not been treated may not last a year under those conditions.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In what county is Irish Cove?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Cape Breton South.

Little Bass River—repairs to channel protection work, $1,200.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where is that?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In Colchester county.

Lunenburg—dredging, $51,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where is Lunenburg?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In the constituency of Lunenburg. It is an important fishing harbour.

Mr. LEWIS: Does this dredging have to be done annually? I see there was a vote for $40,000 last year.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There has not been any dredging done there for some years, and there is a considerable amount of it to be done.

Mr. LEWIS: There was some done last year.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. DOUCET: By contract or day labour?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): By contract.

Mr. DOUCET: Who had the contract last year?

[Mr. J. H. King.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The Acadia Contractors Limited.

Mr. DOUCET: Have they got the contract also for this further expenditure?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is to complete their contract.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But is that quite right? The whole vote last year, for $40,000, has been spent apparently. What authority had the government to enter into a contract for more then the $40,000 voted last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The amount of the contract was $81,840.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to find out definitely what the practice of the department is. It may be there is some use in considering estimates; it may be there is none at all; it may be the minister is entirely a law unto himself. But here is a vote for $40,000, which so far as I know, and so far as is shown in the estimates, is the sole justification for entering into a contract. Now we are told that a contract has been entered into, not for $40,000, but for $81,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is not unusual to vote a sum for a contract, and then to increase the contract and come to parliament next year for an additional amount to complete. The advantage in letting the larger contract would be the opportunity of getting a lower price than if a smaller quantity was moved. The contract price is considered fair and reasonable by the department, and we are asking for this vote to complete the contract.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely the minister can see the result of it all. Last year there was doubtless the usual discussion as to the necessity for dredging at this point, and we were doubtless told that dredging should be done to the extent of $40,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think the whole contract was discussed last year. I have the information here, but cannot find it at the moment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would be interested to know if that was the fact.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The minister last year stated that the estimated cost of dredging would be $103,000, and that the work would be done by tender, so the House was advised at that time that the expenditure would be larger than the vote then asked.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is this to complete the balance of the dredging at the harbour?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is to complete the contract.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is it contemplated there will be further dredging necessary there?

Mr. DUFF: We hope so; it needs it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am not in a position to say, but there are requests from the engineering department for further dredging at Lunenburg.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the dredging being done for greater area or greater depth?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is to provide an area where the ships may lie during the winter season when they return from the banks and crowd into the harbour. At the present time there is not sufficient mooring space for the ships when they come home.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then it is for extra space?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Dredging the channel and around the piers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What depth is the channel being dredged?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Eighteen feet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is, the channel to the pier?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are we troubled with silting there?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, there is some silt from the sea wash.

Item agreed to.

Malagash—dredging, $22,700.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What about this case?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This work is necessary in order to permit steamers to enter into the harbour to receive cargoes of salt. Important salt discoveries have been made at this point, and by opening up the channel steamers will be able to come in and receive cargoes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where is this?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In Cumberland county.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What did we spend last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Practically nothing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the reason for the change? Why did we not go on last year and why are we going on this year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The contract was entered into last fall, and it was impossible to get the plant then.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To whom has the contract been let, and for what amount?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It was let on October 4, 1923, to the Fraser Paving and Construction Company Limited for the dredging of approximately 23,920 cubic yards, at $2.35 for class A material, and 90 cents for class B.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does that mean?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Class A is rock, and class B is gravel, sand, clay and other material.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is the work being undertaken this year greater in extent than was proposed last year? The contract last year was only for $15,700.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are asking for $22,700 this year, of which $15,700 is a revote. We know better now what the cost will be. We have had tenders since we asked for the vote last year, and the lowest tender was for $22,000 odd.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): But it is for exactly the same work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Item agreed to.

McKay's Point—wharf repairs, $2,700.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is new.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is for the construction of the outer part of this wharf and to put in about twenty new stringers. It is not new work, it is reconstruction.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Where is McKay's Point?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In Cape Breton North and Victoria.

Item agreed to .

Merigomish—wharf repairs, $1,400.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Where is this?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In Pictou county.

Item agreed to.

Meteghan—wharf extension, $6,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the object of this extension?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is in Yarmouth and Clare.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is entirely a revote. Has the contract been let?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Tenders were received and the order in council was passed in September, 1923, for this work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the amount of the contract?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The contract was for $5,673.

Item agreed to.

New Harris—wharf, $8,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much was spent last year on that?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We did not expend any money there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the reason for the increase from $5,000 to $8,000?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The engineer increased his estimate by $3,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, but what was the reason of the increase? Is he committing us to more work, or was his first estimate hopelessly out?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The other estimate evidently was too low.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is his explanation; what does he say in his report?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Last year apparently he found cresosoted timber very high and had his estimates too low. He figures this year that his creosoted timber, 10,300 cubic feet, will cost $4,120. Then he is using more native timber which he estimates will cost $2,400. And there is the purchase of right of way, filling, and contingencies, making a total of $8,000.

Mr. LEWIS: Is the precaution taken to see that all native timber is creosoted in a proper manner before it is put in?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are using creosoted timber a great deal more than formerly.

Mr. LEWIS: Is it the practice to creosote all native timber?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We use some native timber.

[Mr. J. H. King.]

Mr. LEWIS: Without creosoting it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is $2,400 worth in this item for example?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. LEWIS: It seems to me that since experience has shown that timber deteriorates very rapidly, sometimes in the space of two or three years, the precaution should be taken to see that all timber placed in wharves, and similar structures, is creosoted.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The creosoted timber is used more under water, whereas the native timber is used above and on the inside of the work.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is this new work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What is the purpose of it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): To enable the subsidized steamer which passes daily during the season to call for freight, passengers and so forth. The district contains a scattered farming population. The nearest public wharf at present is at New Campbellton, six miles distant.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What county is it in?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Cape Breton North and Victoria.

Item agreed to.

North Ingonish (McLeod's)—reconstruction of breakwater and dredging, $34,700.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There has been nothing at all done here has there?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the minister will tell us what happened to this matter since he got the vote of $34,700 last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The delay is due to the lateness of the season when the contract was let. There was no work undertaken there in 1923-24.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To whom was the contract let?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): To Thomas D. Morrison.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the amount?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The amount is $21,572.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why is the vote as large as it is?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is dredging to be done in addition to the wharf.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the $21,572 is just for the wharf?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the estimate for dredging?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): About $11,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To what depth will the dredging be carried and what will be the width?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There will be 10,500 cubic yards of stone and gravel and also 5,000 of sand and boulders to be dredged inside the breakwater. I do not have the depth in my notes.

Mr. DOUCET: Would the minister say in what riding this work is?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Cape Breton North and Victoria.

Mr. DOUCET: About what time were tenders called for this work last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The order in council was passed in November, 1923.

Mr. DOUCET: Calling for tenders?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, awarding tenders. Tenders would be called probably in October.

Mr. DOUCET: This is a revote of last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. DOUCET: Is there any valid reason why the tenders were not called earlier?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The supply came rather late in the department. This is one of the many works that were up for consideration and plans had to be prepared. I imagine the work was expedited as rapidly as possible.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why does the minister say supply was late last year? Supply was voted by the 1st July.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It will be late this year for public works.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It was passed before this last year, was it not?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Supply is always voted late for public works, much to the detriment of the activities of the department. Work cannot be advanced until supply is granted. The result is that many of these works are not undertaken and contracts not awarded until the following spring. That is why many of the works go over until the spring of the following year.

Mr. DOUCET: Supplies must evidently have been called in the past for North Ingonish on the same day as for Lunenburg.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. DOUCET: The department had their supplies presented sufficiently early last year to spend $40,000 in Lunenburg, and we could not get the work done in North Cape Breton and Ingonish. There are a few items that appertain to North Cape Breton and Victoria which it might have been very nice and convenient to have in the estimates last year, but which were not expended. Speaking as one of the members from that section, I hope the minister will find his way clear to see that the expenditures are made this year.

Item agreed to.

North West Cove (Tancook)—breakwater, wharf extansion, $8,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this a new work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is an extension to an old work. The extension is required in order to provide adequate landing facilities at this point, also for the protection of 133 boats which fish from this place.

Item agreed to.

Port Greville—breakwater reconstruction, $40,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the present condition of this work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is for reconstruction of the breakwater. In 1923-24, there was an appropriation of $24,000 and an expenditure made of $11,908. This breakwater was badly damaged by a storm and unusually heavy ice last year, which necessitated the rebuilding of practically the entire structure. Sixty feet of the shore-ward section was reconstructed during the year 1923-24. The breakwater protects the harbour, and without the breakwater it would very shortly become unnavigable.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The vote in 1923-24 was $24,000. The revote is $10,000, while the total vote now is $40,000. That would look as if we had spent $14,000 last year.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We did not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then there is a larger revote than the figures show.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): When the Estimates were being made up, it was assumed that there would be an expenditure of $14,000, but the actual expenditure was $11,908.19.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that when we are voting $40,000, it is not $40,000 in addition to $14,000 already spent?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is how it would appear on these estimates. I just point that out because it is misleading. What is the reason for the increase of $16,000?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Additional damage was done by the storm and unusually heavy ice last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was the work that cost $11,908 injured?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the name of the contractor?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The work was done by day labour.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the explanation of having work done on a job of this size by day labour?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We started to do this work by contract and we prepared to enter into a contract when this storm occurred. That changed the whole situation as regards contracting, and there were many extras in addition. The department decided to make the expenditure themselves and a contract was not entered into. For this year we are asking for tenders for the completion of the work.

Item agreed to.

Port Hood—wharf repairs, $5,800.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We had this matter up last year and all that was necessary was $8,600. That was spent. What has happened since?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A contract was entered into with the Sydney Construction Company for $7,796. In August a further contract for extension was entered into to provide a new block to be placed at a distance of 18 feet from the end of the old work. It is reported that this appears to be due to the falling in of material from the sides which prevented an even or level bearing for the block. As a result it was found necessary to construct a connecting block 29 feet in length. This work was authorized August 28, 1923, as an extra to the contract.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The original contract was $7,400.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It was $7,798.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It was within the vote?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: While that contract was being carried out, if I understand the minister correctly, an undisclosed condition developed and it was found necessary to make another contract. Why was it not dealt with by Governor General's warrant? Why is it brought in here?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That has never been the practice.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The act is perfectly clear. I would again suggest that the minister should have a talk with the Auditor General. We have an Auditor General now and he might be used.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are coming before parliament and asking parliament to vote the amount now. The contract is being carried on at the present time. I am sure this is more satisfactory to parliament than issuing a Governor General's warrant.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not satisfactory to parliament to have votes brought down that we cannot do anything with, when the minister says to us, "The money is all gone and it has to be paid".

Mr. KING (Kootenay): What would be the position in the case of a Governor General's warrant? It would be in the same position exactly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then there would be a responsibility for it; and, in its turn, it has to be sanctioned by parliament and put in the proper place.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Exactly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is an improper way of doing it. Has this money been paid?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It cannot be paid until it is voted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course not. The position is that when it is done in this way the matter is hung up.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Parliament still has control. If it were done by Governor General's warrant the money would have been paid.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How idle to say that parliament still has control! Parliament is supposed to have some sense of decency. It is nonsense to say that parliament has control, and the hon. minister knows that it is nonsense. Any self-respecting parliament would not want a contractor to lose the money. Is the government going to make a practice of this?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think my hon. friend is hardly fair when he says it is not the proper practice. As a matter of fact it is the proper practice and this practice has been followed for many years. My hon. friend says that when it was found necessary to have an extension of the contract we should have obtained a Governor General's warrant. I do not think that procedure would be endorsed by this House. I think we have adopted the proper method. We asked for a certain amount last year and let the contract. During the contract certain conditions developed that required the letting of further work in order that the job might be properly done. That has been done and we come to parliament with this explanation asking for a vote. I quite disagree with my hon. friend when he says that has not been the practice. It has been the practice for many years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I never said it had not been the practice. I still say that it is an improper practice. The government does not like signing Governor General's warrants. It is a check on the extravagance of governments. It is supposed to be the only way in which no regard could be paid to the vote of parliament. It is supposed that money can only be paid out of the treasury when it is sanctioned by vote of parliament. Apparently the practice is to depart from that supposition. That is one of the reasons why I always advocated a pre-audit system. If you depart from the pre-audit system there is no check on the department and there is no help for the treasury; but I realize that it is no good talking to my hon. friend, and the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is not here.

Item agreed to.

Port Lorne—breakwater extension, $8,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is this for?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): To construct a cribwork extension 50 feet long by 40 feet wide and 32 feet high to existing breakwater. This work is under contract with the Reid Construction Company of Granville Ferry, N.S. Owing to the lateness of the season when the contract was let it is not expected that any work will be done during 1923-24. The vote last year was $9,600 and this year $8,000. Tenders were received, the lowest tender being $7,166. This would be the amount required for completion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the expenditure last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): $7,166.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How could we have spent that large amount last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We did not spend it all last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will $8,000 complete everything?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, that will complete the work.

Item agreed to.

Port Medway—to purchase and extend wharf, $6,100.

Mr. BAXTER: How much of a wharf could be built for that sum? Is this wharf in Lunenburg county?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, in Shelburne and Queens.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister explain just what the wharf is needed for, who owns it, when the suggestion for purchase came, and how far the negotiations proceeded.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was a petition signed by some sixty-three residents calling attention to the public wharf at Port Medway, especially on behalf of the merchants and fishermen. They complained that they had not a wharf or a dock to lay a vessel to. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) visited this district in 1923, and he confirmed the statements as set out by the petitioners. During the storm of January 4, 1923, the old wharf was completely wrecked. There are certain industries located at this point. The Nova Scotia Wood, Pulp and Paper Company have mills at Charleston on Medway river, seven miles west from Port Medway. Their yearly output is 5,000 tons valued at $40 per ton.

Mr. MARTELL: Is that the wharf used by the McLeod, McCurdy combination?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not know. There is a letter here stating that a public wharf is urgently required at this point. There is no place where the packet ship from Halifax may discharge her cargo, and there is enough business to be carried on at this point to justify the construction of a wharf.

Mr. BAXTER: How far has the minister got with the negotiations for the purchase of this wharf from private interests?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No purchase has been made yet. There is an estimate by the department that the site will cost $2,500.

Mr. BAXTER: . Is that to be expropriated?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It will depend on whether the owner agrees to a price which the department considers fair and reasonable.

Mr. BAXTER: Who is the owner?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): J. N. Wilde.

Mr. BAXTER: How big will the wharf be?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It will be 225 feet long by 25 to 90 feet wide. The extension will be pile work 40 feet long by 90 feet wide.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many other wharfs are there at this point?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The pulp company have a wharf near there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there a wharf on this site at the present time?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is an old wharf.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are there any others?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not to my knowledge.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the size of the other wharf that is mentioned?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have no information regarding the pulp wharf.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the complaints against the man who runs this wharf? Why is it thought better to have the government purchase the wharf?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The present wharf is not being maintained, and to-day the public are without any accommodation at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is not the other wharf which you are buying available for the general public?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It was, but it is not being maintained by Mr. Wilde, and to-day it is not safe for use.

[Mr. J. H. King.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the record of the business done over it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have no information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the minister know if Wilde made any dock charges or not?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have no information. During the storm last year a steamer was lying at this wharf, which became more or less wrecked, endangering the steamer and causing considerable expense and delay.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the date of Mr. Fielding's visit?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): His letter submitting the petition of the residents is dated February, 1923. In May and October of the same year he wrote strongly urging the necessity of wharfage accommodation.

Item agreed to.

Shelburne—wharf repairs, $1,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the necessity for the extra grant there when we already have the contract of last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are renewing the guard timbers and placing new mooring posts and rings.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What did we spend $5,000 for the year before?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In 1923-1924 there was a renewal of the top at an expenditure of $4,478.39. This is to complete the work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was that by tender?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, by day labour.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not suppose the minister misled the House last year when he said that the work would be done for $4,500. The estimate proved $1,500 too low?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Quite right.

Item agreed to.

Ship Harbour—wharf, $4,100.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is new work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was an estimate for this work last year, for "wharf repairs at Ship Harbour." The word "repairs" was inserted in error, as the appropriation was clearly for the construction of a wharf as explained by the minister at page 4586 of Hansard. The minister then said:

Ship Harbour is in Halifax county. The estimated cost is the amount of the vote. It is to construct a pilework wharf 80 feet long and 20 feet wide with an ell 20 feet by 30 feet. The purpose is to provide shipping accommodation for the residents of Ship Harbour and the surrounding districts by shortening the haul from the mills to the now only available wharf by a distance of about 4½ miles, over a very hilly road. It is a farming and fishing district.

Last year there was an error in setting out the vote in the estimates. It is construction, not repair, so we are asking for the vote this year. The work was not done last year.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What representations have been made asking for this work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That information is given in the explanation which I just read.

Mr. MARTELL: I have had an opportunity of visiting that section of country and it is one of the finest harbours in the world. The people there have no facilities for carrying on their business. If the hon. member could only come down to Nova Scotia I would be glad to arrange to take him on an automobile drive of ninety or a hundred miles in Hants county which would show him the beauty of that part of the country.

Item agreed to.

Tiverton—breakwater extension, $14,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: I see this is a revote. Are most of these revotes due to the fact that supply was voted too late last year to get the work done?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Largely, yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: In view of the statement made by the minister a short time ago I suggest that the House should meet earlier in the season. There are several reasons for that. One is, as the minister has said, that supply is voted so late that it is impossible to carry on this work, and it is just possible that the construction of a good deal of this new work from year to year has been due to the fact that work began too late in the fall owing to the late voting of supply. Then there is another important reason: A great many hon. members would rather be in session here during the winter than during the summer. I urge strongly upon the government that the estimates be brought down earlier in the session and that the session be called earlier in the year.

Item agreed to.

Walton—breakwater repairs, $1,800.

Mr. GOULD: I would ask a question generally about these breakwaters. I understand there is a deep tide there, and I wondered what height above the natural water these breakwaters were.

Mr. MARTELL: Before the minister answers I may say to my hon. friend that he is speaking on the item relating to Walton, which is in the county of Hants. Walton is the home of my ablest opponent in the last election, Mr. Parsons. I have nothing against him personally. He and I are close personal friends, though we do not step with the same foot politically. If $15,000 or $20,000 was being voted for this purpose I would support it, because as a matter of fact I asked for 150 per cent more than what is provided in these votes for ordinary repairs. In all the districts where these votes are given the majority of the people are neither Liberal nor Progressive, but Conservative; nevertheless when it comes to a question of the encouragement of industry I believe in taking the necessary steps irrespective of what people carry on that industry or what their political beliefs are. The hon. member (Mr. Gould) probably does not know our section of the country. I would like him to come down there some time and see it, not in the spring when those fogs prevail which are the bane of the people of our province, but when the apple trees are in blossom, when gypsum quarries, of which Mr. Parsons is a great operator, are working, and when the lumbermen are shipping their products. The tides in that section of the country from time to time recede to such an extent as to leave the rivers nothing but beds of mud.

Mr. LEWIS: Is the hon. member in order? We want to get on with the business. We do not want to be here forever.

Mr. MARTELL: The hon. member (Mr. Gould) referred to the height of the wharf above the tides. If my hon. friend (Mr. Lewis) is a landlubber he had better be patient. If hon. members would come down to my part of the country they would be in a position to criticise, adversely or otherwise—

Mr. CALDWELL: We are trying to pass the item.

Mr. MARTELL: No, you are trying to obstruct it.

Mr. GOULD: I merely rose to ask for information, and the question is not yet answered.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I understood that the hon. member (Mr. Martell), who has knowledge of the locality, had given the information. The height of the wharf is 24 feet; that would be from the bottom sill up. I do not know the extent of the tides there, but I suppose the top would be four or five feet above high water.

Mr. GOULD: Have the engineers taken into consideration the pressure of the tides and have they made an estimate of what the total cost would be to complete the work so as to make it permanent in its character at these various points and render unnecessary these haphazard votes year in and year out?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They are not haphazard; the works are all carefully gone into by the engineer in charge. Many of these works are timber and stone cribwork which are subject to decay and deterioration. There will be annual repairs. My hon. friend, I think, has in mind the hope of permanent construction, something that will wipe out these annual votes. Permanent construction on our coast line, with the present population, would be a very formidable task to undertake. We find that in view of the character of the works and the service they are supposed to render the manner in which we are carrying on these works is the most economical one.

Mr. MARTELL: If my hon. friend from Assiniboia would come down there he would find it is absolutely impossible, unless you spend millions and millions of dollars, to make a permanent structure along the Avon river and in Minas Basin. We have there the highest tides in the world, and you may dredge around the wharves to make berths for the vessels, but in the winter season the water freezes and afterwards you have these immense tides that carry the mud right back again, so it is practically a continuous task to keep these harbours clear.

Mr. CALDWELL: How high is the tide, thirty-six feet?

Mr. MARTELL: Up to sixty feet. My hon. friend has evidently not been over that portion of the country, but as usual he is a sailor, a marine engineer, a dredger, and a lawyer too.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask if the House is sitting to-morrow? It is Dominion Day, and I think we ought to recognize that as a holiday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I announced in the House a few days ago that it was the intention to sit on Dominion Day, and no objection was taken. I doubt if there is any better way in which we could observe the holiday.

Mr. IRVINE: Then why not observe them all that way? I do not see why we should disregard our country's birthday, our own particular holiday.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think myself it is a mistake for us to be sitting on Dominion Day. The Prime Minister did mention it on Friday, immediately after the opening of the House. I did not catch it myself, or I would have objected then. Dominion Day is perhaps the most outstanding holiday of the year, the commemoration of the birth of this country. We are, I know, pressing to get through the work of the session at this period, but it seems too bad to be observing every manner of holiday as a holiday all through the session, and then to ignore altogether the one that really means more to our country than perhaps any other.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit we are not ignoring the holiday in attending to the country's business. In Great Britain the House of Commons sees fit to sit on the King's birthday and on other days that are set apart as holidays. I am inclined to think the country will back up our position very strongly to attend to the country's business on the holiday.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would object less to sitting on the 24th of May than to sitting on the anniversary of the birth of our own country. It seems to me it is overdoing it to be sitting then. If that is not ignoring the holiday, there is no other way of ignoring a holiday that I know of.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When we were sitting in the Museum in 1919 the session lasted, if my memory serves me right, until the 10th of July, and we sat on Dominion Day. I have sitting beside me the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Sinclair), now occupying the treasury benches, and he remembers very well that the House sat on that day, and the session was prolonged until the 10th of July. If that was right when my right hon. friend was leading the government, or when he was one of the real leaders of the government, I do not see why it should be wrong to-day.

Mr. LEWIS: Do the civil servants get a holiday to-morrow if the House sits? I think they ought to get the holiday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. SHAW: Although it does inconvenience a great many of us, particularly the members from the West, I do think we should observe the 1st of July. Of all days of the year I think it is the most important, and if Canada ever means anything to us I think parliament should set a standard in that regard.

Mr. MARTELL: I am absolutely in accord with the right hon. leader of the opposition and with the hon. members for Calgary. Surely if we have a birthday in this country we should observe it. We keep all manner of holidays in this country, as the leader of the opposition has said, and we sit night and morning to make up for them. For heaven's sake, let us have some pride in our country and observe Dominion Day.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

Tuesday, July 1, 1924.

The House met at three o'clock.

HOME BANK INVESTIGATION

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND COMMERCE

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): In the absence of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) I beg to present the eleventh report of the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce as follows:

Your committee have had under consideration the order of reference from this honourable House, dated 31st March, 1924 which reads as follows:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, in view of the failure of the Home Bank, and of the fact that official prosecutions and inquiries have been instituted, including the Royal Commission which has been appointed to investigate the facts alleged in the petition represented by the depositors of the bank and the affairs of the bank generally; and considering that the evidence received and to be taken before the several tribunals will be available for consideration, the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce should be instructed to consider the provisions of the Bank Act with a view to recommending such amendments to the act as will better protect the interests of depositors generally and will prevent similar occurrences in the future; and also to consider the report of the Royal Commission in its bearing upon these matters and with respect to the possiblity of saving the Home Bank depositors from loss," be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for such action as the committee may deem advisable.

And also the order of reference dated 11th June, 1924, reading as follows:—

"That the Interim Report of the Royal Commission respecting the Home Bank be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce."

Your committee have sat from time to time, and have studied the interim report on the Home Bank submitted by Mr. Chief Justice McKeown and the evidence therein referred to.

Your committee consider that the facts therein brought out and the evidence therein referred to clearly establish that the depositors of the Home Bank have no claim under the law of the land for compensation by the country on account of any loss they may suffer by reason of the failure of the Home Bank.

But your committee are also of the opinion that in view of the representations made to the Department of Finance in the years 1916 and 1918, the government of the time could have made in 1916 and in 191 an effective audit under Section 56-A of the Bank Act and if such an effective audit or thorough investigation into the bank's affairs had been made it would have resulted:—

1. In the immediate liquidation of the bank, or
2. Its amalgamation with another bank, and that the effect yould have been, no loss to the depositors in 1916 or 1918.

Your committee have studied the evidence given before the Royal Commission by Sir Thomas White, who was then Minister of Finance, and particularly his statements: "I would never think of putting in a special auditor in a bank and taking chances, especially at a time like that, of closing the bank," (page 345); and further: "Under no circumstances would I have allowed a bank to fail during the period in question. I had many difficult and dangerous financial situations to deal with during the war. At its outbreak, in view of the panic which prevailed, the government, at my instance, placed itself behind the banks of Canada and gave public assurance that it would loan them such sums as they might require to meet the conditions of the war, and would take all further steps necessary to safeguard the financial situation during its continuance" (page 359); and further: "The action I took was in my discretion; in exercising his discretion, a minister must have regard to conditions, because conditions have a direct bearing upon the consequences attendant on his action to the bank and the general situation. If you make a mistake in putting in an auditor, in peace time the consequences may be a run producing little effect upon the bank; if in war time, you may bring down the bank and, in addition, you may cause an unspeakable calamity to the country." (page 743).

Your committee is not called upon to question the manner in which Sir Thomas White made use of the powers given to him, or whether he exercised his discretion correctly or otherwise.

Your committee consider that the facts brought out in the interim report submitted by Mr. Chief Justice McKeown, and the evidence therein referred to, establish that the depositors of the Home Bank have a moral claim in equity for compensation by the country on account of any loss they may suffer by reason of the failure of the Home Bank.

THOMAS VIEN,
Chairman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the report concurred in by all the members of the committee?

Mr. MARLER: It is a majority report of the committee.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. W. G. RAYMOND (Brantford) presented the second and final report of the special committee appointed to make inquiry into an old age pension system for Canada, as follows:

The Special Committee appointed to inquire into an old age pension system for Canada has the honour to present the following as its second and final report:

Your committee has inquired into the systems which are in operation in England, Australia, New Zealand and certain other countries, examined witnesses, carefully considered their suggestions, and compared the information obtained from thirty-one municipalities throughout Canada, in reply to a questionnaire sent to one hundred and thirty-five mayors of cities and towns in every province.

This question has been before this House at different times since 1907, but no definite recommendation was made by any of the committees to which it was referred.

After careful consideration of the information obtained from the sources enumerated, your committee respectfully recommends:

1. That an old age pension system be established at the earliest possible date for deserving indigent persons to seventy (70) years of age and upwards.

2. That applicants for pension must be British subjects of at least twenty (20) years' residence in Canada, or naturalized subjects of at least fifteen (15) years' naturalization and twenty-five (25) years' residence.

3. (a) That the maximum rate of pension be twenty ($20) dollars per month which will be lessened by private income or partial ability to earn:

(b) That one-half the amount of pension payable be borne by the federal government; the other half, by the provincial governments of such provinces as express by legislation their desire to adopt the system —the cost of administration to be borne by the provincial governments.

Your committee has estimated that under such a system there would be approximately 98,841 eligible pensioners, and that if all of these were to receive the maximum rate of pension, namely, twenty ($20) dollars per month, the federal government's portion of the total yearly expenditure would amount to $11,860,920. This amount, however, would be reduced by any private income or partial earnings.

Your committee further recommends that the government communicate with the various provincial governments to ascertain if they are disposed to adopt the above system and enact the necessary legislation.

Your committee also begs to recommend that its proceedings together with the evidence taken, be printed as an appendix to the journals of this House.

For the information of the House, a copy of the proceedings and evidence, a synopsis of the communications received from the municipalities, and a statement of the expectation of life prepared by the Department of Insurance, are appended to this report.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

W. G. RAYMOND,
Chairman.

Mr. CRERAR: Is that a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. RAYMOND: It is a unanimous report of the members present at the final meeting; all the members of the committee were not in attendance.

CROWSNEST PASS AGREEMENT

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a petition from George Pateman and sixty-six others praying that the Crowsnest pass rates be not further suspended or abrogated. This petition comes from Marquette constituency.

BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX ACT, 1916, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, that The Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, and amendments, shall be construed and have effect and be deemed to have had effect since its enactment without lapse or interruption as if section twenty-six thereof when first enacted had provided as follows:—

"The provisions of section three of this act shall not continue in force after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and twenty;" and anything enacted inconsistent therewith shall be deemed to have been superseded amended or repealed, as the circumstances may require, and all taxes, interest and penalties payable under the said act and amendments shall remain a tax owing to His Majesty until fully paid and satisfied.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: If there is unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, I am ready to proceed with the resolution now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I consent, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. IRVINE: I would rather that this resolution be discussed at some other time.

Mr. ROBB: All right.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

PUBLIC SERVICE RETIREMENT ACT EXTENSION

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the operation of the Public Service Retirement Act shall be extended until the thirty-first day of March, 1925, and that the said act shall be deemed not to have expired and ceased to be in force after the first day of July, 1924, but to have continued and to be in force for all purposes thereof whatsoever until the thirty-first day of March, 1925.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution recommends it to the favourable consideration of this House.

Motion agreed to.

VICE ADMIRAL SIR FREDERICK FIELD

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the attention of the government to the following fact, and to address to it the following inquiries in relation thereto:

Recently, at Victoria, B.C., Vice Admiral Sir Frederick Field, the principal speaker at a public luncheon given in honour of the British squadron visiting that city, is reported to have stated that he personally believed that Canada should equip and maintain four cruisers, two of which would be held on the Pacific and two on the Atlantic.

My first question is, whether the government invited this distinguished sailor to give this advice.

In the event of the answer to this question being in the negative, in view of the fact that this country is a loyal supporter of the League of Nations, is anxious to see naval and military expenditure cut to the minimum, is conscious that war has proved a dismal failure as a means of settling international disputes, is convinced that our financial solvency, if not our very civilization itself, depends on the reduction of armaments,—would the government take into consideration the advisability of communicating either directly with the gentleman in question, or through the appropriate officers of the state he serves, to the effect that such pronouncement as that delivered by the Vice Admiral on a matter of purely Canadian national policy is undesirable?

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in reply to my hon. friend, I desire to say that the government did not invite Vice Admiral Field to make any such statement as is attributed to him. The well-recognized principle has always obtained that the question of how much shall be spent by the Canadian people on naval or other services is a matter which rests with the Canadian government and parliament alone. In the past there have been occasions, I believe, when the government of the day has seen fit to invite opinions from the authorities in the Mother Country with respect to naval matters. On this occasion there has been no request for any such opinion or advice. Naturally the statement that is attributed to Vice Admiral Field is one which should not be considered merely upon the basis of a newspaper report, but I shall take steps to verify whether he uttered the statement in question, and then take whatever course may be deemed best in order to assert the well-recognized practice in regard to these matters.

Mr. LANCTOT: Tell him to mind his own business.

STRIKE OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the morning papers contain reports to the effect that the former striking postmen of Toronto still cling to the opinion that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) gave them certain assurances not included in the statement yesterday of the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Stewart). I think the House should have a statement on the subject from the Minister of Labour direct.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in an experience of something like thirty years in dealing with labour disputes I have never seen the press of any city publish such misrepresentations as the press of Toronto have published relative to the postal strike and the settlement thereof. On Sunday last I discussed no question with anyone whatsoever except the one question as to whether all of the strikers at Toronto were to return to duty or only about one thousand for whom there were places.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS—LABOUR

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILDREN AT SEA

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to confirm a certain convention relating to the employment of children at sea, adopted at Genoa on the 9th day of July, 1920, by a general conference of the International Labour Organization of the League of Nations; and to provide that no child under the age of fourteen years shall be employed on any ship except as permitted under such convention; that a list of persons under sixteen years of age so employed, or a register thereof, shall be kept; that penalties be imposed for violation of the proposed legislation; and that the act shall not apply where all the crew are members of the same family, or the child was lawfully employed at the commencement of the act.

Mr. BAXTER: I would like to ask the Minister of Labour whether the expression "children at sea" is intended to refer to the present government?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is prolonging the debate.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure) in the chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister might advise us as to the terms of the convention. If it is not too long I think it should be read and inscribed in Hansard, and if it is too long the minister should say whether it has any other contents except those embodied in the resolution.

Mr. MURDOCK: The object of this draft convention is merely to prohibit the employment of children under the age of fourteen years on vessels engaged in maritime navigation. The provincial school laws in Canada provide for the attendance of youths at school; the factory acts of the several provinces prohibit the employment of children under fourteen in industrial establishments; but there is no provision in the Canada Shipping Act which specifically forbids the employment of children under fourteen, and as it is doubtful if any youths under this age are employed on seagoing vessels from Canadian ports, it was thought that the proposal involved in the draft convention would be regarded as non-contentious. The draft convention has been ratified by Great Britain, Sweden, Roumania, Bulgaria and Esthonia. Ratification has been authorized by Denmark, Finland, Italy, Japan, Holland and Poland. Bills, and so forth, looking to ratification are pending in Spain, Belgium, Germany, Argentine, Chilé, Cuba and Lithuania. Legislation has also been adopted on the subject in Norway and is in preparation in India.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What have the other dominions done in the matter?

Mr. MURDOCK: We have no record of any definite action having been taken by the other dominions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course the United States is not a party?

Mr. MURDOCK: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the United States any law on the subject?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, I understand that they have a law dealing with the same question. I have not a copy of it with me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister know from recollection what its effect is?

Mr. MURDOCK: Its effect is intended to be to prevent the employment of children at sea under fourteen years of age.

Mr. IRVINE: Will this law apply to shipping on the Great Lakes?

Mr. MURDOCK: The intention is to incorporate it into the Canada Shipping Act, and it would apply wherever the Canada Shipping Act applies.

Mr. IRVINE: Does the Canada Shipping Act apply to the Great Lakes?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. CARROLL: With reference to the last two lines of the resolution—

> The act shall not apply where . . . . the child was lawfully employed at the commencement of the act.

Is there any law at present against the employment of children at sea under fourteen years of age?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, I think not.

Mr. CARROLL: So that any child employed at the commencement of this act would be legally employed?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it in accordance with the terms of the original convention that there should be an exception in the case of children now employed under fourteen? It would seem to be an unjust exception.

Mr. MURDOCK: The intent is that no prosecution shall be taken where, upon the coming into force of this act, certain children are at that time so employed. Of course, later there would have to be a compliance with this law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the point I am raising. Suppose a child twelve years of age is employed at sea at the time of the coming into effect of this act; can that child continue so to be employed?

Mr. MURDOCK: I understand not. That is not the intent.

Mr. MANION: The resolution states:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confirm a certain convention relating to the employment of children at sea.

I do not think the minister was very definite in stating that the act would apply to the Great Lakes. It is important to make sure of that, because it would be rather strange to apply the law to ships at sea and not to ships on the Great Lakes. When we are passing a law of this kind we should make it uniform for Canada.

Mr. MURDOCK: The purpose is to incorporate the subject matter of this resolution and of three other resolutions that will be before us for consideration into the Canada Shipping Act, so that it will apply where the Canada Shipping Act applies, which would be, as I understand it, on the Great Lakes as well as on the ocean coasts.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would ask the minister before he brings in the bill to pay special attention to the point raised by the hon. member (Mr. Carroll), because as this reads it seems to make an exception of any case where a child is employed at the time of the coming into effect of the act and to provide that the continuation of that employment shall not be an offence.

Mr. HUGHES: The resolution also provides:

This act shall not apply where all the crew are members of the same family.

In some cases the captain takes his own son with him as a cabin boy, and I do not think that is objectionable, for a part of the year at all events. Perhaps the intention is to train him up and make him a seafaring man later on, and it is a very good training. There might be only one member of the family on board, the captain's own son.

Mr. MARTELL: That is a detail of the bill.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, but it is in the resolution and it may be well to call the minister's attention to it now.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Murdock thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 214, to carry out a certain Convention relating to the Employment of Children at Sea.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

STOKERS AND TRIMMERS—AGE

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confirm a certain draft convention fixing the minimum age for the admission of young persons to employment as trimmers or stokers, adopted at Geneva on the 11th day of November, 1921, by a General Conference of the International Labour Organization of the League of Nations; to provide that any persons under the age of 18 years shall not be employed or work as trimmers or stokers on vessels engaged in maritime navigation excluding ships of war, vessels mainly propelled by other means than steam, and school ships or training ships.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Marcil in the chair.

Mr. IRVINE: I would like to ask the minister if he would be willing to modify the resolution slightly so as to include ships of war as well as merchant ships.

Mr. MURDOCK: I might be perfectly willing to do so but I do not think we could undertake to include that modification here. The draft convention which we are now undertaking to ratify did not take into consideration ships of war, and I fear that if that point was insisted upon the whole matter, so far as our ratification is concerned, would fall.

Mr. HOEY: Canada was represented at the conference, of course?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. IRVINE: I see the point the minister brings out, but I do not see why those who are recommending this convention would object to our carrying out the principle underlying their recommendation a little further than they went themselves. I think they ought to be grateful to us.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not disagreeing with my hon. friend on that point.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is there any valid reason why Canada should not take an independent position in this matter? We could agree with the convention as far as it goes, and the general principle underlying it will be embodied in the bill subsequently to be brought down; but speaking for Canada, and certainly we have that right, we could exempt Canadian children from serving on board ships of war.

Mr. MURDOCK: My understanding is that we would not be considered as ratifying the convention unless we ratified it in the specific terms in which it came to us from the International Labour Conference where it was adopted. On several questions, for instance on the eight-hour day, there has been a disposition on the part of some countries to adopt regulations varying somewhat from the convention that emanated from the first Washington Conference, and the result is that no action has been taken. So, if Canada is to be regarded as ratifying this convention as it came to us from the International Labour Conference of 1920, it has to be done in the specific terms in which it came to us as well as to other countries.

Mr. McMASTER: I would point out to the hon. member for Bow River that what he desires could be readily accomplished by the government just declining to hire as stokers and trimmers on our ships of war any people under the age of eighteen.

Mr. IRVINE: I might point out, for the information of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) that the government could achieve the same purpose by simply resolving not to allow anybody to hire anybody on other ships, without any regulations at all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think I see a glint of sympathy in the eye of the Minister of Labour. I would therefore ask him to consider favourably the introduction of a bill, separate and distinct from the one in which we shall be ratifying this convention, which will set forth the ideas that I think we mutually have in mind.

Mr. MANION: I would ask the minister what is meant by "trimmers" in the resolution.

Mr. MURDOCK: It is not the minister's term, but the minister would understand that a trimmer was in effect a coal passer, one who passes the coal up to the stoker.

Mr. MANION: I took it that it had something to do with the stoking, but in order to avoid complications I would point out that the term "trimmer" is used on the Great Lakes to designate the men who are handling the grain when trimming the ship. We had better avoid mixing terms. and it is a fact that wherever grain is being handled from the elevators to the boats, there are large gangs of men who are hired as trimmers to level the grain and thereby trim the ship.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would suggest to hon. gentlemen to my left that they need not exercise themselves too much about trimmers on our war vessels. They may have some on board under eighteen years of age, but they cannot get very many, and it may be possibly nobody over that age could get on. The real point, surely, is this: War vessels are all owned by the states who are parties to this treaty. Consequently, it is in the power of the government itself to do just what it considers right, and no matter what the law, no government and no people are going to permit themselves to be annihilated rather than put on a boy under eighteen as a trimmer. There is not going to be anybody put on unless under sheer and dire necessity any way.

Mr. GRAHAM: They might be drafted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the point of my hon. friend has any great force. Why is it these conventions are only coming down now for ratification? They are three and four years old.

Mr. MURDOCK: These matters were not dealt with before this government came into office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The convention was only entered into at Geneva in November, 1921.

Mr. MURDOCK: The subject matter of this particular convention was dealt with at the 1920 session of the International Labour Conference.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In 1921, it says.

Mr. MURDOCK: It was originally dealt with in 1920 but was finally adopted in 1921.

[Mr. Garland.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was just wondering what reason there was for the delay. Is there any reason except that other countries did not follow the matter up?

Mr. MURDOCK: One reason is that for five weeks hon. gentlemen opposite were greatly concerned about the honour and dignity of parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think there is a better explanation, although I really do not know what it is. Is it because we were waiting for other countries to take action? That might be a very good reason for the delay.

Mr. MURDOCK: No, that is not the reason. As a matter of fact these conventions do not affect Canada to any great extent. Canada, I think, without very much discussion adheres to the principles that are laid down in all these four resolutions. The object is to give ratification to this convention as soon as possible and thus comply with the desire of the League of Nations and the International Labour Conference. The matter was not reached until the present session of parliament; that is the only reason for the delay.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Murdock thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 215, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, to give effect to certain Draft Conventions adopted by a General Conference of the International Labour Organization of the League of Nations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILDREN AT SEA—MEDICAL EXAMINATION

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confirm a certain Draft Convention concerning the Compulsory Medical Examinations of Children and Young Persons Employed at Sea, adopted at Geneva on the 11th day of November, 1921, by a General Conference of the International Labour Organization of the League of Nations; to provide that the employment of any child or young person under 18 years of age on any vessel engaged in maritime navigation, other than vessels on which only members of the same family are employed, shall be conditional on the production of a medical certificate attesting fitness for such work and that the continued employment at sea of children and young persons shall be conditional on the repetition of medical examination at intervals of not more than one year.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. IRVINE: I draw the minister's attention to the sentence "other than vessels on which only members of the same family are employed." It would seem to me that a family of children growing up on a vessel are just as much in need of protection as other children. What is the reason for the exemption? Is this following the wording adopted by the International Labour Conference?

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not know that I get my hon. friend's question. My understanding is that this exception is so as not to interfere with a family who are handling a sailing vessel, as a fishing boat, that might naturally be regarded as their home or regular place of residence. There is no intention of requiring compulsory medical examination within the meaning of this draft Convention under such conditions.

Mr. IRVINE: The minister's explanation does not exactly meet the point. A boy who may be at sea on his father's boat may be in great need of medical attention.

Mr. MURDOCK: A child might be in need of medical attention on land or anywhere else, but the presumption is that if he is under his father's care he is receiving all the attention possible consistent with the conditions. This is only to prevent the hiring and the use of children other than one's own without proper medical examination, as I understand it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is there any suggestion as to where and by whom this medical examination will be made?

Mr. MURDOCK: The convention is short and, perhaps, if I read the document it will afford hon. members the information they want:

Draft Convention Concerning the Compulsory Medical Examination of Children and Young Persons Employed at Sea.

Article 1.—For the purpose of this convention, the term "vessel" includes all ships and boats, of any nature whatsoever, engaged in maritime navigation, whether publicly or privately owned; it excludes ships of war.

Article 2.—The employment of any child or young person under eighteen years of age on any vessel, other than vessels upon which only members of the same family are employed, shall be conditional on the production of a medical certificate attesting fitness for such work, signed by a doctor who shall be approved by the competent authority.

Article 3.—The continued employment at sea of any such child or young person shall be subject to the repetition of such medical examination at intervals of not more than one year, and the production, after each such examination, of a further medical certificate attesting fitness for such work. Should medical certificate expire in the course of the voyage it shall remain in force until the end of said voyage.

Article 4. In urgent cases, the competent authority may allow a young person below the age of eighteen years to embark without having undergone the examination provided for in Articles 2 and 3 of this convention, always provided that such an examination shall be undergone at the first port at which the vessel calls.

Article 5. Each member of the international labour organization which ratifies this convention engages to apply it to its colonies, possessions and protectorates, in accordance with the provisions of articles 421 of the Treaty of Versailles and of the corresponding articles of the other treaties of peace.

Mr. LEADER: Is it the intention of the government to hold more conventions in Geneva in the future?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend refers to international labour conferences?

Mr. LEADER: Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK: A conference is proceeding at the present time, and the former Deputy Minister of Labour is one of the representatives. The probabilities are that each year there will be one of these international labour conferences as provided for in the Treaty of Versailles, the treaty of peace. An attempt was made some few years ago to have a labour conference every two years instead of every year, and my personal opinion is that possibly that plan will be adopted in the near future; possibly not at this conference now going on, but at some future conference.

Mr. LEADER: The reason I ask the question is that I think the minister should keep his eye on the expense sheet of the travelling expenses of these delegates to the convention. I have before me copies from the Auditor General's Report, 1922, where I find the following:

Expenses of the Hon. C. J. Doherty, Sir George Foster, and the Hon. N. W. Rowell, travelling expenses amounting to $16,409.22.

In the same report, and I presume relating to the same conference, I find an item:

Advanced to Sir Charles Gordon, $8,000; advanced to Edouard Montpetit, $8,000.

The CHAIRMAN: I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that this debate seems to be getting into a discussion which would be proper in supply and could hardly come up on a resolution of this kind, regarding medical examination of children. I think the hon. member is getting beyond the point of relevancy.

Mr. LEADER: I have more to say, but I will desist.

Mr. MURDOCK: My estimates will be up a little later and then the hon. gentleman will have a chance to discuss this question.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

LOSS OF SHIP—UNEMPLOYMENT INDEMNITY

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confirm a certain draft convention concerning unemployment indemnity in case of loss or foundering of the ship, adopted at Genoa on the 9th day of July, 1920, by a general conference of the International labour organization of the League of Nations; and to provide that in the case of loss or foundering of any vessel the service of a seaman shall terminate before the date contemplated in the agreement, he shall be paid unemployment indemnity for the days during which he remains in fact unemployed for a period not exceeding two months.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MURDOCK: This convention is very short, and if I read it, possibly its meaning will be clear to hon. members. It reads:

Draft Convention Concerning Unemployment Indemnity in Case of Loss or Foundering of a Ship

Article 1. For the purpose of this convention the term "seamen" includes all persons employed on any vessel engaged in maritime navigation. For the purpose of this convention the term "vessel" includes all ships and boats of any nature whatsoever, engaged in maritime navigation, whether publicly or privately owned; it excludes ships of war.

Article 2. In every case of loss or foundering of any vessel, the owner or person with whom the seaman has contracted for service on board the vessel shall pay to each seaman employed thereon an indemnity against unemployment resulting from such loss or foundering.

This indemnity shall be paid for the days during which the seaman remains in fact unemployed at the same rate as the wages payable under the contract, but the total indemnity payable under this convention to any one seaman may be limited to two months' wages.

Article 3. Seamen shall have the same remedies for recovering such indemnities as they have for recovering arrears of wages earned during the service.

Article 4. Each member of the International Labour Organization which ratifies this convention engages to apply it to its colonies, protectorates and possessions which are not fully self-governing:

(a) Except where owing to the local conditions its provisions are inapplicable; or

(b) Subject to such modifications as may be necessary to adopt its provisions to local conditions.

Each member shall notify to the International Labour Office the action taken in respect of each of its colonies, protectorates and possessions which are not fully self-governing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a technical point in connection with this resolution.

[Mr. Leader.]

Should not the word "if" be inserted in the fifth line? It says:

It is expedient to bring in a measure to confirm a certain draft convention concerning unemployment indemnity in case of loss or foundering of the ship, adopted at Genoa on the 9th day of July, 1920, by a general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations; and to provide that in the case of loss or foundering of any vessel the service of a seaman shall terminate before the date contemplated in the agreement, he shall be paid unemployment indemnity.

I think it should read: "if in the case of loss", and so on.

Mr. MURDOCK: It will not hurt at all, but I really do not think it is necessary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what it means. It provides that:

In the case of loss or foundering of any vessel the service of a seaman shall terminate before the date contemplated.

Why should we provide that the service shall terminate? If we pass the resolution as it is we are providing that the service shall terminate, and we do not want to do that. We want to provide that if the service terminates at such a time then the men shall be paid.

Mr. MURDOCK: I think my right hon. friend is right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is clear that this is intended merely to impose an obligation on the vessel owner; that is to say, in his contract he must provide for certain payments to be made to the men not only for any days they may be unemployed during the term of the contract but for a maximum of two months extra in the case of the foundering of the vessel.

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, that is right.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: One of the objections I intended to raise has already been stated by the leader of the opposition. I have another reason for objecting to the resolution however; it seems to me that every provision is being made for the seamen and none whatever for the person who may sustain considerable loss through the foundering of his vessel. The vessel owner might lose his ship and be ruined, yet he becomes responsible for two months' wages to the seamen on board who survive the disaster, even although he may be utterly unable to pay them. There is too little consideration on the one hand and too much on the other.

Mr. MURDOCK: Is it not reasonable to assume that the vessel will be insured?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Let us assume also that in some cases vessels may not be insured. In any such case is the vessel owner to be responsible for the maintenance of the men for two months?

Mr. McMASTER: We are entitled to take it for granted that every vessel owner will follow the usual practice and have his vessel insured.

Mr. WHITE: How many nations have adopted similar legislation?

Mr. MURDOCK: So far the convention has been ratified only by Bulgaria and Esthonia. Ratification has been authorized by Great Britain, Italy, Holland and Poland. The necessary procedure has been set in motion for ratification in Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Spain, Lithuania, Cuba, the Argentine Republic and Chile. Legislation on the subject has also been introduced in Norway.

Mr. WHITE: Apparently, then, this legislation, in the course of four years, although contemplated by all these countries, has been adopted only by two small nations. What is the attitude of the United States to a regulation of this kind, which might seriously add to the cost of shipping?

Mr. MURDOCK: The United States is not a member of the League of Nations and therefore does not hold membership in the international labour organization. I think however that its shipping laws in respect of the matters covered in these resolutions are about on the same basis as the legislation we now propose. One of the reasons why this matter has not been pressed before is Canada's reluctance to precede Great Britain in regard to such questions. I believe that only in one of the four instances we have under consideration this afternoon has Great Britain actually ratified the legislation, but in the other cases, as in this, ratification has been authorized. Of course, it will be some time before we reach the point of ratification even although these resolutions become effective in the shape of bills; there is a certain necessary form of procedure for the purpose and it has not been thought proper to try to get ahead of the Mother Country in ratifying these conventions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: My hon. friend opposite (Mr. McMaster) assumes that all vessels would be insured, but there are a great many small boats on the lakes and elsewhere which, I can quite understand, might not be insured at all. In some cases the insurance might lapse through some oversight, or the owner might not be in a position to get insurance. Are we to make that owner responsible for two months' wages for the survivors of a wreck notwithstanding an entire loss on his own part? Surely the men might be expected to find employment in some other capacity within a short time after the loss of the vessel. I do not think that the fact that Bulgaria and Esthonia, two small nations, have so far adopted similar legislation is sufficient warranty for this parliament passing this law at the present time. I think we could very well allow the matter to stand for a while and see whether the other nations are going to pass this legislation. As to this resolution becoming effective when the bill is adopted by this House, it certainly will go into force when the act is signed by the Governor General, and we shall be linked up then with Bulgaria and Esthonia as three countries forming the advance guard in this matter. This legislation pays absolutely no regard to the vessel owner who might lose everything, but it makes him responsible for the maintenance of his crew after the foundering of his ship. It does not seem to be at all pressing, and in view of the stated desire of the government to get through with the work of the session as soon as possible I do not think that any serious hardship will ensue if the matter is deferred for another year, or not passed at all.

Mr. McBRIDE: It is not often that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) and I agree, but I am in sympathy with the statement he has made; this legislation is not called for. I can remember an incident that occurred on the Pacific coast a little over a year ago. A widow owned a steamer which was not insured and which was lost; and that steamer was all that she had. Why should the crew be enabled to sue her for wages for two months while they go about idle? I repeat, the legislation is entirely uncalled for. Thirty days is about the limit of compensation a man can claim who is dismissed in ordinary occupations, why give seamen sixty days? Are they going to be a privileged class of people in this country?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend must remember that two months is not the minimum but the maximum.

Mr. McBRIDE: The minister may rest assured that the maximum will be claimed every time.

Mr. MURDOCK: Let us take the case suggested by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Stuherland), of a vessel foundering on any of the lakes. Is it reasonable to suppose that a seaman in that case could claim wages for sixty days? That seems to me to be far-fetched, because that man could easily get around to his home in a couple of days. Sixty days is the maximum and it is intended to apply in the case of seamen who are shipwrecked at a considerable distance from home, perhaps a thousand miles or so; the provision is that such a man should be paid two months' wages to enable him to return home if he is unemployed.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think the committee need feel that sailors are going to be a privileged class. They are away from home most of the time, they are not present to urge their claims upon members of parliament and other public men, and therefore I think it behooves legislators to look after their interests. It seems to me that this is a very reasonable provision. The case cited by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) is, I think, a very extreme one, as the Minister of Labour has pointed out. The object of the convention seems very clear and plain. Sailors may be wrecked some distance from home before their agreement is up, and in that case the steamship owner, who as a rule will be insured, will be responsible for the unemployment indemnity, not exceeding two months. It is true, as pointed out by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride), that there may be such a case as he brought before the House, of a widow woman, a ship owner, whose ship was lost and was not insured. But I think that will be found to be the exception, for it is one of the primary canons of the shipping business to have vessels insured. It is only the very largest steamship lines that carry their own insurance. I think it will be found that a very large proportion of the world's shipping is insured, as it should be. Insurance facilities are such that every reasonably practical vessel owner will have his ship insured against this contingent liability. This convention has been arrived at after careful consideration by all interested parties, and it behooves us to follow it. The argument has been brought forward that only two small nations have actually ratified the legislation. Well, the leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Meighen) stated in the House the other day that "Canada should lead the way." I forget exactly in what connection he made that statement, but it expresses an excellent sentiment—a sentiment that should appeal to all of us on Dominion Day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I used the expression in relation to the attitude of the dominions in Empire affairs, that Canada being first and largest should lead. I do not take broad exception to the views expressed by the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), but I really have not the same conception of the meaning of the clause that the Minister of Labour has, if I understood him rightly. He emphasized the fact that this is the maximun.

Mr. McMASTER: Not exceeding two months.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. But the effect is this, that the sailor every time, providing his own master cannot take him on again within the period before the two months expire, can always claim the whole two months' indemnity. I think the member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) is right in that respect.

Mr. McMASTER: It is not likely that the sailor will be so unfortunate as to be subject to constant founderings of his ship.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The member has missed the point. The maximum has this effect in all cases of foundering, that unless the master of the ship can get his vessel back into service again before the two months expire, he would be compelled to pay right to the limit of the two months.

Mr. HOEY: Unless the sailor found employment elsewhere.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The sailor has no incentive to find employment elsewhere when he is paid up to the full two months anyway. That is really what is in the minds of the member for Cariboo and the member for South Oxford.

Mr. McMASTER: It seems to me that this will happen—either he will be wrecked near his home, where it is to be presumed he will be able to find employment again; or if he is wrecked away from home it will be natural for him to take service in the ship that first presents itself giving him reasonably attractive opportunities of service. I think the objections raised to this convention are not serious; there is of course something to be said on the other side, but it seems to me that the object of the legislation will appeal to everybody, namely, not to allow a sailor who has been wrecked some distance from home to be stranded without some resource that he can call upon.

Mr. MURDOCK: This convention was adopted at the International Labour Conference of 1920 without a dissenting voice from the representatives of any nation, from any of the employers' representatives, from any of the employees' representatives, Mr. Thomas

Robb, manager of the Shipping Federation of Canada, was the employers' representative at that conference, he also agreed to the convention.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That being the case, how is it that only those two small nations have ratified?

Mr. MURDOCK: For the same reason, I think, that we have not ratified it, there is nothing so very pressing and urgent as to necessitate its immediate ratification. But when we are in the position of giving effect to some of the conventions that emanated from the International Labour Conference, it appeared to be reasonable to couple up these four resolutions so as to incorporate them in the Canada Shipping Act at one and the same time. Practically the conditions proposed are in effect now, except this one, and I have not heard any complaint in this respect. But it is merely a question of proceeding not too hurriedly but in an orderly way to give effect to some of these conventions, if we can, because my hon. friend from South Oxford knows that at times questions are asked, such as: Why has Canada not given effect to some of the conventions emanating from the International Labour Conference? We are trying to do so on matters that are not seriously handicapping to Canada and are not of very serious moment to Canadians, but which will show that we are at least ready to take a step in the right direction.

Mr. McBRIDE: Would this act apply to coastwise shipping or only to ocean-going vessels?

Mr. MURDOCK: My understanding is that should this be incorporated in the Canada Shipping Act it would apply only to such vessels as come within the provisions of that act. I am of opinion that the widow's vessel which my hon. friend referred to a short time ago would not be covered by this convention because it would not be of sufficient tonnage.

Mr. McBRIDE: But I want to know definitely whether this applies to coastwise shipping or only to ocean-going vessels.

Mr. IRVINE: I would suggest that it ought to apply to coastwise shipping.

Mr. MURDOCK: It applies to all shipping that is covered by the Canada Shipping Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should think the question was covered by the former answer of the Minister of Labour, that he thought the convention covered lake shipping. If that be the case, it is perfectly obvious that coastal shipping is also covered by this convention.

Mr. NEILL: No doubt the Canada Shipping Act does apply to coastwise shipping. But in that case the principal complaint of the hon. member for South Oxford will disappear because men on coastal boats—and I presume on lake boats also—are paid by the month. Therefore in the event of their ship being wrecked they would get a month's notice, and consequently their unemployment payment would not extend beyond that period, because the resolution provides:

> That if in the case of loss or foundering of any vessel the service of a seaman shall terminate before the date contemplated in the agreement.

The owner of the coastwise vessel would therefore be liable only for a month's indemnity.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am inclined to think, if that is the case, that even though the seamen were employed monthly they would be entitled to two months' indemnity. The Minister of Labour himself admits that inside of two days a sailor on the Great Lakes ought to be able to obtain other employment. I cannot see the wisdom of providing two months' holidays for any one who sees fit to take advantage of this legislation. If the bill goes into effect, as stated by the hon. member (Mr. McBride) it will enable men employed monthly to draw two months' salary after a wreck takes place.

Mr. MURDOCK: I suppose they will get wrecked regularly in order to get some easy money.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I can imagine the hon. member for Brome as the advance agent for the insurance companies when he points out that the large steamship companies carry their own insurance.

Mr. McMASTER: I said only the largest, and I think I am right.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Only the largest carry their own insurance. Well, if the large owners can carry their own insurance surely the same thing should not be denied the smaller owners.

Mr. McMASTER: The large companies have enough ships to ensure that the law of average shall apply, and they can carry their own risks, and sometimes do with safety. The small owner who owns only one or two ships cannot afford to run the risk, so he has to pay an insurance premium to cover the risk. I submit that the legislation sought is highly proper and highly desirable. Surely no one in this House wishes to deprive a sailor who is wrecked of a chance of being protected in his livelihood for a maximum of sixty days. If some vessel owners do not insure their vessels, this is an added reason why they should. If it induces them to insure where otherwise they would not, then we are conferring a benefit, not imposing a hardship upon them.

Mr. CALDWELL: The inference seems to be that the vessel owner who is insured loses nothing if he loses his vessel. It is well known, however, that you cannot insure a building or a vessel or anything else on the basis of its full value, so that in addition to the amount paid in premiums, which has to be added to overhead, the owner is possibly out the equivalent of one-third the cost of his vessel. I cannot help agreeing with the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) and the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) that the time is too long. As I understand it, even if a man is employed by the month, if his employment ceases before the end of the month he can still claim two months' pay.

Mr. McMASTER: I think he can, if he is actually out of work. The sailor as a rule is not the most provident of men; he has not made savings; and he is doing some of the most hazardous and necessary work of the world, exposing his health and very life in the service of humanity. Surely he is entitled to get sixty days' unemployment insurance at the expense of the owner if he is out of a job for that length of time. I think we are balking over something which really ought to appeal to all of us.

Mr. McBRIDE: All I can say is that the hon. member (Mr. McMaster) does not know what he is talking about. If he was in the shipping business for some time he would think differently. I have had a good deal to do with sailors. I have been a sailor myself, and I say that the sailor often has a mighty good time when out at sea, much easier than he would have if he were working on a farm. I think the period should be cut down to thirty days.

Mr. MURDOCK: Can we not deal with this matter when the bill is taken up?

Mr. IRVINE: I have no doubt that if the hon. member (Mr. McMaster) were a ship owner he would not say what he has just said.

Mr. McMASTER: Now, why impute such unworthy motives?

Mr. IRVINE: I am agreeing with what my hon. friend has just said.

Mr. McMASTER: There is no reason to be wrong just in order to be polite.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. IRVINE: I am not sure I am wrong in coming to that conclusion, because naturally in that position my hon. friend would be looking after his own personal interests. But a ship may be wrecked through the carelessness of the owner, who may not have attended to the vessel or kept it in proper condition. Further, when the sailor is wrecked he may lose all his clothing, all his belongings, in fact, and be set ashore with nothing but what he is walking in. I think that the resolution ought to pass without further discussion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has pointed out that this legislation is not urgent. In view of the fact that we are in the month of July and that the session will in all probability run for a considerable time yet I must protest against the introduction of legislation at this time that is not urgent. Not only that, but it is another form of this nursing legislation that we are continually passing, making people do something that the government should not interfere in at all. We are continually passing restrictions and regulations, a little here and a little there as to how people shall carry on their business,—in other words, putting a premium on laziness and inefficiency and a penalty on enterprise and energy.

Mr. BANCROFT: Is the hon. member referring to protection or to this bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Only the other day a measure was introduced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to enable lawyers to charge about three times what they had been charging for entering notices of protest. These are some of the things that tend to bring law into contempt, in this country. The hon. member (Mr. McMaster) has referred to our passing legislation of this kind on Dominion Day. It is an unjustifiable offence that this parliament should be in session on our great national holiday, when we ought to be doing something towards the development of a national spirit in our people instead of dealing with trifling legislation of this kind for which the minister says there is not the least urgency. So far only two countries, Bulgaria and Esthonia, have passed legislation in accordance with the draft convention of the 1920 conference. That was four years ago. Yet on Dominion Day this House must sit to deal with a trifling resolutions of this kind to suit the Minister of Labour.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Murdock thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 216, to amend the Canada Shipping Act to give effect to certain draft conventions adopted by the International Labour Conference of the League of Nations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the bill which has just received its first reading includes, I understand, all the provisions based on the first two resolutions we have passed. Bills were introduced by error with respect to the first two resolutions, and I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Murdock:

That the first readings of Bills Nos. 214 and 215 based on the resolutions adopted in committee of the Whole this day and standing as Nos. 31 and 37 of the Orders of the Day be rescinded.

Motion agreed to.

REFUNDING LOAN $300,000,000

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide authority for the raising, by way of loan, under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, by the issue and sale or pledge of securities of Canada, in such form, for such separate sums, at such rate of interest and upon such other terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve, such sum or sums of money as may be required, but not to exceed in the whole the sum of three hundred million dollars, for paying maturing loans and obligations of Canada, and to provide that the principal so raised by way of loan and the interest thereon shall be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the usual method when the government requires authority to take care of maturing obligations or to provide for new obligations. This is entirely to take care of maturing obligations up to and including 1927. The situation is this. On 1st November, 1924, we have $107,955,650 of the 1919 victory loan falling due. In 1922, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) introduced a bill which was passed, authorizing the raising of loans up to $350,000,000 for refunding purposes. The renewal loan of 1922 was for $114,464,150. The refunding loan of 1923 was for $200,000,000. This leaves a borrowing power from the 1922 bill still available of $35,535,850. The purpose of this bill is to provide borrowing powers in the future for maturing loans and obligations.

I will give hon. gentlemen the maturing loans and obligations for the next three years. On 1st November, 1924, there is due a victory loan of $107,955,650; and in October and November, 1924, outstanding treasury bills going back to the war date amounting to $4,680,000; $41,060,000; $19,325,000; $26,250,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When were those issued?

Mr. ROBB: They are treasury bills issued during the war period. They have been renewed from time to time, as my hon. friend will recall. Then, on May 1, 1925, we have a bond issue due in London of $24,333,333.33.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the total of the treasury bills?

Mr. ROBB: Calculating it at the moment, they amount to over $91,000,000. In 1925 there is maturing on 1st May, $24,333,333.33; on 1st July, $60,800; and on 1st December, —this is the war loan of 1915—$42,014,500. In 1926 we have maturing on 1st April, $25,000,000; on 1st November, 1927, $29,068,400; and on 1st December, $63,437,250. The total is $382,184,933.33. We are asking for authority in this resolution to take care of these maturing obligations.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What official of the government keeps a record of the public debt, and what sort of ledger is it kept in? I would like to have a little information about that, having in view that the time may soon arrive when we could have a better consolidation of our public debt, and on a broader plan than has been pursued in the past.

Mr. ROBB: The Chief Accountant is Mr. Macfarlane, in the Department of Finance. That is all under the administration of the Deputy Minister of Finance. I quite agree with my hon. friend that we should look forward to the time when the interest rate may become so favourable that we might consolidate our debt obligations.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Have you that always in view? Hitherto it seems—I know very little about it—that a rather slipshod practice has been followed. There ought to be a broad policy in dealing with the national debt. There ought to be a ledger showing the national debt and the due dates. I do not believe any member of this House ever saw that ledger; I do not know whether there is one or not; I do not know whether anybody has ever seen the diary in which these due dates are entered. Somehow I have the impression that there ought to be a better organization for dealing with this question, and it may come up in this House this week. The time will come when there should be a reorganization of the Finance department with a responsible officer at the head, with the present branches of the department consolidated under one high official of the government, say a Comptroller of the Currency, or an officer of that kind.

Mr. SPENCE: Where does the minister intend to float this loan?

Mr. ROBB: In the best market available.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister should not answer the question that way. What is in his mind as to the best policy, whether to endeavour to float in Canada or out of Canada; and if out of Canada, whether in England or the United States? The main question, though, of interest for hon. members is whether the minister really contemplates a domestic loan or not.

Mr. ROBB: I propose to get the money wherever it can be procured to the best advantage of the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the minister's idea?

Mr. ROBB: We will have to look into that. There will be lots of time between now and November to study the condition of the money market.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think it is a matter of the market at all; it is a matter of policy. There are different opinions as to the wisdom of floating a loan in Canada or in other countries.

Mr. ROBB: I should like to have my right hon. friend's views right now. I am looking for advice on the subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Your right hon. friend does not pretend to be much of a financier. His opportunities of learning from this government in that respect have not been very great; but I am sure we will be enlightened by the minister's experience in the last year. What is the minister's view on the subject?

Mr. ROBB: I have just given my views. Now I am looking for advice. I agree with my right hon. friend. There are people who come to you and say you should float this loan in Canada; and there are others who say you should get more new money into the country. I have not been able to make up my mind on the subject.

[Mr. W. F. Maclean.]

Mr. MACLEAN (York): My suggestion is that the Acting Minister of Finance should take up in a broad way the question of the public debt of Canada—that is to consolidate the debt and perhaps get money at a lower rate of interest than has been possible in the last thirty years. To-day in New York money is at a lower rate than it has been for many years, and if we approach the question in the broad way I have indicated the results may be most advantageous to Canada. If this question is discussed as it should be the minister may get valuable suggestions even from hon. members on this side; the subject is worthy of adequate discussion and the getting of full information in regard to it. It would certainly appear to be the proper time to consolidate the public debt when the rate of interest in New York is as low as it is to-day. Let us take a broad view of the question and see if we cannot save some of the money we now pay in our annual interest charges.

Mr. SPENCE: I do not see why the minister does not welcome expressions of opinion as to whether this loan should be floated in Canada or in some other country. My own opinion is that we have floated too many loans in this country; and if we now place another loan of three hundred millions in Canada it will tie up money that would serve to keep the wheels of industry rolling. There is too much money locked up as it is, and people are finding it hard to collect their accounts. If the minister insists on raising this loan in Canada there will be no money available for commercial or industrial purposes. If you go to a bank to-day you cannot get money; you are told it is all tied up in victory bonds or other war loans, and if you are now going to float another three hundred million loan you are only going to aggravate the situation.

Mr. ROBB: Oh, no.

Mr. SPENCE: That is the intention, I understand.

Mr. ROBB: That is a misunderstanding. This is to take care of bonds that are now outstanding, of loans that were floated in Canada by the government which my hon. friend supported.

Mr. SPENCE: I am opposed to such a policy. I do not see how you are going to raise such a loan and pay 5 or 5½ per cent. I understand that money is available in New York at 3 or 3½ per cent. It is much better to get the money there than to raise a loan in this country.

Mr. ROBB: I cannot raise a loan anywhere until this bill goes through.

Mr. SPENCE: The minister ought to be frank enough to give the committee some information as to what he is going to do in this matter.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps my hon. friend was out when I made the statement a few moments ago that I am going to raise the money in the best market available.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the minister going to get the money in the cheapest market—that is taking into account the cost of commissions and so forth—or is he going to raise the loan irrespective of general economic considerations?

Mr. MARLER: The question raised by the right hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Parkdale is a very important question indeed, one which I think is sometimes lost sight of in general policies of government. In the past we have been frequently told that the raising of money by way of a loan in Canada is the best thing to do. We have also been told on many an occasion that owning our own debt is a very excellent thing for the people of this country. I must say that I have not particularly shared that view at all. I think it is very much better, if it is possible to do so on similar terms or nearly similar terms even, to borrow the money by way of external loan and bring that money into the country. It is a question of policy. It is also a question of negotiation, but there is a very important question of policy involved in the floating of any loan by Canada—as to whether that loan should be an internal loan or whether it should be an external loan. The reason—and it is seen on all sides by those who are interested in industrial concerns, by those interested in securing money by way of mortgage and other matters of that description—is that these loans, floated in Canada as they are and as they have been to a very large extent in the past, simply make the money market in Canada exceedingly tight and, if anything, instead of depreciating really increase the rate of interest. I know very well what has happened in Montreal in connection with financial matters. By reason of victory loans and other loans floated in Montreal it is exceedingly hard at the present time on certain occasions to get mortgage money at a reasonable rate of interest and this applies to city property and to country property also. The taking of more money out of the banks and the savings of the people for the purpose of floating these internal loans means that the rate of interest for mortgage money and other investments is bound to keep up. I am glad to have had this opportunity of impressing the importance of this question upon the House. I agree with the leader of the opposition that it is a very distinct question of policy on the part of the government, as to whether these loans shall be floated internally or externally.

Mr. McMASTER: It seems to me that the Acting Minister of Finance is eminently wise in refusing to commit himself as to what policy he will follow four months hence.

Mr. MARLER: No one is asking him to commit himself if I may contradict my hon. friend.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not know that I was saying anything which traversed in any way the observations of previous speakers. I was, for what it was worth, giving my feeble support to the cautious, I might almost say the Scottish attitude taken by the Acting Minister of Finance. It is a question of policy, it is a question of the rate of interest. I conceive it to be quite possible for the minister to imagine that he would follow one line of policy and then, after a very considerable lowering of an interest rate in one of the great money markets of the world, consider himself justified in making a change and placing his loan somewhere else. It does seem to me that it would be unwise for the minister to declare here and now: I am going to try and raise this money in London, or I am going to try and raise this money in New York, or I am going to try and raise it by domestic loan. It is a policy which has to be determined upon by the actual conditions of the money market here and elsewhere, as well as other business considerations at the time the advance has to be actually obtained.

Mr. MARLER: Quite true.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No doubt that is very wise but it does not preclude the minister from giving his own views just as has been done by the hon. member for St. Lawrence and St. George (Mr. Marler). That is all anybody has been trying to get him to do. I repeat that while I have not had much experience as a financier the minister is having quite a lot, and if this government keeps up its present rate of expenditure we shall have a lot more in the borrowing of money.

Mr. ROBB: So far we are only taking care of the debt that was incurred by my right hon. friend and his colleagues.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the minister considered taking care of it by guaranteeing the bonds of the National Railways? In that way he would not add to the national debt at all. It is true it is a debt incurred in our time but it was handled and financed properly. Under similar conditions I would strongly advise the minister to adopt our method, to adopt the method of domestic loan. At that time there was sufficient money for all legitimate purposes in Canada. There was courage and confidence, and business was buoyant and expanding. Conditions to-day are entirely different. It is difficult to get money for industrial enterprises in this Dominion, and under such circumstances it seems the minister should give great weight to the consideration advanced by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. To further drain the supply of capital in Canada would, in my opinion, be doubtful wisdom. Of course conditions may improve in the next six months, but conditions at present are not at all exhilerating. I think when the minister has to face similar conditions at a future time he would be wise in my judgment to be guided by these considerations, as well as the probable fact that the money rate will be lower in other countries than it is here. It is to-day considerably lower there than it has been in the past. Advantage should be taken of it to refund all early maturing loans, but the minister cannot refund a loan until it is due. I ask that these considerations be given such weight as the minister thinks they merit, and that he shall not merely be guided by the rate of interest here or the rate there, or the cost of getting the loan Times are very different to-day from what they were when earlier loans were incurred.

Mr. GOOD: The discussion which has taken place so far on the item seems to take for granted that there is a more or less fixed amount of money in existence either here or in the United States or in the world. I question whether that can be assumed; and if it is not true the discussion on both sides, on the side of those who favour getting money in the United States and on the side of those who favour getting money here is certainly, to say the least, not very illuminating. I noticed in the Ottawa Journal a few days ago a leading editorial headed, "Where better borrow", and the argument was much the same as that presented to-day. If, it says, we take three hundred million dollars out of the supply of Canadian money by floating bonds and so on, we shall have three hundred million dollars less in Canada for other purposes. If we go to the United States and get the money there we will not take it out of the Canadian supply. I want to submit to hon. members that the assumption which has been made and which underlies the argument on both sides is decidedly questionable. It is only true of such money as costs effort to produce. The argument did apply and could apply to gold, which is supposed to be the basis of most currency at the present time, but in regard to all other kinds of money which indeed constitutes the largest part of the money supply of to-day, it does not apply. To some extent it applies to paper money which is limited in its volume by the metal basis, but it certainly does not apply to the largest volume of money which does the business to-day; that is bank credit.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member argue that we have in Canada an unlimited amount of money?

Mr. GOOD: Yes; but that statement might be misunderstood. I am afraid it would take a long time to explain the matter fully, but I would suggest to my right hon. friend that if he analyzes the money which is in existence to-day, and which is doing the business of Canada he will find that it consists of three different parts, first gold—the gold basis, if you like—perhaps we had better restrict it to our gold basis, our standard. In addition and secondly we have token money, which consists of copper, nickel and silver coins, and paper money, both Dominion and bank notes. Thirdly we have what constitutes about ninety-five per cent of the money in use, namely bank credits.

Now in regard to the money which costs something to produce, the law of supply and demand applies, and the ordinary argument as to interest rates going up where the supply is limited and going down where the supply is abundant is quite in order. But in regard to deposits subject to cheque, as my right hon. friend will find if he reads the books on the subject, the argument of supply and demand scarcely applies at all, and it seems to me that that is the point of view that has been and is being entirely lost sight of in the ordinary discussions on this subject. In regard to the money supply in Canada, I might point out to my right hon. friend and other memmers of the committee that as between the year 1917 and the year 1920 in Canada we brought into existence wholly without effort and without cost, so far as the production of money was concerned, about one billion dollars.

5 p.m.

Mr. McMASTER: That is one of the reasons why prices went up.

Mr. GOOD: Yes. It was one of the reasons why prices went up. I do not wish to go into the matter exhaustively. I only rise to point to the moral and to suggest the propriety of looking a little deeper into the question than we have done to-day.

There is of course this further consideration that has to be kept in mind: That there is a danger in the creation of that part of money which is known as bank credits. That process was engaged in during the war years and after the war with very distinct disadvantages and disaster to this country and to other countries. It ought to be very apparent to us, if we look into it, that there is no effort or cost attaching to the increase of that kind of money, and it is purely a question of whether or not it is wise policy to deliberately write so much more money into our national money volume. It can be done without effort, has been done by our banks time and again, and is being done constantly. The banks are doing it constantly in conjunction with their customers, they are increasing or decreasing the amount of money in the country, and that has definite consequences on the price level. I would like the House to consider whether or not in these particular circumstances and under existing conditions it might not be wise to adopt an entirely different method from any that has been adopted up to the present in the funding of this debt, or in the floating of this three hundred million dollar loan. I do not know that this is the time or place to go into it in detail, but I am absolutely satisfied that there is a point of view that has so far escaped hon. members in this discussion. I think that is worth considering very seriously, and I wish to urge its very earnest and very serious consideration by hon. members of this House. I do not propose at the moment to say anything further than to emphasize the need of looking at this particular aspect of the case.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I would like to make a suggestion along the line of the statement of the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Good). I would suggest that we have a committee of the House to deal with matters of this kind. I believe the time has come in the history of Canada when we ought to have a standing committee of this House to deal with the public debt that has been contracted, and to consider how it can best be discharged. It is pre-eminently a question of responsibility which attaches to the government and the Department of Finance to take care of the public debt and choose their own time to either pay it off or incur new obligations. I agree with what the hon. member has stated, and it has been hinted more or less that there should be a study by this House of our commitments which are existant, when they are coming due and how they might be consolidated. We have not had that in the past. It is a matter for parliament to study, but we have not come to it yet. Our obligations are getting very large, and the question of interest is one of very great concern. If we had a standing committee of the House to deal with the national debt and to investigate the situation at every session, out of the consideration of those questions by that committee there might come some suggestions which might be worthy of the attention of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Is it a fact that Great Britain and the United States have consolidated their national debts under some co-ordinated system whereby they have a very low rate of interest? And is it not true that at the close of the war Canada could have done the same thing?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I am not prepared to answer that question at the moment.

Mr. SPENCE: It does not matter just how much the amount may be, but there is no doubt in my opinion that we are oversubscribed. I am interested in several little industries and I know that to-day people are sacrificing industrial bonds since they have learned that a loan is to be floated by the Dominion government. It is a fact that at the present time people are peddling industrial bonds which were considered good security some time ago; they are anxious to trade these bonds for vacant lots and every other form of tangible property that they can get hold of. That looks decidedly bad for the country, and I am afraid that if the government affords the people an opportunity of tying up much more money by offering a decent rate of interest, there will be no investments in industry at all. The money market should be left to the municipalities; but the municipal field will not be free so long as Dominion government loans are floated, because everybody will buy Dominion bonds first, and afterwards provincial and municipal bonds in that order. I have here a statement showing that Edmonton 4½ per cent bonds are selling at 93.60, to mature in 1929; they have sold even as low as 90. Toronto bonds have been selling at 98.38, and Toronto Harbour bonds at 90.90. The government must realize how badly industry in this country needs money at this time, and if further funds are to be tied up in government bonds it will simply mean the decline of industrial activities. Dominion government loans simply encourage the people to tie up their money instead of taking a chance with others in the business world, and this can only be detrimental to the interests of the country at large.

Mr. SPENCER: We have heard a good deal about these future loans if issued in Canada tying up money. The minister might tell us how much money is locked up in government bonds, and whether in his opinion these bonds are not excellent security for the banks. It is entirely with the banks themselves if they tie up money, because having gilt-edged security there is no reason why money should be tied up simply as the result of the floating of bonds. I want to refer to certain securities that have come to our notice in the Banking and Commerce committee. When the bankers want money they submit certain securities to the Treasury Board, amongst which are Dominion bonds and treasury bills. Against such securities the Dominion government advances to the banks Dominion notes at 5 per cent. When the government wants money for a short time it goes to the banks and gives treasury bills as security, and I understand that the government owes to the banks to-day upwards of $90,000,000 for which it is paying 5¼ per cent or ¼ of 1 per cent more than the banks pay for the money they get from the government. It is interesting to note that these same treasury bills which the government gives to the banks for a loan can, when the banks want money, be brought back to the Treasury Board and be pledged in return for Dominion notes at 5 per cent. In other words, we may call this looping the loop in finance. I might refer the committee to a lecture given by such an orthodox economist as Dr. Adam Shortt as far back as 1919 to the students of a college in Manitoba. On that occasion Dr. Shortt stated, what was admitted last year by bankers of eminence who appeared before the Banking committee, that whenever a loan was made from a bank it created a deposit of the same amount. It was simply a matter of the security being good enough whether the bank would lose or not. He said that in regard to government loans the same thing took place; the loan to the government by the bank creates a deposit of exactly the same amount, against which are drawn various cheques by the government to meet payments. Naturally the cheques are paid back to the bank and therefore, according to the professor, a government loan from a bank of even five, fifteen or twenty million dollars means not the slightest strain on the entire circle of banks and very little strain on the individual bank.

This is only following up the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Good), who referred to so much money—95 per cent I believe—being created in this country entirely by book entries. A loan to the government by a bank is created on the assets of the country; it is a gilt-edged security and it is impossible for the bank to lose, the government having the power through taxation to pay back the loan. At the same time, for the book-keeping that is done—because that is all it is, no appreciable currency passing—we pay at the present time 5¼ per cent, or ¼ of 1 per cent more than we charge the banks for the money we give them.

Mr. GOOD: When I spoke first I felt under obligation to make my remarks very brief indeed, and perhaps I did not make myself quite plain. Let me add a word or two to clear up what may be somewhat obscure in the minds of some hon. gentlemen. The function of our banks to-day is to give currency to the credit of the individual or the corporation. It makes current not only the visible wealth of the country, but as well the invisible wealth in the form of human character and potential wealth as the bankers see it in the future. Banks and bankers may give currency to a larger or a smaller amount of that actual or potential wealth and in that way may increase or decrease the amount of money in the country. They may also in doing so indirectly either increase or decrease production, and that too is a very important aspect of the question. Supposing this government goes over to the United States and secures a loan there of $300,000,000. That may absorb a certain amount of the money already in the United States; if so, it absorbs a certain amount of purchasing power already in existence, and has no tendency to increase the price level. On the other hand it may simply be a book entry in the books of Morgan and Company or of some other large financial house that undertakes to float the loan, and increase by that amount the total money volume in the country. Usually such flotations do both to a certain extent. They absorb a percentage of the purchasing power already in existence and also to a certain extent result in the issuing of fresh purchasing power or fresh money. If we are going to pay J. P. Morgan and Company 5 per cent for the money, which they create by merely writing it in their ledgers, I say it is a mighty big price, and we ought to know just how far that is taking place.

If we look back over the last few years we see our banks, as I have said before, issuing nearly a billion dollars of new money. It costs them nothing but their book-keeping expenses. They expected to collect 6, 7 and 8 per cent on that new money. They relied upon the ability, actual or potential, of the people of Canada, their customers, to pay that interest. The results are quite apparent, the process having been very damaging, but we seem not to be able to avoid it. However, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to labour the point just now. What I want to impress upon the Acting Minister of Finance and the House is that this is an aspect of the question which seems to be almost totally lost sight of. A number of economists emphasize it, Irving Fisher and others, whose books I have quoted on several occasions when addressing the House.

Mr. McMASTER: Does Reginald McKenna belong to that school?

Mr. GOOD: I shall quote Mr. McKenna on the subject when the occasion arises, but I do not think it is necessary to do so at the present time. He is absolutely in agreement with what I say in regard to the underlying principles. A perusal of the editorial in the Journal shows the popular and fallacious point of view, that we have a certain amount of money, just as we have a certain amount of wheat, and that if we buy so much of this money there is so much less left; which may or may not be true. That is something which we have to keep in mind. I am not here today to make any definite suggestion to the Acting Minister of Finance about floating this particular loan, but I think that between now and the time when he will float it he would be well advised to get in touch with somebody outside his department who knows more about the subject than his deputy does.

Mr. MANION: I must confess that I do not quite understand the reasoning of some of my hon. friends. It certainly would appear to the ordinary man who does not pretend to be an economist at all that if the small investor puts $1,000 in a victory bond or some other loan which the Minister of Finance puts out, he cannot very well invest that money in anything else: It is true that if a big business man buys $50,000 worth of bonds he can and does use those bonds as collateral to borrow more money at the bank. But in view of the fact that to all government loans there are some hundreds of thousands of subscribers, most of whom are small investors, men, women and even children who invest $100, $200, $500 or $1,000, it is apparent that to that extent they tie up their capital, and therefore once the savings of the country are invested in government bonds they cannot very well be available for investment in industrial securities, which is the point that my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) were referring to. Undoubtedly it would not appear that one need be a specially bright economist to realize that that is the actual fact, and that therefore there is a corresponding restriction of capital available for industrial and other enterprises which the country should develop.

Mr. GOOD: My hon. friend is quite right in so far as that particular class of purchasing power is concerned.

Mr. MANION: And that is the large class.

Mr. GOOD: It may or may not be. My hon. friend is quite right in saying that the savings of any individual or group of individuals tied up in that way is so much purchasing power tied up, and therefore it cannot go out into the market as purchasing power for other purposes. But I would again draw to his attention the fact that that is only part of the process,—if that word may be used,—by which such bonds are floated. I may also call to his attention this further fact, which was very obvious some years ago, that after these bonds are purchased by the individual saver or investor they are used as a basis for the extension of bank credit; in other words, they are used as collateral for bank loans, and to an unknown extent.

Mr. MANION: They are by the big business man, but not by the small bondholder or stockholder, who has his small savings tied up in government bonds. A very large proportion of such small investors do not know how to use their holdings as collateral.

Mr. GOOD: About $1,700,000,000 worth of bonds are already outstanding in the hands of Canadians. How much is left in the hands of the small savers?

Mr. MANION: I think I am correct in saying that some hundreds of thousands of small savers hold government bonds.

Mr. GOOD: Two years ago I tried to get some definite information on this point from the Finance department but found it impossible to make even a guess yet it is asserted on all hands that during the last three years a tremendous number of our small investors, our average citizens, have had their bonds squeezed out of them, so to speak, under the stress of economic conditions; and since those bonds are not purchased by outsiders, the inference is that the large financial houses and rich people generally of the Dominion have secured the bonds under pressure from our poorer citizens. I do not know how much they have secured. I wish I did.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Mr. Chairman, I admit that this whole financial question is largely an enigma. I should like the Acting Minister of Finance to satisfy me on this one point: Our banks to-day are permitted to obtain Dominion notes against the security of government bonds. What difference would there be between this policy and the government putting its bonds in the treasury and issuing its own notes against them?

Mr. ROBB: That would not be very sound banking.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Why not? If it is sound for the government to do that for the banks, surely it is sound for the government to do it for itself.

Mr. HUGHES: Why not issue the money?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Certainly, but I mentioned bonds in order to complete the analogy.

Mr. HUGHES: That would be fiat money.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not at all.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): How much of the $300,000,000 worth of bonds referred to is held in Canada and how much is held outside?

Mr. ROBB: I could not tell my hon. friend exactly, but I imagine that the greater part of these bonds are held in Canada.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Previous to the war it was the custom in Canada as far back as I can remember to float all our large loans on the London market. Temporary domestic loans were negotiated by the banks. I have heard many speeches in this House in favour of the idea of placing Canadian government issues on the Canadian market, so the Canadian people would have an opportunity of investing some of their money in such loans. This was resorted to when the war came on. The bonds were placed on the market; they were taken up patriotically and at the same time proved to be a very wise investment. I know of some insurance companies who took out large blocks of these bonds running into several millions of dollars. This method of financing answered the purpose at the time, but there is no doubt that a great deal of the money of Canada is at present tied up in these loans, and what may be a good thing sometimes may not always be good if it is overdone. I think the minister is unable at this time to decide upon a definite policy, but he certainly should look at both sides of the question. Canadians should be given an opportunity of investing their money to a limited extent, but the interests of Canada surely require that foreign capital should be brought into the country. I know of no more fitting occasion to refer to the financial state of Canada than on this Dominion Day, the fifty-seventh anniversary of confederation. Glancing at the paper to-day I noticed that the net debt of Canada has risen in fifty-seven years from $70,000,000 to $2,400,000,000. It is true that the population has increased from over 3,000,000 to about 9,000,000. The newspapers are filled with the ideas of financial experts in London and elsewhere based on the suggestion that Europe can only recover its normal position when it gets back to the gold standard. Canada is practically there to-day. The Canadian dollar is slightly under 100 in the United States; therefore our financial condition should be studied very carefully in this connection.

The suggestion has been thrown out that this is perhaps an opportunity for the Acting Minister of Finance to see that we begin the funding of our debt, because the greatest problem we have to face is the enormous weight of debt now resting on the Canadian people. I have full confidence in the administration and in the Acting Minister of Finance that he will give this matter all the consideration it deserves and, if necessary, call in outside financial experts. That was done in the case of France and Germany, where valuable assistance was gained by calling in Mr. Dawes, an American. The Acting Minister of Finance would be well advised to see that before this question is finally dealt with a complete review is made of the financial circumstances of Canada with a view to seeing that while Canadians are given an opportunity to invest some of their money in the public debt of Canada, we shall not lose the opportunity which is offered of funding our debt and also of introducing foreign capital into the country.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the minister reply more informatively to hon. members in this corner of the House in connection with the question put by the hon. member (Mr. Campbell)? Perhaps I had better repeat it. He has asked the minister why Canada would not be in a better position if she were to finance her own fundings—we will call it that—through the issuance of Dominion bonds to its own treasury and the issue thereon of the necessary credits. The minister replied that it would be poor financing.

Mr. ROBB: Poor banking.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Poor banking? All right; I am glad the minister differentiates between poor financing and poor banking. I think there is something in that. I would like the minister to tell us in what way it would be poor banking.

Mr. ROBB: I do not want to be discourteous to my hon. friends, but that is a subject altogether foreign to the issue now before us. I do not propose at this stage to enter upon a discussion of the different theories of the values of money.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If that is the only answer the minister has, or the only one he is willing to give, I shall have to accept it, but it is not an explanation of an exceedingly interesting and most important aspect of the financing of Dominion requirements. When a Dominion bond issue is made, say, of $100,000,000, as was done two years ago, it is sent to a bond house in the United States—in that case, the J. Pierpont Morgan firm—and they underwrite it consenting to float the issue. They hand back to Canada a credit of $97,500,000; the $2,500,000 they put in their pockets for commission and for expenses in connection with the flotation. The bonds are then sold; they are extensively taken up by large financial houses, insurance companies and banks, and no doubt, as the hon. member (Mr. Manion) would say, by some private investors also. Inevitably, under our present economic system, which is becoming increasingly severe in its pressure on the large lower strata of society, these bonds drift back into the hands of the financial interests and rich investors. I venture to say that if the figures could be accurately surveyed it would be found that 70 or 80 per cent of the bond issues of Canada are in the hands of the larger interests, not in the hands of the common people. What have we given these bond houses? What have we given to these insurance companies that hold the bonds? We have given them an asset backed by the credit of the whole of Canada, a prime asset. And what have we accepted in exchange? A book credit, or perhaps notes—bank notes, promises to pay on the part of the banks. A bank is only part of the assets of the whole country; an insurance company is only part of the assets of the whole country. It is only an asset to the extent that it performs a service. The Dominion then has accepted an inferior asset in exchange for a prime asset, and has paid for the privilege of doing it. That is a simple statement of a theory that appeals to my imagination and to my sense of logic. The minister answers rather indefinitely; in fact he does not answer at all. What is wrong with a system of financing that would remove this evil? Could we not save tremendously in interest charges? Surely there is sufficient sanity in our government, in our men of business, to prevent any unwise inflation. We have learned the lesson. Would the minister explain this business from his own point of view? He simply disposes of the whole thing as bad banking and lets it go at that; now, I am not content to take that answer.

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend has left out a very important step in his argument. He spoke of the Dominion going to the J. P. Morgan Company or some other banking firm and receiving a certain amount of money. He forgets that there are other obligations outstanding and maturing and that part of the money so obtained is used to retire those obligations. The money brought here is not kept in banks; the obligations outstanding are called in and paid with that money. If the hon. member intended to explain that, he did not explain it clearly.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is simply the retirement of bonds now due.

Mr. MARLER: By other creditors, not by the same creditor. There is no confusion of the same debt at all, as my hon. friend suggests. There is another debit which has to be dealt with.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Well, the suggestion is made that there should be an attempt on the part of this government to consolidate the whole national debt and fund it. Imagine that situation,—the Dominion funding its own debt. Would that not remove some of the difficulty? What argument is there against that?

Mr. MARLER: It would not remove it at all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I cannot see the hon. member's viewpoint. If he will deal with the point I have made and argue against it, I shall be only too pleased to listen to him.

Mr. MARLER: I simply raised the point that the hon. member had not made it clear that there were other creditors outstanding who have to be satisfied. There are creditors outstanding at present who have $300,000,000 of the Dominion's obligations in their hands, and the money has to be procured to meet the demands of those creditors. Now those creditors are not the same people that the money is to be procured from at all, but a totally different set of creditors.

Mr. GOOD: Not necessarily.

Mr. MARLER: Not necessarily, but they are in this case. My hon. friend is pre-supposing an ideal case, and in the matter of debits and credits you very seldom get such a case. The minister is taking authority to borrow from someone else to pay an entirely different set of creditors; in other words, the fund procured from this new credit is to pay off an old credit. I cannot follow the argument of my hon. friend from Bow River at all.

Mr. McMASTER: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, we are quite beside the point, but the discussion is so interesting I beg the indulgence of the House just for a moment in order to make some observations concerning it. What the hon. member for Bow River asks the Finance Minister of this country is this: You have a country here with enormous potentialities and enormous wealth; why not pay off the debt falling due by issuing directly to the people of Canada your own promissory notes, instead of giving them to some broker and getting the money from him? That is really the question which has been propounded.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like the hon. member for Brome to keep in view this one particular point: The only suggestion I made that would change the present system is that we eliminate the bond house as such.

Mr. McMASTER: Exactly, that instead of giving the bond house the promissory notes of this Dominion—for that is all our bonds are, our promises to pay—and getting the bond houses to purchase our promises to pay and then disposing of them and making a profit out of the transaction; why should we not go to the people of Canada directly with our own promises to pay? His question is whether we could not take our own promises to pay and pay off all our domestic creditors—one debt which is due by us to them—by contracting with them a further debt, due by us to them at a more distant date of maturity. That is the question, and I may say that when you ask that question you delve into the most difficult and abstruse questions of banking. I do not think it is a subject matter for risibility. I consider it a matter of extreme difficulty. I know that a man like Reginald McKenna takes one view, and a man as sound in economics and as statesmanlike as Asquith takes another view. I am inclined to the view of Mr. McKenna, but I do not hold myself out as an economist, though I have, I believe, devoted some little time and attention to the study of this matter. The minister is proceeding by the orthodox method and it seems to me we have got to do a little more investigating and come to much more definite conclusions before we can depart from the orthodox method. I think the minister has this to say in his own defence, that from the time of the French Revolution onward, where governments have attempted to issue money solely on the credit of their own country, down to the present day, disaster has always followed that course. Take the French assignats; they were backed by the whole wealth of the French people; France was not a republic, but a kingdom, when the assignats were issued in the first place. The trouble is, once governments have attempted to issue currency based merely on the solvency and credit of their country, rarely have they been able to resist the temptation of issuing more currency and more credit than was required.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There has been no suggestion made here that the currency of the country should be based upon that asset only. This is simply a consolidation and funding of the national indebtedness.

Mr. McMASTER: It seems to me that exactly the same principle applies. What is proposed is that instead of going through this roundabout method, and I frankly admit it seems open to serious objections, and that we are paying very heavily for the financial assistance which bankers give us—nevertheless, the experience of humanity has been that where governments have attempted to create great credit, let us say, which will pass either in the form of currency or in the form of bonds, merely on their own credit, they have been unable to resist the temptation of issuing more currency or more credit than was required, and as a consequence we have had inflation and all the evils which inflation brings in its train. We have only to look at Russia to begin with, and at Austria—

Mr. CRERAR: And Germany.

Mr. McMASTER: I think I am following the method in its chronological order. I think Russia started the wholesale printing of fiat money.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the hon. member consider it greater inflation to float a loan of say $50,000,000 and pay $1,000,000 commission and 5 per cent interest on it, than to issue that loan direct as suggested by the hon. member for Bow River? Which would be the greater inflation?

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think there would be any real difference in inflation at all; it would be six of one and half a dozen of the other, except in so far as the first method might, what I might call, marshal the savings of the people. If by the issue of a government loan you merely marshal the savings of the people and apply them to a certain purpose, removing them from other purposes, then I think you avoid the pitfalls of inflation. Whatever the theoretical soundness of the view urged by hon. members opposite may be, the history of mankind shows that so far governments have been unable, when they took those steps, to resist the pitfalls which lay before them. We have the example of Russia, of Austria, Germany, aye, and of France, and for a time during the war, of Great Britain and the United States, showing us the evils of inflation. Once a government undertakes to create large amounts of credit you get inflation, and one of the brakes —it should not be necessary perhaps to have this brake—on the creation of credit under our present system is that the state has to pay for this credit by paying to these organizations which manage credit now very handsome profits for whatever assistance they give to the state.

It seems to me that is the defence of the minister. I think we cannot very well depart from the traditional orthodox method at the present time without a great deal of further study. I am far from saying that our present method is perfect. I believe, though, that the people in this country who have devoted attention to this financial question, who have been directing their minds to the study of the very bases of credit, which in certain instances were quite unknown to the bankers themselves, have been conferring a very great benefit on this country; but it seems to me that the study has to be pursued a little further, and more definite conclusions arrived at before we can depart from the traditional methods of financing.

Mr. SPENCER: Does my hon. friend contend that the only way to stop governments from inflating their credit is by having them pay an interest charge?

Mr. McMASTER: I do not say that is the only way but I say that from the time of the French Revolution downward the governments which have attempted to create credit without doing something of that sort have dropped into the pitfall of inflation. I think that is true; I do not think it can be gainsaid.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The position taken by some hon. members from the West is, that in respect of this sum of $300,000,000 that is falling due we should issue government notes for the payment of it, thereby avoiding commissions and interest charges. If that is a fair proposition and if it can be carried out why do we not pay our entire debt by that method?

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Somebody says "hear, hear", indicating that is his view. In reply I say that if we did that we would depreciate our currency and be in just the position that Russia, Germany and Austria are. As the hon. member who has just spoken has said, that is what would happen.

Mr. COOTE: I hesitate to voice my opinions in regard to this matter, but a good deal has been said about the wisdom of floating this loan in Canada, in the United States or in Great Britain; and several hon. members have argued, I think, that the loan should be floated outside of the Dominion so as to make more money available in Canada for the purchase of industrial securities and of goods, and thus to speed up or improve business conditions in this country. We seem to have departed from the old traditional idea of encouraging thrift among the masses. We do not wish them to hold these bonds; we would like them to spend their money either in the purchase of goods or in the purchase of more questionable securities.

I want to refer particularly to a statement which was made by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) in regard to bringing outside money into Canada. I am not going to give my own opinion on that policy because it might not carry much weight, but I should like to quote briefly from a speech delivered by the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, chairman of the Midland Bank, Limited. This speech was reported in the Toronto Saturday Night some time ago, and I would be glad if hon. members who attach weight to the opinion of Mr. McKenna would secure the article and read it. It might enable them to form some new ideas in regard to the volume of money which is available in any country for the carrying on of business. I am only going to quote very briefly from the article because I do not wish to take up an undue amount of time, more especially in view of the extended discussion which has already taken place. Mr. McKenna says in part:

Under the system which prevails in our country there is only one method by which we can add to or diminish the aggregate amount of our money. Gold coin is no longer minted, and additional paper currency is not issued except to meet the demands of the public. When the people require more currency they draw it from the banks and deposits are reduced as currency in circulation is increased. The amount of money in existence varies only with the action of the banks in increasing or diminishing deposits. We know how this is effected. Every bank loan and every bank purchase of securities creates a deposit, and every repayment of a bank loan and every bank sale destroys one.

Now I want to come to that part of his address which deals with the question of money flowing from one country to another:

People often talk of money going ahead, or of foreign money coming here, but, as a fact, when gold is not in use money is incapable of migration. The title to money may change. An individual may sell his sterling to an American for dollars, but the American will then own the sterling in England and the Englishman the dollars in the United States. If there is pressure to sell sterling, the exchange value of the pound will be lowered, and, temporarily, the burden of British payments in America will be increased. But the change of ownership does not remove the money, which necessarily remains, and can only be expended where it was created. No exchange transaction, no purchase or sale of securities, no import of foreign goods or export of our own can take money out of the country or bring it here. Those who wish to be meticulous may say that British travellers sometimes carry currency notes and change them in foreign countries, but the total of such transactions is too trifling to be taken into account. Bank loans and their repayment, bank purchases and sales, are in substance the sole causes of variation in the amount of our money.

Now, I am going to leave that part of the speech and quote something which possibly has a very direct bearing on the issuance of this government loan:

Suppose the Bank of England invests a million in war loans the seller receives a draft for £1,000,000 and pays it into his own bank which will consequently increase its balance with the Bank of England by that amount. Actually a million of bank cash will have been created which will become the basis of new bank loans. The repayment of a Bank of England loan or sale of securities by that bank has the opposite effect. It cancels so much bank cash and forces the banks, unless they abandon their established ratio of cash to deposits, to call in loans or sell investments. The Bank of England may make loans or enforce repayment by modifying or increasing the severity of its terms. It may buy or sell gold; it may buy securities or sell securities. Every transaction of this kind leads to a variation in the amount of money in the country, and by this means exercises a powerful influence on trade.

I am not going to weary the committee by reading any further from this address. As I said before it is instructive, and I think it would be a splendid thing if members of the committee would read that address by Mr. McKenna.

[Mr. Coote.]

So far as conditions in Canada are concerned the question as to whether there is money available in this country or not, is primarily one of credits issued by the bank. A year ago when we had some of the most eminent bankers in the Dominion before the Banking and Commerce committee they assured us there was an abundance of money in the banks to take care of business requirements in this country, provided business could furnish the proper security. The same condition undoubtedly exists to-day. I believe that our bank borrowings from the government under the Finance Act are less at this time than they have been for several years. The Acting Minister of Finance, if he would, could enlighten us on that point. At any rate I am satisfied the bank borrowings are at a very low point, and I am quite sure that the Finance department is quite willing to advance money under the Finance Act to our banks if proper securities are given. I know that the vaults of our banks are loaded down with these securities. The reason that business men complain of the tightness of money now is simply because the banks do not consider this is a good time to loan money. The banks can easily make available millions of dollars in the form of bank credits to our business men any day if they think these credits should be given to them. We are arguing altogether beside the point when we say that if this loan is floated in Canada rather than in the United States it is going to tie up money so that it will not be available for the carrying on of business in Canada. If the conditions are right so that the bankers of this country are assured that the securities they are offered are good, they will furnish all the money required, there is absolutely no doubt about that. But it is primarily a question as we are situated in this country to-day, for the bankers to decide whether the time is ripe for them to advance credit. We may be getting slightly away from the point, just now. I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) a question in regard to the rate of interest on the different loans which are maturing—why he is asking authority from the House on this occasion to take care of obligations, some of which, if I understood him aright, will not mature until 1926 and 1927.

Mr. ROBB: We are following the usual procedure in anticipating the requirements of the country. I have not the rate of interest before me, but I imagine most of the obligations are on the 5½ per cent basis excepting the treasury bills, which are issued at 5¼ per cent.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon) moved the third reading of Bill No. 47, to incorporate the United Church of Canada.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): I move:

> That the said bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole House for the purpose of amending the said bill by substituting the words "United Church in Canada" for the words "United Church of Canada" wherever the said words appear in the said bill.

I think it is wise for the House to amend the bill in this way. I have received a great many letters from people in different parts of Canada, members of various denominational bodies, objecting to the words as they appear in the bill as it stands. It is contended that the words "United Church of Canada" are too broad in their significance and that such a title savours a good deal of a national church. It is well known that in Great Britain the Episcopal church is known as the Church of England and the Presbyterian church as the Church of Scotland; and we know that in Canada the Church of England is known as the Church of England in Canada. There would seem to be good reason therefore for amending the bill in the way I have suggested. It may of course be argued that this matter should have come up when the bill was before the Private Bills committee. It is true that the proposed amendment might have been offered there, but I presume that the hon. member who introduced the bill overlooked the matter for the same reason as did other hon. gentlemen in the Private Bills committee. It would make no difference to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), and it would not in my opinion alter the effect of the bill, if the change I have proposed were adopted, so that the new church should be known as The United Church in Canada rather than The United Church of Canada. There is another argument that may be advanced against the change, and that is that five legislatures in Canada have already passed legislation embodying the term "The United Church of Canada". But there are four legislatures that have not passed on this bill, and consequently it would be very easy, in those legislatures at any rate, to have these substituted words take the place of the term at present in the bills which are and have been before the respective provincial legislative bodies. As regards the five legislatures which have already passed on the bill, it would be a simple matter when they met next year to have the various attorneys general of the provinces make the necessary alteration. It seems to me that this amendment is in the best interests of the country; it does not interfere with the principle of the bill and the hon. member who introduced the bill should I think accept it and allow the bill to go back to committee to have the change made.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): We must take exception to the amendment. It is true that on one phase of the question there may not be much difference between the two prepositions, "of" and "in", and either name would probably be perfectly acceptable were we now at the beginning of the discussion. But as the mover of the amendment (Mr. Duff) has pointed out, a bill to incorporate "The United Church of Canada" has been already adopted by certain provincial legislatures, and were we not to adopt a similar name now the difference would undoubtedly lead to inextricable confusion and possibly legal difficulties might arise the extent of which might not be foreseen at the present time. We would therefore respectfully urge the House to vote down the amendment and to ratify the name as agreed upon.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, it seems unfortunate that this bill comes before parliament after having previously been before five of our provincial legislatures, because when we seek to amend the bill in any way we are met with the answer at the hands of the promoters: "We cannot change it now; it is too late. If the bill had originally been introduced here we might have done this, that or the other thing, but as it first went to the provincial legislatures, and as a number of them have pronounced upon it, therefore our mouths must be closed, our hands must be tied." That is the only answer made on this occasion to the motion of my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). So it was when we proposed that the vote to be taken in the various churches should be taken by ballot The only objection of substance offered was that as five legislatures had already passed upon this or that clause, therefore this parliament must not interfere. Surely it is a strange situation that the federal parliament's power must be circumscribed in respect to an important measure simply because some of our provincial legislatures have seen fit to take action before the bill was introduced into this parliament at all. I for one dissent most emphatically from that position. The legislature of Ontario has not yet passed on this measure. I think that province represents probably wellnigh a third of the population of the Dominion. The legislature of the province of Quebec has not yet passed on this measure. The province of Quebec represents, I think, about a quarter of the population of the Dominion. But by reason of the fact that five of the less populous provinces have, through their legislatures, seen fit to pass a bill to which a number of the members of this House do not agree, that is urged now as an answer why we cannot change the terms of this bill.

To my mind the situation is ridiculous. This parliament should be free to act as it sees fit. If it is proper to change the title, let us change it; if it is proper to introduce any other clauses, let us do so before it is too late. I especially desire to point out that in the two most populous provinces, where I think more people reside who are interested in this very bill than in any other part of Canada, the legislatures have not yet acted, and if this House sees fit to amend the bill it is perfectly free to do so. Then the promoters of the bill can go back to the various legislatures which have passed similar bills and have them amended to bring them into accord with what legislation we see fit to pass. I think the House should pause before it allows an objection of the kind urged by my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) to have any effect at all. If that objection is good in regard to this bill, it may be good in regard to a hundred other bills in the future. The fact that a provincial legislature has passed legislation upon an involved question must not be permitted to tie the hands of this parliament. We must be free to act as we see fit.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I do not think any member in this House wants to tie the hands of parliament. Parliament is perfectly at liberty to take what action it pleases in regard to this bill, as the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) knows very well. There is no attempt on the part of those who are in favour of the bill as it now stands for third reading to press for any undue favours. Had this title been introduced in the Private Bills committee at the commencement, had the bill been so considered all through its course as "an act incorporating the United Church in Canada", I am sure no one would have objected to the title. The bill was before the Private Bills committee for weeks and the hon. member for Lunenburg found no fault with the title, and it seems strange that now it strikes him that this is an opportune time to move his amendment.

Mr. DUFF: I brought it in yesterday.

Mr. FORKE: Well, yesterday. The hon. member for South Wellington has stated that we object to the amendment because six of our provincial legislatures have passed similar legislation under this title. That is one of the reasons, but it is not the exact reason, although it is certainly a valid reason. I do not remember the exact phraseology of the legislation as it was passed by those provincial legislatures, but it reads something like this: This act shall come into force when the United Church of Canada has been incorporated by the Dominion parliament. Consequently the whole bill will fall to the ground if we adopt this amendment. So, Mr. Speaker, it is in no spirit of factious opposition that we object to the amendment. I am sure that were it possible to accept it without creating confusion we would do so. But really I do not think the amendment amounts to anything. No one in Canada but knows that there is no national church in this country. No Canadian parliament would ever think of attempting to establish a national church. That this was an attempt to do so might appeal to some prejudices, but really there is no thought of establishing a national church by using the title of the bill. We have adopted the name of The United Church of Canada, the bill has gone through the Private Bills committee and it has been before this House for days under that title, and no objection was raised until last night. I do not think it would be in the interests of the bill that the name should be now changed.

Mr. G. H. BOIVIN (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, since the inception of this legislation in this House I have been, in the lobbies, in the Private Bills committee and in the House a strong supporter of church union. I voted for it in committee because I consider that Canada is a land of religious tolerance, of religious liberty, and that those members of the different churches who desired to unite and who asked parliamentary sanction for church union should receive, as they did receive, the approval of a majority of this House. When it comes to the title of the bill I think we should pause and consider whether it is proper or not. I remember that in my short parliamentary experience legislation has often been amended in connection with banking and other financial institutions whose promoters have asked for incorporation under a name which would convey an erroneous impression. I remember a particular instance where the late Sir Rodolphe Forget, if I am not mistaken, applied to parliament for the incorporation of a bank to be known as the Bank of Canada. His application was refused and the name was changed.

To-day three different churches ask parliament to incorporate them as "The United Church of Canada." It is true that there is a qualification of the word "church" by the word "united", but if this word were deleted the title would remain "The Church of Canada," and I do not think that any church should be established in this country as the Church of Canada. I know I would not ask that for the church to which I am proud to belong, and I do not think that our good friends of the Anglican church would ask to have their church established as "The Church of Canada." I am sure that if our friends had given this matter sufficient consideration when they introduced the bill they would, as the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) says, have used a different title and perhaps it would have been "The United Church in Canada."

I understand that the acceptance of this amendment would cause some slight inconvenience. I understand that the promoters would be obliged to apply to the provincial legislatures for a slight amendment to bills that have already been introduced and adopted. But what is that in comparison with the sanction by this parliament of a title which to those who do not know Canadian affairs, may convey the idea that we have abandoned our ideas of religious liberty and that like some other countries we have accepted the idea of having an established church? I do not think the majority of the Canadian people would ever consent to any church being the established church in Canada. The title may not have been chosen to convey that impression but for the outsider, for the immigrant, it is certainly a misleading title. There are in other countries established churches. They have the Church of England in Great Britain, which we all respect as the established church in that country but we have always felt that in this country there never would be one church with more rights or privileges than another. If we object to financial institutions taking a title of this character we should also object to religious institutions doing so.

Mr. BROWN: Have we not the Union Bank of Canada?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, we have the Union Bank of Canada, the Canadian Bank of Commerce and the Royal Bank of Canada. But we have no Presbyterian Church of Canada, we have no Catholic Church of Canada and we have no Anglican Church of Canada. Why should we have a United Church of Canada? I do not want to go further and say that the adoption of that title might result in an interference with the excellent missionary work that these united churches have been doing in the past in foreign countries. I am not going to enter into that, but I realize that it might be difficult for their missionaries to go to foreign lands and ask people who never desired to establish themselves in this country to join a church which would have the name "United Church of Canada." I merely mention that for their own consideration. But as a citizen of Canada, proud of the religious liberty we in this country have always enjoyed, I do say that I would not like to see any legislation adopted by this House which would enable any church to sail under the false colours of being the established church in this country. I do not think the title should be adopted. I therefore will vote for the amendment.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): The matter might be one of no importance if there were not possibly involved in it the setting aside of provincial legislation. I think we ought to be very clear as to what may be the possible effect upon provincial legislation. Personally I do not think anybody in the House would object to the use of the word "in" instead of "of". But under the circumstances what does it mean? The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) has stated that it would involve the setting aside, temporarily at least, of the provincial legislation, and that might be a serious embarrassment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. GOOD: Would it not therefore be worth while to pass the legislation under the existing name, trusting that if the name is not suitable or not exactly what is desired it may subsequently be changed by concurrent action in the Dominion and the provinces?

Mr. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a good deal both in the committee and in this House regarding the effect that any change in this bill might have upon provincial legislation. I agree with the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that too much stress has been laid upon this matter. We have been debarred from debating the question in a great many instances because, forsooth, it was going to affect provincial legislation. My contention is that this bill should have come to the House first so that we could have passed upon it and there would not have been these continual references to what has been done in the provinces. If things have been done wrongly, let them go back and have them done right.

In respect to the particular point in question, my attention has been frequently called by many people to the name of this church. The matter was not officially brought up, but it has been brought to the attention of those promoting the bill. It has been referred to in the press of the country and there has been a good deal of talk about it, yet we are told now the bill cannot be changed on account of the effect any change might have upon provincial legislation. I have had dozens of letters upon the subject. I have refrained from referring to the name in committee because personally I was not particularly concerned with the name; I was more concerned with some other features of the bill which I considered objectionable. Some of these we have rectified in committee; others we tried to get rectified in this House. A few nights ago the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), who was not in the committee and who had not heard the discussion so far as it went in the House, told us that so far as he was concerned—and he thought he voiced the opinion of all those in favour of the bill—if anything came up in connection with which fairness should be shown to those who were more or less opposed to the bill, he would be quite willing to act in that way. But even with that promise of his, the House did not change one syllable or one sentence of the bill. We asked for only a small thing the other day in respect to the voting, and what did we get? We just got the steam roller. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) told us what we should do in the interests of harmony. What a wonderful harmonizer he is! I have only to refer to the letter he wrote to members of this House, which also appeared in the press, to show what a harmonizing influence the minister is in the House.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend has nothing to do with that letter.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I have nothing to do with it? Well, the House has something to do with it, and it seems to me I have some right to refer to it when an hon. member from his place in this House referred to the writing of that letter as like a billy-goat butting up against a billboard.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I took it, didn't I?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am glad to know the hon. gentleman took it; that means he took something. At all events the harmonizing influence of the minister from the point of view of his letter writing capacities does not count for very much. My objection to this name and also to the method of voting is based upon statements and requests made to me from my own people. This House passes a bill telling the members of the Presbyterian church in Canada how they are to vote. An hon. gentleman says I am not in order, but I think I am entitled to speak of that, because it is one of the things the House decided the other night by the steam roller process to which I have referred. We asked to have our people vote by ballot, and we were told: You have to vote in a certain way. Then when we demonstrated to the House the fairness of our request we were told: Oh well, the provinces have decided it that way. It all comes back to what the provinces have done, and the mistake that was made in carrying the bill to the provinces first, and then coming here afterwards. This parliament has been cramped in the discussion of this measure, in the framing of it and in the amending of paragraphs and sections of the bill, simply because of taking the bill to the provincial legislatures first. We are told tonight that this matter was not brought up in the Private Bills committee. That is so. It was referred to several times; there was no motion made in reference to this particular matter, but I do not see that that is any valid reason why it should not be brought up here. I agree with the member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) who has just spoken. I think the points he has made are well taken, and that we should not give any name to any church from which it can be inferred that that church has any connection whatever with the state. For that reason I am opposed to the name, and although the bill has practically passed the House in many of its features, I am still strongly opposed to the manner of voting that was forced upon the Presbyterians of this country.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): I am not very much concerned as to the fight between different denominations in regard to this matter, but I must put myself upon record as being absolutely opposed to the title of this bill. I happen to be a member of the Anglican church. True, I may not be a man that prates my religion all the time. Nevertheless, I happen to enjoy the rights and privileges of that church, as all my forebears did, and I do not apologize for it. The title of this bill in itself is insulting to me, and it is insulting to a great many other people in this country. They call it the United Church of Canada. We of the Anglican church are united, and by parliament putting its imprimatur upon that particular title it is saying to the Baptists, to the Roman Catholics, and to the Anglican Catholics of this country: You are not a united body. What I say is this: Call this church the United church or any other term you like, but do not say it is the United Church of Canada because that carries the implication that the rest of us are not united. Some hon. members may say to me: In your particular denomination you have the high church, the low church, the broad church—and some people even say no church, but we do not listen to any slurs of that sort. We always fight these things out internally among ourselves. We have our synod and our bishops and we decide these things among ourselves. But whether my political life be long or short, whether or not I am going to be met with my attitude on this particular question, I will not as a member of this House vote to put my imprimatur on a bill which I say is a slur upon the particular denomination to which I have the honour to belong. Therefore, I shall vote for the amendment which is proposed.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston): A preposition in a name may not mean very much. For example, those who did not concur in the union of these churches would have preferred to have the name the Presbyterian Church "in" Canada. That is much preferable to saying the Presbyterian Church "of" Canada, which will exclude any other part of the Presbyterians from seeking incorporation with them. The preposition "of" always carries with it the idea of possesion. We have this particular method of showing possession, and anything to which we add "of Canada" means it is Canada's. So that to call this church the United Church of Canada means that it is Canada's united church. It cannot mean anything else but that, and for that reason it would prevent the union of any other bodies. There are many other bodies in this country which might possibly unite. The Baptist church and the Roman Catholic church might unite, but they are prevented by this bill from becoming the United Church of Canada. The Free Methodists or the Hornerites might unite with the Christian Science church, and they would be prevented by this bill from calling themselves the United Church of Canada. It would be much preferable to give this church a name which would not prevent any other union such as I have mentioned. The Presbyterian Church of Canada, which is one church that we have now as a result of this bill, might wish to unite with another body, but they could not call themselves the United church, and so with other bodies. It seems very important to me that the correct name should be given, so that the possibility of further unions will not be prevented, as they will be by this name.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Before this amendment is disposed of I would like to remark that I think those who are objecting to the name are a little late in the day in taking that stand. It is a matter which has been discussed for weeks past, whether the name was a proper one or not, and now that we have reached this stage objections are being raised to the name—

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What is wrong in correcting a wrong at any time?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It has been contended all along that it was wrong to use the name which it had. Strong exception has been taken to the name, although no open discussion took place in the House so far as I know, with regard to that feature of the bill. It is with very much regret that I have listened to the discussion that has taken place in connection with this, to me, most unfortunate matter. I have refrained from taking part in the debate which has taken place, and would have much preferred that even this discussion to-night should not have taken place. I thought when I came into the House to-night and heard the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) pointing out his objections to the name, that this matter surely should have been remedied long before we reached this stage. I listened to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) referring to what took place here yesterday, when, he said, the steam roller was applied to a very reasonable request on the part of those who belonged to a church which was being submerged by this legislation. I think every one must admit that request was a very reasonable one, yet it received no consideration at the hands of a considerable proportion of the members of this House, particularly my hon. friends to my left, who were here almost to a man in order to see that a snap verdict might be obtained in certain instances rather than that a fair expression of opinion should be obtained in regard to this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman must not use such an expression. The debate has been characterized by moderation and courtesy on both sides and the hon. member is not justified in using an expression which would suggest that there has been a lack of fair play on the part of some hon. gentleman in the discussion of this question. I would therefore ask my hon. friend to refrain from using such an expression.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: May I ask to what expression exception is taken?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is imputing unfair motives in suggesting that many hon. members united in an effort to obtain a snap verdict; to stifle discussion and prevent any proper amendment being made to the bill. I would ask the hon. gentleman to kindly refrain from using language of that character.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I would be sorry to violate the rules of the House, but it is quite evident that I have been misunderstood. The snap verdict to which I referred was not in this House but outside of it. I referred to the vote to be taken of the congregation as to whether they were willing to enter into union or not.

Mr. BOIVIN: A very good figure eight.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I did not have the advantage of listening to all the evidence which was submitted to the Private Bills committee, but I heard sufficient to convince me that some effort was being made by the leaders of the union movement in the church to which my people and I have always belonged which it was not desired should be ventilated openly; there was a determination that the old church should be submerged and cease to exist. Under the circumstances I am not at all surprised that hon. members should rise here and object to the name "United Church of Canada." I am inclined to think that a more suitable name, perhaps, would be the "Disunited Church of Canada." I regret, more deeply than most hon. gentlemen possibly realize, to have to refer to this question in this way. I was never more ashamed of the effort that was put forth than when I witnessed what took place here yesterday with a view of preventing a fair and honest expression of opinion on the parts of the churches affected.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Some hon. gentlemen are very careful about the observance of order. Evidently they do not understand the rules of the House or they would not have interjected the remark. I wish to say that the method of voting which those criticizing the bill sought to bring into effect was one that would have enabled all those belonging to the Presbyterian church to give a fair and honest expression of opinion on the matter. The bill in its present form does not enable that to be done and consequently, in my opinion, the name "United church" is not an appropriate one in this instance. It is quite apparent that many congregations—I am referring particularly to the Presbyterian denomination—do not intend to be submerged even although they are not permitted to retain the old name with which they have so long been associated and in which they took such a justifiable pride. Notwithstanding the lateness of the session parliament found the time to devote to much legislation such as should not have come before it. This union, if it is a union, could have been accomplished without all this legislation that we have been passing. I referred this afternoon to the habit we have contracted in Canada of passing legislation defining and restricting the operations of the people in business and in every other way. If there is one thing that we have a surfeit of in this country at the present time it is legislation. If we would cut out a lot of our legislation and exercise a little more common sense I am inclined to think it would be better for all concerned. I regret that this issue of the name should have been delayed through all the proceedings that have taken place in the several legislatures and in the federal House of Commons up to this stage. I rose with a good deal of reluctance but I thought it was my duty now to speak in view of the fact that I abstained from speaking during all the days and weeks this bill has been before the Private Bills committee and before the House. There is something verging on the ridiculous in the fact that we are only dealing with this matter at this late stage when it should have been remedied long ago; but rather than allow this name to go into effect I am prepared to support the amendment which has been moved.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Question, question.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I think parliament ought to have some respect for itself. Parliament is passing an act providing for a church union, and as far as I can see it is the greatest church union that has ever occurred in this country. It may be a point that will mark great progress in Canada. Perhaps we have too many churches in Canada, and it might be better if we had fewer of them and more union. Having taken the stand it has I do not think parliament should, by this amendment, impugn the legislation that has already been adopted.

Mr. MARTELL: I am satisfied with the membership I have in the church of my forebears.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Never mind, perhaps the hon. gentleman would like to have a pew in it. I say that as we have virtually passed this bill which unifies three great denominations in this country—the Presbyterian, the Methodist and the Congregationalist—I do not see why we should be called upon to adopt this amendment. I am not questioning the right of those who are supporting the amendment to vote for their own proposal; but I think it would be better to let this measure which brings about unity go into effect. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) having made allusion to the appropriateness of the titles of banks, and pointed out that parliament has been very critical in the matter, let me say that there is a bill now before parliament—it is in the Upper House and will doubtless find its way here in due course—which proposes to bestow upon a bank the title of Banque Canadienne Nationale.

Mr. BOIVIN: That sounds more like a railway than a church.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Nevertheless there is such a bill before the Senate at the present time and I suppose it will shortly reach this House. Here is a case where a private bank in this country is seeking authority to call itself Banque Canadienne Nationale.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We can change it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): We can change it. Perhaps my hon. friend will introduce legislation of that kind into this House. We have adopted union in this country. It is a great union, a credit to the country and a prediction perhaps of something greater to come. The hope of the world to-day is that Christianity is to be stronger and more united. The argument against Christianity to-day is that it is too much united perhaps, and yet it lacks union. It preaches unity and does not practise it in all cases. In this instance we are trying to practise it. Certain denominations have got together and have tried to unify themselves as far as this measure can unify them. I hope they will get unity. I hope this tendency towards union will grow rather than diminish.

Mr. G. C. WILSON (Wentworth): I wish to enter my protest against the use of the words "United Church of Canada." I cannot see that the name is anything but a misnomer. I cannot understand why this House should pass such legislation. The hon. member who just addressed the Chamber (Mr. Maclean, York) said it referred to the act of union. Is it not a fact that the Presbyterian church as a denomination has a proud record? It has done great work. Denominationalism is not a detriment to any country but is a benefit. I cannot for the life of me understand how parliament can approve of these words "United Church of Canada." I regret I was not there in the early part of the debate. What about the Anglican church or the Roman Catholic church? There are other denominations in this country, and when you speak of United church you give the impression that all the churches in Canada are united, which is not the fact. In my opinion this could be the most disunited church that had ever been known, speaking from the standpoint of the Presbyterian church. If we say to the Presbyterians who wish their church to remain as the Presbyterian Church in Canada that they cannot have the title, and then turn around and incorporate there applicants as the United Church of Canada and try to insist that that is in the best interests of this country, I must say that I cannot see it, and I certainly think that parliament should not adopt any measure that will perhaps grant a special privilege to any organization. I certainly hope and trust that parliament in its judgment will not agree to any such action.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. DUFF: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is now 9.15 and the time allotted to the consideration of private bills has therefore expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BOIVIN: The point of order is well taken.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) has properly observed, the point of order is well taken unless the House will give its unanimous consent to the third reading of the bill. The first hour from 8 to 9 is devoted to private bills and I must therefore pass to the other business of the day unless it is the unanimous wish of the House that I put the question. Apparently the House is not unanimous on the point.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the unanimous wish of the House that the bill be now read a third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is there an objection?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Am I to understand that the House concedes its unanimous consent to the third reading of the bill now?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: The House not being unanimous, and the hour for the consideration of private bills having been exhausted, the House will now resume in committee of the Whole on the resolution under discussion before recess standing in the name of the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb).

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I beg to state, as a matter of record only, that I voted for the amendment in mistake.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): I desire also to state for the same purpose that I voted for the amendment in mistake. I regret having done so through a misapprehension as to the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: At page 21 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms it is provided in paragraph No. 73:

If a member who has heard the question put should vote inadvertently, contrary to his intention, he cannot be allowed to correct the mistake, but his vote must remain as first recorded.

Again, according to No. 79:

A vote, once given, cannot be withdrawn.

May, at page 343, deals with the matter of the recording of votes in England, where the practice is different from that of the parliament of Canada; in England each party goes to its own lobby when the division is taken. May says:

If a member goes into the wrong lobby, through inadvertence, it is the rule in the Commons, in opposition to the practice of the Lords, to hold the member bound by the vote he has actually given. On the 21st June, 1864, Sir Colman O'Loghlen, in committee on the Court of Chancery (Ireland) Bill, went into the wrong lobby, and carried, by his vote, the question that the chairman do leave the chair. He stated his case to the Speaker, when the House was resumed, but was told that, having heard the question put, there was no remedy for his error.

REFUNDING LOAN—$300,000,000

The House resumed, in committee, consideration of the resolution standing in the name of the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) to provide for the raising by way of loan of the sum of $300,000,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL: A short time before the House rose at six o'clock I asked the minister a question to which I did not receive a complete answer. At present, the banks are permitted to take certain securities, among them Dominion bonds, to the Minister of Finance and to secure in return Dominion notes. I asked the Acting Minister of Finance why, under these circumstances, the government itself could not deposit its own bonds with the Finance department and secure in return the Dominion notes which ordinarily are handed to the banks. An hon. member, I believe the member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes) suggested that this would cause inflation. I do not think it would increase the inflation; as it stands at the present time, these Dominion notes are issued not against gold but against bonds or other securities, sometimes industrial bonds, commercial bonds and notes from business houses. To-day there is inflation to the same extent in so far as the bank is concerned, and I should like the minister to explain in what way he considers my suggestion unsound from the banking standpoint. If it is unsound for the government, surely it is unsound to permit it in the interests of the banks.

Mr. ROBB: We debated this question all afternoon and I said I did not believe it was sound banking to Russianize the securities of Canada.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am not—

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member is getting away from the resolution, the purpose of which is to provide the means of raising a loan of $300,000,000. He is entering upon a discussion of banking systems generally and it seems to me that the debate is going beyond the point of relevancy to this particular resolution.

Mr. CALDWELL: If this is made a domestic loan, there is no thought of making the bonds tax exempt?

Mr. ROBB: Some recent issues of bonds have not been tax exempt.

Mr. CALDWELL: I understand that. I thought that possibly the strongest criticism of early victory loans was that they were made tax exempt. It has been stated in the House this afternoon that a great deal of Canadian money is tied up in victory bonds, and therefore is not available for the business needs of the country. I think possibly there is something in this statement. But the more serious aspect is that we have immense sums of Canadian capital tied up in victory bonds on which we do not and cannot collect any tax; therefore the poorer people must to that extent bear a heavier burden of taxation. I commend the government for the recent issues of government bonds without tax exemption, and I am glad to hear that there is no thought of reverting to the old system.

Mr. HUGHES: If we could ascertain whether or not there is a surplus of liquid capital in this country at the present time, we could decide fairly well which would be preferable, a domestic or a foreign loan. I think the people of Canada are pretty well agreed upon these principles: That our natural resources are very extensive; and that we want population and capital to develop them. If these principles are sound, and if there is a shortage of liquid capital, then unquestionably it would be better for us to float a foreign loan. If, on the other hand, there is an excess of liquid capital over and above what is required to carry on the nation's business, to meet all local demands, then to that extent, and to that extent only, a domestic loan would be advisable. Now, it has been stated here by men who are in control of financial organizations that there is a shortage of capital. The Acting Minister of Finance has access to avenues of information that are not available to the ordinary citizen, and he is therefore in the best position to decide this question. He is able to consult the bankers, the capitalists of the country, who can furnish him with reliable information on this point. Consequently we must under these circumstances leave the matter to his decision, for if he is capable of filling the position he occupies, he is capable of deciding this question in the best interests of the Dominion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I remember correctly, Mr. Chairman, some years ago the Canadian Northern Railway was financed by the direct extension of the credit of the government to the amount of $25,000,000. Do I understand that discussion of that manner of financing is precluded by your ruling on the question asked by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell)?

The CHAIRMAN: I do think that we are limited to the question of expediency, and as to whether the money should be obtained in certain markets. I think the debate which developed this afternoon was more or less on the question of the system of banking.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As I understood the question of the hon. member for Mackenzie, it was not relevant to the system of banking but had reference solely to whether we would go to the banks for accommodation or whether the government itself could issue notes.

The CHAIRMAN: I think that would be in order.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Your ruling then, Mr. Chairman, would leave my question perfectly in order. The question resolves itself into whether the government proposes to use the means for obtaining money that at present is the special prerogative of the banks. I am quite ready to agree with the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) that there are very grave dangers in inflation, that it is very difficult to tell where any government would stop once it embarked on such a financial policy. But I submit that we have that very system in effect to-day. If our currency were entirely based on gold, if there were behind our note circulation dollar for dollar of gold, I submit that the question of the dangers of inflation would be quite pertinent; but we have that condition of affairs in Canada now, and I do not think we will ever see a return to the gold standard. When the banks take to the Minister of Finance industrial, municipal and Dominion bonds and the notes of private business men, and against the deposit of those securities receive an issue of government notes, why, that is nothing but fiat money; there is direct inflation every time that occurs. It is not a question of deciding whether inflation itself is right or wrong; I think we all must admit that it is wrong; but we have that very system in operation to-day, and we have to decide whether we are going to use this means ourselves or leave it as the special prerogative of the banks. I should like the minister to explain a little more fully his statement that it is unsound for the government to use the very system that has been created for the use of the banks to-day. If it is unsound for the government to use the system, then the system must be equally unsound when used by the banks.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, I would answer an observation made by the hon. member for Mackenzie. He states that whenever under the Finance Act the banks take securities and deposit them with the government there is inflation. I do not agree with that statement. Inflation is where you increase either the actual money or the bank credit of the country beyond the actual needs of the country. An increase in credit, whether it is in the form of dollar bills or in bank credit, which merely keeps pace with the increase of the business of the country is not inflation. One of the factors which tend to prevent inflation under the Finance Act is that banks are obliged when they borrow money on the securities which they deposit with the government to pay the interest upon them. It is true they borrow the money for the purpose of lending it again at a profit, but they have always got the interest to pay; and then of course they have the solvency and the soundness of their institution to bear in mind—considerations which should operate to prevent them from making undue use of this advantage.

Mr. SHAW: Is it not true that one of the chief complaints against the federal reserve system has been that the member banks have been able to get money at a cheap rate and loan it at a high rate? Consequently it is to their interest to borrow; there is inflation and the evils which inflation causes. Is that not true? In Canada the rate which the banks pay under the Finance Act is 3 per cent; they readily get 8 per cent. Does that not create inflation in Canada as it did in the United States?

Mr. McMASTER: With any system that involves elasticity in the currency of the country, whether that currency be bank credit or ordinary currency, you have a country exposed to inflation or deflation because inflation or deflation will depend on the attitude of mind of those who are in control of the credit facilities of the country. We have heard the Federal Reserve Bank very severely criticised for inflation; we have heard it just as strongly criticised for a process of deflation when the Federal Reserve Bank called in the loans it had made to the different banking institutions of the United States and they in turn had to call in the loans they had made to their customers. You will find no infallible rule in any system of banking or of credit; mistakes will be made. But the value of such a discussion as this—and I am doubtful whether this is the proper time and place for it—is to attract public attention to what are the real bases of the credit of the country. We have been too much accustomed to regard money as consisting in the mere dollar bills or ten or twenty dollar bills which happen to be in the pockets or the tills of the people. But I think I am right in stating that not more than 10 per cent of the business transactions of the country are conducted with currency; 90 per cent are conducted through the credit system which really comes down to nothing more nor less than entries in the books of the bankers of the country. What I wanted to point out when I rose in the first place was that for bankers to take sound securities to the government and in exchange for them to get currency which can be used in the business of the country is not of necessity inflation. If it is for the purpose and is limited to the object of creating enough credit instruments to keep pace with but not to run ahead of the business of the country it is not necessarily inflation.

Mr. CRERAR: I rise to a point of order. I submit that this whole discussion for the last ten minutes has been out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I agree with the hon. member; I think it is.

Mr. CRERAR: There are some, at any rate, in the House who want to get on with the business of the House.

Mr. SHAW: I submit that the discussion is entirely in order. The hon. member (Mr. Crerar) must have misunderstood the question at issue. The question is whether or not the government in floating this loan might not issue its own credit instead of going to a foreign country or some place else to get credit through bond houses. That as I understand it is the issue that is under discussion by the hon. member for Brome.

The CHAIRMAN: If that was the issue it would be in order, but I did not so understand it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: A few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, you ruled this very question in order. I asked a question of the Acting Minister of Finance, but the hon. member for Brome undertook to answer it.

Mr. McMASTER: I must apologize to the hon. member if I interfered with any answer he was seeking from the Acting Minister of Finance. I had no intention to obtrude myself into the discussion and I beg the committee's pardon if I in any way transgressed.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I would like to have the answer from the Acting Minister of Finance, but I wish to put a question to the hon. member for Brome and I will ask him to answer it after I have received the answer from the minister. He spoke about the money secured through the issue of Dominion notes, issues directly against securities, as not being inflation. There is a good deal of difference of opinion about that. Does he consider money secured in that way as fiat money? Fiat money, as I understand it, is money behind which there is no gold, and when there is no gold behind money then, according to the orthodox view, there must be inflation. Perhaps the hon. member for Brome will reply to that after I have obtained the minister's answer to my question.

Mr. ROBB: It is so long since my hon. friend put the question that I have lost sight of it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I pointed out to the minister that at present the banks are permitted to deposit with the Minister of Finance certain securities, among them Dominion government bonds, against issues of Dominion notes. Would it not be just as sound for the government to issue its own bonds and deposit them with the Minister of Finance, secure the Dominion notes in return for those bonds and put them into circulation?

Mr. ROBB: I think if we undertook to follow that system of financing the credit of Canada would not be where it is to-day.

Mr. SHAW: Why?

Mr. ROBB: I have given my answer. That is my opinion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister regard the method of financing adopted in the case of the railways some years ago as unsound?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the hon. member (Mr. Campbell) would now be glad of an answer from the hon. member for Brome.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am not entirely satisfied with the minister's answer. It is not a question whether this is sound banking or not. I am ready to admit with the minister that it is not sound banking, but the relative unsoundness of it is what I am trying to get at. If it is unsound to do it in regard to the banks then it is unsound for the government to do it. But it is considered orthodox; it is considered sound banking today. Why, then, is it unsound for the government to take to itself the rights and prerogatives and privileges that it gives to the banking institutions.

Mr. HUGHES: Since you have ruled this discussion in order, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words more. Let us bring it back to the simplest elements so that we may understand it more clearly. Take, for instance, a farmer in good circumstances. He has horses and cattle, farm implements, grain and land. He is known to be a reliable man who meets his obligations. He issues a note, say, for $100. Anybody who has money to lend would take that note if it had a reasonable time to run. But suppose he issues a similar note every day in the week for months, or every hour in the day—why, the notes would very soon be far below par; a little later they would be worth very little, and finally they would be worth nothing at all. A nation could do the same thing by issuing its paper to excess. We have seen Russia, Austria and Germany do it until their paper became worthless.

Mr. SPENCER: Has any one in this House to-day suggested issuing paper to excess?

Mr. HUGHES: I am not stating that, but I think that is implied in the arguments of some hon. gentlemen on the other side. The government of Canada issues paper currency; the banks of Canada issue paper currency, and between the two issues the full requirements of the people are met. If the government decided upon issuing a much larger quantity of this paper than is now in circulation there would be no room for it unless the privileges and the powers the banks have in respect to the issuing of currency were taken away, and that would raise a very big question. If those privileges and powers were taken away the government could issue its own paper without inflating the currency, without reaching the danger point. Suppose the government issued all the currency the country demanded, all that it could absorb. At some seasons of the year more currency is required than at other seasons, and the government would have to be in a position to take care of the excess currency as it was presented by giving for it something that would have an international value—for instance, gold. The government evidently could not redeem its own excess issue by another issue. That is the full limit to which the government could go. In my judgment the government could not issue any more notes than are now in circulation, because the people of Canada could not absorb them; they are not needed in the daily business of the country, and could not therefore be issued unless the government withdrew from the banks the power and privilege they now possess. That is a very big question, and one that would involve other considerations altogether.

Mr. GARDINER: Representations have have been made in the committee this afternoon with reference to the possibility of floating a loan, say in the United States or Great Britain, to meet our maturing obligations. We floated a loan in New York two years ago for $100,000,000, and I would ask the minister what consideration did Canada receive in exchange for our bonds? Did we receive gold? Did we receive United States currency, or did we receive banking credits?

Mr. ROBB: I have heard this question argued very often in this House and different theories are advanced as to what is received in exchange. I have heard some hon. members argue that it would be goods. There is a great difference of opinion on this point.

Mr. GARDINER: I asked the minister what we actually did receive for the $100,000,000 of bonds that we sold in the New York market. We must have received something. Did we receive gold for those bonds. United States currency, or banking credits?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We did not receive goods. The government does not receive goods.

Mr. ROBB: But the country does. We received a credit in the banks that was worth gold if we had demanded it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid we will never get anywhere to-night discussing this question, but I am just going to take one or two features which have developed as the discussion has gone along. In the first instance, I am sure the House was moved by the very feeling congratulations conveyed by the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) to my hon. friend upon issuing bonds which are not free of taxation. The hon. minister saw the joke all right; he is laughing now. Of course, once upon a time, during a period of great stress and uncertainty, bonds were for the first time in Canada issued free of taxation. It was not a new idea at all. Government bonds for years in the United States, as hon. gentlemen know who have been following this question, and not only government bonds, but practically all state and municipal obligations, and obligations of public service companies, are free of federal taxation. So the error, if error there be, that was fallen into during that time of stress, certainly had any amount of example and precedent for it, and it was not followed for a very long time. It was some time before my hon. friend had to bother about a funding issue. We stopped that. Of course, the memory of the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton does not go back as far as 1919. Our last victory loan in 1919 was taxable, and of course we have persisted ever since in that course, and we are going to, I hope, entirely in the future.

Now, on the question of inflation and deflation, Mr. Chairman, I do not mind saying frankly that I have found the more I learned about it, the less I could talk about it. When I was embarking upon a study of the subject I could talk all day long on either inflation or deflation. It is an extraordinary thing, that question of inflation and deflation; how at first the vista is so enormous, and the possibilities are so great, and we go into it with great enthusiasm; we want to get on a better basis, if there is any way of getting on it, and we want to stay on it. But the more you go into it, the more you study it, the more circumscribed the vista becomes. You have difficulties here and difficulties there which become greater the better you understand them. I think we can safely say that we have not got back to the gold basis at the present time, but I am inclined to think that we will come back to it again. I think all countries will, when they can afford to do it, because after all real tangible values are good in business, and the more direct and the more real your yardstick is, if you can only keep it like a yardstick, instead of it going in all directions, like we have had it the better for us all. But for the time being the whole world, outside of the United States, and the United States for a time in fact, has got away from the gold standard, and we have to wait.

I am frank to say that when I had the task of administering Canada's finances, take in 1920 particularly, we were entirely away from any gold standard, not only as a matter of law, but much more as a matter of fact. As a matter of law, bank bills were made legals just the same as anything else. We had our law which prevented the movement of gold in or out. Legally we were entirely away from the gold standard, but in fact we were much more so; we were completely divorced from it. In 1920, the first year that the control of wheat was off, when the wheat board was no longer functioning, there was very grave doubt in the minds of some people whether it would be possible to finance the crop. Well, the crop was financed without very great difficulty.

I remember that a very learned gentleman who could talk very convincingly and eloquently on the question of inflation and deflation demonstrated to an audience in this city in 1920 that Canada was absolutely insolvent, as a result of the tremendous inflation of the country at that time. What was that inflation? Of course, we had a certain amount of inflation resulting from the war. Hon. gentlemen will recall that the percentage of gold behind our legals had been changed, but over and above that, at that particular time a large amount of the legals out were simply legals which had been issued to finance the wheat crop. The amount was large; I forget for the moment just what it was, but what was done and the result of what was done shows that when you have inflation and when you have not inflation—and that inflation may not depend upon the amount of your issue—well, though it was said that we were hopelessly insolvent, the whole of those surplus funds were retired in due course out of the sale of our wheat, of our flour, and of our packing house products. Those were the three things against which I was issuing legals to a very large extent. They were all got rid of; the currency all disappeared

The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) is very near the truth when he says that the question of inflation of currency does not depend so much on the volume of currency by itself; that it depends rather upon the volume of currency in ratio to the demand within the country for the use of currency. There is another way in which it can be expressed which, I think, perhaps makes it a little easier to understand. Take for example the issuing of legals under the circumstances I have mentioned in the year 1920. There is a direct ratio between commodities and currency. It is the amount of commodities, of wealth produced, and the ratio which exists between them and the currency itself which in fact determines whether there is inflation of currency or not. And there is one good thing about the present system which is in fact a recognition of our currency on a commodity basis. Take the gold; there is one good thing about it. The whole of that redundant issue automatically came in, automatically was cancelled, and automatically disappeared Why? Because in the case of every bank that had it, it just meant that they were paying out 5 per cent if they held it. It came back, it passed in, and the obligation of the country disappeared. So I am not very much afraid of currency inflation so long as I know that that inflation is something which is in proper relation to the average commodity movement in the country. That is what we need it for.

Mr. McMASTER: It is partly inflation in that case.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think it can well be inflation so long as the currency of the country is merely sufficient to do what currency is meant for, namely, not only to allow our business activities to be carried on in the ordinary sense but also to permit the full exchange of commodities, using the currency itself for a basis. Of course there are other matters of inflation and they are somewhat connected with the subject I have just alluded to. Take for example government bonds. One of the greatest causes of inflation in every country was the issue of government bonds, and the re-issue of them and the use in different re-issues of practically the original dollar with some enlargement of the principal. That alone of itself does not make inflation. Hon. gentlemen talk about loans being made by banks to customers, and treat that fact as if it creates inflation. It does not so long as it is proper business. Supposing, for example, that those government loans had been for the purpose of enlarging our agricultural and industrial activities, costing 5 to 6 per cent but bringing in as a result of the enlargement of those activities a return of 10 per cent? There is no inflation there. On the contrary, instead of inflation you have a very useful investment. But these government loans were not for any of these useful things. Why, there was not one victory loan that had anything really useful for its purpose except enabling business to be carried on for the time. We were simply paying the cost of maintaining our men overseas. Everything was being blown up, our money was being dissipated, and therefore there was inflation.

Now, I am afraid I am coming back to my preliminary thoughts in talking as long as I have, but there is another thing we have to think of in connection with these loans. In the first instance hon. gentlemen are not quite right when they think that all of the bonds of this country are held or very largely or almost exclusively held by the big corporations. They are not. There are heavy holdings of bonds by corporations that the people as a whole are tremendously interested in. I think I would be safe in saying that the holders of life insurance policies in this country have larger holdings of these bonds than they have of any other security. I think I would be quite safe in saying that, and it means that there is practically one in almost every family. They are very directly interested. I do not know what the proportion of holders is now but I could have told once. I remember in the old times the hundreds and thousands of applications which we had, and I was very completely familiar also with the tremendous amount of accounts there were in connection with those loans. That is one of the reasons for the cost of managing such a loan, why it is so great. Not only were hundreds of thousands of cheques issued but there were millions of coupons. If these registered bonds were held by just a few concerns it would be very much cheaper to carry on the management of such a loan. I do not know what the number of cheques is to-day, but I have no doubt the minister can tell us. There is a real interest in this, apart from some large bank or some other large institution.

Further than that there is a very real interest outside of the country. Never mind all we could do to our own banks if it were wise to do it; and frankly I do not think it would be wise to put them out of business. But apart from that there is a very large interest out of the country. There is a very large proportion of our bonds held out of Canada to-day and we have got to pay them. They have got to be paid, and I know that when that time came there would be a great deal of difficulty in paying them by simply telling the foreigner "We have opened a credit for you in our books." The foreign creditor would not like the mere idea of being told "The Dominion is worth billions of dollars and a credit has been opened for you on its books." He would say "Yes, but what am I going to do with that credit? What can I do with it. In other countries I am going to get gold." A mere photograph of that entry on the credit side of the ledger showing his name at the top of the ledger will not help him very much. It will not help our 10 p.m. credit very much to say that the credit is his. And what is more, the foreigner is not going to be content with the picture of even these beautiful buildings with a promise to pay underneath. He is entitled to payment. How are we going to do it?

An hon member put a very proper question when he asked the Acting Minister of Finance what we got for the hundred million loan in New York. There is no mystery about it. I do not know whether at that time the government had to look after obligations in New York. If they had to do so, all that happened in the case of the hundred millions was that the New York obligation was discharged by the cheque of the people who bought those bonds. But assume that none of it was paid in New York and that it was all paid here. Hon. gentlemen of course know that the Canadian creditor would be no more satisfied with a ledger entry in the books of the New York banker in his favour than the foreign creditor would be satisfied with a picture of the entry in his favour in our ledger here. There is no mystery as to what happens. The government buys Canadian dollars. It gets money, or credit, or whatever you like to call it and turns it into Canadian dollars.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What is the security which the Canadian government puts up in order to get this credit?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The security of the country—no question about it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Whether this credit goes through the bank, or whether it is given directly by the government, the security is the same in either case?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, but the position is entirely different, having regard to the method in which payment is made. The hon. gentleman is a close thinker and can follow me easily enough. We have a debt, we will say, of $2,400,000,000. Suppose we say we will get rid of the whole of it—and it is all payable in Canada—by simply using the printing press. If you say you are going to do it for part, then if it is good for part, it is good for the whole. If it is honest to pay one cent to the bond-holders with paper, it is honest to pay the whole. Therefore, we would have to consider paying $2,400,000,000. I do not know the amount of currency out to-day. I have not been able to attend the sittings of the Banking committee, because I was a special subject of investigation before a commission which was sitting at the same time. Therefore I have not heard the up-to-date statistics, but hon. gentlemen know it is a mere fraction of that amount, and it is enough to-day. Put it that way, and what use is it to the people? It is certainly of no advantage to them unless they can use it. On the other hand, if they cannot use it, if you have a great deal of money that cannot be used and if it is not redeemable, then of course you have the Russian or German situation. It could not be redeemable. Just follow up the thought that is thrown out. We pay these obligations by issuing paper. That paper cannot be redeemed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have made no suggestion of issuing paper. I simply asked whether the credit was not the same whether the government borrowed through the banks or re-issued creditory notes or bills. The credit is the same in either case, I think, and there would be no more inflation in the one case than in the other.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Suppose you take this view of it; suppose we do not use the banks or the underwriters at all, and do just what we did in the case of the victory loans, it is quite all right. In reference to that loan we looked after our own business. We made our own agreement and did our own advertising. We negotiated with no underwriters. We raised the money ourselves. I did not know this matter was coming up; I am speaking from memory, and hon. members will bear with me if my figures are not quite accurate, but they are substantially correct, and I say that the victory loans cost us 0.7, 0.9, 1.3, and 1.1, if I remember rightly. We did all the work ourselves. The department itself looked after it, but hon. gentlemen will see what that meant. That meant absolutely no change in the underlying principle. What is that principle? The principle is that the country as a country gives the security which is a redeemable security, and it makes no difference whether the security is a bond, a bill or a lien, so long as we have to redeem it, and if we issue bonds to-day and say to these gentlemen, "Here we will give you bonds, whether you want them or not, or we will give you a legal, whether you want it or not"; we are not paying them, and we can very well say that that is something that is going to be redeemable when we are treating these existing obligations as not redeemable. This is a matter in which we want all the light we can get. I am afraid at present the only practical method is to do business either ourselves directly upon the recognized basis of values, or else deal through the banks.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish to make a suggestion in all seriousness to the minister, and I deal with this subject in no flippant or purely academic fashion. I look upon this matter as one of the most serious problems facing not only Canada but other nations. I say that this government, in common with other governments, are absolutely in the power of financial interests at the present moment, and are unable to free themselves from the shackles of those interests. I have before me statements from prominent gentlemen in regard to this matter. I have under my hand a statement from the Prime Minister of England, Ramsay MacDonald, in which he declares that all governments were helpless in the power of the financial classes. I have Lord Milner's similar statement in that connection, and a further quotation that deals directly with this particular problem. He says:

> As a matter of fact some of the greatest fortunes have been made and are being made to-day by the mere manipulation of financial counters for which the chaos of exchange affords such exceptional opportunity. That is interception in the grand style.

By giving the minister permission to float this loan of $300,000,000 we are proposing, I understand, that the minister shall forthwith adopt the orthodox practice of issuing bonds through the regular orthodox channels. In short, we are continuing the practice of the past, in still recognizing the financial machine that exists and are using that machine without always taking into consideration just what it means in cost to the people. If the minister has to float three hundred million dollars' worth of thirty-year bonds at five per cent interest, what does it involve? This is a consideration that should be thoroughly impressed on the public and also on the minister. It means that if the bonds run to maturity we in Canada and our children after us—because we will not all live thirty years longer—will have paid four hundred and fifty millions in interest for the use of about two hundred and ninety-two million, and we would still owe the three hundred million to the bondholders whoever they may be. I term that frankly a most insane system of financing in this age and generation. I therefore urge the minister to take into consideration some alternative method, not with a view to immediately adopting it—I do not attempt to suggest I could induce him to do that,—but I ask him and the ministers that may follow him in his department, to take into consideration this appalling cumulative debt that is pressing upon the backs of nations to-day, 265 billions of international debts, the result largely of cumulative interest on bonds. Where is it going to stop? How will we pay it? The industrial machine is cracking to the breaking point at this moment. That is the situation.

Mr. VIEN: Has the hon. member any alternative to suggest?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): We have suggested one very carefully this afternoon, and that is that the government might take into consideration the possibility of accepting its own real credit, a real credit which J. P. Morgan will accept, and issue thereupon judiciously and wisely its own financial credit.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Would the minister not consider the question of appointing a permanent committee to study the national debt? Probably they could extend the powers of the committee on Banking and Commerce, and have it reconstructed as the committee on Public Debt and Banking. Every session that committee could review the public debt, as to its location and the interest to be paid on it, and propound a scheme for the refunding of it. If that were done, the result would be that gradually an active and an informed committee in connection with public debt would be developed in this House, and that committee would accomplish some of the things that this House now as a committee is trying to do to-night. I have never known of any real parliamentary study by this House of the public debt in relation to the rate of interest and consolidation later on. Perhaps the minister will make a statement in regard to the suggestion which has come not only from myself but from several hon. gentlemen who have spoken to-day.

Mr. GOOD: The suggestion that has come from the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) has I think very considerable merit. It is a singular and very significant fact that, connected with a number of our departments of government, particularly the Department of Agriculture, we have some really expert and well qualified men to guide us. And while I wish to say nothing disparaging about the estimable gentlemen who are associated with the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), I think I state only the bald truth when I say there is no one in that department who is in any sense qualified to advise the minister in matters of this sort.

Mr. MARLER: Why does the hon. member say that? Does he mean to impugn the ability of the officers of the Department of Finance?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member (Mr. Good) is referring to their knowledge of financial affairs.

Mr. MARLER: The officers of the Department of Finance are in my opinion an exceedingly able and intelligent lot of men.

The CHAIRMAN: I desire to remind hon. gentlemen that the present trend of the debate is out of order; this is not a question of appointing a committee.

Mr. GOOD: Perhaps the discussion from that standpoint is out of order, and I do not know whether I am permitted to answer the question put to me by the hon. gentleman. I am expressing my opinion however, not without due consideration and considerable inquiry from people who are much more competent to form an opinion than I am myself. It is high time that, associated with the Minister of Finance and his deputy, there should be one or more persons who have extensive training in this particular branch, training altogether different from the kind which the present Deputy Minister of Finance has had.

Mr. MARLER: The people the hon. gentleman has in mind are no better judges than some others.

Mr. GOOD: I have expressed my opinion; let it stand for what it is worth.

Mr. MARLER: It is not worth very much.

Mr. GOOD: I want to refer particularly to a criticism offered by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) of what he supposed was a suggestion emanating from this quarter of the House as to the payment of our debts and the settlement of the $300,000,000. The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) referred to the same matter. The question is asked: "Why do we not issue our own promises to pay or Dominion notes for the amount of the debt and wipe it out that way?" And that suggestion is ridiculed. I admit that generally speaking such a practice is a very foolish one, but there might be conditions under which it could be carried on not only with impunity but with profit. I discussed this matter last year with Professor Irving Fisher, one who, probably, has made a closer study of it than any other person on the American continent. I asked him particularly as to the propriety of such a practice, because I could see very serious disadvantages in it, as no doubt everyone else can; and he said that the advantage of it depended wholly on conditions. I do not wish to go into the matter any further than to say that while the practice is not always a wise one, there are nevertheless certain conditions under which it might profitably be indulged in under proper regulations.

Mr. VIEN: Did he define the conditions?

Mr. GOOD: Yes, but that is a matter which I shall deal with in another debate.

Mr. MARLER: What practical knowledge had he of the situation? Had he any practical interest?

Mr. GOOD: I believe so, yes. At any rate, I quote the opinion as that of a man of authority who has studied the question.

Mr. MARLER: Theoretically.

Mr. GOOD: There is only one other matter I want to deal with in this connection. If we were to present to any of our bankers what is admittedly a questionable method of financing, they would hold up their hands in horror.

Mr. MARLER: Because they know their business.

Mr. GOOD: They would say, "Let us do it in the regular, orthodox and proper way". I want hon. members to figure out how the banker does it in the orthodox and proper way. Here is a loan of $300,000,000. How much of that will be inflation?—if we use that term, as it has been used, perhaps improperly. How much of it will be new money and how much the absorption of purchasing power already in existence? Let me suggest what the banker might do—and I submit that he often actually does it; it was done during the war time and time again as can be proved. He may take $100,000,000 of that sum out of existing purchasing power and put $200,000,000 of new money with it, and the country will not see the $200,000,000 of new money because the other is put up in front of it, as was said last year, as a smoke screen; and that will be done not necessarily deliberately but perhaps unconsciously. Here is the very practice we object to, and rightly, in the printing of paper money without limit or regulation; and yet we allow our bankers a free hand in this matter, to inflate or deflate credit without regulation. That is the trouble and that is what may happen.

In conclusion, I would again urge upon the Acting Minister of Finance that he seek expert advice in this matter and consider the situation very carefully before he launches out this fall on a programme of floating loans. And I would emphasize once more the importance of his obtaining competent outside advice. In saying this I wish to cast no reflection whatever upon the personal character, the integrity or the faithfulness of those who are associated with the minister; but I am satisfied, and I say it in the kindliest spirit, that his deputy is quite incompetent to advise him in a matter of this nature.

Mr. ROBB: First of all, let me say in reply to my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) that there is no question affecting our Canadian life that deserves so much attention as the consideration, when the time is opportune, of the question of consolidating the public debt and reducing if we can the interest we have to pay. I will keep the hon. gentleman's observations in mind. As to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Good), I want to disclaim any pretensions to the expert knowledge of a financier; as hon. gentlemen know, I am carrying on the work of this office in the temporary absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) whose illness we all regret. However, in justice to the Deputy Minister of Finance I must say that I have never found any more loyal or willing public servant than the gentleman who serves this country in that capacity. He has been in the service of Canada since he was a boy.

Mr. GOOD: I did not say otherwise.

Mr. ROBB: He has grown up in it and is conversant with all its details. He is a most careful public servant and he could not look after the finances of the country more carefully if they were his own; every penny he has charge of is a prisoner. He is honest, he is sincere, he is loyal to his chief, no matter who that chief may be; and he works during the session fourteen, fifteen and sixteen hours every day.

Mr. PARENT: Like members of parliament.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps. I would add this on behalf of the deputy minister. I believe there is no department where more free advice is handed in than the Department of Finance. Every day some person comes along telling us how to run the finances of the country, and the deputy minister gives a very sympathetic ear to all suggestions, and is always ready to listen to better methods of financing our national affairs.

[Mr. Good.]

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Mr. Chairman, I agree with everyone who has spoken on the subject in describing this as perhaps one of the most important subjects, if not the most important, which has come before us, and particularly before the Acting Minister of Finance this session, because it is very evident that year by year we are not only finding it difficult to repay our indebtedness, but that indebtedness is gradually increasing. This condition of affairs cannot go on indefinitely. I would suggest that in refunding our indebtedness we should take into consideration the purchasing value of the money at the time the loan was made. Undoubtedly a large part of our indebtedness was contracted when a dollar would buy a very limited quantity of goods, that is, when goods were at a very high price level; the debt is being repaid when goods are at a comparatively low price level. The result is that the individual or the country that made the original loan is receiving practically double the amount of money in repayment. This applies within the nation, and it applies internationally. As debts are refunded on the old basis, the creditor is receiving greater and greater value with the receding price level of goods. I believe that is our difficulty. Eventually I presume most of our indebtedness must be repaid in goods in one form or another, if it is to be discharged at all. When we find that at the time the money was borrowed $100, for example, would buy 100 units of goods, and that now we have to pay 200 units of goods in discharge of that $100, it is evident that the situation becomes almost impossible.

Mr. GOOD: Under those conditions might it not be advisable to have such an inflation as would lead us back to the price level existing at the time when the debt was incurred?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have considered that point a little. I do not pose as a financial or economic expert, I simply see the problem, and I concede that if you could bring about inflation to that extent, and could then pay off your indebtedness, it would undoubtedly be an advantage to you. Whether that would be possible or not is a very different matter. As I understand it, many of the debts were contracted in purchasing credits, especially as between one country and another, so that the loan was actually paid in goods. Therefore the individual or country that loaned the money originally is actually being repaid twice over. I am quite aware that it is impossible for every government to say: "We will reduce the refunding amount so that it equals in approximate value the value of the loan at the time when we received it," because that amounts practically to repudiation of the obligation. But I do believe that in the interests of ourselves, and in the interests of the nations, the time will come, and the sooner it comes the better, when a real economic conference will have to be called together to study suggestions for the refunding of indebtedness. This conference should be composed of representatives of the various interests concerned, of those who loaned the money and those who, through taxation, must repay the loan, and these representatives would eventually, I trust, be in a position to recommend an equitable basis of settlement. Because, frankly, Mr. Chairman, as I study the subject year by year—and I admit that I have studied it much more closely during the last three years than I ever did before—I am concerned as to what the future holds for us in that respect. I am no alarmist, but I am alarmed when I consider what must be the inevitable outcome of this continual refunding with its corresponding increase of our indebtedness. I believe that the grave importance of this problem will be borne in upon every business man in this country sooner or later. I believe that eventually we will have to state our terms of repayment in the value of goods and not in the face value of dollars, so that the lender will receive back the same purchasing power which he loaned. There is nothing unfair in such a proposition. If a man loans enough money to buy a suit of clothes, in equity if he is paid back a sum of money sufficient to buy him the same quantity of goods he is fully repaid. This may be considered bad financing but to my mind it is sound financing, and I believe it is the only system of financing that is going to stand up in the future, the only system that will enable us to discharge our obligations. I am not suggesting that the Acting Minister of Finance should attempt to put my suggestion into practice now, but only after consideration by a conference on the lines I have indicated. I am convinced that this problem will have to be taken in hand, and the sooner it is dealt with and solved the better it will be for us and for our future.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Chairman, my sympathies go out sincerely to the Acting Minister of Finance. I appreciate that he has probably the most trying portfolio in the gift of the government: he is responsible for all moneys paid out and for all moneys coming in. It is for that reason that such debates as we are engaged in to-day are, in my opinion, the most important that can come before this House, and I was very sorry indeed to hear the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) say that we were wasting time. All over the world debts are growing very rapidly. Europe to-day is in an awful condition economically and financially, and only two countries are really holding their heads above water. France, as we know, with a national wealth of sixty billion dollars, has a national debt of sixty-eight billion dollars.

There has been some criticism of what are termed the unorthodox suggestions put forward in the course of this discussion. When similar suggestions were put forward two years ago many members walked out of the House. To-day I am glad to see greater interest in these suggestions, and I congratulate those members who have given them a very fair hearing. We can make a great mistake in being too orthodox; there comes a time when you have got to be a little unorthodox and explore new means and ways of doing things. If five hundred years ago people had discussed in parliament such things as the flying machine, the telephone, the gramophone, radio and the other wonderful discoveries which we now have, they would have been placed in asylums or in prisons. We have been following on certain lines of orthodox finance for a long time; to-day there is a very large school of thought throughout the world which realizes that the orthodox school of finance has got to go.

There is not the slightest reason why when this matter is brought forward even the Acting Minister of Finance should refer to our suggestions as Russianizing our currency, nor is there any reason why other hon. gentlemen should refer to them as wildcat schemes. The minister does not seem to realize that the small group in this House who are putting forward these suggestions are his best friends. Unfortunately he does not appear to think so. But coming back to the main question, I understand that to-day the annual interest on our national debt amounts to just about as much as the entire yearly cost of running the country previous to the war! That is something we have to recognize as a very serious subject to consider. I was much pleased with the way the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) handled this subject a few minutes ago. This country is suffering under a tremendous load of taxation, and one of the reasons is that we have to-day bonds issued exempt from taxation to the amount of $931,512,900. It is because of these things that we are very anxious to help the Acting Minister of Finance cut down expense and get money cheaper if possible. The Acting Minister of Finance may not wish to accept some of the suggestions put forward this afternoon and this evening, and I do not blame him for not accepting them right off. But I have something to suggest which is along more orthodox lines which I trust he will consider. He led the House to believe this afternoon that the loan that is going to be made will carry interest at 5 to 5½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. SPENCER: I shall be glad to be corrected if I am wrong.

Mr. ROBB: I made no such statement as to the rate of interest.

Mr. SPENCER: Does the minister expect to get it at less than 5?

Mr. ROBB: I do.

Mr. SPENCER: I am glad to hear that. Possibly he does not expect to get it at less than 3½. I was therefore going to suggest that we have an excellent way of getting money at 3½ per cent, probably as much as the government wishes. If he cared to offer 3½ per cent—or, if the minister wishes, 4 per cent—through the post office savings. Why not throw the gates open as it were, and let the money come in, with the guarantee of the government, thus obviating the necessity for issuing bonds, the country would be saved many thousands of dollars in interest, perhaps millions.

I was glad to see the ex-finance minister (Sir Henry Drayton) take part in this debate to-night. He has seen fit not to take part in these debates in the last two years, though he knows a great deal more about this subject than I think he cares to give the House. I regretted the suggestion he made that any one thought for a moment of issuing paper to pay for a two billion dollar indebtedness at once. The whole thing is absurd.

I would like to quote just a few lines from a speech made by the Hon. Reginald McKenna, of London, England. He said:

> If banks increased their loans and investments, the results would be to increase the aggregate amount of their deposits but to add nothing to their cash resources.

I quote that because the statement I made this afternoon was not accepted, I think, by some hon. members. Referring to the meaning and importance of monetary policy, he said:

> One man may tell you to increase it indefinitely, and keep trade booming, but if you do, prices will soar indefinitely. You will first suffer innumerable social evils, and finally the extreme depreciation of your currency will greatly impair your power to trade.

[Mr. Spencer.]

That, of course, was the case in some of the European countries.

> Someone else may urge you to reduce the amount of money, and bring down prices to the pre-war level, or to such other arbitrary level as he happens to think the right one.

That was done in this country, with this result—I quote from Mr. McKenna again:

> Yes, and trade will remain depressed, and unemployment will be with you all the time. Moreover, the burden of the national debt with the higher value of money will become intolerable, and no chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to balance his budget.
> I think it will be generally accepted that if the price level be unchanged, an increase in the volume of trade will require an increase in the volume of bank credit and currency, that is to say, of money.

I quote these few words because I think it is just as well when hon. members deal with this subject in a rather unorthodox way that we should be able to place before the House quotations from men in such high positions as the Hon. Mr. Reginald McKenna as one supporting the views that we hold.

Mr. IRVINE: It is very gratifying to note the interest that has been shown by the discussion of this resolution. I am aware that the House is not prepared to listen to any academic discussion of the finance question. I have tried that before on one or two occasions and I am satisfied that most hon. members are not even interested and are pretty well convinced that the finance system in vogue throughout the world is the best that is possible. They are just as much convinced of that as they were that the Bank Act was the best bank act in the world last year. Fortunately for them and for the world a revelation of the weakness in the case of national finance has not been brought about so speedily and in as clear a manner as it was in the case of the Bank Act, but I believe that a similar awakening is just as surely coming. There is no evidence that the Acting Minister of Finance anticipates anything different in the way of financing from that which has been in vogue ever since Canada had any financing to do, the road being followed must lead directly to disaster not only to Canada but to all nations following the same course. What is the end of the road? The end comes when you cannot tax your people any longer to pay the interest on the bonded indebtedness, not to speak of paying the bonded indebtedness itself. A number of nations are almost at the end of the road now. We are fortunate in having been a new country with tremendous natural resources, so that perhaps we may on paper look a little better than other nations. But we are following exactly the same road and in proportion to our ability to pay we are not so very far behind some of those European nations which have brought themselves to a state of bankruptcy. While I am not going to follow that point to any length, I think it is necessary to emphasize the fact that this parliament is complacently launching another $300,000,000 loan on the same old basis, and in the same old way, in spite of all that has been presented to this House, in spite of all the evidences pointing to the wisdom of taking another course that come from other nations which are approaching financial catastrophe. I know it is a popular thing to say, "It is all very well to talk like that, but what do you suggest?" One or two of us make a suggestion, and then you laugh. I am prepared to say that it is very unwise for any one to make a detailed suggestion on the floor of the House in the circumstances in which we are now placed. Are we simply to go on blindly because no individual member can stand up here and give a detailed outline of a new financial system that will carry us into safety? Is there nothing we can do? Have we reached the last resort, and that to continue with a system that every one knows to be wrong? I want to make two suggestions, Mr. Chairman, both of which I believe to be practical. The first suggestion is for the appointment of a committee, which suggestion has been made, I believe, by another hon. member.

The CHAIRMAN: I would draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that the question of a committee is not before the House.

Mr. IRVINE: But the question of raising $300,000,000 is before the House.

The CHAIRMAN: That is true, but not the question of a committee to deal with that matter.

Mr. IRVINE: I am not going to argue your ruling at this moment, Mr. Chairman. I was just going to point out that the manner in which that $300,000,000 is to be raised might be in order, but if I am ruled out of order I will abandon the discussion of it.

The CHAIRMAN: The manner and expediency of raising the loan is in order, but not the question of the advisability of appointing a parliamentary committee to deal with the matter.

Mr. IRVINE: Being ruled out of order in presenting another possible means of raising our debt, I am practically shut off and must look for another opportunity to put that practical suggestion before the House. However, let me point out one or two other things since I have been stopped on that angle. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Red Deer press a very interesting and I believe a very important point. Surely if we are going to attempt to pay back our debts—of course it is impossible to pay them back, but as long as hon. members think we can do it I have no objection to their holding that joyous opinion—but if there were any serious attempt to pay our debts, then the point raised by the hon. member for Red Deer when he urged inflation so as to bring the purchasing power of the dollar to what it was when the debt was contracted is surely a practical one. I notice that the ex-Minister of Finance attempted to answer a suggestion made from this side of the House and in doing so held that the government could not issue its own credit or recognize its credit in monetary form, because in paying back their debts that way they would have so much money they would not know what to do with it. It seemed to me that the ex-finance minister actually thought he had cleared the field when he had made that remark, that there was nothing else to be said. I am sorry he is not in his seat, and I shall not in his absence say all I wanted to say of his reasoning on that point. I will be satisfied to say that in my opinion it was not an argument at all, and if I did not believe that the hon. member who made it knows far better than that, and can do much better, I would not have as high an opinion of his statesmanship as I have.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that what I rose to say has been ruled out of order, but I believe nevertheless that there is a better way, and a more practical way, of raising this $300,000,000 than by the method that is suggested in this resolution. I believe that to follow the old method of piling up interest and pyramiding our debts must lead ultimately to a crash. I believe that it is possible to avoid that, but that it is only possible to avoid it by adopting a method that has never been used before; and the necessity for adopting a method that has never been used before arises because of the fact that we are face to face with a situation that never confronted Canada, never confronted the world before. I say that to go on in the same way, ignoring a new set of conditions, ignoring the piling up of debts that never can be paid, is to acknowledge the inability of this parliament to face the problem that stands before us.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is my hon. friend referring to a method that has never been tried anywhere before?

Mr. IRVINE: Certainly.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Nowhere in the world?

Mr. IRVINE: Exactly.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It has to be started somewhere.

Mr. IRVINE: That brings to my memory the fact that the finance question is no longer a Canadian question; it is an international question. We are following exactly the same method that Russia is following. Russia is thoroughly orthodox in her financing. She is on a gold basis, if you please, only she is much more reasonably on it than we would be were we to announce our return to that shibboleth. Russia's financial position is set forth in the financial papers.

Mr. PARENT: Where does the hon. gentleman get his information?

Mr. IRVINE: From Russia. Where did you get yours, if you want to controvert it? There is no doubt in the world that Russia is on the gold basis. The point I want to make is that it is very difficult for any one nation to take a new course except all the nations, or the most important nations of the world, are ready to help and take that course also. Finance is an international problem, and that leads me to the point I wanted to suggest when I was ruled out of order on the second head and that was the calling of an international conference to deal with this matter.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 217, to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the public service.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

MINES AND GEOLOGICAL SURVEY

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mines and Geological Survey—for organization and equipment of the Explosives Division under the Explosives Act, chap. 31, 4-5 George V, $10,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would the minister explain this vote?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil) (Minister of Mines): This is for the purpose of inspecting the manufacture of explosives and testing them to see if they are up to standard, so that the purchaser when he buys explosives that have been inspected will know that he is getting value. This branch also inspects the premises where explosives are manufactured. Those are the two chief duties of this particular branch.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That would be explosives used in the mining industry?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where does the reduction apply?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We proposed purchasing a cannon for testing purposes, but we did not purchase it on account of not having a suitable building in which to instal the machine, and we have cut the vote $2,000 on that account.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not understand the explanation.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have to have various machines for testing purposes. In this particular case there was a building in which we were testing explosives. We are unable to go on with the work this year, and for that reason we are dropping $2,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it the case that a certain type of testing has been going on, but it is not being gone on with now because the appliance is not suitable?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have not been going on with that type of testing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much was spent last year of the $12,000?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We spent $7,881.38 last year. We need a certain amount of money because prosecutions are frequently necessary, but we do not propose to spend any more money than we have to. We are asking for what we think will be a sufficient sum to enable us to carry on the work of the department.

Item agreed to.

Mine branch—for investigation of mineral resources or deposits; of the mining and metallurgical industries and of mineral technology; wages, expenses of testing and research laboratories; investigations by, including salaries and all other expenses of, Dominion Fuel Board, $200,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has any progress been made in testing any new fluids for ores. That is to say, in order to avoid the necessity of submitting to the exactions of the combine which has command now of the oil separation system, has any progress been made in getting a new system of separating ores? I know there were some tests made. That is mainly what this is for.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There have been various tests, but I do not follow my right hon. friend's direct question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I understand it the mineral separation business is pretty well under an American combine. They have the patents on the oil separation system. It is an oil fluid that is used in lead ores and other ores. These are all ground up very fine like flour and then they are put through this process which separates the metal. The department was testing the value of certain other combinations or compounds to take the place of oil with the view of getting cheaper separation in Canada and relief from the American combine. Has any success attended the efforts?

11 p.m.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, the tests are going on and pamphlets have been issued setting out what has been accomplished in this connection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I remember particularly that the late Sir William Mackenzie was interested in another plan for separating metals which it was hoped would give us relief against the oil separation system. I know that his scheme was being tested out. What has been the ultimate result of all that?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Is my right hon. friend under the impression that the system was being tested here in the laboratory?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know it was because I went down to see it once.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I confess I never heard of Sir William Mackenzie's scheme and I have been down to the laboratory half a dozen times.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The late Sir William Mackenzie was interested in it, I forget the name of the inventor. No oil was used, it was a new system. It was rather promising at one time and I was wondering if it had succeeded.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot get any information from the deputy with respect to the particular test that my right hon. friend has referred to. Of course we are testing everything that comes to light as well as trying out improvements right along.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The testing that is done under this vote is testing as to the gold content or the silver content of an ore, and so on. This was another test that was being made, and I thought the deputy would know about it. How much of the $200,000 was spent last year?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We appear to have only spent $148,756 last year, but it is partly accounted for by the fact that our Fuel Board did not get under way until nearly half the year had passed, and this year our estimates are made up as follows:

For investigation of mineral resources or deposits, of the mining and metallurgical industries, and of mineral technology; wages expenses of testing and reasearch laboratories, $200,000.

Summary

Division of Mineral Resources..	$37,000
Ore Dressing and Metallurgical division.. ..	40,000
Fuels and Fuel Testing division including special investigations to be undertaken under authority of Dominion Fuel Board..	70,500
Salaries and expenses of technical executive officer and clerical assistants under the Dominion Fuel Board..	5,000
Ceramic and Road Materials division..	14,500
Contingencies..	3,000
Dominion Fuel Board investigations..	30,000

Mr. McQUARRIE: Is the minister aware of the proposal which is being discussed in the United States to impose a duty of six cents a pound on copper ore entering that country? The minister is no doubt aware that the entire copper production of British Columbia goes to the United States, and if this duty is imposed it will have the effect of practically closing down all the copper mines of British Columbia. I understand at the present time the total production is something like 50,000,000 pounds a year, and that in order that a refinery could be carried on profitably it would require a production of at least 100,000,000 pounds a year. Does the government propose to do anything to meet this situation? I suppose I should not use the objectionable word "retaliation". I got into trouble for using that on a previous occasion, but it seems to me if this kind of thing continues the government will have to do something. I will be very glad to hear from the minister in this connection, because the people of British Columbia are very much interested in the subject.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am aware that there is a discussion in certain circles in the United States with reference to the imposition of a six cent tax on copper. However, that has not gone into effect, and it is not likely that it will go into effect, because I do not think under the provision in the tariff which permits the President to take action anything will be done with regard to a matter of this kind. One could not help realizing that it would be a very serious blow to the mining industry in Canada, not only in British Columbia, but other places where a good deal of copper is taken out. We hope to secure on the continent a market for our product of copper, but my hon. friend knows that it would not be well to be too hopeful at the moment on account of conditions there. A private member of course may talk about retaliation, but I fear that a minister had better keep away from the subject.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the minister really think he should talk in that way, no matter what happens? We have had a multiplication of taxes against Canadian industry and against Canadian agriculture; but the answer is that it makes it all the easier to trade here. Instead of any talk of retaliation on the part of Canada, if my hon. friend runs true to form, he will come down with a proposal to still further reduce duties on American importations into this country. I would never think that if he were a private member he would talk that way. If we can sell no copper ore whatever in the States, and if my hon. friend will simply carry on in the way we are carrying on at present, that will be an additional reason for further reduction, and for further paens of praise to my hon. friend that another death knell to protection has been sounded.

Mr. SIMPSON: I notice that a portion of the item is for the purpose of investigating mineral resources or deposits in the particular sections where the investigations are being carried on.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The sum of $37,000 is for the investigation of mineral resources. That does not mean that we only spent $37,000 out of the total vote of the Mines branch, because all the geological work was being carried on by the department in the interests of the mineral resources.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the minister ready to announce the new Canadian national fuel policy to-night?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The session is getting on pretty well.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It will have to be a separate matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want the government to overlook this matter. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) early in the session moved a resolution calling upon the government to put into force this new national fuel policy for Canada, and the government in order to get rid of the resolution accepted it; so that it is for them to announce it. I have not bothered the government on the subject since. We have waited patiently in daily expectation of hearing the national fuel policy announced. We are asked to vote $200,000 more to the Fuel Board without any policy.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is not the Fuel Board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Fuel Board is being paid out of this. Surely we should have the policy, especially when the government promised to bring one down.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I may say for the information of my hon. friend that this vote has nothing to do with this policy. It is for investigating fuels which we have in Canada, and the use to which they can be put. A national policy, of which my hon. friend speaks, is of a different character altogether. We are testing our own fuels here to ascertain the best methods of adapting them for use in Canada.

Mr. MANION: What has been the outcome of the peat investigation, about which we used to hear so much? Is there any possibility of peat being used?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That investigation was carried to the point where peat was manufactured and sold on the Alfred bog; a type of machinery was developed which could manufacture it quite economically. That investigation was carried on in conjunction with the government of Ontario and both that government and this department felt that the point had been reached where peat might be manufactured with facility. I will not say however that the work has been completed because I am afraid that some engineers would suggest that better methods might be used; there is one engineer in this city for instance who thinks that we are not on the right track. The method adopted at Alfred was air-drying, spreading the peat on the ground and allowing it to dry in that way. The manufacture of peat at Alfred was accomplished to the satisfaction of both governments and now it is a commercial possibility if any one wishes to take it up. At the moment there is a company trying to float bonds to go on with the industry on the Alfred bog.

Mr. MANION: I have not heard much about the matter in the past couple of years. In this government's opinion is it a success or a failure?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The production costs were about $3.50 per ton at Alfred. The freight charges are fairly high and I doubt whether peat could be shipped more than 100 miles to come into competition with coal. As a substitute for coal however for the fall and spring season in Canada it is quite good and burns freely, and it sells at about the same price as coal.

Mr. MANION: Has it been used in Ottawa at all?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. There has been manufactured a quantity of about 15,000 tons at that plant.

Mr. MANION: There has been a good deal of discussion about the settlement of the coal question, and there is evidence on the part of the people generally a desire to use Canadian coal as far as possible. I know that at the head of the lakes, from Winnipeg east to Fort William and Port Arthur, we have been using for a long time with satisfactory results coal brought from the western provinces. The question arises as to the possibility of shipping that coal to eastern Ontario, and rather strangely, I have hardly heard it suggested that the coal might be transported, not by rail entirely, but by water east from Fort William. I know of course that most of the boats that come from the head of the lakes carry grain, but I think there are seasons in the year when these boats might be employed carrying some of the coal of the western provinces to eastern Ontario. I should think that in discussing the question of the route by which this coal should be transported from the prairie provinces to the East there should be considered the possibility of conveying it by boat from the head of the lakes. To-day most of the American coal is carried part of the way to the western country by boat. Take for example the Canadian Pacific Railway; for a long time they have been using Pennsylvania coal which has been brought by boat to the head of the lakes and then carried by rail west. Why not reverse the process in the case of our western coal and carry it to the head of the lakes by rail and then by water transportation east. I do not know whether this possibility has been discussed but certainly I have never heard it mentioned; I have always heard the matter treated as though there were no chance of using that coal in the eastern provinces unless it were carried by rail all the way. The minister might very seriously consider the question of arranging for the carriage of western coal in the way I have suggested.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I doubt whether we can point to any shipment that has been made in that way; but nearly all the men who profess to know anything about the shipping of coal, particularly of lignite which is desirable for domestic uses in Ontario, are agreed that transhipment would break up the fuel very materially. It is held that the transportation of this grade of coal in the one conveyance throughout tends to popularize the coal inasmuch as it retains its original quality; all the experts are agreed that to tranship it on boats would break it up to such an extent that it would become slack and would deteriorate too much. However, the method suggested by my hon. friend has not yet been tried, and one cannot speak with authority until that has been done.

Mr. MANION: That is true no doubt as regards lignite. But surely in the hundreds of millions of tons of coal which we have in the western provinces—our deposits taking second place, in the coal supples of the whole world, only to those of the United States—we have a coal which will not deteriorate to any appreciable extent in transhipment. Do I draw the conclusion from the minister's remarks that we have not in the prairie provinces a coal that can stand transhipment at the head of the lakes?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am merely saying that in all the discussion that has taken place so far with respect to the bringing of coal from Alberta to Ontario—I am speaking of the domestic supply—the two main fields that have been exploited are Drumheller and Lethbridge as well as, to some extent, Saunders Creek, west of Red Deer. The bituminous coal could be shipped anywhere in any kind of way; you could dump it as many times as you liked without destroying it. But the coal which the Ontario people are anxious to secure and which the Alberta people are desirous of disposing of is the lignite which is burned in domestic furnaces; and if that coal is broken up or slacked to any extent it is not so valuable. There is no doubt that the ideal method of transporting it is to ship it in the same conveyance from point of loading to destination. However, until the other method is tried one can hardly speak with definite authority as to how far deterioration will take place.

Mr. MANION: In view of the minister's remarks it might be well to ascertain how far it is desirable to handle some of that coal by rail and water.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The traffic, as hon. gentlemen know, is all moving in the same direction. If the coal were going in the opposite direction to the wheat our problem would be an easy one, but the difficulty is increased a hundredfold by the fact that it has to be moved in the same direction as the wheat. There is a time, from the middle of May until the first of September, when there is a diminution in the rail haul of produce from the West and when consequently there are more cars available. Fortunately that is the time when the mines are at their lowest point of production on account of market contions. But would that apply to the lakes?

Mr. MANION: I agree absolutely with the suggestion of the minister. It is exactly what I am pointing out, that there is a time in the middle of the summer when, it seems to me, it would be possible to make such an experimental test as we are suggesting. We have our Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and a number of the boats are laid up. It appears to me therefore that it would be a worthy project for the government to take one or more of these ships to load western coal from the head of the lakes for Ontario points. Surely some of those western coals would stand transhipment. There must be a time when it is profitable for such coal to be brought east by rail to the head of the lakes, because to-day we are using much of this western coal as far east as Fort William and Port Arthur. All the coal dealers at the head of the lakes advertise western coal, and a considerable quantity of it is used locally. I believe that we have been too much oppressed with the belief that we must have anthracite coal for our stoves and furnaces. But in the last few years when there has been difficulty in getting Pennsylvania anthracite, and consequent high prices for it, the people at the head of the lakes and west have been using soft coal from the prairie provinces and from Pennsylvania. For example, Pocahontas has been used very much during the last year or two with very satisfactory results. If I may be excused for reciting my own experience, I had always used Pennsylvania anthracite, but last winter I used Pocahontas, with much more satisfaction than I ever got out of anthracite. Pocahontas is, of course, an American coal, but I believe that in the western prairie provinces we produce coal at least equal in heating value to Pocahontas, and it is claimed that we produce practically an anthracite coal. So it would appear to me to be a very worthy proposition for the minister to take into consideration the feasibility of bringing forward some of our western prairie coal by rail to the head of the lakes for transhipment by boat to eastern Ontario points.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

It would also appear to me to be worth while considering the advisability of bringing coal from the section familiar to my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald). Nova Scotia coal could be shipped by boat to central Ontario points. During the past year or two we have been using Welsh anthracite, which is a very satisfactory coal from what I have heard, and surely if we can afford to bring over Welsh anthracite for profitable use by the people of Ontario, it must be feasible to supply the same market with Nova Scotia and western prairie coal. I submit that the minister would be acting very wisely as a representative of the government if he used some of our government mercantile marine ships for trial shipments in the way I have suggested, with a view to our being able to dispense with American coal which we are importing in such large quantities at the present time

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Chairman, I am very sympathetic with the views expressed by my hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) in regard to utilizing our own coal supplies as far as possible. Curiously enough, our coal fields are placed at either end of the Dominion, and for years the central part of Canada has relied on the United States for its fuel supply. The stringency that has arisen of late years in the anthracite supply from the United States has given rise to the idea which my hon. friend has expressed. I hope it will be found possible to carry out his suggestion, but I want to point out to him a difficulty in respect of the proposition which he makes to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) to bring coal to the head of the lakes for transhipment by boats of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for central Ontario points. The cost of carrying coal in steamers which are not specially fitted for the purpose becomes so great that the price of the coal to the consumer will be prohibitive. The Nova Scotia coal which supplies the St. Lawrence river market is shipped in boats specially fitted for the reception and discharge of the cargo by the most modern equipment, so that the cost is reduced to a minimum. I understand that the subject has been gone into by those in eastern Canada who are interested in the cheap transportation of Nova Scotia coal, and their opinion is that none of our government merchant marine boats have the requisite facilities for the carriage of coal.

Mr. MANION: What is the difference in their build that makes them unfitted for this traffic?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It is not so much a question of build as of equipment. The steamers which carry coal from Nova Scotia up the St. Lawrence were all constructed in England and are equipped with the most modern facilities for loading and discharging their cargo. This results in reducing the cost of operation to a minimum. The whole thing is a question of cost; unless you can put your coal into a boat and take it out again at a figure so low that the consumer is not going to be taxed abnormally in the price he pays, then water transportation ceases to be a factor. Then again there is the difficulty of bringing coal two thousand miles to Fort William, dumping it into ships and taking it out again, which means three or four handlings of the coal before it reaches the consumer. But if it be possible to work out a system by which coal could be dumped into a freight car at Alberta and brought direct to the point of delivery in Ontario, you would have a feasible proposition.

Mr. MANION. I appreciate the remarks of the hon. minister. At the same time I have been watching coal handled at the head of the lakes for the past twenty-five or thirty years and I have noticed nothing very difficult about it. All it amounts to is this,—the freighters carry wheat east as a rule and coal west, and they are simply large boxes, with no special apparatus except a derrick operating clam buckets. Any steamer may be used for shipping coal so long as it has open holds. Take for example the American coal which is shipped from the Pennsylvania mines to the head of the lakes and west, even up to the present time much of that coal is taken up in the large freighters which come east with grain

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): That is anthracite.

Mr. MANION: Not only anthracite, but a great deal of soft coal, too. It is dumped into these boats for Fort William or Port Arthur, taken out by the clamshell buckets, dumped on the docks and there transhipped to trains and carried west. A Canadian Pacific official told me one time that it had been taken west quite a few miles past Winnipeg to be used by the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. CARROLL: They do not use anthracite.

Mr. MANION: No, the engines use the bituminous coal, but it is Pennsylvania coal, and there is no reason why western coal should not be dumped into these same shell boats and shipped east, or why Nova Scotia coal should not be brought by the same type of boat to central Ontario. The only difficulty would be in the canals, and there are small boats of the scow type which could be used for that purpose. During certain seasons of the year, as suggested by the minister himself, when the coal mines are working at their lowest and the steamships have the least to do, coal might be shipped from the prairie provinces to the head of the lakes, dumped into some of these boats such as the ones that now handle coal, and unloaded at Toronto or other points where they have the appliances for unloading. It might be worth while considering the possibility of doing something of this kind so that we can use our own Canadian coal instead of the large quantities of American coal that we have been importing during the last few years.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am very much in sympathy with my hon. friend's idea, but the whole difficulty is one of cost. American coal can be delivered on board ship at lake Erie ports at $2.50 a ton and carried to Fort William; it can stand the extra handling and the extra cost of handling.

Mr. MANION: What is the answer about Welsh coal?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): That comes from England, and on account of the depreciated currency there it is produced at a lower figure than coal can be produced in Alberta or Nova Scotia.

Mr. BROWN: Does that come as ballast too?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It frequently comes as ballast. On the other hand the initial cost of the coal that comes from Drumheller or Lethbridge, put upon the cars, is at least $4.50 a ton as compared with $2.50 on board ship at lake Erie ports. My hon. friend's idea is a good one if he does not want to break bulk at Fort William. If some assistance could be given, as was asked by the Alberta government, so that the coal could be transported to London, Toronto or Ottawa by one continuous passage in a car, we might accomplish what my hon. friend desires. But the extra cost of two or three handlings is such that the ultimate price to the consumer is very high. My hon. friend and I do not disagree; we aim at the same thing, except that I do not think the Alberta coal would stand the extra cost and the extra handling at Fort William.

Mr. MANION: I am told that coal can be handled from the Pennsylvania mines right up to the Great Lakes at a boat freight of 50 cents a ton.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The boat freight is less than that.

Mr. MANION: Well, say 50 cents; it is a small amount anyway. I see no reason why the same rate should not apply eastward, because many of these boats during the summer go, one way or the other, light. Since that coal be hauled to the head of the lakes at this rate, it might very well be considered whether it could not be handled at a dollar a ton and transhipped east. The whole discussion of this coal question seems to be based upon the possibility of the handling of coal east entirely by cars, but it is claimed by those who have studied the question much more than I have that freight rates by water are about one-sixth to one-tenth the rates by rail. From the head of the lakes east is a thousand miles and that would make quite a difference in the cost of handling the coal east.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That has all been under consideration.

Mr. MANION: I have never seen it discussed. I have heard the whole rail haul discussed, but if we can get traffic going from Nova Scotia to central Ontario and from the prairie provinces to central Ontario we could handle that coal in such quantities that the cost of handling might be very materially reduced.

Mr. TOLMIE: Will this Alberta coal not stand shipment as well as the coal produced on Vancouver Island? We ship bituminous coal from Vancouver down to tidewater, a distance of 10 or 14 miles, where it is dumped into bunkers and shipped to San Francisco. That business has been carried on for quite a number of years. British capital is very much interested in the Alberta fields and is ready to invest provided this coal can be placed in Ontario at reasonable cost. Has the department been carrying on experiments along this line and can we expect any information as to whether that is possible in the near future?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is no information to be had, it is simply a question of freight rates, the cost of carriage. The coal we have been discussing is lignite, which breaks down rapidly under exposure or otherwise, and that is the coal that is taking the place of the Pennsylvania anthracite. Bituminous coal can be shipped and transhipped fifty times without its being destroyed, but it cannot be used for domestic purposes.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. TOLMIE: We use it entirely in British Columbia.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I know, but it is not used here. In Ontario we have been experimenting—in fact, we have almost passed the stage of experiment—in the converting of bituminous coal into coke. In this coke you have an ideal fuel to take the place of anthracite. Transportation costs are a very important consideration in the production of coal. As has been pointed out, coal can be landed at lake Erie ports at $2.50 a ton, and that coal will readily convert into a high grade coke at about $12 a ton. So that coke may in central Ontario very largely take the place of anthracite. Nevertheless I think there is quite a market for the high grade lignite fuel of Alberta as far east as and even east of Fort William, possibly into the Sudbury region and northern Ontario.

Mr. MANION: And Toronto?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I doubt whether the transportation costs would make its use in Toronto possible. However, that remains to be seen.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Years ago I heard the then Minister of Railways and Canals say that a solution of this problem would be through the canalization of the country from lake Superior to the foot of the Rocky mountains. That is a very big proposition, but he had it all worked out. He said it was feasible and that it would be applicable to the transit of grain. If it is applicable to the transit of grain and would save money, it would be much more applicable to the transit of coal from the prairie provinces. I think the minister would not be going out of his way if he took that matter up with the Minister of Railways.

Mr. GRAHAM: That was the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. BAXTER: I quite appreciate what has been said with reference to the coking of coal. In my constituency, and in many parts of New Brunswick, there is unfortunately altogether too much use of anthracite coal, which is imported. We have large quantities, some in our own province, but on the whole a better quality in the province of Nova Scotia, of soft coal, which, of course, is not so desirable for use in homes, but which as the minister suggests is really the remedy if we could have something done in the way of coking that coal. We would then have a material quite equal to anthracite, and above all, it will be our own material, employing our own people, and our money will be kept within our own Dominion. What I would like to ask is whether the government has any definite policy with reference to inducing the undertaking by any person of this process of coking. I can well appreciate the fact that many people will say: Oh, that should be left to private initiative; let it be a commercial experiment. I am inclined to think it needs something more than that, and I would like to see the activities of some department of the government back of it in order that something will be done to induce people to undertake the coking enterprise and get it on its feet. All it needs, I believe, is to get a start and it will be successful, and I believe one of the purposes for which government exists is to give a start to get a development and really to point the way to opportunities. I would like to be assured that something of that kind is being done or will be done.

Mr. CARROLL: I am glad to hear the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) take up this question, which has been more or less near to my heart for the last three or four years. I think there should be some governmental assistance, by bonus or otherwise, for the purpose of initiating in this country the process of manufacturing coke to take the place of American anthracite, which has been dominating the coal market in this country for many years. I am rather of the opinion that we have passed the experimental stage in this country. We know what coke is, and how it compares with anthracite. I would like to point out to the committee that we are being asked to-night to vote $10,000 for transportation charges from outlying provinces on ore shipments which may be sent to the Ore Dressing Plant, I presume here in Ottawa. In the same vote, we are asked to vote an item of $40,000 for publications, English and French, regarding coke and coal. I think we have had all the experiments we need, and it strikes me as very peculiar that we should spend on publications and literature on a question on which there has been much education already, four times the amount that we are spending on transportation charges from the outlying provinces, for the testing of ore shipments.

My hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River has brought up the question regarding the transportation of coal in our merchant marine. I happen to know something about the transportation of coal, and I feel certain that the boats of the merchant marine will not be able to transport coal at fair freight rates, as they are not equipped for that purpose. They are equipped for carrying various kinds of freight and wheat, although I am not sure they are equipped for even that.

Mr. MANION: They are equipped for carrying both wheat and coal. To carry coal it is only a matter of having holes to dump it in.

Mr. CARROLL: I rather disagree.

Mr. MANION: I have seen it carried that way for thirty years.

Mr. CARROLL: I have seen them carry coal for thirty-five years, and a certain equipment is required on coal carrying boats. Equipment is necessary, for instance, to unload the coal from the boat to the pier.

Mr. MANION: You are not up-to-date down there. We do not handle it that way at all.

Mr. CARROLL: We are so up-to-date that we are carrying coal from Sydney to Montreal cheaper than any other transportation company; by "we" I mean those interested in coal.

Mr. MANION: You should bring it further west.

Mr. CARROLL: I agree that something should be done to bring Nova Scotia coal into central Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What about the St. Lawrence improvements?

Mr. CARRUTHERS: And the Georgian bay canal?

Mr. CARROLL: I must leave my two hon. friends to discuss the relative merits of those two projects. As a matter of fact, we have no Georgian bay canal, and we have no deep waterway on the St. Lawrence as far as Toronto at the present time.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The United States have a big proposal before us now.

Mr. CARROLL: But it is not effective at the present time. We have all the coal we need in this country, East and West, more than we can use for three or four generations to come, and I think the government should grapple with this question in a broad and statesmanlike manner. It has been in the forefront of Canadian politics, for it is more or less a political question, for the last several years, and we have had experiments until I am getting tired of them. I want to see something done now. I want to see the Department of Mines, and if that department is not strong enough to take a forward step in this direction, I want to see the government of this country make this a national question. We are sending hundreds of millions of dollars out of this country into the United States every year for the purpose of bringing in anthracite coal, and we have in this country all the coal we need, and if this coking process was adopted, we could use our own coal instead of anthracite without much disturbance in this country, and I say that after having given this question some consideration. I think it is up to the government to take a forward step in this direction. I happened to be the chairman of a committee that took up this coal question last year, and we made a report to the House which was concurred in, but I have never heard anything about it since. I am not so very much concerned about that. Perhaps the report was wrong, but I want to say to the government of this country that so far as western coal is concerned there is only one solution to the problem and that is the question of freight rates. I have always taken the position, since we have had a Canadian National Railway, that it should carry that coal from the Alberta mines, or any other mines at cost in the West, to the central markets of Canada and in my opinion it would be good business if they did that. The present rate is $12 per ton but the railway granted a special rate of $9 or perhaps a little lower.

Mr. MANION: What about the possibility of boats carrying coal from the head of the lakes to eastern points?

Mr. CARROLL: The gentleman who did more towards developing a market for Alberta coal, especially in Winnipeg and points west of that city, stated in the committee that it would be impossible to compete with American coal on the basis of $9 a ton. The committee also went into the question of transhipping coal which came from the Alberta mines at the head of the lakes. There is a certain kind of coal in Alberta that will stand this transhipment; there is another class of coal that will not stand it. I believe the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) suggested at the last meeting of that committee, that notwithstanding the cheaper rates that might he had on the Great Lakes the cost of transhipment would far exceed the rate of $9 a ton that the Canadian National Railways offered. That is all I have to say as regards the transhipment of coal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could we not depend on the Lake Freights bill to keep that rate down?

Mr. CARROLL: I have heard considerable discussion as to that but I believe in the long run the cost of transhipment would be greater.

Mr. GRAHAM: Wait until we get our new bill through.

Mr. CARROLL: Coming back to the question of supplying the Canadian market with Canadian coal I consider there is only one solution of the question. First of all there is the problem of supplying the western area from the Alberta mines. In my opinion that is absolutely a question of the cost of transportation. I am one of those who believe that the railways of this country should carry that coal at cost; and if it is necessary to supply the Canadian market with domestic coal I would say the government should give them some assistance either by paying the extra cost that would permit competition with American coal—

Mr. MANION: That is good protectionist argument.

Mr. MARTELL: It is not protectionist argument.

Mr. CARROLL: I am not particular what my hon. friend calls it. I am a Canadiian and I want to see the markets of this country supplied with Canadian coal. I care not what my hon. friend calls it; whether it is a question of protection or a question of lower freight rates.

Mr. MANION: Nor am I very particular what my hon. friend calls it. We will let the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) name the policy.

Mr. MARTELL: The hon. member for Hants, if the hon. gentleman will permit him to say so, is of opinion that it is a question of looking after the interests of the people of Canada. We are satisfied, if hon. gentlemen opposite will agree to cutting the duties off everything else, to let coal come into the country free. You people up here want all the protection leaving us in the Maritime provinces to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. Give us agricultural implements and other things free and we will be satisfied to have free coal.

Mr. MANION: The only protection my hon. friend wants is in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CARROLL: Well, we have not asked for any protection in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MARTELL: Would my hon. friend (Mr. Manion) recommend an increase in the duty on coal?

Mr. MANION: No, I recommend the use of Canadian coal.

Mr. MARTELL: Would you recommend an increase in the duty? Answer the question specifically?

Mr. MANION: I am willing to try any plan that will result in Canadian coal being used instead of American.

Mr. CARROLL: Now, so far as our eastern coal is concerned—

Mr. HATFIELD: Will my hon. friend tell me why it is we pay more for Sydney coal in Yarmouth than they do in Ottawa? To-day I am paying $12 a ton for Sydney reserve coal and in Ottawa it sells for $10.50.

Mr. CARROLL: My hon. friend is absolutely wrong. There is no Sydney Mines coal being sold in Ottawa to-day.

Mr. MARTELL: And there is no Sydney Reserve coal.

Mr. CARROLL: There is no Sydney Reserve coal and no Cape Breton coal is being sold in Ottawa to-day.

Mr. HATFIELD: Mr. Dawson of the Purchasing branch of the Public Works department told me this session that he could get Cape Breton—

Mr. CARROLL: That he could? Has he got it?

Mr. HATFIELD: —coal for $10.50 a ton but down at the Rotary dinner the other day a gentleman told me he was getting Cape Breton coal for $9.50.

Mr. CARROLL: I am thoroughly familiar with the coal proposition in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MARTELL: There is no such coal as Sydney Reserve coal. There is Reserve Mine coal and there is old Sydney coal. "Sydney Mines Reserve" coal is commonly advertised by western coal merchants but it is a misnomer.

Mr. CARROLL: In answer to the hon. member for Yarmouth and Clare let me say there is no Nova Scotia coal being sold in the city of Ottawa to-day. The coal that he has reference to is the Minto coal from the province of New Brunswick and that coal is being brought here at a little cheaper rate than the ordinary bituminous coal. The mine is practically on the line of the Canadian Pacific railway and I am told that in order to get freights from the mine to Montreal and Ottawa that the company carry the coal at a rate below cost and therefore successfully compete with the bituminous coal from the the United States. That is the only way it can be done. I hope my hon. friend (Mr. Hatfield) will take my word for that.

Mr. HATFIELD: The statement was made to me by Mr. Johnston. And I cannot understand why the hon. gentleman insists that nobody said so.

Mr. CARROLL: The man who said so has been wrongly informed.

Mr. BAXTER: I should like to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Carroll) a question because I think he knows the coal situation pretty well. It is quite evident that the cost of producing bituminous coal in the United States must be lower than the cost of producing bituminous coal in Nova Scotia. Can my hon. friend say why that is so, or if anything can be done to remedy the situation?

Mr. CARROLL: I can explain that to my hon. friend. Although I have worked on the surface I have not sufficient knowledge of coal mining to explain the technical details as to the cost of coal production. I may tell my hon. friend, however, that the reason why the production of coal in the Virginia mines costs about 33 per cent less than it does in the Nova Scotia mines—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): More than that.

Mr. CARROLL:—is because there are some mines in West Virginia where miners are not used to mine the coal. Machines are employed to burrow into the mountain side and convey the coal to the cars. In the province of Nova Scotia in some instances we have to go two miles under the sea in order to get coal at the present time, and I presume it is the same in British Columbia.

Mr. BAXTER: There are some places in New Brunswick where you would not have to go that far.

Mr. CARROLL: I do not know much about the mainland mines, but outside of the new mine just developed, at a cost of $2,000,000 or $2,500,000, by the British Empire Steel Corporation, the haulage is in the vicinity of one and a half miles and in some cases three miles. So that hon. members can see immediately why the cost of the production of coal in the Maritime provinces—and I am speaking of Cape Breton particularly—is so much in excess of the cost in places like West Virginia. I was informed a few days ago that they are developing a mine in West Virginia where the cost of production at the mouth of the pit is 75 cents per ton. If that coal is on a line of railway similiar to those lines equipped by certain American interests, it is almost an impossibility to compete so far as Canadian industries are concerned with that coal in the city of Montreal or in any market as far east as Three Rivers or Sherbrooke. I am referring of course to soft coal. To my mind, if we are going to do anything towards supplying the Canadian domestic demand for Canadian coal, the question is one of coke. I think the experimental stage in connection with coke is passed. We know exactly what can be done in this country, and know exactly what coke plants will cost. We know exactly how many tons of coke may be manufactured from so many tons of coal, and, having knowledge of the cheapness of production in the United States, if we are going to have this question properly settled, we should have governmental assistance, and I am not particular in what shape it is given. I am speaking for the West as well as for the East. Recently I made a few remarks in this House, and suggested, after having given the matter some consideration, that the question for the West was cheaper freight rates, and the question for the East a matter of coking. I have always supported this government, and I am not criticising them in any steps they have taken; they probably know more about the situation than I do; but I am speaking from the standpoint of one who thinks that we have sufficient coal in this country to fill all the Canadian demands, and I ask why should we not utilize it? I believe every true Canadian in this House hopes that the day will come when we will not be sending $100,000,000 a year into the States, but that we will keep it in Canada; and make coke take the place of anthracite coal in domestic hearths in Ontario and Quebec. I think every fair-minded man will say that it is up to this government to take action; and perhaps it was up to late governments to do the same. Let us hope that the time will come when future governments will deal with this question in a national and broadminded way. If the government will do what I have suggested, I feel that they will have the support of every member in this House who thinks that we should have a Canadian market for Canadian coal and coke, instead of sending out of the country $100,000,000 a year, plus the exchange which we have to pay on American money. It might involve an expenditure by this country of $75,000,000 towards the maintenance of that market for Canadian coal. But even so, if that object can be attained, those of us who have in the last three or four years tried to proclaim this policy and to give the government some knowledge of it, will feel that we shall not have lived in vain.

Mr. BAXTER: I will give the House a concrete illustration. I am living in St. John, New Brunswick. I would like some coke. I can get an occasional load from the gas works, but they do not produce enough coke to go round. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) has shown us that it is a feasible proposition to make coke. We know that. At the same time nobody is manufacturing coke commercially. Has the government any thought of putting a government stimulus behind the coke producing proposition in the Maritime provinces? If they will translate their scientific knowledge into practical action, I think they will be doing a good thing for the country, and I will have no difficulty in supporting such a proposition.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I thoroughly agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) in reference to the advisability of having coke plants in Canada. The method has been worked out and found feasible. It would be a great benefit to Canada if we had it as the corollary of the St. Lawrence waterway proposition. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) is here. Let him tell this House if that St. Lawrence waterway is not the solution of the proposition of carrying western coal to Ontario, and of carrying eastern coal to western Ontario via the St. Lawrence waterway. I ask the minister to tell the House and the country what headway is being made, and what are the hopes of an early solution of the transportation question by the St. Lawrence waterway.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is pretty late at night to start a discussion of the St. Lawrence waterway.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): It is the solution of this proposition.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the St. Lawrence waterway were deepened, it would be a solution of the question; but it would not be a subject of discussion at this time of night.

Mr. GOULD: I wish to carry the discussion back into Saskatchewan for a few minutes, because after you leave the Maritime provinces the first coal you strike is in the electoral district I have the honour to represent. I do not see any money being voted in the main estimates for carrying on experimental work at Bienfait, and I anticipate that the item will come down in the supplementary estimates. I rose to ask the government just what attitude they are taking concerning the plant at Bienfait.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have so many questions to answer now, that I do not know that I can remember them all, but I will deal with the question of the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) first. There is no question, as the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) says, that the experimental stage in regard to the manufacture of coke is passed. Nobody denies that, and I would like to say that the $40,000 vote which has been mentioned is not for the purpose of advertising the coke, but to advertise to the outside world our mineral resources, and to provide for research work, investigation and geological surveys. We put an expert on this work last year and he made a study of the situation in Port Colborne, Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa; I am not sure whether he did any particular work in St. John but I know from advice I have received that there is a possibility of a moderate plant being operated there. But the first consideration, which is a difficult one, is the question of disposing of the by-products. My hon. friend speaks of the gas coke, but it is not to be compared with the product made for the domestic market which we are speaking of. Before that plant can be successfully operated it must be hitched up with the gas companies, because the reduction in the cost of conversion is largely consumed by the amount you receive for your gas by-products. I think I may safely say that the conversion will be paid for by the sale economically of the by-products. So that where there is a population of 75,000 or thereabouts it is no longer a question of experimentation to establish a coking plant: if the community is equipped for the use of gas the other by-products can be used acceptably. My hon. friend speaks of encouragement. Last year we spent a portion of this money carrying on the investigation, not for the purpose of proving that you could make coal but for the purpose of ascertaining certain facts and giving needed information to those who would invest money in the enterprise; because it must be carried on as a private or a municipal enterprise. All that information is available; no one needs to search for it. People know what the problem is in the various centres because we have made a study of the question. I may observe that there is a plant at Hamilton where a contract has been entered into for the supply of gas. There are now before the government requests for encouragement, and the matter is receiving consideration; and assistance is also asked for in connection with transportation. I think the solution of this acute fuel difficulty lies in the conversion of bituminous coal into coke. Coke manufactured at Hamilton to-day, I will guarantee, is equal in value to anthracite coal; a ton of coke is equal to almost a ton and a quarter of anthracite in heating value. So that you have an additional value. I think it is safe to say that anthracite sells at $16 a ton, generally speaking, in Toronto and other Ontario points, and coke can be delivered at the door of the consumer at $12 a ton. You have therefore a reduction as compared with the price of anthracite, and in this respect you have done something very much worth while for the consumer. After all we must keep the consumer in mind; for hon. gentlemen who represent the city of Toronto would be the first to kick if you increased the cost of fuel to that city. And that is the practical difficulty that we meet whenever we begin to talk about an all-Canadian fuel supply for Canada. An hon. gentleman says that the cost of coal in Nova Scotia at the pit mouth is $4.50 to $5 a ton. Well, similar coal 250 miles from lake Erie ports is produced at the pit mouth at less than $2.25 a ton to-day f.o.b., and that coal is placed in Toronto in the yards at less than $7.

Mr. MARTELL: If the United States produces the same sort of coal so much cheaper than we do, and if we are going to maintain a protective policy at all, why do you not put sufficient protection on coal and let us have the market for that commodity? We have to pay a duty on automobiles and other things to maintain the industries in Ontario,

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am not discussing the question of duties.

Mr. MARTELL: But it is absolutely apropos.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Taking Toronto as a central point in Ontario, bituminous coal sells at less than $7 a ton; if that is the case and if you have to bring the same product from Alberta 2,200 miles either by rail alone or by both rail and water, you will see the difficulty that presents itself. And I do not see how you could bring coal from Nova Scotia except by water if it is to compete at all with the coal that is landed in Toronto to-day at less than $7 a ton. So that if there is to be a national policy for the supplying of this country with an all-Canadian coal, with conditions as they are in the mining industry in the United States at the present moment, you will have to impose upon the consumer in Ontario a considerably higher rate than he is now paying for his fuel. We might as well face the question at once. I will be frank about the matter and say that in my opinion there is no way I know of by which an all-Canadian supply can be maintained except by making the consumer in Ontario pay more for his fuel than he is now paying. Perhaps he is willing to pay more, but we must face the question and tell him honestly that he will have to pay more. I am just as desirous as any one else, if you can show me how it is to be done, of creating an all-Canadian market for Canadian coal. But I do not know whether you will put the consumer in a good frame of mind by making him pay two or three dollars a ton more for his fuel than he would pay with the American product available. That is the problem we have to face in connection with a national policy of this kind. I do say however that so far as Canadian fuel can be used without increasing the cost to the consumer, and where transportation can be reduced to the absolute minimum, I am prepared to recommend assistance for our friends in the East who have a serious problem of their own. In the East they have deep mining which is expensive; and the same is true of Alberta. I said to the coal miners there that if they were going to get down to a minimum cost in transportation they would have to reduce their production cost, which at the moment is $4.50 a ton. That is the coal situation in a nutshell; you cannot secure an all-Canadian market for Canadian coal unless you make the consumer pay more than he is paying now. With respect to coking operations, I would have anything that might be done in that direction confined to Canadian production.

Mr. LOGAN: I have discussed the coal question before this session, and, as far as I could, exhaustively; and I rise now to make a statement with regard to the cost of coal in Nova Scotia. My hon. friend from Yarmouth and Clare (Mr. Hatfield) states that coal costs in Yarmouth $12 a ton. In behalf of the collieries of my county which produce as good coal as can be got in Cape Breton I will undertake to supply all requirements in Yarmouth and all the western counties of Nova Scotia at $5 a ton f.o.b. their vessels. I do not know where the difference between $5 and $12 lies; it may go to the middleman for all I know. I do know however that we are mighty glad in Cumberland to get $5 a ton for coal; and in many cases we do not get $4.50 a ton at the mine. Why to-day we are selling coal to the Canadian National Railway Board for a maximum of $5 a ton—good coal. steam coal for use in locomotives on the fastest trains.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is f.o.b. railway?

Mr. LOGAN: Yes. In Cumberland we are prepared to supply a minimum of 400,000 tons of coal a year f.o.b. ship.

Mr. MARTELL: About what would the freight be to Yarmouth?

Mr. LOGAN: Coal is conveyed from Cape Breton to Montreal for less than $1 a ton. I would say that the cost in small steamers or schooners should not exceed $1.50 a ton.

Mr. MARTELL: Say 90 cents.

Mr. LOGAN: Well, putting the rate at even $1.50 a ton, it means that the whole county of Yarmouth could be supplied with good coal at not exceeding $6.50 a ton. As I said before, it is a remarkable circumstance, and we have it even within a few miles of the collieries in Cumberland, that coal which is sold at the mines for $4.50 and $4.75 a ton costs the consumer $9 and $10 a ton. But do not let us blame the producer of coal, because I will undertake to say that there is not a single coal operator in Nova Scotia to-day who is making $1 on his investment.

Mr. GOULD: I should like an answer to my question.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have some money still available for experimental work at Bienfait.

Mr. GOULD: Last year I think we came to the conclusion that it was not commercially feasible to handle lignite coal of which we have so many deposits in southeastern Saskatchewan, and I advanced the suggestion to the minister, and he seemed to coincide with me, that it would be well to convert this coal into electricity at central points and distribute it throughout the country for auxiliary heat and power purposes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I shall be very glad to discuss this matter with my hon. friend on another occasion and give him full information as to what we have done in the briquetting of lignite. It is feasible to briquet this coal.

The CHAIRMAN: Briquetting is included in another vote.

Mr. GOULD: I was simply speaking on the subject of research work, which is mentioned in the item under discussion, as I wondered if the government had taken into consideration the potentialities of central electrical stations.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will deal with that on another occasion.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: What about the second item, publications, English and French; purchase of books, laboratory supplies, instruments, miscellaneous assistance and contingencies; shall that carry?

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: The transportation item has been adopted.

Mr. HUMPHREY: No, Mr. Chairman, I should like to get information on the last item.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Let that stand, then.

The CHAIRMAN: The last item stands.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. (Wednesday).

RESERVE BANK

PROPOSED ENLARGED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND COMMERCE

Mr. ARTHUR L. DESAULNIERS (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by Mr. Gervais:

That the sixth report of the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce be concurred in.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbiniere): Mr. Speaker, the sixth report of the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce reads as follows:

Your committee recommend that the order of reference be enlarged so as to embrace the study and consideration of the purpose, organization and operation of some type of properly administered central or reserve bank.

The minutes of proceedings of the committee have been laid on the Table of the House, and therefore we can refer to them in the discussion of this motion.

The order of reference, the enlargement of which is now sought, reads as follows:

That the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce should be instructed to consider the provisions of the Bank Act with a view to recommending such amendments to the act as would better protect the interests of depositors generally and prevent similar occurrences in future.

The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) in committee moved the following:

That this committee is of the opinion that the purpose, organization and operation of some type of properly administered central or reserve bank falls within the scope of the reference; and that a subcommittee be hereby instructed to suggest to this committee the names of competent witnesses to give evidence on this subject.

As chairman of the committee, I had to rule this motion out of order as not falling within the scope of the order of reference. Whereupon the hon. member moved:

That the order of reference be enlarged so as to cover the study and consideration of the subject matter referred to.

This question is by no means a new one. Last year before the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce, and also before the committee on Agricultural Conditions, it was studied at length and a vast volume of information was collected, the evidence being afterwards printed and distributed to all members of this House. The federal reserve system of the United States has been in force since 1913, and in the interval many books have been written on the subject, a number of these volumes being available in the library of parliament. Therefore if the purpose of those who seek to enlarge the order of reference is to collect more information, I think it is futile, because such information is now available in the evidence which has been printed and distributed and in the numerous books on the subject in the library of parliament.

On the other hand, if the purpose of those who seek to enlarge the order of reference be the immediate consideration of the creation of a federal reserve system in Canada, I think it is altogether inadvisable. There are in this House and in the country to-day a certain number of people who find everything wrong with our banking system, and who would like to reform it, not by the ordinary course of evolution, but by drastic measures which would be in effect an actual revolution of the system. This frame of mind is understandable. Some of these gentlemen have attributed the unsettled conditions prevailing in their particular section of the country to the fact that there is no federal reserve bank in Canada. They have also noticed that several banks have got into difficulties. We had the failure of the Farmers' Bank a few years ago. The Bank of Hamilton had to be absorbed. The Quebec Bank was amalgamated with the Royal Bank. La Banque Nationale was absorbed by La Banque d'Hochelaga. And the Home Bank failed. Hon. gentlemen say that if we had a federal reserve board or a federal reserve bank such difficulties as these would not occur. I say, Sir, it is a mistake. It is an error of principle; it is a wrong way of reasoning. The difficulties confronting my hon. friends in their particular sections of the country are by no means peculiar to those sections. The financial and economic difficulties that confront the western farmers prevail also in all the agricultural centres of the United States, and if I read aright the information appearing in the United States press the condition of the farming classes in the western states is even worse than that of the farmers in western Canada. Nor are these difficulties peculiar to the farming class. In the industrial centres of the eastern provinces, Ontario and Quebec, and in the eastern states, these same problems have arisen. Quite a number of firms other than banks have gone by the board on account of the contraction of credit and the shrinkage in value of various commodities which is part of the aftermath of all great wars.

When the question of establishing a federal reserve system first arose in the United States is was to meet conditions quite different from those which prevail in Canada. They had the unit system of banking, independent banks with no branches. These banks had neither an elasticity in their currency, nor the facilities of rediscounting and of mobilizing the surplus assets centred in a few cities for use in other parts of the country where they were more needed. Let me state the objects which were put forward last year as the main reasons why a system of rediscounting should be established in Canada. Before the Banking and Commerce committee last year the question was agitated, and it was moved that we should create in Canada a federal reserve bank the purposes of which would be as follows:

(a) It is a bank of re-discount for other banks, or a bankers' bank; available for credit to banks, either when there is a financial depression and heavy demands on a bank or on the other hand elasticity of credit when there is business expansion and prosperity. In this way very large banking capital is less important in the banking system and there is greater stability of credits.

(b) Open market operations to check too sudden expansions or too sudden contractions, by the use of bank discount.

[Mr. Vien.]

(c) As a credit agent in international trade and commerce for a broader discount market for commercial paper.

(d) To act as a bank of note issue for the government instead of, for example, the Dominion government handling its own note issue.

(e) To act as the fiscal agents of the government.

(f) To be constituted in such a manner as to enable the people of the country by the government and to the government's appointees on the board of directors, to have due regard to the best interests of the people's prosperity and financial welfare.

(g) To act, through its board of directors, as a disciplinary body on banks which might be disposed to engage in questionable undertakings on a large scale.

(h) To exercise, through its board of directors, inspection in a general way for unusual financial operations of the member and other banks.

Mr. LADNER: The hon. gentleman is reading from the proposal which I submitted to the Banking and Commerce committee last year, but it is important for the House to note that the proposals he has stated here refer generally to the federal reserve bank system as operating in other countries. If he will look further on in the report he will see the functions stated as they can be applied to Canada by co-ordinating some of the existing functions of a federal reserve bank which the government actually carry on. It is hardly fair to read that section, because it refers to other countries.

Mr. VIEN: When my hon. friend introduced his resolution in the Banking and Commerce committee last year he said that these were the main functions of the federal reserve system that it was desired to introduce in Canada. Of course he did not mean that the system exactly as it prevails in the United States should be adopted, but the suggestion was that some organization should be created at least to discharge some of the functions which the system discharged in the United States.

Mr. LADNER: I do not think the hon. member wishes to read the wrong part of the proposals. If he will look at page 255, under the heading "Operation" he will see a statement of the actual functions that such an institution should exercise in Canada.

Mr. VIEN: My hon. friend is quite correct, but I do not believe that the quotation I have made conveys the wrong impression to the House. However, my hon. friend has made the correction, and I shall not enlarge on the subject.

The question was put in the committee last year to several banking authorities, who were asked to express their opinion. Sir John Aird, Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor, and several others were examined by the committee, and gave their opinion. May I be permitted to quote Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor's opinion in respect to the advisability of introducing a federal reserve bank into our banking system in Canada? In reply to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) he said:

Mr. Ladner, there is no necessity for a federal reserve bank in Canada in our opinion. It has been suggested before and the proposal apparently arose from the contemplation of the federal reserve bank of the United States, the main reasons for the establishment of which were the absence in the country of means whereby: banks could obtain temporary assistance to meet seasonal or other special requirements. Second: The banking resources of the country could be transferred freely throughout the year to the part where the need for temporary advances might from time to time exist. Canada is under neither of these disabilities. Under the Finance Act of 1914 banks in need of temporary assistance can and do obtain from the Dominion government that assistance, while our branch bank system insures an ample supply of currency at all times and places where it is needed for crop movement or other purposes. It has been suggested that the tendency of the Canadian banks is to borrow from the government only with reluctance. Similar conditions prevail in the United States with respect to borrowing from the federal reserve bank, and in England with respect to borrowing from the Bank of England. Is it not as it should be? The note issues of the national bank in the United States, being based on government bonds did not expand and contract according to the requirements of the country whereas we have as you know a very flexible currency under the Canadian banking system. This expansion is covered entirely and absolutely by the needs of business and works automatically and perfectly. It is safe to say if the present Canadian system had for the past half century obtained in the United States the federal reserve system would never have been established. I remember in 1907 I think it was a great banking authority in Europe saying the United States banking system was uncivilized and the creation of the federal reserve system was an almost distorted effort to create a wrong banking system. It was in existence so long it could not be abolished any more than our banking system could be in Canada and it seems to us the federal reserve system has accomplished its purpose.

Sir John Aird gave a similar opinion in answer to the hon. gentleman's question:

Q. What is your opinion as to the wisdom of creating a federal reserve bank along the lines outlined in the proposal which was filed?

A. I think I answered that just now. I do not think the time has arrived for that. I think that if this country develops and we get the population, the time will come when we will need greater banking facilities, either by the present banks increasing their capital or by the establishment of some such bank along the lines you suggest, but I think it is not advisable at the time because it would be a great cost and risk.

This year we have had the great advantage of having before the committee as a witness Mr. Pole, the Chief National Bank Examiner in the United States. The question was put to him in the committee whether he thought the system that prevails in the United States would be of advantage in Canada. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) put the following question to him:

Having them in mind, the Canadian system and the American system, and from your experience as an examiner, would it be advisable or feasible to adapt the American bank examination system to the Canadian banking system without changing the principle of our banking system to correspond with the principle of the banking system of the United States?

Mr. Pole answered as follows:

The federal reserve system has been of inestimable value to the banks of the United States in ways too numerous to mention. Primarily, with the discounting privileges which it offers to its members, it has enabled a large number of banks to carry on through periods of depression when it would have been impossible to obtain funds elsewhere, and which must have closed their doors with reluctant heavy loss to depositors; and while some members of the system have fallen by the wayside in spite of the facilities which the F.R. banks offered, the question naturally arises as to how calamitous might have been the situation had there been no such agency in existence—and to the world this will never be known, but to those who have been in close touch with conditions since its establishment, the facts are undisputed.

The federal reserve system is admirably adapted to the unit system of banking, but for a very small number of banks with a large number of branches to attempt to adjust themselves so as to fit into such a scheme would appear to be highly impracticable.

Under the provisions of the Finance Act it seems to be quite possible for any bank in Canada whose assets would be of such liquid character as to enable it to take advantage of any facliities offered by the reserve system, to avail itself of equal opportunity offered by the Finance Act, the operation of which is easy and inexpensive, and, judging from the manner in which it has been functioning, quite effective.

The choice in Canada then would almost appear to be between a federal reserve system coupled with a unit system of banks which change would involve untold difficulties, and a combination of the branch banking system coupled with the Finance Act, which seemingly is meeting every banking requirement.

That is the opinion of a banking expert in the United States who came to Canada, made a thorough study of our banking system and gave us the benefit of his opinion.

Mr. CARROLL: In effect, does the witness say it is more easy to get discount in the United States than it is in Canada under our banking system?

Mr. VIEN: He did not say whether it was more easy or less easy. He simply said that the Finance Act in its operation seemed to him adequate to meet the requirements of our banking system.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And did he not say that the Canadian system was therefore superior to the American system?

Mr. VIEN: I do not think that question was put to him. He said that our Finance Act as it is operating at the present time was better adapted to our Canadian branch bank system than would be the federal reserve bank system in the United States. He pointed out to the committee that the federal reserve system was opposed to the introduction of the branch bank system in the United States, and that is quite easy to understand.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Then it was a comparison between two systems that are not comparable, one being a branch bank system and the other a unit system, and therefore his evidence was not germane to the question we are considering.

Mr. VIEN: On the contrary I think his evidence was very germane. He said that our Canadian branch bank system was not adaptable, in his opinion, to the federal reserve system that they had in the United States.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): There is a unit system that would be adaptable.

Mr. VIEN: He speaks of that:

> The choice in Canada then would almost appear to be between a federal reserve system coupled with a unit system of banks, which change would involve untold difficulties.

It did not appear to him possible to change our branch bank system into a unit system of banking, and it seemed to him that the federal reserve system could not be introduced into Canada unless such a change were made. He also pointed out to us the expense incurred in the operation of the federal reserve system. This expense is extremely great. May I draw the attention of the House to a report on the subject which appeared in the New York Times on Thursday, May 29, last, under the following captions:

> Federal reserve in a "lean" season.
> System on a non-paying basis because of the decline in business.
> Loans total, $795,499,000.
> Aggregate of a billion outstanding required to show a profit—shrinkage in bills discounted.

I will not weary the House by reading the whole article but will simply quote these two paragraphs:

> The situation, bankers said, is not to be regarded as serious, but rather as a seasonal phenomenon which they expect will soon disappear.
> To operate at a profit the system must have about $1,000,000,000 out in loans. At present its total earning assets are considerably below this mark.

That means that in order to pay, a federal reserve system must have at least a billion dollars outstanding, otherwise it cannot meet its carrying charges.

Mr. LADNER: I am sure my hon. friend is not trying to mislead the House, but was not the evidence disclosed that the federal reserve system had made a very large profit and that it had paid a very large sum to the United States government?—I have forgotten the amount.

Mr. COOTE: The sum of $138,000,000 was paid to the federal government out of profits by federal reserve banks.

Mr. LADNER: Yes, there was a profit of $138,000,000, and my hon. friend has quoted a newspaper article which shows there was a loss.

Mr. VIEN: Oh, no. I am sorry if I have conveyed such an impression to the House. It was not my desire to do that.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Then why not have stated that there was a profit?

Mr. VIEN: I simply said that in order to pay, the federal reserve system of the United States had to have at least a billion dollars outstanding, and that with any lesser amount of business the system could not meet its carrying charges.

Mr. LADNER: Is there an hon. member here who contends that we should have the federal reserve system of the United States? The chairman of the committee must know that nobody ever contended such a thing; he has built up a man of straw in order to knock him down. I would ask my hon. friend if it is not correct that the tendency of the evidence given to the committee was that we should apply those principles of the United States Federal Reserve Bank, and others, that are applicable to conditions in Canada?

Mr. VIEN: I can best answer my hon. friend by reading again the motion for concurrence:

> Your committee recommend that the order of reference be enlarged so as to embrace the study and consideration of the purpose, organization and operation of some type of properly administered central or reserve bank.

I did not say that what was meant was the identical system that prevails in the United States. What I did say was, that the study and consideration of any kind of central or reserve bank would be useless, because all the information was at present available, and if the purpose was the creation of such a system as prevails in the United States then, on the strength of the evidence now before us, it is inadvisable to do that because we have already in our banking system all the facilities which the federal reserve system offers to the American bank. The head office for each Canadian branch bank is in itself a re-discounting bureau. It is a federal reserve system in itself because it has the required elasticity, and it can provide surpluses at any point where the bank has branches. In addition, the banks in Canada, under the Finance Act, have all the re-discounting facilities which the federal reserve system offers to the American banks. Furthermore, in the opinion of Mr. Pole, and in the opinion of the banking experts in Canada, the great bankers who were called to give their opinion before the committee, it would be totally inadvisable, very expensive, and would not result in any profit, to change our present system.

I wish also to draw the attention of the House to our system as it exists. The Bank Act, which is revised every ten years, is the charter of our Canadian banks. When the Bank Act is revised the Canadian banks at the same time receive powers to carry on for ten years, and it has been customary since confederation not to make radical changes in that act except at the decennial revision. It would tend to cause instability in our banking system if radical and fundamental changes were introduced into the Bank Act every year. We can very well amend the Bank Act year by year so as to improve it; but, I repeat, fundamental changes would be unwise and would create instability. Therefore, I for one object to the concurrence of the House in the sixth report of the Banking and Commerce committee. It would mean a loss of time for the House as well as a loss of time for the committee; it would be a useless expenditure of money to call witnesses and adduce evidence with a view to obtaining information; and it would be utterly undesirable that the fundamental principles of our banking system should be changed before the next decennial revision. For these reasons I deem it inadvisable to concur in the sixth report of the committee.

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary): At the outset I direct attention to the fact that the Banking and Commerce committee only seek an enlargement of the reference in order that it may have the power to study and consider the position, organization and operation of some type of properly administered central or reserve bank. I quite agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) that no one, so far as I know, has ever suggested the application of the federal reserve system of the United States to our present system in Canada. The motion before the House simply asks that the committee be empowered to study and consider some type which might be found applicable to the Canadian banking system. I agree also with the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) that it is not necessary for us to call any witnesses for this purpose. There are mountains of literature on the subject all of which is available; and I have no doubt that the committee could come to a conclusion one way or the other simply by a careful analysis and consideration of some of the evidence at hand.

In order to determine the advisability of making any extension of our system along the lines indicated by a central or reserve bank, it seems to me, we should have a very clear impression at the outset of exactly what our situation is to-day. It is unnecessary for me to remind the House that parliament is charged with the responsibility of furnishing adequate credit facilities to the people of Canada. In its wisdom many years ago—and I do not doubt its wisdom in that regard—parliament saw fit to delegate this duty to certain quasi-public corporations, subject to certain rules and regulations. These rules and regulations intended for the guidance of the banks are laid down in the Bank Act, which is revised every ten years, and sometimes more frequently as necessity demands. Under the terms of the Bank Act the banks have been given many special and important privileges. The providing of credit to the nation has been exploited—and I do not use that word in any improper sense—by the banks for the purpose of making private profit; the banks are entitled to that privilege under the act as it now stands. We have provided by the act that from month to month, semi-annually and also annually, the banks shall make reports to the Finance department, but that department have been of little value so far as checking up or making any careful scrutiny of these returns is concerned. I do not think that anyone, not even the Minister of Finance, will dispute that statement, because I have only to call to the mind of the House that in the matter of the Home Bank the capital had been impaired for some seven or eight years while the Finance department had absolutely no official knowledge of that situation.

In addition to these returns made to the Finance department, provision is made in the Bank Act for the formation of what is known as a central gold reserve. That central gold reserve, which was organized for the purpose of allowing the banks to expand their circulation upon depositing certain specified securities, is managed by four trustees, one representing the government and three representing the banks. Furthermore, we have another alley along which our financial affairs run, known as the Finance Act. The Finance Act of Canada, which provides rediscounting facilities to the banks and the banks alone, is operated by the Treasury Board. The Treasury Board consists of five privy councillors of Canada, with the Minister of Finance as the chairman and the Deputy Minister of Finance as secretary. Strange to relate, this Treasury Board apparently has come to the conclusion —although I believe all modern economists take the other view—that the interest rate cannot be used as an agency in either preventing unwise inflation or safeguarding against unnecessary and harmful deflation. Another illustration will suffice to indicate that the operation of this particular act certainly invites some criticism; I need only mention the fact, disclosed in evidence, that while the banks under this act can borrow money at the rate of five per cent, when the government goes to the banks it has to pay five and a quarter per cent. Surely that does not speak well for the efficiency of our rediscounting facilities. In addition to that, there is another direction in which our financial activities lead us. We incorporated many years ago an organization known as the Canadian Bankers' Association, and under the incorporating act we have given that association certain supervisory powers, delegating to them at the same time certain duties of supervision. And I need not mention that in addition to all these ramifications, unconnected and unrelated, we have a Post Office savings bank which invites savings from the people of Canada and which is operated under the Post Office Department. We have also a government savings bank; I do not know under what department it is managed but I presume it would be the Finance department. And then we have the Mint which operates under the auspices of the British government.

The Minister of Finance now proposes, and I think he is wise in the proposition, to superimpose upon this system an inspection plan under the direction of an officer to be known as the Inspector General of Banks. He hopes I think with some reason, to convert the Finance department from a mere undertaking establishment, in relation to banks, into something like a hospital clinic, so that the banks may receive treatment before their collapse, with a resultant saving to the depositors whose position, it is trusted, will be one of much less peril.

That is the situation that exists to-day; and that, in combination with what the minister proposes, leads one to the conclusion that our system has been something like Topsy; it has simply "growed." It is not properly related, it is not properly co-ordinated, if I may be pardoned the use of that term. That being the present situation, the question is, what has any type of central or reserve bank to do therewith? In the first place I might remind hon. members that central banks are nothing new; the United States is not the only country in which there is a central bank. With all its various and diversified interests the people of the United States have undoubtedly found this central bank to be a very effective instrument to keep the country financially safe and to promote its industrial development. We find, too, that in South Africa, with the varied interests in that country, there is a central bank. The same is true of Australia and also of Japan.

We are not necessarily wedded to the United States scheme. But taking the United States system, let me just in a few short sentences indicate what it has meant, according to the authorities, to the finances and development of that country. First of all it has effectively mobilized the nation's reserves so that those reserves are available in the place where and at the time when they are wanted. One of the witnesses before the Banking and Commerce committee illustrated the situation very well, I think, in this way. He said that suppose you establish twelve water reservoirs and pipe them together, if there was a drain on any particular reservoir, naturally there would be a flow into it from the others, thus maintaining a correct balance in all parts of the entire system. Similarly, in the case of a financial system founded on that principle, a proper balance will be maintained in all parts of the country making credit available wherever and whenever it was needed. So I say, it is admitted everywhere that the federal reserve system in the United States has effectively mobilized the nation's reserves In that country it has also increased the elasticity of the note issue. That is not an important matter in this country, because some people consider that the note issue is, if anything, perhaps too elastic in Canada. In addition it has provided rediscount facilities, and that, of course, has made possible the mobilization to which I refer. Fourth, and perhaps most important of all, it has created an intelligent control, in the public interest, of the financial resources of the country. That has been achieved mainly by the use of the discount weapon. At the outset the federal reserve system in the United States was somewhat new and there was some difference of counsel as to the proper procedure. But, through a time of stress and after a period of strain, it has been found that a federal reserve system can so use the discount rate that unnecessary deflation and inflation, both bad for the country, will be prevented.

These are the fundamental principles, as I understand them, which operate in connection with any central or reserve system. Can any of them be applied to the situation in Canada? Certainly it seems to me that with regard to the rediscount privilege, we should have some effective and competent machinery to regulate the discount rate in order that we may prevent the tragedy alike of inflation and of deflation. That is not done now. I am not surprised that it is not done, because I think that with political management even the best of systems will not necessarily yield the results desired. What we need is an independent board to take charge of this situation and, indeed, of other situations mentioned; a board which will be in a position effectively to administer the nation's resources for the public benefit.

Mr. ROBB: What does my hon. friend mean when he refers to the discount rate?

Mr. SHAW: I am referring to the rate of interest for rediscounting purposes. We do not propose, as suggested by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) any revolution of the system; we propose an evolution of the system. We suggest the adoption of some permanent supervisory board which will gather up all these frayed ends of all of these disorganized and incoherent parts of our financial system that we have to-day, when we shall be able to work out of that system something like coherence and develop a system which will function effectively in the public interest.

My hon. friend (Mr. Vien) has referred to several noted banking authorities who, he claims, were opposed last year to the application of the federal reserve system to Canada. Those same gentlemen last year very violently opposed any inspection system. I am quite sure that their judgment on that point was wrong; as a matter of fact, the minister is quite confident that their judgment was wrong, because now he proposes to introduce an inspection system which, I trust, will be satisfactory for the purpose.

I do not propose to labour this subject further, there are features of the federal system and of the central bank system which, I think, could be applied with advantages to the system in Canada. We could create a supervisory board—I do not care whether you call it a bank; there is nothing particular in connection with the name "bank"—of skilled, competent financial men, men who have made a study of conditions in Canada, who would be able to operate all our financial system and who could make it work intelligently in the public interest.

May I point out in conclusion that this is nothing new in Canada, because I find that a former president of the Imperial Bank, as far back as 1914 after discussing approvingly the inauguration of the federal reserve system in the United States, used these words:

> The time will come in Canada and come early when we will find it advisable, yes necessary, with our growth and development to establish a bank of rediscount under the patronage of the Dominion government and with somewhat similar powers to those that have been granted to the reserve banks of the United States.

Mr. MARLER: Was that not quoted before the establishment of the Finance Act?

Mr. SHAW: I think it was. This statement was made on the 28th May, 1914. I quote it for the purpose of showing that the then president of the Imperial Bank realized the importance of adopting some of the essential features of the American federal reserve system.

Mr. MARLER: Precisely what the government realized itself in bringing the Finance Act into vogue.

Mr. SHAW: Yes, the government was forced, by reason of necessity, subsequently to introduce the Finance Act as a war measure; but the president of the Imperial Bank spoke when there was no suggestion at all of a war or a pending war. Then I find that in 1918 a former president of the Royal Bank used these words:

> In my opinion the question of providing supplementary banking facilities in this country is very important and should receive the consideration of the government and the banks. If we had a bank of re-discount patterned somewhat after the federal reserve bank in the United States, it would render legitimately available millions of assets in the form of high-grade commercial paper, now lying dormant in the portfolios of the banks, and thereby increase our financial resources. I think the government should appoint a committee of experts to investigate the suggestion.

Mr. GOOD: That was said after the Finance Act was passed.

Mr. SHAW: We should not close any avenue of study or consideration which may be of profit to us in putting our banking system on a solid and safe foundation. Our banking system, if it is to function at all, must not only secure, but merit the confidence of the people of Canada.

4 p.m. That confidence unfortunately, has been sadly shaken, and it is our duty to leave no field unexplored where we may be able to find something of value which will add strength and solidarity to this system.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr Speaker, I should not like this motion to go through without offering some views. I am very much interested in the discussion on the part of my hon. friends who have made a special study of the banking system of Canada, but there is no good reason why, at this stage of the session, we should enlarge the reference and refer this back to the Banking and Commerce committee. The committee made a very careful study of the banking situation last year; they carefully reviewed all the arguments for and against and, as has been so well stated by the chairman, the hon. member for Lotbinière, there are mountains of information in the records. Therefore, there is no good reason why we should refer the matter back.

As regards the other argument just presented by the hon. member (Mr. Shaw) as to the advantages of a rediscount system, the present act under the Finance Act has been demonstrated to be quite sufficient for the requirements of the country. It works well and is well suited to the Dominion of Canada, even on the argument of my hon. friend. Under the Finance Act the people of Canada are getting proportionately just as much revenue as the people of the United States will under their federal reserve system. So that for that reason no good purpose can be served by referring the matter back. For all those reasons at this time I shall have to vote against the resolution.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): As one who has been greatly interested in this subject, having given a little study to it, I think the report of the committee which the House is asked to adopt involves a determination of principle. The government should consider this point. The principle involved is whether parliament is disposed to allow the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce to investigate the advisability of a central or reserve bank system as now operated in other parts of the world; or whether parliament is to deny any such inquiry by the committee. I am not suggesting that we spend a lot of money in calling witnesses from all over the world. I quite agree that we have already accumulated much evidence on the subject and that we have an abundance of material available in the parliamentary library, as well as the experience of those hon. members who have been investigating the subject. But, in view of the conditions revealed in the Home Bank failure, the fact must be plain to all of us that unless our public men co-operate in a spirit of goodwill with those vitally interested—our bankers —in a thorough study of the subject, we shall be faced with such a situation ten years hence as every hon. member here will regret.

The two outstanding facts to-day in relation to our banking system are, first, the tendency towards the elimination of our smaller banks; and, second, the resultant centralization of the banking business in the larger banking institutions. I do not say this by way of reflection upon our larger banks, because I believe all Canadians should be proud of the way they have functioned, but to draw attention to the bald fact that seventy per cent of our deposits are in the four largest banks, while the ten small banks have only the remaining 30 per cent, and thus are at a disadvantage in not being able to reduce their rate of overhead expense. Then there is the marked decrease in the number of our banks from 36 in 1910 to only 14 to-day. And, finally, we have the failure of the Home Bank and other incidents in connection with our banking system which have tended to shake the confidence of the public. Surely the mere mention of these outstanding facts is sufficient to convince any hon. member that it would be altogether inadvisable to postpone an exhaustive study of the merits of a central or reserve bank system. There is no desire to apply—in the words of the hon. chairman of the committee (Mr. Vien) —"revolutionary" methods; all we desire is that the committee be not denied the right to study this exceedingly important matter.

Mr. VIEN: Does my hon. friend sincerely believe that if the order of reference were enlarged, the committee could study the question thoroughly between now and the end of the session?

Mr. LADNER: No, not at all.

Mr. VIEN: Then, what is the use of proceeding further?

Mr. LADNER: But I do believe it would be a frank and wholesome expression of opinion on the part of hon. members that they desired to have the subject studied. In other words, the principle would be established. That is what I referred to in my opening remarks.

Mr. VIEN: My hon. friend says that the committee should have an opportunity to study the question further. Any hon. member is quite free to give it further study. But the report of the committee in which concurrence is now moved is that the order of reference be enlarged and that the committee be instructed to study the purpose, organization and operation of some type of properly administered central or reserve bank. It would be almost disrespectful to this House if after a report of this kind was concurred in the committee refrained from proceeding with the inquiry, which my hon. friend admits it will not be possible for them to conclude between now and the end of the session.

Mr. LADNER: Let me make my point clear. We have involved here a question of principle, whether or not parliament shall give authority to the committee to inquire into and study this question. There may not be time to complete the study now, but parliament is faced with this request from a committee which has laboured long hours and which finally decided to make this request despite the ruling of the chairman. I think, out of respect to the committee and as a declaration of the confidence of the House in that committee, the authority asked for should be granted.

Mr. VIEN: The committee refrained from expressing an opinion as to the advisability of pursuing the course proposed. It is now for the House to decide whether or not it is advisable to do so.

Mr. IRVINE: Is not the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) aware that on May 21 the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce asked that this motion be put before the House; and does he know how it is that only now have we a chance to discuss it?

Mr. LADNER: I think that question might be more properly put to the chairman of the committee. I know we made the request in good time, in fact I had the honour of moving the resolution referring the question to the House, and I have been rather surprised that it has not been brought to the attention of the House before. But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to appeal to hon. members to consider the real issue involved as I view it. Is the banking system of this country such that the members of this House should not make any further study of it in the committee; or should this House give the committee an opportunity of proceeding along the lines requested? That, in my judgment, is the question, and I hope the House will grant the application of the committee.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) in criticising the suggestion of a central bank of re-discount referred to the evidence of several gentlemen who were before the Banking and Commerce committee a year ago, and pointed out that they rather criticised the suggestions then made. These same gentlemen in giving evidence before the Banking and Commerce committee at that time also stated that Canada had the best banking system in the world; that depositors were no doubt absolutely secured and that the banks were on a sound basis. I have only to refer to the history of such banks as the Home, Hamilton, Banque Nationale, and others of which we all know, institutions that have been through very trying times since those statements were made. I simply mention that to show that if those gentlemen were wrong in the second statement they made, they probably were wrong in the first.

The Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) mentioned that a very thorough study was made of these questions a year ago. That is correct, but unfortunately, although we took a lot of evidence in the committee on various sides of this financial question, nothing has been done, no action has been taken with respect to same.

Mr. GOOD: Did any discussion take place in the committe last year on the proposals submitted by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner)? I do not remember any.

Mr. SPENCER: The only evidence was that given by the hon. member for Vancouver South.

In the remarks that I shall make this afternoon I wish largely to review the question of note issue. The issue of bank notes is referred to in section 61, subsection 2 of the Bank Act: Banks are allowed to issue up to the amount of their paid-up capital as a special privilege to those corporations. This was at one time thought to be sufficient for the means of exchange. However, the business of the country has so increased we have had to find other means of increasing the issue of notes. The first extension that I can find was made in 1908, when the banks were allowed during the crop season to issue extra notes to an amount equal to fifteen per cent of their paid-up capital and reserve between the months of October and January. Later they found that this was not sufficient and the time was extended from September 1 to February 29. This is quite a privilege to the banks. One will find upon looking up the figures for 1922 that the banks in that year had paid-up capital amounting to $125,500,000 and reserves of $129,500,000. It therefore meant that they had the privilege of issuing extra notes to an amount equivalent to over thirty per cent of their paid-up capital. I am commenting on this only to show that as business increased in the country we had to find some means of getting a larger supply of the medium of exchange in the matter of note issue.

I would like to refer, however, to the year 1904, when the paid-up capital in comparison to the total assets amounted to 11 per cent. Twenty years afterwards we find that it only amounts to 4 per cent; in other words, as business has increased the ratio of capital to assets has decreased. Other means also had to be found to create a sufficient medium of exchange, and in 1913 the central gold reserve was started. The central gold reserve, according to one of the men who had a great deal to do with starting it, was never intended to be anything else than a gold reserve where gold could be placed and notes issued against it. But the use of the gold reserve has wandered a long way out of that path since that time. In 1914 the Finance Act was passed, which made it possible for the banks to bring certain securities to the Treasury Board and obtain Dominion notes against them for a charge of 5 per cent. A lot of these notes were issued in large legals to facilitate inter-bank exchanges, but a large quantity was taken to the central gold reserve and placed there so that against it they could issue their own paper. We were informed in the Banking and Commerce committee a year ago that the reason they wished to issue their own paper instead of issuing Dominion paper was because of the matter of advertising. We have to-day in the central gold reserve, in round figures, some $9,000,000 of gold and some $56,000,000 of notes or paper. In other words, as a well known banker who made his name famous in Canada some years ago stated to me, it was really more of a gilded reserve than a gold reserve.

Regarding the quality of the securities left with the Treasury Board I would like to quote an answer given to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) in 1922:

> Notes to the amount of $87,115,075 were issued to the banks as advances under the Finance Act, 1914, and secured by the deposit of securities approved by the Treasury Board, including Dominion of Canada bonds and treasury bills, bonds of the provinces of Canada and Canadian municipalities, British Columbia treasury bills, Canadian Northern Company notes, certain industrial bonds and stock, assignments of grain and produce and demand notes of commercial houses endorsed by the banks to the order of the Minister of Finance.

You will notice that two of the items in this list were Dominion of Canada bonds and treasury bills. It is interesting to note that when the government wants to borrow money from the banks it issues treasury bills, and to-day we have outstanding to the banks in treasury bills no less a sum than $91,315,000. You will notice, as mentioned by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw), that although we charge the banks only 5 per cent on the notes issued to them against the security offered,—which security might be treasury bills—we pay the banks themselves for money lent against treasury bills 5½ per cent. These treasury bills can again be brought back by the banks to the Treasury Board and the banks can obtain Dominion notes against them at 5 per cent. Otherwise you might look upon it as a sort of looping the loop.

It is rather interesting to note that this privilege of going to the Treasury Board with securities and rediscounting them is open only to the banks. It is not even open to the provincial governments. It is what you might call a bankers' bank, and I think a good deal might be done to widen the scope of the work done by the Treasury Board. It could very readily be taken over by such an institution as the central bank, which is being suggested. I would like to remind the House that these treasury bills, which the banks hold at the present time to an amount over $91,000,000, run for only the short period of six months. Does it not seem absurd that the Dominion government, in making use of its credit, should not only have to go to a third party, but pay more money for its borrowings than it charges the same parties when loaning to them, and that these notes should run for only the short period of six months?

I should like to say a few words with regard to the responsibility of note issue. The private notes are the first call on the assets of a bank in case it fails. It is true that we have what we call a note circulation redemption fund, but it does not serve the purpose that the public for a good many years have been in the habit of believing it does. It has been the impression of the public that if a bank went to the wall, all its notes would be taken care of by the note circulation redemption fund. This, however, is not the case. The fund comes to the rescue for the time being in the shape of a loan, but the entire amount that a bank which has failed can call on the fund as an asset for, is the amount it has paid into that fund. This is contrary to what has been the belief of the people of Canada generally up to a short time ago, but when the unfortunate failure of the Home Bank took place we found that the bank had outstanding some $2,000,000 of notes, and that it had only $100,000 in the note circulation redemption fund, and that was all it could call upon as its part of the assets of that fund. The fund was intended to be to all intents and purposes an insurance fund, but as it operates at the present time under the Bank Act, it is not an insurance fund at all, except to the extent that it is a sort of loaning agency for the time being, but the loan has to be paid back when the assets, including the deposits of the bank, are realized.

Before I sit down I would like to touch on just a few of the very interesting matters that have come before us during the last two years, in the banking committee, and some of these are rather startling, particularly when we remember that last year we were informed that our Canadian banking system was so perfect that we could not amend the Bank Act with any satisfaction to the public, and that therefore it should not be amended.

It is realized to-day that there is no government guarantee behind the deposits of private banks. It has also been discovered that it is possible for the entire deposits to be seized to meet notes outstanding. It has been the impression of the depositing public for a good many years that if they put money into a bank all they had to do when they wanted to draw it out was to issue a cheque on the bank. That is true as long as the bank is running, however bad its condition may be, as we have seen in the case of the Home Bank, which has been in a bad condition for the last seven years; but when the bank closes its doors, what happens? We find that the first lien on the assets of the bank is the notes; secondly, comes the Dominion government, together with any advances made by the Treasury Board; thirdly, the provincial government; fourthly, any secured creditors,—and in the case of the Home Bank we found that they had mortgaged their buildings to a firm in New York;—and fifthly, come the depositors, who otherwise are unsecured creditors. A bank may lend an amount equal to its paid up capital to any one concern. This was proved in the case of the Home Bank and La Banque Nationale. Under the present system that could not very readily be seen, and I hope it will be checked, by the Inspector General who we hope will be appointed during the coming year. The system might be made more perfect by having a central bank of rediscount, with officials working in co-operation with the Inspector General.

We find also that to-day sixty per cent of the banks' capital is in bank buildings. To give an idea of the way the banks have been reduced in number—very largely because the small banks under the present system, and in the absence of a central bank of rediscount—have little chance compared with the larger ones, we find that in 1919 Canada had 36 banks and to-day it has only 14. As the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) mentioned, four of our Canadian banks control seventy per cent of the total deposits, and the other ten control only thirty per cent.

A government central bank, in the opinion of many of us, should have complete control of note issue. This not only would relieve a great liability from the shoulders of the depositors, but it would be the means of bringing in a very large revenue to the government exchequer, and would relieve some of the burden now resting on the shoulders of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I want to say in the first place that when I undertake to criticise in any way the banking institutions in this country, my main hope in regard to them is that they make double the money they now make, and that they may give four times the service they now give for that opportunity of making profits. I want to see the banks prosper, but the underlying principle of banking, the thing behind the banking of the country, must be, as it is in all the other countries of the world, before anything else, the credit of the nation. Banking has become absolutely a state proposition throughout the world. It is under the control of the state, it has the credit of the nation behind it, and the nation has the leadership in the banking of the country. That cannot be denied. It is the case all over the world to-day with the exception of Canada. In some way the private banks have got the leadership of banking in this country. But they have behind that leadership the national credit and they seem to control that as well as their own resources What we want to put behind our banking system is the nation. We also want the nation to have the control rather than the private banks and to give a banking service to the country at the lowest possible cost at the same time allowing the banks a reasonable profit.

Analogy is a poor kind of reasoning but let me give an analogous case. It is that of the railways of this country. Formerly private companies were in control of a great many of those railways and with the exception of one company they wrecked themselves and the country has to come to their relief, take over the liabilities and the railways themselves and re-organize them into a great system of national transportation which to-day promises to be successful. The same thing, or a somewhat similar process, may have to be applied to banks because the banks are getting smaller in number, as has been pointed out here to-day, and they are becoming more of a monopoly. But the more they grow in that direction the more they wish to dictate the banking policy of the country. That should not be. The credit of the country should be behind the national banking system.

We have an example before us, and it is the one that makes the most impression on this country, the example of the national banking system they now have in the United States. I suppose I will be charged with advocating the introduction into Canada of the United States banking system. But that country adopted their present system after years of effort, after years of experience of great losses, after years of the failure of many banks. But gradually they have evolved a system which is satisfactory to that country, and the people of the United States would not change their national banking system to-day for any private banking system they had heretofore. They believe absolutely in the state being behind their system, and they insist on a national banking currency—a thing we ought to have in this country but we do not have. They insist also over there on a national system of bank inspection. We may have the beginning of such a system as that in this country but it was denied to us at the last session of parliament, and it was denied on the evidence of the private banks of Canada who do not want bank inspection. But in the United States the system of bank inspection is proving a great success, and it is weeding out the weak banks. Under their system,—the United States bank examiner has told us and we know it is a fact,—they can find out in three weeks whether a bank is sound or not. It took us eight years to find out that the Home Bank had been a failure, had lost a lot of money, and had been conducted in an improper way. Therefore what we should do is to study the proposition and see whether we should not adopt the system they have in the United States—a system of national banks and in connection with it a national currency.

I do not know who can object to this. We have a national currency but the effort of the banks is to make that disappear and substitute a bank currency which is not always reliable, which is questioned, and the retirement of which in times of trouble becomes a grievance to the country and a source of much complaint. There is no question of the solvency of the national currency. Hon. gentlemen say, and they said before the committee to-day, that there is a redemption fund. But how is it administered? It is not administered well. It allows the currency to be questioned, and that being so when a better example is offered us, such as they have in the United States, we ought to adopt it. That is not the only instance in which the banks over there have a superior system. Their system of rediscounting is as good as ours, in fact it is a good deal better. It allows the credits to be moved all over the country by the organization of the National Reserve Bank system. Every bank there has to be a member bank of some reserve bank system. Consequently it is always under the inspection of fellow member banks who know whether it is sound or not. It it has gone wrong they find it out, expose it, and cause a correction to be made. Under the system of bank inspection there if losses have occurred they are found out and the bank has to make the losses good; if their capital has been impaired it must be strengthened. In that way the American system is recognized as being much better than ours and is considered better adapted to the country. We ought also to make a study of these things which study should lead up to the improvement of our own banking system.

Mr. McCONICA: Is it not a fact that hundreds of banks have failed in the United States in the last few years?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Most of them were state banks.

Mr. McCONICA: There were national banks also.

Mr. MACLEAN: (York): Some were national banks and many more would have failed if they had not had such a system of national banking as now exists there. That is my point if the question comes to an issue. It is the same with private railroads in Canada: They failed and the state had to come to their rescue. Now, let me point out what the underlying reason is for a good many of the bank failures in this country. It is the permission that was given to private banks to issue their own notes. We allow every bank in this country to issue notes up to the amount of its capital. Now, if you read the history of the bank failures in Canada—the long history of bank failures—and analyse the circumstances down to the last vestige of evidence you will find that a lot of those banks went into business because of the temptation of being allowed to issue their own notes and put them in circulation, and in many cases they lent money to their friends. That is probably what wrecked the Home Bank and many other banks in this country—the unfortunate power that was given them of issuing bank notes up to the extent of their capital. Anything that is easy to get is easily parted with, and there was not that care in the administration of the banks that there would have been if permission to issue bank notes had not been allowed in the Bank Act. Therefore, I say it is high time that the banks should not be allowed to issue their own notes. If the banks want additional money—and I should like to see them have as much money as is necessary to lend to the business of the country—the system may have to be substituted for the present one of the country making advances to the banks up to a certain proportion of their paid up capital. That is to say advances might be made to them, perhaps at only 2 per cent, giving them government money to replace their bank note issue. There is no other country in the world where banks enjoy the privilege of issuing their own note currency. A bank has other ways of finding currency; it ought to find it out of its own shareholders, out of its own profits. Nevertheless the first thing a bank wants when it is organized is the right to issue notes to the amount of its paid up capital. In that respect they are and have always been careless, and it is high time that the banking system of this country were placed on a basis of national notes and not on one of bank currency. We have now national inspection, which is a good thing; and certain other improvements that have been advocated in this country from time to time would undoubtedly be of considerable advantage in the stabilization of banking affairs in Canada. There is a great feeling of unrest throughout the country at the present time. In Toronto we have what is known as the Provincial Savings Office organized by the late government of Ontario. This is a high-class savings bank, with a branch in Ottawa, and quite recently I have witnessed in both places large crowds in these banks, ordinary depositors apparently being anxious to put their money in. These people were getting their own cheques marked and it seemed to me that they regarded these banks as perfectly safe. It would be a surprise to the people of Canada to know how that provincial bank in Ontario is succeeding; and it is succeeding for the simple reason that there is throughout the country this feeling of unrest and uncertainty in regard to our banking system generally.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): They pay a higher rate of interest, do they not?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): No, I believe it is about the same. But these particular banks are giving satisfaction to the people, and the banking public feel that their money is secure in them. I wonder how many people in Canada know that we have a government savings bank which is operating in conjunction with the Receiver-General's office. That bank in my own province, Ontario, for some time received deposits and carried on a large business in the city of Toronto, but for some reason or other it was chloroformed about ten or fifteen years ago, by what government I do not know. The fact is, however, that upon investigation some time ago I discovered that it was not functioning in Toronto, and I have never heard any explanation offered of its discontinuance there. Yet it was one of the best savings banks I have ever known in Canada. Certain restrictions were enforced in regard to the withdrawing of money, but it was in all respects a high-class savings bank. As I say, it is no longer in operation in the province of Ontario, although I know it is still in existence in the Maritime provinces and in British Columbia. If there were in Ontario and Quebec a government institution of that kind I have no doubt the people would appreciate it. I should like to know from the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) why the bank has been abandoned in Ontario, while it is still functioning in the Maritime provinces and in British Columbia. The people would be interested to have an explanation in that regard.

We have another savings bank in connection with the Post Office Department,—the Postal Savings Bank. This, however, is a very poor and old-fashioned institution and there is no reason why it should not be modernized. If the committee on Banking and Commerce were allowed free scope to consider all these questions I believe they could profitably take up the question of modernizing the Postal Savings Bank. These banks should unquestionably have the right of receiving deposits, and of allowing the depositor to keep his bank book and have his cheques marked and accepted so that he might be able to pay out money at will. But under the present system he cannot withdraw any money without filling in a blank and giving it to the local postmaster for transmission to Ottawa where the entry is made and permission is given for the withdrawal of the desired amount. That is not the way for the nation to conduct its banking business; if we are to have a postal savings bank it should afford the public the same advantages that are enjoyed in the ordinary banks. I regret that the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) has not been here this session, or at least that he has not had an opportunity of dealing with this, among other questions. I am informed that he has a plan in favour of the expansion and modernization of the Postal Savings Bank and that as soon as he returns he will bring it forward. But he is absent at present and in the meantime this unrest prevails throughout the country. The public in Ontario are now going to the Provincial Savings Office in large numbers, and as I said a moment ago I was surprised to observe the activity in connection with that institution. Someone, however, started an agitation to abandon this bank, which I consider it to the credit of the Drury government to have established. Great pressure has been brought to bear on the present government in Ontario to wipe out this provincial bank, but apparently without avail; the premier of the province evidently is not prepared just now to do anything of the kind. I know, however, that deputations have waited upon him for the purpose of getting that service in the city of Toronto extended to one section in which there were a great many depositors who had kept their accounts in the Home Bank. These people have waited on the premier of the province and requested him to open another branch of that bank in the east end, which happens to be the portion of the city which I represent in this House. So that quite obviously there is an increasing demand for the recognition and the enlargement of the provincial bank; and there is an equally insistent demand for the modernization of our Postal Savings Bank. This is simply because of the feeling of unrest which prevails throughout the country to-day; the people have seen private banks fail one after another, with considerable losses to depositors, and they desire to see something done to put our banking system on a sound basis. There was a great loss in the Home Bank, as there have been losses in other banks. It is true also there have been losses in the United States, where there is an improved banking system. But that is no reason why we should not study this question and empower a committee of this House to suggest necessary reforms. If I am to judge by the speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien), that hon. gentleman apparently condemns the system of national banking based on the credit of the nation and on national notes, as well as related matters of that kind.

Mr. VIEN: Let me correct the hon. gentleman. I simply said that the federal reserve system as it exists in the United States was not, in the opinion of banking experts, adaptable to the Canadian branch bank system.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): So much the worse for the Canadian branch bank system. We all know of course that we have in this country a branch bank system which is not perfect; but can we not make it a better system if that is possible? That is the issue. But the banks do not like to have any comparisons made that are at all to their detriment. They say, "Are we not giving you good service now? Do we not do this, that and the other?" Well, they do give us some kind of service, but that service can be very much improved. And in my opinion the branch system can be carried on successfully by the adoption of some of the improved methods which have been followed in the United States.

As regards the central gold reserve, I will not call it a humbug, because it is a substantial thing. But why should it not be in the control of the nation just as in the United States and in practically every other country? The central gold reserve in Canada is confined to Montreal, and is in the hands of the bankers, save alone that there is one representative of the government on the board. I see no reason, however, why the reserve should not be absolutely in the hands of the nation, in the national treasury, as in the United States. Once again I must apologize for advocating something which in the United States is superior to what we have in Canada; but I think we should create in this country, at Ottawa, a real treasury department, such as there is in the United States. In that country there is a highly paid national official, who has charge of the national treasury, who has charge more or less of the national reserves of the nation and of the note issue of the nation, how it goes out and how it comes in. He is a real national treasurer, not only for the nation in its organization as a nation, but for the whole country. He has control of the rediscounting of notes in connection with the federal reserve bank system. Who controls the national system? The national reserve, and there are billions of gold in the national reserve at Washington. This is all done by the nation and without any idea of making money out of it. The national reserve at Washington looks after the national notes, and nobody ever questions the solvency of the national notes of the United States now. I remember, as a boy, just after the American war, seeing in Hamilton American national dollar notes sold for about thirty-five cents. From that degradation of an American note to that low figure, I saw it rise gradually to par, and now it is the best note in the world. The greatest amount of credit available for the world at large to-day is concentrated in the United States, and this is the gradual result of the creation of a great national system of banking based on the nation's credit. We want to do that in our country. If they have done it there, we may be able to grow in that direction.

Hitherto, nearly every critic who has come forward in this country to pass judgment upon any one who makes a proposal such as I am making here to-day, or as some hon. gentlemen who have preceded me have made, say that we are suggesting Yankee notions. The outcome of those Yankee notions is the creation of the greatest banking system in the world. I do not place even England before it, because England has had to come to the national banking system of the United States to take care of the immense national debt she created in the war. That question was settled and arranged at Washington, and England's debt is being retired at Washington. The United States, it is true, was in the war, but not to the extent that the Mother Country was and the national banking system of the United States is the organization the world looks to now to clear up the mad condition of affairs in Europe. It is the hope of the world to-day, if war is ever to cease and we are to get on our feet. If Germany is to be redeemed and put on her feet after the war, she must do her financing by way of the United States on the basis of the national banking system.

I have nothing to say against the banks of this country, which have done good service, but they are growing into a monopoly. Where is this going to end? I am not going to make any prediction as to what will happen, but I shall be greatly surprised if you do not see, in the near future, more mergers in this country. As the system is moving that is inevitable. There are four big banks and a number of smaller ones, and I do not know that the smaller banks can get along in view of the opposition of the four big banks. What we want is to go back to the small bank. These are the ones that have made the failures, it is true; but if they were prohibited from making note issues against their capital, as they are allowed to do now, I believe the smaller bank system is what we want. We want local banks, organized by groups of local capitalists, to collect the deposits of their localities and to put them into local industries.

Mr. LEWIS: I rise to a point of order. This is a general discussion on banking and not on the widening of the powers of the banking committee.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I am not out of order. According to the understanding of the committee this morning, the report has opened up the whole question of the banking conditions of this country; but if I am transgressing any rule, the Speaker will call me to order. I am surprised that my hon. friend (Mr. Lewis), who is supposed to be a Progressive, does not like to hear progressive views in this House. He is sitting at present beside the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke), and I do not know whether the leader of the Progressives likes the fellowship. This is the only opportunity I have of discussing this subject. I was debarred from discussing it at any time I was in the committee, and I was ruled out this morning by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien). The question is up now and all we ask is that a study be made by a committee of this House, just as I urged in this House that we should do in connection with the public debt. If there is anything in Canada that is as important as the committee to study matters of banking, it is a committee of this House to study the national debt. It is absolutely within the right of the Minister of Finance to create a public debt; to say of what nature the securities are to be, what is to be the rate of interest; to name the place of issue and the place of payment. But at this time, after the Great War, and in view of the enormous debt that we have incurred, this House ought to have a committee studying the national debt, just as a committee was appointed by this House the other day to study the question of the National Railways. Times have changed and we must change with them. Parliament must adapt itself to the new conditions which are far-reaching. There are no questions which are so important and which have widened so much as those of banking and the national debt. These matters should be studied, in the first place, in the committees and then in this House. All that the Banking and Commerce committee and those who are speaking here to-day are asking is that the powers of the committee to study banking and to suggest improvements be enlarged. We have on that committee men who are prepared to give their time, to bring witnesses, to study these questions, and where they think an improvement can be made they will make a report indicating to the House that improvements be made in the directions I have indicated.

We want a system of rediscount in this country. We have started such a system which is meeting the requirements of the country, and that is all right; but the late government gave us that improvement and I want to see it continued. So far as I can gather now I understand the parties in this House are in the same boat as regards national banking. I believe the government are in favour of National Railways; the late government believed in National Railways; the Progressive party believe in National Railways. There is, therefore, no reason why these three parties in this House should not unite in favour of national banking, and I believe they are going in that direction. The only one who is holding back is the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), who does not want to hear anything at all about it. He has said to-day that he wants suggestions and he has evidenced on other occasions a desire to hear. But while he is a good listener, he is only a limited actor. He had only a few things to say to-day, but he has come to the idea that there must be banking inspection in this country. We now have it and I hope it can be improved. I believe in this system of national banking, but most of all I believe in a committee of this House having full charge of banking matters affecting the Dominion, with authority to study banking conditions and the financial and economic dislocation throughout the world as a result of the war, and the reconstruction that must follow. For this purpose there is no better body than such a committee. Therefore I trust that the government and my hon. friends to my left, the leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Meighen) and the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) will express themselves in favour of the committee on Banking and Commerce being granted the authority asked for. Despite all that may be said against the political mistakes of our neighbours, there is no doubt that they have evolved the best banking system in the world. They have no bank note currency, and yet all the banks in the United States are making money hand over fist by using the national currency. That being so, why could not our banks do the same if we adopted a similar system. No one has ever given me a substantial reason for maintaining the disagreement between the banking systems of the United States and Canada. That subject alone is worthy of consideration and could be investigated by the committee if its powers were enlarged as requested. I hope, not because of what I have said but because of the feeling throughout the country, that we shall have from the government and from the leaders of the other parties in this House an expression of their views on this question. For instance, I should like to hear from my friend the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), who introduced much of the beneficial legislation which has been referred to, as to whether he is prepared to say that the Banking committee should be limited in respect to its activities; also, whether the time has not come for the creation of a committee of this House to study in co-operation with the Minister of Finance and his department the consolidation of the national debt at a low rate of interest; and finally whether the Minister of Finance had better take example by what obtains in the United States and create here in Ottawa a national treasury which will give real leadership to our private banking organizations and protect the rights of the public against anybody who may seek to encroach on them hereafter.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to reply very briefly to two arguments which were advanced by the mover of the resolution (Mr. Vien) this afternoon. He seemed to think that certain members were advocating the study of a central banking system because of the difficulties which confronted them in a particular part of the Dominion—referring of course to the western members. I wish to assure him that I do not approach this question from a sectional point of view. The difficulties which Canada is labouring under, so far as our banking system is concerned, affect very seriously all parts of the country. He quoted several of our prominent bankers as being in opposition to the establishment of a federal reserve or central banking system; but I do not think their opinion should carry much weight with this House, because those same prominent bankers could have been quoted a year ago as being actively opposed to any government supervision or inspection of banks, and to-day we find the Acting Minister of Finance, who is I think very conservative in his views regarding financial matters, bringing down a resolution for the establishment of a system of government inspection of banks. So, it seems to me, we must be prepared to study these banking question, even though opposition is expressed by our leading bankers.

The hon. member also said that it was not customary to make radical changes in the Bank Act except at each decennial revision. I would draw his attention to the fact that while the act was under revision a year ago a number of members stated before the committee that they did not agree with that view and did not intend to be bound by it. I think that is an expression of opinion which should be reiterated here. There is too much of a tendency in Canada to regard the Bank Act as being like a law of the Medes and Persians—unchangeable.

We are discussing this question to-day because of a ruling of the chairman of the Banking committee that we could not inquire into the advisability of establishing a central bank. I was under the impression when the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) moved his amendment to the motion made by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) that we would certainly be allowed to discuss any question which was closely or definitely related to the banking system, or which might tend to improve the system. I cannot see any reason why members of this House should endeavour to limit any inquiry which might be made by the committee, and if any members object to the enlargement of the powers of the committee the onus is on them to show cause. It seems to me there are reasons enough for widening the inquiry, in the failures and mergers among our banks during the past year, which surely have been sufficiently serious to warrant inquiry into the merits of what might possibly be an improvement on our present system. Among these untoward happenings, we have the failure of the Home Bank with a loss to its depositors of ten or eleven million dollars, which has certainly shaken the faith of bank depositors; the failure of the Banque Nationale, with a loss which we are not permitted to know the extent of, but the provincial government of Quebec voted a bond issue of $15,000,000 to be loaned to the Bank of Hochelaga to enable it to take over the Banque Nationale; the amalgamation of the Bank of Hamilton and the Bank of Commerce, the reasons for which were not divulged; and the writing down of reserves by other banks. In view of these facts, what reasons can be advanced for limiting the scope of inquiry by the committee? If any member of the government or any member of this House endeavours to prevent inquiry into matters connected with our banking system, it seems to me that they should be willing to be held responsible for any losses which may occur to bank depositors within the next year. I do not see how they can escape that responsibility.

A year ago the Bank Act was renewed for ten years, against a good deal of opposition. We were assured at that time by many hon. members that we had the best banking system in the world; that the system had grown up under this act and that we should not make any changes because it would impair the confidence of the people in our system. But at that very time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), both of whom sat in our committee through nearly all its deliberations, knew that two of our banks whose charters were being renewed were not entitled to any confidence from the Canadian public. In view of these facts why should hon. members argue that we should not be allowed even to study the question of the establishment of a central bank, something that almost every other country has in one form or another?

The mover of this resolution, the hon. member for Lotbinière, (Mr. Vien) argued this afternoon as to the merits of a central bank from the results of the federal reserve system in the United States. I would not advocate exactly the same system as they have in the United States, but it might be well for us to study whether or not that system has been of some benefit in the country to the south. I have had some correspondence with a gentleman in the city of Washington who is very well acquainted both with the United States banking system and with the Canadian system, and in one of his letters to me he said:

> The federal reserve banking system has been in operation for ten years, and its merits have long ceased to be a subject of debate.

He says further:

> No public man in America would care to suggest its repeal or to deny that it has been of the greatest benefit to the United States.

In another letter he says:

> The federal reserve bank has no selfish purpose to serve. Its profits go into the treasury. It does not favour one section of the country at the expense of another or one business instead of another.

I do not think that can truthfully be said of our present Canadian banking system, because it is charging rates of interest which average, I think, three per cent higher in certain provinces than in others.

It has an almost inexhaustible reservoir of money and credit because behind it are all the resources and credit of the United States. The result has been a great expansion of business, the doing away with the old panics and money corners and a control of the currency and credits of the country by the government instead of by private corporations.

I have here a letter from Mr. John W. Pole, Chief National Bank Examiner, Washington, who appeared before our committee a short time ago. In regard to the earnings of the Federal Reserve Bank. He says:

The gross earnings of the federal reserve banks from their organization up to December 31, 1923, amounted to $598,845,776. Up to that date the federal reserve banks had invested the sum of $69,124,530 in bank buildings, which amount was paid out of the profits of the banks. During the same period the government has received from the reserve banks $139,000,997 in the form of taxes, the balance of the net earnings having gone to surplus.

If the Acting Minister of Finance decides to accept the recommendation of the committee with regard to the Home Bank and reimburse the depositors, he might, through the establishment of a central bank, secure enough profits to pay for the reimbursement of those depositors, and do it within a very few years.

I would also like to quote to you from this letter Mr. Pole's figures regarding note circulation in the United States, because I think the question of note circulation is closely connected with the question of the safety of depositors, which our committee was supposed specially to consider. He says:

National Bank notes outstanding December 31, 1923..	$ 771,566,979
Federal reserve notes at peak on December 23, 1920..	3,404,831,000
Federal reserve notes on June 4, 1924.. ..	1,884,039,000
Federal Reserve Bank notes at peak on December 26, 1919..	261,039,000
Federal Reserve Bank notes on June 4, 1924..	none

I would draw the attention of hon. members to the figures there in regard to federal reserve notes, which show the elasticity of their note issue in the United States. Their note issue under this head in 1920 was $3,404,000,000, while in 1924 it has fallen to $1,884,000,000. The federal reserve system in the United States has taken care of the shortage of currency which they sometimes experienced prior to the establishment of that system.

I think we have in Canada, Mr. Speaker, the most expensive banking system in the world. They charge average rates of interest varying from 7 per cent to 8 per cent—I quoted the exact figures in the House a year ago and do not wish to repeat them now. but they are somewhere in that neighbourhood. They pay 3 per cent to depositors. They have the privilege of issuing their own notes, up to the extent of their paid-up capital, with a tax of 1 per cent on that circulation. I have here a statement which I have received from Mr. Pole regarding the earnings of national banks in Federal Reserve District No. 4 for the year ending June 30, 1923. I asked Mr. Pole for this statement because the aggregate capital of the national banks in that district is approximately the same as that of our banks in Canada. The statement says:

Aggregate capital: $128,290,000.
Aggregate surplus: $113,444,000.

Gross earnings..	$100,283,000
Expenses..	68,546,000
Net earnings..	$31,737,000
Recoveries	2,916,000
	$34,653,000
Losses..	9,846,000
Net profits..	$24,807,000

Total dividends declared: $16,834,000.
Ratio:

	Per cent
Dividends to capital..	13.12
Dividends to capital and surplus..	6.96
Net profit to capital and surplus..	10.26

The average rate of interest charged by the banks in this district was 6 per cent.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What is that district?

Mr. COOTE: It comprises the state of Ohio, western Pennsylvania, eastern Kentucky and northwest, West Virginia, and the banks number 764. Our banks in Canada are charging rates of interest much higher than that, and they cannot show anything like as good earnings. In addition to that, our banks have the privilege of the note issue, a privilege which the banks in the United States have only to a very limited extent and not on as easy terms as the banks have in this country.

I would like to point out one other thing before I leave this statement. In the United States the national banks are required to show their gross earnings and also their expenses. In Canada our banks are not required to show that, so we do not know why they are not able to run their business as advantageously or as cheaply as the national banks in the United States do. My own impression is that our Canadian banks are incurring too many losses, and they are burdened with too much overhead, too much of a staff for the amount of business they are doing. That is something that I think is inherent in a big branch banking system.

I want now to refer to the deliberations of the Banking and Commerce committee last year, as they have a bearing on our actions this year. Let me remind the House that the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) made a proposal in that committee for the appointment of a government auditor of banks. That proposal was turned down by the committee; in fact, it met very little support. But this year a proposal made by the Acting Minister of Finance himself on very similar lines was accepted—showing how we have changed our attitude in this matter. The reason for that change of attitude on the part of members of the committee was largely because of the bank failures which have taken place in the last year. I think that fact alone should influence members of this House in allowing the scope of the inquiry to be widened. I have no doubt that before the next decennial revision of the Bank Act is due we shall have to establish some sort of a central bank in Canada. I do not wish to dwell at any length on the number of banks that have disappeared in the last thirty years; that has been referred to often enough. We are down now to a very small number, and that number is likely to be further reduced. I believe the establishment of a central bank would do something to check the disappearance of the smaller banks. I believe also that the question of the safety of deposits has some connection with the establishment of a central bank, and for that reason alone I think the House should vote to widen the scope of the committee's inquiry.

In a little booklet issued by the Canadian Bankers' Association last year, it is stated on the authority of that association that the depositors have a fourth mortgage on the assets of the bank. One of the prior mortgages is the claim which the notes of the bank have on its assets. Mr. Neill, General Manager of the Royal Bank, stated before our committee this year that a bank could do business without the privilege of issuing its own notes, but that it could not carry on its business, without the deposits of the public. Now if that is the case, what good reason can we give to those depositors for putting their claim lower down in the scale than the claim of the man who holds the bank's notes? Why should a note of that bank have a prior claim on the assets of the bank, when, as Mr. Neill says, the deposits are necessary to the operation of the bank, while the privilege of issuing notes is not? If these notes are not to be issued by our banks, they must be issued by the government. I agree with the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) that we should have a government issue of notes in this country, that the issuing of notes should be limited to the government, and then there can be no question of the noteholder's security. We should not have to bolster up that security by giving the noteholder a first claim on the assets of the bank. If we are to have government issue of all notes, I think we should have some kind of a government bank, with offices in different centres throughout this country, so that these notes can be made available to the people for carrying on their business. At the present time the only way an individual can secure a note, even a government note, is through our chartered banks, and we are now in the hands of fourteen chartered banks, and it is possible that in the years to come we may be down to a very much smaller number than that, and be in reality in the hands of one bank; and as one witness before our committee intimated this year, that might mean the control of finance in Canada by one individual. What good reason can be given to the people of this country for not making government notes available to them for their trading purposes except through private corporations?—for that is what our chartered banks are, nothing more or less? This is a question which, I believe, is going to receive consideration at the hands of the people before very many more years have passed, and I think the time to study it is now. I cannot see why we should not be allowed to discuss this question.

Just one other point in regard to the safety of deposits: The logical way to safeguard deposits is to make the Post Office Savings Bank available to the people in a wider sense than it is now. We had a representative of the Post Office Department before our committee, and I asked him the question whether there had ever been any loss to depositors in the Post Office Savings Bank, and he assured me there had not, and never could be. Then why not make these facilities more easily available to the public If we are to receive any large amount of deposits through our Post Office Savings Banks we should have a national bank to handle those deposits when made, and then the deposits would be available to our banks or to our rural credit societies through rediscounting by the central bank.

In 1914, when we went into the Great War, Sir Thomas White, then Minister of Finance, called the bankers together, and they decided that we needed something to bolster up the Canadian banking system, and that we had to have it in a hurry. I should like to quote a few lines from an address Sir Thomas White gave in Toronto, referring to what he said at this meeting of the bankers held here in Ottawa:

> We said to the banks: The Dominion government will loan you in Dominion notes, which are legal tender, twenty-five, fifty million dollars; we put no limit, if you need it, you probably will not, but if you do, we will loan without limit on securities approved by the minister. You bring in high-class securities, or commodity bills, because they represent their full value in goods, and we will lend to you at 5 per cent Dominion notes that will make you liquid, and you need not worry about your reserves. There was no more panic after that announcement was made. From that day to this there has been the utmost confidence in the Canadian banking situation, no sign of panic. That gave flexibility to our banking system, made our bankers confident that they could meet any situation that could arise, and, of course, they could give the public very much more extensive credits than they otherwise would have got.

Later on he says:

> It was the right thing to do, but no permanent measure followed.

In a recent issue of MacLean's Magazine I saw that Sir John Aird was quoted as saying that in his opinion the inspection of banks is not very practicable, and is not needed, but he would suggest that the Finance Act be made permanent. I would suggest to this committee that if the Finance Act is to be made permanent, surely we should have some sort of a permanent board to administer it. The act is administered at the present time by the Treasury Board, which consists of four cabinet ministers. They may know something about banking, and then again they may not know very much. The next government that assumes office—and I suppose we will have a change some day—will cause a complete change in the personnel of the Treasury Board and the new body will then have to administer the act without having the benefit of the experience of their predecessors. To show you how the Finance Act is administered, I will quote one clause from the act.

> Such securities shall be deposited with the minister or with an assistant receiver general. The minister may request the trustees of the central gold reserves to make a valuation of and recommendation as to the amount which in the judgment of the trustees may properly be advanced on any securities offered in pledge under this act.

I am informed that the trustees of the central gold reserve are the Bank of Montreal, the Royal Bank, the Canadian Bank of Commerce and the Royal Trust Company, the last named being a subsidiary of the Bank of Montreal. That is practically placing the administration of the Finance Act in the hands of three banks and they are three of what are generally termed the "big four". Is that not creating a monopoly of banking in Canada? Why should the other banks of this country have to have their securities valued by three of the big four banks in this country when they come to the Treasury Board and ask for an advance under the Finance Act? Would it not seem wiser to have a central bank, with a practical banker at the head and a few experienced bankers under him, to judge the securities that are offered?

Let me also draw your attention to another very great failing in the administration of the present Finance Act. That act works like a machine in maintaining the rate of interest, at 5 per cent all the year round and 5 per cent every year. At the present time money can be borrowed in New York at rates as low as 2 and 2½ per cent. Why would our banks wish to come to the Finance department at Ottawa and pay 5 per cent if they can go to New York, deposit securities there, and borrow money at 2½ per cent? I have heard that is being done by some of our Canadian banks and I do not blame them; I think it is good business for them to do it. But I do ask that our Finance Act should be administered in a businesslike manner. If these banks can obtain advances in New York at 2½ or 3 per cent why should not these trustees see to it that money is loaned to the banks at the same rate of interest? Canada has made a few million dollars from the operation of the Finance Act. In this House last year when Hon. Mr. Fielding was quoting the sums which had been made I believe the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) observed "Yes, and it is all clear profit". Why should we not make a little more profit from the operations of the Finance Act, and at the same time make money available to our people at a lower rate of interest than is now obtainable under the act as at present administered? Because that administration is tending to hold up the wheels of industry in this country, tending to restrict credit, and restriction of business follows from the restriction of credit.

There is one other point I wish to speak upon before I take my seat and that is the question of the rate of exchange. I have here several charts showing the fluctuation in the rate of exchange on New York for the past three years. In 1921 the rate of exchange was fairly steady with a variation during the year of from a discount of ¾ of 1 per cent to slightly over 2½ per cent, which point was reached in June. At the close of the year exchange was quoted at about 1¾ per cent discount. In the year 1919 the average discount rate of exchange for the first three months of the year was approximately 2 per cent. For the next three months it was approximately 3 per cent. In July it reached a rate of 5 per cent, dropping back to 3 per cent in September, but in December reached a high point of 11 per cent and at the close of the year was slightly over 9 per cent. In 1920 there were very violent fluctuations in the exchange rate. In January it gradually rose from 9 per cent to a high point of 12 per cent. On the 4th February it had risen to 17½ per cent and with slight fluctuations gradualy fell until by the end of March it had reached 9 per cent. In April it reached a high point of 12 per cent; in May it fluctuated from 9½ to 13 per cent; in June it varied from 12½ to 15½ per cent; in July it varied from 14½ to 12 per cent; in August it varied from 14 to 12 per cent; in September it varied from 9 to 12 per cent; in October it varied from 8½ to 12 per cent; in November it varied from 10½ to 14 per cent. In December it was 13½ per cent on the first of the month, but on the 21st had risen to 19¼ per cent and closed the year at approximately 17 per cent. In January 1921 it varied from 18 per cent to as low as 10 per cent, rising again in February to about 16 per cent, then gradually declining, showing a high point of 13 per cent in April; 12½ per cent in May, rising again in June to over 14 per cent. In July it reached a high point of 15 per cent, but in August it dropped back to 10½ per cent. In September it had a high point of 13¼ per cent and a low point of 9¾ per cent. In October and November the rate varied slightly over 1 per cent, opening on December 1st at 9¼ per cent and closing December 31st at 5 per cent. In January, 1922, it rose to 7 per cent declining gradually and closing in February at 2 per cent. Variations in March were from 2 to 4¾ per cent; variations in April from 1 to 3 per cent, but during the balance of the year the fluctuations were not very violent. The year closed with exchange at a discount of about 1 per cent, although our exchange reached a premium of 1/8 per cent during October and November, 1922. In 1923 the rate fluctuated from a discount of 5/16 of 1 per cent to a discount of 3 per cent in the month of July, and at the close of the year was quoted at 2½ per cent. I have given these fluctuations at some length to bring the matter more clearly before the House. This continued fluctuation of the rate of exchange is a very great handicap to all our importers. We might take for instance the importer of raw cotton, who probably has contracted months ahead for his supply of cotton at a given price. He is probably obliged to make payment at the time the cotton is delivered, and between the time at which he purchased the cotton and the delivery of the same the exchange may have varied as much as 10 per cent, the result of which would be to increase the cost of his raw material to that extent, with no corresponding advantage to him when he sells his finished product, unless by that time the exchange rate has again risen. It is quite possible that between the time he paid for the goods and the time his finished product is ready for sale there might have occurred a variation of more than 10 per cent in the rate of exchange. The manufacturer never knows what the rate of exchange will be when the goods are manufactured, and that certainly must affect his business. I think it is one of the great uncertainties which our manufacturers have to contend with at the present time. It adds to the risk of their business and consequently they must enhance their rate of profit in order to take care of the risk.

I doubt whether there is a more important question affecting the business of Canada than this question of exchange. It is very seriously affecting our producers. Apparently it is not wise to return to the gold basis, because Sir John Aird, who I think is the greatest authority on banking in Canada, is quoted as having said that the Finance Act should be made permanent. If we are not to return to the gold basis—I do not think we are and I am not advocating that—the only rational way in which we can control the rate of exchange is through a national bank. At present the rate of exchange is almost absolutely in the control of the banks. I do not know whether they are working in unison to control it, but apparently they have not done so in the past whatever they may be doing now. If they are not, then the rate of exchange will have to take care of itself, with the help of exchange speculators. The speculators in exchange have been making money, sometimes losing; and any money they make is made at the expense of the business people of the country. If these people are to be reimbursed the only way in which this can be done is by their adding to the prices of their goods. A national bank could control the rate of exchange and keep it fairly constant. I think it is an open question whether it would not be to the advantage of this country to maintain the rate of exchange at par with Great Britain rather than with the United States. I repeat, however, the statement that the question is one which is open to question. But wherever the level of exchange is to be maintained we should have a national bank to maintain it; and it should be maintained in the interests of the country and not by private banks to their own advantage.

Mr. ROBB: If the rate of exchange just now were at par with Great Britain, would it not add materially to the cost of coal, raw cotton, iron and other products that are used for manufacturing purposes?

Mr. COOTE: It would, and our manufacturers would increase their prices proportionately; so that possibly they would not be worse off.

Mr. MARLER: Is that what my hon. friend would like to have happen? Would he like to see the cost of goods increased to the consumer? I thought he was a free trader.

Mr. COOTE: I am a free trader.

Mr. MARLER: You might answer that question.

Mr. COOTE: I am not anxious to have the cost of goods increased, but if the hon. member will wait until I put a question to the Acting Minister of Finance he will see what I am driving at.

Mr. MARLER: The hon. member is a protectionist in finance.

Mr. COOTE: Not at all, not that I know of. This is the question I want to put to the Acting Minister of Finance: How are our producers in this country who are producing for the British market to compete with, say, the producers of Australia, of Denmark, of the Argentine, if the exchange in those countries is practically on a par, or lower, with Great Britain while ours is at premium? I had a little clipping from an article published by our Department of Agriculture showing the disadvantage under which the Canadian producer of bacon labours in competing with the producer in Denmark. I am sorry I have not that article here to quote to the minister. However, let me put this question to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler), who I know is a student of this subject: How are we going to compete with Australia and the Argentine in the sale of wheat to Great Britain if the producers of those countries can transfer the pounds sterling they get for their wheat into a greater amount of currency of their own than the Canadian producer can? I will not say that this argument applies to articles that enter into the cost of living, but our producers are working to pay off the interest on debts contracted in a period of high prices. How then can they compete with the wheat producer in the Argentine, in Australia and in India when those people have a much lower rate of exchange than we? Almost all hon. members in this House complain because of the unfavourable trade balance between Canada and the United States; they deprecate the fact that our people are so prone to run to the United States to spend their money rather than spending it at home. They wish us to increase our trade with Great Britain rather than with the United States. But would it not be easier to trade with Great Britain if our exchange were on a par with that country rather than with the United States? I want to remind the House, however, that I said at the outset this is a debatable question, and I am not stating where the rate of exchange should be maintained. But so long as we are not on a gold basis the rate is apt to vary up to twenty per cent, as it has done in the past two or three years; and if that is the case, one of the most important questions before our business people to-day is the control of exchange. And I do not see how you can control it in the interests of the nation except through a national bank. Last night we discussed the question of a new bond issue, and the question was as to whether it should be floated in the United States or in Canada. The floating of bond issues is a matter that should be in the hands of a national bank. A year ago, I believe, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) told us that it cost $2,250,000 to float an issue of $100,000,000 in New York, and I have been told that one of the banks in this country received fifty per cent of that, which would be $1,125,000. Whether that is correct or not I do not know, and possibly it is not relevant at the present time. But if we had a national bank these bond issues could be floated at par and they would not cost this country more than one-eighth of one per cent, which would take care of the clerical work involved.

To sum up. We should have a central bank, first of all, for the issuing of notes, and secondly for the handling of the re-discounting privilege for small banks and rural credit societies; for I am firmly convinced that the people will not be satisfied to continue with the few banks that exist to-day. We must have some more small banks, and if these are to be established in such a way that they can operate successfully and compete with the big banks they must have a re-discounting privilege. That re-discounting privilege must be handled by practical bankers. There should also be some safe place for the people to put their deposits. I believe the Banking committee is opposed to the removal of the note issue privilege from the banks, and the people should therefore have some safe place for deposits provided by the government. There is also the handling of the rate of exchange. Surely the logical and the proper way of dealing with the entire situation is to establish a central bank, the profits of which I am sure would enable the government to reimburse the Home Bank depositors in a period of two years.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, in the course of the debate this afternoon the discussion, perhaps through inadvertence, on the part of some hon. members, I had almost said through lack of appreciation of the words set out in the order of reference or the report of the committee, has covered an exceedingly wide range of subjects, the arguments embracing many questions of finance and banking not, in my opinion, intended at all to be covered by the report of the committee. Even the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw), speaking with his usual ability, did not seem to confine himself precisely to the question under discussion. He spoke about bringing together disorganized and incoherent ends or creating a supervisory board.

The question which is before the House at the present time is very clear and distinct. The report of the committee asks simply that the order of reference be enlarged so as to embrace the study and consideration of some type of properly administered central or reserve bank The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner), during the course of the debate this afternoon, I understand, stated that the principle should be that when a committee came forward with a request to enlarge its reference or for permission to study any particular subject, that request should be immediately granted by the House of Commons. I cannot admit that argument for a moment. Committees are charged by the House of Commons with certain matters regarding which they are to debate, discuss, take evidence and subsequently report to the House. There would be no object in this reference to the House coming forward for debate this afternoon if the committee itself had power to decide to go into this complicated subject. But, as a matter of fact, if I follow the argument of the hon. member for Vancouver South, twenty-two members out of a committee of ninety members, came forward and asked the House of Commons to enlarge the scope of their inquiry so as to embrace the study of a properly administered central or reserve bank. Hon. members have a right to decide and should decide whether or not this particular question should be studied at all. If they are of opinion that the matter should not be studied, this report should be rejected. If they are of opinion that the question should be studied, this report should be adopted. In estimating their opinion, in making up their minds on this subject, hon. members will have first of all to decide whether or not the question of a central or reserve bank is one which should be considered at all. They will want to know whether or not our banking system is adapted to the establishment of a central reserve bank, and what effect its establishment would have on our banking laws. If they come to the conclusion which I myself have reached, I think they will decide that there is no necessity at the present time for the introduction of a central reserve bank into our banking system. Holding that opinion, Mr. Speaker, I think that this report should be rejected.

In giving my reasons why I think a federal reserve bank or a central reserve bank—it does not make much difference how it is described—should not be grafted on to our banking system, it seems to me that it will be well to survey the basis of our banking system, because it goes without saying that if this system is not adaptable to a central reserve bank, it would be the height of foolishness to assert that such a bank should be established. Our banking system is based on what is known as the branch bank system of Great Britain, that is to say, a certain number of large banks each with numerous branches throughout the country. In contradistinction to that system we have the United States system, which is based on what is known as the unit system, each unit being independent and forming a banking entity. I quote the United States system because in that country they have a Federal Reserve Bank, which I will discuss later on.

Now, in the course of this debate the question has arisen as to the number of banks in this country, and this question has a bearing on the subject matter before us. We have been told, quite correctly, that we have fourteen chartered banks, and the opinion has been expressed that possibly this is too small a number to handle the banking business of the country. In this connection it will be interesting to make a comparison with the number of banks in Great Britain. There 80 per cent of the banking business is carried on by five large banks having over seven thousand branches, as compared with our fourteen chartered banks with over four thousand four hundred branches. This comparison, it seems to me, demonstrates that we have a sufficient number of banks.

In determining our attitude towards the question now before us it is important to understand the United States banking system. They have 8,000 national banks and 23,000 state banks, to say nothing of trust companies, private banks, and concerns of a semi-banking character.

Let us look briefly into what are the main purposes of banks in general. These are, first, the issuance of notes, in which of course is included security for the notes; secondly, the taking of deposits, in which of course is also involved the safety of the depositors; thirdly, elasticity of circulation; and fourthly, elasticity of credits, which of course includes privileges of re-discount and such like. All these functions are inherent in our banks and are exercised by them. But before dealing with these various functions let us see what the result of our banking system has been. I think some hon. gentlemen are very apt to belittle our banking system, to say that it has not sufficiently built up the country, and that some new system should take its place, a part of such new system to be a central reserve bank. Let us consider the failures of Canadian banks since confederation and compare the losses sustained by noteholders and depositors with similar losses which have been sustained by these two classes under the unit system in the United States. Since confederation we have had only twenty-seven bank failures. Of these two are not reported, one being a small bank called the J. C Dale Bank of Madoc, Ontario, and the other the Exchange Bank of Montreal. I might say in parentheses that two Exchange Banks failed, the one to which I refer having closed its doors in 1871. Three of these defunct banks are in process of liquidation, namely the Farmers' Bank, the Bank of Vancouver and the Home Bank. Now, what happened as regards the other twenty-two failures? Outside of one small bank, the Acadia Bank, which had liabilities of slightly over $100,000, all the noteholders of those twenty-two banks have been paid in full. Of course, since the creation of the bank circulation fund all noteholders of defunct banks have been paid in full.

Now let us look at the record as regards the depositors of these twenty-two failed banks. This is what appears: Of the 22, in the case of 12 the depositors were paid in full; 3 paid 90 per cent or over; one paid 75 per cent; 4 over 50 per cent; one 30 per cent, and one 17½ per cent. In other words, 15 paid 90 per cent or over It seems to me that that record as regards our banking system, although it may not be perfect, is a good and sound record, one that I think we should be proud of, one that those who built up the banks in the country should be proud of, and one that has served the country and its upbuilding exceedingly well. What was the result in the United States? Of course there are many more banks there than we have in Canada, and the population is greater. We understand, too, that some of the banks are small. But we are not comparing the size of the banks; we are comparing the two systems, the branch system and the unit system, with a view to seeing whether a central reserve or federal reserve branch, call it what you will, is adaptable to the system that has grown up in this country.

What, then, are the results in the United States as regards failures? For the year ending June 30th, 1922, the failures were 306 state banks, 35 trust companies, 12 private companies, 11 savings banks, in all 364 banks.

Mr. LADNER: How many of these were members of the federal reserve system? In other words, how many were national banks?

Mr. MARLER: I do not think any of those I refer to were national banks.

Mr. LADNER: Then the result so far as they were concerned has no relationship to the question of a federal reserve system, because these banks were not in the system.

Mr. MARLER: That is not the point I am discussing at the moment. I am discussing—if my hon. friend will have a little patience—the question whether the federal reserve system is adaptable to our system. I was giving the record—possibly my hon. friend did not hear my remarks—as to our banking system, and I was giving the record also of the United States failures. I have the figures also as to the failures of banks in the federal reserve system, which I will take up later. But I am not prepared to say that any of these particular banks were Federal Reserve Banks, in other words, national banks. But under the unit system of banks, which is the system in the United States as distinguished from the system in our country, those were the failures in 1922. I was going on to say that for the nine years ending the 30th of June, 1922, 775 state banks alone failed. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) asked me a question as to federal reserve banks. That question is answered on page 133 of the evidence taken before the Banking and Commerce committee. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) was speaking about national bank failures. He said to the witness, Mr. John W. Pole:

I am taking six years. Take 1914: there were 19 national bank failures and 193 state bank failures, with a total loss of approximately $55,000,000 in 1915 there were 18 national bank failures and 115 state bank failures with a total loss of about $37,000,000; then there were a few years with smaller losses, and we come to 1920, which was a very prosperous year. In 1920 there were 10 national bank failures and 109 state bank failures, with an estimated liability of about $50,000,000. These figures are all in round numbers as far as dollars are concerned. In 1921 there were 47 national bank failures and 357 state bank failures with a loss of approximately $170,000,000; then in 1922 there were 35 national bank failures, and 242 state bank failures, with a loss of about $73,000,000, and in 1923 there were 77 national bank failures and 501 state bank failures, with a loss of about $200,000,000. To summarize this, since 1913—that is ten years ago—there have been 222 national bank failures and 1,664 state bank failures. I have not had the time to add up the total loss, but it runs up very high. Now my point is this, Mr. Pole, if you will permit me, in view of these increasing failures and the losses in the United States during recent years since the establishment of the Federal Reserve Bank, how can it be argued that the Federal Reserve Bank has in any very material sense contributed to the prevention of failures; I am not saying it is the cause, but how does it contribute materially to the prevention of failures?

The answer given by the witness was:

A. I do not think it can be said that it is a criterion of the merit of a system when you take that period immediately after the war.

Then the hon. member for Vancouver Centre asked another question:

However, the facts are correct?

Mr. Pole answered:

A. I will not dispute the facts.
Q. Really the point I want to make is that there is no system that is infallible and will prevent failures.—A. Absolutely none, as far as I know; it has never been devised.

The reason I read that quotation is by way of comparing the record of the system of branch banks in Canada with the unit system in the United States, and I say advisedly and with considerable pride that our banking system has certainly stood the test of time.

Mr. LADNER: Would my hon. friend's comparsion not be fairer and sounder if he gave the figures of the total number of unit banks in the United States so that we could get the proportions, also the number which failed prior to the establishment of the federal reserve system, so that we can note the improvement, if any?

Mr. MARLER: I cannot give my hon. friend the figures of the failures before the establishment of the Federal Reserve Bank. But as I stated in the earlier part of my remarks, there are 8,000 national banks in the United States and 23,000 state banks. But my hon. friend's question is beside the point, because the failures in the United States under the unit system have been much greater in number than the failures in this country.

Mr. IRVINE: The hon. member has stated that there are 5 banks in Great Britain and 23,000 in the United States. He compares the failures in the United States with those in Canada where we have 14 banks. Is that fair? If we had fourteen failures in Canada, for instance, within the next ten years, we would have no banks at all. Does he think that is a fair comparison?

Mr. MARLER: Yes, I think it is a very fair comparison indeed. As a matter of fact my hon. friend's question emphasizes the stability of our banking system, because it simply means that we have less failures. The failure of a unit bank in one part of the country may cause a great deal of suffering, whereas when one bank in Canada fails the loss is spread over the whole country.

Mr. IRVINE: That is an argument in favour of the unit system.

Mr. MARLER: No, it is not an argument in favour of the unit system.

Mr. IRVINE: My hon. friend just pointed out—

Mr. MARLER: The hon. gentleman is not bearing out his argument with his usual persuasion to-night. If he follows my argument closely I am sure he will agree with me toward the end; perhaps his new financial system will have a shock or something of that description.

As I stated at the commencement of my remarks, one of the questions involved in this matter is the issuance and security of notes. That I think I have covered as regards results by quoting the failures in Canada. The same thing applies as regards deposits. The next great question that comes up is the question of elasticity of credits. I think that, if there is any reason at all, is the main reason why the committee asks an extension of its powers for the purpose of studying the question of a federal reserve bank or a central reserve bank, as the case may be. I claim that our system provides admirably for most elastic systems of credit.

Mr. IRVINE: Before my hon. friend leaves that point, might I ask him how many branches there were of the Home Bank? Would it not be fair to say that we had a failure in Canada for every branch of the Home Bank, on the same basis that my hon. friend is figuring it out in the United States?

Mr. MARLER: I do not think that is an entirely fair comparison.

Mr. GRAHAM: A number of the Home Bank branches on their own business would not have failed.

Mr. MARLER: Exactly. As regards the elasticity of credits, under our branch bank system the credit of the country is concentrated at certain points, but at the same time it is decentralized; that is to say, although a concentration may take place at points where the head offices of the banks are situated, all the money in any bank is capable of being used in any branch or in any part of the country relating to that particular bank. By these means all the smaller communities have precisely the same effective powers over the funds of the bank and the use of credit as have the larger communities.

Now I would like to compare with that the federal system in the United States, because after all that is a comparable system with any central reserve bank or any bank of that description which might be included in the powers asked for in this extension. In the United States the local banks have, of course, few or no branches. Money, before the federal reserve system came into vogue, was not centralized in any particular part of the country. When the cotton crop had to be moved there was a lack of money in the south; when the grain crop came to be moved there was a lack of money in the west; consequently rates in particular parts of the country went up and became prohibitive, and in some cases, in fact, money could not be procured at all. It was to remedy this condition that the federal reserve system was put into effect, so that there would be sufficient centralization of funds to enable the member banks of the federal reserve system to procure from the federal reserve bank the funds necessary for their purpose. But as I have explained in our system the question of credit is nation-wide. The credit at the head office of any bank is available for any branch of that bank in any part of the country. Credit is not, and cannot be, so centralized under our system as to deprive the West of money which may be in the East. The West has precisely the same right to that money, and precisely the same powers over it, as has the East, although the money may be temporarily in the East.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Oh no.

Mr. MARLER: Why does my hon. friend say "Oh no?"

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Because the directorates of most of the banks are situated in the East, and they are more interested in the development of eastern industries than of the natural resources of western Canada.

Mr. MARLER: The hon. member is stretching the point. I know that that is the Albertan theory of banking, but he knows as well as I do that capital goes wherever it will pay; there is no question about that at all. The hon. member has no reason for saying that the capital of the banks is used for the development of eastern industries rather than for the development of the resources in the West. If he will look at the loans made in the West, he will find they are quite compatible with the deposits, and he knows that as well as I do.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not at all.

Mr. MARLER: If he will look at the statistics, he will find that is true.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Take the Home Bank case, where in practically every instance the deposits far exceeded the loans.

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend is speaking with regard to one bank only.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not at all. It is the general condition.

Mr. MARLER: Does my hon. friend mean that that condition prevails in all the banks, or in simply one bank?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Home Bank must be taken as typical. It is the only case where we have definite proofs. Last year we asked the managers of the banks to produce statistics in support of their contention that they were giving us fair service, but we have never been able to get it from them; they declined to give it.

Mr. MARLER: Does the hon. member mean to say that the Home Bank is to be taken as typical of our banking system?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not at all, but typical in the case you suggest, that branches in western Canada are extending loans in ratio to the deposits taken in. That is not the case.

Mr. MARLER: Has my hon. friend read the evidence taken before the Banking and Commerce committee this year of Mr. Edwards and of Sir William Stavert, who stated that every branch had the full facilities of the whole bank? If my hon. friend will look at the statistics, he will find that loans are made in all parts of the country, wherever loans are needed, provided the security is there. My hon. friend's statement that the loans are segregated in the East is totally without foundation, and I think he knows it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I suggest that we have sadly needed loans for development work in western Canada, but there has been a preference shown for West Indian investments, Mexican power development, and New Orleans rails, with the money of the Canadian depositors.

Mr. MARLER: Is it not true that the West has had too much money in the past few years?

Mr. SPENCER: If the hon. member will look at the Home Bank figures he will find, as I have, that the loans in each of the western provinces of Canada made by the Home Bank were outweighed by the deposits taken in.

Mr. MARLER: I am not discussing the Home Bank at all. I do not deny what the hon. member has said regarding the Home Bank, but I am discussing the general banking system of the country which the hon. member from Alberta is trying to pull down, to put a new one in its place. My hon. friend will find my statements substantiated—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I must ask my hon. friend to withdraw that last suggestion, that we are attempting to tear down the present system and substitute something in its place. Hon. members on this side with whom I have conversed have for their purpose the co-ordination of the facilities that now exist in one central banking bureau or commission. They are not attempting to interfere with the present banking facilities at all.

Mr. MARLER: Then my hon. friend is trying to merge fourteen banks in one central reserve bank and start a new bank entirely?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not at all. That is not true. May I suggest that the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) very clearly laid before the House just what he had in mind, and that is the co-ordination of the central gold reserve, the Department of Finance, the War Finance Act, the Treasury Board, and the Bankers' Association under one head. Those facilities all exist at the present time, and we are not proposing to do away with them but simply to co-ordinate them.

Mr. MARLER: I do not think my hon. friend followed me.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not wish the hon. member to be off on the wrong foot.

Mr. MARLER: Very possibly I will get on the right foot when my hon. friend from Bow River replies. However, to resume on this question of a federal reserve system for Canada what would happen would be the grafting on to our system of one that is totally inadaptable for all practical purposes. My hon. friends opposite say we want to study this question and find out if a federal reserve system of banking is practical for this country; we should ascertain whether we can have a central reserve bank. Why, the evidence taken before the Banking and Commerce committee this year is sufficient and conclusive on that point; the evidence taken before the committee last year is conclusive on the question that a federal reserve system or a central reserve bank, for they amount to very much the same thing, is not wanted in this country. Let hon. gentlemen opposite read the evidence of Mr. Neill, given on page 278. I know they laugh at Mr. Neill's evidence, Mr. Neill being a successful man, and, of course, it is a crime to have built up a successful bank in this country and to have brought the country ahead; but there is other evidence as well. At page 278 Mr. Neill says:

> Q. Would you compare the terms of our Finance Act and its facilities, briefly, with the federal reserve discounting system?—A. My opinion is that as far as the needs of Canada and the Canadian banks, and the Canadian public are concerned, that the re-discounting facilities granted by the Finance Act are quite satisfactory—all we need.

But in addition to that the Banking and Commerce committee brought up from the United States—it was one of the importations they are so fond of getting from that country—two bankers who gave clear and conclusive evidence before the committee. Mr. Pole, Chief National Bank Examiner at Washington, gave his reasons as regards the question of a reserve bank in Canada. Let my hon. friends look at page 124 of his evidence and they will find there the reasons which he gave for the establishment of the federal reserve system in the United States. He states, and he states in the clearest possible way, that the federal reserve system was established in the United States simply because there was difficulty in having sufficient money in various parts of the country. There is no difficulty under our banking system in having money in various parts of Canada when it is needed. Then if hon. members will look further into his evidence at page 127 they will see also that one of the peculiarities and one of the qualities of the Federal Reserve Bank is the question of re-discounting privileges which exist fully under our own Finance Act. He, as a matter of fact, compares our Finance Act very favourably with the federal reserve system in so far as re-discounting is concerned in the United States. Then let my hon. friends look further at page 139, where more of Mr. Pole's evidence appears, and they will find that he says this:

The system in vogue would seem to be entirely adequate inasmuch as the Finance Act offers every facility, practically, that the federal reserve bank offers at a much less expensive operation.

Then further on, as to whether a federal reserve system was adaptable to our system, if my hon. friends will look at page 142 they will see that Mr. Pole distinctly says that in his opinion the federal reserve system was not adapted to our system of unit banks.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Does he think it is adapted to the United States?

Mr. MARLER: Yes, it is adapted to the United States; it is an entirely different system. My hon. friend from South York wants to import into Canada the banking system of the United States as well as the various experts that were brought here for the purpose of giving testimony.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): No, he does not.

Mr. MARLER: But all these questions were fully taken up by the committee; they were fully considered and they were fully decided. The best witnesses that hon. gentlemen desired to have brought before the committee one and all stated that the federal reserve system is not adapted to Canada. My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good) shakes his head. He is probably thinking of Mr. J. Skelton Williams, but I am coming to him in just a moment.

Mr. GOOD: No, Mr. Pole as I intend to show later.

[Mr. Marler.]

Mr. MARLER: Mr. Pole also? Well, what does Mr. Pole say? On page 144, speaking about the federal reserve system also, he says:

A. I hardly think that the federal reserve system could be substituted for the Finance Act.

Q. Why?—A. For the reason outlined in my remark that it is entirely adequate for a unit system of banking, but it is not adapted to the—

Q. Branch system?—A. Branch system.

Q. Why?—A. Because it would be too expensive and too cumbersome for the number of units which it would have to take care of. There being only fourteen banks, if the fourteen banks should undertake to support the federal reserve system it would be rather an expensive operation.

Q. Because of the expense? That would be largely your objection?—A. That would be one of the objections, when perhaps the same purpose could be achieved under the provisions of the Finance Act.

It seems to me that Mr. Pole's evidence on this subject is very clear and very distinct. Now, Mr. J. Skelton Williams, who was also one of the witnesses before the committee, more or less learned, I admit, to the federal reserve system, but if his evidence is studied it will be found that he knew very little about our banking system. If hon. members will look at page 170 of his evidence they will see that Mr. J. Skelton Williams had not examined the monthly reports under our system. If they will look further at page 179 they will see that the question was asked him:

Are you familiar with our Finance Act?

His reply was:

No, I am not.

How, therefore, could Mr. J. Skelton Williams—not being familiar with our banking system or with our Finance Act—say to us here in Canada that he thought the federal reserve system could in any way be used in this country? But in addition to that I would ask my hon. friend from Brant, and my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) also, if they so desire, to look at page 181 of Mr. J. Skelton Williams' evidence in which he sums up the nine points as regards the uses and advances of a Federal Reserve Bank in the United States. Let my hon. friends look at those points and if they do so they will see that the great majority of them are all covered by our banking system. If the time of the House were not so short I would be very glad to go through each one of these points and demonstrate that our system amply and already covers each essential point that Mr. J. Skelton Williams laid stress on as being of great advantage under the federal reserve system.

Mr. GOOD: And all by way of co-ordination.

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend has made a very cryptic remark. I think he gives me credit for far more intelligence than I actually have. If he will elucidate his question a little bit I will be very glad to reply to it.

Mr. GOOD: I shall do so later.

Mr. MARLER: Well, we will leave my hon. friend's remark in a cryptic state in the meantime.

Now, let me repeat that our Finance Act as it is now and our branch bank system as it is now fully cover all the necessities of elasticity of credit and banking in this country, and our Finance Act as it exists is quite sufficient to meet the requirements without any question of a federal reserve bank being taken into consideration at all. In addition to that hon. members will require to bear in mind the cost of the administration of any banking system based on such a system as the federal reserve system. They will also require to consider what profit is gained in a reserve system of that description. I know that some will reply to me that notwithstanding the fact that $138,000,000 was gained in profit by the Federal Reserve Banks the profit must have come from somewhere—the profit must have come from some interest charged or some discounting, or from the loans made, because unless the Federal Reserve Bank has a considerable amount out in loans the bank cannot function at all. Therefore the question of getting lower rates of interest, lower rates of credit, does not apply at all. Now, consider the situation under our Finance Act. The administration of our Finance Act practically costs the country nothing. The profit derived, it is true, is comparatively small; but comparing the cost of a federal reserve bank—with its various branches and its various officers—it is hugely greater than any cost under our Finance Act at all.

There is another point also, as regards the federal reserve bank, which people having an idea of that subject should take into consideration and it is this: That the Federal Reserve Bank cannot function at all, cannot make any profits—it will have to be run at a loss—unless there is a tremendous amount in loans outstanding. The chairman of the Banking and Commerce committee (Mr. Vien) cited this afternoon a quotation from the New York Times of May 29 stating that the Federal Reserve Bank will barely make both ends meet this year simply because the loans are not great enough to make it pay. Precisely the same thing would happen in this country. If the banks cannot lend all their money, the Federal Reserve Bank cannot lend all its money. The bank if it has any kind of assets which it desires to re-discount can always, under the Finance Act and it is a very inexpensive operation, re-discount those assets and obtain all the money which is required.

Before I conclude I wish to re-state the question which is before the House to-night. It is this: Does this House desire to study the feasibility or the advisability of establishing a federal reserve bank? My hon. friend from Vancouver South said this afternoon that as a matter of principle the committee had a right to come to this House and ask for leave to investigate this particular subject. I do not think that the committee has any such right; it is for the members of this House to decide just what questions any committee shall study. No committee can arrogate to itself any powers and come to the House and say it desires to study this or that question and ask the House to acquiesce in its request.

Mr. LADNER: The committee having come to the House with the request that it be empowered to study this particular question, it then devolves upon the House to decide whether or not the power shall be deputed to the committee to go into the matter. The House can say to the committee: "We will not allow you to go further than you have already gone; individually you may go into the library and study the question as you see fit but as a committee you shall have nothing more to do with it." The House may take that position, and that is the point of the whole debate. My hon. friend has entered into a lengthy discussion before all the evidence is in.

Mr. MARLER: Not at all. I understood the hon. gentleman this afternoon to say that on principle he thought the House should accede to the request of the committee, that it be allowed to study this question.

Mr. LADNER: Certainly; and I see no reason whatever why that privilege should not be granted the committee.

Mr. MARLER: But why should the committee be given the power to go into this question?

Mr. LADNER: Because it has asked for it.

Mr. MARLER: Well, committees have no right to ask for any such powers. Any committee might request that it be empowered to study any complicated and obscure question and take up the time of parliament debating it while parliament might not desire to have that question investigated.

Mr. LADNER: Does the hon. member suggest that a committee has no right to request of parliament the right to enlarge the scope of its investigation? I have never heard any such proposition before.

Mr. MARLER: The committee was not authorized to investigate this particular question.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The committee studies all questions relating to banking and commerce, and surely this particular question would be relevant.

Mr. MARLER: They were asked to investigate an entirely different matter.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): They were told to investigate the subject of banking and commerce generally.

Mr. MARLER: Not at all; the committee were instructed to inquire into a particular question and the scope of their investigation was clearly defined. I do not think they have any warranty for coming to parliament and asking for further powers.

Mr. LADNER: Perhaps the hon. member does not know that the order of reference to the committee was interpreted in two ways, one interpretation being that the authority already existed in the order, and the other, that it did not empower the investigation of the matter in question. The reference was made in relation to the safety of depositors, and I think my hon. friend knows perfectly well that this question relates to that subject. The chairman of the committee having ruled that the committee had no power to investigate this particular question, the committee then voted that an appeal should be made to parliament to secure the necessary authority.

Mr. MARLER: I will not debate that question; it was discussed in the committee, and the ruling was given. My hon. friend says that this question relates to the safety of depositors; I am not of that opinion, for I do not think that the question of a federal reserve bank such as exists in the United States will add one iota to the safety of the banking public.

Mr. LADNER: Does the hon. member think that any member of the committee is advocating the adoption in this country of the United States federal banking system? Does he not know that what we are advocating is the adoption of certain principles, whether they be in application in the United States or in Timbuctoo, which will be helpful in our own system? That is the whole point.

Mr. MARLER: The request of the committee is perfectly clear; it relates to a central reserve bank, and that is the question before the House. Neither the hon. member for Vancouver South nor any other hon. member can make the language any plainer, however much they may talk around the subject; it is clear and distinct enough that the committee asks to be allowed to investigate the question of a central reserve bank. The hon. gentleman has been asking half a dozen questions; he will have an opportunity of dealing with the subject when I am through. In the meantime I want to be allowed to conclude my remarks. No doubt the financial gentlemen from Alberta will take up the question in a moment.

Mr. IRVINE: Is the United States the only country in which there is a central bank?

Mr. MARLER: No.

Mr. IRVINE: Then why does the hon. gentleman conclude that the request calls for a central bank like that of the United States?

Mr. MARLER: I do not say that it calls for the United States system; I am only taking that system for purposes of comparison. If the hon. gentleman had been listening to my remarks he would have heard me say so a few minutes ago. Now, that is the question before the House to-night; parliament is asked to allow the committee to study the feasibility or the advisability of establishing a federal reserve or central bank, call it what you will, and I do not think that the power to go into this question should be delegated to the committee, if in the opinion of hon. members the question of a central bank is unnecessary to all our banking system as I think it is.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I am aware that a great many hon. members in this House are rather anxious now to get through with the business of parliament. I myself am suffering just as much as anyone, if not more than a good many, in staying in this House during July; but I want to state most emphatically that on the present occasion the responsibility for whatever time may be taken up and, in the opinion of some hon. members, wasted, in this discussion, rests on the government, and not upon those in this part of the House who on the committee have made the request for the enlargement of its powers.

I should like in this connection to review the situation as it has developed since May 21. On that date, if my information is correct, the Banking and Commerce committee, by a vote of 21 to 7, requested this House to empower them to consider a matter which they thought pertinent to the inquiry already before them. Personally I did not think that we were going outside the order of reference already submitted to the committee in studying the matter which is under consideration to-night. Nor do I think so now; and in the course of my remarks this evening I shall try to show that this question of the establishment of some type of central bank in Canada is very closely connected with the question of safeguarding depositors, which is the subject already referred to the Banking and Commerce committe by this House. But the contention of the chairman of the committee was that the order of reference to the committee did not include the study and consideration of some type of central or reserve bank, and after some debate and after having been challenged by some members of the committee, his ruling was sustained by a very narrow vote of, I think, 14 to 12. That is the only reason why the committee by an almost unanimous vote of those present requested this House to enlarge the reference so that they might consider this matter, which in their opinion was pertinent and of great importance. That occurred on May 21, and from that time until the present moment some of us have been insistent that the question should be brought into the House and settled by the House so that we could then get to work, with what time we had, to study it and make some recommendation touching it. I do not wish to review all the details, but we have not succeeded in getting the matter into the House until the present time; and it is obvious, as everyone realizes, that the committee will not henceforth be able to give any great consideration to the subject. I do not wish to make any unfair insinuations, but it would seem as though the delay had placed the government in the position of being able to say that, now the time having gone, there is no use in going into the matter. In fact, the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) said this afternoon that it was already too late to undertake the study of a question of this sort. So it is in a sense. Everybody admits that, but it is not too late to assert the relevancy of this question and to insist that this House should give to the committee the right and power which the committee asks from them. That is the history of the situation, and it is just as well that those members of the House who do not belong to the Banking and Commerce committee should know just what happened, because, in my judgment, it is very significant.

9 p.m.

Further, I made a private effort, I suppose about three weeks ago, to secure the acquiescence of the government in this particular appeal of the committee, and I did not think at that time that the government would take a position which seemed to me then and which seems to me now most unreasonable and unfair. I was amazed at that time when I learned, incidentally and indirectly, but from very good authority, that the government was likely to oppose this motion for the enlargement of the powers of the committee. I concluded that if that was the situation, if the government by what majority it might command in the House, was going to suppress the inquiry, nothing was left for me but to place myself on record in this House. I did not want to take up the time of this House. I would have preferred to present in the committee whatever information I had collected in regard to this matter, but the action of the government has forced me, very much against my will and certainly against the inclinations and desires of members at this time, to bring the matter to the attention of the House this evening.

Mr. GRAHAM: How did the action of the government do that?

Mr. GOOD: The situation is plain. The government have clearly indicated that they are opposed to granting the committee any power to study this matter. That attitude was conveyed to me three weeks ago unofficially, and it has been definitely conveyed to the House to-day by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). Therefore, since we cannot possibly get an opportunity on the committee of looking into the matter or of presenting any of our ideas, what option is left for me and other members but to stand up in this House to-night and proclaim our views.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. member take unofficial reports as being governmental information or announcements?

Mr. GOOD: I do not know. I hope yet that I was wrong. I should like to see the government even at this date concede this point. If they could grant the appeal of the committee and acquiesce in their request, a good deal, at all events, of dissatisfaction would be allayed. As I said, what I understood to be the attitude of the government, conveyed to me, if you like, unofficially some time ago, and as I take it, fairly clearly stated in the House to-day, has placed me in the position where I have no choice other than to present the matter to-night.

I had intended to deal with one particular phase of this question of a central bank in order to impress upon the House if possible the great importance of looking into the matter. The argument which I shall present to the House is condensed in the following statement which I should like to submit:

1. The safety of deposits and depositors depends in part on the stability of business, in the prevention of recurrent waves of feverish prosperity, with intervening periods of paralyzing depression, because such flow and ebb encourages banks first to over-loan and then, when the tide turns, subjects them to disastrous pressure.

2. The prevention of this periodic ebbing and flowing of the industrial tide depends, largely, upon the stabilizing of the price level, —the stabilizing of the purchasing power of money.

3. The most potent and immediately feasible method of stabilization in Canada, and also in many other countries, is the regulation of the re-discount rate, and for this purpose a central bank is the proper instrument for putting such regulation into effect.

4. Therefore, the safety of depositors is largely dependent upon the establishment of a central bank.

If that argument is sound—and I think I could substantiate every part of it by such a mass of evidence that this House would scarcely turn a deaf ear—then the ruling of the chairman some time ago was entirely erroneous, I submitted then that it was erroneous and I contend to-night that the ruling of this question out of order—outside of the reference then made to the House—was an entire mistake and that we should have been permitted by the chairman to study this matter, having in mind only the question of the safety of depositors that had already been referred to the committee.

I have some consideration for hon. members and I am not going to present the mass of detail that I had hoped to present in this respect, but I shall submit my argument in brief. Perhaps, we ought to start out somewhat from this point of view. The banking situation, as it has developed in Canada during the last year or so, certainly has given rise to a great deal of dissatisfaction, unrest and uneasiness. Confidence is pretty well shattered. Last year the bankers who were before the committee, and the government also, fought inspection. They fought and defeated practically every other amendment which some of us thought necessary for the restoration of confidence. Our arguments had no effect last year and I think I know why. I have some information which I think the House and the country ought to have as to the possible reason why our efforts last year to secure anything of a fundamentally reconstructive character failed. If members want to know something about the causes, about the influences at work, I wish they would look into the minutes of the meeting of the Bankers' Association held at Montreal on July 9, of last summer.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What were they?

Mr. GOOD: They will find if they look at those minutes that Sir Thomas White, for services—I do not know what services; he was not around or at least I did not see him—rendered during the Bank Act revision of last year was given $20,000 by the Bankers' Association. Mr. Geoffrion who is retained this year, on the testimony of the secretary of the Bankers' Association was paid $20,000 last year and he never opened his mouth in the committee; but he did his work quite effectively, as some of us knew and saw. Mr. Symington, who has been prior to the present time generally recognized as one of the best advocates of the western farmers' interests, was retained by the Bankers' Association for $20,000. He sat in the committee also and did not open his mouth as far as I saw, unless perhaps in conversation with private members.

Mr. CARROLL: Then what complaint have you got to make?

Mr. GOOD: I am simply submitting these facts to the House and to the country, for I think they are significant. Other legal counsel who appeared at Ottawa last year received nearly $10,000. The cost of printing and distributing the pamphlet, "Banks and Banking", which we were all favoured with last year, as hon. members will remember, was nearly $8,000—I am giving the round figures—and the hon. gentleman in the other House who was responsible for writing this pamphlet was granted an honorarium of $10,000. Some of us last year expressed our opinion of the quality of this pamphlet "Banks and Banking". A companion pamphlet was published this year and circulated among members, as we all know. However, no matter what our opinion may be of the quality of the argument in "Banks and Banking," it is significant that an honorarium of $10,000—which I presume must be taken out of the banks' customers, possibly the poor western farmers —was granted to the writer of a little pamphlet which I think any schoolboy could have produced. There were some other expenses, not very large, the total amounting to more than $96,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is the situation. Last year, as we all know, influences were brought to bear on this House and on the government which prevented the adoption of the amendment for bank inspection and of a dozen other amendments that some of us were pressing for. Our arguments were not listened to—well, they were listened to, but I remember time and again in the committee there would not be a word of argument in reply, but some hon. members would call. "Question, question", and we would be voted down. After being assured last year, as was stated in the House this afternoon, by those big bankers that everything was all right, that the depositors were perfectly safe and the banks were all in splendid condition;— shortly after the Bank Act went through this House the Union Bank wrote off its rest account four and a quarter million dollars, the Bank of Hamilton amalgamated with the Bank of Commerce, and later on the Home Bank failed. The public know these things, and we here know what went on in the Banking committee last year. Now we discover that nearly $100,000 was spent by the Bankers' Association in defeating our efforts to amend the Bank Act. In view of all these facts what are we to conclude?

And now the bankers have conceded the necessity of inspection. Why? Because the logic of events—not our arguments—has proven that inspection was necessary and desirable years ago. I hope it has not come too late. So the government comes down, and says, "We will concede inspection." In fact the Acting Minister of Finance has introduced an amendment to the Bank Act for the purpose. It is a good amendment and I hope it will be in time to meet the situation. But as far as we can gather, the government are going to oppose everything else, and we have a dozen amendments which are perhaps just as vital as the amendment which we tried to put through last year to bring about bank inspection. I hope I am wrong, but it seems we have an announcement from the Acting Minister of Finance this afternoon that the government are not going to allow us to even consider the question of a central or federal reserve bank; they want to absolutely suppress inquiry so far as it is concerned. We are told that we can go ahead individually and study this matter. Well, some of us have been doing so for some time, but we cannot get anywhere unless we bring the inquiry into the committee. I think it is an outrageous situation, and I could not believe my ears three weeks ago when I heard that we would not be allowed to consider this matter in committee. Here we are at the last days of the session and the government come along and say, "Oh, well, now it is too late anyway." I do not know under what pressure. The secretary of the Banker's Association says they have four counsel retained, and has named them.

Now I want to present briefly to the House a few facts on the subject of a federal or central reserve bank. Last year I received a memorandum, which I have under my hand, from a gentleman who is now in the United States. He is connected with one of the large investment banking houses, and is a lecturer at one of the universities in the States. Before leaving Canada he was a professor of banking in one of our universities. In this very interesting memorandum there is a very definite and, perhaps, a rather novel argument to show that the time is ripe for the establishment of a federal reserve or central bank in Canada—not a slavish copy of the federal reserve system in the United States. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George laboured the case this evening to show that we should not adopt the federal reserve system of the United States. Of course we should not. We never asked for that at all. As has been well said by the member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner), what we do think is necessary is to study and to secure in the very near future some type of central bank adapted to Canadian conditions. The writer of this pamphlet knows the United States situation, he has spent years in studying the question, and he states very definitely that the time is ripe for the establishment of such an institution in Canada. Are you going to turn that down? We might have secured the attendance of this gentleman for examination in regard to this matter if we had time. We cannot do so now, but we might have the advantage of his attendance next year. His argument, in brief, is simply along the lines of the argument that has been presented by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw): we have at the present time, as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George admitted, all the necessary elements for a federal reserve or central bank; we have our rediscounting facilities under the Finance Act, we have our central gold reserve, we have the Bankers' Association, we have practically a centralization of financial power in this country in this private organization, and we have, or shall have very shortly, an inspection system, and also we have our government savings bank.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And national currency.

Mr. GOOD: We have not yet, but we may have.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): It is coming.

Mr. GOOD: We have these various elements or functions or aspects of a federal reserve system either in being or in prospect —we have everything except government notes. Now the proposition is that we should link up these elements in a co-ordinated scheme under the supervision of a board of experts and they do not need to be very many. Here, is something that can be established in Canada in the near future at practically no expense, because it means substantially nothing additional to what is now in existence or in immediate prospect. It simply means that these activities are to be co-ordinated and managed, if you like, by a board of experts, of bankers. We know the procedure in the re-discounting process, the Deputy Minister of Finance advises the Treasury Board. But the Treasury Board, composed of cabinet ministers, are too busy probably to look into the matter, they do not know anything about the rate of re-discount and the various considerations in connection with it, and so naturally they take the advice of the Deputy Minister of Finance. And he does not know. He admitted the other day in the committee that he had never even thought of altering the rate of interest; that the matter had never been discussed. What a deplorable admission on the part of the only man who advises the government in this matter! Why, it is recognized by all the authorities that one of the most feasible methods of checking inflation and deflation, of stabilizing price-levels and the purchasing power of money, is the adjustment of the rediscount rate. It is recognized by the Bank of England authorities, by the federal reserve authorities of the United States, indeed, by economists all over the world that this is the method which is best adapted under existing conditions—and I think it is particularly true in Canada—for the stabilizing of the price level. Yet the only adviser of the Treasury Board says the matter has never even been thought of, that he has never looked into it. And yet the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George and the Acting Minister of Finance say everything is going beautifully, and the secretary of the Bankers' Association says everything is going beautifully. Why, it is hard not to get hot over a situation like that. I shall have to get my coat off pretty soon. Now let me quote just a sentence or two from this memorandum:

> Only through a central bank and a central reserve board would it be possible to exert that control over the expansion of credit and over price levels, which we discussed in a previous section of this memorandum and, if the day comes when we desire to follow out the suggestions made by the Genoa Conference or by Professor Irving Fisher, or any other suggestions designed to secure stabilization in business and commodity prices, we will be handicapped unless we have some sort of organization.

And then he goes on to speak about the organization of a board for this particular purpose.

Mr. SPENCER: What is my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. GOOD: I have already explained that it is a memorandum placed in my hands by a gentleman who is now living in the United States and who used to be professor of banking in one of the Canadian universities.

There is another point that I would like to emphasize. This country, the United States, England—in fact, the whole world—have suffered tremendously, suffered in superlative degree in recent years from fluctuations in the purchasing power of money. Nothing stands out more prominently as a cause of disaster and misfortune. Now while we had submitted to the committee last year by Professor Irving Fisher one method of stabilization, it was applicable almost entirely to countries such as the United States where there is an abundant supply of gold. We have not an abundant supply of gold, and many other countries are in the same position; the gold standard has practically disappeared. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) in the House yesterday lamented the fact that we have not the gold standard, as did the Deputy Minister of Finance the other day in the committee, and suggested that we ought to get back to that gold standard. Mr. J. M. Keynes, in his most recent work on the subject, "Monetary Reform," published early this year, which I have read with a great deal of interest and attention, says:

> In truth, the gold standard is already a barbarous relic. All of us, from the Governor of the Bank of England downwards, are now primarily interested in preserving the stability of business, prices, and employment, and are not likely, when the choice is forced on us, deliberately to sacrifice these to the outworn dogma, which had its value once, of £3:17:10½ per ounce. Advocates of the ancient standard do not observe how remote it now is from the spirit and the requirements of the age. A regulated non-metallic standard has slipped in unnoticed.

Let me emphasize that.

A regulated non-metallic standard has slipped in unnoticed. It exists. Whilst the economist dozed, the academic dream of a hundred years, doffing its cap and gown, clad in paper rags, has crept into the real world by means of the bad fairies—always so much more potent than the good—the wicked ministers of finance.

Mr. McMASTER: You must not abuse a man in his absence.

Mr. GOOD: Oh, I certainly am not applying this expression "wicked ministers of finance" to our estimable Acting Minister of Finance; far be it from me to make any such suggestion. On page 214 of the same volume Mr. Keynes speaks about the policy of the Federal Reserve Board of the United States in regard to the maintenance of price levels. I am not going to quote it, Mr. Speaker, but the fact is that gold has been demonetized to a very large extent, and if my understanding of the situation is at all correct—and I quote Mr. Keynes as one of the real authorities on this subject; many others could be cited—we are not likely to go back to the gold standard. In fact we have arrived at a point where we are attempting to secure a managed currency. Let me emphasize that term—a "managed currency." Hitherto we have let this thing go wild. If we followed the gold standard we were at the mercy of the supply of gold, whether it was much or little, or we were at the mercy of the printing press or of incompetent bankers who in a period of inflation lost their heads and expanded credit too much and then when the turn came stifled business by contracting credit too rapidly. This has been the situation in the past, and some of the biggest bankers in the world are looking into this matter and are taking remedial steps. If the economic and industrial world is to survive we have to have a managed currency. I submit in all earnestness that there is no means of securing a managed currency in the immediate future that is more feasible and more practicable than the establishment of some type of properly administered central or federal reserve bank.

Let me repeat the argument so far: We have suffered tremendously from these recurrent waves of feverish prosperity and intervening periods of paralyzing depression. This is something that has faced all of us, and the cause has now been discovered in an unregulated, unmanaged, happy-go-lucky currency. It is possible by a managed currency to prevent these alternate periods of booms and depressions—what is known now among economists as the business cycle. Not long ago Professor Irving Fisher sent me a little pamphlet, "The Business Cycle Largely a 'Dance of the Dollar.'" In this pamphlet he has worked out mathematically and by very careful means the relationship between what is known as the business barometer and the rapidity of the fluctuations in the price level. He has shown that the actual facts prove that the business cycle largely follows and depends upon the rapidity of fluctuations in the price level. It is a very interesting document that was published in the proceedings of the American Statistical Association in December of last year.

I have here another pamphlet by Professor Irving Fisher dealing with the same matter, entitled "Stabilizing the Dollar." This was published in Harper's Magazine in March of this year, and I think as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has taken up considerable time, I shall quote briefly from this very interesting pamphlet for the benefit of hon. members. He says on page 1:

From the beginning of things monetary mankind has been harassed by mysterious, periodic price-floods —both ebbing and flowing—comparable to the plagues of Egypt. We have always blamed the wrong man —the "gold-bug" if prices went down; the "profiteer" if prices went up. Yet both of these alleged scoundrels have been merely carried by the mysterious tide they were accused of consciously making. Within the past three years this tide has surged up and down in such quick and bruising succession that the real truth has begun to get itself knocked into a few of us. For who can now go on believing that mere little cliques of human beings whose interests are opposed could take turns at controlling the tides in opposite ways three times within a year! When, therefore, most economists, some business men, a few bankers, and a legislator or two begin to talk "unstable dollar", the rest of us may at least feel justified in taking notice. What has so long prevented the ordinary citizen from detecting the motions of the dollar is the same thing which prevents the child on a train from detecting the train's motion. To the child the fences seem to go scooting backward when it is the train carrying him forward. Even to the grown man the sun seems to move from east to west when it is the earth carrying him from west to east. So we, who ride the tide of dollars, think the price-shore is receding when it is the money-tide carrying us out to sea.

He continues:

Naturally, then, we trust to the wrong expedient to bring prices down. We trust to increased production. But production is already adequate. It is a fact, however, that increased production would lower prices, and therein, if we but look, we shall find the real secret of high prices. Prices are a mutual thing. If money buys goods, goods buy money. If, therefore, overproduced goods mean cheap goods, why does not overproduced money mean cheap money? It is in fact cheap money and not dear goods from which we are suffering. When the abundance of money is sudden, as in war, we sometimes come to acknowledge it and call it by the name of "inflation". But war-inflation is sudden inflation. What we fail to notice is the stealthy, slow inflation that has been the cause of the mysterious slow rising tide of prices through the ages (for prices have mostly risen), and the occasional slow deflations that have been the cause of the occasional historic ebb-tides of prices. Sudden deflation has also been tried, in 1921, as a counter-active against high prices, and it proved so successful that nobody liked it.

I shall not read any further from this pamplet, but I certainly think it is entirely pertinent.

Now I should like to call attention, just in passing, to some data that were placed on the Congressional Record by a gentleman we had before the committee this year, the Hon. John Skelton Williams, ex-Comptroller of Currency in the United States. Here it is,—a document entitled "The Tragedy of Artificial Deflation", showing how a contraction of credit in the United States from 1920 on led to a tremendous fall in prices, and, of course, when you get a fall like that you get it in some commodities more than in others; and showing also very definitely the connection between this tremendous slump or depression, with all the misery it caused, and the policy of the Federal Reserve Board in the United States at that time. I do not know whether I should say the policy of the Federal Reserve Board, but the policy of the financiers at that particular time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You are quite right; it was the policy of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. GOOD: I think the ex-Minister of Finance is right. At all events that is Mr. Williams' contention. I do not wish to weary the House with quoting from this; I shall simply point to some figures that are significant. For instance, here is a summary of the total loans and discounts and bought paper held by twelve federal reserve banks. On May 28, 1920, it amounted to $2,938,000,000, or nearly three billion dollars; on August 31, 1921, $1,500,000,000; on January 25, 1922, $932,000,000, showing a decrease of two billion dollars in the loans of the Federal Reserve Banks in the United States in that very short time.

Mr. McMASTER: Within two years?

Mr. GOOD: From May 28, 1920, to January 25, 1922, hardly two years. The actual contraction of credits extended by the federal reserve system from May 28, 1920, to August 31, 1921, amounted to $1,410,000,000. Over the period of nearly two years that I mentioned it is slightly over $2,000,000,000, as I said before.

Mr. Skelton Williams has quoted in this document the views of a number of leading economists and bankers in regard to this particular matter which I shall not burden the House with at the moment. But I want to emphasize this; that owing to an unmanaged or a badly managed currency, in the United States alone we had a tremendous inflation from 1917 to 1920, and a tremendous deflation following it. Now this is the situation that faces us. It may be said that the Federal Reserve Bank in the United States did not help. Well, maybe it did not, but there is this to be said, that the condition of affairs might have been infinitely worse if they had been without the Federal Reserve Bank. I passed through a good deal of that territory last summer and made a personal investigation, and I had the testimony of United States bankers everywhere to the inestimable benefit the federal reserve system had been to them in the time of stress during the war. But even supposing the results have been unfortunate, that is not due to the system; it is due to the bad management of the system. The point I am making is this, that we have arrived at a stage in the history of the world when we have got to face the problem of a managed currency, not only in this country but in all countries, and that is one of the most important economic, financial and political problems that we have to face at the present time.

Just in this connection I would like to quote in answer to a question that was asked me yesterday by one of the members of the House, one sentence from a speech delivered by the Hon. Reginald McKenna last January in England:

When the national output is below the productive capacity the policy should be to let money out. When production is at a maximum the outflow of money should be checked and if inflationary symptoms have appeared money should be withdrawn.

I was asked in the course of the debate yesterday by one hon. member, under what conditions, if any, it might be good policy to increase the supply of money in the country. Now Mr. McKenna has set forth very distinctly the considerations that ought to weigh in a managed currency; that is, if we have a decreasing price-level, accompanied as it always is by business depression and unemployment, it should be the policy of statesmen to deliberately increase the supply of money in order to take up the slack, as it were, to get rid of unemployment, and to give encouragement to business. If, on the other hand, any inflationary symptoms appear, which will be indicated by an increasing price level, the proper policy would be to decrease the supply of money, and in that way prevent the ups and downs of business. As I said before, the best economists and bankers are coming to the conclusion that this is one of the first-rate problems that faces us in the immediate future. I have referred to Mr. J. M. Keynes, to Professor Irving Fisher, to the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, and to Mr. J. Skelton Williams of the United States. I might refer to a lot of other authorities that have looked into this particular matter.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Are any of them on the pay roll of the Canadian Bankers' Association?

Mr. GOOD: I rather think not, certainly not on the pay roll of the Canadian Bankers' Association.

Now, I hold in my hand a very interesting document, a report of the hearings before the committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives on what is known as the Goldsborough bill. This is a bill that was submitted to Congress by Mr. Goldsborough in December, 1922, a year and a half ago. The bill had for its object the stabilizing of the purchasing power of money and the consequent prevention of these disastrous fluctuations that we are so familiar with. This bill was submitted to the committee referred to. I think it is perhaps significant and interesting that if a bill of this character had been introduced into this House some hon. members would be inclined to scoff at it and say "This is mere academic rubbish." But when it was brought before the United States Congress it was submitted to the Banking and Currency committee. That committee made a very exhaustive investigation into the subject and whom did they consult? Perhaps my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George would also despise the witnesses called before that committee and say they were people who had no practical knowledge. Well, he has a right to his opinion just as I have a right to mine. The witnesses who were called before the committee at Washington were: Dr. Irving Fisher, Professor of Political Economy, Yale University; Professor James H. Rogers, Acting Professor of Economics and Finance, Cornell University; Dr. Willford I. King, Economist, National Bureau of Economic Research, New York city; Mr. Robert D. Kent, President Merchants Bank of Passaic, Passaic, N.J.; Mr. Philip P. Wells, Middletown, Conn.; Mrs. Frederick Leslie Ransome, Legislative Chairman American Association of University Women, Washington, D.C.; Dr. Frank A. Wolff, Physical Bureau of Standards, Washington, D.C.; Dr. George H. Shibley, Director of Research Institute, Washington, D.C.; and Mr. William C. Lee, Member National Monetary Association, Washington, D.C.

There is a lot of information in this document that hon. members ought to study. But our policy has been to go drifting along in a sort of Rip Van Winkle style, not realizing that the world has got ahead of us, talking about returning to the gold standard and a whole lot of things that are in the past. A lot of water has flowed under the bridge in the last seven or eight years in regard to financial and economic matters generally, and if we are going to adapt ourselves to existing conditions we must realize what the situation is at the present time and not remain cognizant only of conditions as they were ten, twenty or fifty years ago. I know that is always the tendency for every one; we are all apt to fall into that attitude of mind, of thinking that the world is what it was twenty years ago, but as Mr. Keynes has well said, the situation has absolutely changed with respect to many of these currency questions within the last four or five years. Look at the flood of gold from the rest of the world to the United States! Why, they have buried down at Washington I do not know how many hundreds of millions of dollars of gold; they were afraid of another disastrous inflation so they had to get the gold out of the way. In Europe they have very little gold. The situation is new There are therefore a number of new problems to be solved. We must face the situation that exists at the present time, and stop thinking we are still living under the conditions of ten years ago when the situation was very different from what it is at the present time, although indeed the same influences were at work then that are at work now. Some of our people in Canada are waking up to the situation. I noticed during the winter a very interesting editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press on "Hard times and the currency problem." Hard times! Have we not had enough of hard times in Canada during the last two or three years?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. GOOD: What relation has it to currency problems? Has it any relation? I venture to say that if I put the question to the majority of members on the spur of the moment they would say no. The only way you can get rid of hard times and the economic conditions of the last two or three years, they would say, is to get your nose on the grindstone a little bit more, work a little harder, economize and save money. When we asked that very eminent banker the late Sir Edmund Walker, in the Banking and Commerce committee last year what he would propose to remedy the situation, the poor man was pathetically—

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Flabbergasted.

Mr. GOOD: No, I would not use such a term as that, but he saw no remedy but to practise the old human virtues of hard work, thrift, economy and so on. That was all the enlightenment he gave us, and he was, I think, the most farseeing of all the bankers we had before us last year. Now, is there any connection between hard times and the currency problem? I contend there is. I do not want to go into all the details. I have a mass of information bearing on the subject and should like to take hon. members through it but hours would be consumed in doing so. This information would show that there is a very direct connection between hard times, that are brought about very largely by inflation and deflation, and the currency problem. Some of us are beginning to see the connection and are commencing to realize what we ought to do. Now, no means has been evolved that is more feasible and practicable and useful in the solving of that problem than the regulation of the interest rate and that can only be done through some type of properly administered central bank. There are many other things that a central bank will do, but this is one of the problems that it certainly can solve. It is one of the most important things a central bank can do.

And yet in spite of that, in spite of the information which has been submitted to the House, merely as yet in skeleton form, what does the government do? It refuses the request of the committee, passed by a vote of 21 to 7, to study this matter and to ascertain what more there is in it. And so we will go drifting on, under pressure I am afraid from the powers that be, into inevitable disaster. I said a few minutes ago that it was not our arguments of last year that brought the Banker's Association to concede government inspection No, it was disaster. But they are not going to concede anything else, they are not going to concede that any change of a radical nature in our banking system is necessary—nothing at all. They say "We have put this patch on and that will stop the leak. No further concessions will be made." Let me make a prediction: If nothing more is done there are going to be worse disasters very shortly. Then when we come back next year the Bankers' Association—after spending perhaps another $100,000 to defeat us—are going to be forced to concede something else. They will be forced to make another concession. The Bankers' Association will not come out of their trenches until they are driven out. Argument will not do it. It is a sad thing in human history that argument will not force people out of an untenable and indefensible position; they must be driven out by the logic of events.

I fear we shall have more disaster in the future. It may be said that I am talking wildly but let me say this: A very eminent banker now in the United States, a man who has had decades of experience in banking in Canada, told me not long ago that he had been making a year and a half's study of the Canadian situation and he predicted disaster in the near future, and he added that inspection had come too late to help. I do not know whether he is right or not, but I hope not. He is not, however, a man who speaks foolishly, and he says it is too late. And here is the government, apparently under pressure, refusing to consider a matter which is perhaps of much more fundamental importance and which will go considerably further, not immediately but ultimately, in the reconstruction of our financial system. The government refuses even the right to inquire into the matter, and I say that it is simply outrageous. It is altogether wrong, and I do hope that the government will give way. I trust I am not right in my supposition that when this motion is submitted to the House to-night the government will vote it down. But if it is voted down I can see some of the consequences that will ensue, and I predict something which the government will not like. The result may not be immediate, but the logic of events is more powerful than anything I may say to-night. We have urgent need to go further than we have gone in this little patchwork; what we have done is all right so far as it goes but it does not go very far. And if we shut our eyes to the inevitable tendencies at work now and refuse to provide for the future that which is alone capable in Canada of contributing to the stabilization of price levels, if we refuse to consider the co-ordination of the Finance Act administration, the gold reserve, the inspection systems, and all these things, I venture to predict that in a very short time we shall be sorry. I urge once more upon the government, even although they may consider it is not self-respecting, to withdraw their opposition to this motion and allow the committee that liberty to which I submit they are entitled.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Hon. members opposite may deal with the subject lightly in their anxiety to get a vote upon it, but I wish earnestly with all the knowledge I possess to support the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good). I desire to emphasize his last warning: The day is past in this country, or in any other country for that matter, when the representatives of the people can sit laughing and calling "Question" without attempting to answer the arguments submitted in behalf of a change which is intended to improve the banking system of their own country. Let me now attempt to dovetail the few remarks I have to offer into the speeches that have already been made. I hope that hon. members who are in earnest in the matter and who are carefully studying the subject will observe that we in this corner are endeavouring as far as possible to avoid any overlapping but rather to form link by link an unbreakable chain of logical argument in support of the cause for which we stand. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) referred to the necessity of establishing some form of central bank in order that long-term and short-term rural credit facilities might be instituted in this country. I am going to assume that the government intends establishing a rural credit system in Canada; logic compels me to make that assumption. I desire to quote from the report of Dr. Tory's commission at page 43:

> A distinguished authority on agriculture, the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture in 1915 stated the matter to a body of bankers in the following terms: "I believe I am not overstating the matter when I say that a satisfactory system of rural credit is as necessary to the development of agriculture in the country as is a widespread application of scientific methods of agriculture. As a matter of fact, it is impossible for the farmers to make use of the latest scientific discoveries without better credit facilities". It is hardly necessary to state that the two go hand in hand.

I should like to bring to the attention of the House another statement at page 10 of the report:

> One great reason why all countries have found it necessary to solve in some measure this problem is that agriculture is everywhere regarded as the fundamental industry, which if not prosperous reflects its lack of prosperity on every other national activity. This is especially true of all those countries which seek to become even approximately self-supporting.

I feel justified therefore in assuming that this government, in spite of its evident inertia, must sooner or later establish a system of long and short term rural credits in this country. It amazes me, as it does the hon. member for Brant, that without even waiting to hear the arguments that were to be submitted in the House on this question of establishing a central bank, the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) should in his place to-day at the very commencement definitely state as the policy of the government that this proposal would not be accepted, the proposal to widen the scope of the banking committee for the purpose of considering and reporting upon this particular question.

Mr. ROBB: I did not say that was the policy of the government; I said I could not support the resolution.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Well, we take it always that on a question of this kind when the minister chiefly concerned makes a definite statement such as this he is declaring the policy of the government. I am amazed too to find that the general attitude of members of the government towards the question of rural credits is, "nothing doing this year." In my opinion emergency legislation is essential at this session, but that is not the issue at the moment. I simply wish to press this point upon the government, that if they are ever to establish a rural credit system that will be really effective there must be some central banking agency, affording central discounting facilities. The present banks are regarded by all authorities, Mr. Neill himself included, as being unsuited to meet the requirements of agriculture in this country, and the question arises as to what we can devise to take their place for agricultural purposes. If we study the situation in Europe we find unfortunately there a multiplication of financial institutions, some helping one class and others assisting another. There is considerable duplication of institutions assisting agriculture, but it may be that with the denser population of these countries and the intensive nature of the farming carried on there, they can support the immense overhead. But I do not believe that in Canada we could 10 p.m. afford such overlapping. So that we shall have to centralize the thing as nearly as possible. With these systems in Europe it goes without further argument that the overlapping is expensive; we find there private, co-operative and state organizations all struggling with the problem. These systems have two objects; the first being the assembling of the community's credit. That is not the function of a central bank; it would be the business of some local organization or local bank. Their second object is the conversion of the collective community credit into purchasing power, that would be the natural function of a central bank; in other words, it is discounting. Hon. members may question whether a central bank is essential for these purposes. I will therefore consider for a moment or two the situation as it exists in other countries. We find that in practically every one of those places where any effective system of rural credits is in operation, it was necessary to establish a central bank. In many cases, I admit, the central bank was not necessarily an institution that did every kind of business. Let me give an example or two to illustrate the point. The mortgage credit banks of Germany are directly under some governmental authority, either a state government or a local authority such as a municipality in this country.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And the public credit is behind the whole system as well.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Exactly; the public credit in every case is behind these enterprises. In Sweden there are ten distinct loan mortgage associations and the whole system is centralized in the Swedish Central Mortgage Bank, again, a government institution.

We then come, in respect to short-term credits, to the raiffusen system in Germany which consisted in the formation of local societies and the federation together into a central body. Under the Credit Agricole of France we have several regional banks in the principal towns, and then the grouping into one great central federation of credit. In Australia, and in most of the states of the Commonwealth, provision is made for loans from governmental sources direct. Perhaps the most outstanding type of this is to be found in New Zealand. I should like in this connection to quote, for the information of the members, from page 38 of Dr. Tory's report. This, I think, is one of the most advanced systems of centralized control that I have come across in my studies.

Section 18 of the New Zealand Act sets out the process by which money for the purpose is raised:

1. For the purpose of the Advances Office, the Minister of Finance, on being authorized by the Governor in Council so to do, may from time to time raise on the security of and charge upon the public revenue of New Zealand, such sums of money as he deems fit not exceeding in any one financial year the amounts hereinafter specified.

2. The maximum amount that may be raised in any one financial year for the business of the several branches of the Advances Office shall be as follows:

For advances to Settlers branch.. ..	£1,500,000
For the advances to Workers branch ..	750,000
For the advances to Local Authorities.	1,000,000

3. The sum so raised shall bear interest at such rate, not exceeding 5 per cent per annum, as the minister prescribes.

The statement then goes on:

Since the inception of the scheme in 1894, loans have been advanced to 53,228 people amounting to £19,826,-812, of which £12,155,000 has been repaid—

And that is my answer to those who fear the non-repayment of direct government loans.

—leaving outstanding, £7,670,188.

Those figures are as at December 31, 1921. Of the loans outstanding at the above date, 14,166 are for sums not exceeding £500.

In connection with this it may be of interest in passing simply to note the attention given by the government of New Zealand to the necessity of advances direct to workers in that country.

Under the Advance to Workers branch (and a "worker" is defined as a person whose income does not exceed £200), there has been loaned £4,446,685 and under the advances to local authorities branch, there has been loaned out £4,661,000.

I think I have made it clear that when the government, as it eventually must, establishes some system of rural credits in this country, some central agency will be required. Dr. Tory and every other authority who has investigated this question in this and other countries recommend in every case that the control of local credit should ultimately rest in the borrower, but the financial credit should be obtained, by reason of the low rate of interest at which governments may secure it, by the state. I, therefore, urge, for this purpose if for no other, the establishment of a central bank in Canada.

There are other arguments, however, that may be brought forward. There is no doubt that the level of prices against the height or which so many persons in this House and this country groan, can be regulated by discount rates through the agency of a central bank. Let me give you an example of just what I mean. In Canada at this time there is undoubtedly a requirement of credit—financial credit, not real credit. We have all kinds of real credit, but we need financial credit. If we had a central bank established, then by lowering the rate of interest and making easy the securing of loans for proper development purposes, we could put to work every man in this country, we could start the wheels of industry running, we could re-establish our agricultural population and we could place our business east and west in a happier state than it is at this moment. After you had reached the level of consumption, let us call it "the saturation point" of consumption and production, the controlling commission, the body that would control that central bank, could then regulate the rate of interest so as to prevent or discourage further borrowings that could have no other effect than to increase prices. Similarly, if there was an inclination to drop off in production, there could be a lowering of the rate of interest for the purpose of encouraging the borrowings so as to encourage production again. Let me suggest this that before that plan, simple in its theory, difficult in its practice, can be carried out, it will be necessary that more attention be turned to the development of the consumption power of the people at home rather than the placing of our goods on foreign markets. That is one principle that will have to penetrate the minds of the people of this country if we are ever going to solve this financial problem. One may ask: When shall we know just when to turn off the credit tap? When the index figures indicate—and certainly it will require a complete Bureau of Statistics to do this—that production has reached saturation, in other words, when everyone is employed that can work or is willing to work, then you can control, turn off the credit tap by a delicate adjustment of the rates thus preserving the productive and consumptive capacity of the country. An effective banking system should be adapted to the peculiar economic needs and conditions of the country concerned. An ideal one should grant security, not only as to bank credits, but to the depositors as well. There is no hope of ensuring that security for depositors under a privately controlled banking system. Such a system must be state controlled. The power must rest in the state. The people in this country are not going to be satisfied to continue under a privately owned, profit making banking business, risking all their deposits without any effective guarantee or protection, and I will deal with that question of protection in a minute, because hon. members, including the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) may question the statement. Let me now remind hon. members that the central banking principle has been applied in such countries as the United States, England, France, Germany, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand and many others, and the preponderance of expert and practical opinion of the world is in its favour. How long is Canada going to wait? Are we everlastingly going to be in this position of straggling along behind? We certainly ought to be proud of our new country and be willing to adopt the new proposals that will so readily adapt themselves to the development of a new country.

The normal resources of Canadian banks are not and never have been sufficient to meet a crisis in this country. They failed to protect adequately credit and otherwise handle the situation in every case where a crisis arose and only exist by virtue of emergency measures that were then taken to tide them over. In 1914, the War Finance Act helped the whole system of Canada from complete, from absolute collapse. No one denies that statement. On January 3, 1919, $82,275,000 worth of Dominion notes were out against securities under that Finance Act. That is an example of the extent to which the rediscounting facilities of the Finance Act were exercised or taken advantage of by the banks. That saved them. In 1907 an absolutely illegal emergency offer of $10,000,000 in Dominion notes was made to the banks and was accepted by them to the extent of $5,000,000. Sir Thomas White himself in dealing with the War Finance Act of 1914 said:

> The act is available and may be brought into operation by the government by order in council in case of war, invasion or panic, real or apprehended.

He also states that the day it was brought into effect such emergency measures were absolutely illegal. True, we have the Finance Act now made permanent, but other crises will arise under private monopoly of banking which will never be met by privately controlled banking, but will have to be met in every case by placing underneath the private financial structure all the credit of the state. Why, therefore, do we hesitate to take over what rightly belongs to ourselves, what always has belonged to the people, something we have alienated from the people by our own act, the sovereign right of the people of this country not only to control their own credit but to control their own issue of currency?

Mr. McMASTER: That is the point.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The application of the War Finance Act which I have been discussing is under the Department of Finance. May I most urgently and sympathetically urge upon the acting minister that the Department of Finance is not qualified for discharging the duties imposed on it under the Finance Act in regard to re-discounting? It owes many other duties to the public which it cannot possibly perform properly while it attempts to perform the exacting requirements of a re-discounting central agency.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George tempts me to touch for a moment or two upon the Canadian banking system. I am sorry to say that I do not share the very favourable opinion which he has expressed of that system. But before I touch on that, let me give the House just one particular instance out of many where a central bank has been of tremendous usefulness to the people. I am referring to the Commonwealth Bank of Australia. In relation to that bank it has been said:

> The private banks there have not been put out of business or destroyed by the establishment of the Commonwealth Bank.

That is my answer to the hon. gentleman when he suggests that we wish to tear down private banks. I have very little use for private banks, but the proposal which I am advocating does not look towards the tearing down of any bank, it looks towards strengthening the banking system and the financial fabric generally. In Australia the private banks met the keenest competition from the Commonwealth Bank, and in an article published in the Bankers' Magazine of New York in 1917, after stating that a general banking business was commenced by the Commonwealth Bank on January 12, 1913, it proceeds:

> About this time the money market was "tight" and the ordinary trading banks were increasing their rates for overdrafts. The advent of a new and powerful competitor, such as the Commonwealth Bank of Australia, with a maximum rate of 6 per cent on overdrafts, therefore had a salutary effect in keeping rates of interest at a reasonable level, and the commercial trading community throughout the whole country has unconsciously received a large measure of benefit from the bank's entrance into the commercial sphere.

One of the first effects therefore in my opinion, of a properly organized central bank in this country, with a flexible low rate of interest, would be to govern rates of interest throughout the country.

Let me remind the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George that when he refers to equal banking facilities east and west he is far from the mark. What rates of interest are charged to industrial concerns and to farmers in eastern and central Canada?

Mr. MARLER: What kind of loans is my hon. friend referring to?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The ordinary banking loans that are made to farmers in eastern Canada?

Mr. MARLER: Banks do not make loans to farmers in eastern Canada on real estate. My hon. friend will find the rate of interest is in all cases compatible with the security and the expense of running the bank in the particular locality.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I most emphatically deny that there is not the grossest discrimination against the agricultural population of western Canada in the matter of financial facilities. I know, and the House knows, that we have to pay banks interest compounded and renewed every three months on notes often supported by chattel mortgages on cattle, at 8, 9, 10 and even 12 per cent interest. In the face of these conditions it can hardly be suggested that equal facilities are afforded to the farmers of the West; it is absurd to say so.

Mr. MARLER: Equal facilities as regards capital.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not understand.

Mr. MARLER: The same amount of capital is available. It is possible that the rate of interest may be more. I was not discussing the question of interest, I was discussing whether capital was sufficiently decentralized in the country, and I contended that capital was available equally both in the East and the West.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, This House may be full of capital, but if one is charged a rate so exorbitant that it makes it valueless to him, it is certainly of no use and might as well not exist. Now why do I not share the very favourable opinion of the hon. member with regard to the branch banking system?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Before the hon. member leaves that question,—does not security influence the rate of interest charged?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): No, it is geography.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, I am afraid it is just whatever can be squeezed out of the borrower. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George said so himself in other words; he stated that private bankers will go wherever they can get the highest rate of interest.

Mr. MARLER: I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I understood the hon. member to say this afternoon that bankers will loan where they can get the best security.

Mr. MARLER: That is altogether different from saying they will loan where they can get the highest rate of interest.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Does not the hon. member think that competition among a number of banks has a tendency to keep down the rate of interest, and that if banking is centralized this tendency will be reversed?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It may be true that in eastern Canada in the large industrial centres where there are great speculative enterprises with friends on the board of directors there will not be competition in the business.

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend is not fair in making that statement.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Turn to the records of the Merchants Bank, turn to the records of the Home Bank, and you will find out whether I am fair or not. Turn to the records of any bank that we have been able to examine under competent authority and you will find my facts are correct; they cannot be contradicted.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I think they are overdrawn so far as eastern Canada is concerned.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not think it is worth while pressing the matter further, the facts are patent in every investigation we have had that was of any value. Turning to the branch bank system, nothing illustrates better the evils of the system than the retarded growth of the western cities and the cities in the Maritime provinces where the natural riches are extensive. Canada has a great and resourceful people, and yet most of her cities and towns are farming and fishing centres, and there is a noticeable lack of industrial enterprise outside our few banking centres. The financial resources of her outlying districts are tapped and brought to a central reservoir, with the result that great centres like Montreal and Toronto profit at their expense.

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend will find that more money is loaned in the West than is received in deposits.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Can my hon. friend produce evidence to prove his statement? We tried to get a definite statement from the president of the Bankers' Association last year in the Banking committee, and we could not. His answer was that it would hurt the banks, and that therefore it was not advisable to disclose it.

Mr. MARLER: I can get it for you.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Dealing with the branch bank system of expansion, let me quote from a speech made at a meeting of bankers in Chicago, held a few years ago, with all the local bankers and many of the principal bankers of the country present. The report of this meeting was printed in the Monetary Times of Toronto, Volume 69, No. 16, of October 20, 1922:

> The branch bank system of expansion is a centralization of money power in a few hands; the American system is one of decentralization of money power, but with organization and mobilization of reserve available to all.

I do not entirely agree with the speaker, regarding the American system, but there is an element of truth in his statement.

> The one is a system of centralization, the other a method of co-operation. The one is a domination of money power by a few, the other an organization of the resources of the many, uniting all independent banks into one cohesive whole.

Again I quote from the same report:

> Branch banking is monopolistic and would ultimately destroy the independent bank system. What branch banking does to the independent bank is demonstrated by the steady decrease of banks in Canada and England. The system means the elimination of the small bank and the concentration of banking power in the hands of the large banks.

Without quoting any further in this matter let me ask the House to visualize the situation. I am not going to say always they do it, but under the present banking system in Canada the few who hold control—and let us not forget that four banks hold seventy per cent of the deposits of the people, the remaining ten hold the balance—these four banks have the power of siphoning from every corner of the Dominion the savings of the people into the two great central reservoirs of credit in Montreal and Toronto. Once they have it there they have the power to do what they like with it, send it where they will, send it out of the country to New Orleans, to Mexico or to Mesopotamia if they want to. The interest of Canada is not properly taken care of under any system of that kind. Remember, Mr. Speaker, I do not blame the bankers for doing this. I blame those who sit here inert in the face of that system.

Mr. VIEN: Will my hon. friend contend that a federal reserve bank would help to relieve the situation?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Certainly, it is relieving it to a great extent.

Mr. VIEN: Did it do it in the United States?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Certainly, it has done it to a great extent.

Mr. VIEN: Has my hon. friend read the speech of Mr. Skelton Williams, who was Controller of Currency in the United States for eight years?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. VIEN: Did he read the speech of Mr. Skelton Williams at Augusta, Georgia, July 14, 1921?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should be very glad to give the hon. member another opportunity of reply. Let me tell him, however, that Professor Skelton Williams has definitely stated that under proper management, if a proper board had stayed in power over the federal reserve system in the United States, the evils which are dealt with in the speech to which my hon. friend refers would never have arisen. It is a question of getting the best men.

Mr. VIEN: Does my hon. friend believe that a federal reserve system would not have to cope with the human element of any directorate in Canada just as it has had to cope with it in the United States?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Certainly, with this one element removed, the element of personal interest and greed, the most vicious element in modern civilization.

Mr. VIEN: And my hon. friend believes that under the system he proposes, that human element would be removed in Canada?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am afraid the fine faculties of the hon. member have not quite grasped my point. Under the system of a central bank we would appoint our own board, non-politicians, men of highest financial standing. You have a parallel in the case of your Canadian National Railway system, why not practise the same policy in the case of the banking system? Appoint the best men that money can get; place them there on salary, not for profit taking, but in the interests of the country.

Mr. MARLER: From Alberta.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not necessarily; the hon. member's remarks are hardly fair. We are simply making an honest effort to meet the situation that has arisen, in Canada. I may say in all fairness that I am not completely enamoured of tinkering with a privately-controlled banking system. I think this proposal however is an evolutionary step in the right direction, but I do not think it will solve the whole credit problem by any means. In countries such as the member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) referred to a moment ago, the United States and elsewhere, the establishment of a central bank, although it has relieved the situation, has not materially changed the general trend of financial control.

Mr. VIEN: Or the rate of interest.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes it has. It has tended towards equalizing the rate of interest all over the United States, especially in connection with agricultural loans.

Mr. VIEN: If my hon. friend will allow me, I may point out that a farmers' bank in Alabama was charged as much as 87½ per cent per annum for the money that they rediscounted at the Federal Reserve Bank.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In Doctor Tory's report it is stated clearly that where a central bank is established to take care of credits there was an evening of the rate of interest all over the agricultural fields of the West and East, and that is one of the things that we recommend. However, in all these countries agricultural and general industrial conditions are almost as bad as, and in many cases worse than they are in Canada. They have not, therefore, succeeded in permanently ensuring prosperity or even costs to agriculture itself. Nor can any system of this kind do so, as long as we recognize private control of the community's credit in the ultimate. The failure has resulted in that under every known system in the final analysis the control of credit itself is in the hands of private individuals and is not being used to the advantage of nations but for profit taking. The day will come, must come, when governments and peoples will realize that money itself is not wealth and should be at the service of a nation's credit instead of, as we have it today, the nation's credit at the mercy of money and those who control it.

So far as we are concerned I do not think there should be any half way measure. The people of this country are sufficiently aroused to the situation, and nothing has so aroused them or can so arouse them as something that touches their pocket-books. They are aroused at this moment and will not rest until some government—if it be not this one, then the next, and it may not be long before there is another—has established some system of complete guarantee for depositors. There must be safety for the money of depositors in this country. The public are expecting it, and no mere inspection such as the Acting Minister of Finance proposes will in my opinion go very far to solve the problem.

So far as the control of finance of this country is concerned, it is to be observed that as few as fourteen men in the Dominion, general managers of fourteen banks, with headquarters in the East, through a system of inter-locking directorates, banks, trust companies, public utilities and so on, control no less than $4,286,000,000 of the wealth of this country, thus dominating to all practical intents and purposes the whole arterial system of the commercial life of Canada. That hold must be broken, if the people are to be saved from future disaster. The present unsatisfactory, expensive and unstable banking system of this country certainly requires, if it is to continue at all, some strengthening agency. Just a step toward complete control of the credit of the people would be taken if we ventured toward the establishing of a central bank—just a step, but an excellent step and one that should be taken. The central bank would be in a much better position to bring about an increase of the purchasing power of the public, a removal of unemployment and a stimulation of industry. I am, as hon. members know, a free trader. I believe in free trade, in international free trade, but I do not believe that free trade alone by any means can solve this problem. We must go further. What is most needed in Canada at the moment is to bring industrial activity to its capacity, to stimulate the buying powers of the nation, and to give employment. Hon. members may ask how this is to be done. I shall not give them my answer, but the answer of Mr. Reginald McKenna, the chairman of the shareholders of the Midland Bank, and not long ago Chancellor of the British Exchequer. He has this to say:

> When national output is below productive capacity, the policy should be to let money out; when production is at a maximum, the outflow of money should be checked, and if inflationary symptoms have appeared, money should be withdrawn. . . . No trade can stand up against a continued decline in the purchasing power of the public. Less money means lower prices or less production, or both, and orders will be withheld so long as there is an expectation that prices will fall.

Let me ask hon. members to pay particular attention to what follows:

> We have deliberately to make up our minds as to what we want. If we mean to get rid of unemployment—

If we mean to give employment to the thousands of immigrants the government is bringing to this country.

> —we must have more money in existence to take up the increased production. . . . Whatever name we give to this expansion of credit, it is indispensable to the proper functioning of our commercial system, and is imperatively needed when trade is deferred and unemployment general.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it will be necessary to add anything further to the speeches of hon. members who have preceded me. Let me, therefore, in conclusion, simply sum up what in my opinion are the weaknesses of the present banking system of this country—weaknesses that can readily be removed by the establishment of a central bank under proper state control.

1. There is no guarantee of deposits. I think there should be a central bank to guarantee them.

Mr. VIEN: Does my hon. friend contend that in any civilized country in the world the government or any central bank guarantees deposits?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The argument of the Bourbon! We must not move from where we are! If other countries have not done it, that is no reason why we should not. If it is good, let us step forward; I argue that it is good, and I await the hon. gentleman's answer.

2. The Bank Act permits every cent of the deposits in any Canadian chartered bank to be taken to redeem the bank notes issued by that bank, bank notes being a first lien on all assets including deposits in the bank which issues them. The depositor, therefore, has a real interest in the "Note Circulation Redemption Fund." All the banks are required to contribute an amount equal to 5 per cent of their average bank note circulation to this fund—Bank Act, Section 64. In the event of a bank becoming insolvent and being unable to liquidate all its bank notes within two months of going into suspension, the notes are liquidated out of this fund and note holders receive interest at the rate of 5 per cent until the notes are paid. The Canadian chartered banks had in circulation in 1922, bank notes to the value of $166,466,109, while the "Note Circulation Redemption Fund," which the poor, unfortunate, gullible public believed in many cases was a real redemption fund, amounted to $6,493,593. Before the contributions of banks other than that of the insolvent bank, to the "Note Circulation Redemption Fund" can be finally applied to payment of notes of an insolvent bank, the depositors of the insolvent bank must suffer a total loss of the money they had deposited in such bank.

3. The Bank Act gives the Dominion government a second lien and the provincial governments a third lien on the assets, including all deposits, in any chartered bank in which such governments have made deposits. In the case of the insolvent Home Bank, the Dominion and provincial governments receive their deposits in full, whereas the ordinary depositor will probably receive only thirty-five to forty cents on the dollar, unless he gets some support from this government. Any special borrowings under the Finance Act of 1914, still in force, also constitute a prior lien ahead of the common depositor.

4. The Bank Act also permits Canadian chartered banks to give preferred security to any of their creditors establishing a further prior lien ahead of the depositors, so a Canadian chartered bank could give a mortgage of its assets, of its real assets at least, and leave nothing for the depositor. The Home Bank is a case in point. Being insolvent, it mortgaged its bank premises, by which act the position of the ordinary depositor was further weakened, since in the winding up of the bank, the creditor holding such mortgage on the bank's premises ranked as "Secured Creditor" whereas the depositor ranked as "Unsecured Creditor."

Mr. MARLER: When the Home Bank mortgaged their property in Toronto, where did the consideration for that mortgage go? They got money in return, and that money went into the bank and was an asset for the depositors.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think a good deal of it went to pay dividends for the shareholders.

Mr. MARLER: That is not a fair answer.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am afraid it is only too true in this case. To continue: According to a pamphlet published by the Canadian Bankers' Association recently, page 15, deposits "are a fourth mortgage" on the assets of the bank. When we go into a bank and deposit our money, we deposit it there for safe keeping, not for speculative purposes. The bank performs a service for which it charges interest, and that money on deposit there becomes only a fourth mortgage, and it is not even a fourth mortgage, because in the case of the bank becoming insolvent the depositor is only an unsecured creditor of the bank—a bank chartered by the Bank Act in which we have deposited our money in good faith for safekeeping.

5. Canadian chartered banks are empowered to receive deposits "without limit." This permits them to incur liabilities to the public without relation to their ability to meet such liabilities out of assets. The Home Bank opened up over thirty new branches and took in over $8,200,000 of new deposits after it had become insolvent. This is possible in any bank, under our Bank Act. There is nothing to prevent any bank from taking in unlimited deposits. It is sometimes not always convenient to do so. Mr. Ford puzzled one bank in the United States by depositing too much money with them.

6. There is nothing in the Canadian Bank Act to prevent a bank from loaning all its funds to one concern, and cases have actually occurred where Canadian chartered banks have loaned an amount greater than their entire capital and reserve to one company. La Banque Nationale, with a combined capital and reserve of $3,400,000, loaned $5,000,000 to La Machine Agricole de Montmagny, which finally placed the bank in a position where it could not any longer carry on, and had it not been for the action of the Quebec government in voting $15,000,000 of the credit of the province of Quebec to assist La Banque Nationale in its merger with La Banque Hochelaga, La Banque Nationale might have gone under and taken La Banque Hochelaga with it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): That was money raised on the public credit, too.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Exactly. Again, the Home Bank with capital and reserve of $2,500,000, made loans to A. C. Frost and Company, which, with accumulated interest, reached the sum of $4,530,000, this account being one of the principal factors in bringing about the insolvency of the Home Bank with heavy loss to the depositors.

7. The relation of share capital to total assets in Canadian chartered banks has shrunk from 11 per cent in 1902, to 4 per cent in 1924.

8. Over 60 per cent of the share capital of Canadian chartered banks is tied up in bank premises—largely buildings, which are of little use in the event of the insolvency of the bank, because they are not suitable for general business purposes.

9. In 1890 Canada had 36 banks; in 1900, 34; in 1913, 24; in 1923, 17; and to-day only 14. Ten years from now, interrogation? The country's credit is given free except for a tax of 1 per cent to banking corporations which are permitted to issue their notes to an amount equal to their paid up unimpaired capital and to charge the public high rates of interest on the bank notes printed by them—paper money, which cost the banks only the expense of printing and handling. Yet among the recipients of this special endowment of the public credit there are those who claim that it would be unjust to use that credit to make good the loss sustained by depositors of insolvent banks. On several occasions special votes of public money have been used to assist banking corporations both individually and collectively; while the depositor who creates wealth and deposits his money in a chartered bank has remained unprotected.

I have earnestly presented my views on the existing banking system and on the question of a central bank. I hope I have convinced the House that it would be the part of wisdom, that it would be the part of reason, to allow the passing of this motion to concur in the recommendation of the committee. It is my only idea that all these matters shall be properly and fully discussed so that the public, and the members of parliament who represent them, may be acquainted with all the facts in connection with them and then that the wisest action, in view of any considerations that arise shall be taken in the interests of our country.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): We are drawing very near to the end of another day and some of us have been educated, some of us have been entertained, and some of us have been exasperated by the debate which has taken place. I have a good deal of sympathy with those who have exhibited exasperation, knowing that they look upon this question from an entirely different viewpoint and feel that much time has been wasted by the discussion of this question. So, in order not to overdo the matter, I wish now to make but a very few observations comparatively speaking. I want to remark that I consider this an epoch-making occasion in the parliament of Canada, and I would not for the world miss this opportunity of taking even a slight part in the discussion. The political life of hon. members is very uncertain indeed. It is perhaps more uncertain for me than for anybody else. I can look into the future somewhat and see the time when the question which has been debated to-night will be considered the pivotal question in the political discussions of this country; and I want to be able to turn up the old Hansards when I am not here and say "Thank God I had enough intelligence to take part on the right side of that issue". That is the first reason why I will not pass this opportunity of saying something.

This is an epoch-making occasion in that we have had this matter brought forward by the newest political group in Canada. The birth of a new economic group, which was announced in the daily press some time ago has now been announced on the floor of the House by concerted action in this debate.

Mr. MARLER: Who is the leader of the group?

Mr. IRVINE: I have been asked "Who is the leader of the group?" I do not consider myself one of the group, I am on the outside co-operating with them in great ideals.

Mr. VIEN: Has the group been named?

Mr. IRVINE: I have not been called upon to christen this child or else I should have solicited a name from the father of it.

Mr. VIEN: What would you call it?

Mr. IRVINE: I am calling it "The Economic Group" representing economic ideals and ideas on the floor of parliament; and I say that if we can take the argument to-day as typical of that intelligence which will characterize the new political movement in Canada I think we may feel very much encouraged. I hope this group may be regarded as typical of that studious, virile intellectuality which—coupled with prophetic insight and devotion to duty—will mark the new political movement and constitute its greatest appeal in the coming years.

Mr. VIEN: Does my hon. friend belong to it?

Mr. IRVINE: I have just pointed out that I have not the honour of belonging to it, but I do have the honour of welcoming it and of feeling that there are in that group minds and spirits with whom I can find at least some political affinity. It is for that reason that I have taken this occasion to refer to the splendid debate which they have inaugurated and carried forward on the floor of the House to-day.

This is an epoch-making occasion in the Canadian parliament in that the debate itself is an evidence that it is dawning on the mind of our time that finance has something to do with industry and commerce, something to do with the standard of living of the people, something to do with poverty, something to do with millionaires, and something to do with every question that touches the economic and commercial life of a nation. It is an evidence that the old political shibboleth has served its day in Canada, and that other questions much more fundamental and much more scientific will be substituted for it and engage the attention of the thinking public. The financial question is the issue, I believe, not only for Canada but for modern civilization. There can be no solution of any of the problems to which we have devoted ourselves throughout this session until we have tackled and solved the central problem of modern civilization which is finance. I am not, of course, entirely convinced that the mere organization of a central bank is indispensable, neither am I absolutely convinced that it, in itself, will constitute a solution of our financial problems; but I am certain it will do good to study the question, and after all that is the extent to which the new political group has gone in this debate today—that parliament might authorize, or permit if you wish, the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce to study this question in relation to the Canadian banking system. I must add that the only reply to the challenge of this group which the government has given has been a portentous silence, with the exception of the interjection of a speech by the chairman of the committee, a remark of about two minutes duration by the Acting Minister of Finance, and an elaborate effort on the part of the member for the two saints—I just forget the name of his constituency—oh, yes, St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler), there has actually been no reply to the argument that has been put forward by the hon. members on this side of the House.

Let me now turn to such arguments as have been advanced by the hon. gentlemen I have mentioned, to see whether the intelligence of this House, judging the question on its merits, will be thrown on the side of these three hon. members opposite who have spoken or whether into the scale with the reasoning of hon. gentlemen of the new political group. The chairman of the committee, speaking against the proposal on its being introduced, suggested that all the information that any hon. member could require was available in the library. I do not know whether that is absolutely true, although I am certain that we have a very fine library. But the same argument, surely, could be advanced with regard to almost any problem that might be brought forward for consideration. Let me point out that we are not merely looking for a wealth of academic information, or for any proposals or any theory; what we want to get are the actual facts surrounding the situation as it now exists in this and other countries in so far as they relate to a central banking system. We want also the facts in connection with the Canadian system of banking in order to see whether it is feasible or practicable to introduce the central banking system in this country.

Mr. VIEN: In addition to the information which is to be found in the library, I took it for granted that the hon. gentleman knew all about the subject.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. IRVINE: I am flattered to be so generously complimented by the hon. gentleman, but I hasten to assure him that I have not yet managed to grasp every detail in the financial situation throughout the entire world. However, we are proceeding as fast as we are able to go in getting such information as we need. But I have not the information that would justify me in concluding, with that same assurance that my hon. friend displays, that a central banking system is not practicable for this country. I was rather amused at the hon. gentleman's anticipation of the argument of hon. gentlemen to my right. The hon. member anticipated in leading the argument against the adoption of concurrence that these gentlemen, in arguing for the establishment of a central banking system for Canada, would submit as a reason that the people of Canada had a great deal of difficulty since the war and had experienced hard times, bank failures and unemployment, and that if we could only get a central banking system, presto!—all these undersirable circumstances, all the difficulties that we have been struggling against would disappear, and everything would be fine. That was the way in which the hon. gentleman anticipated the arguments of my hon. friends to my right. But those of us who listened to the statements that those hon. gentlemen actually made know very well that no such view is held by those who are advocating the study of this question. These gentlemen put their argument rather upon an economic basis, seeking first of all to create an agency by means of which it will be possible to obtain control of the national credit, which is the actual means by which Canada, as well as other countries, does business. Hon. gentlemen made the suggestion that through a central banking system it may be possible to get that control; and they seek to get that control by allowing this central agency to issue national currency, taking from the Bankers' Association the privilege which they have enjoyed so long of issuing their own notes to be redeemed ultimately out of the pockets of the depositors when the banks fail. That is the crux of the argument put forward by hon. members who have supported the request for the extension of the powers of the committee. One other point which hon. gentlemen have advanced has been that the control of the interest rate would be one of the means by which it would be possible to control the tide of inflation and deflation which periodically sweep with devastating force over the industrial and commercial life of the country. Whether or not the claims of hon. gentlemen can be sustained by actual facts and in practice, I am not prepared to say, but that is the argument at all events. Certainly their argument is not the frivolous assumption which the chairman of the committee indulged in.

The Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) gave the House the benefit of an observation which occupied about three minutes of time. I congratulate him on his brevity but certainly not on any comprehensive study of the question. The hon. gentleman assured us that there was no good reason for enlarging the order of reference. He may be right, but we shall require more than a mere casual suggestion from the Acting Minister of Finance to that effect. If he had supported his statement by considered reasons, I think we are competent enough to have followed his argument and to have desisted from engaging the attention of the House; but the minister did not sustain the views he put forward. He referred to an investigation which was held last year, but I would point out that there was no direct inquiry into this question then. Let me point out to the Acting Minister of Finance, however, that he never did anything in regard to the investigation, such as it was, which was held at that time; it was put to no use and no report was submitted; the thing was simply buried. The minister had no reasons to offer, but he concluded by informing the House that the Finance Act was working very well, and that being the case he seemed to imply that it was performing the chief function of a central bank in that it provided for discounting. Let me refer him to the gentleman who he admits is his best adviser, the Deputy Minister of Finance, and who told us in committee the other day that his best judgment was that we should get back to the gold basis. In other words, if we are to take the advice of the Deputy 11 p.m. Minister of Finance we shall do away with the Finance Act which the minister himself declares is working so admirably. It seems therefore that the Acting Minister of Finance and his chief adviser are somewhat at cross purposes so far as this particular question is concerned but even so that is no reason why this motion should be defeated. I desire now to deal briefly with the rather elaborate and detailed argument of the hon. member—

Mr. CARROLL: I rise to a point of order. I submit that the hon. member is not standing strictly by the rules of procedure. As I understand it, there are two or three propositions before the House in the report which has been presented and the hon. member is discussing subjects which are removed from any of the matters which are directly under consideration. I think the scope of the hon. gentleman's remarks should be circumscribed at least to what is relevant. I further object that the committee has no right to report on an order of reference in the manner in which it has been done. A report must first be made according to reference. Such is not the case here.

Mr. IRVINE: I am attempting to answer the argument put forward by a representative of the government, and even if the minister was out of order I suppose the House will permit me nevertheless to reply to the points he has made. I do not say that my remarks are all strictly relevant, but a certain point having been brought forward by my opponents and admitted as argument leaves no other choice to me but to smite it.

Mr. CARROLL: There are two or three propositions before the House with certain recommendations from the committee and if hon. gentlemen are to enter upon a discussion of questions relating to mining, commerce, soldier's civil re-establishment, and other matters of a like nature it seems to me that the debate is likely to get out of hand. The hon. member, I submit, should confine his remarks as closely as possible to a discussion of the report as it has been submitted to the House. I am bringing this to your attention, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose solely of curbing hon. members like my hon. friend in their endeavours to make a speech which will go abroad rather than a speech which will be instructive to members of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am quite sure the hon. gentleman will generally observe the rules. I must say that the discussion throughout the day has taken a very wide range, because the question before the House, if it were carried into effect would, from what I understand of it, affect the whole economy of our banking system. Therefore, naturally it opens very wide the discussion of the subject matter. I am quite sure, however, that hon. members in discussing the question at this late hour will confine themselves to the question before the House and not wander away too much.

Mr. IRVINE: I am glad to know that my hon. friend is anxious about a speech that will go abroad in this matter.

Mr. CARROLL: I still rise to a point of order. I am quite willing that my hon. friend should discuss the Bank Act, but I still persist in insisting that there are three or four questions before the House as a reference from the Banking and Commerce committee. I am going to insist now, since my hon. friend gets sarcastic about the matter, that he be confined within the terms of those three propositions.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I stated a moment ago, this is a very important question which affects the whole economy of the banking system and which naturally goes to the very root of our whole banking organization in this country. I cannot stop an hon. member who, I am sure, is quite willing and who desires to bring forward the best arguments to support his viewpoint. I am certain he will live up to the traditions of the House, that he must confine himself to the subject matter. So far, in my humble opinion, I do not see that he is out of order.

Mr. IRVINE: When my genial and loquacious friend interrupted me, I was coming to the argument of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. CARROLL: No more loquacious than my hon. friend is.

Mr. IRVINE: I am sure that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George will be as genial in listening to my comment on his arguments as I was in taking his from him. He is, of course, always very genial and honourable in debate. On this occasion, however, he reminded me of a huge Atlantic liner surrounded by a very thick fog. There was a consciousness that there were dangers somewhere ahead, but she tooted the whistle and sailed on disregarding entirely the dangers that lay ahead. He emphasized the point that 22 members out of the 90 voted that this resolution be placed before parliament. The question is: Where were the 90—the ninety and nine that safely played cards or were somewhere else? I do not know. Twenty-two were on their job doing their duty.

Mr. VIEN: Will my hon. friend allow me to correct him? He knows it is unfair to members of the committee to say that. Several other committees were sitting at the same time, the committee on Private Bills, the committee on Railways, and we had all the difficulty in the world to get members present at our committee because other committees were sitting. It is unfair to say that hon. members were playing cards while the Banking and Commerce committee were sitting. They were busy on other committees of which they were members.

[Mr. Carroll.]

Mr. IRVINE: I certainly do not wish to impute anything to any hon. member that I would not take to myself. But why did the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George raise that point?

Mr. VIEN: If I remember well, he said that only twenty-two voted for it against 7 who opposed it. That means twenty-nine members out of ninety who are members of the committee voted on that question. But he did not insist on the suggestion that the other members were playing cards.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not insist on it either I did not say what they were doing. I mentioned a number of things which they might have been doing. I did not say that any hon. member was playing cards.

Mr. VIEN: My hon. friend is unfair in that reference.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I rise to a point of order. I was a member of the Banking and Commerce committee, and it was not my privilege to vote on that question, but I deeply resent the unwarranted remark which the hon. member has just made. I was engaged on other committees. It is altogether out of keeping with the decorum which the hon. member usually keeps to make such an insinuation.

Mr. IRVINE: I have taken back twice the insinuation that my hon. friends took from my remark, and I now take it back a third time. I would not think of imputing it to my hon. friend, although I would not say it was a great crime if he did play cards. As a matter of fact, I think we ought all to have a game after this discussion in order to get this contentious subject out of our heads. I did not mean to insinuate anything wrong to any hon. member. The twenty-two members were there, however, and this was the finding. They represented the committee at that time.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George charged, I think, that the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) was out of order in his discussion, because the only question for discussion was whether or not the reference should be enlarged, whereas the hon. member for West Calgary had argued as regards the whole banking system.

Mr. MARLER: I did not say that the hon. member for West Calgary was out of order. He was not out of order. We are always delighted to hear him.

Mr. IRVINE: I know he was not out of order, but my hon. friend used those words.

Mr. MARLER: I never said so.

Mr. IRVINE: I was, however, glad that my hon. friend came back to the point and said that it was a question on whether this parliament would authorize the committee to study the subject. If parliament is considering authorizing the committee to study the question, that opens up the whole question of the financial system of Canada and the United States and in any other country having a central bank of issue.

Mr. VIEN: If my hon. friend will allow me—

Mr. IRVINE: If the hon. members wish me to finish anywhere this side of one o'clock, they had better let me go on. I do not object to questions, but I have a great deal of sympathy with hon. members who have to listen to me.

Mr. VIEN: If my hon. friend will allow me, he will agree to the fact that the report of the committee was obtained on a "snap" vote, on a vote which was taken at a moment when only 29 members out of 90 were present in the committee, the other members being busy elsewhere.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not know whether it was a "snap" vote or not. I certainly do know there was not much snap shown by my hon. friend in bringing the recommendation before the House. In this regard it took my hon. friend about four weeks to "snap." I am not concerned about the nature of the vote. I had nothing to do with that, neither had this House. It was reported as a majority vote, and that is all we have to do with it.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George apparently assumed that we wanted to transplant the American banking system into Canada merely because we asked to be allowed to consider the establishment of some type of central reserve bank. Now, it might not at all be fatal to transplant the American financial system over here. I am not sure about that. I think it is absurd to claim that a system which functions to serve a hundred million people could not serve nine million. But that is not really the argument. The argument is that we are seeking to consider some type, and all types for that matter, of a central banking system to see whether we can devise one that will be suitable to this country. That is the issue. But my hon. friend went on to describe in detail the functions of a bank. As he described them they are briefly these: First, to issue notes; second, to take deposits; third, to give elasticity of circulation; fourth, to give elasticity of credits. If these were the functions of a bank, our system performs them very well. That is to say, our banks issue notes—and they do it gladly; they take deposits—and sometimes they keep them; they certainly have great elasticity of circulation—when they want to; and they have great elasticity of credits— when it suits them; and they can contract it just as easily. Yes, if that constitutes the functions of a banking system, I agree with my hon. friend that we do not need any central reserve bank to facilitate these functions. But he might just as well have described a ship as being something that functions: first, to exhibit a figurehead; second, to be driven by steam; third, to be guided by a rudder; and fourth, to toot a whistle! That is a parallel description of my hon. friend's argument respecting the banking system. These things mentioned by him do not constitute the functions of a bank, they constitute the phases of a function. The main function of a banking system was entirely missed by my hon. friend. I repeat, if these were the functions of a bank, I would consider the introduction of a central reserve bank of no assistance to do these things, because they are very well done already.

The hon. member contended that the central banking system of the United States is entirely unsuited for Canada. He has so decided already. Then he points to the report of Mr. Skelton Williams and enumerates for us the phases of a central banking system. Then he tells us that we already have that system in Canada. After he has said that that system is entirely unsuited to Canada, he turns around and proves that we have every phase of it now! I cannot follow my hon. friend's reasoning.

Mr. MARLER: Let my hon. friend be fair.

Mr. IRVINE: Yes.

Mr. MARLER: Really he is acting as a contortionist. He is very amusing, in fact he is making a burlesque of the subject, but this is a serious debate.

Mr. IRVINE: I am glad to be informed by my hon. friend that he was not serious when he was speaking; I really did think so, and was trying to answer his argument in the same tone in which I assumed it was presented. If he was not serious, then I do not need to say any more about it. Let me hasten to conclude. All we are asking in this resolution is that parliament permit the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce to study this question. Are my hon. friends afraid of what such a study may bring forth? If it should reveal that a central banking system is as impracticable, as dangerous, as inadequate as hon. members on the other side of the House have said it is, then surely we will not attempt to introduce it, and there can come nothing but good from seeking information. All we are asking is that the select standing committee be authorized to seek information. I trust that such authority will be given.

Mr. VIEN: You have it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the House the importance of really trying to ascertain what is the opinion of hon. members as to what ought to be done having regard to the absolute essentiality of some policy, some direction from the government. Surely the government now see what the result of a discussion at large is upon this matter. They see the different views presented—and many of them are reasonable—and they also see the conflict of some of those views. For example, on the one hand they see that it is the considered opinion of hon. gentlemen, supported by authority, that dear goods simply means cheap money; on the other hand, they are told, also supported by authority, that the answer to low prices and poor business is merely more money—cheap money. They see that we can get from financial authorities, from financial writers at any rate, a circle that will take this government back to just where it started. Surely the country is entitled to at least a little bit of decision from the government, for after all this is governmental business, this is not a merely idle academic debate. On May 21 this decision was arrived at; on July 2 the House gets an opportunity of debating it. What an idle opportunity it is! I do not like to see the House attempting idle things. What would happen if this resolution is to-day adopted? Does anyone think that in the expiring days of this session the question can be studied and settled? We all know it is nonsense to think so; it cannot be done. Hon. gentlemen wanted a discussion. They no doubt had a right to that discussion under the arrangement come to. But why did not the discussion take place when we could have done something useful with it?

Mr. VIEN: Will my hon. friend allow me a correction? Even if this motion had been discussed on May 21, the Banking and Commerce committee could not have considered a study of the question. The committee have sat for about twenty-three days, and they still have twenty-two more resolutions to consider before they can come to this question, even if it be referred to them by the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the committee might have thought this would be more important than some of the other twenty-two resolutions.

Mr. VIEN: I do not believe it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It may be that the committee are trying to do so much themselves to-day that nothing will be done in regard to this resolution. But it is only a matter of regret, if we spread ourselves out so thin as to try to cover the whole universe. It is perfectly idle to say that anything can be done to-day. I am going to vote against the report because I do not believe in parliament doing idle things. What will be the effect of the vote? To say that during the few days that remain to us among twenty-two other resolutions this resolution may be considered is tantamount to admitting the futility of instructing the committee, for the committee ceases just as soon as this House ceases.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): When is it going to cease?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, I hope we are not going to stay here indefinitely and permanently. That is the last thing in the world that the country wants. I think a lot of people in the country have the idea that they are getting worse legislation from this House than they would have got if there were no House at all, and that we would be pleasing them best if we got away just as soon as we could. I am inclined to believe that that is what the general public think. Nevertheless these are important questions and questions which should be considered when there is opportunity to consider them. I doubt very much whether this matter is in order at all. I did not want to raise the point until the discussion was over because I wanted my hon. friends to have the opportunity of placing their views before the House. But the report on this question of inspection is in, and I think as a matter of order that the instructions are now discharged and if anything is to be done it must be a new committal to the committee. We might just as reasonably ask that we should have another Speech from the Throne.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Desaulniers), which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. CARROLL: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). While I am not in a position to say how he would have voted on the question, had I voted I would have voted against the recommendation of the committee.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

Mr. G. H. BOIVIN (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to-night, in accordance with notice given, to move that the first report of the select standing committee to supervise the Official Report of Debates be concurred in. But when this motion was brought up the other day and the unanimous consent of the House was asked, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) objected. I see that the right hon. gentleman is not in his seat at the moment. I do not know whether he is in the building or not, but if he is not here I would defer until to-morrow the presentation of the motion and substitute therefor a motion which merely covers the last part of the report, to which the right hon. leader of the opposition is quite agreeable. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Logan:

That the following questions be referred to the select standing committee on Debates for the purpose of considering the same and reporting their opinion thereon to the House, viz:—

1. Whether Hansard should be a record of debates only, containing such items of the proceedings of the House as may be necessary to make the report of the debates intelligible, or whether it should contain all the proceedings of the House as well as the record of debates.

2. Whether it is desirable, in the interests of economy of time, labour and expense, that the report of the debates in Hansard should be limited to such speeches as may be delivered when Mr. Speaker is in the chair, with or without a brief report of the proceedings in committee.

3. Whether it is desirable to make Hansard an official record of all the proceedings of the House of Commons, as well as a record of the debates.

I understand that even to move this motion I would have to have unanimous consent, but I already have the consent of the hon. leader of the opposition.

Motion agreed to.

REDISTRIBUTION COMMITTEE

CHANGE IN MEMBERSHIP

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the order of "Motions," with the consent of the House, I beg to move that the name of Mr. McGiverin be substituted for that of Hon. Thomas Low as a member of the Redistribution committee.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): This motion is certainly a surprise to some of the members of this committee.

Mr. Low has been chairman of the sub-committee for Ontario, and during the past two sessions we have been endeavouring to bring about a scheme of redistribution for that province. If this motion means that Mr. Low's services are no longer at the disposal of the committee, and we have to begin over again, it does not augur very well for a redistribution scheme being passed at the present session.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SALES TAX REBATES

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. To what amount have rebates of sales taxes been claimed under the legislation of last year?
2. How many claims have been made?
3. How many claims have been checked and paid and resulting in what total amount?
4. How many claims have yet to be dealt with?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU: May I ask my hon. friend to let this stand? The commissioner does not know exactly what rebates he will have; or we might drop the question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Better let it stand, and I will find out.

POST OFFICE EMPLOYEES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What amount of money has been spent by the government to test the validity of the Industrial Disputes Act in the law courts to date in order to compel the appointment of a board of conciliation for the Hydro-electric employees at Toronto, and has any appeal been taken, or to be taken, to the Privy Council on the subject?
2. Has the government refused a similar board of conciliation to the Post Office employees as not coming within the act?
3. What conciliation was used by the government, if any, to adjust the Post Office strike?

Hon. Mr. MURDOCK:

1. The government did not undertake to test the validity of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act in the law courts.

The facts as understood are that on the advice of the member of parliament for North Toronto and others, the Toronto Hydro-Electric Commission protested the formation of a Board of Investigation, which had been applied for June 25 and established July 24, 1923, and later secured an injunction from Mr. Justice Orde to restrain the board from sitting.

Later Mr. Justice Mowat disagreed with the decision of Mr. Justice Orde, but instructed that the case be carried to the Appeal Court of Ontario which later, by a judgment of four to one, decided that the Toronto Hydro-Electric Commission and Mr. Justice Orde were in error in the injunction sought and granted.

It is understood that an appeal from the decision of the Appeal Court of Ontario which sustained the action of the department in forming a board, has been taken to the Privy Council. In the meantime the board has not been permitted to function.

The cost of protecting the Department of Labour's rights under the conditions referred to above has to date been $7,297.05, which amount in whole or in part may be salvaged as the latest decision assesses costs against the Toronto Hydro-Electric Commission.

2. No application for a board was received by the Registrar of Boards of Conciliation.

The Minister of Labour advised certain persons inquiring, that a Board of Investigation would not be granted to determine whether Post Office employees' salaries, established by the Civil Service Commission and approved by the Governor-in-Council, in accordance with the law, should or should not be revised.

It is definitely held that government employees do not, and were not, intended to come within the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, but that the compensation of civil servants is, under the law, specifically established by a separate commission.

3. Early in the month of April 1924, members of the government on several occasions covering a period of two weeks or more met with officers of the Postal Workers Federation on account of the threatened strike of postal workers to be made effective about April 15, unless prior to that date the salaries of postal workers had been dealt with and revised by the Civil Service Commission. The government also intimated to the Civil Service Commission the desirability of proceeding as promptly as possible to revise the salaries of all of the branches of the government service, giving first consideration to the revision of the postal workers salaries.

These matters were also discussed with the government Board of Audit. Later the Civil Service Commission presented to the government its proposed revision of postal workers salaries, and that revision appearing to be less acceptable than proposals for salary revision which had been made by Post Office Department officials, the proposed revision of the Civil Service Commission was referred back to that body with a request that further consideration be given to the various representations that had been made, and that additional opportunity be given to the representatives of postal workers and department officers to present their respective views or claims to the Civil Service Commission. The Board of Audit were also requested to give careful consideration to the salary revision for postal workers, and later the Board of Audit made known to the government its recommendations as to salary revision, which was found to be in respect to some fifteen classifications slightly higher or better than those which had been proposed by the Civil Service Commission.

The government therefore requested that the Civil Service Commission give further consideration to this matter, and for that purpose had before them the Civil Service Commission and the Board of Audit.

On June 9 the Governor in Council gave consideration to the Civil Service Commission's final report to the government on postal workers' salary revision, which was the third report to the government that had been made by the Civil Service Commission in this matter, although there was no difference in the rates of compensation proposed in either of the three reports.

On the same date a copy of the Civil Service Commission's report, as approved by the Governor in Council, was handed to the officers of the Postal Workers Federation.

No further word or representations were received from officers of the Postal Workers Federation until the morning of June 17, when a telegram dated June 16 was received by the Minister of Labour from Mr. G. R. Jackson, President of the Postal Workers Federation reading:

Postal situation developing more serious parliament can and should immediately right a wrong. Let me hear from you.

Reply was within the hour sent to Mr. Jackson as follows:

Your telegram of last evening will be brought before government to-day.

And on the same day, June 17, the matter was discussed by the government, and suggestion made that the Minister of Labour should communicate with the Postal Workers committee at Toronto to suggest that they come to Ottawa for conference with members of the government.

On the afternoon of June 17, the Minister of Labour by long distance telephone suggested to Chairman G. R. Jackson, of the Postal Workers Federation that the committee should come to Ottawa, and on that evening the committee representing the postal workers left Toronto, arriving in Otttawa on the morning of June 18.

On June 18, the postal workers committee were in the Minister of Labour's office from about 10.40 a.m. until 1 p.m. discussing with four members of the government the conditions of dissatisfaction said to exist and the objections filed by the postal workers against the revision of salaries that had been given to the committee on June 9.

It was discovered at this conference that the Postal Workers Federation had before leaving Toronto on the evening of June 17 authorized a Dominion-wide strike of all postal workers to become effective as of 5 p.m. on the evening of June 18.

At 1 p.m. on June 18, the conference in the Minister of Labour's office adjourned to permit the four members of the cabinet to discuss in council the situation as it had developed, and at 3.10 p.m. on June 18 the conference between the postal workers and members of the cabinet again met in the Minister of Labour's office, and the postal workers were given the following letter:

June 18, 1924.

Mr. J. E. ARCHER,
Secretary, Canadian Federation of Postal Employees,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir,

This acknowledges receipt of a copy of your letter of even date addressed to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister advising him that:

"Acting on the wishes of the membership of the organizations concerned, as expressed in a Dominion-wide ballot, a general strike in the Postal Service has been called to commence at five o'clock this afternoon."

After discussion of this matter with the government, I am authorized to state that we regret the decision arrived at by your committee, and it is a matter of additional regret that your committee have not prior to this date officially indicated to the government your dissatisfaction with the recent salary revision for postal workers as authorized by the Civil Service Commission and the government.

Since the receipt of your letter of even date, a sub-committee of the cabinet has had the opportunity of discussing these matters at some length with your committee and have heard the views of your committee that further consideration should be given to the claims of the postal employees by the government.

In connection with this matter the Prime Minister in parliament yesterday stated as follows:

"We are prepared. when the Civil Service Commission has submitted its report upon the salaries of the entire civil service, to consider that report carefully in the light of all the material which we have before us and to make to parliament, if we think it advisable so to do, recommendations supplementing those which are contained in the report of the Civil Service Commission. But we do not feel that we are in a position to make any recommendations to parliament at the present time with respect to the postal employees; and I hope that the employees of the Post Office Department will see that the position which the government is taking is one which is in the interests of the entire civil service of the country and in the interests of the taxpayers as well."

We also in discussion of this date learned of the dissatisfaction of the postal employees due to the fact that in certain cases the present salary plus 1924 bonus was higher than certain rates proposed by the Civil Service Commission for the same class of employees, and I am authorized to state that in the case of employees whose revised rates, as determined by the Civil Service Commission are less than the former rate plus 1924-25 bonus, such bonus shall be continued until salary revision for the entire service has been consummated.

I am further authorized to say that in carrying out the plan and action proposed by the Prime Minister in the above quoted paragraph, that the government policy is that when the Civil Service Commission has submitted its report upon the salaries for the entire civil service, that opportunity will be given to the representatives of the employees in the Postal Department or in other departments of the government who have objections to file against salary revision proposed by the commission to fully present their views to a sub-committee of the government and to discuss such matters of differences as fully as may be necessary to ensure a thorough understanding, and, it is hoped a final and satisfactory agreement on the points in dispute.

I trust that your committee will at once take the necessary action to see that continuous operation of the Postal Service is maintained.

CHARLES STEWART,
Acting Postmaster General.

At 4 p.m. on June 18, members of the government withdrew from the Minister of Labour's office, leaving the postal workers committee in conference to determine their further action, and at 4.45 p.m. the Minister of Labour rapped on the door and advised the postal workers committee that 5 o'clock was only fifteen minutes distant and that some decision should be made as to whether the strike ordered for 5 p.m. was or was not to take place.

At 4.56 p.m. the postal workers agreed that the strike order for 5 p.m. that date would be set back for 24 hours, and at once by long distance telephone and otherwise, from the Minister of Labour's office, the committee undertook to advise their local representatives at Toronto and elsewhere that the postponement of the strike order had been determined upon by the general committee at Ottawa.

During the evening of June 18 for two or three hours the postal workers committee were in the office of the Acting Postmaster General at the House of Commons with members of the government endeavouring to set back for 24 hours the strike, which had in many places, as a result of previous orders given, taken effect in some towns and cities of Ontario and at other points.

On the evening of June 18 the postal workers' committee left for Toronto, and during the next day efforts were still made by the government to secure an adherence to the understandings reached the previous day that the strike would be held in abeyance for 24 hours.

[Mr. Murdock.]

About 4.30 p.m. on the afternoon of June 19 the Minister of Labour was called by long distance phone from Toronto by Mr. J. E. Archer, who advised that he had resigned his position as secretary of the Postal Workers' Federation, and that he was returning at once to Hamilton to insist that the postal workers at that point should return to duty and permit the government to carry out the understanding and proposals that had been made in letter of the previous day which had been addressed to him as Secretary of the Postal Workers Federation, the result being that shortly thereafter Hamilton postal workers returned to duty, although during the time they had been out on strike some 130 men had been employed in the postal service.

Before the postal workers committee left Ottawa they had been advised by the Acting Postmaster General that as they had earnestly endeavoured to set back the strike for 24 hours it would not be held that the strike was in effect until the committee definitely advised him that such was the case.

Late on the evening of June 19 advice was received from Mr. G. R. Jackson, President of the Postal Workers Federation that a strike of postal employees had been authorized and made effective as of 5 p.m. on the 19th, although as a matter of fact the strike had been effective in Toronto and at some other points for 24 hours prior to that time.

Efforts at conciliation then ceased, as it became then a question of determining whether the government or striking postal employees were in charge of the mail facilities.

SICK MARINERS' DUES

Mr. STEVENS:

1. What amount of money was received last year from sick mariners' dues?

2. What is the total amount of money received at the port of Vancouver?

3. What is the total amount of money received in Canada from this source?

4. What is the total amount of money received from this source since 1870?

5. What was the total expenditure for last year at the port of Vancouver?

6. What was the total expenditure for last year in the whole of Canada?

7. What is the total expenditure since the year 1870?

8. Are receipts from this kept in separate account; if so, what amount remains to the credit of the account at the present time?

9. How many hospitals are maintained by the government and where are they located?

10. What was the cost of operation of each hospital during the last year?

11. Does the United States government levy a tax of six cents per ton on all vessels arriving from Canada, or from points in Canada where two cent sick mariners' due is charged?

Hon. Mr. BELAND:

1. $172,319.15 received during fiscal year ended March 31, 1924.
2. $37,211.50.
3. $172,319.15.
4. $3,206,190.83 received during the fiscal years 1869-70 to 1923-24, inclusive.
5. $15,791.
6. $109,793.02. In addition to this, accounts received prior to March 31, 1924, and paid from the appropriation for 1924-25 totalled $9,095.30.
7. The expenditure for treatment of sailors from 1869-70 to 1923-24, inclusive, totalled $2,988,850.26. This amount does not include anything for the cost of administering the act at Ottawa or anything for salaries for the collectors of customs who collect the sick mariners' dues in addition to their other duties.
8. The receipts are deposited to the consolidated revenue fund and the expenditure is paid out of the moneys parliament appropriates for this purpose.
9. Two: Sydney, N.S., and Lunenburg, N.S.
10. Sydney, $7,716.37. Lunenburg, $3,418.54.
11. No information.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

PAYMENTS FOR HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. KENNEDY (West Edmonton):

1. What is the total amount paid by the Dominion government for harbour improvements at each of the following ports: Halifax, St, John, Quebec, Montreal, Fort William, Port Arthur, Vancouver, Prince Rupert, Fort Nelson (a) by way of loan; (b) otherwise?
2. What is the total amount paid by the Dominion government since confederation for all other harbour improvements, such as wharfs, piers, breakwaters, jetties, dredging or other harbour and river improvements in each of the nine provinces; and (a) what percentage of the work done is estimated as permanent; (b) what percentage must be renewed annually; (c) what percentage must be renewed every five years; (d) what percentage must be renewed every ten years?

AGREEMENT WITH THE CITY OF OTTAWA

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution.

Resolved, That is it expedient to provide that the Minister of Public Works may, on behalf of His Majesty, enter into an agreement with the corporation of the city of Ottawa, extending for a period of one year from the first day of July, 1924, the provisions of the agreement between His Majesty and the said corporation dated 30th March, 1920, and set out in the schedule to chapter 15 of the statutes of 1920.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. JACQUES RUREAU (Minister of Customs and Excise) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Department of Customs and Excise Act and to place the administration of the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, and amendments, and the Income War Tax Act, 1917, and amendments, under the Department of Customs and Excise, and to provide for the constitution of an advisory board to investigate and study various modes of taxation with a view to simplifying and improving the existing systems.

He said: His Excellency the Governor in General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

CONTRACT FOR STEEL RAILS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): I would ask whether, as reported, the government has awarded a contract for steel rails to the British Empire Steel Corporation and if so, especially in view of the conditions of unemployment that prevail, an arrangement has been made for that company to adopt the eight hour day on such contract?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways): The government has no knowledge of the letting of any contract to the British Empire Steel Corporation. It may be that the management of the Canadian National Railways has let such a contract, but if so I have no information concerning it.

GRAIN INQUIRY COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Medicine Hat): When may we expect the report of the Royal Grain Commission? And is it the purpose of the government to go on with the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with reference to the loan of money to the Vancouver Harbour Board before that report is received?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways): I will make inquiry and ascertain when the report is likely to be brought down. I should imagine it will be a few days anyway.

BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX ACT, 1916

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, that the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, and amendments, shall be construed and have effect and be deemed to have had effect since its enactment without lapse or interruption as if section twenty-six thereof when first enacted had provided as follows:—

"The provisions of section three of this act shall not continue in force after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and twenty; and anything enacted inconsistent therewith shall be deemed to have been superseded, amended or repealed, as the circumstances may require, and all taxes, interest and penalties payable under the said act and amendments shall remain a tax owing to His Majesty until fully paid and satisfied.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 219, respecting the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, and reported.

Mr. ROBB: I move that the bill be read the third time.

Mr. GARDINER: I have no objection to this particular bill receiving the third reading now, but I would respectfully remind the government that it is not desirable to carry the third readings of bills that have not been printed. We have had an experience of this in past years towards the end of the session, and the plan is not a wise one.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend would rather not proceed—

Mr. GARDINER: I have no objection to this particular bill being read the third time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

REFUNDING LOAN $300,000,000

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 217, to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the public service.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. (Thursday).

[Mr. Graham.]

Thursday, July 3, 1924.

The House met at three o'clock.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo) presented the fourth report of the select standing committee to which was referred for consideration and for report to the House the estimates of the Canadian National Railways and Canadian Government Merchant Marine, recommending that item No. 138 of the estimates, providing an amount of $900,000 by way of loan to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, be passed by the House, and also making certain recommendations with regard to the following services of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine: the Atlantic service; the Pacific service; the Atlantic-Pacific service, via Panama; the Great Lakes service.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

Mr. G. H. BOIVIN (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the select standing committee to supervise the Official Report of Debates beg leave to present the following as their second report:

Your committee recommend that for the balance of the present session of parliament and for all subsequent session until otherwise ordered by the House, an additional copy of the Votes and Proceedings be supplied to every member, said copy to be distributed daily when issued through the post office of the House of Commons.

The whole respectfully submitted.

GEO. H. BOIVIN,
Chairman.

If I may have the unanimous consent of the House I beg to move that the second report of the committee to supervise the Official Report of Debates, presented to the House this day, be now concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Motion agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. H. B. McGIVERIN (Ottawa) presented the seventh report of the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

REPORT

Fifteenth annual report of the Civil Service Commission of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Copp.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 218 (from the Senate), to change the name of La Banque d'Hochelaga to "Banque Canadienne Nationale".—Mr. Mercier.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ADMINISTRATOR OF MANITOBA

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. Who has been appointed Administrator of the province of Manitoba for the period of the absence of the Lieutenant-Governor?
2. On whose recommendations?
3. Is the appointee the Chief Justice of the province and if not, why was the Chief Justice passed over?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. Hon. Thomas G. Mathers, Chief Justice of King's Bench Division.
2. The hon. Solicitor General.
3. There was no intention of nor reason for passing over the Chief Justice of Manitoba in making the appointment.

LAMBTON AND KENT—OIL

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. Has the Geological branch of the Mines Department, or any other department, conducted an investigation as to the conditions of the oil industry in the counties of Lambton and Kent?
2. Has a report been made by Dr. Hume dealing with the said oil industry or in an way relating to the production of crude petroleum in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have been waiting to give an oral statement with respect to this question. Dr. Hume visited the oil fields, but not for the purpose of making geological investigations. We have a private letter from him written to the deputy minister, and there will be a report from Dr. Hume upon this oil field this year. He has instructions to make such a report.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do I understand that it is merely a private letter?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How can it be private about public business?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The letter is of a private character. It was not intended to be used by the department or anyone else.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Probably that is more nearly correct.

WATERHEN LAKE DRAINAGE SCHEME

Mr. KNOX:

1. What is the total cost to date of the Waterhen Lake Drainage scheme?
2. How much of this amount is attributable to engineers' salaries and expenses?
3. How many acres were reclaimed irrespective of previous existing hay lands?
4. How much of this land is now leased, and to whom?
5. What is the annual rental and for how long does the lease run?
6. Does the government intend to make any further expenditure on this project? If so, for what purpose?
7. At whose request was the work undertaken?
8. How is the land to be disposed of when the present lease expires?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1. $179,410.21.
2. $12,248.17.
3. 13,881 acres.
4. Names and acreage are as follows: Messrs. Balcovske and Wadlinger, 5,270; J. Guillet, 105; R. Peterson, 142; E. M. Pearce, 93; W. Skene, 148; L. Barbey, 30; M. Welsh, 55. Total 5,843 acres.
5. To avoid the expense that would be entailed in conducting comprehensive experiments extending over a number of years to ascertain and establish the agricultural suitability of the reclaimed land, the department decided to lease portions of the dewatered areas to the above named, who have undertaken to carry out all the necessary research work without expense to the department. These lessees pay the usual lease rental rate of two cents per acre. The lease of Messrs. Balcovske and Wadlinger runs for ten years, and the other leases for five years.
6. The only further expenditure to be made is for the purchase of the land required for the right of way of the drainage canal over private land. The amount involved will approximate $2,000.
7. In the working out of the Soldier Settlement scheme, it became apparent that there was a shortage of free land suitable for homesteading within reasonable distance of transportation facilities. It having been brought to the attention of the administration that the Waterhen Lakes Drainage scheme offered exceptional advantages for demonstrating the feasibility of reclaiming Dominion land by drainage and especially in view of the fact that the project is situated only a very short distance from the railway, the department decided to proceed with the project under the provisions of the Reclamation Act and the Dominion Drainage Regulations.
8. By public auction in accordance with the provisions of part IV of the Dominion Drainage regulations.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. SPEAKMAN:

1. Is the Vancouver Harbour Commission empowered by act of parliament to issue bonds or debentures to persons other than the Dominion government?
2. If so, when was this act passed?
3. Have bonds or debentures issued to the public priority as to payment of interest or principal over those held by the Dominion government?

4. If bonds or debentures have been issued by the Harbour Commission to the public, through what bond house, or houses, were such sales made?
5. Were tenders invited in connection with each issue?
6. What is the total amount of such issue offered for sale?
7. What amount, if any, of such issue has been actually sold?
8. What price was received?
9. For what term do such issues run?
10. What rate of interest do they carry?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.
2. 1913; 3-4 George V., chapter 54.
3. No.

4 to 10 inclusive. All outstanding bonds or debentures issued by the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners are held by Dominion government as security for advances on loan made in pursuance of the various statutes in that behalf.

PAYMENT TO THE TORONTO GLOBE

Mr. CHAPLIN:

What amount was paid by the Department of Trade and Commerce to the Globe Newspaper Company of Toronto for a full page advertisement that appeared in that paper during the month of December, 1923, or the month of January, 1924?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING (for Mr. LOW):

Advertising, $488; reprints, $15.90; total, $503.90.

DATE OF PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLING

Hon. Mr. BAXTER:

1. In the opinion of the government, is it possible and desirable for parliament to assemble in the future early in January, preferably on a permanent date?
2. Is it the intention of the government to endeavour to approximate a fixed date for the assembling of parliament?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The date of the assembling of parliament is necessarily contingent upon many circumstances none of which can be foreseen; the fixing of a permanent date for assembling is therefore inadvisable. The government is, however, of the opinion that it is desirable, circumstances permitting, for parliament to assemble as early in the year as may be possible.

2. Answered by the answer to No. 1.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

SALES TAX REBATES

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. To what amount have rebates of Sales Taxes been claimed under the legislation of last year?
2. How many claims have been made?
3. How many claims have been checked and paid and resulting in what total amount?
4. How many claims have yet to be dealt with?

[Mr. Speakman.]

PULPWOOD COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I have been waiting for many weeks to see what was going to transpire in connection with this famous Pulpwood Commission. I have had many put-offs from the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). Can he not give some definite statement to-day; I do not mean in the style of "in a few days," or "a few weeks," or "very soon,"; but can the minister not state when we may expect the report of this commission? We hope we are nearing the end of the session, and the minister knows the circumstances under which the commission was appointed.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) I have been hoping for some time to receive the report from the Pulpwood Commission. I understand they are working at it but it has not been brought to me yet. I will direct the attention of the commission to the fact that its early submission is urgent.

WEST HASTINGS BY-ELECTION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The definiteness is not improving any. May I ask the government also, in view of the terms of the letter of the late hon. member for West Hastings, Mr. Porter, whether they purpose issuing the writ for the by-election as requested in that letter, and if not why it cannot be done?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government purposes issuing the writ for a by-election and will determine the date later on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask why the writ cannot be issued now in view of the purpose for which the election is being held? The circumstances demand an immediate election.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no necessity for that. The member could not possibly be returned for this session of parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That may be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the law provides that the writ must be issued within six months. With all due respect to my right hon. friend no one takes very seriously the purpose of the hon. member who has resigned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was a time when the Prime Minister, in another post, took very seriously appeals to the people against the conduct of parliament.

LIQUOR AND NARCOTICS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton): Are we to understand that the resolution on the order paper in the name of the Prime Minister in reference to the treaty with the United States against smuggling operations along the international boundary is being dropped, and if so why?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The United States Senate has not, as yet, ratified this treaty, and it is hardly probable they will consider the matter until next year. Under the circumstances the chances are that this parliament will have ample opportunity of dealing with the question at another session.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister knows the United States Senate could not ratify it. After the minister went down only a few more hours of the session of congress remained.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They will deal with it at the next session of congress.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 122, to provide for the superannuation of civil servants.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On clause 1—short title.

Mr. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): This bill is based on a recommendation contained in the report of the special committee appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the operation of Chapter 12, 8-9 Geo. V; an Act respecting the Civil Service of Canada which report was presented to the House on June 22nd, 1923. The committee's recommendation regarding superannuation is as follows:—"The general principles on which modern superannuation schemes are based appear to be fairly definitely agreed upon. The basis most favoured is that under which both the employees and the employer contribute to the support of the scheme, the entire cost as a rule being borne approximately equally by both. The benefits derived or provided for include allowances on retirement after attainment of a stipulated age; allowances to widows and minor children in the event of the death of the employee during service or after retirement, the widow's allowance being usually one-half of the employee's allowance; and allowances to the employees on retirement from disability regardless of age. There is also usually provision made for the return of the employee's contributions without interest in the event of his voluntary retirement after a minimum period of service had been rendered.

Your committee is of the opinion that the adoption of a superannuation scheme substantially on the lines of that above described would remove one of the greatest deterrents to efficiency and curtailment of staffs in many of the departments of the public service and it therefore commends that such a scheme be adopted by parliament at the earliest possible date."

On account of the short time remaining before the end of the session after the presentation of this report it was impossible last session to give effect by legislation to this recommendation but it was announced by the Prime Minister that a bill embodying the committee's recommendation on this point would be presented at the present session. This bill is the fulfilment of the Prime Minister's promise.

It is desirable to outline at this stage the present situation respecting superannuation.

The original Superannuation Act was passed in 1870. This act provided for contributions at the rate of 4 per cent of salaries and for superannuation benefits of one-fiftieth of the average salary for the last three years of service, not exceeding, however, thirty-five-fiftieths. In 1873 the rate of contribution was reduced to 2 per cent, the benefits remaining the same. This act contained, among other provisions, a provision by which, in the case of persons who joined the civil service after a certain age, at first forty, but later changed to thirty, an addition of a maximun of ten years might be added to the period of actual service for the purpose of computing the superannuation allowance, and it was not long before charges were made in the House of Commons that this provision was being abused and that the allowances of retired officers were being unduly increased by this abuse.

In 1893 the basis of contribution was again changed to 3½ per cent and a new fund, Superannuation Fund No. 2 was created to be composed of the contributions at the new rate by new entrants to the service. From that date onwards therefore we have the two funds, Superannuation Fund No. 1 and Superannuation Fund No. 2, the former fund embracing all permanent civil servants appointed prior to April 1, 1893 and the latter fund, all permanent civil servants appointed thereafter.

cerned, and there was substituted by the act of that year the Retirement Fund, composed of contributions from future entrants to the service of 5 per cent of their salaries, to which contributions the government added interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum. According to the Public Accounts as at March 31, 1923, the number of contributors to the various funds were as follows: Superannuation Fund No. 1, 614; Superannuation Fund No. 2, 189; Retirement Fund, 19,953.

The Superannuation Fund provides a retiring allowance for the contributor on his reaching old age or becoming disabled. It provides no allowance for his dependents on death whether before or after retirement. It provides no allowance on voluntary retirement from the service. The Retirement Fund is inadequate because no addition to the contributor's contributions is made by the government and the amount in the fund to the credit of any contributor is inadequate as a provision for retiring allowance. It is also to be noted that the benefit under the Retirement Act is the payment of a lump sum, there being no provision for an annual allowance. At the present time, as a result of the operation of the superannuation funds, men are dying in the service after having served 30, 35 and 40 years and about to be granted superannuation. These men, on their death in many cases, leave widows in a practically destitute condition. Men who have retired and who have drawn their superannuation allowance for a few years die leaving no benefit whatever to their widows. It is this latter contingency which men most fear, and the result is that they remain in the service for the sake of the larger income they receive as employees as compared with their allowance as annuitants.

The ideal superannuation scheme is one based on the principles set forth in the committee's recommendation and these the present bill provides.

The present bill contains the following provisions:

1. The bill will apply to whole-time permanent civil servants receiving an annual salary of $600 or over.

2. The rate of contribution is 5 per cent of the salaries, limited to the first 35 years of service.

3. The superannuation age is 65 optional and 70 compulsory, with a modification applicable for the next ten years to persons now 60 years and over.

4. The superannuation allowance, assuming at least ten years' service, is one-fiftieth of the average salary for the last ten years multiplied by the number of years of service, not exceeding 35. This applies to new appointees. The committee recommends that a change be made in this provision as regards those already in the service, reducing the time from ten to five years.

5. The retiring allowance available after ten years' service on disability or retirement from abolition of office is computed on the same basis as the superannuation allowance.

6. The withdrawal allowance available after ten years' service on voluntary retirement is the total amount of contributions without interest.

7. The widow's allowance is one-half the allowance the contributor received or would have received if superannuation at the time of death.

8. The children's allowance is 10 per cent of the contributor's allowance payable to each child until age 18, the total children's allowance not to exceed 25 per cent of the contributor's allowance if the widow survives. If the widow does not survive each child's allowance is 20 per cent, the total children's allowance not to exceed 50 per cent of the contributor's allowance.

9. In the event of disability or abolition of office before ten years' service has been rendered, a gratuity of one month's pay for each year of service may be granted, and, in the event of retirement on marriage being required, a gratuity of the contributor's contributions without interest. In the event of death in the service before ten years' service has been rendered a gratuity equal to the disability gratuity is payable to the widow and children.

10. In the event of dismissal from the service at any time the contributor's contributions may, in the discretion of the Governor in Council, be returned without interest.

The foregoing applies primarily to persons hereafter entering the service. Provision is made, however, for the optional transfer to the new scheme of permanent employees now in the service.

11. Persons now under the Retirement Fund having contributed thereto for their whole period of service may, at their option elect to come under the new act, and on such election the amount now standing to their credit in the Retirement Fund is transferred and they will become entitled to all the benefits of the new act to the same extent as if it had been in force from the date of their entry to the service. If they have not contributed for the full period of service the non-contributing period will be counted to the extent of one-half in computing all the benefits but such period may be counted in full on payment of arrears of contributions without interest.

12. Persons now on the Superannuation Fund may, at their option, elect to come under the new act, and on such election contributions, if any, will be thereafter at the rate of 5 per cent and the period for which contributions have been made to Superannuation Fund No. 1 or No. 2 will be counted in full in computing the contributor's superannuation and retiring allowances but only to the extent of one-half in computing widow's and children's allowances. Such period may be counted in full for the latter allowances on payment of the arrears of the difference between the rate actually contributed and 5 per cent. The period of service, if any, in respect of which contributions have not been made to the Superannuation Funds will be counted only to the extent of one-half in computing all allowances, but may be counted in full on payment of arrears of contributions at the rate of 5 per cent without interest.

13. Permanent civil servants who have never contributed to either the Retirement Fund or the Superannuation Fund may, at their option, elect to come under the new act and on such election they shall thereafter contribute at the rate of 5 per cent and their period of service shall be counted for all allowances to the extent of one-half, but may be counted in full on payment of arrears of contribution at 5 per cent without interest.

14. In all cases arrears of contributions may be paid in one sum or in equivalent instalments as may be prescribed by regulation.

It is believed that the cost of the benefits proposed by the bill will be equally borne by the contributor and the government; that is, that the government's share of the cost will be 5 per cent of the salaries. There will be in addition an initial liability created in respect of the past service of persons now in the service who elect to come under the provisions of the act. The amount of this liability will depend upon the numbers transferring, their length of service and their dependents. On being ascertained, the amount of this initial liability can be extinguished by an annual charge extending over the probable period of service remaining to those contributors.

That amount can be spread over a period of 25 or 30 years. In the case of the British Local government scheme it extends over 40 years.

The committee which dealt with this matter was somewhat unfortunate in not being able to have the assistance of all of its members, so many other committees were meeting at the same time, and we never had a full meeting of the committee to discuss the question. After reviewing all the evidence submitted by civil servants, by the deputy ministers, and the Civil Service Commission, who assisted the committee in obtaining information in regard to the matter, the committee came to the conclusion that the payments to be made to civil servants under this bill were as great and as fair as could possibly be made with the amount of money provided by the government and by the civil servants themselves. In other words, it was the desire of the committee that this bill should be framed on a strictly actuarial basis, and hon. members will observe that there is a provision in the bill for actual bringing down to the House a memorandum of the amount paid by the civil servants and of the cost to the government, so that if it be found that the bill will not work out on an actuarial basis, the House will have the full information early each session that the bill is not working out as contemplated, and steps may be taken to rectify, either the allowances to be paid to the civil servants, or the contributions to be paid by the civil servants to the fund. There is a feature in the bill which does not seem to meet with the approval of all the civil servants; that is the provision that they will have to serve ten years' time before they can get their money back. The feeling of the committee last year, and the feeling of the committee this year, was that if the bill had any virtue, it was in the fact that it would stabilize the service, and would provide that those who remained in the service would be able to retire with some gratuity and would also make some provision for their dependent children. If we would consider the amount to be paid on retirement to those who remained for one or two years in the service, there would be nothing gained. It would leave it open for any employees who objected to this feature to deposit five per cent of his salary in a savings bank and withdraw it when he liked. This provision is for those who remain loyally in the service, and those who, at a stipulated age feel compelled to retire, and in the case of those people provision is made for their children.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): In view of the remarks of the hon, gentleman (Mr. Malcolm) who so ably presided over the destiny of this bill in committee, I will deal with only one of the aspects of this case. It might not be amiss for me to review briefly the history of superannuation. Superannuation was initiated here in 1870 by Sir Francis Hincks. That legislation was carried down until 1898. In the meantime superannuation was carried on with contributions made by civil servants at the rate of 2 per cent. That system lasted until 1893, when the government found that the method adopted would not be actuarially sound. The rate of contribution was then increased to 3½ per cent. In 1898 the Superannuation Act was closed to new entrants. Nevertheless, when the measure was introduced doing away with the Superannuation Act, there was a feeling that there should be some measure passed providing for superannuation for civil servants. The then Postmaster General, Sir William Mulock, introduced the bill to abolish the superannuation system as it then existed. It might not be out of place to quote here a few extracts from the debate which took place on that occasion. Sir William Mulock—page 6335 of the Hansard of 1898—said:

> Some members may think no retiring fund is necessary and no provision whatever for the relief of civil servants who have ceased to be able to discharge their duties efficiently, but our experience has shown that it is necessary for governments to have some fund whereby they may, either by way of gratuity, pension or otherwise, be relieved of persons who have survived their usefulness, without being compelled to throw them adrift upon the unkind world with no means of support.

Sir William Mulock said also:

> So far as my experience goes in my department at least I can say without qualification, or with but very slight qualification, that a more efficient or worthy staff no member of the government could desire, and I believe that the same may extend to a large extent to the whole staff of Canada.

The measure introduced in 1898 to replace the superannuation system was called the Retirement Fund. It did away with the previous legislation under which contributors paid 2 per cent and then subsequently 3½ per cent. Under this Retirement Fund contributors paid 5 per cent, and when they retired from the service, they drew out whatever money they had paid in with interest accumulations. The committee will see at once that no features of superannuation attached to this scheme, and that it is in the interest of the government to have a measure of superannuation for the Civil Service of Canada, just as much as it in the interest of large corporations to have for their employees a measure of superannuation.

In 1920, the government of the day decided that certain measures of economy should be put into force; that reorganization and reclassification should take place. As a result of that, a large number of employees were to be turned out of employment. A scheme was then devised, a scheme for the moment, a scheme which it was never intended should last forever, a scheme that was called the Calder Act, the dispositions of which were very generous because it was calculated to last for a few months or, perhaps, a year at the utmost. Again to that scheme attached no feature of superannuation, and that is the act which is presently in force along with the Retirement Fund that has been in existence since 1898. The committee may say that there are two measures, one the Retirement Fund whereby civil servants pay 5 per cent and on leaving the service get back their money and, second, the Calder Act which is based upon length of service. To these two measures the superannuation feature does not attach. The Calder Act has proved a most expensive and onerous charge upon the finances of the country. It is imperative, necessary, essential, that a system of superannuation should be introduced into the civil service.

Mr. CARROLL: Is it not a fact that certain employees who were brought in before 1896 paid only two per cent into the fund?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Those who came in under the old act paid but two per cent. In 1893 the amount was increased to 3½ per cent; and in 1898 when the Retirement Fund was created, the amount was raised to 5 per cent, each one of the civil servants remaining in the category in which he or she had been placed at the start.

It might be wise to see if this measure meets with the approval of the people, and one might say that some of the newspapers that have commented upon this matter should be heard. The Ottawa Citizen said:

> It is unnecessary to point out that the enactment of an adequate superannuation measure is the first step towards a rehabilitated service. It is the basis on which all other forward-looking reforms must follow. Nor is it necessary to emphasize the advantages which a superannuation act will bring to the service as a whole.

The Ottawa Evening Journal has this to say:

> There should be little opposition in parliament to a just superannuation measure. The principle has been admitted for many years by both Liberals and Conservatives that systematic superannuation is advisable for the sake of efficiency and economy. It is, in truth, one of the most reasonable and unharmful roads to Civil Service reform.
> Lately the necessity has been more marked because of the unrest in the midst of many dismissals from the service and because there is such confusion of retiring measures, some employees coming under one, some under another, and many under none at all.

Again the Ottawa Citizen, whom my hon. friends immediately opposite will recognise, had this to say:

> There are special circumstances to justify a superannuation act. Apart from the economic necessity of proceeding with the reorganization, there is the recognized fact that many capable civil servants work for less than they could earn in private employment, because there is supposed to be a better assurance of permanence in the civil service. The reasonable hope, too, of a pension has on numerous occasions deterred men from looking for more lucrative opportunities in private enterprises.

But even without the admitted fact that salaries are kept purposely lower, so that the government may not be charged with competing extravagantly against private enterprise for the best men, superannuation should be established on the broad principle of justice. In recent years, many large corporations, like the Canadian Pacific Railway, have introduced pension schemes. It is good business to keep down the percentage of changing personnel, as well as to eliminate the fear and worry of being thrown out of work without means of support in old age. Such humane measures as pensions are a sound investment in efficient service.

When the private corporations are setting the example, the government need have no fear of being taken to task for extravagance in bringing in a superannuation measure. It can be demonstrated that superannuation as a complementary measure to Civil Service reorganization, is not extravagance but economy.

Besides these—and this is the most interesting one—I should like to quote from the Financial Post of March 28, 1924, and I think I recognize in the Financial Post the twin sister of MacLean's Magazine:

"There should be no idea of turning out old servants who have played their part, without making provision for them. Any effective plan of re-organization should entail a superannuation arrangement for those who have served their time and also a promise for those in the service that they will be taken care of in their old age.

Of course it will mean a call upon the public funds to provide superannuation allowances, but it is the only fair way to take care of those who have served their time faithfully. And only by the elimination of the aged and the ineffectual can the service be put on an efficient basis.

A properly organized civil service will, we believe, provide as large or larger salaries for a smaller staff and take care of an adequate appropriation for a superannuation fund with a much smaller total outlay than that now being made with a large staff, a half-time schedule, and low efficiency. It is simply a case of organizing the government staff along the lines successfully employed by the banks and other big financial and industrial corporations."

Now, that I have shown the necessity of this Civil Service reform in the minds of the public, what do those who would benefit immediately by this measure have to say? The Civil Service Association was heard before the parliamentary committee in 1923, and I would just briefly state their reasons for asking for a superannuation measure:

1. It would stabilize and unify the service.
2. Keep the service clear of deadwood by retiring those rendered inefficient by age.
3. Promote efficiency by assuring every consistent worker of maintenance in old age should he survive, with due provision for dependents.
4. Automatically attract to the service, the right kind of people.
5. Maintain the "flow of promotion" which Sir George Murray, the British authority on Civil Service matters said was so important.
6. Facilitate the constant changes in every office, which are made necessary by constant changes in the work to be done.

The Civil Service Commission had no hesitation in expressing its views on the subject and in 1921 that commission made a report from which I quote these few lines:

It is not possible to give the total saving in salaries, nor is it possible to estimate the great benefit resulting to the work of the country as a whole. This opportunity may, however, be taken of directing attention to the great improvement in the morale of the Service necessarily resulting from the clearing of avenues to promotion, and the benefit to the administration of public affairs in granting to younger employees opportunities for the display of ability.

So much did the Civil Service Commission feel that this measure was imperative that in 1922 it came back again with another recommendation:

No system of classification or improved methods of administration will be operated satisfactorily in the Civil Service until a comprehensive measure of superannuation is in force. The advantages of superannuation in the public interest are apparent inasmuch as it relieves the government of the embarrassment and extravagance of retaining the services of officers who have outlived their usefulness; creates a proper flow of promotions; renders the service more mobile; deters efficient officers from leaving the public service for private employment where emoluments and opportunity may be greater; helps to attract a better class of applicants for positions in the service and in general tends to promote efficiency in every way.

I quote further from the report of 1923:

The administration of the Public Service Retirement Act has shown how necessary is a general superannuation scheme and it was with a feeling of gratification that the Public Service and those concerned in its administration heard the announcement of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister at the end of last session that a general superannuation bill would be introduced early in the next session. For years the Civil Service Commission has recommended that such action should be taken, and the service itself has been petitioning for a Superannuation Act. That it is good business is evidenced by the facts stated above.

Two striking facts in regard to this matter are that the country at large is apparently satisfied that the proposed bill is a good one, while the Civil Service Commission itself recommends it. No doubt it would be advantageous to the Civil Service, for the associations themselves have ardently asked for it, and so far as the public interest is concerned, the Civil Service Commission has made a very lengthy report as to the benefits that would accrue to the country in the savings which would be effected if a measure of this kind were enacted. I desire to put on record certain figures which possibly may be tedious. But after all a bill of this kind before it is adopted must be proved to be actuarially sound and also in the interests not only of the Civil Service itself but of the country at large as well. And this can be demonstrated only by figures. Let me quote from the Commission's report of 1923:

A glance at those who have gone out under the Public Service Retirement Act will indicate the prevalence of this tendency. Of a total one thousand two hundred and eighty-nine (1289) retired, five hundred and fifteen (515) were seventy or over four hundred and seventy (470) were between sixty and seventy; and three hnudred and four (304) were under sixty years of age; and five hundred and ten (510) positions were abolished, being further conclusive evidence of the tendency. After three and a half years during which this Act has been in operation a survey of the service reveals the fact that at present there are one thousand three hundred and thirty-three (1333) employees in the Federal Service, exclusive of temporaries and part time workers who are of the age of sixty-five, or who will reach sixty-five on or before the 1st July, 1924, the date upon which the present act becomes inoperative. Of these, only one hundred and sixty nine (169) are contributors under part 1 of the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act. Furthermore, approximately one thousand two hundred and sixty-three (1263) employees are sixty years of age and under sixty-five, and of these only one hundred and ninety-six (196) are contributors under part 1 of the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act. Therefore, it appears that besides the three hundred and sixty-five (365) contributors who are sixty years of age and over and who could be superannuated under the old act there are now in the service two thousand two hundred and thirty-one (2231) employees who may be said to have reached or will reach in a few years superannuation age, whose only provision for retirement is the Public Service Retirement Act which expires on the 1st July, 1924.

During the first eighteen months of the operation of the act, after having provided for annuities to the amount of two hundred and twenty-eight thousand and twent-five dollars and eighteen cents ($228,025.18) a saving of one hundred and fifty thousand seven hundred and eight dollars and seventeen cents ($150,708.17) was effected through the abolition of two hundred and sixty-four (264) positions. At the end of the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two it was found that as a result of abolishing three hundred and ninety (390) positions two hundred and four thousand and forty-eight dollars and eighty cents ($204,048.80) was being saved annually in salaries, and again at the end of one thousand nine hundred and twenty-three, with the abolition of a total five hundred and ten (510) positions two hundred and ninety thousand one hundred and eight dollars and eighty-eight cents ($290,108.88) is being saved annually. This annual saving in the matter of salaries after meeting annuity obligations more than offsets the cash payments made of two hundred and sixty-two thousand one hundred and seven dollars and fifty-three cents ($262,107.53) in retiring gratuities so that actually the Public Service Retirement Act has cost the country nothing and its application has resulted in a saving not only of the two hundred and ninety thousand one hundred and eight dollars and eighty-eight cents ($290,108.88) annually as noted above—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was that under the Calder Act?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, this refers to the Calder Act which was then in operation.

—but also of the amount of the difference between salaries paid annuitants and salaries paid those appointed in their places, which it is not possible to estimate here.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

This may appear all right on the surface and possibly it would work satisfactorily for the purpose for which the act was intended. But I do not think it would be advisable to continue the Calder Act; a large number of civil servants, some 2,000 or more, would be eligible for retirement in a few years under that act and this would mean a tremendous drain on the finances of the country. The Calder Act was never intended to be permanent; it was never intended as a superannuation measure, but was purely and simply a matter of expediency for the relief of a temporary situation. It would not require much figuring to discover that the Calder Act was not placed upon any basis which might be said to be actuarially sound. Then, of course, notwithstanding the marked result that has been achieved under the act, the superannuation feature is not taken into account.

It may be said that the Calder Act is a very generous one; and so it is. But what is most essential to the stability of the Civil Service? What is required is superannuation for old age and not merely an arrangement whereby there is a compulsory deduction from salary of 5 per cent for say fifteen or twenty years and then the withdrawal of the accumulated savings. The idea is that a civil servant should be provided for in such a way that, while he might receive probably a smaller consideration immediately, he would enjoy the permanent benefit of superannuation. The Calder Act is very generous in the way of immediate cash payments but it does not provide for old age.

Now, having said this much; having pointed out that the general public apparently has no hesitation in endorsing this measure; and having shown that the Civil Service organizations for years have requested that something of this kind be passed in the better interests of the Civil Service, I do not think there is very much more that can be added. This bill has received the approval of the Civil Service Commission through its commissioner who appeared before the committee, and the government is satisfied that it is actuarially sound. And the Civil Service itself is satisfied with the provisions of the bill. The committee which was charged with the study of the bill has made a unanimous report. So that, to my mind, taking all these facts into consideration, there seems to be very little to be said against the bill.

In studying the superannuation scheme we have run across a number of anomalous situations. For example, let us take the case of widows of contributors who paid to Fund No. 1 or to Fund No. 2—in the first case they pay 2 per cent and in the second 3½ per cent. In these cases, on the death of the contributor before retirement, the whole of the amount paid in during 20, 25, 30 or 35 years—35 years is the limit—is forfeited; his widow obtains nothing. If, however, he lived after the period of retirement the civil servant would receive a pension for the rest of his life. It has been brought to our attention that in certain cases—the exact number the committee could not ascertain—after having contributed 2 per cent or 3½ per cent for thirty or thirty-five years the contributor died after retiring and receiving from the fund two or three or six or eight months' pension. In that case the whole of the remainder of his contribution is gone, and it does not seem to be quite a humanitarian disposition of the matter, in such cases there would seem to be a moral claim on the government in respect to the contributions made. But the committee felt that this matter did not come within the purview of the present measure; they simply submit it to the generous consideration of the government.

Another class of employees that this bill cannot touch is the prevailing rate men. It has been found impossible, because of the fluctuations in wages, to extend the benefits of this act to those who are under prevailing rates. There are a large number of persons who have served the government faithfully for years but who on account of the change made a few years ago under the reclassification were placed under the prevailing rate system, and it does seem to be a hardship that they should not be entitled to superannuation. However, the committee could not see its way to make a recommendation in that respect, though they suggest that the government should take steps to inquire into it.

Another class of employees, rather a large class, is made up of former employees of the Printing Bureau who were retired under very special conditions which I shall not go into at this stage. But again these people are certainly entitled to some consideration. I take great pleasure in associating myself with the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. McGiverin) in supporting the report which has been presented, and trust that it will meet with the favourable consideration of the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The general policy of retiring allowances and annuities has for a long time been recognized as sound, and it still remains the policy that ought to be followed wherever possible. It is a policy which, I think, the House as a whole is committed to. Unfortunately the Liberal government of an earlier day thought differently and cancelled the measure of superannuation then prevailing. A superannuation system which runs continuously and regularly, which commences with employment and which is operative when that employment ceases, is something which is fairly simple and fairly economical. The only question that arises to day is this: The country having been deprived of the superannuation system—the government on the one hand having been deprived of the revenue for the purpose, and the service on the other hand having been deprived of the benefits of superannuation—just what does it mean to start it up again? Speaking from recollection, I think we have three schemes at present. There was the very old superannuation system which applied to civil servants of a certain date; there was another one, and I think there was a third. What are the balances to the credit of each of the schemes that have not been interfered with?—what is the cost of each scheme to the taxpayers?—and what have been the benefits to the employees?

Mr. ROBB: The present retirement fund amounts to approximately $12,000,000, and that is the estimated initial liability of the government if all on that fund transfer. The annual apportionment over thirty years to extinguish this amount, at 4 per cent, would be $680,000 a year. The annual salaries of contributors to the retirement fund amount to $28,000,000; 5 per cent thereof, being the government's annual contribution, $1,400,000, and the total cost on the basis of present salary would be $2,080,000 annually.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that the government cost or the employee's cost?

Mr. ROBB: That will be the annual cost to the government if all transfer. Of course if they do not all transfer, it will be 5 per cent on the basis of the salaries of those who do.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister tell the committee just what is the state of the funds relating to the systems now in effect?

Mr. ROBB: I will put on record the facts with respect to present superannuation and retirement funds. Superannuation Fund No. 1 was created in 1870 and closed to new entrants in 1893. The rate of contribution is 2 per cent of salary, and the rate of benefit one-fiftieth of the average of the last three years' salary for each year of service up to thirty-five years; retirement age optional at 60; no age fixed for compulsory retirement.

The number of employees in the fund on March 31, 1923, was 614, and the annual salaries amounted to $1,443,668. In 1922 there were 625 in the fund; in 1921, 579; in 1920, 663.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How could the number be increasing when no one could join after 1893? I do not think that can be correct.

Mr. ROBB: There must be an omission; these are taken from the public accounts. Superannuation fund No. 2 was created in 1893.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have got the amount of the salaries. What was the annual contribution by the employees to the fund? And what was the annual cost of administering the fund?

Mr. ROBB: There was no separate account kept of No. 1 funds, but I can give my hon. friend the figures for No. 2 funds.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it a fact that we cannot tell from the experience we have had just what these funds have been costing us?

Mr. ROBB: Not as regards Fund No. 1, without a detailed investigation. We have it for Fund No. 2.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would have thought it would have been perfectly simple, knowing as we do what the salaries are from year to year, to compute 2 per cent on those salaries, on the one hand, and on the other hand, to keep track of the payments we have been making. We would then at least know what we are doing.

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend is right about that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The information must be available.

Mr. ROBB: I will give my hon. friend the data about Fund No. 2, which is separate. This was created in 1893, closed to new entrants in 1898; rate of contribution 3½ per cent of salary; rate of benefit the same as under Fund No. 1, that is, one-fiftieth of the average salary for the last three years; retirement age the same as for Fund No. 1; number of employees in the fund and annual salaries on March 31, 1923, 189, and $416,980 respectively. The amount of the fund on March 31, 1923, was $1,445,576, and the income of the fund $194,953, including a transfer from consolidated revenue. Payments from that fund in 1922-1923 amounted to $36,326.87; total amount transferred from consolidated revenue up to date, $750,200.

[Mr. Robb.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has given me the total amount paid from consolidated fund, but he has not given me the total amount of payments out of the consolidated revenue fund for annuities.

Mr. ROBB: Payments for 1922-1923 amounted to $36,326.87.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But that is for one year. Then he gives me the total contribution from the country, which is $750,200. We have no basis of comparison there. In the one instance my hon. friend uses the year, and in the other instance he gives the total. In order to judge the situation, we have to have both either in years or in totals.

Mr. MALCOLM: Superannuation Fund No. 1 never had any contributions from the Consolidated Revenue Fund, but Superannuation Fund No. 2 has received a payment of $750,200 to put it on an actuarial basis.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To start with?

Mr. MALCOLM: No, the fund was started with provision that it should be on an actuarial basis and contributions were made to maintain the fund.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the annual contribution asked for?

Mr. MALCOLM: No annual contribution was made to Superannuation Fund No. 1, or to No. 2 either.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then how was the $750,200 paid?

Mr. MALCOLM: That is made up of payments from time to time to put the fund on a sound actuarial basis.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To make it self-supporting?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it would be interesting to know what the annual charges were.

Mr. MALCOLM: In 1922-23, $100,000 was transferred.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How does that compare with other years?

Mr. MALCOLM: That was the largest year of all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if we can find out why the cost went up that year?

Mr. MALCOLM: It would be affected by reclassification and increases in salary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the chairman of the committee can tell us what the underlying basis was in connection with Fund No. 2. Was it that the government were to maintain that fund on an actuarial basis, and if on an actuarial basis, what were the considerations that went to arriving at that actuarial basis—in other words, as to the rights of civil servants to retire, and the like? What rights did the employees have that they could enforce? The actuarial basis is arrived at in view of certain factors; what were they?

Mr. MALCOLM: Section 18 of the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act, chapter 17, of the Revised Statutes of 1906, provides:

"A deduction shall be made from the salary of every person appointed to the Civil Service on or after the first day of April, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three, at the rate of three and one-half per centum per annum on such salary, if it is six hundred dollars or upwards, and of three per centum per annum thereon if it is less than six hundred dollars, and such deductions shall be carried to the credit of a fund called the Civil Service Superannuation Fund, number two, to which shall be added by the government annually such a sum as, upon an estimate or valuation thereof based upon the H.M. Mortality Table of the Institute of Actuaries of Great Britain and a rate of interest of six per centum per annum, may be sufficient to make the amount thereof equal to the value of the prospective annuities payable therefrom.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the factor taken into consideration was the matter of the age, sixty years. Was retirement compulsory at sixty years? I did not think so.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When was it compulsory, or was it compulsory at any time?

Mr. MALCOLM: Not under that act.

Mr. ROBB: There was no limit.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If there was no limit we would have to take an arbitrary age, and not sixty years. What age was taken for the purpose of arriving at an actuarial basis?

Mr. MALCOLM: I cannot answer that question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is important to see how it worked out; in other words, we do not know what we are doing unless we have that age.

Mr. MALCOLM: There is no doubt the average age would be taken as around sixty-five.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That sounds like a guess.

Mr. MALCOLM: It is the natural age to judge by, being the average age of retirement of most employees.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course, we can get it by working back. The actuary has his results, and his results show a specific sum as necessary for the purposes of his calculation. Having that result, and knowing the number of employees covered, it is merely a matter of working back to see what was the age that was adopted for the purposes of the original calculation. We could get that information.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think I can safely say that from the act of 1870 down to the present the average retiring age has been about 65. I cannot put my finger on the particular section of the act of 1870 at the moment, but my recollection is the age was 65, and has been ever since.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Taking it at 65 under that act, how many employees have we been able to retire, and at what cost to the country?

Mr. ROBB: The cost is $750,000, plus the interest on that amount.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think it is fair to the service to put it that way. You see what is done there; that is a fund on hand to which the service have equitable rights. That fund has not been exhausted, by any manner of means, in connection with the retirement already made.

Mr. ROBB: That has been necessary to place the fund upon an actuarial basis.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is quite true, and the fund is augmented from time to time for that purpose of maintaining it on an actuarial basis. For example in 1922-23 we apparently voted $101,000 in order to maintain the fund on such a basis. We are going on doing that, and as payments become due out of the fund there is a relation between payment and cost. It is perfectly true that that relationship is disturbed from time to time by the increase in the number of beneficiaries and with the increase you have to make further contributions to maintain your actuarial basis. But with that qualification it is also perfectly true that there is a ratio between cost and result. So that we should have some idea how much in the way of contributions has come from the service and how much has come from the country. That is what I want to get at.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is right about that. We have not the accumulated figures of income and outgo here but they are all available in the public accounts as my hon. friend knows.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes but what I am trying to get at is what the costs really are to the nation. We may form an idea, by ascertaining what the costs have been in the past, as to what we are doing now. Unless we know what it costs to provide an annuity on a basis of 3½ per cent of salaries, it is rather hard to arrive at any definite conclusion as to costs.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Three and a half per cent is the rate in Superannuation Fund No. 2.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the one we are dealing with.

Mr. CHEVRIER: For the present we are not concerned with that—with all due deference to my hon. friend; we are concerned with the Superannuation Act, to see whether the fund we are now creating may be placed on a sound basis, and at what cost to the service and to the government respectively. As to fund number two that, I am afraid, is ancient history. That fund has cost the government $750,000; that is the amount the government had to put in. Now, as I understand it, and I think I am right, Superannuation Fund No. 1 was constituted wholly by the contributions of the civil servants at 2 per cent, but under the act which the hon. gentleman has just read the contribution was raised to 3½ per cent and this fund number two was established. According to the latest information I have there is in that fund at present about $1,100,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Actually $1,445,000.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That $1,445,000 is made up of two sums—contributions at 3½ per cent by civil servants and the further sum of $750,000 which the government transferred at various times and in various amounts. So that up to the present the cost to the government, in the case of this fund is the sum of $750,000, and the loss of interest from the time the payments were made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend may be right in his conclusion, but he is wrong in saying that my suggestion was not to the point. I was suggesting a method of finding out what the costs are. Instead of theory we have a practical illustration of how superannuation—however limited in its scope, altogether too limited—works out. Will the minister please follow these figures—and I shall like him to say whether they are right or not. We find that for the purpose of looking after 189 employees a cost of $750,000 has been entailed.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That 189 represents the number actually in now but a large number have been taken care of and have now disappeared.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the number of employees when we started Superannuation Fund No. 2?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It would be the number of civil servants that joined the first year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us get the average number.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I should like to have that information myself. I suppose the number would be the number of civil servants that joined the new fund. I repeat that I do not see where we can get the information as to the number of those who went in the first year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I simply mentioned the first year because my hon. friend said the figure of 189 was wrong, due to the fact that a lot of employees had been looked after.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. The 189 as I understand it, is the number of employees now being looked after under Superannuation Fund No 2.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many have been looked after in the past?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not happen to have that information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If we had that figure it would show the usefulness of the scheme.

Mr. ROBB: I have no figures here of those who have come in from time to time or of those who have died.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have a record of our cost under the scheme though?

Mr. ROBB: Yes we have that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We know it has cost a total of $750,000.

Mr. ROBB: That is right. That was the cost to put it on an actuarial basis but part of that $750,000 is in the fund yet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I pointed that out.

Mr. ROBB: That has placed it on an actuarial basis. For instance in the public accounts of 1923 my hon. friend will get the records of Superannuation Fund No. 2. He will find that the receipts for that year were $194,953.10 and the payments $36,326.87.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That might be a characteristic year. How were those payments earned?

Mr. ROBB: Those were retiring allowances. The $194,000 includes the $101,000 referred to a few minutes ago.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is obvious. That would leave us with a net ordinary income of about $93,000. How much of that came from interest and how much from contributions from the staff?

Mr. ROBB: The contributions would be 3½ per cent of $416,980 or $14,000 and the interest 6 per cent on the mean fund or about $80,000. May I add that if all under this fund transfer to the other fund on the basis we are placing it on $93,000 would be the annual cost to the government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The present scheme fixes a definite allowance from the government of 5 per cent of the salaries?

Mr. MALCOLM: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much then?

Mr. MALCOLM: That is what it is estimated it will cost the government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what I say, the government is to put up 5 per cent and the civil servants are to put up 5 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, that is estimated upon an actuarial basis.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What becomes of the credit which those which have entered into Superannuation Fund No. 2 now have?

Mr. MALCOLM: It either stays there, or they can transfer to the new scheme by paying up the difference over 2 per cent of 3½ per cent, to equalize the 5 per cent that they would have paid if they had been under the new fund from the beginning.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that fair to the civil servants? We are starting something new now. Anyone can come in, although he has paid nothing, by paying 5 per cent per annum? Or does the scheme of the act run back to the time of first employment?

Mr. MALCOLM: Oh yes. Section 17 covers that. In general the bill is framed to cover new entrants to the service. But section 17 makes provision for those who are now in the service and gives them the option of coming under this measure. If they are under Superannuation Fund No. 1 they will have to pay up the difference between the 5 per cent and what they have paid. The same will apply under Superannuation Fund No. 2. If for any years of their service they have not contributed at all and do not wish to contribute for those years the bill provides that they shall be allowed half of those years of service under this act. If they come in without payment, they sacrifice benefits for half of their years of service.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If a civil servant has been thirty years in the service, and it is only within the last ten years that he has contributed to any fund, but for the previous twenty years he contributed to no fund, he may either pay up 5 per cent on his former twenty years, and get the benefit of the complete thirty years; or he will transfer the 5 per cent paid during the last ten years, and will only be given the benefit of ten years of his former twenty years. Now the objection immediately is made; why not allow the same benefit to one who wants to purchase? This act is based on mutuality—5 per cent by the employee and 5 per cent by the government; it is not based on generosity, but based on equality. But in the case of the temporary employee, the one who has given long faithful service and would be unable now to make up for the deficiency, the government will allow him to come in on paying 5 per cent, but they will allow for half his years of non-contribution—in this case ten years. In that provision the bill is generous. But for one who pays the 5 per cent, and who wants to enjoy benefits as for the full thirty years, the act says he will have to pay up. If he cannot pay up he will get the benefit of his last ten years—for which he has already contributed to the Retirement Fund—and half of his former years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The first fund is one maintained entirely by contribution from the service?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is Fund No. 1.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That costs the government nothing. What is the amount to the credit of that fund?

Mr. MALCOLM: There is no separate account maintained?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How can we do justice to those who are in that fund unless they are separately maintained and we know they are entitled to it?

Mr. MALCOLM: Any balance that exists the government has to pay.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does the hon. member mean by "Any balance that exists," if there is no balance now? The point about that would be this: Under the old act, while you say the government did not contribute, as a matter of fact they did contribute, and what has been said in that regard is incorrect. They contributed in this way. The employee had to put up 2 per cent of his salary. Under the act he was entitled to an annuity on a specific basis. If the amount at the credit of the fund which was created by the 2 per cent was insufficient to cover the annuity, the government paid something.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that it is not correct to say the government was at no expense in regard to Fund No. 1.

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend is quite right in that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: With the 2 per cent, what was the annuity? It was an annuity of one-fiftieth of the average salary for the last five years.

Mr. MALCOLM: Three years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What do we pay in order to supplement the 2 per cent paid by the annuitants under that fund?

Mr. ROBB: They have never kept that on a proper basis. It has never really been kept separate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then we cannot get at that. We would not get at it by simply saying that $750,000 represented that because that payment of $750,000—

Mr. ROBB: That is Superannuation Fund No. 2.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That sum was added for the purpose of putting Fund No. 2 on an actuarial basis. The expenses in connection with Fund No. 1 are apart from that entirely, and the minister tells us he cannot say what those expenses were.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That would all show the necessity of doing away with that system and introducing a new system.

[Mr. Malcolm.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As far as Fund No. 1 is concerned, we do not know where we are, whether it is costing nothing, or whether they have been paying too much or too little.

Mr. ROBB: We know they were paying too little.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is hit or miss. Fund No. 2 is exactly the same as the other, with the distinction that it is 3½ per cent instead of 2 per cent. If I have understood my hon. friend correctly as to the position of the government its contribution is not a fixed percentage but the government puts itself in the same position as it did with regard to Fund No. 1, except that it is now doing it in a more businesslike way—contributing such amounts of money as will maintain Fund No. 2 on an actuarial basis.

Mr. ROBB: We believe the contribution made will maintain Fund No. 2 on an actuarial basis.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The cost of maintaining that fund on an actuarial basis for thirty years has been $750,000.

Mr. ROBB: Plus interest.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You cannot count that. I do not think it is fair to charge the fund with interest. I treat that just as a payment of $750,000. The next thing we ought to know is how many members of the Civil Service are covered by that. We know that last year there were 189. Is that a fair average number, or were there less or more before?

Mr. MALCOLM: The number has been gradually decreasing from year to year from retirements. This is since 1898. It is twenty-five years since the method was changed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the committee we had some figures which showed the contrary, that the number first decreased and then increased. I am quite sure that that must be a clerical error.

Mr. ROBB: I am informed that it was a clerical error in the public accounts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have no balance in Fund No. 1. We have a balance of $1,445,000 in Fund No. 2. What is the balance that we have in the third fund?

Mr. ROBB: $12,027,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought that included the $1,445,000.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, that is a separate amount.

Mr. CANNON: I find this discussion most extraordinary. This is a bill based on the unanimous report of the committee, all parties in this House being represented on that committee. The hon. member did not go to the committee, but his friends must have been there to safeguard the interests of the people. If we continue to proceed at this rate, we shall be here probably all winter. My hon. friend is not the only member in the House. He should have confidence in his own friends who were members of the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thank my hon. friend.

Mr. ROBB: I think the observations of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) are very illuminating and will help us to make progress later on.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I cannot please both the Acting Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) at once, although I would like to. If I am saying anything which is not strictly in order, I hope the hon. gentleman will call me to order in his efficient way. He has very efficient, taking ways with him, and anything I can do to provoke him to speak will be a pleasure to me, because I always like to hear him talk.

Mr. CANNON: The hon. member's answer to the question I asked is about as clear as mud. I should like to know if he has separated himself from the rest of his party, or if he has confidence in those members of his party who were on the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not found anything from my hon. friend requiring an answer. When he gets down to something on the bill, I shall have much pleasure in replying to him. I want to find out if I can how much of that $12,027,000 has been put up by the Civil Service and how much has been contributed by the country.

Mr. MALCOLM: All from the service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How is it proposed to handle those claims of the service in connection with this scheme?

Mr. MALCOLM: Those contributing to the Retirement Fund are permitted to transfer to the new scheme within six months. That has been changed by the committee to a year. On transfer, the amount to their credit in the Retirement Fund is transferred to the consolidated revenue fund and the entire period of service for which contributions have been made to the Retirement Fund is counted in computing all allowances under the new scheme. If for any period of service contributions were not made to the Retirement Fund, such period is counted only to the extent of one-half unless arrears of contributions at the rate of 5 per cent are paid without interest. That is the situation with regard to those who have been paying 5 per cent into the Retirement Fund. Contributors to the Superannuation Fund who have been paying a lesser amount have permission to transfer similarly to those under the Retirement Fund, and the period in respect to which contributions have been made to the Superannuation Fund is allowed in full in computing the employee's own allowance, but only to the extent of one-half in computing widow's and children's allowances, unless they pay the arrears of the difference between the rate actually contributed and the 5 per cent without interest. If for any period contributions were not made to the Superannuation Fund, such period counts only to the extent of one-half in computing all allowances unless arrears of contributions at the rate of 5 per cent are paid without interest.

There are certain permanent employees who have never contributed to any fund. These employees are permitted to transfer to the new scheme, but their period of service is counted only to the extent of one-half in computing all allowances unless arrears of contributions at the rate of 5 per cent are paid without interest.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the percentage of payment making up that $12,027,000?

Mr. MALCOLM: 5 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then, it is just the same.

Mr. MALCOLM: They are all treated equitably, justly, under the provisions of the bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In order to treat them justly, they should be taken in absolutely without any further payment for the number of years they have paid.

Mr. MALCOLM: For the Retirement Fund, they are.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was the only thing I was dealing with. If we have 100 per cent of the service coming in, what contribution should we now make in order to preserve the actuarial basis?

Mr. MALCOLM: It is estimated that an amount equal to the $12,000,000 now in the Retirement Fund will be sufficient together with 5 per cent of the salaries for the future. That $12,000,000 can be amortised over thirty years and will, as the minister has pointed out, cost the country about $680,000 a year. The British Local government has a similar proposition, and they amortised, over a period of forty years. It is considered by the minister advisable to amortise this over thirty years, and the payment would be $680,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Should we not cover the $1,445,000 so that the government would be in exactly the same position in regard to this?

Mr. MALCOLM: We may have to do that, but the government has already made a contribution of $750,000 to put Fund No. 2 on an actuarial basis so that would take care of itself in the transfer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes: that is practically one-half. I suppose the amounts are made up in this way: The employee pays 5 per cent and the government pays 5 per cent on the salary plus the amortisation fund of $680,000?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes. To the Retirement Fund.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the minister said that it was $2,500,000 as the annual contribution.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes. The total annual salary list is $50,000,000. I might point out that, in addition to those under the three funds, there are about 7,000 permanent employees contributing to no fund whatever and about 14,000 temporaries some of whom might be considered as permanent. It is pure guess work to estimate how many will come in under the new scheme, but if all that we have lined up come under the scheme, the salary list will be about $50,000,000, so that the minister's estimate of $2,500,000 is correct. It is very unlikely that all will come in.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the meaning of the change made in paragraph (c) by the insertion of the words "for the purpose of this act?" I suppose that would enlarge it so that permanent temporaries could come in?

Mr. MALCOLM: There is a similar provision in the existing act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am referring to the words, "for the purposes of this act."

[Mr. Malcolm.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is intended to take care of certain employees.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would cover what we might call "permanent temporaries"?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On Section 4—Contribution.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it that as soon as the 35 years are up there will be no further charge, and the employee will get the maximum benefit?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On Section 5—Superannuation to the contributor.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does this section provide?

Mr. MALCOLM: There is no change here.

Mr. HOCKEN: I find that in subsection (b) of this section that provision is made for the payment of a certain amount to the widow of the pensioner after his death. This should be made to apply to any dependent. Suppose a widower has a daughter who has spent all her life looking after him; is she not in the same position as the widow would be?

Mr. MALCOLM: Section 7 takes care of such cases; it provides for the dependents of employees.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any change as to children?

Mr. ROBB: For the purposes of subsection three of section seven of the act no account is taken of age if the child is dependent.

Section agreed to.

On Section 6—Amount of allowance, how calculated.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the effect of the change?

Mr. MALCOLM: The amendment is intended to bring this section into conformity with section 16.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The superannuation is a certain percentage of the average salary received by the contributor during the last ten years of his service, multiplied by the number of years of service. Is this not the same basis as the other one?

Mr. MALCOLM: No. The committee considered that while the provision in regard to the ten year period might be advisable in the case of new entrants to the service it was not satisfactory for those already in the service, who had gone through a period of low salaries. The committee therefore thought it advisable to make it five years in the case of these civil servants, provision to that effect being contained in section 16.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any reason for making the distinction between the two classes? Salaries usually have regard to the cost of living.

Mr. MALCOLM: Civil servants during the past few years have been receiving a low rate of salary which has been supplemented by bonus.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have the point.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Gratuity when yearly allowance not earned.

Mr. ROBB: If the civil servant retires within a period of less than ten years he gets one month for each year of service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Subsection 1 provides for the civil servant—

—if he is required to retire on marriage—

What does that mean?

Mr. MALCOLM: Female employees are of course compelled to retire on marriage.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then why not say "she"?

Mr. MALCOLM: For the purposes of the act the pronoun "he" is used throughout.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was wondering whether under some new government regulations particular male civil servants were going to be required to retire on getting married, and it seemed extraordinary.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The pronoun "he" is used simply for the sake of conformity.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Report by the Treasury Board.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certain changes are made in this section.

Mr. ROBB: It was considered that a person who might at the present time be deemed unworthy of the benefits of the act might later on be thought to merit its provisions. The original section provided only for entire disallowance but the amendment will permit of suspension and later on, if it be deemed advisable, the restoration of the benefits of the act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the reason for enacting such a provision at all? If a man has paid his 5 per cent for years he should be entitled to his annuity and I do not see why we should withhold it from him.

Mr. McBRIDE: If a man were in gaol for a term of years the government would not want to pay him during his incarceration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I can understand that; is that what the section is intended to cover?

Mr. McGIVERIN: The committee thought that it would be rather anomalous for contributions to be going from the public treasury to a man who was confined in gaol for bad conduct; and other things might be objectionable in his moral conduct. We therefore give power for the discontinuance of the gratuity and its restoration if that is deemed advisable.

5 p.m.

Mr. LEWIS: What about the wife and children of a man who is in gaol?

Mr. MALCOLM: It is left to the discretion of the Governor in Council.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Retirement compulsory.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Suppose a civil servant proves to be just as valuable to the country at seventy as he was at fifty, I suppose the government is retaining the right to continue his services?

Mr. ROBB: That is provided for in subsection 2.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the reason for the further limitation in subsection 2—

But no such extension shall be granted after the expiration of ten years from the date of the coming into force of this act.

Mr. ROBB: The superintendent tells me that the committee had this under consideration. Later on the act will operate automatically at seventy years. I am bound to say, having regard to some men I know in the service, that the matter might be left for all time to the discretion of the government.

Mr. MALCOLM: We are following in this respect the wishes of the civil servants themselves, who were all of the view that a man should retire at seventy.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That might well be, but I am thinking more of the government service. If it is right to do it now, it is right to do it in ten years' time so far as the government service is concerned. The provision for extension should either be struck out entirely or left for all time in the discretion of the government. Surely if the government have a man ten years from now who, though seventy years of age, is rendering valuable service, they would be right in retaining him. I am confident that the minister knows I am right.

Mr. MALCOLM: The objection taken by the civil servants themselves was that if there is not compulsory retirement, promotion is blocked. The committee were not particularly strong on the clause, whether it should be left to cover those now in the service or whether it should apply to all. Personally I have no objection to the power being granted, though there is always danger that the power may be abused.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the basis of my hon. friend's idea? Should the government have the right to retain an efficient servant or not? Should the country be put to a double cost, the cost of the annuity plus the remuneration to the new appointee, to say nothing of teaching a new hand to do the work? That is what it comes down to.

Mr. MALCOLM: The new entrant usually comes in from the bottom at a smaller salary. It is questionable whether it would cost the government more to replace a junior and move the others up.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As a general rule, when they get to that age they have reached their maximum, and their retirement will be based on that maximum. To follow the bill as drafted would certainly be to duplicate expense in many cases.

Mr. MALCOLM: I doubt that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then why have this thing in at all? If the whole consideration is that there is a blocking of advancement, then everybody should be taken off at seventy, whether good or ill.

Mr. MALCOLM: There is a question of justice in regard to those in the service today who have been contributing to the superannuation fund or who are about the retiring age. If they are allowed to remain a little longer they may be able to enlarge their contribution and make their superannuation worth while.

[Mr. Malcolm.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not going to delay the bill, but this provision to do away with any extension after ten years does seem to me absurd.

Mr. ROBB: I do not want to offer any substantial amendment to the unanimous report of the committee, who have given so much time and study to this question, but I am bound to say that I agree with the ex-Minister of Finance. I know there are men in the service who have passed seventy years of age whom the government would not want to lose.

Mr. FORKE: Strike it out.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is only necessary to strike out the words following "not exceeding five years" on line 7.

Mr. ROBB: If it is the unanimous wish of the committee, I move that section 10 be amended by striking out of subsection 2 the following words, commencing on line 7:

But no such extension shall be granted after the expiration of ten years from the date of the coming into force of this act.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 11—Regulations by Governor in Council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is to be covered by (d)?

Mr. ROBB: The committee thought there might be cases difficult to decide, and that it would be well to give the Governor in Council power to prescribe by regulations.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understood we were to have a general superannuation act applying to all classes of employees, even the permanent temporaries. Now apparently we have a provision which indicates that it will be only a partial superannuation.

Mr. MALCOLM: The intention of the committee was to make the act as broad in its scope as possible. There might be doubt in some cases in determining just the application of the act. In the vernacular this is really an omnibus clause to give the minister power to deal with those cases.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The idea is not to exclude any of them?

Mr. MALCOLM: The idea is rather to bring others in under the act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should think that the Governor in Council would not want to change the basis for the computation of instalments of contributions. I thought that was definitely fixed at five per cent. There would not be any right to change that, would there?

Mr. MALCOLM: If my hon. friend will turn to section 17, sub-section 2, he will find this:

Any payment made under this section shall be deemed to be a contribution under this act and shall be made in one sum or in instalments of equivalent value computed on such bases as to mortality and interest as the Governor in Council may by regulation prescribe.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Really, what you are trying to do there, although it is not quite clear, is not to change the general basis at all, but to enable you to handle the other classes that may come in.

Mr. MALCOLM: I explained when I was speaking a little while ago that there would be a hardship created for those who had to pay five per cent, if it was compulsory to pay it all in one lump sum, and this clause is to provide for that.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Consolidated revenue fund.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Should we not have this fund earmarked? It is a trust fund and ought to be carefully earmarked.

Mr. MALCOLM: Section 12 covers that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Section 12 simply says that it shall form part of the consolidated revenue fund. The two clauses would seem to be a little inconsistent, would they not? To my mind not only should it not form part of the general fund, but it should be looked upon as a trust fund, and should carry its interest.

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend is quite right, and the committee have carefully provided for that. Section 11 (c) provides that the Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing the nature and form of the accounts to be kept of income and disbursements under this act, and of the statement to be laid before parliament by the minister. Then section 14 (c) provides that the minister shall lay before parliament within fifteen days after the commencement of each session:

A statement showing the amount received as contributions and the amount paid as allowances during the said year under this act together with such further information as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council by regulation made under this act. Under these provisions it is proposed that there will be maintained an account to which will be credited from year to year:

(a) the contributions made by contributors under the act;

(b) an equivalent contribution made by the government;

(c) interest on the mean fund for the year at 4 per cent per annum;

(d) a proportion of the initial liability created in respect of past service sufficient to extinguish such liability at the end of the period approximating the average term of service remaining to present employees who elect to become contributors. This period will be fixed by regulation after the period of election under the act has expired. It is probable it will be found to be not less than twenty years or more than thirty-five years. In a similar act in Great Britain the period was taken as forty years, but in that act the maximum superannuation allowance was reached at the end of forty years' service;

(e) such further amount as is necessary to provide the full actuarial reserve for the current and prospective allowances as ascertained by an actuarial valuation. It is believed, however, that no addition under this head will be necessary.

There will be charged to this account the annual and other allowances and gratuitities paid under the provisions of the act.

If in the above account the actuarial reserve is provided by a contribution of less than 5 per cent by the government, the government will benefit to that extent. On the other hand, it has a corresponding liability for further contributions—under (e) above. The assumption made in the scheme is that the contribution of 5 per cent and interest will cover the government's obligations under the scheme in respect of future service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is my hon. friend referring to paragraph (e) of section 11?

Mr. ROBB: No, of the memorandum I am reading.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Which section throws that liability on the government? I have not seen it so far.

Mr. ROBB: That will be by regulations to be provided.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think the government can very well increase the obligations of the government by regulation. It should be in the act. The minister read out that it was expected that the government's obligation would be covered by that five per cent, and that in some cases it might be less than five per cent, and he went on to say that under subsection (e) the government's liability might be extended. I would like to know what that means. I do not think the act properly covers it.

Mr. MALCOLM: It is a very difficult matter to say that the government's liability will be actually five per cent, and that is why the clause is included providing for a statement being brought down annually. The estimate is that it will be five per cent, but if it does not work out exactly that way, it will be shown to the House each year exactly how the scheme is working, and provision can be made for correction of the contributions either of the government or of the employees. With the tremendous amount of estimating that has to be done in a thing of this kind, it is not possible to bring it to a strict actuarial basis, and the committee have felt satisfied that anything that may occur that would be irregular and away from the fifty-fifty basis, being shown each year in the statement that was presented to the House, could be corrected.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think there is any question about the government not extending the liability under section 11 (e). That is simply to provide the basis for the computation of instalments of contributions provided under section 17, subsection 2.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is another point entirely; that is the contributions of those who are paying. I am speaking of what the minister was speaking of, the contributions by the government.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Income tax returns.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the effect of this? I suppose it is that the civil servant may deduct the amount from his salary. Has the minister considered applying that privilege to the ratepayer? An annuity is a form of insurance, that and nothing else. The premium may be paid for insurance payable on death, or at any given period. The principle here is that there should be no income tax on the moneys which are paid for protection. Is there any distinction in principle between this and the position of the general ratepayer? It perhaps should be considered some time.

Mr. ROBB: There is very much in what my hon. friend has said. He has had demands of this nature presented to him, as I have had, and has been just as procrastinating as I have been, but I am bound to say it is deserving of consideration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is here giving in to it in part and admitting the principle. That is something I never did. If ever I admitted the principle for one, I would admit it for everybody. I do not think there should be any favoured classes under income tax laws or any laws. I am not objecting to this at all, because as a matter of fact it does not amount to anything here; it is so small I do not suppose anything turns on it either one way or the other; but that is not the point. There ought to be some rhyme, reason and principle in connection with Dominion legislation.

Mr. MALCOLM: This clause is simply bringing the bill into conformity with the Income Tax Act, which has a similar provision.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is the first I have heard of it.

Mr. MALCOLM: Any contribution to a pension fund is deductible, I believe, by the Income Tax Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have had application upon application from insurance companies and the like. There is no difference whatever between a pension fund or annuity and the position of the ratepayer who cannot get anything special for himself. He has to take a twenty or thirty pay life policy as the case may be. Does the hon. member seriously say that those payments are not taxable?

Mr. MALCOLM: Payments of annuities are taxable.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course they are.

Mr. CALDWELL: What is this but an annuity.

Mr. CHURCH: Could not the minister consider some more modern method of funding this superannuation fund than mixing it up with the consolidated revenue fund?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is dealing with the wrong section.

Mr. CHURCH: It should be funded otherwise than through the consolidated revenue fund.

The CHAIRMAN: The section to which my hon. friend refers has been passed. We are dealing with income tax return now.

Mr. CHURCH: We are on clause 12.

The CHAIRMAN: No we are not, we are on clause 13.

Mr. ROBB: There is something in what my hon. friend says I will have it looked into.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Application of part two.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the significance of the application clause there?

Mr. MALCOLM: The bill is divided into parts. The part we have just finished with applies to new entrants. Part II is to take care of those under the Retirement Act. Part III takes care of those under the Superannuation Act; and part IV takes care of those who are under no scheme. This clause simply points out what part II covers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Under the first thought cannot officials come in even though they are not new entrants? We have officials who are not under any of these schemes.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes part IV covers all those.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will it cover everybody that is in the service?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes, every one who is permanent in the service and not contributing.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Election to become contributor.

Mr. LeSUEUR: I should like to have one point made clear. If a civil servant is under the Retirement Act I assume he could withdraw the funds to his credit plus the regular rate of interest allowed. Can he start under this new scheme from that date?

Mr. MALCOLM: A civil servant who remains in the service can elect to come under the superannuation fund, or he can continue in the service under the Retirement Act if he chooses.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In connection with this same clause, the present fund I think is in the consolidated revenue fund is it not?

Mr. MALCOLM: It is a separate fund, I understand.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We had a question put on the order paper and to the best of my recollection we were told it was part of the regular fund. It is a sub-account of the consolidated revenue fund, is it not? It is all in the general account.

Mr. MALCOLM: But in a separate account.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is just separate in this way, and I want the actuary to correct me if I am wrong; this is what I got in answer to the question asked some months ago: It is not separate in that there is an account which shows certain figures; it is not separate in that there are investments or anything of that kind. It absolutely forms part of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As it is already in that fund it does not seem to me that this wording works out properly:

> In the event of his so electing there shall be transferred to the consolidated revenue fund the amount standing to his credit in the Retirement Fund.

It is there now, and it ought to be no more to the credit of the consolidated revenue fund than it is now. It ought to go to his credit in connection with the new annuity fund that we are creating.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You could not change the name of the fund, the Retirement Fund has been created by law. This is simply a change in book-keeping.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is all it is. It is a change in book-keeping but I think it should be correctly stated. I just want the minister to follow me for a minute. The Retirement Fund is in the consolidated revenue fund now. There will be a new fund created which shall also be a part of the consolidated revenue fund. That new fund will be the fund which we will create with the employees under this bill. What we are saying here is that the amount to the employee's credit in the Retirement Fund shall be transferred to the consolidated revenue fund where it now is. It seems to me what really was intended was to transfer from the old fund, which forms part of the consolidated revenue fund, to the new fund which in turn will form part of the consolidated revenue fund. This section does not say that.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is right but in the records it appears there now as in the Retirement Fund and I should think this language would be correct when we are making the transfer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend is going to obey this act he will have to have another fund, which he can call anything he likes, but which will form part of the consolidated revenue fund. I know that is intended but this language does not convey the intention. In saying that I know I carry with me the judgment of the chairman of the special committee.

Mr. MALCOLM: I quite agree with what my hon. friend says. I think the wording would be clearer if the sentence had been phrased "There shall be transferred to superannuation fund account from the Retirement Fund account," or something of that sort. I think the wording should be as follows:

> There shall be transferred to Superannuation Account No. 5.

There should be something to distinguish this from the Retirement Fund account.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You might make it read:

To transfer to the Superannuation Fund hereby created.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes, Superannuation Fund account.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You are creating one now.

Mr. CHURCH: I call attention to section 19 which provides that any civil servant may at his option within one year after the date of the coming into force of this act elect to become a contributor, and so on. There are certain classes of civil servants who have not been on the permanent staff. For example, the postmen. Are they civil servants under the meaning of the act? They come under the old Retirement Fund I believe, and some are just temporary employees. Would they be affected by section 17 of the Superannuation Act? Are they officials under the meaning of this section, and the previous section, or under section 19? Would they come under the superannuation scheme? The superannuation is for members in good standing. Are they in good standing, and would they qualify under the new superannuation scheme? What is the status of those branch post office officials who have not a permanent position to-day?

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend will read section 17 he may find an explanation.

Mr. CHURCH: Has the Governor in Council power to interpret section 19 to take care of them?

Mr. MALCOLM: Does the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) think it would be satisfactory to strike out the words "consolidated revenue fund" and substitute therefor, "fund arising from this act."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that would be all right.

Mr. CHURCH: I would like an answer to my question.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on section 16 and have not reached section 19 yet. The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. CHURCH: I was quite in order. Why was I not in order?

The CHAIRMAN: We are on section 16.

[Mr. Malcolm.]

Mr. MALCOLM: I move that the words "consolidated revenue fund" in line 37 of section 16 be stricken out, and that the words "fund created under this act" be substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 17—Periods of non-contribution.

Mr. ROBB: I desire to submit for the consideration of the committee a section to be designated as 17a, and I believe it will appeal to the judgment of hon. members of this House. The present Clerk of the House is 68 years of age. Should he avail himself of the provisions of the Superannuation Bill, he would of necessity retire at the end of two years at age 70. His annual allowance would then be about $960 per annum. Should he not avail himself of the provisions of the bill, but continue to contribute to the Retirement Fund, no adequate retiring allowance would be provided by his interest in that fund.

It is considered fitting that more adequate provision should be made for his retirement and my amendment is suggested to provide for an allowance of $2,500 payable annually throughout life on his retirement within two years from the coming into force of this act.

This allowance is the same as that granted to the former Clerk, the late Dr. Flint, upon his retirement in 1918.

I beg to move the addition of the following as subsection 17a.

The Governor in Council may within two years from the date of the coming into force of this act provide for the retirement of the present Clerk of the House of Commons, and may grant to him on retirement an annual allowance payable throughout life of $2,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not rise to object to the motion at all, but to make a few short observations. One of the ideas of superannuation and retirement ought to be economy. If the Clerk of the House avails himself of this pension, I see no reason why we should have a Clerk and a Clerk Assistant. I see no reason why Mr. Beauchesne could not do all the work. He knows the work to be done perfectly well and is familiar with both languages.

An hon. MEMBER: He might be ill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think there would be much difficulty in that event. He could arrange for someone to take his place if he were ill. Here is a chance to save a little money.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And recognize a good servant.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, an excellent servant.

Mr. ROBB: I am bound to admit that I raised the same point as has been raised by my hon. friend, and I think that the matter should be considered when the present Clerk retires. I think the observations of my hon. friend are quite correct, and I concur in them.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Application of part III.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Which one is this?

Mr. ROBB: Superannuation Fund.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the same principles apply as in the case of the other?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the reason for any difference, if there be any difference?

Mr. MALCOLM: Under the Retirement Fund there is nothing to pay. All the allowances are granted. Under this there is a payment only of the difference—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, it is 5 per cent in one and a less amount in the other.

Mr. MALCOLM: This is 3½ per cent and 2 per cent as the case may be.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any other difference except that?

Mr. MALCOLM: No other point at all except that.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—Election to become contributor.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In reference to the periods of non-contribution, is that covered in the same way?

Mr. MALCOLM: Just the same way. In the case of half time they do not pay, and in the case of full time they pay the difference between what they have paid and 5 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certain payments are to be deemed a contribution. What is the idea there in connection with that section.

Mr. CHURCH: Will section 19 take care of temporary employees, such as postmen? Can they elect to become contributors under the act?

Mr. MALCOLM: The act covers all classes of permanent employees. If they have been under the Superannuation Act, they come under section 3. If they have been under no contributory scheme, they come under section 4. They are all taken care of.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I asked a question as to what was meant to be covered by certain payments being "deemed to be a contribution." It did not seem quite clear to me.

Mr. ROBB: If a man transfers and later resigns his office the contributions are returned to him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The section reads:

> Any payment made under the provisions of subsections 2 and 3 of this section shall be deemed to be a contribution under this act, and shall be made in one sum or in instalments of equivalent value.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is in all the sections.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the significance of it? I may have passed it over before.

Mr. MALCOLM: Section 5 (a) (iii) reads:

> The Governor in Council may grant to any contributor who has served in the Civil Service for ten years and upwards and who, for any reason other than misconduct or those hereinbefore specified retires from the Civil Service, a withdrawal allowance payable in one sum equal to the total amount of his contribution made under this act without interest.

We want to be sure that any payments of arrears made will be included in the amount of contributions that he withdraws.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Any payments of any kind?

Mr. MALCOLM: Any payments made to equalize the years he has not been paying. It may be for arrears. It may be for contributions from current salary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It did not seem to come in with an office being abolished.

Mr. ROBB: No this covers voluntary retirement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The underlying idea is that no matter how many changes there may have been in a man's rank, all those payments are to be considered as payments made by him in respect of his last office, because that would not mean anything unless it was in connection with his last office. It is rather hard to get the meaning from the section. No litigation can ever turn on this, and as long as it is understood what is meant, it is all right.

Section agreed to.

On section 21—Election to become contributor.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This covers everybody that is not under either of the other two funds.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Those who want to come in under this fund have to pay arrears at the rate of 5 per ecnt?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Supposing you have a man who cannot afford to pay 5 per cent and who has been in the service for twenty years.

Mr. MALCOLM: He can have half time allowed to him—ten years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then he would have to pay 5 per cent on ten years?

Mr. MALCOLM: No; he would be allowed the benefit of ten years without the payment of anything. If he wanted the benefit of the full twenty years, he would have to pay 5 per cent for the twenty years without interest. If he wants to sacrifice ten years, the scheme will give him the benefit of ten years' service gratuitously.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If he had not any cash at all?

Mr. MALCOLM: The payments can be made by regulation under the act. For instance. subsection (5) of section 19 takes care of that:

> Any payment made under the provisions of subsections (2) or (3) of this section shall be deemed to be a contribution under this act, and shall be made in one sum or in instalments of equivalent value computed on such bases as to mortality and interest as the Governor in Council may by regulation prescribe.

The amount may be deducted from his salary through life; or he can pay it all in cash or in payments of equal amounts for five, ten, fifteen or twenty years. Several schemes are going to be offered to civil servants to take care of that difficulty by regulation in order to make the payment as easy as possible. That point was thoroughly discussed by the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What my hon. friend refers to has nothing to do with part IV at all.

Mr. MALCOLM: The same clause covers each of the sections. I read that one just for convenience. Subsection (3) of subsection 21 is the same section as referring to employees covered under part IV.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All that does is to deal with the payments which are made?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And it says that payments which are made shall be deemed to have been contributed under this act?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not what I was asking. What I want to know is this. We have a man working in the service for twenty years. He has no money and he wants to come in under this scheme. Would he be allowed to come in on simply paying 5 per cent with a ten-year allowance?

Mr. MALCOLM: If he has been in the service for twenty years, he may be allowed ten years' service without paying any arrears.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In that instance he need pay no arrears whatever.

Mr. MALCOLM. Nothing whatever.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If he pays ten years' arrears, he gets the benefit of the twenty years?

Mr. MALCOLM: No. A man who has not contributed to any scheme and who has been in the service for twenty years may elect to come under the scheme without the payment of any arrears, in which case he will be allowed ten years' service gratuitously. If he wants the benefit of the full twenty years, he is allowed to pay in 5 per cent of his salary for that time without interest, either in cash or in instalments.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is, he gets the benefit of ten years' service without paying anything at all and he gets the benefit of twenty years' service if he pays for twenty years? What is the idea of putting them on a different basis?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I thought I made it clear before that the act was based on mutuality. Those who pay get what they pay for. If some people cannot pay the full amount, that is where the generosity comes in and we give them the benefit of one-half the term of their service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not mutuality at all.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The basis of the act is mutuality. It is and it is not, if the hon. gentleman wants to put it in that way. If you want to get the full term of your service, you have to pay for it. If you want the benefit of a certain portion of your service and you cannot pay for it all, this government will give that portion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A man who has been in the service for twenty years and who does not want to pay any arrears gets the benefit of ten years' service for nothing. If we are going to handle this on the basis of mutuality as the hon. junior member for Ottawa tells us is being done, the other man would get the benefit of his full twenty years' service if he paid for ten years. In that case each would be allowed the ten years' service on the same basis. It is perfectly clear.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not see it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know whether we should discuss it, but it is just as well that we should see where we are. I should like to see if there is anything of fairness between different members of the service. I will take the same case of men having twenty years service.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The element of mutuality comes in when the government grants him the one-half and says: Pay up the other. That is the fifty-fifty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It does not do that, if the chairman is correct. If my hon. friend (Mr. Chevrier) is right, then the chairman is wrong, because they both cannot be right. The chairman tells us that if a man wants to get the benefit of his 20 years he must pay for the whole of the 20 years; he pays his 5 per cent. without interest. But the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) tells us the converse; he says that they both get the benefit of 10 years.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I got it wrong, and I am perfectly right in what I said, namely, that one man gets 10 years for nothing while the other has to pay for 20. If they were both put on the same basis the man who got the 20 would pay only for the extra 10, because the other employee would get 10 for nothing anyway.

Mr. MALCOLM: The hon. member loses sight of the fact that the full cost of the benefits under this scheme is 10 per cent of the salary of the employee for the full 20 years he has been in the service, 5 per cent being contributed by himself and 5 per cent by the government. He is allowed to come in by paying his 5 per cent and he has this advantage over those who have paid 5 per cent into the Retirement Fund, that he has not to pay interest. The employee has 20 years to his credit and in that time the total cost of the scheme is 10 per cent of his salary, half of which would have been paid by the government and half by himself. He is allowed to come in by paying his 5 per cent for the total period. If he does not want to pay anything, he is allowed half the period for nothing.

Section agreed to.

On section 22—Temporary employees.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the effect of section 22?

Mr. MALCOLM: This is to enlarge the scope of the act. The only employees covered by this section are those who come under the Civil Service Act or who have been exempted therefrom by order in council. This section provides that all such civil servants shall come under the provisions of this Act to the same extent as ordinary permanent employees unless they are assigned by the Civil Service Commission upon certificate of temporary employment and are still serving under such certificate.

Section agreed to.

On section 23—Operation of act extended

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When is the act to come into effect?

Mr. ROBB: Upon assent. This section applies to the Calder Act and the two acts will run concurrently until November 1. If by any chance this bill is not passed by the Senate we may have to extend the Calder Act to March 31 to provide for the next year. It is hoped however that the bill will be passed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This provision is up to November 1. Why not make it March?

Mr. ROBB: I would rather leave it as it is and it can be amended later on if that is found necessary. The Civil Service, I may say, is satisfied with it.

Bill as amended reported.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PUBLIC SERVICE RETIREMENT ACT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the operation of the Public Service Retirement Act shall be extended until the thirty-first day of March, 1925, and that the said act shall be deemed not to have expired and ceased to be in force after the first day of July, 1924, but to have continued and to be in force for all purposes thereof whatsoever until the thirty-first day of March, 1925.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The first question is purely a matter of detail. Why is the minister choosing a fraction of the year instead of a year for the period of extension?

Mr. ROBB: This afternoon the Civil Service Superannuation bill was reported from the committee of the House. The bill based upon this resolution will run until the 31st of March, 1925, but if the Superannuation bill, having got its third reading in this House, passes the Senate, then we will have this bill amended to provide for extension of the Public Service Retirement Act until the first of November of this year to correspond with the other act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that the date when the Superannuation Act takes effect?

Mr. ROBB: No, the Superannuation Act will take effect as soon as it is assented to. But we will allow employees until the first of November to decide which of these acts they will take advantage of, the Calder Act or the Superannuation Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would think it would be well to allow a longer time than that.

Mr. ROBB: We could determine that afterwards. We proposed in the bill as it would come down to let the act run to the 31st of March, but that might be modified.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would permit it to run to the 31st of March in any event. I suggest that the word "and" should be "or" in the first line on page 13, if there is need of both expressions, namely "expired" and "ceased to be in force." If there is no need of both, one would do, but if there is need of both, then the word "and" should certainly be "or." I do not suppose both terms are necessary. I would say that "ceased to be in force" is quite sufficient, but if there is any difference in meaning between the two then certainly the word "and" should be "or."

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend is right, and I move that the resolution be amended accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

[Mr. Robb.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 227 to amend the Public Service Retirement Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved the second reading of Bill No. 195, to amend the Immigration Act.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Before the motion passes I wish to call the attention of the House to one section of the bill, I think it is section 3, which gives additional powers to the minister. At the present time he has power to issue a permit authorizing any person to enter Canada, and he now seeks to take further power to allow any person who has entered or landed in Canada to remain there. I think that is too much power and too great an extension of the already very extensive powers possessed by the minister. It is extreme enough surely to be able to say that he can allow anyone whatever, at his own sweet will, to enter Canada. It is surely not necessary to have it made law that anyone having entered Canada, illegally, as it may be, will be allowed to remain by application to the minister. At the very least I would suggest that the word "legally" should be inserted so that it would read, "having legally entered or landed in Canada."

I think also the bill should contain the provision that we find in so many other acts, that within ten days or a limited time after the opening of the session, the minister shall present to parliament a statement showing the number of people who have been allowed in under this clause and the particulars concerning them. But as the section reads now I protest against it, and I will endeavour to move an amendment in committee dealing with it. It may be made possible under that to allow any number of people who have entered Canada illegally to remain here by the mere expression of the will of the minister or of one of his deputies. What brings the matter more particularly home in this connection is this: I wish to call the attention of the House to what occurred in Nova Scotia this spring. In answer to questions in the House by the hon. member, for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), we were told on the 28th of April that the British Empire Steel Corporation had brought in 105 Chinamen to work on six of their boats trading between five named ports in Canada. I would just like to give the language used:

A bond for $105,000 has been deposited with the department (by the British Empire Steel Corporation), this bond to cover 105 Chinese.

I want to call particular attention to this:

These Chinese are regarded as non-immigrants, and the bond deposited by the British Empire Steel Corporation will be retained until the department is satisfied that all of the Chinese covered by the same have been checked out of Canada.

Checked out of Canada; I wish to call particular attention to those words. Again, in answer to further questions by myself on the 28th of May we were informed:

It must be remembered that in none of the cases referred to were these Chinese admitted to Canada within the meaning of the Immigration Act, but were simply allowed to come into Canada temporarily.

You will note the peculiar and invidious situation. These men are not in Canada, and yet when they leave they have to be checked out, and there is a heavy bond put up to ensure their being checked out. They are in, and yet they are not in.

Scientists tell us in their lighter moments that they like to dream or think of a phase of existence which contains four dimensions, as compared with three dimensions of this present life. Some scientists think the world to which we will go after death is one of four dimensions. One can readily conceive it would need to be of different dimensions to the one in which we are functioning now to have these Chinamen or anybody else at one and the same time in Canada and yet out of it. They can hardly be in both situations at once, and yet that is precisely the condition indicated by the answers to the questions I have quoted.

The boats on which these Chinamen are employed run between five ports in Canada: Sydney, Halifax, Montreal, Louisburg and St. John. They are all Canadian ports, and the boats are continually in Canadian waters. These Chinamen are not employed for a day or two, but possibly for years. They are permanent employees on these boats, Canadian boats trading in Canadian waters, and, as I maintain, their admission into Canada was perfectly illegal. The only justification given by the department, and surely it is the lamest of justifications in this case, is the good old-fashioned one of precedent. They say—I will quote the answer to one question:

There is nothing in the Immigration Act or in the regulations in the Chinese Immigration Act which applies in a case of this kind.

And yet they were allowed in? Because it has been done before. Precedent! Now, although I am not particularly fond of precedent when it stands in the way of reform, yet there are occasions when precedent can be applicably cited—in logic, or reasoning, legal decisions, or even, perhaps, acts of legislation. In these cases it is, perhaps, applicable to quote precedent; but when it comes down to quoting precedent as a justification for an illegal action, then I think precedent falls to the ground and falls very hard. One cannot conceive that an illegal act can be justified in any way whatever by saying that it has been done before. If we are going to adhere to that principle all that criminals have got to do when they are prosecuted is to say "Yes, I robbed the bank but banks have been robbed before and therefore we have a precedent." That is an exact comparison with the condition in this case. I do not think there was ever a case where justification, on the plea of precedent, falls flatter than it does in this case.

There is another reason that makes it even worse than what it appears. It is said, and said truly no doubt, that Chinamen were admitted before under similar conditions during the war, and various cases that occurred between 1914 and 1921 are cited in which Chinamen were admitted. But there are two conditions which must be considered in that regard and which absolutely dissipate the idea that there is any force to the argument that Chinamen were brought in before. The first is this: Chinamen were allowed in during the war, and the expression "during the war" can be used to justify and explain a great many things. However, the war is not in progress now. But there is a still further reason. During the war the admission of Chinamen was legal on condition of paying a $500 poll tax. To-day it is not legal under any circumstances whatever either with or without the payment of a poll tax. But prior to 1923 the only thing that might have happened would have been the loss by the government of $500 per head unless a bond was given and it was provided that the employers would be responsible for this bond. If this were done one could well conceive that for that time at any rate no great harm could be done by allowing those Chinamen to come in. But that condition no longer exists. It is not legal now to bring in Chinamen by paying $500 or any other sum, and to say that a bond was given is no justification. I do not care if I give a bond for a million dollars; it is no justification for my robbing a bank. And when it is said in this case that a bond was put up I reply that there is nothing whatever in the act which justifies the putting up of a bond.

Now, I want to consider all these circumstances. I heard the other day that a very worthy judge, now resident in the East, went out one Sunday morning in British Columbia and shot a pheasant, and by so doing he committed no less than four direct violations of the British Columbia statutes. I think the conditions are somewhat similar in this regard only they are very much worse. The first respect in which the statute was openly violated was this: I call attention to section 2 of the Alien Labour Act, being section 2 of chapter 97 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. Section 2 reads as follows:

> It shall be unlawful for any person, company, partnership or corporation, in any manner to prepay the transportation or in any way to assist, encourage or solicit the importation or immigration of any alien or foreigner into Canada, under contract or agreement, parole or special, express or implied, made previous to the importation or immigration of such alien or foreigner, to perform labour or service of any kind in Canada.

That is the section of the Alien Act which applies in this case. Now, it is openly admitted, it is not even denied, that these Chinamen were brought in by contract from China, via England, to work upon these boats. It is so stated both in the question and in the answer referred to; they evidently come under the scope of this section. They were brought in as contract alien labourers. So strict is the act in that regard that section 8 of the same act even imposes a severe penalty on the master of any vessel who brings them in and permits them to be landed from any foreign port. The language of the section is "Who, previous to embarkation, had entered into a contract or agreement" and so on. The law even penalizes the master of the vessel who is a party to any deal of that kind. I think it is abundantly shown that these men were brought in illegally—they were alien contract labourers.

But if that is not sufficient we can turn to section 5 of the Chinese Immigration Act of last year, the act of 1923. Section 5 says:

> The entry to or landing in Canada of persons of Chinese origin or descent is confined to the following classes.

And the section names them: First, the diplomatic corps; second, children born in Canada who have left for their education; third, merchants; fourth, students. These Chinamen that came to work on these boats at Halifax, Nova Scotia, were not members of the diplomatic corps, they were not born in Canada, they were not merchants and they were not students. Therefore they came in in direct and flagrant violation of section 5 of this act which we passed last year in order to deal with such cases.

If that is not sufficient I will quote another section and another violation. Section 7 of the same act reads as follows:

> No person of Chinese origin or descent other than the classes mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 5 and sections 23 and 24 of this act—

Neither of which applies in this case.

> —shall be permitted to enter or land in Canada elsewhere than at the ports of Vancouver and Victoria.

These men did not land at the ports of Vancouver or Victoria. They landed at Halifax, in the province of Nova Scotia, and there again is a distinct and unescapable violation of that section of the act. Again there is another section, section 22 of the same act. This section deals with the case of Chinese in bond. It was said that a bond of $105,000 was put up as a guarantee that these men would be deported, but there is no provision for that kind of thing in this or any other act. Here is the section relating to bonding privileges:

> Persons of Chinese origin or descent may pass through Canada in transit from one port or place out of Canada to another port or place out of Canada—

Provided that it was in accordance with the regulations. These Chinks did not come from one port of Canada and pass through in transit to another port—they stayed in Canada. That is the only provision in that or any other act by which they could come in in bond, so that this bond that was to be given was illegal and I presume had no effect. I do not know about that, but it certainly was illegally entered into. So, there are four distinct violations each one of which would be sufficient, one would think, to ban any ordinary individual.

Now it may be asserted that a similar condition exists in Vancouver, and why discriminate between the East and the West. In Vancouver there are a number of Chinamen employed upon the boats owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway which run to China and Japan. I am not here to defend the government in subsidizing these boats manned by Chinamen in any sense but the conditions are different. The Chinamen there are hired in China. They work on these boats and they stay on the boat in China for a considerable time. More than two-thirds of their total time is spent either in China or on the high seas. They are only in Vancouver whilst the boat unloads and reloads, only a few days each month and they can be easily guarded there—they are practically kept in gaol there until the boats sail again. They are not hired in China in defiance of the Alien Labour Act as were the men in this case. So the conditions can be truthfully said to be entirely different. The question arises why were these men brought here? Well, I have here a quotation from a local newspaper, and I do not want to stress this particular man's plea because he was only a victim of circumstances along with other people. His name appears to have been Duncan McDonald. He was a fireman. He joined one of the boats of the British Empire Steel Corporation, desired to serve three years, and obtain a fourth class engineer's ticket.

> With this view, I did my best and served from the stoke-hold to the engine room.

And so on. Then he says further:

> I was at work in the engine room Saturday afternoon when the second engineer came in. He said: "The Chinamen are coming Monday, so I suppose you had better go out and look for another job." I am now pitching coal in the fires of an old rum-runner, very little bigger than a wash tub.

This man forwards to this paper certified certificates of his character, giving him the highest character for sobriety, intelligence and diligence. He was a young Nova Scotian trying to make his way in the country. That did not happen in Hong Kong, China; it happened right here at the Canadian port of Halifax. Why was this man fired? His superior officers did not want to discharge him, but gave him the highest character. They discharged Duncan McDonald "only because it has been decided to man this department by Chinamen." The paper continues:

> We ask in all the seriousness that can attach to the question, could anything be more tragic, could anything be better calculated to kill ambition and usefulness in a bright young son of this province?

The paper further says:

> The very flower of the manhood of Nova Scotia has been pouring out of this country at an alarming rate; the exodus has assumed appalling proportions. These young men are leaving this province because they cannot find work in this province, and Duncan McDonald—conspicuous for his integrity of character and his aptitude for his work; perfectly sober and attentive to his duties—must go out and take a job on a rum-runner because someone wants to man "Canadian home trade" ships with Chinamen.
> Why was Duncan McDonald discharged? Certainly not because he was a drunkard; certainly not because he was a ruffian and an incompetent. His superiors have set their hands to the statement that he is everything that an honest, sober, and intelligent workman should be. Duncan McDonald was discharged because "the Chinamen were coming." And why were the Chinamen coming? There can be only one answer; because they will work for lower wages than Canadian seamen receive.

It has been stated in answer to a question asked in this House that it is the purpose of this company to confine the employment of Chinamen to firemen and cooks, and they give as a reason for that that they cannot obtain firemen and cooks to man their boats. There is a large number of employment agencies in Canada, and I have no doubt such agencies exist in the eastern provinces. What record is there of these agencies being applied to to see if they could supply the necessary cooks and firemen for this work, in order that Nova Scotians should not be fired out of the remaining jobs they have, and Chinamen placed in their positions? I think a number of men could have been supplied by the employment agencies throughout Canada if an attempt had been made to get them. But the real reason—and we must not shirk it—that these Chinamen were brought in is that they would work at a cheaper rate than Canadians, and their employers, quite properly from their point of view, chose to employ them; and so long as they kept within the law that was their privilege.

But they have not kept within the law. They have brought the men in, first in defiance of the Alien Labour law, secondly in defiance of the Chinese Immigration Act, and thirdly in defiance of the section which prohibits them from landing at any point in Canada excepting Vancouver and Victoria. They were therefore improperly brought in. The only method by which they obtained entry to Canada appears to be a letter from the deputy minister, for which there is no sanction within the four corners of the legislation of Canada. This permission should be cancelled, the men should be deported, and steps should be taken to prevent anything of this kind happening again. I hope the minister will take the opportunity of replying in this debate; or perhaps when the estimates come up the matter can be discussed, in order to discover what steps can be taken to correct the evil. I am quite willing to assume that this was a casual error, but we do not want it established as a right thing, because it is not according to the law, and it may spread. It may be used to allow any number of aliens of any description whatever to be brought into Canada.

I might say one or two words more upon the suggestion that they are not in Canada. They are in Canada. They could not get into Canada by any other means than by landing. They came out as passengers from England on a boat called the Cedric. That boat landed those men on the wharf at Halifax, and from there I presume they were put on board the company's boats. They were in Canada technically and actually. They are in Canada, sailing on Canadian boats and in Canadian waters, and displacing Canadian men. I cannot see that there is any way that the matter can be explained, except by frankly admitting that a mistake has been made, and I think that some steps should be taken to remedy this error in the immediate future.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Amending paragraph (d) of section 2.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This amendment is along the lines of an amendment introduced last year, and to a certain extent is a move in the right direction. It is an attempt to get rid of some of the vicious legislation that was placed on the statute books in 1919, during the period in which there was still more or less of a war hysteria. But I submit this amendment does not go nearly far enough, and I would urge that there should be some further changes at this time. The latter part of section 1 reads:

> And provided further that no person who belongs to the prohibited or undersirable classes within the meaning of section 41 of this act shall be capable of acquiring Canadian domicile.

Now we must turn to section 41 to find out just who they are to whom reference is made. That section reads:

> Whenever any alien advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Great Britain or Canada, or other British dominion, colony, possession or dependency, or the overthrow by force or violence of constituted law and authority, or assassination, or shall by word or act create or attempt to create riot or public disorder in Canada, or shall by common repute belong to or be suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from, or in any way attempts to control any resident of Canada by force or threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail; such person for the purposes of this act shall be considered and classed as an undesirable immigrant.

I think it is very clear that no one will urge that any of these crimes which are mentioned here are to be in any sense condoned, but I should like to point out the bearing of this section. The phrase is "Anyone who shall by common repute." I do not think we have any business to act on common repute. A man ought to be proved guilty of any crime: The minister ought not to act on common repute. Not only that, but the clause proceeds, "Or to be suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization." It seems to me that a man should not be declared guilty simply because some official suspects him of belonging to an illegal organization. I am not defending the man who belongs to an organization which resorts to these tactics, but I urge that we should have something more than suspicion on which to convict him. It would be most regrettable that section 41 should go through as it stands in the bill, although I frankly admit that it is a considerable advance on the old section 41. One point in which there is possibly an advance is that the old section 41 as contained in chapter 26 reads: "every person," whereas it now reads "every alien." I should like to protest against the aliens being thus singled out. The effort is being made in this legislation to protect people of British birth, and I think they should be protected. They should not be victims of suspicion; they should not be condemned because of common adverse repute, but aliens also ought to be protected. We have hundreds of thousands of alien-born people in the West. We have many who have not yet taken out their naturalization papers. I am not pleading for those of them who are guilty of the practices enumerated in this section, but if accused they ought to have a fair trial and that is not provided for in this legislation. Moreover, there still remain unrevised paragraphs (n) and (o) of chapter 25, section 3.

Mr. ROBB: Before my hon. friend leaves that point, will he refer to section 42, subsection 2? I think he will find that ample provision is made for an inquiry by the department.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is true there may be a departmental inquiry, but it is to that that I object. A mere departmental inquiry is not sufficient. Such a case ought to come before the courts of the land. If I may pass to paragraphs (n) and (o), these are among the prohibited classes:

> (n) Persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Canada or of constituted law and authority, or who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government, or who advocate the assassination of public officials, or who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property.

Again these are very serious evils that are aimed at, but the phrase—

> Those who are opposed to organized government.

—is very broad.

Mr. ROBB: These persons under the act are excluded from Canada. They are never admitted. Does my hon. friend want them admitted?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not. I know the ostensible purpose is to exclude these people, but if they get past the gates they can still be dealt with under this clause as immigrants. These are the prohibited classes:

Those who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government.

That phrase is too broad because, in practice, it may very easily be interpreted to mean those who are opposed to some particular organized government. We have heard all sorts of governments proposed. We even advocate in this House certain changes of government. If a man is an alien and advocates some government that is not familiar in this country, he may come under this section. The same is true of the other phrase:

Those who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property.

No one would reprobate more than I would the unlawful destruction of property or any destruction of property, but this phrase may be and has been very broadly interpreted. If during an industrial dispute a striker might advocate the leaving of the pumps and the safety of mines be threatened, he might be said to be teaching the unlawful destruction of property, because his action might result in certain losses to property. That is the line of interpretation which was actually taken in one case in Canada. That is the danger in this legislation as has been pointed out by the Trades and Labour Council of Canada and their legal adviser. I would suggest that if we are to have sections of this character in the act, they ought to be more definitely phrased. This section, so loosely drawn, lends itself to broad interpretations under which almost anyone might be convicted. Paragraph (o) reads:

Persons who are members of or affiliated with any organization entertaining or teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government. . . .

And so on. That is the same style of phrase, and it may very easily be interpreted as meaning those who are dissatisfied with the particular kind of government which prevails at the present time. The viciousness of the legislation in my judgment, lies in the fact that anyone who is suspected of doing this kind of thing, if he is an immigrant—and I may say with regard to paragraph (n) or (o), whether he is an alien immigrant or a British-born immigrant, because there is no limitation—is declared to belong to the prohibited classes. Although he may have gotten past the immigration gates, he still belongs to those prohibited classes. We are told in the introductory paragraph that anybody who belongs to those prohibited classes is not allowed to establish domicile in Canada. This means that any of those people who are suspected of acting or thinking along these lines may be deprived of the right to trial by jury.

I agree with the objects aimed at in this legislation, that we ought to keep out of this country undesirables. But I believe, when a man comes into this country, when he lives for a time here, when he commits or is suspected of committing a crime against the country, his trial ought to be, not a mere departmental inquiry, but a trial before a judge and jury. We owe him that. Our general conviction is that every man in this country ought to have a fair trial, and I would urge that the minister consider the advisability of so redrafting this legislation as to ensure to every man in Canada a fair trial and not merely a departmental inquiry.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think there is anybody in this House who is not desirous that people of undesirable character should be kept out; but I would urge upon the minister that it is un-British, un-Canadian and unfair to turn a man out of this country because he may have a common repute of being undesirable. It would be so easy for some unpopular person among a certain class to be condemned because people who do not like him said that he came under one of those undesirable classes. That a man should be liable to deportation, whether he is an alien or a British subject just because he is suspected of entertaining certain undesirable beliefs, surely is very far from the ideals of justice and fair play. I feel that if we pass any law which does not measure up to the ideals of fairness and justice which we all should hold, we only lower the law, and the appreciation of the law, in the minds of the people. I believe that the legislation should be modified along these lines. I do not condone these offences nor do I desire the people entertaining these views to have asylum in our country; but they should not be kept out, nor should they be turned out if they do get in, simply because by common repute they hold certain views and because they may be suspected by some one or other of harbouring undesirable doctrines.

Mr. ROBB: The laws of this country are enacted for the protection of the Canadian people, and there is no hardship in any respect in this legislation nor has any hardship been caused hitherto to the people of the classes referred to. Let me read the law to hon. gentlemen who I am sure will agree that no hardship is imposed upon any of the people who have not been proven guilty of these offences. Section 42 reads:

> Upon receiving a complaint from any officer, or from any clerk or secretary or other official of a municipality, against any person alleged to belong to any prohibited or undesirable class, the minister or the deputy minister may order such person to be taken into custody and detained at an immigrant station for examination and an investigation of the facts alleged in the said complaint to be made by a Board of Inquiry or by an officer acting as such. Such Board of Inquiry or officer shall have the same powers and privileges and shall follow the same procedure, as if the person against whom complaint is made were being examined upon application to enter or land in Canada and such person shall have the same rights and privileges as he would have if seeking to enter or land in Canada.
> 2. If upon investigation of the facts such Board of Inquiry or examining officer is satisfied that such person belongs to any of the prohibited or undesirable classes mentioned in sections 40 and 41 of this act, such persons shall be deported forthwith, subject, however, to such right of appeal as he may have to the minister.

So that there is the right not only of inquiry but also of appeal to the minister, and I believe that the people of Canada want to see justice meted out shortly and swiftly to offenders against this law.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Why does the minister object to a fair trial by the courts of the land?

Mr. ROBB: Does the hon. gentleman not think that this is a fair trial?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A departmental inquiry, with an appeal to the minister the only appeal, is not a fair trial.

Mr. MILLAR: I think that very broad powers for the minister and the department are required just at the present time. At certain seasons of the year, particularly in harvest time on the prairies, it is quite possible—and indeed at times it does occur—for workmen to cause trouble and even terror. It is the easiest thing in the world just when the grain is being threshed, and when there are large gangs working together, for a man to put stones in the sheaves and so wreck the threshing machines; and it is not at all improbable that they would go the length of putting a bundle of matches in a sheaf. This is not imaginary, for I have had an experience of this sort myself. On one occasion I engaged two men who came from the province down by the sea of which we hear so much, and they deliberately put stones in the sheaves. They admitted having done so and when asked the reason they said that they wanted a rest; that was all. There may be something in the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) that these people should have a trial by judge or jury, but in many cases it is difficult to convict those men who belong to the I.W.W. and who are agitators. I noticed very recently that in a settlement in the Peace river country—I do not know just where it was but it was in the southern part of the district—a number of men of this class got together and made certain threats, and in fact even drove out the only two Canadian families that were in the district. They simply defied the powers. I have nothing but a newspaper report for this.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): I do not think the hon. gentleman should take the newspaper report too seriously; I know the district well and I do not think there is any foundation for the allegation.

Mr. MILLAR: The hon. member knows the district better than I do, and as I said I have just the newspaper reports for it. I know however for a fact, which no one can deny, that in the harvest season when men are gathered together from the United States and from eastern and far western Canada, there is very grave danger of machinery being destroyed. It is necessary at such times to rush the work through and one has to engage almost any able-bodied man who offers his services. It is difficult to weed out the undesirable ones and these men working among the others very often start an agitation; they will burn buildings and destroy threshing machinery and generally cause a great deal of trouble and loss of property. A law of this kind may possibly be required in the industrial centres; but speaking from this standpoint alone in regard to the western provinces I think it is highly necessary for the minister and the department to have broad powers to enable them to deal severely with this class in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: And swiftly.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am in entire accord with the measure as explained by the minister. I am a friend of labour but I am a friend of the man who wants to work and who desires order in this country. I am an opponent down to the ground of anarchy and anarchists, and I know that men have come to this country with no other intention than to cause trouble and stir up agitation, thinking they could subvert order in the towns or cities in which they settled. We had a group of harvesters from Scoland or England—

9 p.m.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Not from Scotland.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, they were from England, Ireland or Scotland, but the man's name I want to mention particularly is Leslie, which I venture to say is a Scottish name. He went on the prairies with a group of harvesters and as soon as the harvest was over he made his way to Winnipeg and from Winnipeg to Toronto, and he caused more annoyance and was a more violent anarchist I suppose than we have ever had in our city. He stood up in the dock in the police court and declared himself a revolutionist who was proud to have been able to shake hands with Lenin of Russia; and he wanted the city of Toronto turned into a Moscow. He led a party down to this city this session, having walked all the way from Toronto to intimidate this government, and one thing I can commend the government for most heartily is the fact that there was no surrender to that bunch of Bolshevists. There were not very many of them. I think it is only right that we should have a law to deport a man like that or any group of men who will create disturbance in the country. I agree with the hon. member (Mr. Millar) that the minister should have wide powers to deal with men of that type. I think I may fairly say that we have in this country among the masses of the people a larger proportion who are orderly and law-abiding than perhaps can be found in any other country in the world. I think that is largely due to the fact that our agricultural population is large. Nothing makes a man steady, sober and orderly like having some real stake in the country he lives in. In this Dominion of Canada every man can have some stake here; if he will practise thrift and make a few sacrifices in his young manhood he can have land of his own and a home of his own.

Mr. GOOD: May I ask my hon. friend whether the stability depends on the amount of stake a man has in the country? If so, would that apply in superlative degree to a millionaire?

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not quite get the drift of my hon. friend's question. I do not know that any millionaires are going around like Mr. Leslie, declaring themselves in favour of revolution. I do not think millionaires make revolutionists, although some of my hon. friends will disagree with that. I do not think a man is a revolutionist unless he has evil in his heart. I do not think any healthy man need starve in this country. Any man who is industrious and thrifty can make his way and gain a competence in Canada. But men who come here with a different idea, that of stirring up strife, ought to be deported, and the more quickly they are deported the better it is for those who remain. There are men in this House, on every side, who began their lives with no more money than Mr. Leslie had when he came out to this country, but they did not attain a competence or a comfortable livelihood without effort. Are we who desire to work, are people who are sober, thoughtful, steady and orderly, to be subject to the agitations of men who pride themselves on their acquaintance with Trotsky and Lenin and declare for revolution in public places in this country? I think not. And as far as I at least am capable, my voice and my vote and my influence, though they may be very little, will be directed against that class of people, and I will support this or any government in taking whatever measures are necessary to get such people out of the country without delay.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am going to address myself to a very brief effort to alter the viewpoint of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) and possibly of others who may agree with him. But before doing so I commend the government for coming so close to, indeed entirely into, our ground on this subject, as they have on many others under the enlightening influence of office. What a few years ago was considered rank and bold autocracy is now considered wise and sane administration. The deportation powers of a minister or of a government are not powers that are exercised for the purposes of punishing offences. They do not imply a crime; they do not imply an offence against the law. They are simply a power, one of many, exercisable for the purpose of selecting the immigrants who come to Canada. This is their purpose and no other. Before any citizen of our country or any alien on our shores is to be deprived of his liberty or his life he is entitled to a trial by judge or by jury. But why is this? Because his liberty and his life are his natural rights, rights that no one can deny him unless he forfeits them in whole or in part by his own misconduct, by offences against the law of the land. But to live in Canada is the natural right of nobody until his citizenship there is established It is not the natural right even of any man from England, even of any man merely because he is a British subject. We are not prepared to admit a man simply because he can raise the British flag. His indefeasible right to live in Canada we have never admitted, and we are sorry we cannot admit it. Much less have we ever admitted that any man from anywhere else on earth has a natural right to have a habitation here.

So when we deny him what he never had a right to, what he never established his right to, and when we do that by the means of deportation, we are not committing any wrong against him. It is essential, in order that this instrument may be exercisable for the purpose of properly selecting immigrants, that the powers of the minister be summary. It is essential that they be capable of swift and immediate execution in appropriate cases. But to suggest that we must give a man a trial by jury before we decide whether he has a right to come to Canada and stay here after he has arrived is to my mind absurd. We are not denying anything to which the man ever became entitled. We are merely exercising in the only way we effectively can, and with the least possible injury to him, an essential power of government.

Mr. McMASTER: Does the hon. member think it wise that people should be deported on general repute or suspicion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not as a rule. But there do come cases where the repute itself is so notorious as to amount to a conclusion. I do not know that ever within the period in which this clause has been in force there has been a case of deportation because of mere repute. I am not certain that there has; if there has I fancy the cases were very few. But if it were a notorious case where the man's reputation was world-wide as an anarchist, why would the minister need to have some other proof? He might exercise his power in such a case merely on the basis of the repute or notoriety of the individual. It seems to me it is not unwise to have the law such that he can.

Mr. McMASTER: What about the suspicion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The word "suspicion" does not appear to me to be necessary at all.

Mr. MARTELL: When the minister is acting in this way is it not the case that he is acting judicially? I mean, that he is taking cognizance of whatever evidence is before him? Moreover, a trial by jury might mean that a man would have to be in this country a year before he could be brought to trial.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly the minister's powers under the act are judicial powers.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Although the ostensible object is that of selecting immigrants, this power may be exercised to secure the punishment of people who have committed or who are suspected or reputed to have committed crime. As I understand the amendment, whether a man has been here one year or twenty years makes no difference; under this legislation it is simply impossible for such a man to establish domicile. An Englishman who has come to Canada and lived here for twenty-five years and is suspected by some of his neighbours or by some over-zealous official of being a member of this particular class or having tendencies along this line, might conceivably be called before a committee of inquiry appointed by the minister and summarily deported to Great Britain. I say that is an intolerable situation.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is building up a straw man to knock him down.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not knocking down a straw man, as an attempt was made in 1919 to do just that thing, and had it not been for a general protest across the country it would have been done.

Mr. COOTE: I would just like to ask the minister, and the question is brought to my mind by the leader of the opposition, how long an Englishman would have to be in this country before he would have the rights of Canadian citizenship?

Mr. ROBB: Five years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I fancy the minister is hardly right in his answer. I do not say the period is wrong, but his rights of citizenship are immediate. His right of residence is defeasible within the five years.

Mr. ROBB: That is what I meant.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Am I not right when I say that any one who belongs to one of these prohibited classes could not establish domicile, no matter how long he has been here, whether it is five years or twenty years?

Mr. ROBB: He could if he were a person of good character.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is the point at issue.

Mr. LADNER: Some time ago I addressed to the Secretary of State a letter dealing with the question of naturalization by those who retain the naturalization of their country of origin when making application for naturalization here. It is a question of dual nationality, and it affects a number of countries, particularly Japan. I took occasion when raising the matter in the House of placing on record the views of people on the coast who are well informed on this question, and perhaps one of them was the best informed person on naturalization questions in western Canada.

The CHAIRMAN: I am rather inclined to doubt whether the hon. member's remarks are relevant to this particular section, which relates to those who are confined in penitentiaries, gaols, reformatories, and so on.

Mr. LADNER: My remarks referred to section 1 of the act, which contains a number of subsections.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 1 before the committee deals with certain classes of criminals.

Mr. LADNER: But there are other classes in section 1. I merely wish to ask the minister if consideration has been given to the question of doing away with dual citizenship; in other words, of making the law so that an immigrant coming into this country who retains the citizenship of his country of origin will not be able to acquire citizenship in Canada. That is a matter of great importance, and I thought the department had looked into it, and would have some views upon it now that these amendments are being brought down.

Mr. ROBB: I am bound to say I have not considered that feature. The matter brought up by my hon. friend is one that might perhaps more appropriately be discussed with the Secretary of State.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister tell us what is meant by the term "undesirable classes." Take an immigrant who can speak neither French nor English, who is without means, and has not enough skill or ability to work at anything. Would he be held to be undesirable under this section?

Mr. ROBB: If he is an illiterate he would not be admitted to Canada at all, under the Immigration Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I am afraid my hon. friend is not enforcing his regulations, because we have up in northern Ontario now a very large number of men who are illiterate, who can speak neither English nor French, and who are being maintained largely by the charity of the people up there. There are 150 Finns up there.

Mr. ROBB: How long have they been in Canada?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They got here this year, and applied for work, but it was found they could not work. They are uneducated, can speak neither English nor French, and are being supported by charity; at least they were a month ago

Mr. ROBB: Most of the complaints coming to us are that the department is too strict in the matter of examining immigrants.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Members of family accompanying rejected person.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I notice, not only in connection with this section but other sections, additional expenses are put on the transportation company, and I was just wondering whether it was this sort of thing that brings about this situation. I remember the time very well when the rate on immigrants was £3 and £3 10s. Today the cost of passage is a multiple of that sum. It is one of the chief expenses my hon. friend is up against in connection with his work of immigration. The increase is very great, and I was just wondering whether all these provisions dealing with the transportation companies do not simply mean that we are going to have a very high rate of passage for immigrants. Why should there be a general charge against the transportation companies unless they are wrong?

Mr. ROBB: There is no charge against them unless they are wrong.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There certainly is under this act, absolutely. Now if they are to be insurers and are to be put to all these charges, the transportation of officials, not only Dominion but provincial, and all that sort of thing, of course they are going to continue to make these tremendous charges against immigration. Would the minister let us know what the rate is now?

Mr. ROBB: The passage costs from sixteen to eighteen pounds, according to the ship. The Commissioner of Immigration tells me that had the total detention charges of last season been charged against the transportation companies it would not have amounted to 25 cents per head on the immigrants carried.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: These proposed sections were not law then.

Mr. ROBB: There is a measure of fairness in this, I submit to my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does my hon. friend think of the multiplication of the rate from £3 10s. to £16 and £18, when we are looking for immigrants?

Mr. ROBB: At the outbreak of the war it was £6 10s. While the rate for immigrants has increased, it has not increased proportionately more than the rate for first-class cabin passengers, nor proportionately more than freight rates. It is due to the general increased cost of operating a ship, higher wages, higher cost of coal, and everything else that goes into the operation of a ship.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the increase in this particular rate is out of line pretty nearly with everything.

Mr. ROBB: I admit the rate is high.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We did have an increase of 50 per cent in our grain rates, and from Saskatoon 32 per cent—

Mr. ROBB: Those are rail rates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, we will come back to the ocean. I was going to point out that those increases have disappeared. There is not the taxpayer to draw on in connection with decreases here as there is in connection with decreases in the rail rates. But however that may be, I do not think my hon. friend will find that other rates have multiplied in the same proportion as the rate on immigrants. In 1893, my recollection is that the rate was £3 10s. Now if people have to pay from £3-10 up to £16 it is easy to see there is quite an obstacle to immigration. I wonder if we could not use some of the boats of the merchant marine on their return passage to carry immigrants?

Mr. ROBB: I would not think so; my hon. friends opposite did not build them for that purpose.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is true, I admit that immediately. I do not think we had very much trouble on this score at that time but we certainly have the trouble now. I do not suppose we would be able to give very palatial quarters on the boats of the merchant marine, but I fancy there are a whole lot of decent people overseas who would take passage on those boats, even though the accommodation would be very different from that of the ordinary liner, at a rate of £3 10s. in preference to paying £18.

Mr. ROBB: Before the section passes I should say that we have arranged with the transportation lines whereby they give a remission on the regular rate of $15 to each third class passenger coming from the United Kingdom to Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That mainly applies to passengers from the United Kingdom.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, from the United Kingdom.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: I hardly agree with my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) that the ocean rate has much to do with the number of immigrants that come from Canada. We could get a very heavy immigration to this country, entirely apart from the ocean rate, if we so desired. What stops immigration is the restrictions which we have seen fit, rightly or wrongly to impose upon immigration, and I am satisfied that the ocean rate has very little to do with it. If we come to the conclusion that we want people, selected people, I think we can get them very readily in almost overwhelming numbers. But on the one hand we hear the objection "We do not want artisans and mechanics" and on the other hand we hear continually even in this House "We do not want any more farmers". What class then are we going to get.

Mr. LEWIS: Lawyers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What about Finns?

Mr. GUTHRIE: My own opinion, speaking only for myself, is that we might relax a good many of our present restrictions. We must remember that at all times immigrants to this country come from a class of people who are not wholly successful in their home lands. The successful classes, the contented classes, do not emigrate as a rule. They remain at home. The love of home is implanted in the human breast and operates equally, I think, on all nationalities. It is the unsuccessful, the discontented, those who have more or less made a failure of life, who desire to change conditions; and I think were we to go back to the early days of this country and see some of our own forebears when they originally landed in Canada we would find that they—coming from England, Ireland, Scotland and from the continent—were not the happy, prosperous contented classes of that day, but were just from the same classes who are inclined to leave their home land to-day. But notwithstanding all that, we find in this country and in this age that those who came a generation, or two generations, or three generations ago, did make a success of life and of conditions in Canada, and succeeding generations have improved on the standard of the old days until we have a nation we are proud of on this part of the continent at the present time. My own view is there should be a material relaxation in the restrictions which we have imposed on immigration coming into Canada.

You read in the newspapers, you hear on almost every political platform, and you hear time and again in this House during every session, that the greatest want of this Dominion to-day is people; we must have population. I have heard leaders of political life in Canada twenty and twenty-five years ago predict, that in ten years we would have from ten to fifteen millions of people; in twenty years we would get probably twenty millions of people, and so on. But how have those predictions been fulfilled? It is over twenty-four years since I entered this parliament, and I am not satisfied with the growth of population that has taken place in that quarter of a century. I do not think any Canadian is satisfied, and there is a consensus of opinion that we want people. There never was an opportunity such as is presented to-day for getting them. The great trouble in the past in getting people to this country was the competition of the United States. Immigrants were drawn there by the tales of prosperity they heard and, of course, by the large population abiding there. Now the doors are closed, the quota law is in effect, and it is most difficult for people to leave European countries and enter the United States. The law will become more stringent as time goes on. Now is our opportunity to choose, to select, to reject if we so desire. But if on the one hand we are told we cannot bring any people into this country to work as artisans or mechanics or labourers, and on the other hand that we cannot bring any in as farmers what are we going to do? What class are we going to bring in, I ask you? I do not believe that the ocean rate has any appreciable effect upon the question of immigration to this country to-day. I have been informed by officials of the department during the present session that if the bars were raised we could bring to Canada any number of people we desired. It is true, there is no doubt about it. But we keep the bars down, and I think the time has come when there should be some very great relaxation of these restrictions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the minister no comment to make? I do not know that there is a more important subject before the people of Canada to-day than the one we are now considering, and yet we have had no discussion on it to amount to anything this session. I should like to know from the minister what classes we could admit to Canada now were we willing? Perhaps I had better put my question this way so as not to embarrass the minister at all: If we raise the bars now in any way what classes would he first admit to this country who are ready to come? The minister understands what I mean. There are certain classes that we all know would come, of course.

Mr. ROBB: My right hon. friend means what classes are ready to come?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. I know pretty well what classes are ready—some of them anyway. What I want to know is this: If the minister were to raise the bars now, and had his chance of selection, what class ready to come would he first admit who are now rejected. I mean to say were he opening the door just a little who are those now rejected that he would admit?

Mr. ROBB: General labourers, without going into nationalities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of what country?

Mr. ROBB: General labourers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not all general labourers.

Mr. ROBB: Well, my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) was quite right. If we relax the restriction and allow people to come in and take care of themselves —regardless of those who say they do not want any more people on the land and those who say they do not want any more labour to come in—there are many people of all nationalities prepared to come to this country, nationalities that have made good in Canada, that have paid their way, have paid their municipal taxes, and have produced traffic for the railways; a fair type of citizens from Germany, Ukrainia, Galicia and Hungary. My right hon. friend was in the department and he knows the type that come in.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never was in the department although I have acted as Minister of Immigration. Immigration was not under the Interior department in my time. We will concede, to get closer to the point, that so far as geography goes, and nationality too for that matter, the immigrants we want are those from northern Europe.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because that climate breeds the stock which does best in this northern part of America. Very well, what classes could we get from northern Europe which we do not admit? The minister says there is an agitation against artisans, an agitation against farmers, even, and there is an agitation against the common labourer. Could we get artisans? Could we get the common labourers? I know that the minister admits farmers. Could we get artisans and common labourers from northern Europe today if the government were ready to open the door wide enough to admit them?

Mr. ROBB: Undoubtedly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In large numbers?

Mr. ROBB: I should think so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister estimate how many a year?

Mr. ROBB: No, I would not go into that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am certain that the minister's official, who is sitting close to him, could tell him. That official should know how many per year could be obtained from all the northern countries in Europe.

Mr. ROBB: The way to do would be to take an average of the past few years. My hon. friend knows the average for ten years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, that would not answer, because there have always been restrictions. Suppose we were to remove these restrictions on artisans from the northern countries, Poland, Norway, Sweden, Germany, Holland, Belgium and France, about how many would the minister estimate would be ready to come in the first year?

Mr. ROBB: I could not say that, but if my hon. friend wants the record he could refer to the past history. I think they were coming in at the rate of a thousand a day during the peak of immigration prior to the war, and I think at one period over 400,000 a year came in.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Were artisans admitted without limit?

Mr. ROBB: I was not administering the department.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think there was much limit at that time.

An hon. MEMBER: Fifty dollars a head.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There were restrictions even then on artisans.

Mr. ROBB: The money test.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister will say that a very large number of those artisans from northern Europe would undoubtedly come to Canada if the bars were raised.

Mr. ROBB: I believe they would.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What other classes?

Mr. ROBB: I have told the hon. member.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Common labourers.

Mr. ROBB: I presume so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume they would come over in large numbers.

Mr. ROBB: I do not know the conditions over there, but I think they would.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister will realize, although he does not say it, that what we need in this country is work for the common labourer and artisan.

Mr. ROBB: I thought my hon. friend was leading up to that; but let me say that during the period, 1911, 1912 and 1913 they were building cities in western Canada, and they required artisans to build railways. They were paving streets and putting in sewers. I think the largest demonstration of unemployed that I ever saw in my life was in Regina in June 1914.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has not travelled far. That was very, very brief, and the minister's experience was limited. It would not amount to anything.

Mr. ROBB: I will admit a limited experience.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He will have more experience, I think, this winter.

Mr. MARLER: The question raised a few moments ago by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) regarding restrictions on immigration is a subject to which I think the government and also the House has given a great deal of attention and study. On various occasions, not only in this House but also in the city of Montreal, I have spoken in regard to the subject of restriction relating to immigration. Last year in this House I advocated the open door. Last fall in Montreal I advocated the open door again as regards immigrants who are mentally sound; but in advocating the open door I have always done so having in view at the same time whether, that door being open, there was sufficient work to go around in this country to supply those who did come here with work and with a livelihood. That is the qualification which I always added when I advocated the open door, which I have done from time to time. As to whether these restrictions which exist at the present time should now be raised is a question which to my mind needs the most careful and the most mature consideration, because the emigration from Canada to the United States has been very serious indeed.

Mr. McMASTER: But can we provide work for them?

Mr. MARLER: This matter is so serious that we cannot close our eyes to the figures as they exist, and that emigration would not have taken place, as I have held before in this House, if there had been sufficient work and sufficient remunerative employment in this country to keep those self-same people at home. My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) anticipates what I am about to say. Now business in the United States in the past few years has been rising and has reached the peak. It is now going down. Some of these self-same emigrants—not all of them, I do not think even the majority, because I do not believe the majority will ever come back to the country, I believe they are gone forever—are now coming back. They are coming back in considerable numbers. Have we work in this country to supply these self-same men who went away? I question very much if, at the present time we have the work to give them employment. I question very much, if they do come back in large numbers, whether we can give them employment; and an immigration policy to be successful in this country must be based on something a great deal more than merely getting the people into Canada. There must be something here for the people to do when they arrive, and until we realize that fact, and realize it to the full, I do not know that we are doing this country any great amount of good by bringing artisans, mechanics or other classes of people into Canada in large numbers. In addition to that—and I think this is quite germane to the subject—owing to the condition of business in the United States we will have in the next few years sent into this country hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars' worth of goods, to be sold at prices at which we cannot manufacture those goods here, and if we are to allow those goods to come in at slaughter prices—and I am not talking on tariff matters just now—

Mr. ROBB: You are very dangerously near it.

Mr. MARLER: Then I will get off the subject at once.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will the hon. member tell me if the dumping of slaughtered goods into this country would not reduce the cost of living?

Mr. MARLER: No, it absolutely would not, and it is utterly impossible, it seems to me, for some people to get it into their heads that the more goods that come in here by this means the greater the cost of goods manufactured in this country. That is a question on which we do not all agree, but perhaps I had better not debate it at any great length. It may bring up a discussion similar to the discussion on the banks.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would the hon. member not apply it to what the farmer has to sell, as well as to what the manufacturer has to sell?

Mr. MARLER: I will not take up that question, but we are going to be faced with the condition where we will have a large amount of American goods coming in. My hon. friends must make up their minds—I have made up my mind and I intend to persist in it—that if these goods come in there will be less work for people to do, and we may as well acknowledge that without question. Let us make up our minds—and I have made up mine pretty well—that we had better start on a solid foundation, and realize that if we want to get people here, it is not a question of restriction or of ocean rates, but it is a question of whether they can get work here.

An hon. MEMBER: They can.

Mr. MARLER: Perhaps they can, and that is the basic question we should decide, and not a question of ocean rates or restrictions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We ought to decide whether or not there is room at the present time for more workers, an open-door policy has been advocated on the floor of this House tonight, but this preliminary question should be answered before we decide whether we wish to introduce a larger immigration. A little while ago the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) suggested that any man who was willing to work could earn a living in this country; that the men who had not work were men who were no good. I should like to bring to the attention of the committee a letter which was recently sent out from the city of Toronto by the mayor and board of control to the mayors of other Canadian cities:

Toronto, May 1st, 1924.

Toronto—the second largest city in the Dominion of Canada in point of population—has during the recent winter months passed through a serious unemployment situation, created and prolonged, in very large measure, by reason of an unusually heavy influx of immigrants, chiefly of the unskilled classes in so far as labour is concerned and which could not be readily absorbed in ordinary industrial and trained employment. As the months passed, the conditions of unemployment became more intense until at the present time, when seasonably there should be few out of work, the reports issued from the government Employment Bureau here are not at all encouraging as a barometer indicative of relief to any appreciable extent in the near future.

The experience of this city has doubtles been the experience of every other city in Canada; just as acute in comparison with population and the volume of employment which could be afforded.

The board of control of this city feel that the time has arrived for the cities of the Dominion to notify both the federal and provincial governments that if they brought immigrants to this country they would have to look after them until they found employment, or in the alternative, that the municipalities insist that it is imperative to adopt a new policy in regard to immigration, if not to entirely put on a speedy stop order. Recent despatches from Europe published in papers throughout the Dominion announced that over eight thousand immigrants would sail from European ports for Canada within the next few weeks to swell the number of thousands now idle for lack of the opportunities to earn a livelihood. On the other hand, thousands of our best trained mechanics are leaving Canada and entering the United States, where work is plentiful and where high wages are being paid. The United States immigration records show a monthly average of 17,000 Canadians entering the United States. In June, July, August and September of last year the figures ran from 16,000 to 18,000 per month. This movement, if maintained, would mean a loss exceeding 200,000 a year.

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order. I did not wish to interrupt the hon. member sooner, because I think he was entitled to reply to hon. members who have also been out of order. But I would draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that we are dealing with section 2, the purpose of which is to give authority to an immigration agent to deport at the expense of the transportation company members of a family accompanying a person who has been rejected or who is about to be deported. I do not wish to suggest any impoliteness to the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), and that is why I did not interrupt him sooner before he had read that letter. But the last several speakers have been entirely out of order in discussing, in connection with the question whether members of a family accompanying a person who has been rejected shall be deported, matters in regard to the tariff, and so on.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What about Chinese immigration?

Mr. NEILL: I will discuss Chinese immigration under its appropriate section, but I am not trying to discuss it under a different section or discuss the tariff on a section such as this.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Pelletier): I think the point of order is not well taken and the hon. member may proceed.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would not object to stopping on a point of order, because I am inclined to agree that the point is well taken.

Mr. NEILL: I think I will appeal.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But since this question has been raised at this juncture I could not let go unchallenged the statements which were being made. Right across the country from coast to coast at the present time are coming resolutions with regard to the bad conditions that exist. I have them from Port Arthur, the border cities, my own city of Winnipeg and points further west. Within the last day or so I was forwarded a resolution as far east as Sydney Mines, urging that something be done:

To relieve the distress amongst our women folk and starving children, as we have not had one day's work since 1st May. They managed to keep the mine open on 1st May, then closed her down although the government had an order for 1,400 tons per week from our colliery.

Such reports suggest that we are really faced with a serious condition across the country. For the past two years officials at Winnipeg have come down urging that if the government persists in its policy of dumping people in Winnipeg without there being any possibility of work, the government must accept the responsibility of caring for those people. At the present time meetings of unemployed men are being held on the market square of the city of Winnipeg. I had an interview only a few days ago with the mayor of Winnipeg who was visiting the capital on other business, he referred to the serious situation which prevails at present in that city with regard to unemployment. It does not seem reasonable that this government should continue to import people into these very centres which are keeping people on charity. If there is any further discussion with regard to opening wide the doors, we ought first to consider the condition of the people at home. I am not opposed to immigration; I am not opposed to people coming to Canada and taking their chance; but I do oppose assisted immigration which is often bringing in people who are not fitted for the country, who have not even sufficient to pay their way to Canada and who, therefore, have not sufficient to get a start. I oppose further the spending of large sums of money through the Immigration Department in spreading abroad literature that, whether or not it may be technically true, gives a false impression to those who have no previous knowledge of conditions which prevail in this country.

Mr. ROBB: I am inclined to agree with both the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) on the point of order, but I have no desire to stop the debate. It is quite interesting. And I am not going to prolong it more than to say this to my hon. friend who has just told us of conditions of unemployment which prevail in Winnipeg. I have also some record of the unemployment situation in Winnipeg and it is about up to date. In the Toronto Globe of July 3, this item appears:

> The Winnipeg strike ends. The strike of the Winnipeg bricklayers and stonemasons which was called on Monday ended abruptly to-day when an agreement was reached with the employers which will bring the union scale of wages to $1.25 an hour.

These men were being paid $1.15 an hour, and when they got the employers started and the buildings partly up, they demanded an extra ten cents an hour. They are now being paid $1.25 an hour. How are you ever going to get down the cost of rents to the people of this country when you are paying men that scale of wages?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would submit that that is another matter altogether and has nothing to do with the unemployment situation. I was discussing unskilled labour which is to be found in such large numbers with no work. If the minister wishes to enter upon the question, I could point out that stonemasons and bricklayers are highly skilled craftsmen and in the West they are employed often for only four, five or six months of the entire year. Throughout the years in the past there has gradually developed for bricklayers and stonemasons a much higher scale of wages than that which prevails in any other section of the building trade and much higher than in any other section of the ordinary mechanical trades. Further than that, I would point out that although $1.25 an hour seems a high wage, it is not nearly so high a wage as has been paid in the building trades just south of the line. This has had the effect of depleting the ranks of our mechanics in Winnipeg, almost every one who can get out going south to Chicago and Detroit. So far as building homes is concerned, let me point out that the question of wages constitutes only one of the vital facts; the enormous ground rent that has been charged, by which a great many people through inflation of land values have made fortunes in Winnipeg and in most of the other cities in the West, is a larger factor in the situation than the wages paid mechanics.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not want it to be inferred from anything I have said that I consider the present a particularly good time to bring labourers or artisans into Canada. I realize as everyone else does that there is to-day especially in the cities a great deal of unemployment. We all regret this but we recognize the fact, and I do not suggest that the present is the most opportune moment for pursuing a vigorous policy of immigration; nor would I think the autumn of the year favourable under any circumstances, spring being much preferable. As regards the situation in Winnipeg, I have no doubt that a large part of the congestion there, in regard to labour, arises from the fact that so many of the immigrants who do come to Canada to-day are brought across the continent and practically dumped in Winnipeg. There they are supposed to await farm labour, or they are supposed to become farmers there themselves. My information is that a very large proportion of these people simply remain in Winnipeg, and if that system is persisted in the conditions will become worse instead of improving there. My own view is that immigration as it lands should be more spread out than has been the case in the past. I had the benefit of an interview with some of the immigration officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway one day last week and I also saw a representative of one of the American shipping companies. These officials told me that to-day you can obtain from northern Europe, not only in the countries enumerated by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) but in such places as Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Esthonia, Ukrainia and parts of Austria, a splendid class of immigration. The people want to leave those parts of Europe and as they cannot go to the United States there are only two alternatives now open to them, namely, South America and the Dominion of Canada, because they do not very readily take to the idea of going to Mexico. This I submit is Canada's opportunity, and so great is the desire of people to come to Canada that we can pick and choose, taking the best and rejecting the undesirables. I do not however suggest that the present is the opportune moment to bring these people; I do not suggest that as unemployment becomes acute we should bring in more immigrants to add to the army of unemployed which we already have with us. But surely there will be a time when this country will welcome a tremendous immigration. I have heard it stated by United States officials that a country can absorb annually without inconvenience 5 per cent of its population by way of immigration. If our population is nine millions at present then four hundred and fifty thousand a year would be the maximum that we could absorb in immigration. These figures are based on the experience of the United States, but I fancy that they would apply to this country as well. I am satisfied that we shall not reach anywhere near that mark this year; indeed, I doubt whether we have ever come near it. I think however that we should seriously consider the question. We all seem to agree on this point, that we want more people in this country. I doubt whether we are retaining to-day the natural increase of the country, and immigration is the greatest need of Canada. Now that the opportunity has come through the operation of the quota law in the United States, which enables us to pick and choose our immigration, let us see to it that we do not miss that opportunity but that we shall at the right moment make a wise selection.

Mr. HOCKEN: I would suggest to the minister that some extraordinary efforts be made to bring out young boys from sixteen to twenty and place them on the farms of Canada. Some hon. gentlemen are suggesting that these boys are no good. I do not agree with that. I know as a fact that a certain British society brought out 200 boys to this country and as a result of the placing of 40 of them on farms in Carleton and adjacent counties applications were made for 200 more. The farmers when they saw the kind of boys that had been brought out were glad to take steps to have more brought out. A boy between sixteen and twenty could remain four or five years on a farm, and if he had reasonable intelligence he would be a fair farmer by the time he came of age. More than that, if he remained that length of time on the farm he would have become accustomed to farm life and would no doubt desire to acquire some land for himself. If he were placed with a man of good repute and of ability as a farmer he would be trained not only in this desirable occupation but he would have a moral education as well; he would lead a good social life and become a creditable citizen. According to the statistics that have been presented to me there are hundreds of thousands of boys of this age in the Old Country who find it extremely difficult to get work there. I am told that most of the trades unions in the United Kingdom compel the employer to pay to a boy over sixteen years of age a man's wages. That is done in order to prevent boys from displacing men and it makes it impossible for young fellows of seventeen and eighteen to get work. There are therefore available any number of boys who could be brought out here and trained as agriculturists and put in the way not only of doing well for themselves but of adding materially to the prosperity of the country. I would urge the minister to have a thorough investigation made into the conditions I have mentioned with a view to bringing out, not a few hundreds, but ten or twenty or a hundred thousand boys and properly placing them with people who would give them the right sort of education in their lifework and bring them up under wholesome influences so that they might become good citizens.

10 p.m.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. LEWIS: Are we to infer that boys of over sixteen who are given men's wages in the Old Country will receive men's wages when they come here?

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not think that boys would expect men's wages here, because they would not have had the training.

Mr. LEWIS: Would they get any wages at all?

Mr. HOCKEN: Oh yes, they do get wages when they come out because one of the stipulations of the society in placing them is that they shall receive some compensation. More than that, before any boy leaves the Home there is a place for him to go to. His parents know where he is going; they are in correspondence with him from the very day he lands here so that they are able to keep track of him and he keeps track of his relatives. Under the operation of this plan I think the very best results ought to be obtained. I do not say that a boy coming out here should get a man's wages; he should not. He is learning something. He is serving an apprenticeship, but he is getting a good living; he is learning a trade and he will not go hungry or without clothes. He will also have a certain amount of social life that will develop him as the kind of citizen we want in Canada.

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order. Under the happier auspices of your presence, Sir, and encouraged by the support I got from the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) and the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) when I raised the question previously, I submit that this discussion is out of order. We are dealing with section 2 of the bill, which is confined entirely to the question whether this government can compel a transportation company to deport the family of a deported man. I have no wish to curtail the expression of views on the part of hon. gentlemen, but I wish to see the work of the session gone on with.

The CHAIRMAN: Rule 13, section 5, says:

Speeches in committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

The general principle of the bill may not be debated upon a section. In my opinion the point of order raised by the hon. member (Mr. Neill) is well taken.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Under what circumstances would the transportation company be compelled to return members of a family?

Mr. ROBB: Where one member of a family is suffering deportation it might work a hardship to send that one member of the family back without the others—a younger child, for instance. It may be extremely desirable that that person be deported—it may be a case of tuberculosis, trachoma or something against which we wish to protect our people. We are going to ask the transportation companies to see to it before these people embark for Canada that they are a fairly healthy family, and if they are not the company is to take all the family back.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Permit to enter Canada or to remain therein.

Mr. NEILL: I have two or three small amendments to submit to this section. I suggest to the minister that the word "legally" be inserted after the words "or having" in the fourth line on page 2. That is to ensure that the man will have landed legally in the first place.

Mr. ROBB: I would point out that the definition of "landed," as set out in clause 2 of the act, is as follows:

"Land," "landed" or "landing," as applied to passengers or immigrants, means their lawful admission into Canada by an officer under this act, otherwise than for inspection or treatment or other temporary purpose provided for by this act.

So my hon. friend's amendment is quite unnecessary.

Mr. NEILL: If that is the interpretation of the word "landed" I will omit that amendment. I suggest also two other amendments: First, that after the word "only" in line 8 the words "not exceeding six months" be inserted, so that it will read:

Such permit shall be in the form A of the schedule to this act, and shall be expressed to be in force for a specified period only, not exceeding six months.

That is to put some reasonable limit to the operation of these permits, which are of a very loose character in any case. The third amendment I suggest is that section 3 be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

A return of all such permits, with particulars and reasons therefor, issued during the year shall be made by the minister to parliament within ten days of its meeting.

That is simply to follow the example that we have in a great many other acts, where exemptions applied in the discretion of the minister shall be given the necessary publicity by their reference to parliament at the next ensuing session. I presume that these amendments will have to be put singly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: With regard to my hon. friend's amendment limiting the period of the permit to six months, I would point out that the six months' period, according to the section, may at any time be extended by the minister in writing. In order to attain the object my hon. friend has in mind he will have to put the words "not exceeding six months" after the word "writing."

Mr. NEILL: I will ask that that change be made.

Mr. ROBB: The commissioner points out that when you give a man a permit you lift him out of the immigrant class, so that the period whereby he may acquire domicile does not count while the permit is in force. That is the reason for the permit.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does the minister say about the six months?

Mr. ROBB: I do not see why we should be limited to that. I think we can trust the government of the day to administer it fairly. I would rather my hon. friend would not press the amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My experience has been that the permit system is rather a good one. In the cases in which permits have been granted in the county in which I reside they have been granted, I think, for a year. I know one or two cases where, after a year, an inspector of the department has come to the city of Guelph, made full inquiries, found the probationer has done well, and has allowed him to remain. I think the minister should be given discretion to grant a permit for as long as he desires. It only applies to doubtful cases, and if a man has made good, and the permit is only for a year, as they are now being granted, I see no reason why the immigrant should not be permitted to remain.

Under this clause, could the minister give a permit for the entry of a Chinese? The language is pretty broad. Of course, the Chinese Exclusion Act is in force, but the section says the minister may issue a written permit authorizing any person to enter Canada.

Mr. ROBB: The Chinese are governed by a special act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But under this section permits might be granted to Chinese to enter.

Mr. NEILL: Under section 79 of the Immigration Act, it is specially provided that where its provisions do not conflict with the Chinese Immigration Act, they shall apply as well to persons of Chinese origin. So as the hon. member for South Wellington says, this section would give the minister power to allow any man, black, brown, white or yellow, to come into this country and stay for any unlimited period. There are no limitations whatever. The hon. member for South Wellington says, it may only be used in doubtful cases, but it can be used in any case whatsoever. It is a very wide and a very drastic power to put into the hands of any minister. The hon. member for South Wellington said that the time might come, if it had not come yet, when we should lower the bars of immigration, but you do not need any further reductions when you have this. This gives the minister a perfectly blank cheque to sign. All he has to do is to write at the bottom and he can let anyone in for two, three, four or five years, without any question whatever, without any qualification, without any appeal. He may issue a written permit authorizing any person to enter Canada, or having entered to remain therein, without being subject to the provisions of this act. As I have said, it applies equally to the Chinese also, and I do think it is not asking too much to restrict the power in such a very moderate way as I have suggested. It is not even restricting the minister's powers; it is only limiting them to this period. There is nothing to prevent him at the end of six months from renewing that permit for reasons validly given. What I would suggest as an improved amendment—it is really the same thing—is to add after the word "writing" the words "the whole of such period, including extensions thereof, shall not exceed six months in all." I am willing to leave it, of course I must leave it, to the judgment of the House, but I fail to see where any harm can be done by inserting this amendment.

[Mr Guthrie.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think I know cases that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has reference to, and there is a great deal in what he says; but there is another kind of case which affects us more down here in the East, and which probably would be adversely affected by the application of that principle without any qualification at all. I have in mind the case of a young man from Germany, who had no proper entry into Canada; he was here on probation. It developed that he knew all about dyes and was an expert tanner. He is now engaged in introducing a new process of tanning hides. The minister has given him the right to stay here for a year for the purpose of completing this work. I think it is good the minister had the right in that case.

Mr. NEILL: I do not deny giving him the right, but with some limitations.

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friends are unduly alarmed. The practice of the department for many years has never been to give a permit for more than a year at a time, and generally it is for a much shorter period; so I think my hon. friend is placing unwarranted restrictions upon those whose experience has satisfied them that this is the proper thing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are they ever used in case of the Chinese? That is the real difficulty.

Mr. ROBB: Not that the commissioner can recall at the moment.

Mr. NEILL: I would ask the minister if this section we are discussing is not the only possible way by which the presence of these Chinese in Nova Scotia can be justified? Their presence can be justified under no other section that I know of.

Mr. ROBB: The Chinese Immigration Act neither permits nor prohibits what has been done in the case of those men on the Atlantic coast. But may I point out that those men were not landed in Canada. They are working on the ships and a bond of $105,000 was given that they would not land in Canada, but would be returned. I am not so sure that it is a detriment to the people of Nova Scotia who are working in the mines producing coal to have these Chinamen working on these boats if that means the boats can run and carry that coal to market. We looked into the McDonald case my hon. friend brought up very carefully, and found that there had been a misunderstanding and that McDonald had been reinstated and was quite satisfied.

Mr. NEILL: The minister has told us that these Chinese were not brought into Canada. Therefore, they are not in Canada now?

Mr. ROBB: They were not landed in Canada.

Mr. NEILL: Then how did they get on the boats they are on now from the Cedric which brought them here? They must have landed on the wharf, and they are now in Canadian boats, in Canadian waters, travelling between Canadian ports. If they are not in Canada, where in God's name are they?

Mr. ROBB: I will read again to my hon. friend the definition of "landed" in the act:

"Land", "landed" or "landing", as applied to passengers or immigrants, means their lawful admission into Canada by an officer under this act, otherwise than for inspection or treatment or other temporary purpose provided for by this act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would think, Mr. Chairman, that even under the language quoted by my hon. friend, these men are landed in Canada. They are in Canadian territory, and under our jurisdiction in every way. They are here undoubtedly.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend object to that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would prefer they had been excluded. My only object in mentioning Chinese immigration under this section is that I think it should be amended to make it plain that this act shall not over-ride or come in conflict with the Chinese Exclusion Act. We have an act that excludes Chinese immigration, and I am heartily in accord with the provisions of that act. I do not think it would be proper to pass another act to permit the minister to do what the Chinese Exclusion Act says he shall not do. I think there should be a limitation to this section, to the effect that it shall not come in conflict with the Chinese Exclusion Act.

Mr. ROBB: We never attempt to do that, and I venture to say that since the act of last year came into force it has been fairly administered. As regards these men who come in on the Atlantic coast, if this government is wrong, every government for the last ten or fifteen years has been wrong.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The fact that we have done wrong hitherto does not justify our doing wrong now. I understand that it is the conviction of the great majority of this House that Chinese immigration should be absolutely excluded from Canada. That is the sense of the Chinese Exclusion Act. We used to allow them in on payment of a poll tax. We stopped that.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not take it as good legislation, I do not think it is logical to exclude them by one act and allow the minister to admit them under the clause in another act.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friends had made a careful study of the act we would have less of this debate. Now the section which bears on this matter reads:

All provisions of this act not repugnant to the provisions of the Chinese Immigration Act, 1923, shall apply as well to persons of Chinese origin as to other persons.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what is objected to. That makes good the point raised by the hon. member (Mr. Neill):

Mr. ROBB: Not at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, because as I followed his reading the section says it shall apply.

Mr. ROBB: The provision shall apply but if the Chinese Act excludes them it does not apply.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suggest that if a provision of this kind is inserted it will meet the case raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni:

The provisions of this act shall not in any instance extend the rights of any immigrants subject to the provisions of the Chinese Immigration Act.

That is a plain short declaration.

Mr. ROBB: When we come to section 29 we will consider that.

The CHAIRMAN: What about the amendment limiting the time of the permit to six months?

Mr. ROBB: I would rather not accept that.

Amendment (Mr. Neill) negatived.

Mr. NEILL: I have another amendment and I do not think the minister will find it in his heart to object to it. It is one found in a great many of our laws, and in every one of these cases where extraordinary powers are given to the minister. It is simply that he shall present a record of his transactions in that regard to the House annually within ten days of the meeting of parliament.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by Mr. Neill that section 3 be amended by adding thereto:

A return of all such permits, with the reasons therefor, issued during the year shall be made by the minister to parliament within ten days of its meeting.

Mr. ROBB: Would my hon. friend make the period 30 days?

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Medical treatment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Section 7 provides as follows:

Section thirty-four of the said act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

A passenger or other person seeking to enter Canada or who has been rejected or is detained for any purpose under this act, who is suffering from sickness or physical or mental disability, may whenever it is so directed by the deputy minister or officer in charge be afforded medical treatment on board ship or in an immigrant station, or may be removed to a suitable hospital for treatment—

And so on. The whole cost may be charged to the transportation company. Now the present law provides as follows:

If, in the opinion of the Superintendent of Immigration, or of the officer in charge, the transportation company which brought such person to Canada failed to exercise proper vigilance or care in so doing, then the cost of his hospital treatment and medical attention and maintenance shall be paid by such transportation company—

There is a vast distinction between the section as it stands in the act to-day and the amendment which is now proposed by the minister. The amendment simply provides that if any passenger reaches a Canadian port and happens to be afflicted by any mental or physical disability all the cost of his hospital treatment or nursing, if such is necessary, shall be charged to the transportation company whether that company has been at fault or not. Let me draw to the attention of the minister the case of a man landing in a perfectly healthy condition at the port of Halifax and suddenly being taken with an attack of appendicitis. Why should the transportation company be put to the cost of medical treatment, hospital treatment, or nursing treatment of that patient? The law as it stands to-day provides that the transportation company shall be liable if they have not been vigilant, if they have been careless in permitting a passenger to come on board their ship; but the amendment simply imposes upon the transportation company the full obligation of caring for these people no matter what the ailment may be. Why, if a man breaks his arm on board ship under this clause the transportation company would have to pay for everything. If a man contracts pneumonia by exposing himself in inclement weather the transportation company, under this clause, must bear the whole cost of that patient's treatment, notwithstanding the fact that these patients when embarking or going on board ship in the first instance were perfectly healthy, were perfectly well and had no ailment that could be ascertained by medical or other examination. I think the clause as it stands to-day should remain in the statute books. If a shipping company has been careless, if its medical officer has been careless, if it has been imposed upon, if it has been neglectful then I think it should pay and that is the law to-day. But to render it liable in every case is going beyond the realm of reason in my humble opinion, and I would ask the minister if he can give the committee some reasonable excuse for the proposed change. Why should the transportation company—having acted vigilantly and carefully, having had its passengers medically examined—now be asked to pay for the medical, hospital and nursing treatment of a man who takes sick after the voyage say from an attack of appendicitis or pneumonia, or who suffers a broken arm or a broken leg?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is a clever lawyer and he is building up another straw man for the purpose of knocking it down. He knows that in actual practice cases of appendicitis and pneumonia, or broken arms, are very rare among the immigrants. Now in order to get business the companies go out and sell transportation to Canada, and we are adopting these restrictions as a warning to their agents so that they will be a little more careful in the selection of the people they send to Canada. If the agent gets a commission of £1 10s. and shuts his eyes to the medical unfitness of the person to whom he sells transportation, why should the people of Canada be called upon to pay for the maintenance of such persons while they are here? Let us look at the experience of the past. In 1922-23 these payments were made:

Transportation companies..	$40,832
Government..	2,917
Immigrants..	6,795

In 1923-24 there was a little more business. The payments were as follows:

Transportation companies..	$68,865
Government..	3,980
Immigrants..	2,577

Under this law all we are proposing to place upon the shipping companies is the addition of the amount that was previously paid by the department and by the immigrants which would be in 1922-23 $9,712, and in 1923-24 $6,557, on a considerably increased business. The total cost—not the additional cost—paid on the passengers they carried was less than twenty-five cents a head. I think it is quite fair that the transportation companies who are making profits out of the business should pay for it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The transportation companies of course are making a profit; but we want the immigration, and the law as it stands is so equitable that I see no reason to change it. The law provides that if the transportation company is to blame it shall pay, and if it is not to blame the passenger pays for his own medical bills, and if the passenger has no money the government pays. The minister proposes to put the whole burden on the transportation company, whether it is to blame or not. Surely one has only to state a case of that kind to show how unreasonable it is. This is the actual proposal of the minister, and the answer is that it only amounts to twenty-five cents a head. I would like to know under what circumstances the government will pay the medical bills of any other class in the country. They will not and they should not pay such bills. If the passenger has the money he should pay his own medical bills, and if he has not the money under the present law the government will relieve him. But why saddle the transportation companies with all the cost? They are not to blame No matter how careful they are, accidents will happen. The minister has not given a reason for changing the present law. It is sound and backed by principle and reason; the amendment proposed is entirely without reason and without justice.

Mr. MILLAR: As the law stands at present, are we safe in inferring, if an immigrant suffering from a disease is allowed to pass an examination and brought to Canada, that either the transportation company or the government are responsible? The minister will know to what concrete case I am referring.

Mr. ROBB: I think under the case my hon. friend has in mind the transportation companies are wholly responsible. Is that the case of trachoma?

Mr. MILLAR: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, the transportation companies are wholly responsible.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I have read the amendment three or four times and it looks pretty severe. The government's official can go in when the boat lands, take a patient, and decide where the government will place that patient, and whether the transportation company is responsible for the illness or not. The government official has a right to decide where a patient will be placed, and then compel the transportation company to pay the expense. That is rather drastic, it seems to me, if I read the amendment correctly.

Mr. ROBB: It is in keeping with the other clauses which impose the deportation charges upon the company. Let us bear in mind that we are here to look after the interests of the people of Canada. There are some companies that will deal fairly and look after these matters; but I say frankly to my hon. friend, that there are other transportation companies that the department has to keep its eye on all the time.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I do not think the amendment is just to the companies who do play fair.

Mr. ROBB: They will look after themselves on the other side.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The illness may have nothing to do with the other side.

Mr. ROBB: That is very rare.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Still it is easy for the government to protect the immigrants and take care of them, without being unjust to the companies. The present law protects them, but it seems to me rather drastic for the government officials to have the power to come in, take a patient, decide where they will place him and then say that the transportation companies shall pay their bill.

Mr. ROBB: We are anxious to see that the transportation companies are not unduly taxing the people of Canada.

Mr. BOYS: I suppose the transportation companies are familiar with this proposed change?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: Have they objected to it, and if so to what extent? Do they all object? As far as I have been able to understand it I agree with the hon. member for South Wellington, (Mr. Guthrie). It seems to me manifestly unjust to hold a transportation company liable when they are guilty of no neglect whatever.

Mr. ROBB: There has been no considerable objection to this section. My hon. friend knows very well that the transportation companies object to every additional charge that is put upon them. All they are looking after particularly is getting earnings for their steamships. If we were running steamships probably we would do the same thing. But we are here to look after the interests of the taxpayers of Canada, and any transportation company that is careful in its selection of passengers brought to Canada will not suffer any undue burden under this section.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend does not so limit it at all. If we are to treat this matter logically, with a view to seeing what ought to be done, we will go back and see what the present law is, and find out what is wrong with it. The present law really makes these companies liable, as I see it, in every case of negligence.

Mr. ROBB: This has been the United States law for some years. Under changed conditions vessels that were formerly plying to New York are now running to Canadian ports. We are not putting them under any greater handicap than they had been under when running to United States ports.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was wondering what would be the fair thing, and I am not concerned with American laws, because I think some of them are unjust. I do not think they help the American taxpayers, and, on the contrary, they add to the burdens of the taxpayers. You can have foolish restrictions that do not help anybody.

Mr. ROBB: I admit that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is not the present law that the company is liable to look after everybody in cases where there has been negligence? Is there any doubt about that? I do not think there can be any doubt about that, from what I have heard this evening, and it has not been contradicted by the minister up to date. If there is no doubt about that, I take it the proposition is that the company is to become insurer of people's health. It must be either one thing or the other. Are they to become absolutely the insurers of health?

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure that that is a fair way to put it.

What is really intended was that they should be more careful in their selections.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am content to go absolutely to the full extent. Put it in any way you like, as to diseases originating or troubles originating that they ought to have known about. But we have to take the act as we find it. Under the act as we find it, so far we have reached this point that the companies are liable if there is any negligence of any kind. Under the proposed legislation they are to be liable without negligence of any kind; they are to become insurers. Are they absolute insurers? Are they insurers against the action of my hon. friend's department? One has only to ask the question to see how ridiculous the answer would be if it was answered truthfully according to this section.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: Would there not be negligence at least to a degree on the part of a booking agent who sold a ticket to a person who could not pass the medical examination when he reached this country?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would agree with that immediately.

Mr. ROBB: These people are not properly in charge of the department until they are passed by our medical examiners at the port of entry in Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I agree with that, but that is not what the section says at all. I will go back to my old query. Are the transportation companies to be absolute insurers? Are they to be insurers absolutely when these people are in the hands of the department?

Mr. ROBB: They are not in the hands of our department until they pass our medical examiner at the port of entry in Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The section reads:

> A passenger or other person seeking to enter Canada or who has been rejected—

He is to some extent in the hands of the department.

Mr. ROBB: Not at all. He has been rejected.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let me read a few more words:

> —or is detained for any purpose under this act.

That detention is a detention worked by the department. That detention is something which has absolutely nothing to do with the steamship company. That detention may continue, under the permits and other things we have in this legislation, for six months.

Mr. ROBB: That detention might be for the benefit of the steamship company. The department might decide at once that they would deport the man, but they might allow a reasonable detention in order to find out if they would admit him or not.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Supposing the case is a proper one, the man being sick, but later on he passes. He has been detained. The transportation company have fulfilled their duty and the detention may be an improper one, but it has been carried out under the act.

Mr. ROBB: May I remind my hon. friend of this, that if the passenger comes to Canada perfectly fit, he is admitted at once; we are glad to get him through the immigration quarters and started on his way wherever he is going to establish himself in Canada. But if the transportation company who sold him his ticket have been negligent or careless to the degree that they have sold the ticket—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the existing law.

Mr. ROBB: —we are placing the responsibility upon them.

Mr. BOYS: The minister has already told the committee that he had cases last year and the year before. I think he said $2,000 odd and $6,000 odd. In other words, where the company was negligent under the existing law, the company paid. Where the company was not negligent, that fact being established, I presume, after an inquiry, the department paid. Why did the department pay the $2,000 odd and the $6,000 odd which the minister referred to a moment ago? I presume it was because on inquiry it was found that the transportation company had not been guilty of negligence. If that be so, I would ask the minister on what ground he now undertakes to hold the transportation company liable if they are not guilty of any negligence, carelessness, or wrongdoing of any kind? For example, a passenger is admitted in perfectly good health. Perhaps during the voyage he develops disease. Why, under those circumstances, should the transportation company be held responsible. What has given rise to this change?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has just touched the point. It is the diversion of steamship business that formerly would go to the port of New York where, for years, the transportation companies have been paying on this basis. Now, that they are coming to Canada, why should we put them in any better position than that in which they have been in the United States? They have been perfectly satisfied with that.

Mr. BOYS: It was considered proper before that the guiding principle should be one of negligence, and that appeals to me. If they are guilty of negligence, they ought to be responsible; but if they are not, it is hard to see how they should be held responsible, and I do not think it is a good argument to say that some other country treats them differently. The more burdens you impose upon them, the higher become the freight and passenger rates.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BOYS: What were the amounts that the department paid out?

Mr. ROBB: In 1922-23, the department paid $6,795. In 1923-24, that was reduced to $2,577, although there was more business. That shows that the transportation companies have been more careful and they will be still more careful if we put the whole responsibility upon them.

Mr. BOYS: Personally, I am with the minister in exerting every effort to make them careful. My sole point is that if they are not guilty of negligence, it is not fair to make them pay. As regards the $6,795, no doubt in the first instance the transportation company was held to be guilty of negligence, and after an inquiry was made to find out whether it was guilty of negligence, it was found that it was not, and therefore the department paid. If so, why should this change take place? If any good reason is given for the change, I will accept it at once; but if no good reason is shown, it is unfair to any transportation company. It is simply placing upon the company a burden which it should not be asked to bear and in the end, with other burdens, it is increasing the cost of transportation, freight and passenger charges to the people of this country.

Mr. ROBB: May I repeat again that the total cost last year was less than 25 cents a head? Who has made any money in any way out of these people prior to the time when they have passed the medical examiner and entered on their way to Canada? I will answer that myself. The transportation company, as my hon. friend knows. Why then should the transportation company not be held responsible?

Mr. BOYS: In the first place, we are seeking immigration and we want the companies to assist us in getting immigration. If they in their assistance, do anything wrong, they should be held responsible; but if in cooperating with the department in securing immigrants, they do nothing wrong, on what proper basis can you hold the companies responsible? That is my point.

Mr. ROBB: We are paying a great deal of money to advertise the advantages of this country and that is of advantage to the transportation companies. Why should they not share up to this extent? Why should they put up a fight against this?

Mr. BOYS: They are doing more than paying their share. The minister's figures indicate that they paid $60,000 where we paid $6,000. I am not asking that they should not be called upon to pay their share so far as that is concerned. This is purely a question of negligence. It is not a question whether it costs 25 or 50 cents or a dollar a head; it is purely a question of principle.

Mr. ROBB: It is on the principle that the Immigration Department places the responsibility on the transportation company in regard to the persons whom they transport to Canada. The transportation company are the only people who have made any money out of the business until the intending immigrant reaches the port of entry in Canada.

Mr. BOYS: Therefore, no matter how careful the transportation companies are, no matter how much they co-operate with the Department of Immigration, if they are guilty of no negligence or carelessness whatever, but a disease or trouble of some kind develops on the voyage, they are held responsible. I should think that is a change which might, to some extent, check the ardour of any transportation company, and in that way it would not enure to the benefit of Canada.

Mr. MILLAR: This legislation may or may not go too far, but a case which I had to deal with very recently inclines me strongly to the belief that we require some more advanced legislation than we have had. Let me point out what a hardship it means in the case of a certain Polish woman whom I know about, who saved money for some years and sent out for her sister who it was discovered afterwards was suffering from trachoma. This was only a few weeks ago; I have seen the minister several times on the subject and he has done his best. But the girl had to be deported. Another hundred dollars was spent to see that she should receive proper medical assistance. Now, here is an amount of hundreds of dollars which this woman spent to get her sister out here all the way from Poland and as a result of this disease she had to be sent back to her former home. This is a very great hardship and while theoretically there may be something in the objection that has been raised, I believe that some legislation is required to prevent steamship companies from bringing out people who eventually have to be turned back.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The effect of this legislation is to make the steamship company a sort of insurance agency. Will the minister tell us what the theory is that exempts the passenger from liability for his own illness and makes the company responsible?

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. ROBB: The transportation company knows the regulations that are in force in this country and it is more than possible that the passenger does not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And that is the reason why a passenger who is taken ill should get free medical treatment. That is a truly unique principle to set up.

Mr. ROBB: The transportation company sell him his passage to Canada and they are the only people that make any money out of it up to that point. This will be an additional obligation on the companies to advise people to whom they sell tickets just what the regulations are. The hon. gentleman need not fear that it will keep immigrants from coming to Canada, because the whole thing will mean less than 25 cents a head.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why would the companies want to advise people? Does the minister think that the transportation companies are going to go out and say to people, "You had better all come out, because if you get ill we shall have to pay your bills"? But let us take the minister's statement, that the company is the only one that is making any money out of the business. I will not suggest, by way of illustration, hon. members travelling on the train on their way west, because they travel on passes; but let us take any one else who has to take a railway journey. Now, there is no difference in principle between a railway journey and a steamer trip so far as this particular question is concerned. The minister's statement is that the company is the only one that is making any money out of the transportation of immigrants; but there is no difference in principle between a movement of immigrants on sea and on land, and if the steamship transportation company is to be made the guarantor against the illness of passengers, why not carry the same principle into the carriage of passengers by railway companies? A man develops appendicitis at sea and under this legislation he is taken to a port, placed in a hospital and is attended by a doctor. And the transportation company has to pay the bill. The minister cannot point to any exception in this provision; the company must pay the cost of the operation even if the trouble developed on the ship. Why should the company be compelled to pay the bill in this case any more than a railway company should be obliged to pay the expense in connection with an operation for appendicitis performed on a person who has developed this complaint on a railway journey? In both cases the company makes money out of the passage. What is the distinction?

11 p.m.

Mr. PUTNAM: Does it weigh with the hon. member, that the onus we impose on the transportation company is no more severe than that which is enforced by our American cousins?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not in the slightest.

Mr. PUTNAM: It does with me.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It may with the hon. gentleman because he is supporting the bill, and I do not suppose he has even read it.

Mr. ROBB: If we allowed everybody to come in without medical examination the hon. member's argument would be sound. But inasmuch as we impose certain medical restrictions on immigrants, then we say to the transportation companies that they shall be responsible if these immigrants when they come here are not physically fit.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, suppose the minister allowed the bill to stop there, with the inspection? But the bill goes past that.

Mr. BELAND: It does not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Minister of Health is wrong; the bill goes past inspection and includes illness developed on board. It covers illness during the period of detention.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The immigrant is not inspected during detention.

Mr. BELAND: If an immigrant is medically inspected, is found fit and is passed, then, of course, if on his journey to his destination he falls ill the government is liable for his treatment. But until an immigrant has passed the medical examination, why should he be a charge on the country?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No one has suggested that for a moment.

Mr. BELAND: A man leaves Europe; he is in the charge of the transportation company that brings him here. The moment he lands in Canada he is inspected by the immigration authorities and the medical officials. If he is considered to be suffering from any disease he is rejected and the transportation company is held responsible for whatever expenses may have been incurred on his account. And why should they not be held so responsible? Is there any reason why Canada instead of the transportation company, which is paid to bring out immigrants, be made responsible for the expenses involved in cases of illness? Shall we draw the line at Liverpool, at Antwerp or at Quebec?

Mr. BOYS: Where he boards the ship.

Mr. BELAND: That is a point we may dispute. That point of view may be held by my hon. friend but I do not share it myself. I say that so long as the immigrant has not landed in Canada and has not been medically inspected and passed as physically fit, all expenses incurred in the treatment of any illness from which he may be suffering should be borne by the transportation company which has brought him out. There is no reason whatever why we should bear that cost. My hon. friend advances the view that the company having exercised all possible vigilance in the matter, they cannot be accused of negligence. Very well; are we then to be charged with negligence, or are we to pay the cost of any illness in regard to which we have no responsibility? Obviously, either the company or the government must be responsible, and as between the two I say that unquestionably the responsibility should rest with the company.

Mr. BOYS: Why not go a step further and make the transportation company responsible for any illness which the immigrant may develop on his way between St. John and Winnipeg after having passed the authorities at St. John?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The company could not be responsible then because the country would have accepted the immigrant.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So far as I can understand hon. gentlemen opposite, the Minister of Health (Mr. Béland) says that there is inspection before detention while the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil) says that the inspection is made after detention.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I did not say anything of the kind; I said that the company could not be held responsible after the immigrant had been passed at inspection.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What my hon. friend said was to the effect that if he passed inspection he was not detained.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Surely he is not, but if he does not pass inspection he is detained, and he is not permitted to enter Canada until he can pass inspection.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend knows there are two inspections, medical and civil, and when we say a man has been examined and passed that means he must have passed both inspections.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Suppose the civil inspection does not take place, for some good reason and the man is held two months. After he has been held two months and is still under detention he takes some disease. Under this bill the transportation company is liable. Does my hon. friend think that is right?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If a man is detained he is detained for cause; if there is no cause he is passed. If there is reason for detention he is held until the cause is removed or the steamship company takes him back. My hon. friend shakes his head, but that is the course that is pursued.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Absolutely; if he is not permitted to enter Canada the steamship company takes him back. If he is detained it is usually on account of his health—nine times out of ten.

Mr. BOYS: They should take him back if there is negligence.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend is continually mentioning negligence. You cannot say it is negligence if the ship's doctor examines the passenger before he goes on board. The passenger may take ill on the ocean and he is detained when he lands in Canada, either because he is ill or for some other reason. That is the only time that the cost is paid by the transportation company that brought him to Canada.

Mr. BOYS: Why is the responsibility of the passenger entirely removed? The former act said:

> Then the cost of his hospital treament and medical attention and maintenance shall be paid by such transportation company, and otherwise the cost thereof shall be collected from such person.

The last two lines are left out. There is no further liability on the part of the passenger; the transportation company has to bear it all. Why should that be? Why should the transportation company at least not be permitted to look to the person, if the person is worth it, to pay for the cost of his own sickness or disease or whatever it is?

Mr. ROBB: Is it fair that someone should have the responsibility of taking care of these cases. Perhaps the passenger is not able to finance it himself, and the people who are making the money out of him are the people who are responsible and who should pay. We have been building up straw men and talking of possible cases all evening—of appendicitis that might develop, of pneumonia that might develop. Suppose a transportation company was a bit careless and typhoid fever developed on the ship, who would be responsible?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They are, of course. That is negligence.

Mr. BOYS: I do not think the minister is quite fair in suggesting that we are building up straw men; I am taking his own figures. Under the former law if the transportation company were guilty of negligence they were responsible; if they were not guilty of negligence they were not responsible. The minister told us that in 1922 the department paid $6,000 odd, I presume because the transportation companies were not guilty of negligence.

Mr. ROBB: In 1923 we paid only $3,980.

Mr. BOYS: What was the year of the $6,000, then? Anyway, we are only quibbling as to that. If the minister did not say 1922 he said 1921. I think he said 1922.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is correct; in 1922-23 the amount paid was $6,000.

Mr. BOYS: The department paid that because the company was not guilty of negligence. That shows that it is not a case of building up a straw man. All I am trying to find out is why this change is made. There are two changes. In the first place, you are departing from the proposition of negligence, and in addition you are relieving the passenger who, if worth it, certainly should in the first instance pay. If he is not worth it, that might be a different matter. I think the condition with respect to negligence should still prevail. Why is the provision giving the right of recovery against the individual not maintained?

Mr. ROBB: The companies are making a profit out of carrying these people; why should we impose that burden upon the passenger? With regard to the amounts paid, the department paid $3,980 and the immigrants paid $2,577, making a total of $6,557 for 1923-24. We have not the details here, but it is just possible that part of that $3,980 which the department paid was because the immigrant was not able to pay. Is it not fair that the company, which makes so much money out of them, should assume the responsibility?

Mr. BOYS: The minister will not say there is any money in carrying people over and then carrying them back without charge.

Mr. MILLAR: It has been stated that the immigrants receive a medical examination by doctors representing the steamship companies. Do they receive a medical examination from anyone representing the government before they go on board ship?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. SPENCER: Is there any medical examination made on the other side?

Mr. ROBB: Not by Canadian officials.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nobody wants to see something that is obviously unjust in a law, no matter whether the injustice extends to $100 or to $10,000. If you get a law the principle of which is wrong you are bound to have gross injustices coming out of it and consequently discontent. There is nothing in the law as it has stood that is in the slightest degree unjust. The principle is sound; you can understand it. But something like this is sure to come, perhaps in dozens of cases. A man comes across. He is inspected by the company before he gets on, and everything is all right. He lands, and that is all right. He is not a poor man; he is well off. But perhaps some report has reached Canada that he is an anarchist or that he is of a class that we should not admit to Canada, for some reason. He passes his medical examination on arrival, but he is detained on account of this report, perhaps two, three or four months. It is found that the report is false. But in the meantime the man takes seriously ill, perhaps with smallpox. Who has to pay the expense? According to this bill the minister says the company has to pay it, and the man never has to repay the company.

Mr. ROBB: I am afraid my hon. friend is building up an impossible case. He would not be detained if he passed the medical and civil examinations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that at all. I say he did not pass the civil examination; that he is detained on account of a report that he belongs to an objectionable class. He is detained because of a report that he belongs to some class that should not come in, say the anarchist class. He is detained two months pending investigation of that report, and in those two months he takes an illness that results in large medical fees. He is quite able to pay them, and this government passes a law which says that the company which brought him over has to pay.

Mr. ROBB: I never heard of such a case.

Mr. POWER: Are the transportation companies supposed to make the civil examination over there?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, we make it.

Mr. POWER: On the other side?

Mr. MEIGHEN: An examination into the qualifications altogether? I presume they do, and if they make a mistake they have to pay for it, and that is right, but where pending investigation on our own account, after we have passed him medically, when we are holding him for our own purpose and he takes ill —I am taking an extreme case, but there will be piles of them in between—though he is entirely able to pay for his illness—

Mr. POWER: I understand what the hon. member means, and I think there is a good deal in it, but what I want to know is this: Is it not the duty of the transportation company, before allowing any passenger to embark, to be sure that he fulfils all the civil qualifications? I am not discussing medical requirements.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think so.

Mr. POWER: Then would not the transportation company be responsible for allowing a person who was an anarchist or a suspected anarchist to come to Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I agree that they should.

Mr. POWER: Then they have committed a certain negligence if they allow an anarchist or a suspected anarchist to come here, have they not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not say suspected, no. If, as a matter of fact, they have done everything they could, have absolutely complied with everything, and not the slightest criticism of any kind can be levelled against them, if the man is all right and the department's information turns out to be wrong, if it turns out also that the man can pay his own medical fees, in the name of all common sense why should we pass a law that says the company has to pay them?

Mr. POWER: I agree, if such a case is possible.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Does my hon. friend infer that if the man passes the medical examination and is detained for some other purpose, the cost falls on the company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, that is the whole clause.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If my hon. friend will read the next clause, it seems to me it means the inspection on his entry and does not refer to a later inspection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is inspection on entry, but not medical examination.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If the man passes his medical examination and becomes ill later, would my hon. friend infer from this clause that the medical fees are to be paid by the steamship company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It not only implies that, it absolutely compels it, provided he is detained for inspection for any other purpose.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I have known of two or three cases where an immigrant after arrival was detained for a bond which took a week or so to arrive. Does the government say that if he takes ill while waiting for the bond the responsibility rests upon the transportation company, or is the government responsible? I know one immigrant who did take sick while waiting for a bond. Does the government say the transportation company should be responsible in such a case as that?

Mr. ROBB: A bond is required where the immigrant comes in against the law of the land. The companies will be a little more careful about bringing that kind of people in, or they will have the bond ready when they land.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The immigrant arrived here to go on a farm, and a bond was required by some person here that he would stay a year on the farm, which he did, but he was detained over a week waiting for that bond.

Mr. ROBB: That was a case, probably, where the immigrant represented himself to be a farmer, but the officer on inspection looked at his hands, perhaps, and said: "This man is no farmer," and he required a bond that he would go on the farm. The transportation people should look after that before they bring the man in.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): He went on the farm and remained there but yet he was detained a week waiting for the bond.

Mr. ROBB: And as soon as the bond expired he left the farm?

Mr. MILLAR: The minister stated that steamship companies have at times refunded certain sums when they brought in immigrants not medically fit to enter Canada. I would ask, as a matter of information, under what conditions they refunded this money. Who made the representations, and what representations were made?

Mr. ROBB: I do not see what my hon. friend is driving at; I made no such statement. I said the steamship companies gave a refund of $15 a head to passengers from the United Kingdom.

Mr. MILLAR: Was I wrong in understanding that when they brought in immigrants not medically fit they made a refund? I understood the minister to say that refunds were made in such cases.

Mr. ROBB: There is a penalty.

Mr. MILLAR: Have they paid any money in consequence of that penalty?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MILLAR: Under what conditions, and who made the representations?

Mr. ROBB: I will give my hon. friend all that information when we get into the estimates.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Certain aliens deemed to be undesirable immigrants.

Mr. McMASTER: I shall not detain the committee long, but I would ask the minister whether the department and the country would not be amply protected if the clause should read as follows: "Or shall belong to any secret society or organization which extorts money," and so on. I do not like to give the right to anyone to deport a person on mere suspicion, or mere common repute. It would seem to me that if the law stated that when a person belonged to a society of this undesirable character he could be deported, that would be quite sufficient. The officers of the department would make an investigation, if necessary, and if in their opinion proof existed of the man belonging to such an unworthy organization, he could be deported. I make no objection to swift justice being meted out to such people. I make no objection to the department having this power, because prompt action may be and quite often is necessary, but I do not think it is consonant with the traditions of this country and British traditions generally that people should be exposed to deportation on mere repute, or what is even worse, on mere suspicion.

Mr. ROBB: May I point out that the question of repute comes in in connection with the examination, but it is provided further:

If upon investigation of the facts such board of inquiry or examining officer is satisfied that such person belongs to any of the prohibited or undesirable classes mentioned in sections 40 and 41 of this act, such person shall be deported forthwith, as provided for in section 33 of this act, subject, however, to such right of appeal as he may have to the minister.

Now, I repeat again what I said earlier in the evening that we are here to protect the people of Canada and I am going to see to it that they get that protection.

Mr. McMASTER: I am not going to divide the committee on this question, I would merely repeat what the leader of the opposition said a few moments ago: That if you have a law that is wrong in principle you are likely to have injustice arise from it. If the investigation was for the purpose of determining that the man was guilty, and if after that determination the man would be deported, I would make no objection; but the investigation is to determine whether he comes within this undesirable class, and the undesirable class is defined as those suspected of belonging to such organization. Under those circumstances it seems to me it is not in consonance with our tradition that a man can be deported from this country just because somebody suspects that he belongs to an undesirable organization.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Really I am not often found complaining of the sternness of an immigration law, but I think there is something in what the hon. member argues. I do not know how the former act read, it may have read in this respect in the same way, but those were different times from to-day. That act was passed in very serious years. Really I do not think we ought to pass a law now which makes an immigrant finally declared undesirable merely because he is suspected of belonging to a certain class. I would not have any objection to a law which enabled the minister to detain a man pending his inquiry into the case of one so suspected; but to declare finally and conclusively that once it is established that a man is suspected then he is undesirable per se seems to be fundamentally unjust.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I may say for the information of the committee that this section has not been changed except that it omits the following proviso from section 41:

Provided that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject either by reason of birth in Canada or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

The rest of the section is just the same.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is left out?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It applies now only to aliens.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the minister reading from now?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am reading from the section of last year and that is deleted this year. That is all the change.

Mr. McMASTER: That does not meet my objection at all. The fundamental injustice is just as bad in respect of an alien as it is in respect of a British subject. As a matter of fact some of the undesirable people who have been carrying on extreme agitation in this country have been from the British Isles. That is not the point. The point is that by this section certain classes are defined as being undesirable, and among those classes so defined are people who are suspected of belonging to an undesirable association. The point I wish to drive home to the committee is that it is not fair and it is not just to classify a man as undesirable and turn him out of a country merely because he is suspected of belonging to an undesirable association.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, but my hon. friend forgets that he gets a board.

Mr. McMASTER: He may get a board but that board is not going to determine whether he is guilty or not but that they suspect he is guilty.

Mr. BOYS: That is the present law.

Mr. McMASTER: I know it is. I object to the present law and I object to the proposed law. Because I do press upon the committee—I am sorry to take up time at this late hour of the session—that it is fundamentally undesirable and fundamentally unjust.

Mr. MARLER: Would my hon. friend wait until he has actually committed some crime?

Mr. McMASTER: I should not wait until he has committed a crime, but we should have some proof before the action which is contemplated is taken.

Mr. MARLER: How can we get proof in a matter of that description?

Mr. McMASTER: Then do not act. It is a principle of British law and British justice that a man should not have any untoward action taken in respect to him unless there is actual proof. To say that because John Sobienski, who has come from Poland, is suspected of belonging to some undesirable association—that merely because he is suspected he should be subject to deportation shocks my sense of justice.

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend's argument is wanting in one particular. First of all an immigrant coming over has to acquire British citizenship or Canadian citizenship.

Mr. McMASTER: But supposing he is not guilty.

Mr. MARLER: It does not affect the situation very materially. It seems to me this matter can be very properly left in the hands of the department. Very possibly a few instances may occur where the suspicion is unfounded, but cases of this description may properly be left in the hands of a competent minister. The provision may shock the susceptibilities of my hon. friend from Brome in certain ways, but we have to take a reasonable chance in matters of this description.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not quite get the minister's distinction. I do not want to press the matter further, but really in these times I would agree with the hon. member for Brome. I am ready to give the minister every possible latitude so that if he himself comes to the conclusion that there is reason to believe, even though it is not proven, that a man is of that class he may send him back. But what class? Anarchists—under the class defined here somebody suspected of being an anarchist. However, I did not rise for the purpose of pressing that question. The Minister of the Interior stated that the only difference between this bill and last year's act was that in the statute there was a clause which stated that this should not apply to anyone—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): To British subjects.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And that is deleted. Well, if this is deleted the act will apply to a person from Britain or anywhere else.

Mr. ROBB: No. What is deleted is:

Provided that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject either by reason of birth in Canada or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

Mr. BOYS: What section is that?

Mr. ROBB: The balance of the section was placed in the act by my right hon. friend. He thought it was pretty good and I agreed with him at that time.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am very glad indeed but we had to take considerable criticism for it. I am prepared to provide the same thing still except in that one respect; I do not think we ought to go quite that length in these more peaceful times. But my point is this: As I understand the minister even yet he reads something which he says is no longer part of the act, but the something which he reads is to the effect that the act shall not apply to a certain class of British subject. When he deletes that it makes it apply.

Mr. ROBB: No, I will read what the bill says:

Whenever any alien advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Great Britain or Canada, or other British dominion, colony, possession or dependency, or the overthrow by force or violence of constituted law and authority, or assassination, or shall by word or act create or attempt to create riot or public disorder in Canada, or shall by common repute belong to or be suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from, or in any way attempts to control any resident of Canada by force or threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail; such person for the purposes of this act shall be considered and classed as an undesirable immigrant, and it shall be the duty of any officer becoming cognizant thereof, and the duty of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein such person may be, to forthwith send a written complaint thereof to the Minister of Immigration, giving full particulars.

Then the Minister of Immigration starts an inquiry under this, and if the facts are proven justice is swift and sure, and he goes back.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has read out the section of the act and he is passing it—the same section.

Mr. ROBB: Yes. The previous act applies to British and Canadian subjects.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister read the exact part he refers to?

Mr. ROBB: The amendment reads:

Provided that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject either by reason of birth in Canada or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

Mr. BOYS: That is not the vital change.

Mr. ROBB: I will admit the hon. gentleman is right. I have been wrongly advised. This is the act that I have read.

Mr. BOYS: That is not the vital change in the act. The first line or two of the proposed section reads:

Whenever any alien advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Great Britain or Canada.

And so on. The opening words of the former section were:

Every person who by word or act in Canada seeks to overthrow by force or violence.

And so on. The proposed amendment would accord in measure with the former section if the words were left out which the minister says are to be stricken out, namely:

Provided that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject either by reason of birth in Canada or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

The proposed amendment goes very much further, and would apply to a resident of Great Britain.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BOYS: Perhaps I am wrong.

Mr. ROBB: If he was a resident of Great Britain and not a British subject.

Mr. BOYS: The former section applies to a British subject.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: Who was not by reason of birth in Canada or naturalization in Canada, and so on. The present act applies only to aliens. That is really the change.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: It would seem to me that if there was one person who should be deported above all others, it would be a British subject who was coming to Canada for the purposes mentioned in the act. I do not know why that change should be made. I personally would be more inclined to forgive an alien for an offence of that kind than a person from the British Isles.

Mr. BELAND: The hon. member thinks the new clause is not strict enough?

Mr. BOYS: I do not see any reason for the change. Surely a resident of the British Isles coming here and advocating such a proposition as is referred to in this section should be treated as severely as an alien. Why is it necessary to make that change?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): He was disqualified under the act of last year.

Mr. BOYS: Pardon me, the language of the previous act was "every person." That would apply to everybody, no matter where he came from. The exception is found in the last two or three words, as follows:

Provided that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject either by reason of birth in Canada or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

These are the only two exceptions. Surely it cannot be argued that that would apply to a resident of the British Isles? It certainly would not. Why is it necessary to exclude him? I would forgive an alien much quicker than I would a British subject for an offence of this kind. What prompted the minister to make this change?

Mr. ROBB: I am bound to say that, now my attention has been directed to it, I share very largely the views of my hon. friend.

Mr. BOYS: I am glad I am right for once.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister will now come to the conclusion that when the late government passed legislation it was not very far out.

Mr. BOYS: I agree with that.

Mr. GRAHAM: It took the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Boys) to show it.

Mr. McMASTER: Would there not be a way to meet the desires of the leader of the opposition, the member for Brome and the member for South Simcoe all at the same time? Make this law apply to British subjects as well as to aliens.

Mr. BOYS: It applies to them now.

Mr. McMASTER: Or strike out the provision in reference to suspicion, and do not have British subjects or aliens deported on mere suspicion. Make the one law apply to everybody, and have it a law which meets our idea of justice.

Mr. HOEY: Give them a trial by jury.

Mr. BOYS: I must admit I share the views of the member for Brome in regard to finding any one guilty on suspicion. Personally I think this law is a move in the right direction, and I would be willing to take a chance on it; so that if the minister can accede to the request I would have no objection. I read the act more or less hurriedly, but it seems to me the words are exactly the same. The former section read:

Or who, by common repute belongs to or is suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization.

And so on. I think the words are identical in the proposed amendment, and for my part I do not seek to make any change, although I appreciate the argument that nobody should be found guilty of an offence or deported merely on suspicion. However, the other feature seems more important than that, and I would make it apply to a British subject.

Mr. NEILL: If I might venture into the field of law, I would suggest that there is nothing very much wrong with the section as now drafted. Formerly it applied to every person who committed any of these offences. That was a general provision, but it exempted British subjects by reason of birth in Canada, or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Canadians.

Mr. NEILL: Yes. But it did allow deportation by means of a summary investigation of an alien or British-born subject?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Now they are going to amend it and leave out the last few words, and the British-born subject and the Canadian subject will be entitled to a trial. That is the change and it seems to me desirable. The hon. member for Brome wants to go further and give the alien a trial as well.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he comes from Britain he is of that class and the law does not declare him to be undesirable at all.

Mr. NEILL: Which law?

Mr .MEIGHEN: The old law.

Mr. NEILL: Would the hon. member explain that again?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under the old law if he came from Britain and was of such a class he would be declared undesirable, the same as if he came from any other country. Under the law as proposed to be amended if he comes from Britain he is not declared to be undesirable at all. He is presumed to be desirable.

Mr. NEILL: And the act does not apply it all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. ROBB: I am advised that substantially the same amendment as is now proposed was passed twice by this House, but was thrown out by the Upper House. For that reason I do not think I would like to change it, but would like to put it through as it stands.

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It has always been held that this was drastic action against a British subject. That is the fight we have had every year. I assume the department is now trying to get away from that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was contended—and a terrible row was raised over it—that we had perpetrated an offence against the individual, but there was nothing in it; it was all pure fudge from beginning to end.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Arrest or prosecution of rejected or deported person remaining in or returning to Canada except in case of inability to comply with rescinded order in council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the difference between this law and the previous law?

Mr. ROBB: Under the present law he was not prohibited from returning, but under this amendment he will be prohibited from returning if convicted under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Cost of maintenance of rejected immigrant pending return.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the difference between this and the previous law? The explanation is longer than the change.

Mr. ROBB: The amendment to section 44 is in keeping with the amendments to sections 19 and 34. As the law now stands, the transportation company is not responsible for any maintenance during detention, that is prior to rejection. Where a large number of passengers are waiting to be examined, it sometimes happens that passengers are held in the immigration building for a period involving maintenance cost. The amended section places upon the transportation company all costs from the time of arrival until the time of admission or time of deportation, as the case may be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is just of a piece with the other. If the department detains a man even though it finally turns out that there was no case at all, all the expenses of detention shall be paid by the transportation company.

Mr. ROBB: I am informed that the transportation companies are now paying this cost. This is only putting in the law what they are actually carrying out. This is supposing that a number of boats come in and passengers are detained for a time before they are passed. The period may be half a day or more. My hon. friend will see how this will work out to the advantage of the transportation people. This is where they are detained in the immigration hall before they are passed on and examined and cleared. It suits the transportation company to get them out of the boat into the immigration hall because the boat may clear and proceed to another port. If we did not have this provision, we might hold the boat out in the stream until the passengers were cleared, so that this is not costing the transportation companies so much.

Mr. BOYS: The former section read:

The cost of his maintenance, while being detained at any immigrant station, as well as the cost of his return, shall be paid by such transportation company except as provided in section 19 of this act.

That was the old section. It is rather difficult just at a glance to appreciate the change. What is accomplished by the proposed section which repeals the former section?

Mr. ROBB: This will apply to cases where he is rejected. Section 44 reads:

Every immigrant, passenger, stowaway or other person brought to Canada by a transportation company and rejected by the board of inquiry or officer in charge, shall, if practicable, be sent back to the place whence he came, on the vessel, railway train or other vehicle by which he was brought to Canada.

When he comes in now, the liability dates from the time he arrives. Prior to this, the transportation company was not liable between the time he had arrived and the time he was rejected.

Mr. BOYS: The minister may be right. The language of the old section is:

The cost of his maintenance, while being detained at any immigrant station.

Again I ask: What does the new section provide which was not taken care of by the former section?

Mr. ROBB: It provides for the period between his arrival and his examination. The old section provided only for his expenses after rejection. This provides for his expenses prior to his rejection as well.

Mr. BOYS: I have read the minister the former section.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend will read the first part of it.

Mr. BOYS: I will read the whole section:

Every immigrant, passenger, stowaway or other person brought to Canada by a transportation company and rejected by the board of inquiry or officer in charge, shall, if practicable, be sent back to the place whence he came, on the vessel, railway train or other vehicle by which he was brought to Canada. The cost of his maintenance while being detained—

Mr. ROBB: After rejection.

Mr. BOYS: What is the distinction?

Mr. ROBB: Now they will pay for him from the time he was landed to the time of rejection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They will have to do that anyway in any case. The only distinction that I can see is that under the old act he had to be finally a rejected immigrant to come under this at all, but if he did come under it, then all the costs before rejection or after it, if there were any, must be paid. But if he never became a rejected immigrant, then under this change, the transportation companies have to pay the costs of detention during examination.

Mr. ROBB: No, they only paid after he was rejected. Prior to this they were not responsible.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the act as read by my hon. friend.

Mr. ROBB: That is the interpretation the officials have placed upon it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If they go home and look it over, they will see they are wrong. I see the difference and it is a difference right in line with the difference which the minister has enacted in the previous legislation about the sick people.

Mr. ROBB: Exactly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The difference imposes this extra obligation upon a transportation company. It says: You bring a man over. He is all right. We examine him through, for a while, to be sure that he is all right. We find that he is all right. Previously, you did not have to pay the expense during the examination; now you have to do so. In the name of common justice, why should they have to? It is penalizing the company for bringing in the right kind of people.

Mr. BOYS: Personally I appreciate very much the new method of explaining these amendments. They are most useful and without them I do not know that we could do as well as we are doing at present; we find the previous clause quoted and in some cases the amendments are outlined. That is very helpful. But when we come to this section we find that splendid system which has been recently adopted, and which I most heartily approve of, forsaken entirely. We do not find anything in the section underlined to show what the new part is, nor is there anything on the opposite page giving an explanation. I am yet unable to grasp the distinction between this section and the other one. I think the former section applied to detention, at time of rejection, and, after rejection, the cost of return, and it seems to me that the new section does exactly the same thing. If the immigrant did not return, under the old section there was responsibility for the period of detention and no longer and under the new section the responsibility is for the period of detention.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The old section is premised, the presumption being that the man is ultimately rejected; but the new section is not. The new section applies to cases where there is no rejection and makes the company liable nevertheless; that is to say, the company performs its duty perfectly well, and brings in the right class of immigrant. But the government detains him for some purpose of its own and ultimately finds that he is perfectly acceptable; yet it makes the company pay the expenses incurred during that detention. That is the new law. It would be exactly the same if the responsibility were put upon one of the churches or upon the liquor board or any body of that kind. Why make the company pay?

Mr. ROBB: They pay on the principle that they are responsible for all charges until the man is admitted to the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can understand that there are certain things for which the company would be responsible. But why make them responsible for doing right? That beats me. There is no soundness or sanity in the principle; it is not founded on anything that appeals to the mind at all. If the country for its own purposes examines a man, and the minister, exercising his judgment, says he is perfectly acceptable and that the company did the right thing in bringing him, having taken every precaution that was necessary, why make the company pay because the man has been detained?

Mr. ROBB: They are paying now, up to the moment that the man is admitted. The companies have been paying these charges in New York for years.

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose they would if they had to. I would far rather make them pay what they are entitled to pay. The thing ought to be put on some common sense basis.

Mr. ROBB: It is on such a basis now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Dear me.

Mr. BOYS: The only change I see in this section seems to be that the words "except as provided for in section 19 of this act," which appear in the old section 44, seem to be left out of the new section. In the old section this language appears but it does not appear in the new one. Is that the only change? Section 19 deals with the appeal from the board, and possibly this change is all that is intended by the amendment.

Mr. ROBB: The amendment to section 44 is in keeping with the amendments to sections 19 and 34. As the law now stands the transportation company is not responsible for maintenance or detention charges prior to rejection. Where there are a large number of passengers to be examined it sometimes happens that passengers are held in the immigration building for a period involving maintenance cost, and the amended section places all costs from the time of arrival until the time of admission or deportation, as the case may be, upon the transportation company. As to detention costs, it will be of interest to note, as I pointed out before, that last year they amounted to less than 25 cents per head on the total.

Mr. BOYS: I do not think that statement can be quite correct because under the former law the transportation companies were not responsible for all costs: they were responsible for all costs in case of negligence but not otherwise. I do not think that is correct, but even that does not explain the point I have brought to the attention of the minister.

Mr. ROBB: The whole language has been re-drafted.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Application of act to Chinese.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the effect of the change?

Mr. ROBB: The only change is to amend section 79 by inserting after the word "act" in the second line the figures "1923." The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), made some observations a moment ago which I said I would take into consideration.

12 m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume that the act of 1923 repealed the former act and consequently this change is necessary.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Bill reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ROBB: If there is no objection, there is a resolution regarding Finland that we might advance to the stage of introducing the bill. It is order No. 56.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does it do?

Mr. ROBB: It gives us the benefit of their favoured nation treatment. As to the business done, they sold us last year $6,000 worth and we sold them $1,754,000 worth. We can discuss the principle when we get into the bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I would not object to the matter being advanced to the second reading so that no time will be lost, but I would prefer not to have the resolution pass in the absence of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton).

Mr. ROBB: All right.

On motion of Mr. Graham, the House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. Friday.
