House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Wednesday, June 11, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

SALARIES OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the table of the House copies of correspondence between the government and the Civil Service Commission and the Board of Audit respecting the revision of salaries of postal employees. This is the correspondence which was requested yesterday by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). What is tabled includes all the correspondence, but it does not include some of the statistical tables which accompany that correspondence. If, however, those tables are desired they can be brought down later.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do the copies include the correspondence with the other various bodies which were supposed to co-operate with the commission—the Audit Board and the deputy ministers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it includes all the correspondence between the government and the Civil Service Commission and the government and the Audit Board; I cannot be sure at the moment whether it includes the correspondence between the deputy ministers and the commission. I will have inquiry made and if necessary submit tomorrow such further correspondence as is not now included in what has been tabled.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Including correspondence between the Audit Board and the commission if there is any?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

HOME BANK INQUIRY

ROYAL COMMISSION, INTERIM REPORT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the Table of the House the interim report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the Home Bank, and I move that the said report be referred to the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): When will the report be printed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall make a motion in a moment respecting the printing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the idea of referring the report to the Banking and Commerce committee? It was not the Banking and Commerce committee which was appointed to consider it. Perhaps this is done in pursuance of a motion made early in the session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was an order passed to refer all Home Bank matters to the Banking and Commerce committee.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move that rule 74 be suspended and that there be printed forthwith 750 copies in English and 250 copies in French, of the interim report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the Home Bank, just laid upon the Table.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SALES TAX COLLECTIONS

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. What amount has been collected under the sales tax during the fiscal year last passed in each city with a population of one hundred thousand or over?
2. (a) What amount of sales taxes were due and unpaid on the 31st March, 1924, and (b) what is the number of taxpayers in arrears on said date in each of said cities?
3. Have legal proceedings been taken against such taxpayers? If so, in what cities and what is the number of such proceedings in each city?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

UNITED STATES TARIFF

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Is there a clause in the United States tariff empowering the president to increase the duty against foreign goods entering the United States, under certain conditions?

2. If so, has the said law been invoked during the past two years, and how frequently and on what goods, and to what rate was said duty increased?

Hon. Mr. LOW:

1. Yes. Under certain conditions therein laid down, section 315 (a) of title III of the United States Tariff Act of 1922, empowers the president to increase or decrease duties up to 50 per cent. of existing rates. Powers of a related nature are conferred on the president in other sections of the act, particularly sections 316 and 317.

2. Yes. This law was made effective for the first time in regard to wheat. wheat flour, and certain wheat products, and on March 7, 1924, the following changes in the tariff were ordered by the president, to come into force in thirty days:

An increase in the duty on wheat from 30 cents per bushel of sixty pounds to 43 cents per bushel of sixty pounds;

An increase in the duty on wheat flour, semolina, crushed or cracked wheat, and similar wheat products not specially provided for, from 78 cents per hundred pounds to $1.04 per hundred pounds;

A decrease in the duty on bran, shorts, and byproduct feeds obtained in milling wheat (within the limit of total decrease provided for in the Tariff Act) from 15 per centum ad valorem to 7½ per centum ad valorem.

This law has also been invoked in the case of certain other products of minor importance, in regard to which the department has no complete information.

DUMPING DUTY ON COKE

Mr. EVANS:

1. Why was $1 per ton of dumping duty levied on a car of coke imported from Detroit by W. O. Sealy of Hamilton when the price paid F.O.B. Detroit was $6.50 per ton, which was the price at which coke was sold in the ordinary course of trade in the United States?

2. What was the name of the customs officer who made the levy?

3. Who made the regulation that coke bought in Detroit at less than $7.50 per ton was subject to the dumping clause?

4. How long has such regulation been in force?

5. May goods be held to be dumped when the price paid is the ordinary charge in the country of origin?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

1. On report of investigating officer that the selling price to purchaser in Canada was less than the fair market value when sold for home consumption in the usual and ordinary course of trade.

2. Collector of Customs and Excise, Hamilton, Ontario.

3. No regulation, but instruction by Appraising branch that invoice did not represent fair market value.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. No, provided price paid is not less than the fair market value of the goods when sold for home consumption in the usual and ordinary course in the country whence exported to Canada at the time of their exportation to Canada.

BEER MANUFACTURED IN MANITOBA

Mr. WARD:

1. What total quantity of beer was manufactured in Manitoba in each of the years 1915 to 1923, inclusive?

2. What revenue accrued to the Dominion from the manufacture of beer in Manitoba in each of the years 1915 to 1923, inclusive?

3. What reports of violations of provincial liquor laws by breweries in Manitoba have been made to Dominion authorities for each of the years 1915 to 1923, inclusive?

4. What decision, if any, has been reached by the Government as to the continuance of license to breweries, found guilty of violation of law?

5. What total quantity of wines and spirituous liquors were (a) imported into Canada: and (b) manufactured in Canada, in each of the years 1915 to 1923, inclusive?

6. What total quantity of beers and malt liquors were (a) imported into Canada; and (b) manufactured in Canada, in each of the years 1915 to 1923, inclusive?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

3. Mr. J. H. MacLean, chief inspector under the Manitoba Temperance Act advised the department on the 17th of February, 1922, that fines were imposed upon the following brewers for violations of said act.

The E. L. Brewery Company, Winnipeg, Man., February 28, 1921, $200; November 14, 1921, $300; December 20, 1921, $1,000.

Frank P. Shea, Winnipeg, Man., October 20, 1921, $300.

The Home Brewery Company, Winnipeg Man., December 19, 1921, $1,000; January 16 1922, $200.

Idelweiss Brewery, Winnipeg, Man., March 21, 1921, $300; August 30, 1921, $500.

4. The department is advised that the minister lacks authority to terminate such licenses under section (2) of chapter (19) of the statutes of 1916, unless they have been forfeited by the court, pursuant to the said section, as an additional penalty.

UNITED STATES WHEAT IN CANADIAN ELEVATORS

Mr. SPENCER:

What quantity of wheat, if any, originating in the United States was taken into public or private terminal elevators in Canada in each of the years of 1921, 1922 and 1923?

Hon. Mr. LOW:

No wheat of United States origin is handled in the public and private terminal elevators in the Western Inspection Division. A small amount of United States corn sometimes is received at the head of the lakes. The public elevators in the eastern inspection division, however, regularly receive considerable quantities of United States wheat in transit. The amounts handled during the crop years ended August 31st, 1921, 22 and 23 were as follows:

CANADIAN CUSTOMS OFFICER AT NEW YORK

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Did the government pass an order in council, providing for the establishment of a Canadian customs officer at New York to facilitate the transfer of goods originating in eastern Canada and destined to the Pacific coast port of Vancouver?

2. If so, has such officer been appointed?

3. If no such officer has been appointed, what is the reason?

4. Did said order in council limit the shipment of such goods via New York to British bottoms; if so, why?

5. Has the government received representations from Vancouver board of trade requesting the elimination of such limitation?

6. If so, has the government reached any decision in the matter or when can such decision be expected?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

1. The order in council provides for a Canadian customs officer being stationed at the point of transfer in the United States, and for the transfer of the Canadian goods from car to vessel and vice versa, and from vessel to vessel, to be made in the presence of the officer and to be certified by him.

2. No Canadian customs officer has as yet been assigned to duty at any place in the United States under the provisions of this order in council. When the department has been notified that Canadian goods have arrived at a place of transfer in the United States under special customs manifest as provided in the regulations, the department will assign an officer to supervise the transfer of the goods under the provisions of the regulations.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. Yes. For the purpose of confining the benefits of this trade to Canadian and British vessels.

5. Yes.

6. No change in the present regulations is contemplated.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT—WEMBLEY EXHIBITION

Miss MACPHAIL:

1. How many steamship passages have been booked for England for members of parliament by or on behalf of the government in connection with the British exhibition at Wembley?

2. With what steamship company have the passages been booked?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. None.

2. Answered by No. 1.

[Mr. Low.]

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I want to ask my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) whether there would be any objection to our proceeding with the second reading of the bill regarding the transferable vote?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Although I am in a very conciliatory mood I cannot agree to that; it would be the last thing I would want to proceed with to-day or, indeed, any other day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was understood that we would proceed with the matter yesterday, but if my right hon. friend prefers that it should still be deferred we will take it up at the first favourable opportunity.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Trust Companies Act, 1914, and to provide,—

1. That the Superintendent of Insurance shall annually ascertain and certify the total amount of the expenditure incurred by the Government for or in connection with the administration of the Act during the last preceding fiscal year, and the total amount of income received during the last preceding calendar year by each company, and the findings of the superintendent shall be final and conclusive.

2. That thereupon the superintendent shall ascertain the ratio or percentage which the total expenditure so found and certified bears to the aggregate of the income aforesaid, and shall assess each of the companies an amount equivalent to that percentage of the total amount of the income received, and such assessment when certified by the superintendent shall be binding upon the said companies, and be final and conclusive.

3. That the amount so assessed against each company shall constitute a debt payable to His Majesty, and shall be payable upon demand of the superintendent, and may be recovered as a debt in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister explain the resolution?

Mr. ROBB: The purpose of the amendment is to make some minor changes defining the classes of securities that would come under the act. The investments are also defined, with certain reference to loans to shareholders and directors and to provide for assessment for administration and inspection. As my hon. friend knows, the cost of inspection is at present entirely levied on the insurance companies and we propose under the three bills which we intend to submit to assess on the trust companies, the loan companies and the insurance companies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is right. Formerly the cost of inspecting trust companies and loan companies was comparatively so trifling that no assessment was made, and there was no objection to the use of the surplus under the Insurance Act for that purpose, although strictly perhaps it ought not to have been so used. Has the cost gone up very much, and are we going to have expensive bureau work in connection with it?

Mr. ROBB: No, we do not anticipate any additional expense. We simply propose to spread the cost over the three classes of companies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Am I right in assuming that what the minister proposes is to take the cost of inspection during the previous year, and assess it in proportion to the income of the insurance companies?

Mr. ROBB: —and the loan companies and trust companies.

Mr MEIGHEN: And that this power of assessment shall be wholly in the hands of the superintendent, with no appeal from his decision?

Mr ROBB: I am not sure about the question of appeal.

Mr MEIGHEN: There is no appeal The bill says that:

—such assessment shall be binding upon the said companies, and be final and conclusive.

Before I would care to assent even passively to the principle, I should like to know what the minister's view is on this whole question of inspection of companies. We have gone pretty far in connection with the inspection of banks in certain proposals put forward by the minister this session. It is said that consultation involves responsibility. Well, if it does, inspection involves responsibility many times more. I have no question mark in my mind at all as to the wisdom of government inspection so long as its efforts are directed towards reasonably safeguarding the public of Canada; but I have a great question mark in my mind as to the wisdom of government going into the field of inspection where its wards whom it is supposed to be protecting are not the public but are merely investors, debenture holders and people of that class. I hope the government is not going too far. I am not making any objection; in fact the question mark in my mind is: Have we not gone too far already? Also, are we not pushing the powers now vested in our officials too far? Are we not delving at the roots of enterprise and all the time involving responsibility on ourselves to a great degree, not on behalf of the public of this country, but really on behalf of investors who are entirely competent to look after themselves?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend must bear in mind that some of these trust companies and loan companies under their charters invite and secure deposits from the public. I think it is quite reasonable that we should have a measure of inspection of these companies as to their investments and administration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not raising the point at all in so far as depositors are concerned. But I should like to have the minister's view as to how far we should go in seeking to protect debenture holders in this and other lands and thus incurring a degree of responsibility on behalf of people who can look after themselves a lot better than we can.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many men are now employed?

Mr. ROBB: There are about eight or nine men, but they are inspecting all the companies. During the past two years one man has been devoting his time largely to the inspection of trust companies and loan companies.

Mr. HANSON: I see by the estimates this year that in the insurance department there are thirty-two employees, and that the salaries and contingencies total $131,550. Under this and the other two resolutions on the order paper is it proposed to put all the expense of inspection on the companies? And what has been the increase in the cost of this department in the past ten years?

Mr. ROBB: The percentage of increase has been less than the increase in the number of companies and the assets involved. The expenses which the hon. member quotes were formerly altogether charged to the insurance companies; now we propose to apportion them among the insurance companies, the loan companies and the trust companies in proportion to their business.

Mr. HANSON: Do I understand from the minister that the assessment is now and has been for some time made on the insurance companies for the cost of their inspection? And does that cost cover all the items set out under the details of Civil Government on page 103 of the estimates? In other words, is the country recouped by the insurance companies for the total cost of the department?

Mr. ROBB: Oh yes, the insurance companies pay the total cost of the administration of the department now.

Mr. HANSON: You propose to spread the cost over the three classes of companies?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: Some weeks ago I introduced a motion regarding these trust, loan and insurance companies, asking for further safeguards, inspection and audits to further protect the public and those interested in and dealing with these companies. A survey is needed and additional safeguards to protect all concerned. Are we to wait until the loan, trust and insurance companies follow the Home Bank's example? What inspections are there of these companies, and what is being done to further protect the public? What are the functions of a trust company? The act has not been consolidated and revised since 1914, and trust companies have gone far afield and beyond the functions intended by parliament, with the skilful way lawyers can draw agreements. Trust companies to-day are doing a banking, real estate and general business, and usurping powers never intended by parliament. The Home Bank inquiry shows how they go far afield, and how such a company can be the backbone of a bank, a trust, and a restraint of trade. The whole Insurance, Loan and Trust Company General Act should go to the Banking and Commerce committee, a survey should be made and the act revised and consolidated and brought up to date to protect the public before these companies follow the Home Bank way of doing things. All these acts need overhauling. Are we to wait until it is too late. These companies are exercising powers never intended by parliament.

Mr. ROBB: We have an inspection in that regard, and a report is published each year and may be obtained from the Superintendent of Insurance. The last one I have in my hand is dated the 31st of December, 1922, and we have a preliminary report now out for the period ending 31st December, 1923.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has had a recess now; perhaps he will venture to give us an opinion on the question I asked about. I think it is fundamental; it is the root of the whole matter.

Mr. ROBB: That is, as to guarding investors?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want the minister's opinion about the wisdom of the government of Canada making itself the guardian of debenture holders, clothing itself with powers and responsibilities to safeguard any except the public of our country. The principle was conceded long ago of guarding the public in respect to deposits made in response to an invitation extended to the people generally. But what does the minister think about our inspecting with a view to protecting debenture holders? Just to make the case specific: The minister has talked pretty strongly in the past against the drift to socialism, but if I were drifting that way this is about the last by-way of socialism I would want to tumble into. Why do the debenture holders need our help?

Mr. ROBB: We are not making any change in the act in that regard. The act we are working under now was the act adopted in 1914, and my right hon. friend supported the government that introduced it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The act has been amended, and amended under this government, in this very feature. There has been continuous expansion. I am not sure I can defend all the expansions that went on even under the late government; one cannot follow every detail. But there has been a growth, and I think a dangerous growth, since. Now, what does the minister think of it? Is it right or is it wrong? If we start or if we continue in this direction—and this is going to encourage the continuance, because this gets the money to keep enlarging the staff, building up an extensive department, sending men here, there and everywhere, inspecting this company and that for fear somebody will lose some money over in Scotland—where are we going to end? Suppose after all somebody does lose something—the hon. member (Mr. Jacobs) laughs.

Mr. JACOBS: I was laughing at the idea of Scotland being a place where any one would lose money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I got the point, especially coming from the hon. member.

Mr. McMASTER: Almost as strange as from Palestine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If we keep on, notwithstanding anything we do there is sure to be trouble, and when that trouble comes are we not going to be in a position where we cannot answer the demands of the debenture holders to be recouped by the Dominion of Canada? In a word, what need we care? If there is one class of people in the world who are able to look after themselves it is the money lenders. Had we not better keep out and let them look after themselves, rather than make provision that will involve increase of staff, the final object being only to pile greater and greater burdens on our own shoulders?

Mr. ROBB: There is no intention of increasing the staff; it is just a question, as I said before, of distributing the cost. It was determined in the amended act of 1920 what were the liabilities and what should be the nature of the report submitted to the department. I find in the statement of liabilities in the schedule to the act that the very first item is marked, "Liabilities to the public; amount of debentures or debenture stock issued and outstanding." We require that, and my hon. friend will recognize that debentures are regarded as a liability to the public. We are not rescinding that; we are not changing, enlarging or reducing it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has made no answer at all. Even if the act were passed in 1920 we still have the question before us, are we going to continue the principle there adopted? I do not admit, though, that the minister has shown that the principle was there adopted. It may be quite right that returns should be made to the government of debentures outstanding; we need to know that. But we do not need to know it for the sake of looking after the debenture holders. The minister will not deny that his department has assumed that duty of superintending, inspecting, demanding reports and all the rest of it, with a view to seeing that the debenture holder does not lose any money. I am under the impression, and I do not care whether I am right or wrong, that the amendments made after this government came in had that object in view. But for the sake of argument, I will let the minister assume they were made before. If they were made before, does the minister not think we ought to discontinue, and the sooner the better?

Mr. ROBB: I would not admit that. It would be admitting that my right hon. friend was wrong in 1920, and of course I would not like to do that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If that will help the minister, let it go at that. But surely he will come to the point: Why should we continue if it is wrong? I think the amendments were made since, but let that go. Goodness knows it is enough for us to look after the public of Canada. The depositors are the only people we need to look after in relation to these companies; that is the way it appears to me. Once we have done that let us be done with it and let the other people look after themselves.

Mr. ROBB: Well, we advertise to the world that we have government inspection of these companies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very lately. When did we advertise that?

Mr. ROBB: In the act of 1920.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not advertising in Scotland. Our public here know we have inspection. That is what is intended.

Mr. ROBB: Have we not some obligations to investors in securities of this kind in Scotland as well as to our own people?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I do not think so.

Mr. CHURCH: Since the passage of the act of 1914, in which the functions of trust and loan companies were set out, owing to the way in which lawyers draw agreements trust companies to-day are doing a banking and all kinds of business, a real estate business, and so on. It was in 1913-14 that this whole act was revised by a select committee of parliament. Why should not this resolution go to the Banking and Commerce or some other committee? They had an investigation in the United States into the matter of trust companies and it was found that those companies were fulfilling functions which had never been intended by the senate or by congress. They were going into the banking business, the railway business, the real estate business, and generally entering upon activities which were not contemplated in the acts under which they operated. Are we going to wait until another disaster like the Home Bank occurs before we take action? I contend that the acts respecting trust companies, loan companies and insurance companies, should be revised to protect the public—in addition lapsed policies of insurance cited in the inspectors report are revealing a state of affairs which should not exist in Canada—these whole resolutions should be referred to the Banking and Commerce committee, together with this Trust Company resolution, for investigation and report, because these companies are going far beyond their functions under the general act of 1914.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that we have got very much further in understanding where this matter stands. I think my hon. friend will agree with me that there are functions in connection with inspection which are more of an inquisitorial character than judicial in their exercise, not calling for the exercise of judgment—certainly not calling for the substitution of a civil servant's judgment for the business judgment which ought to be exercised by a director. I rather apprehend that is the real point that my right hon. leader seeks to make clear. Just to illustrate, take the act of 1920. The finding of the amount of bond issues, and that sort of thing, is merely an inquisitorial function; it is merely finding out the fact, and making public an expression of the fact. That is one thing about inspection, and that is only an illustration that will apply in all the different fields.

The next thing about inspection is that there is not only an inquisitorial function, but a function that requires the exercise of a nicety of judgment; for example, the determination of the value of securities, the determination of the propriety of the policy which the company may have entered upon. Now, if we adopt—and my right hon. leader thinks we ought to adopt—the policy of looking after the more or less uninformed public which uses these companies for the purpose of deposit, it is manifest that the mere official act of ascertaining the figures and reporting the figures under their different heads cannot protect those depositors. Inspection has to be carried further. The official has to exercise judgment, and judgment of a high order. He has to determine upon securities and investments, for instance; he has to determine to some extent upon company policy. Now my right hon. leader has admitted in effect that that ought to be so, so far as these people are concerned. Who are these people? These people are the citizens, not of necessity informed at all in matters of finance, who are putting into these institutions the little savings they make from time to time. That is admitted at once to be a proper field of government operation. Now you can carry it further. You can carry your inspection, your valuation, your criticism, yes, indeed, you can carry your reversal of company policies, to the point of making sure not only that those are safe who are not in a position to ascertain for themselves the safety of their depository, but to the point of looking after the general business investor, the shrewd man of affairs and the like. That is what is done when we look after this question of debentures. My right hon. leader illustrates Scotland, and he takes Scotland because it is known very well that nearly all these moneys were raised at a low rate of interest in Scotland,—or at least this was the case before the war, and I hope soon will be again—and they are looked after there by gentlemen who are very, very efficient in looking after securities of this character.

Now, after pointing out the groundwork to my hon. friend, and if I am wrong in it I want him to correct me, I want to see what he thinks of this. In the first instance I take it that he would say, and I would agree with him in saying, that the function of the department should be carried, if necessary, to the point of reversing company policy in order to save the depositor; to the point that values may be written down, that certificates may be withheld. But will he go to the point of saying that in connection with these companies, whose obligations to a very large amount consist of these debenture moneys, the government official ought to take the place of the directorate and the management, and ought to say whether they can carry on or not, and whether or not the certificate will be withdrawn? That is the logical result of these things. Now it is not so much a matter of law perhaps, as it is a matter of administration, and it is an exceedingly hard thing when you get to the final point as a matter of administration, as my hon. friend has found, and as I know I found it to be, to say whether the judgment of what after all is an irresponsible government official,—and I use that term "irresponsible" merely to indicate that he has no monetary interest in the company, shall be substituted for the judgment of the directors who may have their all in it.

Mr. ROBB: Suppose a case came to the attention of the government where the directors did not have anything in it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then their position is very much like that of the government official. But usually directors have a monetary interest in the concern, and they ought to have a monetary interest in it. Perhaps it would be well to consider making a change in the act to provide that the directors should have a substantial interest in it; that is the way of dealing with that problem. But it is a very difficult matter, I think my hon. friend will agree, to find out, first, when absolute interference with corporate rights is justified, and secondly, what is to be regarded as a just cause for that interference. It is not at all difficult to imagine a situation where the company finds itself with two avenues open to it; for example, it may have made loans which everybody would regret; the values may have largely disappeared, and it becomes a question whether or not taxes and interest should be paid in order to preserve the investment. Now it well might be that one acting in the very best of faith would say: You are simply throwing good money after bad to do it. Again, it well might be that with the turn of the wheel it would have been insanity not to have put up the money. The difficulty that I see, when we get down to the point where you are going right to the very end of the company's activities, is how on the one hand to preserve anything like proper business administration by the directors, and at the same time give effect to the full provisions of the act. It can be done easily enough so far as the depositors are concerned, because as a rule the depositors' interest in these companies is relatively very small and the whole interest of the department would be to see that there was always left intact enough liquid assets, or assets readily convertible, to meet the claim of the depositors. A company, indeed, would have to be in a very bad position before that time came. On the other hand where you have companies with a tremendously large debenture debt—and some of our very best companies have that—if the work of the inspector is to include the whole of that, why the margin as to apparent absolute solvency may become very narrow from the standpoint of the debenture holders of the company. There we are getting on difficult ground. I really think the hon. gentleman should give us an idea of what is to be done.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I should like to point out that from the facts that have transpired before the Banking and Commerce committee the banks are closely allied with trust companies, and the latter ought to be inspected in the same way that the former are to be. If the proposition now before the House is in that direction I certainly would endorse it. The same remark would apply to insurance companies. In the public interest they ought to be protected by some system of inspection such as is provided for by the resolution coming up later.

Mr. HARRIS: How far will this inspection guarantee to a greater or lesser extent protection to the institutions concerned? If the inspection carries with it no responsibility on the part of the government, and does not increase the responsibility of the directors of the different companies, I am absolutely opposed to it.

Mr. ROBB: There is no government guarantee. My hon. friend knows that in common law there is no recourse against the Crown; but the inspection is a protection and a safeguard to the public. Legislation providing for the inspection of loan and trust companies was first introduced in 1914; the law was amended in 1920, and additional amendments were made in 1922 to provide some further protection. My hon. friend, I imagine, argues from the point of view that the claims of the depositor have some preference. I should like to point out that the debenture holders and the depositors rank equally, therefore anything that affects the solvency of the company as a whole affects the depositors as well as the debenture holders.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Ought not that to be amended?

Mr. ROBB: No, I would not admit that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Suppose there are no depositors? Suppose they are all out of the road, should the government keep on looking after some of them?

Mr. ROBB: We cannot legislate for every individual company. The law must be general in its nature and applicable to all companies doing business. Let me point out to my hon. friend, who has a pretty clear mind, this fact: He brought up the question a moment ago of looking after the Scotch debenture investor. Suppose there is a company doing business in Canada, having a Canadian charter, taking deposits from Canadians and selling debentures in Scotland or any other country at a price that will cost the company 8 per cent here while they are investing money in Canada at a net rate of 7 per cent. How long will they keep going on that line without destroying the security of their depositors? I think that will appeal to my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend does not know the Scotch or he would not expect to sell them any of these debentures.

Mr. ROBB: We must consider the effect of exchange. My hon. friend a moment ago brought up the question of directors. Suppose that in the case of some of these companies the directors have borrowed from the companies sums far in excess of the amount they had invested in the enterprise, does my hon.

friend think it would then be time for the department to step in and see to it that they conformed to the loan and trust law introduced by himself?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We must certainly see that the law is carried out, and, if the law as to the responsibility of directors is not strong enough make it stricter. But that is a very different thing from going in, after the law is carried out, and valuing real estate here, there and everywhere all over Canada, and getting into all sorts of conflicts in order to make sure, if possible, that debenture holders are not going to suffer. The debenture holders will look after themselves both when they are making the investment and afterwards. If the minister is right why not go into commercial companies also? They are capable of just this same kind of thing,—why not go ahead and supervise their business? I do not know where we are going to stop. It simply means that we are becoming grandmother and wet nurse for the business of the country. What we should seek to do is to look after the public of Canada, no more and no less. It is only of recent years—that is to say comparatively recent years—that we have gone so far as to make the government of Canada responsible for depositors. But if we are going to apply the same principle to loan and trust companies and watch the interests of debenture holders here, there and everywhere I think it is a very dangerous path for the government to enter upon.

Mr. HEALY: I am absolutely in accord with the proposed resolution. We are about to put the chartered banks of Canada under government inspection. Now, these loan and trust companies are bidding for deposits against the chartered banks and at a higher rate of interest. Therefore there is no difference between a deposit and the debenture that is sold in Canada at the present time. The short term debentures of loan and trust companies are sold and bear interest at the rate of 4 or 4½ per cent, and the company allows the money to be drawn after the lapse of six months on fifteen days' notice. It is absolutely a deposit such as the banks receive, except that it is for a longer period of time. If the chartered banks of Canada are placed under government inspection then the companies competing against them for deposits—whether it is a daily or monthly deposit, or a deposit for six months—in the form of debentures should be placed under identically the same form of inspection. The inspection need not go into the byways and highways of the country valuing real estate at all. That can be carried on at the head office, just as the proposed inspection is going to be carried on in the case of a bank, and the valuation of real estate can be taken from the valuation as submitted by competent valuators such as these companies have in their pay all over Canada. I think inspection is certainly necessary in the case of these institutions from the fact that they are competing daily with the chartered banks of Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has not caught the point to which I was addressing myself. I am not objecting to this inspection; I am trying to point out some of the difficulties we have in carrying it to the length it is apparently proposed to carry it. My hon. friend has not read the act. Had he done so he would have found that we do bother about real estate. That duty is thrown upon us.

Mr. HEALY: Certainly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is just as well to look into these things before we talk about them. In the next place I point out to the Acting Minister of Finance that it is because of the legislation of 1922 that matters have been pressed to the length that they are now being pressed. It was not done before and could not be done before. I pointed out in the first instance that in the act of 1922 provisions very much more stringent in connection with the companies are made; and we find very plain regulations, and plain distinctions as to what is proper security and what is not, which is a good thing, and was done before. We have a list showing how they can invest their money, which occupies over a page of the statute. We have another list which is set out, and then this duty is imposed on the Inspection department, under section 6:

> The following sections are inserted after section 70A, inserted by section two of chapter 21 of the statutes of 1920:—
> 70B (1) In his annual report prepared for the minister under the provisions of section 70 of this act, the superintendent shall allow as assets only such of the investments of the several companies as are authorized by this act, or by their acts of incorporation or by the general acts applicable to such investments.

Hon members will see that so far as that is concerned, it is a mere ministerial act, pointing out what can be done properly: That is, checking the list of investments and seeing whether they fall within the character allowed by this long list Then we have the provision:

(2) In his said report the superintendent shall make all necessary corrections in the annual statements made by the companies as herein provided and shall be at liberty to increase or diminish the assets or liabilities of such companies to the true and correct amounts thereof as ascertained by him in the examination of their affairs at the head office thereof or otherwise.

That examination is carrying out the terms of the act, placing the securities in their proper columns, with proper deductions, and there is no difficulty there at all. However, the inspector is given a right to take hold of the company as such, and this is the matter we are talking about. This right was not given in 1920, but in 1922, and it reads:

(3) The superintendent may request any company to dispose of and realize any of its investments acquired after the passing of this act and not authorized by this act.

That order might be given at any time when nothing could be got for them. Suppose the company buys some stock that never should have been bought, and there is a slump in connection with it in the market, and the directors say "Leave that alone, we know it will be all right again; we know what the assets of that company are; leave them alone;" under this act the superintendent has the right to say, "No, sell it now." Perhaps the delay of a month, and the exercise of the business judgment of the directors, might enable them to realize on the investment, but after that order it becomes a matter of law that the companies must absolutely dispose of the stock within sixty days. And if the amount realized therefrom falls below the amount paid by the company for the stock, the directors shall be jointly and severally liable for the payment to the company of the amount of the deficiency; that is the provision in this section, and it is a very wise provision, it makes the directors personally liable for an investment that should not have been made. This is very different from the provision the minister suggested, that the directors could have no personal interest in these matters. The minister's own act says that if a director makes an unauthorized investment he is personally liable for it. That is quite right. It is idle to say that the directors have no interest. Their direct interest is to save the company from all loss, because if they do not do so they themselves lose. Now, there is a right of appeal to the Exchequer court and so on. My hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. Healy) referred to the question of real estate, and to the business way of doing it. I am sorry he has left the room. We have an express provision put in as to real estate which reads:

70C. If upon an examination of the assets of any company it appears to the superintendent, or if he has any reason to suppose, that the value placed by the company upon the real estate owned by it or any parcel thereof is too great, he may either require such company to procure an appraisement of such real estate by one or more competent valuators, or may himself procure such appraisement at the company's expense, and the appraised value, if it varies materially from the return made by the company, may be substituted in the annual report prepared for the minister by the superintendent. If, upon such examination, it appears to the superintendent, or if he has any reason to suppose that the amount
4 p.m. secured by mortgage or hypothec upon any parcel of real estate, together with the interest due and accrued thereon, is greater than the value of such parcel, or that such parcel is not sufficient security for such loan and interest, he may in like manner require the company to procure an appraisement thereof, or may himself at the company's expense procure such appraisement, and if from the appraised value it appears that such parcel of real estate is not adequate security for the loan and interest, he may write off such loan and interest a sum sufficient to reduce the same to such an amount as may fairly be realizable from such security, in no case to exceed such appraised value, and may insert such reduced amount in his said annual report.

I am pointing this out for the purpose of showing the minister that the superintendent's powers—not under the legislation of 1920, as he supposed, but under the legislation of 1922—are very great. Why, his powers of management indeed are as great as those of the management itself. If it appears to him that some of the assets are not worth as much as they ought to be then, if he wants to manage the company, he steps in, and under the act he has the right to impose his business judgment upon the company even against the judgment of the management. I simply rose to ascertain to what length the minister thinks this inspection ought to go, and whether it is to go to such a length that it of necessity substitutes the judgment of an official of the department for that of the management and directors. Now, all directors are not either imbeciles or fools. The great majority of them have done pretty well.

Mr. ROBB: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And have made an excellent return for their companies.

Mr. ROBB: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And they know a good deal more about any particular district in this country where they are operating than it is possible for any government official to know. And difficulties in connection with these companies usually occur by something going wrong in a particular district. Does the minister think that this scheme of inspection—which was supposed to be for the purpose of seeing first that law was administered and the affairs of the company carried on reasonably and properly with proper books and the like—is to be extended to such a point that the judgment of a government official may be substituted for the judgment of the management and the company immediately closed?

Mr. JACOBS: Does the hon. member remember a case in Winnipeg two months ago, where a life insurance company invested all its capital in a washing machine company?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, that was an awful thing to do.

Mr. JACOBS: Do you suggest that this new Superintendent of Insurance would prevent such an occurrence?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, and I do not see the bearing of the question. There is full inspection under the act, but we are talking about another matter now. There is no use starting out with a question like that, when we want to know where we are going. We want to know whether or not, in the minister's view, this inspection, which started out on the lines I have indicated, is to be carried to such a point that power is given, perhaps without responsibility to any one, as the minister says, and without recourse even in the case of an entirely mistaken policy, to substitute the judgment of a government official for that of the management in connection with the whole of the undertaking.

Mr. ROBB: May I point out again that the inspection clause which my hon. friend quoted was taken precisely, word for word, from the Insurance Act of 1917. As to the "will of an official of the government," let me say that the revaluation can be made only by an independent appraiser; it is not the inspector of the insurance companies who will value the properties but a recognized independent appraiser. The act has been administered fairly and well for some years, the officials being very largely the same persons who administered the law under my hon. friends.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a different act.

Mr. ROBB: Let us get down to brass tacks. Will my hon. friend tell us where, if in any degree, the Inspector of Insurance has done anything to injure a company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not going to wash linen in this House in regard to any company, but what I am trying to argue before the minister—and I did expect he would meet my argument favourably—is the unsoundness of the principle. The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) tells of cases where companies have made gross blunders. Does he realize that one of these companies was inspected?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not? Why was it not?

Mr. ROBB: It has a provincial charter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The provinces have got out of this responsibility and I venture to say they are glad.

Mr. ROBB: To the detriment of the policy holders of the company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Insurance companies, of course, differ from trust and loan companies, and the policy holder does deserve a little more in the way of safeguarding at the hands of the government than do the men who loan money to trust or loan companies. But I would not go too far in assuming responsiblity in connection with insurance companies either, for I do not know where we should find ourselves. I do not doubt for a minute that there are many power companies, for instance, the directors of which have little if any financial responsibility in the way of investments. But they have entered upon a great enterprise and it is our business to see that they lay the facts before the investor. That having been done, however, are we going to inspect these companies too, because they have charters from us? They are quite capable of making mistakes. They might buy washing machines or anything else; but why should we be their guardians? Why should we sit at their desks? Should we have an official with power to value their property, revise their books, and generally to take the place of their managing director the official is of the opinion that they are not managing their business properly? Really, I cannot see the difference between these companies and the others we are discussing. Once you get beyond the sphere of guarding the immediate depositor in connection with loan companies and banks you are on dangerous ground. I object to the government going further; let the other people look after themslves. Why should we by this act venture to stand between investors in loan company securities and the loan company itself? We might as well intervene between the investors of any other company, such as industrial power concerns, and the company itself; I do not see a bit of difference. All these things tend to the building up of great superstructures of governmental departments and the massing of power in the hands of individuals in departments. And, oh, how they love it; they love to have a long entourage of officials at their command. But is that good public policy, and are we prepared to take the responsibility which must naturally and inevitably follow? It will not be the officials but this parliament and the government of Canada which will be held responsible. I venture to ask the minister to look again at the basic principles on which the act of 1922 rests and to see whether they do not need revision.

Section agreed to.

On section 3.

Mr. CHURCH: Does the government intend to consolidate and revise this whole act? I do not think that there are the necessary precautions in the legislation as it stands to provide the protection which those interested are entitled to. I understand that one of these insurance companies was recently called upon to supply further security. Surely, in view of the importance of a matter of this kind, an act like this, which is some ten years old, should be revised and consolidated. The scope of the trust companies should be clearly defined; they are performing functions which I am sure it was never the intention of parliament to sanction. There is such an interlocking of trust companies and banks and loan companies, and the rates that are charged to-day are so high, that it seems to me beyond question that the whole thing should be looked into and rates regulated. I would urge the minister in the recess of parliament to prepare for a revision of these acts so that they may be brought up to date to meet the changing conditions of business and to limit the functions of trust companies also within their proper function and scope. The companies are operating to-day in a wider field than it was ever intended they should engage in. It has been shown in the United States that these companies form the backbone for the efficiency operation of trusts and combines in that great land, and the authorities there are endeavouring to revise the American law with a view to bringing it right up to date. The minister might tell us what he intends to do in this matter. I would remind him that the inspector of insurance has recommended a survey of the whole field; and I believe it would meet with the approval of parliament if the minister would bring down next session a bill for the purpose of consolidating and revising the legislation controlling these companies.

Mr. ROBB: I will consider my hon. friend's observations. I am glad, by the way, to note that I have some support from the other side of the House.

Mr. HANSON: Has the minister considered the question of placing such great power in the hands of the superintendent?

Mr. ROBB: He has no greater power under this legislation than he at present exercises.

Mr. HANSON: With respect to insurance companies.

Mr. ROBB: No greater power.

Mr. HANSON: What about the question of appeal?

Mr. ROBB: They appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. HANSON: On what ground does that appeal lie?

Mr. ROBB: If it is thought that the valuation is not fair an appeal can be made.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 173 to amend the Trust Companies Act, 1914.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT, 1914

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolutions:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Loan Companies Act, 1914, and to provide,—

1. That the Superintendent of Insurance shall annually ascertain and certify the total amount of the expenditure incurred by the government for or in connection with the administration of the act during the last preceding fiscal year, and the total amount of income received during the last preceding calendar year by each company, and the findings of the superintendent shall be final and conclusive.

2. That thereupon the superintendent shall ascertain the ratio or percentage which the total expenditure so found and certified bears to the aggregate of the income aforesaid, and shall assess each of the companies an amount equivalent to that percentage of the total amount of the income received, and such assessment when certified by the superintendent shall be binding upon the said companies, and be final and conclusive.

3. That the amount so assessed against each company shall constitute a debt payable to His Majesty, and shall be payable upon demand of the superintendent, and may be recovered as a debt in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, this resolution is practically the same as the previous one.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think a similar act was passed in 1922—the superintendent will recollect if I am right—giving powers somewhat similar to those in the trust case.

Mr. ROBB: Very similar.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what I thought. Was the situation exactly the same?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What loan companies are we now inspecting?

Mr. ROBB: All loan companies incorporated under the federal parliament.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I could have given my hon. friend the same information. I was wondering what loan companies we still have under our jurisdiction.

Mr. ROBB: There are fifteen companies in all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the total capital of the fifteen, the securities held by them, and their assets?

Mr. ROBB: Their paid up capital stands at $24,939,622; the book value of their assets is $104,858,626; their liabilities to the public are $63,579,876.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many men have we to-day working on this value of $103,000,000 of securities?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) gave the number in the department a few moments ago—some thirty odd. There are eight or ten inspectors for all the companies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We heard that in connection with the trust companies. But I want to find out how many valuators we have working specifically on loan companies.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: The department gets an appraisal of the securities by experts. If we have any doubt about the appraisal we institute a special investigation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Taking last year, what was the volume of valuations made of this $103,000,000?

Mr. ROBB: A considerable portion of the real estate has been valued, and all the bonds and debentures.

Mr. HANSON: A very large portion of the assets of these loan companies is in mortgages, especially western mortgages according to the newspapers. What methods are adopted in valuing these securities?

Mr. ROBB: If it appears to the department that the securities are in bad standing, a special appraisal is made. If the interest is paid up regularly it is taken as an indication that the securities are in fair shape.

Mr. CHURCH: The minister and the government should be interested in something more than the cost of inspection of these companies and the overhead expense. Where does the public come in? Formerly these loan companies loaned fifty per cent of the value on real estate, but to-day they loan only on an average from twenty to twenty-five per cent of the value, with the result that the building of small houses is seriously restricted and the housing situation correspondingly aggravated. As the government has no housing policy such as the government of Great Britain has, some further restrictions and control of rates should be placed on these loan companies. They have been given very wide powers by parliament, but we have no control over their rates or policies. For instance, they have one rate for the farmer and another rate for the city man. Parliament has endeavoured to do something to control the banks, why should these loan companies be left to be a law unto themselves, to charge what rates they like? I think these resolutions should go to the Banking and Commerce committee for revision. It is all very well from the standpoint of revenue to inspect these companies and to charge them with the overhead cost of inspection, but what about their functions? They claim and exercise functions which parliament never intended they should have. It is over ten years since these companies were looked into and the act revised, and it is time that a survey was made, the legislation brought up to date and consolidated, with a view to the protection of the public. I venture to say that before many days are over there will be a rude awakening and some of these companies will go to the wall. Are we going to wait until there is some such disaster as the collapse of the Home Bank before we take action? The minister ought to take steps to bring this act up to date; there is a demand for it all over Canada. There should be an audit of these companies; there should be control over the rate of interest charged and there should be some revision of the vast powers they have to confiscate property by foreclosure, and so on. Expensive legislation is put upon the second mortgagee under the present procedure. The law requires the first mortgagee to notify the second mortgagee in due course and give him a chance to redeem, but this is not always done. I was speaking to a parish priest yesterday in the constituency of a member of this House and he mentioned a case where a second mortgagee had not been so notified by the first mortgagee, with the result that the loan company foreclosed and it cost him $200 to get the thing straightened out. These companies should be put under proper control, not only as to rates, but as to many other matters.

Mr. ROBB: I will take my hon. friend's observations into consideration. The act was revised in 1922. These companies are not earning excessive dividends; I notice that the paid up capital and reserve combined is something over $39,000,000, on which they paid $2,135,000, on the average a little under 6 per cent.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Do any of these companies take deposits?

Mr. ROBB: Oh, yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I want that point brought out.

Section agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 174, to amend The Loan Companies Act, 1914.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INSURANCE ACT, 1917, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Insurance Act, 1917, and to provide,—

1. That there shall be a department of the government of Canada to be called the Department of Insurance over which the Minister of Finance shall preside, and the Governor in Council may appoint an officer to be called the Superintendent of Insurance who shall be the deputy head of the department and hold office during pleasure. Such officer shall be paid such salary as may be authorized by law, and perform such duties as are prescribed.

2. That the Superintendent of Insurance shall annually ascertain and certify the total amount of the expenditure incurred by the government for or in connection with the administration of the act during the last preceding fiscal year, and the total amount of gross premiums received in Canada during the last preceding calendar year by each company licensed under the act and by each company not licensed under the act but transacting life insurance business thereunder, deducting the amount of the dividends paid or allowed by each such company to its policy holders in Canada during the said year, and the findings of the superintendent so certified shall be final and conclusive.

3. That thereupon the superintendent shall ascertain the ratio or percentage which the total expenditure so found and certified bears to the aggregate of the net receipts, aforesaid, and shall assess each of the companies an amount equivalent to that percentage of the gross premiums received in Canada, less dividends, and such assessment when certified by the superintendent, shall be binding upon the said companies, and be final and conclusive.

4. That the amount so assessed against each company shall constitute a debt payable to His Majesty and shall be payable upon demand of the Superintendent, and may be recovered as a debt in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the real effect of this resolution? We now have a Superintendent of Insurance, and he is a very capable one. What is the idea of making the changes here?

Mr. ROBB: It is simply to bring the wording in conformity with that respecting other departments.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There will be no change?

Mr. ROBB: Practically the only change is that the statutory limit to the salary is struck out.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not see why the Superintendent of Insurance should not have just as much right to the salary as any other deputy; he has been performing the duties of deputy for a long time. Is there any other object than to remove him from that disability, a course which I do not object?

Mr. ROBB: None whatever.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will there be any more cost to the treasury?

Mr. ROBB: There is no cost to the treasury now, and there will not be any. It is all reimbursed by the companies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will it work any greater burden on the policy holders?

Mr. ROBB: I would not think so, no.

Section agreed to.

On section 2.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no change here at all?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then why make this provision, if it is in the present law?

Mr. ROBB: We are putting into the statute the machinery for calculating the assessment at present in use in practice.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But it is all in the present Insurance Act?

Mr. ROBB: Not the details, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are other provisions besides that I would not like to see dropped.

Mr. ROBB: We are not dropping anything.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This has been submitted to the law officers of the Crown?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, and approved.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much is it now costing to run the department?

Mr. ROBB: For the fiscal year 1922-23 the total cost was $107,814.43.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much should be taken off for the trust companies and the other companies?

Mr. ROBB: Their proportion is estimated to be about $5,000 or $6,000.

Mr. CHURCH: The decrease in the business done by insurance companies, life and fire, demonstrates the necessity of having a proper department of insurance and a superintendent of insurance who will have adequate powers to go into the business of these companies and protect not only the government in the matter of revenue but also the policyholders. I have here the report of the superintendent for the year ending December 31, 1922, and I wish to read two paragraphs—to show what is taking place at the present time and the urgent necessity of adequate government control. I am urging in connection with this particular clause that there is no use having a department and appointing an inspector or a superintendent of insurance unless you give him the widest powers and some control so that there can be proper regulation of such large companies as we have in Canada. Companies can come in here from the United States and make more money and do things that they cannot do in their own country. On page 5 of this report I find this:

> The year 1922 showed also a decrease in the volume of life insurance written, the gross amount of business written and paid for in cash being $521,304,609, compared with $528,193,352 in 1921, and $641,778,495 in 1920. . . . The total amount of business lapsed and surrendered during the year was $288,836,353, or 49.9 per cent of the gross new business written.

Fancy, pretty nearly half of the new business written lapsed during the [illegible]. The corresponding figures for 1921 are equally disappointing. They show a total amount of business lapsed and surrendered during the year of $241,888,720, or 41.9 per cent. The report goes on:

> This feature of the year's business is disappointing in the extreme, indicating as it does a tendency on the part of the field forces to disregard renewals. A rearrangement of commissions as between new and renewal business might be effective in reducing the high rate of lapse which at present is a standing reproach to all engaged in the business.
> The total net amount of business in force in Canada at the end of 1922 was $3,172,873,312, an increase of $238,092,464 over the net amount in force at the end of 1921.

These two clauses show the necessity for government control and regulation, and of some protection for the policy holders who allow their policies to lapse, and so I say this resolution does not go far enough. We have in my opinion, a very good Superintendent of Insurance and a good department, but the superintendent and the department should be given more powers. Do not make the superintendent like a bank inspector, all dressed up, with no powers at all. Let us give the superintendent full control over these British and Canadian companies and these companies that are half American and half Canadian, doing business in Canada. This report does not reveal a very creditable state of affairs among insurance companies in Canada, when an equivalent in amount of 49 per cent of the policies that are written in any one year—lapse. There must be something radically wrong when that takes place, and the minister should look into this matter. A survey has already been recommended by his inspectors, and I hope there will be a survey made of these companies, because I understand that one of them was asked not long ago to put up $75,000 additional security in order to protect its policy holders. Are there any more of these companies in this same position? Is the department going to wait until there is a failure after the Home Bank fashion and some company is unable to pay its way? In the provincial field we find some of these fraternal societies are not solvent, and they come to the legislature year after year, and if you have a policy for $2,000, they get power to mark it down to $1,200. Some of these federal companies might become insolvent also in the future, and I say that a survey should be made of all these companies and some adequate system of inspection inaugurated in the interests of the policy holders. That inspection should include a government actuary, who would have power to go into these companies every year and make his reports to the government showing just in what financial position each company is. I would urge the minister to take the proper powers and compel every company to open its books.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does this inspection and supervision extend to fraternal insurance societies?

Mr. ROBB: Since 1919 to all such as have a Dominion charter and to foreign societies.

Mr. CALDWELL: Not to those having a provincial charter?

Mr. ROBB: Not to Canadian societies having a provincial charter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the minister should make some reply to the strictures that have been passed by the superintendent, as shown in his report, and which have been read by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church). It shows an unfavourable condition. What is the trouble?

Mr. ROBB: It is probably true that there have been lapses, but as my hon. friend knows, this runs more or less in cycles. We had a somewhat similar experience in 1915. I recall that because I was then associated with a fraternal society, but they are all doing better now, and the insurance companies themselves are doing much to cure this condition by a follow-up system.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister also heard the suggestion of the hon. member in connection with appointing an actuary, the need for inspection, and the like. I do know that once upon a time we had very good actuaries and a complete inspection. Have we not that now?

Mr. ROBB: Certainly. We have that now. I was going to mention that.

Section agreed to.

On section 3.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: While the superintendent is here, I would like to bring up one question. I have already had some communication with him about it in connection with the bill reported this year. I would like to find out what the policy of the minister is in connection with participating rates. It is about the one thing I think the superintendent cannot really control at all, and it is one matter in connection with which the returns of some companies at least are very, very disappointing. These participating rates have been merely a fraction in some cases of what the bank interest would have amounted to on the extra premium during the same period. The idea of the extra premium is to earn the profits. It has nothing at all to do with the life risk, which is covered in the straight rate. I hope the minister understands what I am drawing to his attention. There is no question here of the risk of the company, because that is covered by the basic rate. It is just a question whether these higher rates and some dividends that have been shown are at all fair to the public, and whether or not straight life business ought to be the business which the department should encourage and look after.

Mr. ROBB: Competition takes care of this, and it was never keener than it is now between the life insurance companies. Participating rates are being greatly reduced. My hon. friend will recall that the life insurance companies suffered very heavily during the war period, and consequently their profits were reduced, and that, of course, affected the dividends to the policy holders.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The tendency at present is to get away from these participating profits as much as possible.

Mr. ROBB: And that, consequently reduces the rates that are charged.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The two classes of insurance are entirely different. There is the regular insurance, and then there is a class of business as to which the company doing it say: "If you pay so much more you come in on our profits." The latter kind of insurance means that higher premiums must be paid than under the ordinary straight line rate. Of course it is true that the war had its effect, and possibly is responsible for the feature in question, but on the face of it the showing is not a happy one for the policy holders.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does the Superintendent of Insurance have any control over the class of insurance which a company shall write? For instance if an insurance company is not paying dividends to those holding participating policies it might be wise to see that it shall not write too much of that kind of insurance but shall rather issue a straight insurance policy. I think it is a very important point. If the companies were allowed the right of issuing policies on the participating plan and were not paying any dividends they would certainly stand to win, and the public, probably to lose.

Mr. ROBB: We have in some rather rare cases insisted on a company doing only a non-participating business.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That must have been in a case where there was a likelihood of a deficit. The Superintendent of Insurance does not interfere in the direct management of a company at all. The point the hon. member (Mr. Caldwell) was making was that in view of past results it is very much more to the benefit of the policy holder to take, for example, a straight twenty-year life policy than a twenty-year life policy with profits.

Section agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 175, to amend the Insurance Act, 1917.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915, AMENDMENT

The House again in committee on Bill No. 142, to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—tax on sales reduced.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When the resolution on which this bill was based was being considered I made a statement in connection with the difficulties encountered under the act at the close of one evening's sitting, and my hon. friend was good enough to thank me for what he termed constructive criticism. He said he would look into the representations made and see what could be done in the matter. Has my hon. friend been able to iron out any of the many difficulties pointed out at that time except the one as to licenses?

Mr. ROBB: In a consultation with the minister in charge, and the department, they expressed the belief that most of the difficulties in question have been corrected from time to time, and that the act is now meeting with a fair amount of favour from the public. I had in mind that my hon. friend would have gathered any further information he desired when the minister was passing his estimates through in committee of supply.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Minister of Customs was not troubled very much on estimates apparently. I think his estimates went through on record time.

Mr. KELLNER: I should like to find out how the tax to be levied is figured out. In the case of the sale of $100 worth of goods would the department figure at 6 per cent of that amount, or how would the tax be arrived at?

Mr. ROBB: I will read the clause governing the matter:

> In addition to any duty or tax that may be payable under this part, or any other statute of law, there shall be imposed, levied and collected a consumption or sales tax of six per cent—

Which is now reduced to 5 per cent.

> —on the sale price of all goods produced or manufactured in Canada, including the amount of excise duties when the goods are sold in bond, which tax shall be payable by the producer or manufacturer at the time of the sale thereof by him, and in the case of imported goods the like tax upon the duty paid value of the goods imported payable by the importer—and so on.

Mr. KELLNER: I want to know whether the department's agents collect 6 per cent, we will say of $100, or whether the percentage is less than that?

Mr. ROBB: The act provides:

> For the purpose of calculating the amount of consumption or sales tax, "sale price" shall mean the price before any amount payable in respect of the consumption or sales tax is added thereto.

Is that what my hon. friend wants to get at?

Mr. KELLNER: Would the minister name the rate?

Mr. ROBB: It would be 5 per cent now or, if the articles are boots and shoes or some other articles that come in under the 2½ per cent clause, the latter percentage is the amount that would be levied.

Mr. CALDWELL: I wish to call to the attention of the minister—and I presume the matter has been brought to his attention on various occasions previously—an old claim pending against the government by the automobile dealers of Canada. It is not in reference to the sales tax, and I may not be in order, but I hope I will be permitted to present the case as it is a very sore point with automobile dealers all over Canada. In 1918, when the luxury tax was imposed on automobiles, jewelry and a lot of other things, it was made retroactive in the case of the dealers in automobiles. I do not know whether it was made retroactive in other cases or not but I think not. The automobile dealers had to pay the luxury tax on the cars they had on hand at that time, although these cars had been bought previously. I think in all other cases the luxury tax was paid when the merchandise was disposed of by the merchant. In the case of the automobile dealers they had to pay the tax on the cars on hand, even though they did not sell them for six months. That was a discrimination against them. That is not what they are finding most fault with however. When the luxury tax was repealed in 1920, I think it was, they expected that they would be refunded the luxury tax they had paid on the cars they had on hand, as the tax, when it was imposed, was made retroactive, to cover the cars they had on hand at that time. This has never been done. I believe in the case of a merchant who had stamp taxes on hand to attach to the goods that he sold, the government did grant a refund amounting to $169,426.97. There was another feature that was still worse, I think. Automobile manufacturers who were maintaining retail establishments were I believe, given a refund on all the cars they had in their retail warehouses. This refund amounted to $171,650.53, but the dealer who was not a manufacturer was not given any refund. I know of dealers in my own province who were pretty nearly ruined at that time, because they had a large stock of automobiles on hand on which they had paid the luxury tax. They certainly felt that they had the same right to a refund of the luxury tax as the manufacturer who possibly had a retail establishment on the opposite side of the street, and was competing with them. When the luxury tax was abolished the dealer who had paid the tax and did not get a refund had to sell in competition with the retailer across the road who did get a refund, and it put the former in a very unfair position. I desire to say however that I firmly believe that the luxury tax never should have been repealed. I know it was a tax that brought the government a good deal of money, obtained it from the source from which the government should obtain it, namely the people who were able to buy high-priced articles and luxuries.

Mr. ROBB: Blue-nose potatoes are a luxury.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would hardly credit that statement. When we have been selling our potatoes for fifty per cent of what it cost to grow them they could not be considered a luxury; but if you speak of the quality of the potatoes, they certainly are a luxury. When you speak of the price of the potatoes they could not be classed as a luxury. Has the minister considered the representations of the automobile dealers? I will admit that it is pretty late in the day now to bring the matter up. However, I do not consider that this was a bit better than stealing the money from the dealers. When the government imposed the tax they made it retroactive, but when they abolished the tax they did not make it retroactive. I think two million dollars was the amount paid by these dealers. At the time they paid this money it was virtually promised that they would be enabled to pass it on to the people to whom they sold. They were not able to do this; they lost this money and it very nearly ruined a good number.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend sat in this chair and had to defend the policy of the department, he would be against any person who comes forward looking for refunds or rebates. This question has already been considered, not by two governments but by two different ministers, and was very carefully gone into. I have looked through the files. Representations have been made that there should be a refund. I have consulted some of the officials of the department and it has been represented to us—and I think the records confirm the statement—that there was a conference between the manufacturers and the dealers; and the government of the day did everything possible to see that there was a fair adjustment as between the manufacturers and the dealers.

Mr. CALDWELL: I do not consider the dealer had any claim against the manufacturer. He did not pay the manufacturer the money. He paid it to the government under a public act. When the government abolished the luxury tax, if they had not refunded the money to the manufacturer who, in a great many cases had a retail establishment just alongside of the retailer, it would not have been quite so bad, I will admit, because all of them would have held up their prices and got something out of it. The fact that the manufacturer, who in many cases was carrying on a large number of retail establishments, was refunded the luxury tax on the cars he had in his warehouse, put the regular dealer who was not a manufacturer in a very awkward position indeed, and he was not able to get his money back. For the minister to say that there should be a readjustment between the manufacturer and the dealer—

5 p.m.

Mr. ROBB: No, I say the government of the day tried to arrange a readjustment, and it was represented to the government, I understand, that they had got together and had an understanding.

Mr. CALDWELL: They may have got together but I can assure my hon. friend that the dealer did not get any money out of it, and when a group of men are deprived of two million dollars in such a manner that they cannot get it back, they do not feel pleased about it. Does the minister think it was a fair thing at the time? I am firmly convinced that if my hon. friend had been Minister of Finance at that time this refund would have been given.

Mr. ROBB. Do not be too sure about that.

Mr. CALDWELL: I will admit that while my hon. friend is not all Scotch, he has quite a Scotch disposition, and I think he would have made the refund. Practically everybody else affected by the luxury tax got the refund. I think the luxury tax never should have been abolished, and I think we should institute a luxury tax to-day. But if you are going to impose a tax and abolish it, if you make the imposition of it retroactive, you certainly should in all fairness refund the tax to the man who has the stock on hand when it is abolished.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the minister tell me if the retail automobile dealers had a conference with him, and if a decision was arrived at?

Mr. ROBB: What I said in reply to my hon. friend from Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) was that it had been represented to me that the government of the day had a conference at the time with the manufacturers of automobiles and the dealers in automobiles. It was not our administration at all.

Mr. CALDWELL: Could the minister tell us what decision was arrived at in the conference between the automobile dealers and the manufacturers?

Mr. BUREAU: It was not the present government.

Mr. CALDWELL: No, I think it was before the present government came in. If my hon. friend had been Finance Minister they would have got the rebate.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member is wrong.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think he is very much Scotch.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, all Scotch.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think a Scotchman tries to be fair. I am pretty nearly all Scotch myself and I would hate to think that anybody could tell me I would not be fair. When it comes to the question of being tight-fisted I may be all Scotch. I have always considered these automobile dealers did not get a fair deal. What was the result of that conference and what action was taken?

Mr. ROBB: I was not present at the conference but I have been informed by officials of the department who were present representing the government that there was an understanding that the manufacturers should deal fairly with the dealers and settle with them in the event of there being a rebate. That has been represented to me but I am not going to vouch for it because I was not present. We were in opposition at that time.

Mr. CALDWELL: I cannot see the force of the statement that the government urged the manufacturers to deal fairly with the dealers; as I have pointed out, the dealers did not pay the manufacturers the money, they paid the government.

Mr. BUREAU: The manufacturers would absorb part of the tax.

Mr. CALDWELL: I do not think that the manufacturers are under any obligation to reimburse the dealers. If the government had said to the manufacturers, "We will refund you half of yours and the dealer half of his," that would seem to be equitable; at all events, all should have been treated alike. I realize of course that it was not this government that was responsible. But I am not interested in the question as to what government it was; what I am concerned about is to see that there is fair play. In all fairness to the men who were not treated properly, I say that something should be done to put matters right; it is not too late yet to do justice in this connection. I know there is a strong feeling throughout the country not only among the dealers but on the part of the general public that this has not been a fair transaction, and the government would be well advised to reconsider what has been done. I offer it as a suggestion that possibly there might be a conference between the dealers and the manufacturers; the government could then find out what readjustment if any has taken place as between these two classes. If there has been any, I think it would be very slight, inasmuch as the manufacturers were under no obligation whatever in the matter. As things stand now, the manufacturer has the satisfaction of having had his money refunded while the dealer has not. I would very strongly urge upon the minister the desirability of taking steps to see that justice is done.

Mr. EVANS: It would seem that there was some unfairness in connection with this tax at the time of its abolition. Many dealers had put in heavy stocks for the year's trade and the tax was suddenly taken off. I know some who were put out of business during that time. There was some arrangement I believe whereby the manufacturers were to absorb a part of the tax, but although they appeared to make some concessions they did not suffer; they simply put up the price of their cars and so covered what would otherwise have been a loss. Clearly therefore they made no sacrifice. It would seem to me that the government would only be doing the fair thing if it gave bonds for the amount and allowed those who have not been reimbursed the benefit of interest from December 1920 up to the present time.

Mr. ROBB: Where shall we get the money?

Mr. CALDWELL: You have already got it from the dealers; you have their money.

Mr. BUREAU: That is the question whether it is theirs or ours.

Mr. EVANS: I understood that the matter was at present before the government and that an answer might be expected some time before the close of the session.

Mr. CALDWELL: My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) has just returned to the chamber; he went out shortly after we began the discussion of this matter. Perhaps he can contribute a word or two to the debate to enlighten us. I will not say that he was the criminal, but he was Minister of Finance at that time and he would know something about the matter. He might be able to tell us what action was taken by the government as between the manufacturers and the dealers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The action of the government was not precipitate by any means; the matter was passed upon in the first instance by myself and was discussed in the second place by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). It was a contentious matter, and I may observe in passing that the reason I left the room just now was to get a copy of the record. This memorandum which I shall now read was prepared at the time, or shortly afterwards. So far as I am concerned, let me say at once that I am not going to offer any comment in regard to the question as to who got the money and who did not; my purpose is simply to show the facts as they were. The memorandum is as follows:

A large number of special taxes were suspended by order in council which came into force on the 20th of December, 1920. Having particular regard to taxes on automobiles, before action was taken cancelling them a large deputation of those interested in the industry made specific representations to the effect that in view of the then financial condition of the country and what they stated then existed,—a "buyers' strike"—it was quite impossible for automobiles to be sold. It was represented that if the tax was cancelled men would be put back in employment and conditions greatly improved. Nothing whatever was said about refunds.

Mr. CALDWELL: Were the dealers represented at that conference?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Both sides were represented. The memorandum proceeds:

After the order was issued automobile dealers applied for refund of taxes paid on automobiles which were still in stock. The Retail Merchants' Association took the matter up and made very strenuous representations. No refund was granted but at the suggestion of the then Minister of Finance representatives were appointed to go into the matter directly in behalf of the automobile industry, such representation to include not only the manufacturers but also the dealers. The dealers and manufacturers shortly afterwards met the minister who pointed out that the government had no funds whatever from which to make this drawback and that when changes are made in fiscal matters rebates are not given—then when customs duties are reduced on merchandise on which the merchant has paid duty, while his competitor's goods are still in transit to the country, no refund of duties on the lower or free scale is ever made, notwithstanding the resulting hardship.

Mr. CALDWELL: There is this fact to be noted, that when a duty is imposed it is not made retroactive to cover goods which the merchant had on hand four or five months previously, as in this case.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We shall come to that. Under that legislation, the tax was payable when the sale was made.

Mr. CALDWELL: Not on automobiles.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes. It was payable on sale by the manufacturer; as soon as the manufacturer made a sale of a car the tax was due. That tax was collected at the source; it immediately became due as soon as the manufacturer disposed of the car. And that is where the resulting hardship came in.

Mr. CALDWELL: It is a fact then that the dealers did pay a luxury tax on all cars they had on hand when the tax was imposed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Although in the case of some cars they may have had the stock on hand four or five months previous to the imposition of the tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is it not a fact that the dealers had to pay the tax on all cars they had on hand in the warehouse?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is referring to the original tax of Sir Thomas White. I dare say he is right in that regard; I will not contradict him. But all those cars were out of the way long before this legislation was effective.

Mr. CALDWELL: But in 1920 they still had this stock on hand. They paid the tax on those cars which they had not been able to dispose of.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They did have on hand cars on which they had paid the tax; there is no question about that, because the tax was payable as soon as the sale was made.

The minister also pointed out that the action taken by the government was directly for the purpose of assisting the industry and that if the opinion of the trade was that more harm than good was done by the withdrawal of the tax, another order in council would be passed restoring the taxes and placing everybody where they were. Both dealers and manufacturers insisted that this ought not to be done.

The minister then asked that a small committee be appointed for the purpose of arriving at an adjustment, pointing out that it was in the immediate interest of the manufacturers themselves to see that distributors were not unfairly treated in a matter that was for the good of the whole trade and that they were vitally interested in seeing that existing channels of distribution were maintained.

That is, looking after their dealers.

A committee of four was nominated, two representing the manufacturers and two the dealers. The committee met and reported to the minister that no arrangement could be made and insisted on a refund of the tax. This was refused. The committee again went into deliberation and came back and reported that the claim for refund would be withdrawn provided the tax be not reimposed, and that satisfactory arrangements had been agreed to by the representatives of the dealers.

I forget the names of the gentlemen who were on that committee, but I think Mr. Fortier of Quebec and another dealer who handled Cadillac cars were the dealers' representatives.

Mr. HALBERT: Were the dealers willing to forego the rebate if the tax was removed?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly they were willing to do that rather than have the tax reimposed. Then they came and said that a satisfactory arrangement had been made between the manufacturers and the dealers. I was inclined to get the manufacturers to help out the dealers; that was my whole object in asking them to do this. I pointed out that it was very much in their interests to look after their distributors. The memorandum goes on:

Apparently some manufacturers have not carried out the arrangement. Bulletin No. 1792, issued by the McLaughlin Motor Car Company Limited, dated January 21, 1921, is attached hereto and speaks for itself.

The memorandum issued by the McLaughlin Company is addressed to their dealers, and is as follows:

Gentlemen:

Enclosed please find Bulletin No. 1799, in connection with a refund of part of the luxury tax paid to the government by you.

You doubtless have been advised, through the representatives of the dealers who appeared before the government at Ottawa, and through the press, that the government has decided that it will not refund any of the luxury tax paid by the dealers on cars on hand, unsold, when the tax was abolished.

it was thought that the automotive industry was being placed at a serious disadvantage, and was being subjected to a more severe rate of taxation than other industries. Representations to this effect were made to the government but without avail.

Owing to the general depression this fall and winter the Automotive Association again took up the matter with the government, and made very strong representations as to the unsatisfactory conditions of the trade, attributing this condition in part to the excessive taxes imposed. The case was ably presented to the government, and after investigation of the circumstances, they abolished the luxury tax completely. We are all agreed that this was a courageous stand, and we are much pleased at the government's action.

Inasmuch as the Department of Finance had collected the tax from the dealers upon cars which they had on hand when it was originally imposed, it was naturally assumed that in doing away with the tax, the dealers would be reimbursed on a similar basis, but this was not done.

That is the point made by the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell). The dealers insisted that when the original tax was put on by Sir Thomas White in 1918 everything in their hands was taxed. There was a difference in the two bases of taxation.

Mr. NEILL: Although the cars had been sold by the manufacturer to the dealers at that time?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, the difference being this: In one instance you had a tax at the base, the distributor; and in the other you had it at the source, the manufacturer. My proposition was to tax at the source. I am quite free to admit that I had forgotten what Sir Thomas White did a few years ago.

No doubt you are acquainted with the steps taken by the various dealer organizations throughout the Dominion, and through the Retail Merchants Association, to bring this matter clearly before the government. After the dealers' deputation left Ottawa, the government asked the dealers to appoint a smaller committee to meet with the manufacturers at Ottawa for further discussion. This meeting was held at Ottawa recently, but after presenting the case from all angles to the government, and using every available argument, the combined efforts of the dealers and manufacturers were unavailing. The department has given its decision—that taxes once collected cannot be refunded, and had declined to reimburse the dealers.

The suggestion was made that the list and wholesale prices of cars should be increased for a period of several months in order to assist the dealers to get back from the customer their investment in these taxes, but we feel that this would be equivalent to re-imposing the luxury tax in a modified form, would present a definite sales resistance which would prevent accomplishing the desired results, and would certainly lengthen the time necessary to get back to normal conditions, and prevent the dealer from reaping the full benefit of volume business brought about by the complete elimination of the tax.

On looking at the whole matter it is well to remember, that had the government not taken the unusual and almost unprecedented stand of eliminating the entire luxury tax, by order in council on December 20th, and had they, as is usual and customary, allowed matters of taxation to stand and be dealt with in the budget speech, and had deferred any action looking to the relief of this taxation until the budget was brought before parliament in the usual way (last year this was not until May 19th) the whole trade would have been in a very serious and undesirable position. We, therefore, feel that the industry as a whole has much to be thankful for by the prompt action of the government.

Under all the circumstances, and having regard to the government's refusing to make any reimbursement of taxes collected, we propose to assist the dealers in their difficulty by absorbing (under certain conditions), without raising our price for this purpose, 50 per cent of the taxes paid on new, unused McLaughlin cars in dealers hands at the opening of business Monday morning, December 20th, 1920, thereby assisting the trade to return to normal basis with the least possible delay. We are at present absorbing two per cent sales tax and will continue to do so until further notice.

While some dealers may be inclined to regard the balance of the tax which they absorb as a loss it must not be forgotten that all merchants, manufacturers, traders, etc. have had to assume their share in the general reconstruction (and in some cases excessively heavy and severe losses), through the writing down of inventories, the fall in raw materials and commodities, and the contingent liability for goods contracted for at high prices in advance.

It was hoped that all manufacturers would adopt a uniform basis of handling this situation, but this could not be arranged.

So they sent out their bulletin. At the time I understood that it was entirely arranged between the manufacturers and the dealers, on the basis of fifty fifty, as shown by this circular.

Mr. CALDWELL: Do you know how many manufacturers adopted that attitude, and what was done?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I could not say.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is it not a fact that the government did refund to those manufacturers who were conducting retail establishments the tax on the cars which they had in their retail warehouses? I know a statement was made that refunds were granted amounting to over $170,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I know of no refunds at all. But, in fairness to my hon. friend, I should add that the sales tax under the law was not payable until the sale was made. Merchants had stamps on hand to be attached when sales were effected. Now, those stamps would be redeemed on presentation; but that would not be a refund, the tax never having been payable because no sales had ever been made. I do not know, I tell my hon. friend frankly, but it may be that some manufacturers had cars on the retail side of their warehouses instead of on the wholesale side, and if they had not sold those cars, but had simply transferred them from one side to the other, the government could not hold the tax. It is possible that some payment has been made in connection with this; I do not know. But so far as I am aware everybody was dealt with on the same basis. Now, there are the facts. I am not objecting to any action being taken. I think what I did was right, and Mr. Fielding thought I was right. If somebody else thinks I am wrong, I am not going to be at all warm about it.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—License to bona fide wholesaler or jobber.

Mr. WHITE: With respect to this clause, I have had a matter brought to my attention by a firm in my city who deal in scrap materials. It was brought before the Minister of Customs through a letter written to him on January 19, 1924, as follows:

We desire to call to your attention an unjust measure which has to do in taking out a bond in connection with sales tax.

In our business, which is the handling of scrap materials and is sold to manufacturers as raw material, there is no sales tax. We are therefore not in the position that we were last year, as we do not collect any sales tax to be turned into the department. Under the circumstances it is unreasonable for us to be put into the position of having to take out a bond, covering three months maximum business of 1923 calculated on 12 per cent, which would mean that we would have to spend about $75 for the cost of the bond each year.

You will agree that our position is not analogous with that of the manufacturer and as our business is taxed to the limit now we believe you should withdraw the ruling making it necessary for the wholesale scrap merchant furnishing this bond.

We are placing this matter before you for your kind indulgence and we are hopeful, that you will consider the matter carefully, and we will await your reply with interest in due course.

That is from London, Ontario. In reply to that the minister wrote to Harris & Sons as follows:

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 19th of January with reference to the bond which you are asked to furnish in connection with the sales tax.

This is a matter of legislation and parliament alone could change it. I will submit your letter to the proper authorities and see what can be done with the object of meeting the grievance of which you complain.

On January 26th the minister again wrote as follows:

With further reference to your letter of the 19th instant and to my acknowledgement of the 22nd, I regret to say that it is not possible to meet your request that the giving of a bond be waived in view of the fact that it is a statutory provision which the department has no power to change or modify. Parliament alone has the power to amend or repeal such provisions.

That is signed by the Minister of Customs and Excise. On May 20th, 1924, I received a letter from Harris & Sons as follows:

Since the first of the year we have been classed as a wholesaler under the new sales tax regulations and inasmuch as everything we handle is classified as raw material for re-manufacture we do not charge sales tax of any kind when selling to manufacturers or others with a license. You will therefore understand that we do not hold any moneys to be turned in to the government, as we do not collect anything. Notwithstanding this the regulations say that we must furnish a bond from a bonding company, amounting to $7,000, which amount is arrived at by three months of our last year's sales. Although we were able to get a bonding company to furnish the necessary bond for the first three months of this year same has been cancelled, and we are not able now to furnish this bond although we have explained the fact that we do not collect any sales tax to be turned into the government and therefore the bonding company incurred no risk.

Without this bond the government refuse to grant us a license, and under this circumstance we must pay the 5 per cent sales tax ourselves on everything that we buy and import from the United States, and we feel that under present business conditions we could not remain in business if we had to work under this tax and not obtain a license.

Our bankers are willing to give the government a guarantee in our behalf but they refuse to give the bonding company this guarantee and thereby have them collect their premium without earning same.

I took the matter up with the Acting Minister of Finance and was referred to the Department of Customs and Excise. I took it up with the Minister of Customs and Excise, who wrote me on the 6th of June 1924 as follows:

I duly received yours enclosing correspondence with reference to Messrs. J. Harris & Sons.

In reply I may say that the department has no authority to waive compliance with the provisions of the statute which specifically provide that before being granted a license a wholesaler shall give a bond of security by an incorporated guarantee company authorized to do business in Canada and whose bonds are acceptable to the Dominion government, or Dominion of Canada bonds.

I return the correspondence enclosed with your letter.

I am sorry that I am not in a position to meet the request but, as you will understand, I cannot exceed the powers given by the act.

It seems to me that this is the time to make a change, if a change can be made, which will relieve this company, and other companies as well, of the hardship incurred under the provisions of the act. As they say, they are now taxed heavily enough, and the regulation referred to is one which evidently makes it even harder to carry on business. That regulation seems unnecessary, but it is evidently in conformity with the provisions of the Special War Revenue Act. I would ask the minister whether some change could not be made to afford relief in this connection. For some unknown reason this firm has been unable to get the necessary bond, and in any case it would involve an expenditure on their part of $75 a year, although they pay nothing whatever to the government.

Mr. BUREAU: This is a question of the classification of this firm's activities. They are not manufacturers; they are wholesalers. The act provides that these people shall give a bond. It is the first case I have heard of where the bond company has refused to guarantee the honesty of the trader or his faithful compliance with the law. I do not see what I can do in the matter. These people buy the scrap and sell it, and when a wholesaler sells to a manufacturer he gets a refund from the department of the sales tax he has paid. When the material goes into the manufacture for consumption then the tax is collected and turned in to the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why could a small amendment not be made to provide that a bond or other security might be accepted, in the discretion of the minister? I do not believe this government is out to make business for the bond companies, but that seems to be the effect of the present provision. The guarantee of a bank is just as good as that of a bond company, and many other things could be suggested that would be just as good. Why not provide that such security may be accepted as shall meet with the satisfaction of the minister? The only real difference is that the trader has to pay $75 to get the bond from the guarantee company, whereas in the other case he has not that expense.

Mr. BUREAU: There is a lot in what my hon. friend says, but he knows by experience the difficulties in connection with taking other security. If a man wants to be his own security—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would have to be outside security, of course.

Mr. BUREAU: There were cases as soon as the law was amended, and when they came to the minister and he had to make a decision, he was accused of causing hardship and all sorts of things. In the case of a bond to be given when duty was not paid on liquor, we made it a guarantee bond approved by the department. I would have no objection to what has been suggested if it were not for the difficulty of administration. and the very difficult position in which the minister is very often placed. He may do some injustice in refusing to accept certain bonds, and on the other hand he may expose the government to loss by accepting certain bonds. This makes it difficult. If my hon. friend wants to make it bank security, or add to the kinds of securities we must accept, all right; but I think it is unfair to leave it to the minister to judge whether or not the security should be accepted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want to add for one moment to the minister's difficulties, or to be the cause of his losing one wink of sleep. Why not say, or "bank guaranteed"?

Mr. BUREAU: I would not object to that.

Mr. WHITE: That would cover the ground, I think.

Mr. JACOBS: It is just a question whether the bank has the power to give guarantees to the government for its customers. Banks are created for a certain specific purpose, and I do not think it would extend to giving credit to the government for their customers. That is the function of a bonding indemnity company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think there would be much trouble about that. Every time a bank issues a letter of credit it is, in effect, doing that.

Mr. BUREAU: We have never had any difficulty in getting bonds from outside, but they want us to take their own guarantees, and that is where the trouble comes in. Better leave it as it is, and if there is any difficulty in any particular case we will see what we can do about it.

Mr. WHITE: The minister has had a special case placed before him, and he says he cannot alter the statute.

Mr. JACOBS: Why cannot the man get a bond to guarantee his dealings?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would cost him $75 a year. It is a very serious addition the government is making to the cost to the public.

Mr. BUREAU: How are you going to protect the government?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is one of the troubles of this legislation. The government says: You can only do business with us if you give us a bond, and that will cost you $75 a year to get. Now, there is any amount of different ways of giving security.

Mr. ROBB: He can always get his refund.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend knows about refunds.

Mr. ROBB: I know it is slow.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I venture to say there are refunds still outstanding under the sales tax legislation of last year, any amount of them. The department does not know, nobody knows, what the position of refunds of sales tax under that legislation of last year is.

Mr. JACOBS: You are dealing there with hundreds of millions of dollars. You cannot expect that to be rushed through in a day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What a vivid imagination my hon. friend has—hundreds of millions of dollars!

Mr. JACOBS: Yes; I am talking of the sales tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think it is quite as bad as that, but the refunds are enormous. I do not think my hon. friend got the effect of the interpolation by the Acting Minister of Finance. He says that they can get all this back by way of refunds. That brings up the question, how about refunds in the past, how many are still unpaid under the legislation of last year when we had this fundamental change made in the collection of the tax? That change in the act was the direct occasion of a tremendous amount of refunds, and they are not paid now.

Mr. JACOBS: There is about $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 involved in that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is a pretty serious thing, and is it not a serious thing for the trader, that he should have to put this up without—

Mr. JACOBS: Is it not more serious to make refunds without a proper checking up and auditing of the accounts, without investigation and inspection?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no question about it, that the most serious thing is to create a condition that results in a mess where you do not know where you are with respect to refunds. If there is any way of getting out of any more messes with regard to refunds—

Mr. CANNON: Were there any refunds when my hon. friend was minister?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not remember any. There was no legislation passed then creating refund liabilities that I remember. My hon. friend has a keen wit and a very good memory. Perhaps he will tell me what legislation was put through then creating refunds.

Mr. JACOBS: We had to do it after you left office.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is showing his humour again, although not his usual strict fairness. This refund business, as my hon. friend knows, is the result of the legislation of last session. It has absolutely nothing to do with a single act that we had on the statute book before. Now what is the use of getting into this silly kind of altercation here? Of course, I do not mind it a bit; if my hon. friend likes it he can go on indefinitely; I rather like it.

Mr. BUREAU: I may tell my hon. friend that this system of refunds has been made easier and simpler. I have not the new regulations here, but I would like my hon. friend to see them. They are much simpler.

Mr. CALDWELL: The hon. ex-Minister of Finance simplified this matter when he was in office by simply refusing to make any refunds at all. He acted on the principle, what we have we'll hold, what we have collected we'll keep, especially in the case of the automobile dealers. That was a very simple way of doing it.

Mr. BUREAU: But a radical way of making it simple.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am still awaiting information as to that legislation that was passed when I was minister that created these difficulties in connection with refunds. I see my hon. friend (Mr. Cannon) is going out, without giving me the information.

Mr. CANNON: If I get any information from my hon. friend, it will be the first time I ever did.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid I am not going to help him out now. The hon. gentleman referred to me, and then I asked him to tell me the legislation I was responsible for that created the necessity for refunds, but I have not got the answer to that question yet. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman made a mistake. We will let it go at that. There was no such legislation, and no such situation created. I am very glad to hear the minister say that the regulations now are very much simpler for dealing with this tremendous burden of refunds created by the legislation of last year.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not want to take credit to myself for that. It is the officials.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I give credit to my hon. friend if he has been able to do something in that direction, because the mess thrown on the department was something awful, and the expense put upon traders was tremendous. Inventories had to be taken all over the country, and checked, all for nothing, really all for nothing, but it all had to be done. I do not wonder that although the act was brought in last year the department has only now been able to find out some way of dealing with the situation. I am not blaming them for the delay. The legislation itself was of such a character as to invite opposition. Only last week, or quite recently, has the department been able to evolve a workable scheme. But, I repeat, the department is not to blame; the House and the government are to blame. The government are to blame for bringing down legislation they did not understand, and the House is open to censure for passing legislation which it did not understand; and we have had the sorry spectacle this year, with this act, only a year old, of ministers not being able to understand a simple regulation when it was read to them. More than that, they cannot understand how the tax act of last year is working out. Under these circumstances my hon. friend surely will not suggest that under the new act traders should be unduly handicapped. When they do not want to pay $75 for a bond, surely it would be perfectly easy to provide that it shall be a bond "or other approved security"—something like that.

Mr. BUREAU: You would still put it up to the minister?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But the minister takes far more grievous burdens under this act. It really ought to be a matter of regulation. It is only by regulation that the government are going to bring light out of the darkness, or order out of the chaos, that has existed for some time past.

Mr. BUREAU: As far as returns are concerned we are making the law simpler than it formerly was. My hon. friend contends that the guarantee ought to be subject to the approval of the minister. The minister says that will bring up a lot of difficulties. As I have just mentioned most of the time people come to the department and say "We will give you a guarantee ourselves."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A guarantee by the person himself is no good.

Mr. BUREAU: In the case of banks and corporations dealing with us they want to give their own guarantee. The advantage of having a guarantee bond is that when we have a claim it is made good. In other cases it very often means a law suit. I do not want to shirk any burden. On the other hand, in the interest of the better administration of the department, I think the clause as it is now framed should be allowed to stand. In some cases it may not work out with entire satisfaction but there is no regulation or law which works in that efficient manner.

Mr. WHITE: I can see where it might be a just provision to require a bond when a company is liable to the government for a certain amount. But if I am correctly informed in this case the company collects no sales tax, there is no money involved at all. Yet the government insists upon having a bond which costs a certain amount a year. The minister has expressed the opinion that he would accept a bank guarantee. To a certain extent that would relieve the situation but not entirely, because a certain amount of expense is incurred even in providing a bond of that character.

Mr. BUREAU: It is not a question of having sales tax returns. These men are paying the sales tax. But when the wholesaler sells to the manufacturer my hon. friend opposite claims he is entitled to a refund because the consumption tax is paid when the material is put into the article manufactured and that article is ready for consumption. That is the reason why the tax is called a "consumption" tax. The bond is given in order that the books may be accurately kept and the government may be able to obtain proper returns. If proper returns are not kept and there is any delinquency or fault on the part of the man who holds the license, we go to the guarantee company to get our money.

Mr. WHITE: Is the minister still willing to accept the guarantee of the bank?

Mr. BUREAU: I do not object to a bank guarantee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why not add to the section the words "or a bank?"

Mr. BUREAU: I would suggest the words "or of a chartered bank."

The CHAIRMAN: The words can be added at the top of page 4 and the line will then read " bond of an incorporated guarantee company or of a chartered bank."

Mr. MARLER: Is it the intention to generally license wholesalers or jobbers under this section?

Mr. BUREAU: We have not discussed the matter yet but it looks like it.

Mr. MARLER: It is a very important question. Any wholesaler or jobber getting a license of that description need not pay the sales tax at all until the goods go into the hands of the consumer virtually.

Mr. BUREAU: Why should the wholesaler have to pay the sales tax? If the manufacturer does not pay the sales tax why should the wholesaler if he is licensed have to pay that too and lose the interest on his money until the goods reach the consumer and we make a refund? I think it is only fair to the wholesaler as it stands.

Mr. MARLER: In some cases my hon. friend is perfectly correct. There are instances where the sales tax may not be paid at all. Is it the intention of the minister to classify these wholesalers as jobbers who may be granted licenses or is it not?

Mr. BUREAU: How would it be with the people who have not paid the tax? They would not pay the tax if they did not sell the goods.

Mr. MARLER: Suppose the return is not made.

Mr. BUREAU: We get a guarantee they will keep their books properly and that we will get a return.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Refund on goods enumerated in item 445A.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is for the purpose of implementing the budget and is a refund to the agricultural implement firms, under item 445A. It will cost us $204,000.

Mr. ROBB: It applies to 445A. I gave my hon. friend the figures some time ago.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it was $204,000.

Mr. ROBB: That would be the total amount. This would only be a small part of it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where is the balance of it put in?

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. ROBB: It would come under section 4.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why is this dealt with in this way? At the time of the budget it was pointed out by my hon. friend that refunds which were given under the sales tax act itself were quite a proper matter for action under the existing machinery of the Finance department; but when by a budget proposal a direct charge is made on any of the income of the country actually received it is misleading. It is a wrong principle to treat it as a matter of refund because it is not. It is a matter of originating expense as a result of that legislation, and at the time it was discussed my hon. friend agreed with me. What is the reason for the change?

Mr. ROBB: It would be in the same position as the automobile matter we have just been discussing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, not at all. There was no refund in the case of the automobiles. If there had been, that money having been actually taken into the treasury of the country under the law which put it there, which law had no refund provision in connection with it, there would be no right at all to pay it out. This is put in just where it ought not to be put in; it is made a statutory charge, when it ought to follow the general rule and be voted in the estimates. It is the only proper way of doing it.

Mr. ROBB: The purpose of section 8 is to put Canadian material in the hands of wholesalers, jobbers or other dealers on the same footing as imported material used in the manufacture of articles covered by tariff item 445A.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister has not answered my point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The purpose seems quite plain. It is another attempt to bury the estimates.

Mr. ROBB: No, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what is done. It is something that has to be voted to these companies, and it is going to be done by a statute instead of being put in the estimates and voted dollar for dollar by parliament.

Mr. ROBB: I think the hon. gentleman is wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Tell me what it is.

Mr. ROBB: This is material that might be put in the hands of a retailer who had already paid the tax. Then he sells it, and it comes under this tariff item 445A, and he is entitled to a refund.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) has pointed out that the tax was paid under a law that made no provision for a refund; consequently the money is in consolidated revenue. Now a new law is passed and the money is required to pay that back. That money should be voted in the regular way.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. gentleman is wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course the thing is as plain as can be. You might as well bury any estimate in that way. The minister admitted the point himself in the House a few days ago. I recall it myself. He thanked the hon. member for West York for making it clear. The law under which he paid the money made no provision for refund at all. Consequently the money is in consolidated revenue, properly so under that law, and not subject to any refund. Now he wants it refunded and the only way to refund what was paid in under the other law is by an estimate.

Mr. ROBB: I will be prepared to report to parliament the amount of refund and the names.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all right, but it does not appear in the estimates, and the minister's leader gets up and tells us what the payments are; but all this will be paid out, just the same as the branch lines money will be paid out, and there will be no opportunity to correct it.

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. gentleman can correct it when it comes up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot correct everything.

Mr. JACOBS: Why do we have a leader of the opposition?

Mr. MEIGHEN: To get things right when he can, and he would like to get the co-operation of the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs). Why does my hon. friend waste his time sitting away in the back, when he might put things right?

Mr. JACOBS: Would the leader of the opposition promise me a front seat?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The front in all good works.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why has the minister departed from what he himself said?

Mr. ROBB: I have looked into it and I think this is the simplest way to do it. I shall be prepared to give to parliament the refunds and all the names.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why not put it in the estimates?

Mr. ROBB: We do not know what it is, we cannot put it in the estimates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The same suggestion was made before, and I pointed out to my hon. friend that the estimates were only estimates because we did not know the amount. Everything is an estimate. If we are to understand that the estimates are not to include the cost of carrying on the country, all right, let us understand it.

Mr. ROBB: We must have legislation of this kind, otherwise we could not provide for this refund. We have consulted with the officers of the department, and they consider that this is the best and simplest way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is the simplest way to get out of showing the financial condition of the country. It is the simplest way of evading the necessity of putting down in black and white just what this precious legislation is costing the country. It is the simplest way of bedevilling the country's bookkeeping, so that nobody will know where we are. And there are other things going on just the same. My hon. friend, if I remember rightly, told us that there was no reason why it should not appear in the estimates. That being the case, why has he changed his opinion? Surely he will tell us at eight o'clock why he has done so.

Mr. ROBB: I have consulted the officers of the department and they inform me that this is the better way.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering section 8.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. ROBB: I should not like to press for the third reading now as the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) is not in his seat.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the House.

SUPPLY

TRADE AND COMMERCE

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—local services— vote 180—Baddeck and Iona, steam service between, $10,500.

Mr. LUCAS: Where is this service carried on?

Mr. ROBB: This is down along the coast of the Bras d'Or lakes in Cape Breton. It is one of those points where they have no railway communication.

Mr. BROWN: Have they a mail carrying contract?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Are they paid extra for carrying the mails?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Item agreed to.

Trade and Commerce—Canada Grain Act, administration of, $1,100,000.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that the elevator at Vancouver is under the control of the Harbour Board, and that the Grain Commission have very little to do with it. Is it the intention of the minister to allow that elevator to remain under the control of the Harbour Board, or will it be put back under the Grain Commission?

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The operation of the elevator is under the control of the Harbour Board. The weighing and inspection is under the control of the Canada Grain Board.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the control of rates under the Grain Commission or under the Harbour Board?

Mr. LOW: The rate is fixed by the Harbour Board, which operates under the Marine and Fisheries department.

Mr. GARDINER: Without any reference to the Board of Grain Commissioners?

Mr. LOW: Yes, without any reference to them.

Mr. GARDINER: What rates are being charged for handling grain at that point?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. LOW: That comes under the Marine and Fisheries department. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries will be able to give my hon. friend tthe information he asks for.

Mr. SALES: Is it not a dangerous thing to create a harbour board and give them a virtual monopoly of the whole of the business, nobody else having anything to say as to what rates they shall charge? It seems very unfair that all the elevators at the head of the lakes should be under the Grain Commission and have their rates fixed while in the case of other elevators the Harbour Board should have control. Take the port of Montreal, for instance: the receipts last year were $1,630,745.39, and the operating expenses $689,-855.03, leaving a balance over and above operations of $940,890.36. That is, more than half the total revenue at the port of Montreal is derived from the handling of grain. It is not in the interests of the farmers that harbour boards should have the sole power in these matters; that nobody should have the right to regulate their rates. So far as I can find, no report is issued by harbour boards such as those at Montreal and Vancouver. I do not agree with the minister that this should not come under his department. I do not see how the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should have anything to do with the handling of grain.

Mr. LOW: The Montreal Harbour Board handles large quantities of American grain, so that much of the earnings would come from that source. As to the fixing of rates, that is subject to the approval of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. GARDINER: Under present legislation a certain percentage of the overages goes to the federal government. Have there been any overages in the Vancouver elevator, and if so what is their amount?

Mr. LOW: There has not been an official weighing since the Harbour Board took over the elevator. There will be one, though, in the course of the year.

Mr. WARNER: How do the charges at Vancouver for the handling of grain correspond with those at Montreal and the lake ports?

Mr. LOW: I am informed that they are slightly less than at Montreal. I am not altogether sure, but that is my information.

Mr. KNOX: What are the charges per bushel at each port?

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend will put that question to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries when his estimates are under consideration I am sure he will be glad to give the information. The matter is under his department; we have nothing to do with the fixing of rates.

Mr. FORKE: It is very strange that when we are considering the Canada Grain Act we are told that everything has to be answered by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. LOW: Nevertheless the matter of the fixing of rates is under the control of his department. It is only a question of deferring the inquiry for a day, when hon. members will be able to get the information from the minister in charge of that department.

Mr. SALES: I would like again to protest against any harbour commission having a monopoly such as the Montreal Harbour Commission or the Vancouver Harbour Commission have. In 1922 the Montreal Harbour Commission had a balance of $973,741. Now, when the grain is contributing a balance of nearly a million dollars a year to the Harbour Commission at Montreal, the question arises in the minds of the farmers whether it is not contributing too much. I think it would be in the interests of everybody, and especially of the farmers if all the elevators in the country were under one control, and that control the Board of Grain Commissioners, with power to fix rates; and any overages coming from these transfer houses at Montreal, Vancouver, Prince Rupert or elsewhere should belong to the people and should be taken care of by the Grain Commission. I say it is a dangerous principle to create a monopoly of this kind and have the board responsible apparently to nobody except the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend would not say that a surplus of $94,000 in the thirteen years of operation is too much. We could scarcely figure any closer than that.

Mr. SALES: Is the minister referring to the surplus for operating these elevators by the Board of Grain Commissioners?

Mr. LOW: Yes. Spread over the thirteen years there has only been a surplus of $94,000.

Mr. SALES: I want to understand this clearly. Does the minister mean that the operation of the Canada Grain Act by the Board of Grain Commissioners has resulted in only $94,000 profit?

Mr. LOW: In a profit of $94,000 in the thirteen years.

Mr. SALES: By the Board of Grain Commissioners?

Mr. LOW: The Board of Grain Commissioners.

Mr. SALES: I am very, very sorry to have to appear to be teaching the minister his business, but I have a report here from the office of the Department of Trade and Commerce giving the revenue and expenditure under the Canada Grain Act since 1911. I will read the figures year by year, because I notice that on May 19th the minister stated that there had been a considerable loss in the early years of operation under the Grain Commission. Here is the statement I received from the Trade and Commerce department:

Statement showing the revenue and expenditure under the Canada Grain Act, Board of Grain Commissioners

Year	Expenditure	Revenue
1911-12..	$ 226,894 75	$ 230,173 87
1912-13..	340,294 82	330,430 49
1913-14..	450,737 57	510,184 10
1914-15..	527,773 83	517,034 63
1915-16..	659,062 48	913,616 46
1916-17..	884,999 27	1,459,811 40
1917-18..	1,007,989 04	1,499,875 88
1918-19..	937,521 33	1,082,069 63
1919-20..	925,597 28	1,092,605 59
1920-21..	1,059,565 35	1,483,277 57
1921-22..	1,235,000 00	1,937,323 03
1922-23..	1,386,803 74	2,364,037 48
1923-24..	1,720,781 06	2,308,254 05
Total..	$11,363,020 52	$15,728,694 18

That shows a surplus of revenue over expenditure of $4,365,673.66.

Mr. CALDWELL: Who was that report prepared by?

Mr. SALES: I asked the Department of Trade and Commerce to give me these figures, and this statement was forwarded to me by Mr. Parmelee, for the Deputy Minister of the Department of Trade and Commerce. That is the amount the farmers of this country have contributed to the consolidated revenue fund through the administration of the Grain Act. I was not in the House when the minister's estimates came up the other day, and I was surprised to read his statement that there had been a considerable loss in the operations of the Grain Board during its earlier years. Needless to say, when I got these figures from the Trade and Commerce department I was still more surprised. Then, in addition to that surplus, there is the $550,000 residue of the wheat board funds. We are trying to organize a marketing pool in the western provinces, for there is nothing more important to us, Mr. Chairman, to-day, than the marketing of our products. Our provincial governments have all passed resolutions asking that these wheat board funds should be returned, but as I understand it, the Acting Minister of Finance, whom I am pleased to see in his seat, has taken the stand that he is going to hold that money because some of our people have not paid for their seed. I do not think that is at all fair. When we add this $550,000 of wheat board funds to the surplus of revenue over expenditure of $4,365,000, it makes nearly $5,000,000 which the growers of grain, those selfish people my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) was referring to the other day, have contributed—

Mr. MANION: That will pretty nearly pay for the estimate this year.

Mr. SALES: And pretty nearly for the Hudson Bay railway, too I do hope that in the face of the figures I have given, the Acting Minister of Finance will reconsider his decision and accede to the requests of the provincial governments for the return of these wheat board funds, at least. That is all I have to say at the moment.

Mr. HANSON: In the light of the figures the hon. member has just given, it seems to me that an explanation, and an adequate explanation, is due to the committee from the minister, because there is such a wide variance in the figures quoted by himself and those given in the return supplied by his department.

Mr. LOW: I intended to answer the question but my hon. friend (Mr. Hanson) rose too soon. I propose to stand by the statement I made a few nights ago, that the surplus amounted to $94,000 as a result of the operations of the Canada Grain Board during the period of thirteen years and ten months. During that time the total revenue amounted to $8,366,155.15. The total expenditure was $7,849,124.94, leaving a surplus of $517,030.17. Deducting the provisional bonuses allowed to the grain staff during the years 1918-19, 1919-20, 1920-21, 1921-22, 1922-23 and 1923-24 to the 31st January, amounting to $442,622.62, the net receipts for the period of thirteen years and ten months referred to amount to $94,407.55.

Mr. SALES: Will the minister explain how he arrives at these figures?

Mr. LOW: The trouble with my hon. friend is that he is mixing the figures for the operation of the elevators with the figures under this item. The elevators are not under consideration at the present time they will come up under item 379. I have not looked the matter up to see what the revenue and expenditure amount to in that case, but the item will be under discussion some time this evening, or at a later date. However, I stand by my statement of a few nights ago that the total revenue under the administration of the Grain Act amounted to $94,407.55.

Mr. SALES: I should just like to read this:

> As requested I beg to attach herewith statement showing the revenue and expenditure under the Canada Grain Act and Board of Grain Commissioners, as per calendar years 1911 and 1912 and 1923 and 1924.

Those are the figures I have quoted from a statement signed by Major Parmelee, who is assistant deputy minister, I understand.

Mr. LOW: The hon. gentleman was not in his seat, I think, a few nights ago when I made my statement. In the past the estimates for the administration of the Canada Grain Act and for the management and operation of the grain elevators. have been combined. In the last fiscal year the amount in the estimates was $1,558,839. This year the combined vote for those services is $1,520,000, covered by votes 372 and 379 a decrease in the two items combined of $38,839. If my hon. friend will allow the matter he has been discussing to stand until we take up item 379, where it should properly be considered, I am sure he will have ample opportunity to present any figures which he wishes to bring to the notice of the committee.

Mr. FORKE: If the minister had made that explanation at first some little time might have been saved.

Mr. LOW: May I inform my hon. friend that this item was discussed for an hour or an hour and a half some nights ago. The hon. member (Mr. Sales) challenged the statement that I had made and I had no desire to prevent him from speaking. However, if I had known he was going to enter into this discussion I would have asked him to defer his remarks.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In connection with the management of grain elevators at different ports, I presume the elevators at the head of the lakes are under the direct control of the Board of Grain Commissioners, whereas the elevators at Montreal and Vancouver are under the control of the Harbour Commissioner of those ports?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I cannot quite see the reason for that difference. Although I do not class myself as a grain expert I can see that there is a greater similarity between the elevators at Vancouver and at the head of the lakes, than there is between the Vancouver elevators and the Montreal elevators. I understand that at Montreal the elevators are more or less transfer elevators. That is, practically no farmer's grain is received there; whatever grain is received is transferred there for transhipment?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: At Vancouver, however, the elevators are terminal elevators in the true sense of the term—that is they are not only used as shipping elevators but as receiving elevators for farmers' grain. At Montreal practically no mixing can be carried on; there are no mixing elevators there but simply transfer elevators. On the other hand, mixing operations can be carried on at Vancouver just as they can at the head of the lakes. I am speaking now from the point of view of the men who raise the grain, and after all they are the men who are chiefly interested in elevators, and who should have the greatest voice in their management. It seems to me that control by the Grain Commission is absolutely essential where the mixing can be carried on. I certainly concur, and concur most heartily, with the sentiments expressed by other hon. gentlemen on this side that it is vital that where proper terminal elevators are erected, where grain is received and where mixing operations may be carried on, the elevators should be under the control of a responsible body of men who are trained for the work and understand it thoroughly.

Mr. SALES: I should like to have a little further explanation from the minister. I do not want to dispute his figures at all but the figures I have quoted are taken from the general report. I find there, certain items of receipts which give a total of $2,444,175.70. That includes grain inspection and weighing fees for which the farmers undoubtedly have to pay. It also includes the registration and cancellation of warehouse receipts and the sale of grain samples. Undoubtedly these items appertain to the farmers also. There are likewise included—license fees for terminal elevators, storage fees, miscellaneous collections, and so on. If, by some other method of bookkeeping the minister arrives at a conclusion different from that to be drawn from the figures I have presented, my contention still is that the farmer must bear the cost of these different items which go into the consolidated revenue. The minister may alter his method of bookkeeping, but I do not think in the end he will dispute the facts I have presented that from one source and another the receipts have amounted to nearly $4,500,000 during the last thirteen years.

Mr. CALDWELL: More than cost?

Mr. SALES: Yes, over and above the cost of operation.

Mr. SPENCER: Have the Board of Grain Commissioners anything to do with setting the freight rates on the Great Lakes and the regulation thereof?

Mr. LOW: No, the government has nothing to do with fixing the rates on the Great Lakes, but if, in the opinion of the board these rates are too high, they can step in and fix the amount. So far they have not done so.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the minister aware that the charge to-day between Canadian ports, where the distance is much shorter, is higher than the charge from the Canadian ports to American ports? In other words, where there is no competition the shippers are being held up. Wherever there is competition they are cutting the price. I quoted some figures the other day which are referred to in the Grain Growers Guide, and I believe in other papers. An editorial in the Grain Growers Guide reads as follows:

> The patriotic Canadian lake shippers, who enjoy a monopoly under the coasting laws, are soaking the shipper who exports wheat through Canadian channels. Where they have a monopoly they charge 2½ cents; where they face American competition they charge 1¾ cents. They charge 42 per cent higher rates on wheat by the all-Canadian route.

Could the minister give us some information in regard to these figures and let us know if they are true or not.

The CHAIRMAN: I am inclined to think the hon. member is hardly in order under this item.

Mr. SPENCER: If I am not in order I can bring it up some other time. I asked this question the other day and the minister informed me that when he brought down his estimates I would have an opportunity to ask the question.

Mr. LOW: I have no objection to the hon. member's asking the question. There are various reasons why the rates to American ports are lower. Competition is the regulating factor in all these rates but the vessels have more ore and coal to handle when going to American ports than when destined for Canadian ports, and I am told by some vessel owners that the facilities for handling grain at Buffalo and other American ports are such that the cost of handling is less than at the Canadian ports. Whether that is the fact or not I am not prepared to say but that was one of the reasons given. I wired the Canada Grain Board yesterday asking them if they could give me any reason why the rate to Canadian ports should be higher and why there should be a higher rate where there was no competition assuming the statement quoted to be true, but up to the present time I have not received an answer. When that reply comes I shall be very glad to hand a copy to my hon. friend.

Mr. HOEY: Can the minister tell me whether the dispute with reference to the overages at terminal elevators has been settled? Has the court given its decision as to the right of the government to take the overages at certain terminal elevators?

Mr. LOW: It is still pending in the courts.

Mr. HOEY: It has been in the courts a long time.

Mr. BROWN: In the meantime nothing has been collected on overages; is that the situation?

Mr. LOW: I think the hon. gentleman is asking me a question in connection with some private companies.

Mr. BROWN: In the meantime is the government receiving anything from overages as provided for in the statute?

Mr. SALES: Will the minister tell us what the apple growers and potato growers pay for their inspection?

An hon. MEMBER: One at a time.

Mr. LOW: That matter should be discussed under the Department of Agriculture estimates.

Mr. COOTE: Do the salaries of the Board of Grain Commissioners come under this item?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: Are the salaries of the Board of Grain Commissioners included in the amount which the minister quoted in answer to the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales).

Mr. LOW: The salaries of the commissioners and secretary are included in that item.

Mr. COOTE: Are the salaries of the staff at Montreal included in that item?

Mr. LOW: The salaries of the eastern inspection division come under this item. They amount to $21,402, expenses, $1,000, and printing and stationery $1,800. The Grain Commissioners come under this as well. The vote covers the salaries of the officials, both permanent and temporary, all contingencies under the administration, the various officials in the eastern and western grain inspection divisions, salaries and contingencies of the Board of Grain Commissioners, and salaries and contingencies of the grain research laboratory, except the salary of the chief chemist.

Mr. MARTELL: Are there inspectors in other branches, such as mixed farming, apple growing and so on, whose salaries are paid by the department?

Mr. COOTE: Do you know of any other department under which these services come?

Mr. LOW: They are under the Agriculture department. My hon. friend must ask the Minister of Agriculture about the inspection of fruit.

Mr. CALDWELL: There is a fruit commissioner.

Mr. COOTE: Does the minister know of any other department of the government that is engaged in the growing of any agricultural produce which returns a profit under its operations?

Mr. LOW: The hon. member will have to ask the Minister of Agriculture. He has a number of inspectors under his department.

Mr. MARTELL: Would the minister tell me whether gypsum comes under the Department of Agriculture? If it does, it is a new idea. If the department provides a commission for grain inspection, they should have a commission for the inspection of apples and fruit, and there should be a commission for the inspection of gypsum. The whole thing seems to be for grain; everything is done for grain and nothing else.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister be good enough to give me some information regarding an answer to a question which he gave a few weeks ago? My question was as follows:

> What were the total receipts and expenditures respectively incident to the inspection and weighing of grain by the Board of Grain Commissioners for the years ending August 31, 1921, 1922 and 1923?

I give the minister's answer, adding in each case the surplus as shown in the difference:

Year ending Aug. 31, 1921—
Receipts..	$1,011,678 84
Expenditures..	742,314 98
	$269,363 86

Year ending Aug. 31, 1922—
Receipts	$1,263,253 47
Expenditures	847,186 90
	$416,066 57
Year ending Aug. 31, 1923—
Receipts	$1,433,984 32
Expenditures	972,631 16
	$461,353 16

This makes a total of $1,146,782. Will the minister please explain those figures to the extent of telling us just what is covered in the expenditures? Is he now trying to give the House the impression that there are other expenditures that are not shown in this statement?

Mr. LOW: The item covers the salaries of the Grain Commissioners, weighing inspection services, contingencies of all kinds, temporary staff, and research laboratory, with the exception of the chief chemist.

Mr. COOTE: The minister admits that there is a surplus in the last three years of some $1,147,000.

Mr. LOW: Why does not my hon. friend go back a few years? The year immediately previous to the first one that he has given showed a deficit of $215,993 and the year previous to that a deficit of $221,415; and for six or seven years prior to that, again, there were deficits. If the hon. gentleman will include those figures he will find that the amount I gave him of $94,000 of a surplus for the thirteen years and ten months is correct.

Mr. COOTE: Is the minister prepared to recommend to the Board of Grain Commissioners this year to reduce the fees in view of the surplus of $461,000 odd which was shown last year?

Mr. LOW: I should be glad to recommend that reduction to the government if we were sure that we should have the same amount of grain to be inspected in the coming year. In the nature of things we are obliged to keep a permanent staff, and it is quite possible that through some misfortune we might have a deficit instead of a surplus. If we were sure that there was going to be a surplus each year I should be very glad to recommend to the government that there be a reduction in the fees; but in view of the uncertainty that necessarily prevails I cannot do that. The surplus this year up to January 31, 1924, is $242,036.

Mr. COOTE: I would suggest to the minister that he consult the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) who is very strong on faith; if he did that, perhaps he would be inspired with enough faith to risk the consequences of a reduction in the fees.

Mr. McMASTER: Faith without works is dead.

Mr. COOTE: Let me draw the attention of the minister again to the fact that last year there was a surplus of $461,000, the previous year a surplus of $416,000 and in the year 1921 a surplus of $269,000. How long does the minister expect to wait before he recommends the reduction, or how big a surplus must there be in order that the fees should be reduced?

Mr. LOW: It all depends on the amount of grain we have to inspect. If we were sure that the quantity would be the same this year as last year I would have no hesitation in making a recommendation to the government. We are anxious to help the farmers in every way possible, and I have no doubt that before this session is over the farmers will receive as much benefit from other services as they would get by a reduction in the fees.

Mr. COOTE: Does the minister think that this board was established as a money-making proposition?

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend will glance over the figures for the past thirteen years I think he will be satisfied that the government that organized the Grain Board had no such thought in mind.

Mr. COOTE: They did not expect that it would be a paying proposition the first year, surely.

Mr. LOW: For ten years there was a continuous deficit, but the government always made provision for it in the hope that some day things would come out even; and in thirteen years and ten months there has been the surplus which I have already mentioned.

Mr. BROWN: Any deficit that might be incurred in this particular branch would be offset by a surplus in some other direction.

Mr. COOTE: I would call the minister's attention to the suggestion which the hon. member has just made. Although we have a great many kinds of agricultural products in Canada which are graded by the government, grain is the only product for the grading of which we make any charge; it is the only product in the grading of which the government secures a revenue. I want to ask the minister now whether he would have any objection in handing over the administration of the Canada Grain Act to the Minister of Agriculture. Possibly if he did that we might have the inspection done for nothing, because the Minister of Agriculture inspects apples, potatoes, butter and eggs free of charge. On what grounds does the minister justify the making of a profit out of the grain farmers.

Mr. LOW: The farmers of the West receive benefits in other ways. At Saskatoon we have an elevator that cost $2,500,000, but there is no account of that taken in fixing the rates. There is another one at Moose Jaw and another at Calgary; and we are about to erect one at Edmonton at a cost of probably $1,250,000. Yet no provision will be made for the amount invested in that elevator in fixing the rates; no fixed charge will take care of that capital expenditure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the one at Prince Rupert?

Mr. COOTE: On what ground would the minister justify the building of an elevator at Edmonton, the capital charges of which are to be taken care of by the inspection of grain at Fort William or Vancouver? Is that his argument?

Mr. LOW: Possibly some of the members sitting not very far from the hon. gentleman would be best able to answer that question in regard to the Edmonton elevator.

Mr. COOTE: Is the minister refusing to answer the question? Am I to take the inference in his first statement as being correct?

Mr. LOW: It is not an insinuation at all; I merely say that there is no provision made for separate outlay and charges as capital expenditure in connection with these elevators. A large elevator at Fort William was built in the same way, and I am sure that if my hon. friend benefits from the elevator at some other point he will not object to hon. gentlemen living in another district benefiting in the same way.

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister tell us whether the charges at Fort William are the same as at the elevators at Calgary and Saskatoon?

Mr. LOW: I might remind the hon. member once again that this question is properly to be discussed under vote 379.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, it was the minister himself who tried to sidetrack the question on to the interior elevators by explaining the way the profits made at Fort William were used, saying that they were really going to pay the capital charges on the internal storage elevators. Is not that the fact?

Mr. LOW: I endeavoured to answer my hon. friend's question, and that is the answer.

Mr. COOTE: Then we can take it as an answer that the profits on the weighing and inspection of grain at Fort William are being used to cover the capital charges at other elevators?

Mr. LOW: They are spread to absorb the charges and losses on all the elevators. We cannot single out any one elevator and operate it alone; we combine them all, and the result is what I am placing before the committee tonight.

Mr. SALES: In order to clear up the situation, if there was only $94,000 profit in thirteen years, will the minister explain where the other $4,200,000 came from, and under what heading it is to be found? He will not deny that over $4,000,000 has been received altogether?

Mr. LOW: I have not even looked at the elevator figures to see how they are worked out; when we reach that item I shall be glad to answer the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SALES: I am sorry to differ with the minister. He says that this question will be discussed under item 379, which I find is "Elevators, operation and management of the Canadian government." Is that the item?

Mr. LOW: The elevators are not under discussion under this item; they come under item 379.

Mr. SALES: Then has the $4,200,000 come from the operation of the elevators?

Mr. LOW: I do not know where my hon. friend gets the item of $4,000,000 odd. I have not looked at the elevator item; it is keeping me busy discussing the item before us at the moment.

Mr. SALES: I got the figures from your own department; that is all I can say.

Mr. LOW: I will present the total figures when the elevator item is under discussion.

Mr. BROWN: If I caught the minister aright, he said that this item includes money spent for the research laboratory, with the exception of the chief chemist's salary. Does that mean Dr. Birchard?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. BROWN: Then are we to take it that he is not to be continued in the employ of the department?

Mr. LOW: His salary comes under civil government estimates.

Mr. MILLAR: There has been some discussion as to whether the elevators at Vancouver should be under the jurisdiction of the Board of Grain Commissioners or of the Harbour Commission. When I was in Vancouver last winter I attended a meeting of the Board of Grain Commissioners when this matter came up for discussion. Going back further, I may say that when I got in touch with the harbour commissioners at Vancouver I found that there was a great deal of prejudice against the inspection and weighing departments and against the officials generally at Winnipeg. For this I am convinced there is no good foundation. I am satisfied that the chief inspector and the chief weighmaster are quite willing to give ample opportunity for development of the grain movement at the port of Vancouver. Those who have read some of the evidence taken recently before the Grain Commission, as reported in the papers, have perhaps formed a fair idea of why there was this prejudice. I rather hesitate to mention the name of the company which has been discussed so much, but I think perhaps there is no reason why I should not do so. It appears that Smith and Davidson did not succeed very well at Fort William and Port Arthur and moved to Vancouver, and I am afraid that they had something to do with creating suspicion of the motives of the Board of Grain Commissioners. This matter of the mixing elevators is one of vital importance, millions of dollars being involved. At the meeting of the Board of Grain Commissioners in Vancouver to which I have referred, the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) sat close to me, and he gave figures to show that grain shipped out by the port of Vancouver, bought on grade but sold on sample, brought five cents a bushel more in some cases than it would have brought if it had been sold on grade. Why should grain sold on sample and shipped out from Vancouver bring more when it reaches Liverpool, and the buyers see the actual grain, than when it is sold on grade? I will try to make this perfectly plain, but before doing so let me say that a ship's captain stood up and corroborated the figures given by the member for Vancouver Centre, mentioning the names of those who had purchased the grain. Another gentleman did the same thing. I think the fact is established beyond doubt that Alberta grain shipped out of Vancouver and sold on sample brought five cents a bushel more than it would have brought if sold on grade. Remember, the port of Vancouver last year—the first year of any considerable grain movement westward—shipped out only 19,000,000 bushels; this year the business jumped to 55,000,000 bushels. Since this is a new grain-shipping port, people in Liverpool and London who are buying grain placed their bids on Vancouver grain on the basis of the grain they had been receiving in past years over the eastern route. Now, I think it becomes quite plain and I believe nobody can deny the fact, that they were placing their bids on the basis of the grain they had been receiving over the eastern route, where it is mixed and adulterated; consequently the grain shipped out from Vancouver in its purity was worth five cents a bushel more than if it had been mixed. Some may say that Alberta grain was better than the grain of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Now, a gentleman who stood near me at the meeting, the representative of a large grain firm, made this statement, although it will not sound well to my Alberta friends. He said: "We do not get our strong grain from Alberta but from southern Saskatchewan and southern Manitoba." It will be remembered that our Alberta representatives have frequently spoken of the superiority of their grain and how it has taken so many prizes, being the best grain in the world. Well, as a matter of fact, they have only just started; we in Saskatchewan and Manitoba have taken more prizes than Alberta will take in the next five years! But that is aside from the question. The fact is that the grain sent out of Vancouver is not better than that which goes by the eastern route, but it is pure; the other is mixed.

Let me show the effect of mixing. When we took evidence before the Agricultural committee on the wheat board question several of the leading millers of Ontario were asked: "Do you as readily take grain from the mixing elevators as from the public elevators?" And they one and all replied: "No, we will not take grain at all from the mixing elevators if we can get it elsewhere." How is the mixing done, and what does it mean? It simply means that the poor grain is taken into the mixing elevators and the good grain is mixed with it in such a way that in no case does the percentage of inferior grain go beyond the requirements of the Grain Act. The act is followed very closely to see how much sprouted, how much bleached, how much frosted, how much shrunken and how much pie-bald grain is allowed, and this inferior grain is pumped in in the fullest proportions allowed. Can any one argue for a moment that good grain can be mixed with inferior grain and still retain its original value? It is impossible.

Some have argued that because the farmer has already received his pay it makes no difference to him what is done with his grain. But it makes this difference; those who buy grain in the Old Country market buy it on its actual value, buy it for what it is; and if it has been lowered in value by mixing they pay that much less. The result is that the farmer when he delivers his grain to the country elevator will receive that much less, because what he gets is based on the Liverpool price less carrying charges. Our chief inspector was in England last year and when he returned he stated before the Grain Inquiry Commission that the British importer and miller were quite satisfied with the condition in which our grain was arriving. To those not familiar with the situation that might be misleading; it might give the impression that the grain they were receiving over there was as good as the farmer was delivering. But it does not mean anything of the sort; it simply means that the grain they are receiving in the Old Country is up to the price they have been bidding, and the price they have been bidding is based on the quality of the grain they have been receiving during preceding months. It simply means that the grain as received is uniform; that when they buy No. 3 they get what they they pay for, and so on.

The fact that the grain out of the Vancouver elevator sells for five cents a bushel more than it would if sold on grade indicates the extent of the damage done to our grain by mixing at Port Arthur and Fort William. The grain goes into the terminal elevators at the head of the lakes as Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, but it goes out as Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4; in other words, 5 and 6 have entirely disappeared. How is it possible for millions of bushels of grain of grades 5 and 6 to be mixed in with grades 1, 2, 3, and 4 and not lower its value? It is absurd to argue anything of the kind. I admit there are types of grain that by scientific treatment may be improved in value. If a grain that should be No. 1 has some removable defect it is quite possible by scientific treatment to put it back into No. 1 without doing harm to anyone. But does that apply to grain that is No. 6 and cannot be anything else but No. 6? No scientific treatment can improve its milling value. When it is put off in this way it must simply be put in in a small stream with the higher grades, and that is what is done.

Vancouver is a new port and these mixing elevators are not yet established—well perhaps I should not say they are not yet established because one is already started. The Woodward elevator was purchased for that purpose as advertisements that appeared in the Vancouver papers indicated. Other elevators also are starting and those who are erecting them are going into the mixing business; that is where the money is. But I assure the department and the minister that if steps are not taken to prevent our grain from being deteriorated—and I speak particularly of grain from Alberta; I do not think much Saskatchewan grain will go that way—if steps are not taken to prevent this evil from getting a foothold and to prevent millions of dollars from being invested in the private mixing elevator business an enormous injury will be done to the grain growing districts of the prairie provinces. Now is the time to stop it; now is the time to prevent it before it gets a good start.

As to placing the elevators under the Grain Commission, I am sure that that would bring about greater confidence in the prairies. I discussed this matter with the harbour commissioners when there. Certain statements appeared in the press, conversations with citizens, and I could plainly see that the tendency would be to create a great elevator system which would work out for the benefit of the city of Vancouver, while those who grew the grain would be largely forgotten. I feel that is exactly what is going to take place unless the management of these elevators is placed under the Board of Grain Commissioners. There was some talk at that time of establishing different inspection divisions and of creating different standards; at least, that is what was implied. That would be a great mistake. We want a national standard; we want a national grain handling system; we want Montreal as well as Vancouver placed under one managing body, one chief inspector and one chief weighmaster. You will remember that about 1907 the United States had state inspection and they were very desirous of making such changes as would bring into force an inspection system similar to that of Canada. Their grain was arriving in Great Britain in a very unsatisfactory condition. I remember a remark of one grain importer in Liverpool: speaking of the port of Baltimore, he said they tried hard to regain their lost reputation —the grain was arriving in all sorts of conditions. He said that for many months they sent forward their grain in very good condition, and then all at once it fell off, and as much was lost in one cargo as was gained in three or four. The United States has since gone to a national system of inspection. To create in Canada separate inspection divisions, different in the East from the West, would be a retrograde step; it would be going back to a system which the United States discarded because it was unsatisfactory.

With regard to the work of Dr. Birchard, does that come under this vote?

Mr. LOW: His salary is included in the civil government estimate, but his work comes under this vote.

Mr. MILLAR: I would like to say a word in regard to that. It is a work of vast importance. We have certain types of wheat that are not getting justice. I make bold to say that one can take No. 1 northern wheat. dampen it for twenty-four hours and make it grade No. 3. The wheat itself is not damaged in the least, but it becomes so discoloured in the bran that it goes into No. 3. The Americans are buying on the protein test. They are picking out our strong wheats, and the millers are doing the same. Everywhere great importance is laid on the strength of our wheat, yet the farmer has no means of knowing the strength of the grain he is selling. One improvement made during the time that Dr. Birchard has been at work was the raising of the moisture test, having to do with the amount of moisture the grain will carry and yet not be damaged in storage.

It has been raised—I am speaking offhand —a little over two per cent. What does that mean? It means that thousands of cars that were formerly graded tough, and would thereby lose six or seven cents a bushel, are now graded straight since the moisture test has been raised to 14 or 14.2, and that in itself is a great gain. I believe the chief inspector should have this official right at hand all the time to give him every assistance. Their work should be brought as close together as possible. There have been some reports, I do not know whether they are any more than rumours, that there was some thought of taking this work to a greater distance than it is now, even of doing it at the Agricultural College. Let me say that if the work is done at the Agricultural College, some two or three miles away from the inspection department, it might as well be closed down, in fact better, because we would get no benefit while there would be a pretence of giving us protection. I believe that millions of dollars would be saved to the producers of this country if the work that Dr. Birchard is doing was developed still further. Some of the other parts of the Dominion may say they would not like to pay so much, that it would be too expensive. I think the test of that would be this: Would those who are to reap the direct benefit of this work be willing to pay for it themselves, provided they were relieved from paying the bills of others in other parts of Canada? I am sure they would be willing to pay for the work if it was properly done. Some of the work that has been done will take years to come to fruit. This work should be continuous; it should be encouraged and developed, and as I said before, it should be kept as closely in touch with the chief inspector as possible. If I read aright the evidence of the chief inspector before the board of inquiry, he strongly approved of that; he was very much in favour of the work being carried out, and considered it a great help to him. I am quite convinced I saw that in the press reports. I have confidence in the minister. The stand he took in a certain matter has greatly pleased me. A certain matter came before him and had to be dealt with decisively, and his action in that case gave me confidence in him. I believe he will do the right thing in respect of this work also when he comes to understand it thoroughly, and I would ask him before he comes to any decision as to doing away with this office or moving it to a distance from the inspection department, that he take the advice of those who are in the best position to know. I suppose the Grain Inquiry Commission will report on this; the Board of Grain Commissioners and the chief inspector also know the value of the work, and I am quite convinced that when the minister has studied the matter, instead of the office being disbanded, he will be quite willing to spend more money on it, and he will be satisfied that it is money well spent.

Mr. MANION: I should like to ask the hon. member a question, and I do so entirely in good faith. He mentioned Davidson and Smith, and I rather gathered that his remarks reflected upon them. I happen to know them; they were constituents of mine for a long time, and I should like to know if my hon. friend meant it that way, or whether he just mentioned their names incidentally. I should like to know what he did mean, because his remarks sounded like a semi-charge against Davidson and Smith.

Mr. MILLAR: I would like to say to the hon. member that perhaps a year ago I would have been reluctant about mentioning their names at all. But let me tell my hon. friend this: A cargo of grain that went out of Port Arthur a year or perhaps two years ago to Buffalo was held up there, re-sampled by the inspection department, and graded 4 tough. When it went out of the Davidson and Smith elevator, it went out as straight No. 3. That was the first step that rather broke down my confidence in that company. My hon. friend from Saltcoats thinks it was graded No. 2, but I am under the impression that it was graded No. 3. Now very recently action has been taken against the Davidson and Smith people at Winnipeg by the Grain Exchange and the Bawlf Grain Company to recover the loss on that cargo.

Mr. MANION: Is that action still in the courts?

Mr. MILLAR: Yes, it was taken about ten days ago. In addition to that their names have also been brought up in this inquiry that has been going on. They have appeared in connection with what has now become known as the Maharg Spout at No. 1 elevator, at Vancouver. It seemed rather strange when it was discovered that the only other spout like this one appearing in the Vancouver elevator was in the Davidson and Smith elevator at the head of the lakes. That was another step that helped to break down my confidence. As to the rest, I think you might go over the newspapers. The names of this company have come up before the board of inquiry all over, at Vancouver, Winnipeg, and elsewhere. They have come up time and again. A number of the men who worked for Davidson and Smith at Port Arthur were engaged by the Harbour Commission at Vancouver. I myself heard the man who was responsible for placing this spout in No. 1 elevator admit responsibility for it, and he also had worked for the Davidson and Smith people. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Grain Inquiry Commission thought it wise to investigate this a little further and find out what connection there was between the two. I think they went so far as to find out how many who now work for the Harbour Commission at No. 1 elevator at Vancouver had worked for the Davidson and Smith people. There has been so much said about this matter in the papers that I have no hesitation in saying that their record is not of the best.

Mr. MANION: I have no brief for Davidson and Smith. At the same time, I have known both gentlemen for a great number of years. In fact, I grew up with Jack Smith, and Jack Davidson, I have known for twenty or more years. While there have been some such general statements made about them as my hon. friend has just mentioned, I do not know of a single case of shady dealing of any kind that has ever been proven against them. My hon. friend pointed out that a case is now pending against them in the courts, so I do not suppose we have a right to prejudge that case. So far as charges about handling grain are concerned, I think we all remember—I am not making any charge, but if we wish to retail newspaper talk in the House here, I think we all remember—a charge of false bottoms being used in elevators at the head of the lakes, and not in Davidson and Smith's elevator. I say this in justice to them. They are two young men who certainly have made good from a business point of view in western Canada. Whether there are charges against them of a disreputable character that can be proved, I know not, but none have been proven.

Mr. SALES: What does the hon. member mean by "made good?"

Mr. MANION: In the sense that my hon. friend has made good; they have made a good deal of money.

Mr. SALES: Then they are different from me.

Mr. MANION: They may have made it differently from my hon. friend, but that is what I meant by making good, that they have made a good deal of money, as I understand my hon. friend has done. I do not know that there should be in this country to-day any reason for looking down upon a man because he happens to make money. My hon. friend mentioned certain of these men. I hold no brief for them but personally I do not think it is proper to imply that because any man makes money he does so crookedly. There are a great many men in this country who have made large sums of money and done so honestly. I simply rose for the purpose of making this remark because my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle, who is usually very fair, mentioned these men's names, and as he later explained meant to mention them in a tone of suggestion. Without knowing anything at all about the case and without having any brief for them in any shape or form, but knowing them personally, and having known them for a great many years I have made these remarks. I feel it is perhaps not wise to make suggestions about men who cannot defend themselves here unless there are facts to lay before the House in regard to the matter.

Unless my hon. friend (Mr. Millar) desires to make some explanation at this point, I wish to say a few words about the subject under discussion myself. If I understood the minister correctly the Board of Grain Commissioners had in the past thirteen years made $94,000 profits. That is, they are ahead of the game, if I may use the expression, to that extent. But my hon. friend from Saltcoats (Mr. Sales) gave figures showing that the Board of Grain Commissioners were really ahead to the extent of $4,500,000. Now, I simply wish to see if I understand the facts correctly. My understanding is this: The $94,000 which the Board of Grain Commissioners have made in their operation for the past thirteen years has reference to their direct work in seeing to the inspection of grain, sampling, and so forth. On the other hand the $4,500,000 to which my hon. friend (Mr. Sales) refers was the money—I take it that the figures are correct—made by the Grain Commissioners in handling grain as elevator owners for the people of Canada.

Mr. SALES: Altogether, I think.

Mr. MANION: Including the $94,000? Of course that is a small part of the $4,500,000. At any rate that is what I understood the figures to mean. I have no interest in the question myself. I do not wish to put myself up as having a special knowledge of the subject, but being at the head of the lakes where a great deal of grain is handled I have heard the question discussed a great deal. I take it that if those figures are correct, and I presume they are, the $4,500,000 has been made through the handling of grain through the elevators, has been made in exactly the same way as in the case of any of the other grain handling companies. For instance, the Bawlf Grain Company of Winnipeg, mentioned by one hon. member, have handled grain for a great many years and have done very well in a business way. Then too the Grain Growers' Grain Company have elevators through which they have been handling grain for some years and have been making, I think, reasonable profits. I take it, therefore, that the explanation I have given would account for the difference; that the $4,500,000 has been made in the handling of grain through elevators, and is a separate account. I think the minister will probably support that statement in a general way without looking up the item.

The only question that comes up is this: I can understand the contention of hon. members to my left and I think they have good grounds for arguing that that $4,500,000 should go back to the pockets of the farmers. I would thoroughly agree with them in that contention. At the same time there is the difficulty that if the Board of Grain Commissioners through their elevators changed their rates for handling grain it means that the rates will have to be the same in the case of the other elevators, because if particular elevators have lower rates than others it is natural that everybody would wish to ship his grain through those elevators. I presume that would create a difficulty. At the same time I should like to say that I thoroughly agree with my hon. friend's suggestion that whatever profit is taken out of the grain—which really comes out of the farmers—should later go back to the farmers. I say that not because we had some little argument here last evening but because it is entirely my own view.

There is another question mentioned by my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle—he stated it indirectly I thought—which has caused a good deal of discussion throughout western Canada in the past year, that is the question of sample markets. He spoke of grain bringing more money by being sold through the port of Vancouver because it was sold on sample. As I say, there has been a good deal of discussion throughout the West during the past year—partly engineered by some who wish to start a sample market—in regard to sample markets. Now, according to my understanding there is on the statute books of Canada to-day, and it has been in existence for a number of years, legislation permitting the establishment at Calgary and Fort William of sample markets! Am I not right in regard to that?

Mr. MILLAR: Will my hon. friend allow me to explain that I am very much against a sample market because such a market as established by law carries with it mixing privileges which has an evil effect at Port Arthur and Fort William at the present time. The grain that went from the port of Vancouver went from a port where there is no sample market and no mixing privileges. It was actually sold on sample. That is, after it reached Liverpool the grain was seen and its value was such that it brought five cents a bushel more than if it had been bought on grade. In that case there were no mixing privileges; it was grain that had left the farmer's wagon in its pure state.

Mr. MANION: I understand my hon. friend's point. I am not, however, thoroughly familiar with the question so I do not advance my opinion very strongly. I do not know that a sample market would necessarily imply mixing privileges. It is true that mixing is carried on at the head of the lakes at the present time, but mixing is done by the private elevators. It is not supposed to be done, according to law, at the terminal elevators. That is, not according to the Canada Grain Act. I am quite certain I am right in this statement that the terminal elevators are not supposed to do any mixing whatever; whatever mixing is done is done at the private elevators. My hon. friend spoke of wheat which became damp and the grade of which was in consequence lowered. They buy wheat such as my hon. friend spoke of and dry it, and at the same time buy other low grades of wheat affected by damp or other cause. Then they hospitalize this grain and by drying, cleaning, and various other treatments the wheat is improved and put into a very much better grade. There is no doubt in my mind that so far as these mixing elevators go they afford an opportunity to the farmer who has low grade wheat.

Mr. MILLAR: Most of the damp grain that goes into the mixing elevator is not dried but is simply mixed with dry grain.

Mr. MANION: I was not aware of that. At any rate the grades are raised, and what I was about to say in finishing my sentence was this: According to a statement of the grain trade, and I rather think it is correct, these mixing elevators are a great advantage to the farmers in that they often give a market for grain from the west which is either damp or of very low grade owing to bad sorts of seed, and other causes. In this way the low grade wheat is given a market which it could not obtain otherwise.

Mr. MILLAR: There is a market for a small quantity of "off grade" grain, but about 80 per cent of our crop is of the higher grade, one, two and three.

Mr. MANION: There is a market for the "off grade" grain, as my hon. friend expresses it owing to these hospital elevators that otherwise the farmers might not have.

Mr. MILLAR: At the cost of the higher grades.

Mr. MANION: I do not quite see that point.

Mr. MILLAR: There is a gain on 22 per cent as against a loss on 78 or 80 per cent.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend means that low grade grain is mixed with higher grade grain?

Mr. MILLAR: Yes.

Mr. MANION: On some occasions no doubt that is done. However, I think I am right in saying that if certain low grades are subjected to these processes of improvement—I have no knowledge of the matter, I am only speaking on the question because it came up—there is a market for them which otherwise would not exist at all. It is proved that they take good grain at the same time and mix it, but they do take off the hands of the farmer a grade of grain that he would not otherwise be able to get rid of.

Mr. MILLAR: What authority has the hon. member for saying that he would have no market for that grain? Was all this grain not sold before the mixing elevators were established?

Mr. MANION: Oh, yes. Perhaps I should not have used that expression. It might be sold for feed, but the farmer would not have as good a market. These private elevators compete with each other in the purchase of the grain, and the farmer has a better opportunity than he has had in the past to unload the grain into elevators of that kind. I do not say he gets all he should get, nor did he in the past get all he should get out of the terminal elevators. I think the farmer has been in the unfortunate position of dealing to a great extent individually, and has made a great many losses which he probably should not have made, and that the improvement in the Canada Grain Act will gradually eliminate those losses. So far as I am concerned, though I live in a district where we have the greatest grain elevator centre in the world, I am willing to support any legislation that will improve the chances of the farmer to get more out of his grain than he has obtained in the past. I believe many elevator companies did receive—quite legitimately, because of the looseness of the act—more profit out of the handling of the grain than probably they should. I think possibly my hon. friends to my left are a little inclined—and I only say this in the kindest spirit in the world—to criticise. I am referring to some of the hospital elevators at the head of the lakes, and in the case of these hospital elevators, it would be better if possible to enact legislation under which we could improve them, so that the farmer could gain even more than he gains to-day, because I think to a certain extent he does not get all he should out of the elevators at the present time.

Mr. GOULD: Does my hon. friend recollect the Price Waterhouse report which was brought down to this House a few years ago? I believe he was a member of the House at the time. On that occasion he did not show any interest in regard to bringing down legislation which would benefit the farmer.

Mr. MANION: I took no part at all. I certainly opposed no legislation brought in for the good of the farmer. I do not think my hon. friend has a right to make such an insinuation. He implies that I opposed legislation for the good of the farmer.

Mr. GOULD: It was not my intention to impute such a motive to the hon. member. I say the hon. member was a member of the government at the time the Price Waterhouse report was made.

Mr. MANION: I was not a member of the government.

Mr. GOULD: My hon. friend was not a minister but a member of the party in power at that time.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend was a member also at that time.

Mr. GOULD: No.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend came in at a by-election a little while after I came in.

Mr. GOULD: I came into the House in 1920. The Price Waterhouse report was presented to the House at the time the hon. gentleman was in parliament supporting the then government. His interest was not in evidence at that time, and that was the time in my humble opinion that legislation should have been brought down which would have resulted in many benefits to the farmer. That report was almost suppressed.

Mr. MANION: No, not suppressed. I remember distinctly the Price Waterhouse report being thoroughly aired on the floor of this House. I do not remember when that report came in, but I remember it being fully discussed. So far as my having anything to do with the legislation which was enacted at that time, I may say that I came into the House in the year 1917, and I think the report was presented about 1917 or 1918, just before or just after I came here, and naturally being a new member, I could hardly be expected to bring forward legislation, especially when I was not a member of the government, but at no time in my life have I ever opposed legislation for the benefit of the farmer,—except it be free trade.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: I knew that would bring a little applause from my hon. friends. I should like to point out to my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) that the government of my right hon. leader, and the government which preceded that government did bring in legislation and improved, to my mind, the working of the Canada Grain Act to a great extent. It is because of the Price Waterhouse report that at the present time the overages are not allowed to the grain elevators as they were allowed in the past. Would my hon. friend tell me what government introduced the legislation to change the overages? Was it not the government which I supported at that time?

Mr. GOULD: What government was it?

Mr. MANION: Was it not the government that I had been supporting?

Mr. GOULD: I am willing to accede to that statement, but I wish to point out that the amendment to the Grain Act was put through by order in council, not introduced and discussed on the floor of the House.

Mr. MANION: If that amendment was good legislation, surely my hon. friend will not criticise it because it was brought in by order in council?

Mr. GOULD: If my hon. friend will study the figures revealed in the Price Waterhouse report and compare the faulty amount of legislation which he says was beneficial to the farmer, I am sure his impartial mind will agree that the farmers were not given the legislation which was warranted by the Price Waterhouse report.

Mr. MANION: I do not say that all the legislation which might have been introduced was brought in, because the Canada Grain Act was only put into force a few years ago, and it will be improved until it is perfect, but I think my hon. friend will be good enough to admit that if the legislation which improved the Grain Act and permitted the farmers to get more out of the overages was enacted by the government I supported, he should withdraw his suggestion that I did not support legislation which was beneficial to the farmer.

Mr. GOULD: My hon. friend is labouring under a delusion when he makes the statement that the farmers received more out of the overages. In so far as the legislation was concerned in covering the matter of overages, those overages go to consolidated revenue and do not go to the farmer.

Mr. MANION: If the grain elevators received less the farmers would receive more.

Mr. GOULD: No.

Mr. MANION: This $4,500,000 will go back to the hands of the farmers.

Mr. GOULD: I am referring to the legislation brought down by the government of the day in connection with overages that my hon. friend spoke of. I reiterate the statement that all the legislation simply provided for taking away the overages from the farmers and putting the amount to the credit of the consolidated revenue, and the farmers did not receive any benefits from it. We argue that the overages have been wrongfully taken away.

Mr. MANION: I agree with that but whatever legislation was brought in to do away with the overages was introduced by my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen), and the government which preceded him. May I add, there will be no better opportunity than that which has been presented since 1921 for the government which he supports, indeed which his group controls to bring in legislation which will be beneficial to the farmers. However, instead of criticising the legislation of the past, let him get busy, and let him be as quick to criticise the other side of the House as he is to criticise hon. members who sit in this corner of the House. I will support him in any legislation he brings in for the good of the farmers.

Mr. MILLAR: I wish to state that I do not object—and I think those sitting in this corner of the House agree with me—to the hospital elevator. They look upon it as a necessity, but once you differentiate between the hospital elevator and the mixing elevator, the process is entirely different.

Mr. MANION: The two classes of elevators are to a great extent the same. I think the hospital and mixing elevators are combined.

Mr. COOTE: For the edification of some members of the committee, I would like to bring to the attention of the committee, and particularly to the attention of the genial member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), some of the operations of the Davidson and Smith elevator for the years 1921-1922. First I want to point out that there is a distinct difference between a hospital elevator and a private terminal elevator.

Mr. MANION: I know that.

Mr. COOTE: And a public terminal elevator.

Mr. MANION: I know that also.

Mr. COOTE: The figures I am going to quote are the result of the operations of private terminal elevators for the year 1921-22, by these gentlemen, Davidson and Smith. They take in to the elevator a great many different grades of grain. I would not want to weary the House by giving all the different grades they take in but I have compiled this statement and limited the number of grades to eight. They took in eight different grades of grain, and I will give the committee the total amount of each grade they took in. Some of the grades were as follows: Straight grade grain; feed grain; tough grain; damp grain and rejected grain.

They took in all these grades, and I have here the figures of the different grades, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, feed and no grade. I will first give the receipts and then the outgo of the elevator and the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) will, I hope, note the splendid business ability displayed by Davidson and Smith in the operation of this mixing house, which they call a private terminal elevator. As an hon. gentleman suggests, they made good in this case. The following is the statement of receipts and output:

——	No. 1	No. 2	No. 3	No. 4	No. 5	No. 6	Feed	No grade
Receipts	1,050,911	1,038,576	4,618,623	1,932,706	970,041	238,424	60,604	68,694
Output	1,327,066	3,409,543	3,780,926	1,320,770 77,295	131,044	None	None	None
Overages	276,155	2,370,967
Shortages			837,697	534,641	838,997	238,424	60,604	68,694

Shortages	2,579,057
Overages	2,647,122
Overage	68,065
	68,045

Summing up all these shortages—I have not the total receipts—the total is 2,579,057 bushels. The overages in No. 1 and 2, which were the only grades in which they had any overage, totalled 2,647,122, leaving a total overage for this elevator of 68,065 bushels.

Mr. MANION: That was the total overage?

Mr. COOTE: That was the total excess of overage over shortage. I am referring to No. 1 and No. 2.

Mr. MANION: I thought it was more than that; I merely wanted to help my hon. friend out.

Mr. COOTE: This is in excess over all shortages.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member has a lot of figures before him. Can he give us the overages for the Grain Growers' Grain Company for the same year, or for any other elevator or any of the other co-operative elevators? I ask the question quite candidly because I think my hon. friend will find that the overages during the same years were pretty much in the same proportion in the case of the other concerns. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Gould), I notice, has returned with the Price Waterhouse report which he rushed upstairs to get; no doubt he will be able to enlighten the committee on this matter. I remember seeing that report myself and I could not pick and choose very much; I thought that the government elevators, the Grain Growers' elevators, the elevators of Davidson and Smith, and others were all about fifty-fifty in this respect. I shall be glad if the hon. member will tell us what the Grain Growers' overages were.

Mr. COOTE: I have the Price Waterhouse report myself, and if it were not that it would weary the committee I should not hesitate to quote from it.

Mr. MANION: Go ahead; we will wait.

Mr. COOTE: The figures I am quoting are not from the Price Waterhouse report; they are figures for the year 1921 and the Price Waterhouse report was made in June, 1918. I made a note of these figures over a year ago, when I knew nothing whatever about Davidson and Smith, and they will be found in the report of the proceedings of the special committee which was appointed to inquire into agricultural conditions last year. I took the trouble to compile reports of one or two of the elevators mentioned in that report, and this is the one which in my opinion showed the most glaring example of overages in the high grades and shortages in all the others. This was the very worst case in the whole report and that is why I took it. At that time, I say, I knew nothing more about Davidson and Smith than I knew of any other firm. I am opposed to private terminal elevators and I want to impress that fact on the minister. There is no doubt in the world that they raised feed wheat at least up to No. 5, because they shipped nothing lower. They must have raised a great quantity of No. 4 and No. 5 up to No. 21 and I do not think this should be permitted. In the end, this practice of mixing must certainly result in a lowering of the standard of grain shipped out and consequently in a lowering of the price. I want to say just a word or two in regard to the Price Waterhouse report. As I said before, it was made in June, 1918 and I do not think it was ever published. The government of the day did not see fit to publish it. Possibly not one of those gentlemen who were in the House at the time asked that the report be published, and therefore they must all share the blame. It was unfortunate, in my opinion, that the report was not published.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), as well as a number of other Progressive members from the prairies, were in the House at that time; and, as a matter of fact, the member for Marquette was a member of the government.

Mr. COOTE: I am sure my hon. friend wants to be fair; I just said a moment ago that possibly all the members of the House at that time were to blame.

Mr. MANION: I know my hon. friend said so, but I wanted to be sure that the gentlemen of my hon. friend's party shared in the responsibility.

Mr. COOTE: I can trust my hon. friend to see to that. I hope the hon. gentleman will get the report and read it, because if there is one man who ought to be interested in the success of the grain producers in Canada and in the proper operation of the elevators at Fort William, it is the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River.

Mr. MANION: I am interested.

Mr. COOTE: As pointed out by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar), or at least one may draw the inference from his remarks, the grain trade may possibly be diverted from Fort William and Port Nelson and directed to Vancouver if these mixing elevators are allowed to carry on at Fort William, while they are excluded from Vancouver. I want to point out to my hon. friend that there is at least one difference between the operation of the Davidson and Smith elevator and that of the United Grain Growers', or any other farmers' company, in that there are thirty or forty thousand shareholders in the United Grain Growers' Company who get some benefit from the business.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is it a virtue because there are more profits distributed?

Mr. COOTE: If a profit is made out of shipping grain surely it should come to the men who own the grain. Will the minister tell us in this connection how many public terminal elevators at Fort William have been turned into private elevators during the last six or seven years?

Mr. LOW: I would first point out to hon. members opposite that the subject which has occupied the last hour and a half is being investigated by the Royal Grain Commission, and that an interim report will probably be placed upon the Table within the next few days.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does not the minister think we can finish the subject before the Royal Grain Commission is likely to?

Mr. LOW: Well, if the Royal Grain Commission were travelling all over the world, like some commissions appointed by my right hon friend, I do not think it would be well for us to wait for the report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think they hold the world's marathon record now by quite a distance.

Mr. LOW: I do not agree with my right hon. friend. I recall a commission appointed by him and an injunction had to be obtained from the courts to get the members stopped.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is when the grain companies did the suppressing which was in the mind of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould). But that commission did not last more than a tenth of the time which this Royal Grain Commission is taking. Is it a fixture? Are we going to provide annual salaries for its members?

Mr. LOW: It is making a real investigation,—

Mr. MEIGHEN: It must be.

Mr. LOW:—and we hope to derive some real benefit from the report to be presented to this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can we not investigate the commission to see what is wrong?

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. LOW: The Vancouver matter is being investigated by the Royal Grain Commission. I might point out to my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) that government elevators are not permitted to do any mixing; that grades Nos. 1, 2 and 3 are fixed by the Canada Grain Act, and that grades 4, 5 and 6 are fixed by the Board of Standards. From various sections of the prairie provinces a number of bags of grain are received, a sample is taken from each, these samples are mixed together, and grades Nos. 4, 5 and 6 are determined for that particular year.

Now a word in reply to my friend's reference to Dr. Birchard. We have no desire to curtail any expenditure that will be for the benefit of the farmers of the prairie provinces. As an eastern manufacturer, I realize that we must do something to make the western farmer more prosperous than he is to-day, and so increase his buying power. I am one of those who believe that our interests are bound up together, that what is good for the eastern manufacturer will be good for the western farmer, and vice versa. I think Dr. Birchard was appointed in 1913, and since that time we have spent $118,000 in connection with his work. The government does not regret that expenditure, but believe that it is possible to carry on the work in a more efficient way so as to produce greater results. We have no desire to discontinue the work if it is found necessary and advantageous. I have no doubt that when the Royal Grain Commission reports it will say something about the office at Winnipeg. We are carrying on a number of experiments to-day through the Research Council. We are just entering upon a more rapid development of research work in connection with the rust problem; we are carrying on special research on the winter killing of wheat under Dr. Newton; under Dr. Snell a research on the cause and treatment of soil acidity in Quebec and the Maritime provinces; another on the relation of soil acidity to nitrogen-fixing bacteria, under Dr. Harrison; and we have appointed a committee of agriculturists under the chairmanship of Dr. Grisdale, the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, to ascertain the best methods for determining accurate results in testing varieties, strains and treatments of grains. This will establish the fact that we are not cutting down expenditure; we are simply seeking to spend the money more advantageously. I can assure hon. gentlemen that if there is a surplus, and if we can see our way clear towards making a reduction in the inspection or any other charges, I shall be only too glad to recommend such reduction to the government.

Mr. MANION: With regard to the remarks of my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote), I wish to put a few figures on record. He was good enough to lend me the Price Waterhouse report which he had in his hand. He pointed out that the Davidson and Smith elevator, which was reflected upon by the member for Qu'Appelle had overages and he gave figures for the year of about 68,000 bushels. Is that correct?

Mr. COOTE: Yes.

Mr. MANION: I am going to read the overages for a number of years of the Grain Growers' Company, a co-operative elevator company, handled by farmers on behalf of farmers, and having at its head the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar).

Mr. COOTE: I was quoting those figures to show how they had raised the grade, and I hope if the hon. member quotes the overages he will quote them all.

Mr. LEADER: I move that this whole report be embodied in Hansard, to facilitate the proceedings.

Mr. MANION: It is rather too large to incorporate in Hansard, consisting of over 100 pages, but if my hon. friend will have patience I will give the overages to which I have referred. I understood the quotation of my hon. friend from Macleod, but after the discussion by my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle of the Davidson and Smith elevator, his quoting these overages looked suspiciously like showing a reason for Davidson and Smith being suspected. That was my conclusion from his remarks.

An hon. MEMBER: They advance the grades.

Mr. MANION: Well, it does not matter whether they did or not. If they had not advanced the grades they could not have had any overages. Now, these are the overages—

Mr. SALES: They did not get the overages. It is a matter of grades.

Mr. MANION: Please remember the overages of the Davidson and Smith Company in 1913, according to the hon. member for Macleod, amounted to about 68,000 bushels.

Mr. MORRISON: Can my hon. friend say how many bushels the Davidson and Smith Company handled?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that. If my hon. friends will just have a little patience I will get this line read. The report says:

> The Grain Growers' Grain Company had overages in 1912-13 of 67,875 bushels.

That is within 125 bushels of the Davidson and Smith figure for the year to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. EVANS: Are the figures the same on the grain they handled?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that; I have not the figures at hand. They were both terminal elevators. I am simply giving the overages. The Davidson and Smith people may have handled much more, I do not know. In the following year, 1913-14, the Grain Growers' overage was 33,360 bushels; there was not quite so much profit that year. The following year, 1914-15, the overage was 54,758 bushels, and they were improving, because the following year, 1915-16, it amounted to 105,699 bushels, nearly double what the overage of the Davidson and Smith people was. In the following year, 1916-17, their overage was 156,901 bushels, nearly three times the overage of Davidson and Smith, so they could have handled three times as much grain and still have been in the same proportion as the Davidson and Smith people.

Mr. CAMPBELL: May I ask my hon. friend—

Mr. MANION: Now, just a moment; I will give my hon. friend the floor in a minute and I will quit for the rest of the evening when I am through. I do not want to be understood as opposing any legislation that is favourable to my hon. friends. But I believe in fair play, and when the hon. member for Qu'Appelle made his implied suggestion about Davidson and Smith and the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) gave his overages I remembered this report: I remembered glancing over it at the time and noticing that nearly all the elevators had overages, some even much higher than—

Mr. COOTE: Does the hon. member realize that the overages I quoted with respect to Davidson and Smith were all of No. 1 and No. 2 wheat and that all the shortages I quoted were of lower grades, 3, 4, 5, and 6?

Mr. MANION: What was the year of the Davidson and Smith overages that my hon. friend gave?

Mr. COOTE: 1921-22.

Mr. MANION: What was the price of grain at that time? It had gone down considerably, had it not, in 1921-22? I think it would take about three bushels of overages in 1921-22 to equal one bushel in 1916-17, when the Grain Growers' had their largest overages. However, I do not wish to debate this question. I just wish to be fair to Davidson and Smith and to show my hon. friends that their own Grain Growers' Grain Company had greater overages in one elevator than the Davidson and Smith Company had. I repeat that I am entirely in favour, as the minister said a moment ago about himself, of doing everything possible to help the prairie farmers, with the exception of ruining some other section of the country in order to help them—that I am not in favour of. But I am in favour of any other legislation that will help them in any possible way, because I think the progress and prosperity of Canada depends very largely on the progress and prosperity of the Canadian grain growers.

Mr. GOULD: The hon. member (Mr. Manion) stated that I had gone to get the Price Waterhouse report. I feel that I must accept the invitation, because that is what I did. I am sorry that as much use was not made of that report on the floor of this House on former occasions as was made this evening; otherwise we might have had better legislation. Certainly we deserved much better legislation than we have as a result of the report. The fact is that this report, brought down in 1918, was so ill legislated upon that it became necessary to appoint another commission, which is working at the present time. I propose to ask the indulgence of the committee while I place upon Hansard some proofs at least of the genius of these companies. I have no apologies to make for any of the grain companies in the investigations I have made, and I have made some. I am not prepared to say that any company doing business at Fort William is possessed of greater virtues than any other; I believe I am absolutely correct and unbiased in stating that one is just as bad as the other, and worse—something of that nature.

The Price Waterhouse report is an audit of the books of the terminal elevator companies from 1912 to 1917 inclusive, and it reveals that these companies were making, through their screenings, overages and various other things, in some cases as high as 50.65 per cent, 41.70 per cent, 35.27 per cent. These are common figures as showing the profits these companies were making, and if anyone outside of the companies themselves will justify the taking of these profits at the head of the lakes or anywhere else, then he is not the friend of the man who is producing the grain. It was on account of these exorbitant profits that the government appointed a commission of investigation, and I am sorry to be obliged to relate that the government after having that report and the figures which I now present, did not bring down legislation to remedy the evils which caused them to appoint the commission.

I will give the names of the companies that were investigated at that time. First, there was the Consolidated, who gave the original cost of their elevator as $594,081. They put in the plea to justify the huge dividends they were getting that the present valuation should be set at $922,102. You see, they increased the valuation so that it might be a justification for, in a manner, reducing what they considered their profit. It is also revealed in this report that these companies in all the years of their existence had not written off one dollar's worth of depreciation, and some of them had existed so long that had they written off the natural depreciation their plants would have been wiped out—that is, the expense of their plants. But in spite of that, they increased the valuation, as I have stated.

Next is the Empire, who gave the cost, including land, at $556,611 and put in the present valuation as $858,256. The Thunder Bay Company, whose original cost was $532,383 put in a valuation of $743,331. The Fort William Elevator Company gave an original cost of $651,069 and a present valuation of $979,011. The Ogilvy Company put in their original cost at $554,823 and the present valuation they stated to be $958,100. The Western Terminal Company gave original cost as $722,737 and raised their valuation to $1,235,848. The Canadian Government gave their original cost as $1,315,767 and raised their valuation to $2,105,228.

Observe, the governments did exactly what the private companies were doing. For the C.N.R. "A" and "B" the cost was approximately $1,961,000, and they raised the valuation to $2,925,135. The original cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific elevator was $1,949,437, and the present valuation which they submitted is $2,625,925.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I stated before, these companies when requested to show cause why they were taking these huge profits from the growers of grain gave as a reason the valuation of their sites, and they mentioned that the land had been included. I find by the Price Waterhouse report that the land on which the elevators were built was in the majority of cases given to the companies; there was sometimes an absolutely free gift of land; the land was exempt from taxation in many cases, and in all the other cases only a nominal price was paid by the companies for the elevator sites. Now, when it was made plain that the elevator companies had wilfully increased the valuations, as I have shown by this table, they give another table showing the reproductive value, which is a little higher value than that represented here. Price Waterhouse and Company investigated that table and compared it with the assessed values in the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur, and it was found that the valuations which the companies submitted in that table were, in some cases, from 2½ to 3 times more than the valuation upon which they were assessed. I mention that as an example of the ingeniousness of the companies, and to show how necessary it is for the minister to have legislation to circumscribe these people so that they may no longer be a law unto themselves, but shall give to the people who produce this grain justice and what is their right.

I believe that I stated in the House on a former occasion that we, as taxpayers, provide the dredges to dredge the channels all along the waterfront where these elevators are built, and yet, whenever the government of Canada sends a dredge there the elevators add the cost to the valuation of their plant. These people have no right whatsoever, to add that valuation to their plant, and the minister and the government are absolutely warranted in enacting legislation to circumscribe these people. I am not asking for legislation at the present time, but I have been interested in asking that the report of the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission be tabled, and when that is done I hope we shall have a very interesting time, and I hope the Progressives in this House will assert themselves on that occasion and will endeavour to have placed on the statute book a law in regard to the grain trade that will do justice to the people who produce the grain and who make the wealth of this country.

Mr. LEADER: Will the hon. member also give the overage figures for the government elevators, as given in that report of Price Waterhouse and Company?

Mr. GOULD: The report does not give the overages for the government elevators. It covers 14 terminal elevators. Now we have 25 terminal elevators doing business at Fort William and Port Arthur. The report of the special committee on agricultural conditions last year is much broader in scope than the report of Price Waterhouse and Company.

Mr. HOEY: Does not the hon. member think that if the wheat pool that is at present being organized is successful, it will eliminate in the process of time these evils he speaks of far more effectively than any legislation could do?

Mr. GOULD: I believe that to be a fact. Without being egotistical, I might say that I made a similar statement when I gave evidence before the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission in Winnipeg, and I went so far as to say on that occasion that if the government did not circumscribe the manner in which these elevators were taking undue profits from us, we had already built elevators once, and we were strong enough to build them again and handle the whole thing ourselves.

Mr. GARDINER: I would like to return to the situation in Vancouver for a few moments, and draw the attention of the minister to a question that I believe requires his attention. He will remember that some time ago the Harbour Board bought what is known as the Woodward elevator in Vancouver, and they proposed to spend $650,000 in completing that elevator. They have rented it to a grain company known as the Oriental Grain Company, composed of Edmonton men, and I understand that this particular company proposes to go into the mixing business, just the same as is done by the elevators at the head of the lakes. I would like to ask the minister whether that elevator will be controlled by the Harbour Board, or will come under the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada.

Mr. LOW: The leasing of the elevator, of course, will come under the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The inspection and weighing will be under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. GARDINER: Then I take it there is no intention at all of placing this mixing elevator under the Board of Grain Commissioners?

Mr. LOW: Not so far as inspection and weighing is concerned. The operation of the elevator will be under the Harbour Commission. I was not aware that the elevator had been leased until my hon. friend mentioned it; this is the first intimation I have had of it.

Mr. GARDINER: There is another question I would like to bring to the attention of the minister, and this has to do with the inspection and weighing department. I hold in my hand some information furnished by the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada to the special committee appointed to inquire into agricultural conditions at the last session of the House. I turn to page 926 of the report to illustrate to the minister just exactly what I mean. This had to do with the mixing elevator, the private terminal elevator of Davidson and Smith Company at Fort William, in the year 1917-1918. I dealt partially with this question during the budget debate, but I want to deal with it further to-night because it has to do with the inspection and weighing department over which he has control. On this side of the page are shown the different grades that go in. There are 48 different grades shown as going in there, and inspected by the inspection department. On the other side is shown the number of grades that go out, and this shows that only 5 grades went out of that elevator, although 48 grades went in. This inspection department is under the minister's control, and I therefore hope that he will take cognizance of this important matter.

Then referring to the weighing department, when this grain was weighed in I find that 704,283 bushels and 50 pounds was weighed in. When it was weighed out it amounted to 831,000 bushels, or a difference in weight of 126,716 bushels and 10 pounds. If the members of this committee will turn up the Auditor General's report they will find that the farmers of western Canada pay all the expenses of the Board of Grain Commissioners which includes the salaries for the weighing and inspection department. As we are paying the salaries of these gentlemen naturally we would expect to get a fair deal. But when I bring these facts to the attention of the minister he will realize that the farmers of western Canada are not getting fair treatment from these men whose salaries they pay. I should therefore like to ask the minister what he proposes to do under these conditions?

Mr. LOW: I have only been in charge of the department for about eight or nine months, but I hope to be able to work out some plan which will remedy the evils of which my hon. friend complains.

Mr. MILLAR: Is the minister's decision final in regard to the elevators at the coast operating directly under the Trade and Commerce department rather than under the Board of Grain Commissioners, or is that course being taken only for the time being and until the report of the Grain Inquiry Commission has been received?

Mr. FORKE: The Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MILLAR: No, I am referring to the inspection and weighing. This is a matter of vital importance.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. LOW: The whole matter will be reviewed when we receive the full report of the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission.

Mr. CAMPBELL: For the information of the hon. member (Mr. Manion) who asked a question a few moments ago I should like to quote the statement from the Price Waterhouse report that the Canadian government elevator in the season of 1916-17 had overages to the value of $326,187. I may say for the same year the Canadian government would appear to have earned a profit of 36.72 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before the item is carried I may say that I do not notice any vote in the minister's estimates this year in connection with the lake rates.

Mr. GRAHAM: That matter will be dealt with by legislation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If this vote were in the department of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways I would take his word for it, but there is nothing here about lake rates.

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend examines item 383 he will find the amount there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is for the administration of the Inland Water Freight Rates Act.

Mr LOW: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not what I was looking for. I was looking for an item which would rather make it appear that the government were going to try and do something to undo the present tangle. Is nothing to be done? Is the mess to remain just as it is? Is there no proposition, for example, to return, in some way or other to the farmers of western Canada the extra freight rates paid in September and October of last year. amounting to $3,000,000, on the grain actually moved? Is there no step to be taken in that direction?

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend could not have been in the House a few days ago when I made the statement that an amendment would be made to the act relating to lake freight rates some time during the session. With reference to the complaint of my hon. friend about excessive freight rates in 1923, may I point out to him that the freight rates were about the same in that year as they were in 1922.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think my hon. friend has got the point at all. The question of lake freight rates depends upon the amount of bottoms available, the demand for space, and the like. When we deal with the question of freight rates we know that the normal rate from Duluth to Buffalo and the normal rate from Fort William to Buffalo is the same—I do not think any one will dispute that. But as a result of the legislation of last year we also know that it was not till October that the government made a most humiliating show of themselves in backing down and giving in to every demand made by the American vessel owner. We know it was not until that time, some time in October, that American boats were looking after the business. Now, the actual figures as I have them, my hon. friend will correct me if I am wrong, show that the Duluth to Buffalo rate last September was 2½ cents and reached as high as 2¾ cents a bushel. The Fort William rate in September, instead of being the same as the Duluth to Buffalo rate, was 5 cents a bushel—it worked up to 5—and in October rose to 6½ cents a bushel, while the Duluth to Buffalo rate had only worked up in the meantime to 3 cents a bushel. The latter was much less than half the rate out of Fort William although before we had this precious legislation the Duluth to Buffalo rate was practically the same as the Fort William to Buffalo rate. Everybody knows the reason for this. At first the American boats would not come in. Everybody knows the capitulation that subsequently took place, and the rates came down as the result of the American boat competition. During September and October Canadian grain was carried at an increase of about 2½ cents a bushel over the Duluth to Buffalo rate. Of necessity a very large part of the November shipment moved at the advanced contracts made for space during September and October when the rates were at the high ratio I have mentioned. Consequently there was also a substantial loss to the Canadian grain grower in connection with November shipments in so far as previous contracts were concerned. In September we shipped from the head of the lakes 19,114,671 bushels of wheat. Of other grains we shipped 3,729,526 bushels. In October we shipped with our rate at 5½ and 6 cents a bushel as against a Duluth to Buffalo rate of 2¾ to 3 cents a bushel. In that month we shipped 52,981,781 bushels, and of other grains 7,020,312 bushels. In November we shipped seventy-seven odd million bushels. In November the general price came down again. We had the condition which we ought to have had in both September and October. We had the American boats competing for space, and prices came down, but a very large amount of that movement of over 77 million bushels was covered by contracts already let on the higher basis. Now if we assume that a comparatively small proportion of that movement at least is not affected by adverse contract, but on the exact rates just as they exist, we have a loss of over two and a half million dollars, all as a result of legislation of this House brought down by this government and for which this government is absolutely responsible. What is the proposition? The loss occurred entirely as a result of the government's action. What is the government going to do to make good the loss?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I agree with the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) regarding the seriousness of the situation, but not in regard to the remedy. I do not think he will agree with me that the way to remedy the situation is by a repeal of the coastal laws, but that is the only way it can be dealt with. We find that at the present time, while the distance from the Canadian head of the lakes to Buffalo is much greater than it is to bay ports, the grain is being carried by Canadian as well as American vessels to Buffalo at from one-half to one cent a bushel less than to bay ports. There is only one reason for this, and that is because there is competition. The American boats, on account of the coastal laws, are unable to carry the grain between different Canadian ports. Canadian boats, in order to get some of the trade, are willing to carry our grain into the American ports for considerably less than they are willing to carry it to Canadian ports. I have some figures furnished by the Bureau of Statistics showing the amount of grain shipped from the head of the lakes up to the end of the 31st of May. The amount is seventy-six and a half million bushels, and about half or a little over half of that went to American ports. I am quite sure that if there had been no coastal laws in effect and if the American boats had been able to ply between the head of the lakes and Georgian bay ports, the same as Canadian vessels, a very much larger volume of grain would be handled in Canadian ports over our Canadian railways, and would go out to the sea without being contaminated as a great deal of our grain is, by going through American sources at the present time. The seriousness of the situation last fall is indicated by a quotation from a telegram sent to the government by the Premier of Saskatchewan as follows:

> The government of Saskatchewan believe that the federal government is justified in taking the strongest possible measures to stop the profiteering operations of these international pirates.

That is very strong language, and I do not agree that the legislation of the past year was responsible for the trouble. If you want to deal with the situation, by getting rid of the coastal laws we can do away with a great deal of the trouble and the traffic between the head of the lakes and Canadian ports will be greatly improved. I know that the argument is used that in carrying grain to Buffalo, vessels have a return cargo of coal. I interviewed some of the officials of the Bureau of Statistics, and I find that there is a very small volume of coal, or of any other commodity coming back from Buffalo at the present time. So that it means that any vessel loading at Port Arthur for American ports is basing the rates on the assumption that the vessel will come back empty. They are not basing the rates on any return cargo, because they have no assurance that they will get any such return cargo.

Mr. McBRIDE: I contend that this discussion is entirely out of order. The freight rate question comes under another item altogether, item 383.

The CHAIRMAN: I agree with the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) that the discussion is altogether outside the item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before you rule, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make one observation. The administration of the freight rates, as is shown by the precious list that we find contained in a report of the carriage of freight on the Great Lakes, is shown to be entirely in the hands of the Grain Commission, and this is the view of the Grain Commission, who apparently are looking for this business. My hon. friend said he would sooner have this matter discussed under another item.

Mr. LOW: I have no objection to the matter being discussed now under the present item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want to have it said when we reach another item that we cannot discuss this question.

Mr. LOW: Discuss it now. I have no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I desire to emphasize the fact that this situation will never be properly cleared up until the coastal laws are repealed. What are we doing? In order to enable the lake shippers to make the profits which the Grain Commission showed they were making last year, which were enormous profits, we are depriving our own ports and our own railways, our own working men and our business men, and all the others interested, of the work of handling our own grain. Year after year one half or more than half of our grain goes out to the United States, and our principal objection in the West to this course is that the grain is being contaminated. We are not judging this merely from a national standpoint, but from the other standpoint as well. We know that the grain does not reach the Old Country in the same form in which it leaves the head of the lakes starting for American ports. I think it was in 1921 or 1922 a special committee of the Senate was appointed to inquire into the reason for the diversion of Canadian grain to American ports, and I want to emphasize one particular recommendation which this committee made, and that was that the rates over the Transcontinental to the city of Quebec should be reduced to the level of the prevailing rates in the West. We have almost a double rate from the head of the lakes to Quebec over the Transcontinental. I believe the regular prevailing rates in the prairies applied on the Transcontinental to the city of Quebec would make a basic rate, a maximum rate, and that it would keep these lake shippers to a large extent under control.

Mr. SALES: Mention has been made of why Canadian grain goes through American channels. There are various reasons. I have found one, and I think the people of the country should know it.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) stated in his remarks that Baltimore was trying to get back its reputation. I am going to read a letter which has been submitted to the Royal Grain Commission from a grain handling firm in Baltimore, which was received by the New York offices of the James Stewart Export Company, a subsidiary firm of the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company. The letter says:

> As some of our clients have made inquiries as to the proportions of Manitoba wheat which could be used in mixtures for federal inspection of No. 1 dark northern spring wheat,—

That is an American grade.

> —we are passing along to you the requirements as at present laid down by our inspectors.
> Mixtures can be made on the following basis: first, equal parts of No. 2 Manitoba and No. 4 Manitoba; second, two parts of No. 3 Manitoba with one part of No. 4 Manitoba; third, 30 per cent of No. 2 Manitoba; and 30 per cent of No. 3 Manitoba; with 40 per cent of No. 4 Manitoba.

This will make No. 1 dark northern, which will be passed by the federal inspector in the United States.

> Inspection and weighing charges of about 35 cents per 1,000 bushels will apply on total quantity mixed. All the grain for mixing must be in the same elevator. We therefore request you to route your Manitoba for. . . elevator delivery here for best results or authorize us to do so.

Here is one sentence to which I would ask the committee to pay particular attention:

Any loss occasioned by mixing will be considered by the government as an in transit loss and duty would not have to be paid on same.

I should like to know exactly what that means; this is in the country where they are trying to protect the farmer, the poor deluded fool! Now I come to the question as to whether the farmer here really gets the intrinsic value of his wheat. I went to the trouble of tabulating these mixtures, and I found that in the case of the first mixture our own figure was 97 1-4 cents; No. 2 would be 96 3-4 cents, and the third mixture, 97 5-8 cents for 1 dark northern. Then I consulted a Chicago paper and got the price of No. 1 dark northern in Minneapolis and I found that the quality for which our farmer would get 97 cents was worth to the American, on May 21, $1.15 7-8 to $1.18 7-8, from 22 to 24 cents a bushel more than the Canadian farmer was getting, I began to wonder what our millers were able to do in competition with the Americans who were milling No. 1 dark northern. I am sorry I have not the price of No. 1 dark northern in the Old Country; I have written for it because I am interested to know how that wheat is valued there in comparison with our own No. 1 northern. This is the kind of thing that is going on in the United States. Is there any wonder that so much of our wheat finds its way through American channels when they take it there and pay no duty? The sooner Canada devotes its attention to the marketing of its crop through its own channels exclusively the better for Canada and for the reputation of our wheat. I do not like this sort of thing, I regret that the minister did not admit those figures of mine, because I was going to make a suggestion to him. The minister said that we might as well discuss the matter at length, and we will, if he is agreeable. The suggestion I was going to offer him was that he might earmark some of that $4,000,000 for the purpose of really assisting the western farmer.

An hon. MEMBER: By building the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. SALES: No, let the Hudson Bay railway line alone for the present. I had the pleasure of meeting the minister on his trip out West and I am sure from the remarks he made that he is anxious to assist the western farmer; I am bound to give him credit for that intention. I do not know really where agriculture ends—take live stock, for instance—and trade and commerce begins; the two seem to me to be so similar. I want to draw the attention of the minister to one respect in which he can really assist the farmer, and that is in the marketing of cattle. At the present time under existing freight rates and ocean rates conditions are not very favourable to this phase of agriculture. I happen to know the minister has tried to do something to reduce ocean rates but he has not been successful; apparently there is no hope for a reduction of the rates on live stock, and unless some alternative method of marketing is found there is only one thing I can advise the western farmers to do in the cattle business, and that is to quit it. It costs over $60 to ship live cattle from the West to Liverpool. The Department of Agriculture has given us certain figures but they are not quite correct; it gives us carload lots from Lethbridge, Calgary, Winnipeg and such points, but I would inform the committee that the man who ships cattle from North Battleford has to pay a local freight rate to Winnipeg which is higher than the rate he pays from that point to Montreal. The hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. Davies) is here and he can bear me out in the statement that the freight rate from that point to Winnipeg is $1 per hundred pounds whereas from Winnipeg to Montreal it is 85 cents per hundred pounds. I have worked the whole thing out and I find that the freight on a 1,200 pound steer from Saskatchewan to Liverpool comes to $56.91, on a 1,300 pound animal $58.76, and on one of 1,400 pounds, $60.56. Now, when the farmer has fed a steer for three years, to say nothing of feeding the mother before it is born, and then turns that animal over to the transportation companies for three weeks, and he has to split fifty-fifty there is nothing very attractive in the process; that is a business I do not want to engage in. It is hopeless so far as the western farmer is concerned. And let us bear in mind that meat in the Old Country to-day is sold at an abnormally high price which we cannot hope to continue. The minister could therefore help both the western and the eastern farmer by assisting in the development of a chilled meat trade; I would suggest that he take a portion of the $4,000,000 for the purpose of helping to develop a market for chilled meat. It would cost only $22.07 to take an animal over, killed and in the chilled state, as against $56.91, and if the farmer could benefit by that difference of $34 it would be well worth his while. It is true that a number of experiments have been carried on in regard to the shipping of chilled meat and in connection with this matter I have a report from the Harris Abattoir Company. They made shipments and lost money, but in my opinion they did not give the enterprise a real trial; the shipments were very spasmodic, one shipment being made this week, another shipment in three weeks' time and so forth. If the trade in this direction is to be really developed we must ship chilled meat every week of the year so that the butcher on the other side may feel assured of a regular supply on which he can absolutely depend. There is no country except the United States which is in a position to-day to ship real chilled meat to England. The Argentine is three or four weeks distant and shippers there have to send their meat across the equator; to do that they must freeze it, and there is a lot of difference between frozen meat and chilled meat. I hope the committee will excuse a personal reference, but having been in the business I know that the Englishman likes his beef 12 or 14 days old, which is just about the time it takes us to get our beef from this country to the customer in England; we can do it in 14 days. I should like to have the minister's attention if he is interested; if not I will sit down.

Mr. LOW: I am very much interested.

Mr. SALES: At the present time the United Grain Growers are carrying on a pool system of cattle shipment. I would suggest that the government guarantee the men who put their animals into the chilled meat trade the same price they would obtain if they shipped them alive to Liverpool. Nothing more than that as an experiment. On looking over the figures of the Harris Abattoir Company, I find that when they carried on the business steadily the beef was gaining in favour with the English people, but the shipments were allowed to become irregular. In spite of the fact that the company lost a lot of money, I think the committee will be interested to hear what Mr. McLean said about the experiment. These are his words:

> The losses became so heavy that we were forced to discontinue the shipments. However, an analysis of the results gives some ground for optimism. The loss on the shipments was equivalent to about one penny farthing per pound. We were convinced that the chilled beef which we shipped was worth on the British market two pence per pound and probably three pence per pound more than we actually received for it. And we were further convinced that had conditions been such as to permit continuous shipments this Canadian chilled beef would very soon have commanded a price relatively much higher than that received for our experimental shipments.

He also stated, and it is absolutely true, that the British butcher was not selling this as chilled meat at all, but as English meat. It may be necessary for this country to do the same as Argentine and New Zealand,—establish a shop or two over there to sell our product and so let the people of England really know the quality of Canadian beef. I do not think objections should be raised by any member about somebody else paying for the experiment for the benefit of the farmer. As I pointed out to-night, farmers have contributed to the revenue $4,000,000—it does not matter what head the money goes under, it has gone into the treasury—and I think it would be only right and proper, especially to-day when those engaged in the cattle trade are finding themselvs in a deplorable condition, for the government to take action along this line. Surely it is worth something to the country that our farmers should not go out of the cattle business. But, as I said before, unless some relief can be found, unless rates can be brought down—and I very much doubt if they can be—the only relief is in the development of this chilled beef business.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Has the hon. member any figures in regard to the Australian meat shipments to England? Is not theirs chilled meat?

Mr. SALES: I would inform the hon. member that it is impossible to bring chilled beef to England from such a distance as Australia. As I stated earlier in my remarks, Canada is the only country outside the United States which can furnish the British market with real chilled beef—not frozen. It is kept at a temperature of about freezing point for ten or twelve days. It is not frozen, it is merely chilled.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I asked the question because I thought Australia had been sending chilled beef to the British market for twenty years.

Mr. SALES: Frozen meat, sir; a different thing altogether. Frozen meat has to be thawed out, when all the juices are lost, with the result that it is tasteless as compared with the fresh meat that the Englishman likes.

Mr. McMASTER: Does chilled beef keep its flavour?

Mr. SALES: Yes, and it does not require to be thawed out, which makes all the difference in its flavour. I am convinced that the development of this business might possibly prove a solution towards helping our western farmers at this stage.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In connection with the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Sales), there is a good deal of difficulty in supplying the British market, the English people being strongly prejudiced against frozen beef. There is a marked difference between the price of fresh and frozen beef. I have not the exact figures before me, but I looked into the matter some years ago, and at that time there was a range from fourpence to sixpence a pound in the Smithfield market between frozen meat and fresh, as I recollect it. What the hon. gentleman has said about prices is absolutely right, in fact I do not think he has stated the difference to the full extent. Chilled beef, properly looked after, ought to command just as good a price as is paid for freshly killed British beef as soon as its quality is known. In fact it ought to get a slightly higher price, for the reason that in the Old Country meats are conditioned before they are sold—in other words, they are hung for several days, the time depending upon the state of the weather. The Englishman does not like tough beef. Our beef, if treated in the way the hon. gentleman describes, would reach the British butcher in the condition that he best likes his beef—ready for the market. Further than that, it ought to be in just as good condition as his own prime beef after he has been at the pains of hanging it perhaps a fortnight. He is saved all that cost and trouble.

My own idea was that we ought to go into the business, that the government ought to do something in connection with it. I think if the suggestion that we establish proper conditions is given effect to, and it ought to be, we would have such a condition of affairs that the Smithfield butcher would know by Dominion government certificate that the carcass he bought was killed upon such and such a day, that it was then received into a cooling warehouse and submitted to such and such a temperature, then shipped in refrigerator cars at such and such a temperature, then put into cold storage at such and such a temperature and carried across the Atlantic at a similar temperature. Hon. gentlemen may think there is a lot of red tape about this; there is not. Frozen beef is no good in the British market, that is to say, you will lose possibly as much as sixpence a pound, depending upon the amount of beef and the season of the year. Nor again is beef of much use in that market which has not been subjected to a steady temperature and properly looked after, otherwise you get chemical reactions which lay the foundation for ptomaine and other poisons. The business should not be run by guess. In order to make a success of it the English butchers ought to know that they had the stamp of the Dominion of Canada behind the product.

Mr. PELLETIER: If they know their business they will know when they see the beef.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They should have a better guarantee than that, and there is no reason why they should not have it. Nothing more useful could be done to assist agriculture in Canada—and it needs it—than the taking of the necessary steps in connection with the railway services, steamship services and refrigerator services. There is no reason why the Americans should have a monopoly of the sale of chilled meat on the British market. It is the best market we can get and it is a market that will stay with you when you get it. It would not take such a great deal to start it. We already have our government inspectors in the abattoirs, and it would only be necessary to see to it that we had proper services. It is necessary that there should be a continuous supply of that beef on hand. There is no use in trying it as an experiment, in a sporadic way; you have to stick to it. This government understands bookkeeping and should have no trouble in raising money to look after this matter; it really would mean so much to the country as a whole.

I do not know why my hon. friend a little further down the line objected to my remedy in connection with the high freight rates, because I did not mention any remedy. All I did was to express the hope that perhaps the government which was responsible for this situation would do something to alleviate it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The hon. member suggested that the legislation passed by the government last year was the cause.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, we will take that; it is obvious that it was the cause. In fact, it is so obvious that it is not worth our while arguing the point. If it was not the cause, why was it that when the law was abrogated and American bottoms could come in in the ordinary way, prices came down at once? In September rates from Canadian ports were up. Usually they are the same to Buffalo—I will come to my hon. friend's other point in a minute or two—I am now talking about Buffalo deliveries in each case. Ordinarily the Duluth rate to Buffalo is the same as the Fort William rate. In this instance, because the American bottoms would not come in, with the law as it was, the rate was 2½ cents more. In October it got up as high as 6 cents from Fort William to Buffalo as against 3 cents from Duluth to Buffalo. Now, these are the facts, and it is something that never occurred before. As to the other point that my hon. friend is mixing up with this question, there is no doubt that we have a higher rate to the Canadian ports, and I regret it as much as he does. But I regret also that the grain growers of our Canadian West when they wanted to get into Buffalo had to pay 5 cents as against 2½ to 2¾ cents from Duluth in September and as high as 6 cents as against 3 cents in October. But the things have nothing to do with each other; I am afraid my hon. friend was too anxious at the moment to excuse government legislation. He loses sight of the fact that there is a real commercial interest of tremendous size in the West that ought not to be bothered with political considerations. It means something when the farmers of the West, as a result of ill-considered, ill-digested, ill-advised legislation, have to pay 2½ cents more to reach the Buffalo market because their wheat is in Fort William instead of in Duluth. I agree that it would be a splendid thing if we could cut down the rate to the Canadian port, and I hope my hon. friend will do something to assist in getting that done. I agree also that the club which we have in connection with the coastal privileges is a good one, but I believe in using it. Why, there were higher rates not only this year but last year to Canadian ports. As soon as the Crowsnest rates came into effect, up went the lake carriers' rates. In 1912 we had the same condition, and just as soon as those rates went up the club was lifted; the coastal laws were abrogated and the rates came down. There is no trouble about that to-day.

Mr. COOTE: My hon. friend does not mean to say that the law was abrogated, does he?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I mean to say it was suspended. It does not pay this country to be without a lake marine any more than it could be without railways, but it is a good thing for this country to see that their lake marine behave and that if they hold up the business of the country by excessive prices their privileges shall be suspended. That is what was done in that instance.

Mr. COOTE: Why not abrogate it entirely?

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend did that he would have to address all his complaints to Cleveland. He would no longer get any redress, tardy though it might be, from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He would have no say whatever as to the rates on grain carried on the lakes.

Mr. COOTE: Never had any say.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh yes, we had it in 1912. The hon. gentleman's memory is short. But he was not here, so I will not blame him. These are the facts. Now, the question still remains, what does the hon. minister propose to do about that legislation?

Mr. LOW: I will tell you when that item is under discussion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not going to be so unkind as to ask him to attempt to describe all the twisting and the shifting and the dodging that had to be undertaken in order to get the business back on a proper basis. But surely we should have it put on a business basis; that is all I ask. There is a loss in these rates of from two and a half to three millions of dollars.

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend will allow me to correct him I will do so in a word. I have listened to the hon. gentleman discussing these lake rates. He said in his opening remarks that he did not think I had quite understood lake freight rates. I make no pretence of having the mathematical mind of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance, but I shall endeavour to handle the figures in the ordinary way that a business man would.

In 1923 the rates were very slightly higher than for 1922. My hon. friend mentioned the rates from Fort William to some American ports. Let us examine the rates from Fort William to Georgian bay ports, for instance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I never touched that at all, and my hon. friend knows I did not.

Mr. LOW: I quite understand why my hon. friend did not touch those rates; they would not suit his purpose, but I am going to give the House the benefit of the statement of the rates just the same. In the month of September, 1922, the rate from Fort William to Georgian bay ports and Goderich was 3 cents per bushel; in 1923 the rate was 3.54 cents, or about half-a-cent higher. In the month of October, 1922, the rate was 3.88, as against 4.39 in 1923, about half-a-cent higher again. In November, 1922, the rate was 5.65, as against 3.82 in 1923, or almost 2 cents per bushel less in November, 1923, than in the corresponding month of 1922.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was after the act was abrogated.

Mr. LOW: Let us see how it worked during the whole season.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just take it when the act was in effect. What difference does it make how it worked after the act was abrogated? If you want to compare months, compare the months when the act was in effect, in order to get the effect of the act.

Mr. LOW: Let us compare the whole season of 1922 with the whole season of 1923.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What good does that do?

Mr. LOW: That is making a proper comparison of the period when the act was not in effect with the period when it was in operation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh no, it is not.

Mr. LOW: The act was not in operation in 1922

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nor for the most of 1923. The minister abrogated the act in October, 1923, so what is the good of taking rates after that? Compare the rates before he abrogated the act, and the rates the year before, and he will see the rates were far higher.

Mr. LOW: I have already quoted figures to show that they were only very slightly higher during the months to which my hon. friend refers than in the corresponding months of 1922.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They were far higher up to the time the act was abrogated.

Mr. LOW: In September, 1923 there was no change; in October, 1923, there was no change.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No change?

Mr. LOW: No change in September; not until about the 1st of October. Take these very months to which my hon. friend refers. They are only very slightly higher then than they were in the previous year. In August, 1923, the rate to Port Colborne was 3.33, as against the same rate for the year 1922. In September the rate was even lower in 1923 than it was in 1922.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. LOW: November I should have said; was lower; the rate was slightly higher in September 1923—only $\frac{1}{8}$ of a cent. The rate in 1922 was 3.72 as against 3.99 for 1923, a very, very slight difference. In August the rates were exactly the same. In the month of October there was a difference of only one-quarter of a cent. In the month of November the rates were half a cent lower in 1923 than in 1922.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The act was gone then.

Mr. LOW: Taking the whole season of 1922 as against the whole season of 1923, there was a difference of two-thirds of a cent a bushel. To Georgian bay ports there was a difference during the whole season of one-tenth of a cent a bushel.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In September last, were not the Duluth-Buffalo rates from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to $2\frac{3}{4}$ cents a bushel? Does my hon. friend deny that?

Mr. LOW: I have not the American rates before me. I am more interested in the Canadian rates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I can quite understand why he would not have the American rates, where 62 per cent of the whole movement went. I am going to ask my hon. friend another question. Will he deny this fact, and it is a fact, that on September 20th the Fort William-Buffalo rate was 5 cents?

Mr. LOW: During the month of September the rate averaged 4.57 cents.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was going up pretty well. My hon. friend corroborates me pretty well, I think; 4.58 as against $2\frac{1}{2}$ and $2\frac{3}{4}$; that is the only harm, according to my hon. friend, the act did. Will he deny this, that in October the Fort William-Buffalo rate reached $6\frac{1}{2}$ cents?

Mr. LOW: It may have reached that, but the average was 5.24.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are you sure of that?

Mr. LOW: Quite positive.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He will not deny that it reached $6\frac{1}{2}$, but it averaged 5.24 for the month, as against 3 cents Duluth-Buffalo. That is going up pretty well. Does my hon. friend deny the Duluth-Buffalo rate was 3 cents?

Mr. LOW: I have already said that I have not the Duluth-Buffalo rates before me.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is just the loss on the great majority of the movement.

Mr. LOW: If I had those rates before me I might find they were just as inaccurate as the figures my hon. friend has just quoted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The figures I have quoted are not wrong Mr. Chairman. So far my hon. friend has not said one is wrong. What is the use of insinuating that any of them is wrong when he cannot deny one of them? He said a moment ago he could not tell whether the rate had reached 6½ cents for the month; he could only say the average was so and so, and the average was bad enough.

Mr. LOW: I have given you the figures from Canadian ports to Canadian ports.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is to be done about it?

Mr. FORKE: There is one matter I would like to bring to the minister's attention. The total cost of handling 1,000 bushels at Port Colborne is given here as 4.35 cents, and for handling 1,000 bushels at Buffalo 14.70 cents. That is a very great advantage on handling charges in favour of Canadian boats carrying grain to Canadian ports. Has that matter been looked into?

Mr. LOW: No, but the ex-Minister of Finance will be able to answer that.

Mr. FORKE: It shows a very great advantage in favour of the Canadian boats in handling charges. I was surprised at the attempt the minister made to-night to show that there were no high rates for carrying wheat during the fall of 1923. Those who ship early in the season found it a serious matter. They had to pay very high charges at that time. Of course matters were not so bad when the minister made arrangements whereby American boats could carry Canadian grain; but we know from experience what the charges were in the early part of the season.

Mr. LOW: But the facts do not bear out the statement of my hon. friend from West York. The rates were only very slightly higher.

Mr. FORKE: Probably on the average.

Mr. LOW: On the average during the month.

Mr. FORKE: But if you had happened to be one of the early shippers that would not have done you much good.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why did the minister abrogate the act? He had no right to, it was a straight piece of autocracy.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. LOW: He did not abrogate the act. He accepted the interpretation of the chairman of the Canadian Grain Board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The interpretation was that there was no act.

Mr. LOW: My right hon. friend knows that lawyers differ. Because he holds one view is no reason why another member of the bar should not hold an entirely different view.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose not, but no lawyer nor no human being ever held the view that the hon. minister gave. He does not hold it himself. He knows that the act was the most costly blunder and piece of humbug that was ever put through this House. It was not as big a humbug as the Wheat Board but it was just as big a blunder—just a stupid, costly blunder. He as a business man saw that he had to get some way to extricate himself from the hole in which he found himself, and he took this round about way of getting an interpretation. Everybody laughed at it; the minister is laughing at it himself—the putting of an interpretation on a clause in the act. Now, what is the minister going to do? Why does he not come here and repeal the act and tell the House the government made the mistake which they know they did make?

Mr. MILLAR: I believe that what has been said about the act being rather immature and not being sufficiently considered last session is perfectly correct. I believe also that the resistance shown by the vessel owners did cause a raise in rates in the early part of the season; but I think some of the figures that have been given are rather misleading. We all know that in the month of September, when very little grain is passing down the lakes, our Canadian rates are low, lower than later on.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the hon. gentleman know the tonnage moving in September?

Mr. MILLAR: I have not the figures by months, but I can give the average for the year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But the figures by the month are the figures that count. It is something like twenty-four millions.

Mr. MILLAR: The figures for the calendar year and the figures for the crop year are entirely different. One needs to know what set of figures he is comparing. It may be of interest for the purpose of comparison to give the rate for 1915. The average rate from Fort William to Port Colborne in that year was 1.71. The average rate for 1922 was 4.05 and for the calendar year it was 3.81. For the calendar year 1923 the average was 4.24, so that while the rate may have been higher in certain months the variation was not very great.

I may say that while this controversy was going on I sent a wire to the minister suggesting that he intercede with the railways in order to have the all-rail rate from Armstrong to Quebec lowered. I have never been able to understand why the rate from Armstrong, directly north of Fort William, to the city of Quebec, a distance of 960 miles, is 21 cents. That used to be the figure and I believe it is still. Let me point out to the minister that if grain were carried from Armstrong to the city of Quebec at the same rate it is now carried from Calgary to Fort William the figure would be 11 cents. Now, when we have built this railway at enormous expense—with a road bed that is excellent and a grade that is good—and when we have a terminal in the city of Quebec with an elevator capacity of 2,000,000 bushels, that was at this time only partly occupied, why should the railway rate be prohibitive? It would be wise, if such a difficulty occurs again and the shippers are determined and defiant, for the minister to take steps to set aside and suspend the coasting laws. I knew when I sent this wire to the minister the proposition would be only a partial remedy, for the reason that even if the rates on the railway were lowered at once the rolling stock would be lacking; it would not be possible to get sufficient rolling stock to carry any very great quantity of grain down to Quebec.

One thought I should like to express is this: The minister has been severely criticised for interceding with the American and Canadian shippers, and it has been suggested that he practically invited them to break the Canadian law. I do not feel like seriously condemning the minister for that course because grain was coming down from Winnipeg at the rate of a trainload of forty cars every thirty minutes, night and day. You can see what that meant. For that grain to be tied up, even for a week or a month, meant enormous loss. Therefore I would rather approve the course the minister took, even if he had to pocket his dignity for the time being, in order that he might save that enormous loss. I did not at that time, and I do not now, feel like seriously condemning the minister, even if he took this—I will not say undignified course, for it was rather a case of bottling his pride I suppose. It has been spoken of as rather ridiculous by some hon.. members, but considering the enormous amount that was at stake and the financial condition of those who would suffer, those who were growing grain, I was glad the minister took any steps that might be necessary in order to permit the grain to proceed down the lakes. I shall not attempt to discuss this matter very fully because later on when the Welland canal estimates are being considered I shall deal with the question of the freight rates and the reason why Canadian grain passes through American channels to the extent that it does.

Mr. LOW: I do not understand how my hon. friend, from Brandon (Mr. Forke) could interpret my remarks as an attempt to justify the rates in force on the lakes last fall or at any time. I was simply endeavouring to point out to the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) that the rates last fall, or during the shipping season in 1923, were not higher than they were in 1922.

My hon. friend from Saltcoats (Mr. Sales), made some reference to the marketing of grain. I wish to say that there is no subject occupying my mind more than that of trying to work out some plan that will permit the marketing of the grain of the Canadian West at a lower cost than is the case at the present time. My hon. friend has apparently jumped to a conclusion. He made the remark that I had been carrying on negotiations with the ocean vessel owners and had apparently been unable to accomplish anything. I want to inform my hon. friend that it is true I have been carrying on negotiations regarding ocean freight rates on cattle, but before this session is closed I hope to work out some solution that will lessen the cost very materially of carrying the cattle from Canadian ports to English ports.

Mr. FORKE: I would like to say in explanation that I was not exactly blaming the minister; in fact I agree to some extent with the remarks of the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales); but what did vex me last fall was that there seemed to be a trial of strength between the Canadian government and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and something had to be done. I think probably the minister took the proper steps and I would like to see this government and Canada in such a position that no group of shipowners could dictate just exactly what is to take place on the Great Lakes, a result that could be brought about by abrogating the coastal laws.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I was glad to have the assurance of the minister that this question of securing lower transportation for our grain is occupying a good deal of his attention; but still I am not quite satisfied with the way the coastal laws are being handled. I agree that when we have a club it should be used, and if this were used as a club at the proper time, we would not be asking for the repeal of the coastal laws. That is the whole issue at stake. If the government were prepared to use it at the critical time it would be all right. But the reason we object to the very existence of the coastal laws is that it is only at long periods that this weapon is ever used at all. The minister said himself that competition was one of the things that regulated freight rates. We had a very good proof of this in the insurance rates. I think the government felt that the practice of vessel owners handling insurance was wrong, and it was done away with. As a result I see to-day that 6½ cents per hundred dollar value is the rate from the head of the lakes to Buffalo, where formerly it was 30 cents for a hundred dollars. That makes quite a difference. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) thinks that if we repealed the coastal laws we would have no merchant marine left. If one studies the report of the royal commission appointed to inquire into the lake freight rates on grain and insurance, he will find that these Great Lakes shippers are making a great deal of profit. Page 36 of the report deals with the Great Lakes Transportation Company, and the commission makes some rather interesting deductions. The company has shown 11 per cent as the actual return on their investment. Now the deductions of the commission would show that it was actually about 45 per cent.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What company was that?

Mr. CAMPBELL: The Great Lakes Transportation Company. They value one vessel at $525,000, and the commission values it at $125,860.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What is the capacity of the vessel?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I do not think they give the capacity. The Mathews Steamship Company show an accounting of 10.24 per cent and in connection with this company the commission quote a letter that was issued by Mr. Mathews, the manager, on August 20th, 1922, as follows:

> The average annual net earnings derived from operation, after depreciation and taxes for the five years ending January 31, 1922, amounted to almost five times the total interest charges on the bonds now outstanding including the present issue. Preliminary figures for the first half of the year 1922, indicate that the earnings for this year may be considerably in excess of the above proportion.

The commission goes on to report:

> The bond issue was $700,000; the interest on that would be $49,000. Five times that would be $245,000; but in exhibit 277 the company claims that its operations for the year 1922 up to the first of September resulted in a loss of $29 709.61.

It is quite apparent from those figures that their supposed earnings of 10.24 per cent are a long way from being correct; the figures would show they are making very substantial profits, and I think there is very little danger indeed of our losing our Canadian Merchant Marine through the repeal of the coastal laws.

Mr. SPENCER: Can the minister tell me if Mr. George Hill is still the superintendent at Calgary?

Mr. LOW: Mr. George Hill was suspended, but has been reinstated. The matter was investigated. The reason of the suspension was that he wrote a letter to a gentleman in Alberta that I did not think was a proper letter for him to send out. The matter was investigated, and he has been reinstated. I will read a portion of the letter so that the House may have some idea of the reason for his suspension for a time. It was addressed to Mr. M. G. Gudlangson, and reads:

> When my duties call upon me to answer such correspondence as you send me, then I will quit of my own accord. Were I to tell you that my grading was no poorer than Winnipeg, you no doubt will not believe it, nor could you understand if I was to explain. I was raised on a farm and never saw the lights of a city until I was over eighteen years old. I used to accumulate a grouch like yours on the farm, because I had to spend my hours when not at school cleaning out the cowsheds and pigpens.

That letter was forwarded to me by the gentleman who received it. I immediately looked into the matter and found that Mr. Gudlangson had written to Mr. Hill and myself upon the same date. I replied to Mr. Gudlangson's letter. Mr. Gudlangson wrote three letters to Mr. Hill. To the first one Mr. Hill paid no attention. He wrote another letter and Mr. Hill paid no attention to it. When he wrote a third letter Mr. Hill condescended to answer him by the letter I have read. I felt that any man who would write such a letter to any citizen in Alberta or any other province should be suspended at once. I ordered an investigation, and the matter was investigated. The chairman of the Canada Grain Board reported to me and gave reasons why Mr. Hill had answered in such a manner. He stated that he was working under high tension and a nervous strain. I replied to him that many men are working under high tension or high strain but they find opportunities to answer letters in a courteous and civil manner. I was informed that Mr. Hill regretted his action very much; so I told them to give Mr. Hill another trial.

Mr. SPENCER: Out of what vote will the expenses of the Royal Grain Commission be paid?

Mr. LOW: There was a vote last year which has not covered the expenses, and an amount will be placed in the supplementary estimates to provide for it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Are there any grain hospitals at the foot of the lakes?

Mr. LOW: I cannot answer that question.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Has the minister any information as to the amount of grain lost at the foot of the lakes?

Mr. LOW: We have no knowledge of any losses; any losses that occurred would be through private elevators.

Mr. COOTE: I want to correct a statement made by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River a little while ago so that the correction will appear in the same Hansard that reports his remarks. He was quoting the overages of the United Grain Growers in certain years taking the figures from the Price Waterhouse report. The hon. member is very well versed in some things but he has yet something to learn about the grain trade. He gave certain figures purporting to be the number of bushels of overages which this company had in certain years but in looking up the report I find that the amounts he quoted were the proceeds of the overages in those years. So that those who read Hansard may have some other overages to compare with the figures quoted by the hon. member, I want to quote the figures in regard to one other company in the same year, the Empire and Thunder Bay. In 1912 their overages amounted to 160,821; in 1913, 169,622; in 1914, 59,066; in 1915, 236,223; in 1916-17, 309,643. I might further point out that in the five years covered by this report the total overages of the elevators under supervision showed a total receipt of $5,304,367. I would quote more figures but the hour is late. I should also like to say something regarding the coastal shipping law, but I may bring it up under the other vote. I will defer my remarks.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics, including 6th Census, $200,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Surely the minister, having got through a vote of a million dollars does not wish to go further at midnight? How can we stand this day after day?

Mr. LOW: We have wasted considerable time discussing something at present under investigation by a royal commission, and I do want to get one or two items through.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The main item is through.

Mr. FORKE: In regard to the minister's remark, if the House were assured of an opportunity of discussing this question when the report of that commission is submitted, this discussion need not have taken place. But this is the only opportunity we have of taking up the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What can we discuss if we are to keep away from the things that are before royal commissions?

Mr. LOW: The door has been left wide open for the discussion of everything that does not relate to this particular item. All the other items that will be voted at a later date were discussed in connection with this vote and I raised no objection.

Mr. SPENCER: I am sorry the minister thinks we have wasted a lot of valuable time; I think we have made good use of the evening and have secured a good deal of information.

Mr. COOTE: Why has the minister reduced the expenditure under this item? I believe that the expenditure on the Bureau of Statistics is one outlay which can be justified; this is money well spent.

Mr. LOW: The decreases are in the staff and in the completion of the census. A number of machines have been installed that do the work otherwise performed by individuals. There are also about 20 unnecessary publications issued monthly including preliminary bulletins the elimination of which will represent no loss.

Mr. COOTE: You do not contemplate cutting down the service?

Mr. LOW: No. Let me give my hon. friend the benefit of an investigation I made myself. I had a letter from a friend who wished to have a certain person in the department re-classified. On investigation I found that this gentleman had under his charge some 12 employees. I made an examination of the work carried on by that particular branch, and having some little knowledge of what a stenographer or an office hand should be able to do I decided that instead of recommending an increase in the salary of the gentleman in charge of the office there should be immediately dispensed with the services of 5 out of the 12 persons under him. I thought that 7 would be able to carry on the work efficiently and satisfactorily.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will certainly support the minister in any contraction he may make and I hope he will pursue the good work further. I will give him a hint now as to what he might do by association with his colleagues. We made a persistent effort to get all statistical work concentrated in the one service; I thought it was practically complete and successful. I find now that there are statistics branches almost everywhere; I do not know whether new ones have grown up or whether this is a revival of the old ones. For example, there is a statistics branch in the Labour department. What in the world is the need of that? The statistics should all be in one office, and then there could be economy as well as efficiency. Let me give the minister an illustration. I got from a business man just lately a letter in which he refers to some correspondence with the statistics end of the Labour department. This business man had given out certain facts in his own literature, and important and interesting they were. They had reached the Labour department. The Labour department statistics office wrote and asked where these statistics had been secured; they would very much like to have them. He wrote back informing them that he got the figures from the Statistics branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Here was one government department writing to a business man to find out where information was secured that came from another government department just across the road! What is the common sense of maintaining those two offices, especially when one does not know what the other is doing? Had I known this matter was coming up I would have brought the correspondence down it is really laughable. Let the minister have a talk with his absent colleague, the Minister of Labour, to see if he cannot close up the factory there and use one central statistics office.

Mr. LOW: I quite agree with the right hon. leader of the opposition that there are many branches in various departments that might well be combined. But he knows that it is a condition which we inherited—I am not finding any fault with that—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think you have developed it.

Mr. LOW: —but I hope that during the time we are in office we will be able to remedy this condition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is getting worse.

Mr. LOW: I do not think so.

Mr. SHAW: What power or authority can the chief statistician exercise to secure statistics from the various departments?

Mr. LOW: I am sure that would be a very simple matter to work out. The Statistics Act covers the duties of the bureau and additional services may be assigned to it, from time to time.

Mr. SHAW: Has he any authority to demand statistics from the departments? I understand that he has not. I should like to know.

Mr. LOW: Arrangements can be made to provide for co-ordination.

Mr. FORKE: Some time ago I asked for statistics from the Bureau of Statistics, and was told I could only get the information from another department.

Mr. LOW: I suppose there are some instances like that to which my right hon. friend referred.

Mr. FORKE: I have never got the information yet.

Mr. LOW: Well, if you ask our department you will at least receive a reply.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister should not have said that he inherited the condition.

The whole unification from beginning to end took place under the late government; there was no chief statistician before. Now, I do not say that in the Labour department there was not perhaps some relic left.

Mr. LOW: I am sure my right hon. friend is not objecting to the chief statistician?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I am not; he is one of the best officials any government ever had. But I am inclined to the belief that there is growing up a sort of second crop in the various departments, and why in the world there need be, especially in the Labour department, I am at a loss to understand. If there is not power in the chief statistician to get data from the other departments, there certainly should be. I was under the impression that he possessed such power.

Mr. LOW: I quite agree with my right hon. friend that there should not be duplication in the other departments.

Mr. SHAW: I want to direct the attention of the minister—perhaps he has already had the matter under his observation—to the report of the Haldane Commission in Great Britain some three or four years ago with regard to the reconstruction of the ministry, in which the essential and vital importance of statistical work is outlined and a procedure is suggested by which it can be made a really effective and centralized function of government.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Marine and Fisheries—the minister wants to call one item in order to get on to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will not stand for it. I move that the committee rise.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I will not press the item, but I want it called in order to be in a position to proceed Thursday and Friday.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will not permit an item to go in to-night, but so far as I can see now I would not object to the minister proceeding on Thursday and Friday. If I find I have to object, I will let him know in the morning.

Mr. CARDIN: Très bien. That is all right.

Mr. LOW: I move the committee rise.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Thursday).

Thursday, June, 12, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

SALARIES OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) asked if there was additional correspondence between the Civil Service Commission and the Board of Audit in respect to the revision of the civil service salaries. I now beg to lay on the Table a file of correspondence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does it include correspondence with the deputy ministers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

LIQUOR AND NARCOTICS

TREATY WITH THE UNITED STATES FOR SUPPRESSION OF ILLICIT TRAFFIC

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Graham:

That 700 copies in the English language and 500 copies in the French language of the Treaty for the Suppression of Smuggling Operations along the international boundary between the Dominion of Canada and the United States of America, and for kindred purposes, signed at Washington on June 6, 1924, be printed forthwith; and that rule 74 in relation thereto be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

FEDERAL OFFICES, SASKATOON

Mr. EVANS:

1. How many offices are rented by the Dominion government in Saskatoon?
2. What is the amount of rent paid for these offices?
3. Has the government considered the possibility of leasing or constructing a building capable of housing all departmental branches established in Saskatoon?
4. What was, or will be, the saving accomplished by leasing the Southam Building in Calgary?

Hon. Mr. KING (for the Secretary of State):

1. Eleven.
2. $20,839.85.
3. Yes; the matter has been under consideration.
4. The annual saving accomplished by leasing the Southam building at Calgary is $3,720.74. In addition there is the convenience and increased efficiency gained by grouping the federal government offices in one building.

It was also necessary, in any event, to secure more space for the post office, which the ground floor of the Southam building provides.

GRANTS TO SALVATION ARMY

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. What is the total amount of moneys paid to the Salvation Army by the government for the years 1910 to 1923, inclusive?

2. For what purposes was the money granted and by what departments?

Hon. Mr. KING (for the Secretary of State):

Department of External Affairs:

1. The only money paid through the Department of External Affairs to the Salvation Army for the years 1910 to 1923 was $30.88.

2. The purpose for which this money was paid was a gratuity to charity, paid by the Paris Agency office in France.

MR. DUNCAN MARSHALL

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. Is Mr. Duncan Marshall at present being paid salary or an allowance out of the treasury of the Dominion of Canada?

2. If not, what was the date of the termination of such payments?

3. Was there any communication or inquiry by the Auditor General or officials of that department with officials of the Department of Agriculture in regard to the commission or authority under which salary and allowance for expenses was being paid to Mr. Marshall?

4. If so, what were the dates and nature of such correspondence or inquiries?

5. What amount has been paid Mr. Marshall out of the Dominion treasury to date, and when did such payments begin?

[Mr. J. H. King.]

6. What is the date of the passing of the order in council, if any, by which such payments were authorized?

7. Did Mr. Marshall, while in the pay of the Dominion of Canada, make a trip to France? If so, what was the date of the visit?

8. Did Mr. Marshall, while in France, have anything to do either directly or indirectly with the purchase negotiations or inquiry into the purchase of the Hotel Scribe in Paris, by the Canadian National Railway Board?

9. If not, what was the nature of Mr. Marshall's mission to France?

10. Is Mr. Marshall at present employed as an organizer for the Liberal party, or has he been so employed at any time since January 15th, 1922?

11. Did Mr. Marshall, while drawing salary and allowance for expenses from the Dominion treasury attend and deliver an address at a political picnic at the village of Otterville, held under the auspices of the Women's Liberal Club of Tillsonburg, on June 28th, 1922?

12. Did Mr. Marshall, as reported in the press on the authority of the chairman of the said meeting, Mr. W. F. Brown, South Oxford's representative on the Ontario Liberal executive, attend said political assembly by request or order of the Prime Minister, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, or any other member of the government?

13. Did Mr. W. F. Brown, a member of the Reform executive for Ontario, when in Ottawa on or about June the 27th, 1922, arrange with the government, or any members thereof, for Mr. Marshall to attend the political meeting at Otterville referred to?

14. Was Mr. Marshall deputed to inquire into and recommend an appointment to fill the position of postmaster at Otterville, which was vacant at that time?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. No.
2. January 1, 1924.
3. Yes.
4. The correspondence, is as follows:

Office of the Auditor General Canada
Ottawa, September 20th, 1923.

Dear Sir,—I find on examination of the charges made under your Letter of Credit during the past fiscal year, on the vote for the administration of the Agricultural Instruction Act—No. 52—that Mr. Duncan Marshall was paid as Commissioner of Agriculture, $6,000 in monthly instalments of $500 to March 31, 1923.

As you are aware Mr. Marshall's appointment as a Commissioner was authorized by Order in Council—P.C. 223—dated February 7, 1922.

Will you please let me know if a Commission was issued to Mr. Marshall and if such Commission limited the period of his services to any specific date.

Yours truly,

WM. KEARNS,
Asst. Auditor General.

The Deputy Minister, Agriculture Department,
Ottawa.

Department of Agriculture
Ottawa, Sept. 20th, 1923.

Dear Sir,—Replying to your letter of the 20th instant,—I have to advise you that no Commission was issued to Mr. Marshall.

Yours very truly,

A. L. JARVIS,
Acting Deputy Minister.

The Asst. Auditor General,
Ottawa.

5. $19,637.98, February 9, 1922.
6. February 7, 1922.
7. Yes. May 21 to 25, 1923.
8. Nothing whatsoever.
9. Attending the International Congress of Agriculture.
10. From January 15, 1922 until December 31, 1923, Mr. Marshall was not employed as organizer of the Liberal party. Since he severed his connection with the Department of Agriculture, this department has no information on the subject.
11. Mr. Marshall delivered an address on agricultural education at a picnic at Otterville, on or about June 28, 1922, at which meeting, Mr. Marshall states, no political questions were discussed by himself or any other speaker.
12 and 13. Understand Mr. Brown made request on behalf of Otterville Women's Club to have Mr. Marshall address said club. He did so, confining himself, under advice, to agricultural subjects entirely and dealing more particularly with agricultural education.
14. No.

WEMBLEY—FRENCH-CANADIAN EXHIBITORS

Mr. RINFRET:

1. How many French-Canadian business houses are exhibiting at Wembley, and what are their names?
2. Has the Dominion government carried out an efficient propaganda in the province of Quebec in order to induce manufacturers and business houses to take part in this exhibition?
3. If so, what was the nature of this propaganda?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. Four.

Caron Bros. Inc., Montreal, light, water and power plant, jewellery, radio equipment, metal stampings, etc.
Couture, Professor C., Montreal, violins.
Galibert Glove Co., Montreal, hosiery, gloves.
Lamontagne Limited, Montreal, harness, saddlery, wool rugs and automobile accessories.

2. Yes, not only in the province of Quebec but from one end of Canada to the other.

3. A commissioner was appointed to carry on propaganda work. This commissioner paid personal visits to every manufacturing centre and announced through the press in advance the purpose of his visit to each place. The co-operation of all branches of the Manufacturers' Association, the chambers of commerce and boards of trade was also sought, and nothing was left undone which would tend to bring to the notice of manufacturing and business houses the advantages of participating in the British Empire Exhibition.

SALARIES OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the government whether they have not received a communication from the Letter Carriers Federation protesting against the unfair treatment, as they say, accorded them by the Civil Service Commission in recommending that they be granted lower pay than any other of the postal employees. They take the ground that inasmuch as they give the greatest service they ought at least to get equality of treatment with the other branches. I should like to read the letter, Mr. Speaker if it is in order; it is very short. Is it the intention of the government to reconsider the matter and accord the same treatment to these men as to those engaged in other branches of the service?

[Mr. Graham.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government have given this matter a great deal of attention, having had the salaries of the postal employees carefully considered by two bodies. Parliament has imposed on the Civil Service Commission certain obligations and duties with respect to salary revisions, and unless parliament alters the act and places upon some other body the making of such revisions, it will not be possible for the government to go beyond what is permitted by the law as it now stands.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the government not approved the Civil Service Commission schedule?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, the government has approved it.

HIGH COMMISSIONER'S STATUS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. RENE MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I beg to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to an editorial which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of May 29, 1924, as to the standing of the High Commissioner of Canada in London, in the course of which it is stated:

An interview between a high commissioner and a minister of the British government requires a good deal of arrangement, and not infrequently has proved impossible, the high commissioner being politely referred to subordinate officials, and such a thing has been known to happen even to ministers of the Canadian government present in London on various missions.

And further on is the following:

If a Dominion high commissioner has business to transact with a member of the British government, he should have access, by appointment if necessary, to the minister in question, and it is a strange thing indeed if such access is denied. The high commissioner's official status may be relatively low, but he is the highest permanent representative of his government, and as such he should be treated.

I would ask the government if these are true statements of fact, and, if so, is the government seeking a remedy?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): There have been occasions I think, when the high commissioner has found it difficult to obtain interviews with British ministers, but the latest communications I have had from him would indicate that the British government are doing their best to accommodate him in this respect.

The question of the status of the high commissioners is being considered by the British government at the present time. When the former Secretary of State for the Colonies left office he had made certain recommendations with respect to the precedence to be given the high commissioners. Naturally the matter has been referred to his successor, and I understand that the British government are not yet in a position to make an official public announcement as to what will be ultimately arranged, but that they hope to do so in the very near future.

TORONTO VIADUCT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): I would like to direct the attention of the government to a matter of urgent public importance, namely, a despatch from the Canadian Press stating that after an explanation of the agreement between the railways and the city of Toronto the government has decided to go ahead and carry out the contract of the Canadian National Railways to build the Toronto viaduct. Is that correct? Has the minister yet considered the legal report he received from the railway, and is he in a position to declare what will be done? Has he any new information on this subject to give the House?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, there is something new on this subject every minute. The minister has looked over the documents, legal and otherwise, which were referred to a few days ago. The matter is still being considered very carefully, and I think I can say that some progress is being made.

PULPWOOD COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I want to ask the—I guess he will be Acting Minister of Finance in this respect—when this Pulpwood Commission report is to come down? Will it be down in time for action this session, or are they still in Washington or New York?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): No, they are not in Washington or New York. I am just as anxious as my hon. friend is to have the commission conclude their work. My right hon. friend will understand that I would like to get the matter closed up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is a very interesting remark, but it is anything but an answer to my question. The question is, when does the minister expect the report?

Mr. ROBB: I shall again direct the attention of the commission to the desire of my right hon. friend, and, I believe, of parliament and of the government, to have their work concluded.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no expectation at all as to whether it will be down this session or not?

Mr. ROBB: I would not like to make any commitments on that.

PRESS REPORT CORRECTED—MR. GRAHAM

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): It is seldom that I speak on behalf of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), but I feel to-day that it is my duty to make an explanation lest posterity should hold him responsible for a few feeble remarks of mine. I know he will appreciate my solicitude in the matter, and this explanation may prevent one or possibly both of us from entering action against a leading newspaper. I see in the Montreal Gazette, with reference to the Canadian National Advisory Committee on the waterways project, this heading:

Hon. Mr. Meighen explains objects for which committee was formed.

I feel flattered that that heading was put above the remarks I made. It is solely on account of my solicitude for the right hon. leader of the opposition that I hasten to relieve him of the responsibility.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hasten to express my deep gratitude to the minister, and on future occasions when I am in need of like relief I will appeal to him.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 142, to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 173, to amend The Trust Companies Act, 1914.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Specified securities, proviso.

Mr. ROBB: It will be observed that the proviso is underlined. This provision was previously subsection 9 of the section and has been transferred to paragraph (c) of subsection 1 to make clearer its meaning.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the idea of the minister in connection with section 1, in a case like this, for example: The companies are authorized to invest trust funds in such securities as are authorized by the terms of trusts; but supposing you have a trust which is silent as to the character of the investments—that is not uncommon among people who do not understand them—what is the situation then?

Mr. ROBB: They would have to invest in trustees' securities.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What section says that?

Mr. ROBB: Section 63 of the act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that in this act or in the old act? What does the old act say?

Mr. ROBB: Section 63 provides:

(1) The company may invest trust money in,—

(a) the debentures, bonds, stocks or other securities of or guaranteed by the government of the Dominion of Canada; or of or guaranteed by the government of any province of Canada, or of or guaranteed by the government of the United Kingdom, or of any colony or dependency thereof; or of or guaranteed by the government of the United States or of any state thereof; or of any municipal or school corporation in Canada; or guaranteed by any municipal corporation in Canada; or secured by rates or taxes, levied under the authority of the government of any province of Canada on property situated in such province and collectable by the municipalities in which such property is situated; or

(b) first mortgages or hypothecs upon improved freehold real estate in Canada; or

(c) such securities as are authorized by the terms of the trust: Provided, however, that, notwithstanding the terms of any trust, the company shall not invest or lend money deposited with the company in trust for investment, in respect of which the payment of interest or the repayment of principal is guaranteed by the company, in or upon the security of securities other than those authorized by subsections one and three of section sixty-six of this Act.

This latter proviso I have read is the amendment we now propose.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the only amendment? I thought perhaps the first was also an amendment.

Mr. ROBB: That is old.

[Mr. Robb.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So, really all that is new is the proviso. The proviso seems to be a step in the right direction.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend himself had that proviso in the act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought it was the old law, so really there is no change in the law, and this is simply putting the act in more readable shape, is that the idea?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—No loans to directors.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that new?

Mr. ROBB: It is new so far as trust funds are concerned.

Mr. BAXTER: I see by the note that this is an adaptation of the limitation upon funds of insurance and loan companies, but if we are going to do this thing, why not do it well while we are at it? This provides that the company shall not lend trust funds to any of its directors, or to the wife or any child of any of its directors. What an ingenious directorate in necessitous circumstances may easily discover is a father or mother. Very often the speculative period of life is in the younger days, and I can understand some young Napoleon of finance whose father or mother is still living calling him or her in aid as a recipient of the loan. Why not embody the Levitical degrees generally in this, and make it broad enough so that no reasonably near relative of a director shall receive any money? Simply to say wife or child does not go far enough, it seems to me.

Mr. ROBB: There is always a limit when you are imposing restrictions, and we have not heard of any abuse in the direction indicated by my hon. friend. We put in this clause to cure some abuses that have already been discovered. We must draw a line somewhere in imposing restrictions.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Differing provisions repealed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think perhaps we had better know what we are going to cut out.

Mr. ROBB: This is to remove some of the restrictions that are considered unreasonable. The subsection repealed reads as follows:

Any provision in any special act or elsewhere conferring upon any company any other or wider powers of loaning or investment than those conferred by this act is hereby repealed.

Mr. BAXTER: Just what are these restrictions that are being removed? Is the minister satisfied that they have not constituted, after all a bargain between the investors and the company itself? They may be intended as a part of the charter for the protection of those loaning or investing money. They may have desired these restrictions. I am in ignorance and the committee is in ignorance, and I think we ought to have a statement of the character of these restrictions and the companies to which they apply.

Mr. ROBB: There is, for instance, a restriction contained in section 67 of the Companies Act which is made applicable to certain companies by their special acts, and which prohibits the company from loaning any of its funds to any shareholder. It is believed this restriction is unnecessarily severe. My hon. friend will observe that section 3 prohibits a company from investing or lending any of its funds on the security of its own stock, but there does not seem to be any reason for prohibiting loans to shareholders on other satisfactory security.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Superintendent to ascertain expense of administration of act during last preceding fiscal year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not remember discussing this before.

Mr. ROBB: We discussed this on the resolution.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the idea there of arriving at the amount of income for the purpose of rateably charging the companies with the expenses?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the thing will work out this way. It will be an open question until the end of the year how the cost will be distributed. The principle running through the whole thing, I suppose both as to these and the loan companies, will be to apportion the cost to each company in the ratio that their reasonable incomes bear to such cost—is that the idea?

Mr. ROBB: That is right.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Consideration of sale may be shares in stock of purchasing company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was just going to ask the minister whether this follows the usual form or not. Of course, there is not much use in giving the right of sale or amalgamation to these companies unless the stock provision is put in; there is no doubt about that. This or a similar provision ought to be enacted. The usual provision is that the company shall have power "to sell and dispose of the whole or any part of the business, rights and property of the company, for such consideration as the company may think fit—"and then the shares, debentures or securities of any other company, having objects altogether or in part similar to those of the company." I suppose the position is that this clause does exactly the same thing.

Mr. ROBB: It permits the selling company to take shares in the purchasing company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why is the provincial company a trust company within the meaning of the Dominion act? Is there a clause in the Dominion act extending this to provincial companies? That is the only query that suggests itself to me.

Mr. ROBB: We are putting in this provision to make sure. I read from chapter 55:

> Company or trust company incorporated for the purpose of—

The definition does not say whether it is incorporated by the Dominion or by the provincial authorities. The understanding of the department is that it means any company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would it not be clearer if we were to say: "In any sale under the authority of this section of the whole of the business, rights and property of the trust company."

Mr. ROBB: Well, "company" means trust company by the interpretation section.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Supposing we insert the word "trust." Would that cover the whole thing and make it perfectly clear?

Mr. ROBB: We will consent to putting the word "trust" in, it will not do any harm.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All right. It makes the meaning clearer, I think

Mr. BAXTER: I submit there is a constant, persistent, insidious attempt on the part of the departments of government here —and it does not matter what government is in power—to encroach upon provincial rights. I do not believe that this parliament has the slightest authority to pass such legislation in regard to a provincially incorporated trust company doing business in its own province. Nevertheless we are eternally getting into conflict, and going into the courts, to find out whether we can possibly extend our jurisdiction. If the jurisdiction of parliament is to be revised let it be revised by reconsideration of the British North America Act and a new definition of our powers. If the provinces have come to a point where they are willing that that should be done, let them say so; but until that time comes why should we pass legislation that is absolutely futile, and just as misleading as it is futile?

Mr. ROBB: Does not my hon. friend observe that under this legislation we permit a Dominion company to sell out to a provincial company?

Mr. BAXTER: I had not observed that.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, we are making that provision.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. ROBB: There is an amendment to be made. I propose that the word "trust" be placed after the word "any" on the third line.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 174 to amend the Loan Companies Act, 1914.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1, subsection 1—Superintendent to ascertain expense of administration of act during the last preceding fiscal year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the purpose of this bill exactly the same as in the case of the preceding measure?

Mr. ROBB: The same principle is involved.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 2—Differing provisions repealed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I presume the same reasons exist in the case of this bill as in the bill we have just passed?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Baxter.]

On section 3—consideration of sale may be shares in stock of purchasing company.

Mr. ROBB: This is subject to the same changes that were made in the other bill. I propose to make an amendment to this section. In the nineteenth line the word "loan" will be inserted before the word "company". In the twenty-first and twenty second lines the words "which is a loan company within the meaning of this act" are struck out.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INSURANCE ACT, 1917, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 175 to amend the Insurance Act, 1917.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Repeal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think this is a repeal. There is no marginal note to clause 1. In connection with this clause, I observe that clause 1 of the other act is held to be invalid. On what grounds, and in what case? What is the trouble?

Mr. ROBB: Subsection 2 of section 12 reads as follows:

> A company shall be deemed to immigrate into Canada within the meaning of this section if it sends into Canada any document appointing or otherwise appoints any person in Canada as agent for any of the purposes mentioned in subsection 1 of this section.

This is to make an amendment to comply with a decision of the Privy Council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the point in the case where this was held to be invalid? How far have our rights to regulate insurance companies been impugned? Has this to do with the amendment made in the act not so very long ago for the purpose of getting at the mutuals which have agents here? Is the effect of this to relieve them of responsibility? Or how does it come up?

Mr. ROBB: It comes up indirectly. The question was not directly before the Privy Council. It is not the intention to get after the mutuals. That is not the idea.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does it leave them out altogether? What was the ground of the decision? Has the superintendent a memorandum of the decision? What was the name of the case?

Mr. ROBB: The province of Ontario and the Reciprocal Insurers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should not have said "mutuals," I should have said "reciprocals." Does this mean that the large insurers will escape the payment of the trifling tax to which they are now subject?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it entirely struck out as a matter of form?

Mr. ROBB: It is to comply with what the Privy Council said with regard to this particular clause.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What do we lose by this adverse judgment?

Mr. ROBB: Nothing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What class of activities, if any, will now not be subject to the department? How has the point come up concretely?

Mr. ROBB: The view of the department is that reciprocal insurers might organize within the province regardless of the Dominion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: With regard to the Dominion's tax in connection with this, that was not under the act. That was put in by the Finance minister as one of his fiscal proposals.

Mr. ROBB: It does not affect the tax at all.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Valuation of securities in statements deposited by companies.

Mr. ROBB: This is omitting a valuation a couple of months before the end of the year, so as to enable them to get the report ready in time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is merely an enlargement in the discretion of the superintendent?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 1—Superintendent to ascertain expenditure under act during last preceding fiscal year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I assume that is the same as in the other bill.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, it is exactly the same.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Common stock and proviso.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps this is right. The effect of the amendment is to enlarge the powers of investment by defining what class of stock of a no par value may be purchased, limiting them to stocks of no par value that have received a distribution of at least $4 a share per annum, with the further limitations which the section gives?

Mr. ROBB: That is right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it that the only thing that is new in this section is the words:

In the case of stocks of no par value, of at least four dollars per share per annum.

Mr. ROBB: That is right.

Section agreed to.

On section 6 (3)—Other securities authorized by the Treasury Board:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What particular section is that? Is that the section which deals with securities to be deposited with the Treasury Board?

Mr. ROBB: No, it is securities in which companies may invest which the Treasury Board may authorize. The only new part is the underlined portion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does that really take you anywhere? It says:

Unless it can be shown to the satisfaction of the minister that the bonds, stocks or debentures whose acceptance is so authorized are not inferior in status or value to the securities for which they have been substituted.

That on its face deals only with the case of an exchange of securities. It would not cover the case where a fresh investment was made. What is the reason of this particular change?

Mr. ROBB: Subsection (3) of section 60 of the act now provides that the Treasury Board may authorize the acceptance by a company of securities not complying with the requirements of the section in cases in which such securities have been received as a result of a reorganization of the company.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 6 (3A)—certain dividends paid before reorganization to be counted as dividends paid on stocks of reorganized company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the necessity of this change?

Mr. ROBB: It permits the company to invest in the new stock in the case of voluntarily reorganized companies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the whole idea is to continue the period of dividend payments successively during the period of time which is necessary in order to allow the investment to be made? In other words, the change of name and change of status are not to be interfered with?

Mr. ROBB: That is right.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Person or company doing insurance business without a license to be guilty of offence—penalty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the change in this?

Mr. ROBB: This is simply transferring certain penalties from the Criminal Code to the Insurance Act.

Mr. LEWIS: Has this reference to hail insurance companies doing business under a provincial license?

Mr. ROBB: This would not affect them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just looking over this, it does not seem to me that there is any extension of the offences.

Mr. ROBB: No extension.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the idea of making the change?

Mr. ROBB: In that particular privy council case referred to, doubt was cast on some parts of the Criminal Code as it would apply to these companies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It sounds very extraordinary that any doubt would be cast upon the jurisdiction of parliament to legislate in connection with criminal offences.

Mr. ROBB: We are making this clear in the act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If there is one thing we are sure about, it is that we have in this parliament the absolute right to legislate in criminal matters. It is quite true that we cannot make a paper offence for the purpose of obtaining a jurisdiction, but these are real matters. I should think that it was really something connected with the method of procedure, having regard to the particular kind of business, I should not think it had anything to do with our right to legislate in this matter.

Mr. ROBB: The Superintendent of Insurance tells me that in that decision there was an intimation that it would be better to have the penalties in the act.

Mr. BAXTER: Are these sections in the Criminal Code now?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BAXTER: Is the minister having that portion of the Criminal Code repealed, or is it the intention to have the sections word for word in both acts?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think these are in the Criminal Code.

Mr. ROBB: I would imagine that in the consolidation of the statutes this will likely be dropped from the Criminal Code.

Mr. BAXTER: These sections are now in the Criminal Code?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My recollection is that the offences were formerly in our own Insurance Act.

Mr. ROBB: The offences, but not the penalties.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what I am saying—all these offences were in the Insurance Act before, and I think I am also right in saying that these particular offences never appeared in the Criminal Code. I think what happened was that we simply made use of the machinery of the Criminal Code to enforce the penalties for these offences. That is my recollection.

Mr. ROBB: Chapter 26 of the statutes of 1917, section 508C reads:

> Everyone shall be guilty of an indictable offence who, within Canada, except on behalf of or as agent for a company, thereunto duly licensed by the Minister of Finance, or on behalf of or as agent for or as a member of an association of individuals formed upon the plan known as Lloyd's or of an association of persons formed for the purpose of inter-insurance and so licensed, solicits or accepts any insurance risk or issues or delivers any interim receipt or policy of insurance, or grants in consideration of any premium or payment any annuity on a life or lives, or collects or receives any premium for insurance, or carries on any business of insurance, or inspects any risk, or adjusts any loss, or prosecutes or maintains any suit, action or proceeding, or files any claim in insolvency relating to such business, or receives directly or indirectly any remuneration for doing any of the aforesaid acts.

Mr. BAXTER: I think it is fairly well understood that by a decision of the Privy Council insurance is not a part of Trade and Commerce and that the Dominion has no exclusive dominion over insurance. If a company extends its operations into more than one province, the Dominion may then regulate that business. If a company is incorporated by a provincial act and confines its business to that province, or exercises its business by the comity of other provinces, as it may do, the Dominion has no jurisdiction over it whatever. This is one of the most extraordinary offences that I have seen for years—making criminals out of people who are doing what is perfectly lawful.

Mr. ROBB: If I had read further in the section, my hon. friend would have known that it excepts provincial companies. Section 508C states further on:

Provided that nothing in this section contained shall be deemed to prohibit or to affect or to impose any penalty for doing any of the acts in this section described,—

(a) by or on behalf of a company incorporated under the laws of any province of Canada for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance.

Mr. BAXTER: Does the minister not know that is no part of the legislation he proposes? He has a penalty under the Criminal Code for something or another—I have not looked it up, but whatever the offence is, there is a penalty for that—and now he asks for a new law to declare certain things to be crimes and to impose a 4 p.m. penalty in respect of them. The exception in the Criminal Code will not help that. If he gets this remarkable and ridiculous legislation through, then in the case of an insurance company incorporated in the province of Quebec, with its business confined to that province, a man going about the streets of Montreal soliciting insurance for that concern will be a criminal and liable to a penalty not exceeding $100, and if he happens to be an alien, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months. This committee is paying little or no attention to these questions, and if the members want to pass legislation of this character, they may do so. If they think it is enough to adopt anything coming from a minister of the Crown or a department, they may pass such legislation; but I for one, if I am the only one in this Chamber, am going to vote against this legislation as an outrageous and unconsidered act.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend seems to have overlooked the fact that the whole Insurance Act exempts provincial companies, so that that destroys his whole argument.

Mr. BAXTER: The minister cannot exempt them when he passes legislation of this character.

Mr. ROBB: In the Insurance Act "company" is defined to mean only a Dominion company.

Mr. BAXTER: But this says:

Any Canadian company, or any alien, whether a natural person or a foreign company, who, except under a license from the minister granted pursuant to the provisions of this act, within Canada,

(a) solicits or inspects any risk.

You do not want any definition terms for that. This is simply an attempt being made by some interests in Canada to get absolute control of the insurance business in order to centralize it in the larger cities and to prevent smaller companies in the outlying parts of the country from having an existence.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is wrong.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would have been more clear, I think, if we had continued in this draft the same thing that we had in our Criminal Code, which would say in so many words that this would not apply in the case of provincial companies or of agents of provincial companies. But I do find this which, as a matter of fairness, I think I should mention. The term "Canadian company" as a matter of interpretation in the Insurance Act means:

A company incorporated under the laws of Canada for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance, excluding, however, any British or foreign company which becomes incorporated under the provisions of this act by reason merely of obtaining a license from the minister as herein authorized.

"Provincial company" means a company incorporated under the laws of any province of Canada for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance.

"British company" means a company incorporated under the laws of the United Kingdom, and so on.

"Foreign company" means a company incorporated under the laws of any foreign country, and so on

Mr. ROBB: What does "company" mean?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The word "company" itself means:

Any corporation incorporated under the laws of Canada or under the laws of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of any British possession, other than a province of Canada, or of any foreign country, for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance.

Mr. ROBB: That is it.

Mr. BAXTER: Leave the Canadian company out of it, and, so far as the language of section 71 goes, any individual alien who solicits or accepts a risk, even though that be for a provincial company, is liable to a penalty.

Mr. ROBB: I do not think so. This has been passed on by the Justice department.

Mr. BAXTER: That does not settle it for me: I do my own thinking.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Following up what the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) says, what is the use of the word "alien" there at all? That is an extension of the Criminal Code. How is the word to be used there?

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend look at section 11 of the Insurance Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Section 11 reads:

It shall not be lawful for,—
(a) Any Canadian company; or,
(b) Any alien, whether a natural person or a foreign company,

Then the section goes on to state the offence. They cannot:

—within Canada solicit or accept any risk,—

And so on.

Subsection 71 agreed to on division.

On subsection 71A—As to British company or British subject—penalty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does this work out the same way as the other?

Mr. ROBB: Exactly the same.

Subsection 71A agreed to.

On section 9—Conditions of license; certified copy of application and policy to be furnished on request of insured, etc.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there anything new in this?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, (a), (b) and (c) are new.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister kindly state the effect of this new legislation?

Mr. ROBB: Paragraph (a) requires that the company shall give a copy of the application form upon request; (b) requires the company to forward forms for proof of loss immediately on receipt of notice of loss. Paragraph (c) prescribes a form for proof of loss which shall be accepted by the companies in the case of losses occurring under fire policies.

Mr. BAXTER: I suppose I shall be told that the Justice department has passed upon subsection (c) but if I am told that, it will not enhance my respect for the Justice department. We have provisions to prevent the company from taking what is practically a dishonest advantage of an informality; at the same time I doubt whether we should go so far as to say by legislation that if a claimant fills in a form he has made complete proof of loss which the company is not in a position to challenge. It is a most extraordinary thing; however, it seems to be of no use to make comments here on these subjects.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. ROBB: This particular clause was put in on the suggestion of the chief opposition whip.

Mr. BAXTER: Well, the minister has tried the Justice department on me; now he tries the chief opposition whip. Still, he has not increased my respect for this kind of drafting.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the real idea of the section? Is it to make a complete and proper proof of a prima facie case, or is it to say that upon the oath being made the company has to pay whether it is fraud or not?

Mr. ROBB: The policy requires proof of loss. This form will at least establish that there was a loss.

Mr. BAXTER: Then why not say so? I really do not like to discuss the thing any longer, because I feel that it is utterly useless. I am not complaining of the minister, he does not know anything about the act and he is not in a position to discuss criticisms, he simply falls back upon what someone else has handed to him. The obvious intention of the section is that a certain form should be sufficient as a form, but the draftsmanship makes it go further and says: If you fill in the form, that is a sufficient proof of loss. There is quite a difference between prescribing that information of a certain class is all that is required from a claimant, and saying on the other hand that if he fills in a certain form there is no further obligation upon him and that that concludes the case. I do not see why we should be dishonest toward an insurance company any more than that we should bear too hardly upon a claimant.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does the minister really want to do by this clause?

Mr. ROBB: It is provided by the policy furnished by the company that it shall be shown by the insured how the loss occurred, and if caused by fire how the fire originated; that the loss did not occur through any wilful act or neglect; the amount of other insurance; the names of other insurers; all lines and encumbrances on the property insured; the place where the property insured; if movable, was deposited at the time of the fire. That is what the company requires; surely the man who insures has some rights as well as the company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I simply want to find out what we are doing. It is some years since I engaged in that most delightful of all pastimes, the practice of law, but I have a vivid recollection of insurance cases. I have a pretty good idea of what is wanted here. Under the act, in all insurance cases, technical proof of loss must be furnished. Unless proofs of loss are shown to be valid, and unless it can be established that the loss occurred within the four corners of the proofs submitted, there was a nonsuit. At least that used to be the law years ago when I practised, and I imagine it is the law to-day. I suppose really what is intended here is to say that this particular form of proof of loss shall be accepted as a proper discharge of the statutory obligation to give this proof on which the action can be based. I do not suppose it is intended to say that when that is done there is an end of all question.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 9 carry?

Mr. BAXTER: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am going to ask the minister to be kind enough to have the Deputy Minister of Justice look into the wording of this clause before it goes to the Senate.

Mr. ROBB: Very good.

Section agreed to.

On the schedule.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid that whoever drafted this schedule has been out of business longer than I have, because we have an obsolete form in connection with the declaration. I know that in practice in Ontario we have not heard anything about the Canada Evidence Act of 1893 for a very long time.

The CHAIRMAN: Strike out "of 1893." Shall the schedule carry as amended?

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

TRADE AND COMMERCE

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mail Subsidies and Steamship Subventions—Canada and the West Indies and South America, or both, service or services between, $340,666.66.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would ask the minister to let this one item stand for the present. There are several members engaged at the present moment on the Banking committee who, I know, wish to query the minister in connection with the item and to discuss it.

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I would be very glad indeed to oblige the hon. member, but I have been especially asked to bring on this one item first, because some members who would like to discuss it will not be here this evening.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The meeting of the Banking committee was almost inevitable to-day, and I think perhaps the minister could meet the convenience of both those who desire to leave this evening and those who wish to speak on this item. It is just this one item I refer to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why not let these gentlemen speak who desire to, and then hold the item over?

Mr. LOW: Very well. The subsidy of $340,666.66 is the same as in previous years. In 1920 we entered into an agreement with the West Indian government which provided for a service between Canada and the Islands, and a clause was inserted that the government of Canada would use its best endeavours to arrange for a mail, passenger, and freight steamship service to come into effect as soon as possible, and in any case within three years, between Canada, Bermuda, the Leeward Islands, Barbadoes, Trinidad, and British Guiana. In 1921 tenders were called for, and a contract was given to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company. That contract expired in 1923, when another call was made for tenders. There was only one tender received, that of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, at an increased rate, $584,000. We carried on negotiations for some little time and finally agreed to renew the contract for one year at the former subsidy of $340,666.66 odd. During the year we hope to look into the matter and try, if possible, to secure a better service, even supposing we have to pay a slightly increased subsidy. Our trade with the West Indies is increasing very rapidly, and I think this is one service upon which the money would be well spent.

Mr. LOGAN: I desire to take up the time of the House at perhaps a considerable length for this stage of the session, but if my remarks are lengthy, my excuse is the supreme importance of this whole question of our trade with the West Indies.

Under this item I think it is well for us to discuss, as business men, just where we stand with reference to this whole West Indian matter. The average Canadian, I am afraid, thinks of the West Indies—by which I mean that part of America which touches the Caribbean sea; in addition to Demerara, and British Honduras, an area of over 190,000 square miles, with a population of nearly nine millions of people—as countries low in purchasing power, needing and purchasing the necessaries of life in a very limited degree. Indeed, this is not only the idea of Canadians at home, but true of many of those who have visited the islands of the West Indies and who have come back with the story there is no purchasing power there worth while.

In connection with this vote, which is for steamship communication with these islands, I desire to put before this House and the country some figures which I think will impress them with the great importance of this market, and the great purchasing power of these people. Let me say, shortly, that nearly everything they produce we need, and nearly everything they need we produce. I am going to put on Hansard what I have headed, Startling Facts Re West Indian Trade, putting the matter in a sort of tabloid form so that at a glance we can judge something of the importance of the trade and perhaps of some of the mistakes that have been made in the past.

These are the facts which I submit are somewhat startling:

1. The total trade of the United States with the West Indies in 1923 amounted to $814,703,262, while the total trade of Canada with the West Indies, in spite of the fact that many of them are under our flag and have a preference with us, amounted during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1923, to only $54,999,429.

2. The percentage of increase in United States trade in 1923 over 1922 was over 38 per cent; the increase in Canada's trade was less than 8 per cent.

3. Sales by the United States to the West Indies in 1922—and this shows something of the purchasing power of these people,—amounted to $239,535,021, and in the following year, 1923, that had increased to $331,274,785, an increase in the trade of the United States with these countries, in one year, of $91,739,764.

4. Dealing with Canada. The sales by Canada to the West Indies for the year ending March 31, 1922, amounted to $18,784,364. The sales by Canada to the West Indies for the year ending March 31, 1923, amounted to $19,406,333, or an increase in the year of only $621,969, as compared with an increase in the United States sales of $91,739,764.

[Mr. Logan.]

5. Purchases by the United States from the West Indies in 1922 amounted to $350,970,640. Purchases by the United States from the West Indies in 1923 amounted to $483,428,475, or an increase in one year of $132,457,835.

6. Canadian purchases from the West Indies in 1922 amounted to $31,532,461. Canadian purchases from the West Indies in 1923 amounted to $35,592,096, an increase of $4,059,635.

7. Total increase in United States trade, that is imports and exports in 1923 over 1922—and I think this is somewhat startling—was more than $224,000,000. Canada's trade during the same year increased about four and a half millions.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. LOGAN: I would prefer being allowed to place this statement on Hansard before being interrupted. My hon. friend can put his question later.

8. The United States has 70 consular agents in the West Indies and in the countries around the Caribbean Sea, who are really trade agents; Canada has but two trade agents in all that vast territory.

9. Canada lost in operating the government ships, that is the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, in the three years 1921, 1922 and 1923, an average of about $265,000 a year.

Mr. DUFF: In the operation of the ships on that route?

Mr. LOGAN: In the operation of Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships on the West Indian route. I will give some details of this in a moment. Incidentally, we paid to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company the amount which we are asked to vote again to-day, the sum of $340,666.66 a year to compete with the line that was losing already at the rate of $265,000 a year.

10. Canada buys yearly about $100,000,000 worth of tropical products from the United States, many of which are imported by that country from the West Indies. These products from the West Indies are carried to American ports by American vessels, and over American railways, to a point nearest the Canadian consumption, while we pile up deficits on our Government Merchant Marine and on our National Railways. For instance, last year Canada imported over 2,000,000 stems of bananas, and only 23,000 of these came into this country direct. Canada imported from the United States in 1923 over 18,000,000 pounds of grapefruit and only 400,000 pounds came into this country from the West Indies direct.

13. Here is a very startling statement. It has been submitted to me and I have every reason to believe it is quite correct. It would require 56 trains of 40 cars of 40 tons each to transport Canadian imported tropical products from Canadian ports to the points of Canadian consumption. Yet all that business is going over American lines. For instance if these fruits are bought in Winnipeg they come in through the city of New York being transported thereto by American ship, through an American port, through American brokerage firms, put on American railroads, and carried probably to an American railway point within sixty or seventy miles of Winnipeg.

14. Another startling statement is: According to the average rate of exchange of last year Canada lost nearly $2,000,000 in exchange on tropical products purchased from the United States. Why should Canada not use this money which at present is absolutely thrown away as far as this country is concerned in providing cold storage facilities on Canadian ships? Why not employ more trade agents to secure increased trade direct to Canada?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May we take the trade figures the hon. gentleman has given as being the total trade to the West Indies, or do they refer simply to the British West Indies?

Mr. LOGAN: When I commenced my remarks I explained that when I referred to the West Indies I meant all the islands that are washed by the Caribbean Sea and in addition British Honduras and Demerara.

Any true Canadian is bound to ask the question: What is the remedy for this condition of affairs? Why is it that the United States of America enjoy a trade with a country which is almost foreign to them, except Porto Rico, of over $800,000,000, while Canada has but a trade of $54,000,000. What is the remedy? Well, I humbly submit, the first remedy is better steamship service. Mark you, I am not here to say that this vote should not pass. Under the circumstances I think the minister has done the right thing to continue the vote for one year in order that he may be able to look into this matter more thoroughly. But surely, we can devise some better means of carrying on this trade than paying one company $340,000 a year, whilst we are losing on our own service—which is calling at the same ports in the West Indies—the sum of $265,000 annually. Mark you, the pre-requisite for success in transporting tropical fruit is cold storage—everybody knows that. I hold in my hand the agreement between the government and the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company which has been renewed year after year. There is not one single mention made in that contract of cold storage. Yet it is the one thing that is required, the one thing we must have, if we are going to carry tropical fruits for any great distance. I have gone over the contract rather thoroughly, and there are some features of it which seem to be a little weak. If we are going to renew the contract these parts should be strengthened. We do not provide for any speed whatever. Clause 8 reads:

> The contractors bind themselves to run each of the four steamships hereinbefore referred to at their best speed.

That does not amount to very much. I do not know what their best speed would be. It might be 10 knots an hour.

An hon. MEMBER: The treaty calls for 11 knots.

Mr. LOW: There is a speed limit of 10 knots an hour.

Mr. LOGAN: I do not like to dispute with the minister. I would be glad if someone would point out to me the clause where the contract provides for any speed whatever per hour. Let me read the whole clause, and perhaps it will explain the matter. It is headed: "Rates of speed". It reads:

> The contractors bind themselves to run each of the four steamships hereinbefore referred to at their best speed in the performance of the service herein contracted for, unless the speed of the ship is delayed by reason of stress of weather, or by assisting ships in distress, in any of which events the contractors shall submit to the minister the captain's explanation of the cause of the delay or such other evidence as the minister may require to enable him to determine, and the minister upon such explanation and evidence shall determine whether the circumstances were such as justified the captain's reduction of the speed of the voyage or sufficiently explain the delay in completing the voyage.

That is the end of the clause referring to the speed of the ships. But let us pass from these boats of the Royal Mail line. As I have said I am not here to condemn this line. I think they are carrying on under difficulties. They have not the proper provision made for the trade; at the same time they have done some excellent work in developing trade in that part of the world. We have the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, with four steamers running from Halifax to Bermuda, thence on to St. Kitts, Antigua, Barbadoes, and Trinidad, and on down to Demerara. On the other side, on the other leg of the Caribbean sea—that is towards the western islands—we have two ships, the Canadian Fisher and the Canadian Forester.

For some years we dickered with the people of the British West Indies in reference to their trade agreement; and finally in 1920 an agreement was signed. I have in my hand a copy of that agreement, and I have no hesitation in saying—though I am perhaps speaking against what might be the contention of the department of the government—we are violating that agreement every day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LOGAN: And I will show hon. members how. In the first place we undertook, referring to the steamship service of the eastern group, to put on a line of steamers capable of maintaining an ocean speed of 12 knots an hour. I deny that these ships are there, or that they maintain that service. The clause reads:

> The steamers shall be from 5,000 to 6,000 tons gross, capable of maintaining an ocean speed of 12 knots and providing accommodation for 100 first-class, 30 second-class and 100 steerage or deck passengers.

I deny that that accommodation is there, or that it is provided. Dealing with the steamship service for the western group—that is the group around by Jamaica—the contract provides that the steamers > —shall have an ocean-going speed of not less than 10 knots.

I have travelled on one of those boats within the last six months, and I can speak from experience. I was told by a person who knew that we did not average over seven knots an hour on a greater part of the journey. Imagine trying to operate a passenger service in this up-to-date world with steamers not making more than seven knots an hour.

Mr. SHAW: When my hon. friend is speaking about ships, is he referring to the Canadian Merchant Marine line or to the Royal Mail Steam Packet line?

Mr. LOGAN: I am now referring to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. There is another provision in this agreement which I will submit to my hon. friend who has asked the question, who is a good lawyer—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LOGAN: I will commend it to my hon. friend's judgment as to whether he could draft any better clause if he desired to evade responsibility. This clause states the ships shall be provided:

> —so far as the traffic warrants, with cold storage if this can be secured with reasonable cost—

Mark how it is hedged around:

> —as the traffic warrants, and if this can be secured with reasonable cost—

It reminds me very much of the old story they used to tell about the late President Grover Cleveland. When out duck shooting, he ran out of food. In the morning he said to his cook: "What are we going to have for breakfast?" And the cook replied, "If we had some ham we would have ham and eggs, if we had the eggs." No cold storage has been provided up to this date.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is that the agreement between the Canadian government and the West Indies?

Mr. LOGAN: Yes. As a matter of fact, I made a little investigation on my own hook as to what we were carrying north without any cold storage in a climate that would almost roast you. As a matter of fact I was told by one of the officers of the ship that they could put all the cargo they had in a very small room, and yet they had a crew of 60 or 70 men, splendid officers, none better, and all good navigators. But what in the name of Heaven is the use of a ship on the southern sea without cold storage if we are going to transport perishable fruits? I am leading up to show hon. members why dissatisfaction exists in the British West Indies, on account of the way they have been treated by Canada, because under this West Indian agreement these West Indian islands are forced to pay a part of the loss of the operation. It is provided in this agreement that these islands shall pay as follows:

Barbadoes	£5,000
Bermuda	2,000
Trinidad	7,500
British Guiana	7,500
Leeward Islands	2,500
Windward Islands	2,500
The Bahamas	3,000
British Honduras	5,000
Jamaica	5,000

These people say they agreed to pay these amounts when we agreed to provide cold storage. This agreement has been in force for three years. They have been compelled to pay these large amounts and yet there is no cold storage in the service which we are providing.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Could the hon. member tell us if those ships could be equipped with cold storage at any reasonable expense?

Mr. LOGAN: I cannot answer that question and I do not think the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) can answer it; but in my concluding remarks, one of the things which I am going to advocate is that, if we do not know, we should endeavour to find out. If we cannot operate these ships better than we are doing now, let us scrap them or give them away. There is no use in losing $265,000 a year for play-time. I am not here however to advocate that we should do away with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I believe there are some parts of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine which are very valuable, and while I believe the Canadian Government Merchant Marine service between Maritime Canada in the East and Maritime Canada in the West and the West Indies can be of great benefit, the kind of ships we have now are practically useless.

Referring again to the trade agreement, I understand, it was after a lot of dickering, we entered into trade arrangements with different islands. We arranged for certain preferences. Some islands give us a much greater preference than others. For instance, in Bermuda we get only 25 per cent preference and in the Bahamas, only 10 per cent preference. In Barbadoes, on the other hand, we get 50 per cent preference. I advocate to-day that we offer to establish absolute free trade between those countries and Canada. No protectionist can raise the question for a moment that there is any interference with any Canadian industry. There are no manufacturers there to compete with industries in this country. For a few years they have been under a certain degree of prosperity owing to some extent to the McKenna treaties under the British tariff. These McKenna treaties, as we all know, are now to be abrogated, and a psychological moment has arrived when the question is how long the patience of these islands is going to be maintained. I am rather shocked to find in an editorial in a leading paper known as the Canada-West Indian Magazine certain statements in reference to conditions as they exist now, showing the temper of the people. In the May issue of this magazine, I find the following:

> To say that the dropping of preference by the Labour government in Great Britain has created profound disappointment throughout the overseas portion of the Empire is no exaggeration. The fact that the Labour government's policy in this matter would seem to be endorsed by a very large proportion of the electorate, even of those who do not belong to the Labour party, is taken as indicating that for this generation at any rate imperial preference is a dead issue. Undoubtedly this marks a turning point in the history of the Empire. The dominions and colonies are now resigning themselves to the task of working out their own economic destinies without any special co-operation or assistance from the home country, and with the feeling that any preference they may now be giving to goods manufactured in Great Britain is in opposition to the principles of those who benefit by it, and therefore not held to be of any high value either in principle or effect. In the circumstances it is inevitable that the dominions and colonies will look elsewhere for the trade agreements and alliances upon which their economic structure will in future be founded.
> It is pleasing to note that the first reaction to the home government's policy has been for the dominions and colonies to look to each other for such extension of trade agreements as will enable them to develop trade one with another, and thus to build up a British preference in which the only non-reciprocating portion of the Empire will be Great Britain. One instance of this is found in the negotiations now proceeding between Canada and Australia for an agreement which will give Australian commodities a preference in the Canadian market and place Canadian commodities on an equal footing with goods from Great Britain in the Australian market. Then again, there is renewed interest in the reciprocity agreement between Canada and the West Indies, and a disposition both in Canada and in the islands to still further develop the preferential policy.

The Jamaica Gleaner a leading organ of West Indian opinion states among other things:

> There is also the future to think of. If England is again to become a free trade market, if the overseas portions of the Empire are to hope for no preferential treatment in the Mother Country, they will naturally endeavour to find other markets and will withdraw from British goods the preference which those goods enjoy to-day. If the economic tie is severed by a Labour government, it will probably also be severed by the various Colonial governments. That is the situation and it is just as well for us to face it squarely, for when we face it we shall begin to think seriously of what to do in order to ensure a decent economic and industrial future for this country. We have a preferential treaty with Canada to-day, and though no one pretends that it is perfectly satisfactory, it nevertheless represents the beginning of reciprocal trading relations between the Dominion and ourselves. We are not satisfied either with the internal administration of this colony or with the Imperial policy of the Imperial government. We may therefore, have to consider whether it would not be to our interest to develop further the relations existing between us and the Canadian Dominion. If England is to take sugar freely from Cuba, Java, Czecho-Slovakia, or wherever outside of the Empire it may be produced, not caring what becomes of her own tropical sugar industry, our position will be a parlous one unless we can retain on the most favourable possible terms, the Canadian market.

The Port-of-Spain Gazette declares that the ruin of the West Indies apparently means nothing to the Labour government. It also advocates getting in a closer trade union with Canada. That British Guiana is also following the lead of other colonies in resenting the course followed by the British government as regards British preference, is shown by a cablegram to London stating that elective members of the combined court are giving notice of motion to be moved at a meeting to be held during this month to reduce the colonial preference.

That Barbadoes views the action of the Imperial government with dismay is shown by the following cablegram:

> The statement of Phillip Snowden, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the House of Commons, that under the British sugar preference West Indian sugar production had decreased has been repudiated by the Agricultural Society of Barbadoes. The society has passed a resolution stating that the decreased output has been due only to unfavourable seasons and that it views the withdrawal of the preference with great dismay.

I might also refer to a resolution along the same lines introduced in the legislature of Jamaica. These are some of the opinions expressed in the West Indies. I have before me a letter written by a very prominent citizen of Kingston, Jamaica, a friend of mine, whose opinion I value highly. He refers to the feeling in the West Indies, and says:

> The United States may never get these islands politically, but may get them by commercial conquest. I have been a resident of this island for many years, as you know, and I think I know what is going on. It makes my blood boil to see how Canada is missing her opportunity.

And I am here to-day, to ask that Canada take opportunity by the hand, when it is held out by these people. I commend your attention to these words:

> The United States may never get these islands politically, but may get them by commercial conquest.

I have in my hand a letter written to me by Mr. George Huggins, president of the Chamber of Commerce of Trinidad, and also vice-president of the Associated Boards of Trade of the West Indies. It was written from New York the other day after a visit to Ottawa when he waited upon the Prime Minister. He says:

> The interest which is being awakened in the West Indian Islands in the minds of those guiding the destinies of your great Dominion will, I am sure, bear fruit, and I urge you to keep alive the question of the visit of your public men to these islands at an early date, for I am sure that Canada as well as ourselves will benefit thereby.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Have the United States any trade agreement with the islands?

Mr. LOGAN: None whatever except with Porto Rico. Not one of their ships running to those ports is subsidized, but they have seventy live wires in these southern lands securing trade to provide cargoes for those ships, and to develop their trade; while we sit idly by with only two young men trying to look after our interests. The whole thing is ridiculous. We have a young man in Jamaica, but although I believe he is trying to do his best, he is working under most adverse conditions. The trade agent whom we sent down to Trinidad the other day is no doubt trying to do his best, but what can they do among a population of nine millions of people scattered over a number of islands, some of which are so far apart that it takes four or five days to get from one to another. We are simply playing with the situation. The United States have seventy trade agents there. We too should have trade agents in every large centre of the West Indies if we expect to build up trade. The trouble is we are spending money to provide ships, but we are forgetting to provide cargo for them, with the result that our mercantile marine is a very expensive proposition for this country.

As I said a moment ago, I advocate the cancellation of that trade agreement. There are certain to be difficulties of construction with respect to it. Why not open the door and so have Canada with a tropical as well as a temperate and a frigid zone? I think this should be the great ambition of Canadian statesmen to-day, to work along this line and make Canada really independent of the world. We only need these tropical products to place us in that position. But so long as we have to import $100,000,000 worth of tropical fruit through the United States, and lose $2,000,000 in exchange, how can we expect to become a great independent nation under the British flag.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member advocate political union?

Mr. LOGAN: I am very glad my right hon. friend has brought up the question. I went down to the West Indies rather inclined to favour political union; I came back with not an idea of it in my head. It would be absolutely impossible. I never found anybody in the West Indies who would listen to the proposition for a moment. I was always told: You do not understand our conditions, or you would never advocate political union. I do not now believe in political union, but I do believe in commercial union. Of course, I admit that there are two sides to this question: We might be willing for commercial union, while they might not be. That is a matter for future consideration and negotiations.

Let me point out what commercial union has meant to the United States in the acquiring of tropical islands—and this is another startling statement, perhaps the most startling of all.

According to the National City Bank Review the purchases by the United States from Porto Rico, Hawaii and the Phillipine Islands for the twenty-five years preceding possession by the United States amounted to $502,000,000, whereas the purchases from these possessions for the twenty-five years succeeding the acquisition amounted to $3,360,000,000, or an increase of $2,858,000,000. The sales from the United States to these countries during the first mentioned period amounted to $134,000,000, and the sales in the latter twenty-five year period amounted to $2,038,000,000, or an increase of $1,904,000,000, or the total trade increased during the latter over the former period by no less than the sum of $4,762,000,000.

Do you not think that this overseas tropical trade is something worth talking about and worth getting after?

Mr. LEWIS: Are the seventy trade agents from the United States government officials, or engaged by private firms?

Mr. LOGAN: They are really known as consular agents. As a matter of fact, with the usual American ingenuity for getting money out of other people, the salaries of these agents are provided largely by the fees they charge for the various duties they perform.

Mr. LEWIS: Have any of our commercial firms men representing them in those islands?

Mr. LOGAN: You find them only infrequently. I went into that matter on another occasion when I spoke on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

What the West Indian islands produce now is a mere bagatelle to what they are capable of producing, as any one will admit who has travelled over the island of Jamaica and seen how little of it is cultivated. Bananas at present are Jamaica's greatest crop. In 1923 the export of this fruit to the United Kingdom amounted to 2,758,205 stems, to the United States, 9,680,003 stems, to Canada only 1,923 stems, and to other countries 4,562 stems, or a total of 12,444,693 stems. Statistics show that we imported during 1923 through the United States, as I said before, 2,123,910 stems, and from other countries 23,212 stems. Without any question most of our importations from the United States were of Jamaican origin. Then take oranges. In 1923 we imported from the United States $5,583,844 worth, while from Jamaica the value of our imports of this fruit amounted to only $5,299. Imagine only $5,299 as compared with $5,583,844 from the United States. Oranges almost grow wild in that tropical island, and there is no better orange in the world than the Jamaica orange—I doubt if there is any as good. There would not be the slightest trouble in Jamaica supplying the whole Canadian demand. Why, then, should we import oranges from California and Florida of very much inferior quality to those which Jamaica is capable of supplying us? Away back in 1900 Jamaica exported 107,000,000 oranges, of which no less than 104,000,000 went to the United States. Orange growing was a small affair in the United States at that time. Then take grapefruit. From the United States we imported last year 18,203,134 pounds, from Jamaica—and theirs is a wonderful grapefruit—we took only 401,914 pounds, and this in spite of the fact that we give a preference on Jamaica grapefruit. But, as I said before, we lack proper transportation facilities.

The history of the trade in flour has been a very satisfactory one. In 1921 Canada supplied but 25 per cent of Jamaica's flour requirements; in 1923 that had increased to 54 per cent. We sold last year to Jamaica 199,153 barrels of 196 pounds, while the United States sold to them 173,487 barrels. Canadian flour is the favourite in those islands. Canada has always had a good market in Jamaica for dried salt and pickled fish, but she is now feeling keenly the competition of Newfoundland, with which country Jamaica enjoys a favourable trade arrangement.

Within the last few weeks, the Jamaica legislature passed, without division, a resolution advocating that Canada be again approached with a view to securing improved trade arrangements. This, in my opinion, is the proper time to approach her.

Mr. LEWIS: Could the hon. member tell us what the balance of trade is as between Canada and the West Indies?

Mr. LOGAN: I have a statement prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for the fiscal years ending March 31st, 1922, 1923 and 1924. If there is no objection I will hand the statement in so that it may be printed in Hansard, because the figures are rather interesting.

The statement referred to is as follows:

In addition to advocating a commercial union with the West Indies, and shipping and cold storage facilities, I want to ask that we provide certain tariff arrangements to meet the situation. The ordinary man will tell you that it is no use for any one to try to compete with the United Fruit Company of America. It is a very large and well organized institution and provides splendid facilities in connection with the carrying on of their trade. Their hotel accommodation is the very best and their ships are on all seas.

Mr. HUGHES: Where is the hotel accommodation?

Mr. LOGAN: In Jamaica, and, I think, in other places. To add to their already immense fleet they are providing this year two additional ships of 22,000 tons each to carry Jamaica produce northward. No ordinary private corporation can compete with such an organization as that. But there is what we might call a big stick in the hands of the government which cannot be used by any private corporation, that is, the tariff. A duty of about 50 cents a stem on bananas coming into this country from the United States, with free entry from the British West Indies, would provide cargoes for the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. If that was done you would find the United Fruit Company itself running ships into St. John, Halifax and Montreal in order to secure Canadian trade That is the one power that a government has that no corporation can have; and what possible harm can it do? There is no question of protection involved, because you could not grow bananas in this country, even in the Niagara belt, to say nothing of the colder sections. It is merely a question of the diversion of trade through our Canadian ports. I am confident it would also mean a lower price to the Canadian consumer because of the fact that large brokerage commissions charged in the United States would be done away with. If these tropical products could come into our country direct it would mean a great deal to our national ports; it would mean a great deal to our National Railways—and they certainly need it. To-day we have on the old Intercolonial Railway many crews lying idle—nothing to do—while over 2,000,000 bunches of bananas are being transported over American railways to different parts of Canada. Should this continue? Is our sense of national independence such that we can allow it to continue? Apparently bananas are a necessity; we must have them; why not get them direct from a country which in other ways is associated with us, and have them transported in our own steamers and over our own railways?

Mr. DUFF: What is the present duty on bananas?

Mr. LOGAN: There is no duty on bananas now. I am advocating that a duty should be placed on bananas and other fruits coming to Canada through the United States, but that they should enter free from the West Indies.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If we had our own cold storage facilities on our own ships would there be any necessity of a duty on fruit coming through the United States?

Mr. LOGAN: Yes, there would be, on account of the tremendous strength of the United Fruit Company, which has its organization under other names in Canada—in Montreal, and all over the country. A few years ago I am informed an effort was made to ship bananas direct from the West Indies to Canada. A large sum was invested and finally a cargo reached Montreal and the bananas were offered at a price a little less than the United Fruit Company had been charging. I am told the United Fruit Company the day before the arrival of the cargo cut the price of bananas so low that this concern was almost put in bankruptcy owing to the depreciation in price and the consequent loss of their cargo. I mention it only to show the strength of this company and to point out that if we had a tariff applying against the bringing of these goods in from the United States even the United Fruit Company would be forced to come to Canadian ports.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would not a government or co-operative exchange managed in close connection with our own Canadian Government Merchant Marine and our own National Railways effect the purpose?

Mr. LOGAN: No, I do not think it could possibly be effective.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Does my hon. friend think that that 50 cent duty he is advocating would find its way to the consumer, having regard to the usual pyramiding that takes place?

Mr. LOGAN: In the case of bananas landed in New York there is a first charge for the New York broker, a second charge for the Canadian broker, and a third charge for the Canadian jobber and retailer, and finally the fruit gets to the consumer. Would it not be better for it to come direct to Halifax, St. John and Montreal, and in that way skip at least one broker, and have that much less pyramiding.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Why not skip them all?

Mr. LOGAN: That is a question a little broader than the one I am discussing this afternoon.

Mr. DUFF: Products from the West Indies should be landed in Montreal by steamer as cheaply as at New York.

Mr. LOGAN: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: Then why do you want a duty of 50 cents per stem on bananas?

Mr. LOGAN: Because the organization at the present time is in the United States, and the United Fruit Company insist on bringing bananas and other fruits into American ports and over American railways.

There is another matter I would like to advocate. Our boats of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine at the present time call at very few ports. For instance, they pass by the great island Haiti and San Domingo, and by the island of Cuba, in which there is a tremendous trade. My suggestion is that in maintaining this service they should call at more places and maintain a quicker and better service. We send our ships and trade agents to the very Antipodes to create and foster trade. Why not pay a little more attention to developing our trade with these islands in the Caribbean Sea? I have in my hand a letter written by the manager of one of the leading banks in Kingston, Jamaica, in which he says:

> It seems to me that if the Dominion imposed a duty of say 50 cents per bunch on foreign bananas and bananas not entering through the ports of the Dominion, the whole or greater portion of this trade could be diverted not only from foreign vessels which transport it to foreign (United States) ports, but also to Canadian railways which now only get the shorter haul, the United States railways getting the long haul, and Canada could make out a strong case (if she did this) to increase the preference on her flour, which Jamaica now grants, from 1/— to 2/— per barrel, the effect of which undoubtedly would be to secure Canada an even greater share of the flour business of Jamaica, and it seems to me, it is very necessary for Canada to increase her sale of wheat or wheat products in countries such as Jamaica, where not only does she enjoy a preference, but where the natural conditions are such that it is not producible; especially as the United States in recent years put a tariff of 30 cents per bushel on Canadian wheat, and more recently, I think, increasing to 50 cents, so that if some such plan could be worked out in its entirety it would benefit in many ways, to summarize as follows:—
> (a) Extra (banana) freight for the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine northbound.
> (b) Extra (flour) freight for the ships southbound.
> (c) Extra rail haulage for the Canadian railways.
> (d) Increased markets for the most important Canadian commodity which the United States are doing all they can to exclude from their market.

In conclusion, I beg to submit, in addition to the other suggestions I have made, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Railways, with representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, if you like, of farmers' and producers' associations, as well as newspaper men, should visit the West Indies at the earliest possible date, and if possible go to Brazil and Argentina as well, and become acquainted not only with the actual trade conditions and possibilities, but meet the people. It is particularly important at this crucial time in the history of the Empire that such a vist should be paid, particularly to the British West Indies, to meet our brother Britishers, hold out to them the hand of the Big Brother, and offer our assistance in developing the wonderful resources of their sun-kissed islands, where Nature dwells in her greatest fertility. From our standpoint, we need closer trade with them. The United States has under her flag Florida, the Philipine Islands, Porto Rico and Hawaii to make them independent of the world. We have under our flag Jamaica, Trinidad, Barbadoes, and the other British West Indies, with which we should at least join in the wedlock of trade. They are not only our last Tropics, but our only Tropics. This may be the last time of calling.

We must open the trade door not only for their sake but for our consumers as well. It should materially lessen the cost of tropical fruits to the people of Canada. We must provide cold storage and faster boats. We must provide better passenger accommodation. We must provide regularity of steamship service, and we should make such changes in our tariff as will bind us permanently together under the same flag,

We can afford to be generous. Quibbling over trade agreements and arguments pro and con as to whether or not we are carrying out the terms of the 1920 agreements, are having an ill effect. I am afraid we are grasping at the shadow and losing the substance. There is no question in my mind but that if matters remain as at present, the agreement will not be renewed. Let us go to them. As an instance of what can be done by personal contact, let me refer to the recent treaty made between Jamaica and Newfoundland. The Jamaican preferential tariff, which gave effect to the Canada-West Indian Trade Agreement, came into effect in April, 1922. The Jamaican tariff contains a clause stating the Colonial Legislature might, at any time, by passing a resolution, extend the preference to any part of the Empire. The Newfoundland government did not wait for Jamaica to knock at her door, but sent Sir W. F. Coaker to Jamaica to meet the legislators and business men of that island. As a result, Jamaica has extended recently to Newfoundland, the same measure of preference which is granted to Canada. The resolution, when introduced in the legislature, was passed within a very few minutes without division, although Newfoundland purchases very little of Jamaica's products but sells to Jamaica, dried and salted fish, of which Jamaicans consumed last year over 13,000,000 pounds. If Newfoundland can succeed in securing such a trade arrangement with Jamaica when she has practically nothing to give in return, surely Canada, which at present takes most of Jamaica's coffee and sugar should be able to make a satisfactory trade arrangement.

The psychological moment is here. Dissatisfaction exists in these islands. They need our assistance and we need theirs. If we desire to be a self-contained country, if we desire to look to the future with confidence that we can at all times be independent of the rest of the world, let us proceed to the best of our ability to secure a lasting trade agreement with these British brothers of ours to the south. No better use could be made of one of our Canadian Government Merchant Marine boats than to convey the ministers to these islands to meet the people there in their homes, and discuss with them these great problems, with a view to helping them and helping us to bind still closer the outlying portions of this great Empire.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think this House and the entire country are under a debt of gratitude to my hon. friend from Cumberland for bringing this matter before us in such an instructive and, I might say, so eloquent a manner. He has visited the West Indies and coupled a search for health with a search for information, and we are glad indeed that his search has been successful in both respects. We have had several conversations on this question, and I have found that my hon. friend is saturated with information that he obtained on his visit to the West Indies. In discussing this question we must bear in mind that we are not going so far afield, we are not going to strangers, we are discussing family matters so far as the British Empire is concerned. And discussing questions, with which both the West Indies and Canada have dealt on different occasions, it must be said the conditions changed so materially in trade and in the attitude of people, that I think it is very useful we should at this time ponder seriously on what the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) has said. The situation in the British Empire, in fact all over the world is peculiar just now, and every nation is looking about for the best avenues of trade both export and import. Now, if it be possible to improve conditions between two portions of the Empire, that is just as serviceable, just as useful, and just as patriotic as improving our relations with the Motherland. At the Economic conference in London the outlying dominions took very strong grounds on this point; that while we have been endeavouring, to our own advantage of course, to improve our trade relations with the Mother Country, we have, perhaps, overlooked in a measure the advantages that might be gained by improving the relations between each other. The question of better trade relations with Australia has been before the government for some time, and we hope that some result will follow those considerations and negotiations. Here we have, as the hon. member has pointed out, the very adjunct in the matter of products that Canada does not possess—that is tropical fruit. There is another gentleman whose name I should like to mention at the present juncture who has done a good deal to arouse interest in the West Indies toward better trade with Canada. I refer to Mr. J. Gill Gardner, Brockville, who is the head of a large milk condensery. He made a trip of pleasure to the West Indies, accompanied by his family, I think two or three years ago, and while there decided, like my hon. friend from Cumberland, that he would mix some business with pleasure. The result is that he has established a trade with the West Indies in condensed milk which amounts to half a million dollars a year. I shall read to the House in order to emphasize the possibilities which exists, a memorandum from Mr. Gardner, who happened to be in the building a few moments ago. It will show the importance of this matter being considered very seriously at the present time. Here is the memorandum in question:

> With reference to my former communications re Canada-Jamaica service, let me advise that we to-day received instructions by cable to ship at the rate of 100 tons (one hundred) per month to Cuba (port of Havana). There are no Canadian boats now running to Havana, which necessitates shipping via New York.

So that one of our live wires in business in Canada substantiates everything the member for Cumberland has said.

I may say that at the conference already referred to, the Prime Minister and myself met the representatives from the West Indies on several occasions. We also met the general manager of the Royal Mail Steam Packet line. I think it is not giving away any confidence to say that our fellow British subjects of the West Indies believe they are not getting the ocean service that was contemplated when the agreement was made in 1920. The question of a renewal of the subsidy to the Royal Mail Packet line was discussed quite freely with them, but one of the difficulties that arose was this: The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company desired to have a much larger subsidy than the one mentioned in the estimates of my hon. colleague to-day, and after full consideration of what ought to be done in the improvement of this service I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce did a wise thing in not encouraging the Royal Mail Packet line at this time to build new steamships in the hope or promise of an increased subsidy, but to give them a year's extension of the old contract in order that the Canadian government and parliament might have a chance to consider what was the best thing to do under the circumstances.

Now, we can do an immensely increased trade. I hope the Maritime province members will not think me unduly officious if I refer to the situation in this way: There is no question but that our eastern friends are far removed from the central markets of Canada. When they came into confederation they gave up markets closer at hand. Now they have long rail hauls, and under the cost of operation of railways now—which does not seem to be growing less—they are compelled to pay heavy freight rates on those long hauls. If the hauls were shorter the heavy rates might not be so burdensome. But with the long hauls, and comparatively little local freight to help to ameliorate the existing conditions, the Maritime provinces are not in the best state to reach by land transportation the markets in the central part of Canada. On the other hand, they have all the year round ocean transportation which is the cheapest in the world. They have at comparatively close quarters the West Indies and it is my personal opinion, with which some of them will perhaps agree, that the great development for the Maritime provinces for the moment rests not so much in long rail hauls to the central part of Canada but in the extension of trade with the West Indies which can be taken advantage of by water. Surely if that trade can be developed it will be to the advantage not only of the West Indies but of the Maritime provinces, and that means the advantage of the Dominion as a whole.

I should like, if I may be allowed, to refer again to the Economic conference and matters connected with it. When there, as I said a moment ago, the Prime Minister and myself had an interview with the West India people. I have outlined what their views were concerning the somewhat imperfect service that is being given under the agreement. Now, we cannot hope to even hold the trade we have for that service because the West India people are getting very anxious for a further expansion of trade and I may say this: Gentlemen who have visited the West Indies and with whom I have come in contact, informed me that the people of those islands are in the proper frame of mind now to give Canada all the benefits of a preferential tariff, or any other arrangement that can be arrived at, in order to superinduce trade with them. This is the time to endeavour to do something. Speaking of the conference we had with several gentlemen, I may say that Mr. Phillips, the manager of the Canadian National Railways in London, came to us and presented a request which is somewhat prophetic, in view of what my hon. friend has said to-day, and gave very good reasons for it. It was that the government should consider seriously, in connection with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, the putting of ships on that line that could compete with other vessels or take charge of the trade between the West Indies and Canada both in the matter of passengers and products in cold storage. At the present time we practically have accommodation for neither on the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. True we have accommodation for comparatively few passengers. Hon. gentlemen who have travelled to the West Indies and back assure me that the accommodation is everything that could be desired, so far as accommodation could be provided on ships of that size. But in the first place they are too slow. Business moves rapidly these days. Business men cannot afford to spend weeks when days ought to suffice, on either pleasure or business trips.

As to cold storage; to provide the proper cold storage on these ships would necessitate quite a large expenditure of money, and I am not sure that parliament would be satisfied to spend very much money in order to add cold storage to the present ships, if they were not sure that that facility was going to be efficacious and provide the accommodation required. Take the request of the Royal Mail Packet line from a purely business standpoint; that company asks for an increased subsidy for the term of 10 years. Speaking roughly that amount paid to the Royal Mail Steam Packet line in the next 10 years will pay for their steamers.

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. LOGAN: Five million dollars.

Mr. GRAHAM: It would pay for four steamers. I think the period is ten years.

Mr. LOGAN: Five hundred thousand dollars for ten years would be five million dollars.

Mr. GRAHAM: I still maintain that approximately it would build their ships. When we have a Canadian National Railway, then of course we have it. We need not argue as to how we got it; we have it and we want to do the best we can with it. It is of the utmost importance that every bit of trade the Canadian government is encouraging so far as possible, in a legitimate scheme, of course, should be handled by the Canadian National Railways, everything being equal. I discussed that point with the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, and they hesitated, but said they always worked with the Canadian National Railways. But hon. gentlemen know there is working and working. I am inclined to think that if we determine to maintain a steamship line of our own, we could build the ship without it costing us a cent more than if we granted an enlarged subsidy to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company.

Mr. DUFF: Sell the ships you have and buy new ones.

Mr. GRAHAM: I want to finish that sentence. I say it would not cost a cent more than it would to pay the subsidy. My hon. friend says that we should sell the old ships and build new ones. I say, "Carried; get me the purchaser." We can perhaps convert some of our ships that are of lesser use into a fund that would assist us to buy the new ones. But what I have in mind is this: If we are going to stay in the business, we have to stay in it properly. We have running to the West Indies the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Royal Mail Steam Packet line and ourselves, and we are paying the Royal Mail Steam Packet line to compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway and ourselves. That is not business. No private individual would run his affairs that way. We want to submit the proposition which the government has in its mind to the House to think over. We are of the opinion that the development of trade with the West Indies is good for Canada, good for the Empire, and good for the West Indies, and particularly good for the Maritime provinces if we can develop it.

Mr. LOGAN: And British Columbia.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a maritime province. I mean the provinces on both seas. If that be true we believe further that there is a possibility at this present moment which perhaps never existed before of developing trade and laying the foundation for future trade for years with the British West Indies. It has been stated that the British West Indies would like to become part of Canada. At the present time I would like them to become a great part of the trade of Canada, and these things often lead to further developments. The governments proposed during the recess to make a full investigation either by their ministers or some person else, or their ministers and some person else combined, of all the possibilities of trade with the West Indies. Conditions have changed since the arrangement of 1920 was made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are the names of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine boats running to the West Indies?

Mr. DUFF: There are six of them.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will get the names. We believe there are possibilities of great development in the West Indies, and that now is the time to begin the realization of these possibilities. Canada, from a sentimental and national standpoint, is entitled to the trade of the West Indies, rather than that we should let the United States have it. We propose during the recess to make full investigation from a business standpoint, to endeavour to meet with the West Indian people as far as possible, and discuss with them what they think would be the best means for mutual trade improvements. If it be necessary to negotiate a new agreement there is nothing in the way, if the two of us desire to make such an arrangement, and I am inclined to think that some better provisions might be embodied in a new agreement. In the meantime we ask parliament to think seriously about what its attitude would be with all these facts in mind, in case the investigation proves what I believe it will prove, that there is a vast field for an improved trade between these two parts of the British Empire. We would ask parliament to think over the suggestion of Canada having its own ships to connect with the Canadian National Railways, improve that trade in Canada and stop altogether the payment of subsidies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have listened with intense interest, for the most part with approval, to all that has been said by both speakers of the afternoon. The significance of the speech just made by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) will I think be apparent to all members of both parts of this House, but I wish to compliment the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), who has brought the fervour of a crusader into union with the hard head of the business man and has presented his case with very great force and eloquence. I do not wish to enter before six o'clock into any extended comment on either speech. These speeches consist of criticism in some degree of our past relations with the West Indies, and especially as to the manner in which we have carried out the trade agreement now subsisting, and as well of suggestions as to future means of intercourse and future regulations looking to an expansion of our trade. Let me express a feeling of regret that the speech of the minister should be open to the interpretation that a great blunder was made in the style of ship constructed for the merchant marine. The minister was not fair enough to go back and view the circumstances of construction and the purposes for which the ships were built. I am not able at the moment to discuss the exact knottage per hour, the tonnage, or the cold storage and passenger facilities of the special boats running to the West Indies. Suffice it to say that all are well constructed of the kind they are, all are constructed of the design felt by our best experts to be suited for the purposes that they were then built to meet.

But I do listen with very considerable interest to the conversion to the view that now that we have National Railways, we must have a mercantile marine. It is not without some considerable consolation to me that I hear those who once reprehended viciously the building of any ships at all now reducing their allegation merely to the question of the character of ships built. All this is a step in the right direction, to use the expression of hon. gentlemen to my left. When we hear those who once said that as soon as the war was over we should have ceased building any vessels, we should have cancelled all contracts made, we should have gone out of a business in which we could not succeed, now saying that we must prepare our minds for the extension of the principle; that we must face the building of more ships of a faster and better kind, that is at least a reflection on much of the criticism that we heard during the last few years.

I am in accord with the general peer into the future which the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) presented this afternoon. I am not going to say that we have vessels that will altogether meet the needs of the future. I would be very much surprised if we had. But when we have the responsibility of a 22,000 mile system of railways, we must have as a concomitant a mercantile marine, and when the time comes that we must get rid of the one, we had better prepare the way to get rid of the other too. The two must work together.

I would be sorry, indeed, if any portion of the agreement made in 1920 or any phase of it has not been implemented wholly and generously. We certainly owe it to the people of the West Indies to carry out to the full our contract. I never had heard before that the vessels allocated to that route were not vessels that lived up to the requirements which the agreement designated. Certainly, we should have vessels that live up to those requirements. My recollection was that the definitions of the agreement as to the number of knots per hour, the requirements of the vessels and the designs, were met inasmuch as the vessels applied to the route had what is called—I do not know just how this is expressed—a speed known in mercantile registers which is what is in mind in the agreement itself, and while it may be that the rate is not always that, nevertheless the capacity is there and that is the intent of the original agreement.

Mr. LOGAN: The right hon. gentleman is speaking about carrying out the agreement. In the agreement we provide for a fortnightly service to Jamaica and to Belize. I call his attention to the fact that in the report of Sir Henry Thornton, submitted the other day and incorporated in the speech of the Minister of Railways and Canals, in reference to the operation of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine last year, a service is referred to as a three-weekly service, although the agreement calls for a fortnightly service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If such are the facts there is no excuse for their continuing at all. I cannot understand how the government could permit this country to be in default to the West Indies. We should live up to our agreement, no matter what it costs us. If we do not, we cannot expect to enter under very favourable auspices into another trade arrangement. They will not feel like depending upon us if their past experience shows that that dependence is false. I shall have something further to add after eight o'clock.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. LOW: May I just remind my right hon. friend that we were in default during the time that he was leader of the government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sorry if the only thing this government copies from us is our default.

Mr. GRAHAM: They could not possibly do it all.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, I had merely made some brief references to the significance of the address of the Minister of Railways, and I think its significance would fall even more heavily on the ears, for example, of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff); I might name many more hon. gentlemen who would receive quite a deal of enlightenment by what was foreshadowed in that speech; in fact the cup of experience of my hon. friends opposite must be getting pretty nearly full when they now must look forward to a proposal from this government for an enlargement of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. However, any proposal of that kind will receive fair consideration at our hands. We do not believe in extensions beyond what is required for such purposes as essentially must be served while the responsibility of railway management is upon us.

The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) proceeded to press not only for better ocean services to the West Indies but also for more effective trade regulations looking to the extension of trade with our fellow Britishers of the West Indies, and also—and this was more immediately in his mind—looking to the diversion of such trade as we have through the port of New York and over American railways to our own ports and over our own roads. I think all members will gladly get behind any proposals effective to that end. But I notice that some hon. members almost shudder when a suggestion is made, especially if it comes from across the way, that the trade regulation which would be effective in order to turn West Indian trade to our own ports, and at the same time tend to develop that trade by giving it an advantage over other trade that is not nearly so beneficial to us, would be by the imposition of tariff duties against that other trade.

Tariff regulations are like any other regulations: They can be used for more purposes than one. They can be used to provide production at home. They can be used as well to turn the direction of trade and they are just as legitimate for one purpose as for the other. All that should be before parliament is to decide whether they are effective for this purpose; whether the price is too great or is only such as is adequate for the return we expect. There are of course, some, unfortunately, who for one cause or another are ready to accept anything other than regulations by tariff. Well, for them I am afraid we cannot get the best results by any other means in the present instance.

I do not know whether a better trade agreement can be made than that which was effected in 1920. Personally I was not intimately connected with the negotiations; they were in the hands of other ministers. But as the Minister of Railways said, if anything better can be done there is nothing in the world in our way. There is nobody else concerned; nobody else has the right to interpose. It is between the West India islands and ourselves, and certainly we will all wish success to this government in any effort to improve the treaty that now obtains. For myself I think this country will be ready to go a very good length to achieve closer trade relations with any part of the British Empire, especially if those can be secured coupled with an advantage in their markets to ourselves. Then the benefit will be apparent; certainly it would be worth away above anything we would pay in the way of an imposition on these luxurious fruits coming from the United States. Yes, the tariff is effective both for home production and for the diversion of trade over home routes. They who object to it for the one end must logically, I fear, object to it for the other as well; for myself I am prepared to support it for both.

Mr. McBRIDE: During the last session I made a statement on the floor of this House that in my opinion the marine architects who drew the plans of the merchant marine did it without any practical experience in connection with freight boats. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) makes the statement this afternoon that these architects were the best that could be got. I would like him to explain this: The Canadian Cruiser, a steamer capable of carrying 10,500 tons; crew, 39; fuel consumption, 31 tons per twenty-four hours; the Canadian Ranger, 5,100 tons; crew, 39; fuel consumption, 31 tons per twenty-four hours. One boat carries more than twice as much as the other with the same fuel consumption and the same crew. I would like this explanation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I did not know the hon. gentleman had so high an opinion of me that he considered me an expert in all fields. Very humbly I must decline the honour. I was born some two thousand miles from the water and I did not get a good start in the education of a naval architect. I presume there is some purpose in the different design for the two vessels; in fact, I know there is. What I take comfort out of now is this: That the foes of the merchant marine have seen fit to change their tack. It was not the design of the ships, it was not the fuel consumption, it was not the speed, it was not the want of cold storage, it was not the limit of passenger capacity—these were not the things that were the main objects of attack; indeed, I cannot recall that they were objects of attack at all when the programme was under way, when the full facts and particulars and details as to the ships were before parliament. No, the great blunder then was the building of any ships except for the purposes of the war. We did not need them; a terrible blunder was being made; the country was being loaded with debt—this was the tack pursued as soon as they knew the ships had to be completed. Up to that time the tack pursued was to support the whole programme, but after the programme was so far on that it had to be completed, then of course there was a reversal. Now there is a second reversal, and I must admit I am not prepared to meet this one. I will likely have to take a little time to get some reports on the vessels. May I say that I have never heard a charge of anything faulty in either the design or the workmanship of the vessels. While other countries have suffered grievously in their merchant marine construction because of both, Canada has avoided both. It may be that in the light of knowledge to-day they would be ships of different design; I have not the least doubt they would. Very often one cannot tell; even judges sometimes know a great deal more eight years after than anybody on earth knew at the time. Sometimes that is true even of naval architecture, and so for the present I must be content to rejoice exceedingly in the fact that the early complaints have been abandoned and that after great industry new complaints have had to be found.

Mr. McBRIDE: I am quite satisfied to accept the confession of the right hon. leader of the opposition that he does not know anything about steamers; I now realize he does not. But I maintain that the naval architects, who prepared the models of these freight boats did not know their business; if they did they certainly would not have drawn the plans upon which these vessels were constructed. Is the right hon. gentleman willing to admit that contracts were let for the building of 33 boats after the war was over, some of them less than 3,000 tons?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The contracts were let for the large boats after the war was over, on the unanimous authorization of parliament in the spring of 1919.

Mr. KELLNER: Was the first series of charges to which the right hon. gentleman refers proved, or were they simply abandoned?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, they have not been abandoned, apparently. How can the enterprise itself be attacked when they now propose to expand it?

Mr. BALDWIN: Since I have sat in this House I have advocated closer trade relations with the West Indies. It was a source of great encouragement this afternoon to see four hon. members on their feet at once in their desire to speak on the subject following the remarks of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) who so ably and enthusiastically handled the question. When I very humbly presented my views the first year I sat in parliament the only one who gave me any sympathy was Mr. F. H. Keefer, who had been in the West Indies, as the hon. member for Cumberland has been. I went over and interviewed him upon his return, and I must say that I have not yet met a person who has been in the West Indies who was not impressed with their wonderful trade possibilities.

It has been said this afternoon that this is the accepted time and the day of salvation. In olden times we used to say "Educate, legislate, eradicate." We hope in this case the great word will be consummate. There is no other territory that this great and glorious Dominion of ours can look to for a tropical trade except the West Indies. It is our last opportunity to develop trade with a country that has a tropical climate. I must confess that my ardour had been dampened somewhat by the way in which the House used to treat this question. I have advocated closer trade relations with the West Indies in railway trains and hotel rotundas, lobbies and wherever I have been. I have urged Canadians, when they want to go to a sunny clime, to go to the West Indies instead of to California or to the Atlantic states. I have met with success in my efforts in that direction only so far as my own family is concerned, and when they returned they have always had more to say for the West Indies than they ever had to say for California and other parts of the United States they had visited. We should get to know these people of the West Indies, and incidentally make money by trading with them. I am sure that Canada would be proud of any closer relations that developed with the West Indies. Harry Crow, a strong political unionist, has exhausted his strength and resources in writing booklets and sending pamphlets from one end of this country to the other. I also have the pleasure of taking the Cuban-Canadian Magazine and reading it occasionally, I have seen what the great Macauley of the Sun Life Insurance Company has to say. He does not believe in political union, but in commercial union. I am a political unionist—

Mr. MARTELL: I thought you were a church unionist.

Mr. BALDWIN: I am emphatically a church unionist, I am also a political unionist and that embraces commercial union. I was very glad to see the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) supported in his remarks, not only on this side of the House, but by the right hon. leader of the opposition. I hope this will not be made a party question at all. It concerns the future of all Canada, and we should be a unit in doing what we can to help this country become what we hope to see it some day. Take any large development, the Hydro Electric, for instance; there is always a stage in its development when by the building of a small dam you could starve the enterprise of its power, and we have to go in for the thing largely, issue large credits and secure all the riparian and other rights to make the thing a success, and that takes the credit of the country. I would be willing to see this country extend her credit to bring West Indian trade.

How ridiculous it is that the United Fruit Company of the United States should be able to go down there and control these people! The hon. member for Cumberland has spoken of that cargo of bananas that was shipped to Montreal recently. The United Fruit Company got ahead with a trainload of bananas, and sold them so cheap that when the cargo arrived the people interested in the cargo lost money. Thirty-five years ago, and prior to that, Montreal was the greatest fruit market on the continent for a few months of the year. Fruit dealers came up here from

New Orleans and bought their fruit at auction on the open market in Montreal. These auctions lasted for weeks and weeks just after navigation opened. The great family of Vipond and other wealthy Montreal families all had connections in Kingston, Jamaica, and they have struggled in the face of adversity to build up a big trade. It only takes a few recurrences of such a thing as my hon. friend from Cumberland described to destroy a business of that kind, and the Viponds went on until their resources were exhausted. The last time I talked with the dear old man he had just returned from Kingston. They have lost their money through the great nation to the south getting control.

We have good reason for treating the people of the West Indies well. Owing to the grand banking system we have in this country we have branches of our banks down there. We have also a merchant marine of 28 boats. I do not propose to go into that question to-night—neither to defend nor assail our merchant marine—but I say that we should live up to our agreements, whether of 1920, or prior to that or since, and all unite to develop our trade with these islands. I believe we have won the hearts of these people already. They do not like the tactics of the United States. In British Honduras the people were encouraged to grow bananas, and when the fruit was ready they called on the American boats, and the answer they received was: "Who told you to raise bananas?" and those bananas rotted where they grew.

Fruit is a household necessity in Canada, and we cannot produce fruit ourselves except during a few months of the year. Happily the fruit that we raise they do not raise, but for six months they can supply us with all the fruit and garden produce we need in this country. On the other hand, they want our manufactured goods, our flour, and other commodities. One country is the complement of the other in that respect. Nobody thought forty years ago that California and Washington would be raising the products they are to-day, but when they found they had the same soil and climate as the eastern Mediterranean country they started in to experiment, and now we all know what they can do. There will have to be, in my opinion, free trade with these islands, and high protection for a while against the United States. I do not feel that will antagonize the feelings of our Progressive friends, because it will mean that we shall get the products of those islands here more cheaply than we are getting them now. That is the idea. You can go down the street now and buy bananas for 15 to 30 cents a dozen. Why? Because the United Fruit Company cut the price for the time being. Do you think that company will bring up any more cargoes to Montreal after the experience they have had? Not on your life! It is beneath our dignity to acknowledge that we are too effeminate, too sissified, and too pussy-footed to stand on our own feet.

More than half a century has elapsed since confederation and if we are so effeminate as to allow the conditions to prevail to which I have alluded I am very sorry. Now, I am just as ardently desirous of bringing Newfoundland into confederation as anyone could be. But for the unwillingness of the government of the late Sir Mackenzie Bowell to incur an obligation of $8,000,000 the union of Newfoundland with Canada would have been accomplished long ago. And that money even if it had been $18,000,000 would not have been thrown away. There would have been a return to Canada of far more than any such sum had Newfoundland entered confederation. The same thing can be said of any expenditure which may be necessary to bring about a closer union between Canada and the West Indies. The United States knows the value of the West Indian islands, and I am convinced that she would cancel Britain's entire debt to her if she could secure possession of those islands. If they became the property of the United States we should be at the mercy of that country in the matter of tropical products which are now so largely consumed in this Dominion. I believe that even cotton can be raised in the West Indian islands. Think what an advantage it would be to have a supply of this raw material in a British possession quite near our own doors. On one occasion I was visiting a town in my own county and spoke of the desirability of our having possession of the West Indies. This expression of opinion evoked from a most influential man, the publisher of a newspaper, the remark "What do we want of 15,000,000 niggers?" This indicates how little is known in Canada about conditions in the West Indies. As a matter of fact the entire population there is not one-fifth of 15,000,000. It seems to me that we spend too much time here in cavilling over petty questions to the neglect of really important issues. For my part I am most optimistic over the trade possibilities between Canada and the West Indies.

Mr. EVANS: I think the leader of the opposition must have been referring to me, as well as to others, when he said that some of us were quaking at the mention of free trade.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, at the mention of the tariff.

Mr. EVANS: I listened with great interest to the speeches this afternoon, more particularly to the address of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan). To tell the truth the hon. member has given us considerable food for thought. Basing his argument on the ground of patriotism and of Empire interest, indeed of national interest, he has seemingly made out a pretty good case. Equally with the hon. member I should like to see a line of our own boats in the service between Canada and the West Indies, but it would seem that the vessels of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are not at all suited to the carrying of Canadian commerce. We were told last year that these ships could not be used in the Canadian cattle trade on the Atlantic because they were too small and otherwise not adapted for the purpose. Neither could they be used in the carrying trade on the Great Lakes because they were not suitable as grain boats. I hope the men who designed these ships for the Canadian government will not design any more vessels should we see fit to enlarge the present merchant marine. Finally the discussion to-day proved that the vessels referred to are not suitable for the West Indian trade. I think the advisers of the government at the time they were constructed certainly meant these boats to be a failure. Perhaps they were more interested in private ownership than in national ownership. If so that would partly account for the peculiarity of the design of these vessels.

While we would like to trade with the West Indies we have a great deal to consider before we build and equip the needed vessels, or otherwise foster trade through artificial means, even with that part of the Empire. I have yet to find out where any nationally subsidized lines of vessels have been a success. There was a time during the last century when the United States planned to drive British shipping off the seas, and heavily subsidized vessels of their own. To-day the British merchant marine still holds its place on the seas. Britain's maritime trade has been constantly increasing ever since the war, and it will not be long until the Mother Country regains her former place in the carrying trade of the world.

We might naturally expect that a trade of considerable extent would naturally develop between the West Indies and the eastern part of Canada. But it is very doubtful if sufficient trade, say to provide the rest of Canada with tropical products, could be successfully carried on through Canadian Atlantic ports. Even to put bananas coming from the West Indies on the free list, and to impose a trade penalty against the Americans, would be futile; the ports of the Maritime provinces are too far away from that part of Canada where the greatest market for tropical products exists. I refer to the grain belt of the three prairie provinces. It is a futile argument to advance that because we have the National Railways on our hands, running from Halifax to Vancouver, these railways must get this traffic, when it is economically impossible to land those tropical products where they are needed in the Dominion, even with a heavy trade penalty against competitors. The distance from the ports of entry to the place of consumption is too great.

Let us for a moment take a look at the contour of the Dominion and the position of the West Indian islands. A good part of those islands are just about as near to Vancouver as they are to Halifax, with a fine navigable route at their disposal. When you land the products referred to at Vancouver you are over eleven hundred miles nearer the great grain belt of western Canada, the section where those products are really needed than is the case when importation takes place at Halifax. If the Hudson Bay railway were completed it would enable us to land these products in the very heart of Canada, near the place where they are mostly needed, with half the rail haul, even from Vancouver. The Hudson Bay railway would facilitate trade between Canada and the rest of the world, as no other expenditure of a like sum would do in any other way. The ports on that great inland sea should be developed, in preference to subsidizing a line of boats to carry on an artificially established trade between any part of the world and those ports. This country should develop her natural channels of trade, rather than spend money to artificially develop ports that entail a land haul too great to be of any advantage. The experience in the past shows that it is a very serious matter to attempt to turn trade out of its natural channels.

We have on our hands to-day a railway problem of tremendous magnitude because of the fallacious policy that was insisted on years ago of keeping our trade going East and West. Sentiment and privilege have played too great a part so far in the development of this country, and it has proved too costly. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) says that we are afraid of imposing a tariff. He says that a tariff can be used for several purposes, but he did not say that giving a monopoly to any one concern means a price for the protected product that would absorb the profit of the competitor with the duty added. I would like to see free trade with all parts of the Empire in particular, but when we think of developing that trade through ports which are bound to prove economically unsuitable, I think we should hesitate before making such a move.

Mr. CHURCH: The question before the House is an item of $340,000 to subsidize the services between Canada and the West Indies and South America. I may say that since this principle of subsidizing mail service came into force many years ago the whole question of water-borne traffic has been revolutionized. In looking over these subventions and mail subsidies, I notice that some of them are granted from the opening of navigation to the close. Others are by contract with privately owned companies. Some of them are simply for a subsidy to the company and the company allows the government to regulate rates, carry the mail free and grants other concessions. In regard to this whole vote, I think the time has come for a change. Hon. gentlemen will notice that the amount is exactly the same as last year, $340,000 although the rates have been reduced. The operations of the boats have been curtailed, and many other matters that enter into and regulate ocean rates must be considered. The people of Canada have the key in their own hands. The principle of subsidizing these services was adopted by the government many years ago, and water-borne traffic was very largely assisted. In those days Canada did not have any National Railways, ocean services, merchant marine, or lake service. We did not have many other services which the National Railways provide to-day. The only nationally owned railway was the Intercolonial.

If you are going to adopt the principle of subsidizing the services to the West Indies and South America for the benefit of the people and parts of the Maritime provinces the system should be extended to the head of the lakes, in my opinion, because it has been shown by the evidence taken before the commission recently that there is a lake shipping combine on the lakes and an ocean shipping combine on the ocean. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) spoke of the merchant marine "sitting in" with the railways in fixing rates. What have we on the Atlantic seaboard to-day? We have a combine not only in the United States but in Canada as to ocean services which combine is in league with the railways, and this combine keeps up the rates. The members of the combine sit around the table and determine what the rates shall be. Have hon. members ever considered if any money is thrown away in the subventions granted to these steamship services? There is a combine in the steamship service in Ontario and at the head of the lakes, and the monopoly has frozen out all competition in water-borne traffic. Canada has expended on railways, according to the figures submitted to the House by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) in his speech on the budget, two billion dollars, whereas little or nothing has been expended on facilities for the carriage of water-borne traffic. This item of $340,000 is five per cent on $6,400,000 of capital, and here we are asked to grant a subsidy of $340,000. I agree with a great deal of what the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) said this afternoon. We frequently hear the plea "give the Canadian National Railways a chance" but we hardly ever hear any one say "give the merchant marine a chance." It would be far better if you gave the merchant marine a show, and you would not have to grant subsidies for this mail service. Why can the merchant marine not perform the functions which these boats perform? If hon. gentlemen will look into the history of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, they will see that it was the intention of the government that they should perform services for the Trade and Commerce department in conjunction with the railways, and in that way effect considerable economy. If hon. gentlemen look over the statement of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine on the Atlantic seaboard they will find that there is a deficit to-day, according to the last statement, of $9,368,000, of all charges including depreciation and interest. The report states:

> The main reasons for the decrease in operating deficit were the cancellation of South American, Mediterranean and certain other unremunerative services, also the curtailment as far as possible of general expenses.

The report further says:

> Generally speaking full cargoes on outward trips were secured, but satisfactory cargoes were not obtainable for homeward trips, which naturally increased operating expenses out of all proportion to operating revenues.

Then it is stated that the department should take over some of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine boats and operate them to the West Indies and South America. If that were done we could rebuild a great many of the ships that are sailing to many ports of the world to-day but which are not making enough on inward bound traffic to pay their way. They say we should rebuild these ships and also build additional ships; that we should follow the same line of campaign as we pursue in regard to the railway service—build faster ships which would carry passengers and which would be provided with cold storage facilities and up-to-date equipment. If the government would take over this line, and operate the boats all the year round, I am satisfied they would make a handsome profit. What has been the history of ocean traffic the world over? Where you have a volume of traffic, the bigger the ships, the larger the business in passengers, freight and everything else.

I agree with what the hon. member for Cumberland said to-day. I think he is to be congratulated on giving the committee so much information in regard to this important problem. Duplication is going on between privately owned ships and the government service. In the case of the West Indies the passenger service by the merchant marine is as follows according to page 10 of the merchant marine report:

> In accordance with the trade agreement consummated during the year with the British West Indies, two of your vessels, the Canadian Fisher and Canadian Forester of 5,100 tons each, have been fitted with passenger accommodation, and a regular service every three weeks is being established between Canada and the Bahamas, Jamaica and British Honduras. While the boats now in commission only carry 26 cabin passengers, the accommodation provided is of such excellent character that they should attract a full passenger list for each sailing. It is hoped that the regularity of the service will build up a fine freight business in the interchange of the products of these islands and Canada. The first vessel sailed from Halifax on January 25, 1921, with a full complement of passengers and a cargo of flour, potatoes, oats, cement and general merchandise.
> It must be remembered in connection with this service that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are pioneers in opening up a new route with a view to developing and extending Canada's trade. As it has been the practice of many governments to supplement the earnings of companies engaged in this work, and as steamship subsidies are paid by the Dominion government for services that are much more remunerative than this West Indies service, it would only be reasonable that your company should be guaranteed against loss when engaged, as in this case, in opening up a new route at the request of the government.

The report refers also to the freight service and return cargoes to South America. It states that all of the above are freight services and that the vessels on the Nassau, Kingston and Belize service have some passenger accommodation. It also states that regular cargo services are now established to points in the United Kingdom, to Australia and New Zealand, to the West Indies and to South America. I do not believe they have had a proper chance or can have a proper chance on account of the way in which they have been operated. If we expand the services and build some new fast steamships to take care of this traffic between Canada and the West Indies and South America as the Americans are doing to-day, that would be a good thing for the Maritime provinces and for the merchant marine and would act as a feeder for the National Railways. I admire the people of the United States. They have been rebuilding their merchant marine; they have been going out to the West Indies, down to South America and upon the seven seas, and to-day they are securing the trade. I should like to read from the National City Banks' Trade Bulletin of recent date to show the way in which the United States' merchant marine to-day are working in conjunction with a great steam railway on the Atlantic seaboard in order to secure the trade for the United States. I will give the committee a comparison between the years 1913 and 1922, the last year of record, of the business done between the United States and the West Indies and South America, showing how trade has doubled. Argentina took 33 per cent of her total imports from the United States in 1920 as against 15 per cent in 1913. Brazil took 16 per cent of her total imports from the United States in 1913. In 1921 that had increased to 32 per cent. Chile in 1913 took 17 per cent from the United States. This increased to 32 per cent in 1923. Peru in 1913 took 28 per cent. This increased to 55 per cent in 1923. The same is true all the way down. The same is the case in connection with the West Indies. The United States has come out of the war with a great merchant marine. It is going out not only to the West Indies and South America, but to the seven seas of the world with its merchant marine and getting the trade. There is a field on the ocean and in the West Indies as yet unexplored for the Canadian National Railways if they get proper, up-to-date ocean and lake services, not only to take care of the traffic which offers but to provide feeders for the railway in the same way as the United states merchant marine is building up the railways of that country.

There is also the question of the control of rates to be considered in connection with this vote. The minister has, I understand, in exchange for the subsidies the power to regulate the rates, and the boats carry the mails free. That principle of control should be extended at the head of the lakes. The abuse of the whole subsidy principle has been dealt with very elaborately in the lake shipping inquiry report and in the ocean shipping inquiry report. You have just to read those reports from cover to cover to see how the subsidy principle has been abused in the past, how the ships to-day are not earning the subsidies which they are being given and how some new system should be established by the department involving the utilization of government-owned ships. When I drew this matter to the attention of the minister last session, he said that there was a good deal of argument in it. I contend that these subsidies should be extended to the lakes as well where there is also some need of assistance and where there is a combine. The great regulator of rail rates is water-borne traffic. The only competition the railways have to-day is the ocean service and the lake service, and now that these ocean services and lake services are in a combine, there is no competition at all. On the north shore of lake Ontario from Hamilton down to Belleville and with regard to towns on the St. Lawrence river, there is a monopoly and the boats can charge whatever rates they like. They are under the control of nobody and this is an abuse which should be remedied. These subsidies are mainly under contract; the contracts also vary and there should be a standard form of government contract. I do not believe there is a standard form of contract because some are for one period of time and some for another. Some carry the mails free. Some contracts have government regulation of rates and some have not.

It would be a good policy for the Minister of Railways and Canals to bring down a vote in this House so as to have a proper lake and ocean service from the merchant marine and thus aid as a feeder the National Railways. It would be a bright day for the Maritime provinces if such a state of affairs were brought about. What is the object of spending all this money on harbours for the Maritime provinces if these merchant marine ships are to be sold? What is to become of the Canadian National Railways without up-to-date ocean services? Let us see what the Canadian Pacific, the competitor of the National Railways are doing. They started as a railway. They spread to ocean services, lake services, hotel services, land services, and to-day they are a great railway paying dividends to 140,000 shareholders in connection with services established on ocean and on land. To-day they are a success. Parliament is voting $28,000,000 for branch lines; we have spent nearly $2,000,000,000 on railway land services, and we have spent little or nothing on ocean services. How can these all be a success if they are half starved? Some of these boats are old boats, not properly fitted out. They should be re-built, some for ocean services and some for lake services. There should be cold storage facilities on the lake and ocean boats, and they should be able to take care of fast passenger, package freight and express business. In that way you can build up the ports of St. John and Halifax and all the other ports on the gulf and seaboard. Let us take a leaf out of the book of the United States, where the people have done something to capture the balance of trade of the West Indies and South America. We pay subsidies for the carriage of mail and package freight, but I think this policy has outlived its usefulness, and the sooner the government realize that every up-to-date railway system must have proper ocean services on the Atlantic seaboard, on the gulf and on the lakes the better it will be for the revenues of our National Railways. Ocean rates are now under the control of nobody apparently. I do urge on the minister to have a proper survey made to see whether something cannot be done to rebuild, extend and broaden out our Canadian Government Merchant Marine and put it in a condition to be of real service to the country. Some of our boats can be rebuilt and made available for the traffic which we are now subsidizing. When we look over the list we are told that one boat is not fitted for this traffic, another is not fitted for that traffic—in a word we find that they are fitted neither for mail nor package freight traffic. Who is to blame for building ships of that class, what, if anything, are they fit for? I repeat, we should have a survey made, and whatever boats are not suitable should be altered and made available for the mail service and general freight purposes on lake and ocean for which we are now subsidizing private companies to the extent of $340,000, for the West Indian and South American route alone.

Why should our boats be put on routes all over the world which do not give an adequate return cargo? In the last ten or fifteen years to my own knowledge there has been an elaborate West Indies and South America exhibit at our Canadian National Exhibition to show the people of Canada what the West Indies and South America produce and how we can expand our trade with our fellow Britishers in the West Indies and with the people of the Latin republics to the south. Once we solve our problem of ocean transportation, as the American people have done, we shall get some return for the money we have spent on our mercantile marine, and I am confident that a proper survey will prove that some of these boats can be rebuilt and made available for the traffic which we now attempt to encourage by subsidies. We should build some new fast ships as well. Let the minister come down with a large vote for the purpose, and I think he will get support from both sides of the House. The question of West Indian trade has vast possibilities if the opportunity is properly taken advantage of.

Mr. HUGHES: Mr. Chairman, the development of our trade with the West Indian islands is the most important question from the Maritime standpoint that can be discussed this session. In fact, I would not be exaggerating if I said that the solution of this problem is almost vital to the provinces down by the sea. Owing to certain reasons, which I need not state, the Maritime provinces are shut off from trade with our neighbours to the south except to a very limited extent. The only countries we can trade are with the West Indian islands and Great Britain; we cannot trade with central Canada except in a one-sided way. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) has so well covered the ground that very little more need be said. My remarks will apply to the Maritime provinces generally and to Prince Edward Island in particular.

The farmers in central Canada can supply, and more than supply, the food requirements of the cities in these parts, and no matter what the freight rates may be we cannot enter this market to any considerable extent. In fact the farmers of this part of the Dominion and farther west enter the small market that we have in St. John, Halifax and the Sydneys and compete with us. Now, the West Indian islands lie close to us as far as transportation rates are concerned, for water-borne commerce is the cheapest in the world. They require nearly everything that we produce, except, I presume, coal; our butter, our cheese, our eggs, our fish, our hay, our grain, our potatoes, our lumber find a market there; and in turn we want what they produce. Therefore the trade seems to be a natural exchange, and anything that can be done to foster and develop it will enure to the advantage of both countries. For the reasons that I have mentioned confederation has never been, and never can be, of any advantage to the Maritime provinces and unless we can get compensation by developing our trade with the West Indian islands, we obtain no return for our contribution to the general fund.

These are the reasons why the provinces by the sea have not progressed with the rest of Canada. We have many natural resources; our people are industrious and they compare in intelligence, I think, with the people of other parts of Canada. But we are handicapped by our geographical position. We can never be a manufacturing centre and compete with the manufacturers in this part of Canada, because our power would be derived from coal, which cannot compete in price with the electric power developed from the immense water powers of Ontario and Quebec. The extent to which cheap electric power can be developed in those two provinces gives them an advantage that no other part of Canada possesses, except, perhaps, British Columbia, and it is an advantage which, I should think, ought to enable them to meet all reasonable competition without their asking for any considerable aid through a tariff. With these great natural advantages, Ontario and Quebec ought to be in a fair way to meet the competition of the world. So it is vital to us, if we are to maintain our place at all, that this West India market shall be developed. I was more than pleased this afternoon to hear the Minister of Railways say that the matter was receiving the serious attention of the government and that the business men of the Maritime provinces would be called into consultation with the government and the officials of the department to devise the best methods that could be followed. That is certainly the proper course to pursue and it will necessarily bring results.

Just a word in regard to trade commissioners, a matter which was referred to by the hon. member for Cumberland. From a question asked by an hon. member on the other side I gathered that he thought the government should not incur the expense of sending trade commissioners there, but that the cost of anything in that line should be borne by the people engaged in the trade. There may be something to be said for that, but in the initial stages I think the government would have to send some trade commissioners. This, however, is the point I make, and I think it will appeal to every member of the committee: if we send trade commissioners at all they ought to be the most suitable men for that purpose who can be found. There is very little use in sending young, inexperienced men to those places. Whatever professional men or men trained in the law may think of it, no business man would entertain the idea for a moment no matter how intelligent they may be, these young men have not had the experience, and nothing can take the place of experience in trade matters. The very best trade commissioners would be men who have actually been engaged for some years in the business of import and export, men who have traded with these islands, men who naturally know the business and have had the experience. It does not matter how old they are; the older the better, provided they are active and able to do their work. If the Civil Service Act will not permit that to be done, I should think parliament would be willing to pass a measure giving to the Department of Trade and Commerce the right to appoint trade commissioners. When Mr. Breadner, a former member of the staff of the Customs department, was some years ago placed at the head of the Income Tax branch, being a practical man he stipulated that he be allowed to appoint his own men, and parliament gave him that power. He wanted practical men in that service and he determined that if they were to be appointed by the Civil Service Commission he would not take charge of that department. Of course the Civil Service Commission do not appoint the officials of the railways or of the merchant marine. In saying this I make no reflection whatever on the Civil Service Commission; very likely they are able to select suitable men for some branches of the service where education and intelligence are the chief requirements and where technical experience does not count for so much. But in this branch of the service nothing will take the place of actual practical experience, and every business man in Canada, I think, will endorse that statement. This matter is of great importance, and I am sure that the House would be willing to make any change by way of enactment that might be necessary to bring about the desired end in this respect.

There is little more to be added to the very able presentation of the case by the hon. member for Cumberland and to the really pregnant statement made by the Minister of Railways. I think the views which I have presented are in accordance with the business view, and I trust that the matter will not be allowed to rest but that it will be taken up and proceeded with in order to obtain results quickly.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I had not the advantage of being in the House this afternoon while the discussion was on, but I have heard some of it to-night and I have also heard references made to what was said this afternoon. I know of no question of greater importance to the people of Canada than the extension of its services by sea for the expansion of our trade. The greatest example of success in the way of transportation in the world to-day is found in the National Railways owned by the people of Canada. There is nothing like it in the way of solving the transportation problem. The question of profits for shareholders has been eliminated and the whole problem has resolved itself into an attempt to give service at cost and to expand that service wherever possible. We do not quite realize here how successful that has been. It has made the rival of the Canadian National lines, the Canadian Pacific, see they are up against something they never thought would happen. They thought the old Intercolonial was to continue; they thought the old Grand Trunk was to continue; they thought that all the privately owned roads we had in this country would continue, and that they would have an easy chance perhaps to beat them out. But the amalgamation of these roads and the success of the Canadian National Railway has put the Canadian Pacific up on its toes.

Now, if we have succeeded, and we have succeeded, in connection with the Canadian National Railways, why should we not begin to apply that same principle to the handling of lake and ocean services? Why not expand the principle of public ownership a little, and let the management of the Canadian National Railways have in their charge transportation by water, whether by lake or by sea, as well as transportation by rail? If we did that we would then have a service by rail, a sea service, and a lake service, the whole underlying principle of which would be service at cost, service without profit for the shareholders. That principle has proven so successful in connection with our railway that there should be no doubt of the success of its application to water transportation, either by lake or by sea. I would be prepared to do this, although I know the Canadian Pacific would not accept it: I think the Canadian Pacific might well consider whether the time had not come for them to consolidate perhaps in some way with the Canadian National Railway as far as railway transportation is concerned, and perhaps they would turn over their lake and sea service to a national transportation organization which would apply not only to land traffic but to water traffic as well. That may be rather an advanced idea to suggest, but something like that has to be worked out.

If you read the papers as I have been reading them the last few days, you will see that the greatest monopoly that exists to-day is the combination that exists in lake and sea traffic. The whole of our lake traffic is controlled by one company, and the sea traffic is largely controlled by combines. If you want evidence of this take up one of the Winnipeg papers of this week, in which the farmers are told that it will be necessary for the government of this country to take up the question of ocean transportation. The farmers of the West can raise any amount of live stock now, and they could supply the whole meat requirements of a large proportion of Europe if they could only get low transportation rates by sea; but they cannot get them. As was pointed out by the Winnipeg Free Press this week, it costs $20 to transport a live bullock from an Atlantic port to a British port. There is no reason why Canada should not engage in sea traffic in the same way that she has in railway traffic, and get a few vessels to begin with to transport the live stock products of the Canadian West across the ocean. I am sure they would be able to bring the rate down from $20 to $10, and make money at that rate. But this frightful combination to keep up rates by sea rules the whole business, and has destroyed the prospects of the people of the west, and I would ask my Progressive friends to urge upon the government that they should take up this question.

We must go a step further in dealing with transportation than we have gone already. We must go to the point of dealing with transportation by sea, and if we do that and combine our public ownership of water transportation with our public ownership of land transportation, we will begin to get the leadership in the commerce of the world. There is more hope of that in combining those services than in anything else. We cannot do it in a one-sided way; we must take the two together, land and water transportation. We have to solve the question of transportation as it is applied to the sea as well as to the land, and if we do that we will make some headway, and hold out some hope of improving conditions in the Maritime provinces. There is no reason why we should not, at a very small expense, employ the organization of the Canadian National railways to develop transportation by water, by a line of boats owned by Canada and running to the West Indies, to South America, and across the Atlantic, going into the business in a small way to start with, in connection with transporting Canadian farm products, including live stock. I would trust Sir Henry Thornton to-morrow with ten million dollars, if he wanted it, to start a fleet of boats in connection with the Canadian National Railways, to run to the West Indies, to South America, and to give a service on the Atlantic ocean, a freight service to begin with, and especially for live stock. I have no doubt that if that experiment were made, we should make good. It would have to be tested by the cold facts. I was glad to hear the Minister of Railways hold out this afternoon some encouragement of an effort in that direction. You have to try it out, and my friends from the Maritime provinces and hon. members from the west are in a position to demand from the government that this be done.

The management of the Canadian National Railways has been so successful that it has carried consternation into the minds of railway owners all over the world. The Canadian people are behind the Canadian National Railways in the matter of train service; they have no doubt now as to the future; they know that there are Canadians who can run a railway successfully. The Canadian Pacific can do it, and so can the people who run the Canadian National Railways. The railways have made good, and I suggest to the members from the Maritime provinces and the members from the West that they get together and make it part of their programme right here and now that the National Railways shall be authorized to go into transportation by sea, in a small way to begin with, which will develop the ports and trade of the Maritime provinces, and help the farmers of the West by giving them cheap transportation for their grain, and especially for their cattle. If they do that, we will be in a position to show that Canada has solved the transportation problem in a way that no one else has solved it, by the application of public ownership to a combination of transportation by rail and by sea. That is what the transportation profiteers to-day are afraid of. They want to keep these things in private hands, and they have it in private hands in the matter of sea transportation, which is the greatest monopoly in the world to-day. There is nothing like it; the richest men and the richest combinations in the world to-day are those that control transportation by sea, and the way for Canada to develop and expand her trade is to follow the example we have in the Canadian National Railways and go into the business of transportation by sea on a small scale to begin with. Let us build up our trade with the West Indies and South America, and let Canada go into that business herself, and I believe she will make a profit out of it almost from the day she begins the service.

So I make that suggestion to my hon. friends from the East and to my hon. friends from the West. And, as the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) said, there is no reason why the same thing should not be applied to the Great Lakes, to the inland navigation of Canada. If we succeed in that respect on the Atlantic we can do it on the Pacific, and we can make a great, new departure before the world towards solving the transportation problem by taking the matter up in these broader senses—in the sense of navigation, and in the sense of railway service. In that way we can give an example to the world. And, as a matter of fact, we are already doing that as far as the railroads are concerned. There is nothing which is impressing the world so much to-day—not only the people in the States and in portions of Europe but in the Motherland where it is regarded with especial interest—as the success Canada is now making of her national railways. That being the case let us try to expand that transportation service by applying it to navigation as well as to railways.

Mr. DUFF: I am sure we have all been very much interested in the discussion which has so far taken place on this item. I think I may say we are particularly pleased and grateful to the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) for the very excellent speech which he made this afternoon, and which contained so many facts with regard to our trade with the West Indies and the possible development of that commerce. Perhaps, if we needed a title for this discussion we might select "Yes, we have no bananas" because the talk centred a great deal around that very important fruit. There is no question but that the development of trade with the West Indies is of very great importance for the whole of the Dominion and especially for the Maritime provinces. Personally I am willing to do everything that is possible in order to cultivate and develop that trade. But, Sir, before we discuss the advisability of the government spending millions, and perhaps hundreds of millions of dollars in order to build up a government merchant marine to carry our products to the West Indies and bring the products of those islands back to Canada, we ought to go into the matter a little more carefully than has been done, perhaps, by some of the speakers hitherto. There is no question but that the transportation problem is a very important one and when the hon. member (Mr. Maclean) says this government should launch upon a policy of building ships to engage in the transportation business it seems to me we should pause and consider the subject very carefully.

Now, what are the facts? The discussion has taken place upon a vote of $340,000 which has been granted for a number of years either to the Royal Mail Packet Company, or some other concern, to operate a line of steamships between Halifax and West Indian ports. It is undoubtedly true that if we can save this money it will be in the interests of Canada but the real question is this: Shall we save money by refusing this subsidy to the Royal Mail Packet Company and by entering upon a policy of building and operating ships by the government? It seems to me that after our experience during the past seven or eight years we should look at the statements which have been issued by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine before we go ahead and build more ships for that service. As a result of the cost and operations of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine we have lost something like $90,000,000 and have not even saved the subsidy of $340,000 which is paid to the Royal Mail Packet Company.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): That money was not spent for the improvement of transportation.

Mr. DUFF: What was it spent for then?

Mr. HOCKEN: For the relief of unemployment largely.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And to provide vessels to meet a war emergency. It has not, however, provided a solution for the problem before the House. What I advanced was something different from that.

Mr. DUFF: I do not see what my hon. friend's question has to do with what I am saying. I am not explaining why these ships were built. I am saying that in view of the fact that the country has lost $90,000,000 we should seriously consider the whole question before we talk about building more ships. I am sorry the leader of the opposition introduced into this discussion the matter of the building of these ships. It is an old story and it was not necessary in my opinion to hark back to it. We were in the throes of a great war, and the Minister of Marine and the government of that day thought that by building those ships they would be able to carry the products of Canada over to the Mother Country and furnish supplies to the soldiers who were fighting in France. In my opinion that is why the government started the business, but I do say that after the war was over—

Mr. McMASTER: There were only four keels laid then.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, before any of the ships were launched, and only four keels were laid, the war was over. I said some four or six years ago, and I say it again to-night that after the war was over, seeing that only four keels had been laid, we should have abandoned the policy and not gone on and spent $80,000,000 of the money of the people of this country in building these ships.

I was not present shortly after eight o'clock, but I am told the leader of the opposition said that no objection was made to the building of these vessels by the then opposition, or by the Liberal members of parliament of that time. My right hon. friend, whose memory is usually pretty good, was mistaken in making that statement. If he will turn to Hansard of May 8, 1919, commencing at page 2,211, he will find that during the discussion in regard to moneys to be voted for the building of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, not one member alone but several members objected to the building of these ships, and the granting of the contract for the construction of the last thirty-three vessels. In looking at Hansard of that date I find that the first name was that of a very able member of the late parliament, a man who spent a number of years in this House as a representative of Nova Scotia, a gentleman who, much to our regret passed to his reward a few days ago, and when I mention his name you will know it was the former member for Guysborough, the late J. H. Sinclair. If the leader of the opposition will turn to the page of Hansard I am quoting from he will see that Mr. Sinclair strenuously objected to the building of those ships at that time and the spending of this vast sum of money. Mr. Sinclair said:

> The criticism of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition is quite pertinent—

He was speaking of the ex-member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, now Mr. Justice McKenzie. He said;

> The criticism of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition is quite pertinent however, when he says that the government were very slow that they allowed three or four years to elapse before they did anything, and then when prices were almost as high as they ever will be and when the war was nearly over they embarked on the shipbuilding programme. When this report was issued I understand the war was over, but in it I find, as I have said, that there is a proposal to go on with the shipbuilding programme.

Again he says:

> But I think the minister has undertaken to build the wrong class of ship, if he expects them to make connections with the National Railway system.

Again:

> That company—

Speaking about the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

> —has never embarked on the building of tramp vessels. It has built liners that make regular trips, that connect with its railway system and undertake to route goods to certain places and to deliver them on certain dates. That does not seem to be what my hon. friend is doing. He is building a large fleet of slow, tramp vessels that are not suitable and never will be suitable for that class of work.

I could go on and quote from the speeches of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) who objected. I could also quote extracts from the speeches of the then hon. member for Red Deer, Mr. Clark, and I need not mention the hon. member for Lunenburg—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think he will quote any criticism of that kind from any one else. He could quote a great many speeches from that side of the House strongly supporting the programme, but he could not quote a single vote against it.

Mr. DUFF: It is quite true as my hon. friend says that there was no vote taken at that time, but the fact remains that several members of the Liberal party spoke against the continuation of this shipbuilding programme. They were opposed to it. He is referring to the year 1918, and I think to the present Speaker of the House (Mr. Lemieux), and to the Honourable Mr. Justice McKenzie, who at that time did approve of the programme of that year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding).

Mr. DUFF: And perhaps the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And in 1919 also.

Mr. DUFF: I have looked carefully over the discussion in Hansard, and I could not find any Liberal member who supported the proposition at that time. I understood the leader of the opposition also said that I changed my views on this matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that.

Mr. DUFF: I took it down.

Mr MEIGHEN: I was just thinking the hon. gentleman would have to change his views if he supported what is foreshadowed by the Minister of Railways to-day.

Mr. DUFF: I will put the leader of the opposition at ease. I do not intend to support any shipbuilding programme which will cost this country money; but I say that every year there are hundreds of thousands of ships which are ready at any time to carry the products of Canada to foreign lands. There never was any necessity for the Canadian government to undertake the operation of ships; it has proved to be a failure, and these ships have not carried one per cent of the total exports or imports from or into Canada. These very ships on which we have lost ninety million dollars are doing more business for foreign countries, and the United States particularly, than they are doing for Canada. That is the trouble. Another feature is that hon. gentlemen opposite, because they built the ships, are now endeavouring to show that we on this side of the House are willing to go on with that shipbuilding programme.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that at the present time there is an overplus of bottoms throughout the world? Because if so I cannot understand why we are called upon to pay double rates on our cattle from here to the Old Country.

Mr. DUFF: I have no hesitation in saying that the trade follows the flag, and that ships will go wherever the trade is. Wherever there is business for ships to do, ships will be found to carry all the business that is moving. What did my hon. friend from Cumberland say this afternoon? He spoke of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine coming up from the West Indies with 50 tons of freight, when it could have carried 3,000 tons, and he spoke of the Royal Mail Packet steamships coming up from the West Indies without any cargo. I was on the Hudson river about three weeks ago and saw 2,000 ships tied side by side upon that great majestic stream, and yet my hon. friend asks me if there is sufficient tonnage to do the business.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I asked the hon. member, if that were the case, how he explained the fact that rates were at an exorbitant figure at the present time as applied to some lines of industry?

Mr. DUFF: That was the condition under the late government, and under this government as well, although perhaps neither the former government nor this government can be blamed for it, because in my opinion the mistake was made when the Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships were built and a bill was passed in this House incorporating a company called the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited. A board of directors was appointed, which board was absolutely irresponsible to the owners of the ships, and they were given complete power to carry on the business of the ships, but the fact remains that the management of these boats, instead of endeavouring, as the hon. member would hope, and as I would hope, to keep down the rates on cattle or anything else, entered into a combine. The freight managers or directors of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine entered into a combine, not once or twice, but seven or eight times, not only to keep the rates up but to increase the rates on different products which were to be handled. My hon. friend must remember that the special committee on Agriculture last year went into that question and found that there was a combine. I proved to my own satisfaction two years before that there was a combine. If my hon. friend will read Hansard he will see that in my speech condemning the Canadian Government Merchant Marine I showed that they entered into an agreement known as the New York pool. I could mention another thing to show the way business was conducted by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I think three years ago the manager of the Royal Mail Packet line came to Ottawa to interview the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The vessels of that company, as hon. members know, plied between Halifax, St. John and the West Indies. The manager of the company came to Ottawa, interviewed the Minister of Trade and Commerce and said to him, "We cannot carry on with this subsidy of $340,000, unless you allow us to raise our rates." And what do you think the Minister of Trade and Commerce did? He sent for the manager of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine which line was in competition with the Royal Mail Packet between Halifax and St. John and West Indian ports. These two gentlemen, the manager of the Royal Mail Packet and the manager of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine sat at the table and asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce to increase the freight rates fifty per cent, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce did it. That is the reason the rates are so high.

Mr. CALDWELL: What year was that?

Mr. McBRIDE: Does the hon. member think that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine should be run at a loss when these boats are run in competition with other boats which have got to help pay taxes in order to carry on the merchant marine?

Mr. DUFF: I do not think anything of the kind. I am trying to prove that it is bad business to run these boats at all; and even if the rates were 50 per cent higher than they are to-day the Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships would not pay. I am trying to prove that. I say in answer to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) that if government ships are going to be of any use to the people of the country the rates should be at least as low as the rates of any other boat, or indeed lower. But instead of that, on several occasions, they entered into an agreement with other steamship lines where they could fix the rates between the two countries. If it is good policy to have government-owned ships operate on the line between Halifax and the West Indies, why would it not be good policy to have government ships carry every pound of freight which is hauled over the National Railways in this country both East and West? Would any hon. gentleman suggest that that should be done? Is it not a fact that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine does not handle one per cent of the goods which pass over the Canadian National Railways? If the Canadian National Railways have to depend for the carriage of ninety-nine per cent of its goods by water on outside lines, and the merchant marine has lost $90,000,000, it is about time that the Canadian people woke up to the fact that they had better get clear of it.

It is also a fact that an experiment was made last year with some of those boats to carry cattle from Quebec to the Old Country, and it was found that those boats were not suitable. I am not going to blame the late government when I say that those boats are not suitable to carry cattle or to do the service that the Royal Mail Packet Company is doing to-day. I agree with the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) that the service the Royal Mail Packet Company is performing is not satisfactory. We should have fifteen-knot boats instead of ten-knot boats in order to compete with the United Fruit Company and other lines, but I say that those boats which we have at the present time are practically useless for the services to which they are devoted. What is the use of having those boats put on the West Indies route or any other route except where they are carrying bulk cargoes only in competition with other steamers? I am not complaining about the kind of boats that were built by the late government. I think everybody will admit that when the late government entered into that policy and that contract, they never thought how they were going to use the boats. They did not know how they were going to use them. Their idea was to build as many boats as quickly as possible so that they could help during the war. I think that is a fair statement to make, and I have no hesitation in saying that when the late government, or Mr. Ballantyne, who was Minister of Marine and Fisheries at that time, brought down that policy, he had no more idea what he was going to do with the boats than any other member of the government or of the House of Commons. But the fact remains that we have them now and that there are only two things that we can do with them. We have either to go on and lose $9,000,000 every year in interest, depreciation and loss in running expenses, or to sell the boats, as somebody suggested this afternoon, and buy boats which would be suitable for this particular route. There would be no objection to that because we would not be investing any new money. I think that would be good business in view of the fact that we have some sixty of these boats which are practically useless as regards Canadian trade and which are being used to develop the trade of other countries rather than that of Canada. It would be a good policy for this government to sell some of those ships at whatever price they could get for them and, perhaps, to invest a few million dollars in building ships which would be suitable for this British West Indies route.

Mr. SPENCER: How does the trade of Canada differ very much from that of any other country?

Mr. DUFF: The trade of Canada differs from that of any other country just the same as shipping differs. For instance, the trade of Canada is not at all in lumber; but the shipping of Canada, that is as regards the merchant marine, is all in one class of boats. Now, does my hon. friend see the difference? The Canadian Pacific Railway have different classes of ocean steamers. They have the regular tramp steamers for bulk cargoes, and the passenger, freight and express service by water. That is why there is a great difference, and consequently the only thing to do, if we are going to make use of the ships which we have in the Canadian Government Merchant Marine is to sell most of them and invest the money perhaps in the route between Halifax, St. John and the West Indies or some other route in order to develop trade. But I do not think it would be good business for this or any other government to spend more money in building ships for this or any other route. There is no question that if trade should be developed by the agencies which the hon. member for Cumberland suggested, by appointing trade agents and going after the business, whenever the business is there to be handled, boats will be found to carry the products of Canada to the West Indies and to bring back to Canada the products of those islands.

Mr. KELLNER: What is the matter with those ships?

Mr. DUFF: As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) said, there is nothing wrong, nothing seriously wrong with their construction. Some years ago we were told that we could not build ships in Canada, but these ships on the whole are a credit to Canada as regards their construction. The only trouble with them is that in the first place they are slow, in the second place they are all of the tramp variety, and in the third place they are not suitable for the West Indies trade or any other trade than bulk cargo. That is the only trouble with them and I think that is sufficient. It is useless for us to contend that we can get cargoes on those ships from the West Indies or anywhere else when they can travel at only between eight and ten knots an hour and when other boats from New York ports and elsewhere can travel at from eighteen to twenty knots an hour.

Mr. FORKE: Does the cost of sailing not increase very much with the rapidity of travelling? Can a slow sailing vessel carry cargo much more cheaply than a fast sailing vessel?

Mr. DUFF: I do not think there is any difference, because a Canadian Government Merchant Marine vessel will take ten or twelve days to go from Halifax to Bermuda while a fast ship will make the trip in six days, and whilst this would require more coal consumption and the capital expenditure would be a little more, that would be saved in wages, provisions and other expenses which the other boat would have to bear. Moreover, if the faster boat made the trip in half the time, she would make two trips to the other's one.

We have the merchant marine on our hands and it constitutes a white elephant. We might as well come to the conclusion that these vessels are not suitable, and as the hon. member for Cumberland said this afternoon, they have lost $265,000 each year for the last three years on operation on the West India route alone. No private company would run a business in that way. Why should the people of this country have to do that just because you or I or somebody else has a quintal of fish or a barrel of flour to ship from his fish stage or his farm to some foreign country? The people of Canada should have some say in the matter and not an individual who may have something to ship, and it is suicidal for this government to go on any longer without calling a halt in the operation of most of these ships. They should sell them at once and, if necessary, get the Royal Mail Packet Company or some other company to perform this service on the West Indies route, either with or without a subsidy.

Mr. WARNER: Does the hon. member know of any place or any kind of business for which these ships are suitable?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, there are many things they can do. For instance, I understand they are used on the Pacific coast for carrying lumber. I would say they would be splendid ships for that. That is what is known as a bulk cargo. They would also be suitable for carrying coal. I understand that some of them were used on the Great Lakes for carrying wheat, but they lost money in that work. A ship, in order to carry wheat, must be specially constructed and fitted, but in order to get something for these boats to do, the management put them on the Great Lakes in the wheat-carrying business. This was a great mistake to my mind. There is no reason why those ships cannot be used for carrying bulk cargoes, and it is strange to me that in carrying bulk cargoes, they should lose money when private companies, owning ships of the same class, can make a small amount of money on the capital invested.

The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) this afternoon said that there was a monopoly in shipping. I am afraid he has not looked into this question very thoroughly Of course there are some steamship companies which make rates; but on the Atlantic ocean where ships are going back and forth all the time from every country in the world, there is no monopoly. Freight rates are governed entirely by the law of supply and demand except in special cases, as I said before, where vessels are given a subsidy and the Trade and Commerce department have to fix the rates with the result, as in the case of a Canadian Government Merchant Marine and the Royal Mail Packet Company, they came back to the government and the government gave them an increase of 50 per cent

Mr. WARD: What would you say as to the North Atlantic Conference not controlling rates in any way?

Mr. DUFF: They tried to control rates.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): They do control them.

Mr. DUFF: No.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I will read the evidence.

Mr. DUFF: You can do so after I am through. They did try to control rates, and they succeeded for a certain time; but there are hundreds of ships outside the Atlantic Combine—Swedish, Norwegian and French, besides British tramp steamers and others.

Mr. WARD: Would you say that the North Atlantic Conference or Combine does not to-day control cattle rates from Montreal to British ports?

Mr. DUFF: I was under the impression that it was the English steamship companies operating out of Montreal which controlled the cattle rates from Montreal or Quebec to the Old Country.

Mr. WARD: That certainly is not in keeping with the views of the people of western Canada. They feel that at the present time the cattle rates are atrocious.

Mr. DUFF: It is quite true that the steamship agents in Montreal got together and made a rate for the carriage of cattle, but I am not a judge as to what they should charge for that traffic. It has been proved conclusively, however, that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine carried cattle at $20 a head and lost money; and all I am interested in is the country's investment in those ships.

Mr. WARD: A minute or two ago you said that other companies using the same type of boat as we have in our government merchant marine were making a small profit. If that is so, there must be something wrong if our boats cannot make a profit on similar traffic.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend should know that boats of the type of the government merchant marine do not carry cattle, not being fitted up for the business. The boats which engage in this traffic from Montreal or Quebec are specially equipped and carry cattle in conjunction with other cargo. I did say that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine did not make any money on the cattle business, and that is an established fact which I do not need to argue. I think it is about time that the government and the people of this country told the directors to stop operating the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

I think we should do everything in our power to develop our trade with the West Indies, and unless we can make a better contract either with the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company or some steamship company I feel that it is better for us to pay this subsidy than to put our own ships on the route and lose money. There is no question that our trade with the West Indies should be developed, and we in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, who are at some disadvantage in trading with the central part of Canada, have every desire to see the West Indian trade developed so that our ocean ports at St. John and Halifax will get that much more business. I do not think that taking off the ships of the government mercantile marine would tend to restrict the development of that trade, because I feel that these boats are not necessary for our National Railways at all, as the management can get all the boats necessary to handle our overseas business, and therefore I say that under the circumstances we would be able to pay the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company or some other steamship company a smaller subsidy if they had the route to themselves so that they could put on suitable boats to handle the business.

Mr. SPENCE: I was delighted to hear the very sensible and businesslike addresses from the government side of the House this afternoon. I congratulate them on their constructive character. I refer to the speeches by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) and the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham). Knowing as I do something about the fruit business, I endorse every word uttered by the hon. member for Cumberland regarding the building up of business between the British West Indies and Canada. I feel that it is just as important to develop this trade as it is to develop our trade with the Mother Country. When in 1922 I entered this House I intended to place my business knowledge at the service of the government to assist along these lines, but I found that politics were not very much permeated with business; hence I refrained from tendering any advice. Hon. members will recall that either last session or the session before, when members of the government were criticising my honoured leader about the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, I pointed out how these boats, no matter what their tonnage, could be used advantageously between here and the West Indies or the Mediterranean ports, and I enumerated the commodities that might be imported, pointing out how many vessel loads might be brought in each year and what an advantage this would be in augmenting the traffic of our National Railways. I still claim that I was right, and I am glad to note that some of my hon. friends on the government benches are beginning to give consideration to the development of water transportation by means of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. This to my mind is most essential to this country because water transportation is the cheapest you can possibly get. I also pointed out at that time that a substantial amount of merchandise could be brought from the West Indies once a heated dock was established at St. John or Halifax, because during the severe winter months you cannot handle tropical fruits without such facilities, and their absence is the reason why we are losing this business. If the government would direct their attention to these requirements and develop trade between the Mediterranean ports and the ports of the West Indies, they would soon build up the Canadian National Railways by the extra traffic which would result.

Mr. CALDWELL: We have a heated warehouse at St. John now.

Mr. SPENCE: Can a boat pull in there and unload?

Mr. CALDWELL: Yes, and afterwards the commodities can be loaded into freight cars.

Mr. SPENCE: I am glad to hear it. The absence of these facilities has caused the diversion of this traffic to New York; consequently we are developing that port to the detriment of St. John and Halifax and losing the trade. I am glad to have been the first one in this House to advocate something along this line, and I am pleased to know that influential members on the government benches now see eye to eye with me; but it takes some people a long time to do so—they are just five or ten years behind the times. Last year when I discussed this matter in the House I got very little sympathy even from my own friends; they thought I was ahead of the times. But reading between the lines of what the Minister of Railways has said I know that something is going to be done and that some developments will take place in the steamship line. I am sorry the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr Duff) is not in perfect accord with his colleagues in this matter. While the vessels of the merchant marine may not be all that is desired—may not be large enough or speedy enough—at the same time something might be done in the way of trading off two for one to bring about a development of our trade not only between Canada and the West Indies but between Canada and Mediterranean ports and other ports as well.

The hon. member for Cumberland talked about putting a duty on bananas. I talked about that myself; I advocated it, although it could do no good to me personally. I advocated it on two grounds: first, for the purpose of getting revenue. I thought there was too much direct taxation. Duties could be put on other things besides bananas without doing any harm to the country and the man in business would not have to pay so much direct taxation. My second reason was in order that a preference might be given to the British West Indies. With regard to the United Fruit Company, to which reference has been made, I want to say that they are the strongest aggregation I know of in this business. Their capital must amount from seventy to a hundred million dollars. They control the steamboats; they control the plantations, and I understand that rather than ship a carload of bananas to be sold in this country at a reasonable price they will let them rot. In the early days bananas could be sold in the Canadian market at from 10 to 20 cents a dozen, but to-day you have to buy bananas in carload lots by the pound, and the average price of bananas in the Toronto market in carload lots is 7 cents a pound. So that to-day these people control the boats and the plantations; they control the bananas and they control the price, and as a result of their operations we are compelled to pay an enormous price for bananas. In other words, it is a real monopoly. That is something I hope the minister will give attention to.

Mr. CHURCH: What about the Combines Act?

Mr. SPENCE: Well, hon. members discuss the Combines Act; they condemn it, and so on, but while they do so they would like to be in a combine themselves. I would prefer to get into a combine at almost any time rather than go bankrupt. However, I will leave that to those who know more about it.

So far as lake services are concerned, there may be exorbitant rates charged. There is no doubt that during the last couple of years the rates on the lines of the Niagara Navigation Company have been very high. However, what we have to do is to look after our own business, develop the industries of the country and develop trade between Canadian and British and foreign ports. England built up her trade by developing her merchant marine. The United States did the same thing and I contend that Canada must do the same thing. We cannot depend on private companies to do our business, because these companies are very jealous of governments or municipalities who endeavour to put on a steamboat service and every time they can get you in a corner in the matter of transportation—either a steamboat company or a railroad company—they will do it. So that we are up against some of the toughest problems that can be faced in dealing with companies. I do not know that it is appropriate at this juncture to talk about freight charges but it is a thing that undoubtedly is keeping this country back. Something must be done, and I am sure that when the government sees fit to force the rates down the railway companies will find a way of reducing their overhead charges accordingly.

Mr. McBRIDE: I wish to make one or two remarks in regard to some statements of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) concerning the merchant marine. I have never at any time stated that the larger boats in the merchant marine were a failure. I think they are good boats and should be run at a profit. The hon. member for Lunenburg said that their speed was 8 or 9 knots; the fact is their speed is 11½ to 12½ knots, and that is fast enough for any freight boat. The boats that are anywhere from 8,000 to 10,000 tons should be a good paying proposition for this government. As to the smaller boats, while I do not find fault with their construction, I do not think they can ever be a paying proposition. It seems to be the general habit of hon. members to criticise freight rates and then tell us about combines. If boats operated by private companies were run at a loss, hon. members would say that the owners of them were a lot of confounded fools and did not know how to carry on their business. The man who runs a steamboat ought to get a fair and reasonable price for what he carries, and should be able to make his running expenses and interest on his investment. Proof that a great many are not doing that, when it comes down to the fine point, is found in the merchant marine returns. As for railway charges, I am opposed to reducing them: I say, increase them and get our railways on a paying basis. Why should the taxpayers in a section of country that has no railway facilities be paying a tax so that other sections may get cheap rates? I say that the freight rates all over Canada should be equalized; then make the charges such as to enable our national railways to get on a paying basis.

Mr. MacLAREN: I would not want this discussion to pass by without recording my attitude in regard to the proposal that has been made by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) this afternoon, especially bearing on the question of West Indian trade as set forward by the member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan). The business with the West Indies is there, waiting for transportation, waiting for the necessary arrangement between the West Indies and Canada. I do not know that the question of the relative merit of the vessels of the present mercantile marine has any direct bearing on the question of the development of the West Indian trade with Canada. I do not suppose anyone would suggest that these vessels are especially suitable for semi-tropical trade. I think it is obvious they are not. What I understand was in the mind of the Minister of Railways was the consideration of the propriety and advisability of providing a fleet of ships such as are suitable for semi-tropical trade, and for carrying products of such a character as are produced in the West Indies. That is quite a different matter from the merchant marine as it is now constituted. I do not suppose anyone would argue that we should use the merchant marine boats for this trade, because we all admit they are not ideal for that trade. In view of these three points then, Mr. Chairman—the trade being ready for us to encourage and develop, secondly, consideration of the building of ships suitable for carrying not only freight but passengers in semi-tropical areas, and thirdly, the nature of the business with the West Indies and the enormously powerful American organizations that are carrying on the trade there at the present time, I do think there is a distinct advantage in the government carrying on a business of this character. It requires a great backing, it requires wealth, it requires influence to successfully compete with the firms now operating there, and particularly with one well-known firm in the United States that has practically a monopoly of the fruit business of the West Indies.

Let me say, finally, that I hope this matter will be prosecuted with energy, that undue delay will be avoided. It certainly will appeal to the people of this country that here would be an advance in the development of our trade, and of our ports and transportation system.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): As our little province of Prince Edward Island is one of the ports of call of the merchant marine, I wish to make just a few remarks. It might be supposed that the merchant marine leaving Montreal and making different ports of call both in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island would give each province a fairly good service. We have a splendid harbour at the town of Summerside, where we have been endeavouring to have those ships call, but the management of the merchant marine takes the ground that it would not be good business for the ship to call there on account of competing with the Canadian National Railways. I endeavoured to point out to the management that in the event of the ship not calling there, neither the Canadian National Railways nor the merchant marine would get the business, but the boat of some other company would be put on, and that is just what happened last year. We have endeavoured to impress upon the management of the merchant marine the importance of making Summerside a port of call, but up to now we have not met with success. Another feature has just been brought to my attention this moment, in a letter that came by to-night's mail from the Tourists' Association of Prince Edward Island. It is written by the secretary, dated Charlottetown, June 10, and reads as follows:

> I am receiving quite a few inquiries with reference to boat trips from Montreal to Charlottetown, and upon inquiry I find that the C.G.M.M. s.s. "Sapper" is the only boat carrying on passenger service between these two ports this season, and that owing to the fact that there is no stewardess on this boat, it is impossible for ladies to travel in this way, except when accompanied by their husbands.
> It seems rather too bad with only one boat making the trip, we should be deprived of the privilege of having ladies travel on it, and if there is any way whereby you could induce the merchant marine to give us a stewardess on this service for even two months, it would help us considerably.

If these boats are going to cater to passenger traffic, I think it is only right that proper accommodation should be provided. I am well aware that these boats are not capable of carrying a large number of passengers, but if they are in the passenger business at all every effort should be made to provide the necessary accommodation.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Cumberland, in common with the rest of the members of the House, for the splendid address that he gave us this afternoon. I think it would be in the interest of Canadian trade, and would help to stimulate trade with the West Indian countries if that speech was published in pamphlet form and largely distributed, not only to the West Indian trade, but also to our own Canadian merchants. The two countries are interdependent to a considerable degree in the matter of their products, and we would welcome a development of trade between the two countries. I again congratulate the hon. member on his very able presentation of the case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not wish to take up any time at all, except to put on record the first phase, I think I might call it, of the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite to the mercantile marine. I do not complain of the general fairness at all of the speech this afternoon of the hon. member for Lunenburg. It does not, however, present anything like a just reflection either of what took place in 1918 or in 1919, or indeed in 1920, as to the general disposition of the House towards the construction.

It will be recalled that strong pressure was brought to bear upon the government from all sides of the House for its construction, and this pressure continued right up until 1920. The resistance came first in 1921, but the resistance never took the form that it has taken now; the criticism never took that colour at all. Indeed, hon. members to my left particularly will remember just this last summer when the present Minister of Justice, then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, toured the west, he complained bitterly of the mercantile marine, and the complaint was this, that it was a war construction programme, and nothing else, and that immediately the war was over all contracts should have been cancelled. Am I mis-stating his position? If I am challenged, I will get his speech, for I have it, frequently made. Contracts should have been cancelled, he complained, when the war was over. This was the second phase of attack. Now the phase is: Oh, but you didn't build the right kind of ships; you only built bulk cargo ships. I do not pretend to be an expert upon this, but I venture to say the defence against this attack is just as effective as against any other, and I know it can be produced. I share very much the disposition apparently of hon. members to my left. A desperate struggle is being made to find something wrong with these ships, to show that they are too fast or too slow, too big or too little. The ships are all right.

I rose only to put on record the unanimous attitude of the Liberal party, in its first phase towards the mercantile marine. I read the resolution passed at the convention, and I remark that the convention is subsequent to the laying out of the whole shipbuilding programme. The character of every ship, the whole programme, was laid before parliament months before this convention was held. Here is the resolution. I will ask hon. members to follow it carefully and find in it either an attack on the construction as being merely a war venture which should have been stopped when the war closed, or an attack on the construction as being composed of vessels unsuited for our use. Just watch and see how much of either one of these phases is contained in this resolution:

> The government now owns and operates some 16,000 miles of railway. We believe that the present system of management by a board, the majority of the members of which devote but a small portion of their time to this work, is unwieldy, inefficient, and extravagant, and that under it and the present administration public ownership and operation will not receive a fair trial.

This is merely introductory. I pause only to comment that exactly the same system still prevails.

> Adequate facilities and tonnage for ocean traffic are a vital concern to the commerce of Canada and the utter lack of foresight on the part of the government in neglecting to see that such facilities and tonnage were provided for the immediate after-the-war period is not only humiliating to the Canadian people, but is materially impairing our export trade.

How consistent with the 1923 statement of the Liberal position, as expounded by the present Minister of Justice that the ships were not for after-the-war at all, but were a construction for the purposes of the war, and that all further construction should have been cancelled when the war was over. Here we were roundly denounced for not preparing for after-the-war soon enough. I continue:

> At this time when the country should be in a position to take full advantage of the opportunities to secure its proper share of the export business on which the financial, industrial, and agricultural future of Canada depends, we are confronted with the lamentable situation that no adequate provision has been made for the transportation of the products of the farm, the factory and the forest to the markets of the world. With the knowledge of the enormous destruction of tonnage by the havoc of war in its possession, the failure of the government to protect the trade of Canada against the condition that now confronts it shows an absence of business ability which merits the severest condemnation of the people of Canada.

We do not hear very much in this of what we heard to-night from the hon. member for Lunenburg, that immediately there are goods to carry, the ships are there to carry them. "No," he said, "we have the goods but we have not the ships, and the government should have started sooner knowing the very destructive work of the submarine." We commenced early in 1918; we appropriated $25,000,000 and commenced. We commenced just as soon as we were in a position to do so. We knew when the war was over what we could afford to do. When the war was on no one knew when it would close; but when the most crucial thing became the providing of ships, when that became one of the major features of the war, then the construction of ships was started. Consequently there is a good defence to this attack. But it is not any defence now; the attack is abandoned. There is a good defence to the next attack made last summer by the Minister of Justice. But it is not any defence now; that is abandoned too. The latest is an attack on the character and design of the vessel, and I am sure that it is not received with very great enthusiasm by those who have witnessed the former ones and witnessed their dissolution. Let me admit that the former member for Red Deer, Mr. Clark, did complain of Canada venturing to undertake this construction, and urged that the cost would be much greater than it would have been had we bought from the Clyde or the Mersey, from the big shipyards of England. But inasmuch as the same member had just a few years before urged that instead of having built over there large ships of war, the hardest to build in the world, we should build here in Canada two fleet units of the finest war ship construction, I do not think it is at all to be wondered at that parliament did not take the second criticism as very serious.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wish to state that many of us were greatly gratified this afternoon at the position taken by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham). During the past two or three years I have had a great number of communications from seamen in the port of Montreal, or down in Nova Scotia, relative to the necessity of encouraging the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and in other ways promoting the welfare of our own Canadian ships manned by our own sailors; and the suggestion made by the Minister of Railways that this was likely to be a policy of the government will I am sure be received with very great rejoicing by a large number of the workers in the eastern part of this country. I think perhaps it is too well known to need anything more than the statement, that organized labour in Canada stood out firmly for public ownership of public utilities. In that we include all railway and steamship lines, and we think this is a move in the right direction. May I say that side by side with public ownership we would also like to see a little bit more of the democratic control that ought to go with it.

As I suggested the other day in dealing with the Railway Board, it seems to me that the government ought to try to put into practice what it has conceded in theory—that labour ought to have representation on these big public utility or government boards; that those who are actively engaged in the work—in this case the men actually engaged on the ships—should have some voice in the management of the enterprises. I think that policy would undoubtedly result in a very great deal more of efficiency, and, if anything, greater loyalty than has been shown in the past; although I may say with regard to a number of these ships I have talked with some of the officers and men in the vessels and they are exceedingly loyal to the idea of publicly owned bodies.

There is just one other thing I should like to mention, which came up in connection with the question asked by the hon. member for Cumberland having to do with a further extension of the idea of exchange between different sections of the country. The member for Cumberland opened out a wide field, and I am quite sure that we all agree with his criticism that a great deal is lost in the transmission of commodities from one section of the country to the other. The consumer does not get the advantage that he ought to have. There are a great many commission men, and intermediaries of various kinds, that stand in the way. If we are to have our government railroads, our government steamship lines, and our government terminals it would seem a very small extension to see to it that some sort of exchange system is arranged by which a good many of the middle men that now prey on the producers could be eliminated. A few years ago some of us visited a big storage plant in the harbour of Montreal. There we saw how well equipped they were for cutting out a great many of the middleman's profits, and bringing the producer a little bit closer to the consumer. If these products of the tropics can be brought by our own ships, there is no particular reason why there could not be an almost direct exchange with the people in the West and our supplying the flour that is needed in the East. The government of New Zealand have more or less accomplished this with regard to certain kinds of dairy produce. The farmers of our own West are beginning to work in the direction of shipments through a wheat pool; and it would seem as if we would be in a position before very long to carry out this idea on an even greater scale. I would even look forward to the time when we would have not merely our own ships plying between here and the West Indies, but also between here and the Motherland. At the same time we might very easily find that it was possible for us to carry our Canadian wheat in our own bottoms directly to the world's markets, and probably effect a direct exhange for some of the commodities we need in this country. Inevitably we are being driven into the adoption of public ownership. Whether we like it or not the world is tending in that direction. The only point we ought to safeguard is the effective control of the boards and of the operations of these corporations which are set up. I welcome the discussion this afternoon as being one of the most illuminating we have had on the floor of this House for many a long day.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Before this discussion is concluded, I crave the attention of the House for a very few moments, in order that I may put my ideas before it in regard to this question. I do not think any hon. member—I certainly would not,—would put anything in the way of a treaty agreement or any arrangement with any country or with any islands that would be for the benefit of Canada. If we can exchange the goods of our country on fair and reasonable terms, with another country, I think it is our duty so to do. A treaty whereby the products of the West Indies can be admitted on favourable terms to this country, and whereby the products of this country can be admitted on fair terms into the West Indian Islands and to the mainland of South America, would be of very great advantage to both countries. So far as Canada is concerned, I think it would be not only an advantage to the whole Dominion, but it would be especially advantageous to the Maritime provinces.

We are indebted to my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) for the valuable statistics he has given us this afternoon in connection with the trade relations or the volume of trade done with the West Indies and the possibility of an increase of trade between those islands and Canada. Of course, to carry out what is evidently in the mind of the hon. gentleman would mean a very large and comprehensive scheme and one which would be very expensive if undertaken as a whole. To my mind it would require, not one or two lines of steamers but quite a number of lines. For instance, I do not think it is a practicable proposition to undertake to trade with Cuba, if we couple it with any other island. If results are to be had with the trade or with the line of steamers running to Cuba, I maintain that these steamers must go to that island and to that island alone. The same remark would apply to Porto Rico, to Haiti and to San Domingo. Those islands would probably require two separate lines of steamers. Then again, in order to get the trade of those islands, what arrangement can be made with our neighbours to the South of us for favourable trade agreements? I would say that inasmuch as the United States controls the trade policy of those islands to a very large extent, Canada could not obtain any privileges there; and in that same connection I assume that when my hon. friend quoted the volume of trade between the United States and the West Indies he included the trade of Cuba and all the other islands which I have mentioned, and which are almost wholly American. We know that Cuba is a very large sugar producing country. We know that for some years past sugar has been at the top notch almost. The price has been very high indeed, and with the many millions of tons produced in that island, and with the high price of sugar per ton, the volume of trade in dollars and cents is enormous. The same thing applies to San Domingo. I do not think it applies to the same extent to Haiti or Porto Rico. In my view Canada should welcome any treaty arrangement that would assist us in capturing the trade of those islands.

So far as the steamships which have been operating are concerned, a subsidy, as hon. gentlemen know, has been paid to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company for their services to what is called the Windward islands and Demerara. The government have also, during the last few years, been operating a service to those islands in opposition to their own subsidized service. The result is that the company with whom the government has a contract has not been operating a profitable service. The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows confidentially the result of the operation of that company; and if he will call to mind those results undoubtedly he will conclude that there would be no justification whatever for the government building steamers and placing them on that route. I would remind the minister of the fact that the boats operating in the present service are of very small value. Consequently the overhead—that is the insurance, depreciation and other expenses—are very small indeed as compared with the charges on four new steamers, which would be necessary to cover the route, costing probably $5,000,000. This overhead would result in a heavy loss I believe from year to year. It seems to me that the proper thing for the government to do, when they complete their treaty arrangements with our friends to the south, is to couple up with some steamship company and pay the subsidy that is necessary to obtain the services which they will have to give under the terms of the treaty with the West Indies. To my mind that is the cheapest possible way of operating the services.

Then comes the question how far governments should interfere with vested interests. There are thousands of steamship companies operating throughout the world. I think I can safely say that scarcely one company to-day is making both ends meet, and yet some hon. gentlemen will say, without realizing what the result is going to be: Let the government build and operate those ships in competition with vested rights and private steamship companies. I think the experience we have had with the government merchant marine should be sufficient to impress the government with the fact that they cannot operate steamers in competition with private companies. I think too that the government should consider, with the money which they have required to pay the losses of millions up to the present time, whether they are justified in running tonnage at a loss in opposition to private interests.

The other day I obtained the fifth annual report of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited, and in running over it, I was wondering what the result in operations had been. As far as I can make out the loss has run into over $100,000,000. The statement shows, as of the 31st December, 1923, a deficit of $27,641,581. In this statement amongst the assets I find "accounts receivable, less reserve for doubtful accounts." That seems to me a rather strange entry for a steamship company which is carrying cargo and which is earning freight money, which freight money is supposed, so far as my business knowledge goes, to be payable on or before delivery of the goods. Therefore, I cannot understand why there should be accounts receivable amounting to $1,532,411. That may be a good asset or it may be a figure, a portion of which will never be realized. Then, we have as another asset, due by underwriters, claims estimated and under adjustment, $885,479. That is an asset in the account, before the deficit is struck of over $27,000,000. I will venture to say that that amount of $885,479 will show a very large shrinkage when the final settlement comes. Then there is deficiency on the other side of the account on insurance recovered. On the Canadian Exporter, one of the ships, there was a deficiency in what was estimated as the cost of the repairs. I do not know what the accident was, but on that account there was a deficiency of $23,-191. Is it not reasonable to suppose that there would be a large deficiency on the $885,479? Following up this deficit of over $27,000,000, I obtained from the Department of Railways and Canals the present cost of the fleet. There are some sixty odd vessels with a tonnage of over 362,844 tons. The capital cost on 31st December, 1923, was $74,860,386.48. Add to that the loss in the operation of those boats for the last three or four years and you have a total of $102,-501,968.05. The value of tonnage at the present time owned by the government is $9,724,219, leaving a shortage, if the fleet were sold to-day, of $92,777,749. That amount of $92,777,749 is based on the price of four of the ships which were sold 11 p.m. aggregating 15,508 tons. As regards the money received for them, I am perfectly sure that the credits in the figures given in the report do not provide for commissions on the sale of those boats, and the average price received for those boats works out at $26.80 a ton. I congratulate the department on obtaining such a price. It is a very outside price, and I sometimes wonder how they were able to obtain that price for those ships. But taking the 362,844 tons odd at the average price for which four of the ships have been sold, I arrive at $9,724,219 as their present value, leaving $92,777,749 of a shortage. Since those ships were sold at this price of $26.80 a ton, the price of ships has not increased. Not only has the price of tonnage declined but the ships are that much older, and therefore are not of so much value as when these sales were made. But even so, I venture the statement that were these boats to be sold and the account to be closed to-day, the loss to the people of Canada would be less in the long run than their continued operation. For it must be borne in mind that the country was told that these boats were to be put on new routes for developing trade, and had that been done perhaps we would have had nothing whatever to say about it, but instead they have been running the world over; in other words, they are tramp steamers. Some of my friends to my left seem to think that a steamer is simply a steamer; apparently they do not understand the difference between a tramp steamer and a steamer engaged on a regular route. These boats of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are what are called tramps, and I undertake to say that there has been scarcely a voyage that has not resulted in loss. A government can do that; they can invest their money in railways, or steamers, or anything else, and if they make a loss nobody is going to fail; but it is not a business proposition, it is not a proposition that any steamship-owning firm will undertake. What is the position of steamship owners in Great Britain and elsewhere at the present time? Rather than operate their tonnage at a loss, such as the government has been doing, they lay their ships up and so minimize their loss as far as possible. I should like to ask some of my friends to my left who have spoken to-night in favour of operating our present boats and building new boats to be placed in competition with private enterprise, what they would say if an agitation were started to induce the government to buy large areas of land in the West, engage in grain-growing at a loss, and sell the product at a lower price than the market value? What would our western friends say to such a proposition? Justly oppose it, of course, and bitterly. Then, why should these same people be willing, in fact insistent, that the government should spend the people's money by going into competition with privately owned steamships and vested rights? To my mind the principle is absolutely wrong.

Although it is expensive, in my opinion the cheapest course in the long run will be to lay these boats up and sell them as fast as possible, thus closing up the account and taking the loss. I have no criticism to make of the building of these ships. They were built at the urgent request, I believe, of the British government at a time when British shipping was being destroyed at the rate of tens of thousands of tons per week and it was feared throughout the Empire that not only our soldiers but the people of Great Britain would starve unless new tonnage was provided; therefore the construction of these ships was justified. But I cannot bring myself to believe that any government is justified in continuing to operate any such system of transportation as the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. These boats, as I said before, have not been opening up new routes for Canadian trade, they have been tramping, going down to South America and entering into competition with the regular liners there, carrying goods to Europe and thence to the United States, cutting rates and giving the benefit to foreigners, while we are paying the loss. Such kind of business should not be carried on by any government.

Mr. MILNE: Does the Canadian Government Merchant Marine carry freight at a lower rate than other ocean boats?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): They have, sir; they have been carrying freight to United States ports from European ports, and from South American ports to European ports, below current rates, and at a loss—a heavy loss, $9,000,000 in one year. The steamship companies that were running their boats on those routes were not getting remunerative rates and their yearly balances left their shareholders without any dividends.

Mr. MILNE: Is it not a fact that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine sits in at the rate conferences and abides by the rulings there made?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I am not in the confidence of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine as to what they do in that respect, but even if they ever did it only made them a little better off than they would otherwise have been and helped private interests to that extent.

Mr. MILNE: But does this not show that they carried freight at the same rates as other vessels?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I think they are carrying at about the same rates as other vessels now. They go in the market, and it may be that in some cases they cut a little to secure a cargo. Now, if the government enter into the owning and operating of steamers on the West Indian route or on any other route—I mean large fast steamers—I am perfectly satisfied the result will be disastrous; there will be a deficit year by year without any very great corresponding benefit. It would be far cheaper to give a subsidy to some first class English steamship company than for the government to continue to operate their own boats at a loss.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the hon. member for Cumberland on the able manner in which he dealt with the growth of trade relations with the British West Indies and other islands of the Caribbean. There was food for thought in almost every sentence, and the facts and figures that he placed on Hansard will prove both interesting and instructive to the people of this country. I have not the least doubt that the attitude of some of the people of this country toward the operation of a steamship service between Canada and the West Indies in connection with the Canadian National Railway system will at least be greatly changed. I am not at this late hour going to enter upon any detailed argument or any elaboration of facts in connection with the matters that were so well put before the committee by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) but those facts are sufficient to prove conclusively that there are great possibilities of growth of trade between Canada and the West Indies. When Sir Charles Tupper was in England endeavouring to counteract a movement on the part of the Hon. Joseph Howe to bring about a repeal of the union, he said to John Bright that if the union were displaced the greater part of eastern Canada would go into the United States. John Bright replied:

I cannot help thinking that it would be a good thing to see one government from the equator to the north pole.

Now, Sir, that day has passed. Canada is a nation extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the idea of one government from the equator to the north pole can be carried out by including the West Indies in a free trade relation with Canada in order that we may be able to import into this country, as the hon. member for Cumberland said this afternoon, these tropical products which alone we lack to make us an independent nation in the sense of our having everything which is necessary for the life and comfort and needs of our people. That being the case, why should the government not address itself to the question of bringing about better trade relations with the West Indies and to that end establish a steamship service operated by the Canadian National Railway system that would be efficient in point of speed, passenger accommodation, cold storage and general freight capacity, a service that would cause trade to flow through Canadian channels rather than be sent through the United States ports by the steamers of the United Fruit Company?

I do not take the pessimistic view of the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes) when he says that the Maritime provinces can never succeed industrially. The opening of the Panama canal has given us a great opportunity of carrying on water-borne traffic with the great province of British Columbia and, by rail, with Saskatchewan and Alberta. We have all the natural resources; we have the coal, we have the iron, we have the steel, and we have in Nova Scotia undeveloped water powers sufficient to enable us, with cheap transportation through the Panama canal, to compete with central Canada for the industrial business of British Columbia and some portions of Saskatchewan and Alberta. If that is true, then the pessimism of the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. in reference to the industrial future of the Maritime provinces is not quite to the point.

It seems to me that a red herring was drawn across the trail by hon. members during the discussion this afternoon and this evening by holding up the bugbear of the Canadian merchant marine. The Canadian merchant marine was constructed during the war period and the years immediately succeeding the war. They were built with no objective as to the trade they were to enter; they were built for the purpose of carrying in the best possible way whatever was to be taken across the ocean, and they had to be built in the quickest possible time. If direct steamship connection with the West Indies in connection with the Canadian National Railway system is not to be had because of the failure of the Canadian merchant marine, then I submit we had better scrap it. We had better put that history behind us so that the future of Canada in its trade with the West Indies or with any other part of the Empire shall not be hampered or interfered with through the failure of the merchant marine to pay its way.

Let us look for a moment at the figures. The minister is asking for an appropriation of $340,000 for the steamship service between Halifax and St. John and the West Indies operated by the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company. The hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) knows these ships and how they are operated; it is his company in the city of Halifax that are the operators of them to a certain extent. He knows that one of these ships was lost off Bermuda some months ago and that the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company put in the service an inferior boat, a boat that does not carry passengers and does not conform to the requirements. The company are operating better ships on other lines, whereas the service given between Canada and the West Indies does not come up to what the contract calls for. The hon. member has rather damned with faint praise the suggestion of the hon. member for Cumberland and the statement of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham). He has held up the Canadian merchant marine as a nightmare to the Canadian people. We have to-day, Sir, 23,000 miles of railway operated by Sir Henry Thornton and his board of directors. That railway system has cost this country $1,386,000,000. We are told that these railways are the great feeders, the great conductors, the great centralizers of export and import trade, yet it is said that we should not have connected with these railways up-to-date steamship services in order that they may carry the traffic originating in foreign countries as well as in our own.

I think the minute the government decide to have the Canadian National Railways operate a steamship line to the West Indies they should get away from the name "Canadian Government Merchant Marine." Let that be something that is to be forgotten, and let the service be called the Canadian National Ocean Steamship Company, Limited. Let the ships be up to date, modern in every particular, capable of meeting the needs of the merchants of the West Indies and of Canada in that trade. If we take the subsidy of $340,000 and the deficit of last year on the Canadian Government Merchant Marine of $265,000, we get a total of $605,000. That is what this country is paying every year for its West India service. In ten years that is $6,050,000. Take the West Indian agreement, whereby the British West India islands agree when a new weekly service is inaugurated by Canada to pay $135,000 as their proportion of the subsidy. That means $740,000 a year, or $7,400,000 in ten years. I have it on good authority that four ships of modern type, of 12 knots, with passenger, freight and cold storage accommodation. can be built for $1,000,000 apiece; that is $4,000,000, and you have $7,400,000, which means that they will much more than pay for themselves in ten years. If this is a business proposition, then why should we have obsolete boats, to use the words of the junior member for Halifax? He said these boats of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company could be operated much more cheaply than boats to be built by the government, and the reasons he gave were that they were of small value, which means poor boats, that the insurance rate was low, and the depreciation not very great. He estimated four new ships would cost $5,000,000. Taking his figures, and giving him the benefit of the doubt, say these four ships of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company are worth $3,000,000, then this government and this country are paying the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company on their investment nearly 12 per cent; 12 per cent would be $360,000, and we are giving them $340,000.

I say that these facts give food for thought. It is a matter that should be approached carefully, wisely and cautiously. I think, as was foreshadowed by the Minister of Railways this afternoon, that during the vacation the Railway department, together with the Trade and Commerce department and the business men of the Maritime provinces and other parts of Canada and of the West Indies, should get together in order to see how the trade relation could be benefited and strengthened, and how a better steamship service could be obtained.. If it can be obtained in the way that was outlined by my hon. friend from Cumberland this afternoon, and which was intimated by the Minister of Railways as the probable policy of the government, I think it would meet with the hearty approval not only of hon. gentlemen in this House, but of the country generally. We in the Maritime provinces are practically dying of ennui, and if we cannot build up our export and our import trade, if we cannot send the products of the Maritime provinces to the West Indies and bring back to Canada their tropical fruits and other products, then our last hope is gone. I remember as a boy the sailing fleets that used to go out of my home port, Halifax. There was the hum of industry and the din of traffic at that port then, and I tell you that to-day if it was not for the Canadian National Railway system, and the wise policy of Sir Henry Thornton, Halifax, would not be on the map as a port at all.

Speaking about the Canadian National and the operation of steamships, Sir Henry Thornton entered into an agreement with the Cunard and the White Star Steamship Companies this last winter, as a result of which he brought more tonnage and shipping to the extent of one million tons, to the port of Halifax in five months than came in during the previous year, and instead of bringing eleven thousand people to the port of Halifax in those five months, to be taken over the Canadian National, he brought twenty-eight thousand, or over 112½ per cent more. He sent his agents abroad, he had his steamship connections, and he got the business for his own railway lines. Now if he can do that with steamship companies that are independent of this government, if he has the foresight and the wisdom to work out a solution in conjunction with steamship companies not a part of his system, what could he not do if he was given reasonable latitude in developing an ocean steamship policy with modern up-to-date boats, to be operated in conjunction with the Canadian National Railway system. Who objects to that? Is there any shareholder of the Canadian Pacific who objects to that company operating their own steamship services? Look at their fleets of magnificent steamers, operating across practically every ocean in the wide world.

But my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax says: Oh, that is private ownership, and the other is government ownership. My hon. friend knows as well as I do that the Canadian National Railway system is operated by a private company, of which Sir Henry Thornton is the president, free from government control, free from parliamentary control outside of the estimates that are necessary to give him the money wherewith to carry on. If that is so, we should not as hon. members of this House allow our judgment to be warped because of private interests. We should stand for the public interest, as the public interest requires public men to do.

I can see the Halifax Herald of a few weeks ago, with blazing headlines, "Mr. Black Returning to Ottawa to Look After The Interests Of The Port Of Halifax." I hope, Mr. Chairman, that they will read Hansard to-morrow and see the faint praise that he gave the hon. member for Cumberland who is trying to build up a trade for the Maritime ports and help the people of the Maritime provinces by putting on a steamship line that would meet with the approval of our people, and make our hearts glad to see them coming into the ports of Halifax and St. John. He damned that proposal with faint praise because his duty, first, was not to the port of Halifax, but as I conceive it, to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, of which he and his company, Pickford and Black, Limited, are the managers and the operators at the port of Halifax to-day.

Mr. LOW: I just want to say a few words, Mr. Chairman, before the item carries. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure and deep interest to members on both sides of the House who have spoken on this subject of the development of our trade with the West Indies. I wish to join with other members of the House in congratulating the hon. member for Cumberland on his masterly presentation to the House this afternoon. It was one of the most informative, eloquent and constructive trade discussions to which it has been my pleasure to listen in this House.

I want to say just a few words in reference to the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition. He has apparently come to the conclusion that the members on this side of the House have changed their opinion of the merchant marine. He spoke of their vicious opposition to it as a reckless expenditure. I can only say to my right hon. friend that if any groups of men in this House were to propose the same plan, or the same scheme, I think that every hon. member on this side would oppose it just as vigorously as hon. members did on that occasion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They did not oppose it at all.

Mr. LOW: I am using the words of my right hon. friend. I may be mistaken, but I took his words down.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was after the construction was practically complete.

Mr. LOW: I think I took down my right hon. friend's exact words.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is right but it was after the construction was practically complete.

Mr. LOW: The real difficulty is that the ships were not designed properly for the work they were to perform. The whole scheme was very ill-considered, and I am sure that if this government were to attempt to build vessels according to any such ill-considered plan as that of my right hon. friend many members of the House would oppose it. The junior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) said he did not think that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine could compete with other lines. In that I agree with him at the present. But what is the real cause of this? The reason is obvious. The ships are not designed or built for the purposes of trade between the West Indies and Canadian ports. I venture to say, however, that if the shrewd president of the Canadian National Railways undertakes to build ships and place a service upon that route he will do so in exactly the same manner as the Canadian Pacific Railway would do if they were undertaking such a service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The same way as the "Palais Canadien" was acquired?

Mr. LOW: They would not be boats of the same style as those that were built by the government of my right hon. friend. In connection with improving the present West Indies service, I may say the lowest tender that was received for this service—and only one offer was received—was for $584,000, $243,000 more than the previous tender. In addition, a condition was attached to the offer namely, that the vessels of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine would have to be withdrawn from this route and service. Consequently, in addition to paying $243,000 more subsidy annually, our own Canadian Government Merchant Marine vessels would be debarred from taking part in a very valuable traffic, at least in so far as lines feeding the railways are concerned.

Now, much has been said about the development of our trade with the West Indies, and my hon. friend from Cumberland made the statement that he did not think many business firms were represented down there. I can assure him that many business firms are represented in the West Indies, but we have not the same number of trade agents located there that the United States have. The United States have many agents throughout the West Indies, who are supported by the revenue derived from the consular fee charged for viseing invoices and for other services. I think the fee applies on all invoices over $100. The government might well consider some plan of that kind. Trade with the West Indies has grown very greatly. May I quote from the 1922 report on Jamaica of the Colonial Office:

> With regard to the sources of supply and the destination of our products, it is noticed that in the case of the imports, marked changes have been taking place. In class 1 (food, drink and narcotics) the United States supplied only 37.4 per cent as against 54.9 per cent the year before, while Canada supplied 28.5 per cent as against 22.7 per cent in 1921; the remainder being evenly divided between the United Kingdom and other countries. In this connection it may be mentioned that there was an increase in flour of nearly 82,000 barrels from Canada, representing a little over £100,000 in value. The preference of 1s. (duty) per barrel given by the tariff was no doubt largely responsible for this increased importation from Canada. In addition to this, Canada now supplies fully 65 per cent of our butter and the major portion of our cheese and fish.

This indicates somewhat the opportunities for future trade development with these islands, and I am sure the government would be justified in doing everything possible to extend that trade. I shall only be too pleased as Minister of Trade and Commerce, to do anything I can towards that object.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is only one thing more I want to say in reference to a statement by the minister; I know he made it inadvertently. I want to warn him against putting his foot in a very bad and deep hole. He is anxious to foster trade, but the only specific suggestion he made was that we might adopt the system of having consular trade agents similar to that which the United States follows, and having those trade agents remunerated by fees, or largely by fees, on export invoices. That appeals apparently to the minister. My warning is this: That he should look up the debate of 1921. In that year we brought into parliament this proposal. It met with fierce opposition from his friends. My hon. friend was not in the House at the time. My recollection of its fate is that it passed this House, but that his government abandoned it. I would not like him now to commit himself too closely to a programme which was so treated at the hands of his party.

Mr. LOW: I did not say that I was strongly in favour of it. I merely said the plan was worth considering.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Worth re-considering put it.

Mr. LOW: No, worth considering.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would put it, worth re-considering.

Item agreed to.

Canada and South Africa, steamship service between, $125,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are we to sit until after midnight? We have taken up time to-day which has been pretty well distributed. We have no nights now at all. We are sitting late every night, and it is nearly midnight again.

Mr. LOW: The summer is coming and we would like to get through as soon as possible. I think we might proceed for a little while longer. I may say this item has been reduced by $21,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What company is giving the service?

Mr. LOW: It is the Elder Dempster Company with offices in Montreal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it the same service as before?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: How many trips a year are given?

Mr. LOW: Eleven trips a year.

Mr. HANSON: St. John or Montreal?

Mr. LOW: Montreal in the summer time and St. John in the winter time.

Item agreed to.

Canada and New Zealand on the Pacific ocean, steam service between, $100,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this the same service as before?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How many trips a year?

Mr. LOW: Twelve trips.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What goods are carried?

Mr. LOW: Lumber is one of the large items.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Seeing that the merchant marine boats are practically only fitted for lumber, according to the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), how is it that one of our own boats does not run on this service?

Mr. LOW: The articles carried are: Canned salmon, fresh fruit, potatoes, onions, leather, rubber boots, lumber, codfish, whiskey, bicycles, chairs, horses, suspenders, sewing machines, hardware and machinery.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister knows that the boats of the merchant marine can carry that class of freight all right, and it is practically all lumber anyway. Why has he not a merchant marine boat on this service, if he believes what his friends have been arguing all day?

Mr. LOW: This is a passenger and mail service, as well as freight.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister said nearly all lumber.

Mr. LOW: Freight is carried in addition to the passenger and mail service.

Mr. LUCAS: What company is the contract made with?

Mr. LOW: The Union Steamship Company of New Zealand. New Zealand contributes $100,000 and the Fiji government about $25,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do we bonus boats to carry passengers?

Mr. LOW: No, but my hon. friend asked me why the merchant marine could not operate this service, and I replied that it was a passenger service as well as a freight service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know, but we are not interested as a government in the passenger end; we are interested in the freight end, to get sale for our goods. The goods we sell can go on the merchant marine boats. If what the government says about these boats is correct, they should be on this service.

Mr. LOW: I doubt very much whether it would be possible to make it pay with the freight service alone.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I doubt very much if there is much else. We have not much passenger business to New Zealand. That business would not sustain anything at all.

Mr. LOW: There is a passenger traffic through Canada en route to England, and there is a passenger service as well to Australia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It goes to Australia?

Mr. LOW: Yes. We do not subsidize it to Australia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There might be a very little service to England, but there are other boats to perform that service. I think if the minister will wait till morning he will find out that our boats will not carry lumber. That is usually the verdict. There is always something else they will not carry.

Mr. LOW: Perhaps not. My hon. friend knows better than I do about that.

Item agreed to.

Prince Rupert, B.C., and Queen Charlotte islands, steam service between, $21,000.

Mr. LUCAS: Are these yearly contracts?

Mr. LOW: This contract is for three years. It was made last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are there any boats carrying grain out of Prince Rupert?

Mr. LOW: Not that I know of—no elevators out there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where does the minister expect to get the boats when the new elevator is put up for the Prince Rupert route?

Mr. LOW: I am sure there are many vessels that will be glad to go into Prince Rupert if they can get a cargo.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And around by the Panama canal?

Mr. LOW: I do not know what route they will follow. They will follow the route which will be to the best advantage.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the Panama not be the only route?

Mr. LOW: It would depend on where they were going.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But for grain.

Mr. LOW: There is a trade developed with the Orient.

Item agreed to.

Victoria and San Francisco, steam service between, $3,000.

Mr. LOW: I do not think this item is debatable. We are compelled by the order in council pursuant to the British North American Act admitting British Columbia to confederation to keep up this service.

Item agreed to.

Victoria, Vancouver, way ports and Skagway, steam service between, $25,000.

Mr. HANSON: What company is that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this under the British North America Act?

Mr. LOW: The item just passed, the Victoria and Sam Francisco service is the one to which I referred. If my right hon. friend has any doubt, that the order is pursuant to the British North America Act I will read the clause to him. It is as follows:

The Dominion will provide an efficient mail service fortnightly by steam communication between Victoria and San Francisco and twice a week between Victoria and Olympia, the vessels to be adapted for the conveyance of freight and passengers.

That is a clause in the order in council pursuant to the British North America Act, admitting British Columbia to confederation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then my answer was right.

Mr. HANSON: What company operates this service?

Mr. LOW: The Canadian Pacific Railway Company operates this Victoria-Skagway service.

Mr. HANSON: Is there a suggestion that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine should enter into the service or the Canadian National? I understand they are looking for a steamer; they wish to have one built or buy one to put on this service?

Mr. LOW: I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. LUCAS: Will this pay for the cost of carrying the mail.

Mr. LOW: Yes, any boat we subsidize is compelled to carry mail.

Item agreed to.

Vancouver and Northern ports of British Columbia steam service between, $24,800.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What company has that contract?

Mr. LOW: The Union Steamship Company of British Columbia.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is not going to ask us to deal with the other items to-night.

Mr. LOW: I would like to make a little progress.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You have made a lot of progress.

Mr. LOW: Let us proceed a little further.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Some hon. gentlemen may want to discuss these items.

Mr. LOW: I do not want to press the matter, but I want to make progress.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You have made progress.

Mr. LOW: I do not think so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think you will make any progress by pressing it further to-night.

Mr. LOW: If there is any special item my hon. friend wishes to have stand over, I am quite agreeable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have not obstructed anything to-night.

Mr. LOW: Let us take the items to the bottom of the page; they are only small ones.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There may be some discussion, and you have done very well. Any delay which has occurred to-day has been on the debate brought about by an hon. member on the minister's side of the House. Why should he press the House further?

Mr. LOW: Then I will stop for to-night.

Progress reported.

NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That the name of Sir Henry Drayton be substituted for that of Mr. Ladner on the standing committee on National Railways and Shipping.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Macdonald (Pictou) the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

Friday, June 13, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, the special committee appointed to consider Bill No. 122, an act to provide for the superannuation of civil servants, beg to submit the following as their first report:

Your committee recommend that they be empowered to sit while the House is in session.

I move that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

HOME BANK.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I beg to lay on the Table of the House a petition by depositors of the Home Bank for the return of deposits.

SALARIES OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, in view of the very general dissatisfaction among the postal employees in regard to the new salary schedule, is it at all possible that the government can reconsider the question?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): There must be some final court of appeal for decision in these questions of salary. Parliament has assigned to the Civil Service Commission the duty, amongst other things, of determining the salaries to be paid to civil servants. The government, in order to ensure the fairest possible consideration for civil servants in that connection, required that the Civil Service Commission should prepare its report in conjunction with the deputy ministers, and also in conjunction with the Audit Board. The government has taken particular care to see that the commission should carry out its wishes in that regard, and has on two or three different occasions referred back the report submitted by the commission to the government, before its final acceptance. I may mention that on the first or second occasion on which the Civil Service Commission submitted its report the report was signed by two of the commissioners. The postal employees requested that if possible the government obtain the signature of all three commissioners before accepting any report from them. The government insisted on that additional step, and the position of matters now is that the report has been made. The government had either to approve it or disapprove it. To disapprove it was to leave the salaries where they were; to approve it was to give effect to such increases as had been made by the Civil Service Commission. Unless parliament is prepared to revise the act which refers these matters to the Civil Service Commission and transfer the authority to some other source, I do not see that it is possible for the government to consider the report further. It would simply mean sending it back to the commissioners who would return it with the statement that that was their final judgment. I may add that they have set out at considerable length, in the statement accompanying the report, the reasons which have actuated them. The Audit Board has also placed its views on record. All these different views have been presented to the House in the papers which I have laid on the Table.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (East York): I do not find among the papers that were laid on the Table the correspondence exchanged between the Post Office Department and the Civil Service Commission. Will the government lay that on the Table?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I asked the Civil Service Commission to have us supplied with all the correspondence which passed between the Commission, the Audit Board and the Post Office Department, and my understanding is that that has been done. There may have been verbal interviews a record of which has not been kept and to which no reference is made in the file brought down. But my understanding is that the two returns brought down—I do not know whether my hon. friend has both of them there—include all that there is in the way of correspondence.

Mr. HARRIS: Do I understand that all the correspondence between the Post Office Department and the Civil Service Commission has been tabled?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: According to the statement of the Civil Service Commission, yes. I have asked the Civil Service Commission for a copy of all the correspondence that passed between the Post Office officials and themselves and the Audit Board, and the return which I have presented is the response made by the commission. But I will have further inquiry made and if there are any other papers I will have them brought down.

VISIT OF BRITISH NAVAL SQUADRON

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the House to a despatch appearing in the morning papers from Vancouver containing a statement made by one of the papers in that city with reference to the forthcoming arrival of the British special service squadron on June 21. The Vancouver paper states that there will be no member of the Dominion government to welcome the ships, and it goes on to say that despatches from Ottawa indicate that members of the cabinet are too busy in the House to come to British Columbia, and that the British Columbia people are not quite satisfied with the situation. It goes on to say:

> They recall that when the fleet was at South African ports Premier Smuts extended the welcome. In Australia Premier Bruce met them, and Premier Massey extended a welcome at New Zealand.

It goes on to say that Ottawa has shown little interest in the visit of the fleet, and it continues:

> Its grant toward entertainment has disappointed Victoria and Vancouver, and there is a growing feeling that the Dominion authorities are conserving their energies in this respect until the warships reach Halifax and Quebec in August.

I desire to say that this statement is a very unfair one. The attitude of the government toward the cruise of this squadron and its visit to our Canadian ports is one of the friendliest interest, and we are animated only by the desire to extend the fullest and most appreciative welcome to those representative ships of His Majesty's navy. Our friends in British Columbia are hardly right in their reference to the visit of the squadron to Australia. The visit to Australia took place in March last, and the ships first called at the port of Freemantle, where they were received by the Governor of the state, and it was not until they had practically made the round of the island of Australia and came to Melbourne that Premier Bruce welcomed them there officially on behalf of that Dominion, Melbourne being the capital of the state. What we have done in regard to extending a welcome to the squadron has been that on behalf of the government, the officers of the squadron will be entertained on their arrival on the Pacific coast at a formal dinner, and in conjunction with the government of Alberta we have arranged to take twenty-five officers and two hundred and fifty of other ratings on these vessels through to Edmonton, visiting intermediate points, and from Edmonton to Calgary, and then back to Vancouver. We have asked the Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia to officially welcome the officers of the squadron to Canada on our behalf, and to preside at the official dinner which is to be given them on their arrival.

The squadron also expects to visit Halifax and Quebec, and I am sure that our friends in British Columbia can feel that there is no desire to discriminate, and there will be no discrimination, in regard to the expenditure of money as between the eastern ports and that great city on the Pacific coast.

As to the question of the right hon. the Prime Minister going out at this time to officially welcome the squadron, I am sure it is the judgment of the House, and that it would be in the judgment of the country, that it can hardly be expected that the House could spare the presence of its leader at this time, no matter how keen he may be to show the greatest possible attention to the officers of the squadron. For a similar reason I think the House will feel that this duty, which might otherwise fall upon me, would be rather difficult to perform at this time, having regard to the important matters before the House. We are looking forward, however, to having the representatives of the officers of the squadron visit the capital of Canada in the month of August, when I am sure the country will expect the Prime Minister and other representatives of the government to extend to them an official welcome similar to that which was extended in Australia by Premier Bruce.

GOLD AND SILVER MARKING ACT, 1913, AMENDMENT

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act, 1913, to provide a standard quality for platinum goods.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. LOW: This amendment is intended to provide a standard quality for platinum goods; in other words, to give the same protection to platinum goods that is afforded to gold and silver goods.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What standard of value does the minister propose to erect? Perhaps he might tell the committee how we are getting along in our production of platinum?

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend is aware that gold and silver goods are required to be stamped, and a similar provision in regard to platinum has been requested by the Jewellers' Association of the Dominion of Canada. Three or four hundred representatives of that association, sitting in assembly I think in the city of Windsor, passed a resolution asking the government to provide the same protection for platinum goods as is afforded to gold and silver. The bill provides that the word "platinum" shall be included after the word "silver", so that it will read, "gold, silver and platinum goods."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it the idea that there should be any alloy of any kind allowed, or is it to be of one hundred per cent fineness, or what?

Mr. LOW: It is proposed to amend the act by adding the following section:

The word platinum or any contraction, abbreviation or colourable imitation thereof shall not be applied, either alone or in combination with any other word, to any article of merchandise composed wholly or in part of any metal unless 950/1000ths of component parts of the metal appearing or purporting to be platinum of which said article consists are either the pure metal and element platinum alone or in conjunction with iridium.

[Mr. E. M. Macdonald.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Low thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 176, to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act, 1913.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

PUBLIC WORKS

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Harbours and rivers—Manitoba—harbours and rivers generally, repairs and improvements, $10,000.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works): There has been a reduction in this vote of $5,000. The amount is required to make provision for repairs and improvements to harbour and river works under the control of the Department of Public Works in the province of Manitoba. It is the regular vote.

Mr. HOCKEN: Where is the money to be spent?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is to be spent on the care of the harbour and river works under the control of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. HOCKEN: On the Red river?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): On various rivers. Last year there were expenditures on the Pas river, the Red river, and Victoria beach.

Item agreed to.

Portage la Prairie—sewer extension, $23,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think I shall give a review of what led up to this expenditure. The matter was discussed very fully in the House last year. In the year 1908 a petition to the Dominion government from a number of people living in the vicinity of Portage la Prairie suggested that the river would be relieved during the time of the spring freshet by the digging of a cut or canal which would straighten the river at that point. The work was undertaken and carried on, and each year during the flooded time it served a useful purpose until 1921 or 1922. The cut then widened to such an extent that it left the bed of the old channel dry, and in that way exposed the sewer outlet of the city of Portage la Prairie. The city complained very bitterly to the department of this condition, which had arisen, as they claimed, from the activities of the department, and last year we brought in a vote for the work. A good deal of correspondence and negotiation took place with the city in order to bring about a condition that would be satisfactory to the citizens. Finally tenders were called for and three bids were received, the prices varying from $76,300 to $99,219. These tenders were above the estimate prepared by the departmental engineer whose estimate was $60,000 odd. We rather hesitated to let the contract on account of the variation between the estimate of the departmental engineer and the contractors' tenders. However, it was claimed that owing to the nature of the soil in that district it was very difficult to ascertain what would be encountered after getting below the surface. Experience had shown the contractors that in this deep trenching there was a probability of caving in and great uncertainty, as to what might happen. However, we let a contract in December of last year for the work. It has been proceeded with, and I believe the sewer is satisfactorily installed. Just at this point I wish to state that the fears of the contractor were somewhat realized, because after he had dug this trench three feet wide, which was the intended development, he found that he had to put in cribbing. This made it impossible for him to place his eighteen-inch sewer pipe and be able to caulk the joints. The result was that he had to move another foot of dirt on one side of the trench for its entire length. I mention this because the contractor has made a claim upon the department for this extra work. The matter is under consideration, and the district engineer has advised that the department should give the contractor consideration as to the actual cost. The committee will be advised if the matter comes up in the supplementary estimates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the amount of the tender that was accepted?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It was $76,300.

Mr. CALDWELL: What was the estimate of the departmental engineer?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It was $62,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: Did the minister not tell us that the tender exceeded the estimate of the departmental engineer because of the uncertain conditions which the contractor expected to encounter? And is it not fair to suppose that his tender was high enough to cover the conditions which he feared might be met with?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He claims not. He figured he would get through with a three-foot trench, but such an amount of cribbing was required that he had to enlarge his trench to four feet. The vote we are asking for is to cover the present contract.

Mr. CALDWELL: Without any extras?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Without any extras.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has this work been done to the satisfaction of the town, and will it prevent the flooding that has caused so much damage in the past?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This work was done to take care of the sewerage outlet of the city, so that the outlet will be protected. We have not done anything to the river itself under this expense.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have a lively recollection of what was said by my leader (Mr. Meighen) in the House last year on this subject. I am under the impression his thought was that the department was going to relieve the district from the direct results of departmental work. Now, I understand this work is merely to look after the sewer, and not to provide against the flooding at all.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have tried to accomplish what the city desired and I believe the work has been done to its satisfaction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I may say that I have heard no complaints, although there may be some which have not come to my attention.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think the work is satisfactory to the city.

Mr. LEADER: I believe the work is satisfactory to the city of Portage la Prairie, at any rate there has been a statement in the newspapers to that effect. I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate the minister and the government upon taking hold of the situation and putting it back to where it was in 1908. What I mean by that is this: The department diverted the water of the river by digging a canal in 1908. Through the subsequent years up to 1922 there was a gradual wearing away of the cut thus creating a bigger canal. Finally it took the whole course of the river, thereby leaving bare the mouth of the sewer of the city of Portage la Prairie. This created a very disagreeable and very menacing situation and overtures were made to the government on the subject. I am glad to be able to say that the department took hold of the situation and put it back to where they found it in 1908. I believe the citizens of Portage la Prairie duly appreciate the fact and I think I can convey their thanks to the government for their prompt action.

Mr. CALDWELL: Do you think the work has been economically carried out?

Mr. LEADER: The situation was very unpleasant. It had to be taken care of. Whether the work was economically carried out or not I cannot say, but I believe it is satisfactory.

Mr. MILLAR: Speaking generally, and not with any particular reference to this work, does the minister think it is sound business to give such favourable consideration to claims for extra remuneration because of unforeseen circumstances, such as have been referred to in this case? It seems to me it works an injustice to others. What happens in a case like this? Tenders are called for, and one firm puts in a bid that they look upon as final. If their hopes are realized they make a profit, and if not they lose. Another firm puts in a tender a little bit lower and secures the contract, with the intention of making a further claim later on. I am afraid that is often done and I do not think it is wise or fair. If a firm find they have made considerable money, and these unforeseen difficulties did not turn up, they do not refund anything to the public treasury.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): These things come up in regard to the contracts from time to time. I have not made up my mind as to what shall be done in this matter. Representations have been made by the engineering department. I would not suggest that the government go further than the actual cost of this unforeseen work. That is a matter to be discussed when they ask for a further amount later on. Each contract and all the conditions must be considered on their merits. In this case there was a great variation in the tenders, ranging from $70,000 to $99,000,—indicating that in the minds of the contractors there was an unforseen quantity there that was very difficult to judge.

Mr. HOCKEN: This contractor expected to take out a three-foot trench and he found he had to take out a four-foot trench. Will the engineers of the department say that the extra foot was necessary? Or was it just a little bit of a job he added?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, it was necessary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the name of the contractors?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Fowler, Young & Co., Winnipeg.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In connection with the remarks of my hon. friend as to the advisability of making favourable settlements with contractors, we saw an illustration of that in the closing days of last session. We saw what could be done, how it could be done, and how it is done sometimes. It is perfectly true, as the minister says, that when a man tenders he takes a considerable amount of risk, and the tenderer who thinks he will have to rely upon his strictly legal rights is in one position but the tenderer who has not got to do that is in another position. The minister says that is perfectly correct, but it works out absolutely unfairly as between contractors and makes for the payment of grants which sometimes depend upon the pull of the contractor. These grants certainly are not founded on legal claims. The minister says that by reason of the fact that there were difficulties known to the contractors in that district, having regard to the soil, he came to the conclusion that the estimates of his own engineers—something about $62,000—might not be sufficient. This contractor, knowing of these differences of soil, apparently thought that was a good excuse for getting a higher price than the department thought the work was worth, and receives a contract for $79,000; then the minister says, "Well he was right in wanting more money, because there was some difficulty; he has had to take out an extra foot." The fact that he took out the extra foot is no indication that the estimate of the Department of Public Works for $62,000 was not perfectly correct. The contractor is already paid in advance by the difference between the $62,000 and the $79,000 at which figure the contract was awarded. The situation as explained by the minister is simply this: Here is an estimate, and so far as the department is concerned it is an honest estimate. The contractors say in effect "We know this country and you do not; it is going to be more expensive." They went on and did the work and also performed the extra work; and because they did know the soil better and found there were some difficulties, they were to get paid for their difficulties as well.

Item agreed to.

Victoria Beach—wharf repairs, $4,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that a public wharf?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This item is for the following work:

To renew the stringers and decking, also to cut off the top portion of closely driven round piles—about four or five feet, now rotten and falling to pieces—and replace same with timbers laid longitudinally.

Mr. FORKE: I understood there was some embankment made on the Assiniboine river to prevent flooding. Has anything been done in that respect?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Between what points?

Mr. FORKE: Between Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie. I understood surveys were to be made of the river and some report made as to whether anything could be done to prevent flooding. A tremendous amount of damage is done every year by the Assiniboine overflowing its banks and destroying highway grades and flooding lands. I have never seen any reports in connection with that matter.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Surveys have been made and the matter is still being developed in the engineering department. The work involves a very considerable sum of money, and we are not bringing down any estimate for it this year.

Mr. FORKE: Fortunately the water was very low this year and there were no complaints; if the water had been high as usual, there would have been a tremendous amount of damage. As soon as one flood passes over people forget about it until we have another flood.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Fortunately the floods do not come every year.

Mr. FORKE: They come pretty frequently.

Item agreed to.

Fort Resolution—wharf, $5,120.

Mr. KNOX: I call the minister's attention to the fact that some improvements are required on the river leading from Montreal lake out into lake Laronge, which is an extension of the Churchill river. This is a highway leading into the north. A wagon road has been constructed from Prince Albert to Montreal lake, largely by the provincial government; but, although boats are passing through regularly on the river I spoke of, there are some obstructions between Montreal lake and lake Laronge, which impede progress very much, and I have been informed it would not require a very large amount of money to remove the obstructions which are in the form of boulders in the river. If this were done the outlet into the north country would be very much improved. Will the minister have this matter looked into and brought to the attention of the department?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. COOTE: Has the minister an appropriation in this amount to take care of the damage at High river.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is no special appropriation for that. My hon. friend has made representations regarding certain river banks where work should be done; the department has had reports; and negotiations have been proceeding between the municipalitiy and individuals interested, the department at Ottawa and the provincial government. I think there has been a suggested authorization, on condition of joint expenditures by the municipalities and the province.

Mr. COOTE: I understand that the department was willing to expend $2,500 if the municipality and private owners would take care of the balance. I see from a communication in the High River Times that the town authorities think that the amount which was at first estimated as being necessary to cover the cost of the required work might not be nearly sufficient, and they are reluctant to embark on the work until they can have some assurance that this amount would be large enough. I should like, if possible, to have the assurance of the minister that his engineer would visit High river again as soon as possible, and that whatever amount is necessary to take care of the share which the Dominion government is willing to assume will be provided, should that be possible.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): While discussing this item and the reference my hon. friend has made to expenditures at High river, I might explain to the committee the attitude of the government, or the Department of Public Works, in regard to works of this character. There is no legislative authority as to the manner of control of these rivers. The practice followed from time to time in the past where representations have been made by members of parliament, boards of trade, municipalities or provinces, for expenditures, has been to deal with each case more or less as an individual case. We are rather taking the position that in the case of river bank protection, the people who have located on the river bank, who have property there, are the people primarily interested in saving their property. If the project is beyond them and they are in a municipality, we feel that this becomes primarily the duty of the municipality. If it is beyond the municipality and a public interest is involved, we feel that the provincial government should interest themselves. If it is found that the matter is beyond the individual, the municipality and the provincial government, and that there is a Dominion interest, I think the department and the government are willing to consider each case on its merits. It is only fair, however, to say that these expenditures are asked for from time to time, oftentimes without much consideration as to the cost and the effect the work may have on the river generally. This matter which we discussed just a few moments ago was entered into on a petition in 1908, and it resulted in parliament this year being asked for a vote. I am satisfied that if the municipality of Portage la Prairie had been a party to that arrangement and the matter had been done along proper lines, there would have been a different story to tell to-day and we would not be voting this money. We are being asked, from time to time, through not only the prairie country but the whole of Canada, to come to the relief of individuals, municipalities and cities by way of expenditures on river-bank protection. If we could lay down a principle such as I suggest, many of these cases would not come to government or to parliament and expenditures would not be asked for. I am satisfied, if that principle was laid down and followed, a request of that kind would be jointly examined and reported upon, and I believe the result would probably be better than it has been in the past. In the prairie provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, where the Dominion government control the natural resources and the land, the case is different sometimes from that in eastern Canada and in British Columbia, outside of the railway belt where the river bank and the bed of the river are owned by the province. At the present time in the Northwest Territories and the railway belt the Dominion government still owns the river banks and river bed. I thought I would just make this statement so as to make clear, if possible, the line that the department is following as regards matters of this kind.

Mr. HANSON: What does the minister mean by the "bed" of a river? Does he mean that the alveus of the stream belongs to the province, or does he refer to some navigable stream? I can understand, in the case of navigable rivers, if repairs are needed, the Dominion might have an interest, but I do not understand why the Dominion should be called upon to repair erosions of banks of streams merely for the purpose of protecting private property. Such a thing would be unheard of in New Brunswick. In the St. John river, for instance, the individual is largely responsible for the care of his own bank unless there is a highway along the bank, in which case the province takes care of the matter. I have never before heard of the Dominion being expected or asked to take care of a situation of that kind, and it will be news to the people in the East that that has been done.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It has been done.

Mr. FORKE: Both the Red river and the Assiniboine river are navigable streams theoretically. As a matter of fact they are not, but they are considered to be, navigable streams.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They have a very large quantity of water in them at certain seasons of the year and they become very dangerous.

Mr. COOTE: Highwood river, that is down the river in this municipality, is navigable in certain parts; but at the point where the damage has been done it is not navigable. At the same time I think the municipality is quite justified in asking this government for some assistance. The Dominion government own the water in all the streams in Alberta; they own all the natural resources; they own the land along the banks of those streams. The provincial government never had any jurisdiction over either the water in the streams or the land alongside of them. If the damage is more than the property owners and the municipality can take care of, if any government is to assist those people, it should be, I say, the Dominion government. I do not think this is the first occasion upon which the federal government has been asked for help in such cases or the first occasion that they have given help. Highwood river is a mountain stream and it is subject to very sudden freshets in the spring of the year when the snow on the mountain melts. One year ago the flood was very much worse because we had about two weeks' heavy rain at a time when we usually get high water. The town of High River was flooded. The main street, I think, was under two or three feet of water for days at a time. The river threatened to break through and change its course, in which case probably most of the water would have gone down the Little Bow river. The Irrigation department of the federal government did some work along the banks of Highwood river to prevent the river from changing its course. They did this, I understand, because the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have water rights on Highwood river for irrigation purposes, and if this water were diverted to the Little Bow river the Canadian Pacific irrigation district would go short of water. If the water had been allowed to take its course and go down Little Bow river, it is quite possible the town. of High River would not have been in danger in any way. Therefore, I think there is no doubt that the Dominion government has some responsibility, and the Minister of Public Works has taken a fair attitude in regard to the work at High river.

Many public works entered into in Canada should be entered into on the basis which the minister has suggested. If municipalities in many cases where they want post offices built were required to put up forty or fifty per cent of the cost of the building, the Department of Public Works, I am sure, would not be called upon to erect so many post offices.

Mr. HANSON: Does the hon. member think that the cases are comparable? The post office in a community such as the one I represent is a money-making proposition for the government; a much larger revenue is taken in than the cost involved in running it or the capital expenditure incurred in the building itself. The two things are not comparable.

Mr. MICHAUD: I might tell the hon gentleman too that in my own town we have paid in the last ten years over $1,000,000 to the treasury although we have not a public building.

Mr. HANSON: That is right.

Mr. COOTE: The town of High River I have no doubt has contributed a good many dollars to the revenue of the country; I am not saying anything about that. I know, however, that some work has been done under the vote for harbours and rivers in Ontario which would never have been done if the municipalities had been required to bear any percentage of the cost. But I do not wish to dwell on that feature; we could bring before the committee a good many cases in which money could have been saved to the department in this way. But I do ask the committee to take a fair view of the situation in regard to those towns that are exposed to damage from floods. I want to bring to the attention of the minister the circumstances in connection with the town of Blairmore, where last year at about this time the Old Man river overflowed its banks and the town was flooded. A number of the streets were practically washed away; several bridges were destroyed to the value I think of $44,000; several of the houses in the town itself had to be moved back from the bank of the river to escape being carried away; the cribbing along the bank of the river for a distance of 2,200 feet was completely washed out; and altogether the town was severely damaged. That town is not financially able to cope with what I think I might term in this case a disaster. If another flood had occurred this year as bad as that of last year there is no doubt in my mind that a considerable portion of the town would have been swept away. The council of the municipality at Blairmore appealed to this government for assistance a year ago, but up to date the department has not seen fit to grant any money to assist in repairing the damage that has been done. The department did send an engineer to Blairmore and he submitted a very complete report of the situation. I am sure that the minister himself is very anxious to give what assistance he can; at any rate he must certainly realize the necessity of granting some money for the erection of the necessary works in the town. His engineer reported that the cost of the dredging and the cribbing which would be necessary to control the river would total $74,100. I want to ask the committee whether they think that a little town with a population of 2,500 could possibly be expected to bear that cost? The Western Canadian Collieries, whose works are located there, have offered to do the work for approximately $50,000. This company operates large coal mines in the town, which is practically dependent on the operation of the mines. The property of the company has been badly damaged by the flood and for that reason they are willing and anxious to co-operate with the municipality towards the construction of the necessary works so that they will not suffer again in the same manner. I want to point out to the committee, and particularly to bring to the attention of the minister, the fact that this government has collected in coal royalties from this company alone the sum of $468,400 in addition to lease rentals to an amount of $33,300, and for coal lands purchased by the company to the extent of $128,300. This makes a total of $630,000 which has been paid by this one company at Blairmore. Besides this, the government has received from other companies operating in that district the sum of $796,000, or a total of $1,426,699 received directly from the operators of coal mines in the district. I believe that the town of Blairmore and the property owners affected are quite willing to provide a percentage of the cost of constructing the necessary works, but they are unable to shoulder the entire expense. It is for that reason that I am appealing to the committee and particularly to the minister to bring down an amount in the Supplementary Estimates to take care of part of the cost of erecting the protection works along the banks of the Old Man river through the town of Blairmore. I should like to have an assurance from the minister that this will be done.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I would hesitate to give such an assurance. I have contended that in regard to the condition in the town of Blairmore there is some responsibility on the provincial government, who do collect certain revenues from the community and who therefore should interest themselves, along with the municipality, in getting things straightened out. If that were done I would then be more confident in coming to parliament to ask for a vote for this necessary work—for I believe it is necessary. The Old Man river, as has been said, is a mountain stream and in the spring season it very often becomes a torrent at this point and is very difficult of control, so that the people of the town are exposed to periodical floods. This condition however is not peculiar to that section alone. Indeed, rivers all over the world get beyond control at times and cause great damage. We are trying to take care of the situation as best we can, dealing with each case as it comes before us.

Mr. LEADER: I wish to support the minister and the hon. member (Mr. Coote) in the statement that taking care of flooded areas, repairing the dykes on the rivers, and matters of that nature, is a joint responsibility which should be shared by the municipalities and the provinces along with the Dominion. Last year the minister will remember a delegation from Portage la Prairie waited upon this government and requested either the straightening of the Assiniboine river or the repairing of the dykes in order to meet the situation that develops in that district every few years as a result of floods. I stated before that delegation at that time—and my position in this matter is well known—that in my opinion the province together with the municipality of Cartier and adjoining muncipalities through which the river runs should be prepared to come to the government with a concrete proposal and be willing to assume a certain proportion of the cost required to give the river its proper course. The difficulty, I think, was that we were not in a position to submit any plan of joint action. Fortunately there has been no flood this year, and that explains why the demand upon the government has not been renewed. No doubt, however, the question will come up again in the future; the settlers living in that vicinity are in constant fear of these floods, and the matter is bound to arise again. The Dominion government will therefore have to recognize the necessity for some work being done in connection with this river. If the municipalities directly interested had to put up some money along with the province they would be more careful about expenditures; there is no doubt about that. Another phase of the situation in connection with the river seems to be this, that there does not appear to be any one who is right on the job with dynamite to break up the ice jams as they occur and so to prevent flooding. It has happened that in the case of an ice jam occurring on the river, before notification could come from Ottawa to the dynamiting crews the damage had been done, the banks had been overflowed and the dykes washed away. If the municipality had to take its share of the financing it is quite possible that the municipal council would be on the job to repair any damage that might occur. I am not saying they do not do that already, but there is a possibility of their looking to Ottawa to take care of the situation whereas prompt local action might prevent a disastrous flood. Last year $6,000 was provided in the estimates for taking a survey on the Assiniboine river. That survey has been made and I understand the government have a plan in mind for the reclaiming of that great area which is now endangered by periodical floods. No revenue will come to Canada more quickly than that which will result from the reclamation of these valuable lands. The government is getting no income taxes from that portion of Manitoba, now that is largely owing to the floods that have taken place within the last few years. I think it is the duty of this government, the provincial government and the municipalities to join hands with a view to taking care of the drainage situation in that splendid portion of Manitoba.

Mr. COOTE: Just one further word in connection with the work at Blairmore. The town of Blairmore has been hard hit by the Home Bank disaster. The deposits of the people of that town in the Home Bank amounted approximately to $200,000, and the loans which the bank had there were $6,000, that is $190,000 more of deposits than of loans. Twenty-five per cent of that has been returned, but the people of the town are still short that seventy-five per cent. The school district of Blairmore, which is part of the town machinery, lost, I think, $10,000 in that bank failure. The town has been finding it hard to finance its necessary operations since the Home Bank went under, and that makes it all the more important that assistance should be given at this time. There is one fact I did not mention which might further impress the minister with the necessity of giving assistance to the town in this case. The river runs all the way through the town, following a winding course in several places and making necessary a lot of bridges. In this flood the bridges which were washed out were estimated by the engineers of this government to cost $41,000. These bridges have to be repaired or replaced, in addition to the works that I have already mentioned. It seems to me that the people of the town are very reasonable in asking the government to put up possibly fifty per cent of the cost of the construction of these works. I may point out that the same condition exists at Okotoks. It would seem that the property owners first affected might be the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; if that is the case I presume they are quite able to take care of themselves. But it is quite possible that considerable damage might result to the owners of property in that town if the river should change its course even to a very slight degree. I trust that the minister will see that some appropriation is made under which he could, if necessary, give the town of Okotoks some assistance should they suffer from flood next spring. I would again urge upon the minister the necessity of doing something at the town of Blairmore.

Mr. WOODS: Are we to understand that the government is responsible for damage done by freshets and floods where bridges are taken away or land destroyed, and that kind of thing? If so, there will be a lot of requirements in Ontario along the same line.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, I do not think we are responsible in such cases.

Mr. CALDWELL: I admit I did not know until the discussion came up that the Dominion government was responsible in such cases. However, if they are I want to present a claim of the constituency in which I live.

The CHAIRMAN: This is for Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then we will take it up when we get to New Brunswick. Are the estimates for New Brunswick passed?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not yet.

Mr. FORKE: These prairie rivers are a little different from rivers in other parts of the country. They run through flat alluvial plains. The banks are just a little higher at the river than further back and a flood of a few inches will inundate the country for quite a distance back from the river. It will be seen, therefore, that a very small embankment will do a great deal of good. As for the Dominion government paying part of the expense, that is a question for them to decide. In regard to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Leader) as to the Dominion government and the municipalities undertaking this sort of work, I do think, knowing the conditions, that the Dominion government have some responsibility in the matter. But the proper method would be for the municipalities to do the work something after the fashion of drainage districts. The reclamation of a large section would be carried on; the land reclaimed would be owned by several individuals, and the expenses could be charged up against the land benefited. It would not be a question of public charity or of public assistance; a great deal of useful work would be done and the people themselves would be benefited.

Mr. COOTE: I hope nothing I have said will precipitate a run on the Department of Public Works for assistance to prevent the erosion of banks of streams. But, for the enlightenment of some members, I may point out that in the last ten years, according to a return brought down, there has been spent on harbours and rivers and dredging in Alberta and Saskatchewan the enormous sum of $204,000, while in the rest of Canada there has been spent $82,390,775. Alberta and Saskatchewan have approximately fifteen per cent of the population of Canada, but the amount spent under these heads in those two provinces has been less than one-quarter of one per cent of the amount spent in other parts of the country.

Mr. CALDWELL: I will admit the force of what the hon. member (Mr. Coote) has just said, but possibly it has not occurred to him that what is railway transportation to the prairie provinces is water transportation with us. In Nova Scotia, for instance, there is one main line of railway running through the centre of the province—not a very well constructed railway, and one which does not give a very excellent service, though it is true that it has been better in the last few years. Practically the whole of the traffic is carried on through these harbours and over the wharves around the shores. I have suggested that when the estimates for harbours and rivers for the Maritime provinces come up we might have a map hung up somewhere in the chamber, if the Speaker would permit it, which would show the location of the harbours and rivers and also the location of the railways in those provinces. I am not finding fault with western members, because I know they do not realize our situation as we do ourselves, and I am willing to admit that we do not realize their situation. But if you compare the amount spent on harbours and rivers in the prairie provinces with the amount spent in the Maritimes, and if you compare also the amounts spent on railroads, I believe you will find they are about the same per capita. To take either alone would not give a fair idea of our methods of transportation or of our necessities along that line.

Mr. WARNER: I should like to point out one feature—I do not know just what there is in it—the provinces other than the three prairie provinces own their own natural resources, and that may make some difference in the obligation the Dominion government has towards them. We would like to have these resources, but we have not got them, and the other provinces have.

Mr. NEILL: If the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) feels he has a grievance because he has not harbours in his district, I would be very happy to let him have a couple of hundred from my district, with the consequent expenditure involved, and there would still be enough left to bring down my grey hairs with sorrow to the grave getting the government to do justice to what was left.

Mr. HUGHES: I would point out to the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) that the prairie provinces, while they do not own their natural resources, get a cash subsidy in lieu thereof every year. It may be that the prairie provinces would prefer their natural resources. We are not arguing that at the moment, but I just wanted to point out to the hon. member that when that arrangement was made the prairie provinces were granted a yearly subsidy in lieu of their natural resources.

Mr. WARNER: I would point out in reply—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. It is not in order to debate the question of the natural resources of the provinces on this item, but probably the hon. member might answer briefly if he desires.

Mr. PRITCHARD: Has the coal mining business been injured by the overflowing of this river at Blairmore?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have no knowledge of that, but I think not.

[Mr. Caldwell.]

Mr. PRITCHARD: If it has been why do the people there wish to build on the bank of a river that is likely to overflow and destroy their property? Is there not room for them to build back from the river?

Mr. COOTE: I might point out to the hon. member that this town of Blairmore is not on the prairie, but in the Crowsnest pass, a pass running through the Rocky mountains. The valley is very narrow, and the only place where they can build the town is in between the two ranges of mountains. The Crowsnest river comes down through that pass. The works owned by the mine, which are on the flat, were very badly damaged, to the extent of a good many thousands of dollars, and the coal mining company has to take care of that damage itself. They are anxious to assist in the work of straightening the river and erecting cribs on each side, backed with rocks, to hold the river from overflowing again and damaging their works. They have a large iron works there, one of the largest, the manager told me, between Winnipeg and Vancouver. They have also sidings leading to their mines. They have a great many buildings on the flat, at the mouth of the mine. These were all in danger, and some of them were damaged. Several bridges were also washed away. This is why the mining company is anxious to co-operate with the government and the town in cribbing the banks of the river to prevent such a thing happening again in the future

I might further explain that the banks of this river in places are not more than four feet high, so when a freshet comes down there is not room in the channel for the water to get away, and last year it spread out all over the flat and flooded practically the whole town. As I pointed out, the Dominion government is receiving a splendid revenue from that little town, and I think it is not asking very much when we ask that the government should meet the wishes of the town of Blairmore in that matter. If I have not explained the situation fully to the satisfaction of the hon. member and the committee, I shall be very glad to do so. I look upon this flood at Blairmore last year in the nature of a calamity which visited that community. The same is true of High River. These are the only two harbours I have in my constituency at the present time. I hope I shall not be looked upon as making undue demands upon the government, but if any member here was to go back home to spend the week-end, and find the town had been flooded three feet deep, and all the bridges had been washed away, and the houses threatened with the same fate, I am sure he would regard it as a calamity, and it is in that light I am asking this government to regard that flood.

Mr. WARNER: I do not wish to prolong the debate, but I would point out to the hon. member for King's (Mr. Hughes), who mentioned that the western provinces were receiving a subsidy in lieu of their natural resources, that it is not contended by anybody, I think, that that relieves the Dominion government in any way. The Dominion government grants a subsidy in order to hold those natural resources, and we feel that, possessing them, they are more responsible than they would be otherwise.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia—Arrow park—reconstruction of wharf (revote $9,500), $10,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How does this work stand now? I think it was to be started the year before last, was it not? Has anything been done yet?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A contract has been entered into and we are asking for a revote of $9,500. Arrow park is situated on the Arrow lakes, and is a rather thriving agricultural community.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When was the contract let and how much work has been done?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It was let in 1923, for $9,450.

Item agreed to.

Bamfield East—reconstruction of wharf, $7,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How does that stand?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is a revote. It is to complete the renewal of the superstructure of the existing wharf approximately seventy feet long by forty feet wide; to extend the face of the wharf into deeper water, and make repairs to portions of the existing structure; to construct floating fenders and a freight shed fifteen feet by thirty-two feet. Tenders were called for last October, and a contract is being let.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the date of the contract?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The order in council was passed on May 14 last.

Item agreed to.

Bella Coola—to renew and extend wharf, $9,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How does that stand?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This work will consist of renewing and extending the existing wharf on the south side of North Bentick Arm. The work requiring to be done consists of the removal of the superstructure of the existing wharfhead, together with the removal of a certain number of old bearing and fender piles, the demolishing of the old freight shed, 12 feet by 16 feet, renewing the superstructure of the existing wharfhead, and constructing an extension to the same 101 feet long and 25 to 50 feet wide. It will also be necessary to construct a float, gangway and freight shed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When will tenders come in?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Tenders were called for on October 30, 1923. One tender was received but it was considered too high and we are asking for new tenders. This is an important work on the main coast line of British Columbia south of Prince Rupert. It is at the entrance to the Bella Coola valley, it is a large valley in which there is quite a settlement. It is a fishing centre and some lumbering is done.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Why was the work not done two years ago?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There have been certain negotiations with the provincial government in regard to roadway construction to this pier. The old pier was a very long one extending out for nearly a mile and a half—certainly a mile at least—and a great deal of pile driving and flooring is required. By its reconstruction we are saving a very considerable sum of money. The provincial government are constructing the roadway to the wharf.

Item agreed to.

Bowen Island (West side)—floating wharf, $2,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What about this item?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This vote is to construct an approach 8 feet wide, and 168 feet long, out to low-water mark, a float 30 feet by 40 feet anchored with creosoted piles, and a gangway leading from the approach to the float 36 feet long and 6 feet wide.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has there been nothing done as yet?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Tenders have not been called for yet?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not yet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: One might with very great justice observe that we have re-votes in the case of the whole of these works—one in the case of a contract made in last November, another in the case of a contract made in May of this year but in two other cases nothing at all has been done. I hope the actions of the department are not to be construed as giving effect to a statement recently made in this House. These works were to be carried out because they are absolutely important and yet they have stood two years. Either the department's ideas were wrong and the works were not necessary, or else there has been grave neglect in cleaning up what was practically described as a necessitous situation requiring immediate action. I do not know which is right.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend is hardly fair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am stating facts.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We got our supplementary votes late in the season in the case of many of these items. Plans have to be prepared, and investigations carried on not merely at one point but at a number of points. Reports had to be made to the department, and specifications prepared. All that takes time. Oftentimes we arrive at the point where the money might be expended in the fall of the year, but that is an expensive period for doing work, and very often we cannot get contractors to bid at that season. The result was that many of these votes had to go over until the following year.

Item agreed to.

Burton—wharf repairs, $2,100.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is a new item, will the minister explain it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is proposed to overlay the existing decking, which is in bad repair, with diagonally placed plank. This is one of the most important public wharves on the Arrow lakes. The only access to outside centres and markets is by steamer. The existing planking has served its life, but will afford a good ground or base for the new diagonally laid planking. It is proposed to replank this structure with 3 inch by 12 inch plank.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the work be done by tender?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, by day's labour I would think.

Item agreed to.

Chemainus—repairs to float, $1,450.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has anything been done about this item, or is it in the same position as Bowen Island floating wharf?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This vote is to cover repairs to approach and renewal of float and gangway. The total estimated expenditure is $1,450.

Item agreed to.

Cowichan lake—wharf and approach, $1,700.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am asking my colleague to move that this item be struck out as the work has been completed out of last year's estimate.

Mr. CARDIN: I move that the item be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

Crooked and Parsnip rivers—removal of obstruction, $3,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is this work for?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is a new vote. There is a good deal of trouble north of Prince Rupert on the Grand Trunk Pacific in the Peace river country. The waterways in use there are the Crooked and Parsnip rivers. Representations have been made by various bodies and individuals that by the removal of boulders and the cutting out of certain brush the rivers would be greatly improved for those who find it necessary to go into that country at certain seasons of the year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it proposed to do the work this year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, we hope to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How far on is it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The expenditure has not been authorized as yet, we are asking parliament for a vote. We asked for a report from the engineering branch and the estimate is based on that report.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How will the work be done?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): By day's labour I imagine.

Item agreed to.

Deep bay—wharf repairs, $1,850.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is for general repairs.

Item agreed to.

Fraser river—improvements, $68,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is a very important work. How do matters stand now; is the flooding in hand?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is not to provide for direct flooding conditions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this not in connection with the island we had some trouble about?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, we will come to that later.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the vote for, then?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): For improvements to navigation. It is for the construction of an extension to the existing north jetty which will direct the current of the stream, and, we hope, will maintain the channel. The expenditure made during the last two years has met with a considerable amount of success. The work is under contract and will be proceeded with.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Is it intended to proceed with this work gradually so that eventually the different points further up the river, Port Mann for instance, will be accessible to deep water boats in future, and will the development made proceed as part of the harbour improvements?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The intention of the department is to proceed from one stage to the other. The Fraser river near its mouth becomes a very large river, and the spring freshets bring down a tremendous quantity of alluvial and other material which is deposited, oftentimes causing the river to change its course. These jetties are built to control and direct the current in certain channels. We find that very good results have been obtained by the construction of the jetty. A jetty was constructed last year near a place known as the King Edward cut. That work has been closely watched. It is the intention of the department, where the experience of the surveys and examination and watching of currents will show that the construction of these jetties will tend to bring about a correction and make navigable the channel, to put in these jetties rather than to continue the old practice of dredging from year to year. From the engineering point of view I think the work is progressing satisfactorily. It is being carefully watched by the departmental staff.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: My interest in this matter is due to the fact that I looked into that river to some extent while I was in that district during last winter. It is not often a prairie man is very much interested in the rivers and harbours, but I was particularly interested in this point of view: That in my opinion Port Mann on the Fraser river will eventually be the logical shipping point of the Canadian National Railways. The importance of that point can hardly be overestimated, and I certainly hope, as far as practicable, the work will be continued, and that the Canadian National, whose terminus is Port Mann, will be able to utilize the river in their operations.

Mr. McQUARRIE: In common with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) I am greatly interested in this matter; and in confirmation of what was said I call attention to the fact that the shipping on the Fraser river has very greatly increased in recent years. During the last year quite a large number of sea-going vessels have come into the river, largely for the purpose of taking out lumber and other products which are manufactured on the Fraser river. The minister has said that the work is proceeding satisfactorily, but I think possibly that statement is going a little far. I do say, however, that the minister and his department are entitled to credit for the work which has been done. They are showing an intelligent interest in the Fraser river, but at the same time I do not think that the people in New Westminster and vicinity are altogether satisfied with conditions at the present time. They do not think the work has been taken up in a satisfactory way. They do not think the department is energetic enough in this respect, and that it is meeting conditions as readily and as speedily as it should. I am quite aware that the minister has studied the Fraser river, and that his chief engineer has also made a very complete study of conditions there. I understand it is the intention of the minister to go out to the Pacific coast during the coming summer, and I think request has been made that he visit the Fraser river again and also that he if possible take his chief engineer out there again. Mr. Cameron is familiar with the location, and I hope the minister will find it convenient to take him to that district. Conditions are not absolutely satisfactory at the present time. The draught of vessels coming into the port is increasing, as the minister knows. At the present time ships drawing 25 feet of water are making regular trips. I think they are carrying ore for the Canadian Pacific or for some subsidiary company of that company and regular shipments are being made. Those vessels are drawing 25 feet of water, and it is absolutely necessary that the channel be at all times kept in such a condition that these vessels can navigate without difficulty, I know that the board of trade, the city council and other public bodies of New Westminster have made representations to the minister that certain work which they consider absolutely urgent at this time should be let by contract. The minister has all these facts before him and I suppose is giving the matter consideration, but I know that he thinks that the people of New Westminster are unnecessarily alarmed. He thinks they are exaggerating the difficulties which they think they have there. I can assure the minister that this is not so. These men are all interested in the future, not only of that district, but of Canada. The busines that we do in New Westminster is export and if it is lost to us it is lost to Canada. I am sorry to have to say that at the present time the two dredges which are supposed to be working on the Fraser river have been taken away. I think this is a great mistake, and I have from time to time impressed upon the minister the necessity of keeping the dredges on the Fraser river until we get the channel into such a shape that it will be permanent. The necessity exists at present, and the matter is not in an experimental stage. The business is there and waiting, and it is very necessary that we should be able to accommodate even deeper draught vessels than are navigating there at the present time. The minister knows that some of the Canadian Merchant Marine vessels are of greater draught than can be accommodated in the channel at the present time. Those vessels would like to go in the Fraser river.

Then we have the matter of the shipment of grain. I have taken occasion from time to time to draw the attention of the minister to facilities which the port of New Westminster presents for the shipment of grain. We have asked the government to establish a grain elevator on the Fraser river. That demand has been made on a great many occasions and has been repeated from time to time. The first time I spoke to the present minister in regard to the matter he said, "The government does not propose to build any more elevators." The next thing I heard was that they were buying the Woodward elevator, another elevator in Vancouver. I do not say that I object to that. The announcement was made a few days ago that the government propose to build an elevator at Prince Rupert. I am not objecting to that but I say that the claims of the Fraser river are such that this government should be particularly interested in them inasmuch as New Westminster or Port Mann is the logical point for the shipment of the grain which goes over the Canadian National Railways. As the minister knows, that is assuming very considerable proportions. At the present time great quantities are coming through New Westminster and are taken over to Burrard Inlet. There is no reason why that grain should be taken to Burrard Inlet at all, because the Fraser river is the first point where the ships can come in where grain can be loaded. It is simply throwing away money to take that grain over to Burrard Inlet. The minister must have the facts before him The delegation, referred to by the last speaker, of Progressive members who came to New Westminster last winter, are familiar with the facts. They at that time intimated —and I think they confirm me in the statement now—that they are interested, not so much in any particular point or port on the Pacific, but in having their grain handled where it can be handled most cheaply. That is to say, they would like to see their grain handled economically. It may be, as someone has said, that it does not really make any difference to the shipper whether his grain goes to Burrard Inlet or to the Fraser river, because the rates will be the same to the shipper; but as a matter of fact, if extra expense is involved in taking that grain over to Burrard Inlet, somebody has to pay for that. I am informed that there is an unnecessary expenditure of one cent a bushel in taking that grain over to Burrard Inlet and the trade will eventually have to stand that loss. That is what Progressive members are interested in.

There are other considerations. As the minister knows, the port of Vancouver at the present time is rather congested, and it is difficult for them to handle all the grain that may be expected to go through Pacific ports. I understand this last year the shipments will amount to something like 50,000,000 bushels. I am informed by Progressive members who were at New Westminster last year that within a very few years at least 200,000,000 bushels of grain will go through those ports. When that time comes, the extra expense will mean something, and more than that, the congestion will, of course, be much more marked than it is at present.

As the last speaker has mentioned, Port Mann is a very desirable place to ship grain from and Port Mann is the freight terminus of the Canadian National Railways. The Canadian National Railways at the present time have in Port Mann ideal sites for the construction of grain elevators, so that no expense would be involved in purchasing sites.

Another feature is in regard to the initial cost of construction. On fresh water the cost of construction of an elevator is very much less than on salt water. On salt water it is necessary to have concrete construction, and particularly in the port of Vancouver that construction and the necessary excavation which has to be done are very expensive, so that outside of the initial cost of the site, which is very large, of course, at Burrard Inlet because sites there are expensive, the cost of construction of elevators is very much less on the Fraser river than on Burrard Inlet. Not so long ago a prominent elevator engineer, Mr. Howe, who is well known to the minister and also, no doubt, to many members of the committee, reported in favour of the location of elevators on the Fraser river as against Burrard Inlet. These facts must be taken into consideration, and I think the government are not treating the Fraser river very fairly as regards establishing elevators there.

I am quite satisfied the minister thinks that elevators should be established on the Fraser river and that he is doing what he can to assist in having elevators owned by private companies located there. When the government are going into the business of constructing elevators, they should construct elevators where the grain can be handled in the most economical and cheapest manner. That is what Progressive members are interested in. It comes down to a matter of business, of dollars and cents, and although the cost is absorbed by railroads, the traffic has to bear the unnecessary money that is thrown away in locating elevators on the Pacific coast elsewhere than at New Westminster or on the Fraser river. The minister knows these facts as well as I do, and I have no doubt that if he expressed his personal opinion, he would tell this committee that grain elevators should be located on the Fraser river. Perhaps I have got away from this particular appropriation, and I crave the indulgence of the committee for having done so, but it seems to me that New Westminster and the Fraser river are entitled to a fair deal and I am afraid they are not getting it.

I should like again to impress upon the minister the necessity for keeping the dredges which the department already has on the Fraser river until the work is completed and put into permanent condition, so that the channel there will be assured. If dredging work has to be done in other places—and no doubt there are places where such work has to be done—why not utilise some of the other dredges which the department has out there and which are at present laid up? My idea is that it would pay the department to do a good deal of the work by contract and get the thing finished. This is going to cost money; money is being spent, and I am not altogether satisfied with the results that are being obtained. I believe the business interests in New Westminster are behind me when I impress upon the minister the necessity of considering the advisability of doing more of this work by contract.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend failed to tell the committee that within the last three or four years the channel of the Fraser river has been improved from a depth of 26 feet to a depth of 29 feet. That is a gradual process, and it is well known amongst hydraulic engineers that if you are dealing with rivers of that character, the type of engineering that should be adopted is to build works that will have the rivers cure themselves, and that is the type of engineering which we have adopted on the Fraser river. Building these walls, we find that the current of the river in question is increased and in a little while you have done what my hon. friend would have done next year by dredging. The difference is this, that the river having cured itself through the assistance that you have given it, in all probability you have established what may become a permanent or natural channel, whereas if you were to vote two, three, four or more million dollars—because it would take that much to dredge a channel from the mouth of the Fraser to New Westminster sufficiently deep to allow boats such as we hope to get, to enter the river, probably the thing would be destroyed the next season. So that so far as we are concerned, and in the interests of the people of Westminster, it seems to me that it would be better to have a little patience now and allow the men who are studying conditions on the spot to move as they think best. We are hoping that if my hon. friend will be patient, with the scientific knowledge that we are trying to bring to bear upon the problem, if we are allowed to advance from stage to stage we shall accomplish something that will be of real importance and of permanency in the channel. I am not coming to parliament asking for large sums of money in order that we may rush in and dig channels which probably will be closed up a year afterwards; I think the better plan is to proceed scientifically with the problem. This problem is a difficult one which has been studied by the department for many years, and as minister of the department I am going to take the best advice I can get. Nothing pleases me more than to have a conference with the hon. member, with the boards of trade interested, and with the people of the district who are anxious to have the work go on. But it is necessary that we should take a fair view of this as of other matters. I believe that if we follow the plan suggested by our experts we shall accomplish something which will be of permanent use and of abiding satisfaction to the people of Westminster. The activities during the last few years have brought about marked results, results that are very satisfactory to the department. Last year witnessed the largest tonnage that ever went through the river, and very little difficulty was experienced, steamers going in and out easily.

Mr. McBRIDE: The minister is absolutely right when he says that the proper thing to do is to keep the water of the Fraser river within the channel and let it cut its own way out to the gulf. I remember in 1909 there was a great deal of dredging done on the north arm of the river; in fact, that year there was spent I think about $100,000 on this work. Three months after the dredge left the channel I happened to be going up on a steamer, and where the channel had been dredged the steamer ran aground. She was a twin screw and broke both propellers. The current in this river is of such a nature that if it is not confined to the channel it is apt to fill in where the dredging has been done. In my opinion one dollar spent in putting down mattresses is worth five dollars spent in dredging in the Fraser river.

Mr. McQUARRIE: My hon. friend knows that the vote we are dealing with refers to the main channel; he was speaking of the north arm of the river.

Mr. McBRIDE: The same thing applies to both.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I was going to request the minister to take the chief engineer with him when he goes out.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes I hope Mr. Cameron will be able to visit the Fraser river this year.

[Mr. J. H. King.]

Mr. McQUARRIE: He has been doing good work there; he was there a few years ago and the people are anxious that he should come back again. They hope that he will come this summer if possible to continue his investigations.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers generally—repairs and improvements, $65,000.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I want to call the attention of the minister to a condition at Revelstoke in connection with the river bank protection on the Columbia river. I am fully aware that the minister knows a good deal about this particular matter, but I want to impress it upon his attention. I am informed that there are two places in this locality where there appear signs of erosion into the bank. In past years a certain amount of work has been done at this place. At one particular point there has been done considerable mattress work and at a point further down the river a wing dam was constructed under previous governments, in an effort to change if possible the course of the river to prevent its cutting into the bank. As is well known, the Columbia is a large navigable river; it is by no means a small stream, and at certain times of the year, particularly at high water time, the current here is pretty swift. In fact, at all seasons there is a very swift current and the conditions are such that the river bank is being constantly encroached upon. I do not think that the work done in previous years in the construction of this wing dam has accomplished the purpose it was intended to serve; and from the information I have received within the last year or so and from personal interviews I have had with the district engineer I understand that, as a result of the gauging of the activities of the river in cutting into the bank, it has been decided that something should be done to keep the river in its course or at least to change the course if possible in order to stop the erosion. If there are any further developments there is a possibility of the stream cutting straight through into the town of Revelstoke; at any rate, if it does not go into the town the cutting into the bank will destroy many well-advanced and improved farms and ranches. I was wondering whether the minister could give us any information regarding the work of the department in this respect.

5 p.m

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The district engineer last year made a careful examination of conditions at Revelstoke on the Columbia river and plans were prepared and suggestions submitted for improvements to prevent bank erosion. So far we have not decided to make the large expenditure necessary, believing that further study should be given to the currents there and further reports considered. The flood season will probably have passed in a few days and we hope there will not be any great damage. We shall have further inquiry made.

Item agreed to.

Hardy Bay—wharf replacement, $19,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is a new vote.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is for the construction of a creosoted pile wharf 50 by 100 feet, with an approach 480 by 16 feet and a freight shed 15 by 28 feet, a slip 9 by 30 feet; and launch landing steps. The proposed wharf will be constructed on the west side of the bay and will replace the old structure on the east side which collapsed in 1918. With the construction of a roadway by the provincial government the people will have access directly to the wharf which they have not had heretofore.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What town will this serve?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Hardy Bay, near the northern end of Vancouver island. A landing point there gives access by road or trail across to Quatsino harbour on the west coast of Vancouver island. The work is an important one and, as I say, it is being carried out in conjunction with road work undertaken by the provincial government.

Item agreed to.

New Westminster (Poplar island)—fisheries patrol station, $16,500.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is being constructed for the Department of Marine and Fisheries. They have a fairly large amount of work in that vicinity, requiring a station on Poplar island, opposite the town of New Westminster on the Fraser river.

Item agreed to.

Nicomen island—protection work, $25,000.

Mr. McQUARRIE: How is this work getting on?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This work was undertaken by the government in conjunction with certain work that the provincial government undertook to do. Nicomen island is on the Fraser river below Chilliwack. It is a very fertile island and has been settled for some years. After the war, when the re-establishment of returned soldiers was under consideration, certain lands were bought there and returned men placed upon them; I think about $140,000 was spent for that purpose. For many years the department has been spending money in the building of wing dams and dredging, amounting in all to some $158,000, to protect this point in the river. Two years ago I asked the provincial government to make a joint survey with the Department of Public Works to see if some scheme could not be evolved that would give protection to the people on the island that would be permanent in its character. After careful consideration of the matter and the making of surveys, the engineers reported that by putting in certain bank protection work we could deflect the current from this point and thus secure the land from damage. Prior to that the river had worn in and destroyed a section of the dyke, which left the area open to flood in high water. The provincial government closed that area, expending some $30,000 in the work, and we have carried on this protection work with some degree of success. Part of it has been done by contract and part by day labour. The department have been utilizing what is known as retard dams, a method adopted on the Mississippi with very good results. Large trees are brought into the bank and piled with brush; the ends extend out into the current and that brings about a retarding of the water and silt and the settlement of material. The figures would indicate that last year the bank built up very satisfactorily in that area. It is to complete the contract we made last year that we are asking for this sum.

Item agreed to.

Pender harbour (Donley's Landing)—enlarging float, $1,000.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is to construct an addition 35 by 50 feet to the existing float. Pender harbour is one of the islands lying between Victoria and Vancouver. There is quite a settlement there. It is a farming community and some lumbering is carried on.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I do not think there is any farming there; it is mostly fishing and logging. How many wharves are there in Pender harbour which have received assistance from the government?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think this is the only one.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Is there not one near the principal store almost directly opposite this wharf, at Gonzales and Dames landing, right across the harbour?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are not maintaining that one. There is a store at the float my hon. friend speaks of, owned by Mr. Donley, and the telegraph office is there. It is a general meeting place for half the citizens of the harbour.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Donley's?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I think the minister is mixed up; the telegraph office is at the other place. It is at Gonzales and Dames landing where the hotel is, and the big store. I know the place very well. The reason I mention the matter is because when I was there last summer my attention was drawn to the fact that where the business is done, at the regular calling place for steamers, where the telegraph office is, where the hotel is, and so on, the government will not do anything to assist in keeping up the float and the wharf is in rather bad shape. The member for Comox-Alberni will be able to confirm what I say, namely, that most of the business in Pender harbour is done at this place across from Donley's. I am not objecting to this vote to Donley's; in all probability it is necessary, because a great many fishermen make Donley's float their headquarters. I am simply calling the minister's attention to the necessity for taking care of the other wharf as well. If he looks into the matter I think he will find that the information which is before him is rather misleading.

Mr. NEILL: The last remark of the hon. gentleman is perfectly correct. The information that is before us is misleading—that is the information he has furnished us with. I fear he has been taking a political view of the atmosphere in that district. A telegraph office does not necessarily need a large wharf, a summer hotel may, to a larger extent, but what wharves are generally used for is loading and unloading freight, and that is what this float is required for. I may mention incidentally that if he looks up the public accounts of last year he will find that a considerable sum was spent in fixing up the wharf at the place he mentioned.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The minister said that nothing had been spent.

Mr. NEILL: This year.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Any time.

[Mr. J. H. King.]

Mr. NEILL: There was something spent, and a lot has been spent in years gone by, and on the principle of fifty-fifty perhaps it is time there was something spent at Donley's float. This float was put in some years ago, and it developed a very considerable trade in fish, so much so that it was found not big enough to take the fish off from day to day. You will notice the vote is for enlarging the float. It had worn out in course of time, and was in such a condition that the fish and other products on it would be sinking below the level of the water. A man named Donley maintained, at his own cost and charges, a float there for some years, and the general public, including the fishermen, took advantage of it and had the use of it, on account of the government float being so small and inadequate. Donley's float is now practically worn out, and the government were asked to extend their float so that it would be big enough to handle the traffic that has been done there for at least five years past on this other man's privately owned float. There is no intention, I think, on the part of the government to discriminate against the summer hotel; it is largely used in the summer time. I myself was there last summer. I examined the wharf and I spoke to people, and I heard no complaint of its condition at that time, nor do I think any application has been made this year for further repairs beyond those undertaken last year. While the minister may say he has no record of a vote, possibly something was done out of what is known as the general vote. I am not very sure of the amount. But at any rate there is no absolute need for any repairs at the present moment on that side of the harbour, and there is urgent need for this other work in order that the people who try to make a living by taking the fish out of the water and sending it to Vancouver may have some place on which to land it.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I am afraid I shall have to put the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in the same class with the minister so far as his information is concerned. I have always heard that he did not like to cross the water, because he got seasick every time he did. I thought that he would come fairly before this committee and correct the misinformation of the minister.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): May I interrupt my hon. friend for a moment? Apparently he is seeking for information, and it probably would be just as well to give it to him. He has a local knowledge which some of us do not enjoy, and probably he can play upon that to some extent. Apparently there are two floats, the government float and the private float owned by Mr. Donley. I have the following information with regard to the situation:

> The steamer always landed at Donley's when we had a large float there, and as at that time very little use was made of the government float by the public, it was decided to move the float, which was 40' x 50' to Pope's landing. After a while the people asked for a small float there, as the only school house in Pender harbour was situated close to Donley's and it was claimed that a large percentage of the children had to go to school in boats, and there was no place for them to land except at Donley's private float, and the small boats were in the way of the steamers and fishing boats, for which purposes the private float was built. It was sufficient at the time, but I think that the fish business has grown, and that as Donley's float is getting old the department would be warranted in building an addition to the present float, which would relieve Mr. Donley from the necessity of keeping his float in repair. The Union Steamship Company will then be able to call at the government float, but they will naturally tie up to the float that has the most freight on it to load.

The existing float was built in 1913-1914, and was repaired and moved to Pope's landing in 1919-20. A new float was built at Donley's landing in 1920-21, and this vote, I understand, is for enlargement of the present landing.

Mr. McQUARRIE: There is another float at Pope's landing, is there not?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There may be.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The statement I made was that the telegraph office was at Gonzales and Dames landing, not at Donley's. The minister had it placed at Donley's landing. I thought the hon. member for Comox-Alberni would be fair enough to confirm my statement, but he does not seem inclined to do so, although he knows it is perfectly correct. He has also spoken of a summer hotel. If he has information that this is merely a summer hotel, his information is very defective. It is a hotel that is run all the year round, and one that has been used for a great number of years. It is not a summer hotel proposition at all.

As to the quantity of freight that is handled at Gonzales landing, I would say that at least ten times, and possibly more, is handled there than at Donley's. Another point that I took exception to in the minister's statement was in regard to whether the government had done anything for the other wharf, and I understood him to say that the government did not assume any responsibility at all in reference to that other wharf. I think he was wrong in that; the information which he had was not correct.

The minister seems to complain now because I have some local knowledge, and as he says, have played on it. I do not see how that is really a matter of censure so far as I am concerned. When I find that the minister has not correct information I think it is my duty to supply him with reliable information when I happen to have it, and I know this place very well.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said something about politics. There is no politics in this so far as I am concerned. The place is not in my constituency, but I happen to be a land owner in this particular neighborhood, and I happen to go there quite frequently. I am not objecting to this particular vote for Donley's landing at all, and I think I made that perfectly clear, but I did say to the minister that I thought the other landing required attention. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni said that he was there last summer. Well, I have no doubt he would not go there in the winter, because he would be afraid of being seasick; he does not like to cross the water in the winter.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I want to know what on earth the state of my stomach has to do with Donley's float?

Mr. McQUARRIE: The point is this, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni said he was there last summer, and had not heard any complaint about the condition of the wharf at Gonzales landing. I do not know how that happened at all, because when I was there I did hear complaints. and many of them. I was told by these people that they had been very unfairly treated, that they were not being taken care of at all, and that their landing was the place where the business of the harbour was being done, where all the steamers called regularly, and where the great part of the freight for that harbour was handled. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni had better make another trip up there and get his information more up-to-date. I mentioned this particular case to the minister in good faith, and I certainly resent any criticism from either the minister or the hon. member for having done so. The hon. gentleman should have no particular objection to my mentioning a matter of this kind. If I happen to be a constituent of his at certain times of the year when he is not looking after his duties as he should, and see some things that should be attended to, surely he should welcome my assistance.

Mr. NEILL: I shall make it my business to inquire into this matter carefully and in particular ascertain the location of the hon gentleman's townsite lot.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I did not say anything about a townsite lot. That is another insinuation which I resent.

Mr. NEILL: If my hon. friend takes exception to that term I will apologize and use the word "property," an expresion he himself employed. Surely he will not object to that. When I get the information as to the location of his property and bring it to the attention of the House hon. members will be in a better position to gauge the value of my hon. friend's statements.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It does not make any difference to me, as far as my property is concerned, which one of these wharves is fixed up, not in the least, so that the insinuation which has fallen from the lips of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is absolutely unwarranted. There is no foundation for it at all. It does not make a bit of difference to me which wharf is repaired; I want to see them all fixed up. As a matter of fact I could tell my hon. friend that Donley's wharf happens practically to adjoin the property that I have there, and I use his wharf just as much as I use the other.

Mr. McBRIDE: I may say that I know Pender harbour fairly well—in fact I ran a steamer in there for some years—and the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni are absolutely correct. I think this money should be spent on Donley's wharf. I was up there last summer, and there were a number of people who desired to get off at the wharf. Some remained on board while others were going ashore for fear the wharf would turn over if too many landed at the one time.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. McQUARRIE: May I ask the hon. member for Cariboo how the business done at Donley's wharf compares with that at Gonzale's and Dame's wharf?

Mr. McBRIDE: When I was up there all the business was done at Donley's wharf.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That shows the hon. member for Comox-Alberni does not know anything at all about the matter. He is making reckless statements that have no foundation in fact at all.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. gentleman is getting mixed up. He means the hon. member for Cariboo not the member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I see neither rhyme nor reason for the attitude assumed by the hon. member for Cariboo because evidently he does not know anything about the position of affairs. He has made a statement which is absolutely misleading and he knows it.

Mr. LOVETT: I suggest that the hon. members who are exchanging these compliments should settle their differences outside the House. We do not want to sit here and listen to such remarks which are altogther irrelevant to the matter at issue.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I do not see anything wrong with the discussion.

Mr. LOVETT: I would advise my hon. friends to go outside and settle their differences.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I take exception to the remarks of the last speaker, there is no reason for them whatever. I do not think I have occupied very much time during this session.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McBRIDE: You have occupied more time than any other member of the House.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Here is the hon. member for Cariboo again. He says I have spoken more than any other member in the House. Now he knows that is an untrue statement.

Mr. McBRIDE: I do not.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It is absolutely without any foundation whatever.

Mr. LOVETT: I do not take exception to the hon. member's talking in a businesslike way when he adheres to the item under discussion, but I do object to the irrelevant talk that has been going on for some minutes especially when we hope to make progress and finish up very shortly.

Mr. McQUARRIE: If estimates are brought down at the end of the session we will rush them through, I suppose?

Mr. LOVETT: These estimates were brought down long ago.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The hon. gentleman is most unfair in suggesting that I have been wasting time in discussing this item.

Mr. LOVETT: Discuss the matter in a businesslike way and confine yourself to the item.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Oh yes, discuss it in a businesslike way! When I wish to get advice from the hon. gentleman I will ask him for it. I consider his intervention in this matter as nothing short of impertinence.

What does the hon. gentleman himself do in this House? He is simply a rubber stamp and nothing else.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LOVETT: It is better to be a rubber stamp than a nuisance.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I did not catch my hon. friend's observation.

Mr. LOVETT: I will repeat it if necessary.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Both expressions, "rubber stamp," and "nuisance" are unparliamentary and should be withdrawn.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I withdraw the "rubber stamp" observation.

Mr. LOVETT: I withdraw the word "nuisance."

Mr. McQUARRIE: I certainly am surprised that when I make a perfectly reasonable suggestion to the minister it should arouse all this commotion. I cannot conceive what objection there can be to my stating that there is another landing in this particular harbour which requires attention. I suggested to the minister that the other landing was the one where most of the business in this harbour was carried on, and I defy any one to contradict that statement because it is absolutely correct.

Mr. McBRIDE: I take exception to some of my hon. friend's remarks. I have no reason whatever to retract anything I said. The statement I made was absolutely correct, and no person who goes up there and sees the conditions as they exist will say otherwise. As for the other wharf I have been there a number of times. I have been in that harbour I suppose a hundred and fifty times and I have very seldom seen anybody on that wharf but Chinamen or Indians.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The information contributed by hon. members who have local knowledge of the district has been of value to the committee. However, the item is not a large one. It is simply for the extension of the existing float and I think it ought to be carried now.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I must say that I think the eyesight of the hon. member for Cariboo must be as bad as the stomach of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Item agreed to.

Sayward—wharf replacement, $11,600.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a large item; what is the explanation?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My memorandum reads:

To construct a wharf 90 feet by 50 feet with an approach 146 feet by 16 feet (including King truss for passage of drift logs), a float 14 feet by 38 feet, gangway 38 feet by 4 feet and slip 9 feet by 38 feet. The proposed structure is required to replace the existing wharf which is in a dilapidated condition. Sayward is an important point on Vancouver island. The wharf has been maintained there for many years, and this is for replacement of the existing structure.

Item agreed to.

Sidney—repairs to wharves, $7,250.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is this item?

Mr. KING (Kootenay: My memorandum in regard to this wharf reads:

(1) General repairs to wharf consisting of the renewal of the superstructure of the approach 374 feet long by 19 feet 3 inches wide, the renewal of 758 lineal feet of creosoted piling, also minor repairs to wharf head and concrete piers, estimated cost, $4,000.

(2) General repairs to auto ferry slip and the construction of a sheet pile guide wall, 145 feet in length, estimated cost, $3,250.

Amount required for 1924-25, $7,250.

Item agreed to.

Tofino—wharf repairs, $5,400.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is this?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is situated on Vancouver island on the west coast, and this item is for renewal of untreated bearing piles, in wharf head with creosoting piling, and so forth. We put in bearing piles, cross-braces and untreated fender piles, one creosoted horizontal fender and rough lumber, making in all an expenditure of $5,400.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: By tender?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): By tender and contract.

Item agreed to.

Vancouver, Stanley park, foreshore protection, $8,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before that item passes, being the last on the list, will my hon. friend tell me how the appropriations not required, amounting to $136,435, are made up? How much of that represents work that has been done and money spent, and how much work abandoned?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is a book-keeping item, placed there by the Finance department, in making up their statement. It represents the unexpended portions of the vote of last year under these items, work done or work dropped.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend is entirely wrong. It is not a bookkeeping item to commence with. It is an item which is supposed to give the House information and supposed to be a reliable item.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is a reliable item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not an item showing work dropped. It shows works which have been finished and all the money spent on them. That is what it represents. It is of importance to know what it is, because if we do not know we cannot properly judge the expenditure one year from another year. It is not a bookkeeping item.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have the information before me. My hon. friend is absolutely wrong when he says it is not a bookkeeping item, because it is. It is not an item inserted by the Department of Public Works, but one inserted by the Department of Finance. It is made up of unexpended votes last year. I will read them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the first item?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Anglemont wharf, $4,300.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was done with that?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That was spent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then it was not dropped. What is the next?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Arrow park, reconstruction of wharf. The next would be Balfour, repairs to wharf.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that dropped or is the money spent?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The money spent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The amount is $1,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the next?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Beaton wharf repairs and improvements, $1,760.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was the money spent?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I believe so. Then the next is Bishop's landing float renewal, $1,400.

[Mr. J. H. King.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was the work done and money spent?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I believe so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want the facts.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I will give my hon. friend the list, or if he likes I will give it to Hansard.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the list show the works abandoned as against the works completed?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The list is here and if my hon. friend wishes, we will have it placed on Hansard. Those items marked on this list in black indicate the expenditure having been made.

Mr. ANDERSON: The hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) was not in the House this afternoon, and he might want to inquire about this item.

Mr. McBRIDE: May I ask the hon. gentleman what he is doing?

Mr. CLARK: I have no remark to make in regard to this vote, except that to my own knowledge it is a very necessary one. It is work going on from year to year, and I understand it is the same amount as last year and less than the previous year. Is that not correct?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend is familiar with the character of this work, and I quite agree with him it is a necessary expenditure. It is done in connection with the Stanley Park Board, and they are doing a very useful work. The amount is not as large probably as we would like, but it is a continuation of the work that was undertaken some time ago.

Mr. McBRIDE: I was just going to say that I am sorry the minister cannot see his way to make the amount a little larger. As he has already stated, the work is being carried out in connection with the Stanley Park Board, and it cannot be carried on as economically as it would be if the job were gone on with and completed. It will take more than this amount to complete the work, and if the minister could see his way to put in the supplementary estimates an amount sufficient to complete the work once it is started, I think the work could be done to much better advantage.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have in my hand the list which the minister sends me. This list shows total appropriations not required amounting to $136,435. I have no objection, if it will save time, to handing to Hansard what he suggests, as long as I know what it means. It may mean first that the work is being carried on and the money spent, and therefore you want the vote, or it may be that the department, on investigation, will drop the project. I want to know into which of these different classes each of the items on this list will go. The list, as handed over, does not show that. The deputy minister is present and he will know what work he is going on with and what he has dropped.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think it would be almost impossible for the deputy minister to know that without having a report prepared. There are many items in the list, and if my hon. friend wishes the information we shall have it prepared and submitted to him to-morrow giving him the particulars.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That would be a very easy thing to do.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is impossible for anyone to carry that information in his head.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not saying that, but it will be a very simple thing to do.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, we shall have the information prepared and it will be supplied to my hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

Dredging—
Maritime provinces..	$540,000
Ontario and Quebec..	562,500
Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta..	90,000
British Columbia..	375,000
	$1,567,500

Mr. BAXTER: Will any of this money be spent for clearing out the dredged space on the west side of St. John harbour which has been seeping in ever since that work was performed some years ago and which is not yet completely occupied by wharves?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That would come not under this vote, but under the St. John harbour vote.

Mr BAXTER: There is no St. John harbour vote.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, there will be a vote for St. John harbour.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was spent last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was spent $489,000 on dredging done by government dredges.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any reason why we cannot reduce this vote to what was spent last year, $489,000, and save something?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I hardly think you can reduce the vote. In fact, I think we have made a very considerable reduction. The amount I have given is for departmental plant alone. Other work was done by contract last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want to know the whole amount spent under the vote last year. Perhaps we might call it six o'clock and let this information be secured. The information I want on these items, so that the minister will know, is the total amount spent last year for dredging on each of the four items: Maritime provinces, Ontario and Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and British Columbia. Then in addition to that I want to get some idea as to the work done, having regard to the quantities; I want to see what this work which is being done by the department is costing per yard. What do the government reports show? These statistics are usually available and if they are not they should be. We want to see what we are getting for the money that is being voted.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is some information which I cannot lay my hand on at the moment. I hope the information my hon. friend requires will be available.

Progress reported.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 130, respecting Alliance Nationale. —Mr. Archambault.

Bill No. 158, to incorporate Merchants Casualty Insurance Company.—Mr. Euler.

LAURENTIAN INSURANCE COMPANY

On the motion for the third reading of Bill No. 159, to incorporate The Laurentian Insurance Company.—Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have been looking through my file of bills during the consideration of these private bills and I have not been able to find any of them. I suggest that the Senate bills, especially divorce bills, be placed in a file by themselves. At present it is almost impossible for a member to find a particular private bill, and one does not like to hold up the work of the committee until he has found it.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 170, for the relief of Philip R. Marshall Palmer.—Mr. Duff.

Bill No. 171, for the relief of George Felix Simpson.—Mr. Ladner.

SUPPLY

PUBLIC WORKS

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Public Works—dredging—Maritime provinces, $540,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Before six o'clock the hon. member for West York asked certain questions regarding the dredging vote. That information is being prepared, and with his concurrence I would suggest that we allow this item to stand and take up the next one, for roads and bridges.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is quite all right.

Item stands.

Dominion roads and bridges generally, $5,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that the annual vote?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. It is for repairs, painting, and so forth.

Item agreed to.

International bridge over river St. John between Clair, N.B., and Fort Kent, Me., the state of Maine to provide $15,000; county of Aroostook, $10,000 and town of Fort Kent, $5,000, $29,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: What is being done in connection with this?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This amount is required towards the construction of an international bridge across the St. John river between Clair, N.B., and Fort Kent, Maine. The proposed structure will consist of 3 steel spans, each 232 feet in length, on concrete piers and abutments. It will have a roadway 20 feet in width and a sidewalk 6 feet wide. The estimated cost of the work is placed at $150,700, exclusive of approaches, but this is only tentative as there are three sites under consideration at the present time and until one is definitely decided upon the plans cannot be finally prepared. I may say that this expenditure is a joint international expenditure, the state of Maine contributing one half the cost of the bridge.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister said the cost was to be $150,000. If we are paying half, why have we not an item for $75,000?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We shall not need more than the amount suggested here for this year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it not a great deal better to say what it is? The government will be called upon to enter into a contract for $75,000, and they will have no authority to enter into a contract for that amount if they obey the law.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are asking parliament for $29,000 this year with a view to entering into an arrangement with the state of Maine for the construction of this bridge. It is an international undertaking, and it is not usual to vote the whole amount. It is estimated that $29,000 will be sufficient for our needs this year. The information given here is that the estimate of $150,000 is tentative, as the site has not yet been permanently located, and as my hon. friend knows, the location of the site will have much to do with the cost.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But is there no certificate from the auditor or other officer showing the authorization for the liability which the government incurs in connection with works of this kind, showing that they are authorized, and whether there are available funds for the work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There has been an application, and the information is that the state of Maine is prepared to enter into an arrangement for building this bridge. Our engineers have reported on it, and they suggest a total expenditure of $150,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is $75,000 for us?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, it will be fifty-fifty in the end. There has been a conference between the engineers of the Public Works department and those representing the state of Maine. I think we are taking the usual course in expenditures of this kind. This is not the first international bridge.

There is one already at Edmundston, and this was the course followed.

Mr. HANSON: It seems to me a remarkable thing that the government is contemplating an expenditure of this amount away up on the head waters of the river St. John, where settlement is very thin, and where the number of people to be served is very small indeed. The government cannot find $17,500 to pay for an international bridge across the St. Croix river at Vanceboro, which would be a through thoroughfare between the United States and Canada for tourist traffic. For two sessions I have been urging the minister to enter into an agreement with the state of Maine to pay one half the cost of such a bridge at Vanceboro, where they now have no bridge. The people used to use what was a private bridge across a lumber dam at that point, but that was carried away by the ice. Representations were made to the legislature of the state of Maine, and they voted one-half of the money, the understanding being, of course, that the Dominion of Canada would pay the other half of the cost of the bridge. The Maine vote lapses this year, and nothing has been done by the government of this country to keep faith with these people. That is a very much smaller expenditure than this, but it has been refused by this government on account of economy. That is a perfectly valid excuse, but imagine the amazement of the people on both sides of the international boundary to learn that the government cannot find half of $35,000 to pay its share for that bridge, yet they can find half of $150,000 to pay for another international bridge across another stream that forms the international boundary—a bridge that will be a much larger and a much more expensive structure to serve a community that has not one-tenth the number of people who would be served by an international bridge across the St. Croix river at Vanceboro. I think the people of that county have very just grounds of complaint against the government. The government are not consistent and their plea for economy is not sincere. I do not think the minister has treated the southern part of the province of New Brunswick fairly. I suppose the explanation lies in the fact that the county of Madawaska elects a supporter of the government while the county of York does not and never will.

Mr. CALDWELL: They came pretty near it the last time.

Mr. MICHAUD: My hon. friend (Mr. Hanson) has stated that the district where this bridge is to be constructed is thinly settled. I am afraid the hon. member is sadly lacking in a knowledge of the actual conditions. I should like him to be a little more generous when he is dealing with the question of patronage. In my own town we need a new post office, but I sat in the House for ten years and never made any such remarks as he has uttered to-night; I should not like to do it under any consideration. Now at Fort Kent and Clair nearly all the tourist traffic bound for Montreal and other parts of Quebec crosses the boundary, and there is a town of considerable size there. I may also inform my hon. friend that the northern part of the county of Madawaska is thickly and not thinly settled. He can satisfy himself on that point if he will travel through that part of my county next summer. This bridge will be built at the expense of the state of Maine and the Dominion of Canada. We already have an international bridge across the St. John river. It is practically the only benefit we derive from the Dominion treasury whereas that part of New Brunswick contributes thousands of dollars to the Dominion treasury every year. I am satisfied that the port of Clair yielded one million dollars in customs duties during the last ten years, and has done so for the past twenty years. I know what I am speaking about. If my hon. friend does not know any more about the revenue derived from that locality than he does about the population he is not very well informed.

About ten years ago, or a few years before the Great War began, parliament voted a subsidy to build this bridge. It was not constructed, however, owing to difficulties that were raised by some friends of the then government. They wanted the bridge to be built at the door of a certain gentleman, a Conservative too, who had so much influence with the government that he blocked the entire enterprise. Since that time the public have felt the need of the bridge very much. I do not care what government builds the structure; it is badly needed, especially in the interest of the country around the upper part of the St. John river which my hon. friend knows is one of the important districts of the province. My hon. friend should know that the district in question is growing very rapidly. He ought to know too that we need an international bridge, and I hope he will not place any more obstacles in the way of carrying out the project.

Mr. HANSON: My hon. friend has missed the whole point of my criticism. I am not complaining particularly of the construction of this bridge, but I am accusing the government of inconsistency in undertaking a work of this magnitude when they cannot find a very much lesser sum for a much smaller structure at a more important point in the community. I should like to point out further that the government of Canada have already built a bridge at a point in that up-river country not very far from the site of the proposed bridge—less than thirty miles away, if my memory serves me aright. I am not so ignorant of the conditions in that part of the country as the hon. gentleman alleges; I have been up here within the last two years. This district is comparatively new country, and the settlement is very largely along both sides of the river. I venture to say that the most important traffic on this bridge when it is constructed will be rum runners from the state of Maine into the province of Quebec.

Mr. MICHAUD: Going to Fredericton, I suppose?

Mr. HANSON: I think I am justified in that statement from the facts which have come to my knowledge. But that is not the point at all. What I complain of is that the government have refused to meet the authorities of the state of Maine in regard to the construction of a much smaller, less expensive, and much more important structure. For reasons that are quite apparent here, and quite apparent to the minister, they refused to build the structure that has been asked for by the people of York county and the people of Vanceboro in a much more thickly settled district, and in the direct line of tourist traffic—in fact it is the most direct line—from the New England states to the city of St. John. I should like to point out this further fact, that the county represented by my hon. friend is about to receive a splendid post office from this government. It looks as though the government can find money for certain public works in certain constituencies but they are unable to find funds for works in other constituencies.

Mr. MICHAUD: Does my hon. friend not know that in the county of Madawaska there has not been one public building constructed by any government. It is about time now that we should have one.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend from York-Sunbury is hardly fair in his remarks. This matter is not a new one because I find a vote of $30,000 was provided in the estimates for 1914-15 for a bridge at this point. In 1915-16 there was a re-vote and again in 1916-17.

[Mr. Hanson.]

Mr. MICHAUD: That is for the same bridge.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The committee will readily understand, therefore, that this project has been before parliament year after year. My hon. friend (Mr. Hanson) has suggested that we are discriminating against him in the request he made last year.

Mr. HANSON: Two years ago.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, last year I think the request was made that the government should enter into arrangements with the state of Maine to construct a bridge across the St. Croix river. But under conditions as they are to-day I feel that we should complete projects that are already in hand before entering upon new undertakings. I have no doubt the structure to which he refers is an important one, but I can assure him that the representation of the county has not entered into the matter. He knows very well that many public works throughout Canada are being requested by members in all parts of the chamber, but the government are not in a position to-day to carry them out. I can say to my hon. friend that the government are not neglecting this matter. On the contrary we have been making very thorough and very careful inquiries. The sum originally suggested was considered too large, and the engineering staff investigated the situation in order to see whether a bridge that would meet the demands of traffic could not be constructed for a smaller amount than had been suggested.

Mr. HANSON: Does the minister consider the expenditure of the money upon this structure an absolute necessity, having regard to the financial condition of the country to-day?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There have been negotiations with the state of Maine since 1914 and 1915 with regard to this matter, they have appropriated sums of money in conjunction with this parliament and I think that we should continue to vote that sum at least this year in order to carry out the understandings that were entered into by the friends of my hon. friend when they were on this side of the House. I am sorry the hon. gentleman has seen fit to view the structure in the way he has. That is not the way I view it. I respect my hon. friend as a member of this House, and I like to consider his representations and do the best I can for him.

Mr. HANSON: I am bound to say that the minister is sympathetically inclined towards the request I have made. I think he has always found me ready to do him justice, and I want him to do me justice. It is quite apparent that the reason this bridge was not built, if it was in the estimates so long ago as 1914 and 1915, was because of the war.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There were no rum-runners then.

Mr. HANSON: No. I hapen to know this community, and I do not think the minister would be justified, having regard to the financial conditions, to build a structure of that size at this point, when he is aware that there is a fine bridge, 30 miles away, crossing the international boundary at Edmundston. Half of it was paid for by this government, and half of it was paid for by the state of Maine. I think the last payment was made only two years ago. Here is the situation: On the frontier, several hundred miles long, there is at present one international bridge in the northern part of the county connecting Edmundston with the state of Maine. The density of settlement is all south of that, along the international boundary, as my hon. friend well knows, and the further north you go along the frontier the nearer you come to the wilderness. This part of Clair that has been spoken of is near the head waters of the river, in the very western angle of the province, and I submit that for the purposes of local traffic it is not justified. There may be some justifictation on account of the through traffic which has lately originated between the province of New Brunswick and the state of Maine. I leave it to the minister's imaginaation to say what that traffic is. It is pretty well known out in that part of the country. but the other bridge, for which I asked him to place a vote in the estimates, is not for any such purpose at all. It is to accommodate a very large and increasing volume of tourist traffic by automobile between the New England states and the province of New Brunswick, on a line which will be the most direct route between the province of New Brunswick and the state of Maine. It has been asked for by the people down there. Half of the amount has been voted by the state of Maine and that vote is now current, but it will lapse this year unless this government does its share. It is immaterial to me whether it is built or not, but the people of the community want it.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would like to join with the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) in support of the bridge at Vanceboro. I think it is a necessity and should have been built long ago. In fact, it should have been built by his friends when they were in office. I cannot agree with him when he says that, considering the density of the population, it is a more important point than Fort Kent on the American side or Clair on the Canadian side. I do not know whether he is as well acquainted with that section as I am. I do know that development has taken place in that northern section of New Brunswick more rapidly in the last ten years than in any other part of the province. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HANSON: What district is the hon. gentleman speaking of?

Mr. CALDWELL: North of Edmundston. I happen to be very well acquainted with that country. I have done business all over that country for the last fifteen years and I know it very well indeed. I went up there last year and was surprised—not having been there for three or four years previous—to find the development that had taken place. I think $150,000 is a pretty costly bridge to construct over the river at that point. The minister would be well advised to have his engineers look into the project very closely because the river St. John is not such a large river at that point as it is further down, where the other tributaries come into it. At the same time a bridge is needed. The density of the population is great on both sides and there is a great deal of traffic there. I regret to hear the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) say the only traffic across that river would be rum-runners. I could not credit that. There may be some rum-running done there. I think possibly that there would be as great traffic in rum-running at Vanceboro if this bridge were built. However, as a result of the late conventions entered into by the United States and Canadian governments, I think they will be able to handle this traffic very well indeed. In speaking of the international bridges, it is a fact that there is only a very limited portion of the boundary between the province of New Brunswick and the state of Maine that is international water, the St. Croix river for a short distance in the southern part and the St. John river in the northern part. There is an international bridge at St. Stephen, New Brunswick, on the St. Croix river. I do not know how far from Vanceboro that would be.

Mr. HANSON: Forty-five miles.

Mr. CALDWELL: My hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) says there is a good bridge thirty miles from Fort Kent. That is a good distance to travel, when you have to come back thirty miles on the other side of the river. It would mean you would have to travel sixty miles, and I do not think that is reasonable. I would urge the minister to consider both bridges. Both are very badly needed. Let the minister consider whether the bridges at Fort Kent and Clair could not be constructed for less than $150,000. It seems to me it should be done for less.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When was the private bridge at Vanceboro destroyed?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the information, but if my memory serves me aright, my attention was called to it when we were making up our estimates for 1923-24. My hon. friend says two years ago. He may be right. This bridge was part of the dam; they utilized the structure of the dam for roadway purposes. I think this timber has to be taken out.

Mr. CALDWELL: How has the traffic been accommodated?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They were using the dam, which has to be removed. I have not definite knowledge of it.

Mr. CALDWELL: What will be the method of getting across when the dam is removed? Will there be a ferry or a temporary structure?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is quite a difference in the conditions affecting the two propositions. In the one instance the country is making a new avenue and in the other it is replacing one that is gone. How are the public going to get along down there? They have been accustomed to using this bridge.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I suppose they will go down and cross the river below on a ferry.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What distance are they from the next bridge?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the information. We have not that item before us. I am only speaking from memory, but I would say from 25 to 30 or 40 miles.

Mr. HANSON: Milltown.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Milltown.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If that is true the people that had a road and an international bridge which is now taken away, instead of having to go 30 miles, have to go 40 miles out of their way. The government is starting a new venture, to cut out an unnecessary detour of 30 miles, while providing no remedy for this disability of 40 miles. My hon. friend says, "Let us get rid of the things we are committed to." Why he has not even bought a site. When does the vote in connection with the Clair bridge run out?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In 1925.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The same year as the Vanceboro vote runs out.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What difference is there in favour of Vanceboro as against Clair? There is a fifty-fifty offer. Is there any difference, except that one bridge really costs more than the other?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend is dealing with the viewpoint of it being a provincial bridge and provincial traffic. These interstate and interprovincial bridges only come into consideration occasionally. The traffic in New Brunswick and in the state of Maine is not every day traffic. It is interstate and interprovincial traffic. It is true that there has been an indifferent roadway through that section of the country used by people who had to use it back and forth. I am advised the railway is not of a first class character. The trading points of the people there are not in the state of Maine but in adjoining towns within the province of New Brunswick. My hon. friend will say that this is a smaller expenditure and his friend from West York says that the population is more dense and, therefore, should receive consideration. We have had a variance of opinion on that. The information I have been able to gather is that in the northern portion there has been greater activity and a more rapid development in population than there has been at this point where my hon. friend says that we should put in an interprovincial bridge where heretofore the residents utilized the top of an old dam which is now being removed I should like very much to meet the desire of the hon. member for West York and to give the people of that section accommodation which would be nice for them, but it has not been thought wise in the judgment of the government to put in the estimates an item for that structure. The item under discussion deals with a bridgeway at Clair, a matter that has been under consideration between the Dominion and the state of Maine for some years, dating back to 1914-15.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What difference is there between the character of traffic at one point and the other?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think there is any difference. There will be a little more north than south.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has my hon. friend figures on that?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has he any figures in connection with the traffic that went over the old structure at Vanceboro?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not at hand.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the whole character of the traffic is the same, the offer of the state of Maine is the same, the vote of the state of Maine and its offer both adopted in the same year. There is nothing in those one way or the other. Is there anything in this at all except that one is to cost the country $75,000 and the other $17,000?

Mr. MARTELL: We spend a great deal of time discussing small votes for the Maritime provinces. I quite agree with the hon. member for West York that if there is a valid claim there it should be implemented. Supposing we spent $10,000,000 in the Maritime provinces in order to give the people proper facilities for trade, that would not involve one-tenth the indebtedness that is being incurred for outlays in other portions of the country. We vote millions upon millions with very little discussion in this House when the expenditure is for the benefit of the people of other provinces; but the very instant a small item for the Maritime provinces comes up for consideration, we are treated to disquisitions from practically every member in the House from Cape North to Vancouver. I do not care who represents in this House a constituency in the Maritime provinces, whether he be Liberal, Conservative or Progressive, I am quite confident that when he is advocating something in the interest of his particular constituency, he is not advocating anything that is not our just right in the provinces which constitute the Maritimes of the country. I am deeply grateful for the fact that we have as Minister of Public Works, the Hon. Mr. King, an old Maritimer who, when he left the Maritimes went to the maritime coast of the Pacific. Therefore, we hope that he will constantly bear in mind the interest which we have in the Maritime provinces. These breakwaters, wharves, bridges, are just as essential to us in the Maritime provinces as railways are to the people of the West, and we should view these things in a broader spirit. No man wants to waste public money at the present time.

It is a wonder the people of the Maritimes remain in confederation. It often comes to my mind that it is a wonder why the law-abiding people of the Maritime provinces do not break out into rebellion, because they are constantly being made hewers of wood and drawers of water for the rest of the people of this Dominion. It has been said that confederation was cradled in the Maritime provinces. None of us is asking to get out of confederation; but if we are going to have things that are absolutely essential to the people of the Maritime provinces taking up the time of this House and carping criticism directed at them, while millions are voted for other portions of the country which were built up by the Maritimes, then you are only hastening the day of rebellion in the Maritimes.

I am surprised that above all others the hon. member for West York, the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), a man who is usually fair and one for whom I have great regard, should spend so much time in carping criticism of anything intended to promote the interests of the Maritime provinces. The Minister of Public Works would not be very far amiss to grant both the bridges, the one asked by the hon. member for West York, though he may be a Tory and I cannot claim to be very much in sympathy with the Tories, and the one asked by the hon. member for Restigouche and Madawaska (Mr. Michaud). If the Maritime provinces got both, they would not be getting one-half of what is squandered in other portions of the country and which is voted with very little discussion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has got the wrong corner of this. I have been talking in favour of a bridge at Vanceboro and wondering why on earth it is dropped in order to go to a place further away.

Mr. MARTELL: They are both necessary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not opposing the bridge at Vanceboro. On the other hand, I am trying to see why we cannot get it. There is an item inserted in the estimates and I want to see the reason for the distinction. If by any means we can get a bridge in that part of the country, in a proper place, we should get it. I do not see why my hon. friend is cross with me. I am sure he is not, it is merely simulated wrath. There is a bridge to be built where there is no traffic, there is a bridge not to be built where there is traffic and where they had a bridge which has disappeared. There is no difference in the character of the use; they are both exactly the same. There is no difference in the offer from the state of Maine; it is exactly the same. The only difference is that one bridge will cost $75,000 and the other $35,000. A suggestion was made why the more expensive bridge is being built, and that suggestion was that it did not happen to be in a Conservative constituency represented by my hon. friend who raised the question. I have been endeavouring to find out if there is any other reason and so far I have not been able to get it. That is all.

Mr. CALDWELL: I might be able to help the hon. member for West York a little as to the difference in traffic at those two points. At Vanceboro there is practically no population except the town of Vanceboro on the United States side and the town of McAdam on the Canadian side about six miles from the international boundary. They are connected by a railway bridge across the St. Croix river at Vanceboro. I do not know how many horses there are in Vanceboro or in McAdam, but in any case there must be very few because these two places are railway towns and whatever traffic there is all goes over the railway bridge. At Fort Kent and at Clair the situation is absolutely different. I may observe by the way that the country around Vanceboro and McAdam is not and probably will never be settled by farmers. It is not farming land; and although it was good for lumber at one time it is a rocky section of country, of granite formation. This is one part of the province of New Brunswick which has always struck me as an unfortunate location for a railway to pass through, because people coming from the West and from the middle provinces get a very poor impression of New Brunswick as they go by rail past this district. It is a section of country not fit for anything except bears and game; it reminds me of what an hon. member said last year in regard to some section of northern Ontario which he described as being all rocks and Christmas trees. These two towns are pretty much in the same condition. At Fort Kent and Clair, however, there is a very fertile country thickly settled by farmers and there is a lot of local traffic across the team bridge in that locality which would not exist at Vanceboro. The traffic at Vanceboro is largely tourist traffic; there would be very little local traffic there. At this other place, however, it is important that a bridge should be built with the least possible delay. But there is no comparison at all between the country around Vanceboro and the district at Kent and Clair from the standpoint of local traffic. As I say, the bridge at Vanceboro is a railway bridge and it serves very largely the tourist traffic to and from the Maritime provinces. It is one of the gateways into the Maritime provinces and Americans coming to that part of the Dominion very largely go by that route. But, I repeat, there is no comparison between the two districts from the point of view of local traffic.

Mr. HANSON: What the hon. member does not know about local conditions and the extent of traffic that passes through Vanceboro would fill a book. I venture to say that in his whole lifetime he has not spent any appreciable time there, apart from an occasional quarter of an hour which he might put in at McAdam while changing from one train to another or getting his lunch. That would be the extent of his acquaintance with local conditions. Let me tell him that there are from twelve to fifteen hundred people living in McAdam and that there are some one hundred and twenty motor cars owned in the community. The most direct route these people have out of the place is the Vanceboro road; they have to cross at Vanceboro and go down on the Maine side to get to the nearest town of St. Stephen. It is only in recent years that they have enjoyed the benefit of a highway from the east towards Fredericton. That road was completed only a year or two ago and until then the only highway out of the community was via Vanceboro and on the American side either up or down. The hon. member says that Vanceboro is a small community.

Mr. CALDWELL: No; I said it was a railway town.

Mr. HANSON: They are both railway towns, and there is traffic through them; there is vehicular traffic that absolutely requires a bridge. As a matter of fact there used to be a bridge, not by the grace of any government but by the good will of the paper company who operated in the neighbourhood and who owned the bridge. These people notified the inhabitants well in advance that they were going to tear down the dam and that therefore a new bridge would have to be provided. We would not be here asking for a bridge if it were not that the provincial government of New Brunswick, whose duty in my opinion it was in the first instance to provide one, absolutely refused to contribute a dollar, passing the buck on to the Dominion as they usually do if they have the opportunity. But there is ample precedent for this government contributing half of the cost of the bridge; the Dominion government did so in the case of the other international boundary, on the St. John river in the very community or within a short distance of the community where the minister now proposes to build an expensive structure. No matter what the traffic may be between Clair and Fort Kent the river is of such a nature there that it is feasible to ferry it, while on the St. Croix river, where the bridge was situated, ferrying is impossible as anyone can see who looks out the railway car window. It is not possible to work a ferry there because there is not a sufficient depth of water in ordinary times; it is a shallow stony stream which can be crossed only by a bridge.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We should have this item properly stated. My hon. friend informed the committee that Maine was to put up half the cost of $150,000. Why does he not let us have the proper estimate so that the work can really go on? I should think it would be done by a lump contract and the amount of the contract ought to be voted before the contract is let. That is the usual thing. But there is a more serious objection to the vote as it stands: It does not agree with the statement given by the minister. The vote reads:

—the state of Maine to provide $15,000; county of Aroostook, $10,000 and town of Fort Kent, $5,000.

That totals only $30,000, but if my hon. friend is right there should be a contribution of $75,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think the item is being voted in the usual form. There is no great advantage in our having more money than we can expend this year; it would only swell the estimates and my hon. friend would be the first to complain that if we could not spend the money we should not vote it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not for contract work.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is no contract let.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The liability has to be undertaken for the whole $75,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This was the practice in 1914, 1915 and 1916 and in 1920.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why should we have an untrue statement in the wording of the vote?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I understand the wording is absolutely the same as it was in 1920.

Mr. CALDWELL: To clarify matters, the minister might tell us what agreement our government has with the state of Maine to ensure that they will pay up the balance of their share of $75,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is no agreement. They set aside certain moneys on the understanding that there would be an agreement after the site had been settled upon and a final estimate made. This 9 p.m. vote has been carried along; it is a preliminary vote. The same practice was followed in the Edmundston construction; I cannot see the advantage of voting $75,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why not tell the truth in the item?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): What does the hon. gentleman mean?

Mr. CALDWELL: I am surprised at the attitude of the hon. member (Sir Henry Drayton); I cannot understand why he should want us to vote the whole sum for the bridge although it may not be completed for two or three years, when he absolutely objected to allowing the whole amount to go through in the case of railway construction where there was also a contract.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member is entirely wrong. We never did anything of the sort.

Mr. CALDWELL: The hon. member's leader did.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He never did.

Mr. CALDWELL: I may be obtuse, but I leave it to the judgment of the committee whether the hon. gentleman did not object last year to the bringing down of the whole amount for branch railways; he insisted that the necessary amount should be brought down in the estimates each year. Now the hon. member's attitude is different; he wants the committee to vote the whole sum to build this bridge notwithstanding that we may use only $20,000 this year. I want to be sure that we are not going to undertake the building of a bridge costing $150,000 and then find it left on our hands without some guarantee that the state of Maine will pay its share.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We will not go on with the construction without such a guarantee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member is wrong in his reference to the railway matter. The issue was as to the necessity for having the expenditures voted. We took the position then, and we take it now, that the honest and the proper thing to do was to bring down in the annual vote the amount of money needed and not to put it through by statute so that it would not appear in the estimates. The hon. gentleman says he must be obtuse. Well, he must be if he did not understand our position. The whole thing was that there should be a vote in the estimates. If hon. gentlemen did not understand that I do not know why not. The minister has told us that the state is going to pay half this sum. The vote as it reads says that American interests are to pay only $30,000. I suppose it is open to the House to be as inconsistent and to do as many foolish things as it pleases—to say one thing and to write another. If we want to make ourselves ludicrous, let us know we are doing it. The minister says he is keeping this up because it was in an old vote. I do not know what the cost was in the old vote; things have multiplied in connection with cost. It well may be that $30,000 represented half the cost before, but to-day half the cost is $75,000. Can any reason be suggested why the truth ought not to be shown in the estimate? Of course I do not know where the truth is; whether it is here—passed by the government and sent on—or whether it is given by my hon. friend.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The hon. gentleman must understand the matter; he has had it before him and under consideration at various times. So far as the government is concerned we are dealing with the state of Maine and the state of Maine are dealing with two municipalities. The three of them are carrying on and undertaking to pay half the cost of the construction, or to share half the cost with the Dominion government. This item represents their proportion as amounting to $30,000. In 1914-15, $29,000 was voted for this purpose, and the explanation given then would apply to-day, I assume. We are dealing with the state of Maine and they are dealing with the municipalities.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any objection to the truth being stated? Why not say, "one-half of the cost of the said bridge to be paid by the state of Maine," and strike out the reference to the municipalities with which the minister says he has nothing to do?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think I would not disturb the vote. There is no objection to it as it has been. It is not deceiving anyone.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes it is.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, the vote is simply stating something which is not true.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On division?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Carried on division.

Interprovincial bridge over the Ottawa river at Hawkesbury, the Ontario and Quebec governments to each contribute one-third of the cost, $40,000.

Mr. HANSON: These estimates are misleading; they do not show what the cost of the proposed bridge is to be. No wonder the public have no confidence in this sort of thing. A bridge across the Ottawa river at Hawkesbury will cost millions, judging from the appearance of the railway bridge at that point; $40,000 would not buy the site. How much is this bridge going to cost?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This amount is required towards the Dominion government's share of the cost of construction of an interprovincial bridge across the Ottawa river between Hawkesbury, Ontario, and Grenville, Quebec. There was a vote each year from 1910 to 1916-17 for this structure. We have suggested to the provincial governments that they should share the cost equally with the Dominion government. Up to date I do not think the provinces have accepted this suggestion, and this vote will probably be carried over another year. I think, however, we should leave it in the estimates, because the provincial legislatures will be meeting and I have no doubt that representations will be made to them. As to the necessity of this bridge I have no doubt. There is no bridge across the river between Montreal and Ottawa and those who are familiar with the country adjoining the river on both sides will realize the necessity of such a bridge and the great convenience it would be to the people in the two provinces. The total cost of a high level bridge is estimated at $446,000. A further examination was made to see if the cost could be reduced by constructing a low level bridge, and for such a bridge we have an estimate of $362,000. On July 31st, 1914, tenders were asked for the substructure of this bridge and were received. The work was not gone on with, although I think a survey was made in connection with the bridge site.

Mr. HANSON: Do I understand the minister to say that neither of the provincial governments has made any preparation by way of vote for the construction of this bridge?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have not been advised.

Mr. HANSON: And there is no agreement with them of any kind?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. HANSON: Is the Dominion government promoting this legislation on its own account, or have they been asked by the provinces to do it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Asked by the people of the locality.

Mr. HANSON: There is no guarantee or undertaking that the provinces will contribute any portion of the expense?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not yet, no.

Mr. MARTELL: Is it not the case that under the British North America Act interprovincial matters shall be dealt with by the federal authorities?

Mr. HANSON: No, I do not see any reason why the Dominion government should pay anything toward interprovincial bridges, and I can cite cases where they have not paid. I can cite you a case of an international bridge where the Dominion government has not been called upon to pay, and that is the bridge across the St. Croix river, which was paid for jointly by the town of Calais and the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. MARTELL: They were very generous then. It really should have been done by federal authority.

Mr. HANSON: I do not think so. It is a matter for the immediate locality to take care of. The reason why I rose was to complain of the way the estimate is made out. It conveys no information as to the ultimate liability of the country. A good many estimates are presented in that way, and to the casual observer or to the uninitiated there is no idea what the country is being committed to when the House passes a partial vote of this character. Unless there is a very full and frank statement on the part of the minister in charge of the estimate parliament is entirely in ignorance of what the ultimate commitment may be, and in so far as that is the case it is a deception—I will not say a deception, because that is not a very nice word to use, but there is a lack of the information that the House is entitled to, and these votes slip through before they are fully understood. I am not very much of an engineer, but I have been across the highway bridge at Hawkesbury. It is a magnificent structure and must have cost a great deal of money, and if you can build a high level bridge there for $440,000 with things costing what they do to-day, you are a wonder.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is not my hon. friend mistaken in saying a high level bridge?

Mr. HANSON: Yes, it is a highway bridge.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has brought up a question which, if he had listened closely, he would have heard discussed some weeks ago. The United States practice in this regard is to place in the first estimate the full amount the work will cost, and the item is then voted, and congress is not asked to vote any more until that vote has been exhausted. But the practice in this House has always been to vote the amount required from year to year, and there is no departure from that practice here.

Mr. HANSON: I am not objecting to parliament voting the amount required from year to year, but I do say that the item in the estimates should convey the total commitment of the country, and that is absent in this case.

Mr. GRAHAM: It has always been absent, and that is one of the weaknesses I have pointed out time and again.

Mr. HANSON: Then where is the agreement?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has reached an agreement on only one or two points. I would be in favour of sitting down quietly some day with representatives of all parties, and discussing this question with a view to adopting a new method of submitting estimates. One way would be to give the total estimated cost when the item was first placed in the estimates. The next question is, should that amount be given as a matter of information only, and the amount required each year be voted annually, or should we follow what I am told is the practice in the United States—and I had the bill sent to me here which I think bears out my information—where the vote is passed for the entire amount, and no further vote is asked until that is exhausted? Of course, it would be pointed out at once that that would be taking in one vote the balance that we vote from year to year, and it might make it a little difficult for the first year or two if we voted the full amount in all estimates of this kind. It would make our estimates a little disjointed at first, but that would adjust itself in a year or two.

Mr. CALDWELL: Do I understand the minister to say that in the United States they put the total cost of construction in the first estimate and vote it, notwithstanding the fact that it may take two or three years to complete construction?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am so advised by my law officers, who have studied the United States law and presented it to me.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is right.

Mr. GRAHAM: If there was a building to be erected in the city of Ottawa, for instance, costing $100,000, that amount would be placed in the estimates and voted, and no more money would be voted until that $100,000 was exhausted, and the House would hear no more of it except progress reports as the work was being done. There would be no further vote asked for that work unless $100,000 proved to be insufficient to complete the structure. There are just two methods, and we have adopted the other one in this House, but I am not sure that it would not be well some time to work out some scheme by which all the information would be given in the estimate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is one feature about the American system that is very, very much in its favour, I think, and that is that if the original estimate is ever exceeded, all the cards have to be laid on the table and somebody is going to get the blame. Something has gone wrong somewhere, and the attention of everybody is drawn to it. On the other hand, we could not apply it here. Frankly, I wanted to do it personally, but I found difficulty; there are always difficulties when you try to make any changes. The vote under the American law does not lapse; no matter when the work is done. Under our law it lapses at once, and what we would have to do would be to change our whole system. Where my mind was running was along this line, and this was something I intended to take up with my hon. friend in connection with the rearrangement of audits and all these things, out of which has come his committee: That we should always give the total estimate in the first vote, and in the meantime vote just what we require from year to year, and then provide for a change in the wording of the estimate, so that it would show the original estimate as so much, the amount expended to date as so much, and then the House would know just exactly how it stood when they were voting money from year to year. That could be done without any change of law.

Mr. GRAHAM: You would have greater care in passing the estimates then.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, we would know what we were doing.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister has not replied to the very pertinent criticism of the hon. member for York-Sunbury in respect of the fact that this bridge is an interprovincial bridge, and we have had no evidence of any desire on the part of the provincial governments to enter into any such contract. It seems to me that if the people on each side of that river want the bridge built they should apply first to their provincial governments and get them in favour of it, and then they could come to us with an agreement. But this is simply putting the cart before the horse. I think this estimate ought to be cut out entirely. It is a bridge from the province of Ontario;—I want to call the attention of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) to that— and I think the vote should be cut out until the provinces are in agreement.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend has referred to me. Does he not think that where the matter is an interprovincial matter and has to do with trade between different provinces of the confederation it is truly a matter of federal jurisdiction?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury that it should be taken care of by the provinces.

Mr. MARTELL: Then the sooner the provinces get out of a confederation the better.

Mr. BAXTER: I would like to suggest to the hon. member for Hants, who says that it is a matter of federal jurisdiction, that that is true so far as legislative jurisdiction is concerned, but as to expenditure, that does not necessarily follow. I can understand different aspects of this. It may be that the bridge may serve some general Dominion interest. I do not know whether it does or not. It may be that it serves a purely provincial or municipal interest. As to that I am equally in the dark. Is it not evident, and must it not be evident to the minister himself, that a proposition involving this amount of money should be accompanied by some reasons why there should be such a bridge, why it should be placed in a particular location, and why the people of Canada should make this contribution towards it? Then we get the reasons for the vote. But up to the present moment and I think the minister will agree with me, there has been a singular lack of information to justify a vote of this character. All the information we really have is that the government—perhaps one would be more correct in saying the officials of the minister's own department—had put this item in the estimates. With all respect we ought to have more information on the subject.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think I can throw some light on this very vexed question. First let me say that from Ottawa eastward for almost one hundred and twenty-five miles there is no bridge over the Ottawa river. At the capital there are the interprovincial bridges. Towards their construction the provinces and the Dominion contributed one-third each. That would be a precedent apparently, but that precedent was not carried out at first in connection with the Hawkesbury bridge. An agreement was entered into for its construction just prior to the war, but owing to the outbreak of hostilities operations on the bridge were discontinued. At that time the government of Quebec were under an agreement to make a grant of $15,000 towards the construction. In the particular locality there is a stretch of the river which for almost fourteen miles is very turbulent owing to the rapid fall of the stream. For that reason no ferries can operate and it is almost impossible for the people in the locality to cross the river. A very serious mistake was made in not making provision for pedestrian and vehicular traffic when the Canadian National Railway bridge was built across the river at that point. However, that was not done, and it seems to me when such difficulties exist along both sides of the Ottawa river for such a long distance, that at this point provision should be made for traffic across the river. The people of the locality have been agitating the matter with both the provincial governments and the federal authorities, and the minister has intimated to the other governments concerned that he is willing to make a contribution on the same basis as in the case of the interprovincial bridges at Ottawa, namely, that there should be a split three ways. I know from observation that the structure is very badly needed. As it will be of an interprovincial character, as the precedent to which I have referred exists, and as the federal government prior to the war assumed the responsibility of starting the construction with a very small grant from the provinces, it seems to me that our present action is only an evidence of good faith. That is the situation, and that is the reason this item appears in the estimates. It is for the purpose of commencing construction if an agreement can be reached with the provincial governments.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not want to be in the position either of opposing or supporting this particular project. I really want to get at the principle which underlies it. Am I to understand that this is put forward by a member of the government as a general principle that will be applicable to similar conditions elsewhere? Further I should like to know if this bridge will connect two lines of highway which run for a considerable distance from the river, and not merely link up two communities on the river that are practically opposite one another. I will wait for a moment.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes that is quite correct.

Mr. BAXTER: I am waiting a moment for some conversation to cease so that I can continue. It is an extremely difficult task to think, speak and listen at the same time. I wonder whether the situation would be something like this: Take a highway running say from Ottawa to Kingston. Suppose that on that route a bridge were constructed connecting with a highway running for a hundred or a couple of hundred miles from the river. Would that be the condition here. Or are you simply connecting two settlements where the traffic is purely local? I just want to get the exact condition. I am going to ask the minister also, because I do not want to speak again, to define the conditions because I contemplate some day making an appeal to the House—if I have the permission of the hon. member for Restigouche and Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) who does not care particularly to have other members of the House advocate things in connection with his constituency—to assist in building an interprovincial bridge in the vicinity of Campbellton connecting New Brunswick with the Quebec shore. I want to know whether, under those circumstances, we may assume that the Dominion will provide one-third of the cost, if the two provinces in question will each provide one-third?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Some years ago the Dominion government took the initiative in providing money for these interprovincial bridges, but in later years there has been a disposition on the part of the federal authorities to have an equal division of the expenditure among all the governments concerned. When the new interprovincial bridge at Ottawa was built some years ago the Dominion bore one-third of the cost. We are adopting the same principle in the case of the Hawkesbury bridge. If the Dominion is to contribute surely the provinces interested ought to do the same, and one-third of the expenditure each has been considered a fair proportion. In the case of the proposed bridge between New Brunswick and Quebec to which my hon friend has alluded the disposition of the department would be to meet one-third of the cost, provided the two provinces each contributed an equal amount. In the case of the Hawkesbury bridge I am advised that there are highways running east and west along the river the traffic from which would pass across this bridge at this particular point. The proposed bridge would not only serve the local residents but would meet the needs of a very large area.

Mr. CALDWELL: Would it help to relieve the drought in Ontario?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not know I am sure.

Item agreed to.

Des Joachims bridge—repairs, $6,400.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before the resolution carries I want to get some information from my hon. friend. I find at the foot of the list of items "Appropriations not required for 1924-25, $46,150." Has my hon. friend the information now to show how much of that is lapsed votes and how much represents completed work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend is in luck and I am out of luck in regard to this question. A statement has been handed to me of appropriations not required with expenditures from those appropriations, except expenditures for roads and bridges which was not available. I am very sorry I have not that information, but I will supply it to my hon. friend. I have the British Columbia harbours and rivers now. Out of the item $136,435 not required for 1924-25 I find $100,481.21 has been expended, leaving $36,000 unexpended.

[Mr. Baxter.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the names of the dropped? Perhaps my hon. friend would hand the memorandum to Hansard.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Very well.

Item agreed to.

Cape Breton telegraph and telephone lines, general repairs and improvements, $7,000.

Mr. HANSON: Has the department given any consideration to the question of government telephone and telegraph lines being taken over by the Canadian National telegraph lines?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have transferred some of the telegraph lines to the Canadian National, more particularly in the West, and at some points we are giving them service over our own line, but many of these lines are in outlying section that would not be of any interest to the Canadian National.

My memorandum reads:

This amount of $7,000 is required for the following general repairs and improvements on the Cape Breton telegraph and telephone lines, viz:—

1. St. Peters Section—
Repoling Fourchu-Rivière Bourgeois line entailing the replacing of 311 poles upon a length of 9⅝ at $100 per mile..	$ 975
2. North Sydney Section—
Repoling Steel's Crossing loop, entailing the replacing of 510 poles upon a length of 15 miles at $100 per mile..	1,500
Repoling Boularderie line, entailing the replacing of 176 poles upon a length of 5½ miles at $100 per mile..	550
Repoling Eskasoni line, entailing the replacing of 160 poles upon a length of 5 miles at $100 per mile..	500
Repoling Meat Cove line, entailing the replacing of 64 poles upon a length of 2 miles at $100 per mile..	200
Repoling Gabarus line, entailing the replacing of 32 poles upon a length of 1 mile at $100 per mile..	100
Repoling Grand Narrows line, entailing the replacing of 32 poles upon a length of 1 miles at $100 per mile..	100
3. Inverness Section—
Repoling Meat Cove—Inverness line, entailing the replacing of 172 poles upon a length of 5⅞ miles at $100 per mile say..	600
4. Port Hastings Section—
Repoling Whycocomagh-Strathlorne line, entailing the replacing of 90 poles upon a length of 3 miles at $100 per mile..	300
Repoling Brooks village-Glendale line, entailing the replacing of 90 poles upon a length of 3 miles at $100 per mile..	300

Replacing 264 poles upon a length of 8 miles at $100 per mile..	800
7. Hawkesbury-St. Peters Line—
Replacing between 300 and 400 poles upon a length of 12 miles at $100 per mile..	1,200
Total..	$7,325

We are asking for $7,000.

Item agreed to.

Bay of Fundy—cable from Indian island to Deer island, $585.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is repairs?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Entry—Amherst island—cable, $7,500.

North shore, river St. Lawrence, east of Bersimis—improvement to telegraph circuit on Manicouagan peninsula, $1,200.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is renewal.

Item agreed to.

Athabasca—Fort McMurray telegraph line—general repairs, etc., $2,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Some time ago the whole question was looked into as to getting rid of all these lines out in the West. Some of them were handed over to local governments, who were very glad to get the mileages in connection with their telephone systems. A further suggestion that was made was that, in some of the territories where it was difficult to police and look after the lines and keep the services going, instead of trying to maintain these lines, which were not maintained in many instances, the system should be changed to wireless. It was thought a great deal of money could have been saved. I wonder how that movement is progressing.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In sections of Saskatchewan and Alberta we have abandoned a very considerable mileage where the railway came in and gave the service. In the far North there has been an installation of wireless under the Interior department. That work will probably be extended, but in the country sections which are sparsely settled a wireless will not give the service that probably is required. The wireless stations are placed at very considerable distances apart, and it would mean that people would have to travel probably a great way to get in to communication with the outside. Last year we abandoned a very considerable mileage. On April 1st, 1923 we abandoned some 423 miles of the Qu'Appelle and Onion lake section. This necessitated the closing of some 10 offices, and dispensing with the services of 11 employees, effecting a saving of $16,500. In British Columbia we have abandoned certain lines on the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Canadian National took over the line from New Hazelton to Skeena. If you take it all in all, I think there has been a general improvement in the service. That is, we have been able to eliminate some of what we considered unnecessary expenditures. We have abandoned some lines and some we have been able to turn over to an organization which is operating within the district, so that the government are being saved very considerable expenditure in that way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the government is still willing to give the municipalities in those districts any part of the system they want?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the department advertising at all?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): If we have a request, we make arrangements for them to take over the operation.

Mr. EVANS: The Qu'Appelle and Onion lake line which the minister has just mentioned was eliminated, I think, last year all the way from Qu'Appelle to Baljennie. Why is the 22-mile portion east of Battleford still left intact with an operator at Baljennie who has absolutely nothing to do? The line is absolutely useless and is nothing but an expense since the other line has been abandoned. From Battleford north to Onion lake, I suppose the line is needed, but in the middle of the settlement there where every farmer has his telephone, the line must be absolutely useless.

Mr. KING(Kootenay): In our abandonment of that line in northern Saskatchewan, we tried to avoid leaving people absolutely in the wilderness. Some form of service was necessary to the people. I am not sure of the locality of which my hon. friend speaks, but I shall have an investigation made in connection with that area.

Mr. EVANS: This is no wilderness at all.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): With regard to the same line that was abandoned last year, what disposition has been made of the poles and the wire? The line was built before the country was surveyed into sections. Consequently, it ran right across farm lands, and for a number of years prior to the abandonment it had become a regular nuisance to the farmers. The poles were so old they had rotted off more than once and were reset, and there were farms where it was impossible for an agricultural implement to drive under the wire. Requests were continually coming in regarding the matter. I have on my file a letter from the minister last summer stating that the work would be carried on as quickly as possible, but that at that time the roads were not passable for the men to get to work. Has the farm land been cleared off along the route?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The wire has been taken down wherever that could be economically done, rewound and brought in. The poles have, in some cases, been taken down, and if they are of no further use, they have been left for the farmers to use for fire wood or any other purpose.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Under what vote was the abandonment of that line paid for? Is it in this year's or last year's estimates?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It will come out of maintenance vote, item 367 in these estimates.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia—branch of Canal flats—Wasa telephone line to Sheep creek, $450.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this an extension or a new line?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is a small extension off the Canal flats—Wasa line. It was a new line voted last year which will be completed in the vote this year. This will reach out into a saw mill section. Last year there was a vote of $200, but no money was expended. We are asking for $450 this year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will that pay for itself?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. Usually saw milling territory is good territory.

Item agreed to.

Telephone line from Williams lake to Alkali, $2,525.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is this?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This amount is required for the construction of a telephone line southward to Alkali lake, a distance of forty-five miles. This is in the Cariboo section. It is a very good section, being settled largely with farmers, and the line has been requested for some time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the estimated revenue?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): $1,000 per annum.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the estimated expense?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It will vary. In the first year or two it will not be very great. As the line gets older, it will be more.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Salaries will have to be paid. What is the estimated cost of operating the new line?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The cost of maintenance and operation will be practically nil as the operator-lineman at Williams Lake can attend to any repairs and the line will be operated by agents on commission, subscribers paying the established monthly rental of $2.50. We estimate the probable revenue at $1,000 per annum.

Item agreed to.

Construction of a telegraph line from Horse Fly to Bullion via Beaver creek, $2,780.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is another new line?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It replaces an old line which is very much dilapidated and it will give a better service to the community.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the experience in the old line—loss or profit?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It leads into a gold mining section in the Bullion creek country near Quesnel lake. There was a good deal of activity in there a year ago and there have been some rich placer gold strikes. The estimated revenue is about $2,000 per annum.

Item agreed to.

Mainland telegraph and telephone line—general repairs and improvements, $18,000.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What lines are covered by this item?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is required for general repairs and improvements to the mainland telegraph and telephone lines as follows: Barriere section, Chase-Revelstoke section, Kamloops section, Vernon section, Keremeos section, Penticton section, Merritt section, Proctor-Yank section, Golden-Windermere section and Arrow lake section.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Are the lines in the Okanagan and Arrow lake country being operated by the government at present or have they been taken over by the Canadian National?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are continuing to operate the telephone lines. The Canadian National utilize our wires for sending and receiving. I think they have an office at Kamloops in conjunction with our telephone office, also one at Kelowna, and one at Vernon.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Does the government propose to continue operating these lines or to turn them over to the Canadian National?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have not had an offer to take them over; I do not suppose that the Canadian National Railways would be very anxious to take them over.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Is the minister aware that these lines are competing with lines which are privately owned in these districts? I remember at one time a proposal was under consideration for turning over to the Okanagan Telephone Company the government lines in that district. Has the minister had that suggestion under consideration?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is no doubt a duplication of service in the district. The government service is the original one; the Okanagan company came in later and duplicated. It has been the desire of the department to give the necessary service to the district tributary to the government railways and we have a working arrangement with the Okanagan Telephone Company which I think is giving more satisfaction than heretofore. The capital investment of the government in this locality is one of the largest we have in the telephone service in the valley; in fact it is so large that the government would not be warranted in pulling out and losing the whole of that investment.

Mr. McBRIDE: I know a little about this district and I can inform the committee that the people there would very much resent even a suggestion from the government of giving the service over to a private corporation. The government has provided a good service to the people and the people appreciate it and want the government to continue as owners of these lines.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Are these lines paying or are they being operated at a loss?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They are not showing a surplus but they are earning a very good revenue. We shall come to that question in connection with other items.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I would not think of suggesting that the lines should be given over to any private company, but as I understand it the government lines were built on the principle that they would be operated by the government only where there were no other companies who were prepared to carry on business. The government service was intended to give communication to people who otherwise would have been unprovided for; but where there are other companies who are willing and able to provide a good service and to take care of the business the policy, according to my understanding, was that the government would withdraw from the territory. The question is whether in this particular district there is a company doing business to-day which would be able to meet the requirements of the people in a satisfactory manner? If there is, and if that company were willing to take over the government lines, then it would seem to me that a saving would be effected to the country. I wonder whether that matter has been under consideration and whether there is any prospect of an arrangement being made.

Mr. McBRIDE: Does the hon. member for New Westminster suggest that as soon as the government gets its lines on a paying basis it should hand them over to a private company? That is what the hon. gentleman's suggestion amounts to in practice.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I understand that they are not on a paying basis at all and I do not suppose they ever will be. I think I have enunciated the policy which was in effect at the time the lines were constructed and if I have not stated it correctly the minister will possibly set me right.

Mr. NEILL: I am not familiar with the lines on the main line immediately under discussion but I am familiar with those portions mentioned on Vancouver island district which extend beyond Vancouver island on to the mainland. I certainly endorse the remarks made by my hon. friend (Mr. McBride), and I hope, as the people do, that the government will not turn any portion of these lines over to private concerns. As the hon. member has truly said, it would be a case of turning over the profitable portions of the lines, because no private company would take them if they were not profitable. The result would be that the government would be saddled with the unprofitable lines. The same remark applies to the suggestion that any of these lines should be handed over to the Canadian National Railways, for the railways would also take nothing but those lines that were making a profit. If this were done there would be a bigger deficit every year and there would consequently be a disposition on the part of parliament to curtail the services given by the government lines. The government's function is different from that of a private company or of the railways; the government renders service to isolated places where doctors are required and where there exists no other means of communication. Logging camps are growing up in these places and it is becoming more and more necessary that the government should be a sort of pioneer in this respect. But we cannot expect the government to pile up expenses in connection with the non-paying lines if those that are profitable are to be taken away from them and handed over to private interests. This would induce a lack of enthusiasm on the part of the officials whose business it is to manage the government lines, and altogether a policy of this kind would be very disheartening to them.

While I am on my feet I want to refer to the item in regard to Vancouver island district; I notice that the amount is increased by $3,000. I do not know whether this is intended to provide a new boat at Alert bay which is very much needed, but in any case it is a wise measure to increase the vote. Telegraph services cannot be starved profitably; my hon. friends from the prairies will appreciate the unwisdom of trying to starve a dairy cow, for it is absolutely unprofitable to feed her at all unless she is fed right. On the same principle, a telegraph service conducted on the cheap is a failure either from the point of view of efficient service or as a source of profit.

There are just two other things I want to mention. One is to put in a protest against the government's not including an item in the estimates to furnish a telegraph connection with Lasqueti island. This is no political proposition, I assure my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie), because his own party when in power many years ago put in a vote for a large sum to provide this service. Owing to the war, however, it was delayed and the high cost of labour and everything else at that time made it impossible for the government to proceed with the work. It could now be done for a very much smaller sum. I understand that a petition was presented to the government from the people in connection with this matter, and their own officers have recommended that the work be done. This is the only communication with an island of 300 people, and the population has increased since the time the Conservative government included a vote in the estimates to meet the situation. Logging camps are increasing at this point and in many ways it is urgent that communication be provided. It is the only island of any size in the gulf of Georgia between Vancouver island and the mainland that has not telegraph or telephone communication. The work can be done cheaper now than it will be in a few years hence, and I hope the government will see their way to bring down a necessary sum to take care of it in the supplementary estimates.

There is one thing else I want to mention in connection with the British Columbia service. There appears to be a provincial system —the Dominion government British Columbia telegraph system—in operation; and if you go into our Dominion government telegraph office in Vancouver or Victoria or any of the cities in the province you can have a telegram sent to Victoria or Vancouver, but if you wish to have it sent to Ottawa or Montreal they will tell you to take it to the Western Union, which is a private concern. It offends at least my national pride to be told to take my telegrams over to a private company when we have in the province a complete telegraph system, and beyond the province we have the Canadian National, which could be utilized. It does not look well, and it is a loss of business. I presume that any private corporations engaged in this work are not in it for nothing; they have to get some portion of the rates on those telegrams. I think we should arrange that in respect to messages for destinations outside the province, connections should be made with the Canadian National.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am surprised to hear my hon. friend's last statement. My understanding is that we take the business wherever possible and transfer it to the nearest point from which it may be transmitted to its destination. There may be some exceptions; if so I shall be very glad to have my hon. friend report them so that we may make inquiries. With regard to the Dominion abandoning a territory when it has been developed and becomes profitable enough for a private company to go in, that is a pretty large question. I do not believe it is economical or really in the interests of the public that there should be a dual service, but where the government have gone into a community and the business has increased to a point where it becomes of some substance, to say that we must retire from that field and continue to operate the barren fields is, I think, unfair. It is true that in the section adjoining the Okanagan country there is a very fine telephone area and a company operating there would do very well.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member (Mr. Neill) deprecates the suggestion that the government should give over the paying systems and retain the lean ones; of course that would be a doubtful policy to follow. But have we any paying systems, and if so, where are they and what are the returns?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In connection with the Kamloops, Okanagan and Kootenay districts, embracing a mileage of 1,886 miles, the revenue for 1922-23 was $69,306 and the expenditure $91,342. That is one of the better areas.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Have you got anything as good as that?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think that is one of the best.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does that cover overheads at all?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that in respect to a system which the minister states is as good as any of them, in order to do a business amounting to $69,306 we are out of pocket $22,036. Why are we out of pocket so much as that if a private company can go in and operate in the same districts? They do not operate for the pleasure of losing money.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The area in which the private telephone company in question operates is not operated by us as a division. We operate in the Kamloops, Okanagan and Kootenay district involving the mileage which I have stated.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, there are some things here about extensions, and if we are losing money too quickly on these lines perhaps we would not go ahead with these extensions. In view of these figures my hon. friend can hardly say he expects a good revenue on these other lines.

Mr. MARTELL: Is it not a fact that most of these lines are built through sparsely settled districts, in many cases through areas that are a long way from towns and cities where private enterprise would not go in, and that they are built more as a public convenience than as a paying proposition? For instance, no one would say that the telegraph lines maintained by the Dominion government along the north shore of Victoria county, down near Ingonish and Neil harbour would ever pay. These people are practically isolated in the winter and this is the only way in which they can get any outside intelligence or communicate with the outside world. I quite agree—and I think was my hon. friend's inference—that where private companies are prepared to go in and build lines the government should not interfere.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What I was trying to get at was if we had any paying lines. Somebody suggested that we had, but I had never heard of them.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think there are any paying lines. There may be some sections where the revenue would take care of overhead expenses, but the idea for the most part has been to give service to people living in districts which private companies will not enter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is why we say let the western governments have these territories for telephones and the like. We would be only too glad to have them take hold of them and let any private corporation that is foolish enough to do it provide the service. We would also be glad to get out of the loss.

Mr. CLARK: So far as I can gather, all these lines are operated at a loss. At least one private company has been mentioned, and I ask the minister whether there are any other companies operating in the district in question, and if so, for their names and the districts in which they operate.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We come in contact with the British Columbia Telephone Company, the Okanagan Telephone Company, the Kootenay Telephone Company, and the Prince George Telephone Company in the north. I have no doubt there are other local telephone companies in the province, but I think I have covered the more important of them.

Mr. CLARK: Then if all government lines are operated at a loss, I would ask the minister if there have ever been any negotiations with private companies with a view to having the government lines purchased and operated by the private companies where the two services are contiguous?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There have been suggestions that they would like to have the territory and take over the lines.

Mr. CLARK: Any results?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not as yet.

Item agreed to.

Extension of telephone line from Invermire to McCarthy's ranch, $1,800.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this just for McCarthy.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No. This is an extension of the Invermere branch into a farming community.

Item agreed to.

Yukon Telegraph System—Stewart-Maple Bay section—to replace launch, $1,300.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What has happened to the launch?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This amount of $1,300 is required for the purchase of a launch for repair work on the Stewart-Maple Bay section of the Terrace-Stewart telegraph line. The old launch, which has been in use on the Maple Bay-Stewart section, in making line repairs, was recently wrecked and sunk while endeavouring to make a landing along a very rough shoreline during a heavy storm.

Mr. NEILL: Is that the boat I was alluding to at Alert Bay?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): At Maple Bay, in Stewart lake, in northern British Columbia.

Mr. NEILL: Is there no provision for the boat stationed at Alert Bay?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have nothing for a new boat at that point.

Mr. NEILL: I think it was recommended to be put in the estimates; I know it was.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It may be coming up later. It is not in the Main Estimates.

Mr. NEILL: Then I want to warn the Government that the responsibility will be theirs if those men lose their lives, because that boat there is utterly unsafe for men to risk their lives in. They can run for a day if the weather is all right and the water is smooth, but the water there sometimes gets rough very rapidly, and many a time after having gone for only a few hours, they have had to beach the boat and caulk it. The hull is so rotten that the friction of the water and the waves grinds the caulking out, and in some cases after only two hours running they have been compelled to beach her. Suppose they were where they could not beach her at the end of the two hours? Some time that boat will literally and absolutely fall apart. This has already been fully represented to the government, and for my part I am not prepared to take any responsibility beyond that. I have given the exact facts of the case. If those men are compelled to go out in this boat in its rotten condition—you may say they are not compelled, but they are compelled to if they want to get a living—one of these days there will be a catastrophe.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am glad the hon. member has mentioned it. I will have the matter inquired into.

Mr. MARTELL: Perhaps it is not strictly in order on this vote, Mr. Chairman, but as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has spoken about a boat I would like to call the attention of the minister to the Tyrian, a cable boat operating in the Maritime provinces. I am not particularly concerned with the boat itself, although it is a very old boat, and a very great deal of money has been spent on her, but I would like to ask the minister if there is any provision for superannuation and retiring allowances for the men who are operating on the Tyrian and other cable boats. It seems to me most peculiar that the Marine and Fisheries should retire masters from the lighthouse tenders and from their other boats, under the Calder Act and other retiring acts, while the crew of the Tyrian receive no consideration in that respect. That is what I understand from Captain Peters, who happens to be a personal friend of mine, although not a political friend, I think; at all events, he has not a vote in my constituency. He is a first-class seaman and a friend of mine, though a much older man than I am. He was a personal friend of my father's, and I have known him since I was a boy. Speaking with him last summer he drew to my attention the fact that while the Marine and Fisheries department retire their men on other boats under the Calder Act and other regulations providing for an allowance, the officers and crew of the Tyrian, which is a very much larger boat than many of the boats owned by the Marine and Fisheries department, are thrown to the four winds of heaven, so to speak, when they are too old to go to sea. These men who are repairing the government cables or any other cables have a very important duty to perform. They have to go around the roughest portion of the shores of the country where these cables are laid by the federal government, around the northern shores of Cape Breton, for instance, the island of Grand Manan, the northern portions of New Brunswick, and around the shores of Prince Edward Island, and any person who has ever gone to sea knows that these men have to brave great dangers in order to carry on their work. It has often seemed to me that the officials of the department at Ottawa particularly in regard to marine matters and the hardships that are endured by the sailors working for the department, are absolute landlubbers and absolutely incompetent to rightly apprehend the dangers these men have to undergo. I am absolutely in accord with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni when he calls to the attention of the minister the condition of the boat he mentioned in British Columbia. I do not know anything in particular about that boat, but I know this, that the officials at Ottawa are too prone to ask these sailors, who are some of the best people in the Dominion of Canada, to endure great risks simply because landlubbers are not prepared to give them the proper equipment they need to carry on their work. I happened to be an official of the Marine and Fisheries department in days gone by, and I found in that department an absolute ignorance, with the exception of two or three of the officials, as to the conditions under which our sailors and fishermen have to work. I believe that the time has come when everything pertaining to the sea should be dealt with by men who are thoroughly qualified and who know and can appreciate what these men have to undergo.

Mr. MILLAR: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend says "hear, hear". I wonder if he means that sarcastically. I want to tell him that the men who navigate ships and whose forefathers navigated ships on the seven seas, and who could navigate any ship, from the ordinary schooner to a full-rigged ship, in every quarter of the globe, and carried the flag of Canada to the ends of the earth, and built up a maritime trade for this country, are men of superior intelligence and courage to the man who grows a few grains of wheat on the western prairie, and I say in all seriousness that the time has come in this country when we should get down to practical facts and not be so much concerned whether we grow wheat and provide proper transportation facilities and have the Crowsnest pass agreement. We want something done for the men of the Maritimes, and when I use that term I mean the three provinces on the Atlantic coast. We also want something done for the sailors on the Pacific coast, because all these men are made of as good stock as the individuals who are engaged in any other walk of life.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Shall the item pass?

Mr. MARTELL: Before the item passes I should like to get an answer from the minister as to whether the officers and men of the Tyrian are to get superannuation allowances?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I see no reason why these men cannot be retired if they ask for retirement under the Calder Act when they are permanently employed. In the case of men employed on the dredging fleet their occupation is seasonal, and I am not sure that they would come under the same act.

Mr. MARTELL: I ask the minister—for whom I have the greatest respect, he is one of the fairest members of the government—does he see any reason why the officers and men on the boats of the Marine and Fisheries department should be treated any differently from the men in his own department?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They should be treated as well.

Item agreed to.

Accounts branch—salaries of agents and clerks travelling and contingent expenses of outside service, $21,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does this mean?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This vote is required to pay for the salaries of the agents, paymasters and clerks of the accounts branch, outside service, and for travelling and contingent expenses.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many employees are there altogether?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There are six at New Westminster, three at Edmonton and one at St. John.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the salaries?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The salaries vary from $2,940 to $800.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the duties?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Here are the positions: Accountant grade 3; principal clerk bookkeeper; senior clerk bookkeeper; clerk bookkeeper; clerk stenographer; junior clerk bookkeeper; agent; accountant, grade 1; clerk typist; and travelling paymaster.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the whole of this is outside of Ottawa?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. There is a small expenditure for stationery and contingencies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the minister happen to have the total of the whole thing?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): You mean the total salaries?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I mean the cost of the salaries in connection with the service.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend is asking for the total for the Dominion Public Works service?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Here is a list of the services: Civil government; Dominion observatory, Ottawa; Ottawa elevator attendants; Ottawa heating staff; Ottawa char service; Ottawa repairs, improvements, etc.; Rideau Hall; Dominion buildings—caretakers, engineers, firemen, etc.; Yukon public buildings; Architectural branch, employees; Engineering branch; Accountants branch; Art gallery, Ottawa; Telegraph service; Locks, dams, drydocks and bridges. The total expenditure for salaries is $3,752,311. The appropriation amounts to $4,810,890.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The cost this year cannot be exactly the same as last year; that cannot be right.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is practically the same. If my hon. friend would have patience the next item shows where there have been some reductions and some additions. In the matter of salaries there are the statutory increases, but there have been some reductions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Suppose we pass this item and go on to the next.

Item agreed to.

Architectural branch—salaries of architects, clerks of works, inspectors, draftsmen, clerks and messengers of outside service, $77,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: At what point do you maintain outside architects?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have a resident architect at St. John; at Quebec a clerk of works; at Montreal a clerk of works; Toronto a resident architect; Winnipeg a district resident architect; Regina, Calgary, Victoria, district resident architects and at Vancouver a clerk of works.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are a number of outside architects?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What building has the architect at St. John erected this year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think he has had charge of the building at Halifax, and the repairs to the various public buildings throughout the Maritime provinces.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was just wondering if he had put up any new buildings?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was one put up I think at Sackville.

Mr. CALDWELL: And there was an addition to the potato warehouse at St. John.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, I think that was carried on largely under the engineering department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is his salary?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is $2,640.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then we have an architect at Regina? What work did he do?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He has the maintenance of the buildings in the province of Saskatchewan.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose really these architects are looking after maintenance?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Maintenance largely.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there an architect under this item located here in Ottawa?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That would be under civil government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That does not come under this?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: While we are on this matter, how many architects have we altogether?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am not sure that I can give that information. The list that I have given includes those outside of Ottawa. The inside service would be under civil government. I suppose if we took civil government we might get the details there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend will see the importance of the whole matter. How much did my hon. friend spend in his department last year on capital account?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Total expenditure?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Construction account.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Capital expenditure about $3,000,000, and total expenditure $16,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is all work I assume, and does not include salaries.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That includes salaries.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is worse even than that. You would have to deduct $3,700,000 odd from that total in order to get to the working expense. What would that amount to?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not know what the hon. gentleman is trying to get. If he will make his statement perhaps we will be able to give the information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister gave us the amount of capital expenditure as $3,000,000 and the total expenditure $16,000,000, and I asked if that included salaries amounting to $3,752,211. I was told that it did. Then I asked, "Without that what would it amount to?"

Mr. KING: (Kootenay): It is a question of subtraction. You have the figures.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have asked the minister, Mr. Chairman, to give me accurately his first item of $3,000,000 odd. I thought with the deputy in front of him that he would know, but he does not. Apparently the minister cannot give me the figures.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend is covering a large field in his question. The amounts are:

Public works, capital, buildings	$ 440,000
Public works, capital, harbours, etc.	2,563,000
Public works, income	11,480,000
Public works, collection of revenue	1,045,000
Sundry votes not public works	372,000

To the above my hon. friend will add, an account of 1923-24, the following payments made in April and May, 1923, under authority of order in council 29th March, 1923, which established certain credits not to exceed the balances remaining unexpended March 31, of the votes of the preceding year. These payments were as follows:

Public works, capital, buildings	$145,755
Public works, capital, harbours	2,227
Public works income	61,160
Collection of revenue	5,647

I think my hon. friend has a number of items now that will total up properly.

Mr. MARTELL: Would the minister kindly tell us if he has increased the staff in any way during the last three or four years?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. MARTELL: The same old staff?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As I heard the figures, I make the total expenditure of the department according to these figures $13,549,562, and the minister has already given me the cost of carrying on the service as $4,800,000, salaries alone amounting to $3,752,311. That is a pretty big percentage in connection with $13,000,000 odd worth of work, when we are not employing labourers. In the vast majority of cases we have only the officials. What is the minister's own idea of economy? Where does he think he can do something useful in cutting down that expenditure? All he has to do is to figure the percentages and he will see what a heavy charge it is.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): What is my hon. friend figuring in the operating charge?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Only what the minister has given me.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have covered only a small portion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, I have put the figures down as best I could hear them.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The hon. member has not all the votes. If we are considering the larger vote of $465,000, those are operating charges including the salaries of engineers, inspectors, superintendents, draughtsmen, clerks, messengers and various services. I imagine my hon. friend is trying to arrive at the percentages of the different costs. That can be worked out. There are the engineering costs, the architectural costs which can be worked out, but there is a large force of charmen, charwomen, elevator men, and so on. Those are fair charges for the service that is being given and they should not be in this charge as my hon. friend is trying to work it out now. I would be glad to have the percentages worked out and to advise my hon. friend as to the result. Of course, the staff such as we have is more or less fixed, and when you reduce your main vote, your percentage of operation will run up. The expenditure last year was well within the range of the smaller votes that were made and expended during the war. It is true that we have not been carrying on very actively any construction programme, but still the staff continues pretty much as it has been. We have made some reductions. The staff now in the department is about 15 per cent below pre-war figures, but that we can discuss when we come to the civil government vote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Supposing we postpone the whole discussion until that vote and my hon. friend can have the percentages worked out.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Certainly. The hon. member is setting a pretty difficult task when he asks one to work these out at his desk.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON The question was provoked by the question of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) who, naturally, knowing that there were three outside architects, wanted information as to the architects at Ottawa. After all, we should know the total number of technical officers in the branch, it does not matter where they are. Sooner or later we shall have to get it into our heads that we must cut these estimates down and the best way to do that is to get the facts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How is the Architectural branch distinguished from the Engineering branch? What relation does the one bear to the other?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In the Architectural branch there is the chief architect who has his branch centred at Ottawa. There is very little outside service except at some three or four points which I have mentioned, and at the outside points there are only maintenance architects. At Ottawa, all the drafts and plans are prepared for new buildings, extensions and repairs. In the Engineering branch the service is more scattered. In the districts there are the district engineer, the assistant district engineer. There are sixteen engineering districts throughout the Dominion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it possible to have a reorganization so that there would not be overlapping and so that certain officials could be cut out?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have given some thought to that. The ordinary public works engineer is not considered to be an architectural man. I admit some men who have had good all-round experience could undertake maintenance of buildings; but generally speaking, the two branches are separate, and it has been the policy, which you will find generally in the service, to keep the engineering branch and the architectural branch as two separate branches. They claim that has been satisfactory. I do not think there is very much overlapping in the service.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have been making some inquiries and one can look at the public accounts. When one examines the question from the outside, it would seem as if there was a good deal of going backward and forward between the different departments, reporting from one to another, and a reorganization would seem to be possible.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is not very long ago since there was a reorganization in the department. The engineering districts were reduced from 31 to sixteen, and the officers in the department say that they have a pretty efficient organization to-day and probably not overloaded. There have been suggestions such as my hon. friend has named, that some of the work being done by the architects might be handed over to the Engineering branch. I have given a good deal of thought to that, but I have not been able to get the technical men to agree with me so far.

Item agreed to.

Engineering branch—salaries of engineers, inspectors, superintendents, draughtsmen, clerks and messengers of outside service, $465,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is a pretty big item for outside service.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There are 198 employees in the service. The appropriation in 1923-24 was $465,000 and the expenditure was $461,245. This appropriation is the same as last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many engineers are there? How many of all these different classes?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In Nova Scotia in the engineering staff there are sixteen positions: District engineer, senior and assistant draughtsman, engineer clerks, and clerk stenographers. In Prince Edward Island there are four. In New Brunswick there are ten. In the dredging department staff resident at St. John there are seven and we have a staff of eight at St. John harbour who have been carrying on the harbour work outside of the usual engineering staff. At Rimouski there are nine.

Mr. THURSTON: Are these regular employees?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. At Quebec there are four. In the district engineer's staff at Quebec for the surrounding district there are eleven. There are four at Three Rivers and fourteen at Montreal. In the dredging division, Montreal supervision, for Ontario and Quebec, there are two. Then there is the staff at Ottawa for the surrounding district, what is known as the Ottawa district, the district engineer being resident in this city. There are thirteen on that staff. In Toronto there are two supervising engineers and staff, and in connection with Toronto harbour improvements there are two; and in the district engineer's office in Toronto there are eleven. In the district engineer's office in London there are twelve; at Sault Ste. Marie four; at Fort William seven.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are they all engineers?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, engineers and staff; the list comprises engineers, assistant engineers, senior assistant engineers, junior engineers, draftsmen, clerk stenographers and stenographers. These make up the complement of the offices of the various districts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many offices are there?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I gave the total number not long ago.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You mentioned St. John, Quebec, Montreal and some other places.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There are 16 engineering districts and 198 employees.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where are these districts?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I was giving the list of them and we had arrived as far west as Fort William. For Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the district office is in Winnipeg; the others are New Westminster, Nelson, Victoria and Vancouver.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is all the dredging now done by the Department of Public Works?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, the Marine department do the dredging of the ship channel in the St. Lawrence and the Railway department do the canals that come under their jurisdiction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How do you know whether a man is a dredger of the Public Works department, or whether he is a Marine dredger or a Railway dredger?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is not much difficulty in distinguishing them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You do not distinguish them by colour?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Nor by numbers? How do you determine who is who and which is what?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think there is much difficulty about the matter; the men know under what departments they are employed. They are known to their chiefs and they get on the pay roll.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They get on one pay roll all right, but I was wondering whether they might not possibly get on two. Will the minister define just where the jurisdiction in navigable waters of the Public Works department comes in and that of the Marine and Fisheries department ends?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The distinction is fairly well defined. The Marine department do the dredging of the ship channel in the St. Lawrence from Montreal to Quebec and the Railway department do the canals that come under their control, as well as around the railway wharves.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Which canals?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The canals under their control.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Which are they?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Practically all of them. I may tell my hon. friend that there has been no change of policy in this regard.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That may be so, but should there not be a change? Why should not all the dredging services be confined under one head? Here we have dredging done in the ship channel from Montreal to Quebec. I believe there are four engineers engaged upon this work, if what the minister has stated is correct. There are four engineers doing that work, located at Three Rivers under the Department of Public Works. I suppose there comes a time when the men under the Public Works department run up the same line as those of the Marine department; certainly Three Rivers is along the line of the ship channel between Quebec and Montreal. Yet we have four engineers who apparently are in charge of dredging operations in that vicinity.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They are not doing dredging work alone; they are engaged in construction work in the surrounding vicinity. There is an engineering district with headquarters at Three Rivers.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many engineers are there?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is a staff of four comprising the engineer, the assistant engineer, the clerk and the stenographer. They are not all engineers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What dredging plant is there at Three Rivers under the Public Works department?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is none.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where is the dredging done on the St. Lawrence by the department?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The dredge is moved from one part of the river to another as required.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that most of it will be found to be within the points between Montreal and Quebec.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They go as far as Saguenay.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not say they did not. But will the minister say that they do not work between Quebec and Montreal?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, certainly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course; the great volume of it is done there. And is not that one place where we could have a little bit of co-operation—that word which we hear so often in this House? Could there not be one department in charge of dredging operations instead of having the work scattered under three? I have no doubt each minister would think it was laying hands on his department to take any of his work away from him; and what he would say would be nothing to what the deputy would have to say. But that is no reason why operations should not be concentrated under one department.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend is not offering a new suggestion. Some years ago all this work was done under 11 p.m. the Public Works department. But owing to the importance of the St. Lawrence ship channel it was thought advisable by the government of a former day that the dredging in this case should come under the Marine department, which has been charged with the development of the channel. The development of the ship channel does not involve the removing of debris from wharves and terminals along the river and that work has remained under the control of the Public Works department. For many years the Railway department has had the responsibility of looking after the canals which at one time were under the Department of Public Works. My hon. friend's government was in office many years and this question was as alive then as it is now. The whole question has been considered, but there are difficulties in the way; indeed, it is being considered now whether there would not be some advantage to the service in transferring certain activities from one department to the other. The question is not a new one and it has been receiving the attention of the government; but so far no change has been made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We shall never make any progress in the matter if someone does not take the initiative. Now, I have already asked for information regarding the amount of dredging done so that we may get some idea as to what it costs, and I shall try to get the same information in connection with the other departments with a view to seeing which is the most economical or the most extravagant of the three.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend will have to make allowance for the character and the class of work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, I know that there are a lot of circumstances that have to be considered. But seriously, we shall never get anywhere in effecting real economies unless we do something definite. How far has the minister got in his consideration of the question? Has he worked out even a tentative plan as to how we might secure a reorganization and consolidation for the purpose of unifying the services and effecting an economy? Are there any reports available?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The matter has been receiving consideration but has not come to a conclusion. There has been no report to parliament as yet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We know that. If we had the information we would not trouble the minister for it now. Governments generally act upon reports. Has the interest of this government in economy gone far enough to cause them to have any report made to them, and if so by whom was it made?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, there are no departmental reports. The matter is under consideration.

Item agreed to.

Maintenance and operation of water storage dams on Ottawa river and tributaries, surveys in connection therewith and settlement of land damages, $40,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would draw the Prime Minister's attention to the fact that this is Friday night and that he has just yawned very badly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh no, he has not yawned.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Knowing his tender regard for his constitution I suppose he would suggest that the House adjourn now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think there is a general desire on the part of the House to hasten toward the conclusion of the session, and this is a pretty good moment to get through with the estimates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend knows that there is a way to hasten toward the conclusion of the session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To bring down the supplementaries so that we may know where we stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They will be down before long.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is idle to talk of hastening toward the close of the session when the government has not yet had diligence enough to table the supplementaries. But I am not going to quarrel about his wanting to go on now. In reference to this item, how does the matter stand?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This amount is required for the maintenance and operation of dams and sluiceways in the Ottawa river and tributaries. The object of these dams is to store spring floods and augment the low water flow. The amount covers the maintenance and operation of the Timiskaming dam; maintenance and operation of Quinze dam; for stone fill, repairs to apron, and so forth, to offset erosion at Timiskaming dam; to pay land damage and other claims in connection with Ottawa river improvements.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When was this work started?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The Timiskaming dam was built in 1909-12 and the Quinze dam in 1911-14.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is entirely maintenance and operation?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then how can it be a revote? If these be merely the ordinary annual charges against the work it cannot be a revote.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The maintenance varies, as my hon. friend knows, from year to year. There is nothing unusual, I think, in the method of presenting the vote. The vote last year was $55,000 and we are asking a revote of a portion of that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A maintenance charge is an annual charge. It is not a capital charge at all.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It varies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course it varies, just like salaries do, but I have never noticed a revote of salaries, and in the same way there ought to be no revote of maintenance. If this were described as a betterment my hon. friend would be right, but the bookkeeping of this government is getting worse and worse.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There has been no change in the method of bookkeeping, and my hon. friend knows that very well.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, I am inclined to think there is a great change.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is unfair to throw out that impression.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have thrown it out and I am sticking to it. There have been very great changes in the matter of bookkeeping, the creating of surpluses and the like, and if my hon. friend wants to debate that I am quite prepared to debate it. As a matter of bookkeeping my hon. friend will get into difficulty if he keeps on mixing up maintenance with betterments. Perhaps the matter had better be taken up with the new Auditor General.

Item agreed to.

National Gallery of Canada, $75,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is being done with that this year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The amount will be used for the purchase of pictures and paintings and carrying on the work of the gallery.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are any new picturse being purchased?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): From time to time, yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I suggest that they do not purchase very many more in the near future but should rather spend the whole amount on one or two. There are some frightful daubs there now. I am not an art critic, but it seems to me that when we have an art gallery we ought to have some care as to the character of the pictures that are put there. There is one whole section devoted to war pictures which are rather appalling. I happened to be taking a European friend around with me not long ago, and one that struck me was entitled "The Bolshevik." I do not know whether it was so much a reflection on the Russian people as on our own intelligence to have a caricature of that kind there. I am not quite sure who is responsible for the selection of the pictures, but it seems to me a little greater care might be exercised.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): These war pictures were a gift to the National Gallery.

Mr. THURSTON: Who are the judges that select the pictures?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The late Sir Edmund Walker was the chairman of the board of trustees. The trustees are Dr. Shepherd of Montreal, Dr. Richard, of Montreal, the late Mr. Soper of Ottawa, and Mr. McTavish of Toronto.

Mr. SPENCER: Who gave the war pictures that have been mentioned?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Lord Beaverbrook.

Mr. BAXTER: Will this vote or any part of it be used to pay for expenditures already incurred?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think not.

Mr. BAXTER: After all, while I am in favour in a general way of the maintenance of the National Gallery, still it is obvious that very few Canadian citizens can get any benefit from it. Would it not be well, for this year, and perhaps for a year or two longer, when we are trying to tell the people that we are practising economy, whether we are or not, to set an example by cutting out expenditures the cutting out of which cannot hurt anybody in Canada, and would apparently set an example of some economy at all events? In other words, if a man's circumstances are pretty straitened, he does not buy pictures for the decoration of his house that year. Why should we not cut out this expenditure this year? We shall be just as far ahead in five or ten years from now so far as art is concerned. It cannot hurt anybody, and it is setting not a bad example.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There has been a reduction in the estimate, but we did not think it wise to cut it out altogether. There is a staff to be maintained.

Mr. BAXTER: You must provide for them, of course. How much does that take?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Then there is $40,000 for additions to the National Gallery. That may be expended or not, but there are opportunities to-day, I am informed, by the Art Commissioners, to pick up some very valuable paintings, and it was thought we should have a sum of money available so that if it came to the notice of the commissioners that certain works could be secured at a very reasonable price, they would be able to secure them for the National Gallery. I am not anxious that a large sum of money should be spent from this vote, but I do not think we should drop it entirely.

Mr. THURSTON: Part of this vote is for salaries?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. BAXTER: Make a liberal estimate to cover the expenses of running the building, but cut out practically everything for new purchases this year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That would reduce it to $35,000.

Mr. LEADER: How many pictures were purchased last year, and what was the cost?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should just like to mention to my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Baxter) a feature that possibly he has not considered. While it is true the National Gallery is located in this city, it is also true that the practice has been followed of distributing the pictures through the country, and many paintings here in our gallery are exhibited at different times of the year right out as far as British Columbia. They have been very much appreciated, particularly in many towns on the prairies, not at large exhibitions, but more usually at loan exhibitions. I think my hon. friend will feel that the cultivating of some appreciation of art in this country is deserving of government support. There is very little the government or the country can do to encourage art in Canada, and so many of our artists are drifting one by one to other countries. We are losing them as soon as they reach distinction, and in view of the small amount that is allowed by parliament for the purchase of paintings, considered from that aspect also, I think this vote is one that we ought to look upon favourably.

Mr. BAXTER: I quite appreciate what the right hon. the Prime Minister says, and I had overlooked the fact of pictures being sent abroad throughout the country. I do not really know if they ever reached my constituency; they may have been down there. I perhaps do not take very much interest in art. I can quite appreciate also the assistance to comparatively local artists, but I rather got the idea that the minister was under the impression that some bargains by foreign artists would be thrown on the market this year, and I would still like the Prime Minister to consider whether it is not worth while this year to cut down this thing pretty nearly to the bone.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think the commissioners understand it is the wish of the government they should economize as much as possible, and I think I can undertake to say they will exercise care in any purchases that are made, but I believe it would be a mistake to cut the estimate.

Mr. BAXTER: You would rather leave the estimate there and not spend it?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Following the remarks of the Prime Minister as to sending pictures from the National Gallery to exhibitions in distant parts of the country, I might say that the pictures which were sent out to British Columbia last year and in previous years were very much appreciated. They were shown at New Westminster, Vancouver, Victoria, and other places, usually at exhibitions, and they attracted a good deal of attention. I am thoroughly in accord with the remarks of the Prime Minister as to the necessity for doing something to encourage art in Canada. As far as I personally am concerned I would regret to see this particular item reduced at all. I believe there is a good deal in what has been said by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Public Works, that opportunities may present themselves now which may not be repeated later on. It seems to me the National Gallery here in Ottawa is something we should all be proud of. No doubt at the present time there is room for improvement, but at the same time we have some very good pictures there. I have been brought in contact with some of those responsible for the selection of the pictures, and for the conduct of the gallery, and I must say that they are doing splendid work. Personally, I believe that in a new country like Canada we cannot do too much to encourage art. We must not always think of material things. Surely there is something better in life than mere dollars and cents, and so far as I am concerned I would like to see this item increased.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: May I say that if that remarkable picture referred to by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg as "The Bolshevik" is one of those presented to the National Gallery by Lord Beaverbrook, I am not very much surprised that he presented it. Speaking of the appreciation of art, I studied that picture with some care and a good deal of interest, and I am frank to say that neither my knowledge of art nor my appreciation of art were very much increased by its examination.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What paintings were bought last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I cannot say at the moment. There was a report tabled during the early part of the session, giving details as to all the paintings secured last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend has the details of that he must also have the details of what was spent under the vote last year?

Mr. GARDINER: Is the Lord Beaverbrook who presented these pictures to the art gallery the Beaverbrook of Canada Cement fame?

Mr. THURSTON: What is done with the pictures that are removed from the gallery in oder to make room for new paintings?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The committee loan pictures for exhibition purposes. These pictures move from one section of Canada to the other, and the work is going on practically all the time.

Mr. THURSTON: They are never sold?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, I think not.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the minister be good enough to reply to the question of the hon. member for Medicine Hat?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am afraid I did not catch the question.

Mr. GARDINER: I asked whether the Lord Beaverbrook who presented these pictures to the art gallery is the Beaverbrook of Canada Cement fame?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I believe he was interested in Canadian cement at one time.

[Mr. McQuarrie.]

Mr. GARDINER: I presume the officials of the art gallery realize that he can afford to give these pictures to Canada.

Mr. LEADER: Do I understand the minister has given up answering my question?

Mr. KING: (Kootenay): I think the information is contained in the report of the art committee. I think it contains a description of the paintings that were bought last year. I sent for a copy of the report.

Mr. LEADER: What was the average price paid?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not got that information yet; I will try and get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. CALDWELL: When an exhibition organization wants to secure some of these paintings to put on exhibition what is the procedure followed?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think they would make application to the National Art committtee or to the department. If to the latter they would pass it on to the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has the new chairman been elected yet?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not yet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we are interested in seeing what was paid for the paintings, and how many of them have been bought. I am not sure that it is not the duty of the committee to reduce this vote by $40,000 which would still leave a large sum of money available for new paintings when great need exists for the practice of economy. While the deputy is looking up the information we are asking for I wonder if we could not get the minister interested in something that is a matter of vital concern to us all. How many of us have noticed that this building which ought to be the coolest place in Ottawa is generally the hottest?

Mr. FORKE: There is a reason.

An hon. MEMBER: Hot air.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is right; it is because there is hot air. The members are responsible for a good deal of it sometimes but not for all. It does seem to me perfectly ridiculous that conditions should be as they are. I have drawn this matter to the attention of the department before. In the old chamber there was a duct which brought in cooled air from just about high water mark in the river; the atmosphere in the chamber was always cool, we always had fresh air. Now we have got a very expensive plant for cooling the chamber and the results are disappointing. If the former system were in operation the Prime Minister would not be yawning at eleven o'clock; not a bit of it, he would be feeling perfectly fresh. Seriously if the minister will not think of anybody else I beseech him to think of the Prime Minister. What is the Department of Public Works doing to-day? Outside the chamber there is a little walled-in courtyard where the hot sun beats down all day, and we draw the air in from there to cool this chamber; the process of cooling it is not very successful.

Mr. GRAHAM: Competition.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is the kind of competition the House would like to get rid of.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not know of any change having been made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, I want a change.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I thought you were complaining bitterly because there had been a change.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, I want a change. I do not believe in the kind of conservatism that does not change when a change becomes necessary. We have a temperature outside in the warm weather which is extremely high, and we go through the farce of drawing that hot air into the chamber. We are better without it as conditions are. Why not revert to the former system of bringing cool air in by a duct. That duct is still available, it is only a matter of attaching it. Why not attach it? If my hon. friend would only save a few cents for this purpose out of the tremendous number of votes he is forcing through, it would be extremely beneficial. Let us do that and drop the present pretence of cooling the chamber. Now, I have no doubt the minister has got the necessary information as to how many paintings were bought last year and what they cost.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have a copy of the report and on pages 12 and 13 is to be found a list of the paintings purchased, and also a list of the gifts received. I think about twenty-three were purchased. The value of the works secured amounted to $72,696 last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What were the other costs last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): General maintenance $12,000 salaries and wages $6,000, restoration of National Gallery and Canadian War Memorial pictures, $9,000.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not want to delay but I was credulous about the matter, and I desired to see this report. I thought it would contain all the information and would save discussion. The first page is numbered seven and seems very strange after what the minister has just remarked. The report says:

> It was obvious that out of an appropriation of only $50,000, a considerable portion of which was required for maintenance and administration at home and the furtherance of its work throughout the country, not many purchases could be made.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That was the year before. This was brought down for 1922-23.

Mr. BAXTER: You are speaking of 1923-24?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. BAXTER: That explains it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely the minister does not want to have an increase of 50 per cent of the vote over the vote of 1922-23. We voted for frills and extravagances last year; we voted for ornamental lighting and all the rest of it, and threw away $50,000. Does the minister honestly think that in view of the country's finances, not considering bookkeeping, that it is a good thing to have 50 per cent increase in this vote over the vote of 1921-22?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have reduced the vote of last year $25,000. Of course it could be further reduced, if we allowed the work to cease. Still there is a certain obligation for the maintenance, restoration and care of the pictures, salaries and wages amounting to a considerable sum. I do not think I will disturb the vote. I quite concur in the remarks of the Prime Minister and will suggest to the committee that unless there is a really good reason they should refrain from spending all the money.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is carried on division.

Mr. BAXTER: Looking at the picture opposite page 16, does the minister not think it is a little blasphemous?

Item agreed to.

National Monunment on Connaught place, $10,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is that?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is a revote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Béland) could tell me about that. Is it the idea that it is to be dropped?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think it should be dropped.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why is it that nothing is being done?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We had an item last year and the matter is under discussion. There has been a report as to the foundaton on Connaught place, and this should be thoroughly examined before the work is proceeded with. It may mean a change in the location.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What has been put up so far?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Nothing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is to be put up?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It has not been decided.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the matter is in abeyance.

Item agreed to.

New hull for snagboat, Samson, $27,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When was this boat bought?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This boat operates on the Fraser river and was built some ten years ago, and is used in removing the very large trees that come down the river in the freshet time and catch on bars and tend to collect driftwood in the river. It performs a very important work in clearing the roots and snags out of the river. It was necessary to renew the hull of this boat, and I think contracts have been let.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How long has the work been going on?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The contract was let in February.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is ten years the ordinary life of the hull of a boat on the river?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This boat is moving around up against the shore, but on the coast ten years is about the life of a wooden hull.

Mr. CALDWELL: What kind of wood is the hull made of?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Fir.

[Mr. J. H. King.]

Mr. CALDWELL: British Columbia fir?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There was a vote last year of $30,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That was the same thing. We did not go on with the contract. We are asking for a revote of $27,500. This is the same item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There was a vote of $30,000 for 1923-24, and there is a vote of $41,000 for 1924-25. There is just the difference between $41,000 and $30,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. We have asked for tenders, and the total amount will be $41,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How was the money spent last year? The work must have been started.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The contract was let in February, and there have been small payments made, probably for material which they had laid down before the expiration of the year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has that been done by contract?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: By tender?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the name of the company?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The Star Shipyard Company, New Westminster.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa Parliament Building—tablet to the memory of the late Bowman B. Law who lost his life in the fire which destroyed the old Parliament Building, $5,000.

Mr. CARDIN: I move that this item be struck out.

Mr. SPENCER: How is it going to be paid for?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It was paid out of last year's vote.

Mr. SPENCER: Who was the contractor for that work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Mr. Chalmers of Montreal was the successful competitor in the competition.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Did it require the full $5,000 for the tablet?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Motion agreed to.

River gauging and metering, $30,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is an important vote. It provides for the investigation and collection of data as to fluctuations on various rivers, and provides for salaries of gauge readers at various points, the purchasing of recording apparatus and travelling expenses. These investigations are very necessary in studying the streams and getting data that assist in locating works that it is proposed to construct. The expenditure varies from year to year. In 1922-23 there was an appropriation of $63,000 and the expenditure amounted to $45,251.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is this work being carried on in conjunction with the provinces with a view to developing water power?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is a separate item.

Mr. CALDWELL: What is this item for?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Our engineers in the construction of a wharf or dam would take soundings, meterings, gauge the current, watch the flow. This is a class of work that is done in advance during the whole season. In the Fraser river that we discussed this afternoon, we are continually making surveys.

Mr. CALDWELL: This is more in aid of navigation?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Navigation and general information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: At what points is this work going on?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The St. Lawrence river.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: At what point in the St. Lawrence?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): At various points where we have construction going on, all along the St. Lawrence. The Ottawa river and tributaries, Sturgeon river, Rainy river, Fraser river, St. Maurice river.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought the idea was to make absolutely certain of river levels and changes in river currents, work which can be done, as I understand the matter, only by systematic measurements at a given point. Levels are subject to many causes of variation. Is it true that this is a wandering business, or have we not a regular stand where the different measurements are taken regularly?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are doing work in these localities, gauging and metering. That becomes a record that is available for the department and others requiring the information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this done at a fixed point?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Various fixed points. They must be fixed points.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I asked for the fixed points and the minister said that this work was done wherever there happened to be construction.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the fixed points under my hand.

Mr. McBRIDE: This is one of the most important works the government is carrying on in connection with navigation. There are certain places where the tide changes along the coast, and after these records are taken and established, they are put in the tide tables. In this way master mariners can tell exactly the turn of the tide the ebb or the flow. It is very important when they are going through straits and shoals, narrow channels, to know which way the tide is running. This is an important work in aid of navigation.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does this apply to tidal waters or rivers?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is in connection with rivers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This would be particularly important as regards the Chicago water diversion. That is why I wanted to know why he did not have this work done at fixed points.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, we have.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister will see that he steered me wrong in the first instance, because in the second he is steering me right.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the different locations before me. My statement reads: St. Lawrence river; Ottawa river and tributaries, and so on. The work is being done at different points on the rivers. The fixed points would be a matter of record in the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the expenditure?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In 1922-23 the expenditure was $45,251. In 1923-24, there was an appropriation of $31,000 but the expenditure is not shown.

Mr. BAXTER: It seems to be a misapprehension to think that this appropriation is in connection with tide tables. While it is all very well to praise the government, there is no need for a member to rush in and say that this is a worthy work when he has the wrong work in mind altogether. Item 233 is tidal and current survey under ocean and river service at a cost of $30,000. That is in regard to tide tables. Why is one under one department and the other under another?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are doing this work in certain localities that I named. We are not doing it in tidal waters. The Marine Department are taking care of that.

Mr. BAXTER: Is this not to get information as to the possibility of power development?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is very useful in connection with power development.

Mr. BAXTER: I know that streams in New Brunswick have been investigated by some departments. Was it not the Department of Public Works that sent out officers and had those streams, I might say, calibrated?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the information that this department has been doing work in New Brunswick. We have confined our operations to the larger streams which I have mentioned.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is it not a fact that metering and measuring of the flow of water in rivers for power development are carried on by the Interior department? I got a report from them a short time ago giving information concerning the flow of water in New Brunswick rivers.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They do that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In order to get that information the Interior department would have to meter the rivers also.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They are not covering the same field. We are doing certain work on these rivers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I cannot for the life of me see why we should not try to save something, no matter who did this work in the past. The hon. member (Mr. Caldwell) has made the case clear. The department that does this metering and gauging in order to find out the flow of water of rivers available for waterworks is the Interior department, and in order to do that they would have to do the same thing which this department is doing in the rivers the minister has mentioned. It is certainly clear that this is an opportunity of saving money.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend will notice that the rivers on which the Department of Public Works are doing this work are the larger rivers, rivers where we are called upon to spend pretty large sums of money.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Sturgeon river?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are spending some money there, I think; we have a lot of power development there. Then there are the activities on the St. Lawrence and Rainy rivers—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Sturgeon river is not one of the great rivers, that is where private companies operate.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It has been convenient for the department to do work there. Most of the metering and measuring has been done for power development by the Interior department.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is the Interior department carrying on gauging work on the St. Lawrence, the Sturgeon river, the Rainy river and other rivers on which the Public Works department carries on activities? If so, there would seem to be some overlapping.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am advised that there is no overlapping.

Mr. CALDWELL: The minister is sure that the Department of the Interior is not carrying on work on the St. Lawrence, the Sturgeon, or Rainy river?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am not absolutely sure, but I understand not.

Item agreed to.

Surveys and inspections, $110,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This vote is required to provide for surveys and inspections necessary in the fiscal year 1924-25 in connection with harbours, rivers, slides, booms, bridge works and other services under the control of the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was spent last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The appropriation last year was $110,000 and there was an expenditure of $126,000.

Mr. THURSTON: In what provinces were there any expenditures last year?

Mr. KING: The vote is a general vote for the whole Dominion. The summary comprises travelling expenses to be accounted for for district engineers and assistants, amounting to $20,856; travelling expenses for district engineers, paid from time to time, $95,000; sundry local surveys $5,000; geodetic levelling, $4,000. The expenditure varies from year to year.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does this summary include salaries?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. THURSTON: Apparently most of this vote was used last year in travelling expenses.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is largely for travelling expenses.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What sort of surveys are made?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have countless petitions for new works, such as wharves and piers, and the engineers go out from the various offices to the particular points and make their surveys.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This item really should be considered in connection with the engineering branch, outside service.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is really a part of that vote. Has the minister never considered for his own convenience the advisability of including in the details of civil government all this clerical, engineering and similar work? I know that the departments do not like doing this, but the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) himself agreed with me that it would be a very good thing if the people were enabled to understand just what it was costing to run the country, and if, with this end in view, there could be available a list showing all the salaries. Why can this not be done?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It could be done.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, why is it not done? We have raised this same point now for some years, and the estimates are being brought down just in the same old way.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): When my hon. friend was in the government why did he not do as he now suggests?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is one of the most childish arguments that could be advanced by anyone who is at all serious; it is an argument which is an absolute admission of futility on the part of the minister. To say that because someone else whom he condemned on the public platform and whom he has been able to turn out of office did not do a certain thing, therefore he himself should not do it, is really the height of inanity. My hon. friend knows it. I know that this is an argument frequently used, and I am not blaming the minister any more than anyone else. But this sort of thing is the most miserable and wretched kind of negation that one can think of. If my hon. friend and his government have any real idea of instituting economies, can they not for a while forget this absurd retort, "Why did you yourself not do it?" That does not help the taxpayer one bit. Again, I ask, why is this not done? To say that it was not done several years ago is no answer to the question why it is not done now. The matter has been called very objectively to the attention of the department for some years now.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): As my hon. friend realizes, there are some difficulties in the way. Heretofore the service was considered "outside"; it has not been treated as an inside service. It is true that in the re-classification of the civil service there has been a difference, and I am looking forward to the day when a larger number of these services will come within the scope of the Civil Service and the necessary estimates be brought under "civil government". But my hon. friend knows very well that there are difficulties in the way, and not one department but all the departments are involved. However, the matter is receiving careful consideration.

12 p.m.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is quite right when he says that there are difficulties in the way; but there are always "difficulties in the way", and there will be difficulties in the way so long as no attempt is made to remove them. It is true also that there are more departments than one involved. But any one department can take the first move; because other departments have taken no steps in the matter is no reason why my hon. friend should remain inactive. Nothing will ever be done, we shall never make any progress whatever, so long as this policy continues. If we are to wait until reform is begun everywhere simultaneously we shall wait a long time. Having regard to the peculiar circumstances in this department, can my hon. friend mention one real difficulty which stands in the way of the reform I have suggested?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There are many.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mention one.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In the first place you would bring into the service and give an appearance of permanency to positions which I am not sure it would be wise to regard in that way. I am not sure that this should be done in connection with inspectorships and many of the temporary employees. I think it is a mistake. I think they should probably remain in a list that is not treated as the inside service list.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is confusing the issue. Why talk such nonsense as to say that, having temporaries and permanents both in the inside and in the outside services, if you put them together you are going to change the basis in either case? That is not any reason. Will the minister not try again?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then if we cannot get any answer from the minister, let us try the Acting Minister of Finance. I may say to him that a belief which I held, and which was shared by my right hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), was that we should not have salaries hidden in these estimates, here, there and everywhere, so that we could not find out what the cost of the administration of a department was. We have it in practically all services, and a large proportion in this department. I do not see why the details should be given for Ottawa and not for Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver. You can see exactly what your Civil Service in Ottawa is costing. A great deal is said about the Civil Service in Ottawa; many attacks are made upon it, but I am inclined to think that if we had in respect to the outside service anything like the information we have with respect to Ottawa, the Ottawa Civil Service would be able to make a pretty good case in comparison with the outside. I will ask the Acting Minister of Finance whether he is not in favour of a reform which will enable hon. members and the people generally to know just what the Civil Service is. We think it is what we see here, but it is not; that is merely the Ottawa service.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend mean that we should publish a list showing how much is paid to each employee of the government?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On page 8 of the estimates we see "Civil government, amount to be voted, $10,869,978." The details are given as appearing on certain pages. Now, in some departments what is shown here, and what looks as if it were the whole cost of civil government of that department, is but a mere fraction of the actual cost. For instance, in Public Works—and I take this because it is one of the most misleading of all the departments—the salaries are given under civil government on page 8 as $631,520, whereas it will be seen that they really amount to $3,753,000. The whole reason is that the salaries appear here, there and everywhere.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is hardly fair, because I gave the committee the information as to the number in each department, and it will be found on Hansard tomorrow.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is indeed very sleepy. I was not saying anything about the information he gave or tried to give; I think he has done the very best he could. I am talking about these estimates, not about the waste of time involved in looking for information that we ought to be able to get quite readily.

Mr. LOW: Is this not the system that has been in vogue for the last ten years?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, we still have that cry; we still have that negation of all action and progress and thought, and it comes from a very fitting source, the benches opposite.

Mr. LOW: The fact that the system has been good enough for the last ten or fifteen years should satisfy the hon. member.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely that is one of the most reactionary ideas that could come from a bunch of reactionaries. The fact that it has been going on in the past does not make it right.

Mr. LOW: Would the hon. member suggest some improvement which might be put into effect next year?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend should attend more regularly. Had he been here he would have known that I did make a suggestion and tried to impress it upon the minister. Apparently one has to talk a lot and talk often in order to get the slightest attention. I hope I have not to start all over again for the benefit of my hon. friend.

Mr. LOW: I will read Hansard to-morrow.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As I have pointed out, the apparent salary list for this department is $631,520 whereas the real amount is $3,752,311.

Mr. ROBB: Would not part of that relate to work done by day labour?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Some of it but not very much. There is however, a tremendous amount of it that ought to be given in this civil government list. Now I ask the hon. member what reason there was for not doing it. He gave me the same reason as was given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have expressed my views upon that kind of an argument, and I asked him if there was not some real reason, and he said yes there was—I am giving what he said just as well as I can recall it—and the real reason was that if all these were put on the civil government list we would be making a whole lot permanent who ought to remain temporary. I pointed out to the Acting Minister of Finance that that is no reason at all, as he well knows. It may be the Minister of Public Works thought it was a reason, but the Acting Minister of Finance knows perfectly well, in his position, that when you are treating everything as Ottawa you have permanent employees as well as temporary employees. Just because they are in Ottawa does not make them permanent, and conversely in connection with outside employees you have permanent and temporary; they are not made temporary because they are outside. It is ludicrous, simply ludicrous. There is no reason advanced by the minister why this reform should not be instituted, and I am going to ask my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance if he knows of any, and if he will not admit that it is infinitely better, when you are looking for salaries, to know where you will find them, whether it is salaries in Ottawa or anywhere else.

Mr. ROBB: I am impressed with the observations of my hon. friend, and to-morrow I shall direct the attention of the department to them, and see if we cannot work out a system next year that will be a little more illuminating.

Item agreed to.

Dredging—Maritime provinces, $540,000.

Mr. KING: (Kootenay): Before six o'clock my hon. friend from West York asked for certain figures as to dredging. I have the figures here. For the Maritime provinces the appropriation was $625,000 and the expenditure $529,264. The departmental dredges removed 1,225,613 cubic yards at an expenditure of $459,200.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does that work out at a yard? I asked the yard price.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That would require a lot of figuring. It varies in different localities.

Mr. CALDWELL: Do these prices for dredging include the disposal of the material dredged out?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. The 1,225,613 yards at an expenditure of $459,200 would work out roughly at 38 cents per yard.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does that include overhead, or just wages and fuel?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Just wages, fuel, oil, and operating charges generally. By contract, 51,748 cubic yards were removed at a cost of $53,627; the expenditure on hand dredging, which is done with horses and scrapers, amounted to $16,436.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is an awfully high price to pay for dredging.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You have given in one instance fifty-one to fifty-three, as against twelve to four.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It depends on the character of the work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who was the contractor who got that price?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There are various contracts and various works.

Mr. CALDWELL: What class of dredging is done by hand, with teams and scrapers?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Some of the smaller channels.

Mr. CALDWELL: When the tide is out?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. I have the name of the contractor my hon. friend asked for. At Curry's Cove the contractor, Mr. J. A. Gregory, received the following prices:

5,669 cubic yards sand, gravel and packed clay, at $1.10 per cubic yard barge measurement;

40 cubic yards rock at $8 per cubic yard barge measurement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the long and short of it all is that the figures given for the department covered ordinary dredging, sand, mud and the like, while the contract figures were for rock. If they were for rock, of course they would be higher.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Some of it is rock.

Mr. BAXTER: I might perhaps help the minister in connection with the Gregory contract to which he referred. I speak subject to correction, but I think there are special dredges either at the long wharf or the west side wharves to clear up the channel each year. It is done at a depth of sixty feet in high water, but of course you cannot work in high water, and at a depth of 28 feet in extreme low water, and the only dredge that can get in close enough is one of these teaspoon dredges, and it makes the price comparatively high. So far as that one item is concerned, I think I can say the charge is quite correct. If we could be given the localities and a statement of the conditions such as I am giving, I think it would clear the air and let us know if anything was being done that ought not to be done.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend is right. We did not succeed in getting any bids when we asked for tenders, but finally we did get in touch with two contracting firms. We got the Gregory contract at the price mentioned. The rock or class "A" material was done under difficulties, and the price was considered fair by the department. The Atlantic Dredging Company did the work for us at Louisburg. There the prices vary; it was sixty-five cents for mud and 68 cents for hard sand and mud.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would it not really be better if the minister would prepare a memorandum and put it on Hansard? The present method of getting information seems to occupy a long time. I thought the minister said the information was ready.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have the information asked for. There are a lot of details but if it is desired the information can go on Hansard.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want to get the cost per yard of the dredging done by this government.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The average cost was 38 cents per yard by the departmental plant. By contract 51,749 yards were removed at a cost of $53,627.38. That would amount to something over $1 a yard. By hand dredging the expenditure was $16,436. I do not imagine the yardage is kept. The same information will be applicable to the dredging in Ontario and Quebec.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understood the yardage I have here was for the Maritime provinces.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have given the particulars with respect to the Maritime provinces. I am now going on to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, following the same line of questions that my hon. friend asked.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understood the minister to say the figures were the same.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No. I am answering the same question with respect to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The departmental expenditure for 1923-24 is $547,320. In the case of the departmental dredges there were 805,675 yards at an expenditure of $331,376.81. By contract the yardage was 327,899 at an expenditure of $178,036.39. The hand dredging amounted to $37,907.04 making a total of 1,133,574 yards at an expenditure of $547,320.

Mr. CALDWELL: The departmental dredging would be cheaper?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is in some cases.

Mr. BAXTER: There is no overhead charge?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No you do not have your overhead.

Mr. BAXTER: That is usually the trouble with governmental or municipal bookkeeping; they never make the charges in a way that private firms would do.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The dredging in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta is dealt with in the same way. The departmental dredge handled 168,076 yards at an expenditure of $81,274. The expenditure for hand dredging was $2,115. The amount for maintenance of plant is $14,562.90.

Mr. CALDWELL: I understand there is no charge for plant in the departmental dredging?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, it is not charged up agaginst the vote. Repairs of course are charged.

Mr. THURSTON: There is no charge for plant the same as in the case of a private contract?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No. In British Columbia the departmental dredge handled 2,018,060 yards at a cost of $360,746.85. By contract the quantity was 18,397 yards at an expenditure of $7,908.95. The expenditure for hand dredging was $14,380. The total yardage amounts to 2,036,457 cubic yards and the total expenditure to $383,035.80. I will hand the statement over so that it may be put on Hansard.

Item agreed to.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I move the committee rise and report progress.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my hon. friend thinks he has not rushed enough through yet. I just want to point out that this is Friday night, that members who are usually interested in the estimates go away on Friday night, and that the House rises at eleven. That has been the usual rule. I draw the minister's attention to the fact that it is now 11.30.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, 12.30.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Notwithstanding the rule referred to the estimates have got through very nicely and conveniently to-night. I am merely pointing out the fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I also point out the fact that when I made the suggestion I did at an earlier period of the sitting it was conditional on its acceptance by my hon. friend and his colleagues. He had only to say that it was not acceptable and the committee would have risen.

Mr. CALDWELL: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say I am somewhat surprised at the attitude of the ex-Minister of Finance because I can remember sitting here when his government brought down new estimates at this time of night and went on until two or three o'clock in the morning.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not on a Friday night.

Mr. CALDWELL: I do not know as to that. But just there I do not see any reason why those of us who have to be here for five months and do not get home at all should be compelled to cease doing business because someone else wants to go home. The members who live near Ottawa have just as much right to be present on Friday night and Monday afternoon as we have. I object to the attitude assumed by the ex-Finance Minister and I do not think he is very serious in his view.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that I am very serious one way or the other but I like consistency some time. I know what the Prime Minister and the Hon. Mr. Fielding have said about sitting until eleven o'clock. I know all that, but I suppose I should not look for consistency.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government has tried to carry on the business so as to conclude our sitting at eleven o'clock, but now that we are getting near the end of the session I think there is a general wish on the part of the House that we should sit somewhat later. Of course, if there is going to be strong objection to sitting late, as far as the government is concerned we will not do so but will continue the session on into July and August if that is preferable. However we want to meet the wishes of members, and I think the general desire is to get through as early as possible.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the government want to expedite the session let them expedite their measures and bring them down. If they are sincere in wanting to get away they will at least bring down their supplementary estimates. Usually before there is any talk about rushing business and closing the session all the business is brought down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not want to take up very much time but my hon. friend knows better than to speak as he does with respect to the business of the House. If he refers to the records when he was Minister of Finance he will find that the supplementary estimates were not tabled until the last day or the last two days of the session.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The main supplementary estimates?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say the main supplementary estimates, I said the supplementary estimates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Main supplementaries?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, supplementary estimates. We gave the House plenty of time to discuss the supplementary estimates. There will be no effort to crowd anything through. With respect to the business of the House there has not been a day when the House has not had all the business before it that it could possibly get through with.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know about that. We have adjourned very early sometimes.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 12.35 a.m.

Monday, June 16, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

Mr. H. B. McGIVERIN (Ottawa) presented the third and fourth reports of the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, the third report reading as follows:

Your committee have considered Bill No. 47, incorporating the United Church of Canada, and have agreed to report the same with amendments.

Your committee have found it advisable to amend the preamble of the said bill so as to indicate the reason for some of the amendments which were made to the provisions of the Bill.

Your committee beg to submit herewith for the information of the House a copy of their minutes of proceedings. They have also had the bill reprinted as amended.

Your committee also beg to recommend, in accordance with the usual practice in connection with religious corporations, that the fee and charges paid on this bill, less the cost of printing and translation, be refunded.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I move that, in accordance with the recommendation continued in the third report of the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, the fees and charges paid on Bill No. 47, incorporating the United Church of Canada, be refunded, less the cost of printing and translation.

Motion agreed to.

SALARIES OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have received from the Civil Service Commission some further correspondence with respect to the revision of salaries of postal employees. This correspondence is between the officials of the Post Office Department and the Civil Service Commission. I presented the other day what I was given to understand was a complete return, but the member for East York (Mr. Harris) drew my attention to the fact that while it included correspondence between the deputy ministers and the Commission, there might possibly be other correspondence between officials of the department and the Commission. This is the correspondence I now lay on the Table.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil): (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 187, to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Explain.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This amendment to the Dominion Lands Act is to permit the department to sell small portions of land on school sections. At the present time it is difficult to enter into an agreement of sale owing to the provisions of the act that require a sale by public auction. We frequently have application made to us for small sites for cemetery plots, school sites, and so forth, and in the case of the Winnipeg Greater Water District, the right of way crosses these lands. This amendment will affect only the sale of very small areas. We have consulted with the premiers of the three prairie provinces, and have their consent to this legislation, which will permit us to fix the value without a public sale in selling small parcels for the purposes I have mentioned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The explanation does not explain to me. There always was a method of taking care of the sale of small portions. What I would like to get—perhaps the minister could give it later better than now—is an explanation of what the new method is as compared with the old. They did not have to proceed by auction before.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think my hon. friend will agree with me that that has been the practice. I know that we have received a great many applications for sand pits, gravel pits, cemetery plots, and school sites particularly. In the case of school sites there never was much difficulty, but there is a great deal of difficulty in connection with other small parcels of lands.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LAND TITLES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 188, to amend the Land Titles Act.

He said: This is an amendment to the Land Titles Act to permit us to utilize the services of the Gold Commissioner in the Yukon rather than to employ a barrister, as the act now provides. The registrar at present is Mr. Black, and as we have been cutting down the staff very materially we now propose to have the commissioner exercise the duties that formerly devolved upon a barrister. We need legislation in order to carry out that purpose.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

4. Date of birth not available.

STEAMSHIPS T. J. DRUMMOND AND J. A. McKEE

Mr. ARTHURS:

1. Were the steamships T. J. Drummond and J. A. McKee the property of the Canadian government?
2. If so. when were they purchased and at what price?
3. Were these vessels operated by the Department of Railways and Canals or any other department previous to operation by the Canadian National Merchant Marine?
4. If so, what were the profits or losses annually during such control, on operating receipts and expenses?
5. What amount, if any, was charged for depreciation on such ships during the control of the Department of Railways and Canals?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. While these steamers were operated by Canadian Government Railways revenue and expenses were as follows:

[Mr. Graham.]

SS. McKee

Year	Revenue	Expenses	Surplus
1917..	$ 48,071 25	$ 40,584 38	$ 7,486 87
1918..	102,189 19	67,582 22	34,606 97

2. During the time these vessels were in the service of the Canadian Government Railways no charge was made for depreciation.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY SECURITIES

On the question:

What is the aggregate amount of bonds, debentures, debenture stock (perpetual or terminable), or other securities now issued in respect of the mileage of lines of railway either constructed, acquired, owned or controlled by the Canadian Government Railways (a) in gross; (b) per mile?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a clerical error here, and very likely it is my own fault. Instead of "Canadian Government Railways," it should be "Canadian National Railways". The Minister of Railways will see the obvious clerical error there.

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: Stand.

SPEAKER'S SECRETARY

Mr. SEGUIN:

What amount was paid to the Speaker's secretary, for the whole year, the last year of the regime of the late Conservative government?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: $4,626.96.

COMPARATIVE MILEAGES

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. What are the railway mileages from Edmonton to (a) Vancouver; (b) Prince Rupert?
2. What are the railway mileages from Calgary to (a) Vancouver; (b) Prince Rupert?
3. What are the distances from the western entrance of the Panama canal to (a) Vancouver; (b) Prince Rupert?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. (a) 765.47; (b) 956.90.

2. (a) Via Mirror, Camrose and Terminal Junction, 993.07; via Mirror, Camrose and Tofield, 1,006.22; via Munson Junction, Camrose and Terminal Junction, 1,028.50; via Munson Junction, Camrose and Tofield, 1,038.95. (b) Via Mirror, Camrose and Terminal Junction, 1,184.40; via Mirror, Camrose and Tofield, 1,197.55; via Munson Junction, Camrose and Terminal Junction, 1,219.83; via Munson Junction, Camrose and Tofield, 1,230.28.

3. (a) 4,045 nautical miles; (b) 4,325 nautical miles.

PETROLEUM AND NATURAL GAS RIGHTS

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton):

What is the legislative or other authority for P.C. No. 607 of April 12, 1924, regarding "the withdrawal from disposal of the petroleum and natural gas rights, the property of the Crown, in townships 84, 85, 86 and 87, ranges 20 and 21 west of the 5th initial meridian"?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

Section 76 of the Dominion Lands Act, which defines the powers of the Governor in Council, provides:

The Governor in Council may withdraw from disposal under the said act any tract or tracts of land, provided that the reason for withdrawal shall be set forth in the order affecting the withdrawal.

DREDGE No. 5

Mr. JONES:

1. Is dredge No. 5 of the Department of Public Works now at Liverpool, Nova Scotia?
2. Is coal supplied to this dredge by contract?
3. To whom was the contract awarded and at what figure?
4. (a) Were tenders called for, and (b) if so was the lowest tender accepted?
5. Were other tenders receivd, and if so what are the names of the tenderers and the amount of the tender in each case?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. No. The dredge is now at Yarmouth, N.S.

2. Yes.

3. Hendry Limited, $9.45 per ton for best quality Acadia lump delivered aboard the dredge in such quantity and at such times as may be required.

4. (a) Yes. (b) Yes, quality and suitability of the coal and the conditions of delivery being considered.

5. Yes, as follows:

Name of tenderers	Kind of coal	Price per ton
Inverness Railway & Coal Co. Ltd..	Inverness	$ 7 75
Bras d'Or Coal Co., Ltd.. ..	Bras d'Or	8 20
Hendry Limited..	Acadia	9 45
Hendry Limited..	Springhill	9 45
Southern Salvage Co., Ltd..	Springhill	9 50
W. N. Macdonald..	Sydney	9 75
Hendry Limited..	Old Sydney	10 55
Hendry Limited..	Old Sydney M/R	10 15

The Inverness Railway and Coal Company were twice asked, by wire, to name wharf at Liverpool from which they would deliver coal aboard the dredge. They did not reply. Bras d'Or Coal Company was then asked to name wharf from which they would deliver. They named the government wharf. There is no government wharf at Liverpool. All wharves are privately owned, and none was available for use of the Bras d'Or Coal Company. Hendry, Limited, own a wharf at Liverpool, upon which they maintain a stock of coal, thus ensuring the dredge against any delay in obtaining coal. Because neither Inverness Railway and Coal Company nor Bras d'Or Coal Company, could make satisfactory delivery, and because Acadia coal is more suitable for use on Dredge No. 5, the coal was purchased from Hendry, Limited.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, LIVERPOOL, N.S.

Mr. JONES:

1. Is the coal for the public buildings in Liverpool, Nova Scotia, supplied by contract?
2. (a) To whom was the contract awarded and (b) at what cost to the government?
3. Were tenders called for and was the lowest tender accepted?
4. Were other tenders received, and if so what are the names of the tenderers and the amount of the tender in each case?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. Yes.

2. Hendry Limited, $9.45 per ton for best Acadia lump delivered in bins.

3. (a) Yes. (b) Yes, quality of coal and conditions of delivery being considered.

4. Yes, as follows:

Name of tenderers	Kind of coal	Price per ton	Delivery at Liverpool
Bras d'Or Coal Co. Ltd..	Bras d'Or	$9 95	in bins
Southern Salvage Co. Ltd..	Springhill	9 45	in bins
John Connor..	Riv. Hebert	9 20	in bins
John Connor..	Riv. Hebert	8 60	f.o.b. cars
Greenwood Coal Co. Ltd..	Thorburn	8 50	f.o.b. cars
Emmerson Coal Co. Ltd..	Emerson	8 35	in bins
Maritime Coal Railway & Power Co. Ltd..	Bayview	8 10	f.o.b. cars

T. EATON DEPARTMENTAL STORES

Mr. DUNCAN:

1. Does the Post Office Department allow the T. Eaton Departmental Stores a commission on postage stamps used in their own business?

2. Does the Post Office department allow the T. Eaton Departmental Stores a commission on money order business?

3. If so, what total amount has been allowed the Eaton concern (a) on commissions on postage stamps; (b) commissions on money order transactions?

4. Are commissions or rebates similarly allowed to other departmental stores or mail order houses?

5. Has permission been granted to the Eatons to install a mail metering machine?

6. Where are these mail metering machines manufactured?

7. What per cent or rebate is allowed the Eatons on account of postage in connection with these machines?

8. Is any rebate or commission allowed the Massey-Harris concern on postage used in their own business?

9. Is any postage rebate allowed the Canada Life Assurance Company on its mailings?

10. Does the Post Office department propose to continue the giving of discounts to the Eaton Company to the prejudice of the smaller dealers and merchants of Canada generally?

[Mr. Harris.]

Hon. Mr. STEWART (for the Postmaster General):

1. The T. Eaton Co. receives commission on stamps sold in post offices located in their stores, being the same rate paid to postmasters in other city sub-post offices.

2. The T. Eaton Co. acting as a postmaster, receives regular commission on money orders issued, but not in money orders paid.

3. Discounts on postage stamps and commission on money orders allowed post offices in T. Eaton Co. stores for the fiscal year 1923-4: Postage stamps, $22,252.51; money orders, $2,018.48.

4. Similar commissions are allowed to postmasters in sub-offices in any place of business, including departmental stores and mail order houses.

5. Yes.

6. Stamford, Conn., U.S.A.

7. Two per cent on the first $10,000 of postage purchased by meter each year; one per cent on all purchases in excess of $10,000, these being the rates applied to all postage-meter contracts in view of the work saved the post office through the use of these machines.

8. No.

9. No.

10. There is no intention of treating sub-post offices conducted by T. Eaton Co. differently from other sub-post offices.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PERMANENT CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. BENOIT:

1. What was the total number of permanent civil servants employed in the various public services of Canada, exclusive of railway employees, during each of the years: 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923?

2. What was the total amount paid to said employees during each of the above years?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

For a copy of the instructions given Dr. Hume with reference to the oil industry in Ontario and all letters, statements, documents and evidence taken or collected by the said Dr. Hume with reference to the said industry and of the report made by Dr. Hume thereon.

MR. LOUIS GAUTHIER

Mr. DOUCET:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents relating to the inquiry regarding Mr. Louis Gauthier, caretaker of the post office at Matane, Quebec; also a copy of evidence given at said inquiry, together with the investigator's report.

HISTORIC SITES AND BATTLEFIELDS

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports, estimates and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada and the Historic Sites Board and the Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park Commissioners, relating to the improvement, care and betterment of the historic sites and battlefields, in the Niagara district, of the war of 1812-14.

MR. J. L. BELL

Mr. McQUARRIE:

For a copy of all correspondence in the possession of any department of the government concerning the removal or proposed removal from office of J. L. Bell, police magistrate at Whitehorse, Yukon territory.

MR. JAFFRAY

Hon. Mr. MANION:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, letters and other documents in the possession of the government relating to the capture by bandits in China of Mr. Jaffray, of Toronto, and the efforts of the government to secure his release.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT, 1918, AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Acting Postmaster General) moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolutions:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Act, 1918, by providing,—

1. That when it has been determined by the Governor in Council that any post office, the employees of which do not come under the Civil Service Act, is to be brought under the said act, any person then employed in such office who has had at least two years' postal experience, one of which has been gained in continuous employment in the office in question immediately preceding the date on which the status of the office is so changed, and who was at the commencement of his service within the limits of age prescribed for appointment to the civil service, shall, subject to the certificate of the commission that he possesses the necessary qualifications, be eligible for appointment under the said act irrespective of the principle of competition.

2. That the salary of such person upon appointment to the civil service shall not be changed, provided that such rate shall not be less than the minimum rate for the class, and shall not exceed the rate which he would have been in receipt of had he entered the service at the minimum rate for the class in which his position is placed and been allowed the usual annual increases to which his years of service would entitle him; and persons now employed in such post offices shall be considered for appointment to the civil service under the act to be based upon these resolutions irrespective of age.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolutions:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide,—

1. That the Governor in Council may, from time to time, advance and pay to the corporation of the Vancouver harbour commissioners, in addition to the moneys heretofore authorized to be advanced to the corporation for the construction of harbour improvements by existing legislation, such sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $5,000,000, as may be required to enable the corporation to complete construction of terminal facilities in Vancouver harbour for which the plans, specifications and estimates have already been approved by the Governor in Council, and to construct such additional terminal facilities as may be, likewise, approved as necessary, further to properly equip the said port.

2. That during the period of construction of the works referred to, the interest payable on the debentures to be deposited with the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, under the provisions thereof, shall be deemed to be money acquired in the construction of such works and to be a part of the cost of the construction thereof, and may be paid out of the said sum of $5,000,000; the period of construction herein referred to shall begin on the day when the first advance is made on account of said construction, and terminate on such date as the Governor in Council shall determine.

3. That no advances shall be paid, as above provided for, unless such detailed plans, specifications and estimates for the works on which the money to be advanced is to be expended, as are satisfactory to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, have been submitted to and approved by the Governor in Council before work on the same has been commenced.

4. That the corporation shall submit to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for approval, monthly applications for such advances as they may be entitled to apply for, with statements, in detail, in such form as the Minister may direct, and, upon approval of same, authority for the payment of the amount applied for may be granted by the Governor in Council.

5. That the corporation shall, upon any advances being made, deposit with the Minister of Finance debentures of the corporation equal in par value to the advance so made, repayable within twenty-five years from the date of issue, and bearing interest payable half yearly at the rate of five per centum per annum.

6. That the principle and interest of the sums advanced to the corporation under the authority of any Act founded on these resolutions shall be payable by the corporation out of all its property and assets and out of all its tolls, rates, dues, penalties and other sources of revenue and income, and shall rank as a charge thereon and have precedence in regard to payment next after payments provided for in section twenty-seven of chapter fifty-four of the statutes of 1913, equally with the advances made under authority of chapter twenty-nine of the statutes of 1923.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

HOME BANK INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MATTHEW McKAY (North Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, I beg to draw the attention of the government to an article published in the Ottawa Citizen, Toronto Globe and other papers, of Saturday, June 14th, which reads as follows:

Depositors prepare to move on Ottawa.

Proposed Toronto Deputation before Banking Committee numbers 150.

Toronto, June 13,—Meetings of Home Bank depositors in city branches took place to-night to prepare for the move on Ottawa, when the Banking and Commerce Committee of the House of Commons takes up the report of Mr. Justice McKeown, the royal commissioner.

W. T. J. Lee, chairman of the national executive, said to-night no reply had been received to the message asking if the Banking and Commerce Committee would receive a deputation representing all the depositors. The deputation, if sent, will number 150, but it is possible the Banking Committee at Ottawa may decide to proceed without any representations by a committee of the depositors.

May I ask the government if it is true that these gentlemen have received no reply to their requests.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbiniere): I beg to state, on behalf of the standing committee on Banking and Commerce, that if this declaration was made by Mr. Lee, it was absolutely unfounded. On June 5 I received from the Secretary of the Home Bank depositors the following telegram:

Lieut.-Col. Thos. A. Vien, K.C., M.P.,
Chairman, Banking Committee, Ottawa.

The executive committee of the Home Bank depositors association desire an opportunity to lay the facts of this matter before your committee next Thursday or on Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday of the week following, the earlier the date the better. We would like time for about three speakers to be heard. Would be obliged for as early a reply as possible. Letter following.

I. E. WELDON,
Secretary, Home Bank Depositors'
Relief Committee.

The letter was received the following day confirming that telegram. I immediately ordered the clerk of the committee to answer, which he did on June 6, as follows:

I. E. Weldon,
Secretary, Home Bank Depositors'
Relief Committee,
8 King Street West, Toronto.

Your telegram and letter of fifth instant addressed to Chairman, Banking and Commerce Committee will be placed before committee at their first meeting on Wednesday next, eleventh instant, and their decision communicated to you immediately.

S. R. GORDON,
Clerk to Committee.

And by a letter of the same date, confirming that telegram, the clerk of committee wrote as follows:

Enclosed is confirmation of telegram sent you this evening in reply to your telegram and letter to the chairman of the committee.

Immediately upon the committee deciding on what day they can hear you and the number of speakers I will be glad to advise you.

In the meantime, I am mailing to you as secretary of the Relief Committee a printed copy of the evidence taken to date by the committee; also the "Orders of the Day" for Wednesday containing the "Notices of Motion."

Your truly,

S. R. GORDON,
Clerk to Committee.

On June 11, pursuant to this letter of June 6, the clerk of committee was ordered to send the following telegram, which he duly sent.

I. E. Weldon,
Secretary, Home Bank Depositors' Committee,
8 King Street West, Toronto.

House of Commons Banking Committee to-day decided hear three representatives your organization on a date to be decided after committee has received Mr. Justice McKeown's report. You will be advised of date set.

S. R. GORDON,
Clerk to Committee.

And on the 11th of June we received an acknowledgement from Mr. Weldon which reads as follows:

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your telegram of June 11th advising us that the committee decided to hear three representatives of the Home Bank depositors' organization on a date to be decided after committee has received Mr. Justice McKeown's report and that we will be advised of the date set.

We see by the press that Justice McKeown's report is now in the hands of the government and we presume therefore it will soon be before your committee.

Thanking you for your prompt advice of the committee's decision.

Yours very truly,

I. E. WELDON,
Secretary, Home Bank Depositors'
Relief Committee.

I therefore was exceedingly surprised on Saturday last when I read in the Citizen and also in the Globe that Mr. Lee, Chairman of the National Executive Committee had stated at a meeting of depositors that no reply had been received to the message asking that the Banking and Commerce committee should receive a deputation representing the depositors, and moreover that it might be the decision of the committee to proceed without any representation by the committee of depositors. I immediately wired Mr. Lee on June 14, as follows:

I notice in Citizen this morning reference to your declarations of last night that no reply had been received to the message asking if the Banking and Commerce Committee would receive a deputation representing the depositors. Kindly inquire from Mr. Weldon your secretary, if he did not receive telegram and letter dated June sixth and June eleventh. We have his acknowledgment dated June twelfth. Kindly correct impression given to the press that committee did not answer your message.

THOMAS VIEN,
Chairman.

I confirmed that by letter of the same date, as follows:

I beg to enclose herewith confirmation of my telegram of to-day. It is with some surprise that I have read in the press this morning that no reply had been received to the message asking if the Banking and Commerce Committee would receive a deputation representing all the depositors. You will find by the copy of the correspondence exchanged and which I beg to attach hereto, that the committee has immediately answered by wire and letter.

May I further state that the committee has deemed it advisable to peruse Mr. Justice McKeown's report before it receives you so as to be able better to appreciate your representations when your delegation is received.

I may state that we shall endeavour to fix the 19th or the 20th to receive your delegation.

The committee will sit on Tuesday the 17th instant and will then fix a date and you shall be informed immediately.

To-day I received the following telegram from Mr. Weldon:

Have been away from office owing to illness past week just learned of newspaper report Lee interview stating no reply received our message asking interview Banking and Commerce committee. Cannot understand this report which we greatly regret. All our communications to you and Banking and Commerce committee have received prompt and courteous reply. Will use every effort to correct false impression.

I have received also from Mr. Lee the following telegram:

Just received your wire. Made no such declaration to press. Explain to committee. Will be in Ottawa Tuesday morning and will see you on arrival.

The House will note that Mr. Lee does not deny having made the declaration to the meeting, but denies only having made it to the press. As the Citizen, the Toronto Globe and several other newspapers contained the information in identical language, I think that we can fairly assume that the declaration was made to the meeting of depositors. I am glad that the interpellation of my hon. friend gives me an opportunity of correcting the wrong impression given to the public. I do not believe that Mr. Lee intended wilfully to mislead the public; but the least that can be said, if he did make such a declaration, is that he should have taken the trouble of inquiring from the secretary of the executive committee as to the exact facts before making a statement which I consider unjust towards parliament and the committee.

SALARIES OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): I understand the Prime Minister to have said that if there is to be any alteration in the schedule of postal workers' salaries as revised by the Civil Service Commission, it will have to be made by parliament. In view of the widespread dissatisfaction with the reduction in salaries as so provided by that schedule, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he will indicate in what way parliament can deal with this matter and when?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might take advantage of the question which my hon. friend has asked me just to read to the House the formal expression of view given to the government by the Department of Justice as to the power of the government to deal with any matter of revision and increase of salaries of members of the Civil Service. I submitted to the Department of Justice in May last two questions: First, whether under the law the power of revision and increase of salaries of members of the Civil Service resides in the Civil Service Commission or, second, whether the responsibility therefor resides in His Excellency in Council. The answer made and signed by the Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. Newcombe, is as follows:

My answer is that the classification of the Civil Service including the several rates of compensation as prepared and signed by the Civil Service Commission of first October, 1919, was submitted to parliament, ratified and confirmed and stands, subject to such amendments in respect of rates of compensation as may be made by the Civil Service Commission with the approval of the Governor in Council. See sections 42 and 45 B of the Civil Service Act.

The Governor in Council has, in my opinion, no authority to regulate rates of compensation independently. He may approve the rates submitted by the commission for approval, and the rates will thus become effective, but he has no authority to approve or sanction any rate in excess of that which is recommended by the commission. Such an increase can be sanctioned only by parliamentary authority.

I think it is well that not only the House but the country should understand clearly that, as respects any revision of salaries of civil servants, the government stands precisely in the same relation to the Civil Service Commission as it does with respect to most appointments to the service. In order to remove from the arena of politics, as it is termed, any control by the government in the matter of appointments, this parliament, under a previous administration, gave to the Civil Service Commission full power of appointment of most of the members of the Civil Service. Parliament also gave to the commission like powers with respect to revision of salaries of civil servants, so that the power of revision of salaries of civil servants is taken away entirely from the government. This illustrates wherein to some extent we are being governed by commission and not in accordance with a system of a responsible government in the strict meaning of the term. The government, appreciating the position, took care at the outset to associate with the commission, the deputy ministers and the Board of Audit in the matter of the revision of the salaries of civil servants, and in particular the salaries of postal employees which were the first to be referred. On each of two occasions that a report was made by the commission, having learned that the report was not acceptable to the postal employees, the government took such steps as were possible to secure a further consideration by the Civil Service Commission of their report. The government has gone in that direction just as far as it is possible to go in the matter, and as my hon. friend has said, if there is to be any further change in salaries, they will have to be made by parliament itself. The government is placed in the position, either of asserting that it is not prepared to accept the legislation which is on the statutes and of being obliged in consequence to ask parliament to enable it to revise or amend that legislation, or to stand by the legislation as it appears. We have not felt, for the present, at least, that we would be justified in asking parliament to amend or repeal the statute under which the civil service commissioners have acted, nor to take action in any way other than in accordance with the recommendations of the commission.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I think the statement made by the Prime Minister just now would have been more appropriately made on an occasion when a discussion might follow. I do not take exception at all to the wording of the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, nor do I take exception to the statement of law as made in that opinion; but I do not think the occasion was opportune to make a veiled attack either on the present system or on the commission at a time when debate is necessarily cut off on the Orders of the Day. If the government desire either an alteration in the general scale or a change in the system, there is in both cases a way in which the government can bring that about. If, on the other hand, the government feel that what the commission has recommended is not fair and just, the government owe it to themselves to take such means as are in their power to remedy the situation.

If, though, the government feel that the scale recommended is fair and right—and their approval would seem to indicate that—then the government should not disavow its responsibility, and if it assumes its responsibility, in the event of improper interference with that responsibility, I am prepared to back the government. I do not like, however, the continual habit of shunting the blame on someone else, unless, at least, it it said that those have acted wrongly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think I can let pass the remark of my right hon. friend to the effect that in any way there was in what I said a veiled attack on the commission. I had not the slightest intention of making any kind of attack, nor do I think my remarks are capable of that interpretation. What I think is important is to make clear to those most affected and to the country the exact position in which the government have been placed by the law respecting the Civil Service Commission as that law stands on the statutes at the present time.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): In view of the probability of there being some trouble between the government and the men, is there not some action open to the government which might meet the situation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government will be pleased to receive from my hon. friend or any other hon. gentleman any suggestion he wishes to make in that regard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the government not able to take action itself?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): If they cannot, there is not responsible government.

THE SOVIET AND UKRAINIAN REPUBLICS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): In view of the case now before the Montreal courts, will the Prime Minister state whether the agreement between England and Russia of July 3, 1922, was endorsed by Canada? Whether the government of Canada has definitely recognized the union of the Soviet socialist republic? And, further, whether the government recognizes the so-called Ukrainian People's Republic?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I consider my hon. friend's question as being in the nature of a notice? I shall have to look into the matter and give it some little thought before undertaking to give an answer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would suggest that we have an understanding now that our government is not in the recognizing business.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil) (Acting Postmaster General) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act by providing that the Postmaster General may prescribe and enforce such regulations as to letters directed to be registered, as to him seem necessary, in respect to the registration of letters and other matter passing by mail, and to the charge to be made for the same, and to compensation for loss not to exceed one hundred dollars in any one case.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This will simply put registered mail and small articles on the same basis as parcel post, and it gives to the department the authority to fix the charges. At the present time the maximum indemnity paid on the loss of registered mail is $25, and for the registration of such mail the Post Office Department charges a fee of 10 cents. In connection with registration it is proposed to charge a fee of 10 cents on a valuation of $25, 20 cents up to $50, 30 cents up to $75 and 40 cents up to $100. The purpose of the resolution is merely to unify the system as between registered mail and parcel post.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this resolution complete and effective? It does not specify in any way what the regulations are to be.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It gives discretion to the department. I have given the list of fees which are now charged.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Should not the resolution set out the effect of the regulations which are proposed? I do not see the value of a resolution if it merely says that the minister may make such regulations as he deems advisable.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend will notice that the resolution fixes the maximum compensation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is only one material point mentioned.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have been informed by the Post Office Department that so far there has occurred the loss of only one article out of every forty thousand registered; and while I have quoted the larger fees in force in relation to parcel post, it is anticipated that probably these fees can be greatly reduced. Therefore the fees are now fixed, although the maximum of compensation is stated in the resolution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister say that only one loss has occurred.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is the information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think I must have lost that one.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am only giving the information I have received.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is not referring to registered mail but registered articles?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Registered articles, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh; and this is intended to increase the amount that may be fixed?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is to give the necessary power to fix the fees.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What fees are proposed now?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The fee in effect at the moment is the one I have given.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And are these the fees that are now proposed?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is anticipated that they may be reduced; hence they are not fixed in the amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand that at the present time the liability was limited to $25.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): On registered articles.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the maximum liability is $25 how can there be a fee for a value up to $100?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is to give the minister discretion—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that; but the minister is giving the present fees.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): On parcel post.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and the liability now is limited to $25.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): On registered articles.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then why should there be, as exists to-day, a higher fee for a $100 article when the limit of the liability is only $25 in any case?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is no higher fee than 10 cents in the case of a $25 article.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has not got my point. He gave us the fees now in force and he says that they range from 10 cents in the case of a $25 article to 40 cents in the case of an article of $100 in value. But he says that the liability is only $25 no matter what the value of the article may be.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. But if the registration is more than $25 the higher fees are charged accordingly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And up to what limit can one insure now?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Up to $100.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But I understood the minister to tell us that it was only $25.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is what I am seeking to amend at the present time in so far as registered articles are concerned. The insurance of parcel post regulations went into effect in 1921 and we are making the law now apply to registered articles; registered articles which now carry a maximum of $25 we are making comparable with what applies to parcel post.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is to say, in connection with registered articles the maximum liability at the present time is $25 and it is proposed that it shall be $100, the same as with parcel post.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. FORKE: I do not understand the difference between registered mail and mail that is insured.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Insurance is probably not the right term. If you register a letter and it is lost you recover at the present time a maximum of $25, and the same applies to registered articles. Under the amendment of 1921 we can insure a parcel up to the value of $100. But we cannot accept registration of a letter for more than $25.

Mr. FORKE: I understand that. But I have a specific case: I went to register an article and was told it would be much cheaper to insure it. What is the difference? I do not get the point. I was told that the insurance rate was only half the registration rate.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): For what amount did you insure?

Mr. FORKE: About $10.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This amendment is to permit us to increase our guarantee for registered articles.

Mr. FORKE: You cannot explain that point?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I confess that I am not sufficiently familiar with the details of the department to do so. By this amendment the department will be able to give a greater return for loss.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not the difference this?—That a certain class of article can go by parcel post, and another class can go by registered mail. Insurance applies to each class, but, in respect of parcels, the value for which the department is liable is $100. This amendment is to make the value for which the department is liable in respect of registered mail $100, too.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Stewart (Argenteuil) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 189, to amend the Post Office Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS GUARANTEE ACT

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Canadian National Railways Guarantee Act, 1923, chapter 37, by repealing subsection four thereof and providing,—

2. That where parliament has authorized expenditures on equipment to the extent of twenty-five per cent of the cost of such equipment, the company may make or cause to be made one or more equipment issues for the remaining seventy-five per cent of such cost.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister explain the effect of the resolution first, please?

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that last session a bill was introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) with reference to these guarantees, and that it was subsequently amended in the Upper House. The Justice department now casts grave doubts on our power to guarantee securities at all, and the purpose of this bill is to cure those doubts without taking away any of the restrictions imposed by the former act.

4 p.m.

When an equipment issue is to be guaranteed parliament is called on to vote twenty-five per cent of the issue, if it is to be guaranteed by the government. The second clause of this resolution is to provide that when that twenty-five per cent is voted by parliament it shall constitute authority to the company to issue the remaining 75 per cent. Perhaps it would be as well to put on Hansard the opinion of Mr. Ruel as he gave it to me:

Paragraph 4 of section 2, of this last mentioned bill reads as follows: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed as granting power to guarantee any securities the issue of which has not been authorized by parliament."

The trouble with this paragraph 4 was that it prevented, in the opinion of the Department of Justice, the issue of equipment securities for the reason that equipment securities are obligations of the Canadian National Rolling Stock Company, Limited, which is a company incorporated under the Dominion Joint Stock Companies Act. General power is given the Dominion Joint Stock Company to issue securities, but the Justice department considered that paragraph 4, as above quoted, was dealing with specific authority to issue a specific amount of securities and that the general power in the general act to issue securities did not comply with the wording of the paragraph. Consequently we propose to amend the paragraph to read this way:

"Nothing herein contained shall be taken to authorize the guarantee of any securities the issue of which has not been authorized by this act or some other act of parliament."

The "some other act of parliament" covers the provisions of the Companies Act, and we have added the words "this act" so as to overcome the objection which was raised, but not seriously pressed, that the provisions of paragraph 4 destroy the power to issue securities given to the company by the Canadian National Railways Act itself.

For the purpose of further restricting the company in its issue of equipment securities, I have added the second clause to the draft bill to the effect that where parliament has authorized expenditure on equipment to the extent of 25 per cent of the cost, the company may make, or cause to be made, one or more equipment issues for the ramaining seventy-five per cent of such cost; that means that in order to make equipment issues in the future we will have to go to parliament and obtain an appropriation of the 25 per cent down payment, which is always made in cash. When this appropriation is passed no further legislative authority is necessary to enable us to issue securities and, if deemed desirable, to have them guaranteed for the remaining seventy-five per cent.

The Justice department questions the right of the company to issue any equipment debentures at all since the legislation of last session, and also the right of the government to guarantee such issues.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The last few sentences of the minister's explanation hit the bull's-eye, because if the Justice department questions the right of the company to issue these securities, certainly this clause would not in any way amplify that right. What the Justice department apparently questions is the power of the government now to guarantee securities so issued unless such issue has been authorized by certain acts. Apparently, if I got the opinion right, it was this, that the mere use of the words "by parliament" would be held to be a parliamentary act attributable to the Canadian National Railways, and not a parliamentary act empowering any of these subsidiary companies, including the rolling stock company, to issue securities. May I ask the minister before we go into committee, is the original clause 1 the Senate amendment of last session?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is clause 4.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Part 1 of clause 4?

Mr. GRAHAM: Subsection 4. A bill passed this House in another form and was made to take its present form by the Senate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it clause 4 of the amendment?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, subsection 4.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I had a question on the order paper to-day which deals in a practical way with this legislation. The National Railways, under their charter of incorporation, have among many other things given to them the right of issuing bonds to the extent of $75,000 per mile.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does that include equipment?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, the equipment is apart from that entirely. The equipment issues are made under general power, taking advantage of the trust in New York. Of course, it is quite obvious, Mr. Chairman, that if there is a large amount of that $75,000 per mile still unissued, this House is practically giving a blank cheque under the proposed legislation to the government in connection with endorsation. It has been said, however, by the railway officials that there is not much left of that $75,000 per mile. If there is not the right of issue left under the general clause, the situation then would be, as I understand it, under this legislation, that parliamentary authority would have to be obtained for further loans and guarantees. Of course, that is how we think it ought to be. The issue between this opposition—I beg my hon. friend's (Mr. Forke's) pardon; I should say the whole opposition—and the government was that under the method in which we carried on business, we took each year, through the railway vote, the right to guarantee these securities.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not equipment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not equipment. We took the right to guarantee these securities, our point being that in connection with capital expenditure, and guarantees given for capital expenditure, further commitments, the right to do that must of necessity rest in parliament. My hon. friends did not agree with that last year, and they got legislation which would enable them, irrespective of the right of guarantee being covered by the annual vote, to get, and they did get, the right to give guarantees to the full extent that the company had the right to issue bonds. There was a little amendment made in the Senate last year, which, while it did not go the full length that this opposition asked in this matter, yet made it clear that the right of guarantee was a right which could only be exercised as and when there was the direct right of issue given. The Department of Justice has ruled, as I understand it, that the right of issue must be a specific right, and cannot be supported by any general power. The present amendment would allow the general right as sufficient. Now, what I wanted to do was to find out what the general right meant. If the truth be that practically all of that right of issue to the extent of $75,000 per mile has been exhausted, we are discussing merely an academic issue. But if, on the other hand, that right exists, or in large part exists, we would feel it incumbent upon us to oppose this legislation.

In connection with the matter of equipment to which my hon. friend has referred, that was formerly handled in a different way. Undoubtedly, as I think has already been expressed during this session by the hon. Minister of Railways, the right to endorse equipment securities results in a better rate being secured when equipment securities are sold in Canada, for the simple reason that the Philadelphia trust idea is not thoroughly understood by Canadian financiers and the Canadian investing public, and so they are looking for a government guarantee; but in the United States, on the other hand, it makes no difference at all. Millions on millions of dollars worth of bonds are sold there under that plan. Under that plan, in the first instance, the road has to put up twenty-five per cent of the equipment value, and I understand that so far as that is concerned, my hon. friend is perfectly willing that that should be done. And with that twenty-five per cent put up, a trust deed is made which reserves the title in the whole of the equipment in the trustee for the bondholders, and a satisfactory sinking fund is provided for which must retire the claim while the equipment is still in active operation. I think we will have no difficulty therefore in connection with the question of equipment.

To repeat, for it is a somewhat involved situation: If the original bonding rights of $75,000 per mile for the Canadian National Railways have been practically exhausted, why then, of course, my hon. friend's government have to come here just as we used to come here, for authority, before they make any issue. If, on the other hand, it exists to a large extent—and the officials all tell me it is practically exhausted—then our attitude must be as it was last year.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am glad my hon. friend agrees as to the equipment issue. It is better, I imagine, in order to get the best market price, to have the power to guarantee equipment issues, provided that twenty-five per cent has been voted by parliament, even if the guaranteeing power is not exhausted. As to the other point, I understand that Mr. Ruel is sending my hon. friend some information regarding that. If it has not arrived—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not got it.

Mr. GRAHAM: —I would suggest that we get this in the form of a bill, and we will not proceed with it further until my hon. friend gets the information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As long as we have a clear understanding that we can discuss the whole matter, and without waiving any right as to the principle of the resolution or anything else.

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the minister still determined to keep the amount of these guarantees out of the estimates?

Mr. GRAHAM: The amounts of the guarantees such as we had last year, under the Canadian National Railway Act, were in the estimates. The amounts of the regular guarantees under the $74,000,000 were in the estimates last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The estimates had been brought down by the present Minister of Finance when this fine bill of last session went through, but inasmuch as the fine bill did not do its work, the government was not able to avoid using the estimates. But what I want to know is this: Is the minister prepared to undertake that, in connection with any guarantees to be given under the amended legislation, the amount of them will be included in the estimates as well as, of course, a statement of the destination of the money?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think there is any idea of anything else, except that construction of the branch lines is provided for in other legislation; I do not think my right hon. friend refers to that. This is not an effort in any way to get away from the usual practice we adopted last year of bringing down the ordinary expenditure of the Canadian National Railways, to be provided either by grants from parliament or by bonds guaranteed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As regards the special legislation for branch lines we took our stand on it, but we were voted down, and we are helpless for this session; the minister is unrepentant there. But in respect of the legislation now being amended we took the same position last year and the minister receded. We moved an amendment, as the minister will remember, to provide that the amount of any guarantees given should be included in the estimates. Now, the minister was compelled to use the estimates last year because the act was unworkable. If our amendment had been inserted he would have had to use the estimates anyway. I take the minister's word to-day to mean that as respects this class of guarantee, this class of expenditure, he is not so obdurate as he was last session and will probably accept a specific amendment to that effect.

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend has got, I would not say, alarmed, but mixed. I think I took no part in the discussion last year because the bill was introduced by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I mean the government.

Mr. GRAHAM: I took no part in the discussion. The bill was altered in such a way that the Justice department informed us that our powers of guarantee are impaired, perhaps destroyed. There is no idea in the minds of the government, or of the management, of getting away from the usual practice of putting the ordinary expenditures whether by loan, or guarantee, or cash, in the estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am very pleased to hear the minister make the statement, and I hope he will support any necessary amendments to see that that is always done.

Mr. CALDWELL: We are to understand then that if parliament provides twenty-five per cent for equipment for the Canadian National Railways it would mean $10,000,000 on an issue of $40,000,000, and that the Board of Directors would issue debentures for the balance?

Mr. GRAHAM: As already explained, the amount to be voted is twenty-five per cent of the issue. The remainder will be taken up by the public.

Section agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Graham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 190, to amend the Canadian National Railways Act, 1919.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INDIAN RESERVE LANDS

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil) (Superintendent General of Indian Affairs) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient,—

(1) to confirm an agreement for the settlement of certain questions between the government of Canada and Ontario respecting Indian Reserve Lands, made the 24th March, 1924, defining the respective rights of each touching the disposition of lands in Indian Reserves in the Province which are surrendered by the Indians in order that they may be disposed for the benefit of the Band;

(2) to authorize the payments to the Province provided for in the said agreement of any balance from proceeds of the sale or other disposition of the lands or any portion thereof, together with accrued unexpended simple interest thereon and of one-half of the consideration in the case of the sale, lease or other disposition of mining claims staked on such reserve, or of lands in which minerals are included or may exist or be supposed to exist; and

(3) to provide that no disposition shall be made of water-power in any such Indian Reserve of a greater capacity than five hundred horse-power except by special agreement, and that the provisions of the Bed of Navigable Waters Act, Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1914, chapter 31, shall apply to grants of such lands or minerals heretofore or hereafter made under the Great Seal of Canada or otherwise under the direction of the government of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister tell us, before we go into committee, what designs he has on the Indians?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No designs whatever. This has always been a controversial subject between the province of Ontario and the Dominion. Probably if I read a memorandum that has been prepared on the matter it will give a synopsis of the situation:

1. The respective rights of the Dominion of Canada and the provincce of Ontario in relation to Indian lands within the province first came before the Judicial committee of the Privy Council in 1888, when it was held (in St. Catharines' Milling Company vs. The Queen, 1888, 14 App. Cas. 46) that lands surrendered by the Indians to the Crown subsequent to Confederation belonged not to the Dominion, which had negotiated the treaty, but to the province.

2. Fourteen years later the question again came before the Judicial committee in a slightly different form, in Ontario Mining Company, Limited, vs. Seybold, 1903, A.C. 73. To that appeal the Dominion was a party, but just before the argument an agreement between Mr. Blake, representing the province, and Mr. Newcombe, representing the Dominion, was entered into, and the latter took no part in the argument, which was followed by a judgment in effect confirming the conclusion arrived at in the earlier appeal.

3. The agreement (known as "counsel's agreement", and dated 7th July, 1902), provided that, without prejudice to the legal rights of either the province or the Dominion, and merely as a matter of convenience, the Dominion should, upon their surrender by the Indians, have power to dispose of lands included in reserves in Ontario, the Dominion to hold the proceeds subject to the rights of the province. It was further provided that the question whether this right of disposition by the Dominion should extend to the precious metals should depend upon the instruments and circumstances and law relevant to each particular piece of land.

4. This agreement has been enacted upon and dispositions made by the Dominion, but no step has ever been taken to settle the legal position even as to the surface and base metals, and the uncertainty as to the precious metals has stood in the way of the disposition of these, with the result that such precious metals as the reserves may contain have in fact not been dealt with, to the detriment both of the Indians, who would receive the benefit of the disposition, and of the province, which does not obtain the benefit of any taxation on the output of mines, which it might otherwise do.

5. It was not until 1920 that the strictly legal position of lands in Indian reserves surrendered for sale was discussed before the Judicial committee. Then in a case from Quebec (Attorney General for Quebec vs. Attorney General for Canada, 1921, A.C. 401), it was held that a patent by the Dominion of lands included in a reserve and surrendered by the Indians in trust for sale was ineffective, since upon the surrender the title passed, not to the Dominion, but to the province. It is probable that the strictly legal position in relation to reserves in the province of Ontario is identical with that in Quebec, although practically the situation is altered by counsel's agreement. The statutory confirmation of this agreement would, however, be highly convenient to both the Dominion and the province, and obviously that confirmation should extend to the settlement of the uncertainty in relation to the precious metals.

6. The geological formations in Ontario are such that precious and base metals ordinarily occur together and are only separated in the course of refinement. To deal with the precious metals consequently involves dealing also with the base metals, and the arrangement proposed by the present draft agreement is that upon the sale or other disposition of minerals lands one-half of the total proceeds should belong to the Dominion for the benefit of the Indians, and the other half to the Province.

7. In addition to dealing with the minerals and to confirming counsel's agreement, the present draft agreement also contains a new provision that the capital sum received by the Dominion by way of consideration for the disposition of any interest in lands in reserves may be expended for the benefit of the Indians and that the province, on the extinction of Indian right, becomes entitled only to so much of the capital as may remain unexpended.

That is in brief a sketch of the difficulties the amending legislation has to cover and a statement of what the bill to be founded in this resolution proposes to do.

Mr. FORKE: I have not observed, Mr. Chairman, that there is any definite consent on the part of the Indians to the proposed agreement. Have they agreed to this? Some hon. member says they have no say in the matter.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This has been a very vexed question. It is largely one not affecting the Indians so much as affecting the dispute as to final ownership.

Mr. FORKE: Between the provinces and the Dominion?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was I who made the comment that I did not think the Indians had any say because they are not affected. I do not see that they have the least concern as to where the legal title is, once it passes from the Indians. The Indian has a say, of course, before it passes from him. I was rather surprised to hear my hon. friend say that the Indians had agreed.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I presume the Indians would be better satisfied if they had the disposal of the money which comes from the sale of the land. After the sale of the lands all the proceeds are to be used in the interests of the Indians, unless a tribe of Indians becomes extinct, and there may be a small portion of the revenue coming from the land, which should go to the province.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is between the provinces and the Dominion, and not between the Indians and the Dominion at all. Do

I get the real meaning of it? By reason of the judicial opinion of the Privy Council expressed back in the eighties, the surrender of Indian lands in provinces, after those provinces came into confederation, vested the title to the surrendered lands in the provinces instead of in the Dominion. Consequently some action in another form came before the Privy Council in 1902; and instead of giving judgment an arrangement was made between the counsel concerned, Mr. Blake and Mr. Newcombe, the basis of which arrangement is to be ratified and made law by this bill, in so far as Canada is concerned. Necessarily it will, as well, have to be made law by the provinces concerned. Therefore the only matter left to be understood is, what the arrangement is. Have I got the minister's words or his memorandum aright? —the arrangement in effect was this: That the lands, though the property of the province after surrender by the Indians, should be administered by the Dominion for the benefit of the Indians who surrendered it, and when the time arrived that there was an extinction of the Indians' rights by extinction of the tribe, or by some other means, if it ever occurred, the remainder left over should pass to the provincial government. I understood the minister to say it passed to the provincial government?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, my hon. friend is right. Clause 7 reads:

> In addition to dealing with the minerals and to confirming counsel's agreement, the present draft agreement also contains a new provision that the capital sum received by the Dominion by way of consideration for the disposition of any interest in lands in reserves may be expended for the benefit of the Indians and that the province, on the extinction of the Indian right, becomes entitled only to so much of the capital as may remain unexpended.

We have control of the money so long as there is any Indian in existence. We may dispose of the land and use it, if it is in the interest of the Indian, but when the Indian is extinct, and there is no further method by which the government can expend the money in the interests of that tribe, then the province becomes entitled to only so much of the capital as remains unexpended.

Mr. FORKE: I do not know that I understand it, and I would really like to. Do I understand that some of these grants of land were made by the British Crown to the Indians before confederation, and these Indians agreed to give up the title to the land?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil);: I think there were treaties in effect between the Indians and the representatives of the government.

Mr. FORKE: The minister means between the British Crown and the Indians. I think there is more in this than appears on the surface.

Mr. BOYS: I thought the land was reserved and not granted to the Indians.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I said there were treaties made.

Mr. BOYS: But it involves the question of title. The question was as to whether the lands were granted to the Indians. I always understood that there were no grants but reservations.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If my hon. friend is correct in his interpretation the land is reserved to be set aside for the Indians and to be administered by the Crown.

Mr. BOYS: The title remaining in the Indians?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. BOYS: It could not be a grant.

Mr. FORKE: I have seen an agreement between the government of Queen Victoria and the Indians, and the agreement was practically granting the lands to the Indians. I do not know the exact form in which it was drawn up, but I have never seen anything in the agreement which provided that any day the government could step in and say, "You cannot have this reserve any longer." The Indians have a title of some kind.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is no doubt that as long as there are any Indians the reserves which are set apart for the Indians are reserved for them. But what we are seeking to deal with is the case where the Indian has no longer any interest in the land.

Mr. FORKE: Has the Indian agreed to it?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If he is dead you cannot get his agreement. As long as he is alive he has an interest in it.

Mr. BOYS: I suppose there will be concurrent legislation in the provinces. What is the proposition? Is the title to be in the Dominion?

Mr. STEWART Argenteuil): No. The title is not interfered with. The judgment of the Privy Council indicated that such title to the land as existed was probably in the province, but the land was reserved for the use of the Indians. We are making an arrangement whereby, when the land ceases to be any longer required for the use of the Indians, if that times comes. the province becomes entitled to what is left. Probably I should put it in this way: Under the terms of the agreement the Dominion government have control, and they may sell the lands and use the money under the provisions of the Indian Act and do what seems to be necessary in the interests of the Indians; but when the time comes that there are no more Indians of that particular tribe occupying that particular land, and there is no reserve left, the funds that may remain will go to the hands of the province.

Mr. BOYS: Evidently the sale would be made by the province and the proceeds of the sale would be handed over to the department for its administration on behalf of the Dominion.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The sale would be made by the Dominion.

Mr. BOYS: Then the provinces are agreed that the title for the purposes of this provision shall be in the Indians. They shall make the sale and use the money for the benefit of the Indians;—the title must be either in the Dominion or in the provinces, I understood the minister to say the title was really in the provinces.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend is raising the point as to who issues the title in the case of sale during the life of the Indians?

Mr. BOYS: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have full control to expend capital moneys derived from the sale. Mr. Biggar drafted this legislation, and he was consulted generally in connection with the agreement. Section 7, which I have just read covers it pretty well. The province comes in only when the tribe is extinct. When the extinction takes place, if there are any sums remaining from the proceeds of the sales of those lands, that money goes to the provinces. But we have complete control of the lands.

Mr. CALDWELL: One point is not very clear to me. Section (1) speaks of lands being surrendered by the Indians "in order that they may be disposed of for the benefit of the band." What method is taken to get the surrender of the lands by the Indians?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): By a vote of the band.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. CALDWELL: Unless by a vote they voluntarily surrender the land, the government has no authority to sell it?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The Indian Act gives the government pretty wide authority, but in no case have we attempted to dispose of or to lease land unless we have had a majority vote of the band concerned.

Mr. CALDWELL: And this legislation is not taking any further authority than the government now had, because it refers only to lands surrendered by the Indians?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thoroughly understand what the purport of the resolution is, and on its merits in general I have no adverse criticism to offer, but I really did not know before that the holding of the Privy Council applied to all the provinces. I thought this difficulty had arisen in connection with what is really known in law as the reversionary interest, in British Columbia alone.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This does not apply to all the provinces. This is an agreement between Ontario and the federal government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister's explanation applied to every province. That is what mystified me.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am sorry. I should have to deal separately with every province.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This does not get over the British Columbia trouble at all?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No; I would be glad if it would.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not carried very far by this resolution. I had hoped that the minister had made a settlement of the question with all the provinces. It is in British Columbia that the trouble arises. Will the minister explain, if such is the situation to be cured in Ontario, what is the different one in British Columbia? In British Columbia the provincial government has always claimed the reversionary title, that is to say, in lay language, the title after the Indians' rights are extinct by extinction of the Indians themselves or otherwise; but in Ontario I did not know that any such claim was advanced, in the same sense at least as it is in British Columbia. What does British Columbia claim over and above what this decision held to be the right of Ontario?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Is the right hon. gentleman speaking of the British Columbia government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the trouble in British Columbia? Is the situation there exactly what it has been in Ontario prior to this agreement?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Broadly speaking, the situation has been this. The adjustment between the provincial government and the federal government as to the question of reversion, the administration required in the case of extinction of the Indians' rights, has been in dispute between the governments, and as my right hon. friend is aware, a commission was appointed to go very thoroughly into the question, both governments tentatively agreeing to accept the decision of that commission. The commission reported after a good length of time had been taken up in arriving at a decision, and the Indians are objecting to the commission's finding which recommends the sale of some of the lands that, the commission say, are not required by the tribes. That deals with the older reserves. But the root of the objection by the British Columbia Indian is his claim that he is entitled, not only to reversion, but to the whole of the area of British Columbia; that is, that his hereditary right has never been extinguished. That is the most serious objection in my opinion. The federal government for the past eighteen months have been endeavouring to reconcile the Indians, that is, to get some further consideration as regards the reserve question. But the other question is the real reason for the British Columbia Indian objecting to a settlement of almost any sort. There are foreshore rights, fishing rights and a number of other rights that, perhaps, we can adjust; but the bigger question that is raised by the friends of the British Columbia Indians themselves is the claim to the original title to the whole area known as British Columbia. I would not care to enter upon a discussion of that question this afternoon.

Mr. CALDWELL: Do they claim the whole province?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes; they say their title has never been extinguished.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope the minister is losing more sleep over the national debt than he is over that question. I remember now very vividly the agitation for acknowledgement of the whole of British Columbia as being still the possession of the Indians.

Mr. PUTNAM: Will the right hon. member not wish the minister sound sleep in any event?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; I think he ought to get the national debt down a little before he has a right to sleep soundly. That is the agitation, if I recall it correctly, headed by the Rev. Mr. O'Meara.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not "reverend"; he is a legal gentleman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think he is both; and that is "some" combination. I will not bother discussing that, and the minister cannot be very busy if he occupies much of his time over it. He hardly appreciates the situation as I was endeavouring to lay it before him. I am, or at least I think the government ought to be, very anxious to get a settlement of that reversionary title claim in British Columbia. The question never was crucial in Ontario. It never was brought to the surface while I was connected with the department.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It comes up now perhaps more acutely in connection with the finding of the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A commission which looked into the matter brought in a report; the Dominion government were ready to abide by the report, but British Columbia was recalcitrant, and I must admit that I entirely failed to make any progress with the present premier of British Columbia. That, however, is no reason why the minister should not. I notice the premier announces that he is good friends with the Dominion government. I do not know what he is not getting; I notice he is getting an elevator in Prince Rupert and he is apparently going to fix rates in this parliament. Why can the minister not take advantage of this great friendship and secure the settlement of a question that is really crucial in British Columbia, namely the reversionary question? It is thwarting, hampering the work in British Columbia all the time. It is big and difficult, and it is complicated. The minister has had two and a half years now, with his colleague from that part of the country, to settle the matter. Has he made any progress at all or has his experience been very much like my own?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is hardly fair to blame the provincial government for the delay at the moment. The provincial government has shown a disposition to meet us but there are a number of questions involved in addition to the reversionary right which it is difficult to settle. One of these difficulties arose in connection with the question of the fisheries. The federal government controls that matter in most cases so that it was really not a departmental question. Our Indian wards are not satisfied and I have been endeavouring to appease them with the adjustment that has been made by the commission. They claim that in many cases they are entitled to consideration in relation to foreshore and fishing rights, which consideration they say they have not received under that award. We have been trying to adjust matters and to get the Indians to agree to the settlement, but I am bound to admit that some of their friends have given them bad advice. That has been the chief difficulty; were it not for the class of advice they have got I believe we could have a settlement of the matter in the near future.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Does the agreement with Ontario affect in any way the present status of the dispute between the Department of Indian Affairs and certain islands in the river St. Lawrence which were originally a part of the St. Regis reservation? Some half dozen islands were held under 99-year leases at ridiculously low rentals.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Were they reserves?

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Yes. About six or seven years ago these leases expired, and if I remember rightly the department took the ground that they were not renewable and refused to renew them. Does this agreement with Ontario contemplate any change in the status of that dispute with respect to those islands?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. This merely deals with the disposition of receipts from minerals and so on. The federal government has complete control of the management of the estate, if we may use that term, which is being operated in the interests of the Indian. So that any agreement of the character my hon. friend mentions would be dealt with departmentally; this would not touch it at all.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): But it is not merely a matter of agreement, it is a matter of litigation.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That may be. We frequently have difficulty about leases and matters of contract but this particular matter is simply one between the lessee and the government. It is not an inter-provincial matter at all.

Section agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Stewart (Argenteuil) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 191, for the settlement of certain questions between the governments of Canada and Ontario respecting Indian Reserve Lands.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend section eight of the Northwest Territories Act, Revised Statutes, 1906, chapter 62, by adding to the subjects on which the Commissioner in Council may make ordinances as therein designated, the levying of an export tax on furs within the territories.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister state fully the effect of this resolution?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The purpose is to impose a fur tax on pelts taken in the Northwest Territories. For some years, I understand, there has been an agitation to have this done. The provincial governments are now collecting a tax on pelts taken within the four western provinces and this legislation will put the territories which lie immediately north of those provinces upon the same basis and thus assist us to some extent in paying for the administration. That is all that the bill purports to do; it gives us authority to collect a tax on furs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the tax applicable only to furs exported?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, it refers to fur coming out of the territory.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Some of that fur would be export fur, and some would not be exported. Does the word "export" in this connection refer to furs exported out of Canada or merely out of the territory?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Out of the territory.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it to apply to the Indians?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If they are exporters, yes; but usually they are not. Whoever ships furs out of the territory for sale or disposition will pay a tax thereon.

Mr. WARNER: I have been requested to ask the minister to let this matter stand; an hon. member who wishes to discuss it is not here.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Any hon. member can register his objection when the bill is under consideration. We are merely getting the legislation forward a stage and there will be plenty of opportunity for hon. members to discuss it later.

Mr. WARNER: The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity on some other occasion to discuss it?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes; this is merely to get the bill introduced.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister be good enough to let us know what the rate of tax is to be, whether specific or ad valorem?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It varies somewhat from the similar tax collected by the provinces, but is based on the value of the fur. I might read this list to my hon. friend:

On each white or polar bear, $2; on each bear not specified, 40 cents; on each beaver, $1; on each fisher, $1.50; on each black fox, $5; on each blue fox, $2.50; on each cross fox, $1.50; on each red fox, 75 cents; on each silver fox, $5; on each white fox, $1.50; on each lynx, 75 cents; on each marten, $1; on each mink, 25 cents; on each muskrat, 5 cents; on each otter, $1; on each skunk, 10 cents; on each weasel, 3 cents; on each wolf, wolverine or coyote, nothing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend having told us what the tax is to be, it would be very interesting if he would let us have the average price which the trapper gets for these pelts, because I have no doubt the minister will thoroughly appreciate that the fur-exporting companies will just take the duty off the price they pay to the trapper. A very large number of trappers are Indians, and they will be taxed just to this extent.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will endeavour to get the information from our officers and furnish it when the bill is under discussion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the minister will answer another question it may save discussion later on. Perhaps he has some ground for distinguishing this proposed tax from, or perhaps it is consonant with, the governmental declaration as to the non-taxation of the original products of the soil with a view to helping those engaged therein, whether by land or by sea. By proposing this taxation the government is swallowing itself, and doing it very gracefully, because fur-hunting is an original activity of the Indians. On what grounds is this original activity to be taxed as against exemptions granted in other directions? Is it because there are no representatives of this primary production in the House, no votes to cajole, nothing to be done to keep the government in power when it ought to be put out?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend seems to discover a new mode of attack. This is not a new tax; surely my hon. friend knows that in the northern portions of the four provinces mentioned fur taxes are imposed. Instead of this being a detriment to the Indians we hope it will be of assistance to them. White trappers are going into the territories in ever-increasing numbers to the very great disadvantage of the Indians, so much so that we have to put a rather heavy license fee upon the white trappers in an endeavour to keep them out. The Indian is a most careful hunter with a view to conserving his food supply, but the white trapper does not exercise similar care. Consequently the cost of administration of the Northwest Territories, which is a vast area, is steadily increasing. This is the only country in which to my knowledge there is not such a tax. We think we are entitled to get this tax from the fur trappers in these territories.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend does not answer me at all. There is the policy of his government formally declared; here is the action. It is no argument to say that we have taxes on furs in other parts of the country. If he were putting the declared policy of the government into effect he would be taking those taxes off instead of extending them. But here we have a very novel idea seriously advanced by the minister.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why not? Is not this a matter of primitive production? The minister nods his head. He is right, of course it is. Did not the government say it was in favour of looking after primary production? The minister does not nod his head this time. Well, that is what the government say anyway, whether he nods his head or not. He points out that this is not a new tax. Well, there were some old taxes on primitive productions, but some of them have been got rid of. Of course, it is 5 p.m. true that others have been imposed. Here, we have this tax on primitive production confined to certain areas, and now it is to be increased. The minister has not answered my query as to how his action jibes with the general policy of the government. I do not think he can. But he has given us this new thought—that any specific industry is helped by taxation! Let us help the Indian. How? By putting a tax on everything that he produces. That is all the minister is doing to help the Indian. Well, that is an extraordinary way of helping the red man. But the trouble is, it does not help. My hon. friend says that there are too many white trappers in the Northwest Territories. If so, there is a way of dealing with them instead of taking money out of the pockets of the Indians, for this tax means that for every bear, mink or marten the Indian catches he will make that much less money. If the minister really wanted to help the Indians he would exact such license fees from, and impose such regulations on, white trappers as would preserve these areas to the Indians. But for the minister to say, "We are helping the Indians by taxing them on their furs," —well, I had hopes of better things from my hon. friend.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): While the fur the Indian captures is important, it is not so important as the food question in the northwest country. Our Migratory Birds Act, for instance, has caused a very considerable amount of suffering on account of making it impossible for them to shoot in the spring. It is a question of food with the natives, rather than making money out of the fur Fur used in the territory will bear no tax at all. The Eskimo is clothed entirely in fur, with very few exceptions; there are a few, of course, in better financial circumstances who can buy woollen clothing. The Indian's dress, generally speaking, is of fur, and his chief difficulty is his food supply, so much so that we have had to supply them, as did my hon. friends opposite, with food and clothing from time to time. It is the white man who makes the huge profits that are being made to-day in the fur business. It is the white trapper who is jeopardizing the Indian's means of existence to a very serious degree, and who forces this government, and will force succeeding governments, to spend more and more money in policing the territory in the interests of the Indian. We have to do that unless we are going to spend more and more money in maintaining the Indians. In view of that, I think I am asking only a reasonable tax on this business which is done largely by white trappers brought into that country by the Hudson's Bay people. These trappers come up there by boat in the fall and engage in trapping along the northern coast and to the northwest, and come out again the following year. The Indians will not suffer to any appreciable extent by the imposition of this tax.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have no intention of speaking on the virtue or lack of virtue in the tax itself. Men more familiar with the fur trade may do that, but I would like to ask the minister in regard to one rather interesting point involved, and that is the question of taxation without representation. As I understand it, the Northwest Territory has no representation, either federal or provincial, and as I understand the British constitution, which is the Canadian constitution, no one shall be subject to taxation without representation. That has always been the great principle, no taxation without representation, and I would like to ask the minister how he reconciles this tax on the products produced in an unorganized territory by people who have not the franchise wtih that great principle.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We could easily adjust that difficulty by granting them the franchise.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who, the Indians?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. I have just been trying to point out to my hon. friend that the Indian will not be seriously affected by the imposition of this tax; I was referring to the white man. Some of the Indians do make a very considerable amount of money trapping, but not generally speaking.

Mr. WARNER: Are the Indians exporting fur at all, or do they sell the fur in Canada? Alaska is pretty close there, and I was wondering whether they shipped their furs across the line or sold them in Canada. What are the white trappers doing in that connection?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The fur pack goes out of that country in three different directions. Around the western coast it goes out by the Hudson bay, usually by Hudson bay boats. The Hudson's Bay Company sends in a vessel every year with supplies for their posts around by the coast of Alaska and in the northern waters, and leaves trappers along the coast. The third way is down the Mackenzie river, and out by Edmonton. Those are the three directions by which the fur we propose to tax is exported.

Mr. WARNER: Does the minister mean exporting when the fur is sold to go outside the territory?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is hardly right when he states that the Hudson's Bay Company are going to be taxed by this legislation. The Hudson's Bay Company buy from the Indians, and from Indian trading posts all over the country, and they can load this tax on the Indian; that will only be following what trading companies usually do. If the minister wishes to protect, although I know he hates the word protection, the Indian who produces the furs, the way would be to put a heavy license fee on the white traders, and reserve the territory for the Indian to the full extent necessary to give him that natural nourishment and natural environment that are essential to his life. The minister is never going to help the Indian by taxing his fur. It may be the pressure would not be very great, but just to the extent that it exists, it is going to injure the Indian. A very sad feature of this whole thing is the failure of the minister to live up to that great cardinal principle of taxation for which his party lives and for which it is ready to die, to keep taxation away from the primary, the natural industries. All others, even the hunting of the wild animal are complicated and artificial, compared to this one. This is the most natural and primitive of all. Now where is the whole Liberal structure going to come to if the minister gets back to primitive industry of that kind and taxes it? Surely the minister did not listen with close ears to the parable the Prime Minister gave in the budget debate, wherein he likened the industries of a country to a great tree growing until it branched out and put forth leaves, and fruits appeared upon it; but another predatory interest arrived and tapped the tree down near the roots and extracted the sweet sap, which could then no longer circulate among the branches and nourish the leaves and fruit, and the tree died. Surely the minister did not hear that appeal and failed to understand it with his heart! What a frightful calumny this is upon his leader that he will now come down, only two months afterwards, and not only tap the tree down near the ground, but put in his little spout right in the root itself and tap industry right at the very base. How does he expect the tree to grow? It is really pitiable that these lights surrounding the Apostle of Liberalism should so close their ears to his teachings and come in so soon with a tax of this sort. If ever the whole edifice, the very sanctuary of Liberalism was imperilled, it is imperilled now. Here is a tax right at the very basic root, a tax on the most primitive and primary of all industries, and the minister puts his hand in there and grabs what is going to give it life. Surely he ought at least to resign from Argenteuil. How is he ever going to defend himself hereafter on these historic principles which are so dear to him?

Mr. BAXTER: I am not quite clear about one thing, a constitutional question. I presume the Northwest Territories are a part of Canada, and I thought there was a provision in the British North America Act by which the product of any part of Canada should not have a duty placed upon it with reference to any other part. Whether that strictly applies to export or not, I do not know. I would have some doubt as to the power to impose a duty upon products going from one part of Canada to another. It is perfectly clear a duty could be imposed upon the products of Canada going to a foreign country, going out of Canada as a whole, but whether it is against the letter or not, it is certainly against the spirit of the British North America Act that you should impose what is really a duty as against the other provinces seeking to obtain the prdoucts of any one province. I wonder if that had the consideration of the minister.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I confess this is a new thought to me. The provinces have the right to impose a tax on fur and they exercise it. If that is the basic industry my hon. friend is worrying about, the provinces undoubtedly have that right and they exercise it. The Northwest Territories, however, are administered as a territorial unit. Whether that confers authority to impose taxation I am unable to say for the moment, but I will look into the matter.

Mr. BAXTER: The point I was making has no reference to the authority of the territories but to the authority of this parliament. I assume that an export duty can be placed on lumber going from New Brunswick into any other province; and that an export duty may be put on, let us say, iron ore going from Ontario into any other province. But certainly the British North America Act never contemplated the possibility of a system of interprovincial duties even under federal organization. The point only occurred to me a few moments ago, and I should like to look into it further. I would think the minister would require to give the matter very close attention, because it is a much more important affair than the mere size of the tax. It is a question of whether or not the thing can be done at all. In this House I rather think we rush into legislation that will cost many thousands of dollars, and allow the matter to be resolved afterwards by the submission of questions to the Supreme Court and by appeals to the Privy Council, when we might save a good deal of time and misplaced energy by simply giving a little thought to these matters before we enter into them. Section 121 of the British North America Act provides that:

All articles of the growth, produce or manufacture of any one of the provinces shall, from and after the union, be admitted free into each of the other provinces.

That is entirely inconsistent with the idea of an interprovincial export duty. The only question that remains is whether the Northwest Territories are at all in the status of a province. I have not had time to look into the subsequent acts which gave them the status they now enjoy. I understand they are included now as part of Canada and perhaps the reason referred to might apply.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Stewart (Argenteuil) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 192, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—TAX COLLECTIONS

PROPOSED INQUIRY BY PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee of Supply.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant) moved in amendment, seconded by Mr. Brown:

That all the words after "that" be omitted, and the following substituted therefor:

Whereas it has been alleged in the public press of Canada that if an inquiry were instituted, some interesting information and astonishing facts, showing how the treasury of Canada failed to receive revenue intended for it, would be disclosed to the taxpayers of the Dominion; and

Whereas, for instance, it has been alleged in the press that cheques totalling about $1,700,000, representing the income and business profits taxes of three well known concerns in Ontario, were received by the Department of Finance in March, 1921, but were not deposited until December 6 of that year; and

Whereas a number of similar specific allegations have been made in the press; and

Whereas it has been alleged in the House of Commons on May 27 of this year, that in the case of a certain corporation the treasury of the Dominion seems to have lost in one year about $800,000 to which it was entitled;

Therefore, in the opinion of this House it is expedient that the standing committee on Public Accounts be and same is hereby instructed to investigate the methods by which the business profits and income taxes, especially in the case of large concerns, have been assessed and collected.

He said: I referred to one of the matters mentioned in the amendment on the 27th, May, as stated in the text, and at the conclusion of the debate the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), and the Prime Minister particularly, assured me that the matters which I submitted to the House, could be taken up before the Public Accounts committee. At least such was my understanding of the assurance given on that occasion. Subsequently I made an effort to secure a meeting of the Public Accounts committee at which Mr. Breadner, Commissioner of Taxation, might be questioned on certain matters. I have exercised a great deal of ingenuity between that date and the present in order to secure a meeting of the committee, but have failed, and it is for that reason that I now ask the House to instruct the committee to take cognizance of this and other similar matters I have been told that I should bring a specific charge of wrong doing against some official. I think, Mr. Speaker, that it must be apparent to the House that after it has been claimed by the Acting Minister of Finance and the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) and all those concerned, that the files and information concerning these matters, are confidential, it is practically impossible for anyone at this stage, to make a definite and specific charge. Section 14 of chapter 11 of the Business Profits War Tax reads as follows:

"No person employed in the service of His Majesty shall communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto any information obtained under the provisions of this act, or allow any such person to inspect or have access to any written statement furnished under the provisions of this act. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars."

This I presume is the basis of the statements made by the Acting Minister of Finance and the ex-Minister of Finance in regard to the impossibility or the difficulty of securing any information. Reference was also made on a former occasion to the fact that some information must have leaked out. I think it must be apparent to all, and I think we may take it for granted, that the information upon which the Globe articles were based, upon which I base my own case, leaked out through some of the officials. Why did they violate this particular section of the act, and inform parties outside of what they were pledged not to divulge? My conclusion is that some of the officials must have felt that their obligation to the country was greater than their obligation to observe the law. I am not the guardian of their consciences and do not wish to judge them in this matter. However, they have run the risk of dismissal and penalty for violating the law for certain reasons which they must have considered sufficient.

Mr ROBB: What evidence has my hon. friend that the information was given out from the Income Tax department?

Mr. GOOD: I take it that such must have been the case. Perhaps I might, if I were so disposed, give my hon. friend more particular information. I am satisfied, however, from what you might call general reasoning and very specific information of a confidential character, that such has been the case. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the question which we have before us is in its general aspects one of considerable importance. Is parliament not entitled to know how its own acts are being administered? We have been told that these files are confidential, and that therefore no one can find out what assessments have been made, or anything about assessments and collections. I do not see how we can possibly accept that conclusion. It seems to me a most extraordinary, anomalous, absurd and untenable position to assert that parliament cannot find out how its own laws are being administered. I have taken some little trouble to look into the matter of the powers of parliament in this particular regard, and I venture to submit a statement thereon to the House. First in regard to the obligations which are involved in the present Income Tax Act, I refer to Plaxton and Varcoe, page 254, where I find the following:

> Income tax returns are official documents and generally speaking the Crown cannot be compelled to produce them in court if the responsible officer of the department states upon oath that their production would be contrary to the public interest. Upon an application made by the liquidator of a company for the production of returns the court in the exercise of its discretion refused the application on an affidavit being filed that in the opinion of the Board of Inland Revenue such production would be prejudicial to the public interest. In an action for damages for slander it was held that the defender was not entitled to the production of the pursuer's income tax returns.

This shows, I think, that no person in the government service shall communicate any information to any person not legally entitled, that the Crown has a right to treat the income tax returns as official documents, and that they cannot be compelled to produce them in court. But that is an entirely different matter from the right of parliament or a committee of parliament to call witnesses and secure information. I refer to Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, page 70, where I find the following:

> The Senate and House of Commons have the right, inherent in them as legislative bodies, to summon and compel the attendance of all persons, within the limits of their jurisdiction, as witnesses, and to order them to bring with them such papers and records as may be required for the purpose of an inquiry.

At page 74 of the same authority, I find the following:

> No witness before either House of parliament or a committee of either House can excuse himself from answering any proper question that may be put to him. While the law of parliament demands the disclosure of the evidence it recognizes to the fullest extent the principle on which the witness is excused from making such disclosure in the ordinary courts of Justice and protects him against the consequences which might otherwise result from his testimony, the rule of parliament being that no evidence given in either House can be used against the witness in any other place without the permission of the House.

At page 75, continuing the same line of thought, I find the following:

> The experience of parliament has shown that in the majority of cases select committees are the best tribunals for examining witnesses and accordingly it will be found on reference to parliamentary records, evidence is taken whenever practicable before select committees.

At page 480, I find the following:

> It is usual in both houses to give committees special authority to send for witnesses or documentary evidence.

At page 482, we find:

> In the session of 1891 the committee of privileges and elections to whom was referred a very important inquiry, reported that one of the witnesses refused to place under the immediate control of the committee certain documents, which he had produced. His conduct was reported to the House, and he was ordered to deliver all accounts and papers to the clerk of the House. He complied at once with the order, and the committee had consequently full control of the documents in question.

> In view of certain prosecutions and suits, criminal and civil instituted by the Department of Justice subsequent to inquiries before the committee of Privileges, and in committee of Public Accounts in 1891, the House ordered in 1892 that all clerks and stenographers who were in the employment of the House, and in attendance on the said committees, "should attend, when required before the courts and give evidence as to the statements made upon oath, and produce all books and papers used before the said committees"; and it was distinctly laid down in the same resolution that the House, "while waiving its privileges in these particular cases with the view of eliciting all the facts and obtaining substantial justice in the premises, does not in any sense give up its well established and undoubted rights, whenever it may deem it in the public interest hereafter at any time to protect all witnesses examined before this House or any committee thereof in respect of anything that may be said by them in their evidence, and to refuse permission to any clerk or officer of the House or shorthand writer employed to take minutes of evidence before the House or any committee thereof to give evidence elsewhere in respect to any proceedings or any examination had at the bar or before any committee of the House."

A Witness before the House of Parliament cannot excuse himself from answering any question that may be put to him (with a single exception presently to be noticed) on the ground that the answer would subject him to an action or expose him to a criminal proceeding, or be the means of divulging the secret of his client communicated to him in professional confidence, or be ary breach of a judicial oath as grand juror, etc., some of which would be sufficient grounds of excuse in a court of justice. This difference between proceedings in parliament and in the ordinary courts has been established upon grounds of public policy and is considered to be fundamentally essential to the efficacy of a parliamentay inquiry, but while the law of parliament thus demands the disclosure of the evidence, it recognises to the fullest extent the principle upon which the witness is excused from making such diclosure in the ordinary courts of justice and protects him from the consequence which might otherwise result from his testimony.

And so forth. I have some other references, but it is not necessary to quote them on the present occasion. I want to mention in conclusion the case of Mr. R. C. Miller in 1913 which is contained in the Journals of the House, pages 274 to 278. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) will recall this because he seconded a number of motions made at that time. Mr. Miller refused to answer certain questions; he was called before the bar of the House where, on advice of counsel, he refused to answer the questions, and he was imprisoned until the end of the session.

All this evidence, it seems to me, shows an undoubted right of parliament to inquire into any matters such as have been claimed to be confidential and such as are necessary to inquire into in order to find out how the Business Profits War Tax Act and the Income Tax Act are being interpreted and applied. I may take it, therefore, that there is no doubt as to the power of parliament in this connection.

The other day when the Income Tax Act was under consideration, I had prepared an amendment to the act, but I was unfortunately unable to be present and left it in the hands of another member. But under conditions existing on the evening when the matter was under discussion the amendment was not submitted. I should like to read it to the House now:

Nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with the privileges of the House or of any committee thereof in ordering the production of returns, statements, reports, memoranda or writings made by any corporation, co-partnership or individual under this act, or to prevent the House or any committee thereof from compelling witnesses to answer questions or give information.

As a matter of fact, I was informed by the law clerk of the House, after a very lengthy discussion, that this amendment was not necessary, although there would be no harm in inserting it in the act, because it was generally understood that parliament has the right at any time to inquire into these matters, to compel the production of papers and to compel witnesses to answer questions even though those answers might incriminate them in the ordinary courts.

In view of these facts, I claim that the committee ought to be open to investigate these matters. I have been asked by the chairman of the committee to make a specific charge. I have told him that I can make no charge more specific than I have already made, and apparently that is not judged sufficient to warrant an investigation. As I said before, I am, therefore, compelled to ask the House to issue instructions to the committee to have this matter investigated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The operative part of the hon. member's resolution, the last paragraph states:

It is expedient that the standing committee on Public Accounts be and same is hereby instructed to investigate the methods by which the business profits and income taxes, especially in the case of large concerns, have been assessed and collected.

This is open to the interpretation that all that the committee could investigate would be the principles upon which assessments and taxes are arrived at and how, after being arrived at, they are pressed for collection. Does the hon. member intend that the committee shall be empowered, and that its duty shall be, to investigate the actual facts relevant to the correct assessment, the business affairs themselves and what the assessment should be, in a word, the details of the business or of the individual concerned?

Mr. GOOD: It is quite possible that the wording is not the happiest in this respect and, perhaps, not as clear as it ought to be. I may, however, answer my right hon. friend by saying that the idea that I hoped to convey was that the committee should inquire into, not only the facts in so far as those facts seem relevant to establish certain principles of interpretation and method, but the general interpretation and the general application of the law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That does not answer my question. Is the committee to be empowered to summon the man taxed, the officer of the company before it, and to get at the details of the business so as to enable the committee to decide whether that man or firm was rightly taxed or not?

Mr. GOOD: I think we shall have to leave the details with the committee, but certainly my intention is that the committee should have whatever powers it considers ample to inquire into the whole matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will not have any power except what this resolution gives it.

Mr. GOOD: I hope that if the resolution does not convey the powers that have just been described, it can be amended so as to convey ample powers of inquiry.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Into the individual case?

Mr. GOOD: Yes; and I shall be very glad to have any amendment to the operative part of the resolution to bring about that result. I can assure my right hon. friend that I have no desire to limit the inquiry; in fact, I am very anxious that any question which is relevant should be inquired into by the committee.

If I may further trespass on the time of the House, there is first the question of the interpretation of the law, and I have in mind particularly a dispute which, after the debate the other day, I got into with Mr. Breadner over the interpretation of the Business Profits War Tax Act. I may be wrong and he may be right, or he may be wrong and I may be right, but the matter of interpretation ought to be cleared up in the committee.

Mr. CRERAR: That would be a legal matter, would it not?

Mr. GOOD: I presume it would, to some extent, although I think parliament has power over such matters. Further than that, there is the question of actual facts in regard to certain assessments. I should like, for instance, that the committee should take cognizance of the particular assessment that I submitted to the House on a previous occasion and also should inquire into those other assessments that have been referred to in press despatches. In addition to the matters referred to on a previous occasion, and after the former debate, I received a letter from a man in Toronto whom I do not know at all. He marks it "private and confidential", and therefore I shall not disclose his name. This letter is to the effect that the evasions of the law in Toronto have been legion. He gives me to understand that he knows of numerous cases of what, for want of a better term with which to describe them, I must call evasions, to say the least. I know nothing about this, but it seems to me that the committee might well take cognizance of the matter; my correspondent offers to send me a list of the concerns which he has in mind. He says:

> If you decide to go on with this I can furnish you with a list of names.

I do not wish to prolong the discussion further at the present time. I am anxious however that this matter, which has received a good deal of attention in the press and otherwise and about which there is a good deal of talk, should be cleared up; and apparently the only place where that can be done is before the Public Accounts committee. I therefore urge that the matter be turned over to that committee for such inquiry as they may deem fit. As I said before, if the operative part of the resolution is not worded in such a way as to give to the committee the full and necessary powers to enable them to establish the facts and secure the information that is required, then I should like to see someone who may have better legal qualifications than I, amend the resolution to make it effective.

Mr. HANCE J. LOGAN (Cumberland): I do not intend to discuss the merits of this resolution but I desire to refer briefly to the statement of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), that he had approached the chairman of the Public Accounts committee and used every ingenuity to have a meeting of that committee called to consider this matter. I happen to be the chairman of the Public Accounts committee, and I may say that when the hon. member approached me I called his attention to the fact that, after all, the powers of the Public Accounts committee are somewhat limited. We receive our powers from parliament and they are stated in a resolution which reads:

> That the select standing committee of this House shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House, etc.

We have had the Auditor General's report referred to us, but the matter which the hon. gentleman desired to have investigated was not included among the subjects that had been referred to the committee. I asked him whether he had any charge to make and he said he had not; he only desired to investigate into the methods of administration. It occurred to me that this was rather a wide field to enter upon: It would necessitate an investigation into the methods of administration of the Department of Finance, of the Customs department, of the Marine department, of the Department of Justice if the same should be demanded by any member of parliament. It did not appeal to me, therefore, as being particularly a matter which could come within the province of the Publics Accounts committee, a committee which after all, as its name signifies, is a body whose duty it is to examine into public accounts and not to inquire into public methods of administration. In offering this explanation, I do not think that my hon. friend intended to reflect upon my opposition to his proposal in itself; the only question was as to whether we had the power to investigate a matter which had not been referred to the Public Accounts committee, a matter which was not one of public accounts but one that had to do with methods of administration.

So far as I am concerned, I desire that the Public Accounts committee shall be given, not ill-considered directions, but well-defined instructions upon which to act. I think this matter opens up a vast field, and for myself I want specific instructions from the House as to how far we are to keep faith with the taxpayers of the country. We have undertaken to keep secret certain matters in connection with various businesses throughout the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. That being so, is the Public Accounts committee now to investigate into the private affairs of every concern in Canada or of every individual? Is that to be its function or not? Without discussing the merits of the case that has been brought forward by the hon. member, I desire to have the considered judgment of the House on this question, for I am of the opinion that it is a matter of supreme importance for us to know how far we are to proceed under the circumstances. If we are to adopt such a proposal as this it is going to change the whole scope of the committee as we have so far understood it. Are we prepared to go as far as this implies? If the House directs that the Public Accounts committee shall investigate all these cases, the committee will of course do so. But we should have specific instructions before undertaking anything of the kind.

[Mr. Logan.]

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): As will be found in the report in Hansard of the evening session of May 27, when my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good) made some reference to methods of collecting income tax, it was then stated on behalf of the government that if any hon. gentleman desired to make any charges relating to the administration of the act such charges would be investigated immediately and those who preferred them would be given an opportunity of appearing before the Public Accounts committee. I have listened to the resolution that has been presented to the House and, as I construe it, it seems that the hon. gentleman desires an inquiry into the method of administration of the department; I do not understand that he proposes to go into the details of the business of every man in this House or in the country. It is reasonable that hon. members who were not in this House when the legislation governing the administration of the Income Tax and the Business Profits Tax Acts were enacted should have an opportunity of inquiring generally into the method of administering the law. I desire now to draw to their attention the provisions of that law as it stands. Section 14 of the Business Profits War Tax Act, chapter 11 of the statutes of 1916, is as follows:

14. No person employed in the service of His Majesty shall communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto any information obtained under the provisions of this act, or allow any such person to inspect or have access to any written statement furnished under the provisions of this act. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars.

Mr. GOOD: Does the Acting Minister of Finance interpret that to mean that the officials may not be called before the committee or before parliament and be compelled to give information on these points?

Mr. ROBB: I am quoting the law as it is; and the same thing appears in the Income War Tax Act, section 11 of chapter 28 of the statutes of 1917. I want to give to my hon. friend the views of parliament of the time when this legislation was enacted; not the views of any individual but the unanimous opinion of parliament at that time including both sides of the House. When the legislation was before the House on August 8, 1917, Mr. Carvell, the member for Carleton, asked the Minister of Finance, Sir Thomas White, what course the government intended to pursue regarding the publication of details of taxation under the business profits war tax. I fancy Mr. Carvell asked that question because there was considerable opposition here and there to the giving out of details of people's business; business and professional men, farmers and others do not care to have the details of their business made known to their neighbours and everyone else.

Mr. CALDWELL: Farmers have no secrets.

Mr. ROBB: There were farmers in the House at that time, and they had the same objection. This is what Sir Thomas White answered:

> When the Business Profits War Tax Act, which was introduced in 1916, was under consideration, the statement was made that returns would be brought down provided a resolution of the House was passed asking for such information. It was thought inadvisable that details of private business should be given. There seems to be a consensus of opinion that such details should not be made public.

That was Sir Thomas' view as to the consensus of opinion of the House at that time. Then he goes on:

> My own view is that a member asking that information of a confidential nature should be brought down and made public, should lay a foundation, indicating that the assessment had not been properly made. Then, if such position were prima facie sustained in the argument, the government would, I think, be justified in bringing down the information.

But Sir Thomas laid it down that first the member should make out a prima facie case. He communicated with the High Commissioner to ascertain from the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the practice in Great Britain, and this was the reply by cablegram:

> That under no circumstances would they permit the publication of detailed information relating to the business of individuals, firms and companies carrying on business in the United Kingdom and subject to the excess profits tax.

Mr. GOOD: Does the minister understand that anybody in this House is proposing the publication broadcast of details of people's business? I do not propose it.

Mr. ROBB: I am just making it clear, Mr. Speaker, that if such information was brought before a committee of the House it would be accessible to the newspaper reporters and would be scattered broadcast. But I was going to say that this is a new parliament, and if hon. members are not satisfied with the act and want to amend it, they are at liberty to proceed accordingly. But the government have no desire to keep back information in so far as it can be given under the act, and therefore we have no objection to the resolution offered by my hon. friend, as I understand it, to bring before the Public Accounts committee inquiry into the administration of the act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope the minister remembers that the hon. member said that that was just what he did not intend. It is pretty hard to ask the House to accept a resolution as meaning something which its mover says it does not mean.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, I am dealing only with the resolution as it is before the House.

Mr. GOOD: Mr. Speaker, will you call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Outside of the recitals, Mr. Speaker, the amendment amounts to very little. I never liked these amendments, worded in such a form as to assume a very threatening and important aspect but really to contain nothing. The hon. member (Mr. Good), in answer to a question which I put to him, intimated that he intended that the amendment should empower the committee to inquire into any business whatever with a view to ascertaining the correctness of the assessment that had been made against it in any year; in a word, that the amendment intended to expose the affairs of whatever business might be under the suspicion of any member of the committee. He must have been somewhat surprised to find the Acting Minister of Finance state to him that the amendment meant nothing of the sort, and that because it meant nothing of the sort he intended to let it go; in a word, he intended to let the amendment pass by like the idle wind, just as the government lets many a motion go by on the assumption that it means nothing and will not do any harm.

Mr. GOOD: How could a committee investigate methods of assessment and collection without looking into some individual cases?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know, but the unfortunate part of this amendment is that it does not say they will investigate anything. It says they will inquire into the methods; that is to say, I suppose, they could summon the chief officer and ask him what his methods were, and having got his methods, the organization that is under him, the general plan and scheme of assessment and collection, they could debate that, and I presume make a report to the House upon it. I know that is just what is in the mind of the acting minister, and he will dispute me now if I am wrong. That is the whole compass of the amendment as accepted by the acting minister. What an awful farce this is! What an awful farce! If the hon. member wants the Public Accounts committee empowered to inquire into and expose the affairs of businesses, let him say so in his amendment, or get one of his friends to do so —they cannot do so now in an amendment to this amendment, but the hon. member himself should have said so, and then the House would have had something to deal with. Now we are simply wasting time. This amendment, if it passes, is accepted by the government just because it is innocuous. It is a fraud on the House of Commons. It will not get anywhere; it will lead to no investigation; it is merely a method of evading the subject. What is the use of the hon. member saying, I am prepared to accept an amendment? You cannot move an amendment. He has brought something before the House that means nothing, but I presume it will enable someone to go out and say: We proposed that the committee should know all these facts; and enable someone on the government side to say: We accept the amendment from the Progressive party.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the hon. member suggest that that was the motive underlying the motion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what the motive was. I will have to leave the suggestion as to it to my hon. friend.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But surely he is sincere in the matter?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, if he is, he is taking a strange method of getting anywhere. He gets nowhere by this amendment. The hon. member must recognize that from the speech of the Acting Minister of Finance.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the right hon. gentleman suggest a method that would get action?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that I have been constituted a tutor to the hon. member for Brant. When I have a course to pursue in the House, I put my course in plain language.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It might help hon. members who are anxious to get this action.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid hon. members are helpless. They have gone so far, there is no use suggesting anything. If the hon. member wanted me as counsel he might have come to me before. I had no notice whatever of this amendment; I had no idea it was coming up. Now, in the form in which it is before the House it is innocuous, and for the reason that it is innocuous the government accepts it, and for no other reason whatever. Nothing in the way of a motion in this House gets such a warm welcome from the administration as one that means nothing, and that is the reason for the splendid welcome that the hon. member's motion got from the Acting Minister of Finance.

Now as respects this part of the House. We are responsible for the legislation which is on the statute books. We take full responsibility for it; we believe it is the right legislation. However, if this government does not believe it is the right legislation, it is the responsibility of this government to propose an amendment. The House is quite competent to change the act, if in the judgment of the government it should be changed. We do not think it is in the interest of the country that there should be this exposure of private affairs. We believe these taxes must be collected on much the same principle as other taxes are collected. Officials must be provided, there must be supervision by members of the government, there must at the same time be availability of facts on any allegation of wrongdoing or malfeasance of office. These are the principles that we thought correct. We did not believe that any member of this House had any right to expose before the country any single feature of one of these details, unless it has been brought out in the regular way with all opportunity for disclosing the surrounding circumstances and presenting the other side of the case. I never thought it was honourable to throw before the country one exposed fact or allegation of fact. Hon. members on the other side thought differently, and wherever they could get even a rumour or allegation of fact—as for example in the Riordon case—they flaunted it before the country when they knew there was no opportunity for full disclosure, or that all the surrounding circumstances could be known. If any hon. member feels that the system should be different I would welcome a motion placing before this government the responsibility of establishing a different system. We took the responsibility when we were in office. I know of no reason why this government should evade it; and if hon. members to my left feel that there should be full disclosure of the facts of individual businesses, so that individual members of the House could determine whether assessments were right or were wrong, whether the terms were right or were wrong, then let an hon. member move to that effect and let the government take its position. But I am a little impatient of motions which simply evade the whole question and give the opportunity to the government to evade it.

Mr. T. G. McBRIDE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely opposed to this amendment for the simple reason that I do not think it is fair to business men that such an amendment should be passed. I know a large number of business firms in Vancouver, who call in a chartered accountant, every six months, and have their books audited. When they have this done they give notice to the income tax office and an officer is sent down. He checks over the firm's accounts and the assessment is based on that showing. But the information so afforded is given with the direct understanding that it is confidential. That being so, why should other people be allowed to have this information to satisfy their idle curiosity, and in many cases that is the motive which prompts them to ask for an amendment of this kind. I think if the House adopts any such amendment it will make a very great mistake. In my opinion those who framed the Income Tax Act used good judgment, and the government has no right now to interpret it in such a way as to permit the disclosure of the business of any firm to the public. As the law now stands that is not done. If I had any criticism to offer in connection with this affair, it would be that in my opinion the salaries paid to the officers in charge of the Income Tax branch are not in keeping with the responsibility which devolves upon them. However, that is for the government to say.

Mr. FORKE: I merely wish to make this explanation. I was not in the House when the amendment was read from the chair and I have never seen it. Therefore I do not feel in a position to offer any remarks in respect to it.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I think the member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) totally misconceives the idea held by the mover of this amendment; he (Mr. Good) does not want to inquire into the details of anyone's business. At the same time if corporations or individuals are not paying the taxes they should, there ought to be some way of ascertaining the facts, and whether there is anything wrong or not. If it is to be held that the books of the department are private and that we, as members of parliament, have no right to get any facts in such cases, I should like to ask how we are going to find out whether the government is or is not being defrauded of moneys that it should be collecting?

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. GOOD: I understand, Mr. Speaker, that I have not the right to speak again.

Mr. SPEAKER: Paragraph 2 of rule 21 reads as follows:

> A reply shall be allowed to a member who has moved a substantive motion or the second reading of a bill, but not to any member who has moved an order of the day, not being the second reading of a bill, an amendment, the previous question, an adjournment during a debate, or an instruction to a committee.

Under this rule the hon. gentleman cannot reply.

Mr. GOOD: I was going to ask if I might have permission to submit four questions to the Acting Minister of Finance?

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the House, the hon. member certainly can.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Are you breaking the rule, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent of the House the hon. member's wish may be granted.

Mr. GAUVREAU: No, we have had enough of it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It is important to make clear to the House particularly in view of the remarks of my hon. friend from Cariboo (Mr. McBride) just exactly what the amendment proposes. The leader of the Progressive party may be interested in learning the substantive part of the resolution which is as follows:

> That in the opinion of this House it is expedient that the standing committee on Public Accounts be and the same is hereby instructed to investigate the methods by which the business profits and income taxes, especially in the case of large concerns, have been assessed and collected.

My hon. friend will see that that does not necessitate the disclosure of private business or the business of individual firms. If it did occasion such disclosure it would occasion a violation of the section of the statute which says:

> No person employed in the service of His Majesty shall communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto any information obtained under the provisions of this act, or allow any such person to inspect or have access to any written statement furnished under the provisions of this act. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars.

It does not follow that because the business of individual firms may not be disclosed before the Public Accounts committee there may not be need for this resolution. There is, I think, in the minds of a good many considerable doubt as to the methods being employed in assessing taxes. For example, to what extent account is being taken of watered stock, how exceptions are arrived at and matters of that sort. I think it would be very much in the public interest to have doubts of that kind removed, and for that reason the government is quite prepared to accept the amendment which has been moved. It may well be that the Commissioner of Taxation is proceeding in accordance with methods that will commend themselves to the judgment of the House. It is possible that in some particulars methods may be employed which would not be countenanced if the House were fully aware of them. In any event there appears to be doubt, in the minds of some persons as to the methods that are being followed, and if the course suggested by the amendment will help to remove doubts of the kind I should think a reference to the Public Accounts committee would serve a useful purpose.

Mr. GOOD: May I ask the Prime Minister if he understands that the Public Accounts committee has no power to inquire into any particular case?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Public Accounts committee, like every other committee of the House, is subject to the laws of the land. The Public Accounts committee can operate within the scope of its authority, but it cannot violate any provisions of existing statutes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I do not know that I can usefully add very much to what I said on the 27th May. I think I made my position very plain. There may be some hon. gentlemen, however, in the House now who were not in the House at that time. I invited discussion then. I invite it now; that is provided those in whose hands the good faith of this country now is reposed desire to break faith. I have nothing to fear from investigation. It so happens that at present I am not in any way the keeper of the country's good faith. Attacks were made by gentlemen across the floor which were absolutely without foundation, which attacks I could not answer, because I could not keep faith on the one hand and give an answer on the other. Yes, the attacks were made with impunity, because the authors of these attacks thought I would have enough decency and honour to preserve the secrets of the department which were within my knowledge. Attacks were made on me indeed, by gentlemen who should have been very much interested in seeing that the proper secrets of the ratepayers were held inviolate.

The question is entirely one for this government. I am perfectly prepared tomorrow to go into an investigation, which would have to do with the only things that would be useful in a case of that kind, namely: What was done here and what was done there, what this man paid and what he ought to have paid. I am perfectly willing to go into it to-morrow morning. It is not for me to say. When I was keeping the conscience of the department I believed in keeping faith. Gentlemen across the floor were making attacks which they did not believe in, which they knew were wrong, which their own Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) deprecated when he took occasion in this House to say that he never associated himself with them. and attacks which my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) said this session he never associated himself with. But these attacks were made, and if attacks of this character are to be made, the only logical thing to do is just what the hon. member moving this resolution (Mr. Good) desires done. His idea is that you can do nothing useful here unless you find out concretely what was done. That is the thought of everybody. Was there a charge made against me in that campaign as to theory and as to principle? Not at all. The charge was specific having regard to specific taxes and specific individuals; and every one knows that the only successful way in which you can ascertain how an act has worked out, is to apply to it those very principles in question. Every one knows that. I am quite free to make that admission now. On the other hand, it is a good deal better that scurrilous attacks should be made and put up with, rather than that politicians should suffer, or that the business of the country should suffer. I am quite prepared to admit that, and I am quite willing to admit that the legislation which is now on the statute books is the legislation of every civilized country in the world that desires to carry on, of every government that desires to see business carried on properly, of every administration which does not want to expose its business men to the venom of the busybody, or perchance to the blackmailer, by divulging to any one who asks for it, the business secrets of the organization.

Just think what the converse would mean. What chance would business men have if a stronger competitor could get information as to the inside of all his business, his results and the like, and know just exactly where to squeeze him. There are a lot of businesses, particularly to-day where the accounts show results which are not obtained entirely by the application of strict business principles, businesses where losses have taken place, where things are not going in the way they ought to be going—hundreds of them—and why? By reason of writing off depreciation and other similar charges. Just see what it means. If the results of the patient, painstaking stock-taking of a concern under these circumstances were made public, what would it mean? A wealthier or stronger concern would be able to see exactly how close that company was to insolvency and would be able to calculate, as a matter of days, if certain cuts were made, how that competitor could be put out of the way. That is just how it would work out. These are a few of the reasons why all countries that have any serious interest in business want these things kept in such a way that business can still be carried on.

The Prime Minister suggests the necessity of this investigation on account of watered stock. Is that suggestion not ridiculous? Any member of this House in five minutes can satisfy himself on the point as to what is actually done and the instructions given in connection with watered stock. In that inquiry as to watered stock, apart from the general instructions and general policy, how much further will you get, unless you go into particulars to see whether that policy has been lived up to or not, and how are you going to get those particulars, unless again this government breaks faith with its taxpayers? There is no secret whatever in the situation as to watered stock. Everybody who takes the trouble to look at the act knows it and it is no secret whatever.

I really would like to see something definite done one way or the other. Is the government content to waive the provisions of the act which in the last general election were alleged by hon. gentlemen supporting the Liberal party to have been specially arranged so that one, Drayton, could get behind them? That is not only what was said but what certain newspapers printed. I should like to have something definite on this. I should like to know whether faith is to be kept or not, and if it is not, I want a hand in that inquiry. I can assure my hon. friends that it will be a bigger one than is here proposed; that I shall have not one answer but many more than one for everything that was said in connection with Riordon. How absurd the whole of this tissue of calumny was! Just for a few months did I know anything about the Riordon matter. My hon. friends have been in office and they have known all about it for two and one-half years. What have they done? Absolutely nothing. Pulp was away down; in the United States, our great market for the product of the Riordons' business was very bad in 1921, particularly bad in the summer of 1921. The market was off. Since then we have seen wonderful activity. We have seen that market taking all the pulp, yes, all the paper that can be offered. We have seen the price advance, yes, multiply. We have seen properties sold at far higher prices than they could have been sold at in those days. But nothing has been done. Why, some hon. gentlemen opposite thought that there should be a royal commission to investigate the Riordon charges. Yes, I was to be the subject of a royal commission. I have mentioned it before. I have invited it. I am getting tired of giving the invitation, but the invitation still stands. I should like an opportunity of meeting some of those valiant gentlemen before a royal commission where an oath could be taken and where it would amount to something. I should like something definite about this matter. Why, the last statement to the Riordon creditors—that is no secret now—shows that not a single soumarquee had been collected, nothing done by these hon. gentlemen that were so virtuous, so insistent and so indignant at a few months' delay. Yet nothing is done for two and a half years. I wonder if we can get something really straight and concrete, because I should like to have it.

As I said before, putting up with what I have put up with, I still say that, as a matter of public honesty, the act ought to be observed; but if that course is to be taken let it be taken openly, firmly, honestly. Do not let us have any more shilly-shallying about this. Either say we can go into this matter or not, what is the use of passing this resolution in view of the declaration already made on the one hand that details cannot be given, and, on the other hand, that details can be given. Why should this House not know that? I want to know it and I want to be there with my details. Should there not be an end of this beating about the bush and an honest position taken fairly and squarely? As the matter stands now, it is useless to vote for the resolution; it is useless to vote against it. It is simply another negation. Will the government not take a stand now firmly one way or the other? Either let us know that we can give details and be present with them, or else state definitely that that cannot be done; that the thing is a farce.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to have a little more light on the statement which the Prime Minister made a few minutes ago. which seems to me to involve very directly the rights and powers of this parliament. We have been at this session refused admission to important documents which have passed between the Motherland and this country that bear on the relationship of this country to other nations. Within the past few weeks the government has refused to give information to a committee of this House with regard to the persons present at a cabinet meeting. Within the past few weeks we have been practically told that we have no right to make inquiries into the expenditures of the Canadian National Railways. Only to-day we were told that we had in the Civil Service Commission a body over which we had practically no control. To-day, a few minutes ago, we are told apparently that our tax commission is also a body that is beyond our control. Do I understand from the Prime Minister that this parliament has no right to order an investigation into methods of taxation or into any matter whatever affecting the welfare of this country? The Prime Minister quotes certain provisions of the act. As I understand that act, the provisions bind officials of the department to secrecy with regard to such information as comes before them. But I can hardly understand that the Prime Minister means that that act prohibits this parliament from making inquiries. I thought that this parliament could give instructions to any committee and that that committee could call before it what witnesses it would and ask from them what questions it would. Surely we are not going to abdicate all the rights of this House and say that we have erected all sorts of councils, commissions and departments which are out of our control? I should like to ask a little more definitely from the Prime Minister his understanding of the powers of parliament in this regard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend at once that parliament is all powerful to do whatever it wishes to do; but when parliament has enacted a law which prescribes certain conditions and lays down certain obligations, members of parliament. like the public generally, are obliged to respect the law as it stands. My hon. friend has made to-night a number of statements which, if permitted to pass unnoticed, would convey an entirely wrong impression to the public. He intimated, for example, that we had a Civil Service Commission which, he had been told, parliament could not control. Neither he nor any other member of parliament was ever told any such thing. There is in the statutes a law which gives certain powers to the Civil Service Commission, and as long as that law remains there, members of parliament, the government itself, are bound by that law. Parliament can amend, or change the law when it wishes to do so; but until parliament decides to amend and change laws, they must be respected by members of parliament as well as by everyone else.

As regards the matter under discussion at the moment, parliament has declared in a very special way what the obligations are upon certain public servants filling positions of trust. If my hon. friend wishes to bring in an amendment to the statutes and have it discussed, to do away with that obligation, he has a right to bring his amendment here and have it discussed, and if parliament decides to alter the law, the law will be altered and conditions will be changed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand that without the alteration of that law, that is without special legislation, parliament has no right to make such an inquiry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where parliament has legislated specifically in regard to any particular matter every committee of parliament must take cognizance of such legislation, for it is the law of the land. Parliament has made certain matters criminal; hon. members cannot commit crimes and not come under the law of the land; and because a man is a member of parliament it does not follow that in his conduct or in the assertion of his rights he has any right to supersede any law. Parliament can change the law in any respect or can remove from the category of crimes such acts as at present are constituted criminal; parliament may remove from the statute certain inhibitions which it has created. But so long as any act stands it must be respected.

Mr. GOOD: Does the Prime Minister contend that section 14, which has been quoted, has any applicability whatever to this House?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Every statute applies to every member of parliament just as it applies to every citizen of the country. My hon. friend shakes his head; he says no. Does he argue that a member of parliament is exempt from the provisions of the law?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there not a difference between an individual member of parliament and parliament itself?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways): I happened to be in the House when this legislation was being discussed and I urged very strongly, as did others, that there should be an income tax, believing that this was a good way of finding money where money existed. But I did agree and am still of the opinion that any provision that would allow the examination into the private business of any firm or individual would not only be bad legislation but that it would wreck the results of the income tax law; because men can devise means of hiding their business transactions if they know that those transactions are to become public. This policy would be a fruitful field for the blackmailers and for all kinds of busybodies who perhaps might have no great interest in income tax themselves but who would fuss a good deal about the income tax of other people not being paid. It would make the conduct of business impossible so far as it related to the income tax.

I am strongly of the opinion that the income tax law is a just law. Theoretically we can talk on a good many subjects with more or less lucidity; but we have to be practical business men particularly in considering legislation which has to do only with business men. There is therefore no sense—and I do not say this offensively—in our endeavouring to find some means by which we can circumvent one of the protections that are afforded to those who are doing business, and so disclose the full particulars of people's affairs. One can imagine very many cases in which mischief might be done. I may refer to the Canadian National Railways, to which reference was also made by my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) made out the whole case for the railways; he thought that it would be very detrimental to any company or individual if they were compelled to hand their private business over to the tender mercies of a rival for dissection.

As to the government's taking the ground that they must not say even who was at a cabinet meeting, the government did not take any such ground. Those handling the case took the ground that they must not answer that question; for my part I answered, before the objection was taken, that I did not remember who was present; nor did I and members of the government who have attended cabinet meetings know that, except for some particular business between themselves, they never remember forty-eight hours after just who were present at any meeting. Their own business they will remember, and they will recall those who took part in the discussion; but apart from that their recollection will not be very precise. That, however, is merely by the way.

Let me point out that this parliament has a constitutional method of enacting legislation and of placing its views upon the statute books; and that is what the statute books are for. Parliament cannot one day pass an act, making the whole country liable to it, and the next day through a committee violate that act. That could not be done. What would be the good of a statute if a committee could say, "We do not care anything for the statute; parliament has appointed us a committee to do certain things and we will do them irrespective of that law"? The king himself could not violate a statute without being brought to task, and this parliament has no right to break its own laws, it has no right to do so, either as a matter of law—if lawyers will allow me to say so—or as a matter of fair play and justice to the taxpayers who have sent them here. If this information is required by parliament the right procedure is to repeal the statute and then let the committee fire ahead. But I am not in favour of this information being given, because I believe the business of the country at the present time is more sensitive than it has ever been before. If we repeal this statute we shall do more to injure business than all the one-horse investigations which may be carried on will do to help it.

What I am about to say is perhaps a little afield, but I am constrained to make this observation. The whole world just now seems to have a mania for investigating everybody but itself. Men in every parliament almost at the present time are on the lookout to see if they can find cause for investigating the other fellow for the purpose of getting something on him, as the saying is.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They have managed to do it in the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM: But they do not violate a statute in doing it; and perhaps when the votes are polled it will be found that the newspaper headings did not amount to so much after all. You never can tell until the votes are in just how the public views these things. Generally speaking, if the public men of the world are held in a measure in disrepute it is their own fault, not because of any guilt on their part but by reason of the fact that people are all the time wanting to investigate rather than legislate. I do not know on the whole that any of us will get anywhere by trying to investigate someone else, because there is so much bad in the best of us and so much good in the worst of us, that it ill behooves any of us to talk about the rest of us.

Mr. FORKE: That is not bad.

Mr. GRAHAM: So far as this motion is concerned, I say frankly I would not allow the details of any single transaction to be gone into in the committee; that cannot be done unless the statute is repealed or amended. There may be some general principles on which conclusions are arrived at, such as methods of bookkeeping and so forth, which might be investigated in a general way. But I would be absolutely opposed to compelling John Brown or Bill Smith to open his books to Tom Jones for Tom Jones to poke his nose into them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am thoroughly in accord with the doctrine the minister expounds. Will he say, in the face of that, that it is fair to scatter through the country a report as to any detail of any individual business?

Mr. GRAHAM: I should not think that the committee having got at the details would then scatter them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister think that it is fair or honourable that such a thing should be done in face of the fact that an investigation cannot be held?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know just what the hon. member is driving at.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My question is perfectly clear. I should like the minister to be as frank now in answering it as he was in expounding that doctrine. I commend him for defending the law, as well as shielding himself behind the law. The man who shields himself behind the law ought to defend it. Now will the minister be as frank in answering this question: In view of the admitted impotence of the government to investigate the necessary details, is it fair to scatter a rumour of details as to any individual concern?

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not here as judge in any case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He should be frank.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): I am not at all sure that I agree with the law as it has been laid down by some hon. members. I think the statute is directed to preventing an individual employee from giving information in the course of his employment, and that means to any member of the public. I very much doubt if the statute at all prevents the exhibition of this information to the high court or parliament itself, but I prefer to put my ground for voting against this resolution on a very different plane. The mover has left this proposal, apparently purposely, in an absolutely nebulous, chaotic state; he has asked for parliament to send it to a committee without any additional facts and without any specific direction, and he has expressed to the House his entire willingness to have any change made that anyone else will offer which will make his motion wider. The hon. gentleman had control of the drafting of his amendment, and he could have made it wide enough to get at the specific thing which he desires to get at. I object to any more time being taken up in discussing some general principles or some theoretical possibilities in connection with our legislation. We have had altogether too much of that, and too little of the practical. We can sit in some committee for hours and discuss the whole scheme of the Income Tax Act and the Business Profits Tax Act over again. But are we going to get any further? Has anyone got a specific change to suggest? Does anyone say that the principle of income taxation is unfair? You will know nothing more when you get through an investigation of that character than you know to-day by intelligently reading the act. But we are not given the alternative, we are not given the form the hon. mover suggested the investigation might take—that of specific inquiry. Therefore it is fair to conclude that this is simply one of the usual sandstorms that is blown up to attract public attention to some gentleman who poses as a great saviour of the unfortunate downtrodden people. He takes mighty good care not to put any punch into his proposition so anybody can possibly be hurt. To him the glory and to nobody any suffering. I am not going to vote for an investigation of that kind.

If the gentleman who moved this resolution had himself carried out his invitation to this House to add other language to it, we would have had a sort of snooping, prying, suspicious investigating committee with nothing absolute referred to it, a committee that would have hunted around to try to find some spot or some flaw in somebody's character, and without any member of parliament daring to put his finger upon a specific act of wrongdoing and lay a charge against any officer of this country or any member of the public. I will not vote for that sort of thing. I believe parliament has power to get at the facts, I do not think we are crippled by the statute, but I think we are withheld by our sense of fair play against entering upon any such speculative investigation. As the Scotch bard said, God save us from the unco' guid and the rigidly righteous!

9 p.m.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Good) which was carried on the following division:

Mr. MARTELL: I was paired with the hon. member for East York (Mr. Harris). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now that the government has succeeded in defeating itself, may I ask when we may expect its resignation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government indicated that it would accept the amendment of my hon. friend, and in its action in so doing has been sustained by the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On an amendment to its own motion!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is quite proper, if the government so chooses for it to accept an amendment which is not moved in any sense as a want of confidence motion—if the government believes in the wisdom of the amendment, and it is sustained by the House, that is all that is necessary.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the main motion as amended be carried?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The main motion as amended cannot be carried. The main motion is lost; the amendment is carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: The main motion as amended is lost.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move the House do immediately resolve itself into committee of Supply.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I take the ground that as the motion to go into committee of Supply is defeated, the House cannot go into committee of Supply.

Mr. SPEAKER: Bourinot at page 421 provides for such a case:

> If an amendment has been carried in the affirmative, then it is the practice not to allow the committee of Supply to drop—for that is not the intention in moving amendments at this stage—but to propose a second time the question for the Speaker leaving the chair. It will then be moved—"That the House do on. . . . next resolve itself into committee of Supply."

Or, when it is necessary to proceed at once with the estimates it will be resolved "That this House do immediately resolve itself into committee of Supply."

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think it can be supported from any British authority. The proviso there has some significance. The government having been defeated on its own motion to go into supply cannot again that day move the House into supply.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is very clearly put here. I will send the authority over to the hon. member.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the significance of "when it is necessary"?

Mr. SPEAKER: Bourinot says:

It will then be moved—"That the House do on. . . . next, resolve itself into committee of Supply." Or, when it is necessary to proceed at once with the estimates it will be resolved "That this House do immediately resolve itself into committee of Supply." Mr. Speaker will then again propose the question for his leaving the chair, which is generally agreed to, although it is quite legitimate to propose amendments and debate various matters.

According to May, this is also the British practice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The point I am taking now is this, that even accepting Bourinot, which I submit is opposed to the British authorities, there must be some significance to the proviso "when it is necessary". Such a case might possibly arise when it was the last day of the session, but in a case like this there is no necessity. The wish of the government does not make it a necessity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I submit that the government, not the leader of the opposition, is the judge of the necessity of the case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is, the rule amounts to nothing.

Mr. VIEN: Test the confidence of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is moved by the right hon. the Prime Minister, seconded by Mr. Graham, that this House do immediately resolve itself into committee of Supply. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee of Supply.

SUPPLY

MARINE AND FISHERIES

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Ocean and river service—maintenance and repairs to Dominion steamers and icebreakers, $1,500,000.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was spent under this vote last year?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): $1,467,425.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have repairs apart from maintenance. What was our repair bill last year, and where were the repairs made?

Mr. CARDIN: The repairs were made at the place where the vessels happened to be at the time—Halifax, Victoria, St. John, Quebec, Sorel, Montreal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the minister give us the names of the icebreakers now?

Mr. CARDIN: The Lady Grey, the Stanley, the Montcalm, and the Mikula.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I apologize to the Minister of Justice if I do not pronounce the name "Mikula" correctly; I know how fastidious he is in a matter of that kind. Now, is this name the result of a second christening? If so, what was the original name of the ship?

An hon. MEMBER: What difference does it make?

Mr. LOGAN: "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet."

Mr. CARDIN: This vessel was first called the "J. D. Hazen."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What happened to her afterwards?

Mr. CARDIN: She was sold to the Russian government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Did they give her the name "Mikula?"

Mr. CARDIN: That was the name given to her by the Russian government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What has the Mikula cost since we re-purchased her?

Mr. HOCKEN: Why not change the name to something more distinctive?

Mr. HANSON: They might call her the "Alexander Johnston."

Mr. HOCKEN: Or the "George P. Graham."

Mr. CARDIN: The figures are as follows:

Original cost..	$436,000
Repairs, 1922-23..	6,749
Repairs, 1923-24..	49,890
Total..	$492,639

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the dates for the active campaign in ice-breaking?

Mr. CARDIN: The requests begin about the middle of January, and the work lasts up to the middle of April.

Mr. HANSON: What is the ship used for at this time of the year? Is she in commission?

Mr. CARDIN: No, she is laid up.

Mr. HANSON: What is about the annual cost of operation for that short season?

Mr. CARDIN: The cost is $192,800.

Mr. HANSON: What crew does she carry when in commission, and how much of a crew while she is not in commission? That is a large sum of money for the maintenance of a ship for a period of less than four months in the year.

Mr. CARDIN: She carries a crew of 84 men when in commission.

Mr. HANSON: How many when she is laid up?

Mr. CARDIN: When she is laid up the crew consists of from 15 to 20 men.

Mr. HOCKEN: What have 15 to 20 men to do on a ship when she is laid up?

Mr. CARDIN: We have to take care of the boat. It is necessary to have watchmen on the boat, and we have to keep her ready to render salvage service.

Mr. HANSON: What character of work?

Mr. CARDIN: She is fitted for salvage work.

Mr. HANSON: Does she keep steam up the year round?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Where is she located when she is laid up?

Mr. CARDIN: Located in Sorel a week or two ago.

Mr. HANSON: How much salvaging does she do at Sorel?

Mr. CARDIN: The salvaging is not done at Sorel; but she is capable of doing salvage work when it is necessary.

Mr. HANSON: Has she ever done any salvage work since her purchase?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. HANSON: Has she ever been requested to do any since her purchase?

Mr. CARDIN: There was no call for it.

Mr. HANSON: How does the minister justify retaining 15 to 20 men on a ship that is laid up, and under no request for any kind of useful service? Is it true the department keeps on the whole staff—captain, first mate, second mate, third mate, first engineer, second engineer and third engineer?

Mr. CARDIN: We keep only two officers, the engineer and some men to perform necessary work on the ship. We also have the watchmen.

Mr. HOCKEN: Do you keep the cook on the boat?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, for these men.

Mr. HOCKEN: And the midshipmite?

Mr. HANSON: How many ships has the department in use, what are the names and where are they located?

Mr. CARDIN: The ships under this item are 28 in number. Of these ships 20 are used on the Atlantic coast and the St. Lawrence, four on the inland waters, and four on the Pacific coast.

Mr. HANSON: What are the names of the ships on the inland waters?

Mr. CARDIN: The Concretia at Prescott, the Grenville at Parry Sound, the Murray Stewart at Parry Sound, and the Scout at Prescott.

Mr. HANSON: Is the Murray Stewart the vessel bought from Mr. J. F. M. Stewart, an alleged shipping man of Toronto, who has some relation with the Home Bank?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: What is she used for?

Mr. HOCKEN: Salvage.

Mr. HANSON: Was she used as an icebreaker to take the place of another vessel?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, but she was not an icebreaker.

Mr. HANSON: She was purchased for $80,000 as an icebreaker, but turned out not to be an icebreaker? Is that not the fact?

Mr. CARDIN: This vessel was bought to replace another one which has been destroyed, and this one is much stronger and is capable of taking care of herself in the ice.

Mr. HANSON: Is it not a fact that she was laid up at Midland, Ontario, during the last twelve months because she was not fit to perform the work for which she was intended when purchased, and that the government had to hire private tugs to perform this work?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. HANSON: It is not the fact?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. HANSON: Is it not the fact that after the government purchased that boat large sums of money had to be spent to get her in condition?

Mr. CARDIN: Some money was spent, but not a very large amount.

Mr. HANSON: How much?

Mr. CARDIN: In 1922-23 we spent $1,300.

Mr. HANSON: On her boilers?

Mr. CARDIN: No, generally, hull and engines. In 1923-24 we spent $7,100.

Mr. HANSON: Was that work done by tender or by day work, and where was it done?

Mr. CARDIN: By tender and contract.

Mr. HANSON: Is the minister aware that that boat was on the Atlantic in St. John harbour and was hawked all round the coast for $25,000 with no takers before the government purchased her?

Mr. CARDIN: We have no such information.

Mr. HOCKEN: What is the wage bill on these boats that are laid up waiting for somebody to call on them for salvage work?

Mr. CARDIN: For the Mikula, $39,000.

Mr. HOCKEN: I want to raise my protest against this wastefulness on the part of the government. This boat is laid up all summer presumably waiting to go out on a call for salvage, and the government is spending $39,000 a year for keeping people on the boat to do nothing, to eat their meals, to walk around the deck, to have a good time and, of course, to vote properly according to the expectations of the employer. That amount of $39,000 is being spent for nothing at all at a time in this country when I contend —and every reasonable man will agree with me—that there should be no wastefulness or extravagance at all. When men are going into bankruptcy because they are being sued for their income taxes, this government keeps one boat—and I do not know how many others—tied up to a dock at an expense of $39,000 in the summer months waiting for somebody to call on her to do salvage work, work that she has never done yet and has never been requested to do. I do not know how the minister justifies that kind of thing. Surely there must be some limit to the waste of the money of the taxpayers of this country. Can he give any justification for such wasteful expenditure? I suppose there is a captain on the boat and he must be employed all the year round although he can be doing nothing. I suppose there will be two or three engineers, twenty men employed there all the time. This is beyond the comprehension of any reasonably-minded man, unless there is some political matter behind it.

Mr. CARDIN: This vessel is not an ordinary vessel; she cost a very large sum of money, and we must have on her a man having the necessary qualifications to look after such an expensive vessel and to keep her ready for any emergency that may arise. It is in the interest of shipping generally to have this boat ready and available in case of need.

Mr. HANSON: What is the emergency that the minister has in mind that makes it necessary to keep twenty men on board this vessel at an expense of $39,000 a year?

Mr. CARDIN: I have already stated the reasons that are sufficient to keep these men on board. I am quite sure if we had not a proper number of men on board this boat with the amount of money she has cost the country, the criticism would come from my hon. friends that we were not taking care of the property of the state.

Mr. HOCKEN: Let us get away from that kind of bunk. If the minister says that we are to waste thirty or forty thousand dollars for fear of a little bit of criticism from the other side, he is not showing much common sense. This boat is tied up at Sorel, and there is no likelihood of a call being made on a boat like that. Why there should be a staff of twenty men on board her, no reasonable person can understand. In all the lake ports boats costing quite as much as this boat are tied up all winter. Of course they are not expected to go out on salvage, but they do not have twenty men on board, they have two or three watchmen, caretakers, and that is all that is required. That is all that is required in this case. The smooth explanation of the minister as regards the expensive piece of machinery will not go down with people who are overburdened with taxation. The explanation of the minister is no justification at all. If he has nothing better than that, why can he not get one or two more officials to give him something that will appeal a little more to the committee? What we want in this country is economy, and if the minister, being a new broom, cannot sweep a little cleaner than this, he is not giving us all that was expected of him when he was appointed. I would imagine a minister, on taking office for the first time, would try to make a record for himself, would show a desire to effect some economies in his department. This is as wasteful as anything that has ever occurred in the Marine department, and that is saying a good deal. We ought to cut $50,000 out of this item for the caretaking of boats that he has tied up at docks.

Mr. MARTELL: It seems to me that the hon. gentleman would like these boats to lie idle, that is with the machinery all going to waste and no men on them. Then, if accidents occurred at sea, before the ship could go to the aid of the people requiring it, months would elapse. When I hear the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) speaking, particularly when he rises with that air of self-righteousness and endeavours to scold the government or any department for extravagance, I often wonder what his friends did when they were in power. In this regard, nothing has been done that is too much for the good sailors of the Maritime provinces and of the British Columbia coast. I will say, in conclusion, that my hon. friend reminds me very much of that old quotation, since we are in power and they are over there:

> The Devil was sick, the Devil a monk would be;
> The Devil was well, the Devil a monk was he.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is really comic. I did not think my hon. friend was capable of expressions of that kind and of contributing so much to the burlesque of the occasion.

Mr. MARTELL: The burlesque is over there.

Mr. HOCKEN: He tells us that when a ship at sea is in distress, this vessel would not be able to go out to aid it. If there was a crew of 84 on board and there was distress at sea, what chance would there be of her going to sea? She is tied up in Sorel, a thousand miles from the ship that is in distress.

Mr. MARTELL: Sorel hurts you.

Mr. HOCKEN: I think my hon. friend is himself in distress. Or perhaps he is like one of the salvage boats; he is trying to come to the relief of the minister. But he has not succeeded very well.

Mr. MARTELL: That is only your opinion.

Mr. HOCKEN: He has not said anything of any account, and in that respect he is only normal. I still think, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman from Hants has said—this oracle of the Maritime provinces—

Mr. MARTELL: It is better to be a Maritime oracle than to be writing burlesque and circulating it.

Mr. HOCKEN: I did not get that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You did not miss anything.

Mr. HOCKEN: If the hon. gentleman insists upon being obscure he cannot expect me to understand what he is talking about. But his attempt to come to the rescue of the mininster is a dismal failure.

Mr. MARTELL: In your opinion.

Mr. HOCKEN: No, that is the opinion of the committee.

Mr. MARTELL: It is only the hon. gentleman's opinion.

Mr. HOCKEN: What about taking a vote on it?

Mr. MARTELL: Go ahead.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am not surprised at my hon. friend's views, but he must not advocate extravagance and waste and try to excuse the government by throwing the responsibility on the preceding administration. I do not think there is any parallel at all between the record of the preceding government under normal conditions and the wasteful extravagance that is going on at the present time.

Mr. FINN: The preceding government was never normal.

Mr. HOCKEN: They were normal from 1911 to 1914 when the war broke out. But perhaps the hon. member forgets that there was a war.

Mr. FINN: I have a dim recollection of it.

Mr. HOCKEN: Things became somewhat abnormal about that time; what happened from 1914 until the present government came into power was all abnormal in the sphere of government, and there is no parallel between conditions then and conditions now. We have reached the time in this country when we simply must economize; but we are going deeper and deeper into debt all the time. Our debt is increasing alarmingly, the increase this year being over $30,000,000. But notwithstanding that fact no effort is made by the government to practise economy, although in a matter of this kind there is an opportunity for retrenchment. We can cut down expenses even though someone may have to go and find another job on some other boat. This is a time when sailors should be able to find employment; it should not be necessary for them to be kept busy caretaking, waiting for a call from goodness knows where, perhaps an S.O.S. from the Isle of Wight or some place like that. This amount should be cut down.

Mr. DUFF: Before the hon. member for West Toronto worries any more about this matter perhaps he will allow an old salt water sailor to give a little information to a fresh water one.

Mr. HANSON: We have just had advice from the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell).

Mr. DUFF: Well, you are a fresh water sailor yourself. If the hon. member will permit me to go on, he can address the committee afterwards. This vessel, which is now called Mikula, was formerly known as the J. D. Hazen, having been named at that time after a celebrated politician from the province of New Brunswick, whence my hon. friend (Mr Hanson) also comes. Mr. Hazen was Minister of Marine in the Tory government from 1911 to 1917 and this vessel was built while he occupied that office. Under Mr. Hazen's regime the J. D. Hazen was built for the same purposes for which, as the Mukula, she is used at the present time; she was so engaged until she was sold to the Russian government. While she was in use under the Tory government she carried the same strength of crew, if not more men that she has now, and her expense was just the same. It amuses me to hear either the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) or the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken), or even my genial friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), criticising the present administration in regard to this vessel.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not started yet.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend made a fair attempt but he did not get very far. There is no question that this ship is necessary for service on the St. Lawrence. It is true that during the summer months after the ice has disappeared there is not much for her to do; but how could the department hope to retain her officers and crew if it hired them for only three or four months of the year during the ice breaking season? The captain of this ship is one of the best sailors in the country; I know him very well and I can inform the committee that he is one of the most experienced men in his line in Canada. I think therefore that the department is doing the right and proper thing in retaining him on salary for twelve months even although the vessel is laid up at Sorel or somewhere else waiting for a call.

The hon. member for West Toronto evidently does not understand what salvaging means; let me explain the term to him as briefly as I can. As everyone knows, the river St. Lawrence has a tortuous channel and in the summer months when the big steamers arrive from the Old Country they are apt to get into difficulties in going up the river. I think it is a wise precaution for this government as it was for the Tory government when they were in power, to keep the Mikula, or the J. D. Hazen as she was then, or the Earl Grey or some other ship in readiness to go to the relief of vessels when necessary. The fact that no salvage claims have been made is something to be thankful for, and no one complains in that respect. Shipping men and those who have goods to export from Montreal to Liverpool should be thankful indeed, in the first place, that the Mikula is ready to go to their assistance, and in the second place that there is no occasion for her to go. The very fact that no claims have to be made tends to make a difference in the insurance. A few years ago when the Empress of Ireland was sunk in the St. Lawrence by a coal boat coming from Sydney, if a boat like the Mikula had been then in readiness it is possible that a great many of the passengers would have been saved. Does my hon. friend from West Toronto suggest, in the face of that, that this boat should be laid up, her fires drawn, and the crew discharged, so that if an accident of that kind occurred there would be no ship in readiness to render assistance? Although this vessel is costing money, and possibly too much money, the fact remains that the matter is too important for us to take any chances; we cannot allow the ship to be put out of commission for the sake of saving a few dollars in wages of the crew. I say most certainly that she should be kept in mistake in my opinion in keeping only twenty men on the ship.
10 p.m. commission all the year round. Indeed, I think it is a mistake that she should have a crew of only twenty. If any accident occurred it would take some time to muster a sufficient force for her to proceed to the rescue. The minister is making a great

Mr. HOCKEN: How long would it take her to get ready?

Mr. DUFF: If it took her as long as it took in the case of the Niobe it would be six weeks. My hon. friend's government did exactly what he proposed a moment ago.

Mr. HOCKEN: But they did not buy the Niobe.

Mr. DUFF: I know they did not buy the Niobe, but after they got her Mr. Hazen, allowed her to fall into a state of disrepair, just as my hon. friend would have the department do in this instance. The result in the case of the Niobe was that when war broke out it took six weeks to get her ready and she was obliged to return in a few weeks, her boilers having got into an unsafe condition. If that is what my hon. friend wants to happen to this ship—I do not think he does—then I am glad to make this explanation for his benefit.

Mr. HANSON: Now, Mr. Chairman, we all see the great error made by the Prime Minister when he selected his Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The lecture we have just listened to by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) demonstrates that he should be occupying the position of the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin). But I should like to get down to business. Is the minister serious in saying that this ship is intended as a salvage ship during the season when she is not in commission as an ice-breaker, although while so maintained at Sorel less than 24 of the ordinary complement of 84 officers and men are retained? As the hon. member for Lunenburg has rightly pointed out, the only chance of the ship doing salvage work is away down the gulf or near the Newfoundland coast. In a little town like Sorel the ship could not be fully manned inside a week, and it would take her forty-eight hours to get down into the gulf. It would seem that this salvage business on its face is only a camouflage for keeping twenty men on the pay-roll—either they are too many or they are too few. I think the view advanced by the hon. member for Lunenburg is correct, that is, if the ship is intended for salvage work she should be kept in commission at a point where she can do the work without delay instead of being laid up on the mud banks of Sorel.

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Chairman, this boat is provided with the finest salvage apparatus obtainable. Not only in the gulf may salvage work be necessary, but in the St. Lawrence channel from Montreal to Quebec, and even below Quebec. But it is absolutely necessary that we keep this vessel at a point where we can use her with the least possible delay when the occasion demands, and I think Sorel is the best place at the present time. If the boat were laid up at Quebec my hon. friends would have reason to complain of the extra cost because of the larger number of men necessary to handle the vessel on account of the tides.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is there any difference between the rate of wages paid the officers in the province of Quebec, for example and in the province of British Columbia?

Mr. CARDIN: The rates are a little lower in the province of Quebec. The rates in British Columbia are governed to a certain extent by the rates paid on United States vessels.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman's remarks about the tremendous cost of salaries were relevant with respect to an idle salvage ship, but they might create a misapprehension. The salaries paid to these men are not high. For example, in the province of Quebec we have chief engineers pulling down $150 a month. Now, what is the average length of term of a chief engineer's job in Quebec?

Mr. CARDIN: The salary of the captain of the Mikula is $160 a month.

Mr. DUFF: That is a disgrace.

Mr. CARDIN: And the chief engineer gets $150 a month.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I think, as the hon. member for Lunenburg says, such salaries are a disgrace: they are not even a living wage. If we work out the chief engineer's salary on the basis of nine months, which is the general average for the province of Quebec, his annual income is only $1,350. No man can keep a family of five on such an income.

Mr. HANSON: Are they not all found?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then we have the second engineer receiving, on the same basis, $1,125 a year. I protest against the department paying their officers in Quebec these wages, and then pleading as an excuse that private individuals are paying the same rate. As the minister has said, on the Pacific coast the men have a very effective union, and it is a tribute to the union that they have been able to secure salaries for chief engineers at the rate of $185 per month, or $2,220 for the twelve months, which is the average term in British Columbia. I would urgently ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and also the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King), who, too, has a little to do with this aspect of the case, to increase the wages of their chief engineers and other technical men in their employment until they are being paid at least a living wage. The present wages in Quebec are below those necessary to maintain the recognized standard of living and are a disgrace to the government.

Mr. HOCKEN: Are these men employed all the year round or only nine months?

Mr. CARDIN: Chief officers are employed all the year round.

Mr. HOCKEN: Then the argument of the hon. member for Bow River goes by the board.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not in the least. The average time for marine engineers in the province of Quebec is nine months.

Mr. HOCKEN: But these men are on the year round.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The men on this particular ship are. But we can clear this up in a moment. How many chief engineers are employed the year around and how many on part time?

Mr. CARDIN: Out of twenty-eight, eleven are in commission the year round.

Mr. HANSON: Are the chief engineers paid the year round? I think that is the point.

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. HANSON: What is the average of those who are not in commission the year round?

Mr. CARDIN: Eight months.

Mr. HANSON: Is it not true that these gentlemen, in addition to their salaries, receive a very substantial allowance? For instance, their uniforms are provided for them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON: That is an important item; the hon. member need not sneer at it. The men are found in everything, as a matter of fact.

Mr. BUREAU: This is a free house.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. HANSON: But an hon. member has no right to sneer; it is not polite.

Mr. BUREAU: Put it on the ground of civility, not right.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is not necessary for me to answer my hon. friend to my right. Will the minister take my suggestion into consideration? These men really deserve more money than they are getting.

Mr. CARDIN: I have already received a petition from members of the Engineers' Association and other employees on these boats, asking that their salaries be fixed at the same rate as in British Columbia. I can assure my hon. friend that I will take the matter into serious consideration.

Mr. HANSON: I notice another item in the estimates, a subsidy for wrecking plant, Quebec and British Columbia. Are there other salvage plants on the St. Lawrence besides the Mikula, and if so, where are they located? Does the government own any of the salvage ships in Quebec or in that vicinity?

Mr. CARDIN: There is a wrecking plant at Quebec.

Mr. HANSON: Subsidized or owned by the government?

Mr. CARDIN: Subsidized.

Mr. HANSON: Is there a salvage ship attached to that plant too?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: So the Mikula is not the sole salvage ship on the river? There is a sort of auxiliary?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HOCKEN: A superfluity.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister give us a few particulars about the Murray Stewart? What information had the department before buying that boat? Did they ascertain how many years she had been tied up at Quebec and St. John? What did they find out?

Mr. CARDIN: This vessel was built at Port Arthur, and she was two or three years old when we bought her.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was this the boat that was down at St. John on the Atlantic coast? I would like a plain yes or no.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What had she been doing down there? What work was she in?

Mr. CARDIN: We have no information as to that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the department in a position to deny that she was tied up down there, and attempted to be sold in vain for some years?

Mr. CARDIN: Having no information, we cannot say.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON Then apparently the department bought her without knowing anything about her?

Mr. CARDIN: Except that—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON. If the minister knows anything about her I am prepared to get the information.

Mr. CARDIN: An examination was made before we bought her.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: An examination of what? Here is a boat that our information says was useless, could not be got rid of for $25,000, and a politician gets her and sells her to the government for $81,000. That is our information, and I want to know if it is correct? Did the department ascertain what she had been doing, how long she had been in the market, and how long she had been tied up?

Mr. HANSON: And how long Stewart owned her before he sold her to the government?

Mr. BUREAU: That is a fair question. She might have been towing Noah's Ark.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: She looked older than that.

Mr. CARDIN: The boat was built in 1918. Mr. Stewart was the proprietor up to the time we bought her.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What I am trying to find out is whether the department knew what had happened to that boat from 1918 up until they bought her. Apparently she is the old boat we knew at St. John. That is where she came from. Did the government make any inquiries at all as to what she had been down there for?

Mr. CARDIN: I do not think it was necessary to ascertain that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Did the minister find out when Mr. Stewart bought that boat?

Mr. CARDIN: He built it himself in 1918.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was he still the owner when the government bought her?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want that plain and straight, Mr. Chairman. Was Mr. Stewart the owner from the time the boat was built until she was sold to the government?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, he was always the registered owner.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: At any rate, that is all the government knew about it, is it?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The boat was not working down at St. John, was she? Is Mr. Stewart not the gentleman of Toronto, of the Home Bank?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, what did he have that boat for down at St. John?

Mr. CARDIN: We have no information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I see. Who valued that boat before the government paid $81,000 for her?

Mr. CARDIN: The officers of the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who were they?

Mr. CARDIN: The Chief Engineer, Mr. Fraser; the Commissioner of Lights and the Steamboat Inspector also made a report upon her.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are Mr Fraser's initials?

Mr. CARDIN: B. H.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And who was the other gentleman?

Mr. CARDIN: J. G. Macphail, Commissioner of Lights.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was his duty in connection with it?

Mr. CARDIN: He is the Commissioner of Lights.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now I would like to find out where the government took possession of that boat.

Mr. CARDIN: At St. John.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How long dic it take that boat to go from St. John tc Midland.

Mr. CARDIN: It is hard to answer such a question at this late date.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the records will show when she began to do business?

Mr. MARTELL: The minister did not keep the log.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But he has a very efficient deputy minister in front of him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BUREAU: We all agree.

Mr. CARDIN: The deputy minister is not in a position to answer that question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the minister know what coal alone was lost in that movement, when there were other boats up there that could have been bought easily enough?

Mr. CARDIN: It is very hard to say at this time, after two years, what it cost to take the boat up there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister tell us how many days that boat has been in service since she was bought? My instructions are that she was not fit for service at all, and repairs are said to have been made on her in the first instance. What work did she do the whole of the first year?

Mr. CARDIN: The usual work in connection with the lights.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does that consist of?

Mr. CARDIN: Carrying supplies to the lights.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the deputy in a position to tell his minister how many days that boat was under repair in 1923-1924 at Midland?

Mr. CARDIN: The repairs were made during the winter months.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How long a time did they take?

Mr. CARDIN: We are not in a position to state at the present time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To come back to the Mikula again. She was sold to the Russian government at about her cost to the Canadian government. Is that right?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That did not seem to be so very badly done after all. Was she in good condition when she came back?

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, she was in good condition.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What ice-breaking did she do during the season of 1923-24? When was she out? We were told she was not out at all.

Mr. CARDIN: She was in commission all the winter months.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Did she do anything though?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is my hon. friend sure about that?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Are the salaries and wages of the officers and crews included in this vote?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Coaling and all the other items of expense?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Where do these boats operate in winter? They operate from January to April, but where do they operate?

Mr. CARDIN: The Montcalm and the Lady Grey operate from Quebec to lake St. Peter on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. CALDWELL: All the winter?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Where are the supplies, say of the Mikula, purchased? How is her coal purchased? Is that bought by tender?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Are the tenders publicly advertised for—

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON:—or is there a patronage list in the department?

Mr. CARDIN: We ask for tenders from the different coal dealers.

Mr. HANSON: Locally, that is in Sorel?

Mr. CARDIN: Not in Sorel. There is none in Sorel, do not be afraid.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if we have got the whole distinction now between maintenance and repairs. How much is for maintenance and how much for repairs?

Mr. CARDIN: Here are the different items: Total salaries, $446,300. That is for all the twenty-eight boats.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Supplies?

Mr. CARDIN: Board, $147,800; fuel, $351,800; steward's supplies, $126,600; hull and engine repairs, $307,800; uniforms, $29,700; making a total of $1,500,000 for the twenty-eight boats.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is nothing at all in that for repairs?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, the total for hull and engine repairs is $307,800.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then, I think, the minister said the boat was in commission from January to April. At what point was she working?

Mr. CARDIN: Principally at Cap Rouge, between Quebec and lake St. Peter, on the St. Lawrence.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was that for the purpose of keeping a ferry running at Quebec, or what was the object?

Mr. CARDIN: No, she was employed to keep the ice from forming in the channel of the St. Lawrence between Quebec and lake St. Peter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just how far inland do we keep navigation going all the year? The general season of navigation ceases some time in December if I remember We have no sailings from Montreal or Quebec in winter. That being the case why do we do all this amount of work at that time?

Mr. BUREAU: I can answer the question if I may be allowed. The answer is, that it is to protect properties that are above St. Jean des Chaillons, what they call the Richelieu river. The frazil ice forms there, and creates a dam, and if that is allowed to continue all the property between that place and the shore of lake St. Peter is destroyed. Some years before the icebreaker was put on even the main highway was carried away, to say nothing of houses and other property. When the frazil ice forms the water rises, and when the wind is from the north or the south, the bank, and the property on it, is washed away. The icebreaking is done so as not to permit the frazil ice to form.

Item agreed to.

Examination of masters and mates, $20,000.

Mr. CHURCH: It is a very important matter to have competent officers on the ships that are operating on the Great Lakes and on the St. Lawrence. I should like to find out from the minister whether examinations are still being held as they have been in the past. I also should like to know to what class of ships the examinations apply. Are examinations held whenever candidates present themselves, or do they take place every year, and if so, at what particular time?

Mr. CARDIN: The examinations are held at Halifax, Quebec, Yarmouth, North Sydney, St. John, N.B., Montreal and Prince Edward Island. For the Great Lakes division they are held at Toronto, Collingwood, Port Arthur, and Selkirk in Manitoba; and for the western division at Victoria and Nelson.

Mr. CHURCH: Who is the present admiral of the fleet. Is it the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) or is it the hon. member for Three Rivers and St. Maurice (Mr. Bureau)?

Item agreed to.

Navigation schools, $7,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: Where are these schools located?

Mr. CARDIN: At Halifax, Yarmouth, North Sydney, St. John, Quebec, Kingston, Collingwood and Vancouver.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That seems a very small amount of money to carry on the schools efficiently. What is the idea? What is done?

Mr. CARDIN: This appropriation is to provide for the instruction of seafaring men. and those desiring to qualify as masters and mates, under section 84 of the Canada Shipping Act. The schools at Halifax,Yarmouth and St. John are operated the whole year round. At North Sydney the school is operated for three months in the year, Quebec four months, Kingston three months. Twenty-four lectures are delivered during the winter at Collingwood by the examiner of masters and mates, and twenty-six lectures are delivered during the winter at Vancouver by the examiner of masters and mates.

Mr. CALDWELL: What are the sources of revenue of these schools? Are these schools maintained out of this appropriation of $7,000 a year? It has been suggested that the lecturers give their services free. Is that a fact?

Mr. CARDIN: The examiner at Halifax receives a salary of $1,860, the examiner at Yarmouth receives $800 and the examiner at North Sydney receives $360 for four months' work. At St. John a salary of $1,500 is paid for the whole year.

Mr. BAXTER: Who conducts the school there?

Mr. CARDIN: R. J. Pollock at St. John. The salary at Quebec is $360, and at Kingston there is a grant to a navigation school conducted by Queen's University of $500. At Collingwood Captain Cole, who gives lectures, is paid as an examiner, and the same at Vancouver.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am sure the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) will join with me in congratulating the minister on the good work he is carrying on with such a small amount of money. I am surprised he is able to give instruction at so many points for $7,000.

Mr. HANSON: How many weeks in the year are these schools carried on? I would not like to have the member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) think that these schools are conducted all the year round.

Mr. CARDIN: I have just stated that at Halifax and Yarmouth the schools are conducted all the year round. At North Sydney the school is conducted for four months in the year. At St. John the school is conducted the year round, and at Quebec for four months of the year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Many pupils?

Mr. CARDIN: At Halifax there are seventy-seven pupils, at Yarmouth thirty-seven, at St. John fifty-one, North Sydney six, Quebec forty and Kingston thirty.

Mr. CALDWELL: How long is the course of instruction? How long does it take a man to qualify?

Mr. CARDIN: It depends on the pupil.

Mr. CALDWELL: The minister has some idea of the average, I presume.

Mr. CARDIN: A good number of these pupils are in a position to pass the examination after one year.

Mr. BAXTER: I think the idea is that the men have to take voyages and spend a certain length of time at sea. They also get instruction. In the last ten years has there been any substantial alteration in the number of schools, or in the cost of them, or in the method of their provision?

Mr. CARDIN: We are spending a larger amount now than we have spent in the past. A few years ago the Halifax school was only conducted for a certain number of months, and the same at Yarmouth and St. John, but for a few years these schools have been conducted the whole year.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the temporary relief of distressed seamen, $5,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How is this work standing now? There were some difficulties from time to time in connection with it, particularly during the war period. Sailors were stranded. I take it, that this is an international service which we perform in connection with other countries, looking after the sailors of other nationalities. The money is advanced and we are supposed to get the money back. Is this a vote for that purpose?

Mr. CARDIN: This is to provide only for our own people.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why is it marked "temporary"?

Mr. CARDIN: We make a collection from the owner of the vessel when we can do so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The money is advanced and you hold the owner of the vessel for it. It is very much the same thing. How did it work out last year? Were we able to make our collections? How much money was advanced, and how much did the vessel owners pay back to us? What vessels are in arrears?

Mr. CARDIN: We have spent $4,666.73 for the season of 1923-24. I have all the names here. The list is very long; but unfortunately I have not the amounts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I never asked for the names of the sailors. Under this vote the money is supposed to be paid back to the Crown by the owners of the vessels, and we spent under it last year $4,600. I was just wondering what diligence there was in collecting it. How much have we collected from the owners of the vessels out of that $4,600 odd. That is the practical thing.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is this relief only for sailors who are articled to some ship owner? Does this apply to distressed seamen who are not under contract with any ship owners, who are temporarily out of work or in ill health?

Mr. CARDIN: No; this applies to shipwrecked seamen only.

Mr. MARTELL: Is it not a fact that if a crew is taken off a vessel at sea and taken to a foreign port, money is provided for bringing them back to Canada and the department usually endeavours to collect that from the owners of the vessel if they are worth it? The master of the vessel is called upon to pay his own way back. I cannot understand why that should be so, but that is the old rule.

Mr. BUREAU: Let the minister bring down the information in regard to the collections later.

Mr. CARDIN: We have made no collections. It should be remembered that in a good number of cases, when a vessel is wrecked, it is very hard to run after the proprietor of the vessel and make any collection.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does this information go far enough to show how many ship owners are in the happy position of not getting their bills, how many wrecks there were or whether there was a great number? The Minister of Customs and Excise suggests that the information might be brought down later. If the minister is not ready, he could give us the list a little later on. Perhaps he will tell us at the same time if any attempt was made to collect the amount of $4,600.

Mr. CALDWELL: Possibly the minister could at the same time bring down a statement of what has been collected each year for the last ten years.

Item agreed to.

Registration of shipping, $3,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is this for?

Mr. CARDIN: This is to defray such costs as may be involved in the registration of Canadian shipping. Part one of the Canada Shipping Act provides that Canadian ships must be registered before engaging in trade and all the necessary facilities are provided by the Department of Marine. The expenditure is principally for printed forms and measuring appliances. As the customs officers at the ports act as registrars of shipping, no salary expenditures are involved. No change is made in the service.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does this apply to shipping on the Great Lakes as well as ocean shipping?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Do American boats which ply to Canadian ports have to be registered under Canadian registry?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. CALDWELL: Was there not some regulation last year that they had to register and file a tariff of rates with the Great Lakes' Commission?

Mr. CARDIN: These vessels have not been transferred to Canadian registry.

Mr. CALDWELL: They simply had to file their tariff of rates last year for the first time?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Was that carried out the whole season?

Mr. CARDIN: That is not under the Department of Marine and Fisheries, but under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Is a registration fee charged in those cases?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much was spent last year?

Mr. CARDIN: $2,042.54.

Item agreed to.

Removal of obstructions in navigable waters, $5,000.

Mr. HANSON: How much was spent on this service last year, and how much was spent in the river St. John?

Mr. CARDIN: The total amount spent was $4,972. This vote is for the removal of wrecks, not of natural obstacles.

Mr. HANSON: Under what vote is paid the cost of removing snags in navigable rivers?

Mr. CARDIN: That is under the Public Works department.

Mr. MARTELL: Is this not for the purposes of carrying out what is known as the Navigable Waters Protection Act? When a vessel is wrecked and she becomes an obstacle to navigation, the department notifies the owner to remove the obstacle, and if he does not do so, the department removes it and, if necessary, brings action against the owner to collect the costs.

Mr. CALDWELL: Was anything collected from the owners?

Mr. CARDIN: We have made no collections.

Mr. CALDWELL: Has the department got anything back for this work say in the last ten years?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But nothing last year?

Mr. CARDIN: Nothing last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How is it that the snags are in one department and the wrecks in another?

Mr. GRAHAM: They are not in the departments; they are in the streams.

Mr. CARDIN: I cannot offer at present any explanation. I found this situation when I took office.

Mr. CALDWELL: Are icebreakers used for this work?

Mr. CARDIN: No, government dredges.

Mr. CALDWELL: Are the icebreakers not better equipped for this work than the dredges?

Mr. CARDIN: We cannot do this work with the icebreakers. To remove obstacles from the bed of the river we must use dredges and apparatus of that kind.

Mr. CALDWELL: When the minister said that he had excellent equipment I thought that possibly he meant that the department also had the necessary apparatus for removing wrecks. A question has come up regarding salaries. Is it not a fact that the officers and the crews of the vessels are given board and maintenance in addition to their wages?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is to say they have their board and their clothing and lodging?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister might profitably consider the wisdom of trying to get rid of duplication in these services. Something was done some time ago, but surely it would be wise to place in the hands of one department the whole work of taking care of navigation. Just imagine a dredge of the Marine department cleaning up the bed of the river after a wreck, and if there is a snag a hundred yards or so away it can do nothing but another dredge must be sent from the Public Works department to attend to that job. How absurd it really is. There would seem to be no reason why either the Marine department or the other—I do not care very much which, although I fancy the Marine department would more properly take care of this work—should not have all to do with making the river fit for navigation, no matter what the cause for the particular service may be. Dredging of every description should be done under one department, whether it be dredging in rivers or in lakes. Save for construction work, such for example as the building of a dock, which might fairly come within "public works," everything connected with navigation should come under one department. What utter waste it is to have two departments operating two organizations in the same river, the one aiming at the snags and the other at wrecks.

Mr. CARDIN: I do not hesitate to say that the hon. gentleman's suggestion interests me. Undoubtedly it calls for consideration and I may say that the matter is now being studied. We hope to be able to reach a solution of it some day.

Mr. HANSON: Does the work of keeping open the ship channel in the St. Lawrence come under the Marine department or under the Department of Public Works?

Mr. CARDIN: Under the Marine department?

Mr. HANSON: I am referring to the dredges in the St. Lawrence below Montreal. Are those the dredges of the Marine department?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Is it a fact that dredging is also done in the St. Lawrence, below Montreal, by the Public Works department?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, but not in the channel.

Mr. HANSON: No, not in the channel. But it is true that there are duplicate plants operating in the same sphere at the same time, under a double overhead and practically at double expense to the country, for capital cost and also for maintenance and operation. Is not that a fact?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes; there is no doubt that this is largely the case. But the work performed by the Marine department has to do only with the navigation channel; the work of the Department of Public Works has nothing to do with that.

Mr. HANSON: Take dredging; would not that be within the province of the Department of Marine? You might dredge around a pier or a dock, but it is for the purposes of navigation. Under which department does that work come? In the city of St. John they dredge every few years the berths which fil up with silt as a result of the action of the tides. I am informed that they are dredged every year, a depth, say, of some thirty-five feet being required. Is that done by the Marine department?

Mr. CARDIN: No, by the Public Works department.

Mr. HANSON: Is not that a matter of navigation?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, but it is local.

Mr. HANSON: I do not understand the principle on which this work should be done by the Public Works department while similar work is done by the Marine department in the St. Lawrence.

Mr. CARDIN: The separation of these various services as between the two departments was made several years ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose if the dredging were needed in a canal it would have to be done by the Railway department?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Here is a great opportunity for reform on the part of the government which is hungering for exercise.

Mr. CALDWELL: I see good reason for the government taking this matter into serious consideration; these services should be consolidated. There is something besides the actual dredging involved; the engineers must go to the point and inspect the works and report to the department. If there is a ship berth to be dredged at Quebec, at Montreal or at St. John the engineers of the Public Works department must first pass upon the matter; so that not only the actual dredging, but the plants which the department must maintain, and the elaborate staff of engineers to lay out the work, have all to be taken into consideration. There is therefore excellent reason why the government should seriously consider this proposal. And not only should they keep it under consideration; the amalgamation should actually be made.

Mr. CHURCH: The minister might explain somewhat more fully this division of work as between the Marine department and the Public Works department. Some places have to shoulder the cost of this work themselves while other places have the government to fall back upon. This vote seems to apply to the ocean and river service. My hon. friend (Mr. Hanson) referred to the dredging of the St. John river; but the Great Lakes also need periodical dredging and the municipalities have to bear the cost of this work. In the Niagara there is a very serious obstruction to navigation, and as some 2,000,000 passengers are going in and out at this point every year it is most important that the place should be dredged. Why should not the vote apply to the Great Lakes as well as to the rivers and ocean navigation? Is the Public Works department responsible for the dredging there, or is the 11 p.m. Department of Marine? I do not understand why there should be this distinction between the two departments in this respect. Some of these votes apply only to the seaboard although the whole country has to contribute to the expenditure. Owing to the obstruction in the Niagara which I have just mentioned the steamers are obliged to make a detour, and although this obstruction has been standing for years the Public Works department will do nothing to remove it.

Item agreed to.

Inspection of live stock shipments, $4,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: How much was spent last year?

Mr. CARDIN: There was spent $3,416.

Mr. CALDWELL: At what points is the inspection carried on?

Mr. CARDIN: At Montreal, St. John and Quebec.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is the vote getting larger?

Mr. CARDIN: More cattle are being shipped and we have had to provide $500 for inspection at the port of Quebec.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In view of the fact that the Department of Agriculture has to undertake the inspection of cattle in order to comply with the British regulations, how does inspection come under this department?

Mr. CARDIN: We inspect only the fittings on the ship and make sure that it is in proper condition to carry cattle.

Mr. HANSON: Is that done to comply with the British Board of Trade regulations?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: There seems to me to be a certain amount of duplication. Could not all this work be done by the same set of inspectors, as suggested by the member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart)?

Mr. CARDIN: This work can be more properly done by the inspectors of the Department of Marine and Fisheries who are in a better position to understand the condition of the ship.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is it not a fact that the cattle inspection is conducted by a qualified veterinary surgeon, while the inspection of the ship must be by a man qualified along different lines altogether?

Mr. CARDIN: That is quite true.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is the inspection once a year or on the occasion of every shipment?

Mr. CARDIN: The boat is inspected for every shipment.

Mr. GRAHAM: The inspection is required by the regulations of the British Board of Trade.

Mr. BAXTER: Is it not a fact that the Minister of Agriculture has cut off all inspection in his department except that of churches!

Mr. GOULD: What work is actually performed by the inspector; is it merely the signing of clearance papers?

Mr. CARDIN: The fittings of the vessel are also inspected.

Mr. GOULD: I have seen ships in Montreal that were not built for cattle traffic fitted up with temporary accommodation on the upper deck, and I have known of cases where cattle have been lost as a result of these flimsy structures being washed overboard. Did our inspectors pass those ships?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. GOULD: They have to pass upon the soundness of the upper deck work?

Mr. CARDIN: Oh yes.

Mr. GOULD: They are not held responsible if they pass any flimsy structure?

Mr. CARDIN: The case to which my hon. friend apparently refers was an accident due to a bad storm, and the inspector was not held responsible.

Item agreed to.

To continue subsidies for wrecking plants—Quebec and British Columbia, $35,000.

Mr. HANSON: Are these private wrecking plants?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Where are they located; to whom do they belong; and how many wrecks have they looked after in the last fiscal year?

Mr. CARDIN: One of these plants is at Quebec and is owned by the Quebec Salvage and Wrecking Company Limited; the other is at Esquimalt and is owned by the Pacific Salvage Company Limited of Victoria.

Mr. HANSON: What is the basis, a flat vote each year, or so much for the actual work done?

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. CARDIN: The subsidy payable by the government to the Quebec Salvage and Wrecking Company Limited is $25,000 per annum. The contract is for five years from May, 1922.

Mr. CALDWELL: Under that contract are the company compelled to do any work that the department orders them to do?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is there any limit to the amount of work they can be called up to do? And is there any rebate if they do not do any work at all?

Mr. McBRIDE: I know something about the wrecking plant at Victoria. The company have to keep that plant ready for work at any time, with steam up, so that no time will be wasted in reaching a wreck if called on. I know it is a very important work. I have had to call upon the company myself for salvage services.

Mr. HANSON: What are the terms of the contract with the Quebec company?

Mr. CARDIN: Under the contract the Quebec Salvage & Wrecking Company have to maintain at Quebec the steamer Lord Strathcona and such other plant as may be required to the satisfaction of the department from May 1 to December 1 each year. The payment of the subsidy is subject to the condition that if in any year during the continuance of the contract the total amount received by the contractors from their salvage and wrecking operations, including the subsidy paid, is in excess of the cost of maintaining the plant, including interest and insurance, the contractor shall pay to the government 50 per cent of such excess, it being understood that interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum is to be allowed on a capital amount of $150,000, and an insurance policy not exceeding $200,000. The British Columbia contract is held by the Pacific Salvage Company Limited of Victoria. The subsidy is $10,000 a year payable quarterly in October, January, April and July of each year. The contract is for ten years from July 1, 1915. The company are obliged to maintain the steamer Algerine, or other suitable vessel, together with a steam tender and one or more scows, all in a thorough state of repair and seaworthiness, supplied with suitable and modern equipment and all up-to-date improvements, with a skilled personnel in constant commission at Esquimalt, to be prepared at all times for salvage of wrecks and to render all necessary service in case of maritime casualties when called upon.

Mr. HANSON: How are the subsidies arrived at, on an arbitrary basis, or from past experience, or is it the total amount the companies can squeeze out of the government under given circumstances?

Mr. CARDIN: They are arbitrary amounts.

Mr. HANSON: What is the value of the plant the company has to keep up? We ought to know whether there is any principle involved or not in the size of the boats? Did I understand the minister to say that the contract with the Quebec company had been recently entered into?

Mr. CARDIN: May 1, 1922.

Mr. HANSON: Did this government have a contract with the same company previous to that, and if so, how much was paid?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes; the same amount.

Mr. CALDWELL: For how many years?

Mr. CARDIN: Five years.

Mr. HANSON: In each case?

Mr. CARDIN: Ten years in regard to British Columbia.

Mr. HANSON: About what is the value of the plant at Quebec? Are they making any money out of this? Further, what actual service have they rendered in the past twelve months?

Mr. CARDIN: The plant at Quebec is insured for $200,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: What is the premium on that amount of insurance?

Mr. CARDIN: They carry the insurance themselves. The amount paid for this insurance is $5,569.49.

Mr. CALDWELL: The premium is allowed in the cost of operation, is it not?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: And five per cent on the cost of the plant?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Does the government pay that premium out of this vote, or does the company pay it?

Mr. CARDIN: The company.

Mr. CALDWELL: Under the contract the minister read, I understand that any profits in excess of cost of operation have to be divided fifty-fifty with the government, and in the cost of operation is included the insurance premium and five per cent on the cost of the plant, which is perfectly fair. Has the government ever received any profit over and above the cost of operation, and if so what amount?

Mr. CARDIN: Not last year, but in two years we received a certain amount.

Mr. CALDWELL: What amount?

Mr. HANSON: That is only twice in the history of the subsidy. It is not a very valuable source of income.

Mr. CARDIN: But the service that is given by this wrecking plant is very important.

Mr. HANSON: My information is that this Quebec plant is a good and complete plant, of great value. It is a salvage plant as well. Now is the minister serious in the statement he made to me earlier in the evening that he keeps steam up in the Mikula because she is a salvage ship, when he has this plant to depend on? I do not think he is serious, but I would like a frank statement from him.

Mr. CARDIN: It is true that we have the service of the Quebec salvage plant, but I think it is important that we should also have this vessel ready to help.

Mr. HANSON: But she never does.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is the Quebec salvage plant kept fairly busy?

Mr. CARDIN: They had very little to do last year, but some years they have quite a lot of work.

Item agreed to.

Unforeseen expenses, $5,000.

Mr. CARDIN: This is to provide for miscellaneous items of expenditure that cannot be anticipated and provided for, such items, last year, for instance, as criminal investigations, legal expenses, arbitration proceedings, advice and assistance of experts, damages. The appropriation is the same as last year.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): How much was spent last year?

Mr. CARDIN: $4,949.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would look as if the object of the department was to find as many unforeseen things as would reach up to the vote. How did they happen to run up to within a few dollars of the vote last year? What is the character of these things that are attended to?

Mr. CARDIN: On May 4th, J. S. Rogers received salary for one month's services in connection with installation of refrigerator on the Steamer Canadian Highlander, $85.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is not that paid by the mercantile marine? They are making lots of money.

Mr. CARDIN: Then to the Receiver General for Canada for printing forms for harbour commissioners there was paid $24.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is not that paid by the harbour commissioners?

Mr. CARDIN: This is for our own stationery.

Mr. MEIGHEN; In the department?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. We have to carry the same forms as the harbour commissioners for purposes of record.

Mr. CALDWELL: This would not be unforeseen expenditure, would it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think not.

Mr. CARDIN: We do not know how long the stationery we have will last; it depends upon how much work we have to do. Another item is Canadian National Railways, expenses of a judge of the Exchequer Court to visit Dominion Iron and Steel Company plant in connection with sitting in regard to cancellation of contract for steel plates, $198.10.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Expenses of the judge of the Exchequer Court? These expenses are paid under the Judges' Act.

Mr. CARDIN: The Department of Justice called upon us to pay that.

Mr. BOYS: Would the minister tell us on what ground?

Mr. CARDIN: Upon the request of the Department of Justice.

Mr. BOYS: I do not suppose the minister pays every bill that is sent to him, without good reason. Will the minister explain to the committee why the usual method of disbursing items of this kind was not adopted, and why this special method was resorted to?

Mr. CARDIN: It was a suit in which the Department of Marine and Fisheries was involved.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Lunenburg will have a very vivid recollection of this. This is the case about which he raised quite a storm two years ago because the initiation of a settlement with the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, and where he secured the promise of the Minister of Finance in very emphatic terms that a final settlement would never be made, but that the courts would effect a final settlement, and where within one week after he got that assurance the government made a final settlement, and the courts did not make it at all.

Mr. DUFF: This is the sequel. Sir Henry Thornton should have paid this, not the Marine and Fisheries department. It should be charged to the merchant marine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know who should pay it, but I imagine Sir Henry Thornton would be the last.

Mr. CALDWELL: He has no money left after buying the Hotel Scribe.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the sequel all right. I have often thought that the hon. member for Lunenburg would laugh in even his most sombre hours when he thinks of what occurred that afternoon.

Mr. DUFF: My remarks may have hastened the settlement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Very often the assurance of the government that there will be no settlement is the best sign there will be one.

Item agreed to.

Life saving service, including rewards for saving life, $100,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: What equipment does the department maintain for life saving?

Mr. CHURCH: This is a very important vote for life saving service on both coasts and on the Great Lakes, but the provision is inadequate. I should like to find out on what principle the money is expended. Part of the vote relates to the maintenance of certain stations on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and on the Great Lakes, but the expenditure in the last case seems to be very small. I may say that formerly a life saving station was maintained in the port of Toronto, but four years ago the municipality was notified, through the Harbour Board, that it would have to establish and maintain its own station. Consequently the Harbour Commissioners had to spend $60,000 to take care of the three million odd people that go in and out of the harbour of Toronto. And yet for the whole of the service comprised in this vote only $100,000 is asked. Part of this vote is to provide rewards for life saving at sea. That is all very well, but why not try and provide also to a greater degree for the services which are rendered by the Harbour Commissioners of Toronto? Not only do they look after their own port but last summer they had to undertake work all over the Georgian bay and the Muskoka lakes; also at Hamilton, Oakville, Port Dalhousie, and points along the north shore of lake Ontario. Virtually they are maintaining a life saving station for lake Ontario, a thing which they have no power to do under their charter. Actually their work should be confined to looking after the millions of passengers who go from Toronto to Niagara, Hamilton, and other points. Take the north shore of lake Ontario and you will not find a single life saving station with the exception of the one at Toronto.

It is true the government gives a few hundred dollars to maintain a life boat at two or three small places, but what would happen in the case of an accident if the life boat was not up-to-date especially when it is remembered that it might take several hours to reach the scene. I call the minister's attention to the need of proper facilities in the Muskoka and Georgian bay districts which are visited annually by thousands of tourists. Last summer a serious accident occurred in the Georgian bay district. Three young men from my constituency were on their way up the Moon river when they unfortunately lost their lives. No life saving station nearer than Toronto was available for rendering assistance. Two or three life guards and some other help were sent up from Toronto, and the waters in the district were dragged for over a month without finding the bodies. I claim that the first duty of the department is to try and save the lives of the citizens of this country.

Complaints on this score are not confined to Toronto; they come from other places. The year before last there was an accident at Port Dalhousie. A poor girl was out on a raft, or some other contrivance, but there was no life saving station there to render her help, the nearest being at Toronto. The same situation exists at Grimsby beach and Burlington beach. I am sorry the member for West Hamilton (Mr. Stewart) is not here to-night. I am sure that if he were he would support the plea I am making. There has been an insistent demand from the people of that city for a life saving station, also from the people of Oakville, and many places on the north shore of lake Ontario, east of Toronto. I suppose there are altogether two or three million people that go out from Toronto to Niagara, and other places, during the summer months. What would happen to a boat like the Cayuga, that carries several hundred people, if she met with a mishap? And she did run on a sand shoal last summer. What would happen to the passengers of other boats running to Port Dalhousie, and other places, in the event of a mishap? Last summer a deck hand fell off a steamer running between Toronto and Rochester, and the body was not recovered for several months. The life saving appliance on the ship could not be lowered, and they did not even throw the poor deck hand a life belt. It is a very serious situation and I contend something ought to be done to provide an adequate remedy. The department abandoned the former system and told the people of Toronto some four years ago. "We will give you a few hundred dollars yearly but you will have to maintain your own station."

That the station is doing good work is shown by the fact that the last year it saved forty-four people from drowning. Had it not been for the Toronto station that number of people would have lost their lives. I urge the government to grant a larger vote for this purpose. The country is growing and the Canadians are an aquatic race. The possibility of accidents is increasing all the time. The loss of life at the summer resorts of Canada has been very large in comparison with our population. A great many of these deaths could have been prevented if we had had proper life saving stations and appliances in the districts to which I have referred. I would ask the minister now to grant a larger vote for this purpose. I would ask him also to consider the case of the relatives of the three young men who were drowned on the Moon river. The parents of these poor victims had to spend, I think, $2,000 in efforts to try and recover the bodies. Are we going to wait until a catastrophe occurs before voting increased sums for life saving purposes. The city of Toronto—which is overburdened with taxation, which is paying a very large sum annually to the government of Canada—should receive some relief. The life saving work which was formerly carried on by the government there should be again taken over by them and the $60,000 which the city spends on life saving service, or a part of it, should be refunded to Toronto. Because, as I say, the life saving station at Toronto not only renders service on lake Ontario but also on the Muskoka lakes and the Georgian bay. The city of Toronto has been put to great expense in that regard, and has not been reimbursed for the large expenditure which it has incurred.

Mr. HANSON: Where are the principal stations on the Atlantic coast located?

Mr. CARDIN: In New Brunswick there is a station at Escuminac.

Mr. HANSON: That must be a very small station?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, it is a small one.

Mr. HANSON: Where is the principal station in the Bay of Fundy?

Mr. CARDIN: At Little Wood island.

Mr. HANSON: What is the cost of it?

Mr. CARDIN: The cost is $7,500.

Mr. HANSON: How many men are there?

Mr. CARDIN: Nine men.

Mr. CHURCH: I would like to get an answer to my question. What life saving stations has the department established on lake Ontario, and how much money has been spent on them? How much money has been spent on Toronto? Does the government propose to recoup the Harbour Commissioners of Toronto for doing life saving work in and out the city of Toronto?

Mr. CARDIN: The life saving stations are at Cobourg, Goderich, Long Point, Pelee island, Port Stanley and Southampton.

Mr. CHURCH: How many lives have these stations saved during the last year?

Mr. CARDIN: I have not the figures.

Mr. CHURCH: When danger arises at these different places on lake Ontario, they have had to wire the life saving station at Toronto to come and help to save lives. Lake Ontario is a very large area of water with a great deal of navigation. The number of steamboats on lake Ontario is probably larger than the number of boats on any of the upper lakes. They do more actual passenger business, and the life-saving stations on lake Ontario are very inadequate. Is the department going to wait until they have a disaster in the Niagara district, Port Dalhousie or some other place on the lake before taking action? When will the department establish up-to-date life-saving stations on lake Ontario? At Charlotte and other places on the American side of lake Ontario they have proper life-saving stations. At Buffalo, at Toledo and at Detroit they have large up-to-date life-saving stations, these are under the control of the War department, and they are maintained by companies of men. At Buffalo they have a regular company of naval men who look after that particular port and there is a large volume of steamboat business there. Along the Great Lakes on the American side they have proper life-saving stations. But what have we on the Canadian side of the border? We have one or two rowboats, or what they call lifeboats. We have small stations with very few boats. I maintain that we should have proper stations established on the Canadian side of lake Ontario if we are to make proper provision for the saving of lives. We have a station at Toronto which saved forty-four lives in four years, as a result of having up-to-date equipment.

Mr. BOYS: How does the minister explain the reduction of $40,000? This is an important item. Of course if some part of the service can be done away with, well and good; but I think the service should be maintained in a most efficient manner, and I can hardly see how that can be done with this reduction. I should not think there would be less of that sort of work to perform now. How is the $40,000 saved? Is it by cutting out some of the stations or by reducing the salaries? How is it brought about? A good deal of progress has been made to-night with these estimates, and it is thirty-five minutes after the hour at which we have been usually adjourning.

Mr. MEIGHEN: After the usually promised adjournment hour.

Mr. BOYS: I have missed a week it is true. I was away last week.

Mr. GRAHAM: And we missed you.

Mr. BOYS: I presume the order of affairs which was more or less agreed upon was observed during last week; and that being so, and this being an important item, the minister might let it stand. I do not believe that ultimate progress will be delayed by acceding to the suggestion.

Mr. GOULD: Are life-saving stations maintained during the holiday season in our national parks, where there are several lakes?

Mr. BOYS: If the minister will not adopt my reasonable suggestion, I would ask him to at least answer the questions I put to him, and I think they will be followed by many other questions.

Mr. CARDIN: We think we will be able to cope with the situation next year with this amount, because last year we spent only $80,000. This will mean an economy of $20,000. We expect that we will be in a position to effect some economies.

Mr. HANSON: It would appear that there has been a very drastic cut in the expenditure in relation to this item. I understood the minister to say a few moments ago that the service in the Bay of Fundy at Wood island was costing $7,000 a year. I would like to point out that that is a most important station, probably the most important on the Atlantic coast, and I would like to know the reason why the service has been reduced. I do not think that is a matter about which we should have a cheese-paring policy.

Mr. CARDIN: We do not propose to reduce it.

Mr. HANSON: It has been reduced within two years—I will tell the minister that for his information, and the number of men has been reduced. It may not have been reduced within twelve months, but it has been reduced within two years.

Mr. CHURCH: It is cut out altogether up west.

Mr. HANSON: The service has been about cut in two at Wood island. If hon. members will turn up the Auditor General's report they will see it cost nearly $14,000. I would like to know what the minister is doing as a matter of policy in connection with this matter; because I am sorry to admit that the Bay of Fundy is a very dangerous piece of water to navigate. In the parish of Grand Manan and on the southern portion of Nova Scotia, there have been a good many wrecks, and it is necessary to maintain at Grand Manan an up-to-date life saving station with all modern appliances. There have been a great many lives lost there in my own memory. Happily we do not have many wrecks, but when we do have a wreck it is a bad one and many lives are lost. As a resident of the country for many years and knowing perfectly the conditions that prevail there, I believe that station should be maintained in a thoroughly efficient manner. I should like to know the view of the department with regard to their policy at that particular station. The minister has made pretty good progress tonight, and if he will take a hint from his friends over here, he will let the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. CARDIN: I will be quite ready to accede to the suggestion of my hon. friend if he will let this item pass.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There seems to be a feeling that an equitable policy is not being pursued with respect to life-saving stations; that certain sections are being allowed to save their own lives and other sections are being helped by the government. I do not think the passing of this act will ever save the government's life. The minister has put through ten items tonight, involving something like two million dollars, and this has been done since half past ten. We cannot be sitting here till midnight continuously.

Mr. CARDIN: I agree.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): As Bill No. 47, incorporating the United Church of Canada, stands in my name, and, I hope, will be reached to-morrow evening at eight p.m., I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if he, with the consent of the House, would agree to set apart Wednesday, June 18, for consideration of this bill, if not disposed of on Tuesday evening. Its importance not only to the millions of people directly interested, but to the country as a whole, I submit, places the bill in the same position as a public bill. With the consent of the Prime Minister, I would move, seconded by Mr. Putnam:

That Bill No. 47, incorporating the United Church of Canada, be the first order for Wednesday, June 18, and given precedence until disposed of unless disposed of on Tuesday evening.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): Before that motion is put, it seems to me that it is rather unusual. Members who are interested in this bill should have been consulted with regard to the matter. I have made an important engagement in Montreal for Wednesday, and I should like to be present when this bill is reached. I, therefore, object to this motion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has to be unanimous.

Mr. FORKE: There was no intention of causing any inconvenience to anyone. During the last few days there has been general talk around the House that this bill was coming up on Wednesday, and this was only for the purpose of facilitating business. If any inconvenience is going to be caused to anyone who wishes to take part in the debate, I understand the consent must be unanimous. No discourtesy was meant in making the motion.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government rather hoped that it might be possible to dispose of the bill to-morrow evening in the regular order. Certainly, if it is not disposed of then, it would be our wish to expedite the disposition of it. On the other hand, it requires the unanimous consent of the House to change the order. If it can be arranged to the satisfaction of members of the House to have the bill proceeded with on Wednesday, assuming that it cannot be disposed of to-morrow night, the government will be only too ready to acquiesce in the request of my hon. friend, but he understands, of course, that it is open to any hon. member to object.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: As this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House, it would require to stand until Wednesday when the order is called, when that consent may be given.

Motion stands.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.45 u.m.

Tuesday, June 17, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

HON. MR. MURDOCK AND HOME BANK

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present the second report of the select standing committee on Privileges and Elections. I also lay on the Table the evidence taken and the exhibits filed before said committee. The report is as follows:

Your committee, having considered the resolution referred to the select standing committee on Privileges and Elections on May 22, 1924, as follows:—

"Thursday, May, 22, 1924.

Ordered,—That the following:—

Mr. Porter, seconded by Mr. Guthrie, moved, That, E. Guss Porter, member representing the electoral riding of West Hastings, in this House, having declared from his seat in the House that he is credibly informed and that he believes he is able to establish by satisfactory evidence that:—

The Honourable James Murdock, Minister of Labour, did withdraw from the Home Bank at its Ottawa branch on the 15th day of August, 1923, two days before such bank's failure, thousands of dollars on deposit therein to his credit, using certain information he had received, as such minister, of the likely immediate failure of said bank, and had received advantage and profit to himself to the extent of such withdrawals, contrary to his obligations as such minister in derogation of his office and the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament, be referred to the select standing committee on Privileges of this House to inquire fully into the said allegations with power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath or affirmation, and that the said committee do report in full the evidence taken before them and all other procedure on the reference, and the result of their inquiries to this House for such action thereon as this House may determine.

Attest.

W. B. NORTHRUP,
Clerk of the House of Commons."

and having heard the evidence given by all witnesses submitted in support of the charge contained in said resolution and all evidence and statements made in answer thereto, and examined all exhibits filed on such inquiry, beg leave to report as follows:—

The evidence taken by the committee shows that Honourable James Murdock on the 15th of August, 1923, drew out of the Home Bank of Canada, at its Ottawa branch, the sum of $4,050, but there is no evidence to show that before so drawing out said sum he had received information as a cabinet minister, of the probable failure of said bank. The evidence also shows that the only information Mr. Murdock had of the probable failure of said bank was received as a private citizen from Honourable G. N. Gordon, in a friendly interview on the 9th of August, 1923.

The committee finds that Honourable James Murdock did nothing in connection with the withdrawal of such money from the Home Bank contrary to his obligation as a minister of the Crown, or in derogation of his office and the honour, dignity, and traditions of parliament, and that the charge submitted to this committee for investigation, so far as it affects the honour of Mr. Murdock, is not only not proved but entirely disproved.

Your committee submit herewith the minutes of proceedings and exhibits laid before the committee, and evidence taken by them.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. ARCHAMBAULT,
Chairman.

TREATY WITH FINLAND

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): For the information of the House, I lay on the Table copy of treaty of commerce and navigation between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and Finland.

PRIVILEGE—MR. HUDSON

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. A. B. HUDSON (South Winnipeg): I desire to refer to a matter of personal privilege. Yesterday in the House a question was asked affecting me, which will be found on page 3223 of Hansard as follows:

Mr. Hudson, M.P.

Mr. Harris:

Is Mr. A. B. Hudson, K.C., M.P. member for South Winnipeg, the same A. B. Hudson, K.C., M.P., who is a member of the legal firm of Hudson, Ormond, Spice & Symington, the latter member of said firm being the Mr. Symington who is paid by the government as counsel on the Home Bank Inquiry?

Hon. Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

That question and answer as they appear in Hansard are calculated to create the impression that I am a partner of Mr. Symington in regard to this particular transaction. That is not true. I am not Mr. Symington's partner in this transaction. I have no interest in it, and when Mr. Symington was employed it was expressly stipulated both with him and with the government that the retainer should be a purely personal one on his part. Morever I wish to say that Mr. Symington was not employed at my suggestion or on account of any association with me.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I desire to confirm in every way what my hon. friend has just stated. When I, acting for the government, asked Mr. Symington to represent the government before that commission, I never had any communication with my hon. friend at all in regard to the matter.

SALARIES OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

MOTION, MR. CHURCH, TO DISCUSS A MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) has handed me the following:

I ask leave to move an adjournment of the House under Rule 39 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely:

The application or request of the postal employees received by the government since yesterday for an amendment to the present statute relating to the revised schedule of wages by the Civil Service Commission and the refusal of the employees to accept the said schedule, and their intimation that within forty-eight hours a strike will occur which will, if allowed, cause great damage to trade and commerce and inconvenience to the public and to the business of parliament as well. And for the object of asking this hon. House to consider some form of conciliation, either by granting the employees a board of conciliation or otherwise, or by appointing a Select Committee of the House to consider the case and suggest amending legislation, if any, they deem just and advisable in the matter or for the purpose of taking such other or further action as is deemed advisable, and if leave is granted, I beg leave to move, seconded by Mr. Maclean (South York): "That this House do now adjourn."

Rule 39 reads:

(1) A motion to adjourn (except when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) shall always be in order, but no second motion to the same effect shall be made until after some intermediate proceeding has been had.

(2) Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the House (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (Rule 25) has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

The rule is that the Speaker must decide if the matter of the motion is of urgent public importance. The hon. member who makes the motion hands the Speaker a written statement of the matter, which the Speaker reads to the House. This I have done. The Speaker then asks whether the member has the leave of the House to make the motion. In my humble opinion this matter, a threatened strike which may paralyze the whole of the postal service in Canada, is a matter of urgent public importance. But there is another obligation which must follow my decision that it is a matter of urgent public importance, it is that if objection is taken more than twenty members must rise to indicate the desire that the member may proceed with his motion. So, if it is the desire of the House that the hon. member shall proceed, more than twenty members must rise.

The Clerk Assistant having stated that more than twenty members had risen.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): I I have no intention of taking up more than three minutes of the time of the House on this occasion. The matter is a very important one to the entire city I represent. The members of the House have had no opportunity of discussing this question as they have been waiting for the estimates of the Postmaster General before dealing with the matter, and they have not even yet been considered. Neither have the civil service estimates been considered nor have we had an opportunity of discussing this matter and bringing the facts before the House.

The city from which I come contributes six million dollars to the postal revenue, and the business men of that city are becoming alarmed as to what may happen if some action is not taken by the government. This question has been hanging fire for several months past and tossed about to and fro. Some time ago the matter was considered, and the government assigned to the Civil Service Commission and the deputy ministers the duty of making a survey and drawing up a new schedule of salaries. The Prime Minister laid on the table the correspondence between the various boards considering the case and said it was not within the province of the government to take any action.

This matter was referred to the Audit Board and the Civil Service Commission, who have now made their report. It was bandied about from pillar to post, and the employees have become very much annoyed over the delay and the way in which the case has been handled. Notwithstanding the high cost of living to-day, the scale as recommended by the Civil Service Commission, turning the bonus into salary, works out at a reduction of $179,000 a year. I am not going to enter into any discussion of the report of the Audit Board and the Civil Service Commission to the government, but the government might have taken the House into their confidence a little more and told the Civil Service Commission candidly: We are prepared to go so far in the revision of salaries upward. That has not been done.

The Civil Service Commission have been blamed by the government, and while I am not prepared to go so far as to say that they should be blamed or are at all to blame, I think the government and this House should do something to protect the country from the great inconvenience that will be caused if a strike occurs. The ultimatum I believe has been issued and will expire in a few hours and if a strike happens it will paralyze business. Coming from an industrial city, I know how strikes tie up business. The business men of the country surely deserve some consideration, and a showdown on this whole question is requested. I know that the postal employees in the district from which I come are not the kickers; they are patriotic citizens and the last thing they would want to do is to inconvenience the public one iota. In view of that they have been long suffering and patient, and I hope the government has some favourable statement to make to-day in the matter. For these reasons I did not like to move this resolution, but many business men, commercial firms and public bodies in the city from which I come, requested me to bring the matter before the House and get some action on it. I could not get it before the House on the Orders of the Day nor on the Post Office estimates, and the only course I had open to me was to move this resolution. I have received numerous letters and telegrams from public bodies—a strike vote will be counted to-day at six o'clock; I have been told that the men are to strike.

It has taken nearly six years since the war ended for this bonus to be turned into a straight salary recommendation. The city of Toronto and outside commissions have about 12,000 employees to whom they used to give a war bonus; but as soon as they could after the war they turned the bonus into a straight salary. I urge upon the government to do something to avert this coming strike. What I suggest is that the employees are entitled to either, first, a board of conciliation under the Industrial Disputes Act or, second, a select committee of the House should be appointed to bring in a report within ten days recommending how far we should go in the matter of revision of the statute. If the House does something, a strike will be averted, but if a strike is not averted the trade and commerce of the country will be very seriously hampered. The facts are known to every one and I ask for immediate action before it is too late.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, in seconding the motion, I take advantage of this opportunity to call the attention of the Prime Minister to a discussion that took place on this matter yesterday:

> Mr. Maclean (York): In view of the probability of there being some trouble between the government and the men, is there not some action open to the government which might meet the situation?
> Mr. Mackenzie King: The government will be pleased to receive from my hon. friend or any other hon. gentleman any suggestion be wishes to make in that regard.

With that view of the matter, I hope the Prime Minister will take this as a suggestion—perhaps someone else may have a better one—and bring about some action that will avert this strike.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The motion which has been presented to the House opens with the following declaration:

> The application or request of the postal employees received by the government since yesterday for an amendment to the present statute relating to the revised schedule of wages by the Civil Service Commission and the refusal of the employees to accept the said schedule, and their intimation that within forty-eight hours a strike will occur which will, if allowed, cause great damage to trade and commerce and inconvenience to the public and to business of parliament as well.

That declaration, so far as the government is aware, is quite inaccurate. No application or request of the postal employees has been received by the government since yesterday. I do not know where my hon. friend got his information; but neither the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Stewart) nor myself—and I think it would be the one or the other to whom a communication of this kind would be addressed—has, up to the present time, received any such application as is referred to in the motion of my hon. friend. The motion uses the words, > their intimation that within forty-eight hours a strike will occur.

The government has received no intimation to that effect. Perhaps my hon. friend would tell the House the source of his information. I think it ought to be made perfectly clear to hon. members that since the schedule attached to the report of the Civil Service Commission has been sent to representatives of the postal employees, the government has received from them no official communication whatever. What has appeared in the press has appeared in the press without the knowledge of the government as to the sources from which the different declarations were emanating. Up to the present time no communication of the nature described in the motion has been received. On the other hand, I understand that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) and the Acting Postmaster General have both taken steps to intimate to representatives of the postal employees that they would be pleased to receive them in conference and hoped that any such action as that which was being referred to in the press would not be taken by them without the most careful consideration in every particular.

Mr. IRVINE: Does such an invitation by the Minister of Labour mean anything in view of the fact that no alteration can be made in the revised schedule unless parliament makes that alteration?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend will let me proceed further with what I intend to say. When the government referred to the Civil Service Commission the revision of salaries of postal employees, that was part of a larger reference embracing the entire public service. The clause in the order in council in that connection reads:

> The committee of the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the President of the Privy Council, advise that, in accordance with the announcement made by him in the House of Commons on the 19th March, 1924, (copy of which is submitted), the Civil Service Commission be directed to undertake immediately a revision of the salaries of the Civil Service of Canada and to report thereon to His Excellency in Council at as early a date as may be possible.

It is the salaries of the entire Civil Service of Canada that the Civil Service Commission is being asked to report upon at the present time. To oblige the postal employees, the government asked that their department be the first to be taken up by the Civil Service Commission, but that as soon as it was concluded, the other departments of the government should then be proceeded with. In the report which the Civil Service Commission made to the government on the 8th May, the following paragraph is included:

> The importance of this revision in the postal service will be apparent when it is considered that increases in basic rates of compensation and consequent increased cost of the service would not be confined to the postal service, but must necessarily be also applied to the whole public service as the work of salary revision is proceeded with.

I hope that hon. members and the country will appreciate the significance of that statement in the report of the Civil Service Commission to the government,—that in taking up the revision of the salaries of postal employees they have had in mind the principles which will obtain with respect to the entire public service of the Dominion. The government feel that to take any action at this moment beyond approving what the Civil Service Commission has recommended might be most prejudicial to the further inquiry which the Civil Service Commission is making, inasmuch as the country will not know until the commission has concluded its examination of the revision what the cost to the country, of the practical application of the recommendations is going to be. We therefore feel that until we have before us the report from the Civil Service Commission with respect to the entire Civil Service we shall not be in a position to consider, as we should be able to consider in all its aspects, what the consequence would be of recommending to parliament any concession or any addition to the salaries of any classes of employees beyond what may be recommended by the Civil Service Commission.

We are prepared, when the Civil Service Commission has submitted its report upon the salaries of the entire Civil Service, to consider that report carefully in the light of all the material which we have before us and to make to parliament, if we think it advisable so to do, recommendations supplementing those which are contained in the report of the Civil Service Commission. But we do not feel that we are in a position to make any recommendations to parliament at the present time with respect to the postal employees; and I hope that the employees of the Post Office Department will see that the position which the government is taking is one which is in the interests of the entire Civil Service and in the interest of the taxpayers of the country as well.

Mr. IRVINE: Is the government satisfied with the revision in so far as it applies to the postal workers? In the government's opinion, is the rate of salaries in this particular sufficiently high?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government has taken the report of the Civil Service Commission as received and has approved it so as to enable such increases as are set out therein to go into effect immediately. I have already indicated that until the government has received the report respecting the entire service of Canada and is able to state to parliament and to the country what an addition in any one direction is going to mean in the cost to the nation, the government is not prepared to express any further opinion than that which has been given by its action so far.

Mr. IRVINE: In that case, would it not be better to continue the cost of living bonus to the postal employeees until such time as the commission's full report has been submitted to the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The matter of salary revision has already been referred to the Commission and parliament apparently approved of that action at the time it was taken. No exception was taken by hon. members, including my hon. friend, to the course which was being adopted by the government in referring the matter to the Civil Service Commission; and, that action having been taken, with the entire approval of the House, it seems to me that the House should support the government in standing by the recommendations which the Civil Service Commission has made, until at least we have received information covering the service as a whole.

Mr. EULER: When the complete report is received, if the government should decide that the salaries now paid to postal employees are not sufficient, will any addition that might be made be retroactive?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a matter which will be considered at the proper time. However, I may draw my hon. friend's attention to what appears in the order in council referring the matter to the Civil Service Commission: There is there an undertaking that such recommendations as the commission may make will be made retroactive in just such a manner as he suggests.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): It does not seem fair that the amounts to be paid to postal workers should be dependent upon the schedule as it may appertain to Civil Service workers generally. We are faced with a concrete situation at the present time; the postal workers claim very distinctly that the amount they receive is not sufficient to maintain a decent standard of living, and that fact will not be altered by any further considerations which the commission may bring forward. I would submit that throughout the country generally there is a very considerable interest in this matter and there is a strong sentiment in favour of an increase in the salaries of postal workers. When this matter was being discussed some months ago I noticed an article in the Toronto Telegram—not one of the most radical of Canadian journals—under date April 19, which summarized somewhat as follows:

> The job—a postal porter's helper.
> The hours—4.30 a.m. to 12 p.m., six days a week.
> The work—handling filled mail bags 50 to 100 pounds.
> The pay—$8.50 a week.

That probably represents the lowest grade of the service. On the other hand the great majority of the postal workers are engaged in very responsible work and they receive in many instances less than is supposed, according to the statistics furnished by our own departments, to be the minimum cost of living. Permit me to read a paragraph or two from a recent issue of the Winnipeg Evening Tribune.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Where does the hon. member get the figure $8.50 from? There is no such salary paid.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was quoting from the Telegram of April 19.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The very lowest salary now paid to postal employees is $780 per annum with bonus in addition.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I desire now to quote a paragraph or two from the Winnipeg Evening Tribune of Wednesday, the 11th instant:

> The new scale, by abolishing the bonus and substituting a 15 per cent increase of the basic salaries, will, it is true, raise the pay of some of the higher officials over what was proposed last March. But for married men in the medium grades the salaries will in many classes be even further reduced.
> Letter carriers in the top grade, for instance, were paid during the last fiscal year at the rate of $1,557 per annum. This amount included $1,260 salary and $297 bonus. In March last it was proposed to cut the bonus by $99 so that the total maximum salary and bonus would equal $1,458. The letter carriers protested to the government against this reduction, and quoted official figures to show that the reduced salary was well below the level set by the Dominion Department of Labour for a decent standard of living for a family of five persons.
> There was some unfortunate talk of a strike, but the government poured oil on the troubled waters by promising reconsideration of the salary schedule. It is now proposed as a brilliant solution of the problem that the bonus shall be dropped altogether and that the basic salaries shall be raised about 15 per cent. The letter carriers are thus offered a maximum of $1,440 a year, which is $117 less than they received last year and $18 less than the protested schedule of last March . . . . It is not too late for the blunder to be rectified. It is understood the Prime Minister has yet to confer with the postal employees. The people of Canada do not begrudge a fair wage to their public servants in exchange for faithful and honest service, and few fair-minded people will consider $1,440 a year to be adequate remuneration for a letter carrier of experience and integrity who faithfully performs his arduous duties.

It is not my intention to go into any comparison of the new with the old schedules. From a number of our western cities we have received telegrams urging that there should be a revision of the proposed rates. I think that the general opinion is that the range should be from $1,260 to $1,980. Now, Mr. Speaker, the question is, what can be done in the face of the present serious situation? It is several months since the protests were made, and the postal employees have done apparently all in their power by what are termed constitutional means; that is to say, they have preferred their requests to the government and made their representations to the Civil Service Commission. The postal employees have protested also through members of parliament. What more can be done, so far as they are concerned? They seem to be driven to take direct action. Unfortunately there are members of the business community who are willing to push the matter to the limit. I read one sentence from a bulletin published by the Employers' Association of Manitoba, in which the solicitor of the association submits the following:

> In my judgment action should be taken immediately by the business interests to anticipate and prevent any interruption of the postal service. A strike by postal employees is essentially of a revolutionary character and ought not to be tolerated. There should be a law forbidding strikes by government employees and others engaged in operating public utilities.

Now, if there is no means of redress by an appeal to parliament what other course can the postal workers take than to refuse to continue working under conditions which do not assure them a decent living? That seems to me to be the situation with which we are faced at the present time. But the postal workers are told that since they are operating a public utility a strike by them would be regarded as revolutionary in character! I quite admit that the postal employees do occupy a peculiar position. I think they feel their responsibility and realize that they ought not to strike unless it is absolutely imperative. But what other course remains open to them? You cannot reduce them to a condition of slavery. If they are urged not to strike, surely we in this House ought to be able to offer them some alternative. We ask the Prime Minister what can be done, and he says, "We are in the hands of the Civil Service Commission; we cannot do anything without altering the Civil Service Act."

Mr. BUREAU: That is not exactly right, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understood that to be the Prime Minister's position.

Mr. BUREAU: The Prime Minister said that the government would take no action until the report of the commission was in for all branches of the Civil Service, so as not to prejudice any of them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If that is the case, if we must take no action until that report is received, I would submit that in the meantime we should continue the present scale of wages with bonus, as my colleague (Mr. Irvine) has suggested.

I would urge upon the House the serious situation in which many of these postal workers find themselves. They are working on a very narrow margin; ten, twenty, fifty dollars may not mean a great deal to the majority of hon. members, but the smallest of these amounts means a very great deal to the rank and file of the postal employees; and if they were assured that, without prejudice, their case would receive full consideration, I am inclined to think that they might agree to the final settlement being deferred. But the matter has gone on month after month, in fact almost year after year—for the bonus has been regarded as a temporary provision—and consequently there has been a feeling of unrest and dissatisfaction in the service for several years while the final settlement was pending. Then when at last the settlement proves to be of this nature, it leaves them absolutely in despair of receiving what they regard as justice. I would urge that these civil servants, who have been doing faithful work for many years, have a right to look to parliament for some redress, and that at this time the government ought to assume definite responsibilities and not plunge the country into the throes of a general strike.

Mr. W. G. RAYMOND (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, I was rather surprised to hear from the Prime Minister that he had received no intimation whatever from the postal employees, for the newspapers generally have recorded meetings of the various branches of the Postal Workers' Association throughout the country, at which meetings the men decided in favour of a strike unless their position was altered. I think it would be humiliating for the government if the difficulty ended in a strike and the business of the country was thrown into confusion, as in that event appeals for a prompt settlement would come from all over the Dominion, and the government would have to act. I would respectfully urge that the suggestion made, I think first by the member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine), and subsequently repeated by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Woodsworth), that the full bonus of last year be continued, be acted on by the government, pending a final settlement. I do not think the postal workers have ever been unreasonable in their demands, and they have always put them forward in a reasonable manner. I think if this concession were granted it would avert the threatened strike. But if the matter is allowed to drift until it culminates in a strike, it will be more difficult to settle the trouble then than by anticipating it now and making the concession which has been suggested.

Mr. H. B. McGIVERIN (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to associate myself with the remarks of my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Raymond). On several occasions already in this House I have discussed at some length the bonus as applied to the cost of living, and it seems to me that in this case the bonus granted last year, which even then was a reduction of the bonus for the preceding year, should remain until a settlement is effected not only of the remuneration of the postal workers but of that of all other branches of the Civil Service. Pending the full report on civil service salary revision, it would seem to me that we should not do anything to lower the already low rates which we pay our public service. This House would then have a chance to determine what is fair and right. Therefore I should be very pleased if the government could arrange to continue the cost of living bonus granted last year. I have yet to see any fall in the cost of living figures, and certainly until there has been a decided decline it is only fair and right that this concession should be made. By so doing we are not taking anything away from the postal workers or any other members of the Civil Service until the question is finally decided by an appeal to parliament, if necessary.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in full accord with the proposal to continue the cost of living bonus until a final adjustment is made. If we wait until the final report on salary revision is brought down before taking action, this session of parliament will probably close, and the civil service employees will be in a state of uncertainty and the country will suffer. I can truthfully say that in the western cities at least the cost of living has not gone down to such a point as to enable a family to be maintained on less than $100 a month, which represents the income of some of these men. I think the trouble with this country is that the big salaries are too big and the small salaries are too small. Some adjustment should be made, and I think the government should take this into consideration and act at once so as to satisfy those who are getting these lower salaries.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, we had a postal strike in this country a few years ago, and the business of everybody in the country was so seriously hampered that it was found almost impossible to carry on. That manifestly must be the case in the event of any strike in the postal service. The only thing which, to my mind, would be worse than a postal strike would be a strike of railway employees. But this government has the responsibility of preventing that strike; it is the duty of the government to see that the postal service is carried on. whatever adjustment is necessary to that end should be made, and it would have, I am sure, the support of the House as a whole. Nobody can claim that the men in the postal service are receiving excessive wages. In the case of a man living in a city like Montreal, Hamilton, Quebec or Brantford, the amount he has to pay in rent makes it impossible for him to get the necessaries of life with any less salary than he is getting now with the bonus; that must be apparent to any one who has the responsibility of keeping up a house. The government might well use its influence with the Civil Service Commission—because certainly it must have some influence with the Civil Service Commission—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

An hon. MEMBER: None at all.

Mr. HOCKEN: The government has it in its power to repeal the Civil Service Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is a club that could be held over the head of the commission.

Mr. LOVETT: Would the hon. member support a measure to repeal the Civil Service Act?

Mr. HOCKEN: Why, certainly I would.

Mr. HEALY: Would you put that in writing?

Mr. HOCKEN: My hon. friend may be required to put his statements in writing, but I have never been asked to do that before. If he had been in this House in the former parliament he would know that I was perhaps the most outstanding opponent of the Civil Service Act; I did not believe in it then and I do not believe in it now. If this government says it has no control over the civil service, why does it not repeal the act, if it has any courage at all? That is the way to get at these people. If the commissioners will not do what is reasonable in the judgment of members of the government, the government can bring in a bill to repeal the act and get rid of the commission. So that when the government says it has no power and no responsibility and can do nothing but what it is told to do by the commission, I do not accept that. I do not think any government should lie down to the Civil Service Commissioners, even though they may be under the control of this parliament. I say that this whole question of postal employees' salaries is in the hands of the government, and it must either meet or evade its responsibility. That it should meet its responsibility is, I am sure, what the country will expect.

Mr. A. F. HEALY (North Essex): Mr. Speaker, for once I find myself in complete accord with the member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) so far as the Civil Service Commission is concerned. At the same time I do not think the government should, in the face of a threatened strike, be forced into the position of taking action without waiting for the final result of the judgment of the Civil Service Commission on all salaries for civil servants, unless that judgment is going to be delayed too long. Speaking for my own constituency I may point out that the minimum wage proposed is not such as to enable a man to live decently in the city of Windsor or in the adjoining municipalities. For that reason I say that the proposed salary rates are certainly too low. It is impossible for any man to keep up a home in any of the business centres, I believe, on less than $100 a month; that should surely be the least that this government should call upon any civil servant to work for; and at that he should be able to look forward to increases from year to year so that after he has been in the service for a number of years he will be able to save a little for his old age. I sincerely hope that the government will request the Civil Service Commission to come to a decision as soon as possible on the salaries of all branches of the civil service, and that in the meantime the postal workers may be satisfied to await the decision of the Civil Service Commission and ultimately the decision of this House on the report brought in by the commission.

4 p.m.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine), if the government find it necessary to delay consideration of civil service salaries until the whole revision has been made by the Civil Service Commission, the bonus to the postal employees be continued until that revision has been made. It would be entirely unfair and illogical to reduce the salaries of the postal employees, under the report made by the Civil Servcie Commission, and at the same time to continue the bonuses to all other branches of the civil service. It seems to me that would be unfair discrimination.

I would like to support the statement of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Healy) that the present salaries of letter carriers are not any too high, and for my part I would not like to see them reduced. I think it is known that I have always been a supporter of the Civil Service Act, and I still like the principle of making it impossible to exercise too much political patronage. I do, however, make this differentiation: while I believe we may have a good scheme under which appointments shall be made by the Civil Service Commission, it is going entirely too far when we leave in the hands of the commission the fixing of salaries and rates of pay for civil servants. That, it seems to me, should be entirely in the hands of responsible members of this House or of the government itself. I would like again to suggest to the government, if I may, that they allow the present rate of pay to continue—that is, the present salaries with bonus—until such time as the final revision can be made.

Mr. HUGHES: Is the bonus paid to the other branches of the civil service?

Mr. EULER: I would understand so.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the hon. member (Mr. Euler), but there is one aspect of this matter which perhaps has not come to the attention of hon. members, namely, that the proposed salaries are larger in the aggregate than the combined salaries and bonus amounted to before. The salaries of some of the lower-paid men in the postal service are being reduced, but under the proposed schedule those in the higher branches will get more than they were getting before with the bonus. So that there should not be any difficulty on the part of the government in letting the bonus stand for another year, because they will save a little money. I think I am right in that.

Mr. McGIVERIN: Not last year's bonus.

Mr. FORKE: The aggregate will be larger under the proposed schedule than the regular salaries of 1924-25 and bonus.

Mr. BELAND: Not the bonus of last year.

Mr. FORKE: Yes, last year.

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. FORKE: Well, I may be wrong, but there is very little difference; as I say, the lower salaries have been reduced and the higher ones are larger. I have received the schedule just this minute.

Mr. BUREAU: There is a uniform increase, and the higher-paid officials did not get the bonus. That is what makes the difference.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Acting Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, no one will deny that to have a strike of postal workers throughout Canada would be a very serious matter. and no one will realize that more than whoever has to do with the administration of the Post Office Department. Although the situation is a serious one, to attempt to settle it in parliament does not appear to me to be the logical way to reach a conclusion in the matter. No matter what hon. members may think about the Civil Service Commission, surely they will agree that an impartial body of that kind is better able to deal with such a question as this than the House of Commons or the government itself. There are some things about the adjustment that perhaps do not meet with the view expressed by the officials of the department. But we have to bear in mind that the Civil Service Commission have facilities for getting information with respect to the cost of living, and if hon. gentlemen will refer to the order in council they will find that due consideration was to be given by them to the cost of living and the payment of salaries in occupations similar to those of the postal employees. The report of the Civil Service Commission states that they have done that; they have inquired carefully into the cost of living. That is what they say in their report; I am not speaking from my own knowledge because I have not got information on this question. Not only that but the deputy ministers of the departments were associated with them in discussing this matter. Afterwards the whole case was reviewed by the Audit Board who had all this information placed before them. Hon. gentlemen now have in their possession the schedule which was the result of all this investigation.

I am not going to take time to go into the whole matter this afternoon. I simply wish to say to hon. gentlemen—whether they are in favour of the Civil Service Commission or are opposed to them—that I think we can agree they are an impartial body to deal with a matter of this kind. Now, the postal employees, to be fair to them, complained they were not given full opportunity to present their case. I asked that the Civil Service Commission hear the postal employees; and a second time they complained that they were not given sufficient time to place their case before the commission. Furthermore the postal employees had an interview with the Audit Board and, I understand, they discussed their case very fully with that body. As a result of all this discussion and presentation of facts, both by the postal employees and by the officials of the Post Office Department, you have the schedule before you which embodies the finding of the Civil Service Commission.

Hon. gentlemen argue that the minimum salaries of the postal employees are too low. I should like to point out that the minimum salary under the old schedule was $780. The minimum salary proposed here is $1,020.

Mr. RAYMOND: Is the minister keeping in mind the fact that there was a cost of living bonus.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am speaking of the salaries of which revision was made. Of course the Civil Service Commission as I have already explained, were asked to bear in mind the cost of living conditions and the conditions that prevailed under the bonus. But it is a fact that there is a reduction as between the old salary and the salary with the bonus added.

Mr. RAYMOND: Did not the postal employees make the contention that the cost of living bonus should be added to the salaries?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am coming to the matter of the presentation of the claims of the postal employees. My hon. friends have had the schedule before them; I am merely mentioning the minimum wage because it came into the discussion this afternoon. This may be said with respect to the adjustment of the minimum wage: All three are nearly in agreement about the minimum, although not about the maximum.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before the bonus arrangement came into operation was there not an additional amount provided for western employees on account of the cost of living west of the Great Lakes?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It has been the practice to allow that in the case of the whole service. But one of the difficulties —I might allude to it while I am considering this branch of the subject—was this: When the adjustment of salaries was being made, that is to say in regard to the $780, it was pointed out to me by the commission and by the post office officials that that was the salary payable to a junior, to a young man entering the service. At the conclusion of the war, when our soldiers were coming home and it was difficult for them to get employment, the age limit was abandoned and married men became eligible for employment. Consequently in their case the salaries were found to be too low. In considering this matter also it must be borne in mind that there are certain perquisites in the way of clothing that go with the salary and are still continued. I am not dwelling unduly upon that, but I want to say this: The result of the investigation is almost unanimous with respect to the salaries for those in the lower grades, but there is a difference of $60 between the recommendation of the Audit Board and that of the Civil Service Commission, and an even greater difference between the amount suggested by the officials of the department and the salary asked for by the employees. I am speaking now of the maximum salary, although the same remark applies to both the minimum and the maximum salaries. The point I want to emphasize is that throughout this investigation all agreed, or practically agreed, upon the minimum salary, and so recommended to the government. We have had that recommendation before us and it was returned to the Civil Service Commission upon two occasions. Hon. gentlemen have the memorandum of the commission before them and I am not going to refer to it, but the commission explain how they arrive at their conclusions. The statement of the government now is that when salaries generally are revised they are prepared to act on that basis and make it effective to the whole service. We have had that statement from the Prime Minister to-day and I am not going to dwell upon it.

My hon. friend (Mr. Church) makes a statement that the government have been notified officially by the officers of the Postal Employees organization that we had twenty-four hours in which to come to a satisfactory agreement with them. Well, we have no knowledge officially of that statement. It appears in the press but the department has received no information to that effect, and the Prime Minister has not been officially informed with respect to it. I did expect that when the postal employees—because we were constantly in touch with them; Mr. Murdock and I met them upon every occasion they came to Ottawa—had time to examine the schedule and had discussed it with their fellow employees we would probably have a further conference with them. I do not know whether they propose to adhere to the schedule they originally filed, or whether they would be willing to accept a modified one. If they adhere to that schedule its adoption would mean an additional expenditure in the Post Office Department of over $2,000,000. I am not saying that if that sum is required to give these employees a decent living it should not be granted, but I think the matter would want some further consideration than even the government or the House are prepared to accord it at this moment. I do not in any way suggest that we are shutting the door in the face of these employees, and are going to deny to them the right to discuss this matter with us and thresh it out until we reach a decision that will be satisfactory and avoid further difficulty. Nobody wants a strike. I would be the last to deny to the worker the right to take whatever action he sees fit and proper in order to protect his own interest. But surely civil servants, employees of the government and of parliament, are in a vastly different position to that occupied by the different workers throughout the country.

Do not assume that I am denying them the right of negotiation, the right of protest, or the right to take every proper means to bring legitimate grievances to the attention of the government or to those who may be in authority; but I do most solemnly protest and object to them taking such drastic action as would tie up the business of the country by way of strike. I think in fairness to the House and to myself I should make my position very plain. I have stated to the employees themselves that, so far as I am concerned, I am prepared in every legitimate way to give the postal employees or any other employees of this government what they are entitled to. But what does a strike mean? What will be the result of the strike? If one would judge by the temper of some of the speakers this afternoon, it means that parliament must succumb to the rights of the postal employees, without consideration of the question whether it is right or wrong, in order to avoid trouble. Surely the parliament of Canada is going to reserve to itself the right to run this country. Surely we cannot surrender that right, no matter what we may think about it, and I for one am prepared to go the limit. I am prepared to discuss with these men to-night, to-morrow or at any time, their legitimate grievances, and to sit down with them at any time and go into the matter. I have not the authority at the moment to say what the salaries shall be. In fairness to the Civil Service Commission, I say that they have gone into this matter conscientiously and fairly and made their finding. Perhaps further material might be brought to their attention, but if so I do not know of it at the moment. As far as I am able, I am prepared on all occasions to give to the civil servants of the country a fair deal; but I would deplore drastic action in the way of a strike, and I think every hon. gentleman in this House would agree with me in that connection. It should be a very last recourse in industrial concerns; but so far as the police forces and the civil servants of the country are concerned, I cannot agree that it is warranted under any circumstances.

In reference to the newspaper reports upon which my hon. friend's motion is based, we certainly have no knowledge of a communication of the sort referred to. If there has been a communication of that sort it had not reached the officials at twelve o'clock to-day; certainly it had not reached me, and we have the statement of the Prime Minister that it had not reached him.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Has the acting minister received from the secretary of the Dominion Federation of Postal Employees a request for a conference?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not since the announcement of a civil service board. I did expect to have a conference with them, and will be glad to see them at any time.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): I see by the press the following statement emanating from the Secretary of the Dominion Federation of Postal Employees:

The public are warned through the press that all important mail should be posted before twelve o'clock noon to-morrow.

Mr. BUREAU: Who signs that?

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): It is given out by the Secretary of the Dominion Federation of Postal Employees.

Mr. BUREAU: It is a report to the press rather than to the government.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have been in touch with the postal employees, and constantly in communication, but we have not received the official notice purporting to be embodied in my hon. friend's motion. I am bound to think, Mr. Speaker, that before drastic action of that character is taken the representatives of the postal employees will desire to have further discussion with the members of the government at least. Undoubtedly a good deal of propaganda will be inserted in the newspapers, propaganda is bound to be circulated; but this is a very important matter, and I think we should be fair but firm in the situation.

Mr. W. A. BOYS (South Simcoe): This might be an opportune time for me to bring the attention of the government to a case in the service which seems to be entitled to perhaps more attention than even the matter which is now under discussion, although I do not rise for one moment to interefere with what may be considered absolutely fair from their point of view. In my opinion, if there is one class of employee in the government service whose condition is deplorable from a financial standpoint, and who is entitled to some redress, it is the rural mail carrier. We were told that under this schedule the minimum salary is $1,020, and we have heard statements made to the effect that men cannot live on $1,400. Have any of us stopped to reflect on what is expected of a rural mail carrier? He travels twenty miles and his remuneration at the rate of $45 a mile is considered by some excessive. I think I would be correct if I said the average rate was $43, but placing it at $45, we find that on a route twenty miles long he gets $900.

Mr. BELAND: For a daily service?

Mr. BOYS: For a daily service—and I am coming to that in a moment. Until last year he never had one holiday in the whole year except Sunday. Last year he secured New Year's day as a holiday. He works Dominion Day, Christmas Day and every other day in the year, excepting Sunday, even now—he has the one single holiday, New Year's day. If he does his work in the summer time with a horse and rig, he cannot travel a route of twenty miles without two horses. He has to maintain his horses and buggy in summer and his cutter in winter. And nobody seems to worry about him at all. Last year when the postal estimates were under consideration I took occasion to speak at some length on this subject, but I do not intend to speak at such great length to-day. I suggest to the acting minister that when he comes to consider, as he says, the whole government service and the revision of the employees' pay, for goodness sake do not forget the rural mail carrier. There is only one answer ever made, so far as I know, regarding him, and that is that he works on contract. He signs a contract, and when the contract expires a new one is advertised, and somebody is bound to do the work for perhaps a few dollars less. If you wish to apply the same argument to the postal employees, I venture to say that if the minimum salary is $1,020, and any one of those positions is advertised, you would get one or two hundred applications to fill the position at the same figure. I am not saying that that is a good reason why they should not get that much money—I do not say that—but I say it is not a good reason either when applied to the rural mail carriers. These men render one of the best services, in my opinion, that has ever been rendered to the farming community. We want to see efficient men who are capable of doing their work well filling those positions. It is our duty to see that they get fair play which they are not getting just now. I most earnestly ask the acting minister to give them consideration when the whole question is under consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Would the hon member abolish the tender system?

Mr BOYS: Yes, I would. They have no such system in the United States, they have a standard, and a man must live up to that standard. A fair remuneration per mile is given them. Let us look into the matter and see what is a fair wage for that service. How can we spend time talking about men being underpaid at $1,000 or $1,500 when we have men who have to work for the small wage paid to rural mail carriers? These men are not getting any consideration. I am not seeking in any way to interfere with the just claims of the postal employees, but I do most emphatically state that if it is thought their salaries should be raised, the rural mail carriers should also receive fair compensation.

Mr. HUGHES: I did not hear the suggestion the hon. gentleman is making.

Mr. SPEAKER: Might I ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the subject under discussion. Rural mail carriers are under contract and are not postal employees in the sense in which those whose salaries are being discussed are postal employees. When a motion to adjourn on a question of urgent importance comes up, the rule is that the discussion must not raise any question which, according to the rules of the House, can be debated only on a distinct motion under notice. I must, therefore, ask my hon. friend not to go beyond the motion which is before the chair.

Mr. BOYS: I realized myself, I may say, that, perhaps, strictly speaking and very technically, what I wished to say was not in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: No. It comes under the postal service, but there is a distinction, because rural mail carriers are under contract whilst employees of this class are salaried.

Mr. BOYS: I shall be quite content to say no more than to answer a question which has been put to me by an hon. gentleman.

Mr. HUGHES: The hon. member suggested that another principle be followed in regard to rural mail delivery, and I did not hear it. That is very important.

Mr. BOYS: In the first place, I do not suppose it is our duty, sitting where we are, to devise ways and means of dealing with this matter. I brought to the attention of the government what, it seems to me, is worthy of their attention, but I have no desire whatever to keep secret my thoughts. I would be prepared to change the system and to fix the remuneration at so much per mile, just as is done in the United States, at whatever rate may be considered fair.

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (Laprairie and Napierville): We have heard in the newspapers reports in regard to strikes of postal employees, and I thought if this was a good time to talk about strikes, members of the House of Commons might go on strike, not to increase, but to reduce their indemnity, and thus set a good example to the rest of the country. Because, when we increased our indemnity, we were talking about the high cost of living and now the employees claim that it is not reduced. I think we, as a House of Commons, should make a sacrifice by reducing our indemnity and give that to the poor fellow who does not have enough to live on. I am willing to be the first man to do that, but not alone as I did in 1920 and 1921. I should like to see every hon. member agree to cut the sessional indemnity by $1,500.

Hon. members from the West claim that the cost of living is higher in the West than it is in the East. I do not agree with them. They are the people who raise the wheat, beef, pork, and we in the big cities of the East have to pay high freight rates to bring that wheat, beef and pork from the West. Therefore, I do not see how the cost of living can be higher in the West than in the East.

As regards the subject under discussion, I have always been opposed to bonuses. To pay a bonus is not a proper way to act. We do not pay bonuses to men in my riding. In Laprairie there is an immense brickyard employing about 800 people at the present time. Their wages run from 25 cents, 27½ cents to 33½ cents an hour. There is a fairly high tariff protection of 22½ per cent on bricks and our people are able to earn about $3 a day. My people of Laprairie work harder than the civil servants in the city of Ottawa, but they do not receive a bonus from this country. Is it fair that we, the farmers and the workingman on the farms and in the factories, should be taxed to pay bonuses to civil service employees?

That is the question that I have put to myself since the system of bonuses was commenced in the public service. If the civil service employees are not satisfied with their jobs, why do they not give them up and go to work on the farms? They will find out pretty soon that if they could get back their jobs they would take them as quickly as possible. In Ottawa what do we see on the streets every morning? People running, not working, but running because they are late, sometimes, for nine o'clock. If the people were to do that in the country, it would be pretty late in the morning before the cows were milked. The job is not the same at all.

As regards the situation in Montreal and other big cities, the claim is made that the postal employees want to go on strike. If people were wanted to fill their places, I think I could send to Montreal the next morning about 1,000 people who would be willing to give up their jobs at the brick yard at Laprairie or Delson and be pleased to go to Montreal, take those jobs and work five or six hours a day.

I do not object to a poor man with a family receiving a fair salary. The lowest, as stated by the minister, is $1,020. Where is the man in the country, where is the man at the brickyard at Laprairie, who makes as much as that? Our people get only $3 a day and they work about seven or eight months a year. They are, however, getting along all right. They raise families; their children are well clad and have shoes to go to school with, although their father has a salary of less than $1,000 a year. The trouble with the people in the cities is that they spend a little too much money to go to the movies sometimes; they go to bed too late and they acquire some habits, smoking cigarettes and that sort of thing on which they spend money for nothing. We, the farmers and the workingmen of the brickyards of Laprairie and Delson do not acquire those bad habits. We put that money in a sure place, that is, into the hands of the good woman who keeps the house and saves the money for us. We cannot go to the movies or smoke good cigars or good cigarettes. We buy meat, bread and sometimes molasses, and that is all we want. So I have been all my lifetime a man who has taken good care of money, and I think that is the only way to make a little money even though it takes a long time. That would not have been the case had I been a man to spend money for all the opportunities that come before me, for things that are pleasant enough sometimes. It is very pleasant to smoke a good cigar costing twenty or twenty-five cents, but I smoke that just on Sunday; and if I had any advice to give to the civil service employees, it would be for them to follow my footsteps. In that way, I believe in the long run they would not find it necessary to come before the Civil Service Commission or before parliament, and they would likely be able to save money. I understand that we want to be able in the near future to make both ends meet; that this parliament is not yet too well off, and when a man in private life is not too well off, he cannot spend money for nothing. I should like to see economy practised, and the government should set the example for the rest of the community. When my right hon. friend was in opposition, I discussed the question of bonuses for civil service employees. What I said then, I say the same thing now. I trust the government will find a way of having fewer employees, paying them better and endeavouring to get from the same employees a good day's work. That is all I want.

Mr. JOHN PRITCHARD (North Wellington): I agree with the sentiments of the hon. member (Mr. Lanctôt) who has just concluded as well as with the remarks of the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys). I understand that some hon. gentlemen are of the opinion that remarks of the nature I am going to make are out of order, but I shall try not to depart from the rules in the few minutes I shall occupy. In the matter under discussion to-day we are faced with one of the real problems which this parliament will have to deal with sooner or later. The wage problem in this country is a serious one, and it is all the more serious at the present time because it has got out of balance. One section of our public service is now insisting that it shall retain the pay which it received during the time of the high cost of living. The fact of the matter is that we still have a high cost of living; the cost of living has not gone down, and the question naturally is, what is the reason for this? Well, the cost of living is high, for one thing because wages are high; and how we are going to reduce that cost of living is the important question. As the hon. member for South Simcoe observed, letter carriers who are receiving to-day $600 for travelling twenty miles daily during twelve months of the year must subscribe to the cost of maintaining the city employees with whom we are dealing to-day; he has to give the other man twice as much as he himself is getting. It may be said that the cost of living is higher in the city than it is in the country; but as a matter of fact the man who has to keep two horses and a rig in the country on $600 has a harder problem to cope with than the city employee getting $1,200. I have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion every man engaged in a useful and honest occupation ought to be given such wages as will keep his family respectably and comfortably, afford his children an education, and allow him to put by something for a rainy day. If a worker is not able to do that because his wages will not permit it, then I say his wages are not high enough.

Now, there are two ways in which we can help the workers to realize this condition; we can either increase wages or bring down the cost of living. In my opinion it is imperative that the cost of living shall be reduced, because as I have said on two or three occasions one half of the people receive half of the wages which the other half of the wage-earners are given for their work. That state of things cannot continue, and as the last speaker remarked, there is no better way in which parliament can approach this subject than by reducing the indemnities of its own members. I have said that before. I know that some members of parliament might perhaps be justified in going on strike if that were done, as they might not be getting enough compensation for their time. But we all know how we are spending our indemnity; there is no denying it. I think we could do with less if we saw fit. So far as the present question is concerned, as has been observed, unless we are prepared to treat alike all the employees in the various departments we can do nothing at present; there should be no discrimination. When we can put every man in the employment of the government on an even basis it will be quite right to make a change. But in the meantime I think the suggestion is a wise one, that we wait until we receive the report of the Civil Service Commission before taking any action. The bonus might be retained temporarily until something definite can be done, but I agree with the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil), that those who are in the service of the country should not assume the role of dictating to parliament, for after all we as the representatives of the people are, I am sure, anxious to do what is fair by every one.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull) (Translation): I do not wish, sir to prolong this debate, however I deem it my duty to request the government to kindly keep up the civil service bonus, which was granted during the war at a time when the high cost of living prevailed, until reclassification of salaries takes place, not only as regards the Post Office Department, but all departments as well. One should bear in mind that the cost of living has not gone down in proportion to the general wish of lowering the salaries. To-day, for instance, rents are 50 per cent higher than they were at the beginning of the war. The same is true for fuel and at present we are paying $16 per ton for coal. Indeed, I do not think that the civil employees without the bonus can manage to live on the pre-war salaries.

I find it strange that it is always the salaries of government officials that we first pounce upon when it is a question of economizing. I think there are measures of economy that would be more equitable and more profitable to the country than the cutting down of the civil servants salaries. If there be too many employees, we may dispense with some; but let those who are needed and do the work receive a fair salary so as to allow them to bring up a family in a decent way and hold in society the rank which their position entitles them to. Again, I did not wish to let this occasion slip by without protesting—not only on behalf of the electors whom I represent, but on behalf of the electors of the whole country—against the lowering of salaries, especially before a final report is brought down in the House. I entirely agree with suggestion of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. McGiverin) to continue the bonus to employees until the reclassification of salaries takes place for all departments.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN(Leader of the Opposition): It is a mere platitude to say that like every other hon. member of this House I believe in fair salaries. The question as to what fair salaries are does not enter sharply into this debate, it does not enter now into the consideration of what the duty of parliament and of the government is in the premises. But, speaking of fair salaries, let me make this intimation to the government: I think that the facility with which they have yielded to the demand of the higher officials of the country for larger salaries year after year has had very considerably to do with increasing the unrest among those who are more moderately paid. The government, in so far as salaries have been within their own supervision and decision, have almost in every case yielded to pressure; and such salaries have now reached a scale very perceptibly above where similar salaries were at a time when the cost of living was virtually where it is to-day. This accentuates a situation which causes unrest and invites disturbance.

I have always supported the principle of having the general scale of salaries investigated by an impartial tribunal and by that tribunal determined, and after its decision and recommendation to the government, placing upon the latter the responsibility of acceptance or rejection. This was the system established some seven or eight years ago; it is the system in force to-day. Under that system the government has a power of review, and if it is desired that the general scale recommended by the Civil Service Commission should be increased or diminished, any government knows that if it takes responsibility in the matter the commission will follow its suggestion. In the time when the responsibility was ours, when we once accepted the commission's recommendation we stood by that recommendation, we took the responsibility for it and presented a united front to the service and to the country. Now, I say to the administration, I do not know whether there is to be a strike or not, but if ever a government invited a strike this government has done so by its vacillation, its pusillanimity, by its determination to avoid every responsibility and not even to stand by the officials of the country. The government's course from the beginning has been an effort to incite the service against the commission; never has the Prime Minister risen that there has not fallen from his lips a reflection oblique or direct on the system and on the commission, an effort to show that the government's goodwill knows no bounds but that the commission sits over there holding fast the government's beneficent hands. If only the matter were in the power of the government, if the late administration and the late parliament had not tied its hands, how bountiful it would be; but the commission is in control, responsible government is gone, and this commission-ridden government is compelled now to submit to a restraint that it deplores! Has not this been the continuous attitude of the administration? Would anybody expect contentment in the service, or a belief that after every possible consideration had been given to their claims they had to abide by the decision or leave the service? All the service have been led now to understand that the usurper to be dethroned is the Civil Service Commission, that already it is looked at askance by the government, and that, if only they raise enough disturbance, down will go the despot and their liberty will be complete.

What is the history of this matter? We had first of all the Civil Service Commission. This commission pursuant to the duties imposed on it by this House, some years ago recommended a classification and a scale of salaries in accordance therewith. The scale they recommended was designed for what they termed normal times, and they arrived at it by taking the ascending line of cost of living and of salaries which prevailed before the war, and projecting that line through the years of the war and the years thereafter right up to the time of the fixing of the scale; that is to say, they assumed that but for the abnormal conditions of the war the cost of living would have gone up at the same rate during the period of the war as it went up before, and they fixed the salaries accordingly. But they said to the government: We are quite aware that these salaries do not take account of abnormal living costs due to the war; these should be taken account of temporarily, because they are likely to be in themselves temporary; that responsibility of fixing a bonus was ours, and we fixed it as we felt right to meet the situation then prevailing. These are the circumstances that continued up to the period of this administration. There was some cutting of the bonus a year ago. At my hands this received no criticism. This year the government, anxious to make a display of economy, announced early in the session, or before, a very considerable bonus cut applicable throughout the service. Such announcement was equivalent to stating that in the view of the government under the cost of living conditions of to-day the entire bonus with the salary fixed by the commission amounted to too high a total. When this decision was announced there was a protest on the part of the Civil Service. The government, afraid to stand to its guns, saw the commission sitting over there, and said: We will put it on them, if we can. And the administration made a reference to the commission and asked for a revision of the whole salary list again. This was the first attempt to avoid taking any responsibility, or rather to avoid continuing the responsibility which it had taken, because when it made the reduction it declared to the service that it believed what they were receiving was too high. When the protest became loud enough the reference followed. I have gone through sufficient of the return just brought down—I have not had time to go through the whole of it—to make clear to me that the words of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) were abundantly justified when he said in effect that if ever a commission or a body of men conscientiously went about its duties, this commission did. He states they received a representation from the post office employees once, and again a second time. This is true. But according to this return they received a representation a third time, and still a fourth time, before the final submission of their recommendation took place. And as far as the return shows, nothing in the way of information or opportunity was denied, save a demand that the actual figures of the commission's recommendation, which already had been before the government but not approved, should be made known. The justice of this refusal, of course, every hon. member sees. The duty of the commission was not to make public its recommendation until the government had approved it; the government would have justly found fault had the commission done so in the meantime.

Now I come to inquire as to just what is the result of the investigation and report. I am astonished that the government has not disclosed to the House the real situation—the real schedule as approved by the administration, indeed, I am astonished that it has not gone further, that it has not made known to the country the outstanding facts so that all could judge the merits of the situation, because on the general judgment of the country the ultimate solution depends. On the contrary, the government has risen, chiefly through the Prime Minister, to profess itself impotent, sorry that it is so, of course, and, to the applause of those behind it who crave for patronage, to declare, "The commission is there, and until it is got rid of or shorn of its powers the government can do nothing." Would not the government have been better employed if it had first ascertained to the best of its knowledge whether the commission had fully done its duty, taken all things into account, and then, having so decided and approved the commission's finding, had stood up in this House and said: "The commission is right and we are behind the commission, and we intend to stand behind it through all eventualities?" I think this would have been worthy the dignity of the country, and would probably have led to much better results than confront the administration now.

I am going to give the facts so far as I have got them from this return. The cost to the country in 1924-5, under the scale obtaining the year before with the bonus of the year before, would be $13,134,000. Consequently had the government not acted and made by order in council a reduction in the bonus, the cost to Canada this year would have been—estimated, of course, but doubtless very accurately—$13,134,000. This is the amount the government considered too large and determined to reduce. They made a reduction on their own responsiblity, the total reduction being such amount as brought it down to $12,664,000; the difference, hon. gentlemen can calculate. Now, this is the reduction the government made. A protest then arose and the Civil Service Commission's work came in. The commission made a report, which was referred back but which subsequently was adhered to and constitutes the report approved to-day. On the commission's report the cost this year would be $12,956,000.

Mr. LANCTOT: Would that include the amount required for the civil service in Ottawa?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, for the postal employees affected by the order.

Mr. IRVINE: Does the right hon. gentleman suggest that the government, by actually fixing the reduction, practically tied the hands of the commission in making their revision?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; when I want to suggest anything I will do so. I have not said anything about that. The commission was perfectly free in the matter.

Mr. GRAHAM: The reduction to which my right hon. friend referred amounted to $470,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then $470,000, was the reduction the government effected. The commission then reduced from what it would have been if the government had never touched the bonus, that is $13,134,000, to $12,956,000, or approximately 1½ per cent—a total reduction of $178,000. The government's reduction was $470,000, according to the figure just passed across to me. So under the commission's report, which I presume stands now, the cost for this year is $12,956,000, as against $13,134,000 had the government not interfered, and $12,664,000 had the government's reduction stood unmolested.

Mr. CRERAR: Has my hon. friend the total amount in 1920 when the full bonus was in effect?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. I rather think it is in the return, but I did not note it for the purposes of discussion. Now, I have gone far enough to show just what the effect of the finding is, and also just what the position of the government is. Let me add that when the commission made its recommendation first, the protest still continued. The government made a reference back and asked the commission to reopen the subject, stating the grounds to be as follows:

The Acting Postmaster General and the chief officials of his department feel that further occasion should be afforded them to make representations regarding certain anomalies apparent to them in the schedules submitted.

The representatives of the employees have also requested that a wider opportunity be given them to present their claims and to discuss proposals than was found possible to be allowed them when they were heard by the commission in the matter.

That is to say, the government referred these schedules back because of anomalies claimed to exist by officials of the Post Office Department, and secondly, because the employees desired further opportunity to be heard. It will be noted that the government made no statement or comment whatever as to whether the general scale and total were too high or too low. Having the reference back, the commission again heard the employees, once or twice, I am not sure which. They heard the post office officials, and the post office officials made recommendations as to their own employees which, if they had been accepted by the commission, would have raised the total to $13,487,020. That is to say, the Civil Service Commission was faced with this situation: A salary scale of $13,134,000 reduced by the government to $12,664,000; and at the same time the government's own officials of the Post Office Department coming to the commission and demanding a scale which would have totalled $13,487,020. In other words the commission was faced with a demand from the department for an increase of three hundred thousand odd dollars over the same figure which the entire government had reduced by $470,000. Hon. gentlemen will understand what part the government was playing in relation to the commission—just the measure and quality of co-operation which was being afforded.

5 p.m.

It is very natural for the officials of a department to seek a considerable scale for their own employees. I do not think there is a department of this government the officials of which will not argue—and probably argue conscientiously; certainly argue vociferously—that their employees are all paid too low compared with the employees of any other department. Naturally the post office officials so contend, and they put before the commission a scale which would have put the total at over $354,000 above the total from which the government had reduced it in order to make a display of economy to the people of Canada.

The employees, on the other hand, made their representations, as they had a perfect right to do.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Is my right hon. friend through with the reference to the post office officials? Because there is one important point there as to savings that might be effected in connection with arrangements regarding working hours. I think a reference to that will be noted in the memorandum of the commission as well as in that of the Audit Board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That must come in the latter part of the correspondence. I did get as far as a reference to certain working conditions.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I merely mention it in fairness to the officials.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I venture to say that taking into consideration all the changes in working hours the post office officials had in mind, the amount involved would still aggregate a figure substantially above the total which existed before the government's reduction. The employees presented claims which in the estimation of the commission would have involved a payment this year of $15,055,000. Such was the plight of the commission. They placed before the government the major considerations which they felt should guide them in the discharge of their duty—recited them one by one; and I venture to ask hon. members to read the report of the commission and to read the recital of those factors which governed the commission in their decision. If hon. members do, they will say that regard was paid to those very things to which regard ought to be paid in coming to a conclusion in a matter of this kind.

It is surely the duty of hon. members of this House to be fair to the Civil Service Commission. If there is a body of men that has a difficult, well nigh impossible, task in this country it is that commission. They have to stand between the taxpayers of Canada and those who have to gain by importunities at their door; and they apparently also have to stand between the desire of the taxpayer for economy and the desire of the government for evasion and popularity as the prize of evasion. This seems to be the position that the commission is in. Now, on the last report being forwarded a confirmation of the first, with all the reasons, it was almost an intimation as to what the cost to Canada would be if the higher scale were followed —either the higher scale of the post office officials' recommendations or of the postal employees—what the whole cost to Canada would be applied over the entire service, and this information is in the hands of the government now. In the presence of these facts the government approves and that scale becomes the law of the land.

When a strike is threatened what is the conduct of the administration? Yesterday when the matter was called to the attention of the Prime Minister he rose and delivered himself of these words—I invite the attention of the House and the country to them as illustrating the position this government assumes in the face of what now confronts this Dominion:

> Parliament also gave to the commission like powers—

Having referred before to its powers as to appointments.

> —with respect to revision of salaries of civil servants, so that the power of revision of salaries of civil servants is taken away entirely from the government. This illustrates wherein to some extent we are being governed by commission and not in acordance with a system of a responsible government in the strict meaning of the term.

If this is not an attack upon the commission, on the whole system, I should like hon. members to define to me what is. Here is a declaration to the Dominion that the Civil Service law at the present time constitutes government by commission and is a negation of responsible government. Could a plainer incitement be thrown out to all those who feel they are not getting what they want at the hands of the commission an incitement to go on with the attack and the onslaught because the very institution they are attacking has not the support of the government itself? Then he goes on:

> The government, appreciating the position, took care at the outset to associate with the conmission in the matter of revision of salaries of civil servants, in particular the salaries of postal employees, which were the first to be referred to the deputy ministers and the Board of Audit. On each of two occasions that a report was made by the commission, having learned that the report was not acceptable to the postal employees, the government took such steps as were possible to secure a further consideration by the Civil Service Commission of their report. The government has gone in that direction just as far as it is possible to go in the matter, and as my hon. friend has said, if there is to be any further change in salaries, they will have to be made by parliament itself. The government is placed in the position, either of asserting that it is not prepared to accept the legislation which is on the statutes and of being obliged in consequence to ask parliament to enable it to revise or amend that legislation, or to stand by the legislation as it appears. We have not felt, at the present, at least, that we would be justified in asking parliament to amend or repeal the statute under which the Civil Service Commissioners have acted, nor to take action in any way other than in accordance with the recommendations of the commission.

What is the whole tenor and purport of that statement yesterday? Does it embody the slightest intimation that the government stands by the commission in the prosecution of its work? The slightest intimation that the government is prepared, in the event of a violation of the responsibilities of parliament and of this House, to stand by the recognized authorities of the country? Why, it is an intimation in every line that the government is not satisfied with the situation, it is an intimation to all those who threatened trouble that there is ground for their complaint, and the reason the ground exists is because parliament has tied the hands of this benevolent government and if it had not done so all these grievances would have been redressed. I want to know from the Minister of the Interior, in whose speech to-day I found a little more inspiration than in that of any other member of the government on this subject, whether he thinks that quotation reflects a manly stand, whether he thinks it reflects a stand worthy of the dignity of this House?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If I may be permitted to interject a word: I think my right hon. friend is taking a wrong construction entirely of the statement of the Prime Minister by quoting one paragraph and alluding to it as an indication of his stand. There may be a difference of opinion between the Prime Minister and my right hon. friend with respect to the commission, but surely the right hon. gentleman will not argue that every precaution was not taken in connection with this adjustment by the government and by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not a case of precautions at all, it is a case of an intimation to the country and the House.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If my right hon. friend will permit me, will he dwell on the concluding paragraph he has just read?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will read it again. The two concluding sentences are these:

> The government is placed in the position, either of asserting that it is not prepared to accept the legislation which is on the statutes and of being obliged in consequence to ask parliament to enable it to revise or amend that legislation, or to stand by the legislation as it appears. We have not felt, at the present at least, that we would be justified in asking parliament to amend or appeal the statute under which the Civil Service Commissioners have acted, nor to take action in any way other than in accordance with the recommendations of the commission.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Exactly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that is exactly what he said after explaining the helplessness of the administration. And why would he explain the helplessness of the administration unless he felt there was a grievance to be redressed? What object was there in proclaiming the helplessness of the administration if there was no grievance to be redressed?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): All I beg my right hon. friend to do is to consider the conclusion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, after explaining this helplessness he says: Under all the circumstances we feel there is nothing now for us to do but to accept the recommendations of the commission. Is that just to the commission?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My right hon. friend is putting on the Prime Minister's statement a wrong construction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No other construction is possible.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My right hon. friend is putting a wrong conclusion on the statement. There is no word of the Prime Minister that would indicate that he had any further suggestion to make. He recites the facts and forms his conclusion. If my right hon. friend will confine himself to that I will be content.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let me quote again:

> This illustrates wherein to some extent we are being governed by commission and not in accordance with a system of a responsible government in the strict meaning of the term.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Now my right hon. friend has gone back again to the beginning.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, I take it all. I have read it all and most of it twice. Is not this that I have read an intimation that there is something to be redressed? Then he goes on and says: Seeing that all we can do to redress it is to come to parliament we have decided we will not do it, for the present we will accept the recommendations of the commission. That is a precise and exact interpretation. In fact we do not need any interpretation; read the language itself and give the interpretation in the very language uttered. The duty of the Prime Minister was this: Having made up his mind, as he must have, that the schedule submitted was right, and having approved of it, it was his duty to stand up in this House and defend it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Is not that exactly the conclusion of the Prime Minister's statement yesterday?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: If this is defence then may Providence help the cause that gets a defence of that kind. And, now the subject is up again to-day, what is the attitude of the government? Are we told to-day that the government believes that what it has done is right, that the government believes the schedule is fair, that the government believes that between the taxpayer and those importuning the commission, the schedule adopted by the commission is just? No, we are not told so at all. Seeking for some way to postpone, and put off, and evade, they hit upon this, this is their last hiding place. We do not know just what the effect is going to be until we get the revision for the whole service; we will have to wait until that time; parliament will not be sitting then, but everybody will have to wait till that time—in the meantime giving intimation to those who threaten a strike in the public service that when that time comes they are going to be prepared to review the whole story again. This is the fine fortitude displayed by the government this afternoon. I do make this appeal. There is fairness coming to everybody. There is fairness to the Civil Service Commission acting in the discharge of an onerous and distasteful duty. This government from the beginning has been utterly lacking in according that fairness to the commission, and this government now in the face of an emergency, where probably for the first time in its life it will ultimately have to take some definite stand, is only being visited with the penalty which its own weakness and vacillation have brought about.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): Of course we are accustomed to the scolding of my right hon. friend. No matter what we do or where we go, or when we come back, the government is wrong; it is always wrong. My right hon. friend appeals for fairness for everybody. He has not the first scintilla of fairness in the makeup of his constitution when he refers to the government. It would be well now for him to start and be fair to the government. I know it will be a hard task, and cause a good many spasms, but let him try it once. He puts us in the position "you'll be damned if you do, you'll be damned if you don't."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh no, I told you what to do.

Mr. GRAHAM: Of course. My right hon. friend's contribution, or even his suggestion, as to the best method to proceed in the settlement of this question cannot be found in his speech. From beginning to end he talked about something else, so as to get a whack at the government. The government is wrong if it upholds the commission—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never said that.

Mr. GRAHAM:—and the government is to be abused should it not uphold the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister tell me one sentence I have uttered, either in this debate or any other, where I have said the government was wrong in upholding the commission?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is not what a man says, but how he says it, and the connection he makes with other things he says. He has argued for half an hour against the government because it accepted the finding of the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He did nothing of the sort. My hon. friend cannot quote one sentence of mine to support that statement.

Mr. GRAHAM: Then what is all the scolding about?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just for what I described in the plainest possible terms.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am talking about what it did. The government accepted the finding of the commission. That is all it had power to do, unless it rejected the finding. My right hon. friend might leave the impression with the country that the government had power under the statute to change the finding of the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never said that.

Mr. GRAHAM: Certainly not. But that is the inference many hon. members would draw from his remarks.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would now ask any hon. member in this House to say that he drew that inference from my remarks.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps they will not accept the invitation, because he will then have an answer in some other direction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister did not draw the inference himself.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, because I knew better.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I knew better, too.

Mr. GRAHAM: I made a note of my hon. friend hedging and dancing round that point when he referred to the duty of the government, and what a pusillanimous government it was and that when the report came back it could not do one thing or the other. The Department of Justice has stated that all the government can do under the act is either to reject or approve. Would my hon. friend say we were right if we had rejected the report? Of course he would have said we were wrong no matter what we did, but would the country have said we were right had we rejected the report? What would have happened if we had rejected it? There would have been chaos, or another report would have been brought in which would have been exactly the same, and then another rejection. That was not the government's idea. The government saw that there was a vast difference of opinion between the postal employees and the Civil Service Commission on the one hand and, the postal department and the Audit Board on the other. I agree with the right hon. gentleman that when the Civil Service Commission made its report it gave good and substantial reasons for their finding. The matter was then referred to the Audit Board, who, except in some of the higher classes, I think, practically agreed with the finding of the Civil Service Commission. In order—and I appeal to hon. members on both sides of the House on this point—if possible to get unanimity of opinion expressed in their report, the Audit Board and the Civil Service Commission were brought together to discuss before the government—not alone but to discuss in the presence of the government in the council chamber—their differences and their reasons. Now would it not have been a good thing if the Audit Board and the Civil Service Commission could have been brought together and made a report to which they both agreed? Certainly it would. That is what the government did. After the Civil Service Commission had heard all the Audit Board had to say in reference to its stand, its members took all these things into consideration; and were asked by the government, in view of all these things and the new light that might have been brought to them, if they desired to make any change in their report. They took a few days to consider, and made no change in the report. I want to say distinctly and not offensively that the government is standing by the Civil Service Commission because it is the body authorized by statute to make this report and to give a decision. There has not been any abuse of the Civil Service Commission, because the government did its best, on behalf of the peace and good government of Canada, on behalf of the employees of the government and of the commission itself, to ascertain if it were not possible to have unanimity in the finding or in the conclusions of the Audit Board and of the Civil Service Commission. That unanimity was not arrived at, and under the statute the government has approved of the action of the Civil Service Commission.

Referring to the strike, I am sure I will not say anything to incite a strike. I am inclined to think that some things have been said here to-day that will not mollify the feelings of the gentlemen who are inclined to striks, but will furnish encouragement for them to do so. I say now to the postal employees of the Dominion of Canada that the men who advise them not to strike are their friends far and away beyond those who advise them to strike. The parliament of Canada is always in a position to deal with situations if it is allowed to do so, but employees can put themselves in a place where parliament can only do one thing, and that is not what the postal workers desire. My right hon. friend, of course, abused the government. I am not surprised at that. That is a habit. As Harry Lauder would say, "That is nae a habit, it's a gift".

One of the reasons my hon. friend ascribed for this unrest in the Civil Service was the fact that some of the officials in the higher grades had their salaries increased. I want to say right here, with some experience, that the majority of the men and women in the Civil Service who get the higher salaries can obtain better salaries in other walks of life. Men and women who are taking the full responsibility for the expenditure of millions of money, handling work of great importance in this country, can almost at any time they desire have their salaries increased by going to a private concern. That happens time after time, and the reason why salaries were raised —and it was a selfish reason in many cases— was in order to retain the services of men who would otherwise leave the service and secure higher salaries. I can instance man after man in the higher salaried positions of the Civil Service at Ottawa who can, in ten days, secure a better position than he has now at Ottawa. The worry and the responsibility of one of these men in the higher positions of the Civil Service of Canada, to say nothing of the work is sufficient to drive the best men out of the service, and I am surprised sometimes that we are able to keep them. I believe it is only on account of their devotion to public duty that we are able to retain some of the men in the higher positions of the service of this country.

[Mr. Graham.]

One of the difficulties in the Civil Service— my right hon. friend referred to it from another angle—is the fact that everybody in the Civil Service knows what every other person in the service is receiving. Publicity in that respect, many members of parliament will say, is good. But knowing what it is to be at the head of a department, let me say that the jealousies arising in the Civil Service create a great unrest, and if one of the clerks comes with a complaint, it is not that he or she is not well paid, but that another employee beside him or her is not doing any more work, but is getting better pay. If we could devise some means by which no person in a department would know what salaries the other employees are receiving, that would remove a great deal of the jealousies in the Civil Service.

I do not know what else the government can do. The government is behind the Civil Service Commission in its report. The threatened strike is undoubtedly a serious matter; but I say now—and I want to say this without any harshness—if, under all the conditions at present existing, the postal employees are not prepared to await the final decision of the Civil Service Commission for all the service, but inisist on putting the business of this country into a great turmoil, then the parliament of Canada is not responsible for that, but they will have to take the responsibility. I appeal to them, to their friends to advise them not to take that responsibility, but to accept what has been done in the legal, constituted way through the Civil Service Commission, and perform their duties under the new schedule, because there is not so much difference between it and their demands and the old schedule. I would suggest that they wait until the decision of the Civil Service Commission has been arrived at for all the service, and parliament may then decide in its wisdom, not to over-ride the Civil Service Commission, but to devise some method by which an adjustment can be made that may be nearer the desires of the postal employees.

What I want to make clear is that the government has done its duty to the employees of the postal department; it has done its duty to the parliament of Canada, and it is prepared to accept all the responsibility for what has been done. We do hope and trust that the postal employees will not be misled into taking an action which will make it more difficult for parliament to deal with the matter in a manner that it might otherwise desire to do.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): ,Mr. Speaker; I am very glad that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) has brought before parliament this matter of the dissatisfaction of the postal employees with this proposed salary revision. I had intended in response to urgent messages which were sent to me from the postal employees of the city of Calgary, to bring this matter up to-morrow in a similar way, in which case I would have required some data with respect to the cost of living and salaries, which I had not. I am glad, however, that the matter has been brought up and that so many hon. members have expressed their opinions. I am delighted to know that no hon. member so far has even hinted that the dissatisfaction of the postal employees is in any way unfounded, although at the same time a number of hon. gentlemen have kept as far away from the real problem as, I think, they could possibly get. Theoretically, the Canadian parliament is supposed to be supreme in all matters, and surely a question that involves the possibility of a strike of public servants is well within the jurisdiction of a parliament that claims to be supreme. At the same time it appears to me that ministers of the Crown have become involved in some way by placing the Civil Service Act and the Civil Service Commission between this parliament and the proposed strikers outside and saying virtually this: Now, if you are going to strike. just look at this; here is the Civil Service Act. That is all we can say to these men. We are virtually declaiming against our own boasted theoretic power. I do not propose even to suggest that the Civil Service Act or the Civil Service Commission shall come between me and my duty or parliament and its duty with respect to the matter which has been brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for North Toronto.

The question really is not one of the Civil Service Commission, although much of the debate between members of the government and of the opposition has circled around the Civil Service Commission. The real question is: Are the proposed salaries of the postal workers sufficiently high to keep them from striking? The employees have not said: We are going to strike because you have a Civil Service Commission. They have said: We are going to strike because the proposed salary revision is too low. We have not heard very much comment on the part of the government with respect to that question, and that is the question. I could not hear the hon. member for North Toronto when he was speaking. I presume, however, that he reviewed briefly the history of the negotiations of the employees in regard to salary revision.

Hon. members know that a cost of living bonus was added to the salaries of civil servants involved in order to meet the increase in the cost of living caused by the war. That has gone on until the present year when the government has proposed to remove it. Last year they removed part of it. This year they proposed to remove it all. They, however, suggested that the bonus would not be removed; that it would be added to the salary. It is very well understood, I think, that the postal employees looked upon the salary plus the bonus as being too low, and they had looked forward to the proposed revision in the hope that their salaries would be increased. But when the proposal came from the Civil Service Commission, it was discovered that there was a substantial reduction from what they received last year. It is not more than six weeks, I imagine, since the postal employees threatened to strike last time and as a result of that threat there were renewed negotiations. The schedule was sent back to the Civil Service Commission for revision; the final revision has come up, and again the postal employees have made clear their dissatisfaction with this proposal and threatened a strike in consequence.

I was rather amused to hear the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) a moment ago suggesting that the postal employees should wait until the complete report of the commission comes down; that is to say, they should wait until they know what some other class of civil servants are to get before they go on strike. So far as I can see, that is very poor advice. What difference would it make to the postal employees if the report should give twice as much in the way of salaries to some other class, or half as much, or put them on a similar basis? What difference in the world would that make? Would it put any more money into the pockets of the present employees of the postal department? I think not; yet it would have to convey a promise to do something of the kind before it could be considered good advice to the men who have threatened to strike, or induce them to stay their hand.

The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil), who I understand is acting as Postmaster General, suggests that this is not the logical way of meeting the situation; I presume he means that to bring the matter of the revision of salaries of the postal employees to the attention of parliament, as is being done now, is not the proper mode of procedure. He goes on to indicate to us how the Civil Service Commission arrived at its conclusions, and he points out to us that this body is the logical one to deal with salary revisions, that it is impartial, that its actions were approved of by the Audit Board, and so forth. This of course is all very interesting and it is perfectly all right. But the point is that it has not been approved of by the people whom it most concerns, the people who will receive the salaries which have been fixed by the commission. The minister did not tell us whether the employees concerned had been consulted when the revision was made. What I want to know is upon what basis this competent body arrived at the present scale of salaries for the postal employees.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I want to correct the statement of the hon. member that the postal employees were not consulted. The postal employees filed a schedule and spent some time on two occasions with the commission presenting their claims.

Mr. IRVINE: I understand that the postal workers did present their claims; but to present claims and to be consulted in regard to the revision of salaries are, from my point of view, two entirely different things. Indeed, the postal employees are presenting their claims in the present instance, but that does not constitute any sort of consultation. Now, the situation is approaching an industrial warfare, and I do not see that there is much difference between the presentation of the claims of the postal employees to the Civil Service Commission, to which the minister has just referred, and the present manner of presenting those claims, except that at the present time there is a threatened strike. The matter is a little more decisive in its present character than was the mere presentation which the minister has interpreted as a consultation.

I am speaking from memory, but I think that the average estimate made by several bodies in Canada of the minimum amount required for the maintenance of a family of five is approximately $2,000; that is about the average estimate for such a family. We find, under the salary revision of the Civil Service Commission as it applies to the postal employees, that many of these workers, in fact the large majority of them, will have to work for half or less than half what is estimated as being necessary to maintain a proper standard of living for the average Canadian family. So that it would be interesting to known upon what basis the Civil Service Commission arrived at the proposed salary list.

But I am more interested at the moment in what is going to be the attitude of parliament towards the threatened strike. And this question was dealt with by both ministers of the Crown who have commented upon the subject before the House. The Acting Postmaster General wants to know whether we are merely to succumb as a parliament to the threat of the employees without an inquiry to ascertain whether there is any real difficulty under which these men are suffering. And he suggests that parliament should of all things be firm; in other words, parliament must actually resort finally to the club. The minister, I believe, declared that we must be fair and then be firm.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I want to object to the imputation of the hon. member; I never suggested that parliament would resort to the club; I was careful not to make any such suggestion.

Mr. IRVINE: I assure the House that I had no intention of misquoting the words of the minister; I believe his exact words were that we should be fair and then firm. I know that there is probably no hon. member who is fairer than the Acting Postmaster General, and I do not think that there is anyone who is kinder than he is. I do not suggest for a moment that the minister himself wants to resort to the club; but I do say that he has left no other course open to parliament. Merely to express the opinion that parliament wants to be fair first and then to be firm is all very well. But when parliament has nothing fair to offer, when parliament completely abandons the course of fairness and simply has nothing left but the club, then the club is what parliament will use.

There are two methods which parliament might adopt in this matter: One is the use of intelligence and the other the use of the club. If intelligence is to be applied it means that we must meet the situation precisely as it exists at the moment; it does not mean that the leaders of the two great historic parties shall get into a scrap as to whether the commission should or should not be. The question is, are the wages that are being paid to the civil servants in question too low? If they are too low, then what are we going to do to increase them and thus to prevent the threatened strike? That is the question to which we must apply intelligence; and if we do not deal intelligently with the situation there is only one thing left for parliament and that will be the club, in the event of the employees in question carrying out their threat.

I do not believe in strikes personally; I do not think they settle any question. But what I believe, or what any hon. member believes in regard to strikes makes no difference; strikes will occur if proper steps are not taken to ward them off. Under the existing situation they are inevitable. So that the question still confronts us, shall we apply the method of intelligence or shall we use the club? Upon the answer to that question will depend whether or not a strike occurs in the present instance. I want to point out that no hon. member has expressed the opinion, at least so far as I have been able to gather, that the salaries now paid postal employees are at all too high; no suggestion of that kind has been made. I think therefore I am justified in concluding that in the opinion of those who have spoken these salaries are if anything too low.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Has my hon. friend read the evidence submitted by the commission with respect to the investigation that was held to fix the salaries of postal employees?

Mr. IRVINE: I have not read it. However, I have read the schedule embodied in the last order in council dealing with this matter, I have seen the estimated cost of living figures, and I have received the protests of the organized workers concerned; and for the moment these are the factors which lead me to my conclusion.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend is assuming that the protests of the postal employees are correct, and that anything short of their demands is not justified. I do not wish to enter into a controversy with him, but I would point out that the instructions in the order in council were for the commission to make careful inquiry as to living costs and the prevailing rates of wages in similar employment. The commission have done so, and upon that basis they have arrived at certain conclusions. In fairness, I think my hon. friend should not assume that one side of the question is all right and the other all wrong. If the commission have made a mistake in their conclusions, something might be said in objection, but they say they have carried out their instructions.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister has not brought any more light to bear upon the matter by objecting to the position I am taking. I take the position that the salaries fixed by the commission are not sufficiently high to ensure to those who receive them a proper standard of living for Canadians. If the minister believes the salaries are high enough, then why not say so and assert that the whole claim of the employees is monstrous?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend is dealing with one particular phase of the matter; there are many phases. I might mention the hours of employment, the rates of remuneration, and the runs of mail clerks; these make a vast difference, and the schedule does not expose them, but they undoubtedly would bear some discussion.

Mr. IRVINE: But the schedule does expose the fact that one class of postal employees at least will receive less according to this schedule than they received last year, and there is no evidence to show that there has been a corresponding reduction in the cost of living. Even the cost of living estimate put out by the Labour department is very much above the scale of salaries which is being paid to the large majority of postal employees. So I think I have good grounds for assuming that the salary proposals are altogether inadequate and that the objections to them are well taken. While that is so, and while the minister concerned and his colleagues who have spoken this afternoon have not taken objection at all to this claim, they are going to let things drift.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If my hon. friend will take into consideration one very prominent class of employees in Canada, namely, retail clerks, and compare their salaries—and I am not arguing for these salaries, but I think in fairness to the commission we should be frank about these things—he will find that even the $1,020 that is paid to the minimum classes of postal employees, and they are not very numerous, compares favourably with the salaries of retail clerks. I do not for a moment say that retail clerks are getting all they should get, indeed in fairness to them I think we should say that they are one class of workers in this country that is not receiving the remuneration which is due to its members, but I simply mention them in passing. If my hon. friend will compare the minimum with the salaries received by retail clerks he will find that even the postal helpers, who are the minimum class, though not very numerous, draw about the same salary. Then you have a higher class in the letter carriers who begin with a minimum of $1,080.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker. I would suggest to the minister that he advise the Civil Service Commission how much Chinamen are paid in this country.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am dealing with white people.

Mr. IRVINE: I thought the hon. minister was trying to find some excuse for the commission having arrived at this schedule by citing the remuneration of one of the lowest paid classes of workers in this country. As a matter of fact, the government is, I suppose, the largest employer of labour in Canada. It has accepted the principle of the fair wage basis, and we are expecting it to carry that principle into practice—so are the working people throughout the Dominion. How can we expect other employers to carry out their obligations with regard to the fair wage system if the government does not set them an example? I expect the government to pay more than the starvation wages paid to retail clerks. However, I do not think that has anything to do with the argument. The postal employees cannot live on the excuse which the Prime Minister has made for this government taking no further action. He has virtually said that not all the report is down and the postal workers should wait until they see what other branches of the service are going to get. But all the report is down so far as the postal employees themselves are concerned, and they are not interested in what other civil servants may get. The point is that the statement made by the Prime Minister will not be sufficient to prevent the threatened strike.

Let me suggest two or three things that might possibly be done for the moment. I think the government has accepted the principle of Whitley councils, that is, joint councils in cases of disputes of this character. I would suggest that they put the principle into practice. If they will not do so, then I would suggest that they take this matter out of the hands of the Civil Service Commission; or else, as the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has said, stand by the commission and make it clear to parliament, to Canada and to the workers concerned that the schedule in the opinion of the government is a fair one and will not be disturbed. Let them take some definite position like that. But meanwhile I would suggest that to-night the government give assurances to the postal employees that until the final revision has been made those employees will receive no less salary than they did last year. Of course, I am not authorized to say that this would be acceptable to the postal employees, I do not know that it would be fully satisfactory to them, but I think it is the minimum that would reassure them in this respect. I urge upon the government that they take this point into consideration without delay.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I do not think my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) made his usual high percentage of bull's-eyes in this afternoon's discussion.

Mr. GRAHAM: There was nothing to shoot at.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He made a lot of splendid jokes. The only man he could have shot at was his right hon. leader. My hon. friend may think that the Prime Minister is "nothing to shoot at;"—well, probably he is right. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, how many hon. members had any idea from anything that was said by the right hon. Prime Minister—who, I may notice, after making a very brief statement in connection with this very important matter, abruptly left the House—

Mr. GRAHAM: He is out of the city.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then of course he cannot be here. But I wonder if any hon. gentleman ever got the slightest inkling of the real facts of this case from anything that the Prime Minister said. I wonder, for example if there is a single hon. gentleman on these benches who knew that before this question had even been sent to the Civil Service Commission the government had reduced these wages by $470,000? The House has been given to understand from the very beginning that so far as the right hon. gentleman and his government were concerned they had had nothing to do with this matter; it had been referred to the Civil Service Commission and nothing he could do could change the result; he was not responsible. Did anybody understand anything else? I am going to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) whether he can point to anything stated in the House in answer to any of the questions put that would lead to any other conclusion? He cannot do it. Why, if there is one thing the government have to be thankful for it is that the Civil Service Commission is there and that they can use it as a smoke screen, as a buffer—they are always doing it. That is the kind of thing they thrive on. The reason it went to the Civil Service Commission was that it was sent there by the government. Why was it sent there by the government? Because the government had made their cut of $470,000 in those wages.

Mr. GRAHAM: Bonus.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not care what it is called—bonus or wages. Of course the cut was in the bonus. Apart from a bonus the report of the commission raises the wages, all of them; therefore it is idle to play upon words or to differentiate between bonus or wages. The real truth is that the only reason why there was this reference to the Civil Service Commission was that the government had cut the salaries of postal employees by $470,000, and, running true to form, would not take the responsibility for it. There was a chance to squirm, and the screw was working just as well as it ever worked. No responsibility on the part of the government, but a reference to the Civil Service Commission. Now, after getting to the Civil Service Commission, what further did the government do? Taking every one of the interpellations that were made here—

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

On the order:

The House in committee on Bill No. 47, to incorporate the United Church of Canada.—Mr. Forke.

Mr. FORKE: Stand.

LIFE UNDERWRITERS' ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

The House in committee on Bill No. 60, to incorporate the Life Underwriters' Association of Canada.—Mr. McKay.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is the purpose of this bill?

Mr. McGIVERIN: The bill, which seeks to incorporate the Underwriters' Association of Canada, came before the Private Bills committee at their last meeting. The incorporators, as explained by the promoters of the bill, are prominent insurance men all over Canada who are also connected with various provincial associations. The only change made was in sub-section 2, sub-section "E" where it was proposed to authorize the exclusive use of the title "Chartered Life Underwriters of Canada". The committee and the promoters agreed to the elimination of the word "exclusive". That was the only question that was raised, the other provisions being considered satisfactory.

Mr. MARTELL: Then we are to consider the committee were in favor of the bill?

Mr. McGIVERIN: The bill received the support of the committee.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose the real object of the bill is to incorporate an association or company in which the insurance companies will have membership.

The CHAIRMAN: That is the idea.

Mr. CHURCH: In view of the large powers that are being given to the fire underwriters to fix rates and to exercise certain functions regarding property and civil rights in the provinces parliament should be sure that it is acting legally and is not going outside the limits of the Canadian Insurance Act. I should like to learn from the chairman of the committee if the inspector of insurance has approved of the principle of this bill?

Mr. McGIVERIN: The inspector of insurance was present at the meeting and approved of the provisions of the bill. The only question raised was as to the exclusive right to use the name.

Mr. CHURCH: I see that the underwriters have the power to issue negotiable notes and papers and to prescribe rates. Will the government have any control over them with respect to these matters?

Mr. McGIVERIN: I am not aware that any sections of the bill contravene the provisions of the general Insurance Act.

Mr. MARTELL: If the chairman of the committee has approved the principle of the bill I think we should accept the measure. The question as to whether or not the provisions of the bill encroach upon provincial rights is a matter for the law courts, not for this parliament. The chairman of the committee having recommended this bill to the favourable consideration of the House, we should accept the recommendation, because the hon. member is very careful in all these matters.

Section agreed to.

SALARIES OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Church to adjourn for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: At six o'clock I was referring to the manner in which this government had used the Civil Service Commission in connection with the question under consideration. I had recollected nothing which gave the House the truth as to how the Civil Service Commission was seized of this dispute, and I invited my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) to furnish me with the references, if there were any. I do not propose to go through them all. My right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) dealt with the last reference by the right hon. Prime Minister; I will give another just for the purpose of making absolutely clear what has happened in this case—that this House, yes, and the members of the Civil Service have been allowed to go on in the belief that the reference to the Civil Service Commission was for the purpose of increasing salaries, while as a matter of fact the reference was made necessary by the reduction of the bonus effected by the government. I turn to Hansard at page 3158 dealing with this question, and there I find the following statement by the Prime Minister on June 13 last:

> The government, in order to ensure the fairest possible consideration for civil servants in that connection, required that the Civil Service Commission should prepare its report in conjunction with the deputy ministers, and also in conjunction with the Audit Board.
> The government has taken particular care to see that the commission should carry out its wishes in that regard, and has on two or three different occasions referred back the report submitted by the commission to the government, before its final acceptance. I may mention that on the first or second occasion on which the Civil Service Commission submitted its report the report was signed by two of the commissioners. The postal employees requested that if possible the government obtain the signature of all three commissioners before accepting any report from them. The government insisted on that additional step, and the position of matters now is that the report has been made. The government had either to approve it or disapprove it. To disapprove it was to leave the salaries where they were; to approve it was to give effect to such increases as had been made by the Civil Service Commission.

Let us get behind the smoke screen and see what the real truth is. The salaries now paid, including the bonus, amount to $13,134,000. Then the government's proposal came along for reducing the bonus, resulting in the entire bill for salaries and bonus being cut down to $12,664,000. It was as a result of this proposed cut in the bonus that the question was referred to the Civil Service Commission, and the commission in its report fixes the whole amount at $12,956,000. Now, what is the government's quarrel with the commission? If the government be—by accident—consistent for a short period of time, its quarrel must be, not that the commission has cut too much, but that it has not cut enough off the bonus. The government's cut was $470,000; the cut made by the Civil Service Commission is $178,000.

Now, the point made by my right hon. leader absolutely stands,—that this government has in every possible way invited trouble and taken the position all along, so far as the public and this House are concerned, that the commission was the only obstacle which prevented the government being just—yes, being liberal with the postal service. That was their attitude, an attitude of finding fault with the commission instead of helping it. It is quite true that to-day the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) states boldly and definitely that the government stand behind the commission's report. Well, it is a great pity that the government did not try to do something to strengthen the hands of the commission if they were going to stand by its report; before they did everything they could to ruin its reputation and to make it easy for anything to be said against the report. I suppose it is still open to the government to make an eleventh hour repentance, but they have worked hardship in the meantime. Even the Globe to-day points out exactly what has been pointed out before, that if any real injustice is being done there is no trouble about remedying it, that it is idle to hide ourselves behind the skirts of the commission, that the real responsibility is on parliament. The Globe also points out some cases of apparent hardship. I do not know whether it would be a hardship or not on the government, but I do know that it was the direct duty of the government to go carefully into the whole matter and to see to it that justice was done.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend will not suggest that the government should interfere with the work of the Civil Service Commission after the instructions they had given it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend knows perfectly well that the government are not by the act turned into a mere rubber stamp. They have a right of approval or disapproval, and before giving their approval the government should have seen to it that full justice was done.

Mr. CAHILL: How?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: By simply withholding their assent. If that had been done the former higher basis of salary would still continue. There is no difficulty about it, not the slightest. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the point made by my right hon. leader is absolutely proven, that in their twistings and turnings to appear on the one hand,—when there is this cry of economy,—to do something for the taxpayers, and on the other hand to let the postal employees understand that the government want them to get more money, and that but for the Civil Service Commission they would get more money,—that by pursuing this tortuous course the government have been trying to play both ends all the time—something which cannot be done successfully. To-day, at the eleventh hour, we see the government, for the first time perhaps, facing a position where they must make a decision.

With respect to the threatened strike, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the postal employees will listen to wise advice and not strike. There is nothing that this House cannot do for them. This House is not in the slightest degree bound by the Civil Service Commission, and we all know it. The Globe points that out, if my hon. friends do not believe us.

Mr. MARTELL: Does my hon. friend mean to say that when the Civil Service Commission make an appointment we have any power to interfere with it unless we get the vote of the Commons and the Senate?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is not going to get me beside the mark in a discussion of that character.

Mr. MARTELL: I have every respect for my hon. friend's opinion; I always get along very well with him in committee. But my hon. friend would like to give the impression to this country that this House—I do not mean parliament, because parliament is composed of the Commons and the Senate—that this House may appoint and dismiss civil servants. Now, this House has no power to appoint and dismiss civil servants without the concurrence of the Senate, therefore under the law as it stands at present the Civil Service Commission is all-powerful and paramount.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not discussing appointments or dismissals. I am discussing salaries.

Mr. MARTELL: The same thing applies to salaries.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So far as salaries are concerned it is clearly a matter of annual vote, and that is something this House can look after.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend is a very able man; he has occupied important positions in this country. Will he say that this House, or parliament as composed of the two Houses, can increase or reduce the salaries of civil servants without the concurrence of the Upper House?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend knows how much work the Upper House does in connection with the estimates.

Mr. MARTELL: But if the estimates do not suit them they will soon throw them out.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, we have not yet seen that done. Perhaps the Senate ought to do it, but they do not do it, and I would not suggest that they should.

Mr. BUREAU: A bad doctrine.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that would be a bad doctrine; the Minister of Customs was right that time. His batting average now goes up a hundred per cent. But, Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, certainly this parliament is above the Civil Service Commission.

There is no secret as to where we stand on the question of strikes. We believe in being consistent—we have had to deal with them before. We believe in consistency; we believe in firmness, and we believe in fairness. Strikes anywhere are poor things, but so long as the private employer of labour, working for gain, has the right to employ the lock-out no fairminded man will deny the right of strike. There is a difference between the position of the man who is working for his country, working for an employer who is making nothing out of it, and that of the man in private employment. The servant of the state is really in the position when he strikes of dealing a blow, and sometimes a nasty blow, at his country. The position we took was that government employees ought not to strike. Why, no government can exist that is going to be regularly and systematically unfair to its employees; it cannot be done. There is enough of a sense of fairness in the people to make sure of that. But after all, when you ask the government employees not to strike you are only asking them to trust the people, and the position we took was that if a man struck we were no longer in a position to do anything for him. He lost his job; he had committed an offence against the country. I sincerely hope that there will be no strike, but I am quite sure that if there be no strike and if there be any injustice existing to-day, that injustice can be remedied.

9 p.m.

Mr. HUGHES: And will be.

[Mr. Martell.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And will be remedied by this House.

An hon. MEMBER: Then what is the use of talking about it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not quite get that remark, Mr. Speaker. It is a good thing we have had this discussion. It will be an extra good thing if as a result of this incident the government will for the future take a direct stand so the people will know where they are. This trouble could very largely have been avoided. Just think of the absurdity of the position: so far as the postal employees are concerned the commission has been painted to them by the government, until the last moment, as a vehicle of oppression; as being the reason for cuts in salaries; as justifying—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not think that is fair to the government. I am prepared to say that nothing of the kind ever happened. My hon. friend has had a pipe dream so far as his last statements are concerned. We can stand for a good deal, but we cannot stand for that sort of thing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if I had better read Hansard again. My hon. friend will find it there in black and white just as it has been read—how the government was putting it up and up and up to the commission in order to do justice to these people.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If I may be allowed, I would like to say that that is direct evidence of the government's desire to be fair to all parties. My hon. friend is going a very long way in stating that the government had no desire to meet the requests of the employees and I want to say that the government will continue to try to meet those requests in a legitimate way. I defy my hon. friend to find one place where the government or a member of the government has criticised the Civil Service Commission, as he is trying to show.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why, we have had it read this afternoon and read again to-night.

Mr. GRAHAM: Read into.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Read into? Not at all; there is the English language and it speaks for itself.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend has stated that the employees were so informed by the government. There have been only two or three members of the government meeting the employees, and I say that they never informed the employees anything of the kind.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the employees read the public press? I suppose they know what is going on in this House? I suppose they know—in fact I am sure they do know—the position taken by this government, the position taken by the Prime Minister only yesterday, when he talked about governments by commission and abandonment of proper representative government. What nonsense it is to say that these are not the facts. Let my hon. friend look at Hansard. My hon. friend says, where are the inconsistencies? Well, in their first spasm of economy the government took $470,000 off the wage list, and then when the Civil Service Commission takes $178,000 off they are shocked, or pretend to be, and send the report back, and back again—yes, back again. I wonder if my hon. friend thinks that is consistency. Of course this government, when there is any row, like any weak institution, wants to do something—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It would not be logical to be fair, would it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It knew where it was when it started out to make a cut of $470,000. It knew where it was then—that was before there was any row.

Mr. GRAHAM: Did my hon. friend or his friends not make a reduction in the bonus in 1920-21?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, and stood by it—did not hide ourselves behind any Civil Service Commission. We believe in standing by what we say.

Mr. MARTELL: The Civil Service Commission were your friends.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, but we did not use them to hide behind. We did not use them as a smoke screen or anything else of that kind. We took our responsibilities.

Mr. GRAHAM: We did not use them to cut the bonus.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, no, my hon. friends did not use them to cut the bonus. How did they use them? They made the cut of $470,000, and then sent it back to the Civil Service Commission so that that cut could be made good.

Mr. BUREAU: It is not a question of bonus, it is a question of salary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is how it was done. So we find that so far as the government is concerned—

Mr. GRAHAM: Poor government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —the Civil Service Commission has just made a cut of a little more than one-third of what the government proposed. That is all. I really hope that the government will take some stand and stick to it, and will see that if there be any injustice at all that the right thing will be done.

Mr. JOSEPH T. SHAW (West Calgary): I want to make a very few observations in connection with this matter. I think the issue that is now involved dates back considerably beyond this session. I recall that last year a special committee of this parliament was organized for the purpose of inquiring into the operation of the Civil Service Act, and perhaps I may be permitted to refer to a couple of the recommendations made in what seemed to me to be a very commendable report. I may say that with the exception, I think, of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) the committee were unanimous in the recommendations they made to parliament.

Mr. MARTELL: The hon. member for Hants is proud of what he did.

Mr. SHAW: The hon. gentleman apparently takes pride in the fact that he dissented from that report.

Mr. MARTELL: Exactly.

Mr. SHAW: Anybody who reads the report might suggest that perhaps it would reflect upon the pride of the hon. gentleman. Now, may I be permitted to read from the sessional papers the following:

> The evidence submitted to your committee by representatives of the various civil service organizations brought out the fact that considerable dissatisfaction existed among the civil servants with decisions on classification, promotion, salary adjustment, and other matters generally affecting the service. One of the principal causes for this dissatisfaction seems to be due to the lack of the existence of a permanent board to which the civil servant can appeal.

The report goes on to state that much valuable evidence was heard in connection with the proposal to adopt the Whitley council plan in the Civil Service. The recommendation made was this:

> Your committee therefore recommends that the Civil Service Commissioners be given power to establish without delay departmental personnel boards to be made up of an equal representation of the Civil Service Commission, the department and departmental employees. These boards are to act in an advisory capacity in matters of classification, promotion, dismissal, salary revision, leave of absence and other kindred problems affecting the welfare and efficiency of the departmental service

Again the report goes on:

The evidence submitted to your committee discloses the urgent need of a general readjustment of salary. Your committee therefore recommends that immediately after reorganization and reclassification has taken place, salary revision and adjustment be proceeded with without delay. Pending this revision the bonus is to be continued—

The bonus, of course, being the bonus of the 1923-24 standard.

Your committee feels that the creation of personnel boards, hereinbefore recommended, would furnish excellent means for the solution of some of the difficulties now experienced by civil servants in regard to the classification and other problems incidental to their work.

The government for some reason with which I am not familiar, has never seen fit to incorporate any of the many valuable recommendations of the practically unanimous committee into legislation. I think that if we had had last year the necessary legislation to carry into effect some at least of these recommendations, the matter of the salary revision should have properly received attention, and a board could have been appointed on which the civil servants themselves would have been represented and before which they could appear on a basis of equality with the department and the Civil Service Commission.

It may be interesting for hon. members to know that according to a return (No. 174) brought down on 15th May, last year, of some 19,467 permanent employees in the service 11,661 received salaries of $960 or less per year, while 7,806 received salaries of $800 and less. I want to compare those salaries with the figures given in connection with the standard of living of various official organizations. Perhaps it may not be uninteresting to refer to some investigations made by certain American organizations. The United States Bureau of Statistics in the Labour Review for July of 1919, established a figure of $1,850 per annum for a family of five. The Philadelphia Bureau of Municipal Research, in Bulletin No. 567, of April 5, 1923, found that the cost of the working man's standard of living as of March, 1923, was the sum of $1,854.28. The National Industrial Conference Board, of Detroit, Michigan, in September, 1921, fixed these figures:

For a family of four..	$1,527 08
For a family of five..	1,697 95
For a family of six..	1,868 82

Mr. HUGHES: Are there any figures for a young man or a young woman?

Mr. SHAW: No, these figures are for the average family of four, five and six respectively.

[Mr. Shaw.]

Mr. HUGHES: Are there any figures for single people?

Mr. SHAW: No. The Visiting Housekeeper Association of Detroit, Michigan, found on March 1, 1924, that in the case of a family of five the figure should stand at $2,060.64; and John A. Ryan, author of "A Living Wage," figured on June 1, 1919, that the amount should be $1,605. The average of the Railway Arbitration Boards in Canada approximates $1,900 for a family of five.

Mr. BUREAU: For what year?

Mr. SHAW: The figures apply to a number of years. It is the average, I say, of the finding of the Railway Arbitration Boards in Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: Including the peak prices of the war time?

Mr. SHAW: No. On page 431 of the Labour Gazette of Canada, I think for the current year, $20.58 is stated to be the weekly budget for a family of five, and covers the necessary minimum cost of food, fuel, light and rent. This amounts to $1,070.16 per year. On the same page it states that for the average family of five the expenditure on these items of food, fuel, light and rent would be perhaps two-thirds or about 65 per cent of the total income. Adding this additional amount the figure, according to the Labour department, amounts to $1,605.24. Then, before the special Civil Service committee of last year evidence was produced by the civil servants themselves which indicates that for December 1922 the figure stood at $1,752.84. Now, here is a mass of figures, not only from this country but also from the United States, which indicates that the amount necessary to maintain a proper standard of living for a family of five is certainly greatly in excess of the figures which I have just quoted as the average salaries received by the civil service employees in Canada.

With regard to the particular matter which is the subject of the present controversy the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) has pointed out that under the Post Office Department's proposal for an increase of salary for this year the total would be $13,487,020. Under the Civil Service Commission's proposal, which was the subject of criticism, the amount would be $12,956,000. The employees' proposals as presented to the commission represent a total of $15,055,000. If to the present salaries, which amount to $11,164,000, is added the bonus of 1923-24 —that is the bonus existing before the last cut—the total would be $13,134,000, or a sum less than $200,000 in excess of the proposals made by the Civil Service Commission. In other words, the proposal made by the Civil Service Commission represents a reduction of less than $200,000 in the salaries now received by the potal employees counting the bonus of 1923-24. That means simply that where only a matter of $200,000 is involved there is a possibility of a strike taking place which may disorganize the entire business interests of the country. I do not think it is belittling to the dignity of parliament or to the dignity of the cabinet or the government to simply continue in existence the salaries amounting to $11,000,000, as I have mentioned, and the 1923-24 bonus, until such time as the salary revision is completed, and I feel confident that a temporary arrangement on that basis could probably be made with the concurrence of the postal employees. They would simply have to wait until the Civil Service Commission has had an opportunity of revising the salaries of all employees in the service, and they would then be entitled to get such additional amount as that award would give them, or suffer any decrease that might then be fixed. It seems to me that, for that small amount involved, it is absurd for this parliament to allow the possibility of disorganizing the whole of the business interests of the country. I think it is very foolish and very unwise indeed. In view of the fact that the salaries now received by the postal employees, and the salaries proposed by the Civil Service Commission and by the employees themselves, are far less than the standard of living as indicated by the figures I have given, it seems to me it is only fair that the government, as a model employer, should seek some avenue and some means of escape from the unfortunate condition which now exists, and I suggest to the government that it is not yet too late to make this proposal to the postal employees, in order that the threatened strike may be averted.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend has cited figures, in those figures he puts a certain number of employees at a salary of $800, and the figures he cited as to the cost of living apply to married people who are keeping house. I would like to know how many single men and women are employed and are included in the number who receive $800 a year? Has the hon. gentleman the information?

Mr. SHAW: I regret to say that the information is not available. In no figures presented to the House have I been able to secure that information, but taking the figures which I have mentioned and adding thereto the average bonus in every case it would bring a sum much less than the average standard of living indicated by the figures not only in this country but also in the United States.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand that the $800 includes the bonus also?

Mr. SHAW: No. To the figures given must be added the average bonus, which would not exceed in any case more than $250 per annum.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have been requested to put a question to the government. Is the government prepared to submit the question of postal salaries to an arbitration board, consisting of one government appointee, one departmental appointee and a member to be appointed by the employees.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The government is not prepared to give any answer to any question of a character such as my hon. friend proposes, until we have a further discussion with the representatives of the postal employees. I expect to have that tomorrow.

Mr. CHURCH: Since the House took recess—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for North Toronto speaks now it will close the debate.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): I desire to speak very briefly to the question which has engaged our attention this afternoon. I think the government might have shown a little more strength and a little more decision in dealing with this question than they have done. It is quite clear that there is a distinct limitation in the fixation of salaries for the postal employees, or indeed for any other government employees, at the present time. That has been fully explained this afternoon in the fact that the Civil Service Commission has the authority under the law to consider this question and to lay down a schedule of salaries that shall govern. That is the law of the land, and that for the time being, at any rate, must govern. No one contemplates the possibility of a postal strike throughout this Dominion without very grave apprehension. I know of nothing, unless, as was stated this afternoon, it would be a strike on the part of the railway employees, tying up transportation, that would more disorganize business and cause more inconvenience than a strike of the postal workers, and I would suggest to the postal workers this thought:

That in any action they may take in this very, very grave question which they have before them for decision they should carefully weigh the effect their action is going to have on public opinion throughout this whole Dominion. I may offer my opinion as an individual that if a strike takes place under the present circumstances public opinion throughout Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, will not support the postal workers in that action.

The law is on the statute book, and for the time being that law must stand. If I may offer a suggestion to the postal workers, it would be that they first ask that the law be changed. This they have not seen fit to do. Apparently, after receiving the report of the commission, and after receiving the schedule of salaries which the commission has laid down, the postal workers have reached the decision without any further discussion that they are going to tie up this country in a strike. I think that is a very grave action for them to take. I am satisfied of this, Mr. Speaker—and I think I am within the judgment of the House when I make the statement—that every member of this House desires to do full justice to not only the postal employees of the Dominion but to every other civil servant in this country, both in regard to the question of salaries and the question of working conditions. A good deal has been said in the discussion this afternoon by my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) and his colleague from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine), and a reference was made to it by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw), who has just spoken, as to the necessity of a decent wage or a living wage. I think my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg used the term "a decent standard of living." What is a decent standard of living? What is there that determines a decent standard of living? My hon. friend from West Calgary—and I have some regard for his ability and judgment—has quoted here to-night, American, Canadian and other authorities, as to what constitutes a standard of living, what constitutes a satisfactory wage. That depends altogether on the standard of living. If the parliament of Canada is to adopt a principle of fixing a wage in consonance with a certain standard of living, what is that standard of living to be? Are you going to measure it by the living conditions of the farmer out on the prairie or the farmer in the Maritime provinces or the fisherman down by the sea? I want to say in all seriousness to this House that there are in western Canada to-day tens of thousands of farmers who work hard the whole year round and who do not have but a fraction of what is said here to-night to be a living wage.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. HUGHES: And the same in eastern Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. That question will have to be dealt with ultimately by this parliament if it is to be settled in respect of one class of people who labour in the Dominion. After all, what is the difference that exists to-day between the postal workers and the government in this issue? Reference has been made already to the difference between the total existing salaries and the total salaries that are asked for. Let me refer to this again for a moment. Under the salaries existing at the present time or that have existed during the past year with the bonus that has obtained in the past year, the total amount drawn by the postal employees of Canada was $13,134,000. Under this schedule as laid down by the Civil Service Commission, they propose to reduce this to $12,956,000, or a difference for all the postal employees of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific of $178,000. That is a very little over a decrease of one per cent. One per cent would be $131,000, and the total difference is $178,000, or roughly, about 1½ per cent. The argument is advanced by the postal employees that the salaries that they were receiving with the bonus prior to this year were not sufficient, but the fact is that those salaries obtained prior to the present time. Has there been any reduction in the cost of living in this country in the last three years, or, indeed, in the past year? If we study the statistics, the index figure of the Department of Labour or of the Bureau of Statistics, you will find that the line is coming steadily downwards in the cost of living. Only this morning I noticed in one of the morning papers published in this city a comparison of wholesale prices for May of the present year with May of 1920, when we had the peak of prices in this country as well as throughout the rest of the world. In May of 1920, the index figure was 256 in the range of wholesale prices in Canada. To-day, by the same authority, the index for that range of wholesale prices is down to a little over 150. There has been, as every one knows, though perhaps not nearly so rapidly as we all should like, a steady decease in the cost of living in this country.

Mr. SHAW: Is my hon. friend aware of the fact that the index figure at the time the bonus was first granted was 161, using as a basis the average prices in 1913, whereas, in December, 1923, the index figure, on the same basis, was 151?

Mr. CRERAR: I have given the figures showing the change that has taken place in wholesale prices of commodities; but even taking my hon. friend's figures—I will not dispute them, I have not the figures before me—they show a decrease from 161 to 151, or a decrease of ten points at any rate between prices that existed eight or nine years ago and present prices. If someone is of a sufficiently mathematical turn of mind to figure that out, that will probably amount to the difference that exists between the total salaries the postal workers received last year and the schedule proposed by the Civil Service Commission.

I wish to support a suggestion that was made first this afternoon by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). The Civil Service Commission are at present engaged in a revision of those salaries. At the request of the government, they tackled first the salaries of the postal employees and to-day they are engaged in an inquiry into salaries prevailing in other departments. I think there is some force to the point urged by the hon. member for North Waterloo that there should have been no disturbance of salaries and bonus until the whole classification of salaries had been made so that the whole thing might be done at once.

No one deprecates more than I the difficulties and disastrous consequences that may flow from a strike of the postal workers in this country. I am not going to discuss at the present moment the question whether postal workers or government employees of any kind have a right to strike under any conditions. I have my views on that question, and possibly at a future time in this House I may have an opportunity of expressing them. That question, however, is not germane to the discussion at the present moment. It is of the greatest importance that a strike at the present time should be averted if that possibly can be done. I appreciate the fact that the postal workers, in the position they have taken, have gone so far that it may be difficult for them to recede, and under those circumstances, there is no loss of dignity to the government or to the parliament of Canada if the position is frankly taken: Well, we do not admit your contention; but we think that this salary schedule should not have been put into effect until the whole matter of salary revision had been considered by the Civil Service Commission in its relation to all departments; consequently we put you back upon that basis until we have the full report from the Civil Service Commission, and then we shall decide.

Mr. BUREAU: Will they accept that?

Mr. CRERAR: If they do not accept that, then their case is so much worse before the country. But once that is done, once the Civil Service Commission, as the authority constituted under the law to do that work, have investigated these questions of salaries, have heard the evidence, as I understand they have heard it from representatives of postal workers on one, if not two occasions, after they have made a complete revision and brought that down to the government, the plain duty of the government is to put that into effect, stand behind it and say: We are going to stand behind it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Inasmuch as we know the precise effect of this schedule on the service, taking the total amount this year as compared with last, is there the slightest difficulty in telling now what the effect of a similar schedule will be on the total for the whole service?

Mr. CRERAR: I think the result over the whole service will probably be a slight reduction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In proportion to the amount for this department?

Mr. CRERAR: In proportion to the amount for this department, that would depend, however, on whether the relation between the salaries in the various departments was on an equality. I cannot speak of that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Parliament passed the schedule on the recommendation of the commission, and we have a right to assume that.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, but the salaries, for instance, in some departments, as they stand to-day, have not been fixed or determined by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand so.

Mr. BUREAU: In the Customs department, they have.

Mr. CRERAR: In any case I do not know that my right hon. friend's argument is conclusive. The government have decided upon the policy that the commission shall review these salaries, and I presume that the purpose of that is to get them on an even keel throughout all the departments, or at any rate to ensure that they shall bear an equitable relationship to one another. If I am correct in that, then I think the government are justified in taking the position I have indicated and in saying to the postal workers: "We restore your pensions for the time being and are going to put you back this year in the position you were in in 1923-24; but we do that only until the commission has brought down its full report in respect of the salaries in all departments. Once that report is before the government and the government are satisfied that it is fair, we will stand behind it and ask parliament to do the same". In my judgment, if the government take that course frankly and honestly a strike will be averted and the question will be settled finally, with support, I hope unanimously, but at any rate in a large measure from the House. That course in my opinion would obviate this threatened strike and it would enable the postal workers to recede from a position which it would otherwise be somewhat difficult for them to abandon. The total additional cost to the country would be infinitesimal in comparison with the very heavy losses that are bound to ensue if this threatened tie-up in the mail transportation and distribution services takes place.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend counsels the government to restore the bonus. Would he restore the bonus on the basis of the salaries recommended by the Civil Service Commission or on the basis of the salaries which the employees were receiving before their case was submitted to the commission, and in respect of which the difficulty arose?

Mr. CRERAR: I thought I had made that perfectly clear. I would not superimpose the bonus on the schedule recommended by the commission; I would restore conditions as they were in 1923-24. I would allow the recommendations of the commission, the schedule which has been submitted, to stand for the time being until the schedules in respect of the various other departments were brought down. Once they were brought down I would then put the whole thing into effect.

Mr. FORKE: Was it not on the representation of the postal employees themselves that they were put on a permanent basis? I believe the statement has been made that the department had already been classified.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They were in the classification.

Mr. FORKE: I thought they had made representations asking to have the bonus done away with and to put them on a permanent basis.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Oh yes, that is true.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): I trust that as a result of the discussion which we have had to-day the parties will get together and this matter will be settled satisfactorily. Parliament is supreme in this country, and neither parliament nor the government should seek to evade herein the responsibility which properly belongs to it. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon rather intimated that the present situation did not constitute an emergency, and I understand that the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil) is of the same opinion. I do not by any means agree with these hon. gentlemen; I say most decidedly that there is an emergency. The present situation is a very serious one and the responsibility rests not upon the Civil Service Commission but upon the government to see that proper steps are taken, and taken without any delay, to have matters satisfactorily adjusted and a strike avoided. We are supposed to have representative government in this country, and as I have said, parliament is supreme in all these matters and can revise the decision of the Civil Service Commission or any other commission. There is therefore no reason whatever why the government should seek to shirk its legitimate responsibility. We have not made much progress in disposing of this vexed question in the past six months; it has been bandied about between one department or commission and another and has been passed on from deputy ministers and heads of government to the Civil Service Commission and to a new body known as the Board of Audit with no apparent results. No satisfactory settlement has been arrived at; the recent revision of the Civil Service Commission as presented to the men of the post office proves more unsatisfactory than ever. The scale of wages which has been proposed is utterly unsatisfactory and most unfair to the older employees, the sorters and letter carriers, and all those men who have grown old in the service.

It is all very well to say that if these men strike on service their places can be filled again. That is absolutely untrue; you cannot fill at a moment's notice the position which is held by any one of these older employees. Take for example such an emergency as occurs at Christmas; does any hon. gentleman contend for a moment that a merely temporary employee who has had no experience whatever could take the place of an old sorter or any other postal employee who has spent a number of years in the service? It simply cannot be done; no one can learn the post office business in a day, whether it be in the position of a sorter or a letter carrier or in any other capacity. Furthermore, very grave responsibilities attach to those who have to deliver registered mail; the responsibilities on the rank and file are greater and altogether the work of the postal employees, particularly of those men who have grown old in the service, is onerous and calls for the most satisfactory remuneration which the country can afford. The postal service has given every satisfaction, and moreover it is a public utility which is self-sustaining and gives service at cost including low labor costs.

In the city from which I come the revenue in this department amounts to $6,000,000 as against an expenditure of some $2,250,000. and a large profit is made from the Toronto post office. Now, the country is not bankrupt, nor is the Post Office Department in any impecunious state; so that there is no excuse for any evasion on the part of the government of its responsibility or for placing it on any commission. And if the government does seek to evade its responsibility in this matter I hope that the House at all events will do its duty. Let me read what the Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. Newcombe, has said in regard to the question of regulating the rates of compensation to be paid employees. These are his words:

> The Governor in Council has, in my opinion, no authority to regulate rates of compensation independently. He may approve the rates submitted by the commission for approval, and the rates will thus become effective, but he has no authority to approve or sanction any rate in excess of that which is recommended by the commission. Such an increase can be sanctioned only by parliamentary authority.

The government shelters itself behind all this and seeks to evade its responsibilty. The commission is subservient to parliament. In view of the fact that at six o'clock to-night, it was announced, the voting of the employees on the question as to whether or not there should be a strike throughout Canada closed it seems to me that the government must realize the extreme gravity of the situation; there can be no doubt whatever as to the existence of an emergency in this case. To-morrow evening as I understand, unless the matter is satisfactorily settled, there is likely to be an interruption in the service. The president of the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto after carefully considering this revised schedule, gave it as his opinion that there was just foundation for the claims of the men. The department by the new schedule and after turning the bonus into straight salary shows a saving of some $179,000 all told, and there is no reason why the government should not meet the requests of the postal employees. Let me say in conclusion once again that upon the government and not upon the Civil Service Commission rests the responsibility of settling this problem; and if a strike occurs to-morrow night, paralyzing business that is already none too good and is suffering to a great extent, the blame will lie at the door of the government. Business conditions are bad enough as things are now and very little business in some retail lines has been done all spring on account of weather conditions and other unfavourable circumstances, so that the business of the country cannot afford to incur the loss that must result from a strike. The business men are demanding that this question be settled, and I am only fulfilling my duty as a representative of the Toronto district in bringing the matter to the attention of the House.

Motion withdrawn.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—TRANSCONA SHOPS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Representations have been made by workers in the Transcona shops that the management of the Canadian National Railways is discriminating against members of certain labour organizations. Is it or is it not the policy of the government that the employees should be permitted to belong to whatever organization or form of organization they themselves decide to adopt?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways): The policy of the government in that respect, whatever it might be, would not affect the situation. The railway employees are under certain unions and the men govern themselves; they say who shall be promoted and all that sort of thing. So far as I am concerned, I may say that the government has heard nothing about this matter and knows nothing about it.

SUPPLY

INDIAN AFFAIRS

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Indians—Nova Scotia, $52,340.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are the Indians increasing?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Superintendent General of Indian Affairs): Slightly. There is a reduction in the total vote, we having made some readjustments.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see the cost of Indian education is going down, while the cost of the more material things is going up.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is accounted for by the fact that we are not spending as much for buildings this year. As my right hon. friend knows, last year we made some substantial increases in our building programme. There are some changes in connection with medical attendants.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much was spent last year in Nova Scotia?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We spent $50,140. We spent all our vote last year throughout the whole department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the Indian reserve trouble near Sydney settled yet?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): A property was purchased some years ago and very serious objection was taken to its location. We had a property in another part of the town inspected, but there is too much land in connection with it, and we still have the matter under consideration. We have not moved the Indians.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the employment and pay of the doctors come under this vote or under Indian education?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Under this vote in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the new system for doctors?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is no new system. We have increased our medical work in some instances in connection with tuberculosis. There is an increase in Nova Scotia of $2,200. Last year we spent $10,000 for medical attendance and medicines; this year we are asking for $12,000. We are putting on a nurse in Nova Scotia, who will travel around and assist the Indians wherever they need her. We have found nurses in western Canada very helpful to the Indians. I may say that in a general way the hospital fees are going up; that is in evidence everywhere.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the appointment of doctors by the Civil Service Commission quite satisfactory?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, I have no objection.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is not suffering the way the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) is, for example?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I did not know he was suffering.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not sure of it myself, but he made very loud complaints.

Item agreed to.

New Brunswick, $35,574.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a big increase.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does this vote include an appropriation for buildings on the Indian reserve?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is a slight increase in salaries of $240, and an increase in relief of $6,000. We voted $18,000 last year; we are asking for $24,000 this year.

Mr. CALDWELL: Perhaps the minister did not hear my question?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The building appropriation does not appear here; it is in the vote for education.

Mr. DOUCET: What is the necessity for an increase in relief of 33 per cent?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In New Brunswick there are always a number of children of school age whom the parents are not able to support, and there are also a number of orphan children. Our reports show 95 children to whom the department must give assistance through their parents or guardians. In the past, in view of the fact that the department had no residential accommodation east of Ontario, the cost of maintenance of these children has been charged to the school fund. This practice has been discontinued. Hence we have an increase of $6,000 for the purpose mentioned.

Item agreed to.

Ontario and Quebec, $264,535.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), who is unavoidably out of the city to-day, asked me to mention the case of the Lake of the Woods Indians. I think a petition was forwarded to the minister signed by the chiefs and representatives of a number of tribes. Apparently there was some difficulty in connection with this petition. In the first place it was presented to the Indian agent at Kenora, who undertook to forward it to the department but who failed to do so. Later, I understand, Mr. James Robinson, of Kenora, who is very much interested in the subject, forwarded the petition on to the minister, but no acknowledgement was received until Mr. Robinson had communicated with the Prime Minister, and then after a further delay of two or three months an acknowledgement was received. from the deputy minister, I think, stating that the matter would be looked into. The subject has been covered in a statement prepared by Mr. Robinson, which I think, has been forwarded to the department. The case is very concisely put in a foreword to that statement, and perhaps I may be permitted to read it. It says:

The Lake of the Woods Indians complain to the parliament of Canada of unfair treatment. They declare their treaty rights have been violated and gross injustice done them for the past forty years. They charge that most of their agents have shown little interest in their welfare and are high-handed and domineering in their actions and do not recognize the authority of their chiefs.

A petition to the government containing statement of their grievances and asking for an independent investigation of their complaints was sent down on August 21st last and no reply was received until November 29th, and then only after complaint to the Prime Minister that no notice or reply had been received to the petition. Their solicitor writes a series of letters to the press setting forth their complaints, which are re-produced herein with a short summary of the situation. No action has been taken by the head of the Indian department in reply to their petition, and this statement is issued in the hope that the parliament of Canada will listen to their complaint.

At time of making of the treaty in 1873 no one had any idea of the value of their territory. In area it was a small province within itself, 55,000 square miles of some of the finest territory in Canada, rich in timber, minerals, fur and fish and much of it of splendid agricultural possibilities and now dotted with thrifty towns, villages, hamlets and farming communities.

They surrendered this territory after negotiating a solemn treaty with the government of Canada (treaty No. 3) and in return were allowed certain reserves, many of them containing valuable timber which has been disposed of by their agents and the timber cut and removed. During past fifty years they have never had a statement of how much timber has been cut and removed or what dues have been collected or what amount of money is to their credit.

As to matter of schools, the Indian chiefs at the time of the making of the treaty made special requests in their talks with the commissioners asking that schools be established and that teachers be sent to instruct their young people with the knowledge of the whites. Within this agency there are 600 Indian children of school age without the advantage of education. The only schools within this agency are two, one at Kenora known as the Indian industrial school established by the Roman Catholic Church and another out at Shoal lake known as the Cecilia Jaffray School established by the Presbyterian Church. The area of their agency is equal to about 250 miles from east to west and 225 from north to south. The two schools mentioned are the only schools within their territory, neither of which was established under direction of the Indian department, but one of which, the Kenora School has recently been bought by the government but left in the care of the original owners.

Fifty years is surely long enough for the Indian department to have experimented on these people, yet after that length of time these Indians are in a worse condition than when the government took away their lands and made them "wards of the crown." When are they to become free men and made responsible citizens of Canada if education is denied them and they remain in a state of servitude?

Every honest self-respecting Canadian will blush and hang his head in shame when he reflects how these people have been treated by the government of Canada. Instead of being a happy and contented people they are gradually dying off and will ultimately become extinct. Is this the keeping of Canada's word of honour as expressed in the treaty referred to?

More than one of the provinces of Canada since entering confederation have asked for a re-consideration of their rights. Are not these people entitled to a review of their treaty rights and for further consideration at the hands of our government?

It is requested that an independent commission be appointed to consider

First the prayer of their petition and

Secondly to generally review and report on the best methods of making an honest effort to observe the treaty and bring their native citizens of Canada (indigenous to the country) to a state of civilization and advancement equal to their virility and self respect when in the primitive state as at the time of the treaty and give them some of the opportunities and advantages given to (in many cases) the questionable element of European immigrants brought into Canada, to enjoy the fulness and bounty thereof, at great expense and, in too many cases, to Canada's harm and hurt.

I also have in this pamphlet the petition referred to. It is dated at Whitefish reserve, Lake of the Woods, June 7, 1923, and addressed to the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. The petition reads:

10 p.m.

The petition of the people of the Whitefish reserve respectfully sheweth:

1. Years ago our reserve contained a large number of people, but through sickness and death, our numbers have been reduced to 14 families, about 70 people.

2. We submit for your consideration, and ask for a change in some regulations affecting us.

3. We ask that allotments of land on the reserve of 80 acres for farming purposes, be made to each head of family—of those who wish it—and that the same be made inheritable to our own descendants, but not alienable to others.

4. We ask that a farm instructor be sent us to instruct us and teach us how to farm, who shall be permanently here as an overseer.

5. We ask also that horses, cattle, implements and seed grain be sent us with which to make a start.

6. The land on our reserve is arable—could nearly all be cultivated and there is no better soil in this province, admirably adapted for the growth of such grasses as red clover, alsike and alfalfa, which have been grown to perfection right here. And we submit that the venture could be made self-sustaining as well as profitable.

7. There are 27 children on the reserve—21 of whom are of school age, and, we submit, are entitled to the same advantages of education as the children on other reserves and those of the white population, but we are 50 miles from the Indian industrial school at Kenora. We ask that a school be established with a duly qualified school teacher.

8. We suggest that a competent teacher (and his wife) be sent. One who has some knowledge of medicine could be of much use, as Dr. Ferguson is 50 miles from us, and is usually too busy to come here. Very seldom comes.

9. We submit there has been gross mis-management in regard to the timber on our reserves, and that no statement has ever been made, showing how much or what quantity of timber has been taken from the reserves—although we have repeatedly asked for statements from your various agents.

10. We further say that during the past 40 years, the Rat Portage Lumber Co., has cut and removed the timber on 400 acres, being a portion of the 2,647 acres, being that portion of Indian reserve 32, 33 and 34A, surveyed by A. H. Vaughan, D.L.S. in 1879, lying south of Lobstick Bay, and north of the Whitefish rapids and lake.

11. We charge that 12 years ago, the Rat Portage Lumber Co., cut and removed the timber on Indian reserve 35H, on Sabaskong bay and that the same has never been accounted for, or any payment made therefor.

12. We charge that the Rat Portage Lumber Co. some 10 or 12 years ago cut and removed the timber on reserve 32C belonging to us, having camps on Turtle portage, from which there has never been any accounting or payment.

13. That we have made repeated requests of the agents you have appointed for statements and for accountings for the said timber so taken from our reserves, but have never on any occasion, received any statement or accounting, except hereinafter mentioned.

14. During the year 1921 and 1922, two payments were made us, amounting to $2,688 being $42 for each of the 64 persons then residing on our reserve. But apart from that, we have never received any statement or accounting whatever, during the past 40 years.

15. We charge that your former agent, Mr. R. S. McKenzie, neglected and refused to give any statement as to the quantity of timber cut and removed by the Keewatin Lumber Co. on our Reserve 32B, on Black river, although requested by our Chief, Bob Roy many times, and that we have never received one dollar therefor.

16. The agreement made by your said agent McKenzie, with the people of our reserve, when he was selling our timber to the said Keewatin Lumber Co., was that we were to receive 30 per cent of the total price each year payable at the time of treaty payment until fully paid. Instead of that we received only 15 per cent in 1921 and 15 per cent in 1922.

17. The said Keewatin Lumber Co. through your agent McKenzie, leased one acre of land on our reserve, just south of Whitefish rapids for the purpose of a store house, and built thereon their store house and have occupied it, but have paid no rent therefor as far as we have knowledge.

18. The said Keewatin Lumber Co. also leased as we were informed some land at the mouth of Black river, for the purpose of a garden, but no rent has been forthcoming for that.

19. Your said agent McKenzie, 3 years ago, promised one of our people, Pekowbetung, lumber for the flooring and roofing of his house and instructed him to proceed and put up the frame, but so far no lumber has come, and the said Pekowbetung, with his family of eight persons, had had to exist as best they could in a small shack.

We respectfully ask for investigation into these matters, that we consider our grievances.

It is pointed out in this pamphlet that in the United States the Indians have been very much better treated than have the Indians in this country, at any rate, in the part of Canada referred to, and that as a consequence the former are now in a very flourishing condition; they are becoming educated and taking their places as citizens of the republic. It is also pointed out that in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan the Indians have been looked after and are now producing very large quantities of grain. I want to say that in repeating the foreword of this pamphlet and the petition of the Indians it must not be understood that I am making any charge. I notice in the pamphlet there is a reply from the Indian agent at Kenora to certain statements published in the Kenora press which explains various matters from the standpoint of the present agent. I am simply asking, on behalf of the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), that the case of these Indians be looked into, and that an independent commissioner be appointed to investigate the whole question.

I may say there seems to have been a good deal of controversy on these matters with the department, or at any rate with certain of the Indian agents who are now, or have been in the past, in the service. The main claim of the petitioners is in regard to the timber. It seems to me that the Indians are quite justified in asking for an accounting, and I do not understand why their request in that regard has not been granted. Apparently an accounting has been asked for many times. Surely they are entitled to know how much money their timber has brought, and how that money has been disposed of. If there is any sum to be placed to their credit they are entitled to know it. Apparently only one accounting was made by the department. Then there is the question of providing educational facilities. If these Indians are ever going to be lifted out of their position as wards of the government it seems to me they must be afforded some chance of obtaining an education. Apparently no facilities of this kind are provided for them at the present time. The Indians also want to be instructed in agriculture; they think they are entitled to the same treatment that has been extended to the Indians in Alberta and Saskatchewan. There is another demand to which they appear to attach considerable importance, namely, that some kind of a house of rest should be provided for them when they go to Kenora, as the Indians quite frequently do. They are not able to stay at hotels, because they would not be welcome guests, and there is absolutely no place in Kenora where they can put up. In conclusion I submit to the minister these requests should receive consideration. These Indians have certain rights under the treaty and the government should be prepared to strictly carry out those rights.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The complaint voiced by my hon. friend, and backed by the petition he has been handed, has been brought to the attention of the department. I may say there was a change in agents about three years ago. As far as I can learn, the agent who occupied that position prior to that time was not entirely satisfactory and the change was made. So far as I know the present incumbent is giving satisfaction. My hon. friend would agree that a grievance running back for over forty years is rather a serious matter, and I am asking to send Mr. Paget, the accountant of the department, up there to make a thorough investigation, to hear all the complaints of the Indians, and to bring back a full report as to the conditions existing. With respect to the accounting, I would refer my hon. friend to the public accounts. Complaint is frequently made by the chiefs of the Indians that they do not get an accounting of the funds. An accounting is made every year, and it is at their disposal if they wish to avail themselves of it, but we propose to have a thorough investigation of the allegations of these Indians.

Mr. HALBERT: Has the minister had any complaint from the Indians or the Indian agents on the Rama reserve with regard to the medical attendance there, and will the minister give me the name of the doctor in that district?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Dr. Gilpin. I do not know where he lives.

Mr. HALBERT: He lives at Brecken, about twenty miles from the reserve. Has the minister had any complaints or requests for a change of doctor?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, I think we have had complaint on account of the distance the doctor lives from the reserve.

Mr. HALBERT: Has there been any change in the doctor.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, the matter is under consideration.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister explain how it is that we have salaries detailed for Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island and none for Ontario, the prairie provinces or British Columbia? The salaries are not given in the latter case in the details. If they are not given here, where can they be found?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I can give my hon. friend the amounts. He is referring to the Civil Service list, I presume.

Mr. NEILL: No, I am not referring to the Civil Service list. I take it that the Civil Service list contains the officials at Ottawa, but these are the salaries or the details of the different moneys to be voted by provinces. Nova Scotia has six items, one of which is local salaries of Indian agents and so forth. The same is true of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island; but when we come to the other provinces, while there are details as to relief and so forth, there are no items for salaries. Why are they not there, and where are they?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am informed they are under the item "General Expenses" and have not been separated in the prairie provinces.

Mr. SPENCE: There is an increase of $31,000 in this item. Could the minister give a reasonable excuse for that increase and let us know how much of the $246,000 was used in Quebec? The balance would be for Ontario. Why are the items not kept separate, the same as in the case of the other provinces?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We are asking for $8,800 in connection with the wing of the Lady Minto hospital at Chapleau, which provides, under the Victorian Order of Nurses, excellent nurses. There is a limited number of patients. Unfortunately the hospital is not able to afford sufficient accommodation for the Indians of the district, and consequently about 318 Indians of the Cree and Ojibway tribes, and in addition pupils of the Chapleau boarding school, are unable to obtain hospital accommodation, and this item is to provide the neccessary accommodation for the Indians in the hospital there, and also to provide an amount towards placing the Caldwell tribe of Indians on St. Ann's island in lake St. Clair. This is a band that has never been located. They have been wandering about south-western Ontario and have been the cause of a good deal of complaint by the municipalities. They are without a home, and we are endeavouring to establish them on the island. This vote this year will be used for the purpose of drainage to prepare the island for their reception. There are about 104 souls in this band comprising twenty-one families. This vote will defray the cost of the completion of the road in the township of Onandaga in the Six Nation reserve; the $9,000 is to carry the road right through and gravel it. It is used a great deal by the Indians themselves as well as by the general public. These are the three items that go to make up the additional $31,000 for Ontario and Quebec. My hon. friend wants to get the difference?

Mr. SPENCE: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The figures are: Ontario, $159,224, Quebec $87,311. The population in Quebec is 13,348, and in Ontario 22,344.

Mr. SENN: How much of these funds are held in trust by the government for the Six Nation Indians, and what income is derived from that fund? How is the money expended? Will the minister tell us the general policy of the department in expending the money?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): At the end of last year we had $683,431.69 of the trust fund on hand. That is the capital fund, and the interest accruing on that fund is used in the interest of the band. The interest fund is $43,010.07, and we have a large number of disbursements charged to the interest fund. If my hon. friend will get the Auditor General's report he will find complete details. Of that $43,000 we have remaining to the credit of the band $2,749.65.

Mr. SENN: Will the minister tell me why the policy of the government of late has been not to distribute any money among the Indians as was formerly done? I understand relief orders are given to the Indians. Who issues these relief orders, and why have the Indian council relief orders not been honoured during the past year?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In all cases relief orders are issued by the agent. Needless to say, we have had considerable friction on the Six Nation reserve and we are trying to get it adjusted. A considerable amount of propaganda has been going on, which is somewhat embarrassing at the present time and it is backed by the council. I do not want to go into the details of the matter. We are keeping a very careful account of the expenditures. My hon. friend can get those accounts, examine them and see exactly what the money has been spent for; but it is a fact that we have been issuing relief orders on the instructions of the doctor and the agent.

Mr. SENN: How many doctors are there on the reserve doing work for the department? I understand a petition has been received by the department that the council should be an elective rather than an hereditary council. Could the minister tell me offhand how many names on that petition are of men who have received relief orders during the past year?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I could not give my hon. friend that information. It is true that we have had a petition asking for a change in the method of appointing council to an elective system. That is a very live and controversial question down there. As my hon. friend knows, the council very strenuously oppose any change being made. We have had a good deal of difficulty with the Six Nations Indians, but I think our administration has been firm and fair. That is what we have sought to make it, and I am sure the effect will be felt in a short time. As in many other cases, outside interference will create influences that sometimes are detrimental to the management.

Mr. SENN: The minister did not answer my question as to how many doctors are employed on the reserve by the department. I understand there are two and one of them does not reside on the reserve. Complaints have reached me in respect of that. Are these relief orders issued, or is it the policy of the department to issue them to returned men or to widows and orphans in receipt of mothers' allowances?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is no particular class to which relief orders are issued. They are issued only in case of absolute necessity. One doctor resides on the reserve, and in answer to a request that more medical attention be furnished, a second doctor was appointed who lives not on the reserve, but quite close to it and who renders service when called upon.

Mr. SENN: Complaints have reached me that the doctors who are employed on the reserve are furnished with drugs. At least one of the doctors is practising outside of as well as in the reserve. A complaint has also reached me that the secretary of the Indian Council has not received any pay from the department for at least two years. I understand it has been the policy of the department that the funds that are in trust for the Indians there should be used for that purpose. Has that been discontinued, and if so, what is the reason for that?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The reason was this, that they summarily dismissed the secretary-treasurer without consulting the department. For a time they were taking the law into their own hands and we had a certain amount of difficulty with the council. That difficulty is not entirely removed yet. The present incumbent of the position is not being paid for his services because he has never been recognized by the department.

Mr. SENN: A complaint has reached me to the effect that Indians are not allowed to cut their own firewood on their own farms for their own use. Has any such order been issued by the department?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have never heard of any such order.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Has the minister any statement to make with regard to the progress of negotiations and the work of the commissioner appointed to investigate the trouble with the Indians? Has any report been made by the commissioner?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): A report has been made by the commissioner to the department. I shall be glad to give a copy to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) and the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn); but we have a very serious situation with a representative of the council in the Old Country endeavouring to stir up trouble with the League of Nations over this matter, setting up the claim that these tribes are not Canadian subjects and making statements of that character. These matters are all unsettled yet, and while I do not care to have the report made public at the present time, I shall be glad to put it in the hands of my hon. friends.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What has the government done as a result of the report of the commissioner?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have the report. We have taken no action upon it so far. Perhaps I should not say that we have not taken any action, because we have taken action with respect to some of the recommendations, education, particularly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What has been done in the matter of education as a consequence of the report?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): An endeavour has been made to give better facilities for education, more schools. There is a recommendation with respect to the Mohawk institute that we have not yet acted upon, but we propose doing so in the near future.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One would think that the department's own officials would know about those features better than any commissioner whose experience would be limited to the commission.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): As my right hon. friend who had at one time charge of the Indian department well knows, one of the difficulties is that the Indians often make the complaint that they do not receive fair treatment from the officials of the department. That is constantly coming up, and sometimes with respect to the agents. In order to put a quietus on that, I thought it worth while to send some one outside of the officials to whom they could come and make their statements, and who would give them a fair hearing of all the grievances, fancied or otherwise, that they might wish to bring before him. That was done.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): How much has that commission cost to date?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): $5,510.34.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is the work of the commissioner completed?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are the Indians now happy?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought so. I have no faith in these special commissions to look into grievances of this kind. The officials of the department have infinitely more experience. I fancy the principal object was to help the commissioner rather than the Indians. May I ask who is representing this Dominion at the League of Nations in its contest with the Six Nations Indians.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Dr. Riddell is furnished with all the documents.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is he?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): He is an attaché—

Mr. GRAHAM: He was appointed by the former government.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): He is a Canadian attaché at the League of Nations and was appointed by the former government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of Manitoba university?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think he was originally from Manitoba.

Mr. GRAHAM: He was in Toronto for a good while.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Have the Indians got a status in the league yet?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not that I have heard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is over there,—this man Long?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, Deskahet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is worse.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): He is known generally throughout the country around Brantford and he was in London when last I heard of him. Unfortunately this man has created a considerable impression, particularly upon the representatives of the smaller nations. It is amazing, nevertheless it is a fact that he did have some influence and has given trouble. He is now in England stirring up all the discontent he possibly can.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has he gone over there since the commission was appointed?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): He was over there before the commission was appointed.

Mr. GRAHAM: We are inclined to smile here at the Indian situation in relation to the League of Nations, but at one time during the sessions of the assembly of the league it did not appear to be a laughing matter. The representatives of the Indians arrived at Geneva by way of London. They first made their appeal in London and went further to the League of Nations; through the Netherlands they made an attempt to become members of the league. While in Geneva the Canadian representatives, I would not say experienced difficulty, but at any rate were of the opinion that Canada might be placed in a false position before the league inasmuch as the Indian representatives with their legal adviser from across the line had stirred up considerable enthusiasm in their case in the city of Geneva. As the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil) has pointed out the smaller nations seem to show great interest in the Indians' claim. They made the claim that they were neither British subjects nor Canadians; they declared that they were allies of Great Britain, their status having been recognized under an old treaty made many years ago. And when it was pointed out that they had served with the Canadian troops as Canadians overseas their reply was that they had done nothing of the kind but had gone overseas as allies of Great Britain, fighting side by side with other allies, who were Canadians. In short, they claimed the status of a nation and asked to be admitted to the league on that basis. There is an organization in Geneva for the protection of the Indians, and meetings were held nightly there protesting against the alleged treatment of these Indians by Canada. A deputation was sent from this association to wait upon the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) and myself, asking why we had treated the Indians in such a manner. The Canadian delegation was at first inclined to be sceptical of the seriousness of the matter, but it soon appeared that the representatives of the Indians were really in earnest. In reply we directed them to send the Indians and their legal representative to us so that we might discuss the matter together. They never came, but at a meeting of the league the representatives from Persia were very insistent on a motion being made to have the whole question of the treatment of the Indians by the Dominion of Canada discussed in the Assembly. Application was made to Sir Eric Drummond, who I believe was secretary to the Assembly, and the matter was referred to the president and a certain board the name of which I cannot recall at the moment. It was decided that the Indians had no claim to a status in the league and their case was not brought up in any way before the Assembly. For two or three days it seemed as though the Canadian representatives might be called upon in the Assembly of the League of Nations to defend the treatment of the Indians by the Dominion of Canada. When this attempt failed the representatives of the Indians remained in Geneva, and I am not sure that they are not there now. They remained there for a time disseminating propaganda, and I believe they went to Paris for a while and then on to London. The latest information I have is that at the next meeting of the Assembly of the League of Nations another attempt will be made by the Indians to be recognized as a nation in the League.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid I find my enthusiasm for the League of Nations actually waning. If it is spending its time on humbug of that sort it seems to me it might soon be time for us to consider whether we will vote the money Canada supplies.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is what the Canadian representatives thought.

Mr. CALDWELL: It will soon be as bad as the Canadian parliament.

Mr. SENN: Is it true that a provisional council has been appointed by the department to administer the affairs of the Six Nations?

If so, what is the status of the present council, and is it looking after the affairs of these Indians? Further, why are their officers not paid from the funds?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I explained why the secretary-treasurer was not paid. The council is doing business, meeting once a month and carrying on its usual work. The summary dismissal of the secretary-treasurer accounts for the fact that the temporary officer appointed by the council has not received payment.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—Halifax, Canso and Guysboro, steam service between, $9,000.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What is the life of these contracts?

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minster of Trade and Commerce): One year.

Mr. SPENCER: How long has this subsidy been paid?

Mr. LOW: About twenty years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know whether the minister considers it appropriate under this item, but I have traced back some information he gave the House on other items and found it very inaccurate—in fact grossly wrong.

Mr. LOW: I am very much surprised to hear that. I should be very glad to know what my right hon. friend has found wrong in the information which I gave.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For example, the minister complained of regulations of the Civil Service Commission compelling him to employ as commercial trade agents university graduates alone.

The CHAIRMAN: That is Civil Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know it is not appropriate here ,but the minister has got away from Civil Government. Is he aware that the insistence on university graduates came from his own deputy minister, who refused to have any qualification whatever of that restriction?

Mr. LOW: As I understand, it is a regulation by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is.

Mr. LOW: But I shall be very glad to look it up and inform my right hon. friend whether I am right or wrong. I am certain however that it is a regulation of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that it was not a regulation of the Civil Service Commission, but the fact that the regulation is as it is was due to the insistence of his own deputy minister that no one else but a university graduate could qualify for the position of commercial trade agent, and that when the commission suggested that a lesser educational equipment would do his deputy objected. Still the minister came to this House and complained of the regulation.

Mr. LOW: That may be true, but I have not had an opportunity of looking up the origin of the regulation. I know that in appointments made recently the regulation had to be observed. I have only been in charge of the department for about eight or nine months, but I may say that, as minister, I am opposed to the regulations, as they stand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But he should not attribute to another body what his own deputy is responsible for. Besides, the minister complained of the age limit. Is he aware that a similar condition applies there?

Mr. LOW: My right hon. friend knows very well that it is a regulation of the Civil Service Commission. I do not consider that I misled the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very good;—a regulation of the commission upon which his own deputy insisted would hardly be a regulation which the minister would be in a position to complain of. Then also he said that the training for the year was under a man appointed by the commission. Will he now admit that the training is under a man who was there before the commission existed?

Mr. LOW: I am now prepared to say that the training was under a man appointed by the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is the man?

Mr. LOW: Mr. Poussette.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister say that Mr. Poussette was appointed to the service by the commission?

Mr. LOW: He was appointed director by the Civil Service Commission.

M. MEIGHEN: He was in the service.

Mr. LOW: Not in that capacity. He was a trade commissioner and was appointed director of the service by the Civil Service Commission, and I repeat that Mr. Poussette was placed in charge of that branch of the department by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Poussette was in the service before the commission existed.

Mr. LOW: My right hon. friend will not argue that when Mr. Poussette was in South Africa he was in a position to train the junior commissioners that we were bringing into the service, nor will he deny that he was placed in charge of this branch during the regime of the former Minister of Trade and Commerce while my right hon. friend was Prime Minister?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Poussette was moved from one position to the another with the approval of the commission, but he entered the service not under the commission at all. Certainly it is the latter impression which the minister gave the House.

Mr. LOW: No, I endeavoured to convey to the House that the man in charge of the training was placed in charge of that training by the Civil Service Commission, and I stand by that statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He was not.

Mr. GRAHAM: He was appointed to that work by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister complain of him in that work?

Mr. LOW: I did.

Item agreed to.

Halifax, LaHave and LaHave river ports, steam service between, $6,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who has this contract?

Mr. LOW: The Western Steamship Company of Halifax.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How long have they had it?

Mr. LOW: Four or five years.

Item agreed to.

Halifax and Newfoundland, via Cape Breton ports, steam service between, $5,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I notice there is a mercantile marine service in Newfoundland. Why is there a subsidy as well?

Mr. LOW: This service starts from Halifax, the other from Montreal and Sydney.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would not the Sydney boat call at Halifax?

Mr. LOW: This could not be done without great inconvenience. It is an entirely different type of boat.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What company has this work?

Mr. LOW: Farquhar and Company, Halifax.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much was paid for the service from Sydney before the mercantile marine took it over?

Mr. LOW: There was no subsidized service from Sydney. This boat performed the service prior to the mercantile marine taking it over.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If this boat called at both places before, why cannot the mercantile marine boats call now?

Mr. LOW: This is a small boat that goes through the Bras d'Or lakes; the mercantile marine boats are too large.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was a subsidy previous to the Sydney service by the mercantile marine. What was the subsidy which covered both ports?

Mr. LOW: $10,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So the facts are these: Previously for a small boat that would go through the Bras d'Or lakes, calling at Sydney and Halifax, and proceeding to Newfoundland we paid a subsidy of $10,000.

Mr. LOW: As against a subsidy to-day of $5,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For a small boat going through the Bras d'Or lakes and calling at Halifax alone.

Mr. LOW: The same boat.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The same small boat; and the mercantile boat made a profit last year of $40,000. That is the evidence, I see, of Sir Henry Thornton before this commission; I was just reading it to-night. So in addition to earning the $40,000 it saves us a subsidy of $5,000 and gives a separate and large boat service instead of a single and small boat service.

Mr. LOW: It is to our advantage, of course, to save that $5,000, and we have a profitable service the other way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I see that. I was just pointing out that we saved the subsidy and got a far better service now, and make a profit besides. This boat must not be such a decrepit thing as the others that are so much complained of. It must be a fairly good boat. With regard to item 189, what is the name of the company?

Mr. LOW: The Halifax & Sheet Harbour Steamship Company. That service goes to Spry Bay and on to Cape Breton.

Item agreed to.

Halifax, South Cape Breton and Bras d'Or lake ports, steam service between, $5,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Why the decrease in this item?

Mr. LOW: The company are making a fair profit, so we decreased the subsidy.

Mr. SPENCER: What profits are allowed before the subsidy is decreased?

Mr. LOW: There is no fixed amount. It depends on the capital charges or capital investment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does it depend on who owns the ship?

Mr. LOW: No, not in our case.

Mr. SPENCE: How do you arrive at the amount paid by way of subsidy? Is there never any change?

Mr. LOW: I have endeavoured to decrease some subsidies as my hon. friend will notice.

Mr. SPENCE: There is one lower; should they not all be lower?

Mr. LOW: We call for tenders and the lowest tender is accepted, unless we decide to renew the contract with whatever company has had it.

Item agreed to.

Halifax and west coast of Cape Breton, calling at way ports, steam service between, $6,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It seems very strange that there should be so many boats over the same route, between Halifax and Cape Breton.

Mr. LOW: This is the west coast. I have looked into these services and I do not think there is any duplication.

Mr. MEIGHEN: About how much profit is being made on this one?

Mr. LOW: A very small profit. The financial reports are received in confidence, but I have no objection to showing them to any hon. member if he will call at my office.

11 p.m.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it not only fair that where a company is getting a subsidy from the government its bookkeeping should be made public?

Mr. LOW: I question whether that would be wise. As I say, however, I should be glad to show any hon. gentleman the statements if he will call at my office, because I know that it would be treated in confidence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister consider using on these services some of the boats that he is standing up for and his Minister of Marine is standing up for, thus avoiding the payment of subsidies? They are small boats and they would likely go through the Bras d'Or lakes.

Mr. LOW: I question very much whether they could be used there, I have not looked into the matter. However, it is worth looking into.

Item agreed to.

Mainland and islands of Miscou and Shippegan, service between, $2,000.

Mr. SPENCE: What is the reason for the reduction?

Mr. LOW: They showed a fair profit.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the name of the company?

Mr. LOW: Gloucester Navigation Company, Limited.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it impossible to get boats to ply between these points without a subsidy?

Mr. LOW: As soon as we threaten to reduce the subsidy they say they will withdraw, so we usually stand by it. On the other hand, if the subsidy were withdrawn the rates would be increased. When we grant a subsidy we have control of the rates, and we have the right of ratifying any rates that are put into effect.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is passenger and freight rates?

Mr. LOW: Yes, passenger and freight rates.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does the department have an accounting from these shipowners as to the whole of the year's operations?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: I should like to point this out: On the surface the amount paid in subsidies to steamship companies for these services looks like a lot of money, but it is possible there is just one feature that is not apparent to hon. members who have not lived in the small places served by these steamships. In many cases they are small communities on isolated islands or headlands and are without railway communication. Even with the existing service I think most of us would not want to be placed in the same position at all. Without these subsidies it would be impossible for them to have any regular means of communication. For example, take the case of a man who is raising produce in one of these isolated spots and wants to get that produce to the market in some of the larger towns. It is impossible for him to get across, we will say to Halifax, with his produce unless a regular service is provided. Without such a service there might be a danger of such places becoming depopulated. It is not only a matter of the inhabitants obtaining their mail but of getting their produce to market. And in many cases there would be great difficulty in inducing the shipowner to put his steamship on the route unless a subsidy were granted. I think I am safe in saying that without such a service there would be danger of these particular places becoming depopulated. The hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) would know more about the conditions because I imagine he lives very close to them. However, I know such a condition exists. I confess that it looks as though a lot of money is paid for these services but it provides a means of transportation to the people who are carrying on a line of production both in fishing and in farming, and it enables them to stay where they are and produce and maintain the population of the country. That being so I think it is money well spent.

Mr. SPENCE: I should like to get a little information about this vote; I must confess I am ignorant in regard to it. How many months in the year do these boats operate that are giving the service from the mainland to those particular islands which my hon. friend (Mr. Caldwell) spoke about. He has figured that the population in one of these islands is small. Now, I presume these boats are simply carrying the passengers who live there backwards and forwards, delivering mail and so on. I should like to have particulars about the service that is carried on, and whether it would not be necessary to move the inhabitants off these islands to the mainland seeing that it requires so much in subsidies to maintain the services in question. My hon. friend (Mr. Caldwell) led me to believe that these islands were miniature islands. Well, there is lots of room on the mainland in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Why do not these people leave these islands and settle there? It may be that some of these places are just summer resorts and the people frequenting them are getting the benefit of these services.

Mr. CALDWELL: I hope I did not leave a wrong impression on the mind of the hon. member. This applies to the people of the mainland because there are many communities so located. If you look at the map of the Maritime provinces you will find the coast line is very jagged; there are long points running out, and deep bays between the headlands. It is impossible to give people living in such places railway communication; in fact their only means of getting from where they live to market is by boat.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member talked about islands.

Mr. CALDWELL: I did refer to islands but communities on the mainland are similarly situated. The people on the mainland are perhaps not as isolated as regards transportation facilities as they are on the islands, but in many cases their only outlet is by the sea, the coast is a rough one and very broken, and very hard to navigate in stormy weather.

Mr. SPENCE: During how many months of the year are these boats operated?

Mr. LOW: From the opening of navigation until it closes, a period which usually lasts from May until November. On some of these islands there are from two to three thousand people.

Mr. SPENCE: Is there liable to be any increase in the population of such places, so that there would be the promise of an increase in freight and passengers to an extent that would make the operation of these boats pay?

Mr. ROBINSON: May I say just a word or two about some of the communities referred to. In some cases there are villages inhabited by three or four hundred people who have been settled there for perhaps two or three hundred years. Even on the mainland the people may, in some cases, be eighteen to twenty miles distant from a railway. It is impossible to move these people from their homes; they would not want to go any more than we would wish to move ourselves. The only communication they have with the outside world is during the summer months, say from May until November. These little steamers run along the shore. Take the coast of the Bay of Fundy with which I am familiar. The steamers call at the various ports once a fortnight, or something of that kind, and gather up the freight. Perhaps they start from St. John and call at different points as they go. I do not think it would be possible to operate these steamers without a government subsidy; in fact it is claimed they do not pay as it is, and they do not give as good or as regular a service as the people are entitled to. We have heard a lot about the inconveniences suffered by people in the West who live twenty or thirty miles away from railways. Hon. members who have a knowledge of conditions such as that may have some sympathy with these people on the Atlantic coast. They have been settled where they live for years and they grow their produce there. In many cases cultivating fertile patches of land. If a subsidy is warranted at all it surely ought to be justified in such cases as these.

Item agreed to.

Mulgrave and Guysborough, calling at intermediate ports, steam service between, $9,500.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who has the contract for this service?

Mr. LOW: The Elaine Steamship Company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How long have they had it?

Mr. LOW: For four or five years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who had the contract previously?

Mr. LOW: Hugh Cann & Sons.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the former contractors abandon the service?

Mr. LOW: They abandoned the service because they could not make any money out of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did they get the same subsidy that is now being paid?

Mr. LOW: No, slightly less. The then government—my right hon. friend's own administration, I presume—called for tenders.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much did the former contractors get?

Mr. LOW: Six thousand dollars.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Which is increased now to what amount?

Mr. LOW: To $9,500.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there better service given now?

Mr. LOW: It is the best we can get for the money. We called for tenders.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What traffic is carried by that service?

Mr. LOW: Passengers and general freight. Guysborough has no railway communication.

Mr. CALDWELL: I suppose when we get the new Guysborough railway built we will be able to cut this out?

Mr. DOUCET: Do I understand the minister to say that we are getting better service to-day than under the regime of the Cann Steamship Company?

Mr. LOW: I did not say so.

Mr. DOUCET: The increase is $3,500, and we are entitled to a little better service. I know the country down there very well; I know for what purpose the subsidy is given, and when a subsidy is increased by fifty per cent, the travelling public generally will expect to get a better service.

Mr. McISAAC: This is a daily service between Guysborough, the county town, and Mulgrave on the Canadian National, a distance of thirty-five miles. The people of Guysborough town and the surrounding district are satisfied with the service performed. The increase in the subsidy is caused by having the boat call at Queensport, an important fishing centre, and the ferry trade from that port has largely increased the revenue of the Canadian National Railway in expressage and so forth. The service is now giving every satisfaction to the people along the whole line.

Item agreed to.

Newcastle, Neguac and Escuminac, calling at intermediate points on the Miramichi river and bay, steam service between, $5,000.

Mr. LOW: The lower ports are not served at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are the lower ports?

Mr. LOW: Loggieville, Oak Point, Bay du Vin, Hardwicke and Neguac; they have no railway service.

Mr. CALDWELL: Loggieville will have railway service.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend who lives in that locality knows more about it than I do.

Mr. DOUCET: I may say for the benefit of my hon. friend from Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) that of the places named by the minister Loggieville is the only one that has railway accommodation. There is a branch line there but the others have no accommodation.

Item agreed to.

Pelee island and the mainland, steam service between, $11,000.

Mr CHURCH: I have no objection to the policy of the minister regarding these mail subsidies and steamboat subventions, but I would like to find out from the minister the policy of the government, and on what principle these subventions are granted. No province in the Dominion is suffering to-day from the lack of transportation facilities as much as Ontario. Steamboat towns like Picton and many other places are dead to-day, and the steamboat has been frozen out of the lake business in the province of Ontario owing to a monopoly. I would like to see the principle of the mail subsidy established in Ontario, and subsidies granted to the small steamboats. These boats have had to go out of business, for instance, on the bay of Quinte. They should be given a subsidy in return for services rendered, and we would have a better mail service. Dear knows, in rural Ontario the mail service is not what it should be, as has been explained by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys). I have no objection to these particular grants, but I doubt if they come within the meaning of the British North America Act as being works for the general advantage of Canada. I think the principle of granting subsidies should be extended to the province of Ontario and subsidies should be given to the boats running to towns on the north shore of lake Ontario and to boats calling at ports on lake Huron, where they have only one through service a day. Some of them have not even that. The result is that we have to depend very largely on the rural mail delivery. The Maritime provinces get this particular form of service from the Department of Trade and Commerce. I do not see why the principle should not be extended to the province of Ontario. Such subsidies have not been granted to this province.

Mr. LOW: In the province of Ontario the service was started about twenty years ago from the mainland to Pelee island, and it has been continued ever since.

Mr. CHURCH. I am not objecting to the particular vote, because no doubt it is necessary, but every vote should be on a basic principle, and if you are going to adopt the principle of giving to the Maritime province services by boats and branch and trunk lines to rural places which have many other forms of transportation, the principle should be extended to Ontario. You are giving them a boat service and subsidizing that service. I brought up this question last year, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce on that occasion appreciated my argument, as will be seen by a reference to Hansard. He said something was going to be done to give the boat service a chance in Ontario. It is time something was done in the way of subsidies and subventions to assist the boat business in Ontario. It is very badly needed. If you compare the mail service by boat on Georgian bay, and in the Muskoka district, and around Windsor on the Canadian side with the service rendered on the American side, you will see that we are far behind the times. If the Maritime provinces are to be given subsidies I think these subsidies should be extended to Ontario and other parts of Canada. They need some subventions to build up the steamboat business. It is not right to permit that business to be run by a monopoly. These boats cannot run without some assistance from the government. I am very much in doubt, however, whether these subsidies come within the British North America Act. However, if they come under the British North America Act, and the government is going to build up the Maritime provinces by granting these subsidies, the principle should be extended to Ontario. The rural parts of Ontario have been demanding better service. They have not the boat subventions and the mail subsidies which they should have and which the other provinces have. I should like to see the Maritime provinces get everything they can, because the country in my opinion did not keep faith with them. There are many parts of new Ontario and of old Ontario which have a very poor service and cannot under present conditions get a better service. The Canada Steamship Company has frozen out all these small steamboat operations at Sarnia, along the Detroit river and along the north shore of lake Ontario as far as Belleville. They have monopolized the boat business and driven all the small boats out of commission. The only remedy is to give the small boats a subvention. I hope the minister in the recess of parliament will look into the matter of subsidizing Ontario in regard to the boat business.

Mr. SPENCE: I object to the vote carrying. This Pelee island vote is the only one in the province of Ontario.

Mr. CAHILL: What constituency is the vote in?

Item agreed to.

Mulgrave, Arichat, and Petit de Grat, steam service between, $10,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where are these large points?

Mr. LOW: In Nova Scotia, on the Gut of Canso.

Item agreed to.

Pictou, Murray Harbour and Georgetown, steam service between, $6,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who has this contract?

Mr. LOW: There was no service last year. We are going to call for tenders.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was a vote last year.

Mr. LOW: It was not used.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was there a service the year before?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the company's name?

Mr. LOW: La Have Steamship Company of West La Have.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much did they get?

Mr. LOW: $6,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why did they quit?

Mr. LOW: They could not make any money.

Mr. SPENCE: Can the minister get anyone else?

Mr. LOW: We are going to try again this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It looks as if there was not much business doing.

Mr. LOW: There cannot be a great deal or somebody would take up this service. If any steamship company were sure that with the $6,000 subsidy a profitable service could be established the service would have been taken up.

Mr. CHURCH: Am I to understand that these mail subsidies and steamship subventions apply only to the Maritime provinces? I cannot understand how, by the wildest stretch of imagination, these can be said to be works for the general advantage of Canada so as to come under the jurisdiction of this parliament. There are just as many ports in Ontario that have no form of transportation and that need a service for carrying mails and freight. In some of those places the mails and freight have to go by wagon route and other kinds of routes. That is the case in old Ontario, the Nipissing district, the Muskoka district, the district along the north shore of lake Ontario and many other parts of lake Ontario, and the Georgian bay district. This principle should be extended to the province of Ontario. Just fancy what a difference it would make if a subsidy of $15,000 or $20,000 were given to a steamship company to carry mails and freight between Napanee and other places on the bay of Quinte and the county of Prince Edward. This county is stagnant to-day and the population has decreased on account of lack of transportation facilities. There used to be a boat service all along the bay of Quinte, but it has been frozen out to-day. If a subsidy could be given for a boat plying between Napanee, Desoronto and these other places, those parts of Ontario would come into their own, and they are just as much entitled to a mail subsidy for a boat to carry mails and freight as the Maritime provinces. I am not objecting to these mail subsidies and steamship subventions for the Maritime provinces, but there should be equality of treatment. Old and new Ontario alike are stagnant to-day and things are dead in that province simply because of lack of adequate transportation facilities. The minister should have a survey made of Ontario in order to see whether it would be advisable to grant subventions in order to build up the province and to act as a controller of rates. Three hundred and twenty-four municipalities in Ontario voted for a railway system of their own because they were so sick of the service that the steam railways were giving them, and a subvention of $10,000 a year for a mail and freight service would be enough to establish a boat service in all the small towns of Ontario along the Great lakes. This matter was brought up last year and the year before but nothing has been done. There is no province in the Dominion suffering worse than Ontario on account of lack of transportation facilities and I should be glad if the minister would make a survey of the province because the former minister was going to do so but did not take any action.

Mr. LOW: I shall be very glad to make a survey.

Item agreed to.

Pictou, Mulgrave and Cheticamp, steam service between, $11,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was a service carried on last year?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What company has it?

Mr. LOW: The North Bay Steamship Company of Port Hood, N.S.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Are Mulgrave and Port Mulgrave the same?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It seems to be a very important place. Many of these services seem to radiate from Mulgrave or Port Mulgrave.

Mr. LOW: My friends from the Maritime provinces say that it is a very important place. Seriously though, it is the "jumping off" place between Nova Scotia and Cape Breton.

Mr. DUFF: I might, perhaps, explain to hon. members from other parts of the Dominion that Mulgrave is the connecting point between Nova Scotia and Cape Breton, and passengers from Halifax and other parts of the Maritime provinces get off at Mulgrave to take steamers for Arichat, Guysborough, Inverness, Cheticamp and other points along the shore.

Item agreed to.

Pictou, New Glasgow and Antigonish county ports, schooner service between, $1,500.

Mr. SPENCE: Have we a breakwater or wharf at all these little peninsulas out in the sea? Are they little summer resorts for individuals?

Mr. LOW: Not at all. If my hon. friend would ask the Minister of Public Works, he would be glad to answer these questions.

Mr. SPENCE: Last year, when we were discussing the estimates of the Minister of Public Works we were building a dock for every individual living around the shore there. Now we are providing a boat service for those people.

Item agreed to.

Port Mulgrave, St. Peter's, Irish Cove and Marble mountain, and other ports on the Bras d'Or Lakes, steam service between, $10,350.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why the increase?

Mr. LOW: It is not possible for us to carry on the service without this extra amount and the service is an important one. We are not losing money on it. Certain improvements are contemplated.

Mr. THURSTON: What are the proposed improvements?

Mr. LOW: I have not the details here but I shall be glad to show them to my hon. friend if he will drop into the office. The contract is only for one year and we can discontinue it next year if that is advisable.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. KYTE: The Bras d'Or lakes are of course inland waters; they are in the island of Cape Breton, and the service which is afforded under this vote accommodates a large farming country. The markets are in the mining centres of Cape Breton county and this boat is subsidized to perform a service which has been rendered now for twenty-five years. The service performed heretofore was not considered adequate. More ports of call have been added and in order to meet the requirements of the people who have no railway accommodation in that part of the country and who therefore are entirely dependent upon these subsidized steamers it is necessary that water communication shall be maintained. This service is an important one and is successful. As time advances and the population increases further accommodation becomes necessary periodically.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the population increasing?

Mr. KYTE: In certain centres it is. Marble Mountain, and Iona are important farming districts, and the population has increased in these places and in the mining towns. There are more products consumed in the mining certres to-day and there is therefore a greater necessity for continuous communications.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is the service weekly?

Mr. KYTE: It is a tri-weekly service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not understand why there should be half a dozen different companies running boats on the Bras d'Or lakes. There are several places in the estimates where subsidies are provided for boats in these lakes. The Bras d'Or lakes are of course beautiful but they are not very large. Would it not be more economical if one concern had the whole thing in hand and if one subsidy were voted?

Mr. KYTE: The same company owns all these different boats. For instance, the boat that operates in the north part of Cape Breton is owned by the same company that owns some other boat, such as the Richmond, which operates on a different route.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would suggest to the minister that as he has made considerable progress we should now adjourn.

Mr. LOW: I have not many more items.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The next one is an item that will require some discussion and we have already passed the hour of adjournment.

Mr. LOW: There are only a few more items.

Mr. DUFF: Go on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member says, go on.

Mr. DUFF: This is the middle of June, I want to get home.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We heard a different tune when the hon. member was on this side.

Mr. DUFF: I would help you if I were sitting there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a different opposition now. We have had a fair discussion of each item and reasonable progress has been made.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend used to keep us until two o'clock.

Mr. LOW: I should like to get items 181 and 182 carried.

The CHAIRMAN: These items are:

Charlottetown and Pictou, steam service between, $8,000.

Charlottetown, Victoria and Holliday's Wharf, steam service between, $4,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Items agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GRAHAM moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What will be the business to-morrow?

Mr. GRAHAM: To-morrow we shall take up certain resolutions and bills standing in the name of the Minister of Justice. Following that probably we shall take up the bill in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce with reference to the Gold and Silver Marking Act, and probably one or two other bills. Thereafter we shall take the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, followed by the estimates of the Public Works department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will all the resolutions standing in the name of the Minister of Justice be taken up, and if so are they first?

Mr. GRAHAM: Among those that will be taken up will be Orders: No. 22, second reading of Bill No. 39 to amend the act to authorize re-arrangements and transfers of duties in the Public Service; No. 23, second reading of Bill No. 65, to amend the Judges Act; No. 27, second reading of Bill No. 116, to amend the Exchequer Court Act; No. 28, second reading of Bill No. 117, to amend the Expropriation Act; and No. 32, second reading of Bill No. 120 to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That ought to be enough.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Minister of Justice did not think that they would take very long, but it is just possible he may be under a misapprehension as to the length of time they will require. We shall also take Order No. 39, the second reading of Bill No. 176 to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act, 1913. After that we shall go into supply taking up the estimates I have outlined. Before the House adjourns I want to say that by agreement, as I am informed, between the different parties interested the Church Union bill will be taken up on Tuesday next and the day will be devoted to the discussion of that measure. It is earnestly hoped by all those who are anxious to get through that hon. members will be on hand so that if possible the discussion may be concluded on that day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is quite right in so far as the leaders go; I agreed to Tuesday, but I had no opportunity to consult anyone else. If there is any hon. gentleman anywhere who has a very valid objection to the discussion taking place on Tuesday he should be allowed to express it now; the debate is an important one.

Mr. GARDINER: I understood that next Tuesday the question would come up with reference to the disallowance of the Alberta Tax Act. The Minister of Justice had agreed to have that question discussed then owing to the fact that it had been postponed for several days.

Mr. GRAHAM: I spoke to the Minister of Justice as to Tuesday being fixed for the discussion of the Church Union bill, and he was perfectly agreeable. It is a very important measure, and as it is thought wise that members should have notice several days ahead, I trust my hon. friend will not raise any objection to the course taken. The discussion of the other subject which he refers to can be transferred to another day without any loss of time.

Mr. GARDINER: Provided, then, that this other discussion will take place some other day with the consent of the government, I have no objection at all.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

Wednesday, June 18, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): I move, seconded by Hon. Mr. Robb, that the name of Mr. Good be substituted for that of Mr. Kennedy, (Edmonton), on the select standing committee on Public Accounts.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

RENTAL OF POSTAL STATION

Mr. FOURNIER:

1. What is the yearly rent paid for the postal station, occupying part of La Patrie building, at the corner of St. Catherine street and City Hall avenue, Montreal?
2. How long has this building been occupied as a post office branch?
3. What was the yearly rent paid for the building previously occupied by the post office, on the north side of St. Catherine street, a short distance from La Patrie building?
4. Is it not a fact that a building just as suitable for a branch post office could be rented for at least 50 per cent less than is paid for the present location?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay): The answers to these questions are as follows:

1. $11,358 per annum.
2. Since May 1, 1917.
3. $1,680 per annum.
4. The department is not aware that equally suitable premises can be obtained for at least 50 per cent less than is paid for the present location.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ICE SUPPLY

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. What are the names of those who tendered for the supply of ice on the trains of the Canadian National railways at Charny?
2. What was the price per ton submitted by each tenderer?
3. Was the tenderer who obtained the contract supposed to pay the freight on the ice to Charny?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. (1)—Phileas Paquet, St. Romauld, Que.; (2)—Omer Gamache, Tourville, Que.; (3)—J. A. Pelletier, Riviere du Loup, Que.

2. (1)—$1.45 per ton, f.o.b. cars St. Romuald, Que.; (2)—$2 per ton, f.o.b. Monk, Que.; (3)—$1.35 per ton, f.o.b. St. Romuald, Que:

Question arising as to the suitability of ice supply at St. Romuald, and as suitable ice could be supplied from Riviere du Loup, the contract was awarded Pelletier at that point at the same price he quoted f.o.b St. Romuald.

3. No.

QUEBEC BRIDGE MAINTENANCE

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. What amount was granted for the maintenance and repair of the Quebec bridge for the years 1922 and 1923, respectively?
2. What amount was expended for the years 1922 and 1923, respectively?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. $25,000, year 1922; $20,000, year 1923.
2. $18,884, year 1922; $10,598, year 1923.

ONTARIO HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER COMMISSION

Mr. PAPINEAU:

1. How many horsepower is the Hydro power commission of Ontario exporting to the United States?
2. Have they any surplus power to export at the present time?
3. When was the last license granted to export power?

Hon. Mr. LOW:

1. Licenses granted to April 14, 1924, totalled 167,050 horsepower.
2. The department has no positive information on this point.
3. April 14, 1924, 59,850 horsepower.

PERMANENT FORCE OF CANADA

Mr. McQUARRIE:

1. Have any orders been issued to reduce the strength of the permanent force of Canada?
2. If so, when?
3. What is the reduction for each permanent corps of (a) officers; and (b) non-commissioned officers and men?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou):

1. Yes.
2. 16th April, 1924.
3.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—DIRECTORS' MEETINGS

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: A question was asked by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Ross) the other day in reference to attendance at meetings of directors of the Canadian National Railways, which was answered by myself. I discovered that one page of the answer had been omitted. The list of meetings given in the former answer ends with October 1923. I have here a list of the regular meetings between November, 1923, and May, 1924, together with certain executive committee meetings. This will complete the reply to the hon. member's questions.

November 19, 1923: Sir H. W. Thornton, Mr. E. R. Decary, Mr. Gerard Ruel, Mr. J. H. Sinclair, Col. O. E. Talbot.

November 28, 1923: Sir H. W. Thornton, Mr. E. R. Decary, Mr. Gerard Ruel, Col. O. E. Talbot, Mr. Tom Moore.

December 17, 1923: Sir H. W. Thornton, Mr. J. H. Sinclair, Col. O. E. Talbot, Mr. E. R. Decary, Mr. Gerard Ruel, Mr. Tom Moore.

January 21, 1924: Sir H. W. Thornton, Mr. James Stewart, Mr. Gerard Ruel, Mr. Tom Moore, Mr. E. R. Decary, Col. O. E. Talbot, Mr. J. H. Sinclair.

February 14, 1924: Sir H. W. Thornton, Mr. J. H. Sinclair, Col. O. E. Talbot, Mr. Tom Moore, Mr. Gerard Ruel, Major G. A. Bell, Mr. E. R. Decary, Mr. James Stewart, Mr. F. G. Dawson.

March 1, 1924: Sir H. W. Thornton, Major G. A. Bell, Mr. Gerard Ruel, Mr. Tom Moore, Mr. E. R. Decary, Col. O. E. Talbot, D. J. McDougald.

March 17, 1924: Sir H. W. Thornton, Mr. Gerard Ruel, Mr. Tom Moore, Col. O. E. Talbot, Mr. D. J. McDougald.

April 14, 1924: Sir H. W. Thornton, Col. O. E. Talbot, Major G. A. Bell, Mr. Gerard Ruel, Mr. F. G. Dawson, Mr. D. J. McDougald, Mr. E. R. Decary, Mr. Tom Moore.

May 19, 1924: Sir H. W. Thornton, Mr. J. H. Sinclair, Col. O. E. Talbot, Mr. James Stewart, Mr. D. J. McDougald, Mr. E. R. Decary, Mr. Gerard Ruel.

Executive Committee—July 24, 1923: Sir H. W. Thornton, Major G. A. Bell, Mr. Gerard Ruel, Mr. James Stewart. September 24, 1923,: Sir H. W. Thornton, Mr. J. H. Sinclair, Mr. F. G. Dawson, Col. O. E. Talbot.

STEAMSHIPS T. J. DRUMMOND AND J. A. McKEE

Mr. ARTHURS: I call attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) to a question standing in my name which was answered on Monday last. Apparently two of the answers have been omitted entirely. I would like to have the minister look into the matter.

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: I have just given an explanation and have handed in an extra page of the answer.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS

WEMBLEY EXPOSITION

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Canadian High Commissioner and the Minister of External Affairs or the Department of External Affairs, and between the British Columbia representative in London, Mr. F. C. Wade, and the Minister of External Affairs, relative to the Wembley exposition; the use of Canadian materials in the buildings thereof and the relationship of the High Commissioner of Canada thereto.

SALARIES OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): I would like to ask the government if they have any additional information to give the House regarding the dispute as to the Post Office employees wage schedule? What has become of the conference to-day between the men and the government? Also, in the event of a strike, what will the government do to move the mails and safeguard the public interest?

Mr. GRAHAM: The representative members of the cabinet are at present in conference with representatives of the postal employees.

JUDGES' ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 65, to amend the Judges' Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Residence within county court district.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the Minister of Justice explain that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Under the law at present, judges have to reside in the county for which they have been appointed. In 1919 the province of Ontario enacted legislation for the purpose of ultimately increasing the number of county court judges. It provided that the Lieutenant Governor in Council had authority to group two or three counties into one county court district, and when one of the judges retired or died, he would not be replaced, but the business would be done by the remaining judge or judges. This has been done in a number of cases and the number of county court judges in Ontario has actually been reduced.

The object of this legislation is to authorize a judge who has been appointed for a county to reside at another place in the new district formed by the grouping of several counties, and to live there legally and be entitled to his travelling expenses from that place when he goes into the district which is constituted by the amalgamation of those counties.

Mr. CHURCH: What is the minister doing to reduce the number of judges in Ontario? There are 66 county court judges in that province. According to the Ontario government returns, there were 60,533 civil suits, of which about 28 per cent were in the city of Toronto where there are only six county court judges. There is a congestion in the Toronto district and I should like to know what the minister is doing in regard to it. His predecessor said that during the recess of parliament he would take this matter up and relieve this congestion in the county of York, but nothing whatever has been done yet to put the matter on a proper basis. We have about eighteen high court judges, three or four of whom at times can spend about six months' holidays on political commissions. If we are to have economy, let us have it in counties where there are two judges where there is not enough civil and criminal work for one judge. In some parts there is scarcely enough division court work for the county court judge, whereas in Toronto the work is congested. In view of the Ontario legislation, the minister ought to tell the committee what he is going to do respecting a reduction of the county and high court judges, especially when some of these high court judges can take holidays, sometimes two or three times a year, and spend months on political commissions.

Mr. BOYS: I should like to make an observation or two regarding what my hon. friend (Mr. Church) has just said. His knowledge of the work is probably confined, to some extent, to what takes place in the city of Toronto. My life has been spent in the country, and I can assure him that he is entirely in error if he thinks that county court judges are not called upon to perform a good deal of work. Any return that may be referred to at the present time will not, in my opinion, reflect the true condition of affairs. Since the amendment to the County Court Act, in my county, and I venture to say in many other counties throughout Ontario, cases are and may be sued in the county court no matter what amount of money is involved, and unless the jurisdiction of the court is disputed, those cases proceed to trial in the county court. My own firm and many other firms in Simcoe are continually bringing actions in the county court where, as a rule, the jurisdiction is not disputed and the cases go to trial there. On account of that the county court judge has a great deal more work to do and, perhaps, two years from now the returns, when they are secured, will reflect that feature which they do not reflect at present.

I agree with what my hon. friend says in connection with the work in Toronto. There is no question that the county court judges there work very hard, and it may be that something should be done. Possibly the scheme which the minister has will relieve that to some extent by bringing in outside judges from time to time for use in Toronto. That was done in the past and it can be done in the future. But I do not wish to allow to pass unnoticed the statement that judges in the county courts in Ontario or elsewhere in Canada are not having a good deal of work to do. They certainly are. Our county is a large one and we have two judges. I think I may say that outside of the judges, perhaps, in Toronto, Hamilton, Ottawa and London, they have certainly as much or more to do than any of the other judges and they are kept fairly well occupied. The returns as to cases are not reliable data to go upon. A judge in the country may have to travel twenty or thirty miles to try one or two division court cases, and if you look only at the returns, it would appear that he was having very little to do. It means, however, that he leaves his home in the morning or, perhaps, the night before, and he has to spend the whole day there for the convenience—and properly so—of the litigants in that particular place. A judge in Toronto leaves his home at half past nine, ten or eleven o'clock and sits in court until four, half past four or sometimes five o'clock in the afternoon and he is never away from home. That is a consideration that must not be overlooked. I venture to say that most judges would prefer to be engaged continually from ten o'clock to four or half past four in the afternoon and have no travelling to do rather than spend many days in the year away from home. I trust if any consideration is to be given to what has been said, the minister will bear in mind that feature.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the minister doing to place the county court judges of Toronto upon something like a fair basis? It is common knowledge to both of us that the great bulk of the work of the province is done at Toronto. The hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) is not quite right in connection with the hours that the Toronto county court judges work. They have to leave home, as a rule, at nine o'clock in the morning, and at one time when I was practising in Toronto, when I was county crown attorney—and the situation is worse now—we used to sit regularly while the sessions were on from nine in the morning to nine, ten or eleven o'clock at night. I have gone home at two o'clock in the morning. Why? Because there was such a congestion of business, and sometimes we had one quarterly session of the peace ending the Saturday before the next jury were brought there on the following Tuesday. The work is very heavy. I am referring not so much to the volume of work, although that of itself would justify very sympathetic consideration from the minister. But we have had recognition in this House of different standards of living and expenses in different places. We have a difference of $2,000 a year,—if I remember rightly, and my hon. friend will correct me if I am wrong—in salaries paid to circuit court judges in Montreal whose jurisdiction is confined to cases involving sums of $100 or less. In Ontario we have no such limitation. The Toronto judges are exposed to exactly the same cost of living in that city as the Montreal judges are. Their rents are very high. I do not know how they live on the salaries they now receive. From what I know of some of them, I am inclined to think they are living on their capital at the present time to a limited extent. That is not a sound position. It was thought to be unsound in Montreal and the salaries there were increased. Why should the Montreal principle not be applied to Toronto, more particularly in view of the fact that there is a practically unlimited jurisdiction in the one case and a very limited jurisdiction in the other? I am quite aware that there are difficulties in my hon. friend's path; I am sure he will say at once, for example, that it would be invidious to make a distinction between judges whose jurisdiction is similar. But the fact is that this anomaly of which I have spoken exists to-day. I think I can safely say that when I was a practising attorney, about forty per cent of all the criminal business of the province was done in that city. The matter is an old one. As pointed out by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church), the minister's predecessor took it into consideration; he approached the subject from two aspects, one being whether in view of the volume of work entailed there should not be an extra stipend. The fact of the volume of the work was admitted, but there was an uncertainty as to the principle involved. The other aspect from which the minister's predecessor considered the question was the extra cost of living at that point. The then minister wanted to do something, and I submit that he certainly gave the judges to understand that during the intermission he would consider the question and bring down some measure of relief. Will my hon. frind make some reassuring statement?

Mr. LAPOINTE: With regard to the first part of the remarks of my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Church) as to the congestion of work in the county of York, I may observe that this matter does not come directly under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice inasmuch as the organization of tribunals lies within the sphere of the province. There is no doubt that the judges of the county of York who are administering justice in Toronto have a considerably larger amount of work to do than have the judges of the other districts of the province. Applications have already been made that special treatment be given those judges in the way of increased salaries. It has also been represented that in the districts of Hamilton, London and Ottawa there is legitimate ground for special consideration. The matter presents some difficulty; as my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) himself admits, it would be somewhat unwise to discriminate between judges of the same jurisdiction and standing. There is no doubt, however, that especially in the case of Toronto where the judges are overwhelmed with work a larger salary than is at present paid is deserved. But I would hesitate to open the question of increasing judges' salaries at this session.

Mr. LANCTOT: It would not be popular.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend from Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Lanctot) applauds that statement; but the demand is being made and certainly it will have to be considered seriously. The present discussion, however, is hardly relevant under this bill. There was an agreement, about which I think my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) knows, between the previous government and the government of Ontario, when the salaries of county court judges were increased, that the number of judges should be reduced; and the province has enacted legislation to that end. The Attorney General of Ontario has indicated the districts which have been formed by the grouping of two or three counties where a lesser number of judges can do the work, and this has been the policy pursued both by the previous and the present government. Only recently there was in the county of Huron a vacancy which has not been filled, that county having been added, I think, to Perth to form a new district. There is therefore no longer any necessity for a judge in Huron and no new appointment has been made. The purpose of this bill is merely to determine the most convenient place in the whole district for the residence of the judge.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is it not reasonable that when the readjustment takes place there should be an improvement in the salaries of the judges in the county of York, in view of the greater amount of work they have to do?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I should like to have a general expression of opinion as to whether that is advisable and whether it would be good policy to discriminate in the matter of the salaries paid to judges administering justice in the respective districts.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I agree with the minister that there is a good deal of difficulty about the question of adjusting judicial salaries, and that difficulty arises largely from the fact that our counties or judicial districts, particularly in the province of Ontario, are by no means all alike. There is a great disparity between the judicial districts; there is a great difference in their respective areas; there is a great difference in the facility or the difficulty of travelling from place to place; and there is also a difference in the population of one as compared with another. There are some counties in Ontario where one judge can perform all the judicial duties and have time to spare; but I do not think that is the case in the great majority of our counties. The Ontario legislature passed an act to overcome that difficulty by grouping certain counties for the purpose of reducing the number of judges and thus saving the extra cost in salaries to the country. There are counties like York where there is always a great pressure of business and where a very large proportion of the litigation in the province takes place. My hon. friend (Mr. Church) stated a moment ago that about 28 per cent of a certain class of cases arising in the province were disposed of in Toronto. The county in which I live is fairly compact and has a population of some 55,000. Hitherto we have always enjoyed the distinction of having two county judges, but after the passage of recent legislation in Ontario the number was reduced to one. Simcoe county, represented by my hon. friend who sits behind me (Mr. Boys), has I believe a population of about 90,000, and territorially it is a very much larger county than the county of Wellington. Simcoe still has two county judges, and I maintain that there is as much work for one county judge, if not more, in the county of Wellington as there is for two in the county of Simcoe. At the same time, let me add, the two county judges in Simcoe perform in a year as much judicial service as do the county judges of the county of York. It would be very difficult under these circumstances to discriminate in the matter of judicial salaries. If the minister thinks that the time has come when there should be an increase in those salaries,, all well and good but I think that increase should apply to all county judges alike, whether they be in Toronto or in the most remote districts of Ontario. I for one am inclined to think that judicial salaries might well be increased. I am aware that there is no unanimity of opinion upon the point, and I am expressing only my own view. I think that the county court judges in this province are still underpaid, the high court judges likewise, but whether this is the proper time to advocate an increase in their salaries I do not know. This bill, however, is certainly a move in the right direction. When the legislature of Ontario grouped the counties, a difficulty arose as to where the judge was to be located, where we could expect to find him; and particularly is this bill necessary because it will fix the point from which the judge will base his calculations for travelling expenses. I assume that that is one of the important objects of the proposed measure.

There are a large number of judicial functions arising in Ontario under the Municipal Act entirely unconnected with litigation, such as questions of assessment and appeals from municipal assessments. Judges in Ontario are also police commissioners, in which capacity they have to perform duties of various kinds not altogether judicial in character. When all these extra duties are taken into consideration, I submit, judicial salaries in Ontario, whether for high court judges or county court judges, cannot be termed exorbitant, and I think the minister might well consider the propriety of some increase.

Mr. BRISTOL: Is it correct that certain judges in Montreal are paid higher salaries than county judges in the province of Quebec by reason of the fact that their expenses are greater in Montreal than they would be in the rural districts?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, the judges of the high court in Montreal are paid exactly the same salaries as the judges in the rural districts. My friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) was referring to the judges of the circuit court; they are in a class by themselves and are not like the county court judges in Ontario, who have the same standing and the same jurisdiction all over the province. The circuit court at Montreal is a special tribunal with a special standing, and apart from the jurisdiction which my friend has referred to these judges have jurisdiction in all municipal matters, and it is well known by litigants and the bar that those judges have a very considerable amount of work to do. Their salaries are not as high as those of the high court judges, but, it is true, they are higher than the salaries of the county court judges of Ontario.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Two thousand dollars more, is it not?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think it is.

Mr. BRISTOL: Since there has been taxation of incomes, have judges' salaries been increased at all?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think they have.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): It follows from what the minister has said that the legislature of Ontario ought to create a special court for Toronto.

Mr. LEADER: Mr. Chairman, I know it will appear somewhat audacious for a farmer to discuss matters pertaining to judges and lawyers, but I understand that the hon. minister has intimated that the judges are making a demand for increased salaries. I also understand that the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) upholds that viewpoint and thinks that an increase would not do any harm. In view of this, I beg to submit some figures contained in an answer to a question which I put on the order paper on April 14, last. I was informed that we have 280 judges in the Dominion. I do not know how that figure compares with the judiciary in other countries, such as the United States or England, but I venture the guess that we are overmanned in this respect as well as in respect to other governmental machinery. I was also informed that the annual salaries paid our judges in 1919 were $1,452,554.57. In 1920, I think in conjunction with the increase of parliamentary indemnities, the salaries of the judges were increased, the aggregate amounting to $529,845.43. The total salaries paid our judges now are $1,982,440. In addition to these salaries we also have to meet a bill for travellling expenses, which last year amounted to $134,623.47. Not only have we 280 active judges, but we have 38 on the retired list, these being in the fortunate position of drawing very remunerative pensions, the total paid them on this account last year being $179,166.63, or an average of $4,714.90. In view of the condition of the country I think we are paying our judges too much. There is a demand for economy all along the line, and it seems to me that, although many of these judges are eminent men deserving of all we can give them, they are also rich and should not expect such high salaries. I have been met with the argument that a good lawyer can always command a high salary. We have evidence that this is the case, for we know that our government will pay lawyers from $200 to $250 a day to take a case—yes, I believe in the case of W. N. Tilley they paid $400 a day. So there is no doubt something in the argument that good lawyers can get more money in private practice than they would receive on the bench. I am taking this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to protest against any increase in judges' salaries.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I have searched this bill in vain to find anything in it in connection with salaries of judges, and I think that the whole discussion is out of order. Let me therefore practise economy in time by getting back to the subject of the bill. I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice if he would accept an amendment so that the section would read, "the provinces of Ontario and British Columbia." The conditions existing in British Columbia are parallel with those existing in Ontario, and if it is just and proper—and I quite believe it is—that the federal government which appoints the judiciary, should also designate the place at which they should reside within their district, then it is equally applicable to British Columbia. I do not know whether he is perfectly acquainted with the facts, but his predecessor in office was advised of conditions in British Columbia which rendered an amendment such as I have indicated very desirable.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The matter has not been called to my attention at all. This bill is intended to meet special conditions arising in Ontario on account of the act which was passed by the legislature of Ontario in 1919 grouping together many counties for the purpose of the administration of justice. I do not know that the same conditions exist in British Columbia. The law as it is to-day compels a judge to live in his county, but we have to change it on account of the new conditions in Ontario. Has there been special legislation enacted in British Columbia organizing a new system of grouping of counties?

Mr NEILL: No, there has not been any grouping of counties; but this condition arose: in a certain district there was one county court judge, who resided, as the law provides, anywhere within the riding. Owing to the sparsely settled character of the district and the long distances to be travelled it was desired to have another judge to reside in the northern or more scattered portion of the district. After a great deal of agitation extending over a number of years this was granted and the second judge, when he was appointed, elected to reside not in the scattered portion of the district, where he was required and for the sole purposes of which he was appointed, but in the southern portion, a location more convenient to him. He is now drawing the salary, without being of any advantage to the government or to the lawyers or the people of the district wherein he resides. He really helps the other judge do what that other judge was quite able to do himself. He is within his rights, because he is living within the county. While this is not a question of the grouping of districts, the condition arises precisely there as in Ontario. The government is passing legislation here taking power to direct any judge to reside in any portion of his new district, or group district, as it may be. The principle is the same: you are not saying here that a judge shall reside somewhere in this group district, but that he shall reside at that point in his group district which the government shall designate. I submit that that is a parallel case, and that there could be no harm in taking similar powers in that respect to those now being taken for Ontario.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I understand that what my hon. friend mentions is a condition which prevails only in one particular place.

Mr. NEILL: So far it has taken place only in one county, because there is no other country district where there are two judges, but it is apt to occur at any place. One error is quite sufficient to justify our making provision for it, now that we are passing an act dealing with the matter. As the government retain the power in their own hands, no harm can be done if the government afterwards find it inadvisable to exercise that power. It is identically the same principle in British Columbia as in Ontario; it is a question of the taking of power to designate the residence of a judge within his jurisdiction.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think my hon. friend should let this legislation go without the addition of the amendment he suggests. This is to meet a special provincial condition arising out of legislation applying to Ontario alone. I shall be pleased to consider the question submitted by my hon. friend and I assure him that if any legislation is necessary owing to the circumstances existing in the case to which he refers, we shall be glad to deal with the matter with a view to remedying the difficulty.

Mr. NEILL: I am obliged to the minister for his statement. But ministers of justice have a habit of passing away sometimes. We have the bill; we have the grievance; the remedy is right here, and I suggest that no great harm would result if this bill were allowed to stand over for another day, with a view to amending it as I suggest.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I doubt very much whether the bill now before the committee would meet the situation in British Columbia. The bill is drawn precisely to meet a situation in Ontario which has arisen as a result of action by the legislature of the province. If the legislature of British Columbia passed an act similar to the legislation passed by Ontario I have no doubt that the bill could be amended as my hon. friend suggests. But until we have evidence that British Columbia has passed an act to apply the grouping system, I think it would be entirely inappropriate to amend a bill drawn especially for Ontario. I rose particularly to say a word in reply to the hon. member (Mr. Leader). I admit that the question of judicial salaries does not arise directly in this bill, and I only mentioned the matter in response to the invitation of the minister that the opinion of hon. members be given on the subject. I did have reason to look into the matter with some care in 1920 when the salaries of judges generally were increased. I found then what I think you will find to-day, that judicial salaries in Canada are far less than they are in Great Britain or in any other British dominion. There is no comparison between judicial salaries in Canada and those in the United Kingdom.

Mr. LEADER: How does the number of judges in Canada compare with that in Great Britain?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I could not answer that; I am speaking only of the amount paid to individual judges for the performance of their duty as judges. In England the judges are paid on such a high scale that we could not consider it in this country; I admit that. But comparing the salaries paid in Canada with those paid in Australia, South Africa, even New Zealand, we found in 1920, and I think you will find still to-day—though I cannot speak in regard to the figures to-day, because I have not examined them—that the salaries of judges in Canada are substantially less than those of judges in any of the other self-governing dominions.

Mr. CHURCH: The legislature of Ontario has placed on the county court judges of York a volume of work which county court judges in no other province are required to perform. They have the work in connection with the assessment rolls, voters' lists, election courts, and so on. The duties of division court judges and a very large proportion of the High Court work of Ontario has been laid upon the county court judges. A great many of these judges work very hard. The county of York has about one-third of the population of Ontario, and one-third of all the writs issued in the province are issued in the civil courts of York county. But they have only six county judges out of a total of sixty-six in the province, so that six judges do one-third of the county court judicial work of the province, while the other sixty do the remainder of it. Let me give a few figures to show why the Ontario government passed this cluster county district legislation. The county court judges of the county of York have to call for assistance from the county court judges of the county of Simcoe, the junior judge for that county and the senior and junior judges of Ontario, Halton, Peel and many other counties. Last year 5,430 county court writs were issued in civil cases throughout the whole of Ontario, while in the county of York 2,230 were issued, or 42 per cent of the number for the whole province. In Ontario there were 163 jury trials in county courts, and in York county 54, or 33 per cent. In Ontario there were 705 non-jury trials, and in York county 273, or 35 per cent. The figures for the criminal cases are about the same. There are only three other counties that can compare with York in this respect, namely, Middlesex, Wentworth and Carleton. In Middlesex county in 1922 there were 19 judgments entered, amounting to a total of $4,447; in Wentworth, 56 judgments, amounting to $14,555; in Carleton, 18 judgments, amounting to $3,680; in York county, 317 judgments, amounting to $110,961, or half the mount—$220,000—registered for all Ontario counties. The idea of the legislation passed in Ontario must be to transfer judges from districts in which the work is light to districts where there is a greater volume of business. A meeting of the county court judges was held last September and it was felt then that the county of York judges ought to be dealt with as a special case. In view of the fact that the late Minister of Justice promised that something would be done for York county judges, I hope that action will be taken this session by the minister with a view to giving recognition to the men who do the work.

Mr. HOCKEN: In view of the fact that this is the 18th of June, I would ask if this discussion is in order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It may be in order, but I am somewhat in doubt.

Mr. CLARK: Much has been said from the point of view of the province of Ontario. I merely wish to express the opinion that discrimination at any time is a bad thing, and that if salaries in the city of Toronto, for instance, are increased for the county court judges, they should be increased in Vancouver and every other city of Canada, and I am not so sure that they should not be increased also in the rural districts.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 116, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On Section 1—jurisdiction conferred by agreement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend explain?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Section 20 of the Exchequer Court Act defines the matters in which the court has jurisdiction. That section was amended in 1916 by the addition of paragraph (g) which reads as follows:

> Every matter in which the Crown and any person interested therein have agreed that the Crown shall pay to such person an amount to be determined by the Exchequer Court.

The purpose of this amendment is to widen the effect of this clause so that the court will have jurisdiction when the Crown and any person have agreed in writing that either the Crown or that person shall pay an amount to be determined by the Exchequer court, and also in cases where any question of law or fact have been agreed upon in writing to be determined by the Exchequer court. To illustrate: when a contract is entered into by the Crown and any person, it may be stipulated in the contract that any difficulties arising out of it shall be determined by the Exchequer court, and this amendment is to confer jurisdiction upon the court to try such cases, where both the Crown and the person have agreed in writing, upon it. Matters have already been submitted to the court in similar cases, but there has always been a doubt whether the court had jurisdiction under the act. This is to make it perfectly clear and to prevent difficulty.

4 o'clock

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How does this matter come up objectively? What case has brought this question to the front?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No special matter. This amendment is suggested by the officers of the department, on account of the fact that in some contracts a clause has been inserted providing that difficulties that might arise out of the contract should be submitted to the Exchequer court. The officers of the department have a doubt as to whether the court had jurisdiction under the law as it stands to-day, even where an agreement had been signed by both parties to refer such questions to the Exchequer court.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has my hon. friend considered what the effect of this amendment will be, having regard to the volume of work of that court? The Exchequer court is fairly busy now, I understand. What volume of work does my hon. friend think is involved here? We have courts in some places that are not at all busy that might be looking after this work. Is this to be an argument for the appointment of another judge to the Exchequer court?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Nothing of the sort is contemplated. I think two judges, when they both work, are sufficient to look after all the work of the Exchequer court. My hon. friend will agree that it is desirable that matters in which the Crown is concerned should go to the Exchequer court; that is the natural tribunal to deal with all claims against the Crown or by the Crown arising for instance, under the Expropriation Act, cases for damages caused to property by reason of public works, cases under the Patent Act, and cases where there is loss of life by neglect of a servant of the Crown. And of course my hon. friend will see that these questions which may be submitted in consequence of an agreement are always matters in which the Crown has an interest, but I do not think they are so numerous as to multiply the work of the court.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I just wanted to get an assurance on that point. Of course, it is perfectly clear that the Exchequer court is looked upon as a tribunal fitted to look after all these claims against the Crown that my hon. friend refers to, and they can be referred to the Exchequer court under the law as it now stands; but questions of agreements and the like were thought to be questions which could well be looked after by the ordinary courts, and so different principles are applied to them. I am not saying but that this legislation may be perfectly all right and serve a useful purpose, but it will not serve a useful purpose if we are taking work from courts that are not now busy and are giving it to a court that is fairly fully employed. I think my hon. friend will say that the Exchequer court is a fairly busy court. I am not saying that the judges are overworked, but they are busy, and sometimes there is a lot of work put upon them.

I do not suppose my hon. friend's view is that this in any way discharges the jurisdiction of the regular courts. I mean, does he think that the Crown ought to be put in bar of an action? In the case of a contract which to-day would not be sufficient in the opinion of the law to confer jurisdiction on the court itself, because the jurisdiction cannot be conferred by agreement—my hon. friend gets around that by his admendment—would he think it proper that this jurisdiction so conferred should be treated in bar of an action in one of the regular courts; in other words, as something which would oust the jurisdiction of the regular courts?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid my hon. friend thinks that this will be a bar to a regular proceedings before a court which has jurisdiction to-day. This merely gives the Exchequer court jurisdiction which it does not possess, or which it is doubtful if it possesses. I may say to my hon. friend that this feature of additional work being imposed on the Exchequer court has been fully considered. We do not think that there will be such additional amount of work as to cause a congestion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has the matter been considered with the judges of that court?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I could not say.

Mr. CALDWELL: What tribunal deals now with the cases that are to be referred to the Exchequer court under this bill?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The ordinary high court in every province.

Mr. CALDWELL: Have they competent jurisdiction at the present time in such cases?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: And there is a question as to whether the Exchequer court has jurisdiction or not?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. BAXTER: I followed the minister's explanation, and really I see no objection to giving the Exchequer court jurisdiction in regard to the class of subjects he has enumerated. But there is something here that puzzles me, and I doubt if it has been put in intentionally. The Crown and the person agree—to what? That the Crown or such person shall pay to any person or to the Crown an amount of money to be determined by the Exchequer court. It says that the Crown or such person shall pay to any person. I cannot understand how a case could possibly come up where the Crown and an individual would agree in writing that the Exchequer court should determine that an individual should pay to some other individual. I do not think that that could ever have been intended.

I think now I shall wait until the impertinent member stops interfering with the minister. It is discourteous to the member addressing the House, and only an hon. member of—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. McMASTER: I would draw the attention of the Chair to the fact that those who are removed more than a rod from the gentlemen who are discussing matters in this House cannot hear a word that is being said.

An hon. MEMBER: How long is a rod?

Mr. McMASTER: "Sixteen and a half feet, one rod, pole or perch."

Mr. BAXTER: When hon. gentlemen are all through talking I shall proceed with my discussion with the minister.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. BAXTER: It is quite proper to check me for remarks I have made with reference to another hon. member, but at the same time I have a right to be heard, which right some hon. gentlemen would not accord me. I am speaking on rather an important point, and I doubt whether it has been brought to the minister's attention. I intend to bring it up now. I do not propose to have the whole Progressive party conversing at the same time that I am addressing the committee. It looks as if by a certain construction it might be possible for an agreement to be made between the Crown and some individual, by which the rights as between the individual and another would be determined by the Exchequer court. I do not think that is the function of the Exchequer court. I am heartily in accord with the minister in wishing to amplify the jurisdiction of the Exchequer court, so as to get rid of any technicality and utilize that court as a court of speedy and convenient resort in all possible disputes that occur between the subject and the Crown. But I do not think the minister wants any possible interpretation argued by which the rights of two individuals would be litigated in that court in a proceeding between the Crown and one of these individuals. Yet the drafting is open to that contention. I do not think this was intended.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will take the matter into consideration.

Mr. BAXTER: I am quite willing that the bill should pass now and that the minister should look into it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are circumstances in which the Crown would not itself pay the amount which might be adjudicated to be paid in the Exchequer court by some other person. That might occur in the case of contractors on public works, where there is a power of expropriation. Damages might be caused to private property of other persons by works carried on by public contractors, and the Crown, though it is interested in the matter, might not ultimately pay the amount, which might be paid under the contract by the contractor himself. Still, it may be advisable to improve the wording of the clause, and if my hon. friend agrees, the bill might be put through committee and the third reading deferred.

Mr. BAXTER: I agree. In the case of a contract for a public work, where we have a contractor and a sub-contractor, there might be litigation with the Crown, and the amount payable to the sub-contractor might have to be dealt with in that litigation; and if it is intended that all those matters should be settled in the one action, I would have no objection to it, but I do not think it is clearly expressed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend omitted just one point in this discussion; and that is this is mere drafting, in view of the subsequent further explanation of the minister. It may be the intention to bind a man although that man does not consent.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what was hinted at a moment ago.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Always subject to the condition that there is an agreement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: An agreement between one person and the Crown that either that person or the Crown shall pay to some other person or the Crown a sum of money. The other person is not a party to the agreement in this case at all. I do not think my hon. friend really wants it put in that form. It says:

Such person shall pay to any person or to the Crown an amount of money—

That other person is not a party to the agreement.

Mr. McMASTER: Then he would not be bound by it, in my opinion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know. If the jurisdiction is given to this court to fix the amount which some other person is to be paid, why is he not bound?—unless we are going to say at once that this is idle legislation. It may be entirely idle legislation. But the minister does not want that, he wants the legislation to be effective. I think the underlying idea is that no one is to be bound by this legislation, unless first, there is an agreement in writing.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But that is not how it reads, as the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) pointed out. There are two parties to this agreement. The section says:

Such person shall pay to any person or to the Crown—

"Such person" mean the person who has agreed in writing.

There is a distinction between "such person" and "any person", because "such person" may have to pay the money to "any person." But "any person" is not a party to that agreement, but "such person" is a party. If the hon. gentleman looks at the section I think he will see that it is perfectly clear. Why not get it right? If what we want to do is to have it over cases only where everybody agrees, I should suggest that the section be worded;

The amount to be paid whenever the Crown and any person have agreed in writing that the Crown or such person shall pay to—

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Then strike out the words "any person."

—the Crown or such person as the case may be an amount of money.

And so on. That confines the matter entirely to the people who have signed a contract. Of course a dozen persons may have signed, but as, under the Interpretation Act, the plural is covered as well as the singular, we need not worry about that phase of the question. The effect of that would be that no one could be bound in any way unless he signed the contract, and if on the other hand the interpretation of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) was right that any person could do what he pleased, no matter what this legislation stated, it could not be said that we were passing an idle act. The question turns on what the minister really wants to do. Does he want to have a perfectly proper claim of a third person adjudicated upon by the Exchequer court because a contractor on one hand and the Crown on the other agree between themselves that the payment to this third party shall be made as a result of a reference to the Exchequer court although that party is not a party to the contract. Are we to look upon this legislation as creating a jurisdiction based entirely on agreement, so that any person whether he is liable to pay something or has rights to receive payments will have these claims considered and adjudicated on by the Exchequer court and be bound by the court's decision only if he is a party to the agreement?

Mr. BOYS: I agree with what has been said, and I would also point this out to the minister, that unless there is some definition, in the interpretation of the word "person," this would not apply to a corporation, and I venture to say that most of the agreements would be with corporations. An idea has struck me which I will offer to the minister for whatever it is worth, namely: That the section might be worded as follows:

The amount to be paid whenever the Crown and any person or persons or corporation have agreed in writing that the Crown or such person or corporation shall pay an amount—

I do not see any object in repeating the phrase, "to any person or to the Crown." The agreement will provide that a certain sum be paid, that sum to be ascertained by the Exchequer court. If you leave those words out, you avoid the confusion. But I think you should have after the words "any person" in the second line the word "persons" which would enable an agreement to be signed not only by the department or by a contractor, but by a sub-contractor, and I have not much doubt that the intention here is to include a sub-contractor. He certainly could not or should not be included unless he was a party to the agreement. I gather that the minister has no thought of making this applicable to any person who is not a party to the agreement. If those changes were made, it seems to me that would meet the difficulty which the section, as drafted, appears to present.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Would the minister take time to consider redrafting this section? The explanatory note makes quite clear the object which the minister has in view. It says:

> The purpose of this amendment is to widen the jurisdiction of the Exchequer court so as to enable it to deal with any matters which the Crown may by agreement with any person commit to its jurisdiction.

The difficulty is that the clause, as drawn, provides for other persons who are not parties to the agreement, and the result will be that parties not parties to the agreement will be bound by the payment. I think there is something defective in the drafting. I can see quite easily the object which the minister has in view, but some time should be taken to consider redrafting.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 120, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

He said: By certain sections of the Prisons and Reformatories Act introduced in 1913, there are special provisions for the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. When Protestant girls under sixteen years of age are brought before a court for certain offences which are mentioned in the act, the judge, instead of sending them to the common jail, may send them to a place called the Maritime Home for Girls at Truro, a sort of reformatory for girls. The province of New Brunswick has built and is operating a similar institution at Moncton called the Interprovincial Home for Women. This is to authorize a judge, when it is more convenient to send the girl to Moncton, to send her there rather than to Truro.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. LAPOINTE moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. HAROLD PUTNAM (Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express in a word my very earnest approval of the excellence of the Maritime Home for Girls which happens to be in Truro in my constituency and which has been mentioned by the hon. Minister of Justice. It is managed by Miss Strothard who is a young lady of superior education and attainments and of a peculiarly humane disposition, who understands human nature and who particularly understands the somewhat unfortunate girls who are sent to that home. This home, which is a combined home and school, is among the very best institutions of its kind in existence and it is meeting with very marked success. I do not want to take up the time of the House but I am bound to express my personal pride for my constituency in this regard; the institution has done exceedingly well and though still comparatively young has established a record which is enviable throughout eastern Canada.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

GOLD AND SILVER MARKING ACT, 1913, AMENDMENT

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 176, to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act, 1913.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—"Platinum" to be applied only to articles of defined component parts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is really being done in connection with the production of platinum at the present time? No doubt the minister is familiar with this subject. A lot of ore is leaving this country in which there is a comparatively large percentage of precious metal content. During the past few years it has been possible to win platinum commercially from nickel and a very large proportion of this metal has left the country along with the platinum that has been exported. Our ores are yielding a good many other valuable by-products besides platinum, but I believe that platinum is about the most important. Is this bill being introduced at the request of the producers of platinum? And if so what is being done in connection with that industry?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Some years ago I asked in this House whether there had ever been disclosed to the people of Canada the information regarding the precious metal content of the nickel ore which was being exported from this country. That information has not yet been disclosed. We have absolute control of that nickel ore including the precious metals it contains and yet we are unable to find out what the percentage of that precious metal content is. I believe that the Right Hon. Sir Arthur Mond, who has a considerable refining plant in Wales, takes a large amount of our nickel ore and refines it in the Old Country, and so far the Canadian people, who have absolute control of the nickel ore in this country, have been unable to ascertain the percentage of the precious metal content of the ore that is exported. It is high time the people got that information. Those who demanded it during the war were unable to get it and I hope that the minister will see to it that the facts are disclosed. I think the time has come when all this nickel ore should be refined in this country; we have absolute control of nickel, platinum and these other metals, and there is no reason why we should not know just what percentage of precious metals is leaving the country. There should be a policy to establish the refining of these metals in Canada; with our control of the ores, we could supply the whole world with nickel steel.

Mr. LOW: It would be better for the hon. member to put his question to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil) who has charge of the Mines branch. He would no doubt be able to give the necessary information not only to my hon. friend but also to the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton).

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Why does the minister not hold the bill, then, until he can get that information?

Mr. LOW: If the hon. gentleman presses for the information I shall be glad to hold the bill over.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The minister might give the information on the third reading. The country would like to know why these precious metals are being exported when they should be refined in Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I asked the minister pretty much the same question when the resolution was introduced and I thought that the information would now be available; I do not see why we should not have it. This legislation must be asked for by the people who are interested in platinum. We are producing platinum and we ought to know just what is being done; we ought to know what is the necessity for looking after this particular interest. After all, this question of marking and all that sort of thing, in the absence of real national interest, only means more or less trouble to the people who are engaged in the business; that is really all it means. I know that we are producing platinum to-day, and the minister also knows it perfectly well; he knows too that we are producing platinum out of nickel ore. At Deschenes with the electrical process we are winning in Canada such a proportion of precious metals as practically makes that process feasible; we are winning 4 per cent as against 2 per cent—a difference of 100 per cent—of nickel out of the ore by means of the new process. I am sure the minister must know something about this matter. If he does not he should not introduce legislation in regard to which all this information is absolutely necessary. He must satisfy himself that the bill is in the public interest, and he cannot do so unless he knows what the facts are.

Mr. LOW: This is an entirely different matter, and I am sure a very simple question on the order paper would elicit the necessary information.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Here is a question that is bothering me. I understand that the metal called platinum if pure to the extent of 950/1000ths might be marked as platinum under the provisions of this bill. That is, if it is pure metal to that extent. Then the last line says:

—and element platinum alone or in conjunction with iridium.

What proportion of iridium will be permitted in that mixture to entitle it to be marked as platinum? Will the minister describe what iridium is and how it is mixed with platinum?

Mr. LOW: I would say that 950/1000ths of the product would require to be platinum.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is not the meaning of the bill according to the last clause.

Mr. LOW: I think so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my hon. friend will tell me who supplied this wording?

Mr. LOW: I told my hon. friend a few nights ago that at a gathering of the Canadian Jewellers' Association in the city of Windsor, at which about 400 members were present, it was requested by resolution that platinum be added to gold and silver in order that it might have the same protection as these precious metals. My hon. friend knows that if he were getting married to-day his fiancée would probably suggest that the wedding ring should be of platinum with a mixture of iridium in place of gold. It is therefore considered to be of equal value with gold.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Mr. Chairman, I am again going to point out to the minister that to-day Canada has an absolute control of the nickel supply of the world, and that associated with the nickel ore are other metals, called the "P" metals—platinum, palladium, polonium, iridium, and two or three others. I think it is time we should have information with regard to the location and quantity of these metals in the Dominion. There is no country in the world with such rich nickel deposits as ours, and nickel is becoming more and more essential in the manufacture of nickel steel. Having this monopoly, we ought to establish a nickel steel industry as a national policy, especially in view of the fact that modern warfare depends largely on nickel. This metal played a great part in the old war, and it may play a still greater part in the wars to come. This being so, in the interests of peace we ought to control our nickel deposits, and, if it is possible to do so, we should develop to its fullest extent the nickel steel industry in this country.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am satisfied that the wording of the section is wrong and does not carry out the intention of the minister. The article may be styled "platinum" if it contains 950/1000ths of that metal. I understand that. Then the section continues:

—which said article consists either of the pure metal and element platinum alone—

I understand that.

—or in conjunction with iridium.

I submit that under this wording if 1 per cent of the article was platinum and 99 per cent iridium, it could be styled platinum. I am satisfied that the clause has not been drawn to carry out the idea of the minister himself. If he can explain it, all well and good, but it is meaningless to me in its present form.

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend wishes, I shall be glad to allow the bill to stand over to enable him to satisfy himself on this point.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Will the minister get the additional information I have asked for?

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend will ask the Minister of Mines, he will no doubt supply him with the information.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

The House in committee of supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—Pictou, Souris and the Magdalen islands, steam service between, $50,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who has this contract?

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The Lovat Steamship Company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope the government has not made a contract before the vote is passed, because I see the old amount was only $24,000; this is $50,000.

Mr. LOW: I suppose my right hon. friend knows that it has been the custom for years to make contracts in anticipation of the votes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But not for double the vote.

Mr. LOW: I might point out that the population of these islands, numbering 7,000 people, is isolated for six months of the year. They import their coal and gasoline, and do a large fishing trade, and in order that they may be at no disadvantage compared with their neigbours in the United States it is necessary to improve the service. My right hon. friend will agree that these people who have communication with the mainland for only six months of the year should have a first class service. We found it impossible to give that service under the old conditions, consequently we provided for this increase. My right hon. friend will agree that I have endeavoured to cut the estimates for these subsides as low as possible. Although this service has been very much improved as a result of an increase of $26,000, on the whole I have saved a very large amount in these estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only savings up to now amount to some $2,300. This is an increase of $26,000. I see there are some appropriations not required; I presume some people are being abandoned altogether.

Mr. LOW: I do not agree with my right hon. friend when he suggests that there are only a few items amounting to a reduction of a couple of thousand dollars. The total decreases amount to $40,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was referring to the items that had been passed. I know there are $42,000 not required.

Mr. LOW: It is scarcely fair to consider them item by item. I was speaking of the subsidies as a whole.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the services that are being continued there is a very considerable increase. It seems strange that for 1924-25 it ought to take more to run boats than it did in 1923-24 or 1922-23, because costs have gone down. But this is a striking increase—$50,000 as against $24,000. What is the extra service being given? What was the defect in the last service?

Mr. LOW: I would remind my right hon. friend that we passed items involving decreases of $21,000 and $30,500. There are several other decreases amounting to several thousand dollars.

Mr. HARRIS: Was there a tender for this service?

Mr. LOW: Yes, tenders were called for.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister say that tenders were asked for in this case, and would he tell us what tenders were received?

Mr. LOW: Three tenders were received: from Magdalen Transports, Limited, Steamer R. W. Hendry, $24,000; William Fraser, new steamer to be built specially for the route, $50,000; Messrs. Young and Burchell, of Sydney, Nova Scotia, new steamer to be built, $50,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister took the highest.

Mr. LOW: The first tender was the same as before, which had been reported as unsatisfactory.

Mr. HARRIS: In what respect was it unsatisfactory?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It looks rather bad to have a tender from a company which had a steamer built specially for the route. I do not know who would build a steamer specially for the route, unless he knew he was going to get it and knew what he was going to get out of it.

Mr. LOW: The boat was entirely too slow and there was very poor accommodation for passengers.

Mr. HARRIS: What benefit are we going to get for this extra $26,000?

Mr. LOW: I have succeeded in saving a greater amount than that. We have saved $65,000, which would leave a net amount of about $40,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it incumbent on the government to see that whatever it saves on one route it gets rid of on another? We are considering this one item. The minister got three tenders, two at $50,000 and one at $24,000, and he accepted the $50,000 one. He says that was accepted from a company which built the steamer especially for the purpose. The minister read out from his memorandum that this steamer was built specially for the purpose. Now what provision had the owners of the steamer that they were going to get this contract?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. LOW: The memorandum says, "to be built." The steamer was to be built specially for the route.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not look very good.

Mr. LOW: I think it looks first rate. I am anxious to give the people of the Magdalen islands the very best service possible.

Mr. HARRIS: On which items is a saving made of $65,000?

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend will look over the estimates on page 44, he will see at a glance. It is hardly fair to ask me to give the items in detail when they are before my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have a recollection that I saw an advertisement of a company issuing bonds for the amount stated here, in which advertisement assurance was given that the government was going to give them this steamship route. Has the minister seen that advertisement?

Mr. LOW: No, I have not seen it, and it does not matter how they raise their money. I know they had the contract at that time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am pretty sure this is the one. I am going to find out.

Mr. LOW: I have heard of the advertisement, but I did not see it. It was issued after we had given them the contract.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): How many people are served by this steamship service?

Mr. LOW: I stated in my opening remarks that there were about 7,000 people on these islands. They have a service during the summer for six months, and for the other six months of the year they are isolated from the mainland.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): What will be the probable amount of freight in tons, and the number of passengers carried?

Mr. LOW: The total number of passengers carried last year was 1,675; total tons of freight carried 4,009; live stock 70; mails: locked bags, 2,734; tied sacks, 1,902.

Mr. HARRIS: How many years will this contract run?

Mr. LOW: Ten.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not usual, is it?

Mr. LOW: No, they are not usually made for ten years, but I think you will find contracts have been given before by my hon. friends for that length of time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not in one contract. It is extremely new to give a single contract for that length of time.

Mr. LOW: You could scarcely get a vessel owner to build a boat to meet the requirements if the contract was for any shorter time.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): What is the distance between the ports, and how frequent is the service?

Mr. LOW: The service is twice a week. It is seventy miles to Souris, and fifty miles to Pictou.

Mr. HARRIS: That is, one hundred and twenty miles altogether?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS: When was the contract let?

Mr. LOW: April 17, 1923.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why, the minister's estimate would be passed a good while after that. Why did not the minister come down with an estimate to cover it and tell the House the facts? The minister, I know, was not in office then, but he only had $24,000 put through, and all the time he had a contract made for $50,000 with a good party supporter in Pictou.

Mr. LOW: The officer informs me the contract was made on August 22, 1923, not April.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who are the members of this firm that got this $50,000 contract?

Mr. LOW: The contract was awarded to William Fraser and the steamship company to whom the contract has been transferred is called the Lovat Steamship Company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Fraser made the contract?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister know who he is?

Mr. LOW: He has been a contractor for several years, and is a resident—

Mr. MEIGHEN: A resident of where?

Mr. LOW: —of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Pictou?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought so. He is the right bower of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. LOW: I am not prepared to say whether he is the right or the left bower.

Mr. HARRIS: Where was this $65,000 saved? Would the minister just indicate the number of the votes?

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend will turn to page 44 he will find two columns headed "Increase" and "Decrease" respectively and if he will follow those down he will find savings as follows:

Item No.	Amount
172	$21,000
173	30,509
190	1,000
192	1,300
207	1,000
209	500

I am sure that nothing could be made clearer. The information is set out so that hon. members can get the information at a glance. I referred my hon. friend to page 44 before, and it was a very simple matter for him to have looked over these items himself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister wants us to be impressed with the fact that he has been very diligent in saving up a little money for Mr. Fraser. I read as follows from the Lovat Steamship Company prospectus. This is dated the 1st of October, 1923:

> The ship is being built in compliance with a subsidy contract entered into between Mr. William Fraser and the government of the Dominion of Canada, under which the contractor is entitled to a subsidy of $50,000, payable annually for ten years commencing with the opening of navigation in 1924. Payments under this subsidy will extend beyond the longest maturity of the bonds. All payments under the subsidy are to be assigned to the company, and by the company to the trustee, and the trust deed will provide that from these moneys the trustee will in each year pay the amount of the interest and principal payable in that year.
> Based on earnings from operation of the existing steamship service between Pictou and the Magdalen Islands for the years 1922 and 1923, with subsidies at $29,000 and $24,000 respectively—

I draw the minister's attention to the fact that last year the minister evidently considered the service too good, and had the subsidy reduced from $29,000 to $24,000. Evidently there was a different contractor then. It goes on:

> —it is estimated that the company's annual earnings will be not less than $36,000, available for interest and serial maturities of these bonds, which is at the rate of over three times the largest amount of interest payable in any year, and approximately one and two-fifths times the largest amount required in any year to pay interest on serial maturities. This estimate is arrived at without making any allowance for the very substantial increase in revenue which is expected consequent upon the greatly improved and enlarged passenger accommodation, and approximately fifty per cent greater cargo carrying capacity. The management will be in the hands of Mr. William Fraser—

It will be noted it is not put in the hands of the Minister of National Defence.

—of Pictou, N.S., as president and managing director. The Magdalen Islands are part of the province of Quebec. The population is approximately 7,000 and the islands support one of the most prosperous fishing communities on the Atlantic coast. The service which the Lovat Steamship Company, Limited, will operate is the only regular means of transport between the islands and the mainland, and this service will be operated practically without competition. Under its operating contract with the government the company has the right, with the approval of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to make direct fortnightly trips between Halifax and the Magdalen Islands, calling at Souris, Prince Edward Island, both ways. The estimate of earnings does not take into consideration this additional source of revenue.

It is quite clear that very generous treatment was afforded Mr. Fraser, and also clear that there was virtually no competition whatever in the letting of the contract. I would like to have some particulars as to who that other contractor was, and particulars also as to just what service was given, what the speed was, and how often the calls were made under the late contract, and why when a reduction was made the year before from $29,000 to $24,000 the minister suddenly felt he ought to pay $50,000 to Mr. William Fraser.

Mr. LOW: The amount of the subsidy paid was never $29,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is so stated here.

Mr. LOW: My right hon. friend knows very well that in these advertisements they put forward the very best side of the case, when bonds are offered for sale. He asks: Why did the minister reduce the estimate in the year 1923 by $5,000? I think that bears out the reason why he increased it the following year. It was the same minister who reduced the amount by $5,000 in 1923 who increased it to $50,000 within twelve months. Personally I had nothing to do with the contract.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that.

Mr. LOW: I signed it the day I came into office. The Magdalen Islands have a population of 7,000 which is growing all the time, and they ask the country for the very best service. There is not one word in anything my hon. friend has read in that advertisement which condemns this government or would tend in that direction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not likely they would condemn the government when they were getting the contract.

Mr. LOW: The hon. member has read the advertisement for the purpose of condemning the government. There is not one word of condemnation, but there is every evidence in that advertisement to show that the government were justified in making the increase in this subsidy. If the trade is going to be increased by fifty per cent and the passenger trade increased by one hundred per cent, is it not money well spent? We are spending thousands of dollars on railways in different parts of the country. Why? To increase the trade of the country and the volume of traffic in every way. My hon. friend has read to this House an article that bears out the statement made early in the day that the government were justified in increasing this subsidy and placing a first-class boat on this service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have to get down to the justification for the change at all, before we talk about justification of an item of $26,000 a year. We have been making a departure from what I think is a general rule of passing these votes annually, so that we are now faced with an increase of $260,000 in connection with this service;—it is a ten-year contract.

Mr. LOW: It is spread over ten years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes. Has my hon. friend any more ten-year contracts? Or is there any contract for any length of time for these short routes?

Mr. LOW: We will look it up.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Did the minister have any precedent before him when he saw himself signing that ten-year contract? I am just asking for information. I do not know what is being done. I have never been in that department, but if that is the practice I think we should know about it.

Mr. LOW: When calling for tenders the contractor is asked to state the minimum number of years for which he will accept the contract. Both these contracts are for ten years to provide the service required.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that we have ten years suggested by the contractor. How many years did the man who got the $24,000 contract want?

Mr. LOW: One year, for this service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it a habit of the department to put in the number of years? Is the usual practice of the department to allow the tenderers simply to say how many years they wish to have the guarantee?

Mr. LOW: That has been a part of the tender for many years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On short routes like this?

Mr. LOW: On all routes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On what authority is it done? What act enables the government of this country to bind parliament? What permits this session to compel the next session of parliament to vote $50,000?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is all subject to the vote of parliament.

Mr. LOW: All these items are subject to the vote of parliament.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I know, but while that is true in one sense, in another sense it is not correct. I think everybody realizes that if it were stated that we were not getting value for these services, we would at once be met with the argument that the country is obligated and the country's honour is involved.

Mr. LOW: I suppose my hon. friend knows that there is a clause in every contract which provides that unless the vote is passed by parliament the contract becomes null and void.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If we vote it this year, it is a contract which may be terminated next year?

Mr. LOW: It may be terminated any time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All a man has is the good faith of the government—that the government will stand by its obligations, which are for a ten-year period?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In connection with the other work which was unsatisfactory, I think we should have a statement made to the House as to what the old minimum schedule was and what the new minimum schedule will be. The government should tell us how much oftener these boats will run than they have been running in the past and what improvement there is in the actual movement.

Mr. LOW: It is an entirely different boat.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have an entirely different boat, but there is no improvement in the service.

Mr. LOW: That is not correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, there is no improvement whatever in the frequency of the service. The hours are just the same. What is the next step? Has the department any particulars of freight left because the boat was unable to carry it?

Mr. LOW: Yes, we have some.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The deputy might look it up for the minister.

Mr. LOW: That was the year 1919. The islanders were in danger of starvation, not having received their supplies of flour and oil for the winter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My recollection is that that had nothing whatever to do with the ship at that time. If we have to go back four years in order to find an excuse for the government, we are working pretty hard to help them. If I remember rightly there were ice troubles in 1919 and there was a great deal of difficulty, not only at this point, but at other points. Let us get down to something within reasonable hailing distance. What were the troubles in the year last past?

Mr. LOW: I think I stated to my hon. friend that this boat had not proper passenger accommodation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was dealing with freight for the moment. During the whole of last year what freight was left that the boat could not look after?

Mr. LOW: I have no record.

Sir HENY DRAYTON: Then I think we can take it that as regards freight there is no excuse at all. What is the length of the trip for the passengers?

Mr. LOW: About fifteen hours in good weather. I might add to that statement that this old boat would take about thirty hours in bad weather.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the difference in tonnage between the two boats?

Mr. LOW: The tonnage of the old boat was 439 gross. The new boat has not been measured and I cannot give the tonnage. She will be bigger of course.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the result of last year's business on the old boat?

Mr. LOW: The old boat had a profit of about $3,000 or equivalent to about 2½ per cent on the capital investment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Some newspapers in that part of the country are unkind enough to look upon this as a political deal of a questionable character and to say that there were no advertisements for tenders at all.

Mr. LOW: My right hon. friend has just read an advertisement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But that was an advertisement boasting about their excellent contract, about their $50,000 a year. That is not the trouble. The local papers said that there was no advertisement at all for tenders. I think we should set that rumour right.

Mr. LOW: It has been the custom of the department for many years not to advertise for tenders, but to address a tender to each ship owner in the Maritime provinces.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the local paper is correct in saying that there was no advertisement for tenders. What sort of letter was written to those people and to whom were those letters sent?

Mr. LOW: I have not a copy of the letter, but I shall be glad to submit it to the committee before we finish with this item. I will send for it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister will admit that prior to 1923 this work was done for a considerably less figure still.

Mr. LOW: In an inferior way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The last estimate provided only $20,000 for it.

Mr. LOW: I presume my right hon. friend knows that the company went bankrupt.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no information to that effect. In fact, my information is quite to the contrary, that the company did very well.

Mr. LOW: The company that had the contract went bankrupt, that is the company to which my right hon. friend refers as receiving $20,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When did it go bankrupt?

Mr. LOW: In 1920.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This estimate happens to be for 1922.

Mr. LOW: I was only taking it from the figure quoted by my right hon. friend, $20,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is wrong.

Mr. LOW: The minister is not wrong. The firm that received $20,000 went bankrupt.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was getting $20,000 some two years after the minister said that it had gone bankrupt. The steamship company was in operation while it was getting $20,000 to which I have referred, and I have information, which I do not think he will contradict, that it was doing very well.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. LOW: The last year that that company received a subsidy of $20,000, the year 1920-21, that company went bankrupt. As a matter of fact, the steamer was seized for debt, and the next year my right hon. friend voted $24,000, an increase of $4,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What year?

Mr. LOW: 1921.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have the estimates for 1921 and it is only $20,000.

Mr. LOW: I have a statement here. If my right hon. friend will look back he will find that he usually had Supplementary Estimates to bring down later on. If he will add the supplementary item to the original estimate, he will find that the amount was $24,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister say that for the year 1922 there was a supplementary estimate for $4,000?

Mr. LOW: I am speaking of 1921.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But for 1922?

Mr. LOW: For 1922 the estimate was $24,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister does not follow me. The main estimate for 1922 is $20,000. I asked the minister if there was a supplementary estimate for that year?

Mr. LOW: During the session of 1921, my right hon. friend's government introduced an item for $24,000, the company that was paid $20,000 the previous year having gone bankrupt.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has not answered the question yet. He should have the information there if there was a supplementary estimate. If there was not, he is wrong, because the main estimate was $20,000. Next year, what was the amount paid?

Mr. LOW: The same amount as the previous year. Last year, 1923, the amount was $24,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister say that the company did not do very well under that subsidy?

Mr. LOW: I have just stated that the profit was $3,000 odd which represented 2½ per cent on the capital invested.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Which year?

Mr. LOW: The boat cost $125,000 and the last report is for 1923 when they made $3,117.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What did they make the year before?

Mr. LOW: They made $8,290.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What percentage would that be?

Mr. LOW: That would be 6 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They were quite ready to continue at the same subsidy.

Mr. LOW: There is no doubt they were ready to continue at the same subsidy but we did not think that the service was a good one for 7,000 people isolated on an island for six months of the year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They were getting the same in so far as the period of service was concerned; they were getting the same number per week. As far as the minister's information goes there was room for all passengers applying as well as for all freight, and there were no petitions.

Mr. LOW: The note I have on this matter is as follows:

The R. W. Hendry was very unsatisfactory, with poor passenger accommodation, and weak engines, which gave her a speed only of about 7 or 8 knots, instead of the 12 knots promised by the contractor. Constant complaints have been received against her from the islands, both direct and through their member of parliament, the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux. Her contract, which was for five years, 1921 to 1925, was accordingly cancelled early in 1923, and tenders were called for.

My hon. friend must bear in mind that the last contract was given for five years as against one that existed before of one year. My hon. friend's government made it five years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And you have doubled that.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend gave a contract for five times the length of the other; we merely doubled the existing contract. If we had accepted the principle the previous government established we would have given a contract for twenty-five years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend's type of autocracy was just twice as bad as ours at its worst.

Mr. HARRIS: The minister informed me that part of $65,000 had been saved on the Pacific coast and apparently that is the reason for increasing the cost of service on the Atlantic. Has there been any increase in the population? The simple fact is that the minister's colleague happens to come from Pictou. Why not be honest and say outright that the reason for this boat is that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) comes from that part of the country and needs patronage?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I understand that there was a discussion of this item while I was engaged in the Redistribution committee, and my hon. friend's reference to myself shows that there is a great misapprehension regarding this matter. This service connects with the mainland, part of the constituency represented by His Honour the Speaker (Mr. Lemieux),—known as the Magdalen islands which form a part of Gaspé which is represented in the House by the Speaker. This service has been maintained for fifty years between these islands and the mainland and the steamer calls at a port in the county I represent. I am sorry that the Speaker is not in the House at the moment. The agreement in connection with this matter was made before I had the honour of a seat in the cabinet and it was made largely at the request of His Honour—

Mr. ROBB: And the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Quebec.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou):—and, as my colleague reminds me, of the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Quebec as well, Hon. Mr. Caron.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Caron represents the Magdalen islands in the Quebec legislature.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought that possibly the Minister of Agriculture in this government (Mr. Motherwell) had something to do with it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not as bad as that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The people of the Magdalen islands are thrifty and progressive and they are largely engaged in the fisheries. Previous to the war there was maintained on the route a very fine boat, which rendered good service and for which a very large subsidy was paid. During the war, owing to the appropriation of practically all available vessels for war and other purposes, the service on this particular route deteriorated and the boat which replaced the former vessel was slow, unsafe and altogether most unsatisfactory. His Honour the Speaker and the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Quebec, supported by representatives of the local house, made certain representations, I understand, to the then minister, now Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), as to the desirability of securing a better boat. In consequence of those representations a subsidy was granted. It is quite impossible on the Atlantic seaboard, owing to the number of boats that were appropriated and which were sold during the war, to obtain a satisfactory boat for service of this kind, and I understand that this contract was made with a view to having a boat specially built for the purpose. Personally I know very little about this matter, and I had very little to do with it. The provision was made not in the interests of the people in my constituency but for the accommodation of the people living on the Magdalen islands.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister would except Mr. Fraser when he says that it is not in the interests of the people of his constituency; it would be in the interests of Mr. Fraser.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Let me repeat that I did not know that this contract was made until the whole thing had been arranged. I was not in the government when the arrangement was made, and the mere fact that a gentleman named Fraser who lives in my constituency and who has been connected with the service in the past, received a contract from my right hon. friend's government, should not prohibit him from entering into a new contract for the purpose of providing a new boat.

Mr. HANSON: Does the hon. member suggest that the service requires the accommodation which is contemplated by the building of a new boat by the Lovat Steamship Company? It is true that the Hendry was not fit for the service; every one is agreed on that. She did not have the proper or necessary passenger accommodation, nor did she have the proper sanitary conveniences. But the department has gone out of its way to assist in financing the building of a new boat. Any one who is familiar with the newspapers in Nova Scotia—

Mr. LOW: In what way has the department gone out of its way to assist in the financing of the boat? We knew absolutely nothing about it.

Mr. HANSON: First of all the department has entered into a ten-year contract at more than double the preceding subsidy. The last subsidy was $24,000 and the contract was for five years.

Mr. LOW: The contract was only for one year in the first instance and my right hon. friend increased it to five years. Surely we are not to be condemned merely for having doubled the length of the last contract.

Mr. HANSON: I believe this matter will bear a good deal of scrutiny. In order to finance the building of the boat bonds were issued and sold by the Eastern Securities Company, and the subsidies under this contract were assigned as security for the bondholders. In that way they were able to finance the undertaking. Now, the government might as well have built the boat in the first instance and owned it. The effect of this arrangement will simply be that the country will in ten years have contributed $500,000, which, I am informed, will be more than the cost of the ship. The subsidy being spread over a period of ten years will cover the bond issue, and the bonds have been sold in eastern Canada on the strength of the subsidy and on nothing else. The whole thing looks to me as though the government were endeavouring to buy a boat for its friends, the Lovat Steamship Company, otherwise Mr. William Fraser of New Glasgow, and Mr. Ralph Hendry, the prospective Liberal candidate in the city of Halifax.

Mr. LOW: Mr. Hendry is not an officer of that company.

Mr. HANSON: He was an officer of the Lovat Steamship Company up to a very recent date.

Mr. LOW: I do not state it positively, but I am informed that he is not in the company now. But why should my hon. friend say that this subsidy is intended simply to assist political friends of the government? Would he say that the successful tenderer before was a political friend of the then government?

Mr. HANSON: No, he was an enemy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We did not go on that principle.

Mr. HANSON: If the minister will look up the correspondence in connection with the subsidy contract he will find that representations were made to his department in 1923 that these gentlemen must have a ten-year contract in order to finance the building of the boat, and the department yielded to their representations, although as a matter of fact the service never was worth $50,000; the service is simply worth what was paid for it by previous governments. The best service ever rendered was by the Lady Sybil.

Mr. LOW: Let me remind my hon. friend that it has been the custom for years to ask tenderers to name the minimum number of years of the contract and the tenderers in this case named ten years. The other tenderer named a similar term.

Mr. HANSON: I have not a copy of the other tender, but it is quite apparent that this is a departure from the former practice; the contract for this service before was never for a ten-year period.

Mr. LOW: But there was a one-year contract for a number of years, which was eventually increased to five years, but not by this government.

Mr. HANSON: I suggest that this was made a ten-year contract in order to finance the building of the boat. I do not think that these subsidies should be on such a scale as to render it possible.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's): Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend should give consideration to the size of the boat and the speed required, when he will readily see that the subsidy will not go far towards financing the building of the new boat. There was complaint of the service given by the old boat, which was small, only 400 tons. The new boat is to be about 700 tons, and will require more power to drive her. She is also to have passenger accommodation, which the old boat did not have. All of us who have had any experience in the running of boats know that the largest item of expense is coal, and when you double the size of the boat and double her speed, it is obvious that the increased expense will amply warrant the increase in subsidy. The old boat could not make the trip under thirty hours; this boat is supposed to make it in fifteen.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why does the minister say that the old boat took thirty hours to make the trip while the new boat will make it in fifteen?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's): I am quoting the statement made by the minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He said the old boat took fifteen hours in good weather and thirty hours in bad.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And he never said what the speed of the new boat would be.

Mr. HANSON: What the hon. member for Queen's says is very plausible, but let me point out what the Eastern Securities Company gave to the public last spring.

Mr. LOW: In order to save time, I may inform my hon. friend that we have already had it read to the House.

Mr. HANSON: I am glad it was read, but I was not here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will bear repetition.

Mr. HANSON: Like the hon. Minister of National Defence, I was attending to my duties on the Redistribution bill. According to the prospectus, the new steamship was being constructed in Paisley, Scotland, under contract for the opening of navigation in 1924. The underwriters state:

> This ship is being built in compliance with a subsidy contract—

Mr. LOW: We have heard it before.

Mr. HANSON: You will hear it again, please.

> —entered into between Mr. William Fraser and the government of the Dominion of Canada.

I may say that the subsidy contract has been assigned to the Lovat Steamship Company.

> —under which the contractor is entitled to an annual subsidy of $50,000, payable annually for ten years, commencing with the opening of navigation in 1924. The payments under this subsidy will extend beyond the longest maturity of the bonds.

That is to say, the subsidy will finance the proposal.

> All payments under the subsidy are to be assigned to the company and by the company to the trustee, and the trust deed will provide that from these moneys the trustee will in each year pay the amount of the interest and principal that may be payable in that year and will pay over the balance remaining to the company.

I submit that although this seems to be a profitable arrangement for the company, it is not in the interests of the Dominion exchequer, and that the subsidy is altogether too large for the service. It may be that the boat is too big for the service, but the net result will be that out of the subsidy the owners will own the boat and besides will have had a substantial profit.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's): Does my hon. friend mean to insinuate that you can get a company to operate a boat without profit?

Mr. HANSON: That does not require answering.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's): No, I do not think it does.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the Minister of National Defence came in the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that he did not know whether or not Mr. Fraser was the right or left bower of the Minister of Defence.

Mr. LOW: No, my right hon. friend suggested that Mr. Fraser was the right bower of the minister. I said I did not know whether he was his right or left bower.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Maybe we can get which he was from the minister.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): He is neither.

Mr. HANSON: He may be the joker, and take all the tricks.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I was not present when this discussion started, but I find there is apparently an increase of $26,000 in this vote. I have no objection to the increase if it is necessary to better the service in question. But last year and preceding years I had occasion to interview the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the necessity of establishing a winter service between Murray Bay and Tadoussac in my constituency, and at that time numerous petitions and telegrams were forwarded to the government by people living in that part of the country urging the establishment of such a service. As a matter of fact, a few years ago when I was in opposition I succeeded in obtaining from the late government a service during 1920 and 1921.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. CASGRAIN: But the service was discontinued when the steamer Champlain was sold. When I made representations to the government for the resumption of the service the hon. minister told me that this year there was not enough money available to finance such a proposal. The subsidy was a very small one, running to about $15,000 or $20,000, but we were given to understand that there was not enough money available to establish that service. How is it then, that money is found to increase so largely the service given under this item in another province?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the hon. member did not know exactly how to go about it. He should go to somebody in the business who understands this sort of thing. He should go to Mr. Fraser, or somebody like Mr. Fraser.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I will go to the head of the department and those who are responsible. I do not go to outsiders.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a good deal in what my hon. friend says. There is a section which is not reached by any railway communication, although it is fairly well populated. Tadoussac is entirely cut off; the people there have to cross the Saguenay, which is extremely difficult at all times, and during part of the year practically impossible.

Mr. CANNON: That section does not count.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Apparently not, but I think it ought to.

Mr. CANNON: I think so myself.

[Mr. E. M. Macdonald.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I happened to have something to do with seeing that a service was given there. When I was at Tadoussac in 1919—and a charming and picturesque place it is—I found the people unanimous in the view that something should be done. Rightly or wrongly I thought there was a place where service should be given, and we supported that view and acted accordingly. It was really a smaller matter than my hon. friend thinks. On the other side of the river we have the Intercolonial railway; further up the river we have the branch running down to Murray Bay. As I recall it we used to maintain a service on the south side of the river. When I went there I found that the Champlain was not doing very much and that she might just as well give this service as not. The result was that mails were got in, contact with the outside world was kept up, and the cost was small. I regret to hear that that service has been discontinued.

Mr. LOW: I have no objection to stating exactly what I said to the hon. member (Mr. Casgrain) in regard to this matter. It is true that he called at my office and asked for a subsidy varying from $25,000 to $40,000 a year. He asked me to open up a new service but I told him that in the present state of the finances of the country we hesitated to do that, and I declined to agree to the subsidy. I think the committee will bear me out in that stand. These subsidies that have been granted for forty or fifty years we appear to have to continue. For some reason, once a subsidy is granted it must be kept up; at least it has been the custom of governments in the past to continue them. I told my hon. friend that when the finances of the country were in a better condition I would be very glad to look into the matter, and if it is my pleasure to be in charge of the Trade and Commerce department when that time comes I shall be only too pleased to give consideration to the request he has made.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When do you expect that will be?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister now takes the ground that once a route is established it has got to stay and if it is not established the people have got to do without anything until the country gets richer.

Mr. LOW: No, I do not take that stand. I say that once we grant a subsidy, in almost every case it has to remain. Certain subsidies have been cut off, but it is very hard to eliminate them. My right hon friend will know that from experience; once the people in any part of the country get a certain thing they seem to take it for granted that it is going to continue for all time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is difficult, I know, to discontinue a subsidy, but surely it would be better to maintain a subsidy and a service on a basis that has proved good enough for years rather than to double that at the price of denying other people any means of getting in and out at all. I have pointed out that in his own estimates the minister has $42,000 abandoned; I will ask later what this $42,000 was applied to previously. I know something about the Tadoussac service, although the route was established before I came in and consequently the petition was not presented to me. But I hope I will be forgiven if I call attention to something the late government did undertake on behalf of that district, in the face of the bitterest possible antagonism from some hon members whom I see in front of me now. I refer to the extension of railway service into that district, the rescue from wreckage of the Quebec and Charlevoix railway and the placing of it in a position actually to serve the whole north shore. I was glad to hear the generous words of the hon member (Mr. Casgrain) in the House on one of the branch line bills, in which he paid tribute to the excellent results that had been achieved by that policy I could not help thinking at the time of the attitude then taken by many hon. members who pretended to be very much concerned about the people of that district but who abused us for all the efforts we made to serve them; especially of the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) who was so disgusted with what we were undertaking on behalf of the district that he rose in his place, declared that our conduct and our policy was reprehensible, and left the House.

Mr. HANSON: The chief objection I take to this subsidy contract is that it was entered into and negotiated by the minister or his predecessor in office long before the boat was in existence. Secondly, the boat in question, if she lives up to the advance notices, is far beyond what the service requires. This is a weekly service, as I understand it?

Mr. LOW: Twice a week.

Mr. HANSON: Well, does the minister say that in the winter a twice a week service is required?

Mr. LOW: I have already stated half a dozen times that the islands are isolated for six months of the year. I am sorry that the Redistribution committee is meeting this afternoon, otherwise the discussion on this item would be over by this time. Unfortunately each member of the committee as he comes in has to make a speech on the subject. I do not object to that, of course, but I am sorry those hon. members were not here.

Mr. HANSON: If the minister had been in the Redistribution committee instead of here, he might have made more progress with public business than he is making here. The government is financing the building of this boat, and that is contrary to public policy. What has the minister to say about it? The subsidy was granted to Mr. Fraser personally, and he thereupon organized a joint stock company and assigned the subsidy to the company, and then subsequently the subsidy was assigned to the trustee, under the trust deed, for the benefit of the bond holders and the prospectus of the underwriters says that this is going to pay the whole thing.

Mr. LOW: The prospectus also says, if my hon. friend had read a little further, that they hope the freight traffic will increase by 50 per cent, and the passenger traffic by 100 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But that is in addition to getting full pay for the boat from the government. That is velvet on top of the other.

Mr. LOW: We have control over the rates, and I am sure my hon. friend will agree with me that these people who are shut off from the mainland for six months of the year are entitled to the very best service we can give them during the months when there is an opportunity to communicate with the mainland.

Mr. HANSON: There is another feature, and that is the service between Pictou and Souris. Does the minister think it is good policy that there should be any more competition with the car ferry or the Prince Edward Island railway than there is to-day, and that the government should subsidize a private concern to enter into competition with the Canadian National Railways? That is a matter of policy upon which I would like to hear the minister express an opinion.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): The call at Souris is a help to the Canadian National Railways. A great deal of through traffic from the mainland goes to Souris and is picked up there by this boat and taken to the Magdalen island, and freight is taken back. It is benefit to the Canadian National Railways, rather than competition.

Mr. HANSON: That is freight for the Magdalen islands?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): And freight for the mainland as well.

Mr. HANSON: I do not follow the argument.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How could it be for the mainland?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): From the Magdalen islands.

Mr. HANSON: Is the minister serious in that? The broad gauge has not been extended to Souris.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): But there is a railway there.

Mr. HANSON: With a narrow gauge, and the freight would have to be trans-shipped at Souris and handled again at Charlottetown.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): It does not make any difference whether the railway is broad gauge or narrow gauge; it has to be trans-shipped from the boat to the railway just the same.

Mr. HANSON: But there would be no carload lots trans-shipped in that way.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): It makes no difference.

Mr. HANSON: It means all this extra handling at Souris and again at Charlottetown. I would ask how much traffic goes that way from the Magdalen islands?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): The extra handling does not add to the freight. The shipper gets the same rate.

Mr. HANSON: But it adds to the cost for the National Railways. I do not see how it is of any benefit to them. The National Railways could get the freight at Pictou.

Mr. LOW: This is a condition that exists, and there is no way of changing it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister will have time between now and eight o'clock to bring down copies of the letters which were written to these ship owners inviting them to tender, so that we can get the names, the dates and so forth.

Mr. LOW: If the item carries I will agree to bring that down.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will not carry now, until that is done, although I do not purpose myself delaying the passing of the item.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LOW: Before the committee rose at six o'clock I promised the right hon. leader of the opposition that I would lay on the table a list of the parties to whom the forms calling for tenders were sent and a copy of the tender, and I now comply with that request.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want the item to be passed till I have time to go through this list. What I have gone through is not very illuminating. The call for tenders was sent to the secretaries of the boards of trade of Quebec, Montreal, Halifax, Pictou and Charlottetown. I wonder whether they were sent to the hospitals in these places.

Mr. LOW: Surely my hon. friend would not object to having these forms sent to the secretaries of the boards of trade in these different cities?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what good it would do.

Mr. LOW: I suppose my hon. friend never had any dealings with boards of trade.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not very much. I do not quite understand what they are sent there for. These forms were also sent to the Deputy Postmaster General at Ottawa, to the vice president of the Canadian National Railways, and to Mr. Teakle, manager of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, in case he would want to build another boat probably. They were also sent to Major Bell. I do not know that very much information can be obtained from this list. However, I have not had time to go through it.

Mr. LOW: Twenty-five or thirty other names are mentioned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that, but why they would be sent to these people I do not know.

Mr. LOW: I cannot understand my hon. friend objecting to them being sent to the secretaries of the boards of trade. They are some of the persons to whom the forms certainly should be sent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suggest to the minister that unless some hon. member wishes to discuss this item, he should go on with another item till I get time to read these papers. I cannot read them in a second.

Item stands.

Quebec, Natashquan and Harrington and other ports on the north shore of the gulf of St. Lawrence, steam service between, $85,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Better tell us something about this service?

Mr. LOW: This is a weekly service between Quebec and the north shore.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How long has it been in existence?

Mr. LOW: I have the record here for about ten years, but I understand the service has been in existence for twenty-five or thirty years.

Mr. PELLETIER: Who has this contract?

Mr. LOW: The Clarke Steamship Company.

Mr. PELLETIER: How many trips do they make during the season?

Mr. LOW: One trip a week.

Mr. PELLETIER: How much of this amount is being paid for the transportation of mails?

Mr. LOW: The boats are compelled to carry the mails free. There is no special item for the mail service. We insist upon them carrying the mails.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How many boats are there? The item is $85,000.

Mr. LOW: Two boats.

Mr. GUTHRIE: One trip a week?

Mr. LOW: Yes, it is a long trip.

Mr. DOUCET: How many trips is the boat supposed to make, in order to qualify for the subsidy?

Mr. LOW: One trip a week during the season of navigation.

Mr. DOUCET: Is there a check made on those trips?

Mr. LOW: Certainly.

Mr. DOUCET: My reason for bringing this matter before the committee is that I realize quite well that the people on the north shore are entitled to a good service but we often read in the press statements that they are not getting the service desired. If they get a weekly service while navigation is open there is certainly no cause for complaint. It seems to me that when the large sum of $85,000 is paid as a subsidy for that service pains should be taken to see that a weekly trip is made while navigation is open.

Mr. LOW: The customs officers certify to the number of trips.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I assume that the season of navigation does not last much more than six months, say twenty-five weeks. If the total number of trips made is twenty-five $85,000 seems to be a rather enormous subsidy.

Mr. LOW: Each trip is approximately 809 miles.

Mr. PELLETIER: When does this contract expire?

Mr. LOW: 1931.

Mr. PELLETIER: When was it made?

Mr. LOW: 1922.

Mr. PELLETIER: Is it customary for the department to give ten-year contracts?

Mr. LOW: It is done occasionally, but it is not customary.

Mr. MILLAR: In 1922 how many tenders were put in?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Who holds the contract?

Mr. LOW: The Clarke Steamship Company. The contract was running and the company agreed to improve the service.

Mr. PELLETIER: If the company make the trip on time, do they always make a trip each week?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. PELLETIER: Is the minister aware that last August the North Shore left the north shore with the mails, took a cargo and went to St. Pierre Miquelon? By doing that they were eight days late in arriving at Quebec. According to my information this has been done twice.

Mr. LOW: We have had no complaint about the service and if my hon. friend knew of any violation of the contract it was his duty to file a complaint.

Mr. PELLETIER: I learned of this just a short time ago, and even though I had known of it and had interviewed my hon. friend before the opening of this session, I do not believe it would have done me any good. I remember full well the occasion when I went to him to try to get a subsidy for a company that is now operating between Matane and the north shore. I am very sorry, but I must say that the way in which I was received could be compared with the treatment of a dog in a bowling alley. My hon. friend was so busy that he could not take time to listen to me so that I might tell him what I wanted. He told me that it was absolutely unnecessary for me to go to that trouble. I had petitions from different companies on the north shore, and he did not even give me an opportunity to show them to him. There were some from the Ontario Pulp and Paper Company, the St. Regis Paper Company and the Hudson's Bay Company. One of these petitions was signed by 89 others, and another by 62 others, and they asked that the mail be taken to Matane by rail and then from there by water to the north shore. The minister is giving a subsidy of $85,000 to the Clarke Steamship Company for the number of trips that they make and he has given them a contract for ten years, thereby eliminating any competitors for that period. We are now improving the harbour at Matane and making an attempt to serve those people and serve them well. Now that the people on the north shore are asking to come to Matane, I fail to see why the subsidy that I asked for cannot be granted. It seems to me that if my hon. friend will think this matter over and endeavour to be fair, as I hope he will be, and give the people who are asking for accommodation, the facilities they require, he will put into the supplementary estimates a certain amount so that the people who are now going from Matane to the north shore will have an opportunity of continuing their work. Will my hon. friend even dream of putting an amount in the supplementary estimates for that purpose?

Mr. LOW: I am sorry to hear an hon. member speak in that way because if there is one minister who tries to see everybody, it is the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am sure, when I tell the committee that I had interviews on three different occasions with the hon. member, he cannot claim that he was shown any discourtesy. I did not turn him over to one of my officials, I spoke to him myself about the matter, as I always feel that members are anxious to interview the minister himself. If he did not have time to present his case, as he says he had not, in three visits, that is not my responsibility. I have upon every occasion shown the hon. member the greatest courtesy in anything that he has laid before me, and I am prepared to do so in the future as I have done in the past. The hon. member has absolutely no grounds for making the statement that I did not appear to have time to discuss the matter with him.

Mr. PELLETIER: Such is the case for I remember full well what occurred. The reason I applied to the minister was that I wanted to come to the assistance of the people of my district and the people on the north shore as well. As the matter stands to-day the freight is being taken down by rail on the Canadian National railway and on the Canada and Gulf Terminal railway to Matane, thence by water to the north shore. The mail is all being taken over to Matane. The other vessel is not taking it down from Quebec. These companies have boxes in the post office at Matane where they receive their mail and it is being taken across by our boats. The Clarke Steamship Company is receiving the subsidy and the others are doing the work. I do not believe that is altogether fair and just.

Mr. LOW: I drew to the attention of the hon. member at the time, as he will remember, the fact that there was a railway service to Matane; that a dock was being built by the government and that I thought in view of the expenditure that was being made in his riding, he should at least wait before pressing his request until the finances of the country were in a better condition than they are now.

Mr. PELLETIER: At the same time if what I asked had been granted to me, we would have come to the assistance of all those people and as well we would have aided in the development of that district.

Mr. LOW: I might also remind my hon. friend that if we had responded to all the claims we had from members of this House we probably should not have had a surplus this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the best joke yet.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is it usual to let contracts of this kind for ten years? My impression is that steamship contracts are usually let for periods of from three to five years.

Mr. LOW: I have already stated at least six times to-day that it is not the usual thing to let these contracts for ten years, but the custom was established under my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen).

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh no. The minister cannot fetch one contract which was let for a period of ten years while we were in power.

Mr. LOW: As I pointed out to the leader of the opposition this afternoon, the contract was always let for one year previous to the time he came into power. His government made it five years and we merely doubled that. In other words, he increased the usual period five times whereas we simply double the length of time he established. It is not the usual thing to let these contracts for ten years; it is only under exceptional circumstances that this has been done.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This contract I understand was made in 1922, the first year this government was in power. What were the exceptional circumstances that made it necessary to increase the time to ten years? Will the minister at the same time say whether the Clarke Steamship Company is the same company which is operating in timber and pulp wood in Quebec?

Mr. LOW: I have no knowledge of that.

Mr. HANSON: What is the name of the ship?

Mr. LOW: There are two, the North Shore and the Labrador.

Mr. MILLAR: Can the minister answer my question now as to how many tenders were received when the contract was let? And what was the next highest tender?

Mr. LOW: The negotiations were carried on with the minister and the contract was renewed without tender.

Mr. MILLAR: That means that this contract was renewed for a longer period without tenders being called for?

Mr. LOW: It was negotiated by the former minister for ten years.

Mr. MILLAR: Without any tenders?

Mr. LOW: Yes. I might tell the hon. gentleman that these contracts contain a provision that parliament may decline to vote the amount any year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is a wonderful advantage for parliament to have, and it is astonishing that the minister should protect parliament in that way.

Mr. LOW: It is a protection for the people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is protectionist all right; he reserves to parliament the right to vote the money each year. The fact of the matter is that when a contract is made, especially in a case like this where bonds are sold on the strength of that contract, it is just as easy for the camel to pass through the eye of the needle as it is for parliament to get out of its undertaking. The predecessor of my hon. friend adopted the habit, and I presume that for similar reasons the rotating system is adopted of changing ministers before the next estimates come along so that the actual minister can plead that he is guiltless.

Mr. LOW: I am not pleading that at all; I am willing to stand behind the former minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all very well, but it is altogether different attacking a minister's successor from attacking the minister himself who did all these things. The government has entered into a contract for ten years, in all probability binding future governments, and in so doing it is launching upon a course which neither it nor anyone else can defend. A five year contract is wholly different; it can only extend a short time into the term of the ensuing government or parliament. But ten years is a comparatively indefinite period, and for the government to tie the hands of parliament for ten years is without any defence at all. I notice too that in calling for tenders the government does not say that the contract is for so many years; it is left open so that the government may take whichever contract it chooses and say it is the best. The whole thing is open for the government to put its hands upon its favourites here, there and everywhere. Here is a case in which the government renewed the contract for ten years.

Mr. LOW: Let me correct the hon. member before he goes further. During his regime there was used the same form of advertisement for tenders as is used to-day; the number of years was not stated in it but it was left to the contractor to say for how long he would undertake the service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister knows that previous to this government's coming into power no contract was ever let for a period of ten years; he himself admits that five years was the longest term of any contract up to that time. Now he has let a contract for ten years and he puts the advertisement in such shape that the government can fix a period of five or ten years as it sees fit; it can say that the advantage in having a contract for five years is that it will overcome some difficulty or other, or on the other hand that the ten-year contract will be advantageous in some other respect. As a matter of fact it simply does away with competition.

Mr. LOW: I would ask my right hon. friend whether it is better to have a wide open contract or one in which the number of years is stated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Ordinarily the contract was just for one year.

Mr. DOUCET: It appears to me, as I think it should appear to the committee, that it must be very poor satisfaction to the people on that shore who could get a proper service from Matane to be told that, because the government which was in office prior to 1921 adopted a certain system, therefore it must now be followed. If the government previous to 1921 did not do what was exactly right in any respect there is no reason why this government should follow suit. If this contract had been let for five years only it would expire in 1927 and the department could then call for a new contract to give a satisfactory service to the people of Matane and Natashquan. As it is they are subsidizing this other route whereas a better service could be secured.

Mr. HANSON: Is it the policy of the department now when these contracts expire to renew them for periods of ten years? If that is not the policy, what is the justification in the case of this vote for the Magdalen islands service, no tenders having been called for? This is a matter of principle.

Mr. LOW: Let me correct the hon. gentleman; the contract was not let without a tender in the case of the Magdalen islands. It is not the policy of the government to renew contracts for ten years, but there are exceptional cases where the circumstances render contracts of that period unavoidable. The ordinary man will not invest a large sum of money in a service for only one year; he will undertake it only if he can secure a contract for a number of years.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. HANSON: That is the statement with regard to the north shore service, which does require a good type of boat, and the North Shore is a splendid boat. But why a ten-year contract? Is it to suit the convenience of the contractor—a matter of assistance to him; or is it now the settled policy of the government in such cases?

Mr. LOW: Does my hon. friend say that the term was extended in order to assist some individual or company?

Mr. HANSON: Why it is all assistance. All these subsidies are assistance. What else are they?

Mr. LOW: These are the same contractors who were awarded the earlier contracts for this service by the previous government.

Mr. HANSON: In the case of the Magdalen islands boat the subsidy was not only to assist, it was to finance the whole undertaking. There is no doubt the bonds were sold on the strength of the subsidy and on nothing else; the underwriters would not have been able to sell the bonds otherwise, because the only guarantee that the bondholders would have that their interest would be paid regularly and the principal met at maturity was in the subsidy. And not only that, the subsidy itself is part of the security of the bondholders.

Mr. LOW: Surely my hon. friend will not charge the government with knowing anything about the bond issue at all. As a matter of fact I understand there has been a bond issue of $500,000, if I heard my hon. friend correctly this afternoon. The proceeds of that issue will help the contractors to carry out their contract. A short time ago I received a tender from well recognized shipowners who have been in receipt of the subsidy for the service to the West Indian islands for a number of years. If I remember rightly they asked that they be given a contract for ten years. We have the matter under consideration now. But it is not an unusual thing where a large amount is invested in the boat for a contractor to decline to assume the responsibility of such an investment as the capital required for a large boat, unless some assurance is forthcoming of a contract for a period of years.

Mr. HANSON: Apparently the minister is not very familiar with the details. If he confers with the officers of his department he will find that in the case of the Lovat Steamship Company the minister was consulted at every turn. As a matter of fact, he had given his consent to the assignment of the subsidy contract.

Mr. LOW: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON: The file shows that the department was kept informed of every step that was being taken. It contains a record of correspondence between the department and the solicitors of the underwriters with respect to the assignment of the subsidy as security for the bonds, so that the government might be said to have been parties to the whole transaction.

Mr. LOW: I know only of the letter asking us to agree to the assigning of the contract to the Lovat Steamship Company, and a further letter asking us if the assignment had been completed.

Mr. HANSON: Did not the minister have to consent?

Mr. CANNON: What contract is my hon. friend referring to.

Mr. HANSON: The contract with the Lovat Steamship Company.

Mr. LOW: Does my hon. friend not know that that item has been passed?

Mr. HANSON: When was the item passed?

The CHAIRMAN: The question is out of order; we are on item 203.

Mr. HANSON: Has 202 been passed?

The CHAIRMAN: No, it stands. Does 203 carry?

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: We will revert to item 202, Pictou, Souris and Magdalen islands, steam service between, $50,000.

Shall the item carry?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was waiting for the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) to renew his protest.

Mr. CANNON. He has eaten since.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have no objection to the vote passing. I am satisfied that I shall get the Murray Bay—Tadoussac service next year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought something had happened.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Nothing has happened.

Mr. LOW: I have not had the pleasure of seeing my hon. friend since six o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might be done otherwise; these transformations take place rapidly.

Mr. LOW: Not being familiar with politics, I do not know how such transformations are effected.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have learned from observation. For how many years was the other tender of $50,000, and from whom?

Mr. LOW: Ten years; from Young and Burchell of Sydney.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For how long was the tender for $24,000?

Mr. LOW: One year. That was for the old boat.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the minister see what they would do it for if they got it for ten years with the chance to sell their bonds on the faith of the tender?

Mr. LOW: No purpose would have been served by such a course, the boat was not at all suitable for the service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the boat comply with the stipulations which were sent out?

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In what respect did it not?

Mr. LOW: It was a very slow boat, seven or eight knots an hour.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What did the tender form specify?

Mr. LOW: The contract was for ten knots.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; I am asking what did the request for tenders stipulate.

Mr. LOW: It did not so state, but the contract was specific.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nothing was said in the request for tenders? They would not know what the contract was to be until after the tender had been accepted.

Mr. LOW: The department thought the boat offered by the former contractors was not suitable for the service and the terms of contract offered were not acceptable. It had the right to refuse the tender. The rejection of this boat for this service necessitated the original call for tenders. They undertook to operate at a speed of twelve knots per hour.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the tenderers?

Mr. LOW: No, the contractors under the contract.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course, doing business that way the minister can give the contract to whom he likes. He asks for tenders, but he does not stipulate the speed of the boat. Then when he gets a tender offering to operate a boat at a certain speed, he puts in the contract that the boat must have that speed, and he awards that tenderer a ten-year contract at more than twice the rate that has prevailed for years. What traffic was carried this year? We have had this new boat in operation for considerably over a year now.

Mr. LOW: It is not in operation yet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, it is still being built?

Mr. LOW: Yes; the subsidy is being paid on the $24,000 basis.

Mr. MEIGHEN: According to the contract the boat should have been in operation. Surely things are not frozen up there yet?

Mr. LOW: The contractors are operating the service with the old boat until the new one is ready, at the same rate as heretofore, $24,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then they have not fulfilled the contract. Under the contract they were to start with the new boat at the opening of navigation.

Mr. LOW: I suppose my right hon. friend knows that there have been several dock and shipbuilding strikes in Scotland which naturally delayed the building of the boat?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the minister tell us what freight and passengers were carried this past year? I want to see how the new boat gets along.

Mr. LOW: I gave the latest return to my hon. friend this afternoon. I think he will find it in Hansard to-morrow.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never heard any return as to the passengers and freight carried, except for the years previous. For that year the figures were these: Passengers, 1,313; freight, 6,380 tons; live stock, 8; bags of mail, 4,063. The number of trips made was 59 and the subsidy paid $24,000. Can the minister give the corresponding figures for the year past.

Mr. LOW: I shall give the same figures that I gave this afternoon: Number of passengers carried, 1,675; tons of freight, carried, 4,009; live stock, 70; mail bags: locked, 2,734; tied sacks, 1,902.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Doing less business than the year before.

Mr. LOW: That is accounted for by the poor service—the very boat we have been discussing all afternoon.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot understand it, because the year before it carried 6,380 tons of freight, this year 4,000 odd. If it could carry 6,000 the year before it could carry 6,000 this year if the freight was offered.

Mr. LOW: Last year it went by schooner and gasoline boat.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the minister any more of these contracts pending—$50,000 contracts to political favourites?

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend has a complete list of the subsidies that are proposed for this session. There may be a few in the supplementary estimates, but he has the main estimates before him.

Item agreed to.

Quebec or Montreal, and Gaspe and ports on the south shore of the gulf of St. Lawrence, steam service between, $30,000.

Mr. PELLETIER: Who has this contract?

Mr. LOW: The Clarke Steamship Company of Quebec.

Mr. PELLETIER: How many trips do they make a season?

Mr. LOW: Every two weeks.

Mr. PELLETIER: I learned on the 12th of May of this year that last summer they used this boat for service on the north shore to Cape Breton and left the people without accommodation in the district that they should have served. The Tremblay, plying between Quebec or Montreal and Gaspe, did the work. Is it fair that the Clarke Steamship Company should receive the subsidy while the other parties do the work?

Mr. LOW: The report received by the department indicates that the Clarke Steamship Company are giving a good service. The Clarke Steamship Company's boat is much superior to the other boat.

Mr. PELLETIER: Does my hon. friend know that when the Tremblay was built I got a subsidy of $8,500 for that same boat, to go from Montreal to Gaspe? Afterwards the Clarke people leased the Tremblay and did the work, so the boat was good. Why should it not be good now? A subsidy of $15,000 was asked for the Tremblay and was refused. Why pay $30,000 when the others are ready to do it for $15,000?

Mr. LOW: The passenger accommodation on the Tremblay is very poor. It is generally speaking an inferior boat to that operated by the Clarke Steamship Company, at least so our officers report.

Mr. PELLETIER: Seemingly the Tremblay was giving satisfaction when the Clarke people leased it.

Mr. LOW: The Tremblay was used simply because it was the best boat that could be obtained at that time.

Item agreed to.

Rimouski and Pointe aux Outardes, service between, $5,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this a new one?

Mr. LOW: The new contract commences this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who was the member powerful enough to get a new service when my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) failed?

Mr. GAUVREAU: The need of the country.

Mr. LOW: This service was established last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a new contract, though. If it were the member for Temiscouata I could understand it, but he is not the member for Rimouski. What was the need for this new contract when there was none needed for Tadoussac?

Mr. LOW: The country is being developed rapidly and lumbering—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this the reward for speeches in Rimouski?

Mr. LOW: Speeches by myself? I have not made any down there.

Mr. CANNON: It is to facilitate my right hon. friend's trip when he comes to meet the local member.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is very kind indeed. I hope, however, to be in the district and to disclose the simplicity of my life and the innocence of my character. I did read the last deliverance of the hon. member, but gauging it very much, I know, as the member for Dorchester did himself, I did not think it was worth a reply.

Mr. PELLETIER: This is a newly organized company, is it not?

Mr. LOW: It is a new contractor—J. A. Fafard.

Mr. PELLETIER: When was the contract given?

Mr. LOW: It is dated May 9, 1923.

Mr. PELLETIER: Is it not a fact that this company was organized only last winter?

Mr. LOW: I have no knowledge of the organization of any company.

Mr. PELLETIER: These people came here after the opening of the session, and I find it rather strange that my hon. friend would go sixty miles further to give a subsidy to a company while refusing me what I came here to ask of him three weeks before the opening of the session.

Mr. CASGRAIN: He refused me, too.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Cannot the minister answer the question?

Mr. LOW: What is the question?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why is the hon. member for Matane being turned down? He did not put it in just those words, but that was the substance of his question. He said that he was here three weeks before the House opened, and that he had a first rate case, but got no consideration, and that somebody sixty miles further away, with no case at all, got consideration, and he is appealing to the minister.

Mr. LOW: The only answer I can give is that there is no political patronage in the department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It appears not to be a case of looking after the constituency, but of the ministers looking after themselves.

Mr. LOW: Will my right hon. friend point to one case, just one, where the Minister of Trade and Commerce has looked after himself?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of Trade and Commerce has not any water in his riding, but the right bower case from Pictou looks suspiciously like it to me.

Item agreed to.

St. John and St. Andrews, calling at intermediate points, steam service between, $3,000.

Mr. HANSON: I notice a decrease of $1,000 in this item. I was not aware that the route was so profitable that the contractor could afford to get along with a reduced amount, but I commend the minister for saving $1,000 of the people's money. Is this the same company or a reorganized company?

Mr. LOW: The same company.

Mr. HANSON: I understand that it was current in the city of St. John and the county of Albert that the minister, or the department, had threatened to take away this subsidy altogether.

Mr. LOW: I told them they could have the contract at a reduction of $1,000. They threatened to withdraw, and I simply stood by my original decision.

Mr. HANSON: What were the considerations that moved the minister to reduce it by $1,000? I would like to know how well run the department is.

Mr. LOW: It is very simple. This company is showing a large profit, and I decided to cut down the subsidy.

Mr. HANSON: I think the minister is to be commended.

Item agreed to.

St. John and Bridgetown, steam service between, $1,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What company has this service?

Mr. LOW: The Bridgetown Steamship Company, of Bridgetown, N.S.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, that is in Lunenburg county?

Mr. LOW: No, in Annapolis county. I suppose my hon. friend noticed a reduction there of $500.

Item agreed to.

St. John and Digby, steam service between, $15,000.

Mr. HANSON: Is this the Canadian Pacific line from St. John to Digby?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: I never could understand why it was necessary to subsidize that line. It is part of the through Canadian Pacific route from Montreal to Nova Scotia, and I had always supposed from the very liberal patronage that the boat received 9 p.m. that it was a paying proposition; but I may be wrong about that. I quite agree that it is necessary to have a steamship service across the bay, and a daily service such as they give, and it is a very, very good service, but I cannot understand on what principle the subsidy is granted for that line. Is this in consideration of carrying the mails?

Mr. LOW: That is one of the considerations. I might point out that the Canadian Pacific have had this contract for a number of years, and each year it has shown a large loss. They were paid $20,000 at one time.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Hanson.]

St. John, Digby, Annapolis, and Granville along the west coast of Annapolis Basin, steam service between, $2,000.

Mr. HANSON: What line is that?

Mr. LOW: The Valley Steamship Company, and the steamer is the Granville.

Item agreed to.

St. John and ports on the Bay of Fundy and Minas Basin, steam service between, $8,500.

Mr. HANSON: What boat is that, and between what points does she run?

Mr. LOW: The contractors are the St. John Steamship Company, and the steamer is the Glenholme. The service is between St. John and Windsor, calling each way at Canning, Wolfville and Cheverie.

Mr. HANSON: How often is the service performed?

Mr. LOW: It is a weekly service during navigation.

Mr. HANSON: For how many months?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is all the year round there.

Mr. LOW: Not in the Bay of Fundy.

Mr. HANSON: That will be interesting news to the people of St. John, that the Bay of Fundy is not open all the year round.

Mr. LOW: A boat can get into St. John, but it would be impossible to reach these other points during the winter season.

Mr. HANSON: How many months in the year is the service operated?

Mr. LOW: About seven months.

Mr. HANSON: About how much per trip does it amount to?

Mr. LOW: The minimum number of trips is twenty-six.

Mr. CANNON: Why should every company leaving St. John get a subsidy? There is a whole row of companies here operating from St. John to different points and getting subsidies.

Mr. HANSON: St. John is a great metropolitan city.

Mr. CANNON: Then the traffic should be heavy enough for the boats to pay their own way.

Mr. HANSON: The benefit is not for St. John but for these little places in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CANNON: Why should they go to these little ports in Nova Scotia? They ought to go to the larger ports and get freight and passengers enough to make the boats pay, instead of having to come to this government. In the province of Quebec we have not been able to get anything, on account of economy, but I notice the Maritime provinces get everything they want.

Mr. HANSON: Even an increase.

Mr. CANNON: Increases too. I think the whole system ought to be abolished.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): A great many of these subsidies are granted, I understand, because the places touched by the steamer are not within reasonable distance of a railway. In the case under consideration, I understood the minister to say the connection was between St. John, Windsor, Wolfville and Canning. Now, it is well known that all these points are not only in daily touch with rail communication, but semi-daily, and it seems to me the necessity for an $8,500 subsidy for such a service does not exist.

Mr. LOW: I would ask my hon. friend if Maitland, Spencer's Island, Parrsboro, and Bass River can be reached by rail.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Parrsboro can.

Mr. LOW: But not the others.

Item agreed to.

St. John and Wedgeport, steam service between, $5,000.

Mr. HANSON: Where is Wedgeport.

Mr. LOW: Down near Yarmouth, Nova Scotia.

Mr. HANSON: In Digby county?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government keeps up the wharves and docks, I suppose, at these places.

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume then that if we have the Belle River wharf built there will be a subsidy to get in there. Has the government considered that?

Mr. HOCKEN: There is quite a fleet running from Belle River.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Heavy traffic all one way.

Item agreed to.

St. John, Westport and Yarmouth and other way ports, steam service between, $10,000.

Mr. HANSON: What company is this, and when was the contract entered into?

Mr. LOW: Hugh Cann and Son, Limited, Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and the contract is for one year. The service has been performed for a number of years and the subsidy has been paid.

Mr. HANSON: And renewed from year to year?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Why the discrimination between Hugh Cann and Son and the Lovat Steamship Company? This company has a good boat and performs a useful service along the Nova Scotia shore. I do not see why the minister discriminates between this company and the Lovat company.

Mr. LOW: The contract is from year to year.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I was under the impression that items 213 and 214 could very well be brought together, and if tenders were properly advertised, instead of renewing from year to year, the department could get offers for the two services with a reduction at least of a third. In other words, $10,000 should cover that whole service very easily.

Mr. LOW: I shall be glad to take the hon. gentleman's suggestion into consideration when the matter comes up next year.

Mr. HANSON: What company performs the Wedgeport service?

Mr. LOW: The D. D. LeBlanc Company.

Item agreed to.

Sydney and Bay St. Lawrence, calling at way ports, steam service between, $9,000.

Mr. CANNON: How long has this service been in existence?

Mr. LOW: It has been in existence many years.

Mr. HANSON: Where is Bay St. Lawrence.

Mr. LOW: On the north-east coast of Cape Breton.

Item agreed to.

Sydney and Whycocomagh, steam service between, $13,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us get an explanation of Whycocomagh. Who has that service?

Mr. LOW: James T. Burchell, Sydney, Nova Scotia.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How long has it been running?

Mr. LOW: About twenty-five years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The same one?

Mr. LOW: No, not with the same company. The service calls for three trips a week during the summer and two in the spring and fall.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was it $13,000 previously?

Mr. LOW: It was the same amount last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What were the earnings last year?

Mr. LOW: The department has not the detailed statement of the earnings.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: For the year before?

Mr. LOW: We have not got them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does that go as a matter of form, or are the earnings checked?

Mr. LOW: They are checked.

Mr. HANSON: In what way? Is there an independent audit of the accounts?

Mr. LOW: Our inspector drafts an account of the earnings and sends it to the office.

Mr. HANSON: What steps does the department take to ascertain if the character of the service is satisfactory? Do you have an inspector travelling incognito on these lines?

Mr. LOW: We have a travelling inspector who spends all his time at it.

Item agreed to.

Sydney and Bras d'Or lake ports and ports on the West coast of Cape Breton, steam service between, $18,000.

Mr. HANSON: Tell us why the increase of $4,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Getting back to Pictou again.

Mr. LOW: It is because the contractor refused to renew the contract at the same figure. By a statement which he furnished the department he showed a loss of $4,000.

Mr. CANNON: Were there any tenders?

Mr. LOW: We negotiated with the same contractor.

Mr. CANNON: Do I understand the minister to say the increase of $4,000 is because the company would not renew their contract at the same price, and their request was granted, without finding out whether the service could not be performed more cheaply by other companies?

Mr. LOW: The steamship subsidy inspector verified the statement of the company and was satisfied that the company had lost $4,000 in operating last year, as they stated. They would not renew at the former figure.

Mr. HANSON: I should like to know if the company who receive this subsidy does not also receive another subsidy for the same boats for another service, and that their total receipts now will be something like $22,000 a year in subsidies?

Mr. LOW: It is another company and another boat.

Mr. CALDWELL: What method does the department take to check up the statements of these companies?

Mr. LOW: The statements have to be certified by a chartered accountant; otherwise they have to send in their statements with vouchers, and our accountant checks them up.

Mr. DOUCET: Would the minister tell us what service is performed on the Bras d'Or lakes and the west coast of Cape Breton and the name of the boat?

Mr. LOW: The boat is the Bras d'Or and gives a weekly service from Sydney to North Sydney, Baddeck, Grand Narrows, East Bay, Big Pond, Irish Cove, Johnston's Harbour, Marble Mountain, St. Peter's, Grandique, Poulamond, L'Ardoise, Arichat, Mulgrave, Hawkesbury, Hastings, Port Hood, Margaree, Grand Etang and Cheticamp.

Mr. HANSON: How many trips does this boat make?

Mr. LOW: Weekly trips during the season of navigation.

Mr. HANSON: How many months?

Mr. LOW: About seven.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Perhaps the Bras d'Or lakes should be drained and a railway service put in.

Mr. MARTELL: When the hon. member speaks about draining the Bras d'Or lakes, he should read literature. Charles W. Warner said that the Bras d'Or lakes were the finest salt water lakes in the world. They are noted for their beauty, and all along the shore of that body of water are to be found some of the hardy Scots of Nova Scotia than whom there is no better breed alive. Every one of those places is devoid of railway facilities. The people have no method by which they can get to market or leave their homes save with their own boats or by means of subsidized ferry system. If the people of Cape Breton were coming here and getting $100,000,000 voted for branch lines, there would be very little criticism from my hon. friends over there, but the unfortunate part of the matter is that when a small vote is being made for any portion of Nova Scotia, every person in the House from Dan to Beersheba stands up and endeavours to criticise the finest province in the world, the province that made confederation possible and which is to-day the milch cow for the rest of the Dominion.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Instead of draining the lake, I think a windbreak should be put up.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Item No. 190 is a local service between Halifax, South Cape Breton and Bras d'Or lake ports, for which $5,000 is voted. The service under discussion is between Sydney, which is practically at the entrance to the Bras d'Or lakes, and Bras d'Or lake ports, although not altogether the same ports, and $13,000 is being voted for this service. Why is there such a discrepancy? I am sure the distance covered by the steamer from Halifax is much greater than that covered by the steamer from Sydney.

Mr. LOW: Halifax is asking for more service.

Mr. HANSON: Is there duplication in these services? I have no objection to these communities being served, because I know, as stated by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell), the justification for them is the fact that they have no railway communication, and they would not have any service at all if it were not for these subsidies. But there is always a suspicion in the mind of one who is not conversant with the locality that there may be an overlapping of service or that the same boat may be receiving two subsidies. Is there any suggestion of that character as regards any of these services along the coast?

Mr. LOW: I do not know of one service duplicating another subsidized service.

Mr. DUFF: I am rather surprised that the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) should object to any subsidies being paid and especially to this subsidy. The minister was good enough to read out the names of the ports at which this steamer calls and the hon. member should know exactly where those places are. Owing to the fact that this boat is on that service, a great deal of business is done by Halifax merchants and the hon. member is supposed to be in this House representing the people of Halifax. I am, therefore, surprised to hear him object to and criticise this service, because it is not in the interest of Halifax that he should do so. This boat gives a good service. She goes not only through the Bras d'Or lakes, but through the St. Peter's canal as well. She calls at Grandique, Poulamond, Arichat, Mulgrave, Hawkesbury and a number of other places in Cape Breton where there is no other communication, and I cannot understand an hon. gentleman who has been receiving subsidies from the government for fifty years getting up and objecting to this small amount.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I did not object to the subsidy, but I asked for an explanation of the discrepancy in these subsidies.

Mr. DUFF: There is no discrepancy.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I have not yet received an answer from the minister.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member heard what the minister said.

Item agreed to.

Inspection of subsidized steamship services, $4,500.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is the inspector?

Mr. LOW: Wilfrid Eddy Tupper, a gentleman who was appointed in the year 1912.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is he a good inspector?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister give us the items making up the $42,000 which are discontinued?

Mr. LOW: Canada and Newfoundland service, $35,000. We found that the Newfoundland government had taken over the service and on account of that government running the service, we declined to continue it. The Sydney and Bay St. Lawrence service, $5,000, and the Cheticamp and Port Hawkesbury service, $2,000, were also discontinued. That makes in all $42,000, not required for 1924-25.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the minister tell us how much we have saved in subsidies on account of the mercantile marine?

Mr. LOW: I have not that information by me now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can you give me an approximate figure?

Mr. LOW: I shall be glad to get the information and hand it to my hon. friend to-morrow.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If possible we could let the item stand until we got that information. The amount of course would be calculated on the basis of the previous subsidy and not on the basis of the increased subsidies; it would not be on the basis of the scale that now prevails.

Mr. LOW: We do not pay any subsidies to the mercantile marine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The country is entitled to know in detail exactly what we receive now in subsidies on account of the mercantile marine.

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend would ask the Minister of Railways I am sure he would be able to get the information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would venture a guess on that.

Mr. LOW: It is the privilege of my right hon. friend to guess on anything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amount saved would be under the Department of Trade and Commerce and the minister's officials could get the information quickly.

Item agreed to.

Electricity and Gas Inspection, including Export of Electric Power, $500; International Electrotechnical Commission, $400, $181,295.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister explain this?

Mr. LOW: There is an increase of $11,295 over the vote of last year and it is required to meet increased salaries and $2,000 for additional travelling expenses. The estimate of the salaries is $136,215; rent, fuel and travelling expenses, contractors and inspectors, amount to $44,180; on account of export of power, $500 and the International Electrotechnical Commission $400. The total expenditure for the year ending January 31, 1923 was $140,351.10 and the total revenue, $186,559.25, leaving a surplus of revenue over expenditure of $46,208.15.

Mr. HANSON: Has this service been always self-supporting?

Mr. LOW: For a number of years it has been almost entirely so.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is meant by "export of electrical power"?

Mr. LOW: We grant a license to power companies and commissions in the different provinces to export power to the United States.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is that power vested entirely in the federal government? Have not the provincial governments similar power too?

Mr. LOW: The power is vested in the Dominion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the heading of this item last year? It is not the same this year.

Mr. LOW: I do not know of any change from last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot locate the item in last year's estimates.

Mr. LOW: I have not last year's estimates here but I do not think there is any change.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister say that previously this $500 for the export of electric power and the $400 for the Electrotechnical Commission were included?

Mr. LOW: I think this is a standing item; these amounts are included in the lump sum, the details of which I gave to my hon. friend. The amount expended in the twelve months of the past year was $156,702.26 and I am inclined to think that these sums are included in last year's estimate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not mentioned. When items are mentioned in this way it is usually for the purpose of handing the money to some one; otherwise they would not be mentioned specifically as these two items are in this estimate. There is no mention of them in last year's estimates. I wonder that the minister does not realize just what the significance of that is. The amounts are not large but the principle is one that should be avoided.

Mr. LOW: If the hon. member will allow the item to stand a moment I shall have the information.

Mr. HODGINS: Is any revenue derived from the export of electricity?

Mr. LOW: No. Perhaps my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) might allow the item to pass on the understanding that I will get the information before the evening is over.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it would be better if the minister would let the item stand.

Mr. LOW: This item has appeared for many years. It is for the purpose of paying the engineers to inspect power plants exporting power to the United States. The $400 to the International Electrotechnical Commission is our contribution to the expenses of maintenance of the head office of the commission in London, England. There are thirty contributing countries.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has not made the slightest explanation. His assistant was not in when I called attention to the point. Last year the item appears as follows:

Gas and electricity inspection.

Just those four words, with the amount. Now the item appears:

Electricity and gas inspection, including export of electric power, $500; International Electrotechnical Commission, $400.

These must be new or they would not be specially mentioned. When the amounts are put in separately it is a bad principle; it is done for a special purpose.

Mr. LOW: The wording of the item is slightly different from what it was last year, but my right hon. friend need not be at all suspicious. There is no desire to conceal anything. It is exactly the item which was included in the total vote of last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope I will soon be where I have not to take the government on trust. I have prepared estimates myself—

Mr. LOW: I have no doubt.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —and I never remember a case where a deputy or other official wanted to put in an item in that way that there was not some special reason for it. There is a reason for the change all right. The minister does not know it, I am satisfied of that.

Mr. LOW: My right hon. friend says I do not know the reason.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I give him credit for not knowing the reason, because I am sure if he knew it he would tell me.

Mr. LOW: I have stated to my right hon. friend as clearly as possible what the $500 and the $400 stand for. I have told him that the $500 was to pay a portion of the engineers' salaries while they are inspecting the hydro-electric plants that export power to the United States. I have also told him that the $400 is to pay our portion of the expenses of maintaining the head office of the commission in the city of London, England, to which expenses thirty countries contribute. Can I make it any plainer to the right hon. gentleman?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume someone is getting the money, but the point I made is not answered yet. There is no need whatever for having the amount put in separately according to the explanation given by the minister. What I say is, it would not be set out separately were it not essential to do so.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is this not a way to get around the classification of the Civil Service Commision in order to pay the inspector $400 more than his classification?

Mr. LOW: It is to cover travelling expenses, and only a little over $200 was used last year. It is true the item is worded a little differently from what it was last year, but if we wanted to conceal anything the amount would not be mentioned. The accountant prepared the wording. Why he changed it from the form used last year I do not know, but I have explained for what purpose the item is intended. My right hon. friend knows enough about the preparation of estimates to be aware that it is impossible to spend money except for the purpose for which it is stated to be required.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the member to my left (Mr. Caldwell) has hit on the reason all right. I do not think the minister has the point yet. It is no use for him to say that if he wanted to conceal anything the item would not be mentioned, because if the amount was not mentioned it could not be paid. What the accountant is trying to do is to get around the act and pay somebody a little more. The minister apparently has not observed that. That is the point.

Item agreed to.

Elevators, operation and management of the Canadian government, $420,000.

The CHAIRMAN: This is the vote which was formerly before the committee.

Mr. MILLAR: What items are included in this vote?

Mr. LOW: The operation of the five grain elevators that are under the department, and the handling of all grain in these terminals.

Mr. MILLAR: Would the minister mention the location of the elevators?

Mr. LOW: Port Arthur, Moose Jaw, Calgary, Saskatoon, and Vancouver, until recently.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Prince Rupert?

Mr. LOW: Prince Rupert will come too soon for my right hon. friend.

Mr. MILLAR: Is the Halifax elevator included in this vote?

Mr. HANSON: It is not built yet.

Mr. LOW: No, it comes under another vote; it has not been built yet.

Mr. LUCAS: Is there any revenue from the operation of these elevators?

Mr. LOW: The total revenue for the past four years is as follows:

1920-21	$672,325 00
1921-22	804,201 16
1922-23	860,421 39
1923-24	658,747 21

Mr. LUCAS: How is this revenue made up?

Mr. LOW: With the consent of the committee I shall hand in the statement of revenue for the last fiscal year so that it may be printed in Hansard. The statement is as follows:

Mr. SALES: Will the minister give us a statement of the returns in connection with the operation of these elevators since the government have owned and operated them?

Mr. LOW: I shall put in a complete statement showing receipts and expenditure from 1913-14 up to January 31, 1924. With the consent of the committee, I shall not read it but shall hand it to Hansard so that it may be printed in full. The statement is as follows:

*Vancouver elevator transferred to the Board of Harbour Commissioners on October 1, 1923.

Mr. GARDINER: Does that include interest and sinking fund?

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. SALES: In the $94,000 that the minister mentioned a few nights ago, are the licensing fees for the elevators included?

Mr. LOW: The license fees are included.

Mr. SALES: In the $94,000?

Mr. LOW: No, in this item, I think.

Mr. SALES: What about the license fees for the country elevators?

Mr. LOW: I have handed in the statement of earnings, but I shall give my hon. friend the total revenue if he wishes.

Mr. SALES: That is not the point at all. The other night when I gave as the surplus a figure of $4,000,000 odd, which the minister at that time was not inclined to agree with—

Mr. LOW: And I do not agree to-night.

Mr. SALES: Well, taking the figures the minister gave to-night and adding to them the $94,000 which he admitted had been the revenue over expenditure through the operations of the Grain Commission, we now have $3,966,984.17. We require only another item or so to make the figures furnished by his own department correspond with those I gave the other night, and I think licenses would probably cover that.

Mr. LOW: The figures presented by the hon. member tell only half the tale. They would give out the impression that there was a surplus of $4,000,000, but I shall endeavour to show that there are quite a few items that are not included in the ordinary figures of operation of these elevators. To mention a few small items to start with, there is no charge made for the services of the Board of Grain Commissioners in connection with these elevators. That charge is by annual vote under the Canada Grain Act which we discussed the other night. There is no charge for the services of the department at Ottawa. There is no charge for printing and stationery, or for insurance, except on grain stocks at Port Arthur. There is no provision in these annual statements for depreciation on buildings, machinery and equipment. We have invested in the elevators $5,882,523.78 upon which no interest is charged against the operation of those elevators. There is no charge for taxes of any kind. And we are adding to all this an item of about $1,400,000 for an elevator at Edmonton. If my hon. friend will figure out this capital investment at say 5½ per cent interest, he will find it amounts to about $275,000 each year, not including the elevator that is under construction at Edmonton. Then if the cost of the Canada Grain Board be added the profits will naturally be decreased.

Mr. GARDINER: The services of the Canada Grain Board are paid by the farmers in inspection and weighing fees.

Mr. LOW: Yes, but my hon. friend does not follow me. We had a surplus during those thirteen years of $94,000 on the Canada Grain Act. Had any charge been made under this item for the Canada Grain Board there would perhaps be a deficit in the other. Of course, it is only a matter of whether we shall have a larger surplus here and less in the other.

Mr. GARDINER: Why suggest charging it against this account, when the farmers have already paid the bill? We have paid for everything, and there is no reason why a charge should be made against this account.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend does not follow me at all.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh yes, I do.

Mr. LOW: If you charge certain services against the other item you would not charge them against this; we are putting the total charge in the other item. We might divide it, and if we did that, it would simply mean that the surplus here would be less. It does not affect the joint result of the two items.

Mr. CALDWELL: If I follow the minister, any surplus in the $94,000 item would be greater if he charged part to this item, but the net result of the two items together would be the same.

Mr. LOW: Exactly.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then why confuse the two?

Mr. LOW: I am not trying to confuse them. I did not raise the point. I am simply trying to explain it.

Mr. CALDWELL: The other vote has been passed, and the minister admits a surplus of $94,000. Then why confuse that with this?

Mr. LOW: I want to deal with this separately, but my hon. friend asked me the question. I want to point out that there is no charge made by the department here at Ottawa for printing and stationery, or any other service, and in the elevator item there is no charge for depreciation. Any man knows that a depreciation of two per cent is not excessive. Almost every company in its annual statement writes off at least two per cent depreciation in its permanent buildings, and it would write off about ten per cent depreciation for the class of machinery that is in use in these elevators. The life of one of these cleaning machines is not more than ten years, and therefore ten per cent depreciation should properly be written off the machinery installed in these elevators. Then there are belts and many other things for which no allowance is made, and nothing is allowed for capital expenditure. Charge up these items as an ordinary company would, add interest, say 5½ per cent, and something for depreciation, and you will find that during the thirteen years these elevators have been in operation, the whole $4,000,000 would be more than wiped out. The point I wish to make clear is that while the elevators showed a surplus of $4,000,000, no allowance was made to provide for depreciation or interest on the investment. I am not complaining; I am simply pointing that out.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is that the method by which this surplus for the year was arrived at?

Mr. LOW: Yes, without any provision for interest or depreciation. I might mention that during the last four years we have had a surplus from what are called overages amounting to $179,000, or about $40,000 or $45,000 a year.

Mr. FORKE: Does not the minister think it would be advisable to change the system of book-keeping so that the country could know just how these elevators stand? Why does not the government make these charges against them, and issue a business-

10 p.m. like statement giving the actual standing of the elevators? As it is, it goes out to the country that there is a profit of $4,000,000 in the operation of these elevators, and all these expenses are kept in the background, giving a wrong impression. I do not see why that is done. It creates a great deal of dissatisfaction. If the country knew they were being run on an even basis, all this dissatisfaction would disappear.

Mr. LOW: I, as minister of this department, shall be very glad to take into consideration the remarks of my hon. friend from Brandon. I do not see why interest should not be allowed in figuring out the ultimate result. The point was raised the other night, and I have simply presented these figures to show the House why there is a surplus in the operation of the government elevators.

Mr. MILLAR: A large amount of this surplus grain is in litigation between the elevator companies. They have refused to pay the government for overages. I suppose that is not included in the receipts, as given here?

Mr. LOW: No, that is not included.

Mr. MILLAR: There is a rumour that there was something in the nature of a dispute over some 29,000 bushels in the elevator at Vancouver when it was taken over by the Harbour Commissioners. Could the minister give us any information about that?

Mr. LOW: I do not think there is any dispute. We weighed up the amount in the elevator at the time it was transferred to the Harbour Board; the Trade and Commerce department know the number of bushels there, and we expect the Harbour Commissioners to pay us for that amount. I do not think there is any dispute about it.

Mr. MILLAR: The minister still expects the Harbour Commissioners to pay for that?

[Mr. Caldwell.]

Mr. LOW: I do not doubt for a minute that they will. As long as I am in charge of the department I am going to insist on it being paid.

Mr. MILLAR: Have they admitted or denied the debt?

Mr. LOW: I do not think they have denied it. It is just in abeyance.

Mr. GARDINER: Was this 29,000 bushels of grain that no one had any claim to ownership of, in other words, a surplus?

Mr. LOW: A surplus at Vancouver, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister told the hon. member for Brandon that he was going to consider having the reports appear as disclosing interest on investment, depreciation, and so forth. Will the minister tell us where he thinks he can make this appear?

Mr. LOW: I shall be very glad to rely upon a suggestion from my hon. friend as to where it might be put. He has had a much longer parliamentary experience than I have had, and I think I could safely rely upon his advice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the minister was just stringing the hon. member. There is no place in the world where that could appear. Where can he make appear interest on capital and depreciation? The public accounts show moneys going out and coming in; they are not like the accounts of a corporation, and the minister would have to revolutionize the whole public accounts of Canada. That was only a means of getting past.

Mr. LOW: My right hon. friend says I have just been stringing the hon. member for Brandon. I have not been long enough in parliamentary life to adopt those methods, and I hope I shall never have to resort to them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Tell us where you could have them appear.

Mr. LOW: It could be very easily shown that the surplus as apparent did not take into consideration certain other charges, which could be enumerated in the same statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It could be shown by a speech or in a statement issued, but you cannot show that in the estimates or public accounts, and that is the only place they are absent from now.

Mr. LOW: It could be shown in a statement that might be issued from the Trade and Commerce department, giving the result of the operation of these elevators. It might even be shown in the report of the Canada Grain Board which is tabled here every year. It would be an easy matter to do that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the public accounts.

Mr. LOW: There are some things I know a little about, and one of them is the preparation of financial statements.

Mr. HOEY: Do they appear now in the annual report of the Board of Grain Commissioners?

Mr. LOW: I do not think they do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I venture to say they will not appear there either.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend has prophesied many things for several years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And pretty accurate too.

Mr. LOW: I do not always rely on the prophecies of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are fairly accurate.

Mr. LOW: Not very accurate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, fairly accurate.

Mr. SALES: I am sorry the minister should get the idea in his head that I wanted to circulate wrong information throughout the country. I had no such intention in my mind.

Mr. LOW: I did not think so, and I do not think I intimated that I thought the hon. member had any desire to mislead the House or the country. I would be sorry to think that, because in the short acquaintance I have had with the hon. gentleman our relations have been most pleasant, and I have the highest regard for him.

Mr. SALES: I was only trying to find out what the real situation was, and when I applied to my hon. friend's department for the receipts and expenditures I had no idea what the figures would show, and I quoted them in good faith. I notice, on looking through the Auditor General's report for this department, that if interest is not charged, the cost of the Grain Inquiry Commission, consisting of Mr. Justice Hyndman, Mr. Lincoln Goldie, Mr. J. H. Haslam, Mr. W. D. Staples and Mr. C. Birkett—which was charged up to the administration of the Canada Grain Act—is $46,373.12. I find considerable items for the maintenance of these elevators, for belts, iron beams, steel rods, steel columns, boiler plates, wire cable, buckets and so on. So apparently they keep on maintaining these elevators out of the fund before it shows any profit.

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend will refer to item 380 he will find it reads: "Elevators, government terminal, maintenance of and necessary equipment, $60,000."

Mr. SALES: I am pointing out that in the old way of keeping the accounts, which apparently has been followed up to this year, all the expenses and all the receipts are grouped in the Auditor General's report, and that is where the figures are obtained which I quoted the other night. Now apparently the minister is following some new method of bookkeeping and singling out these items, and very nearly arriving at the same result.

Mr. LOW: I do not think so.

Mr. SALES: Taking the figures the minister has given to-night, and coupling them with the $94,000 which he agreed to a few weeks ago, we have $3,966,984.17, and I do not think we have yet got the license fees from the country elevators included in this. I think the weighing and inspection and the registration and cancellation of warehouse receipts are not included either.

Mr. LOW: Perhaps I should read the items included in the total revenue.

Mr. SALES: Has the minister any revenue other than what he quoted to-night?

Mr. LOW: I have no other revenue. I think it is all included in that amount of three million dollars odd.

Mr. SALES: I am anxious to prove that the figures given me by the department are correct.

Mr. LOW: I think if my hon. friend is prepared to accept half the story he might satisfy himself that the figures that he quoted the other night are correct, but if he tells one half of the story I shall endeavour to tell the other half. If he adds my half of the story to his, he will find that we arrive at a point where there is practically no surplus at all.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think this last statement of the minister coupled with the rather disturbing admission which he made a while ago, is going to make us a bit critical of surpluses reported by the government or by any department. In the first place, he admitted the other night that there was a surplus in the administration of the Grain Act of $94,000.

Mr. LOW: Yes, for thirteen years and ten months.

Mr. CALDWELL: To-night he stated that there was a surplus of $3,900,000 odd in the operation of the elevators, and later on he tells us that their bookkeeping is so faulty—

Mr. LOW: No, I did not say that.

Mr. CALDWELL: I will appeal to the sense of the House on that point. He said he was considering very seriously changing his method of bookkeeping. This would not show any surplus at all—

Mr. LOW: I said I would take into consideration the remarks of my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke).

Mr. CALDWELL: Yes.

Mr. LOW: And that is not saying what I am going to do.

Mr. CALDWELL: Which means that he is willing to believe that his bookkeeping can be improved upon.

Mr. LOW: I did not say that, but I said that we might give more information. I am glad to receive suggestions from hon. members in different parts of the House, and if it will add anything of value to the statement I am willing to insert a clause in the report of the Canada Grain Board, showing the charges that should properly be made against the operation of the elevators, the interest on the investment, the depreciation, and other charges that should properly be included.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then we will take the statement actually made by the minister to-night. A few minutes ago he said there was a surplus of three million some hundred thousand odd in the operation of the elevators, but he also said that if the whole account was brought down and all the expenses charged there possibly would not be any surplus. I think we have a right to be a bit critical of the method of bookkeeping of the department. I think when a statement is brought down by a department of the government we are entitled to have all the information in the statement.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend has noticed from year to year items in the current expenditure for elevators. They are not included in capital account. If we build an elevator this year, as we are doing and which is costing $1,400,000, it will be included in the current expenditures of the year.

Mr. CALDWELL: In the capital expenditures?

Mr. LOW: No, in the current expenditures.

Mr. CALDWELL: Well Mr. Chairman, I may be just a bit thick in my understanding; at the same time I can hardly recognize the different statements made by the minister to-night as meaning one and the same thing; that on the one hand there might be a surplus of nearly $4,000,000, and on the other hand that if the bookkeeping had been thorough there would not be any surplus at all. I would advise the minister to take private counsel from the hon. member for Brandon, so that he could improve his bookkeeping. Then when his statement was brought down we would know what it meant. It is quite a serious thing to say one minute that you have a surplus of three million odd and the next minute to say you have not any surplus at all. If I made out a statement of that kind in reference to my own banking account, it would be a disturbing element.

An hon. MEMBER: It might hurt the bank.

Mr. CALDWELL: It might mean success or failure of the Home Bank. I submit that we are entitled, when we get a statement, to have all the facts and charges against the item. I thought the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales) had about $3,000,000 coming to him a few minutes ago, and now I find he has nothing. I am feeling very sorry for him.

Mr. LOW: An hon. member asked if the license fees for the internal elevators were included in the receipts under this item.

Mr. SALES: The country elevators.

Mr. LOW: Yes, the country elevators. They are included in the vote for the Canada Grain Act which went through a few nights ago.

Mr. HOEY: In the $94,000.

Mr. GOULD: The minister has been talking about depreciation of the elevators. When did the government commence writing off depreciation of the elevators?

Mr. LOW: I am sure the hon. member has been following the items from time to time since he entered parliament, and he has never seen any item for depreciation. That has always worked to the advantage of the producer of grain. It was pointed out that there was a surplus of $4,000,000. It is only right, in explanation of that, that there should be taken into consideration the capital expenditure, interest on the investment, depreciation and other charges that might properly be made. I am sure though we left it out, that fact is working no hardship for any producer of grain in this country. If an elevator is built at Prince Rupert, it will be built out of current expenditure.

Mr. GOULD: The minister states that it is not used detrimentally to the producer of grain. What I have in mind is that when the audit was made of the terminal elevator companies at Fort William and Port Arthur, not only the government elevators, but the other elevators, in the amounts that the companies submitted as valuation, they used that. That is, they did not write off any amount for depreciation, but they allowed that to accumulate. Upon that sum which had accumulated, they added another sum almost equal to it in an endeavour to justify the huge profits they were making. I think it would be good business on behalf of the people to make these companies use a system of bookkeeping which would oblige them to show reasonable depreciation, so that dividends might be shown on the annual valuation of a plant. The depreciation in my estimation is an important item to be considered in these huge sums that are being expended on elevators.

Mr. CALDWELL: The minister speaks of several items that might be written up against this surplus, one of them being taxes and the other depreciation. I think the minister must be mistaken as regards taxes. If the Dominion government are liable for taxes on any of their properties, I shall be glad to know that, because we have in New Brunswick some Dominion government property from which we should like to collect taxes. I refer to the soldier settlers' land taken over by the Soldier Settlement Board, and railway shops. In my constituency there is a terminal division that we would be pleased to put a nice tax on. Is anything written off for depreciation on any public building such as post offices, armouries, docks, wharves, railroads or any other Dominion government property? If not, why should this item be interjected into the debate on elevators?

Mr. LOW: The post offices serve the general public—everybody.

Mr. CALDWELL: Do the elevators not do that too?

Mr. LOW: Not everybody.

Mr. HOEY: Everybody eats bread.

Mr. CALDWELL: Therefore an elevator must serve a public purpose.

Mr. LOW: One group of people might ask that they be exempted from depreciation charges or other overhead taxes. I mentioned a number of small items, but I said that the big item not taken into consideration was interest on the investment. Let me point out to hon. members opposite that, without any depreciation or any other charges, the total item of net earnings referred to by my hon. friend amounts to only 6.26 per cent upon the capital investment. That is not out of reason. If you deduct from that, perhaps, 2 per cent for depreciation of the building and 10 per cent for the machinery, you can soon work out the total amount of actual profits.

Mr. MILLAR: As I understand the matter, the policy of the department is that the grain shall pay for every service rendered by the government, namely: Inspection, weighing, cleaning, handling of the government elevators, and so on. We do not know exactly from the figures given to-night whether there is a surplus or a deficit. I do not wish to cast any slur on the minister, but I do not believe the minister knows that exactly and a careful accounting has not been made. Is it the policy of the government that the grain shall pay for every service rendered by the government?

Mr. LOW: The result for the last ten years would not indicate that. I stated just a moment ago that the earnings would only amount to 6.26 per cent on the capital investment, without any deduction for depreciation. The interest alone on the investment would almost eat that up.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is after paying operating costs?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: How will that compare with the earnings of the government railways?

Mr. LOW: If we are to take for granted the elimination of interest charges against many things that cause deficits there is only one result—the people will have to pay those charges in the final analysis.

Mr. CALDWELL: We are not finding fault with this, but I think the comparisons are hardly fair. What about the earnings of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine? Will they pay 6 per cent on the investment after paying operating expenses?

Mr. LOW: The Canadian Government Merchant Marine is for the benefit of all the people, not for any particular service.

Mr. CALDWELL: And the elevators are not? I submit that there is no comparison at all. Everybody eats bread. Everybody does not use the merchant marine vessels.

Mr. LOW: Surely the hon. member will not argue that the elevators are for the benefit of all the people.

Mr. CALDWELL: Indirectly.

Mr. LOW: The man that eats bread, the blacksmith, the storekeeper, the labourer in the factory, derive direct benefit from the elevator?

Mr. CALDWELL: They all eat bread.

Mr. LOW: That is pretty far-fetched. If any individual class were seeking a special service from the public revenue, I am sure my hon. friend opposite would be one of the first to object. I am willing, however, to consider the suggestion made by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) and to show just what conditions are—

Mr. CALDWELL: If the minister will take the advice of the hon. member for Brandon he will not go far astray on anything.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does the minister think it fair to charge the building of elevators to current account? When you build a post office or a wharf, you charge that, not to current account, but to capital account. All buildings built by the government are charged to capital account.

Mr. LOW: The only difference is that if you charge it to capital account, you charge it to the public debt and thus you make it appear as if you had a large surplus from operating over current expenditures.

Mr. GOULD: When the minister spoke of 6.2 per cent as the profit, on what valuation was that based? Was that based on the original cost or the cost submitted to the government when the latest audit was made of the valuation of the elevator, say at Fort William? I see a disparity between the original cost and the cost submitted recently to the government. The original cost of the elevator was shown as $1,315,767. When they were asked what the present valuation was, they showed a valuation of $2,105,228 and this was given in justification of the huge profits earned by the elevator. This was in spite of the fact that the elevator should have had depreciation charges written off, and the valuation shown as the original cost less those depreciation charges.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. LOW: I am glad to inform my hon. friend that the lower figure is correct; the amount is $1,383,822.

Mr. GOULD: There is a disparity between that figure the minister gives and the lower figure I have mentioned of $1,315,767.

Mr. LOW: There is a difference of some $70,000 odd.

Mr. SPENCER: How much is allowed for the depreciation of these elevators?

Mr. LOW: No allowance is made for depreciation. It is customary in manufacturing businesses to allow 2 per cent. on the buildings and about 10 per cent on machinery. The life of a machine in an elevator operating at high speed is not more than ten years and it is therefore safe to provide for that length of time.

Mr. GOULD: What I am trying to show is that when the Canadian government elevator was asked to justify the huge profits it had made, the valuation of the whole concern was raised approximately $1,000,000. The assessed value of the land site was $145,714 but when the valuation was submitted to the Audit Board it was shown as amounting to only $90,000. We can see the genius of this: It is a very common practice throughout the urban centres, when the assessors come around, to reduce the valuation of property, and the Canadian government has been guilty of the same practice in this instance. To justify the profits they have made they have increased the total value of their land and buildings something like $1,000,000.

Mr. LOW: I have already stated that the correct amount is only $1,300,000 odd and not $2,000,000.

Mr. GOULD: I understand that; I am merely pointing out how the method changes to meet the circumstances.

Mr. SALES: What has been the result of the operation, since their inception, of the elevators at Saskatoon, Calgary and Moose Jaw?

Mr. LOW: The revenue from the Saskatoon elevator 1923-24 amounted to $41,422.95 and the total expenditure, $62,462.86, or a loss of $21,039.91. In the case of the Moose Jaw elevator the total revenue amounted to $24,-210.55 and the expenditure, $57,228.28, or a loss of $33,017.73.

Mr. SALES: What about the Calgary elevator?

Mr. LOW: The total revenue amounted to $98,605.58 and the total expenditure, $71,590.33, or a profit of $27,015.25.

Mr. SALES: That is for one year.

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. SALES: Has the minister any idea what the total result has been since these houses have been in operation? Has there been a consistent profit or loss?

Mr. LOW: I shall give the figures for a period of years showing the various profits or losses as the case may be.

Calgary Elevator

Year	Profit	Loss
1915-16 (Sept. to March)		$ 9,540 28
1916-17	$ 6,899 51

Mr. CALDWELL: What is the reason for quite a large profit one year and a heavy deficit the next; would it be due to a crop failure?

Mr. LOW: When I was at Moose Jaw last year a group of men asked me to provide an amount in my estimates for advertising purposes to urge the farmers to patronize the elevator there. That apparently is the reason for the loss at Moose Jaw—the failure of the farmers to patronize the elevator.

Mr. CALDWELL: What other method do they have of getting their grain out?

Mr. LOW: They can ship it right through to Fort William.

Mr. MILLAR: What would be the object of getting them to patronize that elevator? It would be simply trying to make water run up hill. If it is cheaper for the farmers to ship their grain to Fort William, why urge them to use the interior terminal elevators?

Mr. LOW: I did not agree to provide that amount for advertising, because I felt that the government having built the elevator at a cost of about a million and a half dollars, could hardly be expected to ask the farmers to avail themselves of the accommodation offered when it was not in their interest to do so.

Mr. MILLAR: I think the minister was perfectly right. Perhaps I might explain why there was a surplus some years and a deficit other years. These interior terminal elevators were built for taking care of the grain when there was a shortage of cars and the farmers were not able to ship their grain to the terminal elevators fast enough. The transportation systems are dependent to a large extent on the weather conditions. If they are favourable, as they were last fall, the transportation systems can handle grain very fast, and the interior terminal elevators are not used very much but if the transportation systems are tied up by reason of very bad weather, the farmers must use this accommodation.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister give us the corresponding figures for the government elevator at Port Arthur?

Mr. LOW: These are the corresponding figures for the Port Arthur elevator:

Year	Profit
1913-14	$ 66,708 54
1914-15	153,966 84
1915-16	162,384 53
1916-17	395,425 19
1917-18	399,454 95
1918-19	267,440 92
1919-20	249,249 29
1920-21	156,092 65
1921-22	340,861 08
1922-23	270,331 83
1923-24	246,549 42

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister explain whether in this statement of profit he is making provision for depreciation and for interest on the investment?

Mr. LOW: I think I have told the committee, at least half a dozen times, that there is no charge for interest, for depreciation, for the services of the department at Ottawa, and for stationery and other small items.

Mr. COOTE: Are the profits quoted the difference between the receipts and the expenditures?

Mr. LOW: The profits quoted represent the difference between the receipts and expenditures without any provisions for the items I have enumerated.

Mr. COOTE: Then I wish the minister would explain to the committee why this difference occurs. A short time ago I asked the department for a statement of receipts and expenditures in connection with the various government elevators. According to the statement furnished to me, the receipts of the government elevator at Port Arthur for 1913-14 were $217,641.66, and the expenditures, $68,111.35, leaving a profit, as I figure it, of $149,530. If I understood the minister correctly, he stated the profit on the operation of this elevator for that year was $66,708. In fact there is a discrepancy between his figures and the figures furnished me for every year which he has quoted.

Mr. LOW: The receipts at the Port Arthur elevator 1913-4 were $107,494.14, the expenditure $40,785.20, leaving a profit of $66,708.54.

Mr. COOTE: Is the minister then able to explain why this statement for 1913-14 should be given to me on May 1, if the receipts were not $207,641.66, and the expenditures $68,111.35, leaving a profit of $149,530?

Mr. LOW: The total revenue for 1913-14 was as I gave it a moment ago. If my hon. friend will drop into my office I shall be glad to go into these figures with him, particularly with regard to the differences between those I have given and those he has received.

Mr. COOTE: Just to bring to the attention of the minister the great discrepancy there is I would like to cite a few more of these figures. The letter which I received is dated May first and says:

> With reference to your letter of the 22nd ultimo, regarding additional information required in connection with the Canadian government elevators, I now enclose copies of statement prepared by the Board of Grain Commissioners showing the revenue and expenditure of such elevators at Port Arthur, Calgary and Saskatoon each year since the commencement of operation, which I trust will meet your requirements.

I will just give a few illustrations to show how far the figures given in this connection differ from those given by the minister tonight. The statement I have received shows that for the year 1914 the receipts of the government elevator at Port Arthur amounted to $190,238.39 and the expenditure $64,656.36, leaving a profit, as I have figured it, of $125,582; the minister gives it as $153,966. For 1915-16 the statement I have gives the profit as $324,625, and the figure given by the minister is $162,384. The minister will see what a great discrepancy there is for that year.

Mr. LOW: May I ask the hon. member who signed the letter?

Mr. COOTE: It is signed by Mr. Parmelee, the acting deputy minister.

Mr. LOW: Will my hon. friend show me the letter, together with the figures from which he is quoting?

Mr. COOTE: Yes, I will do that. For 1916-17 this statement gives the profit as $416,923, while the minister's figure is $395,425. May I ask what were the total receipts for the years 1913 to 1923 inclusive?

Mr. LOW: $3,929,262.01.

Mr. COOTE: I have it only up to 1922-23—$3,694,878.61.

Mr. LOW: The amount for last year to January 31, 1924, is $374,861.92.

Mr. COOTE: Adding this amount to the total I have given, I make it $4,069,740.53. What were the profits for 1923-24?

Mr. LOW: $269,691.01.

Mr. KELLNER: What was the idea of taking the control of the Vancouver elevators from the Board of Grain Commissioners and giving it to the Harbour Commissioners?

Mr. LOW: The elevators are usually operated by the harbour commissions, but the inspection and the weighing and the issuing of receipts is still under the control of the department.

Mr. KELLNER: Well, the control is under the Harbour Commissioners in transfer harbours such as Montreal, but Vancouver is what might be termed a terminal point, such as Fort William is, and in that respect it is in a different position from Montreal, St. John or any of the eastern ports. I assure the minister that the western grain growers would much rather have the elevators under the Board of Grain Commissioners.

Mr. LOW: In Vancouver they think they will shortly surpass Montreal in shipping and I would suggest that if my hon. friend happens to be in that part of the country he be very guarded about making that remark within a hundred miles of Vancouver.

Mr. KELLNER: The minister did not get my point. Vancouver is a terminal point and also a transfer point, but Montreal is only a transfer point. How many mixing licenses have been issued in Vancouver?

Mr. LOW: I cannot give that information to-night, but if the hon. gentleman will drop into my office I shall be glad to give it to him.

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister give us the total profit at the Port Arthur elevator for the years up to 1923-24? I would like to get some more information with regard to these discrepancies.

Mr. LOW: The total profit for the years from 1913-1914 to 1923-1924 to January 31, amounted to $2,743,053.64.

Mr. COOTE: I have figured this out very hurriedly, and I make the profit $2,940,911. Of course, I will not guarantee the accuracy of these figures.

Mr. LOW: Are those figures down to the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. COOTE: I have the figures here for every year except 1923 and 1924, and there is a discrepancy in every year as compared with the figures given by the minister. This discrepancy refers to the elevators at Calgary and Saskatoon. I have statements here covering their operations, and there is a discrepancy as compared with the minister's figures for every year. Really, I think the minister ought to give us some reason why there should be this great discrepancy. Possibly he cannot do it, but he has been very positive to-night, it seems to me, in assuring the members that he is giving the grain farmers a very cheap service and is not making any money out of them. Possibly his figures are not accurate. We have two different sets of figures coming from his department.

11 p.m.

Mr. LOW: Is there any reason why my figures should be any more inaccurate than my hon. friend's? We are both ordinary laymen, and I shall be very glad to sit down with him and compare these figures, and see wherein the difference arises.

Mr. COOTE: I will admit that I am an ordinary layman, and the minister can admit it for himself, but we understand that we have a very highly paid and efficient Civil Service which is furnishing us with this information, and it is very hard for members to understand why, therefore, we should get two sets of figures from the same department showing a very great discrepancy. The minister will notice that particularly in the year 1915-1916, and there are other years where the discrepancy is just as great. I certainly hope that the minister will try and see that his department is administered in such a way that we can depend upon the figures we get from it being correct. I would hate to quote these figures and find out afterwards they were not correct. I just wanted to know whether the minister could throw any light on this great discrepancy in the two sets of figures coming from his own department.

Mr. LOW: All I know is that I have a set of figures before me, and I rely upon them being correct. If mine are wrong and my hon. friend's are right, let us get together on the matter. I am ready and willing to meet the hon. member at any time, and compare our figures and see where we differ. There may be some simple explanation.

Mr. CALDWELL: May I ask the hon. member for Macleod by whom his figures were prepared?

Mr. COOTE: I quoted the letter here. It was signed by Mr. Parmelee, and the figures, I understand, were prepared by the Board of Grain Commissioners. Coming from them I would take them to be correct. While I am on my feet I would ask the minister to tell the committee, without going over all the figures again, whether the Calgary elevator is a paying proposition from the standpoint of his department, and similarly with regard to the elevators at Saskatoon and Moose Jaw.

Mr. LOW: I have given all these figures; they are on Hansard; shall I repeat them?

Mr. COOTE: No, but taking a period of years, does the minister consider them a paying proposition?

Mr. LOW: I have given the years in which they have been paying, but you have to take into consideration interest on capital investment, depreciation, and the other items I have mentioned.

Mr. COOTE: I simply wanted from the minister his opinion whether or not it was a paying proposition, because I understand he is proposing to build a similar elevator at Edmonton. I was wondering whether he was going to do that because it was a paying proposition, or what was the reason.

Mr. LOW: Let me first ask the hon. member whether his figures are for the calendar or the fiscal year.

Mr. COOTE: I would take it they are for the fiscal year, because they start off with the year "1913-14."

Mr. LOW: How did the hon. member ask his question?

Mr. COOTE: I have not my letter here, so I am unable to say.

Mr. LOW: I shall be glad at any time to go into the figures with my hon. friend One set of figures may have been given for the fiscal year, and the other for the calendar year.

Mr. CALDWELL: With regard to the discrepancy between the figures given by the department to a member of the House and the figures given to the minister, I am very glad indeed that this matter has come up before the civil government estimates have been taken up. We have a very elaborate staff of statisticians in this department, with a salary list aggregating over $50,000, and one position that struck my attention in view of the discrepancies that have been disclosed to the House to-night is that of Assistant Chief, Division of Educational Statistics. Now, if there is one thing that is needed in this department, if it is going to have a statistical branch at all, it is an educational statistics branch, so that the officers may be educated in preparing their statistics so that they will not show such a great discrepancy.

Another matter that I think it would be well to consider when the civil government estimates are up, and I hope I am not out of order in referring to this now, is a question that has been referred to at different times in this House when those estimates are going through, and that is that practically every department has an elaborate statistical branch. I think possibly the Bureau of Statistics of the Dominion is as competent and able an organization as that of any country comparable in population, and I would like the government to consider very seriously the advisability of doing away with the statistical branches in the different departments, and putting this whole work of gathering and tabulating statistics under one department.

Mr. LOW: That matter has been under consideration.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think in that way we might possibly be able to get figures from the one department that would compare at least within a million dollars when given over a period of four or five years, which seems impossible under the present system. I am not blaming the minister. It is possible the statistician who got out the report for the hon. member for MacLeod was more thorough than the official who prepared the minister's figures, because the minister admitted to-night that if these accounts had been kept under a different system and had been charged with what they should have been charged there would have been a difference of $3,000,000 in the figures he gave us to-night. I would very strongly urge that this question of gathering statistics be considered by the government, so that we will not have the duplication that now exists in this work in every department of the government.

Mr. MILLAR: Is it not possible that the discrepancy may exist through the crop year having been taken in the one case? I have compared some figures for the crop year and the calendar year, and I have noticed quite a discrepancy between them.

Mr. LOW: I have no doubt that when we come to compare the figures we shall be able to find the reason for the discrepancy. I assure my hon. friend from MacLeod that I shall be very glad to go into them in detail with him.

Mr. CALDWELL: There is another thing the minister should take up with his own department and that is the question of giving out statistics to members, because those are what we must depend on; we cannot wait until the estimates come down for this information. There should be some uniform method of giving out statistics so that when a member gets certain figures from the department he can rely on them, and not find them at variance with another set of figures issued by the same department. It impresses on my mind more thoroughly than ever the necessity of having a uniform method of keeping statistics, and it should all be under the Bureau of Statistics.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where did this vote appear last year? I have been looking for the vote of last year but cannot find it. It does not seem to have been dealt with in the same way. There seems to be some change in the estimates.

Mr. LOW: I know that my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) was not in the House when I explained probably a dozen times the manner in which this vote was being treated this year. In the past the estimates for the Canada Grain Act proper and the estimates for the management and operation of Canadian government elevators have been presented to parliament and voted in one amount. This year they are voted in two different amounts one, the Canada Grain Act, $1,100,000, and the other the elevators for 420,000 jointly amounting to $1,520,000, the reduction on the two items combined amounts to $38,000 odd.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There must be an increase in the other one. There is a decrease in this.

Mr. LOW: Yes. They total $38,000 less.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The other item would be the Canada Grain Act administration, $1,478,000. That is the item the minister is referring to, is it? That is item 363 of last year's estimates.

Mr. LOW: The total amount was $1,558,839.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The total amount last year was $1,478,839. It may be that there was a supplementary estimate.

Mr. LOW: Yes, a supplementary item of $80,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In that supplementary of $80,000 there was an increase.

Mr. LOW: The vote under the Canada Grain Act this year was $1,100,000. Under this item it is $420,000, making a total of $1,520,000, against $1,558,839.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not what I was talking about. In 1923-24 there would be an increase of $258,000 over the vote of 1923-24.

Mr. LOW: The combined vote?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. LOW: I do not think so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You will find that the combined vote in 1922-23 was $1,300,000. The amount in the supplementaries for 1923-24 was $1,478,839, which made an increase of $178,839. Now the minister tells us there was a supplementary item of $80,000, so that it makes the increase of $258,000 which I referred to. My hon. friend, in taking $38,000 off this year, still leaves the amount some $200,000 above the expenditure of 1922-23. What is the occasion of the big increase?

Mr. LOW: There is a decrease of $38,000. The elevator item this year amounts to $420,000, against $472,000 last year, making a decrease of $52,000. The item for the administration of the Canada Grain Act is $1,100,000 this year, against $1,086,839, last year, an increase of $13,161. Deduct $13,161 from $52,000 and roughly speaking you will have a reduction of $38,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I quite agree with that, but my hon. friend's government raised that vote in the estimate of 1923-24 as against the previous year $258,000 odd. The reduction now made of $38,000 would cut that down to $220,000. Is there any way of getting back to the figures of 1922-23. What is the reason for the increase? Were there more elevators operated?

Mr. LOW: The natural cause of the increase for 1922-23 was the large crop. There was a large crop again last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It was 1923-24 when the increase took place.

Mr. LOW: In 1923-24 there was an exceedingly large crop, about 475,000,000 bushels of wheat, and it required extra help, inspection, weighing and other services. Naturally it would require a much greater staff to handle such a crop than to handle a crop of 300,000,000 or 325,000,000 bushels.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes. There are a whole lot of different matters I want to discuss in connection with the elevators and the handling of the grain traffic, and I do not know that these matters can be usefully discussed now, when we are told that the grain report is to come down in time for legislation. Is the government's information still to the effect that this report will be brought down soon?

Mr. LOW: I expect that the interim grain inquiry report will be placed upon the Table within the next few days—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Dealing with the question of grain inspection?

Mr. LOW: I do not know just what it will deal with, but it will be an interim report by the Grain Commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are the government's instructions to the commission as to what is to be done in the interim report sufficiently definite to let us know whether we will have that report, not only for the purpose of considering it in detail but for the purpose of basing legislation upon it this year?

Mr. LOW: I am hopeful that there will be matters reported on which will enable us to introduce new legislation. I cannot be certain. No instructions have been given.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose we will have an opportunity of discussing questions of spread, market prices on the country sidings as against the elevators and all the other difficulties.

Mr. LOW: No doubt hon. gentlemen will have an opportunity of discussing that report, and if they enter into all the items which my hon. friend has mentioned the discussion will take considerable time. However, it is the privilege of hon. gentlemen opposite to discuss these things. I have no doubt the report will be tabled within the next few days. I have been informed that it is on its way.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What are the sources from which the revenue of these elevators is derived?

Mr. LOW: I have given these statements about three times already to-night, and the hon. member will find all the information on Hansard.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): We all realize that one of the most vital questions before us to-day is that of markets—the extension and the preservation of markets when we once get them. That applies not only to agriculture, but to all lines of industry. We are bending every effort to extend our markets in every direction where we can find them. In order to retain those markets there is one fundamental principle that we must not lose sight of. Once we have found markets, we must place on them a good product, uniform in quality and in such shape that those who are our customers will know that the article that they are getting is according to grade or as represented.

The marketing of grain is of vital importance to agriculturists, not only in eastern Canada, but in western Canada, to agriculturists in Canada as a whole, and in order to show the situation as it exists at the present time, I wish to make several quotations from this report which I received in the mail only last night. This is the report of the commissioners appointed last year to take up the question of complaints received respecting the condition of grain shipments from Canadian ports and from United States ports in bond to Great Britain. This report is made by Mr. Leslie H. Boyd, chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners and George Serls, Chief Grain Inspector for Canada. On page 3 of the report it is stated that the commission was appointed on the 16th May, 1923. The commissioners left Quebec on the 26th May, 1923, and arrived in Southampton on the 2nd of June, journeying down to London on the same day. On Thursday, June 7, a conference was held with the Canadian, Australasian and United States committee of the London Corn Exchange. The report gives the names of those present but I need not read them. The report continues:

The chairman stated the objects of the conference and called upon Mr. Anderson, the President, to open the meeting.

Mr. Anderson stated that complaints of admixture had arisen in regard to Canadian grain shipped through United States ports and that some time before a deputation from this association interviewed the United States Consul-General in London and placed before him evidence in respect to a number of specific cases of shipments, in regard to which complaints had been made and which had been officially investigated by his association. He further stated the result of this interview was that the consul-general obtained some very valuable reports from various ports in the United States and which, in his opinion, bore out the contention that there is slackness in preserving the identity of Canadian wheat passing through the United States.

Again I quote from page 4:

It was stated in general discussion that most of the complaints during the last eighteen months had been in respect to shipments from Baltimore and Philadelphia. It was further stated that if the elevator companies are directly interested in wheat, the admixture in shipments is hardly surprising. The wheat was handled in the United Kingdom by docks who have no interest in it, and they could not have any incentive to tamper with it.

Mr. Serls and myself carefully outlined the process of inspection at Winnipeg and the head of the lakes, describing minutely the unloading of the grain into the elevators at the head of the lakes and the loading out into boats at these ports, and explained to the members present that when the certificate was issued for the cargo loaded and the boats left for American ports, the authority of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada ceased. We also explained to the meeting that the large majority of elevators in the United States, which handled Canadian grain, were private, and that Canadian grain going through these elevators for export was supposed to be properly bonded, a great many of them being owned by the American railways, and, in reply to a suggestion of Mr. Robinson that the above government should take steps to protect Canadian grain passing through United States' elevators, I pointed out that as Canada only controls her own elevators, this was a practical impossibility.

Further:

It was very gratifying to note that there was no complaint in regard to Canadian grain shipped through Canadian ports, and Sir Herbert Robson stated that the only satisfactory remedy must come from closer co-operation between Canadian and United States governments, and that the bonding arrangements must be tightened. He was of the opinion that the whole trouble had arisen since the duty was placed on Canadian grain imported into the United States, for use there.

Again:

It was further decided that the Honourable Robert Skinner, American Consul-General in London, should be written to and a suggestion made that he should meet myself and a committee of this association with a view of discussing these matters. A meeting was held at a later date. At the close of this meeting we accompanied several of the members to the sample room of the exchange, where we examined samples of the cargoes complained of. The samples more particularly noted were:

First:—A shipment of twenty-five thousand (25,000) quarters of No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat per the ss. Livingstonia to Swansea and loaded at Baltimore: The complaint about this shipment was received by the Board of Grain Commissioners in March, 1922, and the substance was that the wheat in No. 1 hold was mixed with another kind of wheat, presumably a Red Winter or similar wheat. This complaint was investigated by the Board of Grain Commissioners at Fort William in the month of April, 1922, and the Chief Inspector on examining the samples forwarded from London, found that one sample of 387 tons in hold No. 1 of this boat, contained a heavy admixture of American wheat, badly heated and would be graded "Rejected 1 Northern, mixed with Heated". A further sample marked 120 tons in the same hold also contained a heavy mixture of American wheat badly heated, and would be graded "Rejected 1 Northern, mixed with Heated". A further sample of 759 tons, also showed a mixture of American heated wheat and would be graded the same grade, and the Chief Inspector was of the opinion that the grain as represented by these three samples from hold No. 1, certainly gave the consignee grounds for complaint. The samples from holds 2, 5 and 4 and bunker were all equal or better than the standard of 1 Northern. On an examination in the Sample Room of the London Corn Exchange of samples from this same cargo ex the Livingstonia, Mr. Serls, the Chief Inspector, was of the opinion that an admixture of wheat of American origin occurred after the wheat left Fort William.

It might be pointed out that, according to the official records in the offices of the board at Fort William all the wheat covered by this shipment went forward from the head of the lakes via Buffalo and Baltimore.

I quote now from page 7:

The members of the London Corn Exchange at this meeting made it quite clear that, although the causes of complaints were not numerous, these few cases were bound to create a suspicion in the minds of the members of the exchange that the one-time high standard of the Canadian certificate could no longer be relied upon. It was the general expression of opinion of all those present that grain imported through an all-Canadian channel was very satisfactory, but as a buyer was bound to accept the grain tendered on Canadian certificate, they were not in a position to know through what channel, Canadian or American, this grain would be received, and, as when buying grain on a Canadian certificate, the certificate is considered as a certificate final and the buyer must accept the grain delivered on such certificate.

This goes to show the necessity for handling our grain through our own Canadian ports. Passing now to page 14 of the same report, I want to quote just a brief paragraph with reference to Holland:

The wheat importation situation in Holland is somewhat peculiar in the fact that one firm, namely "von Stock's Commissiehandel", was appointed by all the chief flour manufacturers to act as their buying agent. This firm has an office in New York and buys most of the Canadian and other wheats and grains there, as well as through commission agents in Holland when prices are advantageous. The manager of this concern, Mr. Spierenberg, informed Mr. Johnson that he thought the reason why English firms had complaints regarding Canadian grain was that they bought on terms of "Sea-Board Inspection" which enabled exporters to tamper with the grain before inspection was made. He further stated that his company never buy on the terms of "Sea-Board Inspection" but always insist on Dominion Inspection when buying Canadian grain and that this is the case with practically all Canadian grain which is imported into Holland. He further stated that, instead of complaining about Dominion grain, he would wish to compliment the Canadian government for the splendid way in which the inspection of Canadian grain is carried out. Instead of people complaining, every one is very pleased with the quality of Canadian wheat and other grain.

That is to say, when they are not up to grade; and the only way we can be sure of our product when it is placed on the markets of the world, either in Great Britain, in Holland, in Belgium or anywhere else is apparently, according to this report, if it goes through our own ports. Let me quote:

A conference of Mr. Robt. P. Skinner, United States' Consul-General, members of the London Corn Trade Association, Mr. Harrison Watson, Chief Canadian Government Trade Commissioner of the United Kingdom, Mr. Geo. Serls and myself, was held in the board room of the London Corn Trade Association...

The complaints more particularly discussed were those hereinbefore referred to at the London conference.

This is the result of their discussion:

Mr. Skinner emphasized that he had no authority to say anything at all on behalf of the American government but that he would be glad to receive any suggestions and transmit them to his government and to support then if they appealed to him. He further went on to say that he was prepared to receive any facts as to particular cargoes and that he understood the object of the conference was to look into the future and devise some scheme to improve present conditions.

The Honourable Mr. Wiles stated that there was no complaint of the Dominion certificate being incorrect when the wheat was shipped through Montreal; that it was all right.

Mr. Skinner inquired whether there are the same number of handlings of grain passing through the port of Montreal and he was informed that such was the case.

I am not going to quote a great deal more but there are one or two brief paragraphs of importance which I wish to submit. Coming to the summary of the whole discussion we find, in regard to wheat:

Several complaints as cited in the above report were made about the admixtures of cargoes of wheat via United States' ports. Practically none were made covering cargoes of wheat ex Canadian ports.

The grading of wheat was considered generally satisfactory. Some millers stated that they did not quite understand the variation in the weight of 1 Northern but it was pointed out to them that, under the statutory definition, if they received wheat weighing 60 pounds they were receiving what the statutory grade called for, and that in most instances, the weight they received was much higher than 60 pounds Generally speaking complaints about the grading of wheat were very few and of a minor character, and the general expression of opinion was that the grading was remarkably uniform.

Another paragraph appears regarding recommendations:

From your observations and investigations we are satisfied that, although the complaints of grain passing through the United States' ports were not numerous, they are of sufficient importance to endanger the value of Canadian wheat sold on Canadian certificates passing through these ports. The buyer or receiver is bound to take delivery of the grain on Canadian certificates whether it be imported through United States' or Canadian ports, the certificates being final and there being no redress.

These are the quotations which I wish the committee to consider. From these quotations we find that under present conditions it is absolutely necessary for us to make some effort to have our grain handled through our own government elevators, through our own Canadian ports, transported via bay ports or other landing places over our own Canadian National Railways, thus giving employment to our own Canadian people. I think it is only fair to place the matter before the government and in these few remarks to-night I am trying to stress the importance of this feature of our government elevators; I think it is highly necessary that we should handle our own grain over our own railways through our own ports. This is important not only from the standpoint of securing markets but also of maintaining the confidence of our foreign customers.

I have one more suggestion to offer and I do not want hon. members to think that in this I am speaking altogether from the point of view of my own constituency. Let me refer to the situation in the harbour at Collingwood, one of the Georgian bay ports. We have there one of the best harbours in Canada with first class accommodation for the larger boats; last winter there were about 22 tied up in the harbour, some of them 600 feet in length. There we have also the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, which I believe is classed among the first of such concerns in the country. We have, too, dry docks fully equipped for all classes of repair work. We have also an elevator owned by the federal government, but it is altogether inadequate and out of date to handle the large quantity of grain that comes to this port. We are also fortunate in having two branches of the Canadian National Railways running to Montreal, one going via Toronto and the other by way of Allandale, Orillia and Cobourg. My plea to the government to-night is that they do everything possible to facilitate the handling of the grain trade through our Canadian ports and over our Canadian National Railway lines, thus giving work to our people and at the same time helping to extend the markets which we need so badly to-day not only for agricultural products but for everything else. I would ask the government to include in the supplementary estimates this year, or if not, in the main estimates next year, a vote for putting the government-owned elevator at Collingwood in a condition to take care not only of the export grain trade from that port, but also of the domestic grain trade, as the mills and farms throughout central Ontario are supplied from Collingwood, and, as I have already said, the present facilities are not at all what they should be.

Mr. SPENCER: It was not very satisfactory to-night to find that the figures quoted by the minister and by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), emanating from the same department and dealing with the same subject, differed so much. It is true the minister invited the hon. member to come to his office and make a comparison of the two sets of figures to see which set is right, but I would ask the minister after this comparison has been made to be kind enough to give the correct figures to the House the next time his estimates are up.

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MILLAR: I think the minister could do a great deal of good for the grain trade if he would distribute all the information given in the reports issued by the chief grain inspector and the chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners. I am afraid one trouble is that those in the Old Country who are buying our grain do not know the facts as brought out in those reports. The statement was made that those importers were compelled to take the grain from whatever source it might come, whether from the American seaboard or not. I very much doubt that. From what I heard those men say themselves, I gathered that they had ceased taking grain from certain American seaports for the very reason which has been stated here to-night. If the minister would have those reports on hand at Wembley, for instance, I think they would do a great deal of good. The British grain importers are very eager for such information, and I think by this means a lot can be done to have our grain pass through Canadian channels.

Mr. LOW: I suppose during the year at least 100 individual farmers in the western provinces have addressed complaints to me, and in every case I have written a personal letter to the chairman of the Grain Board asking him to make an investigation at once.

Mr. MILLAR: I think the minister misunderstood me. I am referring to importers in the British Isles who are buying our grain. Largely in initiative rests with them to say where the grain shall come from.

Mr. LOW: Any complaints that come to us are investigated, because we realize it is of the utmost importance that we keep faith with the people in England to whom the grain is sold.

Mr. MILLAR: I think if the minister waits until complaints are received he will not be doing the service that is in his power. If this information was spread broadcast in Great Britain I think the maximum good would be accomplished.

Mr. LOW: Does my hon. friend know that at the present time one of the members of the Royal Grain Commission is in England investigating any complaints that may be made to him?

Mr. MILLAR: I am aware of that, but I know he will not come in contact with one-quarter of the grain people there. I am sure that if those reports were circulated over there they would do a great deal of good and the results would be well worth the expenditure involved.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Chairman, in London to-day there is what is known as the Canadian Importers' Association. If the gentleman to whom my hon. friend (Mr. Low) referred meets the members of that association he will come in touch with all the angles of Canadian trade. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and myself had an opportunity of addressing the association while we were in London. We found that they are anxious to get all the information possible to help them to increase their business, which is the importation of Canadian products. My hon. friend across the way (Mr. Ross) spoke about the exportation of grain through Canadian ports. We are all anxious to have this done. I think this is an opportune time for me to say that the route over which Canadian products will go is, in a measure at least, in the hands of the producers themselves. My hon. friend shakes his head. Well, I will put it in a milder way: If the Canadian producer is anxious to have Canadian products go through Canadian ports, he can use his influence to this end. Western farmers or dealers can have their export products sent through Canadian ports if they so route them. The rates to Halifax and St. John are the same as the rates through American ports.

Mr. LUCAS: When the farmer dumps his grain down the elevator he loses control of it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I grasp that, but if the farmers of the West would use their influence to have their products sent through Canadian ports I have no doubt that they could impress upon the man who is routing it the desirability of doing that. We can only develop our Canadian ports by community effort. I merely wish to throw out the suggestion as to the advisability of helping out in this direction in every way we can. It may cost the railways a little more to haul the traffic to Halifax or St. John, but they are bound to carry it the way it is routed. Without the co-operation of all Canadian citizens we cannot develop our Canadian ports.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is the rate on wheat the same, say, from Winnipeg to St. John as it is from Winnipeg to Portland by rail?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, the rates are the same. There was a differential against Halifax until a few months ago, but that has been removed, and although it would be cheaper for the Canadian railways to haul to Portland they have to give the same rate to Halifax or St. John that they give to Portland. Now, send your products by Halifax and St. John and help us to develop our Canadian ports.

Mr. COOTE: Well, it costs more to ship wheat from Fort William to Port Colborne than it does to ship it from Fort William to Buffalo. The remedy for that condition rests with the government; if they will abrogate the coastal shipping law, then wheat can go from Fort William to Canadian ports as it now goes from Fort William to American ports. The minister suggests that we are all anxious to have Canadian grain handled through Canadian ports, but we are raising and shipping down to Fort William more grain than our Canadian boats on the lakes can handle. So long as the present coastal shipping law remains on the statute book, about 40 per cent of our grain must go through United States channels. United States boats are not allowed to take our grain from one Canadian port to another Canadian port, so when a United States vessel loads grain at a Canadian port she must discharge it at an American port. That grain is lost to Canada; yet the government seems to think it must maintain that coastal shipping law. In the fall of 1922 some of our shippers were being penalized to the extent of 2 or 3 cents a bushel because they tried to have their grain handled through Canadian ports. Prominent grain dealers in western Canada were wiring this government asking them to suspend the coastal shipping law so that they could ship the grain to Port Colborne at the same rate that they were paying to Buffalo. But the government made no move in that direction, and a lot of our grain which might have gone through Canadian channels was forced into the United States. Until this coastal shipping law is repealed it will be impossible for our grain to get out through Canadian ports, and until the people of eastern Canada realize that, the grain will continue to go through American ports no matter how much we get up in this House and talk about the desirability of keeping Canadian grain in Canadian channels.

Mr. GRAHAM: A large proportion of Canadian grain does go down as far as Montreal and thence to Portland, but it is possible for the western shipper to see that that grain goes to a Canadian port instead of to Portland. Leaving out the Buffalo end of it altogether, that would be a good beginning. I have advised the Canadian shipping companies to have their representatives go to western Canada to discuss this whole situation with the western people and if possible come to some arrangement by which the Canadian ports will be given a preference. This suggested abrogation of the coastal laws is a very big question. Canadian ships are not allowed to do any coasting in the United States, and we have to take some steps to protect our own interests. But it must be remembered that Canadian ports carry a lot of United States grain simply because the shipper works in unison with the dealer in grain in the United States. My idea is to get the western people and the Ontario people in the frame of mind that they will do their best, everything being equal, to have their grain shipped through Canadian ports. If that is done, it strikes me that it will be a much easier task to regulate the freights than if we all stand aloof and take the attitude that we are going to send through the United States if that is better. We do get large shipments of grain from the United States through Montreal, because that is a better way of shipping it. I realize that there are difficulties but I want to sound the note of the desirability of eastern Canada and western Canada getting together in this matter with a view to seeing what can be done; that rather than stand aloof and say it cannot be done we should be ready to meet with each other with a view to seeing that it is done. I am inclined to think that it is possible to get our rates regulated so that it will not be more advantageous to ship to Buffalo. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and the government are working along that line, but there are many difficulties in the way. We are anxious that our carrying trade should not be handed over to the United States. But the question of abolition of coasting laws does not stop at a ship of grain on the Great Lakes; it is very far-reaching. It is not merely a Canadian question, but an international question; it is ocean-wide, because the question has been raised by Japan whether a ship starting from Liverpool and landing in Canada is not engaged in coastal trade, both countries being members of the British Empire. So we have to be very careful how we deal with the coasting laws, because our carrying trade and that of the British Empire might be interfered with on a very, very large scale. This is a time when consultation and conference and good-will, each to the other, will bring about results very far-reaching, and I have advised eastern men not to stand at long range, but to send their representatives to the West to consult with them as to the advisability of them shipping their grain by Canadian ports. I believe that if we go to work earnestly we can bring about results by which without any detriment to the carrying trade of the Canadian merchant fleet or to the farmers of the West we can get a very much greater volume of traffic sent through our Canadian ports than we have at the present time.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is there not a provision in the Canadian Railway Act that all unrouted freight originating on the Canadian Government railways shall be shipped through Canadian ports, and if so, is that provision being carried out?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not in the Railway Act. There is a clause of that kind in an agreement made, I think, with the Canadian Northern Railway, in which they got some subvention, but it is difficult to carry that out because it is easy for a shipper to say to the railway: Send it some other way.

Mr. CALDWELL: In that case, it is routed. The clause I referred to applies to unrouted freight.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is mighty little traffic that is not routed. You can understand how easily it can be routed if the shipper does not care which way it goes.

Mr. CALDWELL: I thoroughly agree with the minister's contention.

Mr. LOW: In answer to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) who asked why there was such a great difference between lake freights between Fort William and Port Colborne and Fort William and Buffalo, the last complete figures I have are for the year 1922, and they show a difference of .62, or about three-fifths of one per cent per bushel in favour of the Canadian port. I am sure that my hon. friend will agree that that is a very favourable advantage for Canadians. In view of the fact that Buffalo claims that they can handle grain cheaper than some Canadian ports, and the further fact that they have iron ore and coal to carry, while the Canadian boats in some cases have not, that lower carrying charge is really to the advantage of Canadian shippers.

Mr. BAXTER: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to talk too long at this time of night. At the same time, I would not like to let the occasion pass without the comment I think it deserves. In the Maritime provinces particularly, the words just uttered by the Minister of Railways and Canals will, I think, be heard with a great deal of appreciation, and I do not propose that the line which politically separates us on the two sides of the House shall prevent me in any way from expressing appreciation of the policy which he has just enunciated. It is distinctly good and distinctly Canadian, and, if I may borrow a phrase from another quarter of the House, a step in the right direction. We will be glad to have a great many other such steps taken.

Without in any way detracting from what the minister has said, I want the House to realize that St. John as it is to-day, ready, willing, anxious to carry as much of the trade of Canada as it can secure, and not I think unduly jealous of the other great port in the Maritime provinces, Halifax, could not so far as the Canadian National Railway is concerned take full advantage of the trade of the West if it were being forwarded in the direction of St. John to-day. By means of the other national railway, the Canadian Pacific, we are getting a share of it, and we are willing and would be glad to have that share increased, but I want to emphasize at this moment that it is the business of this country not to make expenditures for terminals in Portland, Maine, but to make those expenditures within Canadian territory, at Halifax and at St. John. The Canadian National Railway to-day has a small grain elevator on the eastern side of the harbour of St. John. That elevator is used only to some extent; I doubt if it is used at all to its capacity. There is about one berth available in connection with that railway. You cannot handle any reasonable proportion of the trade of the West through such facilities as those. There is opportunity in the vicinity of the new dry dock, and it is said there is a programme of development to go on there to make the National Railways capable of carrying its portion of Canadian trade through this Canadian port. I would like to see that programme implemented by some equal declaration on the part of the Minister of Public Works.

I would also like to see on the other side of the harbour, on the western side, the opportunity of the Canadian Pacific railway to handle the trade of the West made greater by the actual construction of the breakwater to Partridge island, and the completion of the programme to which the government of Canada is solemnly bound by what is known in St. John as the tri-partite agreement. That agreement provided for the building of wharves by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the government in conjunction. It has remained a dead letter almost from the day it was executed, and yet until these facilities are provided, the spout is not sufficient to handle the grain. That is no reason why we should not ask to get it in the East; but it is the reason why we should come to parliament and try as patiently as we can to convince, not the government alone, but to convince the whole of parliament, the group from the section from which I am speaking as well as the group supporting the government and the group situated to my left, that there are real opportunities in the Maritime provinces for handling this business, and that it is only fair, just and right that a reasonable portion of the resources of the Dominion of Canada should be expended in making those ports fit for the handling of this business. Add to that the encouraging sentiment put forward and so well expressed by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) to-night, and I think we can take a very decided step towards making a more united Canada than in the past.

Mr. FINN: I agree, Mr. Chairman, with the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) in the remarks he has just made in connection with business for Maritime ports. We have a condition at the port of Halifax that is going to be partly met by an estimate in the department of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce that will come up to-night, or perhaps, if it will suit the hon. leader of the opposition, tomorrow would be a better time.

But I can assure hon. members of this House that the sentiments just expressed by the hon. member for St. John are shared by the people in the Maritime provinces; and I think that all hon. members, whether they come from the far Pacific, whether they come from the great province of Ontario or the province of Quebec, or from the middle West, should know that in the Maritime provinces—and I speak more particularly for the port of Halifax, and my hon. friend from St. John has spoken for that city—there are no jealousies existing to-day between those two ports. They are the only Canadian winter ports in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. FINN: I mean in the East. I beg the pardon of the hon. gentlemen opposite. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) who sits near me was about to demur to that statement, and I was about to correct my statement even before I was corrected by hon. members on the other side of the House. When we take into consideration the fact that we have to-day 23,000 miles of railway under the operation of Sir Henry Thornton and his board of management and the statement that there is practically little or no business through the Maritime ports on the Atlantic sea-board over that great system in winter, and, that the traffic must go to Portland, or to New London or to the other American ports, I say preservation is the first law of nature, and I desire to repeat, in the words of my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Raymond), that we want to be a hundred per cent Canadian in the Maritime provinces, in the great province of Ontario, in the province of Quebec, in the middle West, and in far-away British Columbia. I was pleased to hear the remark of the Minister of Railways to-night that the removal of the differential of one cent as against Halifax put the port of Halifax as a port to-day on the same basis as St. John and Montreal and on the same basis as Portland, New York, Philadelphia, Boston and New London. If that is so, there is no reason why the hundred per cent Canadian in the West, whether he be a grower of grain or a broker who ships it out, or whether he be a purchaser, should not be a hundred per cent Canadian in the East, and when he can get the same rate through the ports of Halifax and St. John in winter, as against Portland, New York, Philadelphia or Boston, he should utilize these Canadian ports for the purpose of transporting that grain to the Mother Country and to any other parts of the world where it is required. I say, Mr. Chairman to-night, as I said before, that if our Canadian people are not a hundred per cent Canadian, if they are not going to look after the development of their own ports, but are going to sacrifice the interests of Canada and prevent Canada from becoming a great nation for their own self aggrandizement, it is the duty of this government or any other government that is in power, to see to it that grain and other products are shipped through Canadian ports; and if these products are not shipped through Canadian ports, then the government should consider whether or not an export duty should be placed on products shipped through foreign ports. Consider what the United States is doing to-day. What is it doing? It is giving a differential over its railways on all freight that is going to be carried across the ocean in American bottoms. They are a country of 110,000,000 people, and we have scarcely 9,000,000 people.

Mr. MILLAR: Did they not propose that legislation and afterwards withdraw it?

Mr. FINN: No. If I am not mistaken they attempted to withdraw it, and I understood that under the law it was held in abeyance, but it is their intention to put that differential into effect, in order to obtain the traffic for American bottoms. My hon. friend shakes his head. I may say that I read the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I read the application that was made for the staying of those proceedings, but it was only temporary; it has been held in abeyance and is to come into effect later. Even taking the statement of my hon. friend, it shows what public opinion in the United States is to-day. It shows the tendency of the public mind, not only the mind of the public man but of all the people of the United States; and if that is the tendency and if that is the mind of 110,000,000 of people in that country, surely it is up to us as a Canadian parliament and as a Canadian people to see to it that we protect our Canadian ports, and that we send through Canadian channels that which will help to make our country great and prosperous. If we fail to do that we are recreant in our duty. My hon. friend on the other side laughs. It is all very well for him to take that attitude. He is living in a country where he does not care very much about the Atlantic ports. There are hon. gentlemen in this House and in this country living in our middle West who do not care whether the grain goes to American ports or Canadian ports as long as Providence gives them the soil, the rain, the sunshine, and the season, enabling them to grow the crops and sell them to the broker, the question as to how they are transported from this country means little or nothing to them. But there is a principle involved; and I desire to say to my hon. friends that when we in the Maritime provinces entered confederation in 1867 we gave to this great country a Maritime frontage that otherwise they would have been without. The moment the St. Lawrence closes Canada as a nation is without a national eastern seaport. If the American governments and the American people put an export duty on Canadian produce going through American ports, where would the Canadian people be for six months of the year? We gave that frontage to this great Dominion, we gave up our right to enter into fiscal relations with the 110,000,000 people to the south, and now we are told that when the St. Lawrence is closed by Providence it is only right that Canadian products should be transported to Portland, New London, New York or Boston. Are we, the Maritime people going to stand for that?

Mr. SALES: Would the hon. member permit me to say that the other night I advocated the shipment of grain through Canadian channels as far as possible. No hon. member on this side of the House has made any such insinuation as the hon. gentleman is making at the moment.

Mr. FINN: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I prefaced it with the word "if." I said: If it was the opinion of gentlemen—I did not say who sat in the House, but I said gentlemen who lived in the Canadian West, the men that were growing the wheat. I do not desire to detain the committee; but it is only fair and right that as a representative of the East, I, along with the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter), should have made this statement here to-night to show that we are alive to the interests of the Maritime provinces, and we are not going to quit either in this House or in this country until we get our right which is due us. When we have that we shall be satisfied, and you will not find us complaining either here or in the country.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In spite of some remarks of the last speaker (Mr. Finn), I may say that I have a very sympathetic appreciation of the statements made by all three hon. gentlemen who have just addressed the House; that is, I am a sufficiently good Canadian to want to see all the traffic, commercially possible, carried through our own ports and over our own railways. I think the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) was hardly correct in stating that the farmers of the prairies had very much influence in routing their grain after it got east of Fort William. The men who ship their own grain route it to Fort William, and they can naturally say how it will go, either Canadian National or Canadian Pacific. But when the grain gets to Fort William, that is their market; but beyond that, practically all our grain is handled by the men who purchase it from the farmers, and they are the men who must be approached in the matter. No matter what our sympathy, whether we ship by car or in any other way, we have no control over the routing after the grain arrives in Fort William and is unloaded in the elevators there.

When I was at home, I wondered at times, and since I have had the pleasure of an opportunity of visiting the ports of Halifax and St. John which, I saw, were fine natural harbours, I wondered why our grain went through Portland and other American ports instead of through our ports in the Maritime provinces. I discussed the matter at some length, and I began to realize why it was; that with all the goodwill in the world it is hard to buck against natural facts or financial, not theories, but actualities. From Montreal to Portland over the Canadian National Railways—and I presume all the grain going to any of these ports must go through Montreal—the distance is 297 miles. From Montreal to St. John over the Canadian National Railways it is 743 miles and from Montreal to Halifax over the Canadian National Railways it is 843 miles. There is the reason in a nutshell. By the Canadian Pacific—this does not apply to Halifax, but it does to St. John—the distance from Montrael to St. John is 481 miles. There is the reason. The cost, it is true, to the shipper is the same. That is, there is exactly the same rate from Montreal to any of those ports; but you can quite understand why the railway itself, which is supposed to show an operating profit, chooses the shorter route. There is the physical fact that we are up against. That is the disability under which those Canadian ports are labouring. I wondered over this many times, as I discussed the matter with gentlemen I met in those eastern ports and as we discussed it on our way home. Sympathetic and anxious as we were to see those ports prosper, we discussed many times how, through our co-operation or in any other manner, that disability could be overcome.

Mr. FINN: The distance is greater than from Montreal to Portland, but the rate is the same as to St. John and Halifax. If the railways were prepared to haul and time was not a great factor, what is the argument in favour of Portland as against St. John and Halifax in the winter?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I said that from the point of view of the shipper, unless time was an element, it made no difference which way the grain was routed. From the point of view of the railway which receives the same money for hauling a much greater distance, you can readily see why they, bound, if possible, to show an operating profit, would, as a business concern, prefer the shorter route. That is my point.

Mr. FINN: The distance from Montreal to St. John over the Canadian Pacific is 184 miles further than the distance from Montreal to Portland. Why would the Canadian Pacific haul 184 miles further to St. John? Why would they not go to Portland?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am not quite certain whether the Canadian Pacific has a definite connection to Portland.

Mr. FINN: And the Canadian National should not have either. If we have, we should not use it in order to ship Canadian products.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have no intention at this time of night of entering into an argument with the hon. member for Halifax as to the advisability of owning the American portion of the National Railways. That is a rather large subject. As to the righteousness of utilizing it if we do own it, that is a rather large subject again. I was simply pointing out, as best I could, where the difficulty existed. I am not pointing this out through any lack of sympathy, because if you are going to meet a problem, you must understand the problem. My sympathy is with Nova Scotia. I like Nova Scotia things. I went and got a wife from Nova Scotia, and I could not have paid that province a greater compliment. There is the problem, and there is no use in closing our eyes to the fact that a difficult problem exists and that the president of a railway, whose connection with the railway is a purely business concern, who is bound, if possible, to make this railway pay so as to reduce deficits to the vanishing point, to produce a revenue and to pay interest charges, is justified from his standpoint of view in using the shortest, most economical route and the route that will bring him the most money.

[Mr. Finn.]

Mr. MILLAR: Has the hon. member considered also the factor that has not been mentioned yet, namely; that the ocean rate from New York and Boston—I am not sure about Portland—to Liverpool is about two cents better than the rate from Canadian ports?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am aware of that fact, but I had not quite come to that point because I was still on dry land. I was discussing the problem of the railway in moving the grain to the port. A number of us, anxious, although we live in the Middle West, to see the best done for the whole of Canada, were discussing and considering how that difficulty could be met. To my mind it is an unfair thing to say to a railway that is struggling to overcome a deficit: You must, at the same price received, haul grain a much greater distance at a much greater cost. There is also the additional factor that, on the whole, the grade is better to Portland, and again that there is more return freight from Portland. Those are factors which you cannot overlook, and from a railway point of view the argument in favour of Portland is incontrovertible. Then comes the other point —in what way can you meet that difficulty? I am not advocating this; it must be a matter of government and not of railway policy. But to my mind there is only one thing that could be done; the government might say, "It is in the national interest that we should ship through these ports and that they should be developed." But are we prepared to subsidize the railways to pay the difference? I am not advocating that. I am simply saying that this is the only sound business way of approaching the matter, and it is useless to try to camouflage things and to blind ourselves to the situation. Are we prepared as a country to subsidize the railways to pay the difference in the cost in order that the grain may go through these ports? At the present time I have not made up my mind that this is wise and I am not going to offer the government any advice; I can only say that I am thankful that the responsibility is not mine. That, however, is my point of view. Eventually grain and merchandise must go by the way it can be carried cheapest, from the business point of view; and if the business point of view and the national point of view conflict, as they may do in this case—and I am not saying that they do—then the matter is one not of railway policy but of government policy. It is not a policy for the business men and the railways to initiate; the government must meet the situation.

Mr. LOW: I am able now to add a few figures to those I have already given the hon. member (Mr. Coote). I stated that the Fort William to Port Colborne rate was less by three-fifths of a cent than the rate from Fort William to Buffalo. I should correct that; it is lower; it is two-fifths of a cent. The rate for the year 1923 for seven months, amounted to 3.63 to Goderich and 4.36 to Buffalo, a difference of three-quarters of a cent less to Goderich or bay ports than to Buffalo; and from Fort William to Port Colborne it was a quarter of a cent less in 1923 than to Buffalo. These to the Canadian ports are less than to American ports.

Mr. COOTE: I must admit that the minister has the advantage of me in quoting figures in regard to lake freights because I have no figures before me to answer him. But I would suggest to the committee that if we could find as much discrepancy in these figures as occurred in those the minister quoted before we might discover that a wrong impression, if I might put it as strongly as that, had been created in the committee. I regret I have not here the report of the royal commission which examined into the matter of freight rates on the Great Lakes in the year 1922. I am sure I could show to the minister that the rates to Buffalo early in that season were one and a quarter cent less than to Port Colborne and that specific complaint in regard to that was made by Mr. James Stewart. He asked the government to suspend the coastal shipping law so that he might not be penalized by paying this high rate which made it difficult for him to compete with American millers. This government absolutely refused or neglected to suspend that law in 1922. If I had the correspondence which was brought down that year between the government and the different parties in regard to this suspension I am sure I could show the minister that the rates to Goderich and bay ports were much higher than they were to Buffalo, although the distance to Buffalo is several hundred miles greater.

There has been a good deal of talk here to-night regarding the question of the shipment of grain from Montreal to Atlantic ports, but that is only a very small percentage of the grain which is going out of Canada through Buffalo, and through Buffalo to the different American ports on the Atlantic coast. The one great fact which must not be overlooked in connection with this shipment of grain through Canadian channels is that so long as this shipping law remains on the statute books 40 per cent of our grain—and I think I am placing the estimate very low—is forced to go through American channels. It cannot go to Montreal to have even the chance then of going through Halifax or St. John. I think that possibly we have dwelt on this question long enough; I presume that most of the members of the committee at this hour of the morning do not care to pursue the subject much further. But the question of the mixing of Canadian grain is one which must de dealt with and placed in a more satisfactory position than it occupies at the present time. Last year, in the month of July, Canadian wheat was 10 cents a bushel lower on the Liverpool market than Australian wheat, although we are always told in this House that we have the best wheat in the world. In conversation with a representative of one of the largest milling firms in Great Britain I was informed that in his opinion one of the reasons was that the Canadian grain which they bought could not be depended upon to be up to standard. He said that if our farmers could form a strong enough pool they could place their own inspectors at the elevator from which the grain left Canada, place their own inspection certificate on that grain, and place an agent in the Old Country who would examine the grain when it went there, and if any claim were made that it was not up to standard, the grading and sample could be made good to the English buyer. If we did that, he added, we could raise the price of our wheat, because, as he said, there was no question in the world that a lot of the grain they bought in England had been lowered in grade or sample.

This is one of the most important questions in connection with the grain trade, and so long as the bulk of the wheat which is going through Montreal is American wheat there is danger of the cargoes which go from Montreal being tampered with as well as the cargoes which are going from the United States. I want to impress upon the minister that I have been assured that the grain which has gone from Vancouver has so far been on an average of a better sample for the same grade than the grain going through Montreal. This goes to show that it is possible that the grades which are going out of the elevator at Montreal are not in all cases what they should be.

Mr. LUCAS: It is not my intention to discuss the matter at any length at this hour, but there is one point that has not been discussed this evening. We all agree that the routing of Canadian grain through Canadian ports is a matter of great importance. I would like to point out to the Minister of Railways, who dealt with this question a few minutes ago, a remedy which would in a great measure prevent our grain going through American ports; that is, the routing of a great deal of it through the port of Vancouver. He could lend a great deal of assistance to this end by using his influence to have the mountain scale of freight rates reduced in proportion to the rates prevailing in other parts of the country. The minister told us this evening, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), that while the distance from Montreal to Portland is only 297 miles, as against 743 miles from Montreal to St. John, that the railways give exactly the same rate in both cases. And while the distance from Calgary to Fort William is 1,280 miles, as against only 640 miles from Calgary to Vancouver, yet we have to pay practically the same rate for the shorter haul. This in my opinion is a gross discrimination, especially against the people of Alberta because of the fact that Vancouver is their natural outlet. Although about two years ago only half a million bushels of wheat went through the port of Vancouver, this year already over fifty million bushels have been exported from that port, amply demonstrating that it is a feasible route. Last year Alberta produced 167,000,000 bushels of wheat, and every bushel of it for export would find its natural outlet through Vancouver, as would also a great portion of the Saskatchewan crop. The diversion of this wheat to the western route would relieve the eastern route to such an extent that it would be able to practically take care of all the grain that would naturally go through our eastern ports, and thereby render unnecessary the use of the American Atlantic ports for this purpose. I think the Minister of Railways will agree with me that through the Yellowhead pass the Canadian National Railways have as easy a grade as will be found on any other part of the road in Canada. Therefore in my opinion there is no reason why we in the West should be discriminated against by the mountain scale. I trust this matter will be given careful consideration with a view to our getting the same treatment in regard to freight rates as is enjoyed by our friends in the East. I am entirely sympathetic with the aspirations of our Maritime ports, and I should like to see every bushel of grain that is going out from the Atlantic seaboard handled through those ports to the fullest possible extent; but I believe the natural outlet for a great portion of our western grain is through the port of Vancouver, and I think this route should be given every encouragement.

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. LOW: I agree very largely with the remarks made by the hon. member for Red Deer that the individual farmer loses control of his wheat once it reaches Fort William, when the buyer determines the route which it shall follow. I know from personal experience that the seller of 400,000 or 500,000 bushels of wheat immediately asks how the buyer wants it routed. So the individual farmer, if he is shipping a car load through to Montreal or to Halifax or even across the ocean, is given this opportunity of saying how he wishes it routed; but the individual farmer undoubtedly loses control of his grain once it reaches Fort William.

Item agreed to.

Mr. LOW: There is one other item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought my hon. friend was through. I have been keeping quiet so he could get his vote passed.

Mr. LOW: This is a very small item, and I think my hon. friend will allow it to go through without even a comment—Number 380.

Elevators, government terminal, maintenance of and necessary equipment, $60,000.

The CHAIRMAN: It is attached to the last vote.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

TUESDAY—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House I beg leave to move, seconded by Dr. King:

That the order of business on Tuesday the 24th instant be the same as on Monday the 23rd instant.

The object is to bring on private bill No. 47 to incorporate the United Church of Canada.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the unanimous consent of the House to adopt this motion?

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Graham, the House adjourned at 12.40 a.m. (Thursday).

Thursday, June 19, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

PROPOSED AUTHORITY ON SPELLING

Mr. GAUVREAU (Translation) presented the third report of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Printing.

. . . . Also the committee recommends that the order in council of June 12, 1890, defining the method of the spelling of certain words in official documents printed in the English language, shall continue to apply and be extended to all words in the English language; and that the New English Dictionary, known usually as the "Oxford Dictionary," be the standard spelling to govern all the public departments.

Mr. SPEAKER: With all due regard to the joint committee on the Printing of Parliament, the last paragraph of their report need not be taken in consideration by the House as it relates to a matter which was not referred to the committee. Under the rules and customs of British parliaments, standing committees are not administrative bodies and their power is limited by such orders or instructions as may be given the House. When the committee on Printing was formed the House passed the following resolution:

That the select standing committee on Printing be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

It is evident, therefore, that since the question of the orthography used in official documents by the various departments was not referred to this committee, it had no authority to report thereon and the last paragraph of the report should be struck out. When the House is called upon to give its concurrence I shall rule then that this paragraph is out of order.

I may add that the House is perfectly free to refer the question of official orthography to this or any other committee, but until it has done so, no committee has power to take it up and make recommendations.

I most strongly hold, however, for the King's English, and it is quite proper that the various departments should understand that the standard English spelling should be used in official documents. If the matter had been referred by the House to that committee, then it would have been their duty to consider it. I say this in all fairness to the members of the committee who are doing their duty splendidly.

Mr. GAUVREAU: At the end of the session of our committee we could not refuse the petition of Mr. Fred Cook who asked that this question be considered by the committee, and we agreed to that.

Mr. SPEAKER: But the House of Commons is above Mr. Cook or any other official.

Mr. MACLEAN: (York): I brought up the question, and inasmuch as that question was not referred to the committee for consideration, I would be prepared to move that now.

Mr. SPEAKER: That question will come up when the motion for concurrence is made.

NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo) presented the first report of the select standing committee on National Railways and Shipping as follows:

Your committee has considered item No. 138 of the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1925. namely, loan to Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited $900,000, and approve of the said item.

HON. MR. MURDOCK AND HOME BANK

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): I had given notice that I would move to-day concurrence in the second report of the select standing committee on Privileges and Elections and it was my intention to do so. The hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) however, has telephoned me that he is ill. It would be repugnant to me to do anything that would inconvenience the hon. member, who throughout the proceedings has shown every courtesy to the Chair. At the same time the hon. member and the House will realize that the hon. the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) is most anxious to resume his seat and this delay is causing him great inconvenience. I have therefore arranged with the hon. member for West Hastings to proceed on Wednesday, the 25th instant, and I now give notice that on that day I shall make the motion which I intended to move to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would scarcely be proper to proceed with a motion of that kind in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The matter could not have been proceeded with in the last two days, anyway.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. J. F. WHITE (London): I beg to present a petition from the Union Mothers' Club of London, Ontario, with reference to the establishment of a central place of execution in Canada.

HOME BANK

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (East York): I beg leave to lay on the table a petition signed by 38 persons humbly praying for the indemnification of the depositors of the defunct Home Bank.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 195, to amend the Immigration Act.

He said: The bill contemplates very minor changes. With respect to persons ordered to be deported, if an appeal is granted, the time spent in Canada shall not be counted in the period of residence which is necessary to acquire citizenship. If the head of a family is ordered deported the minister may compel the transportation company to take back with him the members of his family who accompanied him. The amendment provides also, under certain conditions, that free transportation shall be given to the immigration officers of the different provinces. There is a reference to medical attendance, and there is also some change in regard to the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act in relation to immigrants.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—RATE REDUCTIONS IN SYDNEY

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

Referring to parliamentary return No. 239; with what officials of the Canadian National Railways were interviews held by the Minister of National Defence in which interviews the statements as to coming rate reductions made by such minister in North Sydney on the 28th July, 1923, were authorized?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Interviews were held by said Minister with Mr. Dalrymple and Mr. Watson of the Canadian National Railways in the month of July regarding freight rates.

RIFLE SIGHT BRIDGES

Mr. ARTHURS:

With reference to sessional paper 236, what firms were asked for tenders by the Department of Militia and Defence for 10,000 rifle sight bridges, as mentioned in the said sessional paper, (a) in Canada; (b) in Great Britain?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou):

(a) In Canada: Messrs. MacKay & Fraser Ltd., New Glasgow, N.S.; (b) In Great Britain: The Birmingham Small Arms Limited, Birmingham, England, through their Canadian representative Messrs. Fraser Company, Montreal.

WEIR LICENSES

Mr. HANSON:

1. Has the Department of Marine and Fisheries decided to amend the fishery regulations so as to provide that a condition be inserted in each weir license issued by the department, providing that no fish caught under said license so issued by the department shall be sold at less than a minimum price named in such regulation or to the like effect?
2. When was such regulation passed and what minimum price has been fixed?
3. How does the department propose to enforce such regulation?
4. When will such regulation go into effect?
5. Has the department the right to pass such a regulation under the Fisheries Act?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1 and 2. It has been made a condition of the sardine fishery licenses for Charlotte and St. John counties that the licensee will not dispose of his catches to be exported fresh out of Canada for less than $10 per hogshead. This course was requested by the sardine fishermen and weir owners of that district.

3. By withholding the license if this requirement is not complied with.

4. June 12.

5. No such regulation is being obtained.

FISH HATCHERY—BEDFORD, N.S.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax):

1. Was there a dwelling built at Bedford, Halifax County, Nova Scotia, last summer for the keeper of the fish hatchery?
2. If so, was it built by tender, and who was the contractor?

3. What are the names of those employed, the rate of pay and total amount paid to each?
4. What are the names of firms who supplied material and the total amount paid to each?
5. What was the total cost of the building?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.
2. No.
3.

$300,000,000 LOAN

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide authority for the raising, by way of loan, under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, by the issue and sale or pledge of securities of Canada, in such form, for such separate sums, at such rate of interest and upon such other terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve, such sum or sums of money as may be required, but not to exceed in the whole the sum of three hundred million dollars, for paying maturing loans and obligations of Canada, and to provide that the principal so raised by way of loan and the interest thereon shall be a charge upon and payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

TREATY WITH FINLAND

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that goods produced or manufactured in Finland shall receive treatment as favourable as that accorded to goods produced or manufactured in any foreign country so long as goods produced or manufactured in Canada enjoy in Finland the same treatment as is enjoyed by similar goods produced or manufactured in the United Kingdom, as set out in Article 23 of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and Finland, made at Helsingfors the 14th day of December, 1923.

Motion agreed to.

FEEDING STUFFS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend The Feeding Stuffs Act, and to provide,—

1. That any commercial feeding stuff which does not contain as ingredients any screenings, scourings, scalpings, oat hulls, oat feed, buckwheat hulls, peanut hulls or shells, cottonseed hulls, peat or moss, or any other material of low feeding value, which the minister shall have power to designate by regulation, may contain a maximum of fifty per cent by weight of bran, shorts, middlings, or feed flour, singly or combined;

2. That wheat flour sold for feeding purposes shall be deemed to be feed flour;

3. That any material, including the scourings or scalpings in addition to all or part of the mill screenings, which has been removed from wheat in preparing such wheat for the processes employed in flour extraction, and which material contains more than eight per cent crude fibre, may be registered and sold as a commercial feeding stuff under the name "Mill Scalpings"; or, if the material has been graded by a grain inspector operating under The Canada Grain Act, it may be sold under such other name as such grain inspector may designate on his certificate of inspection.

STRIKE OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, has the government any announcement to make about its attitude towards the strike which is now going on in the postal service at Toronto?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend will renew his question a little later when the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Stewart) is in his place, I have no doubt that the required information will be furnished.

Mr. HOCKEN: Will I have an opportunity to renew my question?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think before we close, the House will be glad to get that information.

VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS AND HANSARD

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. WALLACE STEWART (Humbolt): Mr. Speaker, I rise to call attention to an apparent error or discrepancy in the record of the proceedings of the House. In votes and Proceedings of June 17, at page 405, I find certain resolutions reported as having been adopted. They appear under the heading "Mail Subsidies and Steamship Subventions" and are numbered 183, 184, 189 and 193. Turning to Hansard of the same date, I find that pages 3319 and 3327 in which the report of the debates on those items occurs contain no record that the chairman of the Committee of the Whole either called the items or declared them carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am informed by the Clerk Assistant that the items were passed, and that the record in the Votes and Proceedings is confirmed by the scroll—the famous scroll. There the hon. gentleman can find the evidence that the items in question were passed.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I think attention should be called to the too frequent variations between Hansard and Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. SPEAKER: Certainly, I will call the attention of the chief of the Hansard staff to them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid that that will not be the sole cure. I have never observed such discrepancies occur previous to this parliament.

Mr. JACOBS: Does the hon. gentleman suggest a change of government in order to avoid further discrepancies?

GOLD AND SILVER MARKING ACT 1913, AMENDMENT

The House again in committee on Bill No. 176 to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act, 1913, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 1, was carried. Section 2 stood.

On section 2—"Platinum" to be applied only to articles of defined component parts.

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday afternoon when this bill was before the committee my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) asked me to allow it to stand over that he might be supplied with further information on the subject matter of the bill. Objection was taken to the amendment by certain hon. members on the ground that it would permit of articles being composed of 99 per cent iridium and 1 per cent platinum. I might point out that at the time this amendment was introduced platinum was selling at about $115 per ounce, and iridium at from $275 to $300 per ounce. I am sure that those

hon. members were under the impression that iridium was an inferior metal. I find that platinum is one metal element, iridium is a metallic element resembling platinum in its general properties and occurring in nature in the metallic form alloyed with platinum. Iridium, osmium, palladium, rhodium, rutheum, are metals of the platinum group. These metals all occur naturally in alloy in the metallic form with platinum; they are not metals or combinations mixed with platinum to produce an inferior article.

Mr. McMASTER: With careful attention one can see the lips of the minister moving, but that is as far as anything comes to this end of the chamber. We really cannot hear at all.

The CHAIRMAN: The chairman has asked for order half a dozen times, but no attention has been paid to the call.

Mr. LOW: We have followed the procedure adopted by Switzerland, a country that largely manufactures gold, silver and platinum goods. I pointed out when this amendment was introduced that platinum was selling at $115 per ounce as against $275 per ounce for iridium. That alone should answer the objection urged by some hon. members that iridium was an inferior metal mixed with platinum. The intention of the amendment is to give platinum the same protection that is given to gold and silver goods.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not remember anybody objecting to iridium on the ground that it was a base metal. All we want to do is to find out what the amendment involves. As it now stands you can have the pure metal—that would be pure platinum, I suppose; you can have "element platinum," and then again you can have iridium. What is element platinum?

Mr. LOW: The deputy minister informs me that that is a term used metallurgically. It is the platinum, pure, allowing of no further decomposition. It is found in the Swiss act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The bill provides that you can stamp anything as platinum if 950/1000ths of the component parts of the metal appearing or purporting to be platinum are either the pure metal and element platinum alone or in conjunction with iridium.

Mr. LOW: Iridium is part of the platinum itself. It is a metal that is very hard to extract and is consequently very valuable.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Nickel ore is the substance from which we get platinum, iridium and these other valuable metals. A large amount of ore goes out of the country which is not refined so far as these rare metals are concerned. The information I want is how we are getting on with the production of platinum, iridium, and so on, from our nickel ores. My hon. friend took the bill out of committee in order to be able to get that information, but we have not got it yet.

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend will put the question on the order paper I am sure the Minister of Mines will be glad to answer it any time. It is true I said I would have the information, but I have not been able to secure it. My hon. friend knows I was busy last night until one o'clock—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, the hon. gentleman kept us here until half past twelve last night, but it was not our fault.

Mr. LOW:—and this morning I was in committee from ten o'clock.

Mr. BAXTER: If at any time we have to define in court the elements of platinum, would it not mean its chemical constituents?

Mr. LOW: I do not think it would. Platinum is itself an element—and cannot be reduced further.

Mr. BAXTER: Then what are the elements of an element? I also suggest that in dealing with platinum and iridium we should deal with all precious metals. There is an extremely precious substance not mentioned in this bill, known as "bunkium". It is a most precious political substance, and it goes about the country to-day with no legislation, with nothing but the government stamp on it to indicate its quality or its source. Why not deal with "bunkium" when you are dealing with the rest of your precious metals?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Although we have an absolute monopoly of these precious metals, parliament has never yet been put in possession of the facts as to what they are and what their value is. The metallurgists speak of these metals as the "P" metals, P being the sign for platinum. They include iridium, palladium, polonium, chromium and two or three more—at least five in all. Nickel is one of them, and it is a metal of which we have a monopoly. We have all these metals, and they are going out of the country and are being refined elsewhere. Every nation wants these metals, and we could get a great revenue from them if we had them all analyzed and knew the quantities we had in our country, and adopted legislation that would at least compel the refining of these metals in Canada into the finished article. Nickel is only one of them, but nickel is the basis of nickel steel, and all the world wants nickel steel to-day. We have a monopoly of this metal, but it is being refined over in the United States and in England. The great industries of the world to-day need nickel steel, and they are absolutely dependent upon the nickel ores coming from Canada, and these ores are practically all contained in six square miles up around Sudbury. If that is the case, parliament and the people of this country ought to know it, and we ought to insist on the refining of these ores and the production of the finished article in this country. I have advocated that for years. I brought up the question—

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. We are discussing a bill for the purpose of determining how a certain precious metal called platinum shall be marked, and I do not think it is in order on this bill to raise a discussion as to how the natural resources of this country should be developed or dealt with.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I do not agree with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McMASTER: I appeal to the Chair.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): That is all very well, but if there is any place where there is free discussion it is in committee, and I am surprised to hear such a reformer as my hon. friend (Mr. McMaster) try to limit the discussion in this manner. We have these metals in our country, and no other country has them.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, I raised a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Is there any other hon. member who desires to discuss the point of order? I think the point of order is well taken, and that the hon. member is not in order in his discussion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister know whether this wording is employed with reference to other metals used? The reason I ask is because it appears to be about as clumsy as could be conceived. If it is the same wording as the other, there would be an excuse for it, but if it is new, it certainly could be improved on.

Mr. LOW: These words are added to the act as it was before. It says that the act shall be amended by adding to it the word "platinum," so that it will read "gold, silver or platinum."

Mr. MEIGHEN: The first part is all right, and the wording there is correct, except that I would have thought perhaps platinum should be used again, but it is the last part I am directing the minister's attention to—this addition.

Mr. LOW: Will my right hon. friend point out where it is clumsy? I really do not see it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You have to do some thinking to tell what it means. It says:

> The word "platinum" or any contraction, abbreviation or colourable imitation thereof,—

In the first place, you do not speak about a "colourable imitation" of a word.

Mr. LOW: Of the metal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is wrong. I thought that, too.

Mr. LOW: Yes, of the metal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no; he is wrong. The minister will please be patient with me. I thought it meant the metal, and that got me wrong for quite a while. Now I think I see what it means, but I am only right on the hypothesis that it means a colourable imitation of the word. What is meant is any contraction of the word, any abbreviation of the word, or any colourable imitation of the word. There is no question about that. The minister has not understood the clause.

Mr. LOW: I quite understand it. I am sure it is very clear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister will not say it means a colourable imitation of the metal.

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He said that first.

Mr. LOW: No, I did not. I said it referred to a colourable metal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not refer to that at all.

Mr. LOW: The wording is clear. Let me read it:

The word "platinum" or any contraction, abbreviation or colourable imitation thereof shall not be applied, either alone or in combination with any other word, to any article of merchandise composed wholly or in part of any metal unless 950/1000ths of component parts of the metal appearing or purporting to be platinum of which said article consists are either the pure metal and element platinum alone or in conjunction with iridium.

Could anything be clearer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has come to a new view on the first part; now I will discuss the rest. It means a colourable imitation of the word, not the metal. The effect of it is this, if I may put it in simpler language—that you shall not apply the word "platinum" as a noun, adjective, or anything else, or any word sounding like "platinum" intending to convey the effect of that word to any metal unless 95 per cent at least—

Mr. LOW: More than that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But 950/1000ths is 95/100ths, is it not? My arithmetic used to tell me that was 95 per cent.

Mr. LOW: I think my right hon. friend is a little rusty on his arithmetic.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister will take a few minutes more, I think he will come to my view on that. I appeal to the professor of arithmetic in the back row. I know he will agree with me.

Mr. ROBINSON: It is 95 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I struggle along I may possibly get the minister to know what this clause means. You cannot apply the word "platinum" as a noun, adjective, or anything else, or any word sounding like "platinum," intending to convey the effect of the word "platinum," to any metal unless 95 per cent at least of the article supposed to be platinum is the real element platinum or platinum in conjunction with iridium. Now that is the effect. Consequently, if the bill goes through—and I want to know if this is just what was intended—you can put out an article and use the word "platinum" in relation to it if not one-tenth, one-fiftieth, or one-millionth part of it be platinum, provided only that that portion of it which is supposed to be platinum shall be at least 95 per cent platinum; that is to say, if there is some combination of platinum used in another alloy, and the combination of platinum is only one-hundredth part of that alloy, you can use the word "platinum" with relation to the whole thing, or any adjective giving the effect of the word "platinum," provided only that 95 per cent of that one-hundredth part is elemental platinum, or platinum in conjunction with iridium. That is the effect of it; one can get that result after considerable meditation. And if such is intended, it really is not very much protection, because the alloy itself could be overwhelmingly something else, but as long as the little coating or whatever it may be supposed to be platinum is 95 per cent real platinum, the article can go and the adjective may be used.

Mr. LOW: If I understand it aright, 950/1000ths must be platinum.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of the whole article?

Mr. LOW: Of the whole article.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the effect at all.

Mr. LOW: I may be mistaken, but I understand it that way. The bill was drawn by the Justice department, but lawyers differ, and if they have made a mistake in the meaning, they have done so without my knowledge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is wrong as to his conception of what the draughtsman intended. The draughtsman who drew this never in the world intended the whole article to be 95 per cent platinum—never.

Mr. LOW: I am fairly satisfied that is what he means.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then we had better defer the bill, because he certainly has not produced that meaning. I should like to hear from the member for Kings (Mr. Robinson); I fancy he knows something about the question.

Mr. ROBINSON: The intention doubtless was that it should be 95 per cent of the element platinum, but it does not say so. I think it is possible to put upon the provision as worded the construction the right hon. leader of the opposition has given.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The minister has told us that iridium is worth $300 an ounce and platinum $115. Now, an attempt is being made by some jewellers to palm off upon the public a substitute for platinum and to use the sign "P" for that metal. In that way they hope to impose upon the public and sell to them this substitute as being worth $115 an ounce, although it may contain only a small percentage of the real metal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the minister had better defer the bill, because either the member for Kings (Mr. Robinson) is right as to the intention, or I am. We both agree as to the effect but I believe the member for Kings is wrong as to what is intended. I think it is only the proportion that it is supposed to be or is ostensibly platinum that must be 95 per cent platinum, not the whole article. So we will wait until we hear from the Justice department.

Mr. LOW: The language used in the clause is "950/1000ths" which works out at 95 per cent. There is no doubt in my mind that the intention is to provide that the article represented as platinum must be 95 per cent platinum.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think we are all agreed that that is not the effect of the proposed legislation. Personally I am of the opinion —I should like to get the minister to understand it if I could—that it is not the intention that it should be 95 per cent of platinum or platinum with iridium. The intention of the proposed legislation, if I conceive it correctly, is that only the portion of the article ostensibly platinum shall be at least 95 per cent either wholly platinum or platinum with iridium—only the portion which, in the words of the clause is "appearing or purporting to be platinum." Now, if the minister has my understanding of it he will be able to submit the matter to the Justice department so that they will see what the point is and we will know to-morrow.

Mr. LOW: Platinum and iridium are the same metals.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the point.

Mr. LOW: Iridium is extracted from platinum and is more valuable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that matters.

Mr. LOW: It may be 95 per cent platinum or iridium because the latter is more valuable than the former.

[Mr. W. F. Maclean.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister may know that; I do not know whether iridium is the same metal as platinum or not. But that point does not come up at all. The minister says the intention of this bill is that any article, as respects which the word "platinum" or a compound of it is used, must be 95 per cent platinum or platinum with iridium. If that is the intention the bill itself does not say so, or when passed will not make it law—not at all. Personally I do not think it is the intention. The intention is this, and I hope the minister will follow me, that the portion which is apparently platinum shall itself be 95 per cent platinum, or platinum and iridium combined.

Mr. LOW: Ninety-five per cent of the whole article represented as platinum, yes, certainly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister does not get my point. I am sorry but I tried to explain it the best I could.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Will the minister consult the Department of Mines and have the misunderstanding cleared up? A representative of the Department of Mines in co-operation with the law department surely will get the facts.

Mr. CALDWELL: It is quite apparent to me, from the memorandum in the explanatory notes, that this section does not mean that the whole article must be 95 per cent of platinum or platinum with iridium. In the explanatory notes on the opposite page I find this statement:

> The full title of this act is "An act respecting the manufacture, marking and sale of articles composed of gold or silver, and of gold plated and silver plated ware".

The present act does not refer to platinum plated ware which must be very thinly plated, but what is now proposed would appear to be that it shall apply to platinum plated ware as well. In that case the whole article would not have to be composed of 95 per cent platinum.

Mr. LOW: Yes, 95 per cent.

Mr. CALDWELL: Ninety-five per cent of the plating but not of the whole article. I think that is the point made by the right hon. leader of the opposition.

Mr. LOW: I think it is 95 per cent of the whole article. What value would there be in it if the article might contain perhaps 95 per cent of other inferior metal? In that case why should a protection be asked for?

Mr. CALDWELL: The Gold and Silver Marking Act has reference to gold plated and silver plated ware. This is simply adding the word "platinum" to the Gold and Silver Marking Act. In that act it is provided that a gold plated article must be of a certain degree of gold or it cannot be so marked. In case of a silver plated article it must conform to a certain standard of silver—that is, the plating part of it—or it cannot be marketed as silver plated. Therefore the present provision would appear to mean that if an article were plated with platinum the plating, the thin cover, must consist of 95 per cent platinum. That is my understanding of the section.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is it exactly.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is the way it appears to me.

Mr. BOYS: I understand the minister to say that 95 per cent of the entire article must be platinum or platinum with iridium. If that is the intention it seems to me that if you insert the word "of" after the word "metal", and strike out the words "appearing or purporting to be platinum" you will meet the case. If that is done the section will read as follows:

4. p.m.

The word "platinum" or any contraction, abbreviation or colourable imitation thereof shall not be applied, either alone or in combination with any other word, to any article of merchandise composed wholly or in part of any metal unless 950/1000ths of component parts of the metal of which said article consists—

And so on. That amendment would make it apply to the whole article and not merely to the plating upon it.

Mr. McMASTER: That clearly is not the intention.

Mr. LOW: The intention of this amendment is simply to give platinum the same protection as gold and silver. I shall send for the Gold and Silver Marking Act, and if there is any difference we will make this provision conform to the act. The idea was that exactly the same protection that now applies to gold and silver under the Marking Act should apply to platinum. It was a provision of that nature I asked the department to prepare.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have the act here. I will read the clause; I think it is in construction and substance the same:

The marks "silver," "sterling" or "sterling silver," "coin" or "coin silver," or any colourable imitation thereof, or any other mark intended to suggest such a quality, shall not be applied to any silver article, if the silver in the article contains pure silver in less proportion than nine hundred and twenty-five parts of pure silver in every one-thousand parts of such silver.

I do not want to say "I told you so", but this confirms every word I have uttered, only the wording in the Act is much better. I never had any doubt in my own mind as to what is intended and as to the real effect of these words, but what I rose to call attention to was the clumsy wording.

Mr. LOW: If it is clumsy it is the work of a lawyer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That may be, but I have often had to attack the work of lawyers; really, it is no defence to anything to say it was done by a lawyer. What I argued first was that these words at the beginning modified or affected the word "platinum" and not the article. The minister conceded my point there. Then we had this dispute as to the percentage. That is settled. Next the point was raised that the intention of the law was to compel the platinum portion, or what was ostensibly platinum to be 95 per cent platinum or platinum and iridium. The minister persisted that it was the intention of the proposed law that the whole article should be 95 per cent. The language of the clause in the existing act has been quoted, and as clear as words can put it it seems that it is the silver of the article, in the case of silver, that must be 92.5, or 92½ per cent, silver. The intention of this is that the platinum in the article shall be 95 per cent pure. So the minister is wrong as to that. I would suggest that he refer to the draughtsmen the construction used in the original act as to silver and have it apply here; it is much clearer. When half a dozen of us in this committee are all mixed up on this question and the minister hopelessly so, it is hardly fair to ask the public to come to the right conclusion as to what it means.

Mr. McMASTER: The act with respect to silver must have been in application for some years and it would seem that there is an advantage in using the same phraseology as regards platinum. I think the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition is excellent and would serve to expedite business.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is the purpose of the act to prevent manufacturing jewellers from making plated ware of platinum and to compel them to make ware of this description of solid platinum?

Mr. LOW: I do not think the amendment is intended to confer upon platinum any other protection than is given to gold and silver.

Mr. BOYS: I think the hon. member (Mr. Caldwell) has hit the nail on the head? Is this intended to apply to the whole article or merely to a plate of platinum which is to be upon it? If it is intended to apply to the whole article, it is clearly wrong.

Mr. LOW: It is intended to apply just the same protection as the act now grants to gold and silver.

Mr. BOYS: What is intended in connection with gold and silver? Is it intended to apply only to the surface or plate, or to the whole article?

Mr. McMASTER: The suggestion made by the leader of the opposition was that this might be referred to the draughtsmen and brought forward at a later date. If that is a good suggestion, let us follow it and get on to another item of business. If it is not a good suggestion, let us continue to discuss the matter. But the sense of the committee might be taken and the minister might tell us whether he is willing to follow the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. LOW: I have often had to lean upon lawyers, but occasionally I find I am leaning upon a broken reed. This amendment is added to the Gold and Silver Marking Act, so apparently plated ware is included:

In the case of articles made in whole or in part of an inferior metal, which has deposited or plated thereon, or brazed or otherwise affixed thereto, a plating, covering or sheet composed of gold or of silver, or of an alloy of gold or of silver, and known in the trade as rolled gold plate, gold filled, gold plate, silver plate, silver filled, or gold or silver electroplate, or by any similar designation, and in the case of articles of like nature brought under the provisions of this section by regulations made by the Governor in Council under this act,—

(a) no mark shall be applied indicating otherwise than truly and correctly the fineness and also the actual weight of gold or of silver, or of alloy of gold or of silver, contained in the article, or the decimal proportion of gold, or of silver, or of alloy of gold or of silver, to the gross weight of the article at the time the article is sold or delivered by the maker; but a mark plainly and truly indicating that the article or part thereof is made of rolled gold plate, gold filled, gold plate, silver plate, silver filled, or gold or silver electroplate, or of any similar material, as the case may be, which mark must be accompanied by a trade mark registered in accordance with the Trade Mark and Design Act, may be applied; and,

(b) whenever the fineness or actual or proportionate weight of the gold, or of the silver, or of the alloy of gold or of silver, contained in the article is indicated by a mark, the article and its accessories shall be marked as required by the last preceding section and the next following section of this act; and,

(c) the actual weight or the decimal proportion of gold, or of silver, or of alloy of gold or of silver, shall not be less than the actual weight or decimal proportion indicated by the mark by more than ten per centum of the actual weight or decimal proportion so indicated.

2. The Governor in Council may, from time to time, make such regulations as to him seem necessary for declaring articles to be brought under the provisions of this section.

That will apply to platinum just the same as it applies to gold and silver.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This bill makes two amendments: First, to the title of the act by showing that the act itself deals with platinum as well as with gold and silver. The second amendment is 12A which gives a definition as to what platinum is. The minister now apparently says that this applies to plated articles as well. It is most necessary that the legislation should not only be understandable but follow existing forms. I would suggest that the matter be referred back with the idea that not only should the language employed in section 9 of the act, for example the definition of silver as silver when you are dealing with pure silver, be followed in connection with this new section 12A of the act, but that, if the intention be, as apparently this covers plated articles and shows how plated section would indicate, that plated goods or platinum may be treated as platinum plate just as goods plated with gold or silver are treated as gold or silver plate under certain conditions, an amendment should be made to the appropriate section. My hon. friend will see that there are two distinct matters. Section 9 of the act covers silver; section 10 articles can be described and marked. If the intention be to allow articles plated with platinum to be so marked, the legislation ought to follow in form section 10, and the definition as to pure platinum should follow the form of section 9. The sale of pure gold is one thing and the sale of gold plated articles an entirely different thing, and the two must be treated separately.

Mr. LOW: But this all applies to platinum.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is nothing whatever that extends the plating provisions of the act to platinum.

Mr. LOW: I suppose my hon. friend knows that the protection that is afforded in connection with platinum goods as far as plating is concerned is not necessarily so important as in the case of gold or silver?

Mr. CALDWELL: Should not the bill be so worded as to make it impossible for white metal to be sold as platinum?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the point.

Mr. CALDWELL: We want to protect the public from being sold any article plated with platinum as an article of pure platinum. An article made of fourteen karat gold is marked accordingly, but if it is only plated with fourteen karat gold the article cannot be marked "fourteen karat gold"; it must be so marked as to show that it is plated with such gold, I think the point of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), which is also the point I am making, is that the bill should be so worded as to make it impossible for dealers to sell platinum-plated ware as solid platinum. The minister, I think, would be well advised to accept the suggestion of the leader of the opposition and adjourn the debate on this bill; he should go into it thoroughly because the matter is an important one. Platinum is a valuable commodity and we should protect the public from being imposed upon.

Mr. LOW: Does the hon. member suggest that the men who drafted the Gold and Silver Marking Act are not sufficiently competent to draw up an amendment to the same act?

Mr. CALDWELL: Certainly.

Mr. LOW: They were able to draw up the other act.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): At the request of the jewellers.

Mr. LOW: At the request of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): But are not the jewellers at the bottom of it?

Mr. LOW: Yes. There is always an agitation on the part of some group of the people for some action to be taken in one direction or another, and we endeavour as far as possible to satisfy public demands.

Mr. CALDWELL: I do not think that this amendment does make it plain that the distinction between solid platinum and platinum-plated goods shall be observed.

Mr. LOW: I am inclined to think that after the twisting of words by one lawyer and the interpretation of them by another lawyer the language of the bill may possibly be not quite clear.

Mr. McMASTER: That shows the use of lawyers.

Mr. McCONICA: I think the language is clear and expresses exactly what it is intended to express. Let me read the section:

> The word "platinum". . . . shall not be applied, to any article of merchandise composed wholly or in part of any metal unless 950/1000ths of the component parts of the metal appearing or purporting to be platinum of which said article consists are either the pure metal and element platinum alone or in conjunction with iridium.

I am sure that says exactly what it is meant to convey.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member did not read all of it, however.

Mr. McCONICA: I left out some of the qualifications, that is all. The whole section is as follows:

> The word "platinum" or any contraction, abbreviation or colourable imitation thereof shall not be applied, either alone or in combination with any other word, to any article of merchandise composed wholly or in part of any metal unless 950/1000ths of component parts of the metal appearing or purporting to be platinum of which said article consists are either the pure metal and element platinum alone or in conjunction with iridium.

I do not think there can be any misunderstanding of its meaning, and there does not seem to be any sense in referring the bill back to any one for the purpose of making it clearer; it is clear enough to me as it stands.

Mr. LOW: I am glad to note that I have at least the backing of a member of the American bar; it is gratifying to me to know that he construes the words as I do. I have had much to do with lawyers and have very seldom found any two of them who interpreted anything the same way; nor have I once received the same opinion from two lawyers on the same matter. So that it is not a surprise to me this afternoon to find lawyers differing. My one desire is to make the purpose of the bill perfectly clear; we are extending to platinum the same protection which we are now extending to gold and silver goods. If there are any words which might be omitted to advantage I shall have no objection to eliminating them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This discussion was started with a view to assisting the minister; certainly it had no other object, for we are not likely to have a general election over the quality of platinum. The endeavour of the committee was to make it clear just what the intended effect of the bill was and to see that such effect was really produced. The point was raised, additional to the point I raised myself, by the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell), that while this does take care of one class of goods it does not take care of the other, while probably both should be taken care of. Supplementary to what I stated, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) urged upon the minister the wisdom of having the wording of this clause the same as the wording of corresponding clauses respecting gold and silver so as to avoid litigation and the possibility of varying interpretations. The minister has offered his view as to several features of the clause, in every one of which he has been declared wrong by every hon. member who has spoken; and he has had to admit in two cases that he was wrong. I have not sought to make trouble for him on that account. But when he accepts the representations of hon. gentlemen in the spirit he does, I find fault. He thinks that he is scoring a point in defending himself by getting up and berating lawyers and saying how difficult it is to get them to agree. There have not been two lawyers in this House who have disagreed on this question; we have all been struggling to get the point into the minister's head. No one disputes what the hon. member for Battleford (Mr. McConica) says as to the intended effect of the section; I have not disputed his view, nor have I heard any other lawyer dispute it. I certainly think, however, that the section could be more clearly put, and I agree with the hon. member for Brome that it is far better, for two reasons, to use the language which was previously employed. First, because the language previously employed is clearer; and, secondly, for the very reason that it has been employed. It is always better to use language that probably has already been interpreted in the courts, that already at least, if it has not been interpreted has stood through the years and not required interpretation. This is all we have been urging.

Mr. McMASTER: It has been interpreted by practice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We all agree that if the intended effect is that the article shall be pure, or, as is put here, shall have the element platinum alone or in conjunction with iridium, the description is correct. The only one who disagrees is the minister, who keeps saying that the whole article has to be 99 per cent pure. Most of our time has been occupied in trying to make him see that that is not the intention. It is no use for the minister to abuse the legal profession. It does not seem worth while for us to try to assist him in any way, for instead of getting gratitude we get abuse. The only thing the minister understands is some plain talking.

Mr. LOW: I have listened to the right hon. member, and I know that it is quite usual for him to cast slurs at hon. members who have not had the advantage of as long experience in the House perhaps as he has had, but he has not been able to show that I have been wrong in any case but one. In that instance, I made a slight mistake which I admitted at once. I have told him from the outset that my endeavour is to have this act extend the same protection to platinum as it extends to gold and silver. Now he says that we might use the same words in both clauses, but in making that suggestion he has no justification for casting slurs upon me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not cast any slurs.

Mr. LOW: The right hon. member certainly did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For not using the same words?

Mr. LOW: Not only to-day, but the other day when he said that I endeavoured to deceive this committee by certain statements which I had made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister wants to get off this subject and discuss the other, we will do so.

Mr. LOW: Yes. He said that I intended to deceive the House, that my deputy had been a party to certain arrangements with the Civil Service Commission which I had attributed to the commission itself. The regulations were made in 1919 by the Civil Service Commission, requiring candidates for the position of commercial trade agents to have university education, and the age limit was also fixed in printed regulations in that year. They were revised at a later date by an official of the department appointed by my right hon. friend; but, as minister, I did not have any knowledge of the revision. Now, when the right hon. gentleman charged that I had misled the House he made a mistake; a charge that he cannot sustain. I have never intentionally misled anybody whether in the House or out of it, and I do not propose to allow such an allegation to stand against me. I may make a mistake sometimes, on my facts, as everyone does, but I will not deliberately misstate facts nor mislead anyone. A man is best known in his home town, and if my right hon. friend should ever make a similar statement to that just made from a public platform in my home town, I would advise him to be well forewarned, for it would arouse objection, not from members of the Liberal party who might be present but from members of his own party. I have hitherto regarded my right hon. friend as a statesman, but it seems to me that tactics such as we have just witnessed are not worthy the leader of a great historic party; they are rather what might be expected from a ward politician. I am ready and willing at all times to discuss any question fully and frankly. There is absolutely no justification for casting slurs upon any hon. member because he does not happen to agree with opinions held by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister is through I have a few very simple words to say. I have listened with due humility to the castigation which the minister has administered. His language was not very graceful, but its grace infinitely transcended its appropriateness. He managed to escape very quickly from the subject we are discussing to another. Yesterday I referred to the hon. minister in certain terms, and here, in Renfrew, or anywhere else, I am prepared to stand by every word I then uttered. The minister has not alleged that anything I did state was wrong in the slightest degree. I did not say that the minister deceived the House, much less did I say that he deceived it intentionally. I said that the minister had stated to the committee that the Civil Service Commission was responsible—and he reflected on the commission as being responsible—for the restriction of the position of commercial trade agent to university graduates. I called attention to what he had done, and I stated that he had no right to do it.

Mr. McMASTER: May I interpose to ask whether these university graduates were going to deal with platinum rings?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not introduce this.

Mr. McMASTER: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the straits of the minister who did introduce this discussion are pretty desperate. I stated that the minister had no right to reflect on the commission in this way, that he was treating neither the commission nor the House fairly in doing so when his own deputy and himself insisted on that restriction. I did not say the minister had so insisted; it was his deputy. In the face of that, I submitted that it was not fair to lead the House to believe that the commission was responsible for the condition referred to.

Mr. LOW: Is it fair to hold me responsible for an act of the deputy minister that took place under the administration of the right hon. gentleman?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not hold the minister responsible; I did not say he was responsible.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I think this discussion is absolutely out of order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Surely I have a right to reply. The hon. member should have risen when the minister was speaking.

Mr. McMASTER: I restrained myself while the minister was speaking, and I also restrained myself while the ex-minister was making his address. Now that the minister has objected, it seems to me time that those of us who are anxious to see the orderly progress of business should protest against a continuance of this discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the right hon. gentleman might be allowed to make his explanation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will be very brief. My object is to set out to the committee what I said and to show that I was justified in saying it. The minister should have stated that the stand taken by the commission was not only agreed to but insisted on by his own department.

Mr. LOW: Who was in charge of the department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Sir George Foster, I think.

Mr. LOW: The only mistake I may have made was in not coupling up the government of that day with the restrictions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was it fair to refer to this as something to show that the commission was not doing its duty? It certainly was not. In respect of the same matter the minister also held the commission alone responsible, and as an argument against the commission, referred to the fact that it wanted the age to be set at a certain figure, when he who now presides as his deputy was the man who insisted on that too. I do not think that was fair on the part of the minister, and I stand by what I said then. Surely it is not casting slurs on the minister to require that when he reflects on the commission he should give the facts and circumstances. That is all I charged the minister with, and he should not exaggerate my language.

As respects my conduct on the issue before the committee this afternoon, I do not need to make any argument. There is not a single hon. member who does not recall the whole of this discussion and what the minister has said—the spirit of it all from the beginning, and whether any slurs were cast on the minister. I do resent it that, when an endeavour is made to set the minister right in this matter —and he was set right in respect to at least three features of it—he continually casts aspersions on the legal profession and attributes blame to them when nobody in the world is to blame at all. Why does not the minister accept in the right spirit the assistance he is given? We all know he said first that these adjectives referred to the metal. Everybody heard what he said next—it is trifling; it amounts to nothing, and I was not trying to make anything of it. But as to the next feature the minister resisted us when we persisted that it was never intended by this section that the whole product should be 95 per cent platinum. The minister assured us over and over again that that was the intention.

Mr. LOW: There are no plated platinum articles in common commercial use.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They may not be plated, but they must be articles which are only partly platinum, and it is only the platinum part that must be 95 per cent pure. The minister was wrong there and wrong in an essential and fundamental part of the section. We did not denounce him for that, but when we point these things out to him why in the world should he be continually getting up and taking a fling at the lawyers? I did not denounce him because he had not used the language used before, I simply supported the member for Brome in the view that it is better to use it—that it is worth while referring this to the draughtsman to get it used. If the minister will not do that, all right; I will let it go, but I think it is the general desire of the committee.

Mr. LOW: On the other hand we have the remarks of the hon. member for Battleford (Mr. McConica) who says that the clause is very clear.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister had better take that, then.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When we pass legislation of this kind we usually try not only to make it clear but also to make it enforceable. We are told that the purpose of the bill is to place this metal in exactly the same position that gold and silver occupy now. I have already pointed out that there are only two amendments, the first in the title and the second in this particular clause. There is an interpretation clause which, if anything is to be done, must be amended, because it deals with marks, and it is the improper marking which is the offence. In the original act we have in the interpretation clause the definition of "mark" as follows:

"Mark" means any mark, sign, device, imprint, stamp, brand, label, ticket, letter, word, figure or other means whatsoever of indicating, or of purporting to indicate, quality, quantity, or weight of gold or of silver, or quality or kind of gold or silver plate.

Then there is the definition of dealer:

"Dealer" means any person who is a manufacturer of, or a seller of or dealer in, whether by wholesale or retail, any of the articles to which this act applies; and whether such person is an individual person, or a corporate or unincorporated body of persons, or a director, manager, officer or agent of any such body.

Then section 3 provides that the act shall apply to (a) all gold articles; (b) all silver articles, (c) all plated articles. It is perfectly obvious, therefore, that if we are to deal with this matter intelligently and effectively we must also amend this section to make the act apply to platinum. I shall not go through the whole thing, but surely enough has been said to show that the bill ought to be withdrawn and a proper amendment brought in.

Mr. EVANS: I think it is high time somebody besides the lawyers got in on this. I always thought I could read the English language, and I fully agree with the hon. member for Battleford that the language here expresses exactly the meaning it is intended to convey. I do not see why there should be any quibble over it.

Mr. LOW: This bill was referred by the Trade and Commerce department to Mr. A. G. Troop, law clerk of the House of Commons. I am very sorry if the meaning is not clear. Will my right hon. friend give me the numbers of the clauses in the Gold and Silver Marking Act to which he has referred?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The interpretation clause is clause 2. The application of the act clause is clause 3, and sub-clause 3 of clause 9 is the one I read. The point is this, to reiterate: I have never, from the beginning urged anything else than that the amendment does mean what it is intended to mean. I have never had any doubt as to what was intended. But I think it should be made clearer, and I also think it should be in the wording of the old clause. There were additional points raised by my hon. friend to my left and by the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton; these are points that will have to be taken care of separately.

Mr. LOW: The proposals incorporated in the bill were first referred to the Justice department and then to the law clerk of the House, and I was endeavouring to stand behind their wording.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not finding fault with them.

Mr. LOW: I thought that several lawyers should be quite capable of drafting a very simple clause to cover a matter that seems so very clear to me. Will my hon. friend read the clause in question? I have not got it before me.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think I had better go back a little before reading it, and I will deal with it in language which is entirely the language of the layman. In all acts there are interpretation clauses the purpose of which is to give the judge and everybody else an idea of what you mean. For example, in this case you have an interpretation clause which states what "mark" means; it shows that these are marks having regard to gold, silver, or articles plated with either of these metals. My hon. friend will see that this clause should be amended so as to make the definition of "mark" apply to platinum as well as to gold and silver. Then there is another thing always in a statute, and that is, you try and define the object of the statute, and you do that in the clause which deals with the application of the act. You have a clause here which says the act applies to such and such things, but it does not apply to platinum. You would have to amend that clause to extend it to platinum. Then you have your penalizing clauses as well. They have to do with the dealers. I am not going to go through the whole thing, but I just want to impress this point on the minister, that what he thinks he is doing is not being done. This has not to do with the wording at all, but with the act as a whole. The penalties are penalties against dealers. The present act defines dealers, and the dealers defined are dealers in gold and silver, or in articles of plated ware. So it is not sufficient merely to put in a substantive clause to say something about platinum, unless the real machinery of the act which applies to the marking, the application of the act, penalties, and the like, is similarly amended.

Mr. LOW: Do they not now apply?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, it is perfectly clear that the act applies to only gold and silver and plated ware. I do not think my hon. friend will find any difficulty at all, if he sends this back to the draughtsman and asks him to read the act he thinks he is amending. I think the law clerk of the House would tell him at once.

Mr. LOW: I am surprised and disappointed to find that an amendment that was drafted on reference to the Justice department and later referred to the law clerk of the House of Commons is not understood by a number of the members of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid you will have to blame the Minister of Justice, and not me.

Mr. LOW: I am not blaming anybody. I confess that occasionally I am unable to understand what some complicated clauses mean with their "whereases this, whereases that, and whereases the other," when the matter could be perfectly and clearly expressed in a few simple words.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am perfectly content to leave it to the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell). He understands it.

Mr. LOW: The clauses read:

2. There shall not be applied to any silver article any mark indicating, or purporting or intended to indicate, that the silver in the article is of higher quality than it really is, nor any mark which contravenes the provisions of subsections 3 and 4 this section.

3. The marks "Silver," "Sterling" or "Sterling Silver," "Coin" or "Coin Silver," or any colourable imitation thereof, or any other mark intended to suggest such a quality, shall not be applied to any silver article, if the silver in the article contains pure silver in less proportion than nine hundred and twenty-five parts of pure silver in every one thousand parts of such silver.

I think the other is just as clear.

Mr. McMASTER: May I just say, in support of the suggestion I made a few moments ago, that the bill might be withdrawn and referred again to the law officers. I remember hearing in this House the Hon. Mr. Fielding state how difficult it was to amend a bill at the Table, how difficult it was to get the precise phraseology sought. I think the minister might possibly consent to this suggestion. It is made in all kindness, and it does not involve the slightest disrespect to either the minister or the law officers. Any one is likely to make a slip. I do think it is advisable to use the same phraseology, or as nearly as possible the same phraseology, in legislation dealing with similar matters, because the department in the past may have had to apply these laws, and if they have a law which is exactly in the same terms it is easier to apply. It may possibly have been interpreted by the court, and in that case it is a real advantage to have your amending act in the same phraseology.

Then there is the point suggested by my hon. friend for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), that the interpreting clauses will have to be changed in order to have the word "dealer" extend to a dealer not only in gold, silver, and plated ware but also in platinum. Under the circumstances I think it would perhaps expedite business if the bill were referred to the law officers again. If the law officers are correct, and those of us who have found some ground for criticism are wrong, the minister will be re-established in his opinion, and perhaps will be able to convince those of the House who are of a different opinion from him. It seems to me that a good deal of time would be saved if the bill were withdrawn for the moment, and that could be done without the slightest implication of dereliction in duty, or carelessness, or anything of that sort.

Mr. LOW: Does my hon. friend think the clause is not clear? Does he not interpret it to mean just what was intended in the drafting?

Mr. McMASTER: It is a little hard to know just what was intended, as I was not present when the bill was drafted. I do think the clause is fairly clear. It seems to me that the words "any contraction, abbreviation or colourable imitation" means contraction, not of the article, but of the word itself, "platinum," and it seems very clear to me that the 95 per cent refers merely to that part of the article which is supposed to be platinum. I think that is clear enough. But that does not cover my suggestion that it would be well to use the same phraseology as is used in connection with gold and silver, and it certainly does not cover the rather important point brought forward by the hon. member for West York, that there would have to be another clause added to the bill extending the definition of "dealer" to cover not only dealers in gold, silver, and plated ware, but also dealers in platinum.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. LOW: If such a course meets the wishes of the committee, I shall be glad to refer the bill back to the Justice department and the law clerk of the House of Commons.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

TRADE AND COMMERCE

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Elevator, government grain, towards construction of, at Edmonton, $1,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the minister explain how this matter stands?

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): There was an item placed in the estimates last year for $200,000 towards this elevator The work was started last year, and this year we have this vote for $1,000,000 in the main estimates. It is for the purpose of building an elevator at the city of Edmonton with a capacity of 2,500,000 bushels. Excavation work was started last winter, and pile driving was continued during the spring. The contract for pile driving was let in the month of May, the successful tenderer being Carter, Hall and Aldinger. For the elevator itself the following tenders were received, Carter, Hall, Aldinger Company Limited, being the lowest:

Carter-Hall-Aldinger, Co. Ltd., Winnipeg, Man.	$1,297,729
Northern Construction Company	1,349,000
Barnett McQueen Co. Ltd., Fort William	1,398,000
MacDonald Engineering Company, Toronto	1,411,000
E. G. M. Cape Co. Ltd., Montreal	1,419,000
Poole Construction Company, Regina	1,433,000
Fegles Construction Company, Fort William	1,460,000

The successful tenderers, Messrs. Carter, Hall-Aldinger have started work, and we hope to have the elevator in operation by the time the new crop is available. Edmonton is the centre of a great wheat growing district, and we felt we were justified in making this expenditure. There will be a further item in the supplementary estimates with respect to this investment. The reason that vote was not included in the present item was the fact that when these estimates were presented to the House, tenders had not been received. For that reason we felt that if we asked for the larger vote in these estimates it might disclose to the contractors the amount we had in mind.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What will the further amount be?

Mr. LOW: The engineer has estimated that the elevator will cost $1,500,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I suppose the amount in the supplementary estimates will represent another $300,000 will it not?

Mr. LOW: The whole of the previous vote was not spent last year. Only about $21,016 had been expended up to January 31.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What engineer is looking after the construction?

Mr. LOW: Mr. C. D. Howe, Port Arthur.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He used to be with the Grain Board before?

Mr. LOW: Yes, and they found his services satisfactory.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose it is to be a terminal elevator the same as the elevators at Saskatoon and Moose Jaw?

Mr. LOW: It will be identically the same.

Mr. JELLIFF: What further consideration, if any, has the minister given to the matter of erecting an internal storage elevator at Lethbridge? This question has been before parliament, I think, year in and year out for the last ten or twelve years, and the people of the district feel they are being treated very unjustly in the distribution of these elevators, some of which have been placed at points not nearly so well entitled to them as Lethbridge. I discussed this matter at considerable length last year when the item for the Edmonton elevator was being considered, and the then Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) assured me that the representations made at that time would be fully considered—that the Grain Commission were going to investigate the Lethbridge situation. I inferred from the minister's statement that a report would be obtained with respect to Lethbridge and I knew that when it was presented it would be favourable. I therefore expected that some consideration would be shown to Lethbridge when the estimates were brought down this year.

I do not want to discuss the matter at great length but I draw the minister's attention to the fact that over 40,000,000 bushels of wheat which is about one-fourth of the entire production of Alberta, went through the Lethbridge freight district last year. I also draw his attention to the fact that such an elevator is of great importance to us in connection with the movement of grain by the western route. It is true that we have an internal storage elevator at Calgary but our easiest route to Vancouver is not through Calgary but through Golden. In taking the latter route some of the more severe railway grades are avoided. There are a great many reasons, both of a national and of a local character, to warrant the establishment of an internal storage elevator at Lethbridge. As I stated last year there is scarcely a place where difficulty is more likely to ensue over car shortages than in that district. We are served by one railway solely, the Canadian Pacific whereas Calgary, Edmonton and other points are served by two or three distinct lines of railway, and have the benefit of all the freight car equipment of those several lines. Since I have been a resident of that part of the country we have suffered very severely indeed from car shortages on a number of occasions, in spite of the fact that the Canadian Pacific is handling the business in a very efficient and capable way. I can remember that as far back as 1915 we were unable, on account of car shortages and lack of elevator space, to get that year's crop out until the summer of 1916. Last year we had a crop quite equal to that of 1915, and we had a similar crop in 1916. In 1922 we had a crop of 22,000,000 bushels of wheat, over one-third of the entire crop of Alberta. We feel very much aggrieved over the slight we have experienced in this matter, and our people are insisting that action be taken. A number of years ago when the location of these internal storage elevators was first before the country and under consideration by the Grain Commission, Dr. Magill recommended the building of an internal storage elevator at Lethbridge. He was at that time head of the Royal Grain Commission. Since I have become a member of this House, I have talked with Dr. Magill several times and he has assured me that he made the recommendation at that time. He asserts, as he did then, that Lethbridge is the logical point for the establishment of one of those elevators. There come to Lethbridge, if I recollect aright, lines from seven different directions. There is the line from Macleod from the west; the main line of the Canadian Pacific from the east; the Cardston branch; the Coutts branch; the Lethbridge-Weyburn branch, recently completed, which brings grain from eastern Saskatchewan through to the west coast; the Aldersyde branch; the Macleod-Calgary branch; and very soon we are to have constructed by the Canadian Pacific the Kipp-Retlaw branch. All these lines run into Lethbridge and bring an immense quantity of grain into that centre.

5. p.m.

One special reason why they want an internal storage elevator there is the avoidance of a car shortage, which is a very important matter, because in the fall when our shipments of grain are heaviest, there is the greatest call on our railways for the shipment of coal. It takes 200 to 300 cars a day during that part of the year to get coal out of the Lethbridge district. The railways very properly will give preference to the coal business when the weather happens to be cold on the prairies and the people are likely to suffer from inclement weather.

Last year I had a statement, to which I referred, from the Lethbridge Board of Trade which is very greatly interested in this subject, especially on account of the mixed farming operations which we are trying to carry out in that district. They have gathered extensive data regarding the advantages which will be derived by that section of the country from the building of an internal storage elevator at that point, and I am going to cite some of the figures. They state that in 1922 the wheat production was 22,662,000 bushels. We are very anxious to have the screenings left in that district in order to feed our sheep as we have a largely developed sheep industry there and have shipped as high as 1,750,000 pounds of wool per year. That has been very important at seasons when on account of drought conditions, the wool product was about the only immediate source of money for the farmer to provide for necessities and to leave any money at all in that part of the country. If we figure the screenings alone at two per cent on that wheat crop it would amount to 453,000 bushels of screenings, or 13,597 tons. When you figure the cost to the farmer of shipping this quantity of waste all the way to Fort William and to the sheepmen in order to get the same quantity of screenings back—and pay $15 to $20 a ton for them in addition—you will realize that it amounts to a good deal of money. They paid $67,986 freight on those screenings in 1922. It required to move those screenings alone 302 cars. It required to move the whole wheat crop 15,108 cars, if we take 1,500 bushels of wheat per car. If you make the same calculation in connection with this year's wheat crop of 40,000,000 bushels, you have almost double the result. You have 800,000 bushels of screenings with a freight loss on those screenings alone of $120,000. The by-product which they want to use in the Lethbridge district is carried all the way to Fort William, and then when they want those screenings in order to fatten their sheep in the winter season, they have to have the stuff shipped all the way back again. That is what happens, and is one of the strongest arguments in favour of the erection of an internal storage elevator at that point with full facilities for screening grain.

That is only one feature of the matter. It is figured, if I remember aright, that it takes about 100 days to fatten sheep, and about 250 pounds of those screenings together with other feed must be used. The calculation is that with the screenings from the 22,000,000-bushel crop of 1922, they could fatten 76,000 more lambs per year than they are doing at the present time. On the basis of the 40,000,000-bushel crop for this year, those figures would be very nearly doubled. There you had in 1922 a possibility of adding 76,000 sheep to those that the people in that district are able to handle, worth $8 a head and, for mutton, this would mean $600,000 more to the return of the sheep men of that section. Every one of those sheep would yield probably seven to eight pounds of wool, or a total of about 500,000 pounds, which even at the low price of 25 cents a pound, would amount to $125,000. Therefore, the extra amount which could actually have been produced for the sheepmen of that district if they had the screenings alone there, would have been about $725,000. This is a matter of public interest to this country. The clothing situation and the food situation of this country are affected by it, and advantages would accrue to the people generally as well as to the farmers. I want to urge this upon the minister. I notice he is paying no attention to what I am saying.

Mr. LOW: I am making notes of what my hon. friend is saying.

Mr. JELLIFF: I thank the minister. That is only one feature. I have always contended, as our people have that the Lethbridge district which produces as good grain as can be found anywhere in the world, should be the centre of an immense milling industry; that our raw product should there be converted into flour and feed of various kinds. There is no reason why that should not be the case. I was before the Grain Commission years ago in connection with this subject when Dr. Magill was inclined to favour Lethbridge as the place where one of those elevators should be established and which he subsequently recommended. I took the ground that Lethbridge and the southern Alberta district should be the Minneapolis of Canada, and I hope the day will come when that will be the case. I have been assured that the millers in that district are ready, the moment an internal storage elevator is erected there, to double and treble their capacity. Time and again I have been in the offices of the Ellison Milling Company there and I have been shown files, telegrams and messages, of various kinds containing orders for flour from Japan and China. This country is very much interested in developing the oriental trade. In order to manufacture that flour the millers must have the lower grades of wheat, 4, 5 and 6, out of which they make it, and they cannot retain the quantity of these low grades of wheat in that part of the country under the present system of handling the crop and shipping it to Fort William, to supply that trade and keep their mills running to full capacity the year round, further develop the industry, and give our people the full advantage of the crops which they produce. I was on the coast last winter on the invitation of the Vancouver Harbour Commission and one of the first things I noticed on the docks was a lot of flour from the Ellison Mills of our district being loaded for the Orient. When I got home I spoke to the manager of the milling company, Mr. George Green, in regard to what I had seen. There were five carloads of that wheat being loaded on a vessel in the harbour at that time and I so reported to him; he said that if I had waited two or three days longer I should have seen thirteen more carloads. That is the situation and I think it is important enough to call for the consideration of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. We can increase our output for the oriental and foreign trade from two or three times if we can get an internal storage elevator out there which will retain in our district enough of the different grades of wheat year by year to supply our mills.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the present milling capacity?

Mr. JELLIFF: I cannot say offhand. There is another thing I want to bring to the attention of the minister in that connection. At great expense to the people there are being developed extensive irrigation areas in that part of the country, and the method of farming in these irrigated districts is of the intensive type. We should be, and are, fast developing along dairy lines, raising hogs and cattle and sheep and poultry; and it is especially essential to the welfare and the proper development of these districts that we should have, combined with the forage crops which are easily produced in large quantities on the irrigated lands, the by-products from our mills. There is scarcely a year in which we are not compelled, in order to supply the demands of our dairy farmers, to ship into that country bran and shorts and all sorts of mill feeds and screenings which should be produced right there in the immediate district. It might be of some importance to the minister to mention the fact that one of our big sheep men there has brought down to Fort William, and fattened on the screenings, as many as ten thousand sheep in a single band. Mr. Harvey, a prominent sheep man of Raymond, Alberta, has brought that number down on different occasions; and a number of other men have brought down bands numbering from 2,500 to 5,000. Can the minister not do something to meet this situation? It is a long-standing demand which is justifiable from every angle I have mentioned: from the car shortage and the milling standpoint, from the mixed farming and live stock standpoint, and from the standpoint of the oriental trade. There is every reason why the minister should seriously consider this matter and bring down in his supplementary estimates a sum sufficient to enable him to begin the construction of an internal storage elevator at that point.

Mr. LOW: I realize that this is a matter of great interest to my hon. friend (Mr. Jelliff), and I agree with him in many respects. There is no doubt that many new elevators both internal and at various ports are required. But my hon. friend recognizes I have no doubt, that the government is obliged to cut its coat according to its cloth; we must proceed cautiously in matters of public expenditure and therefore cannot build more than one or two elevators each year. The hon. member knows that the cost of erection of these elevators must come out of current expenditure, and at present we are endeavouring to lighten the taxation burdens of the people as far as possible. During the recess it is my intention to devote myself to an intensive study of the whole wheat question, with the purpose of finding some solution if possible to the problem of cheaper marketing of the wheat of the prairie provinces. I realize that a margin of two, or three, or five cents a bushel means much to those provinces, and with a crop of 400,000,000 or 500,000,000 bushels a reduction of five cents would amount to a considerable sum. The matter is worth inquiry. The department over which I preside can do no greater service to the people of the West than to endeavour to work out some amended system which will enable the wheat grower to market his wheat at a lower cost than is possible to-day. With that object in view I intend to devote to the whole subject as much time as I can between the close of this session and the opening of the next. I fully agree that it is a sound idea to have in the immediate locality of the farming district an elevator where screenings—and if a mill—where by-products from the flour can be obtained for cattle. One thing we try to do in the milling business is to export as much flour as possible, retaining at the same time for the benefit of the farmers of this country all the by-products from the mill. For about three or four months of the year there is a great shortage of shorts and bran and certain other by-products. If we can obtain a greater volume of export business in flour in Canada it will help us to supply this shortage, because feeds are rarely exported. I shall be glad to take into consideration the remarks of my hon. friend when the question of marketing western wheat is under scrutiny.

Mr. JELLIFF: When I was at Vancouver last winter I attended a banquet given by the harbour commission at which a gentleman connected with the milling industry of that city stated, in the course of his address, that Vancouver was not likely to become a big milling centre because it did not have a sufficient number of live stock in that part of the province to consume the by-products. He mentioned that it would be a great help to the milling industry of Canada, and would facilitate the handling of the grain crop, if more storage elevators were erected in the interior, and he named Lethbridge specifically.

I was glad to learn something from the figures which the minister gave the committee last night as to the results from the internal storage elevators. I find that the storage elevator which was erected at Calgary showed a loss in only one year, and that the net profits during the years quoted, 1915 to 1924, were $374,488.77. The elevator at Moose Jaw showed net profits of $170,782 for the same period. I am inclined to think that those elevators are most needed in the Alberta country, for we are furthest from Fort William and from Vancouver, and the empty cars that finally trickle back into our neighbourhood are accordingly fewer and very much slower in getting to us than to others more advantageously located. Consequently we have more trouble in meeting our car situation than those who are in the other provinces, and we have greater occasion to use these storage elevators. The minister also mentioned the elevator at Saskatoon, which I noticed made a net profit, in round figures, of $370,000. I think that is a good investment for our people. It is not a gratuity to the grain growers, because eventually these elevators pay their way. We are very hopeful that an interior storage elevator will be established at Lethbridge, especially in view of the mixed farming that is carried on in the district, for this would guarantee a better return than is usual where this condition does not prevail.

Mr. HOCKEN: May I break in to ask for a reply to the question I put to the government in the absence of the Acting Postmaster General, as to what course the government is going to take in regard to the strike of postal employees?

Mr. GRAHAM: May I suggest that at about five minutes to six the hon. member repeat his question? If we break in on this discussion it is apt to start all over again.

Mr. WARD: Could the minister give us any figures to show the service which is being rendered by the elevators located at Calgary, Moose Jaw and Saskatoon? I have been given to understand that very little grain is ever stored in them. If that is the fact, it seems hardly proper to build other elevators when this accommodation is not being utilized by those for whom it is intended.

Mr. LOW: Before erecting a new elevator we always take into consideration whether it is likely to be self-sustaining within a short time of its erection and actual operation.

Mr. WARD: Are the interior storage elevators at Moose Jaw, Calgary and Saskatoon self-sustaining? If not, does the minister expect that they will be self-sustaining in the near future?

Mr. LOW: I gave those figures last night about six times, but I have no objection to repeating them. Patience is a virtue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dispense.

Mr. WARD: I understand they are all on Hansard, so I will look them up.

Mr. KELLNER: Is it the intention of the government to instal drying machinery in the Edmonton elevator? And would it be feasible to get a through freight rate on grain originating east of Edmonton and destined for Vancouver? At present we have to pay the local rate to Edmonton plus the local rate from Edmonton to the coast.

Mr. LOW: Answering the first question, it is intended to equip this elevator with all the machinery required including adequate drying facilities. In reply to the second question, freight rates are under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was very much interested in what the minister told us as to an effort to be made to bring down the cost of marketing grain, and also to hear his statement that efforts were to be made to export flour instead of grain.

Mr. LOW: The mere fact that we were able to get the ocean rates on flour from Canadian ports equalized with the rate as from American ports has helped wonderfully.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was going to say that I hope it is to be something more than a pious wish. Of course the discrimination which was practised in connection with the Atlantic movement to which my hon. friend's reference applied, was so bad that I do not suppose anyone thought it would continue. If my hon. friend did anything to get rid of it I congratulate him.

Mr. GRAHAM: He did.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It was simply a scandal.

Mr. LOW: I was able to draft such a plain clause that the gentlemen at the Economic Conference understood it, and we succeeded in getting the rate equalized with the American basis.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the object of the ministers's last statement is to show that he knows something more about dollars and cents than he knows about platinum.

Mr. LOW: No, something more than I know about law.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The correction of those rates is not helping the flour business very much while the present spread continues. We had evidence the other day before the committee on Railways that the present spread between flour and grain is 7 cents. It is hard to believe that we are seriously trying to promote the export of flour if we are going to sit down quietly under such a spread as that. The old spread was at one time as low as half a cent. It went up a cent, then a cent and a half, then to three cents. The government became alarmed—that was in 1913, I think—at the spread having doubled. I remember taking the matter up with the British Board of Trade when in England, and I recall that the whole question was gone into pretty thoroughly by that body. No definite action was taken by them, however. My recollection is that at that time the spread was 5½ cents; to-day it is 7. That means there is just that much disability standing in the way of what the minister says ought to be done. We ought to export a maximum amount of flour, for the reasons pointed out by the hon. member (Mr. Jelliff). It ought to be done in the interests also of the dairying industry, because those engaged in that industry are compelled to import hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of foodstuffs in order to carry on their dairying activities.

Mr. LOW: Wheat is one of the best ballasts that can be obtained, and consequently the vessels very often take it at an extremely low rate. The ocean rates are something over which we have little control; they are under the direction of an Atlantic shipping conference. We have at present a gentleman in England, Mr. Preston, investigating these matters.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I quite understand that in certain cases we do get grain carried at a nominal rate. I am only sorry that that is not done more often, and that that nominal rate does not work back to the producer. It is not within his power to take advantage of these adventitious contracts. But the question of spread has nothing to do with these accidental rates.

Mr. LOW: I do not know much about platinum, but I know a little about flour and wheat. What is the spread to which my hon. friend refers? Is it the spread between certain commodities?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, the spread between the rates on wheat and on flour, a matter that has been discussed in this House and everywhere else for years.

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend had not made any reference to wheat or flour.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; I thought I had. The spread I refer to is not that which applies in the case of abnormal rates or rates made applicable for the purpose of trimming boats; it is the spread between the regularly quoted rates, the conference rates, of wheat on the one side and flour on the other. If my hon. friend finds that his representative in England does not do something, well, he is going over himself and perhaps he will take a turn at it. Of course, some spread is to be expected; that must be said in fairness, because there are claims for damages, and there is a little more money involved in the case of loading and unloading flour. But the present spread is certainly a matter which should receive attention.

Mr. LOW: Does my hon. friend suggest a remedy?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would refer the minister to the report of the committee on Agriculture last year and to the evidence taken before that committee on this very question. At one of the imperial conferences a committee was appointed to take this matter up, and a report was made two and a half years ago dealing with the question and suggesting, as I recall it, the creation of a tribunal in that connection. Nothing has been done by the government on that report. Perhaps they can find some better way of handling it, but certainly we shall never get anywhere unless we try to do something definite in connection with this question of spread.

Mr. LOW: I am already trying.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I hope my hon. friend will not weary in well doing. Perhaps he will be able to bring back something for us next year. May I ask the minister whether he thinks there is any more favourable centre than Lethbridge for the purposes of an elevator of this kind, having regard to the character of the country and to the fact that we have there a district which can only live if mixed farming is adopted to a greater degree and if there are enough screenings there for the purposes of feed to the necessary stock? I have not heard any particular reason why Lethbridge was overlooked when others were being built. There may have been some reason, but the minister has not given it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I understood that Lethbridge was to go before Calgary at one time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know; I am only looking for information.

Mr. LOW: It certainly should have preceded erection of an elevator at Moose Jaw.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that not a point where there is really more chance for mixed farming, and for the sort of thing the Minister of Agriculture wants done? Is there no better point at which to start it? I would like to find out from my hon. friend what the milling capacity is at Lethbridge. As I understand it, a lower quality of flour is in demand for the markets of the Orient than for the European markets. We use for milling for the Orient grades 4, 5 and as low as 6. That, of course, makes a flour of a character that does not carry as well, and would not last as long, as flour from our No. 1 hard, and it is not worth as much. It would look to me as if it was in the interest of economy that that should be milled as conveniently to Vancouver as possible.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. LOW: I suppose that my hon. friend knows that low grade flours are also made from No. 1 and No. 2.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think there is a smaller proportion of low grade flours made from the more expensive grades.

Mr. LOW: It also depends upon the particular patent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think I am right in saying that we have a maket for our poorer grades of flour made from the lower grades of wheat in the Orient, and if I am right in that, it would also follow that it would be the course of wisdom to mill that at some point in western Canada that is convenient to the Vancouver gateway. It would seem to me there is a great opportunity just now to extend this milling business in the Orient, particularly in Japan at the present time, for obvious reasons. Is the minister in a position to say whether we have sufficient milling capacity at the present time? Does he not think it would be a good thing to have a multiplication of our milling activities? I think the hon. member for the district suggested three times as much.

Mr. LOW: The milling business increased almost too rapidly during the war, and the situation of the milling market to-day is that many mills find themselves in the position of running only twelve hours a day. I suppose my hon. friend knows that it is utterly impossible to make a flour mill pay when it operates only twelve hours a day, for the very simple reason that to operate for the other twelve hours costs only a trifle more. When the mill operates for only twelve hours all the overhead and almost every charge carried when operating twenty hours must be carried just the same. Operating at night simply means an addition to your staff of a couple of packers and a couple of millers only, say in a mill with a capacity of five hundred barrels. You would only require four extra men, but you could double your capacity. When the mill is working only twelve hours, an inferior flour is turned out because the run is stopping and starting again in the morning, and that is a bad thing. The longer the mill continues to run steadily, the more uniform and better the grade of flour turned out.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I entirely agree with my hon. friend, but he is speaking of the situation generally. I was speaking having regard particularly to the milling of the lower grades of wheat for the markets of the Orient, and the best geographical position for mills for the purposes of that trade. My hon. friend is quite right as to the situation generally, but I was wondering how we were situated to-day having regard to the number of mills established in the district where it would be cheap and economical to handle the lower grades of flour through Vancouver to the markets of the Orient. The reason I asked is that the hon. member for the district pointed out that if the terminal elevator were built there, the local millers apparently think they have such a demand for their flour in the Orient that they are prepared to instal three times as great a capacity as they now have.

Mr. LOW: The great problem in operating a flour mill is that the lower grade flour brings a very low price, and consequently there is some question whether a mill could operate entirely on low grade flour. The territory to which my hon. friend has referred seems to commend itself to me as a very good point for a flour mill.

Mr. EVANS: I would like to again press the point of freight rates to the internal elevators. The internal elevators have mostly shown a loss, and I do not think the farmers know exactly the cost to themselves of turning in their wheat to the terminal elevators. The charge in some cases, perhaps, is too high. The farmer, of course, would like to use the nearest elevator possible, so that he may get his weights and grades and go to the bank and get his money, but he does not know what the extra charge will be when his grain is turned in there.

Mr. LOW: There is no extra charge, so far as the shipping of grain through the Edmonton elevator is concerned, except one cent a hundred, the usual charge for stopover. You can ship from any point and obtain the through rate to Vancouver with a stopover at Edmonton, at a charge of one cent a hundred for that stopover, whether it is for cleaning or any other purpose.

Mr. EVANS: Would that apply also to wheat destined for Fort William? Would it apply to wheat going to the terminal elevator at Saskatoon and loaded at some point east of Saskatoon?

Mr. LOW: I venture to say it applies to all. I might quote my own case. We have a stopover privilege at Fort William. We can ship to Montreal, and we have a stopover at my home town. It costs us on the all-rail route one cent, and lake and rail, three cents.

Mr. MILLAR: That cent a bushel stopover does not include elevator charges? It is simply for the stopover.

Mr. LOW: That is all.

Mr. KELLNER: Is there no charge for spotting cars in addition to that? When you re-spot your car to ship out, are you not charged for that also?

Mr. LOW: No, unless it is going out by another line, and it is some distance from the other. In my own case, between the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, there is a switching charge of $5.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is on the car?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

STRIKE OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. HOCKEN: May I ask that question now which I have asked two or three times?

The CHAIRMAN: An undertaking was given to hear the hon. member's inquiry. Perhaps this item could stand until after dinner.

Mr. HOCKEN: I want to know what course the government intends to take in regard to the postal strike.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Acting Postmaster General): We discussed the situation yesterday with the representatives of the postal employees and the newspapers last night intimated what the results of that discussion were. Before saying anything about that, may I say that before the executive left Toronto there was an order issued apparently for a strike yesterday at five o'clock, which would be effective throughout Canada. The executive, however, after discussions in Toronto, came here to discuss the situation with us yesterday. We appeared to be reaching an agreement in the neighbourhood of five o'clock, but whether the executive were late in forwarding their message to Toronto or not at all events the Toronto employees went out—all the postal workers in the offices and their assistants, all the mail carriers and their assistants, and the chauffeurs. Of course when that happened it broke in upon our negotiations. The government, as was intimated in the press, offered full consideration of the claims of the post office employees; we proposed that after the claims of the Civil Service were all adjusted by the Civil Service Commission we might sit around a table and discuss thoroughly the complaints of the post office employees as well as the complaints of any other civil servant. In addition to that we suggested that in the case of employees whose revised rates as determined by the Civil Service Commission are less than the former rate plus the 1924-25 bonus, such bonus shall be continued until the salary revision for the entire service has been consummated. That in brief was the offer of the government, and up to five o'clock we had hopes that it would be accepted by the officials. For further consideration of the offer of the government they ordered their men to delay the strike for twenty-four hours. That order was not obeyed in Toronto nor was it obeyed in Montreal. Subsequently some of the men came back to work, but in Toronto they did not return. That was the situation up to ten o'clock last night, when the officers of the association left here to go to Toronto.

As hon. gentlemen well know, the busy hour of the day is about five o'clock in that city, which is the biggest centre perhaps, that is seriously affected. The mails come in about that time and there is heavy sorting to be done for distribution as well as the getting of the mails out on the trains. That was all delayed last night. At ten o'clock last night I felt that we could not delay any longer, and as there did not appear to be any hope of getting an adjustment in time to begin work upon the Toronto mailing, I issued instructions to the Toronto postmaster that if the men did not return by ten o'clock standard time this morning he was to proceed to put on men to take their places. That was done and I had a report at about four o'clock that indicated we had almost in the neighbourhood of four hundred employees at work in the post office at Toronto. So far up to the moment we have not, except in Montreal and in some of the other centres, had to resort to putting men on. The negotiations went on throughout the day in Toronto between the executive and the post office employees there, but at five o'clock the result was that they were not able to persuade the men to return to work. One of the officers—the representative from Hamilton, I believe—in disagreement resigned and intimated that he would undertake to try to prevent the men from going out in the city of Hamilton. I have no further word on the situation except that at the moment the men in Toronto, that is the regular employees are out. They are out in London to a considerable degree; they are also out in Windsor, in Belleville, in Brantford and part of them in Montreal.

As to the western situation we have word from a number of centres, namely, Calgary, Edmonton, Saskatoon—most of the large centres—and there is no indication at the moment of a strike occurring. I am given to understand that there was not complete unanimity of feeling about the matter in these centres. We have no further word from Vancouver or Victoria; they took no action. Of course word reached them much earlier in the day than it reached the city of Toronto. At Montreal the mails are being moved, and everything was going on to-day except at one postal station in the city where a little trouble developed this morning. In the Maritime provinces, with the single exception of Moncton, the officers were operating with full staffs. At any rate there was no intimation to the department that they intended to go out on strike.

What the result will be of the issuance of the order coming at five o'clock to-night I am unable to say, but I wish to restate what I said the other day in the House when speaking on behalf of the government: While I am a strong sympathizer with labour, while my sympathies are with the working man—as I think, perhaps, is the case with most of us—it is the government of Canada that is concerned here and it must carry on the business of the country. I said to the representatives of the men the other night "Gentlemen, my sympathy is with you up to the point where you declare a strike. After that bear in mind that I will exercise all the ingenuity and energy I possess to carry on the business of Canada." That is my feeling in the matter. At the moment we have nearly four hundred new employees at work in the Toronto post office. It is said that while the light holds out to burn the sinner may return. At the same time I simply have to say to the men that a settlement cannot be postponed indefinitely. The postal service of Canada must be carried on, the mails must be moved; and so far as I am able I am going to take every legitimate means to secure the number of employees necessary to do that. I make no threats. As I say my sympathy is with the man who has to work in that kind of way for a living. But there is a higher interest to be considered and that is the interest of the country at large. When that interest is attacked in that kind of manner my sympathy in very large measure ceases. Speaking on behalf of the government that is what I propose to do, so far as is possible, in order to keep the mails moving.

6 p.m.

Mr. HOCKEN: I wish to put two questions so that the House and the country may be informed; I have no desire to embarrass the government in any way. What proportion of the total staff in Toronto is represented by the 400 men engaged, and have they been given the promise that they will be retained in the office in the event of a settlement?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): At ten o'clock standard time to-day a notice was posted in the Toronto office that the men who did not return to duty would be considered out of the service. As to the newcomers there is a large waiting list of men who are eligible and have taken their examinations. They were given an opportunity to go on first and we will continue to take on men just as fast as we require them, and adjust the situation later. But the men we are taking on now will have to be protected.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Department of Trade and Commerce, elevator, government grain, towards construction of, at Halifax, $200,000.

Mr. MILLAR: The matter of keeping grain in Canadian channels has received a great deal of consideration, and some of the measures that have been adopted towards that end have been wise and some have not. According to remarks that have been made from some quarters during the last few days, it is apparently thought that a great deal could be done, by appealing to the patriotic feelings of our Canadian people to induce them to ship through Canadian channels, I think the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) suggested appealing to the western farmers particularly. This will be entirely futile. The movement of grain passes out of the hands of the Canadian farmer never further east than Fort William. The exporter, the shipper can do something in the way of keeping Canadian grain in Canadian channels, but he is not likely to do so unless that is the cheapest route.

I take it that building an elevator at Halifax is an attempt to keep Canadian grain within Canadian channels, but I contend that it will not succeed; that perhaps no vote that will be presented to this House deserves greater condemnation or greater opposition than this vote for an elevator at Halifax. I should like to see Canadian grain kept in Canadian channels; I should like to see the city of Halifax built up; I am friendly towards the city of Halifax; I am quite as willing to see money spent in the far corners of the Dominion as near my home; but in this case I contend that spending money for the erection of an elevator at Halifax will not, to any extent, benefit that city except that the money will be spent there. The grain will never go there. Halifax will never become a grain port.

Why is this the case? Simply because the rail haul is too long. If one looks at the route of grain down the Great Lakes, one is struck with the fact that the railways cannot compete with the water route where there is open water. The case is different when the question is one of canals. The carrying cost in open water such as lake Erie, lake Ontario, once you get to that open water, is only about one-eighth the cost by rail. In order to get to the open water, the Welland canal must be completed; but after that canal is completed, we shall then have open water as far east as Prescott. As it is utterly impossible in any part of Canada for railway transportation to compete with open water transportation, how is it going to be possible to carry grain the distance that was given in this chamber last night of 743 miles from Montreal to St. John? There are times when grain will go to St. John, the St. Lawrence route being frozen up; and there are certain conditions that operate in favour of St. John. So that I believe that grain will be handled at St. John in considerable quantities. But when it comes to carrying grain to Halifax, over a hundred miles further by rail, I cannot see the wisdom of such a course; the cost of that extra transportation will have to be borne by the country. What would be the object of carrying grain another hundred miles by rail when it can be carried by water at one-eighth of the cost. To be sure, if the grain goes to Halifax it will be nearer Liverpool; but there is a considerable difference between carrying grain by rail and carrying it by water.

Mr. FINN: When the hon. member says that the grain can be carried by water he is speaking of the St. Lawrence route when navigation is open there.

Mr. MILLAR: Not necessarily so.

Mr. FINN: Then will my hon. friend tell us what he means?

Mr. MILLAR: When the St. Lawrence route is open I believe very little if any grain will go through either St. John or Halifax. It would be preposterous to carry grain by rail 700 miles, and in the case of Halifax 843 miles, when it can be carried the same distance by water for one-eighth the cost. Is there any force of appeal to patriotism that would induce shippers to go to that extra expense?

Mr. LOW: I might answer that by reading a letter which I wrote Sir Henry Thornton, the president of the Canadian National Railways, and his reply. The following is my letter to him:

As you are no doubt aware, we have had under consideration for some time the matter of the erection of an elevator at Halifax.

There seems to be a difference of opinion among the grain men and others as to the wisdom of building an elevator at this port. In the estimates last session we made provision for an amount to enable the government, if found advisable, to commence the construction of an elevator at this point. However, before undertaking this large expenditure, we desire to know absolutely whether it is in the best public interest. I am therefore writing to ask you to let me have your frank personal opinion on this matter as soon as possible.

He replied on February 21, 1924, as follows:

Replying to your inquiry of February 15th, with reference to the proposed elevator at Halifax, briefly put, the following represents my view of the position.

The elevator referred to is of a terminal character and it is my understanding that it will be built and operated by the government—not by the railway. The railway has however recommended the erection of the facility as the present elevator has entirely outlived its usefulness.

Having regard to the long haul to St. John and Halifax, it is doubtful if there is any profit to the railway company in handling grain to either port. But this commodity is required by steamships at both ports partly for ballast and partly as cargo, and consequently an elevator at both ports would seem to be justified.

Bearing in mind the legislation recently enacted making Canadian ports attractive to import business, principally from Great Britain adequate and modern facilities for handling grain at Halifax would appear to be necessary for the protection of steamship service, and therefore a situation is created which is beneficial to the country as a whole.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the date of that letter?

Mr. LOW: My letter and the reply are dated respectively February 15 and 21 of this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought the government had decided on this matter long ago.

Mr. LOW: When I came into office I had before me all the information, but I endeavoured to ascertain the opinion of the president of the National Railways, knowing that he would give me his views frankly. I have read to the committee just what he wrote to me.

Mr. EVANS: Notwithstanding all that the minister has said, I cannot see that an elevator at that port is at all needed. Since the Vancouver port has been developed for the handling of grain, very little grain has gone east after navigation has closed. And even if it were necessary to haul a part of the western grain crop to a Maritime port, what is wrong with the port of St. John? Surely that has never been congested yet, and there are no indications that it ever will be. Seeing that Vancouver is a port through which grain can be shipped out all the year round there will be absolutely no necessity for hauling grain all the way to Halifax by rail. I am utterly opposed to this vote.

Mr. MILLAR: Last year I believe the amount of grain handled at this port was either 300,000 bushels or 300—I have forgotten just what the figure was.

Mr. FINN: If the hon. member proposes to discuss this matter I wish he would make himself acquainted with the facts. Neither 500 nor 300 bushels is correct; the hon. member's figures are absolutely wrong. Let him get the facts before he undertakes to discuss the matter.

Mr. MILLAR: If there is anything wrong about the figures I have, the responsibility must rest with the Department of Trade and Commerce because these figures were certainly contained in the report of that department.

Mr. FINN: I challenge the hon. member's statement and call upon him to produce the figures. If he will submit the facts I shall be content to accept them; but his statement is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. MILLAR: I shall be pleased to do so.

Mr. LOW: The elevator facilities at Halifax are inadequate for the handling of the grain. I really do not know whether there is any grain going through the elevator or not; it may be going direct from the rail to the ship.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If there is no grain going through Halifax the elevator would handle it all right. What does the minister mean when he says that he does not know whether or not there is any going through?

Mr. GRAHAM: They are no longer discharging where the elevator stands.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, is that the reason?

Mr. GRAHAM: There is no elevator handy now to handle the grain.

Mr. MILLAR: Does the minister think it is good policy to spend large sums of money carrying grain over the railway for the purpose of providing ballast for the ships? Does he think we should compel the railways to carry the grain for nothing? I infer from the remarks made yesterday that it is the intention to compel the railways to carry the grain a part of the way for nothing; that is to say, they are not to be permitted to charge more for carrying the grain to Halifax than they charge for carrying it to Portland. That of course does not apply to the American railways. Now, this simply means that the National Railways will be obliged to carry grain hundreds of miles for nothing. Is that fair to those who are paying the bill? The Canadian people as a whole will have to pay for all this, and it does not seem to be a wise policy to take money from the public treasury or out of the producers of grain in order to make possible the transportation of wheat to Halifax to provide ballast for the ships.

Mr. VIEN: Does my hon. friend think that the railways even at a reduced rate will lose money?

Mr. MILLAR: If the railways are carrying grain to Portland a distance of 297 miles at a fair rate—and we may assume that they are not getting more than a fair rate—then if our railways are compelled to carry it 843 miles for the same price, is that not sufficient evidence for my hon. friend that our railways will have to carry the grain part of that distance for nothing, and must therefore lose money?

Mr. FINN: No, it is not.

Mr. MILLAR: Either they are losing on the one or they are getting an enormous profit on the other.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend should bear in mind that there is other traffic besides wheat, and that the success of the railway depends on the traffic it gets both ways, from east to west, as well as from west to east. The steamship companies with which the Canadian National is doing business give the railway a large inward traffic at Halifax, and if for the benefit of those ships that must get ballast wheat is carried, you will have to take into account the cost of the carriage of that wheat in connection with the profit from the cargo on the westward voyage. That trade is being developed by the ships calling at Halifax, and last year it was double that of the year before. It is like a grocer selling sugar on which he does not make any profit in order that he may sell some other commodity on which he does make a profit.

Mr. MILLAR: Would the minister apply that to the National Transcontinental and the port of Quebec? Strange to say, the cost of carrying grain from Armstrong, north of Fort William, to the city of Quebec a distance of 960 miles, is 21 cents, whereas the cost from Calgary to Fort William is 15½ cents or for 960 miles is 11 or 11¼ cents. If that is a good policy, would it not be wise to develop Quebec by allowing the railways to carry grain at a reasonable price, for they would get return cargoes from Quebec and the increased traffic would build up that port?

Mr. FINN: The rate from Winnipeg or from Fort William to Quebec is the same as to Montreal.

Mr. MILLAR: Oh no.

Mr. FINN: I think if my hon. friend has facts and figures bearing on this he should produce them before contradicting my statement. I have looked into the matter and know.

Mr. MILLAR: Grain is carried by the rail and water route for very much less; it is carried down to the bay ports for about 3 cents.

Mr. FINN: I am talking of the all rail rate.

Mr. LOW: The rates on grain all rail from Fort William to Montreal or to Quebec are the same; by lake and rail they are somewhat less to Montreal.

Mr. VIEN: Half a cent a bushel.

Mr. LOW: It is more than that—four or five cents. But from Montreal to Quebec the local freight rate applies, which amounts to about 10 cents per 100 pounds. Of course, if you ship by water during the navigation season you have the advantage of the lower rate. But when you have to ship all rail, or lake and rail from the bay ports—because the elevators there fill up during the fall and you are able to continue shipment by rail through the winter—there is a very slight difference.

Mr. MILLAR: But why is it that the grain is carried for such an excessive price from Fort William? As I pointed out before, while the rate from Armstrong to the city of Quebec is 21 cents, for the same distance, 960 miles, the through rate on the Canadian Pacific from Calgary to Fort William is 11 or 11¼ cents; that is, it is just double.

Mr. LOW: Double from where?

Mr. MILLAR: From Armstrong on the National Transcontinental about 200 miles north of Fort William.

Mr. LOW: What is the through rate to Quebec?

Mr. MILLAR: Twenty-one cents a bushel from that place to Quebec, a distance of 960 miles. I had read that statement, and I inquired of the author if it was absolutely true, and he assured me it was.

Mr. LOW: The rate from Fort William to Quebec is only 39 cents per 100 pounds. Three-fifths of that is about 23 cents a bushel.

Mr. MILLAR: That would verify my figures.

Mr. LOW: And the other is 21 cents; there is a slight difference.

Mr. MILLAR: A very slight difference.

Mr. LOW: But my hon. friend knows that there is very little traffic on certain parts of the line.

Mr. MILLAR: But we are anxious to keep our grain in Canadian channels, and it seemed to me strange, particularly last fall when there was so much congestion on the lakes and trouble in getting our grain down at reasonable rates, that there should be this prohibitive rate from Armstrong to the city of Quebec, where we have an elevator with a capacity of 2,000,000 bushels only partly used. One would almost think that Canadians were not anxious to keep their grain in Canadian channels. Now, the government can take this course if they wish in order to divert grain to Halifax, they can place an elevator there, but it is forcing the traffic uphill, it is the wrong place for it to go. They can say: "Well, we will force grain there, if we have to carry it for nothing." Traffic can be developed to Halifax in that way, but otherwise that port will not become a grain outlet. I would be willing to vote money for Halifax for any legitimate purpose, for I should like to see the port built up,—

Mr. FINN: Thank you.

Mr. MILLAR:—but I am quite convinced that it is a mistaken policy to force grain to Halifax at a considerable loss by compelling the railways to carry it at much less than cost.

Mr. FINN: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but if he wishes to be taken seriously let him give facts and figures in confirmation of his statement.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. MILLAR: I shall be very pleased to ask my hon. friend for information when he speaks.

Mr. FINN: When I speak you can ask me anything you like and I will try to answer you.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MILLAR: He will probably remember the statement I made a short time ago that the railways are carrying grain from Montreal to Portland, a distance of 297 miles, for a certain rate, which we may assume is a fair rate. In view of this I should like him to show by facts and figures how the railways can be expected to haul grain for a distance of 843 miles for the same rate and not lose money. I shall be very pleased to give him a chance to answer now.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Chairman, I propose to take my own method of placing my facts before the committee. But when my hon. friend speaks of the difference in distance between the two hauls of 550 odd miles, I presume his comparison is between the rates from Winnipeg to Portland and from Winnipeg to Halifax.

Mr. MILLAR: No.

Mr. FINN: Well, between what ports is the comparison made?

Mr. MILLAR: I took the figures given here last night by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), which I assume are correct, namely, Montreal to Halifax, 843 miles.

Mr. FINN: What other port are you putting against that?

Mr. MILLAR: Montreal to Portland, 297 miles.

Mr. FINN: An American port.

Mr. MILLAR: Yes.

Mr. FINN: Good for the Canadian West.

Mr. MILLAR: I am not advocating that our grain should go there. Surely my hon. friend does not misunderstand me. I am simply comparing rates.

Mr. FINN: When the St. Lawrence closes and the ports of Montreal and Quebec are not available, if he is not seeking to send Canadian grain to Portland, where else is he going to send it unless to St. John or to Halifax?

Mr. MILLAR: I stated a few minutes ago that when St. Lawrence navigation is closed the grain will go to St. John, and should go there.

Mr. FINN: Does my hon. friend know the difference between the all rail rates from Winnipeg to Halifax and from Winnipeg to St. John? If he does, let him tell the committee. He should have all the facts and figures bearing on the case.

Mr. MILLAR: I know the difference in rates between Montreal and St. John and between Montreal and Halifax.

Mr. FINN: But what is the rate from Winnipeg? Let us get out West.

Mr. MILLAR: I do not see what that has to do with it.

Mr. FINN: I am asking the question.

Mr. MILLAR: The large part of the grain will be at the port of Montreal.

Mr. FINN: I am asking the hon. gentleman if he knows the difference in mileage between the haul from Winnipeg to St. John and the haul from Winnipeg to Halifax.

Mr. MILLAR: I do not think it is necessary to know that. According to these figures it is over a hundred miles further to Halifax than it is to St. John so that the grain will naturally go to St. John.

Mr. FINN: Does my hon. friend know the difference between the haul from Winnipeg to Portland and the haul from Winnipeg to St. John, where he says the grain should go?

Mr. MILLAR: That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. EVANS: The minister told us last night that the charge against the handling of the grain from western Canada was about 6½ per cent on the facilities erected for handling that grain. When the Minister of Railways says that grain is needed at Halifax for ballast, to what department would he charge the construction of this elevator?

Mr. GRAHAM: It would be charged to the Department of Trade and Commerce and come out of current account. We cannot discuss this question from one angle only, otherwise we do not get at the real essence of it. During the past year, as a result of the new arrangements or the development of old ones, the Canadian National has had connection with increased steamship landings at Halifax. If it be necessary for these steamers to have wheat ballast, is it not better to work that in through Halifax, retaining the trade with the steamships and encouraging the steamships to call at that port? It does not cost the grain producer any more, and in the final analysis it will not cost the railways much more. It is worth while to make these experiments. If arrangements are not made by which outgoing ships can get cargo as ballast, what will be the result? If the Canadian product is all carried to Portland, which is the shorter route, then the traffic will not in every instance be over the National Railways, because once you get to Portland there is competition, whereas at Halifax the Canadian National has the advantage. We cannot fairly discuss the matter without taking into consideration these various aspects of it—the traffic east and west, the circumstances with respect to return haul, the local traffic, the development of the harbour, of the port, and so on—not particularly, perhaps, the development of the port, but the consideration that when ships are induced to call there the resulting traffic will bring good returns to the Canadian National Railways. That traffic, if developed properly, would overcome anything that might be lost in the hauling of the wheat to Halifax.

Mr. BAXTER: I confess I rather enjoy the ingenious but very patent attempt to inject into the discussion of this vote that which is calculated to cause friction between St. John and Halifax in the hope that they will begin to fight with each other so that there will be an excuse for not making an expenditure. I want to serve formal and friendly notice on the rest of Canada that the day for that sort of jockeying has long since passed. There was a time when a delegation could not come up from Halifax to see the government of the day about what they regarded as necessary expenditures without a rival delegation proceeding to Ottawa on the next train to badger the government for something for St. John. Well, we are not going to be played that way any longer. Our people are coming to realize the importance of the problem as a whole and we are prepared to support whatever will make for the benefit of Nova Scotia or of New Brunswick, irrespective of the constituency from which we come and of our political affiliations. We had a lively example in the House tonight: We almost had the olive branch held out. One hon. member—and his attitude is perfectly typical—is willing to give Halifax or to give St. John something that has not been asked for, that nobody has yet thought of; but if a concrete proposal is made to do anything for one or for the other he finds that it is something not directly subservient to the interests of the West, therefore he will not support it. We do not admire that sort of tactics; it does not appeal to any spirit of broad Canadianism. If the part of this country that really carries the business is prepared to take a course which will not add to the railway burden of the country but will change the aspect of it so that the burden will be borne for Canada and not for a foreign country, I do not think it is much of the business of hon. gentlemen sitting to my left. We in the Maritime provinces are entitled still to be regarded as a part of confederation, and we propose not to go out of confederation. Only those who indulge in idle talk in that part of Canada ever make any suggestions of that kind. Without our co-operation there would have been no confederation and the gentlemen who are so liberal in their criticism of the Maritime provinces to-night would not be here as representing any province of Canada, because there would be no Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BAXTER: Hon. members may say "hear, hear" as decisively as they like, but Canada is going to hear it and Canada is going to heed it. I do not care whether it comes from the Pacific coast or from the centre of the West, this spirit of disunion, this spirit of belittlement of parts of Canada that are of reasonable importance, is not going to meet with the approval of the Canadian people as a whole. The sooner the two very much scorned old parties that we used to hear so much about in this House, who have been held up to execration as models of all that was unfair and unrighteous in politics—the sooner the two old parties forget something of the strenuousness of the fight between them and join hands to save the real interests of Canada from the modern depredators, the better it will be for our common country. It is all very well to criticise a vote to build something in the Maritime provinces, but we would not have any howl if the proposal were to throw out a few handfuls of millions to build an imaginary road to the North Pole—or perhaps divert it to Hudson bay. That would be perfectly logical; that would be perfectly legitimate. If I were to express the feeling of the Maritime provinces upon that I would say it is a wild project that no party in this House should be committed to. But I am not making that assertion. I am waiting until the government is pushed a few inches further by my hon. friends to my left on that subject of the Hudson Bay railway, and then I will declare what I conceive to be the position of some portions of the Maritime provinces.

Just at the present we are dealing with an attempted denial of our right to share in the general grain traffic of Canada. Now I concur in what has been said by the Minister of Railways, that even if you carry grain at a loss you are getting return cargoes. Give us a chance in the Maritime provinces to handle as we ought to handle, the whole of the commerce of Canada that comes to us in the winter time by virtue of the Imperial preference, and we will show you return cargoes and be able to carry that grain without any loss. Just do by order in council what you can do under a statute that was passed in the time of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, limit importations under the British preference to Canadian ports and Canadian bottoms, and we will take care of the grain in the Maritime provinces. But we will have to have the facilities to handle that grain and to handle the traffic generally, and we are not begging when we ask for them. We are only asking that the purpose of confederation shall be carried out, and that some gentlemen who have not been very long in Canada shall acquire a sufficiently Canadian attitude to join with us in doing this.

As I say it is a matter of absolute indifference to me whether this vote is for Halifax or St. John. Both ports require the equipment, and the fact that this is proposed for Halifax before the same adjunct is proposed for St. John makes no difference to me. I am in favour of it because it tends to enlarge the spout of the hopper, and enables us to handle the traffic where it ought to be handled during six months of the year. At the same time, I think I have a right to ask the minister whether he is playing square with the people of Halifax in this vote. I want to know whether this is an honest vote for an honest elevator that will be built according to modern-day plans and specifications. I had occasion to be in Halifax about last December, and it was an interesting occasion. The elevator was going to be built then, and tenders were invited for that elevator. I have no objection to an elevator being built at Halifax, mind you. I am strongly in favour of it, and strongly in favour of the policy that will bring traffic to it; but if I were a member of a government that was going to build an elevator in Halifax, even if I were going to build it on the eve of the Dominion by-election, I do not think I would call for tenders or plans that were afterwards discovered to have been made for some other place, and to have been many years old. I think I would be a little more sincere than that. I want to know from the minister whether these plans have been revised and are now up to date, and what the probable cost of the elevator is going to be. I know that $200,000 is only a beginning; I would like to know the total estimated cost, the capacity of the elevator, and above all, where he proposes to put it, because I think that there were no less than three good party friends who had three equally available sites in the month of December last, and it was suggested it was rather difficult to make a decision immediately prior to an election. I hope the minister has found out, since the stress of the by-election is over, just where he is going to put the elevator.

I think I have also a right to ask the Minister of Railways, who is always very gracious in giving any information he can, whether there is going to be a railway policy for Canada that will take that wheat from the West and carry it to the port of Halifax. There will be no jealousy on the part of St. John. We are getting some of our share of the grain through the agency of the other great national railway at the present time, and we are looking to the Canadian National Railway to develop the port of St. John so that it can handle more business.. Our vision is large, but it is justifiable. Our vision is large enough to believe that you can equip both ports with vastly greater facilities than they now possess, and still they will not be handling the whole Canadian business, if that business is honestly and zealously turned into those channels in the winter time. I would ask the Minister of Railways whether plans are in being now by which rates will be afforded and facilities given to actually carry the grain to this elevator when it is built. If the minister can give me that assurance it will make me support all the more hearty, and if the Minister of Trade and Commerce can tell me that the plans for the elevator are modern, that he has settled on the site, and that they are going to build this elevator and make use of it, then it is something which I am perfectly ready to support in this House. But do not ask me, please, to vote merely to dangle something before the eyes of the people of Halifax. Let the glittering vision really come down upon the earth this time and take a concrete shape that was denied to it in the month of December last.

Mr. LOW: As far as the Halifax elevator is concerned, it will be looked into during the recess—

Mr. BAXTER: Has it not been looked into yet?

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend will permit me to answer his question, I intend to look into this elevator, along with all the other elevators, during the recess. So far as the site is concerned, if I adopt the same plan I adopted at Edmonton and ask the city council and the board of trade, together with the railway, for I consulted the railway, to accompany me and show me the site they think would be in the best interests of the city—

Mr. BAXTER: I think the railway is the chief thing to consult.

Mr. LOW: —if I follow that course, will my hon. friend have any objection to the site that is chosen?

Mr. BAXTER: Not a bit. I will applaud it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If they differ which site will the minister take, the board of trade's or the railway's?

Mr. GRAHAM: The best site.

Mr. LOW: If the board of trade and the railway board agree on the site, two out of three, the ordinary man ought to be convinced that the better site had been chosen.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister take the city council and the board of trade over the railway?

Mr. LOW: No, the railway is interested in the elevator.

Mr. CALDWELL: You will build it on the railway?

Mr. LOW: We will try and build it on the Canadian National railway. Our first interest is in connection with the railway.

Mr. BAXTER: How about the plans and specifications and that sort of thing?

Mr. LOW: I have already returned the plans to the engineers and asked them to remodel them. They inform me that certain things can be eliminated without affecting the efficiency of the elevator, and that a 500,000 bushel capacity elevator can be erected for between $500,000 and $600,000, and in such a way that an additional capacity of 100,000, 200,000, 250,000 or 500,000 can be provided at any time.

STRIKE OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Acting Postmaster General): Mr. Chairman, as this is a very critical time for me, I should like to take this opportunity of making a correction of a statement I made just before six o'clock relative to the strike. I told the House that we had taken on in the neighbourhood of 350 men in Toronto. That figure was incorrect. We had applications from almost 400, but we have taken on and have in employment at the moment only 180. I do not want any misleading statement to go out; I want every statement I make to be absolutely correct, and I have therefore taken this opportunity that the Chairman has afforded of correcting my statement.

SUPPLY

Mr. MILLAR: I do not care to allow the remarks of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) to pass without reply. I am very glad he has got this off his chest, for it is a very bad thing for anybody to have on his chest. The trouble with my hon. friend is that it seems to accumulate there very frequently. Every other day my hon. friend has an accumulation which he must throw off in this way. And why is he doing it now? Because I discussed the rates at which our grain should reach the seaport, a matter in which we are vitally interested, without the least possible reason for giving rise to the fear that I had ulterior motives, or wished to create friction between the two ports. My hon. friend, in his characteristic manner, reads into my speech something which is not there. He suggests that I wish to make trouble. I am sure that with my hon. friend living in one of the districts in question there is no need for any one else to make trouble. If there is any necessity for stirring up bad feeling all that is necessary is to let the hon. member alone—he will produce that result quickly enough. I had absolutely no thought of creating any bad feeling between the two ports, but in the West we are interested in the cost of carrying our grain and we do not want to see an elevator built unnecessarily if the expense is to be charged up to the revenue derived from our grain. That is an important point and I should like the minister to consider it.

Mr. FINN: If my hon. friend wants to be consistent he ought to stop the operations of the Canadian National Railways in the West because they are carrying millions of a deficit to-day.

Mr. MILLAR: Is my hon. friend referring to interior elevators?

Mr. FINN: I am talking about the Canadian National Railways— the Canadian Northern, the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. MILLAR: We have every reason to believe those railways are paying.

Mr. FINN: Are they? Are they paying the interest on the capital cost?

Mr. MILLAR: Can the hon. gentleman give facts and figures to prove they are not?

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. FINN: Yes. I say that to-day the Canadian National Railway system, and largely in the Canadian West, is carrying a deficit of between fifty and sixty millions a year.

Mr. MILLAR: And what share of the loss is incurred in carrying products to and from the Maritime provinces?

Mr. FINN: I am positive it is under four millions. Deduct that from the fifty millions and forty-six millions remain. You can take your share of that. I will agree to the elevator project being stopped if my hon. friend will agree to the stopping of the operation of these railways in the West where they are not carrying on at a profit.

An hon. MEMBER: My hon. friend would not get any grain down in his elevator then.

Mr. KELLNER: Hon. gentlemen in this portion of the chamber who are opposing the project hardly realize the seriousness of the situation. Actually the hon. member (Mr. Baxter) says that if the opposition is persisted in there will be a danger of breaking up confederation. A little later he suggested that the two old time parties should get together and decide on a reasonable plan that would furnish a profit to one of these two ports in the east. However, I did not rise for the purpose of taking exception to what my hon. friend said. Western Canada is just as anxious for the upbuilding of eastern Canada as it is for the development of any other section of the country. I believe the farmers there are ready to send their grain to the East at any moment if a satisfactory rate can be granted. The desirability of this was pointed out last night in a very brilliant speech by the Minister of Railways. Let me mention a few things in which the West feels that it is not getting a fair deal, not as a result of the action of any particular section of the country but owing to the operations of certain interests in Canada. I would refer first to what took place in parliament two years ago when we discussed the Crowsnest pass agreement and were successful in having the price of grain brought within the terms of that agreement. The western farmers thought that meant a considerable advantage and anticipated saving quite an amount of money on their crop that year, but the result was not what they expected. The vessel owners on the lakes immediately raised their rates and swallowed up the benefit the western farmers expected to have derived by virtue of the Crowsnest pass agreement. I believe I am safe in saying that the western farmer in consequence received practically nothing from the reduction under the Crowsnest pass agreement. Then the embargo on Canadian cattle going to England was removed but what happened in that case? The ocean freight rates were immediately raised to a figure that took care of any reduction the West had hoped to derive from the lifting of the embargo. This session the government reduced the tariff rates on agricultural implements, and it was only reasonable to suppose that as a result the western farmer would be able to buy his implements a little cheaper. However, at this very time the Railway Commissioners are considering applications from railway companies asking for a reclassification of freight rates, which simply means that these companies are trying to get the benefit which should accrue to the western farmer from the tariff reduction. If such things are going to continue it would almost seem that no matter what load the western farmer gets from under, some other interest slips in and reaps the benefit. Now, in matters of this kind regard should not be paid to one section of the country. There should be co-operation between all parts of Canada so that from whatever action is taken the West will benefit as well as the East. And so we say to hon. members that if they will co-operate in helping us to overcome our problems, we will be ready to respond to any reasonable demands they may make upon us.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I must say that when I saw this vote in the estimates for the Halifax elevator I was considerably disappointed. The project has been a live issue for a long time. It has been greatly talked about, and many promises have been made in regard to it. All these seemed to have come to a focus in December last when it was expected the elevator positively would be constructed at once. This view seemed to be justified seeing that tenders were called for and offers received, and apparently only the return of the Prime Minister from England was necessary to close the bargain and proceed immediately with the construction of the elevator. At that time $200,000 had been voted, the same sum that now appears in the estimates. But nearly seven months have elapsed and we are told by the minister that the plans have not yet been decided upon. Practically nothing has been done we are given to understand, and the matter is still under the consideration of the government. Under the circumstances but one conclusion can be arrived at in my opinion and that is that the government are playing with the subject. There is no intention on their part to erect an elevator at Halifax until another election looms up. Then we shall have one built in the air, so to speak, and it will melt in the sunshine. That is no way to conduct public business: It is not the way to treat any portion of the Dominion. Notwithstanding the treatment accorded to Halifax we see the sum of $1,000,000 in the estimates this year for an elevator at Edmonton—following a vote of $200,000 last year—and how much more will be demanded next year none of us can tell. As so much storage is required for the grain out there in the West, which grain has to be moved east or west after it is placed in that elevator, why should the Canadian National Railways not provide in the eastern section of the country facilities for the handling of that grain? In the winter time water transportation which my hon. friend (Mr. Millar) spoke about, is out of the question. The rail rates to the Atlantic coast from Halifax on the north to, I think I can say, Baltimore on the south, have been equalized. The rate on inland carriage from points of production to the ocean is the same to all those ports. If that be the case, if the railways have established that principle, why should my hon. friend be so concerned about carrying the grain to Halifax, which is, I admit, somewhat farther east than ports farther south?

9 p.m.

There is another point which, perhaps, he has not thought of. If the land carriage to Halifax is longer than to either St. John or Portland, that certainly shortens the ocean carriage, and would it not be a reasonable proposition that the steamer which carries the grain the shorter distance from Halifax to the Old Country should reduce her rate for ocean carriage somewhat below the rate from St. John, Portland, New York, or any of the other Atlantic ports? The saving of time to a steamer would be greater, and we all know that time in connection with shipping is valuable. That would be a reasonable proposition and, if adopted, would give the inland carriage that much greater advantage.

We have heard a great deal about Canadian business going through Canadian ports. That is a policy which I think this country should adopt and should begin at once putting into effect. It is not, perhaps, for me to suggest how that is to be done. It is for the government to work out a policy which would be for the benefit of this country as a whole. Vancouver, it is true, has lately attracted a good deal of attention in connection with the shipment of grain. From what we hear and read, that business will increase there, and we are very glad to know that it will, because until shipments of grain began through Vancouver, it all came east, the bulk of it going over American railways and through American ports.

My hon. friend to my left (Mr. Millar) has centred his argument on the fact that the distance is nearly 200 miles further from Montreal to Halifax than from Montreal to St. John; but I would remind him that the grain that would be shipped to Canadian Atlantic ports originates not in Montreal, but in the West, and therefore the difference in distance would not be so adverse as the hon. gentleman makes out. Complete trains of grain can be operated and handled with very little additional cost. Money would be earned by the handling and transportation of that freight and the overhead of the railways would be no greater. Therefore, the conclusion, it seems to me, is reasonable that without any extra overhead the earnings of the railways would be increased and the profit of handling and hauling this grain would be as much as the railway companies could, within reason, expect.

I am pleased with the remarks of the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter), who took the broad-minded view that he would be glad to see elevators built at Halifax and a development there. I feel with him that the competition and rivalry of days gone by no longer exist and that we can work together for the common good without any feelings of jealousy and distrust.

It is gratifying also to find that the government, apparently—and I am judging from what the Minister of Railways and Canals told us—is waking up to the fact that there are Maritime provinces and that they are worthy of some consideration. We have waited a long time for such an atmosphere. The various governments of the past appear to have handled this question of the rights and interests of the Maritime provinces with the same indifference. But it would now appear as if we were receiving some attention and as if good would come to us in the future because of this awakening.

As the Minister of Railways and Canals said —and my hon. friend to my left should bear this in mind—the question is not one of grain alone or whether the grain pays or not. I doubt if any business in the world, I might say, is carried on, regarding which every article that is dealt with shows a profit. If it is necessary, in order to bring grain to Maritime ports, to carry that grain at cost, it is the duty of the great railway systems to do so and to take their profit out of the rest of the traffic which they are handling, the two working together with the result that profit comes.

The question of the elevator, I am sorry to say, appears to have been delayed. I did not catch what the minister said regarding the building, whether the plans are under way, whether they are completed or whether departmental officials are coming down to investigate sites. I would ask that he repeat the statement.

Mr. LOW: The plans are being investigated further. I did not raise the question as to where the elevator should be erected; it was introduced by my hon. friend (Mr. Baxter). I simply answered the question by saying that I would adopt the same plan as I did in connection with the elevator at Edmonton. I consulted the city council, the board of trade and the Canadian National Railways, and I do not think that if I were to follow the same course in connection with the elevator at Halifax any hon. member could find fault.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): That is quite all right; I do not raise a moment's objection to that. But when are we likely to have the site selected and the work gone on with?

Mr. LOW: I have already stated that the erection of the Halifax elevator will be taken under consideration when the whole question of the marketing of grain is investigated by myself this year, and I hope that something definite will be done. Personally I am inclined to agree with the letter which I have read from Sir Henry Thornton; I agree that if Halifax is to remain a port ballast must be provided. If it is found advisable to build an elevator there after further examination we shall build one.

Mr. LUCAS: What is the capacity of the present elevator?

Mr. LOW: I do not think it is in use at all. I have no idea what its capacity is; perhaps my hon. friends from Halifax could tell us.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much grain has gone through the present elevator in each of the last three years?

Mr. LOW: I have not the figures for the last three years, but I have for 1923—300 bushels.

Mr. FINN: The grain that passed through the port of Halifax in the last three years amounted to—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Through the elevator.

Mr. FINN: Through the elevator, yes; I will give the figures.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was it for 1923?

Mr. FINN: From 1921 to 1924 it amounted to 2,861,612 bushels.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much went through in 1923?

Mr. FINN: I do not know whether my right hon. friend wants me to make in reply the same sort of statement he made at the last session of parliament. He said then that very little had gone through and that as far as he knew, from the information he had, the elevator had been burned down. If it is burned down of course nothing could go through it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who said that?

Mr. FINN: No less a person than my right hon. friend himself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member apparently is anxious to have a quarrel with me. He was in the House very little last session.

Mr. FINN: I was in the House the night the right hon. gentleman made that statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. member is dreaming.

Mr. FINN: Perhaps my right hon. friend will allow me to read what he said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: By all means.

Mr. FINN: I quote the following from Hansard:

> Mr. Meighen: The information I have is that there was an elevator there that had a little grain in it some years, and for some years none. I fancy it was burned down. Anyway it is not there now. I had a return on this the other day—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read on.

Mr. FINN: (Reading):

> —I believe it was partly built by the railway and partly by the city. At any rate there were joint contributions. Can the hon. member tell us just what special event the government has in mind that caused it to deem it the part of wisdom to build a large elevator there?

Perhaps my right hon friend was dreaming when he said that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There has been a misunderstanding of what I referred to. I knew the present elevator was not burned down because I had seen it. I did know, however, that there was little grain going through it.

Mr. FINN: Did the right hon. gentleman make those remarks to mislead the public or hon. members?

Mr. MEIGHEN: "The right hon. gentleman" did not mislead nor intend to mislead the public in any way. Has there not been a fire in an elevator there?

Mr. FINN: No, except to keep it warm.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, elevators do not need to be kept warm usually.

Mr. FINN: The employees need to be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the employees do not live in the elevator. I notice the hon. member fights shy of telling us what went through the elevator in 1923.

Mr. FINN: I am not fighting shy; I do not think that any grain went through in 1923.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Give us the figures.

Mr. FINN: I gave them as I received them from the Department of Trade and Commerce; during the period from 1921 to 1924 the amount was over 2,200,000 bushels.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the year 1923 the minister gave us 300 bushels.

Mr. FINN: That may be; if the minister says so it must be right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had no intention of taking issue with the hon. gentleman; I simply wanted to find out how much grain had gone through the elevator while the government had it. Even if I did not believe in having grain go through Halifax I would not be as much concerned over this vote as hon. gentlemen to my left. But my own apprehension is that there is about $200,000 more in it than will be spent—unless there should happen to be another by-election, in which event there might be a little stir. This vote has really an interesting history, and I wonder what comforting assurance the senior member for Halifax obtains when the minister advises him now on June 19, 1924, that the matter is going to be "taken into consideration."

Mr. FINN: If my right hon. friend wants to know, I may tell him, to be candid, that I am disappointed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should think so; I was too. I was in better hopes than that myself.

Mr. FINN: I was in hopes too.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Last fall one would have thought that there was only the shingling still under consideration; the whole structure was right in the mind's eye of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald, Pictou). In fact, that hon. gentleman described the fine architecture, the modern efficiency of it all, and he regretted that even one, two, three days might elapse before the contract was let.

Mr. BAXTER: Are you sure he made that speech?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps we should not attribute this to him inasmuch as he has not yet had sufficiently frequent opportunity to deny having made the speech. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was there too, but he had to get back to Ottawa. Only for that the contract would have been let at once; but unfortunately the train had to take him back. There was to be a contract let, and the consideration of the whole thing was through; the decision had been arrived at. And how the Minister of National Defence lamented the fact that those few tedious hours had to elapse before it was under way. Here, seven months after, we find $200,000 in the estimates, and the matter is to come under general review when the minister gets down to consider elevators some time next summer. After the by-election had been fought and lost the government discovered that the plans were no good. They discovered, first, that their own by-election plans were no good, and the two plans fell down together. It turned out that the plans had been made some years before. There was though no inkling of their unsuitability when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was there. The government did not discover it when the Minister of Finance was there. And all through the herculean efforts of the Minister of Defence (Mr. Macdonald), they never dreamt such a thing as that these were old plans. But the fact dawned on them suddenly just as the last return came in from Halifax; they found that those plans would not really do for an elevator suitable to the occasion, and there would have to be new plans drawn. I would be interested, as I know the House would be, and I think the hon. member from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) would be much relieved, if we could be told just how far advanced those plans are. Would we not like to have a picture of them here this afternoon—the result of the sweat and toil of the draughtsman since December 6, 1923! The minister has worked out how he is going to select the site: He is going to consult the Board of Trade and the city council and the railways —he forgot the Liberal Association,—but anyway he is going to consult all those authorities, and he is sure that if he does no fault will be found. It will not bring much comfort to the member for Halifax to be told that there is a site with no elevator on it, nor will the port be much helped.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. FINN: Does my right hon. friend refer to me?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did have him in mind.

Mr. FINN: I thought so, that is why I asked.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was right in my reference. The same might be said as well of the member for Halifax in my rear; I do not think he takes very great consolation out of the fact that the minister has so far advanced that he now knows what plan he is going to adopt and will next decide where the site is to be after the other consideration is well advanced. How slow these things proceed! May I ask, has the minister in mind the possibility of a by-election this year; is that the foundation of this vote?

Mr. LOW: During the last twenty or twenty-five years I have engaged in approximately fifteen or twenty by-elections, and I have consistently refused to enter into such discussions on these events as so often occur in this House. I have always been able to go through the heat and feeling of by-elections and yet preserve a most friendly relationship with all my opponents. After the fight was over I was always able to greet my contestants with a sincere handshake. Now my right hon. friend refers to by-election promises. I would be the last one to introduce the subject, but let me remind him, when he asks this committee if this vote is founded on a by-election, of a very interesting event which took place in Kingston in 1919. A party of Conservatives met in the city of Kingston to discuss the pending by-election, and it will be remembered that the local candidate subsequently withdrew in favour of the ex-Minister of Finance, who was duly elected. The editor of the Kingston Standard, a Conservative journal, and one of the gentlemen who attended that meeting, and who was in the confidence of the Conservative party, printed the following in the next issue of his paper:

> Mr. J. M. Hughes has withdrawn from the race as a candidate for parliamentary honours in this city and as a consequence it is generally believed that Sir Henry Drayton, Minister of Finance, will be elected by acclamation.
>
> Mr. Hughes' withdrawal followed a conference in the Daily Standard office last evening attended by W. R. Givens, A. B. Cunningham, H. C. Nickle and Mr. Hughes himself. The situation was frankly and fully discussed, and at the conclusion of the conference Mr. Hughes announced his withdrawal from the contest. The best good will was displayed at the meeting and the whole discussion was along entirely friendly lines.
>
> This morning Mr. Hughes drafted a letter explaining precisely the reasons that led to his withdrawal. The letter is as follows:

To the Editor of the Standard,

Sir,—I wish to announce that I have retired from the contest for the seat in the House of Commons. My reason for doing so is that it is reported that the Hon. J. D. Reid made the statement to a number of representative citizens that if Sir Henry Drayton was given the seat Kingston would be well looked after and that the harbour improvements would be assumed. Being a loyal and true Kingstonian and as I have always worked for the interest of the city I felt that I could not take the responsibility of going on with the contest and in any way interfering with the material progress of the city. I sincerely hope that Sir Henry Drayton will see to it that work will be started in a very short time and Kingston will become the eastern terminal of the Great Lakes.

I thank the many citizens who assured me of their support and ask them to put their shoulders to the wheel and work for a bigger, better and more prosperous Kingston.

J. M. HUGHES.

I wonder if my right hon. friend has hanging in his office a picture of the great harbour works that were to be built following his colleague's election in 1919; I wonder if it took two years to prepare the plans; I wonder if he has even gone as far as I have in an endeavour to have plans prepared; I wonder if he had the approximate cost placed in the Estimates—or as soon as the by-election was over were the promises of the party forgotten? It was well known in Kingston that that was the bid of the Conservative government for the seat; as I said before, it is with reluctance that I refer to these things,—

Mr. MEIGHEN: That will not hurt.

Mr. LOW: —but when we hear so much about the purchase of the Hotel Scribe I wonder if my right hon. friend ever thinks of the purchase of the Daly building in Ottawa on the verge of a general election in 1921? As I said before I am sorry to refer to these things—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Don't worry.

Mr. LOW: —but these are facts, and I have referred to them because my right hon. friend has brought up the subject of election promises. I can assure him that it is my intention to look into the merits of Halifax as a point for an elevator—and also certain other places,—and I will not disappoint either the junior or the senior member from that city.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want first to assure the minister that the pangs of conscience the delicate sensitiveness which he spoke so frequently of were quite unnecessary. He might have freely and heartily and enthusiastically made those references and gone into all of them with the utmost detail and without doing the slightest injury to us. What did the minister think he had? Evidently he had somebody search the records for years back to see if he could bring home to the Conservative party some pre-election promises. And behold! after the mountain laboured can hon. members now discover the mouse? There was a meeting in the Kingston Standard office when Sir Henry Drayton was a prospective candidate in the local by-election. Next day a gentleman by the name of Mr. Hughes wrote a letter to the Kingston Standard stating that he was withdrawing because "it was reported" that the Hon. J. D. Reid had said that if Sir Henry Drayton was elected the harbour improvements would be looked after.

Mr. LOW: Does my right hon. friend repudiate the statement of the men from Kingston?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What men? There is only the statement of one man, and the one man says, "It is reported," and he does not say who reported it.

Mr. LOW: A man who was likely to be a candidate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He does not say even who reported it—wonderful evidence! The minister knows that the Hon. J. D. Reid, only a few days afterwards, the first time it was brought to his attention, distinctly denied in this House that he had ever made such a statement to anybody. Against this fictitious case the minister is faced with the promise of his own colleague, the Minister of Defence, brought right home to him in this House over a year ago, never to this moment denied—and he dare not deny it; quoted in the newspapers as well as quoted here; the whole thing pledged indeed explicitly by advertisement in the Liberal press. Well, against that he puts the statement of a gentleman in Kingston that "it is reported",—by whom nobody ever heard—and he conceives that he has made a case. Then he mentions that delectable memory, the Scribe hotel. What was in the minister's mind in vamping that spectacle before the committee? If he wants to refer to the Scribe hotel let him at least do that honour to the president of the Canadian National Railways which he so begged for in his letter—let him call it the "Palais Canadien". Let the name Scribe hotel pass into bitter oblivion; let this whole nightmare be dignified from now on with its proper title. Surely the minister should extend to it that consideration if no more. What in the world his object was in stringing the bedraggled feathers of the Scribe hotel into this discussion I do not know. As for the other reference his purpose was equally obscure, or equally blind, I do not know which. What he had in his mind we may find later in the evening or we may not. But anything the late government did the minister is at liberty to investigate to the bottom any time he wishes, but when he has investigations on his mind perhaps the "Palais Canadien" would be the first subject for attention; these things seem to be mixed promiscuously in his mind. The rest of us are on the Halifax elevator just now. I am struggling to find out how far the plans have advanced, and the minister is struggling hard to avoid answering.

Mr. LOW: I will answer now. The plans are in the hands of the engineers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are completed, then?

Mr. LOW: No, to be remodelled.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, old plans. Well, that is not very much progress. According to the statement last session they were completed many years ago, so the plans have not advanced much.

Mr. LOW: It is more progress than my right hon. friend made in two years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, we did not make the pledges. After seven months the old plans have now got as far as the engineers. Hon. gentlemen who feel that this is a waste of money have not any great reasons for apprehension. If it takes another seven months for the engineers to locate the plans in their pigeonhole there will be as much progress as the minister likely expects.

Mr. FINN: Before this item carries I wish to say a word or two, and perhaps in some respects I am a little disconcerted by some statements made to-night by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. As I said to the right hon. the leader of the opposition, I am somewhat disappointed with those statements. They do not at all meet with my approval, and they are not what I understood from the government of which I am a supporter, from the Prime Minister, from the representative of Nova Scotia in the cabinet, the Minister of National Defence, and from all my conversations with and the assurances given me by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. For my part I put the interest of the Maritime provinces ahead of party, and so long as I occupy a position of public trust in this House it will be my sacred duty to stand for what I conceive to be right and to criticise the government or any minister or any department when I believe it my duty so to do.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Last session when this matter was under consideration, the item in question being an amount of $200,000 in the main estimates, we did not receive very much comfort from some hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly from the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), who said it was useless to try to put grain through the port of Halifax. Indeed, he went further than that and said that the grain would be carried by the cheapest route. In that he was partly correct, because there was then a differential of one cent as against Halifax which does not now prevail. To-day Halifax is on a parity with St. John, Portland, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore. So that any objection based on the cost of carrying grain to Halifax is done away with by the removal of this differential, a result which was brought about through representations made by this government to Sir Henry Thornton and the Board of Management of the Canadian National Railways.

The statement was also made that no grain, or practically none, was put through the elevator at Halifax. The ex-Minister of Finance said that no grain had been put through that elevator except during the war. I have before me the figures as furnished by the Department of Trade and Commerce. I find that in 1915 there were 588,657 bushels handled at that elevator; from 1916 to 1920, 5,168,818 bushels; from 1921 to 1924, 2,861,612 —in all, from 1915 to 1924, 8,612,087 bushels, or in round figures, 9,000,000 bushels, an average of a million bushels a year.

Mr. KELLNER: Has the hon. member the figures before him of the number of bushels for the crop year of 1921-22?

Mr. FINN: No, I have not the figures for that period. I have the totals from 1915 to 1920, which was practically the war period, because the war conditions continued a year or two after the conclusion of the war. Then I have the period from 1921-1924, and these I think, offer a fair basis for comparison between what is known as the war period and the period of reconstruction which started in about 1921.

I was rather surprised at the statements of some hon. members here to-night, particularly the remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) and of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans). They do not seem to coincide with the assurances given as late as last evening by hon. gentlemen on the other side that it was their desire that grain and other western products should be carried through Canadian ports. I apologized to an hon. gentleman last night because he misunderstood my meaning in reference to the viewpoint of an hon. member in the Progressive group, but I find now that there are some gentlemen in that group who, notwithstanding the fact that presumably we all desire to be one hundred per cent Canadian, still feel it necessary to force Canadian traffic through Portland simply because it is a shorter haul, and even though the rates for the respective routes are the same. They come back with the answer that you should not take it to Canadian ports because it is going to cost a little more to take it there.

I remember at the last session of this House I had the honour of hearing a statement by the right hon. leader of the opposition, and I commend him for his broadness of view in reference to a national question in the position of responsibility he occupied. It was when the question of deficits in connection with the Intercolonial railway was being discussed. He made the statement, which I think was fair, honourable, and proper from a national standpoint, that the government should address itself to the problem of the Maritime provinces and absorb if necessary as part of the national debt any reasonable deficit that might occur in the operation of the Intercolonial in order that we in the Maritime provinces might grow and develop. That is the spirit in which to approach this great question. Where would the great provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba be to-day in winter time if they had not a maritime frontage. Could Canada have become a nation, could Canada have boasted of open ports on the Atlantic the year round without that maritime frontage? No, she could not. If Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had remained out of confederation you would have been isolated in the West, and in Ontario and Quebec in so far as great national ports on the Atlantic are concerned. Were not these ports worth something to the great and growing prairie provinces? Do hon. gentlemen sit in this House simply for the purpose of selfish ambition, to develop alone these great prairie provinces? And then, as a result of confederation, as a result of the efforts of the pioneers who hewed the way to our national greatness, the leaders of the Conservative and Liberal parties, men who were born and brought up in this country, who did not come to a land of adoption, for this land was theirs by heritage, and in that heritage we in the little province of Nova Scotia have the right to participate.

Mr. KELLNER: I think the hon. member is liable to get on the wrong track again. There are lots of native-born Canadians in the West; it is not their land of adoption.

Mr. FINN: No person's conscience need be hurt who was not born in this country, or the conscience of any body who was born in Canada. The great western provinces were carved out in this confederation and we invited to this country from the British Isles and from all parts of Europe the very best of citizenship and offered them the best this land could afford, independence and the right which they enjoy to-day of sitting in this House as the worthy representatives of these new and ever growing provinces. But when you look back and think that the little province of Nova Scotia gave to this great Canada of ours three prime ministers in the persons of Sir Charles Tupper, Sir John Thompson, and the Right Hon. Sir Robert Laird Borden, to say nothing of the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, who for eighteen years has guided the financial destinies of this country, surely after we have participated in that way in the building up of this great nation we should not be asked to continue to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. I say in all sincerity that when I hear some hon. gentlemen of the Progressive group giving utterance to-night to statements that are selfish to a degree, it makes me sick at heart indeed to feel that any such sentiments can burn within the heart of any of our Canadian people from these western provinces.

With reference to the carriage of grain and other products from our Canadian west, as the Minister of Railways has stated to-night, shipping at the port of Halifax this last season has increased over one hundred per cent. Over one million more tonnage came into the port of Halifax during the past five months, that is, before the St. Lawrence opened, than came in during the previous year, 1923. The ships that come to the port of Halifax land their passengers and freight there. and then go on to New York and Portland. Do not hon. gentlemen know that it is a day's sail from Halifax to Portland, and a day's sail back from Portland to Halifax? These are big ships, expensively operated, and under great demurrage charges, and by using the port of Halifax as their terminus those two days could be saved, which would mean two more trips a year for each of these large ships. I am assured by steamship representatives that if an elevator was built at the port of Halifax where the ships could get the basic cargo of grain, they would not go to Portland, but would make Halifax their terminus and load and unload their freight and passengers there, inward and outward; but if we have not the facilities at the port to enable them to do that, it is impossible for Halifax to grow and develop and become the great port that we of the Maritime provinces expect it to be.

My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance made a statement last session when this vote of $200,000 was under discussion, that the difference in mileage between Halifax and St. John was 267 miles. I have the figures before me to-night, obtained from the Railway department. and I find that the difference in mileage is only 113 miles. I also find that the difference in mileage between St. John and Winnipeg and Portland and Winnipeg is 184 miles, yet the Canadian Pacific carry grain from Winnipeg to their own ships at St. John, 184 miles further than to Portland. The difference between St. John and Halifax is only 113 miles, so that with the freight rate the same to the port of Halifax, and facilities for handling the grain, these ships could obtain grain at that port and carry it across the ocean. There is no sound reason why we should not obtain our share of that traffic, and why the city of St. John should not participate in this Maritime development, thus helping to keep our people within our province and making us feel that we have a future. These are some of my reasons for supporting this vote of $200,000 to-night. My hon. friend (Mr. Black) made some statements in reference to the by-election in the city of Halifax. I desire to say to my hon. friend that when the vote of $200,000—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rise to a point of order. Has the by-election down in Halifax anything to do with the item under consideration?

Mr. MEIGHEN: A very great deal. It has one hundred per cent to do with it.

Mr. FINN: I may say to my hon. friend who has just raised the point of order that he was probably not in the House when this question was raised a little while ago by no less a person than the right hon. the leader of the opposition, and surely if I follow his experienced lead, I cannot be far wrong in discussing the same matter. The junior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) said the vote for the Halifax elevator was practically designed to get the votes of the electors in the by-election. As I have already said, when that vote was placed in the estimates there was no by-election in Halifax. I came to Ottawa as the representative of the people feeling in duty bound to submit sound reasons to the government for the placing of a vote in the estimates for the building of this elevator. That viewpoint was concurred in by the Canadian National Railway officials headed by Sir Henry Thornton, and as a result of several interviews my late colleague—now Mr. Justice Maclean—and I had with Sir Henry Thornton, he recommended that an elevator with a capacity of a million bushels be built. The recommendation was adopted, a vote was placed in the estimates and tenders were called for. Several tenders were received and the offer of the Atlas Construction Company of Montreal was the lowest. However, it was found that the elevator would cost more than was estimated. On looking into the matter it was ascertained that the specifications required the building of steel conductors of a very expensive type to two piers not yet built, and that expensive machinery beyond the needs of the port of Halifax was included. By the elimination of these features an elevator with a capacity of a million bushels, and machinery that would meet the requirements of the port of Halifax in every respect, could be constructed at a much lower figure.

In January last I discussed the matter with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I asked him if it was not possible to eliminate these features that were set out in the specifications and permit the lowest tenderer to take the contract cutting out these extra costs. The minister said to me "Mr. Finn, if it was my private business I would do that, but as a minister of the Crown I feel it my duty to call for new tenders and allow every tenderer an opportunity to bid again. That is cleaner business and would not and could not arouse suspicion." I agreed with the minister and he then told me that the Railway department would be asked to revise the plans. I asked only two things of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. One was that the capacity of the elevator should not be reduced. The other was that a provision should be inserted in the contract calling for the completion of the elevator by the close of navigation in the month of November or December next. I had the assurance of the minister that these two requests, which were fair and reasonable, would be accepted; and I was surprised to-night to hear him state that he was going to investigate the matter further and communicate with the city council and the board of trade at Halifax as to the location of the elevator.

Some years ago, when my right hon. friend opposite was a member of the Borden administration, plans and specifications for new ocean terminals at the port of Halifax were prepared. That government disregarded absolutely the warnings of technical men and experienced marine authorities as to the location of those terminals. Notwithstanding that advice, technical and general as it was, the sum of $18,000,000 was expended at the port of Halifax on these so-called terminals. The property taken for this purpose ran from one side of the city to the other. In the south end, our best residential district, the government bought at high figures property extending from South street down to Green Bank. The property taken included Mr. S. M. Brookfield's residence for which they paid him $76,000. The late government cleaned up too the residential section along that water front. Did they buy from the owners of these properties? No, sir, they did not. The word went forth to the Conservative party, and one of the leaders, one of the organizers, one of the men who were closely identified in business with a member of that administration, went round and took options on these properties, and they were sold to the government at advanced prices. When the hearing relative to this property was on in the Supreme Court a gentleman was asked under oath who the man was who had these options and he gave his name. It was that of a leading Conservative and an active organizer in the province of Nova Scotia.

These are the handicaps under which Halifax labours to-day. We have south end terminals and when a southeast wind blows ships are not able to lie alongside those berths but a tug has to pull them out into the stream. An artificial breakwater, which cost thousands of dollars, was placed there when natural breakwaters exist namely, MacNab's and George's islands. Furthermore, there is an inner harbour where pier number 2—which cost only a million—was built by the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding when he was Acting Minister of Railways to which all the great ships like the Aquitania, the Olympic, the Bergenland, the Lapland, and other big vessels of from twenty-five thousand to thirty thousand tons could tie up. That is the heritage the party now led by my right hon. friend opposite left to the Liberal government. That is the state in which they left the port of Halifax with their expenditure of $18,000,000. In the plans and specifications for this development provision was made for an elevator. That site is government property. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) say that he heard there were three sites available to the government on which to erect this elevator. My hon. friend's statement is absolutely without foundation. There are no sites in Halifax available for an elevator except two. One is a property in the north end and owned by the Railway department; the other is a site at the south end terminal also owned by the Railway department. My hon. friend (Mr. Baxter) sought to convey the impression that interests were at work to effect a purchase that would result in private gain. There is no such site open for the elevator and no such condition existed at the port of Halifax in reference to the same.

10 p.m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member referred to certain purchases and Supreme court proceedings. How did they come to be in the Supreme court?

Mr. FINN: They came into the Supreme court in connection with a suit that was brought regarding an option which had been obtained and which was not carried out. A writ was issued for specific performance in connection with the same.

Mr. MEIGHEN: From the Exchequer court to the Supreme court?

Mr. FINN: Yes. I shall be very much disappointed if the plans and specifications for this elevator are not available at once. I understood from Mr. C. B. Brown, chief engineer of the Canadian National Railways and from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low), that the report of the Railway department, through its engineers, was placed in his hands last January, I am going to ask the minister to state what has happened between last January and now, the 19th June, that, on the revised report of Mr. C. B. Brown to himself the assurances given me have not been carried out, and new plans and specifications made and tenders called for. I do not intend for one moment to submit to procrastination on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in reference to the construction of this elevator at the port of Halifax. As the representative in this House for the city and county of Halifax, I demand that these plans and specifications be obtained at once from the Railway department, that tenders be called and an elevator be built at the port of Halifax with a capacity of 1,000,000 bushels as recommended by Sir Henry Thornton, Mr. C. B. Brown, the railway engineers and the consulting engineers, the Metcalfes, of Montreal. There is no need to consult the Board of Trade or the City Council of Halifax. As the representative for that constituency in this parliament, I will take the responsibility of saying that there is the site which has been accepted; there is also the fact that a million bushel elevator is to be built and at once. If these promises and assurances given me are not to be carried out, then I owe it first to my constituents, to myself as a public man and to the party of which I am a member, that unless these pledges are implemented by action, to say to the government—of which I am a supporter—that they will have to have some other person represent the constituency of Halifax in this House, because I will tender my resignation to the Prime Minister and go back to political dreams in my own good old city of Halifax.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It may just be possible that the government was fearing something of what the hon. member mentions and this accounts for the estimate being inserted. I want to make two or three remarks as to the words of the hon. gentleman, not, in the main, nor in a critical frame of mind. He quoted some words of mine, spoken in this House last session, and I must say for the moment I could not understand this quotation. I want to make clear to the committee now what the reference was. I knew that the present elevator was standing.

Mr. FINN: I gathered my impression only from what my right hon. friend said. If he meant something different from what he said, I will agree with him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I meant exactly what I said. I knew the present elevator was standing and I could not refer to it in stating that I believed the elevator was burned down.

Mr. FINN: What elevator was burned down?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The one before it. The hon. gentleman will see from my remarks that I had received a return regarding the matter, and looking through the return I had found that an elevator had been burned down. That is the one to which I referred.

Mr. FINN: The right hon. member left the House under the impression that there was no elevator.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. The hon. member knows the record of the elevator as I will show him in a minute. This is what I said last year:

> The information I have is that there was an elevator there that had a little grain in it some years, and for some years none. I fancy it was burned down. Any way, it is not there now. I had a return on this the other day. I think it was used substantially just once. I believe it was partly built by the railway and partly by the city.

That would identify it to the hon. member as the elevator that was burned down. I am informed now directly by those who know, that it was built partly by the railway and partly, to the extent of, I understand, $50,000, by the city. The elevator in existence at present was not contributed to by the city at all.

Mr. FINN: It must have been long before my oculars were working and they were working a long time ago when I was very young.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know about my hon. friend's oculars, but I know from hon. members of greater years and possibly as much knowledge that the elevator I referred to had existed there first.

Mr. FINN: Perhaps the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Black), who is much older than I am, can recall and give the information to the committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He just gave it to me.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I think what the right hon. member says is absolutely correct. There was an elevator there which was burned down.

Mr. FINN: Before the present one was built?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Yes.

Mr. FINN: When?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): At least twenty years ago.

Mr. FINN: Will the hon. gentleman undertake to tell me when that elevator was built and when it was burned down? The other day he said that he remembered playing with the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding when they were boys. Surely, if he can remember that, he can remember when the elevator was burned down.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): That elevator was not burned down. It is standing there still.

Mr. FINN: Which elevator is it that my hon. friend refers to that was burned down?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): The first elevator that was built in the city of Halifax and to which the city of Halifax contributed was burned down.

Mr. FINN: When was it built?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I have not the information at hand. I can get it for my hon. friend if it is of great importance to him.

Mr. FINN: I should like to get it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I mentioned that just to show that I was not referring to the present elevator.

Mr. FINN: I must say to my right hon. friend that I did not believe he was trying to mislead the House. I thought he was mistaken in his facts at the time. That was all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I evidently had before me some return. I want to make a little reference to what the hon. gentleman dragged in connected with the Halifax terminals.

Mr. FINN: The right hon. gentleman dragged in a by-election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not complaining at all of this dragging in. Indeed, I rarely complain of anything. I do not profess great familiarity with the question. I was not a member of the government when the policy was decided upon. I mention that, though, only to explain that I am not as familiar with the matter as I otherwise would be. The part I want to refer to is the cost. The cost was great. My memory is fairly good at times, and a return which was brought down last session showed an outlay of approximately $16,000,000. The hon. member's figures were substantially over that.

Mr. FINN: I said $18,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The return I asked for showed $16,000,000.

Mr. FINN: I said $18,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister had said $30,000,000 previously, so I congratulate the hon. member on being infinitely more accurate at least than his leader.

Mr. FINN: Thank you.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I recognize the irony of the reply because the hon. member must have been impressed in recent years with the utter abnormality of his leader in points of fact.

Mr. FINN: I am getting to be great.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now, as to reasons for the project. I do not doubt that there would be some engineers who would offer opposition; I have never heard of any project to which some engineers were not opposed while others were in favour of it. The balance of opinion I know was taken and I have received even recently very bitter complaints on the part of eminent railway engineers of the failure to proceed with these works, on the ground that they are a real solution to the Halifax situation. As to which side is right and which is wrong I am sure I can give no opinion; if I did it would be utterly without any value. Suffice to say that whatever the hon. gentleman may have had in his mind there was nothing approaching graft or dishonesty in the matter. I believe that what he said was right, that in some way information as to the project got out, and there were certain properties acquired, or options secured thereon. But the Hon. Frank Cochrane took good care that these things were brought into the Exchequer court. He forced them right through the Exchequer court and that is the very reason the facts referred to came out in that court and in the Supreme court to which appeal was made. It is just because Mr. Cochrane refused to submit to the prices asked for the property, by reason of these acquirements, that the matter went through the Exchequer court and finally to the Supreme court for decision. I have no more comment to make on the hon. member's speech than this: I entirely sympathize with him in his view that this project having been promised should be gone on with; it should be gone on with as a matter of good faith and not merely be held out as a bait to cover a by-election contingency. I was surprised at the figures which were quoted. I did not want to pour ridicule on the project in asking the hon. member for the figures for 1923; I wanted it for that year, as I want it for 1922 and 1921, year by year, in order to see just what has been the history of the port, especially of late.

Mr. MILNE: I rather hesitate to say very much after we have had one of our periodic scoldings from our would-be tutors on the right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To whom is the hon. hon. gentleman referring? Is he referring to myself? If he is, I want to tell him that I was not scolding him nor anyone else; as a matter of fact I had not observed him.

Mr. MILNE: If the shoe does not fit the hon. gentleman need not put it on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Be a man and say what you mean.

Mr. MILNE: When this item was brought up I considered it to be in the interests of the development of our Dominion trade; and after the words of my hon. friend (Mr. Baxter), the significance of which I must confess was hard to grasp, I rather gathered that he wanted the two old parties to get together—I think that was the drift of his remarks. I am afraid if they did Halifax might get two elevators. I heard the suggestion the other day that if the dry docks in St. John were moved to Halifax and a roof put on them they might be used for an elevator. As regards the elevator at Halifax, we have spent a couple of hours in discussing the item. I have jotted down the reasons which have been advanced in support of the proposed undertaking. One of these reasons is apparently political. I will avoid discussing that. Another reason has been dwelt upon at some length; it is that the work should be done from the standpoint of patriotism. Anyone who has ventured to dispute the wisdom of this sacred item for the Maritime provinces has been charged practically with disloyalty; at any rate that has been the insinuation. Now, I yield second place to no one in the fervor of my patriotism and my Canadianism, and I certainly resent any insinuation or innuendo to the effect that hon. gentlemen from the West are not as truly Canadian and as truly patriotic as our Maritime friends. Another reason why the elevator should be built, it has been suggested by one of the hon. gentlemen from Halifax, is that this structure would constitute a fine monument to some of our noted public men who have come from that part of the country. If the hon. member wishes to erect a monument to any of those great statesmen and is prepared to discuss the proposal on its merit I am perfectly willing to come across and assist in any way I can.

Mr. FINN: The hon. member is referring to myself; I never made any such statement as he attributes to me. I did not say that the building of an elevator would provide a monument to public men.

Mr. MILNE: I gathered from the remarks of the hon. gentleman that as Nova Scotia had contributed these great statesmen to the public life of the country that was one of the reasons why the elevator should be built.

Mr. FINN: I did not say that.

Mr. MILNE: If I am mistaken in that regard I must apologise to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FINN: Well, you are.

Mr. MILNE: Yet another reason was that the elevator would be the means of providing ballast for the ships. Looking over the shipping figures in a book which I happened to be reading to-day in connection with shipping, I came across certain facts. I got the book from the Bureau of Statistics, and I am rather reluctant about giving figures taken from any statistics, because my experience in the last few days has convinced me that one may secure figures to support almost any contention. However, the figures I have would indicate that in connection with Halifax there is about four times the tonnage going out from the port of Halifax as there is coming in. The minister might be good enough to tell us why it is necessary to carry ballast to that port when there is about four times as much tonnage going out as there is coming in. The hon. member for Halifax also made the suggestion that ocean vessels could carry grain from Halifax at a cheaper rate. I admit that and I think the government should make an effort to see that the vessels carrying grain from our ports should give a lower rate to Halifax than to Boston.

Mr. FINN: I want to remind the hon. member that there are two members for Halifax. He is referring constantly to the member for Halifax; which of them does he mean?

Mr. MILNE: I am referring to the senior member for Halifax. He made the statement that about a day is saved in going to Halifax and that it is unfair that the railway companies should be made to carry grain that extra distance at the same rate, while vessel owners take grain a shorter distance and for the same rate. I understand that the insurance is considerably higher to Halifax than to United States ports; and as freight comes up the St. Lawrence river the rate increases. From the point of view of damages involved, I can find no reason why the rate should be so high on the St. Lawrence. If the government in addition to building elevators and encouraging trade could press that point and secure a reduced rate on ocean transportation and a reduction in insurance rates, it would be of considerable advantage.

Mr. LOW: I have already stated to the committee that the matter is being investigated.

Mr. MILNE: I believe that by letting in daylight on the steamboat and insurance rates and making them public property a wholesome effect will be produced which will result in a more equitable equalization. Why do we have to carry ballast to Halifax when nearly four times the tonnage goes out that comes in?

Mr. LOW: A very large portion of the freight shipped from Halifax will not serve as ballast at all.

Mr. GOULD: What is the tariff charge on wheat placed in the elevator at Halifax, and what does the charge cover?

Mr. LOW: In 1921-22 no wheat was shipped through Halifax; in 1922-23, 300 bushels were shipped.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) gave 2,000,000 bushels odd as the amount shipped between 1921 and 1924.

Mr. LOW: I have given the figures as contained in the report of the Board of Grain Commissioners. I have nothing here to show the rate per bushel, but I am sure that the cost of handling 300 bushels must have been very high indeed.

Mr. GOULD: What I want to ascertain is the usual per bushel charge at a terminal elevator located, say, at Halifax or St. John.

Mr. FINN: In reply to my right hon. friend, the figures I received from the department of Trade and Commerce are as follows:

	Bushels
1920	1,920,600
1921	199,000
1922	none
1923	300
1924	none

From 1920 to 1924 the total is something over 2,000,000 bushels.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am glad to see that all but a very infinitesimal part was handled under the late government.

Mr. FINN: No grain has been shipped in these last years owing to the fact that the new terminals at the south end practically cut off the old terminal and it was impossible to get in any very big shipments of grain. At present there is practically only one track leading into the old terminal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The change was made long before 1920.

Mr. FINN: With the building of the new terminals the piers from which grain was shipped were partly abandoned, and I am advised that they are not now in a condition to have big shipments tie up to them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They must have gone into disrepair since 1920.

Mr. FINN: I would think so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They should have been kept in repair.

Mr. FINN: We could not get the necessary money from the railway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nor from the government?

Mr. FINN: The government had not direct control. Action was taken on the advice of Mr. Hanna, and as the general manager of the division was at that time located in Toronto, we hardly got anything in Halifax.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that is probably the explanation.

Mr. LOW: In answer to my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) may I say that last night when the elevators were under discussion I had the report of the Canadian Grain Board at hand, but to-night, not thinking the rates would be under discussion, I did not bring it with me. If the hon. member will secure a copy of that report he will find particulars of the various charges.

Mr. GOULD: I have the information here. I find that at the port of Halifax just exactly twice the tariff is charged as is in force at the head of the lakes. The computation given at the head of the lakes as a fair, cost figure to be used on handling is $50,000 per million bushel capacity, which would work out at one-half cent a bushel. I wondered if that included explosive insurance and ten days' free storage as at all the Atlantic ports. I know explosive insurance is a specific charge against grain at tidewater.

Mr. LOW: It is one of the items to which I referred last night as not being included in the charges against the elevators. I am sorry that I have not the report with me to-night.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): It has been reported in the press that the cost of the ocean terminals at Halifax was as high as $40,000,000, while another statement placed it at $30,000,000. I took occasion to write the Department of Railways for information on the point, and the deputy minister advises me as follows:

> The capital cost of the ocean terminals at Halifax to April 16, 1924, is $17,025,432.09.

Against that there is real estate to the value of about $400,000, earning a fairly good rental; there is perhaps $150,000 of real estate which is unproductive; in addition some 88 acres of land have been reclaimed, the value of which I am not prepared to state definitely, but supposing it to be worth $5,000 an acre—the aggregate value reduces the cost of the terminals to about $16,000,000. I make this statement to correct any false impression which may have been created by the exaggerated reports regarding the cost of these terminals.

My hon. friend (Mr. Finn) seems in doubt whether or not one of the elevators at Halifax was burned down. I will satisfy him on that point if he wishes me to do so.

Mr. FINN: I am not in doubt about its having been burned down; I only want to know when.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Well, I will tell you.

Mr. FINN: I have patience.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): The fact is that nothwithstanding all the promises which have been made to us on the eve of elections in Halifax with regard to elevators and shipments of grain, the people were too sensible to take them seriously. They knew that the promises of hon. gentlemen opposite had a habit of falling down. The expenditure of a few thousand dollars would have resulted in putting that elevator in such order that it would handle a certain amount of grain which would have been gladly accepted by steamship companies operating out of Halifax. They could have handled quite a large quantity of grain at very little cost. The boats of the merchant marine, instead of lying idle, could have been employed in carrying this grain to the markets of Europe. But what was done? Absolutely nothing; the elevator was allowed to lie idle. No desire was shown, no attempt was made, to create traffic through the port of Halifax. We have here to-day an appropriation for a paltry $200,000 towards an elevator and the statement from the minister that the plans are still under consideration, seven months after tenders were called on plans that had only to be revised. But even if the plans had been new, surely seven months was sufficient to enable the government to have the work of construction proceeded with. Had that been done, had the government been in earnest, we would have had a grain trade through the port of Halifax for the coming winter and arrangements could have been made with steamship companies to carry it in conjunction with the light traffic which is obtained there in the shipment of apples and other products. Had that been done we would be in a position next winter to make a beginning in the opening up of that trade, with, I am sure, wonderful prospects for the future.

Mr. LOW: I shall be very glad to take into consideration the suggestion of my hon. friend that the present elevator might serve the purpose by being repaired.

[Mr. W. A. Black.]

Mr. HANSON: He did not make that suggestion.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): No.

Mr. GOULD: I cannot discern what are the real reasons offered by the members for Halifax in connection with this elevator. I am not sure that they are patriotic reasons, neither am I sure that they are business reasons. I do not think that enough grain will ever go down that way to make a very large elevator at Halifax a satisfactory business proposition. The president of the Canadian National Railways may well be trusted to see that such amount of wheat is shipped through the port of Halifax as may be considered desirable or necessary. One has only to read the reports of former governments to find out what the relative values of the different ports have been in the past in this respect. The Halifax elevator has had a storage capacity of 500,000 bushels and the St. John elevator, 2,500,000 bushels. At Montreal the elevator has a capacity of 9,000,000 bushels. I asked a question a moment ago about the tariff charges, and I find that they are the same at all these places. We are asked merely to provide traffic for the railroad down to Halifax, not, in my humble opinion, for business reasons. It is quite possible that the excess might go to Halifax if there is congestion at other ports; if St. John was overloaded with grain Halifax might take care of some of it. In that respect I do not object to seeing grain go down that way, but it will need some argument to convince me that the construction of a large elevator at Halifax would be a business proposition, or that it would be beneficial to the railways, to shipping, or to the individual persons who produce the grain. In every instance, according to the information I have received, the cost of these elevators is a charge against the grain; the grain pays it. That is admitted by the official sources from which I got my information. I am not going to oppose the item, but if it were proposed to construct an elevator of huge capacity at Halifax the House would be justified in raising strong objection.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I would like to make myself clearly understood in regard to this elevator. I did not say that the old elevator was sufficient for the requirements of the port, or that it would handle the grain that should be handled there; it is old fashioned and out of date. What I wanted to suggest was that if the government were in earnest with regard to the establishing of a grain trade through the port of Halifax a beginning could be made with what we have there until improved facilities could be obtained. I did not suggest that the present building be put in such condition that it would take the place of a new one; its capacity is not large enough and the cost of modernizing it would not, in my opinion, be justified. It might, however, be used as a temporary means of handling grain.

Mr. EVANS: Not one economic reason has yet been forthcoming from the minister or from anybody else as to the need for this elevator. It looks to me like a waste of public money. The cost of every elevator is a charge against the grain. The price is made in Liverpool, and whatever it costs to get it there from the grain fields is a charge against the farmer. We already have an elevator at Halifax of sufficient capacity to handle all the grain that will go through there. The Minister of Railways says we need wheat for ballast, but the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Milne) successfully contradicted that statement. There is more freight leaving Halifax seaward than goes in there.

Mr. LOW: My answer to the question of the hon. member for Neepawa was that a large proportion of the freight carried from Halifax to England and other countries was not of a nature that would be suitable for ballast purposes.

Mr. EVANS: We have also an elevator at Quebec which is never used to its full capacity. We have several inland storage elevators, and there has been a debt on these annually—

Mr. LOW: My hon. friend knows the Quebec elevator cannot be used in the winter time.

Mr. EVANS: No, but we have an elevator at Halifax, and it is no longer needed in the winter, as the amount that went through there last year goes to show. Since the port of Vancouver is being developed no grain goes east now in the winter, and the elevator at Halifax is only a waste of money. All these elevators that are not being used to their capacity at the present time, and which could be used for storage, are a charge against the farmers' grain. There is a deficit of from $16,000 to $25,000 each year against every one of these elevators in the prairie provinces. We are building another one now at Edmonton, and I only hope that it may be used to its capacity. The port of Vancouver is our natural outlet in the winter months, and I maintain this Halifax elevator is not needed.

Mr. MILNE: Is the wheat that is carried from Halifax carried at ballast rates, or are the Canadian National Railways expected to absorb that charge, and hand the grain over to the shipping interests to be used by them for ballast and charged the full cargo rate.

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend knows anything about ocean rates he knows that the shipper in Canada has nothing to do with fixing them. Whether the rate is two or three or ten cents, it is fixed by the vessel owners, and sometimes in order to get ballast the boats will carry grain at a ridiculously low figure.

Mr. MILNE: Regarding the effort that is being made to have rates registered, was this matter put before the chairman of the Imperial Shipping Committee when he visited Canada this spring?

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend read the newspaper reports he must have seen that the Imperial Shipping Committee visited Canada at the request of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. MILNE: That does not exactly answer my question.

Item agreed to.

The Inland Water Freight Rates Act, administration of, $5,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is $5,000 needed to administer an act that the minister himself, without authority virtually repealed?

Mr. LOW: Last year there was spent in connection with the administration of this act the sum of $3,238,65; for travelling expenses, $1,234.67; professional services, $1,592.71; telegrams and telephone calls, $288.63; sundries, $122.64.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is very interesting, but it has no relation to my question. I do not doubt there was money spent last year for telegrams, telephone calls, and travelling expenses, but those were all telegrams and telephone calls in order to arrange some method of getting around the act. The minister knows that. That was one of his chief troubles last year. He had an awful time with this act which was bedevilling the whole lake freight situation, and he had the job of his life to find some means of getting around it, and all this telegraphing and telephoning was done trying to work it out. The return is down on the Table, and it is a beautiful return. It tells all about the efforts made to get these people to come in, and how they would not do it because of his act; how Mr. Boyd went down; how the minister was telegraphed to meet some American shipowners in the corridor of a hotel, and how he postponed and finally got there. All these expenses I know had to be gone to. That was one of the penalties, but a trivial penalty of the act. The main penalty was paid by the shippers in western Canada; the main penalty was paid by the farmers who raised the grain. The question I am asking is why in the world do we need more money to administer the act in the coming year when the minister has managed to get rid of it by an interpretation? Is he really going to spend any more money on that act? If just because it is on the statute book you have to have a vote to administer it, you had better repeal it; it would be cheaper.

Mr. LOW: Does my right hon. friend mean it would be better to repeal the act for the sake of $5,000, an act that serves the purpose of helping the agriculturists of this country—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where does it help them?

Mr. LOW: My right hon. friend says the rates were higher last year than the year before, and I quoted him figures sufficient, I think, to show that the rate last fall was only a trifle higher than the year before when the act was not in effect. So far as running around the country is concerned, it was worth running around the country for what was accomplished.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister think it is worth keeping the act in order to get the rate up a little higher, even if he is right in his figures?

Mr. LOW: There were many things which entered into the situation last fall. We had a very large crop, and when there is plenty of cargo offering, vessels are inclined to raise the rates as high as the traffic will stand. The hon. member knows the rates are fixed by the amount of cargo offering. The vessel owners usually fix the rates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the act for, if they fix the rates?

Mr. LOW: The act provides that when the Canada Grain Board consider the rate is too high they step in and fix a rate. Fortunately last fall, notwithstanding the large amount to be carried, the rates were only a trifle higher than the year before when the act that my right hon. friend condemns was not in effect. So far as running about to meet people in Winnipeg or anywhere else is concerned no place is too far for me to go if I think I can accomplish anything for the good of any section of the country—Winnipeg, Vancouver, or Halifax.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I commend the minister's honesty in smiling when he was making that statement. He knows this act is a farce, a howling farce. The minister knows he has expressed his opinion about it in language just about as strong as that. It is not a question of what the rates were all through the year. The rates dropped after the minister got rid of the act, in the early part of October.

Mr. LOW: Let me correct my right hon. friend. We did not get rid of the act, not at all. Again I say, I accepted the interpretation of a lawyer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What lawyer?

Mr. LOW: The chairman of the Canada Grain Board, a gentleman appointed by my right hon. friend. Surely he has confidence in him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: An interpretation the minister told him to put on it. The thing is a joke. What is the use really of making a farce of things. The minister knows as well as that he is sitting in his seat that no human being thinks the act means the interpretation given by the Canada Grain Board. The chairman no more thinks it, would not say it, never said so to the minister—he no more thinks it than this glass thinks it.

Mr. LOW: Does my right hon. friend think that the chairman appointed by himself would try to mislead the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, and never did. He just evaded it.

Mr. LOW: He simply told me that was the interpretation he placed upon the act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend must think he is talking to a child.

Mr. LOW: Oh, no, I do not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why was the interpretation not put upon it until on in October? The thing is a joke. The interpretation is merely a means of annulling the act.

Mr. LOW: Up to that time there was no reason for considering the act at all; the rates were all right. It was only when the grain movement started in October, that it was found necessary to look into the Grain Act to put the broadest interpretation on it in order to secure sufficient bottoms. It started moving about the first of October and continued to the end of November. However, this whole matter will be under discussion when the resolution comes up to amend the Lake Freights Act. It will be moved tomorrow, and then my right hon. friend will have an opportunity of discussing it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know, but what I am drawing attention to is this: With the whole heart and blood out of the act the rest of it is just a shell. The shell is being preserved for mere appearance sake and we are paying $5,000 to help preserve that appearance. Does my hon. friend imagine for a moment that the amendment that is coming down is going to bring the act back to the same principle that was embodied in it? It is not. This vote ought to be cut out. I do not think any hon. member wants that act on the principle that was instilled into it and remained in it until this scheme of interpreting the act in order to get rid of it was adopted by the department. It was wholly unauthorized, but I think it helped to save the situation. I think the reduction was due to the annulment, but what a cry of autocracy would have been raised if anybody else had done it. Never in the history of legislation was an act like that perpetrated by a government. But sometimes when the act itself is so monstrous the method of getting rid of it must be equally monstrous.

Mr. KELLNER: I should like to point out that getting rid of the act did not altogether fix up the rates either.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think it did altogether.

Mr. KELLNER: In October the rate was 4.33. Then in November, I think the act was scrapped by that time—

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was scrapped.

Mr. KELLNER: —it was down to 3.87 and in December it had gone back again to 4.72.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think generally speaking the level after the act was scrapped was almost the same but a little higher than the year before. The year before was one of the highest years we have ever had.

Mr. KELLNER: The rate to Georgian bay ports appears to be a little less in that year. I ask the minister if he is quoting his figures from this book "The Grain Trade of Canada"? I notice his figures hardly compare with those that are in this book.

Mr. LOW: The figures I quoted with reference to what?

Mr. KELLNER: I am asking the minister whether he got his figures from "The Grain Trade of Canada"? The figures he has been quoting are not the same as the figures in this book.

Mr. LOW: What figures is my hon. friend referring to?

Mr. KELLNER: You stated that the figures in 1923 were less than in 1922.

Mr. LOW: The figures I have here are for the seven months in 1923. From Fort William to Port Colborne the rate was 4.09 as against 4.36 to Buffalo for the same period the previous year. It is scarcely fair for my hon. friend to pick out one particular month and compare it with another month; he ought to take the average for the season. However, if my hon. friend will refer to the average rate each month during the shipping season he will find that the rates were slightly lower for the seven months in 1923 than for the seven months of the previous year.

Mr. KELLNER: The figures I quoted were the average figures.

Mr. LOW: What is the average figure for the seven months of 1923?

Mr. KELLNER: To Georgian bay ports?

Mr. LOW: Yes to Georgian bay ports.

Mr. KELLNER: The rate is 4.07.

Mr. LOW: The average rate for the seven months amounted to 3.63 according to my figures.

Mr. KELLNER: The figures I have are for nine months.

Mr. LOW: My figures are only for seven months, I do not think the boats operate for nine months. The figures I have are up to the end of November, 1923. They are the latest figures I have. I repeat that for the seven months the average rate to Port Colborne was 4.09 as against 4.36 to Buffalo.

Mr. KELLNER: This book gives the rate to Buffalo as 4.42.

Mr. LOW: Perhaps my hon. friend is not referring to the same year.

Mr. KELLNER: It is the year 1923.

Mr. LOW: Is my hon. friend referring to the fiscal year or the calendar year? The book he has may be dealing with the calendar year.

Mr. KELLNER: It starts out with the rate for April and gives the rates down to December inclusive. The average rate is given for all these months.

Mr. LOW: At what page are the figures given?

Mr. KELLNER: At page 175.

Mr. LOW: The rate I have here for the eight months of navigation during the year 1923 to Georgian bay ports is 4.07. To Buffalo for the same year the rate was 4.42, so the Buffalo rate is higher by .35. The rate from Fort William to Port Colborne amounted to 4.24 as against a rate of 4.42 to Buffalo. In each case the rate to the Canadian port last year was lower than the rate to the American port. I am reading from the page my hon. friend gave. Am I right?

11 p.m.

Mr. KELLNER: You have quoted correctly but the rates you now give differ from those you gave a little while ago.

Mr. LOW: The only difference is that I was quoting the rate for seven months. In this report the figures are for eight months, that is the only difference.

Mr. KELLNER: I do not know what the difference was but there certainly was a difference. I point out to the minister that during the months the grain is moving the rates are high. In July and August the rates are away down to 2½ to 3 cents but there is little grain moving then. In the fall and spring months when there is quite a volume of grain movement, the rates are largely in excess of the average rate which the minister has been giving.

Mr. LOW: Plenty of cargo is offering in those months.

Item agreed to.

Gold and Silver Marking Act, $6,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much was spent last year?

Mr. LOW: The expenditures has run about the same from 1917-18 to 1923-24. The expenditure in 1917-18 was $3,878.10; in 1922-23, $3,737.34 and in 1923-24, $3,751.38.

Item agreed to.

Honorary Advisory Council of Industrial and Scientific Research, $120,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is apparently, from its history, a merely formal vote, never spent.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. LOW: The vote is the same, but the amount is spent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much was spent last year?

Mr. LOW: The whole amount.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was done with it?

Mr. LOW: The Research Council carries on very important work. One-third of the amount is for the purpose of administration and the balance is for fellowships, studentships, bursaries and research work.

Mr. WALLACE: Is this vote the only source of income for the council?

Mr. LOW: There is some other revenue, but it does not go to the Research Council, it goes to the treasury.

Mr. WALLACE: My question is: Has the council any other source of revenue besides this vote for carrying on its work?

Mr. LOW: The chairman is at present president of the University of Alberta, but I understand that sooner or later he will devote his entire time to this work. The officers, apart from the clerks and minor officials, do not draw any salaries at all. Their expenses are paid to them.

Mr. WALLACE: This is a large item, and perhaps the committee might have some information as to the chief activities of the council. I am not opposed to the vote. I rather think it is a good thing.

Mr. LOW: The subjects of research are as follows:

To carry on experiments in reforestation in New Brunswick..	$5,000
Investigation on colour vision..	1,100
Investigation on the artificial propagation of the sturgeon..	800
Investigation of the deterioration of concrete in the alkaki soils and ground waters of western Canada..	5,000
To meet expenses of a demonstration to be attempted by James Graham of his methods of drying, carbonizing and briquetting peat.	300
Investigation on the processes in evergreen plants whereby they are rendered capable of growing and forming their organic compounds (starch, sugar, and oils) during the very low temperatures of the winter season.. ..	400
Provide apparatus necessary for a research on the intensities in spectra from various sources when excited under controlled conditions.. ..	500
To continue the investigation on the mode of inheritance of starch and sugar in the endosperm of corn by means of chemical analyses of parental stocks and their hybrids in F_1 and F_2 generations..	250
To continue the investigation on the possibility of economically cultivating a number of essential oil and drug-yielding plants in B.C.. ..	500

To investigate the various processes for carbonizing the coals of New Brunswick and utilizing the by-products thus obtained.. ..	1,500
Investigation of plant extracts containing glukokinin..	3,000
Investigation on the nature of winter hardiness in crop plants, alfalfa, red clover and winter wheat..	2,000
Investigation on the separation from the bitumen of Alberta sands of the chemical substances which it contains..	1,000
Investigation on the variation with frequency of the power loss in dielectrics..	600
Research on Caoutchouc..	2,000
Investigation on the proper diet of the ranch fox..	5,000
Research on the field of low temperatures.. ..	2,500

This is some of the research work that is being carried on by the Research Council at the present time.

Mr. HOEY: Is there an annual report published covering the work of the council?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has there been any achievement of major importance by the Research Council to date—I mean any scientific application to industry which has really produced substantial results? That is one question I want to ask the minister. The second question is this: Has the minister or the government anything in contemplation in the way of extension?

Mr. LOW: In connection with the lobster industry there has been a very important discovery. Heretofore in the packing of lobsters it was found that a rust developed in the course of shipments but I understand that a process has been discovered whereby this can be effectually prevented. This is one achievement I have in mind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would be important and I am glad of it if the minister's statement is correct. I had not heard of it. Has it been applied in actual commerce?

Mr. LOW: I think so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) was at one time a specialist in lobsters; he has no interest in the business now. Perhaps the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Sinclair) could tell us something about this matter; I did not hear of it when visiting any factories. Is it a recent discovery? It may not yet have got into the channels of commerce.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): Three years ago our lobster canners lost a very large proportion of their pack, the lobsters having turned black in the can after they had been packed a few months. The market that year did not absorb the output as readily as it had done some years previously and the pack had to be held a few months longer. The Research Council went into the matter thoroughly and as a result of their investigations they discovered that by the addition of a very small amount of certain acetic acids to each can of lobster deterioration was altogether prevented and the meat was preserved for a considerable period. So far this method has proved effective and has been applied by several of the large companies who operate lobster factories around the shores of the Maritime provinces. During the past season or two a considerable number of packers have applied it with almost entire satisfaction, and the result of the investigations of the Research Council in that direction has benefited the lobster packing industry to a marked extent. Had this discovery been made three or four years ago it would have saved to those who have large sums invested in canning plants, and who are obliged to lay out a good deal of money before the season begins, several thousands of dollars each year, not to mention the benefit to smaller factories who have also lost a good deal. These smaller factories did not feel quite able to apply the new method as soon as it was discovered; had they done so they would undoubtedly have saved a good deal. This one discovery alone justifies the very existence of the Research Council in my opinion.

Mr. LOW: It has been estimated that in that one industry alone there is a saving of $350,000 annually.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This discovery was made in 1921.

Mr. LOW: I do not remember just when.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): About that time.

Mr. LOW: A new industry is also starting up now as a result of research on sulphite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is to say, there has been a discovery in relation to the production of sulphite.

Mr. LOW: I have not the details but a discovery has been made in that direction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am glad of these discoveries especially of the one in relation to lobster preservation, which should be of value. The minister has not yet answered the last question I asked him. Has the government in mind any work in the way of extension? I know that in later years of the old government the strongest pressure was brought to bear to have the institution established on a much more permanent basis, especially in regard to the provision of a building. Has the minister any plans?

Mr. LOW: We have not considered any plans yet. A bill may be presented before the close of the session to permit the Research Council to accept fees in connection with the work they perform for industry. Under the present law they are not allowed to accept directly any fees or make any charges.

Mr. BOYS: Was last year's appropriation all spent?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Inquiry re ocean freight rates, $10,000.

Mr. BANCROFT: I would direct the attention of the minister to the excessive freight rates charged on cattle shipments to the Old Country. The figure still remains at $25 a head to Dundee and $20 to other British ports. Since the lifting of the cattle embargo against Canadian cattle the farmers of this country have been encouraged to increase the production of cattle for this trade. The tendency to increase herds of this type has however received a serious setback by the excessive charges levied in ocean transportation, and unless these cattle can be shipped at something like $10 a head the farmers may as well abandon all idea of participating in any way in this valuable branch of agricultural exportation. This is not a western matter only; it affects nearly every province in Canada. In its general effects the export trade of cattle is of even greater value to the country than the exportation of wheat because the raising of wheat for export purposes can only be carried on successfully in districts that are peculiarly suited to its production. But the raising or finishing of cattle for export can be carried on, on almost every farm in Canada. Therefore this is a very serious problem and deserves the most careful attention of the government.

If it is not possible to bring ocean freight rates down to a reasonable figure, the farmers may as well be informed of the fact so that they will not continue to waste their resources and their energies in an endeavour to produce cattle for export. The crux of the problem is to find out what it costs to transport cattle to the British markets. It has long been asserted that freight can be transported seven miles by water at the same cost as one mile by rail. The correctness of this assertion is shown by the fact that freight can be shipped from Montreal to Vancouver by the Panama all water route, over 7000 miles, and then east to Regina, another 1100 miles by rail, at a lower cost than by rail from Montreal to Regina, a distance of 1780 miles. The conclusion therefore is unavoidable that where there is competition ocean rates are approximately one-seventh railway rates. But in the transportation of cattle from Winnipeg to British ports we find that the charge to Montreal is about one-half of the charge for carrying the same cattle across the ocean. In other words, the ocean rate is twice that of the rail rate, although before the war it was less than one-half. Since 1914 railway rates on cattle have increased 40 per cent, while ocean rates have increased 166 per cent, and this in spite of the well-known fact that a great portion of the world's shipping is now lying idle. If these ocean rates on cattle are justified by the cost of service, the sooner the farmer finds another export market the better; otherwise his only alternative is to abandon his efforts to raise cattle for export. But the suspicion is widespread that these rates cannot be justified and that the business of transporting cattle to Great Britain is in the grip of a relentless combine. It is to be regretted that the Imperial Shipping Committee presided over by Sir Halford Mackinder was not empowered to investigate this situation thoroughly. It is undoubtedly the duty of the government to get at the facts. It has been suggested that in order to determine the cost of transportation, and to maintain our cattle trade with Great Britain, the Canadian government should charter ten or a dozen steamers suited for the purpose, and transport Canadian cattle at pre-war rates. Now, the Canadian farmer is not asking that this trade be maintained at the expense of the taxpayers generally; that would not be fair I am sure. But if the government were to engage in this traffic for a while in the manner suggested, the feasibility or otherwise of maintaining this trade on a profitable basis would be demonstrated.

Mr LOW: In reply to my hon .friend, I may say that Sir Halford Mackinder was advised that we wished the ocean rates on cattle to be investigated. With this in view we communicated with the Board of Trade, the city council, and other prominent men of both Winnipeg and Montreal. At the present time this very important matter, along with others, is receiving the attention of a special representative in England, and I hope during the recess to investigate the matter myself, because I fully realize that nothing will help agriculture more than to ensure to the farmer a larger return from his cattle than he has been receiving for the last few years. Before the session closes I hope to demonstrate in a practical way that I am trying to do something in this direction and I will then place before parliament the proposals I have in mind in order that hon. members may decide whether they should be adopted.

Mr. SALES: Who is the special representative now in England?

Mr. LOW: Mr. Preston.

Mr. BANCROFT: Is the minister convinced that the export cattle business cannot be carried on at the present transportation rates?

Mr. LOW: I had several meetings in this country with the representatives of the vessel owners and on each occasion they stated that it was utterly impossible to lower the rates, pointing out as one reason that the costs of dock-handling were as high as the peak during the war, and they informed me that the men were making a demand for a further increase in wages.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: We very much appreciate the statement of the minister and look forward with some hope at least to a successful termination of his efforts. In endorsation of the remark by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bancroft) I would point out the remarkable increase in cost and what it implies. The raising of the British cattle embargo brought a feeling of relief and inspired a good deal of hope in the hearts of the farmers, but I am afraid they have found that that embargo was only removed in order that a freight embargo might be substituted. The increase in transportation costs has been almost incomprehensible to us. Before the war cattle were carried from Montreal to English ports at an average ocean rate of $7.50 per head; since the war and at the present time the rate is $20 to the western ports and $25 to the eastern ports of England—an increase, as my hon. friend said, of 166 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the $7.50 rate apply to both eastern and western ports?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes, in pre-war times. Now, we quite understand that marine costs have risen since pre-war days, but we cannot believe that they have risen proportionately to any greater extent than railway costs of operation. There are fewer men employed in connection with ocean transportation, and in many ways the expenses are less than those incurred by our railways, and therefore I cannot see why the ocean rates should be any higher in proportion than railway rates. At the present time it actually costs $10.20 to move a 1,200-pound steer—which is about the average for export—from Winnipeg to Montreal, a distance of 1,411 miles, while to move the same steer 2,060 miles by water costs from $20 to $25. In other words, the rates are almost the same per mile by water as they are by land. It is well known that water carriage is infinitely cheaper than land carriage, so that this state of affairs is to my mind unjustifiable. I cannot believe that these rates can be justified by the costs invilved. As I say, we are looking forward with some hope to a real improvement in these conditions through the negotiations and investigations being carried on and through the efforts of the minister and his department. If the present embargo on our cattle to the United States continues and if the present freight embargo to Great Britain continues, our live stock industry, the most important in the whole country, will be destroyed.

Mr. LOW: Does my hon. friend know whether the shipper of cattle from Winnipeg has to provide the feed used on the trip? As I understand it the ocean liners provide the feed.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The shipper of the stock provides the feed in either case; the ocean carriers carry the feed free. There is a grievance in that connection. The feed is carried on the exposed deck, and in rough weather, particularly when the water is washing across the decks, the feed is frequently ruined.

Mr. SALES: I wish to corroborate what the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bancroft) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) have said with regard to the precarious situation of the cattle raiser in western Canada. Unless some relief is given there is only one thing for me to do, as I said the other night, and that is to advise these men that there is no hope for them to continue in the business. When I say that they have been writing down the value of their cattle to the extent of 60 per cent below what it was a few years ago, hon. members will realize the seriousness of the condition they are in. I am pleased to hear that there is a special representative inquiring into this matter of ocean rates. The special committee on Agriculture dealt with it last year and I came to the conclusion then that there was no hope of the owners of ocean vessels reducing the rates voluntarily. I do not know just what we can do. If we attempt to fix rates, then the ocean going men will say, "Well, we will not go to your port of Montreal." I do not see how we can control them. That is why I raised the question the other night with regard to chilled beef—whether it would not be more advantageous to the farmers of this country to ship their beef dead than to ship it alive. I hope the minister will devote some attention to that question. I hope also that representations will be made to the government of Great Britain on the question of discrimination between one dominion and another. I was in the Old Country; I was in Birkenhead and I saw cattle from Ireland there, side by side with cattle from Canada. I saw scabs of cows from Ireland that could go anywhere in England while our fine steers could not move unless some representative of the Department of Agriculture said they could go. With him was the decision whether our steers were store steers or fat steers, the decision was not with the man who wanted to buy them. If this official of the English Department of Agriculture said they were fat, they had to be slaughtered at Birkenhead; if he said they were stores they were permitted to go into the country and be fed for a short time. To my mind that is altogether wrong. The man who is purchasing the cattle should be allowed to say whether he is purchasing them for slaughter or whether in his opinion they are fit to be fed for five, six, seven or eight weeks longer. I raised this point directly with the official, and he said, "Well, this is the law and I cannot alter it." I do hope that representations will be made to the home government on this point. Perhaps it is a matter that the special representative at present making investigations in the Old Country should take up. If there is to be discrimination between dominions, the right hon. leader of the opposition will no doubt recognize and will express better than I can what it may lead to in the future. I can only reiterate my opinion that unless something is done very quickly to relieve the situation the only thing the farmer in the West can do is go out of business. I have always thought that the railways could assist. There is a milling-in-transit rate for the miller who handles western wheat; the minister will know all about it, as he is interested in the milling business. I have always been of the opinion there should be an in-transit charge for feeding cattle for export. For instance, an Ontario farmer buys cattle in the West; he intends feeding them for three or four months and then exporting them. Why should he not have the same privilege of a one cent per hundred pound stop-over rate, then shipping through to Montreal on the through rate, that the miller has for stopping wheat and converting it into flour, then shipping it on the milling-in-transit rate? I think that would help considerably in the marketing of our cattle from the West to the feeder in Ontario who wants to go into the business but who now finds that the local freight rate from Winnipeg to his station and the freight rate from his station again to Montreal is practically prohibitive. These are the things to which I think the government should devote its attention if it earnestly desires to assist the stock grower of the West.

Mr. LEADER: With regard to the situation of the cattle growers of western Canada, and particularly with reference to the question of transportation, which has arisen to-night, I had prepared some figures and had intended to speak on the live stock item in that regard, but I shall make a few comments under this item. The Minister of Trade and Commerce expressed a doubt a moment ago whether the farmers paid for the feed carried for the cattle during their transport.

Mr. LOW: I did not express any doubt; I simply asked the question.

Mr. LEADER: I wish to read a statement which was published in the Manitoba Free Press and which will show the actual charge that the farmer has to pay. The statement is as follows:

Detailed Statement of Cost of Shipping

Statement of cost of shipping 1,200 pound steer from Calgary to Britain, based on 21 steers to car from Calgary to Montreal, with an off-car weight of 1,085 pounds per steer at Montreal at a rate of $1.14½,

Calgary—
Sand and bedding, $1 per car	$ .05
Disinfecting car, 75 cents	.03½
Moose Jaw—
Labour (unloading $1, loading $1)	.09½
Feed, 20 lbs. hay in yard per steer	.25
Feed, 20 lbs. hay in car per steer	.25
Winnipeg—
Labour	.09½
Feed in yard	.23
Feed in cars	.23
Fort William—
Labour	.09½
Feed in car	.25
Chapleau—
Labour	.09½
Feed in car	.25
North Bay—
Labour	.09½
Feed in car	.25

Montreal—
Labour (unloading and loading)..	.09½
Two feeds hay, 15 lbs. per steer per feed at $45 per ton..	.67½
Freight, 1,085 lbs. at $1.14½..	12.42½
Insurance en route (25 cents per head).. .. .	.25
Ropes 20 cents, buckets, forks, etc., 11 cents.	.31
Labour, marking and roping..	.10
Wharfage..	.15
Men for boat..	.75
Cattle broker's commission at Montreal.. ..	.50
On board ship—
Ocean freight..	20.00
Ocean insurance, 5/8 of 1 per cent on $1.60.	1.00
Feed, hay, about..	4.30
Feed, meal, about..	2.10
(Feed, according to order, receives by law 20 lbs. hay, 6 lbs. meal per day per steer)
Total..	$47.42½

That amounts to a little over $47 per steer. In addition to that the shipping interests compel the shippers to prepay freight in Canadian money, which Mr. Kennedy of Toronto computes adds from $1.50 to $2 per head. If the shipper was allowed to pay in English funds he would save that $2 per steer.

Here is another table supplied by Mr. Rice-Jones of Winnipeg, showing the rates applicable since the war:

Inland freight—
Winnipeg to Montreal, 1,200 lbs. at 85c...	$10 20
Ocean freight—
Montreal to west coast of England or Scotland..	20 00
Feed, inland and ocean..	8 00
Labor, Insurance, etc., inland and ocean.. ..	3 80
	$42 00

(All charges payable in Canadian funds.)

Figuring the same movement on the basis of 1914 rates the figures are:

Winnipeg to Montreal, 1,200 lbs at 60½c.. ..	$7 26
Ocean—Montreal to England, average 30 sh...	7 30
Rail & ocean feed (estimate 20 per cent less than 1923)..	6 40
Labor-Insurance (estimate 20 per cent less than 1923)..	3 04
	$24 00

That gives a total of $24 on the basis of 1914 rates, as compared with $42 as at present.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the government cannot escape responsibility in regard to this matter. When they anticipated the raising of the embargo on Canadian store cattle in the Old Country the shippers of western Canada in a live stock meeting held at Regina in 1921, passed a resolution advising the government to take under immediate consideration the feasibility of getting some of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships to carry cattle overseas. Mr. Arkell, the live stock commissioner, was present at that meeting, and he made the statement—I have it here, but I will not read it—that he understood there was a surplus of cattle-carrying boats, and knew for a fact that some of them were being dismantled at that time. Notwithstanding that, when the trade developed and the cattle were ready for shipment overseas, we were met with the situation that the shipping interests claimed they did not have space enough, and they immediately raised the carriage charges, which leads us to believe that there is a deliberate combine existing in order to extort the last dollar out of the Canadian farmer and the shipper of cattle. I would just like to quote a few words from Mr. Rice-Jones, who represents the Grain Growers' Grain Company, which ships 25 per cent of the cattle shipped out of Canada. He appeared before the Imperial Shipping Committee at Winnipeg and declared that the present steamship rate was almost prohibitive and was strangling the export trade between the two countries, Canada and Great Britain. This is a live question out in the West, and it also should be, and I believe is, in the East. Here is an extract from an editorial appearing in my own paper in Portage la Prairie, which expresses it in better language than I could use. Referring to a meeting held in Winnipeg about two months ago it says:

> At the Stockers and Feeders banquet in Winnipeg eminent men like the president of the C.P.R. and 1st vice-president of the C.N.R. gave advice favouring mixed farming and cultivating the home market. This is what the boys call "old stuff." Reduced transportation rates is one of the greatest essentials to assist agriculture. It has been demonstrated that it costs more to transport a steer to the British market than it costs to buy the beast in the stockyard in Winnipeg. How is it possible for agriculture to succeed working on that basis?

I shall not keep the committee any longer to-night, except to sound this warning, unless we receive redress, and receive it very soon, the cattle raisers of Canada will have to go out of business unless we can find another market, because the Old Country market is not proving what we expected it to be.

Mr. BOYS: The minister told us that the special agent was Mr. Preston. I would like to get his initials, and to know something of his occupation, and if possible, the terms upon which his services as special agent have been secured by the department.

Mr. LOW: His initials are W.T.R.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That name has ravished my ears before.

Mr. SALES: What are his special qualifications for this investigation? What does he know about the business?

Mr. LOW: I have not the slightest doubt that he is qualified to carry on the investigation, and I hope that good results will follow.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When did he leave?

Mr. LOW: About six or eight weeks ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Had the Liberal organization given him leave of absence?

Mr. LOW: I do not understand why my hon. friend interjects these questions. He knows very well that Mr. Preston has no connection with the Liberal organization, and has not had for a number of years. I cannot understand why a gentleman of the standing of the leader of the opposition should ask such questions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is strange.

Mr. LOW: It is.

Mr. BOYS: What was his occupation before he went on that trip?

Mr. LOW: He is investigating the matters I referred to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was his occupation before?

Mr. LOW: I have no knowledge of what he was doing before. I knew he was quite capable of carrying on this investigation, and that is all I was concerned about.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was not his principal occupation before hanging around to get the job?

Mr. LOW: You seem to know more about him than I do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that.

Mr. LOW: I know he is a good man to carry on such an investigation, and I asked the government to put through the following order in council:

The committee of the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, advises that W. T. R. Preston be employed to investigate the alleged discrimination in freight rates covering Canadian shipments from Atlantic seaports, and also regarding the alleged combine in connection with such shipments in marine insurance, and to report on these subjects to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What date was that?

Mr. LOW: The 28th of February, 1924.

Mr. BOYS: I have endeavoured to find out what his occupation was before he took this work. It strikes me that it would be very desirable to know whether he knew something of these very questions he was going to investigate, discrimination in freight rates, and freight rates in general. Perhaps he has that qualification, but so far as I know he has not, and I would be glad if the minister would let us know whether he has or has not.

Mr. LOW: I have already stated that I thought he was one of the best men in the country to investigate such questions.

Mr. BOYS: He is a journalist or something of that kind, is he not?

Mr. LOW: It does not make any difference. I suppose lawyers are often appointed to investigate different matters. I imagine my hon. friend would say a lawyer was a good man to investigate matters in connection with the Grand Trunk railway. I am sure that a printer has some qualifications for such work.

Mr. BOYS: Is that what he is, a printer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is not the first step the government took towards meeting the situation?

Mr. LOW: It is not the first step we took towards meeting what situation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What preceded that?

Mr. LOW: When the delegates were going to England last fall I prepared a memorandum for them, pointing out that there was a discrimination against Canadian ports in the shipment of flour. I am sorry the ex-Minister of Finance is not in his place tonight because I think he made the remark that the difference did not amount to very much.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is in relation to flour. I mean in relation to cattle.

Mr. LOW: In relation to cattle? The negotiations opened up about the same time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As this?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is 28th February?

Mr. LOW: I think it was a little earlier than that. I think I carried on negotiations shortly before that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: With whom?

Mr. LOW: With the vessel owners in the city of Montreal and elsewhere. I had several meetings with them at which I endeavoured to persuade them to reduce the rate, but I was unsuccessful. However, negotiations are still going on and I purpose visiting England during the summer. That is one of the objects of my visit. The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) made the statement this afternoon that an equalization of rates between New York and Liverpool, and between Montreal and Liverpool, would not amount to very much. Well, the equalization amounts to about five cents a hundred, about ten cents a barrel, and about two cents on every bushel of wheat. My hon. friends can quite understand that if the Canadian miller is at a disadvantage of two cents a bushel it is a great handicap to him. We succeeded in having the rates equalized, and I think my right hon. friend will admit that was a great accomplishment. At any rate the farmers, as well as the millers, will admit that, because if the average miller was sure of a profit of ten cents a barrel on flour the year round he would be well satisfied. It is the great volume of flour that is manufactured that tells, and the mill must be run the whole twenty-four hours or it is almost impossible to make a profit in milling. I do not know whether I have given my hon. friend all the information he asked for.

Mr. BOYS: Now give us the terms on which he was employed?

Mr. LOW: The gentleman who was sent to England to investigate this matter? I will quote from the order in council:

> The committee, on the same recommendation, further advise that subject to instructions of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and while employed on the above work, Mr. Preston be paid remuneration at the rate of fifteen dollars ($15) per day for each day actually employed on the said work; and also that he be allowed for the time necessarily spent in travel while carrying on such work a living allowance not to exceed an average of ten dollars ($10) per day, in addition to actual cost of transportation while so employed.

Mr. BOYS: There is no limit as to time?

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister expect that Mr. Preston will require the $10,000 appropriation, or is some of that to be used elsewhere?

Mr. LOW: Some of it has already been used elsewhere. The chairman of the Imperial Shipping Committee was invited to visit Canada in connection with this investigation and we agreed to pay the actual expenses of the British visitors. Some of this vote will be used for that purpose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps it would be convenient for the minister to let us have the particulars as to how this estimate is made up—how much is set apart for Mr. Preston and how much for the other purpose?

Mr. LOW: There is no portion set apart for the other purpose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps it will not be enough?

Mr. LOW: The amount was arrived at after the estimates had been prepared. We were not sure just how much would be required so we estimated the figure at $10,000. If I remember rightly I think the expenses of the gentleman referred to amounted to $2,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Will the minister say whether there is any other provision made for taking care of Mr. Preston during the coming year?

Mr. LOW: For what?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Whether there is any other item in the estimates to take care of Mr. W. T. R. Preston during the coming year? The sum of $10,000 would surely not be sufficient. If this is the same W. T. R. Preston that I have in mind, I think he was acting in the inquiry into the freight rates on the lakes during the past summer.

Mr. LOW: He acted as secretary to the commission.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: And prior to that he was employed by the government in the Old Land. I have here some references to Mr. Preston which date back to 1898. I believe that almost continuously since that time he has been paid for acting in a somewhat similar capacity to that in which he will act during the coming year. This thing is getting threadbare. I do not believe the minister really knows Mr. Preston's record, and his ability to have items appear in the estimates for his particular benefit.

Mr. BOYS: Put him on annual salary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has ability to size up the situation himself without any advice from Mr. Preston.

Mr. LOW: I have not had time; he is preparing material for me.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Then all I can say is that if there is not time, and it is necessary to have someone make this inquiry, select some person whose reputation will bear investigation; do not appoint a political hack such as this, a discredited political hack, a man whose very reputation stank in the nostrils of the people of this province during the last twenty-five years. I doubt if there ever was in the history of the province of Ontario, or the Dominion of Canada, a man who had a more unsavoury reputation than this Mr. W. T. R. Preston. I noticed the present member for West Elgin (Mr. McKillop) sitting in his seat a few minutes ago and I asked him what year it was Mr. Preston was carrying on his operations in that constituency. There were two or three by-elections there inside of two years, in 1898 and 1899. The result of Mr. Preston's activities in that constituency was that the candidate of the Liberal party was elected, but when a recount took place it was found that more votes had been cast for that candidate than there were voters, in some of the polling divisions. An investigation was held and the Liberal who had been elected, Mr. Donald McNish, resigned his seat and protested against the methods which had been adopted. I have here a telegram that was sent out by Mr. Preston to Mr. McNish on the night of the election in that year. It reads as follows:

Heartiest congratulations. Sorry to the bottom of my heart cannot be with you to-night. To be supported by such a noble army of workers should make you the proudest man in Ontario.

This was the telegram that Mr. Preston sent to Mr. Donald McNish, the member who was supposed to be elected on that night. When the matter was investigated Mr. McNish resigned his seat and he had a statement published over his own signature as follows:

1. That a large number of persons were specially sent into the constituency by men working on behalf of the Liberal party for the express purpose of taking part, on Mr. McNish's behalf, in the election held January 12, 1899, and we believe that fraudulent and corrupt means were used by some of such persons to secure his election.

2. That several of the said persons illegally and without authority acted as deputy returning officers at the said election,—

That several of the said persons illegally and without authority acted as deputy returning officers at the said election, and in at least three cases so acted in the names of reputable local men, having under assumed names, been introduced to the returning officer by local agents of Mr. McNish.

3. That in many of the polling subdivisions of the riding there were grave irregularities connected with the return of ballot-boxes and their contents, the voting, and the counting of the ballots thereat.

4. That there were large numbers of persons brought into the riding for the express purpose of personating legitimate voters, and, assisted by some of Mr. McNish's local supporters, such persons did personate qualified voters in voting for Mr. McNish.

5. That the declared number of votes for Mr. McNish largely exceeded the number of bona fide votes cast for him.

That a large number of ballots cast for Mr. McDiarmid were in some nefarious and corrupt manner manipulated, whereby the result of the election was rendered doubtful, and that in this connection the voting at Shedden and Middlemarch, and in several divisions in St. Thomas, where said strangers so acted as deputy returning officers, merits special mention.

This is from Hansard of July 26, 1899, reporting the discussion in the House of Commons. This matter was threshed out upon that occasion and Mr. Preston was immediately appointed as an immigration agent in the Old Country in connection with the Department of Immigration and Colonization. While in that capacity he got into touch with the provincial Director of Colonization at Toronto, and this matter was also placed on the records of this House two or three sessions ago. In view, however, of Mr. Preston's renewed activities and his ability to have the government provide for him, I am going to read some of the methods which he was advocating at that time. This letter was dated and written on government stationery from 17 Victoria Street, London:

W. T. R. Preston to the Director of Colonization in the province of Ontario:

I have your letter of a late date on emigration to Ontario. You incidentally say in the letter that you are opposed to indiscriminate emigration. Well, in that respect you agree with everybody else. I do not know any one who suggests, or who would propose, that there should be indiscriminate emigration to that province. Whatever is done must be done carefully, and any who are sent out must be well selected emigrants. But don't run away with the idea that only well to do people, or those with money, are going to emigrate. If you are going to keep up a population in the old parts of the province you must be satisfied with sober, energetic and industrious emigrants. I know all you people are terribly afraid of the foreign element. Upon that point I don't agree with you and have no hesitation in saying that a good class of foreigners scattered about the old parts of Ontario will do very much more towards preserving a proper agricultural population than those from England for instance. Politically speaking I believe the introduction of a hundred families or so into some of those close ridings with the connection which could be had and maintained here would easily preserve for us many doubtful seats in that province. I know the anxiety or nervousness of the minister upon this question. Confidentially, I may tell you, I fear it bears some slight resemblance to one of courage. You know enough about politics to know that courage always beats. However as we don't agree upon that phase of the question we won't discuss it.

I have heard from the Wallaceberg people in answer to my letter of the middle of last month and I am now trying to meet their wishes among the best growers of Belgium. I will be over there in the course of a week or ten days and will then write to you as also to them, upon the outlook there.

Yours very truly,

W. T. R. PRESTON.

This letter was dated October 18th, 1901. Afterwards a good deal was heard—and some hon. members may recall this—about him and his connection with the notorious North Atlantic Trading Company which was subsidized by the government of that time, and when an inquiry was demanded, the information was refused to parliament at that time, on the ground that some of those connected with that company were people of high standing on the continent and that some of them would likely commit suicide should their names be divulged. Mr. Preston was one of those who were associated with that scheme, and this has been the case during all these years. During the past year Mr. W. T. R. Preston was secretary of the commission that was investigating freight rates on the lakes. Now he is going to be taken care of by the vote that is before the committee to-night in order to provide for his maintenance. He evidently has claims upon hon. gentlemen opposite that he insists upon having recognized. He is not the only one. I have referred, during this session and last session, to some other parties who evidently contend that they also have claims that must be recognized and who have been drawing their salaries and expenses out of the coffers of this country, illegally, as it was stated last session. The government absolutely refuse to grant a fiat to enable suit to be brought to recover the salary that had been paid to this other party. I claim that an item of this kind appearing in the estimates, with the minister stating that a portion of it, at least, is to go to pay for the services of Mr. W. T. R. Preston, is an item that ought to be struck out of the estimates. This country cannot afford to employ people of that character, discredited political hacks that have been a barnacle upon the Liberal party in the province of Ontario for the last twenty-five years. It is about time that we were dropping characters of that kind instead of reviving them. I do not believe the minister knew the character of this man or he would not have made the statement he made here to-night, that this man was to draw the major portion of this $10,000 item which is now before the committee. This is the first time that I have referred to Mr. Preston's operations in this House, although they have been referred to frequently by others. I know there are many members in the House who know nothing about Mr. Preston, but the minister can very easily obtain the information that he desires without this item at all. If this item is merely to provide for Mr. Preston, under the guise of performing a public service then it should not appear in the estimate at all.

Mr. LOW: I absolutely refuse to be drawn again to-day into a debate of mud-slinging and the style of debate that one would expect to hear from political wardheelers when a campaign is at its height.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I object to having any insinuations thrown across the floor of the House. I came into the House a few minutes ago and I found that the minister himself was referring to Mr. W. T. R. Preston. You cannot introduce the name of Mr. Preston in this House and expect to avoid anything of this kind.

Mr. LOW: My right hon. friend himself referred to Mr. Preston. Why should two or three gentlemen condemn Mr. Preston? There are other members of the House who may have an entirely different opinion of him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does the minister think of the letters, which he has heard read, signed by Mr. Preston?

Mr. LOW: To tell you the truth, I did not listen to them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then why does the minister describe something that he knows nothing about?

Mr. LOW: I heard enough of the remarks that were made in regard to the letters to know what they were about.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister expects to appoint a character like this at the expense of the country and have no one make any remarks about him? If so he quite fails to realize the character of hon. gentlemen in this House. This money is nothing but a piece of jobbery against the people of Canada; there is absolutely no justification for sending Mr. W. T. R. Preston to England to report on cattle rates—a man who has had no more to do with matters of this kind than anybody whom the minister might pick out of any newspaper office in this Dominion, or off the street. Mr. W. T. R. Preston is a man who ever since the election has been hanging around the door of the Liberal party wanting jobs all the time and getting them whenever the government could hand them out.

Mr. LOW: Did my right hon. friend never have men hanging around looking for jobs?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but we did not give them.

Mr. LOW: You did not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We did not send political hacks to England, at a cost of thousands of dollars to the people of this country, to look into questions in respect of which they had no experience whatever, no information and no qualification of any kind. A more absurd selection could scarcely have been made in the Dominion; I doubt whether the minister could have made one less acceptable to the farmers of Canada or to the people generally. Every one knows W. T. R. Preston. There is not a better known—or rather I should say a worse known—name in the political history of Canada. The minister may be going over to England this summer. Very well; let him go over and look into the matter. But do not send Mr. Preston over on the excuse that he is going to prepare the way for the minister. I find in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the House a statement which in the light of what is revealed to-night is more than amusing:

> As a stimulus to stock-raising in the Dominion, and of direct benefit to agriculture, the government has been endeavouring to obtain a lower carrying charge on all shipments of Canadian cattle.

Mr. LOW: Does the hon. gentleman object that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it is really amusing that the government should see fit to put that passage in the Speech from the Throne, on the basis of the facts revealed by the minister to-night. What were the efforts that were to be made? The first effort was for the minister to see some of the shippers and ask them to reduce the rates. He failed; and the next effort, the only other one, was on the very day the Speech from the Throne was delivered, to pass an order in council to send Mr. W. T. R. Preston to England.

Mr. LOW: Does my hon. friend not know that the negotiations had been carried on for several months?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister told us what they were. He told us that he himself failed in his request of the shipowners to reduce the rates; he told us that he was in Montreal with a view to having this done. This failure of the minister and the appointment of Mr. W. T. R. Preston are worthy of insertion in the Speech from the Throne!

Mr. LOW: The efforts of the Minister of Trade and Commerce were not, but the object was worthy of reference in the Speech from the Throne. Does my hon. friend know that almost every farmer in Ontario and in the province of Quebec, besides many in Alberta, have from six to ten steers to sell every fall?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is talking about that?

Mr. LOW: If we can accomplish something in lowering the rates will it not help the agriculturists of the country?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister think that is the point I am making?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. LOW: I know my hon. friend is trying to make out that what we are going to do is all wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I am making out is this, that the order in council appointing Mr. W. T. R. Preston to go to England, the day the speech from the Throne was delivered, is no basis for the presentation to parliament of a document of this kind. The thing is to laugh! Undoubtedly the subject itself is of paramount importance and warrants the visit of the minister to England. It is big enough, and if the minister accomplishes anything we will give him due credit upon his return. The minister claims to have already spent some time on the subject. He evidently will have to spend a little more before he knows as much about it as hon. gentlemen who have spoken to my left to-night, and behind me as well. He does not know very much yet about it. Nevertheless, he does know something about business and about freight in general, and it is quite right and proper that he should go and look after the matter. But we object to providing an excuse for keeping in some measure of comfort a political refugee of the Liberal party. It does seem to me extraordinarily strange that since the embargo was removed about a year ago, and during the very time these supposed efforts were put forth to reduce the rates, the rates should go up to the alarming figure they have now reached. If it is true—and I have no reason to doubt it; indeed I was astonished at the statement—that water carriage to-day is practically equal mile for mile to land carriage, then surely there is something wrong. And if it is equally true that for what cost $7.50 before the war $25 is charged to-day, unquestionably there is an opening for some remedy, even if we do go the length of providing competition by our own investment. I do not pretend to have any experience in the cattle business, but knowing as I do the conditions under which the cattle men lived before the war, when the rate was $7.50, it is inconceivable that the industry could exist under a $25 rate.

Mr. LOW: That is why I am anxious to provide a remedy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not complaining of that, but it is an awful start to make to send Mr. W. T. R. Preston over and make the provision for him the first charge against the campaign. The minister's own efforts may result in something, and we hope they will. Could he not give us an indication as to what he proposes to do? There is no reason why that could not be done; no time would be so suitable for him to do so as the present. I am not anxious to discuss the matter to-night but we would have this advantage, that we could come to the discussion much better informed if we had an intimation in advance as to what the nature of the proposed legislation is.

Mr. LOW: I would hardly care to discuss the matter without first having considered it fully with my colleagues.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil) told us a while ago that there was to be something, so that he evidently knows about it.

Mr. BOYS: It is 12.20 p.m. now and we have been working hard all day. During the past few days the House has been adjourning around 1 o'clock in the morning. This item is not large but it is an important one and it could stand further discussion. If the minister is not familiar with Mr. Preston's record perhaps a little more information could be given him if the item were allowed to stand. I do not like to make statements I am not sure of, but I do know something of what has been already stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland), and I feel confident that if the minister wants more information regarding Mr. Preston's record it can be got. Certainly it does not seem to me that Mr. Preston is the right man to send on a mission of this importance. If his investigations lead to nothing I doubt whether the members from the West will feel satisfied with any report he might make. I rose however to suggest that having in view the lateness of the evening this item might stand. The minister has made good progress and unless he wants to keep us until two o'clock he should report progress.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I would hardly think it possible that the minister would adopt the attitude he has taken in view of the statements that have been made regarding Mr. W. T. R. Preston. Transportation, not only inland but on the ocean, presents great difficulties from the standpoint of rates; the rates are absolutely prohibitive. Unless something is done therefore I do not know what the outcome is going to be for agriculture. If the minister insists on retaining Mr. Preston in his service I am going to move that the item be reduced by as large a figure as possible. Unless we have an assurance that the services of this gentleman are going to be utilised in some capacity in the interests of the country I will not be a party to voting this item. In view of the attitude of the government therefore I move that the item now before the committee be reduced by $9,999.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is not in order until it is in writing.

Some hon MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is absurd to suggest that the item can be carried before the hon. member has time to put the amendment in writing.

The CHAIRMAN: No effort is being made to write it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The amendment is in writing if the messenger will take it.

Mr. LOW: Just a word on the amendment. Is it the wish of this committee that the expenses of the Imperial Shipping Committee which visited this country to investigate freight rates on the ocean shall not be paid? If this vote is not passed there will be no means of paying those expenses. I propose carrying on an investigation with one object in view namely to secure if possible some reduction in the rates on cattle and other commodities going from Canada to the United Kingdom. The sum of $10,000 does not seem very much. It seems to be the impression of some hon. gentlemen opposite that we have not selected the right man. He has been appointed for a period of six weeks to two months. He will have the information as far as possible prepared and ready for me, and so long as he secures it I have no fault to find with him. The references that have been made to him do not enter into the question at all. The question is whether we think the vote is a fair and just one for the object for which it is intended, and the man whom I have selected will I think obtain the information that will enable me to carry on the negotiations successfully when I am permitted to visit England.

Mr. HOEY: How much of this is required to meet the obligations imposed by the shipping board?

Mr. LOW: About $2,000.

Mr. BOYS: There may be a little misapprehension. As I understand it, the vote is only for two-thirds of $10,000.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is that the item be reduced by $9,999.

Mr. BOYS: It is not what I asked, Mr. Chairman. I said that the vote is for two-thirds of $10,000; therefore it is really for $6,600.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: If $2,000 is required for this other service, the amount apparently voted to Mr. Preston would be $4,600. If my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) could see his way clear to make a change in his figures, I would be pleased that the amount to be voted should be the $2,000, and that $4,600 should be struck off.

Mr. LOW: There is no fixed amount for Mr. Preston; he may be in England for another month, he may not be. If he returns to Canada before I leave I shall be very glad.

Mr. BOYS: I appreciate that; but the minister has explained that of this $10,000 $2,000 is required for a specific purpose, and that the balance may or may not be required for a specific purpose, and that the balance may or may not be required for Mr. Preston. The vote is for two-thirds of $10,000, which would be $6,600. If the $2,000 is required for the building, that would leave a vote of $4,600, which would be devoted possibly—we will put it that way—to Mr. Preston.

Mr. LOW: Roughly speaking, he has an allowance of about $25 a day including expenses, which would be not more than $750 a month. If he is away, say, four months, the amount paid him will not be over $3,000.

Mr. MILNE: Is it not a fact that the Imperial Shipping Committee intervenes in complaints between shippers and shipowners; and has the Dominion a representative on that committee?

Mr. LOW: That is true.

Mr. HOEY: Who is the Dominion's representative?

Mr. LOW: Mr. Larkin.

Mr. MILNE: While the Imperial Shipping Committee apparently were effective in reducing rates, yet it seems to me that their action was effective only so far as the millers were concerned, because the cattle rate instead of being brought down even with the low rate was raised to make it on a par with the high rate. So it seems to me the commission did not accomplish very much. But why was not this matter of the cattle shipper presented to the committee when it visited Canada? I understand that at Winnipeg the evidence relating to the cattle trade was taken under protest, the chairman stating that the committee had received no instructions to investigate the cattle trade. The cattle rates having been a matter of contention for a good many years, I should like to know why this committee was brought over here at considerable expense to investigate the grain business, while the cattle business was not touched.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. LOW: I have already stated that the committee was asked to investigate the cattle rates as well as the grain rates. If my hon. friend will drop into my office to-morrow I shall be very glad to show him the letter of instructions which was addressed to the chairman of the Imperial Shipping Committee.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made by the minister that $2,000 of this vote has been expended for another purpose, and that the vote is for two-thirds of the amount appearing in the Estimates, with the consent of the committee I should like to change the figures in the motion now before the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: That cannot be done; the amendment must be withdrawn and a new amendment moved. The question is on the amendment, which has been already read to the committee. Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the committee to withdraw this amendment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BOYS: Will the minister not accept the suggestion we made? It is now thirty-two minutes past twelve. We have done a good day's business.

Mr. LOW: We have been discussing this all evening. I am willing to abide by the decision of the committee.

Mr. BOYS: Usually the minister is in charge of matters of this kind. We want to be fair to him, but I think he is getting on well. Surely he does not want to keep us here all night.

Mr. LOW: We might as well decide now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I move that the item now before the committee be reduced by $4,000.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) in favour of the principle of an inquiry into ocean freight rates?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Most assuredly I am, but I do not see any reason for employing a man of the reputation of W. T. R. Preston to make an inquiry of that kind. There are many competent men in the department who have all the knowledge required to make such an investigation. I doubt whether a trip across the ocean is necessary to secure the information that is required. I am satisfied that the minister, with his business acumen and the officers in his department can very quickly obtain all the necessary information without employing a character of this kind. Mr. W. T. R. Preston's whole record is against the utilization of his services in this capacity.

Mr. McKAY: What particular charge does the hon. member make against Mr. W. T. R. Preston?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I cannot make it any clearer than I have already made it. I gave a partial report of his history for the past twenty-five years. It has been placed on the records of this House time and again.

Mr. McKAY: The charges made by the hon. gentleman have been very general in their form. Nobody in this assembly this evening has been able to determine what the hon. member means by those charges. Let him make a specific charge against Mr. Preston.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Surely the charge made by the candidate in West Elgin, Mr. McNish, should be sufficient.

Mr. McKAY: Did the law proceed against him. Was action taken against him? Was anything proved against him? Nothing at all. I have known W. T. R. Preston for a number of years. I knew other organizers in Ontario who are dead and buried, but I am not one of those who wish to stir up the embers of the past. W. T. R. Preston is one of the cleverest men in Ontario. He may have been guilty, although not proven guilty, of indiscretions in elections he took part in. He was organizer for the Liberal party for a great many years and an abler man in that capacity never occupied the position. I can make charges against men, and prove them, too, who were organizers for the Conservative party, but that is not my province, nor is it my determination in getting up here to-night. But I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) to explain why in the election of 1917 in the Old Country W. T. R. Preston was arrested and kept in custody all day on a trumped up charge and released in the evening to prevent his activities during that day? Then I would like to ask the hon. gentleman to produce a booklet or pamphlet written by W. T. R. Preston entitled "Taking off the Lid," making serious charges in regard to that election across the pond, charges which have never been answered to this day, though they were broadcast through the length and breadth of Ontario, and although they have been in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite for a number of years?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have never seen it.

Mr. McKAY: These charges have never been answered. One can therefore understand the animosity toward W. T. R. Preston on the part of hon. gentlemen in that corner of the House to-night.

Mr. LOW: I had just one object in investigating the ocean rates. I selected Mr. Preston to do the preliminary work. He has been at it for the last six weeks or two months, and now by your amendment you ask the committee to repudiate the action of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If this vote does not carry there will be nothing to pay Mr. Preston. He has to be paid, but I am willing to stand behind the vote of the committee and will allow hon. members to decide whether I am taking the proper course in investigating the ocean rates at present in effect.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not need to make any comment on the minister's statement except this: His argument, if there was one, was to the effect that the government, having employed this man without the authority of parliament, now must have the money to pay him, no matter whether the government's action was proper or not. Parliament, if it has any authority at all, will exercise it in this case. As to the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. McKay) I do not think I am in a position to dispute that there is a measure of cleverness in W. T. R. Preston. I will concede also that for the purposes for which he was appointed as Liberal organizer he probably worked hard and had some qualifications; but I shall not define those qualifications. As to his being arrested in England, I did read about it. He was arrested by an army officer who, I understand, did not know who he was, and thought he was making a nuisance of himself. I did see the pamphlet that he wrote. He wrote it for the purposes of the Liberal convention, whereupon the Liberal convention passed a resolution that they wanted to get into power in order to investigate the charges of W. T. R. Preston, in order to investigate the awful scandals that he said had been perpetrated in England. They got into power by the storm they raised and under the dust they created, but they never investigated the charges. They have been two and a half years in office now, but they have shuddered at the brink. Now we have them in front of us; I want them to investigate the W. T. R. Preston charges. I want them to send a commissioner who is a commissioner to England to investigate them. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the worst of the charges were made against men who now are their closest friends. Catch them investigate the charges! Why, if the hon. member for North Renfrew came here with forks and tongs he could not prod them into it. So let the hon. gentleman not refer to charges that his own party are afraid to investigate. Preston's record smells to high Heaven in this province. As respects a matter of this importance, a matter that demands experience of a quality that he is foreign to as a stranger in the Dominion, this item is nothing but an outrage on the treasury and it is an insult to parliament to ask to have it voted.

Mr. SALES: I am sorry that a subject of so much importance to this country cannot be discussed without charges being hurled from one side to the other. We have tried to-night to talk business, serious business, business which affects our people and their getting a living. Speaking for my friends around me, I think I can say that we do not propose to take any part in the washing of old, dirty political linen. I am sorry we cannot talk business without that being brought in.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not matter who is appointed?

Mr. SALES: I am glad to see that all parts of the House realize the importance of this subject, and the responsibility for this appointment must be on the government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It rests with us if we vote the money.

Mr. SALES: I do not know what the qualifications of Mr. Preston are, and I asked the minister. I really think he might have been better advised if he had appointed Mr. Duncan Marshall. He has a knowledge of the subject at any rate, but I know that if he had been appointed hon. gentlemen to my right would have raised just as great a storm of protest as they are doing over this appointment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We sent him over to the Old Country three times last year.

Mr. SALES: I know what is said about him, but I repeat, he has a knowledge of this particular subject.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Better than Preston, all right.

Mr. SALES: Yes, but in my opinion the responsibility for this appointment must rest on the government. I believe the money should be voted for this inquiry, and I am not going to support the amendment.

Mr. BAXTER: The responsibility does not rest on the government alone. It rests upon everybody who votes for the item. Members need not be afraid that I am going at this hour to discuss Mr. Preston. I know very little about him anyway. But just assume that this government appointed a criminal from the penitentiary; I am not going to suggest that Mr. Preston is in that class at all, but suppose the government took a criminal out of the penitentiary and sent him over. Listening to what my hon. friend from Saltcoats has just said, that would be all right, the government had the power to do it; the responsibility be on the government, and then he votes to pay the money for something that he might not in private life say he would approve of, just because the government had done it. Can truckling go further?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I would just like to make one comment in reply to what my hon. friend from St. John has just said. The only evidence we members in this corner of the House have had so far as to Mr. Preston's alleged bad character has come from the gentlemen to my right. Now I have a great deal of respect for these gentlemen, particularly for some of them, but I have not been encouraged from what experience I have had in the past to take all their statements at their full face value, and unless I have other evidence to back up their statements, I do not propose to take them at their full face value. If there was other definite evidence apart from the statements that have been made which would go to prove something against Mr. Preston, and not merely statements on the floor of this House by men who, however honourable, are not without a slight tincture of partisan feeling, I would accept that evidence and vote against the appointment of an unsuitable man.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member consider it no evidence when a letter is read signed by the man himself, in which he urges the bringing out of foreign immigrants and keeping them, one hundred families in a county, for the purpose of keeping control of them and influencing an election?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am prepared to accept a written document of that kind at its face value. It was written, I understand, about twenty years ago. That man may have been a good Liberal organizer at that time, but that does not necessarily prove to me that he is not fairly honest in his business dealings.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He was not a Liberal organizer at that time. At the time he wrote the letter he was a commercial agent for the Dominion, and was paid a salary by the Dominion government.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Has the letter which was read, or have his actions which have been condemned, any bearing on his qualifications for investigating the cattle trade? If it were proved that this man were unsuitable I would take a chance on destroying the investigation by refusing to vote the money, but as it is I am not prepared to accept the statements at their face value. In spite of the gentlemanly remarks of the hon. member for St. John, somewhat characteristic of him, I am not prepared to accept his word, and I propose to take a gambling chance in voting $4,000 that the government is sufficiently alive to the sense of their responsibility to see that a man is appointed who has some qualifications, and I propose instead of destroying the possibility of any investigation, to vote for the item.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am afraid my hon. friend is fairly easily satisfied. If he is anxious to acquire some information with regard to Mr. Preston I would refer him to Hansard of July 26, 1899, page 8579, and of April 4, 1907.

Mr. PARENT: When have you been studying that?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: This is 1924.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Afterwards, while Mr. Preston was in the employ of the federal government he was a Liberal organizer for the province of Ontario.

Mr. KELLNER: Was he engaged in the 1917 election?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: He took an active part in the election overseas, and I only wish I had some of the literature over his signature that he circulated among the soldiers overseas, because if there was ever damning literature against any man it is the literature circulated by W. T. R. Preston on that occasion.

Mr. PARENT: Look in your back pocket. You might find it there.

Amendment negatived; yeas 13, nays, 41.

Item agreed to.

Inspection and Sales Act, administration of, $3,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister purposes going on now, I may as well warn him he will go on in vain.

Mr. LOW: I move that the committee rise and report progress, but I wish to say that I did not like the threat of my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It should not have been necessary.

Mr. LOW: If my right hon. friend had waited a moment he would have heard me move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Robb, the House adjourned at 12.58 a.m. (Friday).

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS

First and second reports of the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization.—Mr. Kay.

Second report of the selert standing committee on Marine and Fisheries.—Mr. Duff.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Mr. Thomas Vien (Lotbiniere) presented the tenth report of the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce as follows:

Pursuant to the Order of Reference from this House of the 31st of March, 1924, your committee, in view of the failure of the Home Bank, have considered the provisions of the Bank Act with a view to recommending such amendments to the act as would better protect the interests of bank depositors generally, and would prevent similar occurrences in the future:

And your committee are of the opinion that it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Bank Act and they therefore recommend that the said act be amended as follows:

That Section 56A of the Bank Act be repealed, and the following substituted therefor:

"Inspection:

"56A. 1. The Governor in Council on the recommendation of the minister shall appoint a person who in his opinion has had proper training and experience who shall be charged with the performance of the duties hereinafter mentioned. Such person shall be designated "Inpector General of Banks". The minister may direct some other such person to temporarily perform the duties of the inspector should the inspector, by reason of illness or other contingency, be unable to perform such duties.

"2. The Inspector shall hold office during good behaviour, but may be removed from office by the Governor in Council for misbehaviour or incapacity, inability, or failure to perform his duties properly.

"3. If the Inspector is removed from office for any such reason the order in council providing for such removal and documents relating thereto shall be laid before parliament within the first fifteen days of the next ensuing session.

"4. The Inspector while holding office shall not perform any service for compensation other than the service rendered by him under the provisions of this section.

"5. The minister may appoint or employ on the recommendation of the Deputy Minister of Finance and the inspector, such persons with training and experience and such clerical assistants as may be deemed necessary to carry out and give effect to the provisions of this section. Persons so appointed or employed shall receive such salary or remuneration as may be fixed by the minister".

" 6. The inspector, from time to time, but not less frequently than once in each calendar year shall make or cause to be made, such examination and inquiry into the affairs or business of each bank as he may deem to be necessary or expedient, and for such purposes to take charge of the assets of the bank or any portion thereof, if the need should arise for the purpose of satisfying himself that the provisions of this act have reference to the safety of the creditors and shareholders of each such bank are being duly observed and that the bank is in a sound financial condition. The inspector at the conclusion of each such examination and inquiry shall report thereon to the minister.

" 7. A copy of all reports made by the auditors of a bank to the general manager and to the directors under the next preceding section shall be transmitted or delivered to the minister by the auditors at the same time as such reports are transmitted or delivered to the general manager and directors.

" 8. The inspector, or person acting under his direction, shall have a right of access to the books and accounts, documents, vouchers and securities of the bank, and shall be entitled to require and receive from the directors, officers and auditors of the bank such information and explanation as he may deem necessary for the performance of his duties.

" 9. The inspector shall have all the powers conferred upon a commissioner appointed under the Inquiries Act for the purpose of obtaining evidence under oath, and may delegate such powers as occasion may require. Any person who refuses to give such evidence or to produce any book or document material thereto when required so to do shall be guilty of an offence against this act.

" 10. Whenever the inspector is satisfied that a bank is insolvent he shall report fully on the bank's condition to the minister and the minister may, without waiting for the bank to suspend payment in specie or Dominion notes of any of its liabilities as they accrue, request the association or the president of the association to appoint a curator to supervise the affairs of such bank, and such request shall have the same effect as if the bank had suspended payment in specie or Dominion notes of any of its liabilities as they accrued, and a curator shall forthwith be appointed as provided in section 117 of this act.

"11. The inspector shall be paid a salary fixed by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the minister.

" 12. All salaries, remunerations and other expenses incidental to giving effect to this section shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and the Consolidated Revenue Fund shall be recouped after the end of each calendar year for such outlay by an assessment upon the banks based upon the average total assets of the banks respectively during the year, as shown by the monthly returns made by the banks to the minister under section 112, and such assessment shall be paid by the banks.

"13. All persons appointed under this section shall be officers of the Department of Finance, but the provisions of the Civil Service Act, 1918, shall not apply to such persons.

" 14. Any bank or any director, president, general manager or any officer of a bank who directly or indirectly makes a loan or grant or gives any gratuity to the inspector or any other person appointed or employed under this section and the inspector or any such person who accepts or receives directly or indirectly, any such loan, grant or gratuity, commits an offence against this act, and is liable as provided in section 157 of this Act, in addition to any punishment otherwise provided.

" 15. The inspector or any person appointed or employed under this section who disclose to any other person, except the Minister and the Deputy Minister of Finance, any information regarding a bank, its business or affairs commits an offence against this act and is liable as provided in section 157 of the act.

" 16. Provided, however, that the government shall not incur any liability whatever to any depositor, creditor or shareholder of any bank, or to any other person, for any damages, payment, compensation or indemnity which he may suffer or claim by reason of this section or anything therein contained, or by reason of anything done or omitted to be done under the requirements thereof, or by reason of anything omitted to be done which is hereby required to be done, or by reason of any order or direction of the Governor in Council or of the minister in the execution or administration of the powers or any or them by this section conferred, or by reason of any failure or omission on the part of governor in council or of the minister or of the inspector or of any officer or employee of the government to execute or discharge any power, authority or duty thereunder, or otherwise by reason of any default, negligence, mistake, error or omission in the administration or discharge of the powers or duties which in any circumstances are by this section intended or authorized to be executed or performed; and no such payment, damages, compensation or indemnity, nor any claim therefor, shall in any case be authorized, paid or entertained by the government.

" 17. This section shall come into force on the first day of October, nineteen hundred and twenty-four, but it shall not be incumbent upon the inspector to examine all of the banks under the section during the calendar year one thousand nine hundred and twenty-four."

He said: I beg to move that the tenth report of the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: This I think will stand as a notice of motion. Some members state in my hearing that the report is so long and so important that they would rather have time to read it before it is adopted.

Mr. VIEN: This motion is made, Mr. Speaker, in order to allow the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) to introduce a bill based on the report.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent, of course.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the House would do justice to itself in accepting a report which embodies suggestions for a very important piece of legislation forming a distinct departure from the Bank Act, without the prescribed one day's notice.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouata): I beg to move that the third report of the Joint Committee on Printing be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: This will stand as a notice of motion.

WINDING-UP ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 197 to amend the Winding-up Act.

He said: Under section 34 of the Winding-up Act the liquidator may, with the approval of the court, sell any real and personal property belonging to the bankrupt estate and transfer it to any person or company. The amendment proposes to add the words, "for such consideration as may be approved by the court." The purpose is to remove doubts as to the power of the court to approve of the consideration when such consideration is other than cash or equivalent to cash.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE AND AUDIT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 198, to amend the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act.

He said: This amendment is designed to make it clear that the Deputy Minister of Finance will not be obliged to sign with his own hand Dominion government bonds, but may delegate it to an officer of the department to be designated by the Governor in Council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose it is putting the law in the same shape as in regard to Dominion bills.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 196 (from the Senate) for the relief of Annie Thirdie.—Mr. Hocken.

INLAND WATER FREIGHT RATES

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Inland Water Freight Rates Act, 1923, and to provide,—

1. That it be enacted in lieu of the provisions of section three thereof as to filing with the Board of Grain Commissioners of a tariff of rates to be charged, that every shipper (including a corporation) shall immediately after entering into any charter party, bill of lading or contract for the carriage of grain from Fort William or Port Arthur to any other port or place in Canada or the United States by lake or river navigation, and before the grain shall have been laden in pursuance thereof, file with the Board of Grain Commissioners of Canada a true copy of the said charter party, bill of lading or contract for carriage.

2. That the provisions as to posting up statements in detail of cargo space, time of shipment and destination, as prescribed by section six, be repealed, and that the penalty clauses of the said act be amended.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS AND HANSARD

Mr. SPEAKER: I have received the following letter from the Editor of Debates:

June 20, 1924

The Honourable the Speaker.

Sir,—I assume that your announcement in the House that you would call the attention of the chief of the Hansard staff to complaints of discrepancies, is a command to me to report upon the matter. I have the honour, therefore, to submit the following:—

The point to which Mr. Stewart (Humboldt) called attention is that certain items of the estimates, passed in Committee of Supply, and so recorded in the Votes and Proceedings, are not recorded in Hansard.

The notes of our reporters show that these items were passed without debate. In leaving such items unrecorded in Hansard, the reporters followed instructions given them, which instructions, so far as I know have stood unchanged ever since Hansard was established.

As this may seem to call for explanation, I submit further: It has always been assumed that the work of Hansard was limited to recording debates, the very title of our service—"Official Report of Debates"—indicating the bounds of our territory. Of course, certain items of the proceedings must be recorded also in order to make the report of debates intelligible, but we have never supposed that Hansard would be looked to as a record of proceedings.

Our reporters, and all of us who are engaged in the work of Hansard, are most desirous of performing our whole duty in the honourable positions we hold as servants of the House of Commons of Canada. In this case to which attention has been called, we followed what to us is immemorial custom, based, we assume, upon instructions originally given by competent authority.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

A. C. CAMPBELL
Editor of Debates.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I desire, with all respect, to refer to the statement made by Your Honour, and the letter which has been read from the Speaker's chair. I have the utmost respect for the Editor of Debates, but I have not so understood the purpose of Hansard, and I think it is an error if Hansard is continued on that principle. The letter of the Editor of Debates was designed to prove that Hansard was merely a record of debates as between one member and another of this House, and not as well a record of all the proceedings of the House, inclusive of statements by Your Honour and of motions passed without debate as read from the chair. I just turned up a Hansard which was on my desk, and I give this only by way of illustration. At page 3829 of the Hansard of last year, June 13, I find the following:

Royal Assent

A message was delivered by Colonel Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the Honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate.

And having returned,

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the Royal Assent to the following bills.

Then follow two and a half columns of bills that had been assented to. Thereupon there is no debate, and the next item is Supply. This clearly shows that Hansard is much more than a record of debates, it is a record of proceedings; and I think should be a complete record of proceedings. In this connection let me urge, or at least let me suggest, that if Hansard were a complete record of proceedings, which it certainly is, save to a very slight extent, and I think should be fully—this illustration shows it has been a record of more than debates—then really, I do not see what object is served by the Votes and Proceedings publication. A very great economy could be effected by abolishing the Votes and Proceedings publication altogether. All that is ever left out of Hansard is little, and I did not know there was anything intentionally left out, and I urge strongly there should be nothing. Let us have one record, and let that record be complete.

Mr. SPEAKER: This morning I had a visit from the Editor of Debates, Mr. Campbell, who is an old and trusted official who has served the House of Commons for almost thirty-five years, and he states that from time immemorial the debates have been reported as they are reported to-day. It so happens that at times items are carried without any debate at all, and Mr. Campbell says that his understanding has always been, and his instructions from the Debates committee have always been, that the reporters of his staff shall report only the debates. I must say to the House that if they have any other instructions to give to our very able staff of Hansard reporters the matter should be referred to the Debates committee. The Debates committee does not meet very often, but it should meet on such an occasion at least.

Now as regards the Votes and Proceedings, which constitute the official record of what takes place before the House, let me read from Bourinot at page 182, speaking of the officers of the House of Commons and their duties, he says:

The clerk of the House is its recording officer, appointed by the Crown under the great seal of Canada and holds office during pleasure, virtually until his health or age no longer permits him to perform his duties. He has also, by the terms of the Civil Service Act, the rank of deputy minister, and in the operation of that act is charged with special duties and functions with respect to clerkships of the staff of the House. He takes notes of the proceedings of the Commons without any reference to the debate. He is "to make entries, remembrances, and journals of the things done and passed in the House of Commons; but it is without warrant that he should make minutes of particular men's speeches". His minutes, technically styled "the scroll", are made up every day in a brief and convenient shape, known as the "votes and proceedings," which comprise a record of all the proceedings, but omit many of the parliamentary forms which are given in full in the journals, when these are extended after the close of a session. He signs the orders of the House, endorses addresses and bills sent or returned to the Senate and reads whatever is required to be read in the House.

This shows that the Votes and Proceedings and the Scroll constitute the authentic record of what takes place in the House. But if it is the desire of the House, as suggested by the right hon. leader of the opposition, that Hansard should report what from time immemorial until to-day, Mr. Campbell states, has never been reported, that is items that are passed without any debate, it is for the House to instruct the Debates committee accordingly. I am informed by Mr. Campbell that he would accept the directions of the House in the matter. He is a very able and trusted official of the House of Commons.

Mr. HOCKEN: What duty or function has the committee of Debates to perform?

Mr. SPEAKER: Such matters as are referred to it by the House of Commons concerning the report of debates, the qualifications of the Hansard reporters, and matters generally concerning the official report of evidence before committees.

Mr. HOCKEN: I have been a member of that committee for the last two or three years, but I do not remember a meeting having been held.

Mr. SPEAKER: Possibly it is because as a matter of fact—and I am very sincere—the reports of the proceedings of the House by our Hansard staff are creditable to the country and to the House. I think I may say that.

Mr. T. W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, there was no thought in the mind of any members in the House to reflect either upon the Editor of Debates or upon the reporting staff of the House when this question was raised yesterday. I have been a member of this House for a number of years and this is the first time it has been called to my attention that items of Supply are treated differently when they are debated and when they are not. I can hardly understand why there should be any difference in the method of reporting in connection with the calling of an item when it is debated and when it is not. The saving effected in not reporting the items called and passed without debate would be infinitesimal. If the committee would rule that the debates on some of these estimates should not be reported, I think that condition might be justified; it seems to me that in some cases a good part of the discussion might be cut out. For instance, we find on page 3438 of yesterday's Hansard, to illustrate what I mean, the following item:

Honorary Advisory Council of Scientific and Industrial Research, $120,000.

If this item had not been discussed it would appear in that form and the only additional words would be, "Item agreed to." I would certainly recommend that the method be changed, and I say that without any desire to reflect upon the Editor of Debates, for whom I have the highest respect both for his ability and for his thoughtful care over the new members of the House—as we all were once. I am sure there is no thought of reflecting upon him in any way.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sure that the Hansard reporters will take heed of the remarks made this afternoon and that it will not require even the calling of the Debates committee to have that little reform instituted.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): In justice to the present staff of reporters, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I have been a member of this House for over twenty years, and this is not the first time it has come to my notice that when items in the estimates are carried without discussion they are not reported in Hansard and that we have to look at the Votes and Proceedings to find them. That has always been the case, and I do not know that we should transform Hansard into an official record of the proceedings of the House. It is rather a report of the discussions for the information of those who desire to know what takes place in the House, but it has never had the character of being as official as some members would like it to be. Perhaps we would all suffer if it were so. It happens that our mistakes in speeches, either in French or in English, are corrected in Hansard, and it is good for all of us; if it were an absolutely official report of what took place many of us would suffer. Perhaps the reporters will view it in that way.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest it might be a wise thing for the Debates committee to meet and discuss this situation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I just wish to mention, because it seems to have been overlooked, that the case to which I called attention shows that the rule has not prevailed.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): My long experience in this House enables me to state that Hansard has never been looked upon as an official record of the House. The Votes and Proceedings, transformed into the Journals of the House at the end of each session, and signed by the Speaker, constitute the official record of this House; and if you wish to give evidence in a court of justice as to what really occurred in parliament you must produce this document, not Hansard. The drawback of Hansard is that when you seek information on any particular item which was not discussed in parliament there is a likelihood that no mention of it is made in Hansard, therefore Hansard is deficient in that respect. I think it would be a good thing if all the actions of this House were reported in Hansard, so that this costly publication, the suppression of which has been discussed a dozen times during my experience, should at least be a complete record of the proceedings of parliament. If that were done you would not have to refer back for this information to the journals of the House, a publication which few people possess outside of members of the House, while on the other hand, Hansard is distributed to the public libraries and generally throughout the country and is easily accessible. As I say, Hansard is deficient in that respect; when there is no debate the reporters are not required to make any mention of the undebated subject, but for the convenience of the readers of Hansard it seems to me that mention ought to be made of these matters. But if we are to say that Hansard is the official record of parliament we shall have to go back on our present procedure. We had a very stubborn debate on the question here some years ago when the suggestion was made that the French and English journals of the House be combined, making one a mere translation of the other. I think that before any move at all is made in the matter, the Debates committee should meet, as you suggest, Mr. Speaker, discuss all sides of it and then make a recommendation to the House.

Mr. G. H. BOIVIN (Shefford): It will be a pleasure for me to call the members of the Debates committee together some time next week in order that this matter may be discussed. But I would like to say now that my own opinion agrees very much with that of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and that is that Hansard should not be made an official report of the proceedings of this House. I understand that it would be advisable, if possible, to make mention in Hansard of the different votes passed in committee of Supply. Still, if hon. members give the matter a moment's reflection they will see that there are many objections to that plan. The reporter sitting at his table, having the estimates before him as a guide, is obliged to rely upon his hearing and upon the statement made by the Chairman in deciding whether or not a vote or a motion has been passed. Very often an item is called; the minister says "stand," and it is placed to one side. Sometimes a nod of his head to the Chairman is all that takes place and if that item is recorded in Hansard with no notation whatever—if the word "stand" is not used or is not heard by the reporter—then that item appears in Hansard to have been passed.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does this not apply to the items that are discussed? The Hansard reporter must depend on his hearing in regard to them.

Mr. BOIVIN: Absolutely; but when an item is discussed the Hansard reporter uses the description of the item as it appears in the estimates as a heading for the discussion and the discussion or debate appears in Hansard. Sometimes items are passed after they have been discussed and the fact that the item is carried may not appear in Hansard. Sometimes an item is postponed by unanimous consent, and the fact that it is postponed may not be recorded. There is only one man in this House in a position to state whether an item has been passed or not. He holds the responsible position of Assistant Clerk of the House, and sits beside the Chairman of Committees. When an item is passed it is signed by the Chairman of the Committee and is recorded by the Assistant Clerk. From the Assistant Clerk's record the Votes and Proceedings are compiled, and are signed by the Speaker. That record is carefully checked over by three or four officials before it is printed and placed upon each member's desk the following morning as the official record of the proceedings of parliament. If you are going to place upon the Hansard reporters the responsibility of saying whether an item has been passed or not you will sometimes find a contradiction between the Hansard and the Votes and Proceedings and you will have the same trouble now complained of. Every time there happens to be an apparent contradiction there will be more or less confusion; some hon. members will swear by Hansard, and others will rely only upon the Votes and Proceedings. In my opinion there should be only one official record of the proceedings of the House and that should be the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. CALDWELL: Do I understand the hon. member to say that in no case is the fact that an item is carried after discussion recorded in Hansard?

Mr. BOIVIN: No. What I said was that in some cases when items are carried the fact is recorded and in other cases the fact is not recorded. It depends a great deal upon the way in which the item is passed; upon the way in which the next item is read; upon whether two or three items are carried together, or whether they are read separately. It is imposible for the Hansard reporter to give an absolute and faithful report unless a certain course is followed. It would be necessary for the Editor of Hansard to delay publication of the day's debates and obtain from the Clerk of the House official confirmation of the passing of the items. If hon. members wish that to be done it will delay the printing and they will not have Hansard on their desks the following morning at ten o'clock. After a prolonged sitting of the House the report is voluminous and the printing of Hansard is consequently delayed. With the proposed change it would be further delayed and not distributed until three, four or five o'clock in the afternoon.

Before I take my seat let me add that I would be very glad to have the Debates committee consider the suggestion made by the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) that discussion in committee be omitted altogether from Hansard. I have often thought that if the reports of the debates were limited to speeches made when the House was sitting with the honourable the Speaker in the chair, and if the reports of debates in Committee of the Whole on a bill, in Supply, or in Ways and Means, were not recorded in Hansard, the rules governing debate would be more strictly adhered to and the sessions of the House would be abridged by at least two months or almost half of their entire duration.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then we should not have a repetition of each by-election when items were considered in committee of Supply.

Mr. BOIVIN: If hon. members deem it advisable to consider this innovation, it can also be discussed when the Debates committee meets next week and then further debated by hon. members when the ordinary motion is made in connection with the report of the committee which must be presented to the House.

STRIKE OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (East York): Will the Acting Postmaster General be good enough to state the exact position of the postal controversy at the present time, more particularly with reference to the city of Toronto.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Acting Postmaster General): The situation is clearing very rapidly. In Nova Scotia the mails are moving quite normally, there is no difficulty. The same is true of New Brunswick, of eastern Quebec and of Prince Edward Island. Last night in two instances the trains leaving Quebec were not fully manned. They are all fully manned this morning, and Quebec is in a normal condition. In Montreal a considerable number of the regular men are still out on strike. Their positions are being filled very rapidly, and a great many of the employees who went out are coming back. Just before 12 o'clock to-day I had notification that there were five hundred men trying to break into the office to get employment. In the West there has been no disaffection at all. In Hamilton the men returned this morning. We enlisted yesterday about 130 men in that city, but all the strikers returned to duty this morning so that at the moment we are overmanned in Hamilton. Of course, it is understood that the men who are coming back are returning absolutely without any promise of permanent employment; that is a matter that will have to be adjusted later. We are still short of men in Windsor, but as it is not an important distributing point we are not suffering very much inconvenience. I think that in all the smaller post offices in Ontario at 2 o'clock to-day, with the single exception of Brantford, all the men had returned to work. That statement may not be absolutely correct, but it is a fair summary of the situation. There are about 1,400 men out in Toronto, and in that city we had enlisted yesterday up to midnight about 500 men. At 10 o'clock this morning I issued instructions that no more were to be taken on. I think I can say, with some hope that the statement will be verified that the striking postal employees in Toronto will think better of their action. I have given them until 8 o'clock to-morrow morning to return to duty. If they do not return by that hour they can consider themselves as permanently out of the service.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Was the same concession granted to the striking employees in Montreal?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It applies everywhere. The situation in Toronto is that we have been unable to deliver the mails fully to the business houses, but that is to be expected when 1,400 men walk out almost without a moment's notice. We will, we anticipate, be able to move the eastern and western mails to contiguous points and sort them to-day, so that in a couple of days we should be able to restore the movement of the mails to almost a normal condition. In conclusion I wish to say that as Acting Postmaster General I appreciate very much the patience of the public, and the prompt manner in which the business houses and other institutions that are affected rallied to the support of the department and endeavoured to maintain normal conditions in the movement of the mails.

Mr. HUGHES: Will the men who have been taken on be protected and retained in the service?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is a very difficult question to answer at the moment; it will require a great deal of thought. All I can say is that very full consideration will be given to the case of the men who have been taken on even in a temporary way.

SEIZURE OF STEAMSHIP JEANNE D'ARC

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DOUCET (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on the 24th of March last, the House ordered the production of all correspondence relating to the seizure and release of the steamship Jeanne d'Arc for a breach of the customs regulations. Would the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) see that his department obeys the order of the House. I think that between March 24 and this day the department should have found the time of producing this correspondence.

Mr. BUREAU (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is due to an error if the said report has not already been laid on the Table of the House, I was under the impression that it had been and I thank my hon. friend (Mr. Doucet) for having drawn my attention to the fact that it has not. I shall see that it is brought down on Monday.

GOLD AND SILVER MARKING ACT 1913, AMENDMENT

The House resumed from June 19 consideration in committee on Bill No. 176, to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act 1913 (Hon. Mr. Low), Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—"Platinum" to be applied only to articles of defined component parts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has the minister a new bill to-day?

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) said he thought the present draft was fairly clear but thought that the minister should give way to the suggestion of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and allow the matter to stand over for another day, until he could have an opportunity of taking up the matter with the Justice department. It is somewhat encouraging and certainly refreshing, after the long debate which took place yesterday, to be able to come back to the House and say that the Justice department has borne me out in every interpretation which I have placed on section 12. I refer now to Hansard, and I find that my right hon. friend said:

> I should like to get the minister to understand if I could.

This afternoon I will use exactly the same words to the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) and I say to him, I would like to be able to get the right hon. leader of the opposition to understand, if I could.

This section was first suggested by a resolution by the Canadian Jewellers' Association, assembled in the city of Windsor about a years ago. They submitted a clause which they felt would meet the requirements, and my department sent the clause to the Justice department with instructions to draw up a bill which would meet the requirements. The bill as drawn was sent back to the Justice department this morning, and they inform me that the deputy minister conferred with the assistant deputy minister, and that they decided that the clause was so clear that no ordinary person could misunderstand its meaning. They called in the Deputy Minister of Justice and called in an authority on drafting bills in the department. This gentleman stated that the clause as worded was so clear that he could not see that any change could be made. The clause was inserted in the bill, and, as I said yesterday, it means exactly what it states. Yesterday I stated, in answer to a question of my right hon. friend:

> Ninety-five per cent of the whole article represented as platinum.

Again I said:

> I think it is ninety-five per cent of the whole article. What value would there be in it if the article might contain ninety-five per cent of other inferior metal?

And the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) asked the same question, and I think I replied to him that that was the meaning I gave to it. I understand now, after a further reference to the Justice department, that that is what the bill is intended to cover—that the article must contain ninety-five per cent of platinum. Then again, the object of the jewellers, the people who handle platinum goods in this country, was simply that the word "platinum" should only appear on articles that contained ninety-five per cent platinum. Now with reference to "platinum" and "element platinum," there is practically no difference. The words "element platinum" are used to designate the purest kind of platinum, and these words are inserted in the bill in order to afford the greatest protection possible, this being specially necessary when the metal is to be used for scientific purposes. I hope I have made myself clear to my right hon. friend. The Justice department bears out my interpretation, and backs up their interpretation with the statement sent to my department when the bill was submitted to them that the bill stated exactly the intention of the act in the clearest kind of words.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the minister the ruling of the Justice department in writing?

Mr. LOW: If my right hon. friend doubts the statement for one minute I will have no trouble in obtaining the opinion in writing. It was stated most emphatically. Sometimes it does not suit my right hon. friend to call for things in writing. I would remind him of an occasion when he debated the wording of an order in council for over an hour. He said that the wording was the most clumsy wording that could be produced,

4 p.m. and yet when it was produced it was found to be the baby of my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What one was that?

Mr. LOW: Ten years ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the minister identify it?

Mr. LOW: If my hon. friend will turn up Hansard he can find it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not had much time to come to any practical conclusion. The only one that I have come to is that the minister is absolutely hopeless. He comes to the House now and tells us that the Justice department confirmed every interpretation he gave when the subject was last under debate. Well, if he had produced the opinion of the Justice department and read it to the House, I am quite certain that all members of the House would have understood it. As it is, I fancy that no human being understands what the Justice department's opinion is. If it is that which the minister has set forth;—well, I was going to say it is nonsense, but I will not say that, because I know the opinion of the Justice department is not that; I am quite certain it is not. I have no doubt at all that the Justice department declared the words to mean just what they say; and I do not think there is any difference of opinion in the House as to what they mean. In fact, I do not think that there is any difference of opinion except in the minister's mind, and I am afraid he is still under a misapprehension. My conclusion, therefore, is that the minister is hopeless. The confusion on the last occasion was due to the minister's persistence in the view that the effect of this clause, just as it stands, was to compel all articles, in regard to which the word "platinum" or any compound thereof was used, to be 95 per cent platinum. No one else took that view, not even the hon. member for Battleford (Mr. McConica) who was so sure about the matter.

Mr. LOW: If my right hon. friend will read Hansard of yesterday he will see that he himself thought it meant that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This minister is more hopeless than ever; I never said that nor did anyone ever think it, except himself. The minister should first understand the Department of Justice and then repeat their opinion accurately to the House. He has not done that. What the Department of Justice told him, I have no doubt, was that the clause means precisely what it says; and what it says is that the platinum, or the substance purporting to be platinum, shall be 95 per cent element platinum or platinum with iridium.

Mr. LOW: That is not correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the minister had better get the opinion of the department and read it.

Mr. LOW: Read the section; it covers it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have all read it and we know what it means; the only one who is confused about it is the minister. Some of the rest of us thought that while there was no question as to the meaning of the clause it would be better if it were worded in the form used before, both because it would be clearer and because that form was the established one. But as to what the effect of this is, there was no difference of opinion in the House, and there is no difference of opinion among hon. members now. The minister seems utterly incapable of getting the meaning of the words. So far as I am concerned, as the minister seems hopeless, he may go ahead and pass the legislation in any shape he wants.

Mr. BOYS: I asked the minister yesterday a question which he did not answer. Is this intended to apply to the whole article or only to the plate surface?

Mr. LOW: It is intended to apply to all articles containing at least 95 per cent pure platinum. Is that not plain enough?

Mr. BOYS: I have the utmost respect for the minister and I do not believe he is trying to evade the question; but certainly he is not answering it. Let me put it to him again. We have a ring, say: Is this clause intended to mean that 95 per cent of the entire ring is to be platinum or iridium? Or, if that ring is plated with platinum, does it mean that 95 per cent of the plate shall be platinum or iridium? That is what I want to know.

Mr. LOW: Ninety-five per cent of the ring must be platinum. Surely, when 400 jewellers in the Dominion have requested that this legislation be passed, and have stated over the long distance telephone today that it is what they want, we ought to assume that they know what they want better than does the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen).

Mr. BOYS: The minister seems to have great faith in the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), so far as this matter is concerned. At the bottom of the first column on page 3397 of Hansard there appears an amendment which I proposed which would make the point absolutely clear. I closed my remarks, after proposing the amendment, with these words:

> That amendment would make it apply to the whole article and not merely to the plating upon it.
> Mr. McMaster: That clearly is not the intention.

Yet the minister suggests to the House today that there is absolutely no doubt as to what the section means. I ask him to read that comment of the hon. member for Brome, in whose opinion he seems to have so much confidence; that hon. member took a view directly opposite to the construction which the minister puts upon the section.

Mr. LOW: Surely not.

Mr. BOYS: Pardon me, he does. I do not see the sense of this controversy, because we understand now that the intention is that the section shall apply to the whole article. I would suggest, in passing, in place of the cumbersome phraseology 950/1000ths the minister simply use the words 95 per cent. If 95 per cent of the whole article must be platinum or iridium there should be no difficulty about stating that in plain words; surely to goodness the English language is capable of such a use. The minister is positive to-day, but yesterday he was not so sure of himself. He has only to read the answers he made to the questions I put to him, to come to that conclusion; he has only to refer to what the hon. member for Brome and the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton both stated, to be convinced that his position has been wrong. There is not a single member who has spoken on this question who has not taken an opposite view to the minister's. Why not put the thing right? The public should be protected. If you buy a ring and it is said to be platinum you ought to know what you are getting. Do not let any jeweller or storekeeper be in a position to deceive the public. I am glad to hear the minister definitely say that this does mean that 95 per cent of the whole article is to be platinum. The section, however, to put it mildly, is most doubtful, and legislation, to be useful, should leave no room for doubt. I do not mean to say for a moment that what I offered yesterday was the last word on the subject, but I do think that if the minister will adopt my suggestion he will find that it will clarify the intention which he seeks to convey; it will make the section very much clearer than it now stands.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have no wish to delay the bill or to embarrass the minister, my sole concern being to see that both parties to the sale and purchase of platinum articles shall be protected. I quite agree with the minister that the jeweller is completely protected under this bill, but I do not think that the people who purchase the goods will be similarly protected. I direct the attention of the minister to the wording of the section:

> The word "platinum" or any contraction, abbreviation or colourable imitation thereof shall not be applied, either alone or in combination with any other word, to any article of merchandise composed wholly or in part of any metal—

And so on. There is the point I refer to: The section provides that the article may be "wholly or in part" of this metal.

Mr. LOW: I had the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, the Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice, another member of the same branch and the Law Clerk of the House, and these men state positively that the section is clear. Am I to listen to one or two members opposite and take their advice as against the advice of eminent lawyers such as Mr. Newcombe?

Mr. CALDWELL: We are not pitting our opinion against that of the Deputy Minister of Justice on any matter of law, but the interpretation of this section is a matter of common sense. I agree with the minister that it means what it says, but I do not think that the section means what the minister says it means. I think the words "or in part" should be eliminated so that the section would properly read:

> The word "platinum" or any contraction, abbreviation or colourable imitation thereof shall not be applied, either alone or in combination with any other word, to any article of merchandise composed wholly of any metal. . . .

If this section passes as drafted, in my opinion a jeweller would be able to make a ring plated with platinum—if that is possible—and if 95 per cent of the plating was platinum, to stamp it with the word "platinum", and the public might buy the ring believing it was solid platinum. If you cut out the words, "or in part", to my mind there would be no doubt as to what was meant; as the section stands I think its meaning is very doubtful. I believe, with the Justice department, that this section means just what it says, but apparently they were not able to convince the minister that it does.

Mr. LOW: Surely we agree that the clause means that any article upon which the word "platinum" is stamped must contain at least 950/1000ths, or 95 per cent, of pure platinum.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then why are these three words, "or in part" inserted?

Mr. LOW: The article must be either of pure platinum or of platinum to the extent of 95 per cent.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then why these words: "to any article of merchandise composed wholly or in part of any metal unless 950/1000ths of component parts of the metal appearing or purporting to be platinum of which said article consists"?

Mr. McCONICA: Let us suppose the article is a diamond ring set in platinum, then the platinum would be platinum and the diamond would be diamond, and the whole thing would be a ring and would comply with this definition. If it were a shot gun, the barrels would be platinum and the stock would be wood, and it would comply with this provision.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. McCONICA: So far as it purports to be platinum it must be 95 per cent pure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all right.

Mr. McCONICA: That is what it says; that is what it means; and that is what it is intended to mean.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If my hon. friend can get that into the minister's head he will be doing well.

Mr. CALDWELL: Following the line of reasoning of the member for Battleford (Mr. McConica), if a bar of half-inch iron is plated with platinum, then it can be stamped "platinum", because the part which purports to be platinum, the plating, will comply with this section. I think the illustration of the member for Battleford should convince the minister that the section does not mean what he thinks it means.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Let me call the minister's attention to a common article of jewellery, a lady's bar pin or bracelet jewelled. The jewels are actually set in platinum, but on account of the expense of that metal the balance of the metallic portion of the pin or bracelet is made up of what is called white gold, bearing the appearance of platinum. Could an article of that kind be stamped "platinum?"

Mr. LOW: Not unless it contains 950/1000ths of pure platinum or platinum in conjunction with iridium.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then what is the object of the words, as the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) points out, "or in part?" The "part" of the article would be the clasp holding the stones, and it might be stamped "platinum" if those words are allowed to remain.

Mr. LOW: The clasp must contain 95 per cent pure platinum or platinum in conjunction with iridium before the word "platinum" is allowed to be stamped upon it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then why not strike out those words, "or in part?"

Mr. LOW: If these words were deleted it would not be permissible for the article to contain 5 per cent of any other metal than platinum.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is what I say, you should not stamp the bracelet or pin "platinum" when the body of it is composed of white gold.

Mr. LOW: Do you contend that it should be 100 per cent pure?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I mean the whole article should be platinum, not part of it platinum and part of it white gold. I think the words "or in part" are objectionable there.

Mr. CALDWELL: Possibly this will make it clear to the minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will not.

Mr. CALDWELL: Suppose the section were altered to read, "any article of merchandise composed wholly of any metal of which 95 per cent shall be platinum?" Surely the minister would not contend that, so worded, the section would mean that the article must be 100 per cent platinum. I think that is as clear as day—it is to me. If the section read, "to any article of merchandise composed wholly of platinum unless 95 per cent was platinum," I admit the minister would be right, the article would have to be 100 per cent pure. Worded as I suggest, the clause is short and plain.

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Chairman, I did not take any part in the discussion yesterday, indeed I did not listen very closely to it, and therefore I approach the matter entirely unprejudiced. I have read the section to see what interpretation I would put upon it. This is my interpretation: That the clause refers to the metal of which, we will say, a ring is composed, and is intended to mean that 95 per cent of the metal which goes into the ring shall either be platinum or platinum in conjunction with iridium.

Mr. LOW: That is right.

Mr. BROWN: That is the meaning I put upon this clause. In other words, whatever metal it is composed of, 95 per cent pure platinum or platinum in conjunction with some other metal shall form part of the whole composition.

Mr. LOW: That is the interpretation which I have placed on the clause for the last twenty-four hours, but my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) says I am "hopeless."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. LOW: I was not too "hopeless" to be returned for my constituency where I have resided for the past thirty-five years. I think it ill becomes my right hon. friend to interject such objectionable remarks into the discussion of a very simple bill. The interpretation which I have put upon the clause is exactly the same as the interpretation of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown).

Mr. MEIGHEN: I admit, though the minister objects to the words, that they only express my feelings. I have done my best to explain to the minister what this section means, but without success; and from what he says I think the Deputy Minister of Justice has made a similar effort, but evidently he did not succeed any better.

Mr. LOW: Cannot I make my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) understand—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand the section as thoroughly as I ever understood anything.

Mr. LOW: —that any metal offered for sale as platinum, no matter what its metallic contents, must contain at least 95 per cent platinum alone or in conjunction with iridium before the word "platinum" can be stamped upon it. My right hon. friend suggested a few minutes ago that we make it read 100 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never said that.

Mr. LOW: I think he referred to some percentage.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. LOW: Gold is treated in the same way; it must contain 92½ per cent pure gold before it is allowed to be stamped as gold.

Mr. STANSELL: I think this bill is of sufficient importance for us to understand what it means; otherwise how can we expect the public to understand it? If I followed the minister correctly, he says that the purpose of this bill is that any article offered for sale and stamped "platinum" must contain 95 per cent platinum. Is that correct?

Mr. LOW: That is correct. I am glad that there is at least one member behind my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) who understands the meaning of this clause.

Mr. STANSELL: The minister did not allow me to finish. If this bill is for the protection of the public, then I say it does not accomplish that object, and I am not concerned with what the Minister of Justice or any one else may say about it. The bill says:

> Any article of merchandise composed wholly or in part of any metal unless 950/1000ths of component parts of the metal appearing or purporting to be platinum—

And so on. Under that provision an article in which a stone is set may be stamped platinum if 95 per cent of the small portion surrounding the stone is pure platinum; the remainder can be any metal whatever. That is the only interpretation to be put upon it.

Mr. LOW: I am glad at least that the hon. member agrees that it means 95 per cent platinum. I am willing to accept the opinion of such eminent lawyers as Mr. Newcombe, Mr. Edwards, the assistant deputy minister and another lawyer in the Department of Justice, experts in drawing bills, who passed upon this drafting. They say that the clause is as clear as it is possible to make it, and I am going to stand by that opinion of the Justice department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What did my hon. friend submit to the department?

Mr. LOW: I had my deputy go over to the Justice department with me, taking the file of correspondence between the Department of Justice and the Department of Trade and Commerce in connection with the preparation of the bill. I took Hansard with me, showed them some statements of hon. members, and asked them whether the clause was sufficiently clear to carry out the intent of the measure. They said that the clause clearly provided that the article must contain 95 per cent of pure platinum or element platinum, and that no other words could make it clearer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the minister will do me this justice. I have said quite a little on this bill yesterday and to-day as to what it means. The minister has been trying hard to score on me by some indefinite references to something nobody ever heard of. But he will score wonderfully on me now if he will take from Hansard any sentence I have uttered as to the meaning of this clause and bring to the House a statement from the deputy minister that I am wrong to the extent of a shadow.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am satisfied that this bill does not carry out the minister's intention; it does not protect the legitimate jewellery trade but will permit improper and unlawful marking of goods as platinum which are not platinum. These words "wholly or in part" in the fourth line are the words that are going to create the difficulty. I cannot do better than give the minister the illustration I gave him before. Take the case of a jewelled bar pin where the jewels are actually set in platinum which is 95 per cent pure. The remainder of the pin, however, is white gold, made to resemble platinum—a very much cheaper metal. That bar pin is "wholly or in part" platinum and can be stamped "platinum" under the bill.

Mr. LOW: Not unless it contains 95 per cent platinum.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The bill says that the article may be "wholly or in part" platinum. Part of that article is pure platinum, complying with the bill, and if an article which is wholly or in part pure platinum can be stamped platinum, someone is going to be misled. I think these words "wholly or in part" should be struck out.

Mr. SPENCE: There seems to be some misunderstanding between the minister and the Justice department. I suggest that this item be dropped. I do not see why the minister should prolong the session a full week discussing his estimates.

Mr. LOW: I beg to correct my hon. friend. I am not prolonging the session. Hon. members opposite are doing it.

Mr. SPENCE: It seems he is endeavouring to prevent his estimates going through.

The CHAIRMAN: We are discussing Bill No. 176, not the estimates.

Mr. SPENCE: I suggest that the minister answer the questions that are put. I have been sympathetic toward the minister. We have been censured for offering so much criticism from this side, yet the minister himself provokes that criticism and I do not propose to sit here and listen to this discussion without saying what I want to say about it.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. SPENCE: It should not carry at all.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I think we are all agreed as to what the intent of the committee is with regard to this proposed measure. But the question has arisen whether the measure definitely expresses what the sense of the committee is. The minister says the bill was designed to carry out the clear intent as understood by the committee and that in having the bill prepared he went through the ordinary course followed by every minister in the preparation of legislation. It goes to the Department of Justice, and through them to the officials of the House, who supervise the drawing up of the measure, and the minister comes to the House and says: This is the measure intended to carry out what is now the purpose of the committee. One can argue and define as to the various interpretations that might be put upon a complicated sentence of this kind, but I do think that in view of the discussion that has taken place the committee can very safely adopt the wording that has been arranged by the law officers and advisers whose duty it is to put into language the intention of the minister or the department seeking the drafting of the legislation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I welcome the advent of my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) into this discussion, because I appreciate now that we shall be able to get at least some consideration of a legal proposition. The first thing I am going to ask him is whether in his view this act should be made effective?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): We are all agreed about that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very good. I have got that from my hon. friend, but I could not get it yesterday. Well, if this act is to be made effective, ought platinum to be brought within the application of the act?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The whole issue, as my hon. friend sees, is whether or not those to whom is entrusted the task of translating into language the ideas intended to be put on the statute books, have actually done so. My hon. friend says no; the minister is advised to the contrary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I asked the minister what he submitted to the department. He did not submit any legal questions with which he was confronted in connection with this bill. Now I hope the Minister of National Defence is not going to run away.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I have to go to the Redistribution committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I shall have to fall back upon my hon. friend. I am going to assume that the Minister of Trade and Commerce wants this to be an effective bill.

Mr. LOW: We are agreed on that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then how can he make it effective unless the limiting clause of the act, which deals with the matters to which the act applies, is amended for the purpose of including platinum? How on earth can it be done? The trouble with my hon. friend is this: He has got just one idea into his head, that was this section, and he got it there with a certain degree of heat.

Mr. LOW: Oh, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh yes; with a certain degree of heat and with the determination to bull the thing through, right or wrong. He goes to the department just with that one thought in his head—because I am sure the Department of Justice are not insane; I felt sure, if the matter was drawn to their attention, just what they would do, and I took particular pains to ask my hon. friend what he submitted to them. What he submitted to them was this correspondence with the jewellers, and this section, and he asked them what this section meant. Now the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) joined with me absolutely in pointing out the necessity of making other alterations in this bill, and I am going over it again because the minister evidently forgot all about it, and these were the very questions that ought to have gone to the Justice department.

I point out to the minister again that section 2 of the act respecting the manufacture, marking and sale of articles composed of gold or silver, and of gold plated and silver plated ware, is the interpretation clause. You have the interpretation which is given to articles of gold and silver, and most particularly of marks. My hon. friend, when he looks at the statute, will find in regard to marks that that important definition limits it to marks having regard to "quality, quantity or weight of gold or of silver, or quality or kind of gold or silver plate." It does not cover platinum at all. The platinum sections, if they are to be made workable, would certainly be much helped if the interpretation clause were extended to cover platinum. Now that has nothing to do with this section as a section at all; it has to do with the scheme of the legislation as such. My hon. friend says that he wants to make this act an act which will be enforceable. Against whom is this act to be enforceable? The "dealer" means "any person who is a manufacturer of, or a seller of, or dealer in, whether by wholesale or retail, any of the articles to which this act applies". I point that out to my hon. friend, and also the very next section, which gives the list of articles to which this act shall apply. There is not a bit of good in adding at the end a little clause like this without adding platinum to the general administrative sections of the act. The section is perfectly clear:

> This act applies to the following articles when made in Canada by, or sold in Canada by, or imported or otherwise brought into Canada by dealers, that is to say, "gold articles," "silver articles," and "plated articles" of gold or silver.

Surely my hon. friend must see that in order to have this legislation right, that clause providing for the application of the act should also be amended. Now take for example this section:

> When an article is composed of mechanism, works or movements and of a case or cover containing the mechanism, works or movements, a mark applied to the article shall be deemed not to be, nor to be intended to be, applied to the mechanism, works or movements.

I suppose my hon. friend wants that applied to platinum, too?

Mr. LOW: No, they did not ask for that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then, look at the perfect ridiculousness of the situation we are getting into if that is not to be. If my hon. friend is right in that, a platinum watch cannot be stamped platinum, just like a gold or silver watch is stamped gold or silver, for the simple reason, according to my hon. friend, that the mechanism, works or movement it contains are not composed of platinum. Now, no sane man in the world thinks any one intends that.

Mr. LOW: The word platinum is applied in that case in much the same way as when you take a deed of a building, for instance, that includes all articles that are attached to the floor and walls. I do not think that it could be said that the works of a watch are a part of the case. If the works are taken into consideration the whole watch may be very much under 925/1000ths parts of fineness, yet the act provides that you can stamp that watch "gold". Am I right?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, because there is a provision for that. I asked my hon. friend if he wants a similar provision with regard to platinum, and he says no.

Mr. LOW: What is the provision protecting the watch?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have just read it to my hon. friend. Now my hon. friend says that does not apply, that if you do not have a similar section with regard to platinum you can never stamp "platinum" on a platinum cover. But what my hon. friend says about gold is not quite right. You have a varying standard recognized for gold.

Mr. LOW: I understood a provision to be read fixing a certain percentage in the case of gold.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The clause read out had reference to silver and not gold.

Mr. LOW: Well then, take the law in connection with silver.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend want the penal clause as to marks to apply here?

Mr. LOW: Certainly they will apply.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, as the bill is worded they do not apply. I again point out to the minister that he did not bring to the attention of the Department of Justice the very matters we are discussing upon which the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) and myself are in absolute agreement.

Mr. LOW: I explained earlier in the day that I had discussed this matter with the Department of Justice. I asked the department for an interpretation of the clause that was under discussion yesterday afternoon, as to whether the meaning of what was intended was plain and clear. The Department of Justice said they did not think it would be possible to make the meaning clearer than the words of the proposed amendment to the act made it. I asked the department what percentage of platinum should be contained in an article to which the name "platinum" might be applied. The department informed me that it was 95 per cent, that as the bill was drawn each article which had the word "platinum" on it should contain at least 950/1000ths, which is 95 per cent. That is the interpretation I received from the Department of Justice together with the opinion that the meaning of the clause referred to could not be made plainer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As to the plainness of the clause it is a matter of opinion. As to the meaning of the clause it is not a matter of opinion, it is very clear, I would not have risen but I see the Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice here, and I am going to put the two interpretations in his hearing and ask him to give the opinion of the department as to which it is. The question is this: Whether in the case of an article, a single article, as respects which part purports to be platinum and part not, this bill insists that the whole article shall be 95 per cent platinum or part platinum and part iridium, or whether only the part that purports to be platinum shall be 95 per cent platinum and iridum? I want the assistant deputy minister to answer himself.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We heard him answer. It confirms what we say ourselves.

Mr. LOW: It was made clear by my deputy and myself that it was 95 per cent of the whole article.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not what the assistant deputy minister said at all. I want the minister to answer right out.

Mr. LOW: I am always willing to admit when I am wrong. I am not a lawyer and I accepted the interpretation that it was 95 per cent. My deputy was with me and that was the understanding he got also.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice has just said to the minister that it was 95 per cent only of the part which purported to be platinum, not 95 per cent of the whole article. That is what the assistant deputy minister said; I heard him. That has been our whole contention. I tried to get it across to the minister for hours but I failed.

Mr. CALDWELL: In view of the presence of the Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice I would suggest that the words "wholly or in part" in the fourth line and the words "appearing or purporting to be platinum" in the sixth line be omitted, and I ask the assistant deputy minister whether this would not convey exactly what the minister wants? I am clear as to what the minister wants and I desire to see his wishes carried out, not to oppose the bill at all, but my contention is the present wording will not accomplish what he wants. If I were a jeweller I should like to see this provision passed into law just as it is.

Mr. LOW: I wish to say further that the understanding I have mentioned was the understanding my deputy and myself gathered of the interpretation of the provision when we left the Department of Justice. Furthermore, my deputy called up the president of the Jewellers' Association, so that there might be no misunderstanding in the matter, and the president said the requirement was that it must be 95 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know what the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) has in his mind and it is possible he is right. That is merely a matter of legislation. As to what the act means is not even a matter of opinion. There can be no possible two opinions on the subject; the opinion is just what the Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice told the minister a while ago, and what we have contended for for two days. I do not think it is the object of either the Jewellers' Association or the framer of the bill that the whole article should be 95 per cent platinum.

Mr. LOW: That is what he said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the minister is wrong as to that. I think the minister is wrong also as to what has been told him by the Department of Justice. Take a watch that may be studded with platinum—I am not very sure whether they are or not but they may be—it would never do to say that watch must be 95 per cent platinum or iridium but only the part which purports to be platinum or as to which any imitation of it is used. In so far as the existing section is concerned it means what the Justice department want it to mean, there is no doubt about that. The language used as respects silver and also gold could be clearer but its meaning is all right.

Mr. CALDWELL: The right hon. leader of the opposition would not propose to allow a jeweller to mark a watch "platinum" when it was only studded with platinum.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. I do not know whether platinum is used as a plating or not; but assuming it is, it would be quite lawful for the jeweller to stud a ring with platinum plate providing it had ninety-five per cent platinum or iridium. It would be quite proper to stud a watch with platinum, provided the platinum in it was ninety-five per cent pure; but it would not be proper to call it a platinum watch.

Mr. CALDWELL: He could under the act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under this act possibly he could; but under the law generally, without this section he could not, because it is not a platinum watch.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then this would make illegal what is now legal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under the present law if a man misrepresents anything he is liable for misrepresentation. He is not liable to the penalties of this act, but to the general penalty, and a jeweller who would say that a ring was platinum when it was only platinum plate would be liable for misrepresentation under the law. I think it is assuming a grave responsibility to make this mean what the hon. minister states.

Mr. CALDWELL: He might not state that it was a platinum ring; but under the law he would be allowed to stamp "platinum" on it if it were ninety-five per cent platinum?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, this act merely says what he cannot do. It does not deny him the right to do what it defines, but the ordinary law of the land denies that right. This bill comes in and defines a new class of offence.

Mr. LOW: If the bill is not clear, I do not want to press it. I want to make sure.

Mr. CALDWELL: If my suggestion to strike out certain words in the fourth and sixth lines were adopted, would it not make it clear that the article must be ninety-five per cent platinum?

Mr. LOW: The deputy informs me that if the word "platinum" is applied to an article it must be ninety-five per cent platinum. If you bought an article stamped "platinum" you would assume you were buying something which was ninety-five per cent platinum.

Mr. MARTELL: Any person who understands the primary principles of law knows that the contention of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) is correct; but I think the wording of the bill is not very plain, and I would suggest that we waste no more time, but postpone the measure and endeavour to get together on it.

Mr. SPENCE: I think that would be the best thing to do. The minister should try to bring the bill back in proper shape. It would take hours in committee to put it in proper form.

Mr. McCONICA: It seems to me that this bill means just what it is intended to mean, and that it will do just exactly what it is intended to do. It provides that a platinum article shall contain ninety-five per cent platinum. If it is composed partly of platinum and partly of some other material, the part that is platinum must be ninety-five per cent platinum.

Mr. MARTELL: If the portion which is required to be platinum is only ninety-five per cent platinum, why should the dealer call the whole thing platinum?

Mr. CALDWELL: That is our point.

Mr. MARTELL: The leader of the opposition is correct in his contention.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am glad that the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) has come to our assistance, because perhaps we can postpone consideration of this measure for the present and deal with other matters. We should make this a workable bill. The only thing to do is to bring platinum within the interpretation clause, which is the second clause. Clause 3 specifically confines the application of the act to gold and silver. The word "platinum" should be inserted in the clause. If we are to go after platinum dealers, we must make it apply to those dealers.

Mr. LOW: The deputy minister informs me that if an article is made up of fifty per cent platinum and fifty per cent something else the word "platinum" could not be applied to it. If the word "platinum" were applied to it, it would have to be applied to a platinum tip or something of that kind. I merely say this to show that this morning I honestly interpreted the remarks of the deputy minister to mean that every article must contain ninety-five per cent of platinum.

5 p.m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have never for a moment disputed that the minister honestly sought to interpret what was given to him, but he did not comprehend what it meant, and when one tries earnestly to make a thing clear the minister should not hark back to other matters.

Mr. LOW: The right hon. member should not cast slurs on the department and refer to the minister as "hopeless."

Mr. MEIGHEN: There were no slurs at all; but the minister comes back with something else and talks about divisions between lawyers and so on. The minister is not a lawyer. It is not necessary to be a lawyer to understand this section. If the minister has spent his life in other lines and is not accustomed to this class of work, he should be a little more patient. I think this lesson to-day will teach him in future to be more patient, and not get into difficulties.

Mr. LOW: The reason I relied on the Justice department and the law clerk of the House was because I was not a lawyer and knew nothing about it. The Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice now tells me that when articles are composed of fifty per cent platinum and fifty per cent other material the word "platinum" could not be applied to the whole. I ask that the section be allowed to stand.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. A. B. COPP (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No 118, to amend the Companies Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On the short title.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot remember the minister ever having given an explanation in detail of the general purpose of the bill.

Mr. COPP: I have not made any general statement inasmuch as the bill involves a good many minor amendments which are intended to correct certain anomalies in the act. The act has been amended from time to time and the language of the various amendments is not uniform; the majority of the amendments are intended to rectify that. There are six or seven new sections which can be studied as we proceed. The amending bill has been considered by the leading corporation lawyers in different parts of the Dominion in consultation with the law officers of the department and the amendments which are now suggested are the result of those conferences. Last year a good many similar amendments were passed in this House but they were dropped in the Senate owing to pressure there; I understand that they were omitted not because of any particular objections to them but wholly for the reason I have stated. In the hurry and rush they were scuttled so to speak. Since that time and during the present session very strong representations have been made by lawyers who frequently resort to the act, to have these amendments carried. The amendments are intricate but I am sure that legal gentlemen in the committee will be able to follow the explanatory notes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What protection is given the public in relation to what is commonly called watered stock? Is any definite provision made in that regard?

Mr. COPP: Provision is made in the act itself with regard to watered stock but there is nothing in these amendments on that subject.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there adequate protection in the act to safeguard the people against watered stock?

Mr. COPP: Yes, in the act itself.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What is it?

Mr. COPP: I cannot tell the hon. gentleman offhand just what the provisions are but he will find on page 13 of the act just how the matter of watered stock is provided for.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am not a lawyer and am therefore unable to discuss the legal aspect of this bill. I think the House made a mistake in allowing the bill to go into committee without some consideration of the general principles involved. The bill was moved into committee before I had an opportunity of looking it up and I submit that we should have some explanation on the part of the minister of its general principles. Here a question has come up with regard to the issuing of watered stock; the minister should explain the principal features of the bill including this matter.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—When company may be created a private company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the distinction between a private company and a general company?

Mr. COPP: This amendment is simply to conform with subsection 3 of section 43 of the act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not the act here.

Mr. COPP: Subsection 3 of section 43 refers to private companies but there is no provision for the creation of private companies. This section provides the necessary machinery for constituting such companies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand that, but what is the real distinction, for the purpose of the act, between a private and an ordinary company.

Mr. COPP: The difference consists in the limitation of shares to the public in the case of the private company.

[Mr. Copp.]

Mr. MARTELL: I have not had much to do with companies of that sort but I should think that a private company would differ from an ordinary company only in this, that whereas in the case of the general company the stock may be sold to the public generally, the stock in a private company is restricted to a number of shareholders, and there may be certain restrictions in the method of transfer. I am not attempting to explain the distinction, but that is the only difference that I can see.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member's explanation would seem to be right. But what is the public policy that suggests the necessity for a private company? What is the object of this legislation and what is to be gained by it?

Mr. COPP: I am instructed that it applies to a company whose stock is not offered to the public but is held by, say, the members of a family—a private company. That is one illustration.

Mr. MARTELL: That can be done today under the Canada Companies Act. As a general rule a certain number of persons, three in Nova Scotia, five in the other provinces, can secure incorporation and their powers are set forth in the memorandum of association which they file, which powers must be in consonance with what the general act authorizes. Supposing these people get a charter for a company with a capitalization of $50,000, in one dollar shares, there is nothing to prevent them from owning those shares.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In the case of insurance companies we have a superintendent of insurance who insists upon certain requirements being complied with before a company can be organized. Is there any similar scrutiny exercised in regard to the formation of such a company as this?

Mr. COPP: The applicants for the incorporation of a company must comply with the provisions of the Companies Act.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there any scrutiny by the minister's department of any of the statements made by the promoters?

Mr. COPP: The promoters must file their prospectus with the Department of the Secretary of State.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then you take the statements in the prospectus at their face value?

Mr. COPP: The department do not scrutinize the prospectus particularly, but those who are considering the advisability of buying stock may come to the department and study the prospectus. They must use their own judgment in regard to its contents.

Mr. MARTELL: This does not apply to insurance companies, but only to ordinary trading companies.

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My thought was not that insurance entered into this, but I said that in the case of insurance companies the public has some guarantee of their soundness. Is there any similar guarantee in the case of these companies?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: These private companies are prohibited from inviting the public to subscribe for any debentures or shares. This section applies to a limited partnership form of company, and I do not see any objection to it.

Mr. CALDWELL: While the prohibition applies to invitations to the public to subscribe for debentures or shares, does it prevent a shareholder from selling his stock to the public?

Mr. COPP: He can sell stock, but only to a limited extent.

Mr. MARTELL: You are putting in a prohibition so the incorporators can keep the stock within their own narrow bounds. But the law to-day would allow it to be done by agreement among the shareholders themselves.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Applicants.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there any provision that the provisional directors shall hold office for any particular length of time, or that they have any real interest in the concern?

Mr. COPP: Under the provisions of the Companies Act provisional directors are appointed until such time as the company is organized and the shareholders elect their directors. This amendment makes no change.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Applicants.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This section appears to me to be intended to make it clear that the provisions apply only to companies without share capital; is that it?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They were intended to apply only to companies with share capital. If that be the case, it is to get rid of the possibility of error?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are a lot of subsections. What is the idea in subsection (6)? It is pretty hard to follow that.

Mr. COPP: It is to correct a clerical error. In the old act it appears as subsection 2; it should be subsection 3. That is the only change.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—subsection (1)—Issue of shares without nominal or par value.—Statement as to preferred stock.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does the minister say about this?

Mr. COPP: The note gives an explanation of the amendment. It refers to the formation of a company issuing stock without par value. A similar provision has been in force in the United States and in the province of Ontario for a number of years, and corporation lawyers inform me that it is working very satisfactorily. We are simply bringing our act into uniformity with it.

Mr. MARTELL: Is there a similar clause in the English Companies Act?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Our original legislation, if I recollect aright, was based on legislation of the state of New York so far as this no money share amendment is concerned.

Mr. COPP: It was adopted in 1897.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think England had covered it in their General Companies Act.

Mr. COPP: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand that all that is being done here is to ingraft on the American statute: we took over the amendments which the Americans have found it necessary to make.

Mr. COPP: That is right.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection (2)—Equality of shares.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is in the same position I assume?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection (3)—Shares to be allotted at price fixed by board or letters patent.

Mr. CALDWELL: In paying a dividend would these shares without par value be entitled to participation the same as shares with par value?

Mr. COPP: They might declare a dividend on the value of the shares.

Mr. CALDWELL: But they are without par value.

Mr. COPP: They do not pay any percentage dividend on the shares but if the company make sufficient to pay dividends they may pay at the rate of so much per share.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would like to get that clear. Do these shares have the same right to dividend as shares in the same company that have a par value?

Mr. COPP: It depends on whether the company are making enough money to pay the dividend.

Mr. CALDWELL: Under this act we are allowing the company to issue non par value shares. Does that mean shares of stock for which no money is paid?

Mr. COPP: No. We issue a charter to the company for no capital stock but for a certain number of shares and the directors fix the values of the shares and sell them accordingly. That value may also be fixed by the charter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The only difference between this arrangement and the provision under which when a company is incorporated it has so many thousand shares of stock is that the shares here have no money value. Theoretically the entity is split up into say a thousand different shares and the owner of each share is entitled to one-thousandth part as an owner of that property. In the other case he is entitled to a share which represents so much in money value. That value is supposed to be properly related to the value of the property it represents though that of course is not always the case. In this instance there could be a multiple of shares; there is no question about that. But these shares with no money value represent nothing but an individual interest in the assets of the company. The company is incorporated, and at the incorporation the price at which the shares shall be disposed of may be arranged. On the other hand—I speak now subject to qualification—the directors may by by-law say at what price the shares shall be sold. Obviously therefore, when you get to that point you cannot declare a definite dividend of a certain per cent because there is no definition of money value in the hands of the shareholders on which the dividend may be computed. So what is done is this; the directors define what shall represent the amount available for the distribution of profits, and as soon as the amount so available is declared each one of these shares of no money value is entitled to an amount proportionate to the relation which it bears to other shares outstanding.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is quite clear. A company gets a charter to do business. There is no capital stock, but they have say a thousand shares of no money value. Does this mean that the company may issue only a thousand shares? Because if they could continue issuing their shares it would mean that the shareholders would not be entitled to the one-thousandth part.

Mr. COPP: They may issue only the thousand.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then the earnings of the company are divided pro rata among the thousand shareholders, or if a loss is made it is borne proportionately by those shareholders?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Mr. SHAW: I think there are some members who would like to know from the minister what steps are taken to protect the public so far as the sale of shares is concerned. I think this is the matter which has been referred to by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). I am now referring particularly to the various types of provincial legislation. In some of our provinces we have what is sometimes denominated as "blue sky legislation," providing certain safeguards to the public in the event of the sale of shares by corporations. What provision is made by the Dominion under the Companies Act for the protection of the public in a similar manner?

The CHAIRMAN: The discussion must be strictly relevant to the clause under consideration. This matter could be considered under section 14.

Mr. SHAW: Or section 8.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 8 covers only commissions.

Mr. SHAW: It goes further and deals with shares offered to the public.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Company may obtain change of name.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does this involve?

Mr. COPP: The wording of several sections of the act providing that certain transactions may be effected by a two-thirds vote is not uniform, and doubt has arisen whether "two-thirds vote" means two-thirds of all the issued capital or two-thirds of those present at the meeting of shareholders. The only change made here is that there must be a two-thirds vote of the shareholders present.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Present and voting.

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—When company may surrender charter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose this is to make it more certain that the shareholders' rights are considered.

Mr. COPP: It is the same provision we have had for fifty years. A company may get a charter and may never organize, and the practice now is that they may return their charter to the department. This is to provide that they may return the charter under the act, provide the debts and everything of that nature are taken care of.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not see anything about insolvency here. What happens in that case?

Mr. COPP: They cannot surrender their charter if they are insolvent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But suppose a company goes out of business entirely as a result of insolvency, what happens? Has the Secretary of State still to send out notices and get them back again like he did before?

Mr. COPP: They would be wound up in the regular way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They might or might not. I thought the idea of this was to save the department sending out forms.

Mr. COPP: That is true, but the charter can only be returned after the debts are all paid.

Mr. MARTELL: They have to comply with all these terms before they can be liquidated.

Mr. CALDWELL: If a firm goes through the bankruptcy court, what becomes of their charter?

Mr. COPP: The order puts it out of business.

Mr. CALDWELL: Automatically?

Mr. COPP: Yes, but we are dealing here with the case of a company being wound up.

Mr. CALDWELL: When a charter is surrendered, must it be with the unanimous consent of all the shareholders in the company? While the deputy is looking that up, I would like to give my reason for asking that question. We realize, of course, that in an incorporated company an agreement made by any authorized member of the firm binds every member of the firm, and that brings about the necessity of having the charter surrendered when they cease to do business as an aggregation. Take a hypothetical case. Suppose a company of three men is incorporated.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend is not quite correct. An incorporation is not a firm, and the shareholders of the company are not bound unless the agreement is within the four corners of the memorandum of association.

Mr. CALDWELL: But until the charter is surrendered they are still a company in the eyes of the law, and any business contracted by any member of the firm is binding on the firm. Suppose there is a firm of three members and two of them wish the charter dissolved or surrendered, and the third objects. What is the procedure?

Mr. MARTELL: If they cannot come to terms they would apply to the court, and the court would give some guarantee as to the rights of the minority in order that the company might be wound up, if the petition was for winding it up.

Mr. CALDWELL: I presume that is correct, but I would like to have the minister's opinion.

Mr. COPP: If there was any such dispute there could not be a surrender of the charter, not unless everything was agreed upon and closed up by the shareholders, and the debts all paid.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then it must be by unanimous consent?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Just what procedure would you follow in the case I cited, where two members wanted to surrender the charter, and the third did not?

Mr. COPP: If anything was done, it would have to be done by departmental regulation. There is nothing in this section providing for it.

Section agreed to.

Mr. COPP: Since the bill was drafted a suggestion has come to us that we should add a new section, to be known as section 8, incorporating the provisions of the Companies' Act of Ontario. At the present time, a company when applying for a charter has to put in a long list of the objects of the company. This entails a great deal of work and expense in preparing the petition and sending it forward. Then after the petition comes to the department a charter has to be drafted and recorded, notice is printed in the Canada Gazette, and finally there is published in the Gazette a very long list of the objects of the company. The cost of printing the Canada Gazette has increased about 50 per cent within a short time, and we have found that in the case of some companies we are incorporating it is costing us more for the publication of these notices than we receive in fees.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is terrible.

Mr. COPP: We thought that by making provision here giving the company general powers, it would save a great deal of work and expense. The amendment is very long, and I will send a copy of it over to the hon. member for West York.

The CHAIRMAN: It is proposed to amend the principal act by inserting the following section, as a new section 8, after section 28:

28A. (1) A company shall possess as incidental and ancillary to the powers set out in the Letters Patent or Supplementary Letters Patent power:

(a) To carry on any other business (whether manufacturing or otherwise) which may seem to the company capable of being conveniently carried on in connection with its business or calculated directly or indirectly to enhance the value of or render profitable any of the company's property or rights;

(b) To acquire or undertake the whole or any part of the business, property and liabilities of any person or company carrying on any business which the company is authorized to carry on, or possessed of property suitable for the purposes of the company;
