For the past ten years, the western powers have sought the most appropriate steps to take in order to convince Russia and her satellites to abandon their ideas of aggression.

The experience of the past few years has established without doubt that the Soviet will keep on talking of peace while threatening the world with war as long as the nations on this side of the iron curtain continue to show disunity and weakness.

That is precisely the fact which we must not lose sight of during the present debate.

The problem we are facing, as an anti-communist country, is the mustering among the western nations of the strength required to deter the communist powers from pushing forward on the road to aggression to an ultimate world conflict.

The rearmament of Germany within the framework of the western European union and its admission into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization are only means to an ultimate end: the safeguarding of world peace and the pursuit of happiness for the whole human race.

It is only natural that well-disposed people here and elsewhere do not see without some concern Germany becoming overnight a free and sovereign nation, and even an ally. It is a surprise for a great many people to learn that we are committing ourselves to defend, in case of attack, this very Germany which brought so much hardship and suffering to the world, and which has been guilty of heinous crimes against entire peoples.

Such a feeling of apprehension towards Germany should be easily understood, and we must, indeed, respect it. However, I think that the agitation that for the last few weeks has been coming from a small group of communist traitors here in Canada only shows how much confusion was thrown into the ranks of the Russians and of their varletry throughout the world by the stand taken in Paris by the western nations.

It is no doubt difficult to forgive Hitlerite Germany for all the misery she spread over the world from 1939 to 1945 and we will long harbour inevitable resentment on that score. But we must be realistic. It would be well to remember the words spoken by George Washington in his farewell message to congress in 1796. He spoke words which, to this day, remain topical, with regard to the foreign policy of his country:

> Nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded . . . The nation which indulges toward another a habitual hatred or a habitual fondness is in some degree a slave . . .

That is why I believe we must rejoice at the result of the London conference and the signature of the Paris agreements. On the eve of these historic conferences, the countries of the west were just emerging from a terrible impasse into which they had been thrown by the rejection of EDC by the French national assembly. It spelled disaster for the west, especially for American diplomacy in Europe.

Germany was again a vacuum in the very heart of Europe and we, who were preventing her from rearming, were in the obligation of defending her, in spite of herself, if she were attacked. The only alternative left was to abandon her to the Russians or to leave her in neutrality, which amounted to the same thing.

The unification of the peoples of western Europe appeared as a very distant possibility and the Soviets were already beginning to rejoice at our division. Those were indeed dark days for the governments of the free countries of the world.

Fortunately for the free world, France had at that moment the dynamic leader she had been awaiting for ten years, Mr. Mendes-France. He was able to regain the confidence of his country's allies, at a time when France was beginning to discredit herself. Thanks to him, she was able to assume her responsibilities.

England, which by keeping out of EDC would have made that pact non-viable, did not fail either to take her responsibilities. By undertaking to maintain forces in Europe for 44 years, England was able to take part in these negotiations, to direct them and to bring them to a successful conclusion. With England out of EDC, France would have been alone to bear all the odious part of the rearming of Germany. France would have been alone to face its secular enemy. The stand taken by England saved the day.

We must be practical and I think that the London and Paris conferences are happy dates in the lives of free peoples the world over.

The western European union gives back to Germany its full sovereignty and permits her to rearm, but we must not forget that that extension of the Brussels treaty of 1948 is a defensive pact and that there are in the new protocol some very sound guarantees against any intention which Germany might have of turning against its new allies.

[Mr. Balcer.]

Lastly, its admission into NATO, which, as I have said, is another defensive pact, guarantees to the countries on this side of the iron curtain an army of 500,000 men which we cannot do without. There again, NATO control of Germany's armed forces is an excellent guarantee of German intentions.

May I quote two statements that are expressive of the advantage this German rearmament may mean to the cause of peace and of the free nations.

This is what the assistant supreme commander of NATO forces, Marshal Montgomery, had to say after the Paris agreements:

> The integration of German forces into the Atlantic forces will, once these troops are trained, constitute a solid rampart against an eventual menace of aggression by the Soviets.
> The Paris agreements are decidedly more satisfactory than the former EDC, insofar as they leave much greater freedom of action to the allied military commander.

General Gruenther was equally categorical. He stated:

> If an organization like this had reached the same efficiency in 1939, I am inclined to think that the second world war would not have taken place. We now have to perform the great task of putting the new agreements into effect. Above all we need the full support of public opinion. I am convinced we will get its support because the 400 million people protected by NATO realize that our essential aim is to prevent a new war and the destruction of our civilization.
> The spirit of sincere co-operation and of trust which is so evident since the Paris conference inspires me to believe without reservation that in two or three years we will have solidly consolidated peace in Europe.

Such declarations, particularly that of General Gruenther, enable us to understand the military importance of these new agreements. I believe that every sincere Canadian will greet those agreements as a great step towards the establishment of a common purpose among our free countries in the face of the aggressive and destructive totalitarianism of the Soviet world.

There is only one way to live in peace with the Russians, and it is to show them unequivocally that their designs of world domination will never succeed.

I hope that all the members of this house will vote in favour of these agreements in order to indicate clearly that the people of Canada loathe communism, and rejoice at the evergrowing unity among the free peoples of the world.

I would like now to discuss another aspect of this question, and I must admit that there arises in my mind some doubt and apprehension.

We are called upon today to vote the admission of Western Germany into the Atlantic nations organization, of which Canada is a member. I am convinced that it will be carried with the unanimous consent of the house, but I believe that this vote affords us an opportunity to review the situation, and to ask ourselves whether our government, in the international field, is not being carried away and compelling our country to play a part which is beyond its strength and means. I rather feel as if the government has an exaggerated tendency to play the part of a world power.

No doubt this country enjoys a fine reputation throughout the world. It does have very real importance in world affairs, but it must not be forgotten either that we only have 15 million people.

Canada too, whose people have a real craving for peace, must not, moreover, give the world the impression that it is a venturesome nation willing to take a hand in all wars, whenever and wherever they occur. The history of the last few years gives an opposite impression. We have unfortunately taken part in the last two world wars, and in the Korean war; we have troops within a few miles of the iron curtain; we have an armistice commission in Indo-China. In brief, we are everywhere in the world.

That is why I believe it to be important that, in this debate, the government explain clearly to us the new obligations involved in the Paris agreements and the part Canada will be called upon to play in the future by reason of these agreements.

Mr. Martin: Has not the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) clearly explained this question and that asked just now by the hon. member?

Mr. Balcer: He will never explain them enough. There still persist some doubts and I am going to voice them. I should then be very glad if it were possible to have still more explanations.

Mr. Habel: Ask our leader.

Mr. Balcer: The position of our forces in Germany was never too clearly defined, for at the end of the war, when the time came to occupy Germany, we were simply thrown out. But today we are back there, we maintain a brigade of 10,000 men a few miles from the iron curtain, and we maintain an air division in France.

But, as regards our troops in Germany, we were the only country which has had to pay its expenses. The United States, England and France had full divisions there but they were occupying powers and as such the care of their troops was borne by Germany.

It is a good thing for Canada of course not to have a reputation for stinginess, for shirking her responsibilities, but why should our country do more than others and especially more than a nation of 15 million people can afford?

When the war in Korea broke out, our country's effort was far above that of most countries in the western world.

It may be that our friendship with the United States justified such an effort. But we can ask ourselves if, compared to all the countries of the western world, such an effort was really suited to our international status.

I sincerely believe that the government shows too much enthusiasm for international ventures and that it always wants to play a prominent part. It may be that it has very good reasons for doing so, but it could give us a lot more explanations than it has given us so far.

The other night, on a C.B.C. forum, one of the most distinguished members of the press gallery, speaking on that very subject, used a phrase which gives us, I think, a very good idea of the situation. He said:

Are we getting too big for our breeches?

That is why I say that if Canada, as a member country of NATO, had to be represented at the Paris agreements on October 23 by its Secretary of State for External Affairs, some may ask why the minister had to go to the London conference. Rumours were circulated in the press to the effect that he was not even invited and had to insist in order to be able to attend.

We have, no doubt, some interests to safeguard in Europe. But if the west European representatives were in London to discuss German rearmament, they were meeting as the delegates of EDC nations. Having signed the Brussels treaty, England was considerably interested in the matter, and the United States, as leader of the western nations in the cold war, also had to attend.

But Canada had no more business to be there than Greece, for instance, which is also a member of NATO. And yet, Greece, which had much greater reason to take part than Canada, was, during the last war, invaded from both sides at once, by Italy and Germany. That country was not represented there. It is still a victim of Hitler's Germany. Moreover, on one of its frontiers it touches the iron curtain. Still, it was of the opinion that the question could be decided without its intervention. The same thing applies to the other members of NATO who, as was the case for Canada, did not have to sign the western European union agreement.

It may be that these great European countries, whose diplomatic traditions go back several centuries, could not make any decision without the advice and the knowledge of our minister. That may be but one may doubt it.

Mr. Lesage: Have you not read the papers? If you had you would not doubt it.

Mr. Balcer: It is possible to doubt. We have the right to ask ourselves whether we were then furthering the interests of our country or whether once more the government was not carried away by its megalomania.

Or whether our government, in order to gain an international prestige out of proportion with our means, does not run the risk of leading us into ventures likely to be detrimental to the economy of this country.

First of all, we must be realistic, and weigh carefully the means and needs of this country, before embarking upon too big ventures which might be very costly.

The colonial policy followed for the last ten years by England and France gives us a perfect example of that realistic view.

Realistic England, at the end of the war in 1945, granted complete independence to India and Pakistan. These peoples, following this action by England joined the commonwealth voluntarily, signed trade agreements and pledged themselves to safeguard British interests in those countries.

Great Britain had proved to be realistic and this realism had been to her advantage. But France, more sentimental, who likes repeating the sonorous phrase "France's mission in the world!", refused to act likewise in Indo-China so as not to lose any prestige. She was therefore forced to wage an impossible war in this colony, a war which deprived it of the best part of its young officer corps and shook the economy of France to its foundations for a period of eight years. Mendes-France's realism was necessary to end this conflict.

I feel that this little example should be considered by our government since, in foreign policy, especially, idealism must be replaced by realism. Here, as elsewhere, prudence is the mother of virtue. That is why I believe that the study of the Paris agreements provides our country with an opportunity of weighing its responsibilities with proper realism and of asking ourselves if our foreign policy is not such as to lead us into certain ventures beyond our strength, our obligations and our needs.

Mr. B. R. Leboe (Cariboo): I am not going to make a lengthy speech this afternoon, Mr. Speaker. The reasons for supporting this resolution introduced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) were fully stated by our leader, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). We have given serious consideration to this problem, and in view of all the circumstances have come to the conclusion that we have no alternative.

Personally, I have come to that conclusion as a result of speaking with many of my constituents. I might say that I have had only five communications in respect to this matter; two of them from my constituency, one from Toronto, one from Vancouver and one from Ottawa. But in speaking to my constituents I have found that, without reservation, they believe there is no alternative to ratification of this agreement.

The reports coming out of the U.S.S.R. give us hope that Russian imperialism may have a difficult time in keeping its own people under subjugation. If time plays in our favour, then the decay and deterioration of the Russian dictatorship will be the largest single factor in establishing a lasting peace. Let us sincerely hope that time will be on our side.

Now, Mr. Speaker, many hon. members have expressed regret that parliament was not called to discuss this very important matter. At the conclusion of this debate, I should like the government to state clearly why the members of parliament were not called together to discuss this problem in order that they might make suggestions and give guidance in drawing up such an agreement. This would put an end to the speculation we have heard throughout the country. We have all heard speculation as to why we were not called together. Some say it was because of the by-elections; some say because of the Quebec tax situation; and others say it was because of the pressure of members of parliament. In conclusion, therefore, I request that the government state clearly and fully why parliament was not called and taken into the government's confidence.

Mr. G. D. Weaver (Churchill): It is with a large measure of hesitation, Mr. Speaker, that I ask for the floor on this occasion. The subject matter under discussion is probably as important as any with which this house will ever be called upon to deal. It relates not only to the security of Canada, which should have top priority at any time in our deliberations, but it relates also to the security of humanity itself. I am sure that since 1947 all of us have followed with deep concern the apparent unwillingness of the Soviet union to be satisfied with living her own life within her own borders in peaceful co-existence with the rest of the world. Slowly but surely we have reluctantly found it necessary to refashion our weapons and reconstitute our armed forces.

I can recall when Sir Winston Churchill came to this continent back in 1946 and made a very famous speech at Fulton, Missouri. I can recall the feelings occasioned by the Berlin airlift. I can recall listening to the radio when President Truman declared the state of emergency in 1947. I remember during the 1949 election, when I first came to this house, NATO was the word that was on everyone's lips. At that time our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization would be the foundation of our foreign policy and our security. Later on I remember very well EDC and I am sure those words are recalled here very earnestly. All these events were steps leading slowly but surely to the erection of a defensive shield by the NATO nations of the western world. The erection of that shield was provoked only by the communist threat exemplified by Kremlin-directed action wherever on the globe defensive forces were not strong enough to discourage their forward movement.

Canada as a young country has been proud of the fact that the NATO shield was the outgrowth of an idea that had its birth in the mind of our own Prime Minister. And we are also proud of the fact that our own ministers, notably the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), the former minister of finance and the former minister of national defence had a great share in building the NATO alliance, and played a prominent part in the development of that NATO idea.

I recall here in Ottawa less than a year ago the supreme commander of the NATO forces, General Gruenther, addressing most of us in the railway committee room. He pointed out a gap in the centre of that NATO shield which was to be filled by German divisions in EDC, and everyone at that time accepted that as a matter of course.

I think I should mention here that many well-meaning Canadians, many of whom served in the last two wars, have expressed concern over the rearming of Germany. We can only look at the over-all security picture, and make our decisions on the facts as we find them at any particular moment in time. We are not gifted with second sight, and we cannot look into the future.

The honest doubters could prove to be right. And in that connection I want to read one sentence—although taken out of context, it expresses very clearly the point I have in mind—spoken by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). He said:

> On the one hand we of the democratic world dare not be naive. It would be foolish and dishonest to pretend that those who are most sceptical may not be right.

That is taken out of context, and it does not apply to this particular subject. I do suggest however that the words are applicable.

On military matters we must accept the advice of the country's military advisers. That advice together with the advice of our allies in two world wars has brought us victory and made it possible for us to reach this point in time. This country has good military advisers. We have not the manpower available that is found in Asia. Our military advisers have said that from the point of view of manpower we require integrated in our western defence the divisions that can only be supplied by West Germany. They advise—and this has been done publicly in the newspapers; it is not new—that without a rearmed West Germany, together with our weapons, our shield is not sufficiently strong to defeat a thrust from the east. That advice was given before the latest hydrogen bomb development.

The risk in not rearming West Germany is too great, and not arming West Germany would not be keeping faith with those Canadians who have died in the first two wars.

Having in mind that picture, I remember last summer the feeling of dismay I experienced when I read in the newspapers about the rejection of EDC by France. And I remember with what feelings of suppressed alarm I, as a citizen, watched from a distance while our Secretary of State for External Affairs, Great Britain's Sir Anthony Eden, Mr. Mendes-France, Mr. Adenauer and Mr. Dulles resolved their different viewpoints and hurriedly but surely evolved the solution which was to fill that gap in our NATO shield that we are ratifying today.

The things being decided here today are fateful for humanity, and it would be unthinkable for Canada to refuse ratification when France, perhaps the one country that has suffered most in our memory from an aggressive Germany, after so much heart-searching finally found within herself the strength to rise above her fears and to agree to this important instrument. Let us hope their uncertainties are in the past.

However, this afternoon my purpose in speaking goes beyond this point. During the period of the events which I have outlined there has been a rapid change and growth in the power of atomic weapons, and I think there should be a clear distinction between atomic warfare and weapons and hydrogen or thermonuclear warfare and weapons.

I note in this agreement that hydrogen weapons are classed as atomic weapons, and rightly so, but the destructive power of hydrogen devices is so far beyond the power of what were first called atomic bombs that they should not be confused with one another. It is very important that the distinction be clearly understood.

The term "atomic weapons" should be confined to fission devices in which the nuclear power is produced by the splitting of the atom, as opposed to fusion devices, notably hydrogen or thermonuclear devices, whereby atomic power is released by a fusion of atoms brought about in the heat of the ordinary atomic bomb, which is used as a trigger. These devices are not limited as to size, as are conventional atomic weapons.

With this distinction, atomic weapons can and should be classed as conventional weapons because, terrible as they are, they are only larger concentrations of power of weapons already known and used. Thermonuclear weapons on the other hand are so far beyond this that they carry within themselves the possibility of the suicide of humanity—and I want to make that point with as much force as I ca .

To support this statement I would quote only a few lines from a speech by the Minister of National Health and Welfare when he spoke in New York last October on the question of disarmament. These are his words:

> There are reasons to believe that progress under present circumstances may be less difficult than it has been hitherto. For one thing, I think it quite possible that men in the governments principally concerned on either side of the iron curtain are beginning to fear the awful power that scientists are putting at our disposal. Certainly I am not ashamed to admit I myself find the situation most disquieting. For the stakes are incomparably higher than they were even a few years ago. I think that only those associated with governments which have some direct experience of atomic processes and direct access to classified information of technicians working in this field can be aware how serious is the threat which contamination and other effects of nuclear explosions can pose to the very existence of organic life on this planet.
> None of us should be ashamed, or too proud to admit that we are concerned. Humility before the awesome power which our scientists are placing in our hands is, I suggest, a becoming attitude for members of governments in any part of the world.

[Mr. Weaver.]

I want to make a very important point in connection with this protocol, in the light of what I have just read. If we show weakness anywhere, our only possible enemy has shown that he will take advantage of that weakness.

If we do not plug the hole in our NATO shield by ratifying this protocol and bringing into the western camp the necessary manpower represented by the West German divisions, we leave ourselves unprotected against the military advance of communism in the vital centre when considering only the field of manpower together with conventional atomic weapons. Communist manpower is many times greater than ours, and the only restraining factor would then be as now the hydrogen bomb which ought never to be used, but which we will surely have to use if we fail to meet our responsibilities. Man as an individual does not possess the right to take his own life. Humanity similarly should not have the right to take action that is tantamount to committing suicide. We are therefore morally obligated to do our utmost to maintain an adequate shield of conventional weapons—when I say "conventional weapons" I mean atomic weapons—integrated with available manpower against the threat of communist expansion. If we do not ratify this protocol, we are deliberately failing to meet our responsibilities not only to Canada but to humanity.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) yesterday said something that was very true. He said:

> I believe that in this world today we are playing for time. We need it terribly. There are things that we can do if we are given the time. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, as I have already suggested, referred to the tremendous forces being made available to us as science gets down to the power of the atom with its tremendous peacetime uses. If we had the time I think mankind could yet turn this world from one of recurring wars to one of permanent peace and human accord, with a high standard of living for mankind the world over.

I agree wholeheartedly that we must have time, but the only way we can get time is by plugging that hole.

I want to say just what having time means. It is not just something simple. We cannot say we must have a little time to do some more negotiating. I was fortunate a few years ago to work as an engineer in another country, on another continent, where those whom I was supervising, or many of them, were people whose skin was of another colour than mine. I had one lad who was a good smelter man, and I would match him with any of our Canadian boys. His name was Jampie. As in this country, when somebody does a good job and there is another job open that pays a little more money you are anxious to promote him. Just such a situation came up and I said to Jampie, "There is a job open on a converter; would you like to have it?" He looked at me and said, "No, boss, I eat porridge; I don't eat bread." His pay was 4s. 3d. a day. The job he turned down paid 5s. a day. He had thought it over carefully. The extra 9d. would not give him the necessary bread to make up the extra physical work he would have to do on the other job. When he said "porridge" he meant cornmeal porridge; that was the basis of his food.

You can take all the grain surpluses you like. You can load them on ships. You can drop them in that country out of the goodness of your heart, as many tons of grain as you wish, but that act would not put the extra bread in Jampie's stomach. In this country we have been expanding our economy at the rate of between 3 and 4 per cent a year, and that is faster than human beings have ever done it before. In Jampie's country the rate is roughly the same. It would be unrealistic to expect to expand it faster, but that is the only way you can put the extra bread in Jampie's stomach and in the stomachs of other Jampies.

It is a problem that requires patience. The process of expanding the economies of these undeveloped countries is slow, and they must do it themselves in the long run. It will not be done overnight. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, their economies will truly and surely expand with our aid, and then the words of the hon. member will be fulfilled; but I should like to put it differently from the words he used in his paragraph. I would say I am confident that we shall have the time, and I am confident that we shall turn this world from one of recurring wars to one of permanent peace and human accord, with a high standard of living for mankind the world over.

I feel that my vote on this occasion will be only one among many that will contribute to that end. If we do ratify this protocol, if we continue to support the ministers in this house who have contributed largely to its present degree of success, then, in keeping with the motto in the personal seal of Lord Ismay, secretary general of NATO, which was affixed to this protocol, we may "have no fear."

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am confident that had anyone in this house in 1945 suggested that by 1955 we should be doing what we are doing today that person would have been considered a very fit patient for a psychiatrist. Nevertheless the question before us is of great significance to every Canadian man, woman and child. In my opinion, nothing that has come before this house since the end of the war has been so important as is the question before us.

Notwithstanding the significance of the matter before us, Mr. Speaker, there is just no enthusiasm among the peoples of the world today for the ratification of this protocol, no enthusiasm except possibly on the part of those remaining members of the German military staff and on the part of those who believe that war with Russia is inevitable.

Could I believe that war with Russia is inevitable then I should certainly be supporting this protocol. War, like politics, makes very strange bedfellows, and certainly if it is inevitable that we are to get into a third world war with Russia, then it does not matter much whom we have for our allies so long as they have an abundance of thermonuclear weapons.

Although the protocol has been ratified by the assemblies of a number of the nations concerned, there has been little enthusiasm for this ratification in those assemblies. There was very little enthusiasm in the British House of Commons, where 51 per cent of the members representing both political parties refrained from voting. There was very little enthusiasm shown in the French assembly, which was induced to reverse its first vote by the threat that France would be isolated and that Germany would be rearmed with or without French aid. There appears to be very little enthusiasm in Germany itself, as is indicated by the report in this morning's press of the delay which is being caused there to the ratification of this protocol.

Certainly there is no enthusiasm across this country. A Gallup poll released by the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion on November 24, 1954, showed that 27 per cent of those who were interviewed thought that the rearming of Germany was a step toward peace, but that 43 per cent of those interviewed thought it was a step away from peace. It is true that one in four of those interviewed in that Gallup poll had no opinion on the subject; and it is true that 74 per cent of those Canadians who were interviewed had no conception of what was symbolized by the letters EDC. That, I suggest, is a reflection on the government, a reflection on the press of Canada, and to some measure a reflection on ourselves as members of parliament for failing to give to the Canadian people information on this subject which is one of vital importance to every Canadian. Certainly, I have found no evidence of any enthusiasm in my riding.

I have received, to date, well over one thousand personal appeals asking that I oppose this resolution. Those personal appeals have come from individual trade unionists, from individual veterans and from other citizens. Some of these are people in my riding that I know to be communists, but I know the people in my riding well enough to know that hundreds of those protests came from people who are just as violently opposed to communism as any member of this House of Commons.

Why should there be any enthusiasm for this measure? Even the members of this chamber who have spoken in favour of it have shown their misgivings. Few of them have shown any great enthusiasm for the step we are taking here; the best they can do is to hope that they are right.

The objections and the misgivings of that small minority of us in this chamber who will vote against this resolution were very clearly set forth yesterday, in no uncertain terms, by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and they were also expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) today.

Our objections were furthermore expressed by the C.C.F. leader yesterday, even though he could not in all conscience agree with us. They have been repeated by many other speakers in this house who are supporting the measure. I shall not take the time of the house to repeat some of our objections which have already been stated. As I have already indicated, I do not believe, I cannot believe in the inevitability of a third world war. I cling to the belief that such a catastrophe for the human race can be avoided, but I cannot believe that the step we are about to take can possibly achieve any purpose other than to make the avoidance of that catastrophe more difficult.

I am concerned with the possibility of the resurgence of German militarism, and I think it is only sensible to realize that by taking this step we are encouraging that resurgence. I just cannot for the life of me see how we can think otherwise. There can be no doubt that those who will control German rearmament will be members of the former German general staff. I do not think there is or can be a doubt in anyone's mind that many of those who were members of the former German general military staff during world war II will now be in charge of that rearmament.

It is only sensible to realize, as has been pointed out, that a rearmed Germany will in a short time become the predominant force among the western European nations. In this connection I should like to read one short paragraph from Lord Russell's new book, "The Scourge of the Swastika." He makes reference to the German general staff, some of whom we must remember will be in charge of German rearming, and on page 4 he gives the verdict of the international tribunal in connection with the German general staff, as follows:

> They have been responsible in large measure for the miseries and suffering that have fallen on millions of men, women, and children. They have been a disgrace to the honourable profession of arms. Without their military guidance the aggressive ambitions of Hitler and his fellow nazis would have been academic and sterile . . . they were a ruthless and military caste . . . Many of these men have made a mockery of the soldier's oath of obedience to military orders. When it suits their defence, they say they had to obey; when confronted with Hitler's brutal crimes which are shown to have been within their general knowledge, they say they disobeyed. The truth is that they actively participated in all these crimes, or sat silent and acquiescent, witnessing the commission of crimes on a scale larger and more shocking than the world has ever had the misfortune to know.

I believe, regardless of our opinion on the necessity of ratifying this protocol, that we must face the fact that a rearmed Germany will again come under the direction of those same military leaders.

If a third world war is inevitable, then the resurgence of German militarism does not much matter. It will make very little difference to any of us what general staff is in the ascendancy under those circumstances. What I am more concerned with than the resurgence of German militarism is the effect this ratification will have upon the process of negotiation with our enemy.

Three years ago we were told how vitally important EDC was. For three years we were taught that the western allies could not survive without the ratification of EDC. But for three years, without the ratification of EDC, we made what is admitted on all sides to be more progress in negotiating with our enemy than at any time since the end of world war II. Why then the haste? Why the hurry? For that period of time we have made real progress on reaching agreement through diplomacy and negotiation without having recourse to arms. Must we now take this step which, if it does anything, will in my opinion make negotiation extremely difficult?

Mr. Martin: Will the hon. member permit a question? In what field or where has this progress been made with those whom my hon. friend refers to as the enemy?

Mr. Noseworthy: I doubt if the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has made a single speech in this house within the past year without emphasizing the fact that we have been making progress in the field of negotiation, and no one has been louder in claiming that we must not close any door to the possibility of reaching agreement through negotiation and diplomacy.

We negotiated on Korea. We have made some progress in negotiations regarding Indo-China. We have, thanks to the good work of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), made some progress toward convening another conference on disarmament; and, if we accept press reports, we are now on the point of negotiating a cease-fire on Formosa.

We have been making progress, Mr. Speaker, and to my mind the most important question concerning the ratification of this protocol is the effect it will have on the negotiations in future. Will it hamper or improve our chances of settling disagreements with Russia through negotiation? If I could be as certain as is the Secretary of State for External Affairs that it will open the way to easier negotiation, then I would have no hesitation in voting in favour of ratification. But for the life of me I cannot see how this is going to make it easier for our negotiators to reach agreement on the many international problems confronting us at the present time.

Most of all, I am concerned with the effect the ratification of this protocol will have upon the outcome of that conference which has been initiated through the good work of our delegation at the United Nations under the leadership of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

All Canada was proud of our achievement at the United Nations. All Canadians rejoiced that our own delegates and one of our own ministers was able to do what the United Nations has been trying to do for many years, namely, get unanimous agreement on the possibility of another meeting on disarmament.

We have the communists with us, Mr. Speaker, and we are going to have to live with them. If we are to avoid a third world war we must, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs told us yesterday, find some way of reaching an agreement on an effective disarmament program. Just so long as east and west continue to pile up armaments of every known nature, just so much greater becomes the danger of someone somewhere sparking a third world war. Unless we want a third world war we must find some way of reaching an agreement on an effective disarmament program.

As I have already indicated, it appeared that we were making some progress. I am most concerned with what effect this will have on our meeting with Russia in a disarmament conference after and not before we have rearmed Germany.

One effect of this protocol is certain. Both east and west will acquire more arms. Both east and west will strengthen their military forces. One result is sure, whatever else may be in doubt. We will be adding to our forces in the west, and we have no reason in the world to suspect that Russia on the other hand will not offset any military balance which may be created by the rearming of Germany by further rearming of the forces of the Soviet and her satellites.

There is another question. At the end of world war II I participated in a conference of the Canadian teachers' federation. As educators we were then concerned with the fact that there was in Germany a whole generation of German youth who had absorbed the philosophy of nazism. I well recall the concern of the Canadian teachers' federation and the world federation of teachers over what steps should be taken to try to eradicate from the minds of that generation of German youth some of the things they had learned under Hitler, and how we could possibly educate in Germany a generation of youth who would have some conception of the ideals and philosophy of democracy.

There have been a great many democratic leaders in Germany since then whose chief concern has been to train a generation of German youth with some conception of the ideals of democracy; to get them away, to enable them to forget the lessons they had learned under Hitler. Under this protocol we rearm Germany and we shall place these very youth, with whom democratic leaders have been struggling for the past eight or ten years, under the military leadership of at least some of the men who led the German forces in world war II. That, I think, is a matter which we should consider seriously.

The government, with the support of the majority in the house, will obviously ratify the protocol. I can only hope that history will show I am wrong and those who support the protocol are right. But I must be guided personally by my own conscience, and I can follow no other course than to take issue with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, for whom I have the very highest regard, take issue with my own leader, for whom I also have the very highest regard, vote against the measure, and leave my constituents to be the judge of my actions.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything in this debate. I did not feel that I had any particular competence in the matter now before the house. However, I think the speech made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat does justify a modest intervention on my part.

I should like to say first of all, as he has just said, that whatever the differences each of us may have in our various points of view we all respect the points of view of other hon. members on a matter of such great importance, and certainly nothing I shall say is to be taken as a reflection on what the hon. member has said, on what any of his colleagues have said or may say, or in any way a reflection on any other member of the house.

But I do think the hon. member is in error when he suggests that there is no enthusiasm in this country for this particular proposition. I am sure the word "enthusiasm" in this context should be defined. No one, for example, has any enthusiasm for the payment of income taxes, but our people recognize that if we are going to discharge the responsibilities of government at the present time taxes have to be paid, and in that sense there is "enthusiasm" on the part of the Canadian people for this particular obligation. Surely there is enthusiasm on the part of the people of Canada for the maintenance of peace and freedom in the world. Surely those of us who believe that peace and freedom can best be maintained at this time through this particular proposal will find it possible to justify the stand we are taking on this momentous question.

I have said that, within the context of my understanding of the word "enthusiasm", I believe there is a strong conviction, soberly arrived at, if you will, on the part of the people of the country that, having in mind the realities, there is no alternative for those of us who want to preserve what the west stands for other than to take every legitimate opportunity to align ourselves now with that potentially mighty nation that has always played such an important part in the history of Europe and of the world.

There is one group in our country, of course, that does not like this particular resolution, and I am not suggesting in any way that the hon. member or any other hon. member of the house is directly, willingly or unwillingly a party to the points of view of this group. I have noted in the Canadian Tribune that on December 10 the national committee of the labour progressive party met in Toronto at which time, according to this paper, the leader of the labour progressive party, Mr. Tim Buck, issued a call to all L.P.P. members for country-wide action against ratification of the London and Paris agreements. I learned, furthermore, that a detailed directive was later issued by that party setting out with considerable care the manner in which the campaign against ratification was to be organized. I am sure that all of us in the house have already felt the effects of this particular way of impressing us with the extent to which there is no enthusiasm in the country for the decision that most of us in the house think has to be taken with regard to this matter. I have had placed in my hands through a responsible source a copy of the particular directive to which I have just made reference, and here it is:

> Every section of the party should be activized in this campaign. All possible initiative should be developed in neighbourhood activities. Members of parliament should be visited by deputations in their constituencies.
> The idea should be raised of a great national delegation to Ottawa at the opening of parliament, if necessary.
> That petitions of a local character be taken up by individuals. We should have small, and preferably handwritten petitions organized in such organizations as the Y's, trade unions, shops, and neighbourhoods. Every comrade can write out a short petition and take it to his or her neighbours, getting 10, 15 or 20 signatures and then forward it to their M.P.
> No single petition is being issued at this time in order to avoid the difficulty generally encountered of people refusing to sign a petition because it might associate them with the left.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that if there is no enthusiasm on the part of the people of Canada, it could be because this directive has already been acted upon. But we are not unfamiliar with this technique, and none of us in this house is going to be in any way influenced except, as the hon. member who has just spoken has said, by the dictates of his or her own conscience.

I feel that the majority of the people in this country, in the exercise of what their conscience suggests and having in mind the great stakes involved as well as the challenge of the ideology which since the end of the first war has faced the free world, will recognize that, great as are the difficulties and so-called risks involved, it is our duty at this time to let the people of Germany know that the integrity of that nation and the preservation of the freedom of the world rests with the west and not with the east.

It seems to me that is the positive feeling which I, for one, would want the people of that nation to realize at this time. We want them to feel that, notwithstanding the justification of the judgment of history against the atrocities of another regime in that country, we would hope that in this interdependent world we could march with them in the future toward the building up of a fabric of peace and not of human destruction, to which admittedly they have made their contribution in the past.

A moment ago the hon. member referred to the work of the Canadian delegation at the recent general assembly of the United Nations. What we should do, he said, is to work for disarmament. We should seek to channel the resources of the world, now being deployed into the building up of machines of war for destructive purposes, into channels for constructive purposes for the good of mankind. The hon. member said that should be the purpose of this government's policy and should be the attitude of this parliament and of this nation.

I am sure that upon reflection he would admit that that is the purpose behind the policy of this government, that that is the purpose behind the policy of the governments of the United States and the United Kingdom. I feel it is necessary that we should declare here and now, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) did when he spoke in New Delhi, that we do not for one moment subscribe to the view that either our own policies or the policies of our great neighbour have any other purpose than to bring about peace among the nations of the world.

I went to the meeting of the United Nations to assist my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who realized that certain matters would take him to Europe on at least two occasions during the course of the autumn. During the first week of the ninth assembly of the United Nations I was able to confer with him on the purposes that should guide our point of view in respect of the various questions that were to be discussed at the United Nations. Naturally as a member of the government I knew of the difficulties that besieged the North Atlantic community in Europe, and the part that Canada would be expected to take at those important conferences in London and Paris.

My colleague left the United Nations before a speech was made by the permanent delegate of the Soviet union, the late Andrei Vishinsky, on September 30. This was one of the most important speeches made by the late Mr. Vishinsky at the United Nations, for it announced the abandonment of the traditional attitude taken by the Soviet union on disarmament. In effect he said that from now on they would no longer insist first upon an agreement to ban the use of atomic weapons as a condition precedent to disarmament in conventional weapons. That represented a very important declaration. I at once communicated with the Secretary of State for External Affairs and pointed out to him the nature of this declaration by Mr. Vishinsky. He replied that we should immediately take every advantage of this situation, even to the point of taking the initiative to see if we could not take some forward step on this question at the United Nations.

Those who criticize the proposal now before us as one that is contrary to the peaceful purposes to which this country is dedicated ought, therefore, to bear in mind that while my colleague was taking a particular step in London and later in Paris, it was as a result of his instructions, and I might say his inspiration, that we decided to take the initiative at the United Nations to see whether or not the time had arrived when we could count upon the support of the Soviet union to take solid steps toward a program of disarmament.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the minister permit a question? Would the minister agree that the steps we are asked to take now are the logical and inevitable result of our voting for NATO?

Mr. Martin: I do not think there can be any doubt about that. Now, because of the remarks made by the hon. member who took his seat a few minutes ago, I want to recall certain steps that we have taken. To make this particular question more understandable to hon. members, I may remind them that two years ago the United Nations set up a disarmament commission. It surely is the function and responsibility of the United Nations to do what it can to ease the burden of armaments.

Last June my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs had taken steps along with M. Jules Moch of France, Mr. Selwyn Lloyd of the United Kingdom and Mr. Patterson of the United States, in discussions in London, to see whether or not it would be possible to give new life to the cause of disarmament through renewed meetings of the subcommittee of the disarmament commission that had been set up for that purpose. Out of those discussions in June came a notable document known as the Anglo-French memorandum, which provided a formula for disarmament. This formula was subscribed to by the United Kingdom, France, Canada and the United States, but was opposed by the Soviet union, represented at that time by Mr. Jacob Malik.

The speech made by Mr. Vishinsky on September 30, therefore, came as a most heartening bit of news to the world, and particularly to those who had followed these discussions. They argued that even at this seemingly most illogical time we might bring about an easing of the burden of armaments. So we decided in Canada—that is, our Canadian delegation—to put forth a resolution urging the reconvening of the subcommittee that had met in London in order that the discussions that had ended there so abruptly, because of the attitude of the Soviet union, might be resumed. And in view of the speech made by Mr. Vishinsky we thought we were perfectly justified in putting forward this proposal.

As an earnest of our intention we took the unusual step of circulating to the United Kingdom, to France, to the United States and also to the Soviet union an advance copy of the resolution we proposed to introduce the next day, together with a letter addressed to the permanent delegate of each of these countries. I was given the assurance at once by the three countries of the west that we could count fully on their sponsorship of the resolution we intended formally to lay on the table the next day, and Mr. Vishinsky himself called me to say he greatly appreciated this act of courtesy, that his country was anxious to give consideration to the implications of our resolution, and that while he could not say more at that moment, certainly he would look on the matter with the greatest interest and sympathy.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the minister allow a question? I believe it is a very important one. Was this statement by Mr. Vishinsky, and also the speech, made after or before the London-Paris agreements were decided upon?

Mr. Martin: It was concurrent. The London agreements had not been completed. The London conference was actually in session when his speech was made.

The following day we presented our resolution, which was a procedural one. I do not wish to read into it anything more than it contained, but it seems to me that disarmament has the quality of procedure in it, and that perhaps on that account I should neither underestimate the value of our proposal nor should I overestimate its significance. But at once the countries of the west gave their support and their agreement to sponsor the resolution. We were eager that there should be sponsorship of it by the Soviet union.

After the conclusion of the first session of our meetings, and after we had tabled our resolution, we had a meeting with the three other sponsors of our proposal. At that time it had ceased to be a resolution standing in the name of Canada but became one carrying the sponsorship of the United States, Great Britain and France. Canada took the position that we should seek sponsorship of this resolution by the Soviet union as well, and I may say that the representatives of the other three countries readily concurred. The question then arose as to what contact should be made with the Soviet union to see what modifications were necessary in order to bring about unanimous sponsorship. Canada was designated by her three colleague countries as the liaison between the four nations and the spokesman for the Soviet union, Mr. Vishinsky.

At this point I want to pay tribute to the personnel in the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Pearson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin: I refer to the three gentlemen who accompanied me in my conversations with Mr. Vishinsky. I can say that whatever credit there may be for what was done should go, in large measure, to them for their advice and their help, as well as their great industry.

But the fact is that after a series of meetings we were able to arrive at an understanding—the United States, Great Britain, Canada and France on the one hand, with the Soviet union on the other. I think I may say my impression is that we were able to arrive at an understanding with the Soviet union because by this time the masters of the Kremlin had come to the conclusion that they were negotiating with an area of the world that had become strong.

I am sure the Soviet union respects strength. I am sure we are now in a better position to carry out the proposals for the peaceful use of atomic energy because of our armed strength. I am not saying we will succeed in the matter of disarmament, but certainly we are in a better position to move ahead because of the contribution the western nations have made since 1947 in the building up of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

And so in any consideration of this matter of disarmament, and the part we played at the United Nations, it would be quite wrong for anyone to contrast what we sought to do there with what my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, was able to accomplish in London and Paris. In passing I may say that his speech yesterday certainly did not reveal the very considerable part which he personally played in the successful outcome of the meetings in London and elsewhere during the past few months.

It would be wrong to say that because we were trying to bring about disarmament we were acting in a way that was contrary to what was being done in London, and later in Paris. The fact is that I really do hope the steps taken by us last fall at the United Nations will mature into successful results. At the last meeting in which he took part at the United Nations Mr. Vishinsky, who acted as chairman of the disarmament committee of the United Nations, formally set in motion the operations of the subcommittee. When the meeting was over—and this was only a few days before his death—I happened to pass him and I said, "I really hope we mean business, all of us, this time."

I do not know whether all of us mean business or not; but I can say this—and I say it to the hon. member for York South—that we did our best at the United Nations to promote disarmament, just as in London my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs did his best, along with others from the west, to bring about guarantees for increased unity among the western powers.

We did nothing that could be construed as an abandonment of the main safeguards which the western powers consider essential for effective control. We made it clear in our discussion that we wanted to argue from a position of strength. If the world before the advent of Hitler had been strong enough, not to resist by aggressive action but by way of defensive measures, it is conceivable that the mad dream of Hitler's war would never have taken place. There was no change in this policy because of our efforts towards disarmament, nor was there any change in the resolution of all of us which would have the effect of weakening the unity of the west. Certainly the United States, Great Britain, France and Canada, who took the leading part in these discussions at the United Nations, did not in any way by that step indicate, or intend to indicate, that we were prepared to abandon the defensive strength that had been built up during the years since the end of the war.

Our policy in Canada, and I am sure the policy of our co-sponsoring western nations, has always been to consider the issue and the time. The Canadian government has always believed that our objective in building up strength for our survival is to attain a position from which successful serious negotiations can begin. As the Prime Minister has said, everything we have done in NATO, at the United Nations or elsewhere has been in an effort to prevent another war.

Now in asking this house to support this resolution we recognize the implications; we recognize the force of the irritations that are recorded in the pages of contemporary history; but at the same time we cannot blind ourselves to the fact that in Germany there is a powerful group of people potentially capable of doing good as well as of doing evil. Whether or not we bring Germany into the North Atlantic community the day will come when that nation will again enjoy its sovereign position, a circumstance which may come about perhaps by action on its own part or by bilateral arrangements made with the strongest power in the west. Therefore what we are now doing is not only to guarantee our own strength vis-à-vis a potential aggressor. At the same time we are giving evidence to the people of Germany itself of our desire to share a peaceful life and a peaceful world with them.

The Canadian government has pursued a seemingly illogical course at London and at Paris, but on examination a course that I am sure commends itself to this house and to the people of this country. By our acts at the United Nations we have demonstrated, along with our colleague nations, that we have no warlike intentions, that we would like to see the resources of our country and of the western world employed for more constructive purposes than the building of instruments for human destruction.

I said on two occasions at the United Nations, once during the disarmament debate and once on Mr. Lodge's proposal for the peaceful uses of atomic energy, that as Minister of National Health and Welfare in Canada I could be expected to have a special appreciation of the moves we were making. I share with every hon. member the hope that the day will come when we will be able to transfer to more humanitarian ends the great resources our people have put at our disposal for the purpose of building up defensive alliances against aggression; that we will be able to use these resources to improve the health and welfare of the people of this country and make additional contributions in these fields to the other peoples of the world. I look forward to that day, and so do the people of Canada. But if that day is not at hand it is not the fault of this nation, it is not the fault of the nations of the west; it is because the policy of the Soviet union, pursued over these years, stands in the way and jeopardizes all that we treasure most. I believe the resolution moved yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is constructive, is directed toward strengthening our position and thereby making us more respected and a stronger figure at the bargaining table. In a practical way this may do more than anything else to create in our world at this time an era of security, freedom and peace.

Mr. Noseworthy: May I ask the minister a question? Does the minister agree that the unanimous agreement to his resolution at the United Nations indicates that there is a lessening of tension between east and west.

Mr. Martin: Well, I can only give my own personal view of the situation. Obviously there is a greater absence of conflict at the present time, but my opinion on a matter of this sort is not of any great value. What I have sought to say is this. If there is an easing of tension—and I personally believe there is—it is because the western world had made itself stronger than it was before.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are now dealing with a subject that is of critical importance in international affairs. There has been no discussion since the war of greater interest to the Canadian people than this one which deals with Germany. The attention focused on this subject by parliament has been impressive. It is under circumstances such as these that parliament fulfils its great function as a forum in which direction and guidance may be given to the Canadian people. It serves to give opportunity to those who wish to present differing points of view. Here is the place where all the facts may be disclosed, all the evidence examined, and false propaganda exposed and discredited.

It is my intention to support the resolution, for reasons which I shall presently state. If I do not show the great enthusiasm that some seem to think hon. members who support the resolution should show, and have expressed surprise in that regard, on the other hand I doubt whether I shall present very many reservations.

At this stage I should like to commend the minister on his statement yesterday. I think it was well done, though incomplete in some respects. Having commended him, and others have quite properly complimented him—to set the proper balance I should now proceed to offer a little criticism, not in any partisan spirit, for the subject is above party considerations, but because I have been dissatisfied for the last 20 years with the conduct of our external affairs.

My dissatisfaction goes back to the period before the second world war when we faced a crisis in international affairs just as momentous as the present period of uneasy peace. In those years I looked to the government of the day for information and direction, and was sadly disappointed. I have had no reason to change my opinion since that time. The official Canadian attitude to foreign affairs has all too frequently been characterized by unwillingness to disclose any information until pressed to do so; to ask for parliamentary approval long after agreements and protocols have been signed; to encourage a so-called bipartisan attitude without prior consultation with the opposition, and to avoid discussion at home and commitments abroad wherever possible.

I remember the late Mr. Gordon Graydon drew attention a few years ago to the small amount of time given by parliament to the discussion of external affairs. Some slight improvement has occurred of late, but more is desirable. Competent as the minister is in his special field, he nevertheless has fallen into error on this occasion due, in my opinion, to long years of conditioning in the bad practices I have mentioned. I shall not blame him for the failure to summon parliament in the fall; that responsibility lies elsewhere. But I do place the blame on him, as did the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken), and on his department for failure to appreciate the necessity of preparing the Canadian people for this measure which is of such historic importance. He has been outmanoeuvred and outwitted by the communists. We are now gathering the fruits of this method of conducting our external affairs.

During the past six weeks members of parliament have been deluged with letters, telegrams and other communications, chiefly but not entirely from communist-inspired groups across this country. The communists have had the best opportunity in years to mislead the Canadian people. Skilful communist propaganda has succeeded in creating in the public mind the opinion that the only issue at stake is the rearming of Germany. Taken completely out of its context and background the rearming of Germany would alarm almost anyone, but considered in relation to the whole sphere of international affairs it is a very small part indeed.

In the four months which have elapsed since the London conference, in the almost three months that have gone by since the signing of this protocol by Canada's representative, no effective information from a government source has gone out to the people of Canada. No official statements or documents were placed in the hands of members of parliament. Even now with parliament assembled the supporting documents have been tabled with diffidence; they have been reproduced in Hansard or in Votes and Proceedings only upon request, and are incomplete. Consider the resolution now before us. It states:

> That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany, signed by Canada at Paris on October 23, 1954, and that this house do approve the same.

In the British House of Commons the motion dealing with the same subject was expressed as follows, and I quote:

That this house approves the policy of Her Majesty's government towards western Europe as expressed in the agreement reached in London on 3rd October 1954 and in Paris on 23rd October, 1954.

I think the motion before us should have included some reference to those conferences. Technically, of course, it is correct. The admittance of Germany to NATO requires the approval of our parliament. Canada is not a member of the western European union, as is Britain. Nevertheless the admittance of Germany to NATO is merely the final step in a whole series, and would not have been considered without the other arrangements between Germany and western European nations. Furthermore, Canada was represented at the London conference and played a full part in the deliberations. Obviously, I think, parliament should have been asked to approve or disapprove of the government's policy as expressed in the agreement reached at London. All we are asked to do is to approve of Germany's admittance to NATO. I give this as an example of the method used for many years past to play down or gloss over matters that concern Canada's international relations.

Then just consider the documents that have been tabled. Instead of putting in our hands a white paper, which would have included the proceedings of the London conference and Paris conference, instead of giving us all that information, what happens? The minister tables what is actually a special supplement to a NATO letter which is undated. This gives practically all the information as to the Paris conference, but omits one very important matter which I shall mention in a moment. Several days later on request a reprint was tabled from the magazine External Affairs purporting to be a report of the final act of the London conference.

On request the protocol was printed in Hansard. Again on request the proceedings of the Paris conference were printed in Votes and Proceedings. The proceedings of the London conference remain simply as a sessional paper. I think following the British custom that documents of such importance, particularly in relation to a matter of this nature, should have been incorporated in a white paper and given to members of parliament as early in the session as possible. I do not understand the operations of the Department of External Affairs in tabling documents of that nature when the other method is available.

Then I say that they are not complete. One of the first questions I wanted answered when I came down here was the actual contribution required of Germany by NATO. What are the figures? People who interviewed me talked about the contribution in rather large figures. I did not know. I did not have the actual authentic information. Nowhere in the documents tabled by the minister is that information to be found. The minister disclosed it yesterday in the course of his speech. In the British white paper dealing with the Paris conference I find a subnote mentioning twelve German divisions, 1,350 aircraft, and naval vessels.

Similarly with regard to the London conference, the documents tabled in this house are not complete because they omit the text of the three statements made by the representative of the United States, the representative of Great Britain and our own minister of external affairs. I think those three statements should have been included in the documents tabled in the House of Commons here.

Having said that, I think the minister can now relax. I trust that he will profit by my suggestions for the improvement of the administration of his department. I would not have taken the time of the house to mention these matters had it not been for the great historic importance of this step that we are considering. We should have all the information that is available to us as members of parliament upon whom rests the responsibility of making decisions, in order that we may answer effectively those who write to us or send us telegrams or come to see us.

I just want to say a word with regard to what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said last night. He was later supported by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), so perhaps the other point of view from that city may be presented. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre expressed the fear that with Germany making a military contribution to NATO and being given the right to rearm, very soon Germany would dominate the councils of NATO. I cannot follow my hon. friend in that reasoning when there are actually 14 nations involved, and when the dominating powers are surely the United States and the United Kingdom.

Then my hon. friend mentioned the necessity of removing the causes of war. I quite agree with the hon. member that the problem of removing the causes of war is of profound importance. That is a problem that has engaged my attention ever since the end of the last world war, and I have given it more attention than anything else. But the hon. member suggested that poverty was one of the prime causes of war. I shall give his exact words, so we may be quite clear about them, as reported at page 397 of Hansard for January 20:

> Given the time I think we can remove some of the causes of the world's ills. We can change the picture so that instead of two-thirds of the world's people going to bed hungry tonight, as they do every night of their lives, there might be some sharing of the food and good things that we can produce.

I agree with the hon. member that everywhere in this world want should be removed. But I cannot agree that want is a major cause of war, as he implied in his statement. That expression is rather widely used, and people frequently say that if poverty were removed the danger of world war would be lessened. I do not know to what extent it would be lessened, though I agree with the necessity for removing poverty throughout the world.

However, I doubt if any evidence can be produced that any of the great wars of history occurred because people were short of food. It will be a long time before I am convinced that we are in any danger of a third world war because of any action that might be taken by a half-starved peasant in the wilds of Siberia, or a starving population somewhere else in the world. The decision with regard to a third world war or a war on a world scale rests with a few singularly well fed men in the Kremlin.

To digress for a moment, I believe the causes of war should be examined by this house on some occasion. We had a debate two years ago when we touched on that subject, but it should be further examined in order that we may be better informed. I take one of the prime causes of war to be anarchy, that lack of control among the nations of the world which leads to unrest. Each nation is sovereign in its own right and makes its own decision with regard to declaring war on its neighbour.

If we deal with that possibility I believe one of the prime causes of war will be removed. In this regard I believe it is in NATO that the most effective step has been taken to that end. The nations grouped in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization have come closer together than at any time in the history of the world, and gone farther toward solving that problem. They have become so closely integrated that there is not the slightest possibility of any one of those nations declaring war or committing an act of aggression against another member of that group. The hope of the world is that some such system as that can become more widespread. It is in that connection that I look at the problem of Germany. I have not concentrated my attention on the rearmament of Germany. For me that has been a secondary consideration. It is the problem of bringing Germany into the council of the western nations that impresses me most as it does others who have looked at this picture very closely.

It is a really astonishing step forward to realize that a former enemy—and a bitter enemy at that—is now going to unite with us and sit down at the same council table. When has Germany ever sat down peacefully with the representatives of the western nations with the intention of co-operating with them to maintain peace and security? Not in our lifetime, except perhaps during the short interval of the Weimar republic. Not for 80 years have we had the opportunity of getting close to Germany. Not in fact, since the time of Bismarck. Yet I cannot help but recall that earlier in our history the Germans were well thought of and even admired by some. We have only to recall the battle of Waterloo, when Wellington saw with pleasure and delight the arrival of German troops under Blucher.

I have no reason to like the German people as a result of the experiences I have gone through. I have nothing but scorn for Prussian officers, nazis, and arrogant German militarists. But I do not believe for one moment that all the people of Germany can be put into that category. I believe it is a bit difficult for us to blame anyone in Germany under the age of 30 for any of the atrocities committed during the war.

We have suffered severely at the hands of Germans. Indeed, is there a family in Canada that has not suffered? Nevertheless, has not every family in Germany also suffered? Once you engage in war it is difficult to draw the line between the opposing sides. I make no excuse for the frightful atrocities committed by the nazis in their concentration camps and other places of torture. I make no excuse for the atrocities committed on the battlefield. But in all fairness we must recognize that the German nation too has suffered. That nation has learned a bitter lesson in two world wars.

We have said of France that she would have been a great and powerful nation in our time had she not been bled white during the first world war. We have time and again lamented the loss of the flower of British manhood in the first great war. Is it not therefore likely that Germany for the next 50 years will be lamenting the loss of the flower of German manhood in the second world war? I believe there are perhaps as many widows and orphans in Germany as in any other country in the world.

The suffering therefore has not been solely on one side. We might say that they brought it upon themselves. But we know that under our own democratic system of government decisions are made to which everyone cannot agree, and we have to go along with those decisions. Decisions were made by German nazi leaders which inflicted serious loss and injury on the entire German people.

For those reasons I am not quite certain there will be the resurgence of German militarism which bothers some people. There may be a reaction against German militarism for a long time to come. But even if there is a resurgence of German militarism I believe the present controls are effective. I do not propose covering those controls again, for they have already been dealt with, and I agree with statements made in this regard by the hon. members for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes), and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Well, that is the situation. If we examine history we see that over long periods of years there have been antagonisms between nations, 300 years of it between Britain and France, a very long period between Canada and the United States. It is practically within living memory that the antagonism and fear of Canada of the United States has been dissipated. We are aware of the antagonism between France and Germany ever since 1870. But what is the situation now? Surely this is one of the greatest forward steps in the history of the world. France and Germany, bitter, mortal enemies in so far as we have known their history in recent times, have now agreed to come together. It is something we could not have expected or foreseen.

That is not all. The United States of America, on whom we pinned our hopes during that difficult period in the 1920's and 1930's when the league of nations was formed and then had trouble, has altered its age-old policy with respect to international commitments. One of the reasons I suggested to the minister that Mr. Dulles' speech at the London conference should have been printed in our records was this sentence that caught my attention. He said:

> The North Atlantic treaty was an engagement which was quite unprecedented for the United States—it was quite unprecedented for the United States to make that kind of long-range alliance with other countries. That was directly contrary to our earlier policies which had been pursued for over 100 years.

Yet we are living in an age when the United States has changed that policy, is taking an active part in international affairs, is stationing her forces overseas, and has been carrying on shoulder to shoulder with us ever since she entered world war II.

Then consider, as the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) characterized it the other day, that courageous step by Great Britain. We know from the history of Great Britain that her policy was to have no commitments on the continent of Europe in the way of stationing troops there in any permanent sense; yet look at what has happened now. I think this was the great and decisive action of the London conference, the offer by Sir Anthony Eden that British troops would remain on the continent and would not be withdrawn unless under the most difficult and unexpected circumstances. Sir Anthony Eden, in the course of his statement at that conference, said this:

> My colleagues will realize that what I have announced—

He was referring to the announcement that British troops would remain in Europe.

> —is for us a very formidable step to take. You will know that ours is above all an island story. We are still an island people in thought and tradition, whatever the modern facts of weapons and strategy may compel. And it has been not without considerable reflection that the government which I represent here has decided that this statement could be made to you this afternoon.

That is leadership of a high order. I had hoped that Canada might have made as forthright a statement with regard to her forces in Europe as is implied in the commitment of Great Britain and the statement by Mr. Dulles. My hope is that nevertheless we shall remain solidly with Great Britain and the United States in this great commitment overseas. That, to me, has overshadowed this so-called rearming of Germany. Here we have the leading democratic nations in the world linked more closely together than ever before in their history, changing their centuries-old methods of dealing with foreign countries, the United States reversing a policy maintained for over 100 years, Great Britain reversing a policy maintained during all of her history in modern times, and both united with us and other countries in that great organization, NATO.

To bring Germany into that organization under these conditions, to forget some of the injuries of the past, to attempt to hold out the hand of friendship to Germany and to expect in return the hand of friendship from Germany—surely that is a great forward step in international relations. That is why I said at the beginning that I propose to support the motion now before us, and I support it with minor reservations. I was going to say without any reservations whatsoever, but they are extraordinarily minor because, as I see the picture, it is one of the most important steps that have been taken in the history of the world since the formation of NATO.

I recall those words of Sir Winston Churchill contained in his history of the second world war. You remember them: In war, resolution; in defeat, defiance; in victory, magnanimity; in peace, good will.

This is a period when we can show magnanimity to Germany and greet her in the company of the NATO nations with good will.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, like most other speakers who have taken part in the debate I want to deal mainly with the military aspects of these agreements, and especially with the problem of rearming Germany; because that seems to be the part of the agreements that has caused the most worry and upset among many people throughout the country.

Since it was indicated that it was intended to bring this matter before the house I have received dozens of letters and cards not only from people in my own riding but from all over Canada protesting against the acceptance of these agreements. Granted that many of them came from communists and fellow travellers, nevertheless a good many of them, probably the majority, came from people who are good, honest, sincere citizens and who are motivated only by the deepest concern as to what the result may be.

I share that concern. I am greatly concerned about what may happen with respect to the rearming of Germany. My memory is not so short but what I can look back to the five years I spent fighting these same Germans. I have not forgotten the good friends whom I lost during that war. Nor have I forgotten the cries of men who were wounded, hurt, dying or drowning. I have not forgotten the sound of the whistle of German bullets nor the whistle of their bombs. I can still remember vividly the white wake of their torpedoes and the dull boom as they struck merchant ships. More than that, I can remember the hours I spent digging in the rubble, with my hands bleeding, trying to get civilian survivors out of the bomb ruins in London. I can remember an overturned lifeboat floating on the water, riddled with machine gun bullets. These things are not easy to forget. When we recall that we have gone through this ordeal twice in one lifetime, it makes it doubly hard to forget.

I am not too sure how far Germany can be trusted. I am not too sure how far her leaders can be trusted. But let us remember this, that not too many years ago practically every nation which is a signatory to the Paris agreement was an aggressor nation. This is true of Great Britain and France and all of them. Gradually these nations have developed beyond this idea of using aggression to become a world power. Gradually they have become more and more willing to co-operate with the other nations of the world. I am hoping events will prove that Germany has reached that point and will co-operate fully with the western nations.

As I said, I am not too sure how far we can trust Germany. However, we know we cannot trust the communists. For years their leaders have been telling us that their ultimate aim is world domination and nothing less will suffice. They have even explained the ways and means by which they are going to attain this end, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) put on the record yesterday. Let us not forget, too, that Germany is split in half. One half of Germany is already armed and ready to take part in any move against the western nations. If we cannot trust West Germany, then we cannot trust East Germany any further; and we already have East Germany on the wrong side of the fence, fully armed and ready to go. They are being pushed by the communist forces stationed there.

We have the safeguards laid down in the agreements. I do not know whether they are adequate. After reading the protocols and listening to the minister yesterday, I have been relieved of a good many of the fears I had prior to that time. One thing that strikes me is the guarantee given by West Germany that she will not use arms for the unification of Germany or any other expansion of her borders.

Yesterday the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked about the manufacture of arms outside of Germany. They brought to the attention of the minister the aircraft plant that is being established in Spain by a German arms company. I believe that is fairly well covered because protocol IV, article 7, deals with the setting up of an agency to investigate the importation of arms and the amount of arms stored within West Germany. I cannot see how it would be possible, therefore, for any nation to rearm, maintain arms, or import arms without that fact coming to the attention of this agency.

It should be noted also that article 10 of protocol IV gives the necessary control so far as atomic armaments are concerned. I shall not read the protocol because it is too long, and I notice it is getting close to six o'clock.

The letters I have received have opposed the rearmament of Germany because it was felt it might interfere with the ultimate reunion of free Germany. I do not think that would be so, because Russia is not going to agree to any union until that suits her purposes. Russia is not going to allow free elections for some time at least because she knows it would not be possible to win a majority. The Russians know they could not win in West Germany, because the elections held there have already proven decisively that the people of West Germany have no intention of embracing communism. When you recall that West Germany contains the larger population of the two sections, it becomes even more doubtful that the Russians would agree to free elections in the near future.

In addition they know they cannot possibly win a free election in East Germany, in spite of the brainwashing and educational programs they have introduced. East Germany, for one thing, is mainly Catholic and the Catholics are noted for being one of the strongest groups opposed to communism. What guarantee have we that free elections will ever be held in Germany when the Russians will not allow their own people within the Soviet union to have free elections? How can they be expected to hold free elections in any protectorate, as a result of which they might lose power in that section of the country?

This afternoon I was glad to hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) give some idea of the co-operation extended by the Soviet union in the debates of the United Nations this year. My experience in the United Nations a year ago showed me how unwilling the Russians were to co-operate at that time with the western nations in working out some sort of formula for the reduction of arms and for peace.

Many of those who oppose these agreements do so because they feel that we are going to turn the communists against us. They seem to feel that by backing down we are going to gain favour, that because the strength of the Soviet union is continually growing we should become weaker. They probably feel that if we get weak and puny the communists will take pity on us, as we might take pity on a puppy.

Let us not fool ourselves. They have no pity in their make-up. The stronger they become and the weaker we become, the less chance we have of ever achieving peace on this earth, except on their terms. It is also said that because there is danger of a third world war which could entail the end of civilization, we should grovel at the feet of the communist aggressor and submit to slavery without doing anything to protect ourselves.

I do not think an arms race is the only solution. I agree with some hon. members who have said we should make a continued effort towards peaceful negotiations. I agree also with those who said that we should be sending more clothing, food and so on to the have-not peoples of the earth, because if we had shown to those underdeveloped people a few years ago any of that Christian charity we boast about, they would not be embracing communism today. And had we shown a bit of respect, a bit of charity toward the Chinese people in the thirties, we would not have had men facing them in Korea during the last few years, and standing by to protect themselves from the Chinese at the present time. But we made those mistakes, and at least partially because of that we have to keep the arms race going at full pace today.

Like some other hon. members who have spoken I agree that these agreements and the rearming of Germany can put us in a much stronger bargaining position, because strength and force represent the only language the communists understand. And if we can add 1,350 fighter planes, 500,000 men, and other armament to our forces it will greatly enhance our bargaining position.

We realize that there is a definite risk, but we must also remember that the continued occupation of West Germany could do nothing more than antagonize the people and drive them directly into the hands of the communists. No one likes to walk down a street in a town and see members of the armed forces of strange nations patrolling those streets and sharing the livelihood of that nation. They do not like it. People like to feel that they are free. It is much better for us to give them an opportunity to show their good will toward us and to show that they are willing to co-operate with us than to antagonize them to the point where we know very well we cannot hope for any peace with them.

I cannot see that we have any choice other than that of rearming Germany. Because, believe me, if it ever came to a hot war between us and the communists I would rather have the German fighting strength as an ally than as an enemy. I might as well be frank enough to say that my decision to support this motion was to some degree influenced by the fact that there is going to be no real widening of Canadian commitments. But it does make it possible for the Germans to help protect themselves, if the Russian hordes ever should pour across the border. Let us remember, too, that even if Germany does remain unarmed, Canada is committed to protect West Germany against invasion. Even if this entailed further commitments I would still feel justified in supporting the motion.

I think every Canadian having full knowledge of the facts would give support; because what we need now, in the light of all the facts, is plenty of determination, and to show that we are willing to back up that determination with acts of courage. I think, too, that any of those who think there is no war at the present time could not do better than read the article written by David Lawrence in the U.S. News and World Report of January 21. I am not going to read it, but I commend it to all members who think we are living in a period of peace. It deals with the border clashes in Indo-China, the bombing raids on nationalist China, the invasion of some of the nationalist islands along the Chinese coast, and so on. This article makes it perfectly clear that, in spite of the communist peace propaganda, there is an act of aggression taking place somewhere in the world every day. We have to arm ourselves against that, no matter how much we dislike doing so.

I support the motion, not because I want war; I do not. I hate it; but I hate slavery more.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, before I start on the main part of my speech I want to refer for a moment to one remark of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) in a speech which I thought was otherwise an able one, when he expressed opposition to the proposal now before the house on the ground that the Canadian people were not very enthusiastic about it. As I heard him say that I could not help but remember the story of an American advertising man who was sent up to Canada to do a big job, to put on a big advertising campaign. After he had been up here for about a year he gave up the job in disgust because, he said, he never could get the Canadian people to think in terms of "greatest in the world" or "biggest in the world". He said the utmost in enthusiasm that he could ever get out of the Canadian people was "not too bad". I believe the Canadian people will say of this proposal that is before us tonight, "not too bad".

If you will forgive a personal word, Mr. Speaker, apart altogether from the substance of what is before us in this motion, I want to say how proud I am to give my support to my oldest personal friend in the house, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sorry that my second oldest friend in the house, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), is not here also because, while I do not always see completely eye to eye with him, I do greatly regret that he is not here to make his personal contribution to this discussion on what seems to me to be the most important decision likely to come before this parliament of Canada for a good many years.

We have heard a good many arguments pro and con, and it must be very obvious to anyone who knows the facts that there is a great deal of concern in the minds of the Canadian people as to what is the right course of action of this Canadian nation and this Canadian parliament, which is the servant of the Canadian nation. I frankly confess that in the past few months I have given the question my own deepest personal thought, and partly to clarify my own thinking on it I went back to London just a few weeks ago. I got to London on the 1st day of September, and the first sight that greeted my eyes in that great city was great billboards put up by the Conservative baron, Lord Beaverbrook, blazing out to all the city "Don't rearm Germany".

Because I myself was going to NATO headquarters to discuss some of the military facts and political problems connected with NATO I decided that to clarify my own thinking I would do what I had never been able to do since 1918, namely revisit some of the old battlefields of the first world war. I had the privilege of going from London to Paris and being driven to the old battlefields of Flanders, Vimy Ridge and the Somme. And, Mr. Speaker, by one of those unbelievable coincidences that sometimes happen to us, I spent the night in Arras at the foot of Vimy Ridge in an ancient hotel which somehow or other looked familiar to me. When I checked up next morning I found it was the very casualty clearing station to which I had been carried on September 2, 1918, with a blue cross on my forehead which they tell me means that you are not supposed to get better. But here I am, how many years later—I am not good at arithmetic, but anyway quite a few years later—still carrying around in my carcass, shall we say, some of the bits of good German steel that landed there on September 2, 1918. The Secretary of State for External Affairs complains about his voice trouble. People sometimes complain that my voice is too harsh, but if they do I say "Oh, well, the reason is that my tongue is literally edged with bits of German steel which have been there for 37 years."

When you approach at night from the rear that beautiful monument which is a great credit to this Canadian nation, with a full harvest moon highlighting those two pylons reaching to the sky, I do not know what you think but I know what I thought. I thought it was like the arms of a bereaved woman reaching up to heaven in prayer as if to say "How long, O Lord, how long!" Then in the daylight you see that immense battlefield. You see on the foot of that monument the names of 11,000 Canadians whose bodies were never found, 11,000 of the 60,000 Canadians who paid the price in the first world war. Then when you look around you see equally great numbers of names of British troops, of French troops and French colonials. Above all, Mr. Speaker, when you go down to that immense cemetery where the bodies of the slain Germans are buried two to one under painted wooden crosses and check up the figures you find that 44,037 German servicemen are buried there. You look at the two stone monuments erected by German regiments between the two world wars, and when you walk up close to one of those monuments you see marks of bullets on it from German machine guns of the second world war.

Then, Mr. Speaker, no one needs to tell you we are dealing with a very serious problem indeed when we are dealing with German rearmament. But when you drive away from Vimy Ridge on those wonderful national highways built I think by Napoleon—but for all I know perhaps originally built by the Romans and rebuilt by Napoleon—and find that young boys who are working on those roads, when they see the Canada sign on your car, wave at you and say, "Canada bonne, Canada bonne", it gives you a nice warm feeling. It does stir you a bit, and you realize that probably they are the sons or grandsons of the Frenchmen of the generation you knew.

Then, Mr. Speaker, you drive a little further en route to Paris and through the city of Bapaume. In the main square which so many of us knew during the battle of the Somme in the first world war you see that very striking statue of a recumbent figure. When you get up to read the inscription under that recumbent figure, you see that it memorializes the mayor of the city of Bapaume who was shot during the second world war for not having called off the resistance of the civilians to the German occupation. Then when your guide, a former Liberal member of this very parliament who is good on history, tells you that the Germans also shot the mayor of Bapaume in the first world war, no one needs to tell you, even if they did before, that this German problem is a very real problem indeed.

I want tonight, Mr. Speaker, in the clearest terms of which I am capable, to try to demolish one of the greatest of the fallacies which are sometimes bandied about. I frankly confess that I am appalled when people write me such things as "Never again trust the Germans" and "No guns for the Huns". I say that I am appalled when people talk as if all Germans by race, by blood, by ancestry, were incurably evil. I do not know what this house thinks, but the more I think of it the more I believe that particular theory is just Hitlerism in reverse. It is just the most vicious form of racialism, just as it was vile and foul for Hitler to convince the German people that they were the master race, that they were superior creatures and that all the rest of the world were lesser species. I think it is just as vicious to take the view now that all Germans are incurably bad and that the German people should never be able to live their own lives again.

But there is an even more immediate reason, I think, why that doctrine should be rejected by this house. Where would we be in regard to our own beloved royal family if we adopted the theory that all Germans were incurably evil? What about the Mountbattens? Where would we be in regard to our very great friend President Eisenhower of the United States or General Gruenther, the great military head of our NATO coalition? Or if we want to come closer to home, where would we be in regard to some, including one from my own province, very fine generals in the Canadian army in both world wars? And where would we be with regard to the very fine people of Waterloo county or the people of German origin who have served us faithfully in this parliament and in all previous parliaments since and before federation?

The problem with which we deal is not the problem of evil Germans as a people. We are dealing with Germany as a great national power which perhaps has been something of a problem because she came too late on to the stage of history. She came later on the stage of power politics and history than some other nations, but I submit that the theory that Germany is an essentially evil warmongering power is a theory which hardly stands up in history.

I hold in my hand an original copy of the London Times which reported the battle of Waterloo in the year 1815. As a truthful newspaperman I am bound to say that in these four pages of the London Times published in 1815 there is much more news than in our newspapers of today running to perhaps 96 pages.

I see in the main item, which by the way did not make the front page because that page was all taken up with advertisements, that the Duke of Wellington was reporting on the battle of Waterloo, and it states that he pinned the whole battle of Waterloo on the attack of the Prussians. The whole purport of his dispatch was that if it had not been for the Prussians as well as the British, Napoleon never would have been overthrown and the history of our times would have been very different indeed.

When I hear people say that the Germans are incurably evil, that there is no hope for the Germans and that a German should never be trusted with anything stronger than a cap pistol or a water pistol, I wonder if that stands up in the perspective of history. I have in my hand an extract from a book written by Professor Quincy Wright of the University of Chicago. This is a massive two-volume study of war from 1480 to 1941, roughly between the time of the discovery of America and the second world war.

On looking at the score card I find Germany pretty nearly at the end of the list for the number of wars fought. To be precise, I find that Germany is fourth from the end in the list of all the powers. I will give you, Mr. Speaker, or any member in this house one guess as to the names of the two nations that head this list of the number of wars fought, because 99 per cent of the members in this house are descendants of either one or the other. The first is Great Britain with 78 wars and the second is France, which is very close behind with 71 wars. Germany is a mere piker, small-time stuff in the light of history and the matter of fighting wars.

The man who wrote this book is a very modest American. He seems to take great delight out of the fact that in 150 years the United States of America was engaged in only 13 wars; but then he puts down one of those little stars, those things they call an asterisk, and he has a note indicating that this does not include 110 expeditions against the Indians.

I think the real problem with which our generation has to deal, and with which this house is called upon to deal now, is that of the terms on which Germany is to regain her freedom of action in the family of nations. I have never, even in the worst and most bigoted days of the war, been among those who thought we could keep Germany down permanently by force. We tried to keep her down by force before, and we got Hitler. We can never keep Germany down perpetually by force. Those people who talk about keeping Germany disarmed forever are simply stating in another way that they think Germany should be deprived of self-government forever.

I have made quite a study of the statements of the social democratic party in Germany, for which party I have great respect, and I have never seen any statement by that party which did not indicate very plainly that once they regained their unity, once they regained their self-government, they themselves would decide in their own interests to what level they should rearm. It seems to me that what we are called upon here to decide is upon what terms Germany is going to be given the right of self-government, and on what terms Germany is going to be given the right to rearm to a limited extent.

I confess frankly that had history taken another course; had the war come to an end; had we got first a Germany united and peaceful and willing to conduct itself, shall we say, as a greater Switzerland; had we got a united and peaceful Europe, including everything west of Russia, willing to conduct itself as a still greater Switzerland, then in my opinion everything would have been happier for all concerned. But we cannot make the waters of history run uphill. We are in our present position, and it is not an imaginary position indeed.

I referred at the outset of my speech to the fact that I had the great privilege of going to NATO headquarters. I happened to be there when Sir Anthony Eden was doing his great peace-making job, picking up the pieces of what had been wrecked through the destruction of EDC, in my opinion in a great, historic, adventurous and faithful way —faithful in the very sense of the word, full of faith. We faced tragedy at that moment. But I saw Sir Anthony Eden sitting on a bench with Premier Mendes-France. I didn't know what they were discussing, because I saw them only from a distance; but I think at that moment history was being made.

Then on the front page of every newspaper in Paris that afternoon I saw the picture of John Foster Dulles and Chancellor Adenauer studiously posed at a meeting in Germany. I do not think the French people are very slow on the uptake. I think every French person knew perfectly well what was the choice for the entire western community at that moment. It was "Either let us get together; let us weld western unity; let us stand together; let us make the best arrangement we can, or else." As certainly as we are here today we would have been faced with a straight two-way alliance between the United States and Germany. Had that happened, then in my opinion we soon would have been faced with the proposal General de Gaulle was brooding about; that is, a counter-alliance between France and the Soviet union, and we then would have been further on the road to a third world war than we are today.

I sometimes wonder who will go down in history as the greatest peacemaker this country has every produced. It may be our present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). History will speak very highly of him, and of all of us who are members of parliament and members of the government at the time of making this decision. If this decision turns out well, history will say we were wise people indeed. But if this great decision turns out badly history will say we were ill-advised indeed. Unfortunately none of us has the faculty of being able to peer with uncanny accuracy into the future. At any time we can only do our best with the light the good Lord has given us.

From our own North American history I draw a great lesson. If you go to the town of Deseronto in the county of Hastings and look in the main square you will not find any monument to the greatest person ever born in that town; but for many years I have made a hobby of the study of North American Indian history, and I believe that a man who was born in the town of Deseronto was the greatest and most practical peacemaking statesman this world has yet produced.

If you dig through the dusty tomes in the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, or read the annals stored in the archives at Albany, New York, you will find the history of this great Indian peacemaker, whose name was Deganawida, and who spent 12 years of his life in welding together the original five-nation Indian confederacy. Those were the five hostile tribes who for hundreds of years had been just as bloody and warlike as the great powers of our own century.

When at last his great statesmanlike effort was crowned with victory and representatives of the original five nations, who had been bitter enemies, were gathered together in a building, they sat down together for six whole days before anyone said anything. I sometimes think the United Nations would have got on a lot better if we had waited a little longer before we began to talk in the hostile and belligerent terms so often used in the past 10 years.

The original five-nation Indian confederacy was eventually broadened to include a sixth Indian group, and this six-nation Indian confederacy kept the peace absolutely by banishing the anarchy and lawless relationship that had existed between these former enemies for hundreds of years.

I for one, Mr. Speaker, believe that what was done by the six-nation Indian confederacy in North America hundreds of years ago is not beyond the possibility of achievement in our time. If we have anything in our Canadian history of which we can be justifiably proud—and sometimes I think we should not be too proud of it because neither part of our nation sought this destiny—it is that people from two great countries in Europe which for hundreds of years had been the bitterest of enemies and at one time fought a series of wars lasting a hundred years, now live together in perfect amity. Our greatest achievement is that we have enabled people of two races, two cultures, and two languages to live side by side in this great country and work together as partners to make a united Canada which is highly regarded by every nation on this earth.

I am not one of those who believe there is anything peculiar about the French and English, or that there is anything unique about their respective qualities. But I believe that the process which worked to enable the people of French and English origin to live together could possibly work also to include all the nations of the western alliance who have been allies in former wars. I believe also that that very process and that same approach will yet bring us great friends and great assets in the German people.

If you will forgive me for a personal reference, Mr. Speaker, I would like to recall that one of my brothers went off to the United States after the first world war. He heard that members of one branch of the family came from Ireland, and another branch instead of coming to Canada went down into Kentucky. But much to his chagrin, when he went down to look up our relatives he found they had been the worst feuding, fighting lawbreakers in the entire state of Kentucky, up to a certain point. When he delved into their short history he found that some wise person at the proper stage of historical development had found a way of making these lawless, feuding, fighting people fit into the law-abiding picture. His formula was very simple. He just made them policemen.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, there is anything in the nature of the German people or anything in the nature of Germany as a country which makes it inevitable that Germany will again cause trouble. In saying that I am not unaware of the risks everyone has pointed to in regard to this arrangement. One risk I see very clearly is that at some future time the rearming of Germany might bring about again what Ludendorff did with Lenin in 1917, or what Hitler did with Stalin in 1939. But I think there are risks in any course of action or inaction open to us.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that when human beings are faced with a decision which depends on whether they take an outlook which is full of faith or full of doubt, when their decision depends on whether or not they are going to rely on the good will of another aggregation of human beings or are going to take for granted that this other aggregation will act for the worst, on the basis of ill will, we can never take a better guide as to what our decision should be than words of the illustrious Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when he said in almost the last speech he ever made:

> Let me tell you that for the solution of these problems you have a safe guide, an unfailing light, if you remember that faith is better than doubt and love is better than hate.

It is in that spirit that I for one am proud to stand here tonight and say that with my eyes wide open, having a firm conviction of faith in the good will of Germany, having faith in the progressive organization of humanity towards a basis of international and world law, I shall cast my vote in support of the agreements which are before us tonight.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased with the tone of the debate thus far. It has been conducted with a seriousness which I think is worthy of the occasion. I note that the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) has been able to follow on this occasion the entertaining and humorous vein he usually pursues. At least the debate has been serious enough that no attacks have been made upon those who have presented views contrary to those expressed by other speakers, and I propose to adopt the same course. I shall not even try to refute contrary arguments. I shall, at the risk of repetition, perhaps, say some things which have already been said. I shall advance conclusions to which I had come before the matter was mooted at all in this place and which I had previously jotted down to clarify my own thinking. These points I do not think I shall even embellish or elaborate.

The private member of parliament is at a disadvantage when discussing foreign affairs. He has, particularly if he belongs to a smaller party in the house, no research facilities, and has had no opportunity to make contacts with the leaders of opinion in other countries throughout the world. He has to rely very largely for the formation of his own opinions on what he reads of the opinions of others; and what he reads may, as we have discovered, be mixed with a good deal of propaganda of one kind or another.

But after all a private member of parliament does have some feelings. He has, I hope, at least a modicum of common sense, and he does represent in a way the collective good sense of those who sent him to this place. Many people think, and this is proven by the letters we have received and the interviews we have had with people either at home in our own constituencies or since we have come here, that the opinion of a member of parliament like myself or the opinion of an opposition group such as we constitute here, can have some effect upon the ultimate decision as to the ratification of these agreements, including the rearming of Germany. On that point, as I have perhaps vainly tried to explain to them, they are quite wrong.

I think the people of the country should know that Canada was committed to the ratification of these agreements months ago. We are here discussing foreign policy after—and I emphasize the word "after"—rather than before the event. More and more the foreign policy of Canada is decided by the Department of External Affairs and, I think it is fair to say, less and less by parliament as time goes on. That department in its dealings with the diplomats of other countries shows complete assurance that anything it chooses to do, even months ahead, will later be endorsed by the government majority in the house; and that is so on this present occasion.

The protocol will be ratified. Rearmament of Germany will be ratified. I speak with assurance, particularly in view of the ratification by the French national assembly under pressures which I shall not discuss here. All we can do here is subscribe to a fait accompli or refuse to subscribe to it; and for myself, I refuse so to subscribe. With full consciousness of the ultimate futility of my action, a futility which I think I have explained, certainly to my own satisfaction, so far as its effect is concerned, I shall vote against this proposal. Under the circumstances I realize the futility of making a long speech about it, and I am not going to do so.

In the consideration of this matter one could be swayed by his emotions if he allowed his emotions to get the better of his reason. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that all of us, even the wise men, are swayed by emotions whether or not we know it. So far as emotion is concerned, one could quote the words of the great statesmen of the period of the last war and the justified vituperation that was directed against our nazi enemies. I have a recollection of Mr. Churchill hissing into the radio—those nazis. "Never again" was the slogan. May I remind you, sir, that never is a long, long time; and as to the "again" it is here with us. Today we have come to "again".

Another emotion that might be aroused in us springs out of the communist opposition in this country to German rearmament. I said that in my opinion the debate up to the present had been carried on in a serious and dignified manner, but I should like to make one exception. I refer to the rather snide remark—I do not like the word but I cannot think of a better one at the moment—of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who suggested that there might have been some softening of our opinion or the opinion of the country in this regard on account of certain propaganda from the handful of communists in Canada. It is true that the minister immediately withdrew that inference in so far as members of parliament were concerned. I have heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) do that sort of thing before. I believe, however, that inferences, accusations or slander once indulged in can never be completely withdrawn. I am sorry to have to interject that note, but I think the method which has become so familiar to the members of this house was fairly evident in the debate this afternoon.

Speaking for myself I might say my natural reaction to the opposition which has been expressed by a handful of communists in this country, if it tended to drive me in any direction, would persuade me to support ratification if I were not otherwise so inclined. But I am not going to allow a handful of communists in this country, or a mob of people in this country, to form my opinion for me. I do not admire the intelligence of people who would fall into that particular type of trap. The communists, as I have discovered, are difficult people with whom to live. Every time I have sought re-election they have opposed me. As I say, I am not going to fall into the trap of being swayed by the opinion of anyone else. I must stand on my own.

Translating this idea of living with them, or to use a phrase that has now become rather trite, coexistence with communists, I may say it now has a wider meaning. We shall probably find it rather difficult to live with the communist nations; that is my own reaction. Distasteful as it may be to live with them, however, I think we would find it even more distasteful to die with them. This may be strong language, but in my opinion that will be the ultimate result if war, in its full force, breaks out amongst us. But enough of emotion.

I have said that we must be ruled by reason. I am opposed to the ratification of this protocol, which includes the rearmament of Germany, for the following among many other reasons which I could but shall not elaborate. I want my statement to be clear so that he who runs may read, and so there may be no doubt as to what my opinions are.

I believe that the rearmament of Germany now will be an irrevocable step in dividing that country, and will create an impassable barrier to the unification of that country. I believe it would be considered a warlike step, rather than as some of my friends on the other side have suggested, a peaceful gesture. I believe it is as a warlike gesture that it will be considered by what one might call the neutralist countries and particularly those in Asia, those countries that are watching us closely for the implementation of our oft-professed desire for peace.

I believe, in common with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that time is an important element. It is important in one way he did not mention. If it is granted to us, time will provide the opportunity for a new generation of German youth, unarmed over a period of years and living under peaceful conditions, to arise. This generation would be less military-minded than the generation preceding it. If we begin now once more to put German youth into military uniforms we will interrupt the impact of a period of peace upon the youth of Germany.

I believe further that the rearmament of Germany would be the ultimate step in completing the division of the eastern and western worlds into opposing camps. I believe that the rearmament of Germany to the extent of 12 divisions would be futile, because such action would only be reciprocated by the creation of an equal, double or triple if you like, force on the other side. The other side would have the advantage of manpower, and we should be merely accelerating the pace of the military armament race. In any event I do not believe 12 German divisions, even if it may be assumed that they would be used on the side of the west—a point in regard to which some speakers in this house today have been uncertain—would make any essential difference in a total war. Military leaders such as Viscount Montgomery, General Gruenther, and a United States admiral whose name I can never recall, have expressed the view that there is no doubt in their minds that should war break out, thermonuclear and atomic weapons would be used. I ask you whether you believe 12 divisions will shift the balance in favour of the western world.

I believe that the creation of further divisions—this is something we should listen to and think about—proves that we are still clinging to the fantastic and obsolete idea that differences between the peoples of the world can in fact be settled through force of arms, and that one side can emerge victorious. I do not believe that war is inevitable. Somehow I have that faith. It is backed, I believe, by reasons which I could state if I desired to take the time. I do not believe that any of the people in this world want war. I do believe that all the peoples of the world want peace. The rearming of further legions looks to me like a peculiar way of expressing that desire for peace.

I am not sufficiently optimistic to believe that if you did grant Germany permission to create 12 new divisions, the creation of those 12 divisions would lessen the difficulty of control. Rather it would increase it. If conditions do not change, Germany is going to arm herself. Let us make no mistake about that. She will rearm, and that rearmament will be limited only by her own desires. But we need not thrust arms upon her.

I am aware that the nations of the western world have ratified these agreements. I am aware, too, that some parliaments, some under severe pressure, some by small majorities, and some by devious means, have ratified them. History has proved that on occasions the majority has been wrong, even an enthusiastic majority, as my friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare has this afternoon—and quite wrongly, in my opinion—described the majority of nations supporting this protocol. But history has proved, as I said, that the majority may be wrong.

This government has set its mind upon ratification. Even this government, at times, has been wrong, and I believe it is wrong now. I must assume my own responsibility, and when doing so I do not speak for this group or for any other members of this group, but speak only for myself. And I speak as I believe. I must speak and I must vote as I believe, and I must oppose ratification.

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I never thought it would become necessary to rise in this House of Commons in a debate of this kind, but I have been greatly surprised to hear some hon. members opposite take part in the campaign in which we, in this parliament, have been asked to vote against the rearmament of Germany.

It is in the light of the grim facts that we are forced to do so. But has Russia helped the world since 1945 to make us change our minds? I have been surprised in this House of Commons, in this parliament where freedom is our goal, to hear some hon. members speak against something which is a necessity in the life of this country as well as in the lives of those countries which, with us, are devoted to liberty and freedom.

Yesterday I listened to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I was greatly pleased with the manner in which he placed before the house the fact that today against our own will, we are confronted with the necessity of rearming Germany because Russia and her satellites are ranged against us. I read the minister's speech of January 1 in which he said that we have to do this, and that our people should not forget that the rearmament of Germany comes within the framework of a world organization in which the North Atlantic nations are united.

So Germany will be rearmed, and within what scope? We have developed the treaty of the North Atlantic nations, and under the procedure now being taken, Germany will be incorporated within a group of nations organized not for the purpose of waging war but rather that of waging peace. And this is something which Russia and her satellites have not done since 1945.

What about Poland? Is it not a fact that Poland was always an enemy of Russia? Yet Russia took Poland and we see that today Poland, without the consent of her own people, is obliged to suffer the reorganization of that country by Russia, with the Polish people having no right to say one word in the matter.

When we seek to rearm Germany we are criticized by some of our friends on the other side of the house. When we seek to rearm Germany to bring peace to the world we are criticized by some people, the same people who are satisfied when Russia rearms Poland, a country which over the centuries has been Russia's enemy. If hon. members opposite could give me any explanation of the stand they take, perhaps I would be prepared to discuss the matter with them. But the fact today is that while Poland is rearmed by Russia, the people of Poland have had nothing to say about it.

Because of events since 1945 we have reached the point where we are forced to rearm Germany. This does not give us any pleasure, but we must keep in mind that as individuals we do not run the world. The world as it is today is the result of history, and history records that at times we have had to fight while at other times we have been able to get together. But we have to get together by peaceful means, by agreement and understanding. That is not what Russia has done since 1945. We are doing our best to build a world in which peace will govern the actions of each individual. I say it is a bad thing for Canada when, within this country, such campaigns as I have indicated have been promoted.

It may be that this is done in good faith. I will not question the good faith of those who are behind it. But these are the people who come to us and say, "Do not do anything. Be gentle. Be nice. Let it go. You know, Russia and communism do not carry with them any harm against any country or any people."

This is a bad position to take, because those citizens who undertake the campaign do not serve our faith in democracy, they do not carry out our faith in idealism, or our faith in freedom and liberty.

When I see some of my friends on the other side, who are always promoting the freedom of human beings on earth, working against themselves when they do not agree with us on the rearmament of Germany—because the rearmament of Germany is one solution which will create peace in the world—I am amazed. If we can get more countries to come on our side we can be sure that one day we shall convince those people who do not think as we do that there is only one way to build a peaceful world. That is: to give freedom to all men, women and children in every country in the world; to assure them freedom and liberty which will make them strong enough to change the form of their government, if the government is trying to subdue them under a form of dictatorship which is not good for any human being.

We are asked today not to rearm Germany, but to bring Germany within the nations which, since the implementation of the charter of the United Nations, are working very hard to bring about peace in this world. Can we get peace anywhere in the world if we are not sold on the idea that peace comes from our hearts and our minds? Do you think it is possible to create peace in any country in the world if you disturb the minds and the hearts of the people by trying to induce them to campaign against their own country, against peace and against a way to create peace? No, it is impossible; and no political ideas in this world will bring about peace if we do not get together in good faith and sincerity to promote peace in the world.

Peace is something formidable. Peace is something very difficult to understand. Peace is a relation between the life of any individual, anywhere, and his own country. Peace is something we carry in our hearts and our minds. I cannot understand why today some people in this country and in other countries are carrying on a campaign against peace for the benefit of the U.S.S.R. I have no criticism of their leaders; they might be acting in good faith.

What are the facts since 1945? We sacrificed our sons and ourselves, we sacrificed this country for the freedom of the world, and we were helping Russia in every way possible. Who would have thought at that time that after the victory was won we would be antagonizing ourselves over things which mean the destruction of the people's minds, because communism does not mean anything but the destruction of the people's minds.

They are building up in Russia today a mentality which does not appeal to the people but which is a form of obedience to their leaders and to the government which has no connection with the hearts and the activities of the people of that country. We want to keep our freedom to think, our freedom to pray to God, in which we have faith. We want to keep our liberty to do what we think is good for the country, and this is a resolution which might assure us that we are going to protect the free world against the forces of communism, the forces of Russia. We must remember this.

I do not care very much about what people might think. Liberty to think is the important thing. Of course we might use it for ends which are for the good of the country, or we might use our freedom for an end which has no relation to our own good. Canada is a country where we are free to think what we believe is the best for our country, what is best for humanity and what is best for the good behaviour of the people.

What have we received today from those who have spoken against this resolution which was so well presented by the Secretary of State for External Affairs? What have we? Nothing; just words, an expression of views, which might bring to the speakers a few votes or some sympathy. We have to be realistic. What is the world situation today? Russia has some bases in Prussia. She does not care about the sovereignty of Bulgaria and Roumania. Russia does not have any care for the sovereignty of Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia or even Austria today. It is a dragon with long arms trying to conquer the western world, and this fact does not seem to appeal to our friends who are talking against the rearmament of Germany. Look at what Russia is doing in Asia. It might have been possible for Russia to stop the Korean war, which cost the United States, Canada and the other free nations a great deal of money. What did Russia do to prevent that war? I would like someone to answer that question.

An hon. Member: I will.

Mr. Boisvert: When will you answer?

An hon. Member: Right now.

Mr. Boisvert: I am sure your answer would be no good. What did Russia and red China do to prevent the Indo-China war? When you tell me you will answer, it means to me that you are not free in your mind to give a free answer to my question.

We are facing difficulties. We are in a world where it is very difficult to balance the forces of one side and the forces of the other side, but there is one thing which cannot be contradicted by anyone; that is the fight between freedom and slavery. If Poland could rise and speak her mind she would not stay for one minute within the framework of what we call the satellites of Russia, because we know that the satellites of Russia are not free to express their will, their faith and their convictions.

It would be the same with any of the nations that are now subjugated by Russia. We have nothing personally against Russia. I do not want to antagonize any country in the world, because I have faith in the good will of the people of any country. I think it might be possible to bring the people of these countries together. We are told that if they could but understand the way we think, the way we feel and what we have in our hearts, they would join forces with us to establish a world of peace, a world of good will, a world which would be one of glory for our children, where war would be no more, where peace would dominate the minds of everyone.

I should like to say a few words in French before I conclude my remarks. We are told that we are rearming Germany.

[Mr. Boisvert.]

This is not quite the case. We are associating Germany with NATO, and when voting for German rearmament, I shall feel the same grief as my learned friend from Cartier (Mr. Crestohl).

One thing must not be forgotten in this world, and it is that those who speak or agitate are not always those who decide the fate of nations. History is stronger than the individual action that might be taken in a particular place, and the course that nations have to follow at one time of their history is determined by the forces of history. We are surprised to have to rearm Germany, but that is what history has always taught us. Napoleon fought against his foes and a few months later he was rearming them and fighting along with them. I could go further back in history, and say that the best friends of Louis XIV were his former enemies whom he had defeated.

But we must not forget that we are no longer living in a world where wars must be fought. We are living in a world where we must live in peace, where we must make peace. And this peace will only come from such personal feelings as we may have towards it. It is these personal feelings which we must ourselves have and spread abroad by word and thought.

Some countries want war, but the very basis of the United Nations is that the world must live in peace. Statements to this effect also occur in the charter of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Here, in Canada, we want peace, we are looking for peace. But peace is not a unilateral thing. It is achieved through agreements and the good will of nations working towards the same ends. Ever since 1945, every time that this country has thought it possible to seek an agreement with Russia, it has done so, not only for the good of our country but for that of every other nation. But Russia has always found a way of evading the issue, of delaying discussion and of preventing, by its actions, peace-loving nations from finding a solution.

I need not repeat the statement made yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). We know that in her relations with the rest of the world Russia does not act in good faith and that she endeavours to implant here, as in all other countries, a philosophy which tends to destroy individual liberty in order to allow her to dominate nations. Communism is but one form of the activities of the Soviet republic. The Soviet republic pursues the age-old idea that Russia should dominate Europe. Peter the Great, imbued with this idea, led his armies across Poland and tried to conquer her. Russia nowadays pursues the same idea of world conquest envisioned by Peter I, Peter the Great, father of panslavism. The outcome of revolution was that the idea of the aristocracy and of the middle class became that of the mass of the people.

The error of the communists makes possible this spiritual distortion being spread about by individuals fascinated by this doctrine which destroys the human community. By an act both just and fair, any individual can secure what is best from a society based on freedom and justice. Is it not unfortunate to see some of our fellow citizens work counter to the principles accepted by this government and counter to our natural propensity to accept the only solution? In France, in England, in the United States, the government of the country is in agreement. However, some groups believe, in good faith or in bad, that it would be better to be slaves than free citizens. The liberty of our country to choose the best means of maintaining the marvellous conditions which exist in this country must prevail. Security, as well as liberty, is the undeniable right of everyone.

Oh, I know very well that we may have, on the right or left, political theories which are different. But when these theories are applied by men of good faith they never affect the security of the nation. I have nothing against those who have accepted them since they may make a contribution to the well-being, security and liberty of the nation by fair and constructive criticism.

But still, I would not like to see in this country any move which would tend to scuttle what we have managed to accomplish since the turn of the century for the Canadian people. But for us, in the province of Quebec, communism is the fundamental error of those who have no confidence in themselves. It is the fundamental error of those who believe in nothing save in submission to the dominating power of a government which ignores them. We in Quebec still have faith in those ideas which are the very basis of this Christian civilization of ours. And having faith in that civilization we are convinced that no force will destroy man in his faith, conscience and spirit. And those who think they can dominate us through what I call a spiritual nebula and which some call communism will never succeed in convincing those of our faith that they should accept being slaves rather than the free men that we are.

(Text):

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, it requires a good deal of self-assurance to believe that one can add anything to this debate, particularly considering the level at which it has been carried on and the ground it has covered.

But there are three reasons I wish to say something on this matter. First of all, because of the vast importance of the question we are discussing. Second, because I feel that with those who have announced they are going to vote against it I have very much in common. I go far along the same road, and I cannot help hoping that at the end of my remarks they will take the turn I am taking and not the one they have announced they are adopting. Third, I want to speak because I have had occasion in my own constituency to talk to deputations who visited me, and I feel I would like to put my views on record for their benefit and for the benefit of anyone else who may see these remarks.

It was rather shocking to me to find the amount of indoctrination to which these deputations had been subjected. Some of them, particularly a younger group, told me they considered President Eisenhower and Sir Winston Churchill warmongers. For that reason—and this is one of the excuses I have for taking part in this debate—I want to put on record quite briefly one or two of the things President Eisenhower has said, which seem to me to show that we are fortunate to have a man of such wide humanity in the responsible position in which he now finds himself.

He is describing the position he is in and the responsibility he carries, and he says:

> " . . . if we are going . . . to take such a fateful decision as leads us one step toward war, let us, by no means, do it in response to our human emotions of anger and resentment, but let's do it after we have prayerfully considered it and found, as (President Woodrow) Wilson expressed it, 'no other means of protecting our rights.' "

I want to put that on record because I think it is desirable that it should come to the attention of as many people as possible.

As to Sir Winston Churchill we know his record. We know that unworthy people for unworthy ends tried to represent him as a warmonger for election purposes. But we believe that has been long since swept away and he has appeared in his true light as a man whose whole desire at advanced age still is to do something for the cause of peace.

To the deputations that came to see me I made a very simple, perhaps naive answer.

I said, "I will agree with you as to the danger. You do not have to argue with me, because there are dangers. But the best answer I can give you is the vote in the French chamber." Surely if any people in this world know the dangers it is the French. They have suffered again and again at the hands of the Germans, and if they can bring themselves to vote as they did surely the rest of us can do so also.

I pointed out to them that there are encouraging signs. I reminded them that the Germany which makes up West Germany is not the Prussia that we found so truculent and difficult. I reminded them that it was the milder Germans we were dealing with, the Germans for whom we used to have a friendly feeling as we faced them across no-man's land. When we found the Saxons there I think, if my memory serves me right, we were quite sympathetic, and we perhaps felt more irritated at divisional headquarters than we did at the Saxons.

There is reason to hope and believe that the democracy which failed to take hold in Germany between the two wars will take hold now. We believe Adenauer is serious and sincere. There is some ground for the belief that we may have a Germany which is not going to hand itself over to the military but is going to go out for peace.

I repeat that there is, of course, a risk in German rearmament. But in the case of Russian rearmament it is not a risk but a reality which we have with us now. That actuality is so real that I find it difficult to understand how my friends with whom I agree so much and with whom I go so far along the road apparently do not end up with me.

Now let us look back for a moment. Let us remind ourselves of our disarmament in 1945. Let us remind ourselves of our feelings during and after the war. Let us remind ourselves of the agonizing anxiety with which we followed the Russian campaign during the war. Let us remember the days of Stalingrad and how we agonized over what was going on then. Let us remember what Churchill said in 1941 when Hitler attacked the Russians. He said, "Whoever fights against Hitler is our friend." Let us remember the feelings we had in 1945 when we hoped that we were all going to co-operate in working for peace.

At this point I want to put on the record words used in the house by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in March, 1949, at the time we were voting on NATO. Let me here remind the house that we had a practically unanimous vote for NATO, and let me venture to say that it is utterly impossible for me to understand how anyone who voted for NATO can now vote against this resolution, because it seems to me that the arguments which prompted us then are just as strong now. What I shall read sets out well our pressing sense of disappointment at the end of the war when we found that the co-operation which we had hoped for was not forthcoming. At page 2072 of Hansard of March 28, 1949, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said:

> Those of us who were at the San Francisco conference hoped and believed that the victorious nations would unite to prevent aggression, to end the threat of war, and to lay the foundations of that permanent peace for which men and women of good will hoped and prayed. But even whilst we were at San Francisco and the conference was in progress, indications were not lacking that understanding would be difficult.

Further on on the same page I read:

> Shortly after that a Labour government was elected in Great Britain. As we know, they believed absolutely there was every possibility that they would be able to reach understandings with the Soviet union on basic problems. It was not long, however, until it became obvious that the communist government and its parties throughout the world had launched a vicious offensive against democratic socialist governments and their parties everywhere. Because of that and the bitter attacks on countries with democratic socialist governments, to which we listened with grave and growing concern at Lake Success in the autumn of 1946, it became evident that far greater difficulties faced the world than were anticipated at San Francisco.

We can recall so well, as if it were yesterday, that disappointment. We disarmed then with almost feverish haste, and we had it almost completed before we woke up to the fact that the communist countries were not following our example. Now we are told that we must work for disarmament again, and apparently we are to do it by unilateral disarmament. Apparently we are to negotiate from weakness. That is what I understood the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) to say, and it is so hard for me to understand. Surely if we have learned anything in these last years it is that the only time we have got anywhere is when we have negotiated not from weakness but from strength.

It seems to me that we can say, with all our imperfections and all the criticisms we make of ourselves—and we are able to criticize ourselves and each other in this free country—nobody outside of a lunatic asylum has any but the most whole-souled desire for peace. Incidentally, when I listened to those young people who came to see me and realized they had been poisoned with the thought that in this free country on this free continent, and in Britain and the other free countries, there was anyone who had other than a sincere desire for peace, I understood better than ever before what evil subversive propaganda was at work. So I come back to say that we wish to work for peace. We wish to disarm, but surely we have learned the lesson that unilateral disarmament is no good.

I want to deal for a moment with the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), whom I respect and whose speech yesterday I respected. But I suggest to him that he was not at his usual level of logical clear thinking. I read briefly from his words as found at page 395 of Hansard:

> The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich dares to hope that the hydrogen bomb is so terrible that it will not be used; therefore we must have conventional armaments upon which to rely. We all hope that is true, but I wonder whether in our heart of hearts any of us really believes that a third world war would go very long without the use not just of the obsolete atomic bomb but of thermonuclear weapons.

He went on to say:

> . . . I feel we have to start from that premise and somehow we must take the kind of steps which will make sure that war will not break out again.

But these are the steps that those of us who are in favour of the resolution want to take. These steps are the ones we believe give us the best chance. We realize the dangers, but surely we are entitled to argue that we have tried to negotiate from weakness and we have found it no good. What small success we had in Korea surely was by reason of what Churchill called the "valiant decision" of Truman in 1950, and how valiant it was, to stand up to aggression at that time.

Incidentally, while the debate was going on it occurred to me to wonder whether if we heard next week that Germany had turned down this resolution we would be very happy about it.

The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) said we might just as well face the fact that Germany is going to rearm. I was amazed to hear him say that and at the same time announce that he was going to vote against the treaty. If Germany is going to rearm, would we not rather have them rearm and be on our side, be part of our team? I could hardly believe my ears when I heard that. We all recognize the danger. We all know that safeguards can never be 100 per cent complete, but surely we have to take calculated risks and go ahead.

I should also like to put on the record what seems to me a statement clear as crystal emanating from that great man—and he has become much greater this year by what he has done—Sir Anthony Eden, speaking in the British House of Commons on the 17th of November last. I cannot see any answer to this. He said:

> What are the alternatives that now face Europe? In the main, there are only three. Either the cold war will continue; if so, we shall have a continuation of the heavy financial burdens, to which the right hon. gentleman the member for Ebbw Vale—

I hope if there are any Welshmen present they will correct my pronunciation.

> —(Mr. Bevan) referred, over a period of years with all the strains and stresses . . . that that brings with it. The second possibility is that the cold war will become a hot war. If that happens, I do not think, with all respect, that the calculations of any of the treasuries of the world will become very important one way or the other. There is a third alternative which is that, out of these arrangements which we have so carefully built up, it may be possible for negotiations to be developed in Europe which may lead to ultimate success and agreement. It is for this third possibility that we are now working. We think that the Paris agreements have taken us some steps towards that . . . The only real alternative to accepting the Paris agreements would be to plunge the west into confusion and despair. Is anybody seriously going to contend we should better be able to negotiate with Soviet Russia if we were in that particular condition? I cannot believe that to be so.

I should like to say a word more about the French attitude. Some of us had a good deal to do with the French more years ago than we like to count, and we conceived for them the greatest admiration, respect and affection. We were able for that reason to sympathize with them, particularly when the second war came and, bleeding still from the scars of the first war, they were overwhelmed.

They are now facing a third time of trial. When I was in France four years ago I recall travelling on a train and sitting in a dining car opposite a French lady. When she found I came from Canada she said, "Canadians are a very fortunate people." One felt the bitter anxiety which they were facing every hour of their lives. The French have agreed to this. It is true the majority was small but, as the member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) pointed out, if you remove the communist vote the majority becomes substantial.

The last point I want to make is that we are told time is essential. I suppose time is always essential. Apparently what was meant by that argument, if I could understand it well, was that as time was essential we were to give more time for talks with Russia. We were not to sign this agreement because to sign it would make negotiations with Russia more difficult. We were, therefore, to give time and we were not to sign. I believe I have already said enough to indicate how utterly unsound that argument seems to be. Mr. Eden makes this point clear when he says:

> Not for a moment do I accept the proposition that if these agreements are recognized, we have to give up hope of solving any of the issues of Europe today which affect soviet Russia . . . I do not believe it for a minute. On the contrary, the fact that they are now in such a hurry to summon a conference that could not possibly meet in the time allotted is an indication of the fact that, if we proceed calmly and steadily with these proposals, we shall have better opportunities for negotiation than we have had for a very long time.

So, Mr. Speaker, I end where I began. We have two dangers and both of them are substantial. I like to think that the German danger is not as great as we imagine it. I like to associate myself with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). In spite of everything that happened during the last war, in spite of the bestialities inspired by Hitler, we all know that in a very real sense the great majority of the people in Germany are people who love and hate the same things that we love and hate.

The other danger is the Russian danger. I do not suppose for one moment that the individual Russians want war any more than we do, but they are in the grip of the forces of despotism. They can be turned to the purposes of a few men who may at any time act with a dreadful irresponsibility toward the human race. It seems to me, therefore, that while recognizing to the full all that has been said by those to the left, we come right back to a simple choice as to which of the two dangers is the greater. I know which I feel is the greater, and I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to support the views expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre so ably and so clearly last evening. Like the hon. member, I am confident that we are expressing the views of thousands of good, solid, patriotic Canadians. I say this because I have had the opportunity of having conversations with supporters of all parties in this house. I have received letters from the supporters of all parties in this house, which indicate that there are large numbers of Canadians who are opposed to this measure because they are sincerely opposed to German rearmament.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare when speaking this afternoon suggested to the house that there might even be enthusiasm in the country for this measure. I think the tenor of this debate has indicated there is no enthusiasm for this measure, because almost every member has expressed his justifiable fears of German rearmament and the possibilities of the future. I know that the communists in Canada are opposed to German rearmament. I know of the campaign they have waged in the country and even in this building. In my opinion that is no reason for my views to be affected.

This afternoon the Minister of National Health and Welfare read into the record a directive issued by the labour progressive party to its members. As the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) suggested he made, I think, a rather unfortunate inference, though he later qualified that statement. I much prefer the attitude of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) when you come to consider a situation of this nature.

In British Columbia the Liberals, the supporters of the C.C.F. and the labour progressives have expressed opposition to the building of what is known as the Kaiser dam on the lower Arrow lakes. I am informed that the labour progressive party has advised its members to campaign against the building of that dam. This fact does not influence my opinion one bit. I was glad to notice that, according to newspaper reports, it does not influence the opinion of the Minister of Fisheries. In a speech in British Columbia he mentioned that the Liberals, many C.C.F., communists and others opposed the building of the Kaiser dam, but the minister was apparently quite willing to let the issue be settled and dealt with on its merits. We take exactly the same view in a situation such as this.

I fully appreciate the difficulties, doubts and fears which this problem presents to the members of this house. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that along with other members in this group I most sincerely respect the views of those who disagree with us.

My opposition to this resolution is based mainly on two grounds. Personally, I fear the rearmament of Germany. In presenting my case I shall try to deal with the matter on a logical basis, although I am one who has had some experience with unconventional methods of warfare on the part of German militarism.

I oppose this resolution in the second place because I believe, in common with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that this step will increase the danger of war. I believe it is an irrevocable step in further widening the division between the east and the west.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell)—and I listened to his remarks attentively—said he could not understand why those who voted for NATO cannot vote for this measure, or words to that effect. Mr. Speaker, because one votes for the establishment of a committee on procedure it does not necessarily mean that he is going to vote for all the things that committee does. Consequently I suggest that this is a somewhat different matter from voting in support of NATO, or in support of bringing into NATO recognized western democratic nations.

I think the hon. member for Greenwood said he could not understand why we are opposed to German rearmament and increased strength. In the opinion of those who are opposing the measure we believe the military advantages do not equal the risk. We are of the opinion that if you increase the German military forces by 12 divisions, or whatever the stated number may be, you are simply causing the Soviet bloc on the other side to increase their forces to a similar extent and that therefore, in the long run, you accomplish nothing so far as increased defence is concerned.

The hon. member for Greenwood also suggested that he could not understand our opposing increased armaments, or having our military strength increased; but we believe at the present time we are not negotiating from weakness but rather that we are already negotiating from strength.

My reading of published documents, newspapers, magazines and periodicals, and my study of this whole situation brings me definitely to certain conclusions. And as I have reached a point where I shall have to proceed with my argument, perhaps owing to the time I should now move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Herridge the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house would want to continue this debate on Monday, and in order to conclude it if possible on Tuesday it would be our intention if the debate is concluded on Monday that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would move the adjournment so he might make a proper answer on Tuesday with respect to what has been said. If that occurred we would then on Monday revert to the debate on the address in reply.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 24, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSING

REPORTED RESTRICTION ON LOANS ON HOUSING NEAR AIRPORTS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): On Wednesday last, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) asked a question regarding loans under the National Housing Act on property in the vicinity of airports. Subsequently on Thursday the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Fraser) asked the same question. This problem has been under study for some time by officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

For the most part, when airports were established they were located in relatively undeveloped areas, but because of the growth of most Canadian communities urban development has surrounded the airport. In recent years there have been marked changes in the size of aircraft and in the type of engines they use. These changes in themselves have a long-term effect on residential property in the vicinity, particularly in the areas at the end of runways.

The Department of Transport already has regulations and many municipalities have their own zoning requirements. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation must concern itself with the mortgage value of the properties on which they approve loans. After a study of all the aspects of the problem it has been decided that loans under the National Housing Act will not be made available within the rectangular area extending 5,000 feet from the end of a runway, and 1,000 feet on either side of a line that is a projection of the centre line of the runway; nor are loans to be approved within 1,000 feet from the side of a runway.

While the dimensions I have mentioned might at first appear to include large areas, hon. members will realize that in the larger airports there is a considerable distance between the end of the runway and the airport boundary. Similarly, the clearance from the side of a runway to the boundary is fairly extensive.

The restriction I have mentioned will have application to our main commercial airports and some of the military airfields, but will not apply in respect of small or secondary airports which are not likely to be substantially developed in the future. A list of the airports to which these restrictions apply is being worked out between officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Department of Transport so that there will be no misunderstanding in respect of airports to which the restrictions apply.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—REPORTED DECREASE IN WHEAT SHIPMENTS BY CANADA

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wish to rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, arising out of an answer given to me by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on Friday last, a portion of which was inaudible to me. The question appears on page 403 of Hansard of January 21, 1955, and reads as follows:

> I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the latest crop report and having to do with the sale of wheat. Why is it that in the first four months of the current crop year Canada's shipments of wheat abroad have dropped compared with increases on the part of the other three great producing countries? Why is it that Canada's share of the over-all market has dropped while the share of three other countries has increased?

The minister replied as follows:

> The facts as stated by my hon. friend are not true.

Now, sir, I wish to refer to a publication by the bureau of statistics. Perhaps the minister misunderstood my question, but if he did not these are the facts according to the latest report issued by the dominion bureau of statistics on January 13, 1955. The answer to the first question is summarized by the Canadian Press as follows:

> All major grain growing countries except Canada showed increased wheat exports in the first four months of the current crop year.
> Canada's shipments dropped in the four months by 6,100,000 bushels to 97,300,000 from 103,400,000 last year, the bureau of statistics reported Monday.
> United States exports increased to 72,500,000 from 70,000,000; Argentina to 45,200,000 from 43,200,000 and Australia to 26,700,000 from 22,000,000.
> Thus, there was a decline in Canada's share of the over-all market with exports from the four countries rising in the four months to 241,700,000 bushels from 238,600,000 last year.

In so far as shipments are concerned, I have before me the bureau of statistics bulletin, volume 24, No. 9, dated January 13, 1955, in which the following appeared. It compares the dollar value of wheat exported from Canada between January and November 1954 as compared to the same period in 1953. It shows that the total amount of wheat exported in that period in 1953 amounted to $530,903,000, as compared to $339,871,000 in 1954, a fall in the dollar value of exports of $191,032 for wheat.

However, one has also to take into account wheat flour in the same period of time. According to the dominion bureau of statistics the exports of wheat flour from Canada fell from $93,590,000 in 1953, that is between January and November, to $81,371,000 for the same period in 1954.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING BRANDING AND WRAPPING

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8, to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Fulton: Section 8 of the Food and Drugs Act, Mr. Speaker, provides for the offence of misbranding, and sets forth a number of circumstances and actions which are to be construed as constituting the offence of misbranding. It is the purpose of this bill to add a further subsection which would make it an offence to sell meat products wrapped in any wrapping which contains stripes, printing or other marking of a red or reddish-tinged colour, since it is considered the only purpose of such markings is to mislead the public.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

ASSISTANCE TO APPLE GROWERS, N. S.

Mr. Balcom:

1. How much money was disbursed to apple growers in Nova Scotia under the prices support act, during the past season, in respect to apples sold to processors, following hurricane damage in September, 1954?
2. What was the average cost to the government per bushel?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. Under the authority to buy apples at 90 cents per bushel of 45 pounds, the agricultural prices support board paid $967,831.51 up to December 31, 1954. These apples were resold for processing purposes and sales returns are still incomplete since they are based on utilization of the apples.

2. See answer to No. 1.

DISASTER PAYMENTS, N. S.—HURRICANE DAMAGE

Mr. Balcom:

How much money was paid out of the disaster relief fund to take care of hurricane damage in Nova Scotia, to (a) standing timber; (b) fishing boats, gear and equipment; (c) buildings and other property?

Mr. Benidickson:

The Canadian Disaster Relief Fund Incorporated is not a government agency. Accordingly, any amounts paid by the fund are not of government record.

J. O. RAWLUK

Mr. Bryson:

1. Is J. O. Rawluk now in the employ of the federal government?
2. If so, on what date did his employment commence and in what department of government is he employed?
3. What is his present address?
4. At what salary is he now employed and what has he received to date in the way of travelling, sustenance and any other expense allowance?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.

2. On March 22, 1954, he was assigned by the civil service commission to a clerical position in the Department of National Defence.

3. The address given in departmental records is 1120-10th avenue, Regina, Saskatchewan.

4. $2,160 per annum. To date he has not received any travelling or other allowances.

COAL EXPORTS TO UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. Hansell:

How much coal, in tons and dollar value, was exported from Canada to the United Kingdom during 1953 and 1954 respectively, or in 1954 as far as records are available?

Mr. Dickey:

1953—none.

1954, January to November inclusive—none.

CHEESE IMPORTS AND EXPORTS

Mr. Boisvert:

1. How many pounds of cheese were imported in 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953 and 1954 from Great Britain, France, Holland, Switzerland, Italy and New Zealand?
2. What was the value for each year of the imported cheese from the above mentioned countries?
3. How many pounds of Canadian cheese were exported to the same countries for the same years?
4. What was the value of our exported cheese to those countries?

Mr. Dickey:

HURRICANE LOSSES—DOMINION CONTRIBUTION

Mr. Smith:

What amount has the government of Canada contributed to relief or rehabilitation of those in Ontario who suffered damage and loss in the hurricane and flood of October, 1954?

Mr. Benidickson:

No payments have been made to date by the government of Canada to relief or rehabilitation of those in Ontario who suffered damage and loss in the hurricane and flood of October, 1954.

[Mr. Dickey.]

UNEMPLOYMENT PERCENTAGES

Mr. Boisvert:

1. What was the percentage of unemployment with regard to the population of Canada at the end of each of the years 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953 and 1954?

2. For the same years what was the percentage of unemployment with regard to the total employment?

Mr. Gregg:

TELEVISION ADVERTISING

Mr. Dufresne:

1. Does the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation control advertising over its television network?

2. Is the corporation of the opinion that on the Jackie Gleason show, televised every Saturday night to Canadians, commercials sometimes overrate the quality of products advertised?

3. If so, will the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation take steps to protect Canadian listeners from misleading advertising?

Mr. McCann:

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises that:

1. It has a right to reject any advertising.

2. It has not an opinion as to whether commercials on the Jackie Gleason show sometimes overrate the quality of products advertised.

3. It does not and cannot guarantee all statements made by advertisers, but will consider evidence that advertising is misleading, discuss the matter with the advertisers, and if found necessary reject advertising.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER PROJECT

Mr. Coldwell:

What precautions have been taken by the federal government to ensure that in the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project the federal government will not directly or indirectly or, in effect, subsidize in any degree the development of hydroelectric power?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

The precautions taken by the federal government are to be found in the agreement of December 3, 1951, between the government of Canada and the government of Ontario as set out in the schedule to the International Rapids Power Development Act, chapter 157 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, in the application of the government of Canada to the international joint commission dated June 30, 1952 as approved by the order of the international joint commission dated October 29, 1952 and in the exchange of notes of June 30, 1952 between Canada and the United States.

TARIFF REAPPRAISALS

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. How many commodities have been reappraised for tariff duties since Bill 29 became effective?
2. What are the values of the various commodities so reappraised?

Mr. McCann:

1. Four—viz.: Textile fabrics; garments; other textile manufactures; refrigerators.

2. Textile fabrics	$ 83,353.00
Garments	3,478.00
Other textile manufactures	591.00
Refrigerators	49,425.76

H.M.C.S. CEDARWOOD

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Was H.M.C.S. Cedarwood recently damaged while at sea off the coast of British Columbia?
2. If so, what was the nature of the damage sustained?
3. Is H.M.C.S. Cedarwood a wooden-hulled vessel?
4. When was she first commissioned, and on what date was she acquired by the Royal Canadian Navy?
5. On what service was H.M.C.S. Cedarwood engaged when damaged?
6. Has H.M.C.S. Cedarwood been involved in any accidents during the past five years necessitating repairs to her bow and/or stern?
7. If so, did any damage done during such accidents directly or indirectly weaken the hull of the vessel other than in the area immediately damaged?
8. Was H.M.C.S. Cedarwood considered seaworthy in all respects, both for service in protected waters and also in the open ocean, when she left Esquimalt on her last voyage?
9. What crew and other personnel were aboard H.M.C.S. Cedarwood when she was damaged?
10. What was the value of the scientific equipment on board H.M.C.S. Cedarwood when damaged?
11. Is H.M.C.S. Cedarwood to be continued in the oceanographic survey service, or is she to be replaced?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.

2. During a severe storm a cement seam filler in the hull weathered away causing a leak although the caulking was sound.

3. Yes.

4. Acquired in June 1947 and commissioned 22 September 1948.

5. Oceanographic research.

6. In April, 1953 H.M.C.S. Cedarwood suffered a slight collision with the caisson while entering dry dock which damaged her stem post.

7. No.

8. Yes, within the limits imposed by her size.

9. Three naval officers, thirty-three other ranks and five scientists were aboard.

10. Approximately $100,000.

11. The question of replacing H.M.C.S. Cedarwood is being studied by the defence research board and the Royal Canadian Navy. She will continue to be employed on oceanographic research for the present.

JAPANESE WAR CRIMINALS

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Have the sentences of Japanese war criminals Colonel Isao Tokunaga and Captain Shunkicki Saito been reduced recently?
2. If so, what was the original sentence, and what reduction in that sentence has now been granted?
3. What were the grounds for the reduction of sentence, if any reduction has been made?
4. Where are these persons at present serving their sentence?
5. On whose authority was any reduction in their sentence made?

Mr. Blanchette:

As Colonel Tokunaga and Captain Saito are war criminals who were tried, convicted and sentenced by United Kingdom authorities, the following information has been obtained from United Kingdom sources:

1. (a) Colonel Isao Tokunaga: No
   (b) Captain Shunkicki Saito: Yes.

2. Captain Saito was sentenced to death in November 1946 by the military war crimes commission in Tokyo. This sentence was commuted on 13 February 1947 to 20 years imprisonment by the general officer commanding, China command, in his capacity as confirming officer. In July 1953 Captain Saito's sentence was reduced to 15 years imprisonment.

Questions

3. The reduction of sentence from 20 to 15 years imprisonment was made on the grounds that Captain Saito had acted under orders and that, therefore, his responsibility was of an intermediate nature.

4. Sugamo prison, Japan.

5. The counsellors of state of the United Kingdom acting on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen approved the recommendation for reduction of sentence made by the war office review board.

PACIFIC GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY

Mr. Leboe:

1. Has the dominion government received any request from the British Columbia government, asking for assistance for the extension of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway?

2. If so, what was the nature of the request and what action was taken by the dominion government?

Mr. St. Laurent:

1. Yes.

2. A brief was submitted to the federal government on December 14, 1953, by the government of British Columbia, included in which was an offer to sell a half share or all of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway. In addition, in a letter from Premier W. A. C. Bennett dated May 18, 1954, the federal government was asked to share in the costs of a proposed extension of the railway. This letter was acknowledged and a request was made to the provincial government for sufficient information to assist in forming a conclusion about the economic justification of the northerly extension of the line. Some information has been provided but it was not considered sufficient to enable a decision to be reached. Therefore, the federal government has continued to collect data in order to determine whether federal assistance for the extensions of the Pacific Great Eastern line would be justified at the present time.

SHAUGHNESSY VETERANS HOSPITAL

Mr. Goode:

Is any thought being given, by the Department of Veterans Affairs, to decentralization of hospital facilities at Shaughnessy hospital?

Mr. Bennett: No.

CHILDREN OF WAR DEAD—TRAINING

Mr. Schneider:

1. How many applications have been received and approved since the inception of the legislation providing for training assistance to children of the war dead?

2. As of December 31, 1954, (a) how many are in training; (b) how many have already completed training; (c) how many have failed or withdrawn from their courses?

[Mr. Blanchette.]

3. Does the department provide a counselling service for the mothers and potential applicants and for those who have failed or withdrawn from their courses?

4. In what courses are the students being assisted?

5. Has the response to this legislation met the department's preliminary estimates?

Mr. Bennett:

1. From July 1, 1953 to December 31, 1954: 484.

2. (a) 368; (b) 45; (c) failed 14, withdrawn 15. Of 42 deferred cases, 25 are repeating courses at their own expense.

3. Yes. In each of the departmental districts a record of potential applicants is maintained. Beginning at the secondary school level, veterans welfare officers counsel the mother and the child towards a firm educational program. The counselling service continues into the higher educational levels regardless of the child's academic achievements.

4. Assistance is being, or has been, given in 46 different courses: Accountancy; Actuarial science; Agricultural science; Architecture; Arts; Biology; Botany; Business administration; Chemistry; Chiropractics; Commercial art; Criminology; Dentistry; Dietetics; Economics; Electronics; Engineering; Food analysis; Foreign service; Geology; Interior decorating; Journalist; Laboratory technician; Law; Library science; Medicine; Mining technician; Music; Nursing; Occupational therapy; Pharmacy; Photography; Physics; Physiotherapy; Psychology; Pure science; Radio and television; Radiography; Radiology; Research; Science; Secretarial; Social worker; Teaching; Theology; Veterinary.

5. Yes.

PURCHASE OF GARLAND BUILDING, OTTAWA

Mr. Tustin:

1. Has the government sold the premises in Ottawa generally described as "the Garland building"?

2. If so, when was the sale made, what are the price and payment terms of such sale, and who was the purchaser?

3. Did the government, subsequent to the sale, lease the property, and if so, to whom was it leased, for what period was the lease, and at what annual payment?

4. How much did the government, previous to such sale, spend for alterations and repairs including the installation of new elevators?

5. Was any part of such alterations done on a cost-plus basis, and if so, what part and at what cost?

Mr. Bourget:

1. No, this building was never owned by the government.

2 to 5. Answered by No. 1.

MONTREAL NEUROLOGICAL INSTITUTE—FEDERAL GRANTS

Mr. Richardson:

1. Has any assistance been given to the neurological institute, Montreal, by the federal government under the health grants program?
2. If so, what amounts have been paid to the institute and for what purpose?

Mr. Robertson:

1. Yes.

2. $663,550 has been paid to the province of Quebec on behalf of the Montreal neurological institute, for the following purposes: purchase of scientific and technical equipment, $450,378; construction of 130 neurological beds, $167,160; support of research projects, $46,012. Approval has recently been given for an additional $31,761.20 to provide for the purchase of technical and scientific equipment, for use in the newly constructed McConnell wing of the institute.

POST OFFICE SITE, ROTHESAY, N.B.

Mr. Brooks:

1. Has the Department of Public Works purchased a site for the erection of a new post office building at Rothesay, New Brunswick?
2. If so, from whom was the site purchased, and what was the price paid?
3. Were there any offers by other parties for the sale of land for this purpose?
4. If so, what were the names, and the amounts asked in each case?

Mr. Bourget:

1. No, but negotiations under way.

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

INCOME TAX APPEAL NO. 227

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the appellant in income tax appeal board case No. 227, which was heard in November, 1954, as an individual, through the company represented in case No. 227, or through any other company, at any time had any contracts with the federal government, or any department or agency thereof?
2. If so, were any such contracts connected with construction projects?
3. Were any such contracts connected with the supplying of goods?
4. Were any such contracts, either construction projects or the supplying of goods, related to national defence?

Mr. McCann:

Since the delivery of the judgment of Mr. W. S. Fisher, member of the income tax appeal board, in the case of No. 227 appellant, and the Minister of National Revenue, respondent, held in camera, the minister who was a party to the proceedings had a check made as to whether at any time since the appellant company purchased the property referred to in the judgment, the federal government had awarded any contract of any kind to the appellant company or to its subsidiary referred to in the judgment. It was found that during this period the federal government had not awarded any contract whatever to the said appellant company or to its subsidiary.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

RESEARCH EXPENDITURES

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

What was the amount spent on research by each department of the federal government during the calendar year 1954?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, if this question could be amended as I think it is intended to read, so that it would deal with scientific research, it could be passed as an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

ADVERTISING EXPENDITURES

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

1. What was the amount spent for advertising by each department of the government during the calendar year 1954?
2. What advertising firms were employed?
3. What was the amount paid each advertising firm?

PUBLIC SERVICE—EMPLOYEES

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

As of December 1, 1954—

1. How many employees were in the service of each department of government?
2. How many persons were in each branch of the armed services?
3. How many civilians were employed by each of these branches?

CIVIL DEFENCE—PROVINCIAL ALLOTMENTS

Mr. Pearkes:

1. What sums of money were allocated to each province, during the current fiscal year under the civil defence financial assistance program?
2. What amounts have been taken up by each province against these amounts?
3. On what dates were the first payments made to the various provinces?

DEPARTMENTAL MOVES, CALGARY TO EDMONTON

Mr. Harkness:

1. What branches of government departments, if any, have been moved from Calgary to Edmonton within the last six months?
2. What branches of government departments, if any, is it proposed to move from Calgary to Edmonton during the next six months?
3. What is the reason for these moves?
4. Will the branches which have been moved or are to be moved go into government-owned office space or will office space have to be rented for them?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN IRRIGATION PROJECT

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged since the 1st day of May 1954, between any department of government and the governments of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, relative to the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, of course it is understood in connection with all these motions for the production of correspondence with other governments that this government will communicate with them, and will file the papers after having obtained their consent.

Mr. Speaker: Motion agreed to.

FARM PRODUCTS—UNITED STATES EMBARGOES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents since the 1st day of May 1954, that have passed between any department of the federal government and the government of the United States regarding the application or imposition by the government of the United States of embargoes, in whole or in part, against import into the United States of Canadian farm products.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, this motion concerns diplomatic correspondence with a foreign government, and deals with negotiations which are still in progress. Therefore I think that, according to the well established practice of the house, it is privileged, and it would not be possible to bring the information down at this time. I am hoping therefore that the order can be dropped.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow the matter to stand?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member must have unanimous consent to intervene at this point. Has he consent to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like to ask if my hon. friend would allow it to stand.

Mr. Pearson: Yes; I have no objection to that, so long as it is quite clear that in the circumstances I have mentioned it would not be possible to produce the papers.

Mr. Speaker: Then, under the circumstances, would it not be better just to have the motion dropped?

Motion dropped.

L. B. THOMSON

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence, since the 1st day of June 1954, which has passed between any department of government and Mr. L. B. Thomson, relative to his attempted resignation as director of P.F.R.A.

FRUITLANDS IRRIGATION DISTRICT, B. C.

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the dominion government or any department or agency thereof and the government of British Columbia and any other person or persons, since January 1, 1952, regarding the renovation, etc. of the irrigation system of the British Columbia fruitlands irrigation district.

Mr. St. Laurent: This is of course subject to the same observations I made a moment ago, it being correspondence with the government of British Columbia.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may ask the Prime Minister whether the effect of the statement he made a moment ago is that the government of any province has the right to veto what may be produced in this house.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is a matter of courtesy which, to my knowledge, has always been observed in connection with correspondence between this government and some other government, and I think it is on the understanding that such courtesy is extended that the correspondence does take place.

Mr. Fulton: I understand that, and it is a matter of obvious courtesy that the provincial government should be informed; but I am wondering if we have gone beyond what I understood to be the rule of courtesy—a rule to which I subscribe—and have placed in the power of a provincial government the right to veto what will be produced in the House of Commons of Canada.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think so. After communication with a provincial government, to my knowledge the situation to which the hon. member refers has never occurred—and I do not think it is apt to occur. However, if it did occur the matter would be reported to the house, and the house could deal with the situation in the light of the facts as they would then appear.

Mr. Fulton: That is the point I wished to have established.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Carried, subject to the reservation made by the Prime Minister.

WATER RESOURCES—ARROW LAKES DAM

Mr. Byrne:

For a copy of all communications between the federal government and the government of British Columbia, relating to and resulting from the application of the Kaiser Aluminum company of America to build a low level storage dam on the Arrow lakes at Castlegar, in the province of British Columbia, along with a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the international joint commission, Canadian section, and the federal government or government of the province of British Columbia, with respect to this matter.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the first part of this order deals with communications with the government of British Columbia, and I am informed there are no such communications. The second part deals with communications, not of an agency of the federal government, but of an international agency. And, again, following the well established practice of the house, I suggest that such correspondence of an international agency cannot be produced here, and that therefore the motion should be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION, BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Goode:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents since the 1st day of January, 1954 exchanged between the federal government and the government of British Columbia relative to the Oak street bridge and a proposed highway from Vancouver, through Richmond, to the United States.

Mr. Winters: This will be subject, Mr. Speaker, to the reservation the Prime Minister has already referred to.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the statement made by the Minister of Public Works, the motion is carried.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. Zaplitny:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, memoranda and/or other communications exchanged between the Department of Agriculture or the minister, and the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, or any minister thereof, since January 1, 1954, dealing with the question of amendments to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

D. R. BISHOP

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Post Office Department or any officers thereof and Mr. D. R. Bishop, dated at any time since June 1, 1950.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I discussed the matter with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. In order that it may not be necessary to search thousands of files to discover whether or not there may be a letter, I think we agreed that there should be inserted after the word "Bishop" the following phrase: "concerning post offices and rural routes in the county of Carleton, New Brunswick."

Mr. Speaker: Motion as amended agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PURCHASE OF PROPERTY, SARNIA

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Department of Transport and/or the Canadian National Railways and Messrs. W. C. Nelson and D. F. Stonehouse, since May 1, 1953 to date, with respect to property in Sarnia or Point Edward purchased by W. C. Nelson and D. F. Stonehouse.

Mr. Marler: I ask the hon. member whether he would let this motion stand.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED REMOVAL OF FOUNDRY FROM TRANSCONA SHOPS TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? Is the minister aware of the steps being taken by the Canadian National Railways to move the foundry from the Transcona shops, at Winnipeg, to Montreal? In view of what this means to the employees affected, and in view of the central location of the Transcona shops, in Canada, will the minister ask the Canadian National to reconsider this move?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I regret I received notice of this question only a few minutes before entering the house. I shall take the hon. member's question as notice and reply at an early date.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO RECENT OCCURRENCE ON H.M.C.S. "MAGNIFICENT"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Is the Minister of National Defence prepared to give the house any more information than has appeared in the press in respect to the unfortunate incident which developed on H.M.C.S. Magnificent?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I have of course received some information. I do not know that I have as yet complete information. In any event, the navy has instituted a board of inquiry which I believe commenced sitting today. I do not think it would be desirable or proper for me to comment on the matter while the board is holding its hearings and producing its findings. I might say, in view of the references in the press generally, that the consumption of alcohol on navy ships is not permitted to men except under two circumstances: One, they receive a rum ration if they are 20 years old and if they want it. If not, they get a cash allowance in lieu of it. Second, on very rare occasions in the tropics the captain of a vessel may allow the canteen to sell in individual bottles a limited amount of beer, which has to be opened in the canteen and cannot be taken away unopened. The stringency of the regulations governing the consumption of alcohol on ships is I think another reason why I should not make any comment on such information as I have been able to gather until the board of inquiry has established the facts.

FISHERIES

FALSE CREEK, B.C.—APPLICATION FOR WATER LOT RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, of which I have sent him notice. On what date did the dominion government apply for water lot rights on False creek, Vancouver? When may the seining fishermen anticipate the completion of the mooring dock for their boats?

Mr. Speaker: This question is of a local character, which could be put on the order paper. However, if the minister is ready to reply, since he has received notice, I will leave it to him; but normally these questions should be put on the order paper.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I have received notice, for which I am grateful, and I have a reply. For some considerable time our district officials have been negotiating with officials of the British Columbia government for a water lot to build a 180-berth fishing harbour. Plans were prepared accordingly. We have been ready for some time to invite tenders for such a project.

In October last, the British Columbia government informed us they were unable to make available a water lot of the size required, but would arrange for a smaller lot. We have exchanged correspondence since that date in an effort to obtain the larger lot, but have now decided with the concurrence of the Minister of Fisheries to proceed with a project of approximately 150 berths. Plans are being redrawn and we expect to be able to invite tenders within the next eight weeks.

INCOME TAX

PROVINCIAL REPLIES TO PRIME MINISTER'S LETTER OF JANUARY 14

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Have all provinces replied to the Prime Minister's letter of January 14, and has any province indicated that it desires to accept the option to its tax agreement, as set forth in the letter?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): To the first question the answer is no. There have been some acknowledgments but not yet from all the premiers. To the second part of the question, the answer is that no provincial government has indicated any desire to avail itself of the option mentioned.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FORMOSA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he in a position to say something about the situation in Formosa and the islands adjacent to the Chinese mainland? Is Canada taking any stand to have the United Nations bring about a cease-fire? In any event, is the minister able to give some assurance to the Canadian people regarding the apparently perilous situation existing there?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman's question deals with a very serious matter. I do not think I should attempt to reply to it without careful consideration. Therefore I shall take his question as notice and hope to be able to say something, possibly tomorrow.

BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON TOPICS TO BE DISCUSSED AT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister, of which I have given him notice. Will the Prime Minister comment on the Reuters report appearing in the Ottawa Evening Journal of January 22, to the effect that among the topics to be discussed at the commonwealth conference are the economic and trading problems of the sterling area, to which all commonwealth countries except Canada belong?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No doubt the discussions among the prime ministers of commonwealth countries will include some consideration of international and economic questions, since these represent an important aspect of the world situation. There is no indication of which I am aware that they will be particularly considering the specific subject mentioned in this newspaper report.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

APPROVAL OF PROTOCOL ON ACCESSION OF FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

The house resumed, from Friday, January 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany, signed by Canada at Paris on October 23, 1954, and that this house do approve the same.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in continuing my remarks on this resolution, commenced last Friday evening, I rise to support the views expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, (Mr. Knowles) and for similar reasons, which he so clearly outlined to the house at that time. Like him, I am confident that we are expressing the views and fears of many good and patriotic Canadians. Letters I have received, conversations I have had with many people who are supporters of all parties in this house, clearly indicate very strong opposition in Canada at this time to German rearmament. At best, Mr. Speaker, there is no enthusiasm in the house or in the country.

I fully appreciate the difficulties, the doubts, the fears that this problem presents to hon. members, and I sincerely respect the views of those who do not agree with me. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I think the level, the tenor, of this debate is a good indication of the firmness and strength of our democratic and parliamentary institutions.

My opposition to this resolution is based mainly on two grounds: First, my fear of a rearmed Germany. I am afraid, as are many Canadians, of what a rearmed Germany herself may do in the future. Second, that in this step we will increase the danger of war because it is an irrevocable step, deepening the division, as I see it, between the east and the west.

My fears of German rearmament and the fears of a good number of Canadians stem from the evidence that nazi elements are still too strong in Germany to place arms in their hands and the further danger of the revival of Prussian militarism, not necessarily associated with nazism. I have done my best to study every aspect of this problem and to read the opinions of those qualified to assess this situation. I have read a great deal on the subject and heard the opinions of those who speak with some experience and some knowledge of it, and in support of my argument I want first of all to quote from the Toronto Daily Star of September 29, 1954, the reported opinions of Rabbi Abraham Feinberg of Holy Blossom Temple, a powerful and highly respected figure in the Jewish community in Canada. The article, which is entitled "Lessons of History Flouted if Germany Rearmed—Feinberg", reads:

Rabbi Abraham Feinberg of Holy Blossom Temple charged today that in rearming Germany the west "flouts the bitter lessons of recent history" and that the treatment by the western powers of Israel as compared with Germany "is a shocking example of human error, a tragic betrayal of the ideals for which vast blood and treasure were spent in world war II, and a dire threat to peace".

"In the 1930's", he said, "western policy makers, urged by London, acquiesced in Germany rearming, as a defence against communism—with the ultimate and evil fruit of Hitlerism and unparalleled slaughter. Now, in the 1950's, western leaders, for the same reason, are being pressed by the U.S. into the same deadend of illusion, self-deception and fateful peril for all mankind".

Referring to nazi atrocities in world war II, Rabbi Feinberg said, "It would be suicidal to forget the bestiality of German nazis . . . the blithe, optimistic, carefree romance of the western powers with West Germany is a travesty on mature political thinking and a form of self-inflicted blindness which can lead all humanity to an abyss".

He said that many former top nazis now hold positions of influence in West Germany and named the following. Dr. Schroeder, federal minister of the interior, (formerly a member of the S.A. and legal adviser to Schacht); Dr. Theodor Oberlander, minister of refugee affairs, (who was an S.S. major until 1953, when he fell out with Himmler); Dr. Victor Emanuel Preusker, minister of housing, (an S.S. instructor on race relations); Hans Globke, state secretary of the federal chancellery, (who wrote the official commentary on the Nuremberg racial laws): Waldemar Kraft, minister without portfolio, (who did much to pave the way for Hitler's invasion of Poland).

The growth of new nazi splinter groups, the numerous articles in West German papers glorifying nazi leaders, the Nauman plot exposure, the prolonged campaign for the release of "martyred" war criminals, the frequent desecration of Jewish cemeteries and the belligerent diatribes of ultra-nationalist spokesmen—all these ominous developments do not support Dr. Adenauer's assertion that there has been no nazi revival in Germany. Throughout provincial and federal governments nazi membership is now practically a qualification for a position of public trust.

Adenauer may soon become a venerated, powerless "wooden statue", like old man Hindenburg before Hitler, and the itch to retrieve heroic Teuton horror will soon be stirring in the German "superman's breast". Rabbi Feinberg stated.

"The German 'problem child' is of special concern to Jews", he said. The massacre of six million Jews by the nazis raised our casualties in world war II to a proportion of 25 per cent—far higher than those of any other people. We are entitled to feel intensely about the trend of moral and spiritual development in postwar Germany. He said he was "keenly conscious" of the threat to the west of "the possible plans of the Kremlin for world domination". But the Russian threat is compounded by the danger which arises from a renascent and rearmed Germany.

Western civilization, under the pressure of U.S. foreign policy, seems willing to sacrifice Germany's moral rehabilitation in order that she might be converted into an armed fortress against the Soviet union. From the strict viewpoint of religion and its eternal mandate to evoke the best in human beings, such a program cannot be upheld. "As a practical strategy in a hard and bitter struggle for existence, it is a grave risk", he said.

These are the views of a thoughtful leader of unquestioned integrity which merit the greatest consideration and respect. He states facts that have a great bearing on this problem. Furthermore, I am one who is disturbed by the fact that war criminals are receiving rousing welcomes on their return to their homes by a certain section of the German population. I am also disturbed to know that war criminals are receiving pensions for life, including the time they have spent in jail. The time they have spent in jail is considered as time spent in the service of Germany.

Even the text of the final act of the London conference gives some cause for concern. There is a section headed "German Declaration—Voluntary Limitations." This is section 15 and it reads:

That the federal republic undertakes not to manufacture in its territory any atomic weapons, chemical weapons, or biological weapons, as detailed in paragraphs I, II and III of the attached list.

The phrase "in its territory" is repeated in several places. To me those are ominous words. What about the plants being built at the present time by German industry in Spain, in Turkey and with the possibility of plants being built in North Africa. I cannot remember the source, but I have read of a possibility of Krupps coming to Canada. I hope to God they never do. That is one of the points in this document I would like the minister to explain, because the words "in its territory" do not appear to me to offer much hope of limiting German armaments.

Another fact which causes me great concern is what is contained in the text of documents agreed on by the conference of ministers held in Paris, October 20-23, 1954, and published by Her Majesty's stationery office. A footnote explanation is given in connection with protocol No. II on the forces of western European union, article 1, clause (a). This footnote does not appear in our document and it reads:

The special agreement annexed to the European defence community treaty is not a published document. Authoritative German statements have, however, confirmed that the levels laid down for the German contribution to European defence community were as follows: Army—12 divisions; Air force—a tactical air force of about 1,350 aircraft; Navy—light coastal defence and escort vessels.

What disturbs me is the fact that in a document published by Her Majesty's stationery office and laid on the table of the British House of Commons the authoritative information had to come from German sources. Furthermore, I think that there is in these arrangements another great difficulty which concerns many of us. The main hope for tight control lies not in NATO but in the Brussels treaty for western European union and Canada is not a member of that union.

I have read as widely as possible and I want to quote here from a source which I think is well worthy of consideration. I wish to quote from an article entitled "The Dangers of German Rearmament" by Professor C. R. Hiscocks of the University of Manitoba, appearing in Canadian Business of November 1954. He can certainly speak with knowledge and from experience. For the information of the house, Professor Hiscocks has been associated over the past twenty years with various international organizations. British-born Professor Hiscocks joined the staff of the Royal Institute of International Affairs, London, in 1935. He spent five years of war service in the Middle and Far East, Crete and Germany, and then joined the British military government in Germany for one year. The next five years he was British council representative first in Austria and later in India. Since 1950 he has been at the University of Manitoba as professor of political science. In 1953 he was United Kingdom representative on the UN subcommission on the prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities. He was in Germany as recently as this past summer. I shall just quote from that article at various points. Professor Hiscocks has this to say:

There has been something very naïve about allied views on Germany in their crudest form. Towards the end of the war the secretary of the United States treasury proposed the so-called Morgenthau plan for reducing Germany to a nation of farmers or, as some Germans now say with justifiable bitterness, to a nation of goatherds. Industry was to be drastically controlled and reduced. Then, within a few years, billions of American dollars were being poured out as Marshall aid to rebuild German industry and re-equip it with the most modern machine tools.

The period of rigid disarmament when a German could be executed for burying a shotgun in his garden gave way to the present phase, when one of the chief aims of western diplomacy is not only to allow Germany to rearm but to ensure that it does so effectively.

And then again:

It is hardly surprising that Germans are sometimes scornful of allied policy. Many sincere and enlightened thinkers are highly critical of American diplomatic pressure aiming at the rearmament of their country. Whether we agree with them or not, their point of view deserves respect.

I have never heard so many or such strong arguments against German rearmament as I heard in Germany this summer. It may seem curious that this should be the case, yet the average German has suffered more from German militarism than the average Canadian or American. Anti-militarism is particularly strong amongst the young. Some say bluntly that in no circumstances will they do military service again. Many more are determined that a new army should be different in spirit from the old. Only a very small minority would welcome the re-creation of the German army for its own sake with any real enthusiasm. One man told me that he was thankful for every day that went by without rearmament, because it meant that one or more of the old militarist gang had died off and that the danger of their restoration to power had correspondingly decreased. This sentiment is shared by many ordinary German citizens with no political axe to grind.

The quotation continues:

The real danger of German rearmament is the revival of Prussian militarism under some thin disguise, with its narrow nationalist outlook, its arrogance, its cynicism, and its belief in amoral Realpolitik. Such a revival would be compatible with a sincere repudiation of nazi doctrines, because the Prussian military caste included some of Hitler's strongest opponents. But without any admixture of nazi ideals it would be a development sinister enough in itself.

Towards the end he concludes:

For nearly ten years Germany has had no army. This break in continuity provides grounds for hoping that the militarist tradition has been broken and that any new army that is created will be different from the old. On the other hand, it is arguable that the interval has not been long enough. There are still many officers and NCO's available who are just waiting for an opportunity to re-create the old military machine.

I think the voice of that gentleman should receive some consideration.

The argument is often raised that since East Germany has been armed, West Germany should arm. The obvious answer to this is, however, that any contribution that a West German army might make to western defence would, in my opinion, immediately be cancelled out by additional rearming by the communists in East Germany.

Those who argue for the rearmament of Germany emphasize that West German forces would be controlled within NATO and WEU. Unfortunately, however, the great danger lies in the fact that German nationalists want reunification, and recovery of Polish-settled territory and Polish-held and Russian-held east Prussia.

North Atlantic Treaty

There is strong evidence that extreme nationalism is rising. When Chancellor Adenauer has passed from the scene another government might ignore his peaceful pledge. Civil war, war with Poland, war with Russia, might result, or perhaps even a Russian alliance may be entered into. NATO consequently might lose its defensive character. It is conceivable that under such conditions NATO might well be drawn into dangerous courses and increased armaments.

As far as arms control specified in the agreements is concerned, it should not be overlooked, Mr. Speaker, that between the wars Germany evaded arms control, assisted by Krupp and other big industries that are now in much the same hands. There is also the strong possibility that communist countermeasures would likely cause the west to relax control and raise more German forces.

I very much question the military value of German rearmament, and in support of my argument I wish to quote B. H. Liddell Hart, former British government military adviser, one of the greatest military critics in the west in recent years, and the only British military expert who foresaw the development of blitzkrieg warfare by fast moving panzer divisions, and whose advice the British government of the time refused to take in preparing to meet the oncoming onslaught from Hitler.

I quote from the Globe and Mail of Tuesday, January 4, 1955, carrying the headline "Expert Attacks Defence Strategy". The report reads:

A British specialist in military strategy says that much of the west's new plans for defence in the atomic era are a waste of time and money.

B. H. Liddell Hart, a former government military adviser, claims the realism of present defence planning is questionable under the implications of the hydrogen bomb. In the event of an all-out war, he says, there would be little value in the armies being built up by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, navies, ordinary bombers or air defence.

The only real defence is "the deterrent power of retort."

Liddell Hart, one of the first advocates of air power and mechanized warfare, presents his theories in a long letter to The Times.

Three things, he suggests, are necessary for defence: A strategic air force of "superlative technical quality and performance," an extensive police force and "fire brigade" forces of high efficiency and mobility, in constant readiness. "The supreme fact of the hydrogen bomb era," says Liddell Hart, "is that war has become palpably suicidal."

A "realistic" appreciation of the military factors, he concludes, could change Britain's whole economic outlook for the better, while also providing greater security. Big savings could be made in ordinary bomber forces, navies and air defence, since none is capable of preventing "a catastrophic penetration by "hydrogen bombers" or bombardment by atomic missiles.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, Liddell Hart completely torpedoes the argument in favour of the military necessity for the rearming of Germany for western defence.

Fear of German rearmament is well indicated in debates in various parliaments and assemblies which dealt with this issue.

In Great Britain only approximately 40 per cent of the membership of the house voted in favour of the measure approving the rearming of Germany. The Labour party, with the exception of seven members, abstained, and nearly 100 Conservatives failed to record their votes. That was no doubt attributable to the expression of public opinion at that time.

In France the same measure was carried only by a minority of the French assembly voting under great pressure and after a lengthy and stormy debate.

In Bonn, Germany, the matter has been postponed further and internal opposition to West German rearmament is rapidly extending from parliament to the general public.

In this connection I wish to quote from the Christian Science Monitor of January 19, 1955, under the heading "Opposition Mounts", and then the main heading "Rearming Tears Germany". The report datelined Bonn, Germany, reads:

> Internal opposition to West Germany's rearmament is rapidly extending from parliament and closed party circles to the general public.
> The initiative in all this is taken by the Social Democratic party (SPD) supported by a large section of the trade union movement. Influential groups in the Protestant Evangelical Church also have come out strongly against rearming.
> In fact, general indications and reports from different parts of the country indicate that the federal republic is more divided on rearming than it has been on any other problem for a long, long time.
> The main argument against remilitarizing West Germany and tying it to the western powers is that thereby all prospects of reunifying Germany diminish to zero.
> The decision to take the campaign to the country assumes that the Bonn parliament does not represent the will of the people. The Social Democrats are organizing meetings throughout their constituencies designed to prove to the general public the "dangers for unification arising from the government's foreign policy".

The Social Democratic party has appealed to the socialist parties of the world, stating its fear of a rearmed Germany and urging every effort be made for the calling of a four-power conference on unification. The West German trade union federation, by a vote of 391 to 4, agreed to make a similar appeal.

I am not going to deal further with that issue, Mr. Speaker, because I am sure other hon. members are more informed on that aspect of the situation than I am.

Opposition to the rearming of Germany is expressed by responsible people in all countries. Lord Beaverbrook has expressed his opposition through his press in Great Britain, and expressed it vigorously indeed. I am informed that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) was the guest of Lord Beaverbrook at Nassau—

Mr. Martin: We quarrelled violently on that subject.

Mr. Herridge: —and I am sure Lord Beaverbrook expressed to the minister his views on that subject. In his last speech made in the House of Lords before he died, Duff-Cooper made a most passionate appeal against German rearmament. General de Gaulle, who certainly has not the same political opinion as has this group, has taken a strong stand against German rearmament because of his fears of the effects of German rearmament on the safety of the French nation. Thomas Mann, a great German novelist, a great democrat who fled from Hitler and who is now an American citizen, recently said this:

> "The trend of world affairs is menacing, pregnant with disaster", and he warns that by putting "yesterday's mortal enemies back in the saddle the west is scandalizing the peace-loving majority of West Germans".

He should know. I expect he has a great deal of correspondence with friends in Germany.

Thousands of responsible and patriotic Canadians oppose German rearmament. I have received letters from, and held conversations with, many parents, wives and children who have lost their loved ones. I have also received letters from many veterans who have expressed their uncompromising opposition to German rearmament, and I shall refer to two, who have informed me of their opinions. One is a retired major of the Grenadier Guards, who is a resident of my constituency, and who had experience in Germany after the first world war, serving with the British military mission. From his knowledge of Germany and of the situation there at the present time, he expressed to me in no uncertain terms his belief that rearming Germany was a most dangerous step. Then since this debate commenced I received a letter from a comrade of mine who is now in Shaughnessy hospital receiving treatment for first world war disabilities. He said, "I am extremely glad to see that some of you people are opposing German rearmament". Sections of the Canadian Congress of Labour and other trade unions have expressed strong opposition to rearming Germany at the present time.

We have been asked the question: What is the alternative course of action? In reply, Mr. Speaker, I say that we believe that time is on our side. We therefore believe in playing for time as an alternative: time to explore further diplomatic possibilities; time to develop Colombo plans and further technical assistance; time to remove more of the economic ills of the world; time to allow the further strengthening of the democratic forces in Germany; time to work for the settlement of disputes as outlined in the charter of the United Nations.

As to that last point, I suggest that the United Nations should propose a deal by which a united Germany is admitted to the United Nations along with communist China, and that rearmament be postponed. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, and in the opinion of some other people who have given this question some consideration, if we couple with this suggestion the withdrawal of Russian, British and American troops from Germany and the satellite states, the whole picture would be greatly improved.

At the Lambeth conference of 1948, a committee of bishops of the Anglican communion—of which the late bishop of Kootenay was a member and who is sincerely mourned by thousands in my constituency at the present time—dealt with problems the church has to face in the modern world, including communism, and reported in part as follows:

> Communism cannot be overcome by argument alone. It has to be outlived, not merely outfought. Under the Providence of God its truths will pass into the experience of humanity, its untruths and half-truths will be self-destructive.

It was my lot, Mr. Speaker, to be born in an era of hope. No one who grew to maturity in the years before world war I could in his wildest nightmare have imagined the horrors which have been commonplaces of the daily press since the first world war of 1914. The science which men trusted has given those mad for power a capacity for the destruction of body, mind and soul on a vast scale, one so great that, in my opinion, comparisons with barbarian conquerors are grotesquely misleading and totally inappropriate.

The generation of my youth believed in a fundamental rationality of life and its essential goodness. Most of all, it believed in the sure and certain progress of the human race. This false confidence was somewhat justified in the light of modern history, particularly by the progress made in the latter part of the Victorian period in the western world. At the outbreak of the first world war, I, who was a progressive though not yet a socialist, interested in peace and always opposed to imperialism, never thought of war in present basic and total terms. It is the hydrogen bomb, Mr. Speaker, which has made most articulate our fears for the future and which casts its black shadow over any hope of progress except towards destruction.

Today we face an unprecedented world situation. For the first time in history no general staff can guarantee its government victory, nor give any accurate estimate of the cost in military and civilian casualties or treasure required to assure any hope of victory. As Liddell Hart says:

> The supreme fact of the hydrogen bomb era is that war has become palpably suicidal.

On that basis we must consider this situation. In brief, the logical deduction from the experience of our times is that if we cannot get peace, plenty and freedom together we shall get none of them. To achieve these objectives is an indivisible task.

Mr. Speaker, I have given this problem my best judgment and serious consideration. That is the situation as I see it today. I have brought my best judgment and serious consideration to dwell on this problem and I feel that, in the best interests of this country and of the future of mankind, I can do nothing else but oppose this resolution.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the debate has been carried on at an extremely high level. Thus there is little that I can say after the powerful and lucid speeches that have been made in the house. I shall not willingly, of course, lower the standard of debate by being repetitious. Unless I can say it better, I am not going to attempt it. For that reason the house will understand if I do not speak for too long.

It was in 1950, after the North Koreans had attacked the South Koreans, that Dean Acheson, secretary of state in the United States, drew a parallel to Germany. He pointed out the danger and suggested to the free world that consideration be given to the rearming of West Germany which was then, as now, facing an armed East Germany. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), the distinguished hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the knowledgeable hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) have given us chapter and verse with respect to the arms in the hands of Germans who are in the east. These, numbering nearly 400,000, have been paraded before us in such great detail that we can almost recognize the regimental identification. It may be argued—as the hon. gentleman who just sat down argued—but surely it cannot be maintained that it is a virtue for the Germans in East Germany to be armed and that it becomes a scandal when arms are provided for Germans in the west. Nor can it be maintained that those in the east are good Germans because their arms are provided by the Soviets and that those in the west are bad Germans because the free democracies will provide arms for them. When the fourth session of the twenty-first parliament opened on January 30, 1951, at the earliest opportunity, which was during the debate on the speech from the throne on February 6, I spoke at length of the dangers of rearming Germany. My words appear on pages 114 to 118 of Hansard for February 6, 1951. There I discussed at length many of the problems which now face this house. The tenor of my speech was that we must approach the problem of German rearmament with the greatest caution and safeguards, and with the memory of what an armed Germany cost the world in blood and tears in two world wars. We cannot afford to chance it once again without adopting precautionary measures, safeguards and controls.

Those words bear repeating because they are as cogent today as they were four years ago. I then recognized the inevitability of the step we propose to take at this time and my emphasis was on the controls. Whether or not the controls will control as we expect is the great unknown. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said, and I quote from page 369 of Hansard for January 20, 1955:

> I do not suggest that we should ignore the lessons of the past. Indeed, as George Santayana has said, "those who will not learn from history are condemned to repeat it."

By those words he indicates that he is fully aware of our previous failures, in which he had no part. Thus we should be reassured that in this instance there will be no failure.

In 1952 the house unanimously endorsed the European defence community which provided arms to West Germany and upon which the French later changed their minds. Subsequently, the French endorsed rearmament by changing their vote.

The present debate has been a thorough one and every aspect of the question has been fully discussed. I am particularly impressed and I am influenced by the forceful, profound and powerful speech made in the course of this debate by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Cogent in its lucidity were the words used by the hon. member for Prince Albert to describe that speech.

[Mr. Croll.]

The effect of that speech has not been lost on the world. The Toronto Star of January 22 carries a Reuters dispatch headlined as follows: "Thunderer praises Pearson's Speech". The article reads:

> The Times praises the 'wise and timely' speech given this week by L. B. Pearson, Canadian external affairs minister, when he opened the debate in parliament on ratification of the Paris agreements.
> It says the speech 'provided one of the most reasoned statements in favour of the agreements which has yet been heard.
> 'Canada was one of the most influential members in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. And in all that he said in the debate Mr. Pearson held fast to the original hope of a partnership of like-minded nations, wedded to a common purpose.
> 'As he looked ahead Mr. Pearson made a significant contribution to the present talks in Paris on the proposed European arms pool.
> 'It was a wise and timely speech'.

I found that during this week end there was a wider understanding and a better appreciation of what we had been trying to accomplish. For many years the Secretary of State for External Affairs has chartered the course of our international relations with remarkable ability. He has brought credit, distinction and peace to our country and helped preserve the peace of the world. I have, of course, read the Paris agreements noting fully the severe and binding limitations, controls and safeguards which are contemplated and which the minister has amplified.

It has been said in the house that foreign affairs are always a choice of problems. There is no sure or certain course. Decisions are made on unproved assumptions, weighing the advantages and disadvantages with the hope of a good result. The issue of war or peace in our time depends on our finding the right solution. This may be our last chance to solve this problem, and I think it is our best chance. None of us can be sure. Time alone will tell whether the rearming of West Germany is justified. Standing as we do at the crossroads of our existence, we can only hope and use our very best judgment, in the light of the information that is available to us, that in rearming at this time an aggressive and tumultuous people who were responsible for two of our deadliest wars in history we are preventing a third blood bath.

This is a momentous decision which, for good or ill, may determine the fate of generations. What we do now is with the hope and prayer that we are avoiding a greater catastrophe—at the very best it is a choice of evils. I believe this house knows my background, upbringing and family tradition. Seared and burned in my memory are names that will forever live in infamy. I have had thousands of representations and many delegations which have made a very deep impression on me. There is scarcely a home in one portion of my riding that has not suffered. I am a man torn. I have done much soul-searching. My heart, instinct, intuition and emotions say no. My head, logic and realism say yes.

I admit that the realities cannot be denied. There is no middle or alternative course. Without this step that we propose to take now, there can only be chaos. With great reluctance and a heavy heart I shall do what needs to be done at this time, without joy and with the Everest of misgivings.

(Translation):

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, the present discussion, to which I would like to bring my modest contribution, is of extreme importance, and I firmly believe that everybody's attention is now focused on parliament hill.

Upon the voicing of our views, as well as upon the decision that the parliament of Canada is about to take on this question—much debated in certain quarters—of the rearmament of West Germany, depend, in my humble opinion, the future and security of our country, as well as the safeguarding of peace and democracy in all those countries which are increasingly proud to belong to the free nations of the world.

Within barely a quarter of a century, we have been engulfed in two horrible wars, both of them started by the arrogant leaders of a Germany hankering for power, whose unbridled ambition was to conquer the world. The German people, as the result of their leaders' ambition, came to the conclusion that they were a superior race and that, as a consequence, all the peoples of the world had to fall under their domination. The only recognized god then was the fuehrer!

I have certainly no intention of minimizing in any way the incredible number of horrors perpetrated throughout the last two world wars by our former enemies. It will be sufficient to recall the memory of those who fell gloriously on the battlefield, the memory of our Canadian heroes. It would be sufficient too to read once more the numerous stories of the unspeakable massacres and tortures worthy of darker ages which were the lot of those who had been crammed into concentration camps. Neither are we forgetful of the martyrdom suffered by those of the captured soldiers of the free world who refused to abandon and betray their native land.

How many Canadian homes have known separation, worry and death? The losses sustained by those who mourn for a husband, son, brother, fiancé, relative or friend, pitilessly torn from the love of their dear ones, run into hundreds of thousands. And this through a war willed upon us by the nazi hordes.

Following those deaths, at the thought that these dear ones would never again see their beloved Canada, for the defence of which they had just made the supreme sacrifice, we, in general mourning, damned Germany and the barbarousness of her leaders and wished for her complete destruction.

Why did these young Canadians, on which the country based its fondest hopes for the future, agree to leave behind country, homes and folks, to risk and give their life?

It was because these young men had faith in the future, that they wanted to prepare happy tomorrows, make Canada a country in which it would be good to live in peace and harmony, and leave behind the fine reward begot only by courage and sacrifice.

The hatred that Germany called upon herself has not been forgotten and no Canadian, least of all those upon whom these wars brought sorrow and mourning, can be asked to forgive and forget.

It is owing to these few considerations no doubt that quite a number of Canadians of all racial origins are not ready to give definite and enthusiastic approval to this proposal in which we are asked to ratify the agreement permitting Western Germany to rearm.

German militarism having always, or nearly always, been a menace to world peace, it is easy to understand that we should doubt its fairness and its honesty. Since Germany did not comply with treaties and agreements in the past but rather considered them as mere scraps of paper, it is easy to understand that we should be under some apprehension regarding these new commitments.

The unforgettable atrocities, the innumerable defaults, the treaties wilfully ignored, those are all factors which today explain the reluctance of nations who have suffered to forgive those who have so often been called tyrants.

What new guarantees have we should we decide to forgive the past and try—however hard it may be—to consign to oblivion the record of so much evil, of so much blood and tears?

Is their word worth more today than it was yesterday, or are the Germans sufficiently smitten with remorse to atone, by doing good, for the immeasurable mischief of which they have been guilty?

The representative of God on earth forgives the repentant evil-doer, often in spite of his many grievous sins, because, he says, the Creator's mercy is infinite.

Must we not, at all times, use that last-mentioned maxim as a guide and he who repents should at least get the benefit of the doubt when his present or future good intentions are in question.

In my humble opinion, when we deal with that ticklish question, we must put our feelings aside and be truly realistic. Great Britain and France in particular have, more than we, been devastated and have lost an important part of their population but have they not reacted once more when confronted by the far greater danger which threatens not only Europe but the entire world?

What is that danger? What is that menace which lies heavy on peace-loving nations, which hangs over them like the sword of Damocles?

It is bolshevik Russia, atheistic Russia, murderous Russia, conquering Russia, godless Russia, which harbours the hideous canker, the destructive ideology of communism and whose deadly propaganda aims at nothing else but the poisoning, followed by the destruction of the souls and hearts of all who fall prey to that doctrine.

The communists, making use of every dishonest practice they are known to use, through recourse to cunning, hypocrisy, falsehood, have infiltrated every possible movement, including labour unions, in order to sow discord; they even have the gall to disguise some of their organizations under the title of "peace congress".

The communists up to now have shown by their barbarous deeds that they are international bandits, dangerous spies and the greatest persecutors of the church and of the faith that ever existed.

Every day we read with dismay in the papers that in the countries over which they rule they have thrown into slavery, imprisoned, tortured in the most horrible manner and cowardly assassinated men whose mission, whose calling is to guide the souls of others and to spread the belief in the Supreme Being, as if these men were the most wicked criminals.

[Mr. Dufresne.]

This pernicious and subversive ideology has been spreading even in this country where it must be admitted that communism has an ever-growing number of more or less conscious adepts.

On different pretexts they carry out periodic invasions of these parliament buildings where, following blindly in the wake of their leaders, they accomplish these little pilgrimages of theirs, dangerous and hypocritical, with a view to furthering their propaganda.

More than 800 of them banded together only a few days ago. They came to this parliament in order to meet the representatives of the Canadian people so as to ascertain their opinion on the point now at issue. For my part I took a few minutes off to receive them and to tell them, in a few words, what I thought of their doctrine, of themselves, after which I threw them out. I took advantage of this opportunity to voice once more my deepest religious convictions and to state loudly all my love for our democratic institutions.

These Canadian communists, who are afforded too much freedom in this country, since they are a constant threat to our national security, because of the hatred they nurse for our system of government which gives happiness, peace and prosperity, should be considered outlaws. Now, then, when will the government adopt this urgent and oft-suggested measure and when will they prevent this filthy propaganda from reaching into Canadian homes through the postal services of Canada which, in this way, become an indirect accomplice to the overthrow of the system democratically established in our country? Let us face realities. Let us have courage. Let us apply the best preventive at our disposal, the outlawing of the communist party in Canada.

For the communists, the word freedom means abuse and it is more than ever time that the Canadian parliament be made aware of it. Let us never forget the sorrowful and fatal consequences of the complacency and indifference of some countries now behind the iron curtain and deprived of the freedom which is a source of happiness for those who enjoy it.

One thing can be understood or rather can be readily understood, when it is realized that all over the world the communists dedicate all their efforts to the service of their masters in the Kremlin, to whom they are blindly subservient.

All their devotion is dedicated to this foreign and dangerous power, at the expense of the best interests of the security of their own country.

No matter what conquering Russia may do, Canadian communists applaud unreservedly her machinations which are a menace to all mankind.

In this debate I think that Canadian communists who ask for a negative vote on the Paris agreements are guilty of the most infamous imposture.

Have you ever heard them lodge any protest against the steady flow of destructive arms to red China and other countries ruled by the Kremlin, arms which might sooner or later be used against our own country and our own people, which might bring us destruction and death?

These double-dealers, these traitors, through their wilful and unpardonable silence, are satisfied and no doubt happy to see that the nations which have taken up the communist doctrine, or which are made to put up with it, will be able to arm to the teeth in anticipation of further aggression inspired by Russia.

Their behaviour is all the more treacherous, traitorous and unpardonable that they learn of the fiendish intentions of their infamous masters through a spy network well organized by Moscow and directed here in Canada and elsewhere through embassies and consulates, as we have found out in the past.

What is going on at this time around Formosa and the adjacent islands constitutes even more convincing proof of the fact that we may, at one time or another, be drawn into the most terrifying and devastating war in the history of all nations.

Red China is delivering repeated attacks against certain islands still held by the nationalist forces of Chiang Kai-shek, in order to prepare the invasion of that territory. That is no doubt the first step towards global and total warfare.

Those attacks have been inspired by barbaric Russia. It is the prelude to its attempts, born of boundless ambitions, to dominate the world and set up therein its regime of terror, slavery and idolatry. As for communist China, it only acts under the satanic orders of Moscow of which it is the contemptible puppet.

Whether we like it or not, and in spite of the optimistic statements made lately by certain chiefs of state, a sense of realism and an examination of what is going on should convince us that war is all but upon us at this time and that the free world is now being seriously threatened. Let us therefore adopt the appropriate measures now open to us in order to face the uncertain, perilous future that awaits us.

It is most unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that the government have not seen fit to convene parliament earlier so as to allow all representatives to give this matter their undivided attention. This is the most serious matter to come before us since the close of hostilities. Once more the government now in charge of the destinies of the country have, through this reprehensible attitude of theirs, failed to recognize the supremacy of parliament.

This new commitment on our part, which does meet with our almost unanimous approval, must not, nonetheless, bring about an increase in our military spending. These expenses are already far too heavy for the means of our small population who, ever since the end of the war, have been groaning under the weight of taxation. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) must give us that assurance.

He will also have to tell us, unequivocally, what would become of our Canadian soldiers stationed in Germany at the taxpayers' expense if, some day, a rearmed Western Germany decided to invade the remainder of its territory now occupied by the Soviet, in order to proceed with the unification of the country. Would they be evacuated from a zone that had become dangerous for themselves and their families who had come to join them, or would the agreement we ratified oblige them to fight with the West Germans? These, Mr. Speaker, are questions that cannot remain unanswered and about which the Canadian people have a right to be informed.

For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, and being aware of the responsibilities that weigh upon us as representatives of the Canadian people, I shall assume those responsibilities and vote in favour of West German rearmament. Of two evils, we must choose the lesser. I, therefore, prefer to absolve a repentant sinner than to become the accomplice of those who have decided to pursue their international gangsterism, in order to throw peoples into slavery and idolatry.

As far as we, who believe, are concerned let us implore the help of the Almighty and pray for the conversion of bolshevik Russia.

(Text):

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, because of the far-reaching implications of the proposal that is now before us I hesitate to take part in this particular debate.

However, for the very same reason, I feel that I could not justify myself in maintaining silence. Therefore at this time I should like, at the risk of further repetition, to express my own feelings with respect to this particular resolution.

It seems to me that this is a debate in which the emotions of hon. members of this house are being deeply stirred. It is a debate in which our powers of discernment are being taxed and our capacity for judgment is being tried to the limit. It seems to me that we are haunted by two fears, the fear of a revival of German militarism and, on the other hand, the fear of further communist expansion.

The first, of course, is not without foundation. Twice in the first half of this century Europe has rocked with the tread of German spike-helmeted, ironclad forces urged on by the dreams of power and their leaders' fanatical sense of destiny. Those forces have not hesitated to drench nations in blood. We do not propose at this time to recount again the stories of brutality perpetrated in an endeavour to carry out their policies. We do not close our eyes to these facts. We do not forget the cost in lives and material, lives especially, involved in the defeating of those forces. That is our first fear.

The second fear, that of communist aggression and expansion, is also based on fact. Read into the records of this debate have been statements made by leaders of communist thought to the effect that world domination is their ultimate objective, and we have seen some phases of that program become reality. I do not wish to labour this point further except to refer to the constant threat felt by men in governmental positions all over this world.

Privileged as I was to attend part of the recent sessions of the United Nations general assembly, I heard delegates from various nations refer to the process of infiltration, intrigue and subversion emanating from and aided by the Kremlin directed toward the overthrow of constituted law and order and the bringing of increasing millions of humanity into the slavery of communism. All this in spite of Mr. Vishinsky's declaration that Moscow does not export revolution.

The hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) likens communism to creeping paralysis or, in some cases, to galloping consumption, the virus of which is slowly penetrating into every corner of the world. It seems to me that communism is a high-crested flood that threatens to engulf the world. It is a power threatening the very existence of democracy and freedom. This, I say, is our second fear.

It seems to me that our prayer is not for courage to do the thing which is right; our prayer is for guidance that under these circumstances we will know the right. I believe that each and every one of us will do the right thing if he can discern what is the right thing. We have been carefully weighing the issues, judging the particular dangers which confront us, and we must register our votes and trust that history will confirm the wisdom of that decision or at least credit us with sincerity of purpose.

Just today I received a circular letter in the mail—I suppose all hon. members received a similar letter—from the church peace mission, care of St. Cyprian's church in Toronto. I call attention to it because to me it is rather misleading. I know nothing about the church peace mission; I do not know how many belong to it; whether it is a properly constituted group or just what it is. This letter urges us to take our stand against the ratification of the agreement and I should like to read a portion of this letter by the Reverend D. C. Candy, chairman of the church peace mission. Referring to a previous communication which he had sent to hon. members, he said:

> The following excerpts from the resolutions adopted by the assembly of the world council of churches, which met in Evanston in August 1954, express the view of the great majority of Protestants throughout the world:
> "We believe that there are two conditions of crucial importance which must be met if catastrophe is to be avoided: (a) The prohibition of all weapons of mass destruction, including atomic and hydrogen bombs, with provision for international inspection and control such as would safeguard the security of all nations, together with the drastic reduction of all other armaments."
> (b) The certain assurance that no country will engage in or support aggressive or subversive acts in other countries . . . We are convinced that peace will be seriously endangered so long as the armaments race continues. . .

He adds this sentence:

> We heartily support these views and urge that the efforts of our government be towards their implementation.

I am sure the council was expressing the feelings of the great majority of Protestants, as well as those of other people. However, I would not go along with the inference that in order to accomplish these aims and objectives we have to vote against the ratification of these agreements. I believe his views are erroneous on that subject. He goes on to say:

> In the early part of last fall our own Canadian representative introduced a motion in the UN general assembly, which gained the approval of all the major powers, asking for the continuation of the discussions of the special subcommittee on the subject of the control of atomic weapons and by all peace-loving people.

The writer goes on to state:

> It would be inconsistent with the objectives of this motion now to agree to the development of any large new military force, let alone the revival of a German army, with its criminal record. Continued support of the work of this UN body will have far greater possibilities for the promotion of world peace than the re-establishment of the fearful German war machine.

I would again like to place myself on record as being in opposition to the view that to vote for the ratification of the agreements would be contrary to the spirit of this particular United Nations resolution. I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) made a plain statement in regard to the circumstances that led up to this particular proposal. Many of the things that have troubled us have been clarified, and we certainly appreciate that.

Again with reference to the time I was privileged to spend at the United Nations, I would like to say that I appreciate the diligence and devotion with which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), as acting head of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations, sought and succeeded in bringing the east and west together through the co-sponsorship of the draft resolution on disarmament.

We hope and pray that further negotiations will achieve the desired results. I say that, Mr. Speaker, because of the tendency on the part of some to imply that we are now following a policy of provocation rather than negotiation. Therefore, like other hon. members who have given this matter great, and I may say prayerful, consideration, I feel I must, and I shall, vote in favour of the resolution before us.

Mr. A. M. Fraser (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate on the resolution to approve the Paris protocol to the North Atlantic treaty, I am fully conscious of the extreme gravity of the decision we are called upon to make. Implicit in this resolution is the question whether or not West Germany is to be rearmed. This question is one of the most momentous ever to come before the house.

I venture to suggest that there is not one of us who has not approached this issue with mixed feelings and with serious misgivings. The black record of German aggression, and particularly of nazi atrocities, generates in every one of us an instinctive revulsion against the idea of German rearmament. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, this is an issue which must be decided not by instinct, or passion, however natural these emotions may be, but by reason and logic.

For my own part, Mr. Speaker, my misgivings have been diminished and my apprehension allayed by the clear and comprehensive statement made to this house by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). He has convinced me that the real choice is not between a Germany disarmed and a Germany rearmed, but between a Germany rearmed within an international framework of control and a Germany rearmed without control.

It is impossible to maintain a permanent power vacuum in central Europe. As Sir Anthony Eden said: "The question is not whether West Germany is to be rearmed, but how." We cannot treat West Germany as a perpetual pariah, an outcast among the nations, because if we were to attempt that policy Russia, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs has pointed out, would be tempted to fill the vacuum thus created.

Let us try to imagine for ourselves what the situation would be if this protocol failed to be ratified. I venture to suggest that one of the first consequences would be to undermine the authority of the Adenauer government in West Germany, the government led by a man who is at one and the same time a good German and a good European.

It was my good fortune, Mr. Speaker, to be in West Germany during September of last year shortly after the rejection of EDC by the French national assembly on August 30, and I could not but feel that the failure of EDC had generated a sense of disappointment and disillusionment among the Germans. Chancellor Adenauer had pinned his foreign policy on the support of the west and one of the pillars of the western policy had been EDC. When it crashed to the ground there seemed to be a danger that West Germany would lose confidence in Dr. Adenauer, and his government might be overthrown.

That, I fear, would be one of the consequences, and we must remember that in dealing with the West Germany of Adenauer we are dealing with a different Germany from the German empire which Bismarck welded together by a combination of astute diplomacy and relentless force. We are dealing with a different Germany from the Germany of Kaiser Wilhelm. We are dealing with a different Germany from the Germany of Hitler. From the West Germany of Dr. Adenauer Prussia is absent. I think hon. members of the house will agree with me that throughout the history of the German empire and of Hitler's reich it was the Prussian junkers and the Prussian militarists who spearheaded German aggression either directly or through their influence on the German general staff.

I would venture to suggest that the Germany of Adenauer could be even different from the Germany of the Weimar republic because I think experience has led the West Germans to remedy some of the weaknesses of the Weimar constitution. For instance, the powers of the chancellor are greater. Article 65 of that constitution declares that he is responsible for the principles of policy and determines them. Moreover, we know that the chancellor's position has been strengthened by the fact that the basic law provides that if the opposition wishes to get rid of him, it must do more than simply vote no confidence in him. It must agree on someone to take his place. So in West Germany today we have a government that is at once a democratic government and a strong government. I think it would be a tragedy for the west if that government were to be undermined before its policy of co-operation with the west has been brought to fruition.

Another consequence of the failure to ratify this protocol might be the driving of a wedge between Western Germany and the NATO countries and the forcing of Western Germany into the arms of the Russians. We have seen the tendency for Germany to draw close to Russia illustrated more than once in recent history. The treaty of Rapallo in 1920 occurs to one, as does the Ribbentrop-Molotov pact of 1939. I therefore cannot see any alternative to the protocol.

I come next to the second thought which was left in my mind by the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), namely the effective limitations and controls which are to be imposed on West German rearmament. As he pointed out, it is of course impossible for human ingenuity to devise absolutely ironclad, foolproof guarantees; but in so far as these guarantees can be devised and applied, they are devised and applied in this protocol, as was made clear from the masterly exposition which the minister gave us relative to the controls with respect to certain armaments and the prohibition of arms.

I should like to deal briefly with the reception that the protocol has had in one or two other countries which are intimately concerned. We know, of course, that in France the French national assembly has approved the protocol, albeit reluctantly. That reluctance is perfectly understandable. France has suffered the humiliation of three German occupations in some 85 years, each one of them more brutal than the last. While I was travelling through France last fall, the brutality of that occupation was driven home to me very forcibly by a memorial in the town of Auxerre. That monument is not, in the strict sense of the word, a war memorial but is a memorial to the men, women and children who were taken from that town by the German authorities, who were transported into Germany to work as slave labourers and who died as a result. Engraved on that monument are terrifying sculptured forms of bent bodies bowed down beneath intolerable burdens, with a hand stretched piteously from the earth. No one who looked upon that memorial could help feeling how deeply the brutality of the German occupation had entered into the heart and soul of France.

France has good reason to distrust and to fear Germany. We can understand why the French national assembly rejected EDC. But let us not forget that the French national assembly has approved this protocol which is now before this house.

Reference has been made by several hon. members to the narrowness of the majority in favour of the protocol. But it is well known that the 53 members of the M.R.P. who voted against the protocol are nevertheless in favour of rearming Germany and that they voted against the protocol simply because they would have preferred the solution proposed by their own leaders, namely EDC. If those 53 votes were deducted from one column and added to another, the result would have looked much more impressive. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, that protocol has been approved by the French national assembly because of 86 socialist votes. Without those socialist votes, given in an almost solid body by the socialists of France, the protocol would not have passed the French national assembly. From the figures that I have seen, I understand that the socialist party in the French national assembly divided as follows: 86 in favour of the protocol, 18 against.

As to Britain, Mr. Speaker, let me say that the protocol we have before us was largely the result of the brilliant initiative of the British foreign secretary, Sir Anthony Eden. It was largely he who, following the collapse of EDC, mobilized the forces striving for the unification of western Europe. It was he who produced a solution in the form of a wedding, as it were, of the Brussels treaty with NATO, out of which has come western European union.

Not only did the British government take the initiative in bringing forward this protocol, but in order to make it easier for France to accept the protocol the British government undertook a new commitment, to maintain troops in western Europe in time of peace. This is something which has been correctly described as a truly revolutionary act. By that action Great Britain has sacrificed, if you will, an important part of her sovereign rights in the cause of international co-operation and collective security. By doing so she has given practical proof of her conviction that absolute and unfettered sovereignty has become an anachronism in our atomic age.

So, Mr. Speaker, we find that in both France and Great Britain these protocols which we are debating have been approved by the legislatures. In Great Britain the majority in favour was 266 to 6. It is true, of course, that a great many members abstained from voting, mainly members of the Labour party, but only 6 out of the Labour party membership in the house of close to 300 actually voted against the measure.

In the course of this debate a great deal of emphasis has been placed on the time factor. We have been told that time is of the essence, and of course one must agree with that. When one agrees with the idea that time is of the essence the thought in my mind is that we must seize the most propitious time. I firmly believe that time is now. During the past four or five years earnest efforts have been made, not the least by our distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), to bring about a strengthening of the west for peace. It has been an uphill task, as we all know; but now, when the French assembly has approved the protocols, when Great Britain has made the sacrifice of sovereignty she has, when opinion in West Germany is more favourable to it than perhaps ever before and more averse to militarism than ever before, are we going to lose this moment? Are we going to undermine this fabric of international understanding in the west that has been built up by patient and skilful diplomacy?

I believe we should hesitate, Mr. Speaker, before we take that chance. Indeed, let us try to strengthen the cause. By doing so we shall be helping to strengthen the defences of the free world. We shall be deterring Soviet aggression, and I firmly believe we shall be improving our chances of successful negotiation with the Soviet union because we shall be negotiating from strength. If there is one lesson that the history of the post-war years has taught us in our relations with the communists, it is that we derive greater successes at the bargaining table when we can lead from strength. This has been the lesson of Azerbaijan, the Berlin airlift and even the success which we have achieved in Korea.

If we look at the rest of the world today we can contrast the situation in the Far East with the situation in Europe. What do we see? We see that communist aggression is more rampant in the east, where our defences are weakest, than it is in the west where our defences are the strongest.

This brings me to what I feel to be the fundamental question, and that is why this proposition is being put up to us at all at this moment? Why is this question of German rearmament coming before us? I should like to answer that question in the words of the French socialist leader, Guy Mollet. Speaking in the historic debate in the French chamber, he said:

> Why is the question of German rearmament posed?

The answer he gave was:

> It is because of the policy conducted by the Soviet union which menaces the peace of the world, and denies liberty to millions.

Yes, I feel that the danger of war today, the danger of aggression, comes not from Bonn but from Moscow.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I refer to the very convincing speech made on Friday last by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) in reply to certain comments made by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy). This was an immensely valuable contribution to the debate. I felt that the minister demonstrated conclusively that there is no inconsistency between Canada's efforts at the United Nations to achieve disarmament and this resolution which involves the rearmament of Germany. We have always felt that disarmament must be under effective international control and supervision. I believe we are more likely to obtain a successful result from the impending disarmament conference if we can negotiate at that conference from strength.

It is clear from what the minister said that Canada is not speaking with two voices, not speaking with one voice in New York and another voice in London and Paris. These two policies are integral parts of the same pattern, two aspects of the same policy. The Canadian government is speaking with one voice, a voice that has been listened to with increasing respect and admiration throughout the free world. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the parliament of Canada, too, will speak with one voice.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, this is the second occasion since I entered the house that I have had the opportunity, perhaps I should say the temerity, to take part in a debate on external affairs. The first occasion was in 1953, when we were debating external affairs in a general way. This time we are dealing with a specific measure, and we are asked to make a decision as individual members upon the matter of the ratification of the German protocol.

I suppose one of the reasons the ordinary private member in the house hesitates to take part too frequently in a discussion of external affairs lies in the rapidly changing picture confronting us. When we realize that just nine years after the close of world war II the whole structure of power politics has reversed itself almost beyond recognition, we can appreciate the point I have just made.

Then, too, Canadian policy has changed rapidly since world war II. I recall that after the cessation of hostilities in 1945 Canada tried to get back to what we called a state of normalcy such as had existed in the pre-war period. We demobilized; we withdrew from European commitments. Even though we perhaps realized that, in the light of world conditions emerging after world war II, such a policy was not realistic, we could not resist that deep-seated and almost subconscious urge to get back to the period of peace as it had existed prior to 1939.

In facing this issue upon which we must now decide, we can readily come to the conclusion that what we decide now is not a final or fixed solution, because both in Canada and throughout the world tremendous moral, political and economic forces have been set loose that no parliament and no country—and certainly no individual—could control by any decision made at any particular time.

I should like to emphasize at the beginning of my remarks that defence alliances are especially transitory. Any cohesive element that might lie within a defence alliance is dissipated or begins to disappear almost as rapidly as the ink dries on the signatures of those taking part in shaping the alliance. Because of the uncontrollable forces of power politics that have been unleashed in the world we are faced with a condition that, for any definite period of time, is beyond the control of human ingenuity and human understanding.

However, I do not have too much difficulty in making a decision on the question before the house because I feel that the question set out in the motion contains the only logical conclusion to which anyone could come. As I have listened to the debate during the last three days my decision in this regard has been strengthened.

NATO came as a logical development from the rapid disintegration of the UN following world war II, which had appeared at first to be the beginning at long last of a meaningful world alliance, including the powerful U.S.S.R. After examining the circumstances I must conclude that the fact we were forced to take part in a regional defence alliance in 1949 was not the fault of the western powers, particularly those in North America, because we were forced reluctantly to take action for regional defence as a matter of collective security. This was largely because of the unco-operative attitude of the Soviet.

In 1949 the cry was that the western nations must unite for survival, and as the world situation has further deteriorated it seems to me that cry is even more urgent. In 1949 NATO restored the balance of power in favour of the west. I believe a logical development in that process, in view of the circumstances prevailing since the war, is the incorporation of Western Germany into this regional alliance of free nations.

As other hon. members have emphasized, in the changing circumstances of world affairs it is almost impossible to believe that at last we have France and the western section of Germany trying to get along within a mutual defence agreement. We must also keep in mind that, notwithstanding its excursions into military aggressiveness twice in the first half of the twentieth century, Germany is basically and essentially a part of our western Christian civilization.

Having said all that is to oversimplify. The issue is not as straightforward or as simple as all that. Indeed, it is one of the most complex I have had to face as a member of the house, and one of the most complex confronting the world today. This was revealed in the minister's excellent review of the situation at the opening of the discussion on Thursday afternoon. It is not a subject that could be presented in sweeping and simple generalizations.

I join with other hon. members, particularly those in the back rows and those sitting in opposition, in regretting that more information was not placed in our hands at the time of the original Paris and London agreements. I have been under assault, if I may put it that way, from certain influences in my own constituency almost since that time, and it has been difficult to answer queries raised and deal with criticisms made concerning those two important conferences without having the information at hand.

Sometimes we of the opposition are referred to as the paper opposition, in that we get most of our information from the press. I have found from personal experience that this is almost inevitable, particularly as government affairs become more complex. As a private member I find there is not too much opportunity to get the necessary detailed information on a matter as complex as this. Neither do we have the opportunity to deal with the representatives of the various free parliaments. We must formulate our own understanding and develop our thinking from the information transmitted to us through the various paper means of communication.

I venture to say that members of the armed forces of Canada, particularly those who travel abroad, have a more intimate understanding of and a more intimate contact with the actual geographical setting where these tremendous issues are taking shape. Members of parliament have to depend on secondhand information. That is an unfortunate situation. What the remedy is I cannot suggest this afternoon, although I do recall that when I first joined the air force back in the beginning of world war II the slogan was "Join the air force and see the world", and we did see a considerable part of the world at that time. Any personal grasp I have of countries outside the North American continent came from contacts that were made possible during those days.

In spite of the fact that to a large majority of the house it seems to be inevitable that we must ratify this protocol, there are some who feel that at this time they cannot vote for the resolution before us. I can partly understand that reservation. It is similar to the attitude that prevailed in the mid-1930's, when a strong feeling of pacifism was the dominant sentiment of a good many citizens of Canada and in fact of most of the western nations. Our generation is saturated with what we might call a mixture of sentimental Christianity—because as fundamental Christianity becomes watered down it tends to taper off into sentiment—scientific humanism and social evolution dogma. It was a mixture of all these sentiments that produced in the mid-1930's that famous resolution that swept through universities of the free nations of the world and which said, "Under no circumstances will we take up arms for king and country." A good many students of those days affixed their signatures to that resolution because of the sentiments that had shaped their thinking and formed their personalities; leading them to believe that everything was for the best in the best of all possible worlds, and never again would there be any war.

The refusal to ratify a resolution as important as the one before us springs from similar sentiments, I believe. Just a few moments ago the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) referred to the belief in progress that was our heritage from the Victorian era; and that belief in inevitable progress still is very firm in a large segment of the population, even though in Victorian times, under relatively stable conditions, the wrecks of civilization were to be seen on all hands, particularly in the Mediterranean area. These evidences that civilizations do rise and fall only served to underscore the comparative security of our own era. It was not until world war II, when we saw within the confines of the western nations wrecks of cities, the debris of our own civilization, that our thinking in regard to inevitable progress was brought up short.

I remember that in the early 1940's, at the height of the devastating bomber attacks on Germany, the crews taking part in those mass raids, in order to provide a safety valve for their own emotional reaction to the horror in which they were actually engaged I suppose, used to refer to a successful raid something like this. They would say they had heard a newscast from one of the German radio stations which said that a mass raid of a thousand allied bombers appeared over one of their cities this evening. The broadcast would refer to the destruction of a number of bombers and concluded with the final sentence, "One of our cities is missing."

That, I think, underscores the problem that faces a good many hon. members, as we have to make a decision on this matter. We are now confronted with the prospect of total destruction, not only of the physical aspects of our civilization; but with the additional threat of what are called the ABC weapons the situation becomes even more ominous. Not only will cities be razed to the ground, but we are faced with the possible disappearance of soil fertility and interference with human biology itself. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) dealt with this subject a few days ago.

I want to emphasize that progress is not inevitable, and trends for good or evil can be disturbed by the actions men take, notwithstanding Marx and similar materialists —and our own civilization is saturated with strong potions of materialism today. I heard an authority speak on the subject not so long ago. He was rather cynical in his observation, when he said he saw very little difference between the atheistic materialism of Malenkov and the theistic materialism of western civilization. The materialists would always have us believe in determinism, that trends are inevitable, but I believe that man is capable of rational and creative activity. The decisions we make here in a free parliament, as well as decisions that may be made elsewhere, can be implemented into action, can change the course of events so far as human civilization is concerned.

In addition to the general confusion of a problem of this kind, the issue has been further confused by certain representations that have been making themselves felt repeatedly in parliamentary circles. I have had many letters; I have had many interviewers, all of whom have urged me to vote no on this matter. I have not had one letter urging me to vote yes. If you were to take that as a measure of public opinion you might be persuaded to move in the direction of the noes.

I am a little bit suspicious of the type of pressure that has been applied to members of parliament. First of all, it is highly charged with emotional content. It is not a rational approach to the problem at all. It seems even to have some subversive tendencies so far as the well-being of the western nations is concerned. It is an appeal to conscience, and that is an appeal that can always tend to neutralize the westerner because, notwithstanding the adulteration of the element of Christianity in our civilization, we are still pretty heavily saturated with Christian morality; and whenever anybody approaches us from the standpoint of a peace offensive we always think very carefully as to the stand we shall take.

I suggest that approaching members of a free parliamentary body such as this with a peace offensive is much like preaching to the converted. I do not think the North American countries offer any threat of aggression, and such propaganda efforts might be more usefully employed in quarters requiring a little more aggressiveness on behalf of peace. We are convinced that war is a scourge. When I have been confronted with this emotional, almost hypocritical approach, I hark back in my thinking to the peace offensive of Hitler during the 1930's, when he neutralized any possible resistance from the western powers by appealing to the western conscience.

It is largely, too, an appeal from the standpoint of fear, and it was Mr. Roosevelt who said at a critical period during world war II that we had nothing to fear but fear itself. The world today, because of the continuing threat of the international situation, is almost paralysed by fear. The other day I was quite impressed when I read in the press the story of the smog that suddenly descended over London causing the good citizens of London to fall on their knees in prayer, and in general distress and confusion thinking that it was the end of all things.

There is an atmosphere of fear in all the nations of the world at the present time. We are constantly reminded of the scourge of the nazis, of the possibility of the revival of German militarism and the modern barbarism of nazism. I would suggest that this tactic of the appeal to irrational emotionalism was just the thing that made it impossible for the west to stand up to the threat of the nazis during the 1930's. The nazi propaganda machine painted communistic aims and methods in such a bestial light that they confused the issue—the old red herring technique—and concealed their own bestiality. By arousing this irrational response of fear the nazis gained the allegiance of many of the respectable groups in Germany. Hitler destroyed law on the pretext of saving it. He undermined free government on the ground that he was its only safeguard. He brought all property under state control with the explanation that he was the champion of free enterprise, and he finally opened the gates of Europe to Russian communism on the excuse that he alone knew how to fight it. As I have listened to these representations by peace delegates my mind has constantly harked back to the Hitler technique of the appeal to emotional irrationality.

This leads me to a consideration of what we are up against in so far as any possible threat to our western security is concerned. True, there is a possibility of revival of German militarism; but I think we are in much greater danger from the possibilities of Soviet aggression. We need merely go back to the record since the end of world war II. It is not necessary for me to recapitulate that dismal picture here; it is well known to all hon. members. It is the lack of good faith and co-operation on the part of the U.S.S.R. that has made this whole western defence structure necessary.

In addition to that, if you go back to the doctrinaire Marxist approach behind Soviet designs and ambitions you will find they make no secret of the fact that they are out to destroy what they call capitalistic society, and they have a method of attack that is very difficult to deal with because it has two aspects to it. First of all it appears in the form of a revival of czarist Russian nationalism, and second it appears in the form of communist imperialism. This communist imperialism has, to my way of thinking, many of the overtones of religious fanaticism.

I do not believe that the Soviets will precipitate an all-out war. That seems to have been demonstrated by the pattern since world war II; but there is no doubt, by the same token, that whenever the opportunity arises, whenever confusion and chaos occur, they will indulge in a session of smashing and grabbing that is bewildering to behold. Such was the case behind the iron curtain as they absorbed satellite after satellite in the immediate post-war period.

Of course it may be they are hoping that according to the Marxist dialectic the capitalistic nations will be destroyed of their own volition, that the elements of destruction are inherent in them and that Russia will simply have to wait until we reach a point of disintegration and confusion, when they can walk in and take over. That is why I feel it is so necessary to preserve, to extend and strengthen the system of collective security that has already been so well established in the NATO organization.

Actually if you look at either threat, the threat from the revival of nazism and the ever-present threat of Soviet pressure, there is much in common between the two. I remember attending a debate in Hart House in 1946 when the topic was "Resolved that nazism and communism are essentially the same". I think the affirmative in that debate rather had the upper hand. Both fascism and communism are the by-products of despotism. They are the results of the concentration of power both politically and economically in the hands of a few state officials. Of course this must inevitably lead to the abuse of power.

In addition to that, despotisms, particularly the modern despotism of nazi Germany and the Soviet union, are completely amoral. Lenin declared himself to have no belief in eternal moral principles. Actually all modern despotisms, and especially the two I have referred to, are more dangerous than any despotism that has existed hitherto, because they have all the insights of modern science at their disposal.

I was impressed with the minister's phrase when he said that he hoped science might be used for welfare rather than for warfare. I do not think modern despots are using the discoveries of science for what you might call welfare. Early despots used physical torture as an instrument to ensure conformity. In some cases they destroyed the body. But now the Soviet—and this has been amply demonstrated—uses new discoveries, in the physiology of the mind, for example, to inflict psychophysical torture on the victim. The will itself is destroyed. We have seen pictures of the white-faced automata appearing in the Soviet courts and confessing in the very language of their accusers. We have come to the conclusion that not only has liberty itself been removed, but the very essence of humanity has been subtracted.

We also recall the campaign that came from the same source as the peace campaign, with reference to the use of bacteriological weapons in the Korean conflict. We have discovered that this same diabolical brainwashing technique has been used, that the insights of modern psychology and psychiatry have been used in extracting confessions from prisoners of war.

Notwithstanding this—and this shows the very amorality of the threat now confronting us—no state in history has been more obsessed with "righteous" faith in the infallibility of its policies than the U.S.S.R. It sends men to labour camps in the name of freedom; it wipes out minorities in the name of liberation; it puts millions of peasants to death by starvation in the name of efficient agriculture. If anything, and this conclusion has been reached by others in this debate, Soviet despotism is much worse in its threat to humanity than nazi despotism ever was. In this regard I am constantly reminded that to fail in the ratification of these agreements will further open the way to communist infiltration. That is why I feel we must move resolutely and firmly toward the furtherance of western unity.

Like most hon. members I have reservations on this score, and some of these reservations I mentioned in my opening remarks. We are dealing with forces and powers in a great many respects quite uncontrollable, and we are constantly afraid that anything we do will usher in a third world war which would be the final madness of the human race. I would emphasize some of the things already stated in this debate, namely the need for rigid control of the German military machine and also, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Health and Welfare have emphasized, the need for continued discussions on the matter of disarmament, because nations armed to the teeth are always in danger even unwittingly of precipitating the last and final destruction.

Canada has tentatively attempted a lead in this regard. But it is interesting to note that any reference to disarmament by the Soviet seems to stress the A B C weapons, which have never yet been used to precipitate war. The atomic bomb was used to end the last world war; that fortunately has so far been the fullest extent of its use. It must be noted that wherever communist aggression has occurred in the world it has been carried out by means of superiority in conventional arms. It is therefore my view that any future war would begin with the use of conventional arms, and if our Soviet friends were sincere in their desire for disarmament they would have something to say on that score. Western frontiers have been engulfed by a slow process of attrition by means of these weapons, and that aspect of disarmament should be remembered in any discussions that take place.

I would like to emphasize again the non-military aspects of the protocol now before us. It was at Canada's insistence that article 2 of NATO was inserted in the agreements. Unfortunately, due no doubt to our preoccupation with other matters, there has been very little attempt to implement the economic co-operation underlined in article 2, and in passing I would re-emphasize that if the responsibility the parliament of Canada is being asked to assume means anything at all it is the need to go much further than merely implement a defensive agreement.

Then there is the problem of the preservation of democracy in Germany, which is of basic importance. Only in a democratic Germany can we have any hope of avoiding a revival of the nazi military tradition. As I have already indicated, despotism always moves in the direction of the abuse of power, and certainly a nation having the recent historical background of Germany is in great danger from this threat. If the present democratic form of government in Germany collapsed, and despotism replaced it, all sorts of problems would have to be resolved on higher levels of foreign policy. We have to remember that Chancellor Adenauer is a very old man, and the fact that there will have to be changes in German leadership will present a problem difficult to handle by those entrusted with the responsibility of assuring the continuance of the democratic way of life in West Germany.

Then perhaps the greatest danger of all in dealing with this problem is the compulsion toward unification. It is rather significant that in any settlement or peace arrangement we have been able to come to with the U.S.S.R. the question of partition has always been involved. That was the solution in Korea; it was the solution in Indo-China; and unfortunately and tragically it was adopted as a solution in dealing with the problem of Germany. These arrangements constitute sore spots in all these countries, and the drive toward reunification on the part of all these national entities is likely to be the cause of a hot war breaking out in future.

Continuance of negotiations between east and west is of course fundamental. Since the change in the personnel making up the power structure in Soviet Russia there has been perhaps a new emphasis which is of utmost importance, and which should be remembered in any attempt we make to carry on negotiations with Russia if there is to be any hope that the present policy of containment might eventually be replaced by some reasonable and sensible policy of coexistence.

Summing up in the spirit if not perhaps the words of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), we are forced to conclude that any action we take on this important matter is primarily an act of faith. The uncontrolled forces loose in the modern world make any other attitude impossible. Power politics turn the world in which we live today into a veritable madhouse. We wonder what Russia will do and what Germany will do. No one can say what the future holds, and perhaps even those countries cannot themselves provide a reasonable answer.

But I do believe we must continue to negotiate from strength. That has been the NATO solution, a solution which has worked most satisfactorily up to the present time. We must also remember that we are relying not only on military, economic, and political strength, but above all on the moral strength which lies at the very foundation of our Christian western civilization. That is why I say we must make this final decision as an act of faith. We must believe that the balance of western Christian morality will decide the issue in the long run on the side of God and on the side of humanity.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I listened the other day with a great deal of interest to the excellent speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. To my mind it was a speech designed to justify the action of the government in approving German rearmament. Since then several other hon. members have spoken along the same lines.

I noticed that the minister glossed over the history of Germany when armed. He glossed over the fears and dangers that engulfed us during two wars. Therefore, like several other members, particularly in this group, I feel that I should like to place on record my reasons for not supporting this resolution.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has already given the house reasons, with which I agree, which cover my case almost entirely. I want to make it quite clear that I am not opposing the admission of Germany into the family of nations. That action, by itself, is an excellent thing. I believe that everyone would support it. I believe the German people would vote for being admitted to the family of nations. I think that has the support of everyone in this house. However, I object to the package deal that is now before us, including as it does the rearmament of West Germany.

My memory goes back to 1914—and it has done so consistently over the past three or four days—when as a young man in London I listened to speeches made by prominent people, including both members of parliament and members of the public in London. I read the newspapers of those days and the posters exhorting the youth to join in the service of Britain. We were told that we had to do it in order to preserve democracy. We were told that nothing less than the full flower of Britain's youth pitted against Germany would bring about victory. We were told then that the challenge of Germany, if successful, would mean the end of our way of life. I well remember that statement. We were told that Germany must be defeated and must be forever effectively controlled.

On the basis of those statements and promises thousands of us joined, thinking we were being told the truth. After a long and bitter struggle we won the war. I have not the time in which to tell you of the price we paid, of the youths who died in the prime of life, or of the thousands of others who were maimed and crippled for life. You know the history of that war. Suffice it to say that those of us who survived looked forward to a peaceful existence for the rest of our lives, having accomplished what we set out to do, namely to disarm Germany once and for all.

Germany was disarmed. But before long people forgot the misery of the first war. I could not do so. I still cannot because I retain the memory of the day I joined the forces in August, 1914, in London, with six others who were also about my own age, five of whom paid the supreme sacrifice at the Dardanelles. Those are my memories. As a personal duty to those boys I knew so well, who gave their lives for a principle, I feel that I now must stand up and speak in favour of the same principle.

As the memory of the first war faded we gradually relaxed our controls over Germany. Although she was not allowed to build an air force, an army or a navy, she managed to produce some fine fighter pilots through the use of gliders, thus overcoming the restrictions placed upon her by the victorious allies. She was not allowed to build a navy, but she surreptitiously produced pocket battleships. She was not allowed to have an army, but she produced a small army composed almost entirely of officer material that eventually developed to the point where they could take charge of a vast army. All this went on before Hitler came on the scene.

When Hitler came on the scene they had reached a point where they were again strong enough to challenge the democracies that had defeated them a few short years previously. Once again the cry went out for recruits to stem the menace of a new Germany. Once again, in almost the same words, the same speeches were made. The same articles appeared in the press and the same posters appeared on the walls of buildings in England—and I might say in Canada —and again with the same results. Our youth responded. Incidentally two of my own sons joined the services in the last war, responding to the call. I too offered my services in the second war, as I did in the first, serving in the reserve army. This time it was to be a final war against Germany. Never again would they be allowed to arm and menace the world. Those are not my words. They are the words of Mr. Churchill, the Prime Minister of England, supported by other prominent men in the democracies, including our own country.

Again, Mr. Speaker, after a bitter and bloody struggle we were victorious. The second war was far more vicious than was the first. In order to see how much more atrocious it was, you have only to read the recorded facts with regard to prisoner of war camps such as Belsen, the gas chambers and all the atrocities that were committed in the second war, and compare them with those that were perpetrated in the first war.

I am convinced that a third world war would surpass, in violence and atrocity, both the others combined. It is even conceivable that the use of modern nuclear weapons would exterminate the majority of mankind, civilians as well as members of the armed forces. I therefore view with alarm the emergence of Germany as an armed world power for the third time. For this reason I cannot agree to sanction the rearming of this nation after having, twice in my lifetime, given years to try to disarm it.

An armed Germany will not bring stability and peace to Europe. The history of the last 50 years proves that statement. History actually proves that Germany has been the most disturbing influence in Europe. On what ground then do we now credit the Germans with better intentions? President Eisenhower, Prime Minister Churchill and our own Secretary of State for External Affairs have told us of lessening tension. Both the United Kingdom and the United States are reducing their manpower because of the lessening tension and are relying more and more on their superiority of atomic weapons.

This condition has been brought about without the help of Germany. Why, then, at this stage enlist an army of foot soldiers? They will not be allowed to carry atomic weapons. We are now told we have too many. According to the experts, foot soldiers are already a surplus element in a modern defence system.

Instead of allowing Germany to rearm I think we should allow her to use that money to improve her own economic condition and the lot of her people. I believe building German homes would pay far greater dividends than would the building of a German army. The German people themselves would prefer an improvement in their economic lot. A happy prosperous Germany, to my mind, would be a more effective bulwark against the growth of communism than any German army could possibly be. For that reason there is a growing opposition even in West Germany to the proposal that is now before us.

In support of this contention that Germany itself is not in favour of rearmament I should like to quote part of an article that appeared in the Globe and Mail today. It is written by Dorothy Thompson, and reads as follows:

> The rearmament of Germany was launched by Mr. Acheson in September, 1950, right off the cuff. Since then even strategic plans of how to meet a possible Russian attack on Europe have changed. The answer would be an all-out atomic reprisal—and the Germans are to have no atomic weapons. Thus the political stability of West Germany and France and the confidence of both countries in the United States are being sacrificed to 12 German divisions which, were war to come, would be worthless, but whose existence makes war more, rather than less, probable. So, at least, argues the growing opposition in West Germany.

In a few words, Mr. Speaker, that is the reason I cannot support this resolution at the moment.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): It has been one of the richest experiences of my life, Mr. Speaker, to sit and listen to the discussion of this measure that has taken place thus far in this house among all hon. members. I honour every one of them, and in so far as I may disagree with any I do not mean that to be any reflection on them. This is a most contentious matter.

One thing I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, and which I wish I could get into the mind of everybody in the Dominion of Canada and the United States, is that we have been talking incessantly about the fact that Germany rearmed and fought. We have not heard a single word as to why she did. Not a single word has been said about the economic pressures under which Germany was placed. Not a word has been said as to how those economic pressures might have been removed and might now be removed, thereby removing the cause of war and probably solving our problem directly.

I am not saying for one minute that the Germans were not culpable. I hold no brief for any of them. Nevertheless, would you not naturally expect that in a chamber of 265 intelligent members some attention would be given to this question of the probable cause of world war I or world war II? I do not believe there is a member in this house who has not heard that a fighting war is the result of an economic war. I wonder if there is a single member in this house who has not heard that economic warfare brings on fighting warfare. Would there not be some reason to suppose that fighting warfare was brought on by economic warfare? It will be along that line, to some extent, that I shall aim to direct my remarks.

Many earnest people, Mr. Speaker, have asked me to vote against German rearmament. Many have told me that they would watch my activity and read my explanation of my vote. I feel called upon for their sake to give my personal reasons for voting for German rearmament. What I shall say will be said on my own responsibility as a member of parliament. My words will in no respect commit any Social Crediter in Canada, and that includes every one in this group. I support 100 per cent the position taken by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) in his excellent speech on January 20.

First of all I congratulate the minister on a great forward step in organizing a counter-attack against communism. A counterattack far broader and deeper than this has been in order for at least six years in this country, and very little has been done about it. All last year I argued in the hope of getting some sort of organization against communism, and now we have one step in this respect.

One of the main reasons urged by the opponents of rearmament is that the Germans, as a people, are unworthy to be trusted with arms. They seem disposed to believe that the Germans are in some hereditary way peculiarly base and unreliable. They seem to assume that the Germans have, of necessity, been the fundamental cause of each of the wars in which they have been involved. I was well pleased with the realistic approach of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott). He indicated that a great deal of that thinking must be essentially fallacious.

May we examine the validity of the position that is taken? Emotionally I have much to set me against Germany. In world war I I lost nearly all the best friends I ever had, my university pals, who went into the service and are lying in Flanders' fields today. In world war II of my three brothers who enlisted in the services, one fought all through the terrible scenes in western Europe. I had three sons involved, one of whom paid the supreme sacrifice in the attack on Peenemunde on the fateful night of August 17-18, 1943; that was my son Winston W.

However, I must not allow things like that to affect me. I am in a responsible position. It is my task to try to determine, along with my fellows, what is the best thing to do in the situation we face right now.

To what extent were the Germans responsible for world war II? If we can find that out, then we shall be in a better position to judge the validity of the contention that the Germans are unworthy in every way to bear arms. First of all, what are the causes of war? There are many causes, but we shall name five which, I believe, are the chief ones. The first is racial ambition. The second is religious ambition, and let that not be forgotten. The third is ignorance, and that I believe played a terrible part in this last war, ignorance on our part because we did not know the truth. The fourth is the struggle for safety, for instance boundaries that are easy to protect. The fifth is the struggle for existence.

Let us consider cause No. 5, the struggle for existence. I believe that everyone has an inherent and inalienable right to life. I believe every member of this house will agree with that. One of the great figures in world war II said that a child born in Tokyo has the right to just as good a living as a child born in Washington. There is no answer to be given to that statement. I believe we will all agree. I agree. The big question is how to guarantee the child born in Tokyo the chance to have the standard of living which the child born in Washington can have. We are not, in the main, directing ourselves to that problem and how to answer it.

Everyone has an inalienable right to the means of supporting life: food, clothing and shelter. This requires a set of circumstances under which, by his own effort, he can obtain those things. If in any part of this world we have any considerable number of people who are deprived of access to the means of life, then we have a situation which is a breeder of trouble. If people are denied the enjoyment of this fundamental right to life they fight, if they are strong enough to fight. And if they cannot fight, they die; they eke out a miserable existence and finally give up the ghost.

Access to the means of life is to be gained legitimately by delivering either services or goods. What services, what goods a nation shall deliver has to depend upon the resources it possesses in the territory occupied, and upon the number and nature of its population.

Have we examined Germany? Have we given consideration to the number of people there are in Germany or to the geographical situation of Germany? Have we considered the rapidity of increase of the population which is natural to Germany; have we considered their natural resources, or their need for trade? Have we given consideration to all those things, to see whether or not the Germans might be in an intolerable position? If we have not, then we had better look very carefully before we go too far with some of the items contained in this resolution.

Let us now consider Germany in relation to these fundamental principles of life, while we contemplate her history. In the light of all considerations, let us now seek the causes of world war II, from Germany's point of view. What were the causes of world war II, for Germany? Most people blame Germany for world war II. Let us begin by assuming that Germany was to blame, while we probe about in recent history seeking to assess the extent of Germany's culpability. Winston Churchill called world war II "the unnecessary war". It was unnecessary from whose point of view; Germany's? Or was it unnecessary from the standpoint of those who constrained Germany?

We shall begin with the treaty of Versailles in 1919. Germany was broken; she was bereft of all her colonies. She was burdened with a set of penalties impossible for her or for any people to sustain. Her war debt was so great that to service it forced her into disastrous inflation, ruining her property values. A number of investors, including many eastern European aliens—and I draw everybody's attention to that expression "many eastern European aliens"—swooped down upon her and bought up vast amounts of her properties.

The republic established by the treaty was feeble. Germany stumbled along, with numerous political parties, and a near paralysis of government. Two parties finally emerged as powerful. First was the communist party, many of whose leaders were eastern European aliens. Mark that. The second was the national socialist German workers' party. Faced with harsh alternatives, the Germans chose the native party, making Adolf Hitler chancellor on January 30, 1933.

Five weeks later Franklin D. Roosevelt was inaugurated as president of the United States. On August 2 President von Hindenburg died and on August 19 Hitler was made both president and chancellor of Germany.

North Atlantic Treaty

Hitler issued a series of tirades against communism, considering it a world menace. Roosevelt, on November 16, 1933, gave full diplomatic recognition to Soviet Russia—now there is an exceedingly important matter—as the result of the activity and influence of Litvinoff, Dean Acheson and two others, very prominent American figures whose names I shall not give here, but which I could give instantly.

One potent factor influencing Roosevelt toward recognizing red Russia was almost certainly the more than three million eastern European aliens who had immigrated into the United States and joined the Democratic party, and who had made known to the Democratic leaders that they would support the Democratic party in return for having men of their choice placed in certain administrative positions of influence in the American administration, where they could exercise control over United States foreign policy. There is one of the most serious facts in all modern history.

The German government had at that time the responsibility for feeding, clothing and sheltering 62 million people in a territory about the size of Texas. How would hon. members like to contemplate endeavouring to keep 62 million people in Texas, or in an area about one-third the size of Ontario? That was the task the German government faced in those days. I would like my hon. friends of the C.C.F., whose earnest remarks I honour, to ask themselves what they would do if they had a group of their own people in charge of Germany under conditions of that kind. I would ask those members to think it through and not give just some careless opinion, such as ordinarily they give to us.

Germany began to implement a policy which might be characterized as Germany for the Germans. It was a policy which in some respects might be likened to the more recent policy of Mossadegh in Iran, relative to British control of the Iranian oil industry. In effect Mossadegh said, "These oil reserves belong to us. Let us control them. These people have come in here and built industries from which they derive the benefit, and from which we derive nothing. Let us see that we get adequate returns from these industries."

This pro-German policy of the German government naturally was opposed by the non-German stock numbering about 510,000 in 1933. In particular it was opposed by those who were eastern European aliens—mark that again—many of whom were communists. Most of these aliens had bought German property in 1923, greatly to the detriment of Germany. Naturally these non-German aliens were unwilling to lose through the government's action any degree of their position of financial and other power acquired in large measure during Germany's hour of deep distress, occasioned by the famous German inflation and collapse of 1923. These non-German aliens—communists—therefore appealed to certain of their friends with influence in New York and elsewhere. Once again I ask my C.C.F. friends what they would have done, had they been in office.

In 1933 an international boycott was organized by these friends in New York to bring Germany to her knees, or to terms. Instructions went out to all friends of these non-German aliens of eastern European origin and loyalty, largely communists, that first, they should buy no goods made in Germany. Again I ask my C.C.F. friends, what would you have done under conditions like that? The second instruction was that they should refuse to deal with any merchant or shopkeeper who was selling any German-made goods. The third was that they should refuse to buy any goods from anyone employing German ships or shipping. Once again, what would my C.C.F. friends have done had they been in charge of the country when that happened? Think it through.

Arrangements were made by these aliens of eastern European origin, largely communists, to extend the boycott to include France, Holland, Belgium, Britain, Poland, Czechoslovakia and other lands even as far away as Egypt and Finland. They did the job up pretty thoroughly, did they not? A C.C.F. government in charge of that country would have been facing real trouble, would it not?

In connection with the boycott, the anti-German campaign that had been going on steadily in the United States ever since world war I suddenly broke out with great violence, almost as though it had caught fire. Who was behind that? Germany was denounced in several influential New York newspapers, as well as over the radio. In saying this I am just recounting history, and recording the facts as they occurred. I am making no comment and offering no interpretation of the facts.

The public were dazed by all this propaganda. The United States government soon placed upon German imports her general tariff rates instead of the lower most-favoured-nation rates which all other nations enjoyed. What would you have done about that? This measure slowed down German imports into the United States, but did not stop Germany from manufacturing export goods. The United States then took a further step. She raised her duties against German goods by amounts ranging from 22 per cent to 56 per cent in addition, mind you, to having placed German goods under the general tariff. Within about six months this measure caused German exports to the United States to dwindle to practically the vanishing point.

Next, certain anti-German, presumably communist, international financial interests made an effort to call sufficient German treasury notes to break Germany. Men in the house with financial experience will readily recognize what that was. The German government successfully met this manoeuvre by giving a substantial bonus above the current exchange rate to all foreigners who would come to Germany, exchange their currency for German marks and spend the marks there.

Germany made great preparations for welcoming strangers to such gatherings as the world conference on recreation and leisure time in Hamburg in August, 1936. Special trains of school children came from as far away as northern Norway. Visitors were shown every courtesy. The result was that tourists spent enough in Germany to keep the German mark stable. That was an extreme measure adopted to meet an extreme situation, over which a C.C.F. government in Germany could have no control.

Mr. Winch: How about telling us what you would do, instead of misinterpreting what you say we would do?

Mr. Blackmore: I am making this speech, and in time I shall tell you what I would do.

Mr. Winch: You have not the fortitude.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: Any time my hon. friend wants to enter into a debate with me on the floor of the house he is welcome to it. Evidently I am getting quite close to some place that hurts.

But this did not supply the increasing need of the 62 million German people for various raw materials and other imports from abroad, such as wheat. These imports Germany could buy and pay for only with exports, which exports she was forbidden or prevented from making by those measures I have already referred to. Roosevelt continued his policy of economic warfare upon Germany; yet in his public utterances for some time he kept up talk about a policy of non-intervention in the internal affairs of foreign nations. In two speeches in the summer of 1937 he said:

> Our national determination to keep free from foreign wars and foreign entanglements.

Those were his words, but a few months later Roosevelt made a complete about-face, probably the most complete in the whole history of United States foreign policy, a very important matter leading up to the war. On October 5 in Chicago he delivered his famous quarantine speech. Let me quote:

> . . . let no one imagine that America will escape, that America may expect mercy, that this western hemisphere will not be attacked.
> When an epidemic of physical disease starts to spread, the community approves and joins in a quarantine of the patients in order to protect the health of the community against the spread of the disease.

That was a most important speech. In the United States the speech was considered most inflammatory and provocative of war. It caused unprecedented consternation among people in the United States. Certain newspapers outspokenly opposed the quarantine speech. Chief among these was the Chicago Tribune. The communist New Masses enthusiastically favoured it. I wonder why. Earl Browder, a national communist leader in the United States, was so highly pleased with it that he promised the Roosevelt administration the "100 per cent unconditional support of the communist party", provided Roosevelt adopted a hands-off policy toward communism. The majority of United States people called for clarification of the quarantine speech. What did it all mean? No explanation was given. The conclusion most people believed obvious was that the speech referred to Germany and Japan.

The German government, first in 1937 and again in 1938, made "a sincere effort to improve relations with the United States, only to be rebuffed". The United States government gave as its reason "a fear of domestic political reactions in this country unfavourable to the administration". Germany was told that the American public would not tolerate a conference. The Roosevelt administration blocked Germany's further efforts for peace by withdrawing the United States ambassador from Berlin, thus peremptorily preventing future negotiations. Germany was then forced to withdraw her ambassador, "who was personally friendly to America".

Through censorship the United States public for more than ten years were kept from knowing anything about these appeals and their sequences. That was in America the free! Even then the facts were ferreted out and made known only by the un-American activities committee.

Being thus economically strangled by an international boycott, headed in New York, the Germans in the late 1930's had to provide work for their unemployed by hiring them on government-sponsored projects, including armament factories. The series of events I have just related, together with the reactions Germany met in countries around her, convinced the Germans that they were the victims of "encirclement" on the part of Britain, France, United States and Soviet Russia. This caused the Germans to make the deal with the Soviet union in August, 1939, to partition Poland. This move directly precipitated world war II.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, before the house took recess I indicated by my remarks that much of the blame for world war II must be fastened upon the United States, the communist party, particularly great international figures who played prominent parts in the communist party, and President Roosevelt, president of the United States from 1933 on.

I mentioned serious economic pressures under which debtor nations are placed in the conditions which surround them in the world today. Strangely enough the creditor nations are not so seriously suffering from these pressures, but the debtor nations who most need assistance are suffering. I shall aim to refer particularly to a number of them in a minute or two.

Before recess I made a number of statements of tremendous importance. I realize how serious the statements were and I made them deliberately. I would not have made them if I had not ample evidence in support of everything I said. These facts are important not only for appraising the past and the present, but for planning for the future. If we desire honestly to build up a world in which we can be free from wars we must be guided by the things which can be learned, and which I stated, in my earlier remarks.

Those desiring to check the accuracy of the information I have given thus far in this speech will find all the proof required in four sources which I now quote; firstly, in the works of Dr. John Beaty, who I believe is probably as great an authority on these matters as is to be found on the American continent; secondly, in a book called "American Foreign Policy in the Making, 1932-1940" by Professor Charles A. Beard, published in 1946; third, "Design for War" by Frederick R. Sanborn, published in 1951; fourth, "America's Second Crusade" by William Henry Chamberlin, published in 1950. A careful perusal of these four authorities will satisfy anybody that what I said is moderate as well as true. I have referred to gross abuses of terrible power possessed by unbridled internationalists, all of whom appear to be much inclined to communism or are perhaps actual communists.

But besides all these particular provocations which were suffered by Germany in common with other debtor nations from 1933 onward, there existed a standing irritant that had been oppressing all nations other than the United States for a good many years. What I now refer to is the unconditional most favoured nation clause which was constantly urged and insisted upon by the United States.

The definition of this clause was first made in President Wilson's famous 14 points, announced in 1917. It is point No. 3, calling for the most favoured nation clause for every nation. The unconditional aspect of it had not yet been declared.

The most favoured nation clause called for in point No. 3 of Wilson's 14 points was changed to the unconditional most favoured nation clause by the United States in 1922, and from that time constantly insisted upon. If I have time enough I will give a little explanation so those people out in the country who read these remarks will be able to form some idea of the iniquity of the unconditional most favoured nation clause. Roosevelt's new deal administration demanded compliance with the clause, and this fact alone rendered the position of Germany intolerable, without adding all the other things which I have referred to previously.

Now I wish to say just a few words to the minister and to my fellow members of the house. As I read the measure which is before the house, the only provision which is made to give economic help to nations in need is the building up of a set of vises by means of which we can clamp on every nation in the world the iniquitous features of the unconditional most favoured nation clause, whether they are able to endure them or not. If I am wrong the minister will have a good opportunity to reply, but I insist I am right.

What is the use of building up the United Nations, a central agency which will deprive individual nations of their sovereignty, without modifying those economic influences upon the nations which render their lot unbearable? How can anyone seriously contemplate such iniquity as that? Apparently that is what the minister and the other planners who are working along with him have in mind. I hope I am wrong, but if all goes well I am going to give the minister ample opportunity to explain that situation to the house before we get through this year. There is just no use setting up a situation which is impossible.

We are led to believe by a wide variety of propaganda that all that is necessary to avoid war is to give away the sovereignty of the people. Take an illustration. We are insisting upon provincial sovereignty in this country, and in the United States they insist on state sovereignty. Would anyone in either of those two countries consider for a minute depriving one of those units of its sovereignty in order to place it in the hands of a central government, even though that central government were composed of the same flesh and blood, were the same kind of people as those in the provinces?

How can we seriously contemplate taking away the sovereignty of a nation, Canada, Great Britain, the United States, Germany and all the others, and placing it in the hands of a central power, especially when we have not the slightest idea as to who are going to constitute that central power, how the members are going to be selected or how they are going to be checked up and rendered responsible to the people?

I promised I would take a few minutes to illustrate the unconditional most favoured nation clause. Will you imagine two little countries like Czechoslovakia and Rumania, before either of them was brought in behind the iron curtain? Will you remember that each one of them is struggling to be sure that it does not import any more than it exports, trying to be sure that it produces as much of its own needs as it is possible to produce so as to avoid the dangers of international trade which would likely create international debt? We can fully appreciate that in Canada because of our adverse balances of trade.

These countries must have the needs of life. Czechoslovakia would be needing Rumanian oil, which that country would be able to produce in surplus, and Rumania would be needing the munitions or machinery produced by the Skoda works in Czechoslovakia. Rumania would be in need of those very things which Czechoslovakia had in surplus. Czechoslovakia would be anxious to have Rumanian oil just as Rumania would be anxious to have Czechoslovakian machinery and munitions.

A simple device would be for Czechoslovakia for instance to say to Rumania, "Now, Rumania, we will lower our tariff against your oil, we will let it come in at a much lower rate if not free entirely, if you in a complementary way will lower your tariff against our machinery. In that way you will get the machinery you need plus a market for some of your oil and we will get the oil we need and a market for some of our machinery. We will both be better off."

The unconditional most favoured nation clause announced by the United States in effect amounts to this: The United States says to any nation in the world, "If you lower your tariff against the goods of any other nation in the world, you also have to lower your tariff similarly against our commodities."

Let us see how these two little nations would find this to work out. Czechoslovakia lowers her tariff against Rumanian oil, and the United States sends in her oil, if you please; but she refuses to take in payment munitions from Czechoslovakia. Czechoslovakia would become indebted to the United States and Rumania would not obtain a market for her oil.

Rumania lowers her tariff against Czechoslovakian munitions, and the United States sends in munitions, refusing to accept oil in payment. Rumania falls into debt to the United States, while Czechoslovakia fails to get the market for her machinery.

We see those two countries thus put into a position which is ever so much more difficult because one power, the United States, has insisted that if any nation gives a reduction in its tariff to any other nation it must give it also to the United States. That is how the unconditional most favoured nation clause works out in action. When that mechanism is applied all over the world it creates a situation which is much worse, even intolerable. The lot of the weaker nations is made absolutely unsupportable, forcing them into debt and disaster.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what we as members of this house should ask ourselves is this. Is there any means whereby we can build up some medium through which we can bring the United States to use common sense in the application of the unconditional most favoured nation clause? We should also ask ourselves whether there is any means whereby we can protect nations with weaker economies. If there is not then all the talk of solving the economic problems and the peace problems besetting this world is idle and futile. An international organization which would deprive nations of sovereignty would only unnecessarily complicate the issues. In these terrible days when people of every nation are crying out for a lead my plea is, "Let us use our heads."

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is my duty to declare myself on this issue, particularly in view of what I have seen and heard not only over the last few weeks but in the past few years. What I have to say tonight will not be quoted from a book, and the speech will be entirely my own.

I have received many delegations at Fort William; some of which have interviewed me many times. Most of them advocate the same line of policy. There was only one individual among them who did support the labour progressives, and I personally appreciate his reasons for opposing German rearmament. I told these delegations that I would not declare myself on this issue until I heard from the government leaders and from leaders of the opposition parties in this house. I have followed that policy. One delegation from Toronto requested me to ask the government to wait and continue to wait. He did not know my disposition. When I have a thing to do I do it now, because an opportunity comes only once.

These deputations urged me to vote for delay. I would like to briefly state five reasons why I support the resolution submitted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. First, I support it because of the character of those who have submitted the motion, and of the leading men on the other side who oppose it. I do not require to name the two outstanding Canadians who support Russia. I do not know whether they are in the employ of Russia, though some believe they are.

When I compare the character, past record, influence, and service to God and country of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, with the character of these two men supporting the opposing campaign across Canada, then I can conceive of no better reason why I should support this motion.

My second reason is that since the last war members of this government have planned, worked, and campaigned for a permanent peace. I do not think that can be denied, and indeed it is quite evident throughout their speeches. The government want peace, and in seeking that permanent peace they consider the rearming of Germany one of the major safeguards.

My third reason for supporting this motion is the government's announced policy in favour of disarmament. Fourth, I believe in the efficacy of the rigid controls which have been inserted in the agreement with regard to the rearming of Germany. Germany cannot do just what she likes in this regard, and the minister has convinced me that the controls will be effective.

My fifth reason for supporting this motion is the difference between Germany east and west, or between West Germany and Russia, which amounts to very much the same thing. The last election held in West Germany was a free election. When did we ever have a free election in Russia since the revolution? There is one party in Russia controlled by one man, and anyone who dared stand up and find fault with their conduct of an election might not vote again. I believe there is far more to be hoped for from West Germany than we could ever possibly hope for from the east.

I would like the Secretary of State for External Affairs to answer one question when he rises to reply. If the United States, Great Britain and those supporting them had not stopped the communists in North Korea, what would have happened? Which country would have fallen next to the communists?

I have had some personal experience of communist tyranny through the arrival in Fort William of several families from Latvia and Estonia. One lady in particular is now serving in McKellar hospital as a nurses aide. Her first husband was a judge; her present husband is an outstanding lawyer who is now working in a camp, and he has made the statement that every time he uses an axe on a tree it is a blow for freedom. The other family lost everything, for they had to move out as the Russians moved in. Indeed, what was the use of being a judge in Latvia when the Russian government was in control?

There have been many fine speeches from the other side of the house, but the two speeches on this side which stood out in my mind and helped me come to a decision came from the hon. members for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) and Spadina (Mr. Croll). I know something of what the hon. member for Cartier went through. Indeed, I remember telling hon. members that he would be criticized by those who sent Fred Rose into this house, who afterward was the cause of his own dismissal.

When I think of Russia today I recall the statement by a very distinguished man who, in addressing a meeting at Fort William, said there would be a revolution in Russia that would overshadow the former revolution. It is well known that those who come from slave camps in Russia say that all that is now required is a spark to light the revolt. Why? Those people have no rights; they are half starved; they are tortured to death. Certainly they have not the opportunity to speak for themselves.

Look at what is happening in Korea, with new airfields rearmed up to the hilt. What would happen if they were now allowed to go south in Korea? The result would be that South Korea would not be there, that is all.

It has been said several times in the house, why rearm East Germany and not West Germany? As one hon. member said, we would give West Germany its place in the North Atlantic organization, but would not give them their freedom. If we admit them, we should give them everything the other nations have.

For these five reasons I must support the motion.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, the reasons we should support the present resolution have been, I was going to say, adequately but I would prefer to say brilliantly expressed already by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the hon. member for Prince Albert and others, and I have no intention of taking up the time of the house by attempting in a much less adequate way to repeat what has already been said. However, for a few minutes I should like to comment on some of the objections that have been raised to this resolution by some of the members of this house who have expressed their intention of voting against it.

As I have been able to gather the four reasons that have been given so far by those opposed to this resolution are, first, that many have deep personal convictions; second, that Russia might be irrevocably antagonized if the Paris arrangements were ratified; third, that Germany must not be rearmed as she is a potentially dangerous nation; and last, as one hon. member put it—I believe it was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre —the convention of the party of which he is a member had objected to it at a meeting last summer and had reaffirmed the objection a few days ago.

I should like to deal at some little length with each one of these points. First there is this matter of deep personal conviction. If a person is opposed to the ratification of these arrangements made in Paris on a personal basis, and if this opposition has been arrived at on a basis of reason, then nobody can quarrel with his position. Every one of us knows that one of the privileges we have in this house is that of arriving at our own conclusions after examining the facts. However, if anybody is basing his stand purely on emotion, without having thought the matter out, it is not a valid reason to say that he has a deep personal conviction. If the personal convictions are based on reasoning, that is all right; but if they are based on emotion, it is not.

As to the possibility of antagonizing Russia irrevocably, I am afraid I do not think this is a valid argument. From the things we have heard from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and from reading the debates in the British House of Commons and elsewhere, I think we may safely assume that Russia is undoubtedly armed to the teeth as it is, and that she has armed her satellites to the teeth. I do not think we are likely to antagonize her any further by rearming West Germany. We all know—and it has already been reiterated many times in this house—that you cannot negotiate and deal with people from weakness when the people with whom you are dealing have the morals and outlook of bandits. There is no use in trying to deal with people such as that when that is the attitude they have.

There are plenty of historical examples, and I shall mention one or two. If you go far enough back, to the twelfth or thirteenth century, you have the case of the famous Asiatic conqueror, Genghis Khan. Cities like Samarkand in central Asia had tried to treat with Genghis Khan. They offered him presents and tried to appease him. He took the presents, and of course he took the cities and the people were treated very badly, if one cares to go into the details of what happened.

We have, of course, a much more recent example of what happens when you are trying to deal with a country that is bent on world conquest—admittedly so—and is armed to the teeth. In 1939 I think we all remember that in numerous European countries—and, I am afraid, in many countries which are closer than that—people did everything they could to avoid war. Germany was appeased right and left, and we all remember the ultimate result. Germany accepted appeasement and took whatever she liked, until finally it was decided that she could go no further, and that there were some things worse than war.

It seems to me that those who have been objecting to the ratification of this agreement have been bringing out this old line of appeasement again. In fact it is virtually undisguised. Looking back, I can remember the 1930's when I was attending university and taking a course in political science. I think most of us who took the course in that period became greatly interested in socialist doctrines, and we used to have what were called "bull-sessions" over the matter. When I heard some of the arguments that have already been presented in this house opposing the ratification of these agreements, I had the strange sensation that many of us get occasionally of having heard this before, that strange "I have been here before" feeling. I looked back to the common room in the university which I attended, where I had heard almost exactly the same arguments, that we must not do anything to antagonize this person or that person. It is true they may be arming to the teeth and we are fearful of their intentions, but if we do anything to arm ourselves in order to protect ourselves or to form an alliance, all we are doing is antagonizing them and all we will do is bring war upon us.

When 1939 came we all said, "We will never think that way again; that kind of thinking has gone forever." But, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid it has not gone forever when we hear these same ideas expressed again. They say it is all right for your neighbour to arm to the teeth when he has the avowed intention of conquering you or setting forth on a plan of conquest, but it is wrong for you to do that because if you build up armaments it will antagonize him all the more.

Human thinking is sometimes a little difficult to change. I know people who are avowed socialists and who sincerely believe that war is a bad thing. We all believe that, Mr. Speaker. Nobody likes war. Those of us who have been through a war, have lost friends and relatives and have seen people killed, do not like it. But, as I say, the thinking of some people who belong to the socialist party—and I imagine there are others also—sometimes gets to the point where I have heard it referred to as atrophy of the mind. They do not like to change the basic thought pattern they have had for many years.

This type of people was clearly illustrated the other evening in the city of Montreal, when I was seeing this new film process called cinerama, a most interesting thing. The subject of this film was the reproduction of a section of one of the great operas, Aida. It was filmed at La Scala opera house in Milan. At the end of the film I overheard a conversation between two persons who were sitting behind me, and I was interested especially in the remark of one who said, "I never realized grand opera was as wonderful as that; but then, after all, I would not want to sit through one."

I think that incident illustrates the point I have in mind. It is difficult to change one's thought patterns. Once people get in their heads something which has been drilled into them at an early age, it is extremely difficult to get it out. As I suggested, that might apply to some people among the socialists, but I think it illustrates what I am saying.

Along the same line, we have already heard that it would be a dangerous thing if West Germany supplies us with 12 extra divisions, that the Soviets will just put 12 more divisions in Eastern Germany. I think that is a rather spurious argument, because General Gruenther, who is in charge of NATO defence, has probably fairly carefully worked out what forces he considers to be adequate for the defence of western Europe. Having arrived at that conclusion, he has decided that 12 divisions from West Germany would be adequate. Even considering what manpower the Soviet have or could produce, the armaments the Soviet could produce and so on, I do not believe it likely that Russia will increase the forces very much more than she has.

The third argument I should like to touch upon, and which is basically wrong, is that we should not rearm Germany because she is dangerous as a nation. I am afraid this point of view is the result of some rather false conclusions drawn from certain facts upon which I shall touch. Nations or cultural groups react differently when faced with different sets of circumstances. There are plenty of historical examples to illustrate this. However, in referring back to history you must be careful to choose examples that illustrate the point you want to illustrate. In this case we are trying to illustrate a point by referring to one group of people in the past—and we can learn from history—who have reacted very differently within a short space of time to a different set of circumstances.

Let us look at our own country, Canada, before 1837. In Upper Canada, and I presume in Lower Canada as well, people were anxious to have responsible government. At that time the governors we had from across the water and their friends, who were known as the family compact, did not look kindly upon responsible government. As a consequence active rebellion broke out. However, after Lord Durham came over and made his famous report people behaved quite differently. The other day the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) illustrated this point by saying that the Six Nations Indians had their own little NATO. I would not use that as an example, but I would like to use the Indians to illustrate this point.

The Indian tribes in western Canada and the western United States were basically the same people. True they were different tribes, but they moved back and forth. In the United States, as we all know, some trouble was experienced at the end of the last century because of the treatment of the Indians, whereas in Canada, where they were treated somewhat differently, we had no trouble at all or at least very minor trouble.

There are numerous other examples if you want to go far enough back into history. You could refer to the fact that about 1,000 years ago the emperor Charlemagne invaded the northern part of Italy. He treated the Lombard princes very kindly, and they thought this was a big joke. They murdered all his envoys. He came back and used the iron fist on them, and they reacted differently. On the other hand, when Charlemagne invaded Saxony he tried to be hardboiled. This did not succeed, so he started to be very pleasant and obtained good results. These examples show that the same people under different circumstances can behave differently.

To what does this all lead up? It leads up to the present problem of Germany. In 1919, after the first war, a different set of circumstances existed in Germany than those which existed in 1946. After the German empire was formed under the aegis of Prince Bismarck, conditions in Germany were very good. I was going to say that it was all beer and skittles, but perhaps sunshine and beer would be a better term. The people had a fine time.

In the first world war there had been no invasion of Germany, no damage in Germany. It is true that there were troops in Cologne, but apart from being deprived of certain of the necessities of life the Germans had not suffered severely. They looked back upon the Germany of 1914 and remembered the good times. They wanted to return to those conditions. They felt they were not defeated but had been betrayed by somebody in the government; and consequently they looked for a return to that way of life. Eventually, after a few weak governments, along came Hitler. The people were ripe for him and events followed from there on. There is no point in going over them because everyone in the house knows them as well as or better than I do.

After 1946 Germany was in a totally different state from that of 1916. Germany had been ravaged as no country had been ravaged since Carthage. The people had been physically and emotionally injured. They were looking for something different, because even before the war started there had been hard times. Their work had been going for guns and not for butter as the late and unlamented Hermann Goering used to say.

We have a totally different set of circumstances. After the first war the idea of Clemenceau and others was revenge. After world war II we felt that idea had not worked. The whole attitude of the western countries was to try to rehabilitate Germany. I feel it can be safely said that this policy has worked extremely well in Japan and gives every indication of working well in Germany.

For the reasons I have already stated, I do not feel we have to fear the German nation today. There is a different set of circumstances existing today from those which existed after the first war. The people have been treated differently. I cannot help but feel they will be good citizens of the North Atlantic community of nations and of the community of nations generally.

I should like to deal very briefly, Mr. Speaker, with the fourth objection set out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The same stand has been taken by a number of the members of the C.C.F. party. In order to avoid misunderstanding I should like to say at the outset, so I will not be accused later of taking this debate off the high level on which it has been, that I am not insinuating anything against any member of this house. I am not insinuating Russian sympathy or anything of that sort. When I specifically refer to the members of the group to my left I have no intention of insinuating any such thing in the remarks I am going to make. I have become acquainted with some members of that party since I have been here, and I have the greatest respect for them and for their integrity. I do not wish any misunderstanding.

I should like to refer, however, to the speech made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in the early stages of this debate. I quote from page 393 of Hansard for January 20, 1955, where the hon. member said:

> I also take this position because, as my leader pointed out this afternoon, it is the position of the movement to which 24 of us in the house have the honour to belong. As my leader pointed out, at our national convention in August 1954 a decision was taken against the rearming of western Germany at this time.
> Further, as my leader pointed out in his address this afternoon, the matter was under very serious consideration at a meeting of our national council this past week end. That meeting of course was held with the knowledge of the debate to be undertaken in the house this week; and the view of that council by majority vote was that we should oppose the rearmament of Western Germany at this time.

As we all know, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has opposed ratification of the Paris agreements.

While I have not heard any other members of the group to my left who have opposed ratification of these arrangements give the same reason that was offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I cannot help feeling that probably some who have not yet spoken and some who intend to speak will be objecting to the ratification of these arrangements, and that one of the reasons they will give for their objection will be the one offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I find this a strange reason, because the decision reached at the national convention of the C.C.F. party last August was made before the present arrangements were drawn up. I find it difficult to understand how that convention or meeting could form a conclusion when the arrangements had not been made upon which they were deciding. I find that strange indeed. And the hon. member mentioned that the executive council of this party meeting last week had objected to ratification. Yet according to the information given to us by the Secretary of State for External Affairs it was not known at that time. Again we have a case of making a decision without knowing what were the facts.

I should like to refer briefly to the attitude of the C.C.F. party, or a substantial part of it, since 1939. I would point out that their attitude in respect of resistance to aggression has been rather out of line with the Canadian point of view generally. It has proved to be unrealistic and, if I may say so, wrong.

First of all I would refer to Hansard for 1939, the second session, where at page 55 the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was setting out the views of his party concerning the declaration of the second world war. At that time he said:

> In view of these considerations, the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation believes that Canada's policy should be based first on the fundamental national interests of the Canadian people, as well as on their interest in the outcome of war. Canada should be prepared to defend her own shores, but her assistance overseas should be limited to economic aid and must not include conscription of manpower or the sending of any expeditionary force.

And again on the same page:

> No military participation overseas. Any attempt to send a force abroad would rob us of the manpower necessary for the defence of our shores and for home production, would gravely endanger national unity, would threaten our civil liberties and democratic institutions, and would ultimately lead to conscription.

And finally at page 57 the hon. member said:

> We believe, as I have said, that the sending of expeditionary forces is unnecessary and unwise.

Then to continue on from 1939 I would refer briefly to an editorial in this morning's Montreal Gazette, headed "Canada's Bevanly Host". I shall refer to only a short portion of it, in which reference is made to the policy of the C.C.F. since the close of the second world war. It states:

> In fact, varying degrees of opposition have appeared within the C.C.F. to nearly every step taken since the end of the second world war to resist communist expansion.
> When the Marshall plan was inaugurated, it was officially condemned by the Manitoba convention of the C.C.F. as being "framed to provide capitalists with markets, rather than to help the people of Europe".
> When the United States supported the Atlantic pact (out of which NATO has grown) the provincial convention of the C.C.F. in British Columbia passed a resolution opposing "any further expenditures on arms." After the Korean war broke out, the C.C.F. premier of Saskatchewan, Hon. T. C. Douglas, said that the United States was trying to use the United Nations to protect the interests of certain oil corporations, notably Standard Oil. Under such circumstances, the people of Saskatchewan were being called on "to send their sons to be slaughtered in foreign fields."

I have already referred to the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in which he referred to the decision of the C.C.F. national convention last August and of their national council about a week ago. If hon. members oppose this motion on grounds of their convictions, they are quite justified in doing so. I feel that many who have opposed it, some of whom I know better than others, have done so because of their convictions. But if, to help them in making up their minds, they are using some of the suggestions that have been put forward by that party in the past, then I would suggest that before they vote they should refer back to some of those decisions, made by either a part of or by the whole party, and carefully review what actually happened.

Sometimes party directives are issued and members feel obliged to follow them; but hon. members should see that those directives are based upon reality. I repeat that under no circumstances do I make personal reference to any member in the house. My brief history of the foreign policy of the C.C.F. is the history of a group of which hon. members sitting in the house form possibly only a small part.

Then there is another matter I should like to touch upon briefly, one that has not yet been mentioned in this debate, and to which in my opinion careful consideration should be given. I refer to the leadership Great Britain has given in the drawing up of these various arrangements. This is something that, as yet, has not been emphasized. I believe we all know that after the failure of EDC it was Anthony Eden—and I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs would confirm this—who was able to effect a rapprochement between Mr. Dulles and Mr. Mendes-France so they were prepared to compromise in order to draw up the present Paris arrangement.

This must have been a difficult task. Most of us are not personally familiar with the intricacies of French parliamentary life, but I think we have been able to gather that proceedings in the French parliament are quite different from those here. There are many parties and great rivalry among them. In the final ratification of these arrangements in the French parliament we saw the communists voting against it, along with the de Gaullists and the M.R.P., who had nothing in common with the communists but must have so aligned themselves for purposes of political strategy.

It is a great credit to Mr. Eden and to Mr. Mendes-France that these arrangements were drawn up in such a way as to be acceptable. We know Mr. Eden has effected a number of brilliant arrangements in the last year or so. We remember the Iranian oil dispute, a great source of world tension, which through the efforts of Mr. Eden was ironed out. Then there was the touchy and explosive situation at the Suez canal, also worked out successfully by Mr. Eden.

We know that shortly there is to be a meeting of commonwealth prime ministers in London. It would be well for us to watch and see what happens.

Sir Anthony Eden has been very successful in easing tension in the world. A great deal of account should be taken of the fact that England has shown a resurgence of leadership in these matters. I understand that India, Australia, New Zealand, Pakistan, Ceylon and Canada will be represented at the commonwealth conference. After discussing the matters that are to be dealt with at that conference—we do not yet know what they will be—if Sir Anthony Eden is able to repeat what he has done in the last year or so, it may well be that this commonwealth conference will affect the whole future of international relations.

As I mentioned earlier, it is true that we cannot treat or try to make arrangements to deal with Russia unless we are strong enough to do so, because she will not pay any attention to us unless we are strong. If we are strong enough it may be that the diplomacy of the commonwealth countries will ultimately bring about a real state of coexistence in the world. I am sure that it will lessen the danger of war "to a point", to coin a phrase, "of no return", and we shall not have to worry about wars in the future.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): It is not easy for me to resist the invitation of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) to become involved with him in a political debate, but the international situation is far too grave for me to take time to pursue a discussion with the hon. member tonight.

With very few exceptions the hon. members who have taken part in this important debate have set an exceptionally high tone, and I shall try to maintain that high level. The members of the press have reported objectively the discussions which have taken place in this parliament The Toronto Globe and Mail, in a comment on its editorial page this morning, said:

> Dissenting C.C.F. members, even though mistaken, have performed a useful service by expounding the minority view in the debate which began last Thursday.

The first suggestion I should like to make is to recommend that this inflammable question be referred to the United Nations. Let me remind the house that before the second world war ended we spent a good deal of time in making plans to ensure that never again would the world be plunged into a war. We set out a worth-while goal in the preamble to the charter of the United Nations:

> to practice tolerance and live together in peace with one another as good neighbors, and to unite our strength to maintain international peace and security,

And so forth. We have made provision to ask the security council to investigate any dispute or situation:

> . . . to see if its continuance is likely to endanger international peace and security. Such a dispute or situation may be brought to its attention by any member or, if it accepts in advance the obligations of specific settlement contained in the charter by any non-member.
> The council determines the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression. It makes recommendations or decides to take enforcement measures to maintain or restore international peace and security.

The situation in Formosa, as reported in tonight's paper, is very critical. In addition, solving the German question is so essential that this matter should be referred to the security council. If the security council is unable to deal satisfactorily with it, I suggest that Dr. Bertrand Russell, in his article in The Nation on December 18, 1954, makes suggestions which should receive consideration. Dr. Russell said:

> Mankind at the present time is faced by dangers to the whole species so great that the avoidance of them ought to be the common aim of all the powers. The facts are known to everybody who chooses to know them, but for reasons of propaganda they are not adequately emphasized on either side of the iron curtain. It is true that they have been stated in western countries but not in such a manner as to influence policy. They have been stated more clearly and forcibly in America than in any other country, but they do not seem to have made any impact upon the average congressman or the average American voter.

Further on Dr. Russell says:

There is, however, another alternative. It is that both sides should recognize, and should be known to recognize sincerely, that war has become futile. Neither side alone can be vigorous in urging the futility of war since to do so gives an impression of weakness. It is here that neutrals can, if they will, save both camps from destruction.

Neutrals have two advantages over the powers in either camp. The first advantage is that they can urge the destructiveness and futility of war without incurring the odium of seeming to advocate cowardly submission. The second advantage is that they can speak to governments on both sides without being thought to be actuated merely by bias.

Neutral governments, on the contrary, can speak in identical terms to both communist and non-communist powers, and can avoid the suspicion that they are concerned to promote the success of either side.

Dr. Russell suggests that India and Sweden might be two countries that could be persuaded to act as a neutral commission to try to find out the consequences of a third war on neutrals particularly. He suggests those two countries because Sweden has its natural association with the west and India is most anxious to ease east-west tensions. Dr. Russell suggests that on such a commission there should be military, naval and air experts, first class nuclear physicists, bacteriologists, economists and men of experience in international politics. I am convinced that a body such as that could draw up a report which would make the futility of a third world war undeniable. In conclusion he says:

The truth is so plain and simple that it seems as if governments must in time become aware of it: the communist and non-communist worlds can live together or die together. There is no other possibility. When both sides realize this, it may be hoped that they will choose to live rather than die.

Therefore I submit, Mr. Speaker, our first concern should be to try to get all sides to agree that the United Nations should be given a chance to negotiate to see if something could not be done.

The second part of my speech of course must deal with Germany. We have had a good deal of discussion about sovereign rights, about the privileges and responsibilities of the people in Germany and so on. We should clarify our thinking as to how far we can go in giving people the right to embark on programs to build up armaments and participate in the destruction of the entire world. However, I want to make it very clear that I feel Germany should be recognized as a country that has made a worth-while contribution to the world. The German people must be given the chance to develop in the future. We should remember our ideals as set forth by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill when they suggested that their countries seek no aggrandizement, territorially or otherwise. They desire to see no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned; they respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live, and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them. I am anxious that people in Germany should have their rights.

There has been a good deal said about the fact that Germany is divided into East Germany and West Germany. We seem to have lost sight of the fact that Germany has been divided into four sectors. There is a part now in Poland and a part in soviet Russia. According to the ideals that were set out in the Atlantic charter we must respect the rights of all peoples to choose the countries in which they want to live, and I think the German people in these four sectors must be given a chance to live together again as a united Germany, as soon as they are able to convince the rest of the world that there is no danger of a revived militarism plunging the world into war.

In this morning's Globe and Mail there were two articles on the editorial page which I think deserve mention. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Jones) referred to one paragraph in Dorothy Thompson's article. Another paragraph says:

The rearmament issue is tearing West Germany into vehemently opposing camps. Spearheaded by the social democrats and the trade unions, but supported by non-socialists, including outstanding members of the Protestant Evangelical church, a nation-wide campaign is under way to take the issue to the people. A 24-hour strike of Ruhr coal miners, though called for another reason, turned into an anti-rearmament demonstration. On January 29, the campaign will culminate in a huge mass meeting in the Pauls church in Frankfurt.

Speaking about Chancellor Adenauer:

The weakness of the chancellor's position is that he can offer no rational explanation of how Germany can be reunited once the step has been taken to create a German army in military alliance with NATO. Neither can the British, French or American foreign offices. In fact, Germans are coming to the alarmed conclusion that the "peace of the powers" (or coexistence) is envisaged as resting on a final four-power agreement to maintain and respect the existing status quo. They are vividly aware that the truces in Korea and Indo-China were won at the cost of dividing these two nations.

Then another paragraph:

> Can it continue? Is it conceivable that a German government and army can indefinitely commit the nation actually to defend the partition of the country? If, behind the scenes, the western foreign offices are preparing to accept permanent German division as the price for "stability and peace" would that not constitute "containment" of a rump Germany, with a German army actually collaborating to police the condition? If so, how much popular support would such an army have? And unless it commands popular confidence what good is any army?

George Bain, in his "Ottawa Letter" this morning said:

> After the first world war Germany was not allowed either,—

Referring to bombers and long range aircraft.

> —and only a very few German officers were permitted to take flying training. However, leading German aircraft firms as early as 1926 had for some time been producing planes in Russia, Switzerland and Sweden, and within the civilian firm Luft-Hansa, a training system had been set up.
> Germany after the first world war was not allowed tanks, submarines, heavy artillery, just as today it unconditionally guarantees not to manufacture such things as atomic, biological and chemical weapons and guided missiles.
> However, ways were found to get around the bans following the first world war. Krupps, for instance, had bought control of the Bofors arms factory in Sweden by 1925. Submarines were being produced by German-controlled firms in Holland and Spain, even in Turkey and Finland.

And again:

> In 1926, a three-nations commission reported that "Germany had never disarmed, had never had the intention of disarming, and for seven years had done everything in her power to deceive . . . the commission appointed to control her disarmament." Because the allied powers so desperately wanted to believe that Germany had been converted to peaceful ways, this report was buried.
> Today there is not only a desire to believe in Germany's peaceful intentions, but also a recognition that a rearmed Germany is necessary to the defence of western Europe.

I was interested in an article on "Versailles and London" by J. Alvarez del Vayo, the foreign editor of The Nation and I quote from the issue of October 23, 1954:

> The measures adopted, and to be adopted, to keep German rearmament under effective control are a constant theme in commentaries on the London conference. They cropped up in the debate which preceded the French parliament vote of confidence in Mendes-France. They are referred to repeatedly in the praise heaped upon the conference by statesmen and politicians.

And further on:

> Apparently no one doubts that the arms control agency to be set up as part of the Brussels treaty organization will be able to keep the massive armament output of the Ruhr within the limits agreed on.
> To anyone over 40 years old—and the principal authors of the London agreement were grown men by 1918—such optimism is incredible. The story of Germany's secret rearmament in violation of the Versailles treaty, of the complete collapse of the allied effort to halt the rebirth of German militarism, is a story not from history books, but of our own generation.

I think the situation is so critical that we should pay more attention to the suggestions which have been made by other members of this group, that the time factor is most important and Germany should have a longer time in which to demonstrate to herself and to the world that the nazi elements which were responsible for world war II are not going to be in control.

Like a number of hon. members of the house I was in Germany this summer. My wife and I had a most delightful stay. I had been there before, in 1926, and on both occasions I marvelled at the courtesies extended to people who had been their enemies such a short time before. Last summer again and again we inquired how a maniac like Hitler ever managed to get to a position in Germany where he could plunge their country and the world into war. Again and again the answer was, "But I was just a little man, there was nothing I could do." Sometimes the answer was, "If it had not been for forces outside Germany we would never have allowed him to go so far."

So I think we should give Germany a longer time to develop the democratic organizations that are being built up in that country, to demonstrate to themselves that they are capable of operating a democracy over a period of time. I should say that we did not meet any communists in Germany; there are not very many pro-communists to be found in West Germany, and I think it is fair to say that there is a very real fear of Russia. I should say something also which is not so well known, that there is a very real fear of the United States. But above all there is a very real fear of war.

Most of the people we saw did not seem to think either the United States or Russia would start a war in Germany or Europe, but they felt that some incident in Formosa or Indo-China might set a spark which would plunge the world into war; and they know from vivid experience what war will mean to them.

Before I leave Germany I might mention that in the air edition of the London Times of January 17 I found the details of the proposals made in a Moscow broadcast of a week ago. Unfortunately details of these proposals were not carried by such papers as the New York Times, or at least I did not see them. Here is what Moscow proposed a week ago:

1. Paris agreements lead to a grave complication of the whole situation in Europe.

2. Paris agreements can bring nothing good to Germany. They will finally involve the German federal republic in the adventurous plans of preparation of a new war, which always were and always will be alien to the interests of the peoples, including the interests of the German pepole.

3. Paris agreements will consolidate for many years the splitting of Germany and will become an obstacle to the peaceful restoration of the unity of Germany.

4. The ratification of the Paris agreements is incompatible witth the restoration of Germany as a united peace-loving state.

5. In the event of the ratification of the Paris agreements, the Bundestag will assume a grave responsibility for the continuation of the division of Germany as well as for the position of inferior rights in which the population of the German federal republic will be for many years.

6. If plans for a remilitarized West Germany are abandoned free elections can be had in 1955.

7. U.S.S.R. will come to an agreement on establishing appropriate international supervision of the holding of all-German elections.

8. The holding of free all-German elections and the restoration of the unity of Germany would create the necessary preliminary conditions for the conclusion of a peace treaty with Germany which would finally consolidate the independence, sovereignty and equality of rights of a united Germany.

It continues:

If, however, the Paris agreements are ratified, the "U.S.S.R. would take care not only of a further strengthening of its friendly relations with the German democratic republic—

This is East Germany, of course.

—but also of facilitating the strengthening of peace and security in Europe by the joint efforts of the peace-loving European states."

I am not suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that these proposals are made with complete sincerity and that they would be accepted without qualification, but according to the London Times they have created a great deal of confusion in West Germany.

The London Times of January 20 carries a report from its Bonn correspondent outlining the views of the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, a newspaper which is usually found to be in support of the government's foreign policy. This newspaper feels that the politically undemonstrative nature of the German people conceals "a deep division disturbing the nation's subconsciousness."

The writer points out that the official western view of the statement is that it is a victory for the policy of strength, that the Russians have made concessions and will make even more if the same policy is pursued. But the danger, when the west eventually comes to negotiate with the Russians, seemed to be that the question on the agenda will not be German reunification but the conditions for peaceful coexistence without the irritant of a united Germany. The eastern zone would then stand no chance of being freed.

I would next like to deal with the H-bomb. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) referred to this factor the other night. I have the greatest respect for the hon. gentleman personally and also for his very distinguished war record, but I believe the conclusion he reached is unsound. The hon. member intimated that the H-bomb probably would not be used because it was so dreadful and because both sides possessed it. I am quite sure that if the hon. member was the officer in charge the H-bomb would not be used; but unfortunately he is not.

In the U.S. News and World Report of December 31, 1954, there appeared a very alarming article by Air Marshal Sir John Slessor, former chief of the British air staff. It is headed "H-bomb Will be Used if Big War Comes." The writer claims that the weapon of mass destruction would certainly be used in any great war between major powers and he quotes Mr. Attlee, British opposition leader, as stating:

"The fact is that once there is war, absolute war, in the modern age, and if the existence of a nation is at stake, any weapon will be used in the last resort.

The writer then goes on:

When is the last resort? It is beyond doubt that ultimately the bomb would be used—no nation would admit defeat with this terrible weapon of retaliation lying unused in its armory. Are we to wait to use it as a rat's dying bite? Are we to hold back and watch our enemy overrun Europe and set up his V-weapon sites again on the channel coast, and do nothing to stop him except with weapons of his own choosing . . .

I would like to refer hon. members to a speech by Sir Winston Churchill as reported in British Hansard of July 29. Hon. members may recall that Sir Winston was reminded by members of the Labour party of his famous statement that he did not become prime minister to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire. Mr. Attlee said that if the Prime Minister were in opposition he would describe developments in Egypt as "scuttle." Captain Waterhouse, one of the Conservative rebels, said it was not a sell-out but a give-away. Sir Winston rose to reply as follows:

I have not in the slightest degree concealed in public speech how much I regretted the course of events in Egypt. But I had not held my mind closed to the tremendous changes that have taken place in the whole strategic position in the world which make the thoughts, which were well founded and well knit together a year ago, utterly obsolete, and which have changed the opinions of every competent soldier that I have been able to meet.

Merely to try to imagine in outline the first few weeks of a war under conditions about which we did not know when this session commenced, and about which we had not been told—merely to portray that picture and submit it to the house would, I am sure, convince hon. gentlemen of the obsolescence of the base and of the sense of proportion which is vitally needed at the present time, not only in military dispositions but in all our attempts to establish human relationships between nation and nation.

In the Manchester Guardian of December 21, 1954 I read the following:

"We are trying to keep an element of sanity in a nightmare world," one senior officer said.

He was speaking of allied planning for the possibility of a war with hydrogen bombs. His conclusion was that the outcome of war would probably be settled within the first 20 to 30 days, and for Britain perhaps within the first 20 or 30 hours.

In his judgment, that greatly raised the deterrent value of the American and British long-range bombing forces. . . .

There was a time when it was thought that the superiority of air power in the western countries would give us an advantage, but Joseph and Stewart Alsop, writing in the New York Herald Tribune of August 20, 1954 said:

The pentagon intelligence analysts have reluctantly concluded that the Soviet union is already producing a jet engine about twice as powerful as any yet produced in the United States. This is the biggest shock, the bitterest pill in a development that was generally shocking and unexpected. Until a few months ago, the official forecasters were convinced that the Soviet aircraft industry would need at least two years more to turn out planes comparable to our B47 and B52. But now such planes are already in the air.

To find the Soviet strategic air development two years ahead of schedule was unpleasant enough in itself. It was even more unpalatable to find that this remarkable Soviet jump forward depended upon, and in fact probably resulted from, the successful design of a jet engine greatly surpassing any jet engine as yet designed in the west.

Those who maintained that the west had superiority in aircraft and atom and hydrogen bombs have had trouble in proving their claims. The opinion I have been expressing about the inevitability of the hydrogen bomb being used has been confirmed by Viscount Montgomery. In his "Ottawa Letter" in Saturday Night of December 18, 1954, Mr. Stevenson quoted him as follows:

Speaking not long ago at the Royal United Services Institution in London. Lord Montgomery said: "I want to make it absolutely clear that we at SHAPE (the headquarters of the NATO forces) are basing all our operational planning on using atomic and thermonuclear weapons in our defence. It is no longer a question of 'they may be used'. It is very definitely 'they will be used—if we are attacked'. We could not match the strength that could be brought against us, unless we used nuclear weapons. We have reached the point of no return, as regards the use of atomic and thermonuclear weapons in a hot war."

In another copy of The Nation I ran across an article by Elizabeth Weideman on "The H-Bomb's First Victims". An appeal was sent to the Y.W.C.A.'s all over the world by a distinguished Christian Japanese woman, Mrs. Eumura. Her letter is written in restrained language. Along with her letter is given some information with regard to the facts of the H-bomb:

In the past three years there have been reported several cases of pitiful deaths of school children who as babies survived Hiroshima or Nagasaki seemingly unharmed. These children looked quite normal until they fell ill six or seven years after that day, their bodies giving way to the destructive operation that had been secretly working within them. So far, nothing can save those in whom the symptoms of the "atomic disease" manifest themselves, and they die after indescribable months of agony. Grown-ups are no exception to this liability . . .

Then there is a description of the sailor who lost his life as a result of the explosion of the H-bomb in Bikini. In the New York Herald of January 7 I saw a note "Japan accepts H-bomb offer", and there is a picture of——U.S.A. ambassador J. A. Allison shaking hands with Japanese foreign minister after Japan agreed to accept a $2 million payment from U.S.A. for damage claimed by Japan caused by an American H-bomb test at Bikini last March.

When one considers that this fishing boat was 80 miles away from where the explosion occurred, and that the United States has paid $2 million for the damage caused at that distance, it gives one some idea of the implications if we insist upon using H-bombs in a third world war. I think probably I should use the word "last" world war with "last" in quotation marks, as there will not be a fourth world war.

The last point I plan to develop is what I call an appeal to reason and I am quoting some well known people. In the Leader-Post, Regina, Saskatchewan, January 3, 1955 on the front page I read the following:

Pope Urges Coexistence on Basis of Bethlehem
Dispatch from Vatican City—

Pope Pius today published a solemn appeal for the peaceful coexistence of all nations on the basis of "the principles of Bethlehem".

The appeal was contained in a Christmas message to the world, which the pontiff was too ill to complete in time for Christmas and which he was still too weak today to broadcast himself.

In apparent criticism of the recent Paris pacts the pontiff said the accords no longer looked toward extensive European unification. In the past, he had expressed approval of the European defence community.

Then I go back to the speech of Sir Winston Churchill in the House of Commons in England on May 11, 1953, when he made some statements I think we should never forget. He said:

I do not believe that the immense problem of reconciling the security of Russia with the freedom and safety of western Europe is insoluble.

Then he quoted his telegram which he sent Stalin on April 29, 1945. If it was a worthwhile telegram to send in 1945, I submit that it is a worth-while sentiment to express today. Sir Winston said in his telegram:

There is not much comfort in looking into a future where you and the countries you dominate, plus the communist parties in many other states, are all drawn up on one side, and those who rally to the English-speaking nations and their associates or dominions are on the other. It is quite obvious that their quarrel would tear the world to pieces, and that all of us leading men on either side who had anything to do with that would be shamed before history. Even embarking on a long period of suspicions, of abuses and counterabuse, and of opposing policies would be a disaster hampering the great developments of world prosperity for the masses which are attainable only by our trinity. . .

Then he said:

I must make it plain that, in spite of all the uncertainties and confusion in which world affairs are plunged, I believe that a conference on the highest level should take place between the leading powers without long delay.

I might say that a well known correspondent in London informed me that Sir Winston, with a view to what the future will say of him, would prefer to be remembered as the man who saved the peace rather than in connection with the extremely important role he played during the second world war. But apparently he has not been encouraged to have a top-level conference. Then I should like to quote a well known American, George F. Kennan, former ambassador to the Soviet union. McCarthy has never suggested that Ambassador Kennan had any communist tendencies. He said:

As many of you already know, I have never seen any evidence that the Soviet leaders have at any time since world war II (or before, for that matter) desired a general war between the Soviet union and the major capitalist powers, or looked to such a war as a likely means of achieving their objectives.

I still have one other, a well known international figure, who spoke as follows:

If the nations of the world engage in a third world war, civilization would be destroyed, external affairs minister Pearson warned Sunday. . . Mr. Pearson said that "horrible devastation" would be brought about by the new atomic and chemical weapons devised by men.

"Should we ever get into world war III, there probably won't be more than a handful of people left", Mr. Pearson said.

He referred to the hydrogen bomb explosion in the Pacific and said he was glad that the public was "now becoming acquainted with the fantastic power of the weapon." "That one bomb in the Pacific was more devastating than all the bombs dropped on Germany and Italy during the last war."

Then he said:

"But we will never defeat communism unless we understand it. We must have faith and a positive approach. We have to confront communism with something stronger and more dynamic. . ."

"So often in the international field today, problems are not all black and white. They are often in terms of grey, and it is hard to find what is right and what is wrong."

I think the minister never uttered truer words than those, that things are not all black and white, that we cannot defeat communism unless we understand it. I suggest that if someone could devise a formula so that within the next 24 hours every communist in the world could be killed, our problems would not be solved. We really would be in trouble then, if there were no more communists left for us to attack.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the critical international situation has been created by men and women. It can be solved by men and women. I suggest that this house reject the motion which is before it and refer the question to the United Nations, an organization that we have helped to build, in the hope that this organization might be able to bring the dispute to a satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): I shall take a very few minutes in this debate, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member who spoke before me and I entirely disagree on this matter. Because the people at home feel so strongly on the question of rearming Germany, I rise in my place for a very few moments to put their thoughts on the record.

I have given many weeks of thought to what my stand would be when the time came to vote on this question. I have argued in my mind both for rearmament and against it, hoping that out of some personal experience in this house, with years of debate in print in my office and the speeches of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to which to refer, some firm basis for an established opinion could be found.

I listened with profound respect on January 20 to the speech delivered by the minister, and I was particularly interested when he said that the democratic nations in and out of NATO seek to institute a search for effective control of thermonuclear weapons, not for warfare but for welfare. He said that agreement for effective disarmament was the goal of all those nations which comprise NATO and that for years the Canadian government had taken an active part—he could have said a leading part—in searching for such an agreement.

The minister's second point was built around the fact, acknowledged by all who welcome a permanent peace, that you can only deter aggression by strength. The improvement of relations amongst the friendly countries, the removal of the causes of war and the development of the international community, was a third area explored by the minister. Whether we forward these valiant ideas by bringing into being a rearmed Germany, though it may be under temporary control, is problematical. If we could rearm that country and guarantee to our people that this would be a permanent solution to a problem that has faced us in two wars, then we would be on sound ground in any personal action we take in voting on this motion.

Hon. members will recall that not too long ago we voted whether we should allow Kurt Meyer to return to Germany. I believe I was the only one on this side of the house who voted against his return at that time. I did it not for political advantage, not to create in the minds of the people of Canada the thought that here was a Liberal member who was against Germany, but I voted as I did because it was my opinion that concrete evidence was available that former senior nazi officials were coming to the forefront in German military matters.

If you need further evidence of that fact, press reports of Meyer's reception and consequent generous treatment in his country are proof enough. Read the headlines of the European papers and prove for yourself that the staff of any new German army will be former associates, personal or military, of the nazi regime.

It has been said many times in this debate that we can rely on Herr Adenauer to keep control of former military leaders in Germany. Perhaps he can. He is a great but elderly man, and who comes after him? Who will be there five years from now? No guarantees can be given.

I am one who believes that eventually we will fight communism in battle, communism headed by either Moscow or Peking. Indo-China, Korea, Malaya, Costa Rica and Guatemala are all a pattern in an encircling movement that will force a war to the death. It may not come in my time or yours, but the Lenin formula of world domination is not too far off schedule, and certainly is not too far off course. I hold the opinion also that the war will not be an atomic war as we understand it. Complete destruction of the world could never be read into the words of Lenin.

If that war comes, or even seriously threatens, we in Canada will play a major role. There will be no choice of who will serve and who will stay at home. Every young Canadian, male and female, will fight that war. The fathers and mothers will fight it at home, too. There will be no static position, no trenches, no decimation of European countries and peace at home. Burnaby and Oshawa, Ottawa and Halifax, Yellowknife and Richmond, will each share in an ever-moving front line. The recent warning from General Ridgway to his President proves this possibility. He said that a reduction in the size of United States ground forces in Europe, a policy already decided upon, would cause a three-months gap in reinforcements, reinforcements to face a communist army now in being of 75 satellite divisions, over 2,500 planes, thousands of pieces of artillery both atomic and basic, and a Russian fighting force that is beyond civilian realization.

In the event of war, what would be the Canadian manpower position? As I have said, every young man and woman would be subject to immediate draft. Perhaps millions would die. Certainly Canada's casualty rate in two other wars would be fractional compared to this terrible holocaust.

I have faced up to this crisis with what I hope is mature and complete understanding. Many arguments present themselves to me and today I wish I could, in all sincerity, vote against this motion. We are voting, however, not only on what is to happen now but on what might happen to our children and Canadian generations yet unborn. I vote in support because I think there is a chance, a good chance, of delaying war for a generation. It is a far better thing that we do if we rearm a country in an effort to hold that country as our friend. If we refuse to rearm Germany, in time we create a physical enemy with only one country to which to turn, Russia. There can be no geographical neutrality in a great country surrounded by acquaintances and no military friends.

I look to the day when East Germans will join with their blood brothers in the west to bring back into being a great friend of the democracies. We perform no service to this hope by refusing to West Germany its rightful place in NATO. The defeat of this motion would mean that the western European peace alliance is dead, perhaps worse than that. I believe the defeat of the European defence community by France, and an adverse vote on this motion, would surely prove to the German people that their future does not lie with the west.

Unhappily perhaps, but with the honest opinion that I aid my country in its fight for peace, if only a temporary peace, I support this motion. The knowledge that we may face some type of aggressive Germany in the future must be outweighed by the fact we might produce a formula for world peace and understanding. This thought counterbalances any fear of the results that may come from a mistake now. If the decision of this house defends Canada against another world war in the immediate years ahead, we will have fulfilled our responsibility to those young people who attend the schools throughout Canada.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): The previous speaker has shown, Mr. Speaker, how seriously the members of this house have taken this problem, and how deep has been their study. I am aware of the conviction with which many of them have spoken. It is possible that many of us differ. We ask that our convictions be treated as having arisen from equally great concern about the future of Canada and of the rest of the world.

Three months ago Canada's representatives signed the protocol admitting the Federal Republic of Germany into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. It was evident even at that time that there were many serious doubts in the minds of many people, in all NATO countries, as to the wisdom of that action. It was surprising to note that the Canadian government did not consider the opinion of the people of Canada of sufficient importance to call parliament before this time to find out what the people thought and what their representatives would say with regard to the protocol.

Be that as it may, the government accepts that responsibility. But it has this advantage, that many events have taken place since the fateful October 23, 1954, which I believe have confirmed rather than diminished these doubts and misgivings. The French assembly, when called upon to ratify this agreement, rejected it on the first vote. Later they reversed their decision, but quite evidently they were under pressure. The British parliament, the cradle of democracy, adopted it with over 55 per cent of the members abstaining. It was a silent protest, but it was a protest. It was a sign that there were grave misgivings.

I think it is proof that our democracy is in a healthy condition when members register their objections, even against an overwhelming majority, and are free to express their convictions. I believe it would be wrong for this parliament to pass this ratification unanimously when it is so evident that many sincere, thoughtful and patriotic Canadians are opposed to it. And I do not include the communists in our land, who are the agents of Russia and who would use the privileges of democracy in this land to destroy freedom here. For them I have only the deepest contempt. I will not allow them to influence my thinking.

I want to pay tribute to the leader of this group, and to other men in high ranking positions in this group, who informed the house of their honest convictions, honestly arrived at, in support of the resolution. At no time was any effort made to influence other members, nor did the other members try to influence their leader to change his mind. The vote of our group is the vote of each member, speaking from his own convictions. I am proud of our leadership, and more convinced than ever that such leadership contains within it the essence of democracy, the essence of freedom.

There is every evidence that speakers in all parts of the house have very serious doubts, and that those doubts are shared by many other people.

I intend to vote against the motion because I believe it is wrong, and that it is premature. I believe it has within it an inherent danger to the western world. I intend to vote against it because I believe it is being forced upon a reluctant people. Evidence from all parts of the country shows that the rank and file of the German people are not in favour of restoring armaments to Germany, if it is to come under nazi leadership.

If this protocol is to be successful it requires confidence. I doubt whether it will give any real strength to the western powers until it has that confidence. I believe it is possible that the implementation of this protocol may bring war closer to us, not put it farther away, because it does not contain the safeguards which I believe are necessary.

If nuclear arms of war come to this earth because man refuses to live in brotherhood, then it will be divine retribution; man can destroy himself by his own stupidity.

I want here to reaffirm my faith in the rank and file of the German people. They are capable; throughout the world they have shown themselves to be capable of great achievements, of making great contributions to the betterment of mankind. But I have only the greatest misgivings concerning them when they are dominated by a military dictatorship. We of the western world find it difficult to understand how an army could possibly superimpose its will upon the state.

But those of us who have studied German militarism and nazism know that this does happen. Those who are in power look down upon the democratic processes. They consider themselves supreme.

The rank and file of the German people fear and detest nazism. They oppose the rearmament offered them today. This is where I think the great danger comes in. I do not know whether it is part of the calculated risk about which we hear so much. Has a calculation been made of the possibility that, once that German machine is again in power with 12 divisions, once these people are rearmed under nazi leadership, it may not be possible to trust them? All Germany wants a reunited Germany. All Germany would like East Germany to be united with the west. Might not the offer be made to a nazi West Germany that Germany could be united if they would only break with the west? And if that is a possibility we should certainly study it with great care. In such event, not only would we be opposed by Russia in time of war, but also by a Russia joined with a powerful nazi machine which we ourselves had helped to recreate.

History reveals that the character of people living in certain environments produces predictable results and trends. Nazi Germany is an entirely different nation from a free and democratic Germany. The German people, brought up under a democracy, and brought into an economic alliance with the western world, which has learned the meaning of true democracy, could be a great ally. But we do not know what a nazi Germany would do. No one knows what they would do. Give Germany democracy, real co-operation and time to build a true Germany, time to cleanse itself of nazism, and we will have hope. Some day in the not too distant future this could be achieved. At that time a rearming of Germany could be tried with some hope of success.

Had article 2 of NATO been properly implemented we might have had such a Germany today. The people of that country would have had a chance to throw out nazism. The teachings of Hitler remain too deeply rooted for us to hope that this change could be brought about in such a short time. If there were evidence to show that nazism had gone, then there might be some justification for taking a calculated risk. But instead of evidence that nazism is gone, what do we find? We find Kurt Meyer welcomed home. We find Adolf Galland, chief inspector of the luftwaffe fighting command, returning to Germany from Argentina. We have Frau Schlitter making a statement in London showing the tragic reality that the nazi thinking is not dead. Hitler's militarism can never be accepted in faith by the western world. That record can never be forgotten. That black page in the history of man is written.

We have not done our part to help build the real Germany, the democratic Germany. Canada must take her blame along with the rest. We must reap today the harvest of that failure. There is to be a new 500,000-man army under Adenauer, with its generals pledged to NATO. That is a fait accompli. The pact has been signed. The evidence that the majority here are with it is complete. We can only hope that there may be some force live enough and great enough to hold it within control.

The trouble is with that army of half a million men there may be a few staff members under Adenauer who are denazified and who believe in NATO, but who is going to officer that army, who are the staffs going to be, from the lieutenant colonels and colonels down to the majors, the non-commissioned officers and the ranks? Who is to be enlisted from the ranks of the German people? Therein lies the greatest danger in our control over Germany today. Reports confirm one or two things. One, that there is a great hope amongst all the German people that ultimate unification will take place and they will be united with their brothers in East Germany.

The other great thing is the great mistrust of the rank and file of the German people of nazi regimentation. I refuse to support a nazi German army forced upon a reluctant German people who know the real nazis. Give them time. Give the world time to appreciate the consequences of refusing to live together, to realize that war has never settled anything, that mass destruction can be the punishment for refusing to live in human brotherhood.

Mr. Harrison: In view of the lateness of the hour would you call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Harris: Before we do that, would it be possible to continue a little longer tonight? I am informed that there are a number who would like to take part in the debate, and we had quite sincerely hoped that we could conclude by tomorrow afternoon. While I would not want to inconvenience the hon. member for Meadow Lake, if it is possible for the hon. member to agree we might complete at least one more speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreeable to the house?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be fairly brief. In any case I think we can accommodate the minister and the house. My reason for speaking in the debate is the rather remarkable campaign that has been put on by our communist friends and such agencies as the peace congress prior to this debate in the hope, I suppose, of getting us to vote no on the admission of Germany to the western alliance.

I have been rather surprised—well, perhaps I should not be—at some of the, shall we say, support that has been gained in the ranks of the C.C.F. At the outset I should like to compliment the leader of that group on his courage, in face of the uprising he has had in his ranks.

Mr. Gillis: Plain common sense, that is all.

Mr. Harrison: You cannot condemn a whole organization if a part of it goes astray. You do not shoot a man just because he has gangrene in his leg, but there is occasion to cut the leg off if the whole body is to be saved. I think, though, this is a very good thing for Canada. Certainly, because of the speeches we have heard from that group and by the vote that will be taken we shall be able to separate the sheep from the goats, and possibly with the goats we shall have to put those who fail to vote; because I heard one remarkable speech from that side indicating that everybody should vote against the rearming of Germany. After a 30-minute speech the hon. member sat down, but before he did so he said he was not going to vote along the lines he suggested, and in fact he was not going to vote at all. The only thing that told me was that he did not have the courage of his convictions. It was a proposition of do as I say, but not as I do.

From time to time many words have come out from Moscow. We have had those echoed by the C.C.F. members of the legislature in Saskatchewan, who have always supported the ideas that have come from that country but without taking the alternative in any case. These things make one wonder.

In this debate these gentlemen who have indicated that they are not going to support their leader have taken one side of the story only. I have not heard any part of the other side. They have not discussed the alternative.

I have no objection to a man looking at both sides. He comes to his honest opinion; he decides which is which, and that is all right. But these gentlemen have discussed the terrible things that might happen if we allow those 12 divisions to be established in Germany. Well, they might have mentioned the other 250 divisions that are in existence in Russia and her satellites. In East Germany we have 180,000 so-called police, equipped with some 600 tanks, 250 mobile guns and 1,700 pieces of artillery. Well, that is some police force.

As the minister told us, there was no rearming whatsoever in Western Germany in 1948. There was not even a soldier there. But that was when the rearming of East Germany took place. In view of our experience with Germany, you might think there is cause for serious thought. The minister has told us of the safeguards we have there. But with the 250 divisions and this East German police force and another 400,000 Soviet troops in that country, what are the safeguards in that case? Do we hear anything about those? Not at all.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we have had calls on members of this house. I have had telephone calls from some of these people, and I told them they had access to my office, that I was quite willing to see them and hear what they had to say. One delegation was supposed to meet me in the morning, but they failed to arrive. They telephoned me in the afternoon and said they were sorry, that there was some misunderstanding and they could not see me. But I did have a one-man delegation call on me. He was a gentleman from my own riding. This gentleman had been the communist candidate in the last election. He is quite forthright about what he wants; he always has been. I have no disagreement with that. What he wants here is a Soviet government. He is quite willing for Russia to come here and take over.

We have no communist members as such in this house, but when one reads the speeches that we have heard from some hon. members of the group across the way who are showing signs of dissent with their leader, it indicates that there has at least been some acquiescence in what has been proposed by the Soviet union, and that the voice of Moscow has not been unheard in this house.

Mr. Winch: How low can you sink?

Mr. Harrison: You made your speech. If I may comment on some of the speeches I have heard, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) said that he had received letters from people of all opinions. I have had letters from all kinds of people, but they are all of one opinion. I think they all came indirectly from the same place, the Canadian peace congress. They all took the same line we have heard from these hon. gentlemen. No alternatives are discussed. In view of this I certainly compliment the other hon. members of that party and its leader in particular —I have great respect for him—for their stand in the face of that kind of opposition.

I think on the whole this debate has been most valuable for the people of Canada. As I have said, it is written that by their fruits ye shall know them. In this case it will be—

Mr. Campbell: A little longer and you will turn the whole house against it.

Mr. Harrison: If I have the hon. member with me then I am on the wrong track. By their fruits ye shall know them; but I think in this case we should say, "by their speeches and by their votes or lack of votes."

On motion of Mr. Fleming the debate was adjourned.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 25, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—INCOME TAX APPEAL NO. 227

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on yesterday's order paper standing in my name there was a question, the pertinent part of which read as follows:

Has the appellant in income tax appeal board case No. 227—

I shall skip the unnecessary wording—

—at any time had any contracts with the federal government, or any department or agency thereof?

My question of privilege relates to the fact that, as I see it, the answer is hardly adequate. The answer as found on page 451 of yesterday's Hansard says, in part:

...the minister who was a party to the proceedings had a check made as to whether at any time since the appellant company purchased the property referred to in the judgment, the federal government had awarded any contract of any kind to the appellant company or to its subsidiary referred to in the judgment.

As Your Honour will notice, I asked whether there had been any contracts awarded to this company at any time. The answer given is that there have not been any since the time the property referred to in the judgment was purchased. Obviously this leaves an inference which can be drawn one way or another as to what happened prior to the time that property was purchased.

Then further, on my question of privilege, I would like to point out that the judgment referred to indicated that this property, up to that time, had not been purchased at all. It had only been leased with the option of purchase. That makes the phrase "since the time the property was purchased" meaningless.

In the light of these facts I would hope that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) might consider bringing down a more complete answer to my question.

INCOME TAX

REPLY BY PREMIER OF QUEBEC TO LETTER OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. W. G. Weir (Parliamentary Assistant to the Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) I lay on the table two copies in English and in French of a letter dated January 19, 1955, from the premier of Quebec to the Prime Minister concerning federal-provincial fiscal relations.

WITHDRAWAL OF HOTEL PROPERTIES FROM RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) I beg to table, under the provisions of section 18 (2) of the Canadian National Railways Act, chapter 40, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, a copy of order in council P.C. 1955-54, dated January 13, 1955, withdrawing from entrustment to the Canadian National Railways the Pictou lodge and Minaki lodge properties.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

LONDON, ONTARIO, CENTENNIAL—PRESENTATION TO MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Would he accept from me a dollar's worth of wooden nickels celebrating the city of London's centennial this year.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to do so. But I should point out that, from my knowledge of western Ontario, London is worth more than wooden nickels.

Mr. Fulton: How much is a dollar worth?

Mr. Harris: More than was said the other day.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this question is somewhat early, but I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he can give the house any intimation as to when we may expect the budget.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Some time during this session.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FORMOSA—STATEMENT ON PRESENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I understand him to say that he would make a statement on the situation today with respect to Formosa. In view of the anxiety that is felt by many people in this country regarding the statements of policy made yesterday by the President of the United States, can the minister tell us whether the United States has been informed that Canada's policy remains as it was, and that we are not entangled in any of these Formosan adventures?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in reply to what my hon. friend has said, and also in reply to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), I shall make a statement on this matter now, as follows:

The President of the United States yesterday sent to congress an important message dealing with the situation in the Formosa straits. The President's proposals in this message are, of course, a matter of United States policy. The United States has particular commitments of its own in this area. These, and the effect of the President's message on them, will now be under consideration by congress and it would not, of course, be appropriate for me, or for any member of this government, to comment on this aspect of the matter.

Although we are not involved in United States commitments in this area, we are of course deeply concerned over the dangerous situation existing there and we, with other free governments, are anxious that steps should be taken to bring to an end the fighting which has now been taking place for some time along the China coast.

[Mr. Harris.]

In this message the President of the United States referred to the possibility of action by the United Nations to bring about a cease-fire. The United Nations has, in Indonesia, Palestine and in other parts of the world, been successful in bringing to an end fighting which might have had dangerous consequences, and if it could achieve similar results in this case it would be a cause, I am sure, of great satisfaction to us all.

If the question is raised in the United Nations—and there are reports that it will soon be raised—this would presumably take place in the security council of which Canada is not at present a member. However, we are being kept informed of developments in regard to the possibility of such a reference, and we are watching the matter with great interest and some concern. Incidentally, an essential party to any cease-fire of this kind would be the communist government of China, which, though a non-member of the United Nations, would have to be invited, I assume, to participate in the security council deliberations if they were to have any chance of success. Whether this particular government would accept such an invitation is another matter.

While it is not proper for me to comment on United States policy in this matter which is now being considered by congress, I think I can say that any move or proposal within the United Nations or through diplomatic channels which could serve to achieve the purpose as stated in the President's message "to improve the prospects of peace in the area" will be warmly welcomed by the parliament and by the people of this country.

Before the Korean armistice I expressed on more than one occasion in this house the view of the Canadian government that Formosa should be neutralized as far as possible while hostilities continued in Korea. We thought then, and we think now, that the final disposition of Formosa should be a subject to be discussed at a conference on Far Eastern problems which at that time we thought might be held after the cessation of fighting in Korea. That was the view adopted by the political committee of the United Nations general assembly on January 13, 1951. Despite developments since then, it remains the view of the government that the final disposition of Formosa should be dealt with by international negotiation, at a conference, if you like, on Far Eastern problems, if one could be held. Certainly, in any decision regarding the future of Formosa the wishes of the people there, which are often forgotten in discussions of this matter, should be a primary consideration. Pending such a decision I think that a strong case can be made for the neutralization of Formosa both in order to prevent any assault upon it by communist forces and also so that it will not be used as a base for invasion of the mainland.

Mr. Coldwell: The President did not say that.

Mr. Pearson: In this area of tension and danger a distinction can validly be made between the position of Formosa and the Pescadores and the islands off the China coast now in nationalist hands. The latter are indisputably part of the territory of China; the former, Formosa and the Pescadores, which were Japanese colonies for fifty years prior to 1945 and had had a checkered history before that, are not. I suggest therefore that the considerations which recommend the neutralization of Formosa and the Pescadores do not necessarily apply to the coastal islands so close to the mainland and a hundred miles or so away from Formosa. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I welcome that part of the President's message which looks to the redeployment of the nationalist forces which are now in these islands. "Some of these forces", the President's message states, "are scattered throughout smaller off-shore islands as a result of historical rather than military reasons directly related to defending Formosa."

My understanding of the basis of a truce or cease-fire is that neither the nationalists, the government of China which we recognize, nor the communists need be asked to give up their claims on the territory now held by the other side. What they would be asked to give up of course is the use of military means to achieve their aspirations. In other words, negotiations for a cease-fire need not involve any question of the final disposition of the territory in dispute; for in our view this is a suitable matter for international negotiation at a later date through the United Nations or otherwise.

I am sure this house will particularly welcome the closing paragraph of the President's message which is as follows:

> Our purpose is peace. That cause will be served if we demonstrate our unity and our determination. In all that we do we shall remain faithful to our obligations as a member of the United Nations to be ready to settle our international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask a supplementary question? Would the neutralization of Formosa in the manner indicated by the minister lead to the immediate seating of the people's government, the communist government of China, in the United Nations? Would that not be the necessary consequence?

Mr. Pearson: No; as I understand it, that would not be the necessary consequence to the neutralization of the islands.

Mr. MacInnis: May I ask a supplementary question? My question is in reference to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in regard to the invitation of communist China to any cease-fire conference that would be held. Would not the acceptance of an invitation to such a conference by communist China be facilitated if we recognized China as the de facto government of that part of China of which it is the de facto government? Would it not be a good thing if a start was made in that direction by this government?

Mr. Pearson: That is another question on which I would not like to express an opinion at this time.

Mr. Green: May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a further question? Does the Canadian government take the stand, or does it not, that Formosa is in the first line of defence for Canada's west coast?

Mr. Pearson: That also is another question dealing with far-reaching matters of strategy on which I would hesitate to express an opinion at this moment.

ATOMIC ENERGY

REQUEST FOR LOCATION OF POWER PLANT IN BRUCE COUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. Robinson (Bruce): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production of which I have not given notice but he may be able to answer it now. My question arises out of a statement made recently by Mr. W. J. Bennett, president of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, at Toronto's annual board of trade dinner.

Will the government give consideration to locating the proposed atomic power plant in Bruce county, considering decentralization and Bruce's distance from hydro sources?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): As I understand it, no decision has been made regarding the power plant that is now being contemplated. I can assure him that the merits of Bruce county will be very carefully assessed before the location is chosen.

Inquiries of the Ministry

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT—REQUEST FOR DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a communication from the premier of Saskatchewan suggesting a meeting of committees of both the federal and provincial cabinets to discuss the South Saskatchewan dam? If so, will the Prime Minister indicate whether or not the government will agree to appoint a committee of the cabinet to meet the provincial committee?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The answer to the first question is in the affirmative. The answer to the second question is that no arrangements for such a meeting have yet been made.

Mr. Coldwell: They might be made. It is under consideration. Did I get the last part correctly? I did not quite hear the last part.

Mr. St. Laurent: No arrangements have been made for such a conference at this time.

Mr. Coldwell: I was asking if they would be made.

Mr. St. Laurent: The request has been received but no definite answer has been made to it.

FERTILIZERS

SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO POSSIBLE COMBINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the concern expressed by farm organizations in respect to the high price of fertilizers, and in view of this has any consideration been given by the government to having the fertilizer industry examined under the Combines Investigation Act?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes. The answer to the hon. member's second question is that the combines branch, as a result of informal complaints, made some inquiries in eastern Canada which failed to disclose any collusion among the mixers of fertilizers. The combines branch also made some informal inquiries into the possible restriction of supply and enhancement of price in the case of ammonium nitrate and ammonium sulphate, but the information obtained did not indicate any situation forbidden by the Combines Investigation Act.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ST. FELICIEN-CHIBOUGAMAU BRANCH LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the government changed its policy regarding the construction of the eastern section of the Chibougamau railway and is it the intention of the minister to bring forward some legislation to that effect at this session?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Three Rivers, I wish to say that the government has not changed its policy regarding the construction of the St. Felicien-Chibougamau section of the Canadian National Railways. As the construction of the above mentioned section of the railroad was authorized at the last session of parliament it is not my intention to bring forward legislation in this connection.

REPORTED REMOVAL OF FOUNDRY FROM TRANSCONA SHOPS TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked the following question:

Is the minister aware of the steps being taken by the Canadian National Railways to move the foundry from the Transcona shops, at Winnipeg, to Montreal? In view of what this means to the employees affected, and in view of the central location of the Transcona shops, in Canada, will the minister ask the Canadian National to reconsider this move?

I have spoken to the management of the Canadian National Railways and they inform me that their dieselization program has now progressed to the point where there is insufficient casting work to justify the operation of two foundries.

At Point St. Charles the Canadian National has a modern foundry, the only one properly equipped for major casting work such as steam locomotive cylinders. The decision reached therefore, in the interests of economic operation, is that casting work should be consolidated at Point St. Charles and operations at the Transcona foundry discontinued.

I might add that there are 22 men now employed at the Transcona foundry. The transfer of work to Point St. Charles foundry will necessitate an adjustment in staff and 12 of these men will, in accordance with the provisions of the governing wage agreement, be given the opportunity of transferring to Point St. Charles.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ALLEGED DISAPPEARANCE OF MONEY AT BRITANNIA BEACH, B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware of the disappearance of some $44,000 from the post office at Britannia Beach, British Columbia, in December and, if so, has the minister been able to place the responsibility for the loss?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to investigate the matter referred to by my hon. friend.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

APPROVAL OF PROTOCOL ON ACCESSION OF FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

The house resumed, from Monday, January 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany, signed by Canada at Paris on October 23, 1954, and that this house do approve the same.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, by inexorable logic this house is moving to a momentous decision after what may go down in the records of the Canadian parliament as an historic debate maintained on a level worthy of the occasion.

There have been some truly remarkable contributions to this debate. One thinks of the illuminating and authoritative pronouncement made on the subject of German rearmament by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes). One admires the courageous stand taken in this house by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) and the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). One can admire courage wherever one finds it. One can commend as well statesmanlike utterances such as those the house has heard from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and others.

It was necessary that speeches of this quality should be made in this house on this occasion. The pity is that the country had not heard at an earlier date as authoritative and illuminating pronouncements from the government as those made in this debate by at least two government ministers. More than in any other aspect of public affairs it is in the field of our external affairs that the people need a lead from the government and from parliament, because so many of the decisions are arrived at in secret negotiations. We have seen in the vacuum of silence left by the government over the past several months the inevitable result: where ignorance and misunderstanding abound there is fertile soil for communist propaganda.

I say, therefore, that it is regrettable that the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not make this same speech or similar speeches on a dozen earlier occasions in different parts of Canada. I wish the Prime Minister had delivered such speeches. Indeed I wish the government, when they decided not to call parliament at an earlier date, had undertaken to campaign across Canada for the purpose of bringing these necessary facts before the Canadian people. Therefore, while this debate in the house has now reached its fourth day, it has nevertheless furthered a vitally important purpose in bringing to the attention of the Canadian people important and inescapable considerations which bear upon the decision that is now to be taken in their name.

Events have been moving swiftly in the past twelve months. Who among us ten years ago could have foreseen that the House of Commons today would be on the point of taking a decision, not only on German rearmament but in relation to the association of Germany with the western world, ourselves included, in an alliance? This is one of the strange contradictions of history. It would have been different indeed had the Russians proved themselves trustworthy since the war. They are responsible by their aggression and by their duplicity for the fact that we are now taking the course that has been presented to us, a course which they condemn and seek by every means at their disposal to thwart.

We need look back no farther than last spring to the negotiations at Geneva when the western nations, and France in particular, were required to negotiate from weakness. And while at Geneva the best was done that could have been done in salvaging a virtually impossible situation, I hope that we in this house have decided we do not wish to face any more situations where we must attempt to grasp peace out of virtual defeat and weakness.

Few could have foreseen after EDC had been defeated in the French national assembly last summer that there would have been raised up in its place a new form of agreement which is now on the point of being carried to a decision.

During these post-war years, ever since the Russians embarked upon their program of conquest and aggression, the greatest danger to the free world has lain in Europe. I for one will not forget my visit to the Canadian infantry brigade at Hanover in the fall of 1952, and I recall that Canadian troops and the nearest Russian troops were just 45 minutes' travel by road apart.

If this greatest danger has receded in the past year or two, that recession is due to our growing strength in that part of the world, but the danger remains and unless we of the free world greatly strengthen ourselves in the west we will continue also to be weak in the east in the face of the continued probing by the communists for and exploitation of our weak spots in that part of the world. None know this better than the Russians themselves, as is evidenced by their frantic efforts to prevent, thwart, defeat, or delay, by every kind of pressure at their disposal, the decision we are now about to take.

It is regrettable, sir, and I am sure surprising, that in this house there should have been put forward by a particular group of hon. members of this house that formidable array of decoys which the communists and those who have been listening to them have been offering to the Canadian public. These have been reviewed and I do not intend to dwell upon them. But let me just mention them in passing.

First, there is negotiation, the idea of "another conference", another conference wherein the Russians, of course, hope again to divide the west. But the decision we are taking does not preclude further negotiations, if the Russians want them. But when these negotiations are held they should on the part of the west be negotiations from strength and not from weakness. That surely is the lesson of Geneva of last spring.

The next is the decoy of coexistence. But the purpose of this measure is defensive. There is nothing in it to prevent peaceful coexistence.

Third, there is the decoy of Russian reasonableness. But if the Russians truly mean to be reasonable, and really mean to turn over a new leaf by co-operating, there is nothing in the decision we are about to take that prevents them from being reasonable and more reasonable than ever before.

The fourth decoy, and it is as dangerous as any, was uttered with some feeling in this house two days ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It was the plea that we should not take the decision at this time. But, Mr. Speaker, time is running against the west. It has been running against the west for a considerable period, and time is the one thing that we cannot afford to give at this stage in any further measure to the Russians.

Then there is the fifth decoy, that we must not provoke the Russians because they may increase their arms. Well, sir, that is just the old form of naked appeasement rearing its ugly head again. If that argument had been followed there would today be no NATO in the world, and we should not forget that the Russians have done their very utmost at all stages to defeat NATO.

The sixth decoy is that this measure is going to prevent German unification on some sound basis. But there is nothing here that will prevent German unification on any sound basis. There is, however, much here that would prevent unification of Germany on the tyrannical terms that Russia would impose.

I may sum up my view, and I believe the view of most Canadians in relation to these decoys, in saying that we do not trust communists. Have we forgotten Korea? Have we forgotten Czechoslovakia? Are we forgetting what is happening in Indo-China today in those areas that have fallen within the sweep of communist rule? No! There is one man who knew the Russians much better evidently than some C.C.F. members in this house know them, and that is Karl Marx, who said, in an historic utterance: "The Russian bear is certainly capable of anything—as long as he knows the other animals he has to deal with are capable of nothing."

Then on the other side of the debate there are those facts which have been overlooked by those members of the C.C.F. who oppose the resolution. The first of these is the existence in fact of a divided Germany. Second is the fact that Eastern Germany is armed. I have seen the military police, the barrack police, on the other side of the iron curtain. The existence of an armed Eastern Germany under Russian control is a fact, and Russia means to stay in East Germany until she has fastened her system, as she hopes, for all time upon the necks of the people of East Germany.

Third, rearmament is not the equivalent of war. Members of the C.C.F. in this house have treated rearmament as though it were the equivalent of war. That has been one of the hopeless contradictions obsessing those who have raised their voices in opposition to the resolution.

As we see it, rearmament in the view taken by this Canadian parliament in these momentous recent years has been a guarantee against the outbreak of war. We deplore that it should be necessary to lay upon the Canadian people the burden of sustaining rearmament. But, sir, when we talk about welfare let us remember that the first duty we owe to the Canadian people in ministering to and preserving their welfare is to make sure that Canada as part of the western world does not become a victim of aggression.

The fourth factor is that the guarantees have been overlooked, and if there are those who are disposed to regard those guarantees as insufficiently strong, let us remember that they are just as strong as are guarantees in the United Nations or guarantees in NATO, because in every instance those guarantees rest upon the pledges of a nation through its accredited representatives and no more.

Fifth, the fact has been overlooked that this is a purely defensive arrangement. A great injustice has been done by the evidently innocent misrepresentation of this fact in this house by C.C.F. members.

Sixth, and a vitally important consideration is this, that it is strength in this world in which we live which deters Russian aggression today. It is the possession by the United States in recent years of the atomic bomb which has bought safety for the west. Those of us who were in Berlin in the fall of 1948 and flew in on the airlift can recall the events of those days when the Russians were attempting to drive the western powers out of Berlin. We should not forget, sir, that it was courage, firmness, and force on the part of Britain and the United States in that situation that marked the turning point in the course of events in these post-war years. At that point had Britain, France and the United States shown weakness in the face of Russian strength and determination the whole course of subsequent events would have been changed. But Britain and the United States stood firm and made it quite clear that they would resist the land blockade. They set up that marvel of organization, the airlift; and from that time, as a result of that stand, the smaller nations in western Europe realized that they could safely commit their lot to the western nations and could join hands with them. It was out of that firm stand that NATO was born and became possible. Let us not forget that the only god the Russians know or respect is the god who is on the side of the big battalions, to use Napoleon's expression. We do not put ourselves in that category, but we know that these Russians respect strength and that it is strength we need if we wish to live in peace beside them.

The next fact overlooked is that the risks with regard to German rearmament have been exaggerated. At least we have these facts, Mr. Speaker, which are entitled to be given due weight. Atomic weapons will come into the hands of the Germans only by decision of the western powers, and their arms will be subject to inspection. Last night in this house from C.C.F. members we heard speeches that proceeded on the belief that Germany is still nazi and that the rearmament of Germany is equivalent to the resurrection of nazism and the nazi war machine. We are not going to forget the nazi atrocities. We are going to remember the way in which those nazi atrocities bathed Europe and far parts of the world in blood. But is there anyone here who seriously thinks that the nazis control the government of West Germany today? It is a fact that there is no stauncher democrat in all the world today than is Chancellor Adenauer. But on the other hand, in Eastern Germany there are nazis in high office.

Several nights ago we heard an authoritative pronouncement from the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) on the point of German rearmament. When it is said by C.C.F. members that the steps now being taken mean the resurrection of the nazi war machine, let us not overlook also some news items that have come to knowledge within recent days.

> The Russians have released former Field Marshal Ferdinand Schoerner, Hitler's war minister in the last days of world war II . . .

What has he been released for? Why is it that, as the news dispatch indicates, he has undertaken to send a letter of thanks to the Russians for his release? How does it happen that he is released at this particular time? And how does it happen that Vice-Admiral Voss was released by the Russians a few days ago? By the communists in Canada we have heard it charged that the purpose of releasing Kurt Meyer was so that he might lead some German army in the west. Yet we have a news dispatch of January 23 from Bonn which says as follows:

> The wife of former German tank commander Maj. Gen. Kurt Meyer said her husband has no intention of accepting a communist offer to help build up East German armed forces.

Is there any greater duplicity we have seen in all of Russian chicanery, in all of communist propaganda, than to pretend that it was the intention of the western powers to make common cause with former nazi generals in order to build up a German army while at the same time the Russians were those who were fighting against the resurrection of the nazi war machine? This kind of authoritative information from Berlin and Bonn is surely the complete exposure of that type of Russian chicanery.

Let it be recognized that the lesson of destruction and devastation has not been lost entirely upon the Germans; that there will be on German soil the continued presence of British, French, United States and Canadian forces; that the German forces will be under the command of a NATO commander in chief; and that the Germans will simply not be strong enough, under the limitations that exist, to embark upon a war of aggression for unification of Germany. Yes, the western powers must and will remain there.

Mr. Speaker, I now put to the house the proposition that it is the duty of every member—particularly of those who have voiced opposition to it—to oppose this measure only on the assumption that if it lay within their power they would defeat it. It would be a betrayal of the responsibility that each member of this house owes to the house and to the Canadian people if he cast his vote against this measure while at the same time secretly hoping that the measure would be adopted or, knowing that the measure is going to be adopted, indulged in some irresponsible objections to it.

Mr. Speaker, the defeat of this measure—and it is this that the hon. members of the C.C.F. must be prepared to accept if they are taking a responsible course in this debate—would have results which would indeed be too dreadful to contemplate. It is true that the major risks lie in this direction. The first result would be international chaos.

The second would be such an outburst of Russian glee as would be suitable and appropriate only to a great communist triumph in the world. We would then indeed have played into the hands of the Russians and of the communist cause.

The third result would be that inevitable agonizing reappraisal on the part of the administration and congress at Washington of United States policy and the course that the United States is to follow in relation to Europe.

In the fourth place, for Germans it would mean an effective rebuff by the west to Adenauer and to German democracy. It would mean that we would be violating the promise that has been given to a democratic Germany, namely that we of the west are prepared to work with a democratic Germany. Chancellor Adenauer deserves the support of the west for he has taken the greatest of risks.

The fifth result would be in relation to France. It would inevitably mean the crash of the French government and such a period of instability in French government as we have not yet seen. The whole course of French history would indeed be in a precarious plight. The strength of the communists would be bound to upsurge in France.

In the sixth place, to what fate would Germany be consigned? The Russians want all of Germany, west as well as east, with them. Their blandishments and all their efforts have been directed towards that end these many years.

In the seventh place—and let us put this issue squarely before members of this house who have indicated their opposition to this resolution—we would have dealt a body blow, it may well be a fatal blow, to NATO itself. NATO is needed in the world today as much as it ever was needed. We know that the United Nations are not enough. They are not enough to guarantee peace. We recognized that when NATO was established with the aid of Canadian inspiration. NATO's existence is needed. NATO's very existence would be challenged by defeat of this measure.

In the eighth place, in our own land it would mean, on the part of the communists, that their frantic efforts had been crowned with success, and a new boost to the morale and the effrontery of communists in Canada.

So I say, with reluctance and regret, that those who in this debate have indicated their opposition to this measure have shown no realism; they have shown no competence to assume any governmental task. When it comes to comparing them with those of whom they profess to be the counterpart in other lands, may I say that they are indeed ideologically the followers not of Mr. Attlee but of Mr. Bevan. Appropriate indeed was the title applied to that group by the Montreal Gazette yesterday when they were heralded as "the Bevanly host". "Bevanly" indeed! Thank heaven they are not a host.

One may sympathize with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the C.C.F. party in the house, as he has had to submit to the humiliation of listening to the speeches that have been made by his followers in condemnation of the measure before us in this debate.

Sir, I think we must express surprise and at the same time regret that we should hear that the same organization, the C.C.F. national council, is about to sponsor a visit of Mr. Attlee to Canada. Let me make it clear, in relation to this news dispatch that reached us yesterday, that Mr. Attlee enjoys the respect of us all, whatever our political views may be. I am sure most members of the house have had the opportunity to meet Mr. Attlee, some of us on various occasions, and we all respect him. We respect and uphold the views that he expressed in support of this measure of German rearmament in the British House of Commons. Mr. Attlee will always be a welcome visitor to Canada, but, sir, it is something new for the leader of a political party in the United Kingdom to be coming to Canada on a visit sponsored by a Canadian political party. That is the news that came to us yesterday.

We are told that Mr. Attlee will make a coast to coast tour of Canada between April 11 and May 1 under the sponsorship of the C.C.F. national council. I am sure it would be regarded as effrontery if the Conservative party in this country invited Sir Winston Churchill or Sir Anthony Eden to come to Canada and undertake a tour under our auspices. It would inevitably be a political tour. Unquestionably use will be attempted to be made by the C.C.F. for their own political purposes of the forthcoming visit of Mr. Attlee which is to be sponsored by the C.C.F. national council.

If Mr. Attlee chooses to visit Russia or chooses to visit China on the invitation of the governments of those countries, I am sure it is no affair of ours, sir, but it is an affair of ours if the leader of a British political party comes to Canada to make a tour under the auspices of a Canadian political party. It seems to me, sir, while Mr. Attlee is widely respected by all of us here and will always be a welcome visitor to Canada, that he ought not to be accepting the sponsorship of a political party in Canada for his tour.

Finally, sir, I wish to say this about the course that we are taking. It is a momentous course, but I ask: Is it within the bounds of contemplation that Canada should follow a different course in this matter from that to which the British House of Commons has already committed Great Britain, that land which in its finest hour saved the world? Is it in this situation thinkable that Canada should follow a contrary course to that being followed by the United States which, whatever its faults and shortcomings may be, has at least taken the burden and responsibilities of world leadership in the post-war years? Is it thinkable that Canada should follow a different course from that to which the French national assembly has committed that nation, invaded three times in living memory, France which has bled? Is it thinkable, sir, is it within the realm of contemplation of hon. members of this house, that Canada should take a different course from that followed jointly by Britain, the United States, France and other western nations? I tell you if we were to take that different course this country would never again be able to lift up its head in international company, and that respect which Canada has won at international conferences over the years from the close of world war I to the present time would be lost forever.

There are dangers, yes. We are calculating those dangers, we are measuring and weighing them here and now; but is that any excuse for allowing ourselves to be paralysed by fear into insensibility and inaction? The western world has already suffered much by the fact that the communists have been outthinking and outplanning us. They have been planning ahead of us. We have been waiting always for them to take the lead and then we have been taking defensive measures to try to counteract those measures which they have taken in lead of us.

Sir, the measure now before us and the alliance to which it gives expression offer to us as part of the western world an opportunity, long sought and long awaited, to take the lead. The time has come indeed for bold and courageous measures. How often in this debate have I thought of those words of Shakespeare:

> but I tell you, . . . out of this nettle, danger, we pluck this flower, safety.

There are dangers, but in accepting what dangers run with this decision we shall yet win safety. That is the lesson of the airlift. That is the lesson of these years. We cannot guarantee the result. It is an imperfect world. None, I am sure, is more conscious of the limitations of human wisdom than we who are about to vote on this measure today, but we must take the best advice and use the best sense we have. For my part, sir, I have no hesitation in following the course recommended by Churchill, Eden, Attlee, Eisenhower, Mendes-France and the great majority of the members of this house in preference to the course recommended and sought by Bevan, Malenkov and those members of the C.C.F. who have spoken against this measure.

This is the means by which we must seek to strengthen the European dikes against the tides of communist aggression if we would hope to have either strength or time to erect similar dikes in Asia or Africa.

My reasons for supporting this measure are not merely negative. They are positive. I do not accept the philosophy or view that the Germans can never change. I admit that there is much yet to be done to establish the contrary, but I am not prepared to accept a course that commits me for all time to the view that the Germans cannot change. I believe that there are great numbers of Germans who are anxious, in the spirit of democracy and in the spirit of freedom, to purge the stains that nazi brutality has left upon Germany and upon the world.

Nor can I accept the view that Germany and France are forever destined to be enemies. It may be, sir, that we are here witnessing the great fulfilment of a dream, more than we could ever have hoped for, a dream that was expressed by Sir Winston Churchill in these words but a few years ago:

> If we could only weave Gaul and Teuton so closely together economically, socially and morally as to prevent the occasion of new quarrels, and make old antagonisms die in the realization of mutual prosperity and interdependence, Europe would rise again. It seemed to me that the supreme interest of the British people in Europe lay in the assuagement of the Franco-German feud, and that they had no other interests comparable or contrary to that.

In this land, where our ancestors are drawn alike principally from Anglo-Saxon and from French sources, surely we must echo that hope and share that dream. Are we not prepared to believe now as an act of faith that when Churchill uttered those words he spoke not simply for the living but also for those heroes who in a thousand military cemeteries people the sacred cities of the dead?

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I feel sure all hon. members will have heard with a great deal of apprehension the news reported in this morning's paper, that in the area of Formosa there is a situation which could readily explode into a new world war. I think that on this occasion it will be at least reassuring to the people of Canada that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, replying to the leader of this party, has stated the official position of Canada, indicating that the problem of Formosa should be settled by the United Nations, or over an arbitration table.

And so, in prefacing my remarks concerning the very serious situation facing us in connection with Formosa, I cannot but be astounded by the government's position when an attempt is made to solve a far less urgent problem, by means of an armaments race which, undoubtedly, will take place in connection with the matter before us. I refer of course to the agreement which would permit the entry of Germany into NATO, and involves the rearmament of Germany.

I do not intend to take much time answering some of the criticisms which have been made of members of this group who, like myself, hold the view that the rearming of Germany at this time is ill advised and fraught with many dangers.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) who has just taken his seat took a great deal of time in his speech by innuendo and other references in an effort to indicate that the members of the C.C.F. are not sincere in their convictions. The hon. members for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) and Meadow Lake, did likewise. It is not my intention to take time to deal with these expressions. I am used to red baiting. I would say only this, that it had never been the hallmark of Canadian democracy to have a slavish obedience to any political party or to any one idea. On the contrary the essence of parliamentary democracy in Canada is that any member can rise to his feet and express his opinion without fear of vilification.

[Mr. Fleming.]

And so today I intend to do just that. Each member who has spoken, whether in favour of the rearmament of Germany or otherwise, has expressed his fears as to the outcome of that decision. Each member, by one argument or another, has indicated that the proposal is fraught with many dangers and that a calculated risk is involved.

I believe it is ill advised and dangerous to the peace of the world to rearm Germany. One might very well argue emotionally about the atrocities committed under the nazi regime, but, in the light of the seriousness of the situation, I do not think we need do that. However, we must try to be realistic and objective in our approach to this great and complex problem.

The viewpoint expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs runs something like this: That there is a vacuum existing in Germany, and that unless the west moves to fill that vacuum, communism will move in. I do not agree with that, and I will support my contention with quotations. I shall quote first Dr. Russell who, in the issue of December 8, 1954, of The Nation has this to say:

> The truth is so plain and simple that it seems as if governments must in time become aware of it: the communist and non-communist worlds can live together or die together. There is no other possibility. When both sides realize this, it may be hoped that they will choose to live rather than die.

And again, the well known writer George F. Kennan, former ambassador to the Soviet union, has this to say:

> As many of you already know, I have never seen any evidence that the Soviet leaders have at any time since world war II (or before, for that matter) desired a general war between the Soviet union and the major capitalist powers, or looked to such a war as a likely means of achieving their objectives.

So I do not think there is any immediate concern in the matter of invasion of West Germany. As a matter of fact I believe that the rearming of West Germany can only mean that there will be reciprocation on the part of the Russians and that they, too, will increase their armaments to keep balance with those the west might provide for the Germans. Therefore I say the minister's argument that Russia will not take reciprocal action to keep her strength in armaments equal to that on the allied side is somewhat ridiculous.

Again, those who have supported the rearming of Germany have argued that, through strength, we can achieve the reunification of Germany. In this respect I believe that in rearming West Germany a curtain will be erected so that it will be very difficult to bring about any form of disarmament. And I believe there will be other dangers, one of which is that, in time, the German army, rearmed and under old nazi leaders and under the military control of the whole country, will begin flexing their muscles, so that in time there will be real danger that they would start negotiating with Russia to get the things they want.

I believe that is the greatest danger in connection with this problem of Germany today—the danger that when Germany is reunited or rearmed, because of her interests in the east she will negotiate with her former enemy, Russia. And when that time comes it seems to me there would be little hope that the guarantees indicated by the minister would be sufficiently effective to control the destinies of that country.

It is my view that, rather than a policy of immediate rearmament, the west should proceed step by step in a rearming program. By offering real democracy and better economic conditions to East Germany there would be a basis from which we could reach some solution. As it is, I believe there will be two armed camps standing side by side within a short distance of each other, a condition fraught with many dangers.

There are others with authority and good judgment in these matters who bolster my argument. I would refer first to Dorothy Thompson and Thomas Mann, both of whom believe as I do that German military power would be used eventually for her own interests. Thomas Mann says, as reported in the Citizen of January 20:

> The trend of world affairs is menacing, pregnant with disaster.

And then he warns:

> Putting yesterday's mortal enemies back in the saddle, the west is scandalizing the peace-loving majority of West Germany.

And so I believe the move to rearm West Germany is a very serious procedure indeed.

I might digress from my argument just to point out what is involved in a third world war. I hold in my hand a copy of the U.S. News and World Report of January 28. On the front page in large red and white letters I find the following: "No need to bomb cities to win wars." I do not agree with the contents of the article to which I want to refer. The article was written by Colonel Richard Leghorn. I do not agree with his arguments because they are fallacious, they are pregnant with disaster for the west. However, I want to indicate what he has to say in regard to the situation now facing the world, should a third world war come upon us. This is what he says:

> One hundred assorted modern bombs on target can knock out one half of United States industrial capacity and tens of millions of Americans. The 100 largest cities of the NATO powers in western Europe contain one-quarter of its population and a greater fraction of its industrial capacity. Two hundred bombs on city targets would destroy the western world.

Further on this author indicates that an intercontinental ballistic missile has been invented. This missile can go from continent to continent at a velocity twenty times the speed of sound, and there is no method of defence against it. Therefore, we are facing a serious problem in trying to settle this matter.

My conclusions are not entirely my own. They are also those of our national convention which took place in the early part of last year at Edmonton and the decision of the national council. It, too, is the decision of the world council of churches and many other citizens throughout Canada. There has not come to my desk one letter indicating support of rearming Germany. On the other hand I have received many letters protesting the rearming of Germany at this time.

There are some things that plague the world today which prevent a real solution to the problems of war. The conference table of the United Nations has been plagued with the fact that people who go there with high hopes and sincerity have to work under pretty difficult conditions. I wish to refer to what I think is the basic cause of war today, namely, the international cartelization of the armament industry. Any hope of world peace is bound to be bedevilled as long as that situation exists. It is well known to hon. members that during the first world war Canadian soldiers in France were wounded and shot by machine guns manufactured in Britain. We also know the story of Madame Chiang Kai-shek when the Americans were in China during the last war offering military assistance. The story is told of Madame Chiang Kai-shek coming in with a piece of a Japanese plane of American make shot down over China. We have all these contradictions.

I want to dwell on one important world cartel which in itself proves the point I am trying to make. I refer to international capitalism and those merchants of death. They know no country; they know no patriotism; their allegiance is to one thing and one thing only, namely, the making of profit. They have no compunctions about the deaths they cause; their one idea is centred on the making of profit. I wish to refer to the I. G. Farben company, the great nazi Germany chemical empire.

This great cartel operated during the last war. As a matter of fact it was responsible for the near success of Hitler. In the early days of 1932 when Hitler was coming to power this cartel played an important part in his rise to power. At the Nuremberg trials in 1947 24 leaders of this German dye trust appeared. At that time the conscience of the world was awakened. Perhaps that has all been forgotten since. These 24 leaders appeared before the military tribunal at Nuremberg, and charges were made that the I. G. Farben company played an important role in preparing the third reich for aggressive war. This is one of the largest firms in the world. It has 400 participating firms in Germany and over 700 affiliated companies in 104 countries throughout the world where they gained the control. Where they have not direct control, then they control the companies by patents and other policies. The charges laid at these trials were that this company was guilty of wilfully engaging in activities indispensable to Germany's aggressive war.

On November 6, 1932, the Reichstag elections were held. The nazis lost very heavily. There was a conference between Hitler and the leaders of this great cartel. At that time the Farben company was going to cease manufacturing synthetic gasoline; but when they went to Hitler he promised them assistance, and from that time on there was friendship between this important company and Hitler. More than any other thing in the world, this company was responsible for the war machine of Hitler. Indeed the ramifications of this company went so far that they gave money to the Sudeten Germany free corps which was a sabotage association, and it did other work on the frontiers in order to cause trouble.

It is worth noting that Hitler had only a small segment of the people on his side, but he had this huge and powerful industrial concern. When we look through newspaper reports at this time we find that once again this huge chemical firm has been reinstated in all its ramifications all over the world. This company even has its tentacles in Canada. At the Nuremberg trials it was found that seven Canadian companies were in some way connected with this great chemical concern. Until people of good will in the world, people in responsible positions—I am now speaking to this government—are prepared to take a stand to decartelize these warmongers, these merchants of death throughout the world who govern and control by their assistance to governments and through their propaganda, we shall not have peace.

As a solution I have a six-point program which I want to put before the government and the house. The policy of the western nations should be: First, to accept the fact that coexistence or no existence is a reality and there can be no victory for either side if a third world war should come. That is the first thing we have to realize and accept.

Second, we must accept the proposition that genuine and permanent check of communist influence is possible only with better ideas, politically, economically and morally, and institute these in world policy at every level.

Third, we must reiterate our faith in the United Nations. I am very happy that the minister of external affairs has expressed this faith in the United Nations in connection with the situation developing in Formosa, and that Canada will again have faith in the United Nations for the solving of the great problems of mankind. We must reiterate our faith in the United Nations as the framework to establish world peace and justice.

Fourth, we must immediately attempt, stage by stage, a reduction in conventional and new weapons.

Fifth, we must set up a world arms control agency under the United Nations to control arms production, both conventional and new weapons.

Sixth, we must set up through the United Nations an agency to break the world-wide cartelization of profit-motivated merchants of death.

We are going to be plagued with this situation. These people have allegiance to international capitalism and to no other ideal. They have no allegiance except to the profit motive. Surely the good will throughout the world, surely governments in responsible positions in the democracies are going to see that something is done about this so that the world will not be faced time and time again with world wars.

In conclusion I want to say that I am against rearming Germany because I do not think that a solution can come through an arms race. The logical thing is to realize that you can never reach the pyramid by which one side will gain over the other enough tactical strength, enough armaments to assure victory.

When speaking at Estevan in 1945 I put forth the proposition that it was a case of finding out how to live with Russia or to die with her. At that time I expressed the opinion that by the use of technological means at our disposal the western nations, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) said, by going into those areas where there are economic conditions from which communism can grow, and by correcting those difficulties, could gain the opportunity of living in coexistence with the Russians.

We are today fighting an ideological war and we shall not win it by force alone, except the force of conviction that we have the best kind of government in the world, democracy, and by showing that we have moral principles and that we are prepared to establish moral agencies throughout the world.

I think this is the hope and aspiration of all people of good will throughout the world. I only hope that what I have said may have even some small sympathetic reception in the hearts of people who believe, as I do, that war solves no problem.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make my position known in respect to the present resolution, and at the commencement of my remarks may I read what the resolution is:

> That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany, signed by Canada at Paris on October 23, 1954, and that this house do approve the same.

Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose there has been any one decision over the past few years that is so important as the decision which we are called upon to make in this resolution. We have often read in the past of the responsibilities of members of parliament. Sometimes those responsibilities have been depreciated by a cheap sort of journalism. Perhaps it appears that there may be some element of insincerity with our work at times; but when members of parliament come face to face with such a decision as we have to make in voting on this resolution, then those responsibilities are not child's play in any sense. The decision that we are to make in respect to this resolution as far as Canada is concerned may well determine the future course of history.

When facing a responsibility of this kind I cannot help turning my mind back to the time when the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King came into this house, after calling a special session of this parliament, and asked us to vote to declare war on Germany. To me that was perhaps one of the greatest decisions which I have ever had to make in my political life, because at the time my two stepsons and my first-born son were of military age.

Of course I followed the events of the war very closely. I am not alone in this. Like the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and others in this house, I suffered the heartbreaking experience of losing my own son in that war. Such heartbreaking experiences not only tear at one's heart but cause one to think and to think desperately. I followed the events of that war and the events that transpired after the war. I followed with interest the conferences that were held by the big men of the earth, the conferences between President Roosevelt, Prime Minister Churchill, Stalin and later President Truman. I recall the conferences of Yalta and Tehran.

As I followed them closely, wondering how they would affect the future course of history, believe me, I have come to the conclusion that no greater treachery has been perpetrated upon the human race than was accomplished at those conferences. Time and time again we gave a foothold to what is now our enemy and helped it to build its strength to its present powerful position, and which today constitutes a threat to our civilization.

I must admit that as I looked at those things with the emotion that characterizes every human soul I was tempted to adopt an unchangeable decision that I would never, never again vote for any measure that would indicate in the least possible degree the possibility of war, for I determined that never again should I ever have any confidence in those who have the responsibility for determining international policy.

Now we are face to face with another decision, and in facing that great decision I am also faced with the knowledge that I now have another son of military age. But as I think of that other decision and that other son I must also remember that we have another enemy, and an enemy who is perhaps just as ruthless if not more ruthless than the enemy of a few years ago.

We have heard a great deal about German atrocities. I know that we all, each and every one of us, abhor them. Each and every one of us detests them. We do not even like to think of them. It is significant, however, that many speakers in this debate who have mentioned those atrocities have paid little attention to the atrocities of the present enemies of the west. Millions upon millions have been liquidated by Russia and her satellites for no other crime than simply a desire to own their own little farms, and live their own lives freely. We are faced now with that enemy and must now make a decision in respect to it.

Well, Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned I lost one son and I have another who is now of military age, and when I think of them I recall the remarks of an hon. member in this house. I was moved to tears as I heard the concluding remarks of the speech delivered in this house the other day by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl). Some of us perhaps think we have suffered, but I would like to refresh our memories by reading a few paragraphs of the hon. member's speech. I quote from page 401 of Hansard of January 20, 1955:

> I know, Mr. Speaker, that all my colleagues in the house will bear with me if they find that I have spoken with some emotion on this subject. If I did so, it is perhaps due to the fact that, to a greater extent than anyone else in the house possibly, I have personally been a victim of nazi cruelty. My rather distressed feelings result not only from the fact that I belong to that ethnic group which suffered most, but also because my own uncles, aunts and cousins, consisting of a family of over 60 persons, were tormented and put to death by the nazis. Hon. members I am sure can therefore appreciate that if, notwithstanding the over-all record of nazi cruelty and my own personal grief, I am still led to the conclusion to vote in favour of this resolution, I do so only because, to paraphrase a Shakespearean line:
> "Not that I dislike Berlin less,
> But because I fear Moscow more".
> By your leave, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one more personal remark, and it is this: As I stand here before my colleagues on the floor of this house, and as one of the spokesmen of my ethnic group, I most solemnly declare that I vote for the resolution, but not without a deep ache in my heart caused by my grave doubts, apprehensions and misgivings; and I therefore accompany my vote with a most fervent prayer that, in the wisdom of Him who guides the destiny of us all, this vote may be for the betterment of all mankind.

I might point out, Mr. Speaker, that the pronoun "Him" is spelled with a capital letter. I suppose those words now written in Hansard will finally be buried in our musty old archives, but though they might be buried there they will not be buried in the eternal record.

I have pointed out that we have another enemy to face. In this regard we have heard a good deal lately about the dangers of German rearmament. I know we are all very conscious of that danger and, as the hon. member for Cartier pointed out, we approach it with some misgiving. We have heard a lot about the German military machine. But the fact of the matter is that we have heard very little from the people who debate in this fashion about the tremendous power and ruthlessness of the enemy who now confronts us, and that enemy is not a German war machine but another war machine more powerful than any the world has ever seen, except perhaps that which is gradually coming into existence through NATO and largely because of the strength of the United States.

I declare that we have no choice, Mr. Speaker. We are faced with an enemy and we face him today. It is not a matter of what might happen in future years following the rearmament of Germany. The important question is what is happening today.

A couple of years ago it was my privilege to visit Germany. I cannot reveal the names of those with whom I spoke, but I will say that on one occasion I had an opportunity of speaking with three or four high German government officials. I believe that experience that evening will perhaps highlight many of the other experiences I have had. Those top ranking German government officials were not nazis. In fact, one gentleman, whose name I am not at liberty to reveal, was on Hitler's liquidation list, managed to escape, and because of his ability and desire to serve his country returned to Germany. He told me that the great desire of those in office in Germany was to bring Germany within the orbit of the free and democratic nations of the world. One might ask what confidence we could have in those words. But if we adopt that attitude we might as well ask what confidence we can have in anyone's word. I felt at the time that there was a great desire on the part of those in top ranking influential positions to bring Germany back—yes, I know, restore her sovereignty—but also back into the place where she would be known as a free nation, and take her place as one of the free nations of the world.

I now want to pass on to another subject that I think is extremely important. It has been mentioned a number of times. I refer to the subject of the necessity for continuing negotiations with the enemy. I say "the enemy". There is no other way to describe them. My hon. friend who has just resumed his seat talked about the possibility of coexistence. I am well aware of what that means. I am not so stupid as to believe that we are not living in a world side by side with the enemy. The propagandists for coexistence mean only one thing. They mean for us to live at peace by granting concessions all along the way to those who are proposing this idea of coexistence. It means negotiation by concession.

The other day the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) argued that progress had been made by negotiation. Let us not ever believe that Moscow has changed or will ever change its ultimate objective. It never will. When we talk about progress by negotiation, we can mean only one thing, namely progress by concession. I have yet to see that we have received any benefit of negotiation with the Russians. Only the communist imperialists have come out on top. If it is progress at all, it is progress down hill. It must be remembered that you can make progress down hill.

I heard a great deal about this progress by negotiation and about pursuing peaceful means. I know it is a nice phrase. The Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon used it. What I think we must determine is whether or not this enemy of ours is evil. Let us determine that fact first. Is it evil or is it not? If it is evil, then is it right for us to coexist with it and to grant concession to that which is evil? That is the decision we must make. We talk about peaceful means, but what is meant by "peaceful means"? They are nice words; it is a glowing phrase. It is nice to use it, but there is only one thing that phrase "by peaceful means" can mean. "Peaceful means" is a delusion and a snare. It is a delusion and a snare to assume that evil aggression can be overcome by peaceful means.

I do not want to stand here and to sound like one who is anxious to fight or is anxious for war. Over and over again in this debate it has been said that nobody wants war. Nobody hates war any more than do I or other hon. members. But we must face realities with regard to this matter. The only place where peaceful means could be successfully employed is between men of good will; and our communist enemies—I will not call them our communist friends—have proven over and over again that they are not men of good will. Just how far would law enforcement agencies get if they notified the underworld that henceforth every criminal problem would be solved by peaceful means only? If the F.B.I. or the R.C.M.P. and all our police forces were forbidden to use arms and were instructed to resort to peace in opposing criminals and criminal acts, the resulting increase in violence and crime would terrify and demoralize the whole nation. The use of the term "peaceful means" is meaningless when applied to the acts of violence perpetrated by international communism. We must destroy the ability of the communists to inflict injustices upon others or we ourselves must face ultimate destruction. There is no alternative.

As to this particular resolution, may I say this. The masters of the Kremlin are more anxious to weaken and to make ineffective the North Atlantic Treaty Organization than they are to do anything else. They are more interested in pushing the United States out of Europe than in any other political objective today. Why? Because they know that just as long as NATO is effective, they will not be able to move with respect to their political objectives, at least in that part of the world.

Let me now say this, Mr. Speaker. Some of our friends have been warning against the possible dangers in respect of a rearmed Germany, as though when once it is rearmed it is going to turn on us. I suppose that might be a chance we have to take. But let me throw out this thought. If any conflict should break out in Europe, it would not result in a local skirmish; it would result in another world war. We do not want it to come but I say that in that event I would rather have Germany with us than against us.

May I read from an article written by William Henry Chamberlin. Of course there are some people who will perhaps denounce Mr. Chamberlin for his attitude on many things. But in an article he wrote not long ago he throws some light on this picture in respect of the rearming of Germany. I am not going to read it at all, of course, but there is a point here that I think is well worth consideration. He says:

> Europe cannot be defended against occupation unless there is at least one strong European power.

I believe the idea of this resolution is to make NATO effective and to make it a strong power. Mr. Chamberlin continues:

> Unfortunately not one nation on the continent qualifies under this definition today. It is no exaggeration to say that Germany offers the only hope of playing this role.

This is the particular thought I wanted to bring before you, Mr. Speaker:

> . . . the rearming of Germany in alliance with America—

And under this resolution it is an alliance with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

> —and the west is the most hopeful means of cracking the iron curtain. The inner rottenness of the Soviet puppet regime in the Soviet zone of Germany was exposed on June 17, 1953, when only the presence of Soviet troops made it possible to put down a widespread spontaneous uprising. Without the backing of Soviet occupation troops the red Quisling regime in the Soviet zone would not last five minutes.

Then the article goes on to say that "the Soviet zone is extremely shaky." The article continues:

> Some opponents of German rearming, in and out of Germany, contend that the German people are more interested in national unity than in association with the west. But there is really no such alternative. The Soviet government has never consented to German unification on the only basis that would be acceptable to the overwhelming majority of West Germans, conservatives and socialists alike: free elections accompanied by freedom of speech, press, assembly and political parties. The last "election" in the Soviet zone late in October followed the usual totalitarian pattern: one official list of candidates, people prodded to the polls by intimidation, a 99·3 per cent majority for the official list.

Skipping a bit in the article, I read this pungent part:

And once the chain of Soviet empire snaps in its weakest link, in the Soviet zone of Germany, the crack-up of the whole jerrybuilt structure of Soviet imperialism in eastern Europe, with repercussions on the dictatorship in Russia, would become a possibility. No wonder Molotov gives the prevention of German rearmament the highest priority in his foreign policy aims.

Believe me, Mr. Speaker, it is an obvious thing of late that the prevention of German rearmament has had top priority in the Moscow propaganda program that permeates the world. I do not want to say that men have not spoken in this debate with a good deal of conviction, but I say that that conviction must be very naïve if they cannot see that. Many speakers have expressed their approval of the high level of debate, and I do not want to minimize it. Should any members take a position that is opposite to mine, I am not going to call them communists. I am not very much concerned with whether or not a man carries a communist card. I am concerned about the men who follow the communist line. I say that it is the most illogical thing for one to bellow: "I hate communism, I do not like communism, communism is a thing I abhor", and then turn around and do the very things that the communists want them to do. That is illogical, and I cannot see how a person can be so naïve that he cannot see that.

As far as I can visualize the world scene, I cannot see that there is any other position to take, with all our misgivings, than to vote for the resolution. We have Germany, a country with a high degree of national unity, with proved industrial and military capacity, with a negligible communist fifth column, and a bitter sense of grievance against the Soviet union. What more could we ask in the way of a co-partner with us in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization? It is true that Germany has been our enemy in the last two world wars, but it is not a new thing for a former enemy to become an ally any more than it is a new thing, as has happened today, for a former ally to become our enemy. It is not a new thing.

One can talk about Germany, the ruthlessness of Germany and so forth, but I think we are all aware that we cannot tag the German people with that. The speech made by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) yesterday is most revealing. The German people came under the dynamic leadership of a dictator but there were circumstances involved in those years and, if I may say so, they fell for it. That does not mean to say that the nature of these people is ruthless. Many of us have German communities in our constituencies. We mingle with these people and they are just as good citizens and good people as any of us. Personally I should like to keep them as my friends.

It is better to have this powerful nation as our friend in the face of any threatened war than to have her on the side of our enemy. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I take my position with our leader and other members of this group in supporting the resolution.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, even before this debate was initiated, I had decided to support the protocol of accession of the Federal Republic of Germany to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I have not changed my mind. However, after considering some of the speeches delivered on the subject, I have thought it advisable to state my reasons for taking this stand.

In spite of all the propaganda to which we have been subjected for several months, when attempts were made to demonstrate to us the importance of the part Germany might be called upon to play in the defence of peace, I do not hesitate to give the benefit of the doubt to our allies of the NATO organization, and to grant that they are sincere in their efforts to achieve their aims.

On the other hand, we must not overlook the fact that in the countries where the problem has been referred to parliament, and even here in Canada, considerable opposition has developed.

Are the members of this last group equally sincere in claiming that Germany's entry into NATO would render peace more uncertain still and even make for added friction? I would feel like answering in the affirmative, which is the same as saying—and that is my sincere feeling in the matter—that it is possible to be opposed to the protocol and yet be no communist.

Between these two alternatives we must objectively seek the truth. It is impossible for a citizen of France not to remember or to feel in his very flesh the sufferings and misfortune which have thrice fallen upon his country in a 70-year period. For a German citizen it is not easy to forget either that these same misfortunes and sufferings, for which he is himself responsible, have by no means improved his lot even though, once out of three times, he emerged victorious from this venture.

And the memory of these sad events in both these countries is sufficient to cause an important section of the population to hesitate and to wonder whether armaments are really the best way of maintaining peace.

Under these conditions, the reasons expressed from all sides may quite properly be justifiable, by those who oppose the motion as well as by those who support it.

I should be quite inclined to believe that, in both of these opposing groups, there exists an equally sincere loyalty to the country and an unequivocal will to protect her from communism. To my mind, the difference lies in the appraisal of the means to be adopted.

In our case, however, the problem must be set in an altogether different manner. It should be discussed—publicly I mean—more calmly and more objectively. I exclude from this remark, of course, most of the speeches made in this house, and particularly the brilliant report made by the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson).

There is being created among the public in the United States as well as in Canada some sort of mass hysteria, some kind of mass psychosis of which the leaders themselves in the end are not entirely free.

But, and this is true of masses as well as of individuals, the moves that are made in such a condition of nervous tension are often unreasoned, and they are sometimes detrimental and fraught with unfavourable consequences.

I readily admit that those who support the cold war are largely responsible for that condition of tension in which we live; but the cold war is not always fought on only one side of the barricade; and even among those who are beyond all question on the side of right and justice—I mean our allies in NATO —there is some overdoing which tends to foster that nervous condition so incompatible with calm judgment and cool reasoning.

After all, we should know chalk from cheese. A good example of the errors which are accepted offhand by whole populations who, owing to well-timed propaganda, seem unable to think for themselves and to react, is precisely that mutual defence treaty agreed to by the United States and nationalist China. We have proof of it at this very time when we can put our fingers, so to speak, on the very serious complications that are threatening us as the allies of the United States, a consequence of that treaty which seems to me unjustifiable and indefensible.

Another instance of such exaggeration, which this time is shown by the Canadian government and but too easily accepted by a benumbed population—so to speak—as a result of well-organized propaganda, is our overexpenditure of public moneys for our participation in the Korean war and the sending and maintaining in Europe of the troops we are keeping there now, for our own protection perhaps, but mainly to protect countries which hesitate to a considerable degree to contribute to their own protection.

I express the hope that if parliament ratifies the entry of Germany into NATO—I hope and wish it will be so—measures will be taken to bring back as soon as possible to Canada the men and the materiel which we have in Europe at the present time.

By thus facing realities, we will ease the heavy burden of the Canadian taxpayers and keep our contribution to the defence of the west within reasonable limits.

In that respect, may I be permitted to quote a short extract from the editorial which Le Soleil published on January 22, 1955, under the following title:

Ottawa considers the German problem.

The writer devotes a few lines to the problem in general, then states precisely what I have said, that certain European countries seem to drag their feet, so to speak, with respect to the setting-up of their own defence. The editorialist then adds:

> Such being the case, ratification by the Canadian parliament will in fact have but very little effect on German rearmament.. We should be humble enough to admit it. In this way we would be able to equate our international commitments with our small population. In this connection Canada could think of repatriating at least the ground troops we maintain in Germany, at colossal expense, quite out of proportion with their military usefulness, in return for our agreeing to the rearmament of a nation which, through its own fault or that of world politicians, has twice drawn Canada into war in the space of a single generation.

Nevertheless, even though we must be careful, even though we must guard against propaganda and try to look at things objectively when everything conspires to rush us, we must recognize that we are, at this time, faced with a dilemma which must be solved.

Shall we allow the German republic to rearm and to enter that group of countries with which we are associated for our collective defence on an equal footing or shall we allow her to rot in a state of forced neutrality, inaction and repression, which may be without danger when it is chosen out of free will, but which readily becomes a cause of the most serious disorder when imposed by coercion from outside?

In my humble opinion, it is not so much a question of deciding whether Germany will be rearmed or not, but whether or not she will recover her freedom. In spite of all the ills she has in fact brought upon Europe and the whole of humanity, by reason of her unjustified aggressions, it appears to me that we have no right and that it is not wise to keep this vanquished people indefinitely captive. That would be, moreover, a means of redeeming the errors committed after the last two wars when we seemed to be wanting to tighten to the limit the grip intended to crush an overly venturesome enemy. Undoubtedly, the rearming of Germany carries probable risks, but I sincerely believe that these risks are smaller than the ones we are running by letting this country fume under inaction and repression.

History does not relate a single instance where a young, strong and vigorous nation might have been kept for a long time in trusteeship, as has been the case, since the end of the last war, of both Germany and Japan. That might be possible with decaying and decadent nations, but it will never be possible in the case of present-day Germany.

We must also never lose sight of the fact that an opponent as treacherous and as unscrupulous as communist Russia will never be completely thwarted by armed might only. Even in defeat, they will continue to instil into our veins the poison of their doctrine.

Besides adequate military preparedness, in which I am willing to include German rearmament, we must put into play such other forces, moral forces, as honesty of intentions, superiority and integrity of purpose, honesty of means, a sincere desire for Christian justice, not only for ourselves and our allies, but also for our opponents and for the vanquished. Those are many factors of great importance in our struggle against the communists; factors which are not to be found, I do not hesitate to say, on their side, but that we must make sure to find here, in the heart and soul of free peoples.

I shall vote for the motion to approve the protocol, not so much because it allows Germany to rearm, but rather because it makes her free again, hoping indeed that, in her love for liberty, she may join us in our efforts to repel communism.

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I intend, in taking part in this debate, to leave no doubt in the minds of those whom I have the privilege to represent in this house as to the stand I am taking on the ratification of the proposed rearmament of western Germany.

I do not hesitate to endorse the motion introduced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), to the effect:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany, signed by Canada at Paris on October 23, 1954, and that this house do approve the same.

The minister, and, after him, several members have stated the reasons for taking such action. Others spoke against the measure, and I respect their views on this matter.

What! they say, we are going to allow those German barbarians to rearm again? Have the Canadians and their allies forgotten the tortures that were inflicted upon a multitude of their own nationals by the very people whom we are now seeking to support, during the two world wars which have wrought havoc in so many countries in less than a quarter century.

I would remind those who do not share my views as to the expediency and urgency of endorsing the resolution now before us, that there is not one of us who can recall without poignant emotion these two tragic events.

We still remember the cruel losses suffered by a large number of our fellow citizens. Our military hospitals are living though all too sad reminders of the results of these tragic conflicts.

We remember those days of anxiety and terrible suffering undergone by those who so bravely defended the cause of democracy on the field of battle. Our heroes are assured of our eternal gratitude and it is precisely because we seek to prevent such calamities that we are preparing to circumvent as quickly and as efficiently as possible any such undertakings.

It is precisely because we remember that we will not allow the sacrifices made in the past to remain devoid of results.

In every circumstance we wish to hold aloft the torch of our ideal, the defence of the liberty of nations. That is why we will not miss any opportunity of preparing in an adequate fashion to counter the efforts of those who, armed to the teeth, are seeking to undermine the principles of order and liberty which are our heritage and that of those nations with whom we are allied.

Do you mean to say, you might ask, that such freedom prevailed under the rule of Hitler or of Mussolini? My answer is no. These two proud individuals with voracious appetites who attempted to conquer the world have received their just punishment and their countries still suffer the consequences.

However, for these two dictators, it was less a matter of trying to subject the world to a universal subversive doctrine than, as the main objective of their insane attempts at conquest, to ensure the economic advance of their country through the expansion of their territory and the conquest of new lands. No doubt, this ambition was to be satisfied at the expense of other nations which these two adventurers tried to subjugate by force, but it did not necessarily involve the repudiation and the abandonment of religious beliefs by the peoples they wished to conquer.

I need not add that I condemn this idea of territorial expansion at the price of bloodshed attempted by those whom divine Providence has already punished. Will their defeat have been salutary to these vanquished peoples? I hope so, although I would not vouch for it.

Today we have to decide if we are to kneel before the Russian hydra which would conquer the world in order to establish what is called "a new order". Are we going to let communism keep on spreading terror in the world while we do nothing about it?

Are those who, through their methods, have destroyed the family spirit in so many quarters when they destroyed the authority of the parents, going to be the only ones to keep on arming?

Their propaganda throughout the world is already a menace to harmony between nations, to the peace and respect of our homes. How could we remain idle in the face of so much cunning and deceit, in the face of the hypocritical appeals to peace coming from those who are dedicated to destroy all that binds peoples in a fraternal fashion, insomuch as brotherhood can exist on earth, in order to satisfy their own ambitions?

As long as we have only to fight a country which, oblivious of the rights of others, seeks to enlarge its realm, bringing it to reason should, I believe, be a rather easy task.

But in the case of communism, the situation we have to face is entirely different. Communism is a false doctrine which we must destroy. Russia and her satellites are not so much a menace from the point of view of the purely material economic advantages which would be theirs, should they succeed. There are other and more serious consequences. We must resist this tyrannical monster, who, by every possible means—murder, torture, and so on—is trying to impose on the whole world a rule which would reduce us to the level of animals, and who would destroy even the souls of men.

To the fear expressed by some of my colleagues with regard to Germany's rearmament, I would reply that enough nations would be found to bring her back to reason and make her pay, as in the past, the price of her unwarranted ambition.

Shall we be called upon to go to the defence of the republic of West Germany following an attack by communist East Germany? Will Russia become an aggressor? Those are questions which nobody, I think, can answer.

One sure thing is that Russia—and I hope that this eventuality is as remote as possible—will lose no time to launch hostilities whenever it suits her purpose to do so. Wherever the first shots be fired, in China, Europe or elsewhere, we must be ready for anything. What an advantage it would be for the communists to be able to count upon the part of Germany they have rearmed while the other part would be defenceless!

I am not one of those who have sought to further the cause of an imperialism which has launched us into so many unhappy ventures.

However, I do not hesitate to say that should Russia attack Western Germany or civilization or nations which share our ideals, our first line of defence would lie at the very forefront of the point of attack. We would be unable to postpone action until the field of hostilities reached our own continent. Let no one believe from what I am saying that I would like to see a repetition of the days of distress we have known in the past, when thousands of our sons were called upon to serve overseas. Two of my own sons agreed to make that sacrifice. I have others who would be of enlistment age should another war come and I beg Providence to spare them the sad calamities brought about by war.

However, we must do our duty. I am confident that we will give no respite to our common enemy, that we will take all necessary steps to fight that enemy and that we will agree to make more sacrifices to check the march of enemy forces.

German rearmament and the entry of Germany into NATO is a preventive measure which will make Russia think.

I am sure everyone wishes to see the present international disagreements which cause so much grief come to an end and hopes that mutual understanding may give us long years of peace.

However, we must always be ready for anything that may happen; in troubled times like these, the motto si vis pacem, para bellum is justified. We are threatened by the forces of evil, well provided with munitions of war; we must therefore arm ourselves accordingly in order to repel the inhuman hordes that are preparing to swoop down upon the world.

I cannot conclude my remarks without challenging some statements made by two of my colleagues, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) and the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne). Those two members miss no opportunity of expressing their antagonism towards the government.

The member for Three Rivers deplores the fact that our country is always trying to play a leading part in international ventures. If he will only refer to Hansard, he will see that at the very moment when our war effort seemed to me far above our strength, his own leader thought that we were not doing enough. I am sure that the hon. member for Three Rivers would then take the first opportunity to change his mind as to the part our country is called upon to play in international disputes or international relations between Canada and other nations. I admit that, in certain circumstances, our efforts went beyond what could be expected of us. But where the hon. member becomes utterly ridiculous is when he inquires why the minister (Mr. Pearson) attended the meeting held in London by those we call the "big powers", especially, he adds, without having been invited.

The hon. member admits that we have interests to protect in Europe but he fails to see why we should seek information on the subject which was under examination at that conference: the rearming of Germany.

[Mr. Dupuis.]

For my part I think that it was necessary for our Secretary of State for External Affairs to remain in touch with the question, in such a way as to make it possible for him to give facts and reasons to his colleagues in this Canadian parliament.

I would like to take this opportunity—though I would not like to be accused of flattery—to express to the Secretary of State for External Affairs my very sincere personal admiration for the leading part he has played in the United Nations and abroad. He has caused our country to be better known and, in so doing, he has informed all nations concerned of our firm determination to defend peace. At the same time, he has most certainly contributed to the solution of economic questions and of various other problems, to the benefit of this country of ours.

German rearmament is of very weighty consequence for humanity as a whole and everything done to promote it will be such as to serve our cause.

Our minister may have no lesson to take from me, but he will nevertheless be well-advised to remain in constant touch with all questions which are of close or remote interest to us and, on occasion, to make his views known. So far his presence has been of service to our own country and to our cause.

As regards the member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne), he also is bent on criticizing the government. In his opinion, parliament should have been convened sooner. Did that dear colleague of ours want us to make a decision before the very countries which, according to the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), are primarily interested in studying the matter, had made their decision known as to the advisability of admitting Western Germany into NATO and consequently of granting this new ally the right to rearm? I say to these two members to agree with one another. One of them claims that we are proceeding ahead of time and the other, who shares the same political views, states that we are not proceeding quickly enough and that we should decide matters even before the parties primarily interested have made a decision. This I say with the best possible good will and spirit. Besides, it is not the first time that opinions do not seem to converge on the same point in the ranks of the opposition in this house.

However, such partisan criticism will not prevent, I am sure, a majority of members on the opposition benches as well as on the government benches from voting for the motion now before this house.

Our stand, which is not, I repeat, an aggressive one, will permit us to look to the future with greater serenity. God grant that the action we are now taking will bring us that peace we all pray for, and that the future of every country will be such that we will be glad to live there in human conditions which can materialize only through the behaviour of those who have but one wish: that the world may have peace and unity.

(Text):

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it has been stressed by many who have already spoken in this debate that at this time we face a difficult problem and an even more difficult decision. I agree with that. Perhaps I might go even a little further and say it is not only a difficult but an agonizing decision that will have to be made in this house within a matter of hours.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the previous speakers. I have listened with a great deal of respect to nearly all the previous speakers. But I regret that a small minority has seen fit to lower, in my estimation, the high plane on which this debate has been conducted by making inferences and casting aspersions on those who may be voting in opposition to this motion.

We differ in this house individually and along party lines. We comprise five groups, Liberals, Conservatives, C.C.F., Social Credit, and independents. We differ in outlook, viewpoint and program. But I have always taken pride in the belief that we do not differ in our love of this country, in our patriotism, and in our anti-communism and anti-communist line. We are all the same on that. Therefore I think I am quite in order in saying I regret that for reasons known only to themselves a few hon. members of this house have cast aspersions, such as fellow travellers, followers of the commie line, and commie stooges, upon those who do not agree with them.

I listened with a great deal of interest to all that has been said thus far, and particularly to the speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I could not but help note the great similarity in the proposals and terminology to that which was used over 30 years ago. In the past few days we have heard a great deal about the threat of Russian might; about the fact that we need a bulwark in Germany and that the price of Germany's admission to NATO will be the partial rearmament of that country.

That expression rang a bell, so I went down to the library and found my memory had served me well. The request for our support of this motion at this time is similar to the request made for the same purpose over 30 years ago, not at that time by the western powers or the United Nations, but by the German foreign office. Gustav Stresemann was chancellor and minister of foreign affairs in Germany from 1923 to 1929, and I would like to quote a statement by that gentleman in order to demonstrate the similarity to the present proposal. I quote from "Stresemann and the Revision of Versailles", page 139:

> It was the danger of a bolshevik penetration of Germany's eastern provinces, and the accompanying danger of insurrection, which caused Stresemann to demand an easing of the disarmament restrictions. Referring to allied protests against the citizens' militia which had sprung into existence everywhere in Germany, he addressed this warning to the west:
> "If the path is cleared for a victorious advance of bolshevism by (allied insistence upon complete disarmament of Germany), then bolshevism will not halt at the Rhine, not at the channel, unless it is stopped in Germany."

That was not from the speech of a few days ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs; those words were spoken just after the first world war.

There were other items, factual, interesting, and logical, which drew my attention but one other statement also rang a bell. That was the important statement wherein the minister stressed that the rearmament of Germany as a member of the NATO family would be governed by controls and restrictions, and completely supervised. We all welcomed that statement and appreciated the detail into which the minister went in dealing with it. But it is exactly what was heard 32 years ago.

Article 8 of the covenant of the league of nations is of great relevance in this regard. Perhaps hon. members would like to read it when time permits. But on that point I would like to quote from what I understand is a very authoritative book, namely "The Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences". I quote from page 480 of volume IX:

> The treaty of Versailles imposed drastic disarmament upon the defeated powers; it also declared (art. 8) "that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations" and entrusted to the council of the league of nations the task of drawing up plans of reduction, which should be subject to reconsideration at least every 10 years. Members of the league also undertook to interchange full and frank information as to the scale of their armaments and military programs.

The ideas advanced at that time under the sponsorship of the western powers within the league of nations were similar to the arguments being advanced today in support of the protocol now before this house. Yet despite the controls and agreements drawn up after the first world war under the organization of the democratic powers, we landed into a second world war.

I admit, and believe, it is the sincere hope and belief of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that this time it will be different; that this time rearmament and control under the auspices of the western powers will not lead to another world war. I earnestly hope the minister is correct. But history repeats itself; and the arguments advanced so far do not, in my opinion, contain enough convincing evidence to show me that they are not out of the realm of prophecy and the problematical. There has not yet been given a sufficient cogency of argument to show that, just as we did not know of a Hitler at the end of the last world war, we may not in the future see in Germany the rise of somebody else, be he a dictator of nazism or a dictator of communism, both to be abhorred. Those two points, Mr. Speaker, I bring in only by the way, but they are important.

I noticed that almost without exception those who have spoken said they had arrived at the conclusion that this matter could not be discussed from a viewpoint of emotionalism but that it could be considered only from a standpoint of realism. I cannot understand that kind of thinking. In fact I completely disagree with it. I make no apologies whatsoever for the fact that, in the time I have left, I intend to speak on an emotional basis because real emotionalism is based upon deep understanding and deep feeling, and deep feeling is engendered by a study and analysis of the facts.

Because we face a most difficult and agonizing decision that must be made on the floor of the House of Commons, to the best of my ability, for a great many days, I have been trying to study and to analyse the facts. I have under my desk at the present moment something in the neighbourhood of 20 authoritative books and publications issued by the government, and which are to be found in the library. It is on the basis of study and analysis of these facts that I have a deep feeling, and therefore speak with deep emotion.

What are the facts? They are as follows. It is only ten years, approximately, since the end of the second world war. What was the purpose of that world war which ended only about ten years ago? The purpose was to disarm Germany. What again is the fact? Ten years later we are being asked in this House of Commons to cast our votes in favour of a partial rearmament of the country that we fought to disarm. Canada is a nation large in area and in influence but small in population. In our lifetime Canada has gone to war twice. What for? To disarm Germany.

In discussing this matter, Mr. Speaker, should we forget the price Canada paid? I do not think we should. In 1914 the population of Canada was 7,879,000. We played our part in going to war to stop aggression and disarm Germany. What price did Canada pay? The price was 56,634 dead and 149,732 wounded. In 1939 Canada had a population of 11,315,000, and again we went to war. For what purpose? To disarm Germany. What price did Canada pay in that war? The price she paid was 41,992 dead and 53,145 wounded.

That was the price in life and limb. In two wars to disarm Germany, what was the Canadian price in goods or in money, if you want to put it that way? According to the government records, it cost Canada $2 billion to wage the first world war and $20·25 billion to wage the second world war. We are obligated to take care of the dependents of our dead, and our wounded and their dependents. According to the department I contacted here a few days ago—and I want to thank them for their co-operation—as a result of those two world wars, in allowances to the dependents of the dead and the wounded until December 31 of last year—some 26 days ago—it had cost Canada $1,994,947,807. But that is not the end. The Department of National Defence has required money, to a great extent because of German aggression and the threat of German aggression and in later years, of course, because of another threat; but it is all because of war. Mr. Speaker, if we take all those publications called "Canada's Defence Program" issued by the Department of National Defence and add the figures together, we find that from 1919 up to and including the estimates for this fiscal year—excluding the cost of waging war, and excluding pensions—our defence expenditures have reached the fantastic sum of $19,828 million.

Let us for a moment just recapitulate the price Canada has paid, mostly to disarm Germany in two world wars. Here is the way it goes. In two wars, 98,626 dead and 202,877 wounded. That is the cost in life and limb. Then there is the cost of waging two world wars, namely $22¼ billion. Add to that the cost of pensions, and you get $24½ billion. Then if you add the cost of the defence department, you get $44,047,947,807.

It is only ten years since the war to disarm Germany ended. We are asked to forgive and forget. Sometimes it is a good thing to do so. We are asked to believe that there has been a change in the national viewpoint and outlook in that important country. We are asked to believe that under control that country can be directed. We are asked to forget the price

Canada paid. We are asked to forget that, up until ten years ago, Germany was the nation that prosecuted, persecuted, imprisoned, tortured, crucified and murdered millions of innocents. We are asked to believe that all that has changed.

Mr. Speaker, it is my own personal and humble opinion that Canada could do more for peace and the guarantee of peace if we would expend our every effort and any money we can spare to teach the new generation of Germans the meaning and practice of liberty, freedom and democracy rather than to rearm the generation that negated those principles throughout their entire lifetime.

I know there are many arguments in favour of supporting the resolution. I have heard it said that irrespective of what we do in the House of Commons this is a fait accompli and we cannot do anything about it. I agree that is correct. I have heard it said that even if it were not a fait accompli we cannot and should not try to keep Germany a secondary world power and keep her out of the family of nations. I can agree with that statement too. I have heard it said that even if this were not a fait accompli Germany will eventually become a sovereign nation, that she will rearm partially or fully and there is nothing we can do about it. I am inclined to agree with that, too.

But, sir, in view of the fact that it is only ten years since the last war, viewing the past record of Germany, viewing history and what it teaches, I say there is one thing that we can do, at least there is one thing I can do as a Canadian citizen honoured to have a voice and a vote on the floor of the House of Commons. I can decline to put my stamp of approval on the rearmament of Germany at the present time, and that is the way I intend to vote. Emotionalism? Perhaps. But it is based on deep feeling, and the deep feeling is based upon facts.

Two generations of Canadians have gone down under German guns, and at this time, with all the evidence that is before us, I cannot see myself giving approval to what might mean a third generation of Canadians having to face German guns.

As I said when I started, Mr. Speaker, it is a difficult matter requiring a difficult decision, a decision that is agonizing for all of us. I appreciate all the arguments that have been put forward in favour of the motion. I appreciate the arguments that have been put forward by those who oppose it. I hold all those who are going to vote for the motion in the deepest respect. I pay particular honour to my own leader who, because of conscience, conviction and judgment, has come to a different decision from some of the rest of us.

So, Mr. Speaker, because I feel this way, because my feelings are based on facts, I intend when the time comes to stand in my place and be counted in opposition to the rearming of Germany at the present time.

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I shall be comparatively brief. I am one of those who feel that diplomacy with Russia is carried on better today with a sword in one hand and a treaty in the other than with a treaty alone. That is a harsh thing to have to say on Robert Burns' day, who sang of the time when men shall brothers be for a' that, but I think we have to realize the facts that face us in the world and not engage in wishful thinking when we are debating an issue such as the one now before us.

Two weeks ago deputations came here to call on us. A group of these men and women tramped out in the snow in front of the building a message which read, "Don't rearm the nazis". It was interesting to note that the message could be seen only from one particular point in the building, and only when the sun cast a shadow at a particular time of the day. At other times and from other positions the message, "Don't rearm the nazis" faded until it was unintelligible, until it became nothing more than depressions in the snow. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that much of what we have heard in support of that message, "Don't rearm the nazis", has had its origin in a comparatively narrow point of view, and that when we stand back and view all the aspects of the situation we must come to realize that at this time there is probably no other course open to us.

I think we come to that conclusion because "Don't rearm the nazis" is a negative attitude. On the other hand the entry of Germany into NATO, bringing her once again into the family of nations, is a positive step toward world understanding and world peace. In this connection I should like to pay particular tribute to one ethnic group in Canada and the attitude they have taken on this question. I have made a particular effort to discuss this matter with a number of leaders of the Jewish community, and I have invariably found, just as has been expressed in the house by two members who are of that particular ethnic group, that they approach this resolution and what it entails with misgivings, with unhappiness, but they are prepared to accept it because they feel it is in the best interests of all of us. I think that is a mark of true Canadianism.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that one of the responsibilities of the house, if not the major responsibility, is to lead Canada and its people, and to make our own decisions once all aspects of a situation have been studied and we have heard all sides of an argument. In this respect—and it is regrettable—I think in the past few months the government have defaulted because they have made no effort to inform the people of Canada, as they should have informed them, of all aspects of this question. The government point of view may be well known in Bonn, Germany, Paris, London and all the other places to which these perambulating ministers go, but lamentably the facts are not and have not been well known to the people of Canada. I think perhaps the Gallup poll taken a little while ago which indicated that almost three-quarters of the people of Canada could not name one single cabinet minister is an indication of the lack of effort on the part of these hon. gentlemen to get their story across to the people of Canada.

One more point, Mr. Speaker. In February, 1954, speaking in Bonn, Germany, at a dinner for Dr. Adenauer, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said:

> It may be, however, that European unity in itself cannot be expected to furnish an answer to the problems that face western Europe. Perhaps the time has now come to consider whether some of the steps towards closer integration, which we must take if our concept of civilization is not to perish, should be taken within the larger framework of the North Atlantic community. It would be difficult for me at this stage to particularize. But I suggest that we should perhaps be seeking solutions to the problems continuing to face you of achieving greater unity in Europe in a wider context and possibly in pursuit of article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty. It has become increasingly clear, I think, to all members of the NATO and to those many countries who are associated with us throughout the free world that our very survival and our continued development in freedom and in peace depends upon our ability to look beyond national barriers and to make them somewhat less artificial and more satisfactory.

There was more in the same vein. That was a year ago, and I think it is regrettable that in the year that has passed this government has not taken more forward-looking steps and more concrete action to implement the suggestions made by the Prime Minister at that time. There is no particular use going around the world preaching this sort of thing unless we are in a position to follow it up and do what we can to bring it about. Honeyed words without action to back them up are of as little value in international affairs as they have been here in Canada. To bring Germany into NATO and let NATO remain static is not going to be a lasting solution to the problems about which we have heard so much in the last few days.

I think the government would be well advised to go back and examine these suggestions of the Prime Minister, this promise inferentially held out of something that will be done by NATO under article 2, to see just what they are going to do to implement the proposition set forth a year ago.

I shall vote for this motion and for ratification of the treaties, not on any emotional basis, not because of any reason other than that, having examined the facts of the case and having listened to the presentations made in the house, it is my firm conviction that a vote for this motion is a vote for peace.

(Translation):

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, as has been said on various occasions during this debate, the decision we have to take following the motion made by the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is of the highest moment.

For a great number of Canadians, the painful memory of the last years following the second world war is not without a morrow, and the rearmament of Western Germany brings to mind a page of history that is not easily forgotten. We remember with much grief the considerable loss of lives our nation has suffered at the hands of Hitler's men, and the wounds inflicted upon our people in concentration camps are not yet entirely healed.

But from the clear, brilliant and complete comments made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I gather that the decision we will reach should borrow from reason and realistic judgment that which the heart refuses to understand.

We can more easily understand the approval of this motion, when we recall the confusion caused among the free nations by France's refusal to accept the plan for a European defence community.

At that moment we feared that all the efforts made to maintain unity among western democracies would be of no avail and that a gap exceedingly hard to close had rent the wall of collective security which we had endeavoured to build against communist imperialism. Luckily for us, repeated efforts have made possible a new plan which we are called upon to ratify today and whose aim is approximately that of the European defence community.

Like many others, I received representations to the effect that the rearming of Western Germany could one day work against us.

It is certain that any international agreement is not riskproof. However, a study of the results which will follow the ratification of the protocol is enough to dispel any doubts and make one decide in favour of the motion. Moreover, the clauses which limit the rearming of Western Germany and which are incorporated into the agreement remove a good deal of the fears that have been expressed.

Perhaps we might have better reason to fear the rearmament of Eastern Germany, which is already an accomplished fact, for who, among the free nations of the world, will dare say that in that part of Germany now under Russian occupation, they need more than one hundred thousand constables, abundantly equipped with tanks and artillery, to maintain peace and order. We all recognize that such a force under Russian control is nothing but a link in the powerful organization set up by Russia in order to make its ascendancy over the world more easily felt.

This decision to rearm our former enemy, which the latter is accepting without compulsion, not only is a direct result of the principles embodied in NATO, but also finds a justification in the continuous opposition raised by the Russians and the relentless stubbornness they show each time the question of an agreement on the unification of Germany comes up.

Moreover, this rearmament is always associated with the principle stated in the Potsdam agreement, namely, to unify Germany for the security of all nations.

Surely, this rearming of western Germany is a sad necessity, but it is the imperative duty of free nations to maintain all the forces required to prevent and deter aggression.

The experience of the last few years and recent events clearly show that the countries behind the iron curtain will be ready to stop their imperialistic march only when they realize that the wall of collective security that we are building in conjunction with our allies is unconquerable. This measure is another stone in the masonry of this wall and it would be unfortunate if Canada, by rejecting it, were to be an obstacle to the laying of this stone.

The welfare of nations in the face of communism requires a security based on the solidarity of all democratic countries. Once this security has been achieved, we all hope that it will then be possible to turn our efforts and our energy to the improvement of the common good in the peace we have been seeking for so long and which we pray divine Providence to grant us.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, much of what I would like to say has been said by my colleagues in this debate. Consequently I am not going to be repetitious. At the same time there are a number of observations I feel I should make at this time on this very important question.

It is gratifying to note the concern with which hon. members treat the subject now before us. The length and the quality of the debate are indicative of the growing interest in international affairs. I believe that parliament more and more should undertake responsibility in making decisions of this kind. I am rather disappointed that we are in the nature of a consultative body, asked to place the stamp of approval on decisions that have been made on our behalf by the minister. I realize that this is necessary in the diplomatic world today, but I do feel that on matters of general policy such as this it should be possible for the government to seek the feeling of the house. Along with other hon. members I think this house could well have met last fall to give more serious consideration to the matter now before us.

We find many hon. members rising and expressing deep concern and grave doubts regarding the wisdom of the step we are now taking. It is only logical that there are going to be differences in conclusions. I think it inconceivable that when so many hon. members are undecided, finding it difficult, as the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) did last night, to reach a decision on this matter, there should not be differences in conclusions. I think that is a test of the strength of a democratic government. Only under an authoritarian or totalitarian regime do you find conformity with government policy a necessary thing.

I find it a little difficult to understand the attitude revealed by one or two members who have spoken, who seem to indicate that once the government has laid down its position on a particular matter, then it becomes automatically in the best interests of the country and those who oppose and who hold contrary views are acting against the best interests of the country. We had one speech along those lines last evening, in which an hon. member expressed surprise that there should be some members who have the temerity to question the wisdom of what the government is proposing to do. I believe that, certainly in the field of international affairs as with domestic affairs, a difference of opinion is to be desired. Just because there is uniformity of opinion does not mean that when a mistake is made the consequences of that mistake are any less serious. I think the Globe and Mail struck that note in an editorial, when it pointed out that while the C.C.F. might be mistaken, at least they were bringing to the attention of the house many of the serious doubts that had existed in the minds of the people of Canada. That is our job as an opposition, and I for one have no apology whatsoever to make for taking issue with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The high level of the debate, with few exceptions which are hardly worthy of note, indicates that we can look forward in the future to a discussion of international affairs on a sane and sober level. In the way it is handling this problem the house can set an example to the country as a whole so that Canadian citizens will not find themselves in the position of those who were described by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) the other night when, at page 382 of Hansard, he said:

> I believe that a good many serious-minded, loyal citizens of this country have possibly been silenced for fear that they might be classed as communists or communist sympathizers.

That such a situation could exist in Canada is a matter of serious regret, because it offers a threat to our time-honoured tradition of free speech and discussion. Those who resort to the tactics which might have brought about this situation have nothing to be proud of, because they are weakening the very fabric of our democratic system.

Many speakers have referred to the fact that the labour progressive party were quite active in trying to influence members of parliament in the past month or so; but to use this as an excuse for voting for the motion is absurd and ridiculous, to say the least. If an hon. member is going to allow himself to be influenced one way or the other, directly or indirectly, by what the communist party says, then I suggest he is placing in the hands of this discredited fragment of our population an influence and power far out of proportion to their position in the political life of this country. I am quite certain that hon. members are capable of deciding on issues of this kind without being influenced, as I say, one way or the other by the group I have just mentioned. It is rather regrettable that one or two hon. members have sought, strictly for political purposes, to create the impression that anyone who is voting against the motion therefore must have been influenced into that position by this campaign.

I am not going to be told by the labour progressive party how to vote, directly or indirectly, one way or the other. I have no respect for that organization. They opposed me in the last election, and throughout my political experience I have had a great deal of trouble with them. For hon. members to seek cover on this particular issue by pointing to this delegation and using that as an excuse for going along with the rearming of Germany is to take a very weak position indeed.

In his address to the house last Thursday the Secretary of State for External Affairs put forth certain reasons why he felt the house should support the motion. Among other things he suggested that the rearming of West Germany would serve to unite the western democracies and knit closer together the members of the North Atlantic community. With this point of view I cannot agree. In my judgment no single issue in recent years has done more to divide the nations of the western world than this very question that is before the house today.

Other hon. members have pointed out that a motion similar to this was passed in the British House of Commons only by virtue of the fact that there were wholesale abstentions in the house vote. As the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) pointed out, there were around 100 Conservative members of the British House of Commons who did not go along with the government on this particular vote. I will grant you that some of the members may not have voted for other reasons, but in this instance it indicates an unusually large number of members, normally supporting the government, not going along with the Churchill government on this issue.

We know that a minority of the members of the British House of Commons voted on this matter. We know that when the matter was first brought before the national assembly in France the move to support German rearmament was defeated. The matter was introduced a week or so later; and after Mendes-France, with his tremendous prestige, had made it a vote of confidence and had wrapped up a package deal which included a social security measure, he was able to get it through the French assembly. But it must be pointed out that on that occasion the majority of the French assembly did not vote for it. I think the figures show that only 281 out of 627 deputies voted to rearm West Germany. Therefore it is correct to say that the majority of the members of the national assembly in France did not approve of German rearmament.

Opposition in France to German rearmament is not restricted to the communist party. As a matter of fact perhaps the most vociferous of the opponents of German rearmament have been the de Gaullists, the extreme right wingers, and of course the M.R.P., the Roman Catholic party in France. So those who would suggest that objection to German rearmament is confined to the communists should pause and reflect, because if they follow that line of argument to its logical conclusion they are condemning most of the people in the western democracies as fellow travellers or dupes of the communists. I suggest that when we consider this problem we should dismiss from our minds any thought that decisions, apart from decisions made by the communists themselves, are made on any other basis than that of sober consideration of the problems involved.

But while France and Great Britain accepted the rearmament of West Germany very reluctantly and with very grave misgivings, the opposition to German rearmament is more solid in West Germany itself. To judge from the remarks made by some members in this debate one might almost get the impression that the German people are on bended knee crying out to us for justice and demanding that we give them arms. We are told that we cannot deny the German people their place in the family of nations, that we cannot deny the West Germans the right to rearm; and when those arguments are put forth one gets the distinct impression that the German people are crying out for this right. My intelligence would indicate that the reverse seems to be the case, and I would suggest that if this proposed rearmament of West Germany is to go through in its final stages it will depend largely on our ability to sell that idea to the German people themselves.

Perhaps the greatest obstacle to the rearmament of West Germany will be opposition in that part of Germany itself. The people of Germany have been the victims of German militarism in the past, and they are not anxious to saddle themselves once again with the military cliques which in the past have proved so disastrous to the continuance of German democratic institutions. It would appear that in so far as the people of West Germany are concerned, rearmament will have to be brought about as the result of outside pressure.

It seems ironical that just a few short years ago we were saying we were so worried about German militarism, and now we are setting out to convince the German people that they ought to rearm, that they ought once more to set out on the path which has had such tragic consequences not only for the people of Germany themselves but for the peoples of the world.

I agree with the statement made last Thursday by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who said: "Does it not seem tragic and ludicrous that we should now turn completely around and plead with the Germans to think in terms of militarism, even if it is limited?" Yet in spite of this the minister would have us believe that the people of West Germany are insistent on their right to rearm. They want sovereignty, that is true; and I agree with the minister when he says that the first right of sovereignty is the right to arm. But I suggest that that right to arm is not a compulsion to arm. I suggest that this is a matter which could very well be left to the good judgment of the people of West Germany. I certainly feel that we as a parliament should not be asked to approve of something when we have grave doubts whether the people of West Germany want it at this time.

The division within Germany on the question of rearming is not difficult to understand. In the post-war years West Germany had the advantages of a demilitarized state. During this time West Germany made a remarkable recovery, due largely in point of fact to the happy position they were in of being able to devote all their energies and resources to peacetime pursuits. West Germany, free from the overpowering burden of a huge armaments program, has been able to rebuild her economy so that today many of our western businessmen are worried about the future of their markets in competition with the people of that country.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I had been discussing the remarkable recovery of West Germany from the effects of world war II, and had suggested that this was largely due to the fact that an unarmed West Germany has been able to devote her energies to peaceful pursuits. That perhaps is one of the reasons the German people are reluctant at this time to take on the burden of armaments.

I suggest that if we give the Germans time to build and time to purge themselves of the effects of 12 years of nazi brutality, West Germany could become a tower of strength in the democratic world. It is not an easy task to counteract the long period of nazi indoctrination of German youth. The Germans must have time to complete this task and to build enduring democratic institutions. Nothing can make that task more difficult, or perhaps wellnigh impossible, than the restoration to positions of power in Germany of a German military caste. Whatever may be the reasons advanced in support of West German rearmament at this time, let us not pretend too much concern over the German right to rearm, a right which at the present time they do not wish to exercise.

The point of view which I think best expresses German opinion is that enunciated by Erich Ollenhauer, leader of the German social democratic party. According to a report in the London Observer of September 26, 1954, Mr. Ollenhauer summed up his position quite tersely in these words:

> First, no West German rearmament before another attempt at agreement with Russia about German reunification and on all-European security. Second, even in the event of failure of such a happening, no irrevocable integration of Western Germany into a supranational western system, and third, German conciliation with France even at the price of postponed German rearmament.

I suggest that the fulfilment of the conditions laid down by this West German statesman would do more to contribute to the building of western unity than the present efforts to force West German rearmament both on Germany herself and on a reluctant and suspicious western Europe.

I referred a moment ago to the proposition that German reunification should be a prior goal to any talk of rearmament. Among Germans in both east and west reunification is and will be a burning issue. One thing is certain; there can be no possibility of a settled and peaceful Europe as long as Germany is artificially divided into east and west. West German rearmament must be considered in the light of this fact. The question that naturally arises on this point is this. Will West German rearmament now help or hinder efforts toward peaceful reunification? On the strength of the evidence at hand I believe that the rearmament of West Germany at this time will make reunification more difficult than ever.

When we have an armed West Germany the logical consequence will be that we will have yielded whatever bargaining power we now possess. The Russians will hold the trump card, for they alone will be in a position to bargain with West Germany on the question of reunification. Russia alone could satisfy the German desire for a united Germany. And since, generally speaking, nations are motivated by self-interest, what reason have we to believe that an armed sovereign West Germany would not at some time in the future make a deal with the Russians?

The minister referred to a quotation the other day which went something like this: "Those who will not learn from the lessons of history are doomed to repeat it." When the minister made that statement my mind went back to 1939 and the German-Russian non-aggression pact of that period. I suggest that if we take note of that quotation we will exercise a greater degree of caution than is shown by some of those who support the motion now before the house.

We are told by the minister that we will have controls, and that these controls are foolproof. In other words we have nothing to worry about. The minister has great faith in the present West German government, but Adenauer will not be chancellor forever; and after Adenauer, what? These are questions that should be settled before we take the irrevocable step of placing arms in the hands of West Germans.

The German people are worried about this problem. I suggest that if they are worried about it, we also should be worried about it. Many in Germany and elsewhere fear that German rearmament at this time will lead to a West Germany dominated by the military. Such a government could take one of two steps to achieve the goal of reunification, both steps being unpalatable to the west. With an army, West Germany could seek by force of arms to achieve that which she has not been able to achieve by negotiation, namely the reunification of Germany. This could well provide the spark to set off a third world war.

The other course of action would be for a West German government to deal unilaterally with the Russians. It may be argued that these are possibilities rather than probabilities, but I believe the danger is there. I believe all hon. members should give serious consideration to the step they are being asked to take at this time. Are the 12 German divisions—which, of course, will be offset unquestionably by a similar build-up in the east—worth the terrific risks involved? That is a question which this house must answer.

In my view West German rearmament can be considered only in the light of two assumptions: first, that the efforts at German reunification be abandoned; or secondly, that reunification could be achieved by force. The first assumption is unacceptable. It is difficult to imagine that the German people will accept as permanent the division of their country into east and west. The second assumption is utterly unacceptable, since it involves a most serious threat to the peace of the world.

No one in this house has denied the risks and dangers involved in the rearmament of West Germany. The minister spoke of it as a tragic necessity. I too consider it tragic, but I cannot agree that it is a necessity. The arguments advanced by the minister have not convinced me of the absolute necessity of taking this irrevocable step. I shall vote against this motion because in my judgment the dangers and risks involved far outweigh the possible advantages.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, as one of the newest members of this house I had been hopeful that I could have been spared the necessity of taking part in this debate. I am sure this house also wishes that it could have been spared hearing me.

An hon. Member: Not at all.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): You may recall that last week, in speaking in the debate on the speech from the throne, I indicated that I could not criticize without offering a sound alternative. However, in this extremely serious problem that faces us tonight there is no alternative. I have received the delegations, the telegrams, the chain letters and the circulars. I have seen the results of German atrocities. Yes, I have even seen Belsen. Let me make it quite clear to the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis) that in the stand I am taking in this debate I am not hiding behind any animosity I harbour for the labour progressive party. The issue is as clear-cut as set out by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). The sides have been fairly taken.

We have all heard the arguments in support of the resolution, and they are arguments based not on emotion but rather on cold, hard facts. I shall support this motion. But I cannot deny the sincerity of many people who have been in touch with me in the past few weeks from my constituency of York West on the subject of German rearmament.

If I cannot criticize the stand this government is taking at this time, I wonder whether there are not some lessons to be learned from the series of events which have led up to this situation, and also perhaps some warnings to us with regard to the future. First of all, I cannot help agreeing with the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken) and the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) that this government has failed to inform the people of all the circumstances which led up to our present position. Under a democratic system it is the duty of any government to inform the public, to the best of its ability, of the conditions precedent to its policy decisions; and the blame cannot be placed on the press if access is not given to the necessary information.

In the present situation the public have not been fully aware of the fact that our "no alternative" position is the direct result of Russian communist unilateral action. For the same reason the public has not been convinced that our decision on the question of Germany's admission to NATO has been taken on our own initiative and not as a free rider on the tail of the Washington kite. The people of this country need to be convinced that our decisions are made in Ottawa. Let us hear more of the strong, clear voice of Canada in foreign affairs. In addition, there has been no solid assurance that Canada will play an important supervisory role in the rearmament program.

We must look at our decision tonight not as an end to a problem but as the starting point of a new phase in our international affairs. If we are not to break faith with those who sleep in Flanders fields, this time, supervision must work. As we cast our votes in favour of this plan, let us resolve that on the anniversary of this vote in following years we shall ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs for a report on the part we are playing in the supervision job that lies ahead, and we shall ask this time for no failure.

(Translation):

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, the proposed rearmament of Western Germany seems to upset and worry a great many of our fellow citizens.

As a matter of fact, if we were to take exclusively into account the history of Germany, the natural disposition of the German people to aggression and militarism, the atrocities and crimes committed by the Germans during the last war, then all that misgiving and worrying would surely be justified. However, I wonder whether it is fair to discuss that question only from the standpoint of Germany's past. I do not think it is. Since the last war, events have taken place that have deeply modified diplomatic relations between all nations, such as the creation of the United Nations Organization. Now less than ten years old, that organization has nevertheless marked a new chapter in the history of the world. Although we are generally inclined to look at the failings of UNO and to seldom consider its accomplishments, I think that some of these accomplishments will remain graven on the memories of men.

It should be mentioned here that in 1946, through a decision of its security council, UNO brought about the withdrawal of communist troops from certain provinces of Iran, at a time when their continued presence would certainly have caused war. A few weeks later, through the work of the UNO security council, British and French forces were made to leave Lebanon, a move which prevented the outbreak of another war.

In 1947 the clash between Indonesia and The Netherlands was put to an end through negotiations and conciliation. We can add to that list the gradual pacification of the frontiers of Greece, the armistice in Palestine, the cease-fire in the struggle between India and Pakistan.

For the first time in the history of the world an international police force made up of soldiers from fifteen sovereign states fought under the United Nations flag against an enemy force which had just invaded Korea. It is also thanks to the United Nations that we have been able to bring hostilities to a close in that country. It would seem to me that these are important events that must be considered in examining the rearmament of Germany.

The setting up of NATO has been, in itself, a revolutionary undertaking in that it has banded together a group of European countries for the purpose of establishing collective defence and security, each country giving up a part of its sovereignty in order to contribute to mutual defence. That point, Mr. Speaker, is highly important with regard to this whole discussion.

Science has also contributed to changing the international scene. All of us will remember with what feelings we learned that it was the atomic bomb, in all its destructive power, which had put an end to the second world war. Since that time, we have been given the opportunity to ascertain the destructive force of the hydrogen bomb, which scared statesmen so, that nearly all leaders have exerted pressure to have the use of thermonuclear weapons prohibited.

Events moved on, so to speak, and at the suggestion of the president of the United States we saw the birth of an embryonic international atomic agency which nursed the hope of using thermonuclear energy for the welfare of the world rather than for its destruction.

You have no doubt heard about the progress made on the question of disarmament. Incidentally, on the question of disarmament, to those who seem to believe that Canada is assuming unjustified international prestige, I should like to point out that if there has been the slightest agreement on the question of disarmament, if there has been the least progress, it was due to the prestige, initiative and efforts of Canada in the United Nations. I had the honour to be present when this matter was discussed. I had the opportunity of witnessing the efforts put forth and the work done by the leader of the Canadian delegation who was, at the time, the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). I also realized that our country enjoyed in UNO and among all the nations of the world a measure of prestige which we do not even suspect here in Canada.

Everyone knows that we did not have to add to our military obligations; that did not cost the Canadian people one cent more. Besides we know that disarmament, if it could be achieved, would reduce not only international tension but also our foreign commitments and our national defence expenditures. As we all know, the amounts earmarked for the defence of our country make up more than half our budget. I cannot believe that we have come to the point where the government is criticized because Canada enjoys too great a prestige on the international plane.

However, Mr. Speaker, in view of all these happenings, we may say that our position is not the same as in 1914 or 1939. And what might not have seemed feasible at that time might be so today. For instance, I think we should now count on the rearmament of Germany on certain conditions.

All fears and worries that have been expressed about the rearmament of Germany have their source in two theories. In the first place, it has been said that, by giving arms to Germany, we are opening wide the gates leading to a new state of militarism that probably will bring about a third world war.

In the speech he delivered last week, the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) did not try to minimize the risks and dangers we were incurring. He gave us to understand that the very powers who proposed to rearm Germany recognized those dangers and deemed it necessary, in fact, to include in the protocol strict restrictions with respect to the quantity and the types of arms Germany would be allowed to keep. Moreover, the army in question, as we know, will be placed under the control of the NATO forces.

Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of underestimating the dangers which may exist. There are dangers and we recognize them but on the other hand we can be equally certain, morally certain, that every European nation, every member state of NATO, the United Nations themselves and, more particularly, France will watch closely for any tendency toward any expansion of the German army. If France, it seems to me, could ratify those agreements and accept the rearming of Germany, in spite of the sufferings imposed upon her thrice by Germany, we can be morally assured that every necessary precaution had been taken before approving the agreement.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) on the speech he made last week. It reflected profound and legitimate emotion, but it was also inspired by cold and calculated reasoning and logic. I am sure that the hon. member for Cartier is not enthusiastic about voting to rearm Germany, but that he will do so in the light of the present situation and as the lesser of two evils.

The second theory which has given rise to those misgivings is that, by rearming Germany, we will antagonize the Russians to the point that they might start a new world war. As for antagonizing the Russians, Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the rearmament of Germany is going to antagonize them, but I am not ready to say that they will be antagonized to the point of starting a new world war. As a matter of fact, they have not made any important gain in the west European countries, because they fear the moral power of the European union and the military power of NATO.

It seems to me that it is our duty to bring more strength to that organization which, so far, has kept at bay the armed forces of the communists.

It must also be borne in mind, Mr. Speaker, that German rearmament and the integration of Germany into NATO is not only important, but absolutely necessary with regard to the establishment of adequate defences in western Europe. And it is precisely because Russia is afraid of this strengthening of NATO that, immediately following the London conference, she lost her head and sent out proposals and suggestions of all kinds, or invitations to conferences devoid of any meaning. It is for that very same reason too that Russia has contacted the communist party in Canada, enjoining it to exert pressure on every fellow-traveller group in this country, so that the federal government, and more particularly this parliament, would go on record as opposing German rearmament.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in the circumstances any attempt to diminish either the moral strength of the European union or the potential military strength of NATO would be a victory for Russian propaganda. And furthermore it is a notice, it is further evidence of the fiendish propensity of Russia to hide her hand so well, in the hope that the western powers be made to swallow gall for honey. We should not once again fall into this trap.

Besides, I sincerely believe that the true solution to this problem is much more important than the question of rearming Germany. This solution lies rather in the free nations giving the North Atlantic Treaty Organization all the support required to give it the strength and the effectiveness necessary to keep in check the communist threat of aggression on the one hand and, on the other hand, the necessary authority to be able to solve any problem likely to arise within the organization itself.

There will always be time, Mr. Speaker, to achieve universal disarmament once we have been given proof of the sincerity and good will of the communists.

If we cannot, Mr. Speaker, vote with enthusiasm for German rearmament, we should at least vote with determination and with confidence in the NATO forces which, since the beginning of the cold war, have held in check powerful communist forces in each one of the satellite countries of Russia.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we should have faith in NATO. Of course there are serious dangers in this whole question. We have to choose the lesser of the two dangers which we have to face. Those are facts and conditions which exist and which we cannot change, and this reminds me of this prayer of an English philosopher whose name I forget: Lord, give us enough serenity to accept the things which cannot be changed; enough strength to change the things which can be changed; and enough wisdom to differentiate between the two.

Mr. Speaker, after having considered for a long time this question of great import for the whole world, I intend to vote with confidence and without mental reservation for the rearming of Germany.

(Text):

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, tonight I am going to begin by begging the indulgence of the house to permit me to cite one or two experiences I had last fall. I think perhaps I am entitled to that indulgence because you will recall that last year I was the sole worker in this particular vineyard of debate, whereas this year there has been such a rush of workers that I have been almost squeezed out of the gate. So I am going to take a few minutes to tell of my experiences last year in Germany and in Berlin.

About four months ago I was in west Berlin, speaking to various people there, asking them about conditions in Berlin both east and west, asking about the way one might travel from the west sector to the east sector, speaking to such people as an old bookseller who told us about his quite hair-raising experiences the year before when he had had to flee from east Berlin to save his life because he had resisted police pressure to allow his bookstore to be used as a point of control.

I had conversations with many people, in particular one lady who lived in Wannsee, whose son was a doctor, and whose practice took him into the east sector. She told us of her anxiety until her son arrived home each evening. I heard endless tales of almost unbelievable brutality and oppression in the east sector, tales which tragically were only too well authenticated.

With my wife I inquired about going from the west sector to the east sector, and we got conflicting answers. Some people held up their hands in horror at the very thought of anyone taking the unnecessary risk of going into the east zone. Others suggested that there was not any very great risk, that it was easy enough to accomplish.

We had gone to Berlin with the express purpose of seeing in east Berlin what we could of the communist regime. So one day we started down the Charlottenburgersallee to the Brandenburg gate, which is the division between the east and west zones of Berlin, a very interesting experience. Perhaps three or four cars went down that street while we walked the mile to the gate. Those cars were stopped, and the drivers and passengers put through a most careful and searching inquisition by the east German police. Even the few people who were on bicycles were stopped and were interrogated. But apparently, with the irrationality which often distinguishes totalitarian regimes, no one had suggested to them that they should ask questions of pedestrians.

So when my wife and I walked past the Soviet war memorial and through the Brandenburg gate, all that happened was that some rather puzzled and wondering glances were thrown in our direction by the armed German police. Nothing more was done. It was a most unpleasant sensation, however, to walk through the Brandenburg gate with these armed gentlemen behind us, wondering just what was going to happen.

We went through the gate to the Unter den Linden. We went into various establishments. We went there to find out what we could, and our first experience of what it is like to be in a police state occurred when we were standing in front of Humboldt University on the Unter den Linden. My wife was translating for me the notice on the board outside the university when I observed that a jeep had drawn up alongside the curb and a very unpleasant, young-looking man in uniform was gazing at us carefully and very searchingly. My wife went on translating. Out of the corner of my mouth I murmured, "The cops are here." She murmured back, "I know", then she took a deep breath, twirled around and stepped across the sidewalk in front of this man and asked him if we could go into the building, not having any idea what the building was.

Wherever we went we were confronted with that. We experienced the unpleasant sensation that there was always a man in uniform, someone watching us very carefully, and a most unpleasant experience it is. We had it even in a restaurant. It was a very eerie experience. It was a very good restaurant, good meals, not too expensive, crowded—and almost dead silence prevailed. It was a most unnerving and eerie experience to sit in a restaurant and hear only the occasional clatter of tools, and perhaps a murmured request for the salt. There was no conversation.

We went into the Karl Marx museum dedicated to that communist worthy. It was a very disheartening experience for a socialist, I may say, to see men, whose lives were devoted to a critical analysis of human society and, whether we agree with their methods or not, to the introduction of a better form of society, to see such people made into the objects of really idolatrous veneration. It was to me most repugnant and most unpleasant. In east Berlin there are obvious signs, to the most superficial observer, of a very unpleasant and evil state of oppression.

One can readily understand why those people in east Berlin in June of 1953 took their lives in their hands, as is set forth in this pamphlet that we got in west Berlin. There are pictures here of young men throwing brickbats at tanks, pictures of communists fleeing to the west sector. One can readily understand that after being in east Berlin. It was a very unpleasant experience, and certainly no one in his right senses would want to see such regimes spread their influence any further throughout the world.

But, Mr. Speaker, I had a question asked me repeatedly by Germans, both in Berlin and in other parts of West Germany. "What is your alternative to coming to some sort of terms with these people, short of war?" That question was asked of me repeatedly. The question is one I ask tonight. It is a question I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson); because if, as we were told the other day, the Canadian government is committed to wholehearted support of the view of the German people that German reunification must be the foundation of all policy with regard to Germany, then I have this question to ask. How do we propose, without war, to rescue those 18 million people from the communist regime which is now oppressing them, unless we are prepared to sit down and negotiate?

There is something intellectually dishonest in pretending or even implying that there may be some third alternative to negotiation or war; that there may be some way in which we can avoid having to negotiate with these people and thus remain on good terms with our United States friends, and at the same time avoid war and remain on good terms with our common sense and reason; but I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, there is no third alternative. We have only two prospects before us.

How do we propose to go about dealing with this great danger, this unpleasant situation? We propose to rearm a part of Germany in the face of widespread and growing dismay among the German people, and in the face of the often expressed fears of the Russians which, the Secretary of State for External Affairs admitted the other day, are understandable if possibly unreasonable fears.

What has been presented for approval in this house? When I was preparing notes for my speech, Mr. Speaker, I took occasion to check over some of the words of our Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I came to the conclusion that for one who formerly had at least some pretensions to being an historian, there were some remarkably shaky pieces of history in his argumentation. I was very interested tonight to note that the Ottawa Citizen is of the same opinion, and feels that poor history has had very rough handling at the hands of the Canadian parliament and no more rough handling than at the hands of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

As proof of the reckless and characteristic intransigence of our communist antagonists, we were told on Thursday last that the Berlin blockade was an example of the senseless, dangerous attitude of these people, and evidence of the folly of hoping to come to terms with them. I am quite prepared to agree that it was a senseless and dangerous procedure on the part of the Soviet authorities, but I do suggest that anyone wishing to present an historically true picture of the situation would have been obliged to mention the fact that that move, that senseless, dangerous move, wicked if you like, the blockade of Berlin was the direct result of an antecedent event. That event had been, of course, the expressed intention of the western powers to integrate the three western zones of Germany into one and to give it at least semi-sovereign status.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is indispensable to anyone who professes to present an historical review of circumstances to mention the whole chain of events. I am not arguing the merits or the demerits of the action taken at that time, but I do emphasize that one was the direct result of the other. It is dangerous folly for us to take actions of the communists that we dislike, examine them in isolation and overlook the antecedent events that led up to those actions.

We are told also that the Berlin conference of last year proved that an honourable and acceptable basis for agreement on German unity did not exist. I myself, Mr. Speaker, of course would hesitate to question the infallibility of our Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I would remind the house that a great many observers of the foreign scene of almost such stature came to a different conclusion. I would place on the record again the comments made in the London Observer, which is usually considered to be a fairly authoritative and objective journal, certainly not one that is tinged with communism or socialism. Speaking of the Berlin conference Sebastian Haffner, a very eminent observer, had this to say:

> It would be rash for anyone to claim positively at this stage that Mr. Molotov's plan provides an acceptable form of that general "Locarno" or "mutual security" idea in Europe for which many western statesmen, from Sir Winston Churchill to Dr. Konrad Adenauer, the West German chancellor, have been groping during the last year, and which is indispensable—as has come to be widely recognized—if there is to be a general pacification of Europe. It would however be rasher still to deny the possibility that something on these lines might be developed from a patient and serious exploration of Mr. Molotov's proposal.

The eagerness with which the three western ministers in Berlin tried to sweep it off the table without consideration has been rather terrifying. It is undoubtedly one of the more intriguing proposals which have turned up since the war, and it should be the subject of careful study and diplomatic exchange, not only between the powers which were disputants at Berlin but among all interested European governments. It would be a great pity if the hastily contrived conference speeches and press comments of these hectic weeks were to be considered the last word on it.

Unfortunately that great pity came to pass. We all know that our Secretary of State for External Affairs occupies an eminent position in the world, but he has not hesitated to follow the rather rash course deplored by Sebastian Haffner. Just what did we do at Berlin? The suggestion is made that it was only the Soviet union who, shall we say, behaved in an intransigent manner. Just what proposal did we put to them? In essence the proposal was that the Russians should withdraw from East Germany, that they should agree to the unification of Germany on a basis which they and everyone else know meant adherence of that united Germany to the western bloc, and moreover there was to be an armed Germany.

Regardless altogether of our views of the communist world, regardless of our views of the Soviet regime, will anyone make the suggestion that that was a proposal we could reasonably expect them to accept? I could quote a great many competent non-communist observers who have suggested that Sir Anthony Eden's statements at that time were at least a little disingenuous, particularly when he suggested that the west was so generous that it did not mind to which bloc the newly united Germany would adhere. I suggest that if he did not mind to which bloc they adhered he had no business speaking for us. I suggest moreover that he knew perfectly well that if Germany were united because the western powers were able to bully or cajole the Soviet union into moving out of East Germany, naturally because of gratitude and self-interest they would move solidly into the western bloc. Let us face that fact frankly.

It has been pretended that it was a reasonable proposition. The fact that the Russian counter-proposal also contained some unacceptable jokers and some dishonesties, which it did, is no excuse whatever for pretending that our proposals were reasonable ones offered in the expectation that they would be accepted. I think we have the right to expect perhaps a more intelligent and adult conduct of our affairs in the face of this very dangerous and cunning adversary.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo).]

My colleague the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) made reference to the latest Soviet note. I think it is rather significant that the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not see fit to mention that the other day in his historical review. One might have thought he would have considered it relevant to this discussion. Whether it be good or bad, or acceptable or unacceptable, one can only presume that it is to be given the same unintelligent and cavalier treatment given to former suggestions.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested reasons why the Russians refused free elections last year. I think he is quite right in this. What happened in West Berlin was that the communists received only some 2·7 per cent of the vote. I was amazed that they got even that. But there was another conclusion to be drawn from this. While it is quite true, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs says, that the communists must have shuddered at the result of this, I suggest that Dr. Adenauer also must have had a few tremors because his party also went down to defeat. There was an indication in that West Berlin election that a reunited Germany meant the end of the Adenauer regime. I have no doubt that Willi Pieck would shudder. I expect that Konrad Adenauer had a shake to himself. So much for what I have termed the rather dubious historical foundation for the case put up by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I should like to say a word or two about the manner in which this case was presented. I wish I could agree with those who have complimented the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I really cannot. There was a time when responsible statesmen in dealing with foreign nations with which their country was presumably at peace observed a careful reserve and decorum in their statements. It was considered that until war broke out abuse was not very helpful, that it might indeed place obstacles in the way of reaching conclusions. Naturally the minute war broke out the lid was off.

I was somewhat dismayed, to be quite frank, at the tone of the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I had the feeling that instead of it being an adult, sophisticated, cold analysis of a dangerous situation which we had the right to expect, it was, on the other hand, a rather embarrassing combination of, what shall I say, hillbilly self-righteousness and disregard of the real actualities. It was an oversimplified way of presenting a very complex situation.

Let me quote what he said, as reported on page 362 of Hansard of January 20:

> The communist dictators have already dragooned hundreds of millions of men into highly centralized empires which deny the dignity and worth of the individual except as a creature of the state.

That may be factually true, although if by that he means that those hundreds of millions are struggling at the leash and waiting for the moment when we can release them, then I suggest it is a most dangerous delusion indeed. I would commend to the Secretary of State for External Affairs the words of a very eminent statesman spoken only last month in the city of Boston, which I should like to quote. They were as follows:

> An arrogant Pharisaism and smug satisfaction with one's own superior righteousness, in a person or in a nation, are not only unamiable qualities, they are not conducive to clear political judgment. He whose humility and moral sensitivity is least highly developed, is most likely to confuse principle with question of fact or expediency, and to make an easy subconscious identification of his own viewpoint with the cause of right.
> Furthermore, self-righteousness in international affairs is likely to lead to rigidity of thought and intolerance of other views. This often prevents a wise understanding of complex and changing situations; and tends to make diplomacy captive and inflexible.

The author of those admirable words—and I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you will agree with me that they were wise and admirable words—was a gentleman by the name of Lester B. Pearson. But of course the Secretary of State for External Affairs was not addressing the Canadian House of Commons; he was addressing the assembly of the national council of the churches of Christ in the United States of America. Perhaps more important still, he was addressing them in the city of Boston, which has a well-deserved reputation of being allergic, shall I say, to the more illiterate forms of expression; of being allergic to oversimplifications and crudities of every sort.

I think it is to be regretted that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not considered the members of this House of Commons to be as worthy of that carefully considered and, if I may say so quite frankly, profound thinking that is expressed here, and instead saw fit to give us a sort of superman comic strip, a simplified and highly coloured statement about a very complex situation.

Mr. Pearson: What are we getting now?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Not very highly coloured. I would suggest that it is not only discourteous to this house but it is also very dangerous to encourage the attitude that there is a simple, clear-cut answer to these difficult and complex problems, and that there is a simple, clear-cut analysis of conditions and events in many parts of the world. To suggest that, I believe, is merely to ask for trouble.

There are some questions I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs should answer before he can satisfy a great many people in Canada. He told us first of all that 12 divisions or approximately 500,000 men mobilized into ground troops and with an air force in Germany are necessary for our safety against the threat of communist aggression. Here is the question I wish to ask. Is the minister seriously presenting to this house the suggestion that these 12 divisions will make any material difference in our strength vis-à-vis the enormous concentration of troops which he himself referred to the other day on the floor of this house? Is he seriously suggesting that 12 divisions of German troops are going to count against some 250 communist divisions plus 135 divisions easily mobilizable, according to a military expert in the New York Times? Is he suggesting that it is a serious matter of defence, and that is why we have to arm the Germans? I doubt very much whether the minister seriously contends that. If he does there is nothing more to be said. We shall have to leave him with his clay pipe and bowl—

Mr. Pearson: If the hon. gentleman would like me to do so I shall answer him now by saying that I never at any time in my speech made any such suggestion.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Then that clarifies the matter admirably, and the whole case based on the fact that the rearmament of West Germany is an essential part of western defence falls to the ground.

Mr. Pearson: Your whole case falls to the ground.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Apparently the minister is not sure whether he takes that position or not, but I am going to suggest to him that if he is not prepared to clarify that situation in the minds of the Canadian people —and he has certainly given the impression to this house and to the Canadian people that these 12 German divisions are an important factor in our defence—then he had better tell us what the real goals are. Is it to be 20 divisions, 30, 50 or 100 divisions? Is it going to include thermonuclear weapons?

The minister also tells us that it is safe to rearm West Germany because we have devised means of control. But almost in the same breath he tells us that we have no option about it, because the Germans are a proud people and will insist on rearmament anyway. I would ask the minister by what process of reasoning he considers it will be easier to control a rearmed West Germany than a Germany which he says we cannot control now? It simply does not make sense.

He told us that the Canadian government fully support the German people in their insistence that reunification must remain an essential goal of German policy. But he must tell us how he proposes to bring that about short of war, unless it is by negotiation. I would suggest too, Mr. Speaker, that one cannot negotiate, even from strength—if by negotiation from strength we mean something more than the issuing of ultimatums—we cannot negotiate from strength unless we have something the other people want and we are prepared to give them in exchange for something they have which we want. That is the essence of negotiation.

In addition, I suggest there is only one thing the Russians want in exchange for reunification, and that is a disarmed and neutralized Germany. Now, I am told—

An hon. Member: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): No. I had to listen to you the other day and it was as painful for me as this is for you.

Mr. Pearson: It was not as long.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): We are told by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that we cannot do this because it would create a vacuum in Europe. Quite apart from my objections as a purist to this silly journalistic trick of using terms in the political field which can apply only in the physical laboratory, I would say that if there is a vacuum in Europe right now into which soviet Russia is preparing to rush, why did they not rush in before? Presumably something stopped them. Something must have stopped them in 1945 when, as General Gruenther told us not long ago, they had a marked superiority over the west with regard to conventional weapons. Something stopped them, and I would suggest the thing that stopped them is the same thing that stops them now. Is there any reason at all why a reunified, neutralized Germany cannot be the object of guarantees which will place the same problem before the Russians that was placed before them at the end of the war, namely that the risk of invading western Europe is so great that it means the starting of a third world war with thermonuclear weapons? I have said nothing so far—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I do wish the people of Canada could have heard that, because they are going to be awfully interested in the position the Liberal and Conservative parties have taken on this issue, very interested indeed. They will be interested to find that anyone's remarks in a debate of this sort were presumed to be a suitable subject for levity. To me it is not surprising, because people who have abandoned their position of intellectual integrity are, of course, capable of anything.

Mr. Pearson: What about your leader?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): This year I visited Germany. I was fortunate in that I had perhaps better opportunities than many to find out what the people were thinking, because I was introduced to a very large circle of family connections by my wife and was able to obtain points of view that perhaps would not have been given to the ordinary foreigner. For example, I spoke to Mr. Artur Bratu, who is now superintendent of education in the state of Hesse. Mr. Bratu is a Jew who had to leave Germany during the Hitler regime but went back afterwards because he is also a German, and he considered he had a job to do in Germany.

Mr. Bratu was dismayed and distressed at the intentions of the western world. He said something of this sort to me. "We are now beginning to raise a new generation of young Germans with their faces turned against militarism. I cannot guarantee what is going to happen to these young men if you insist on putting them into an army officered and N.C.O.'d by former nazis."

Mr. Pearson: Rubbish.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): That is the only answer you have. I suggest it is very unwise for anyone in this chamber to be scornful of people like Mr. Bratu, who went back and put his head in the noose again because he felt it was his duty as a German to do so.

I had a talk with the member for Darmstadt in the Bundestag, Mr. Ludwig Metzger, who, like many of his colleagues, spent many years in and out of prison camps during the Hitler regime. He also expressed profound distress and uneasiness over the proposals now being made. I met another Jew, Heinz Putzrath, in Bonn, who had to leave Germany and go to England during the Hitler regime, where he was employed by the British government. He also went back to help build a new democratic Germany. He told me this. He said he himself was not so much concerned about the ex-nazis who were getting back into power—as they are doing in Bonn—as he was about the conditions that have been recreated in Germany by the western powers for the production of a new group of nazis. He said, "I find it difficult to have much confidence in a regime in which Alfred Krupp is again the dominant economic factor.

Then when it is again sought to add to Mr. Krupp a military arm, I am terrified at what may take place." One may well believe that he would be terrified. He was a Jew who had to get out. Most of his family died.

I had a long talk with Mr. Ollenhauer, leader of the social democrat party, who placed before me many of the arguments I have attempted to place before the house tonight. Mr. Ollenhauer also has an unimpeachable record of activity against the nazi regime, as have many of his colleagues in the social democrat party, such as people like Peter Blachstein who spent a year in Hitler's concentration camps and then escaped abroad; and Jacobi Werner, a man who spent seven years in Hitler's concentration camps. Now he is in the German Bundestag and is desperately afraid of the rearming of West Germany.

I could go on with an endless list of these people. Moreover, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that these are the people upon whom we have to rely if there is to be a democratic Germany arise, and that these are the people who tell us with one voice that we are insane to proceed with this project of rearming Germany at this time.

I do not know whether the clue to this situation is to be found in the statement with regard to United States policy which was made by our Secretary of State for External Affairs the other day, when he suggested that none of the alternatives was suitable or acceptable, particularly in the light of United States policy. Is that the milk in the coconut? Is that the real reason? Does that explain this determination to carry on in the face of a poor case in logic or, in fact, no case at all?

If so, Mr. Speaker, I can only express regret that our Secretary of State for External Affairs and our government did not follow the example of Pierre Mendes-France, the premier of France, who, when he laid the proposition before the French assembly, did not pretend it was a good thing but quite frankly admitted it was a bad thing and told them in effect, "This is it; this is the price of United States support; we have no option". If that is the situation, then we should be told frankly that it is.

I am not sure, Mr. Speaker—and neither is anyone else in this house—what will be the results of this move. I myself doubt that it will lead to war. I do not think so. I think the overriding danger of thermonuclear war will prevent that outcome. However, I think it may have disastrous effects for the very people in Germany who are our friends and allies, that it will place obstacles in the way of reunification of Germany in the foreseeable future and, perhaps even more important still, will be another obstacle in the way of lessening tensions in the world something which surely every sane and intelligent person is hoping for today. Surely we all realize that it must be the goal of all our foreign policy and the goal of all international relations today to effect some sort of slackening of world tension so the human race can get about its overriding business of improving life for mankind on the face of the earth.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) who has just spoken will not take it amiss if I say that the house, after so much brilliance, will consider my efforts to be pedestrian indeed.

I think every member who has spoken in this debate has referred to the importance of the question we are discussing and the difficulty of making a decision. The importance of the question before us is indicated by the seriousness with which almost every hon. member has approached it. I too feel that we are debating an extremely important question, and I hope that nothing I shall say will do anything to lower the high standard of the debate.

I wish to say at once that I am voting for the resolution. I am voting for it for reasons already stated by my leader, and perhaps for reasons which I shall put forward before I finish. I am also voting for the resolution because no acceptable alternative has been put forward by those who are opposing it. I say "acceptable alternative", although I think I could say equally well that no alternative has been proposed. I wish to say quite frankly that I have no alternative either.

The reasons for the ratification have been stated by a number of hon. members, including my leader. I shall try to avoid taking up the time of the house by repeating what they have already said. I shall, however, take a little time to try to analyse the arguments put forward by those who are opposed to ratification. I am in a most peculiar position this evening, Mr. Speaker, because my opposition, instead of being in front of me, to the left of me or to the right of me, is behind me. I think it is generally accepted that a person can do his best fighting when he can see the whites of the eyes of his opposition rather than when he feels their breath on the back of his neck.

I said I was going to analyse some of the arguments put forward by those who are opposing ratification of the agreements. What are those arguments? From a careful reading of the speeches that have been made I think they are as follows: First, that the arming of Germany would widen the gulf between the democratic nations and the Soviet bloc. As one member speaking in opposition to the resolution said, it would push the division between the two camps "beyond the point of no return." Second, that the German people are not to be trusted; that Germany is still the Germany that twice in our lifetime has engulfed the world in war; that the Germany we would make a partner is the same Germany that was responsible for Dachau, Belsen and Buchenwald; or put more briefly, that the German people are not morally worthy to associate with the rest of us. Third, that the proposal to bring Germany into NATO—which we accept and which, of course involves the rearming of Germany—is premature and that another attempt should be made to negotiate with the Soviet union on the reunification of Germany. Fourth, that there is no enthusiasm in Canada for the ratification of the agreement.

I think these are the main arguments put forward by those who are opposing the resolution. I shall try to deal with the various points as they appear to me. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I am not approaching this matter lightly. I have gone over the various points made time and time again.

Let me deal with the first reason put forward for opposing ratification of these agreements. It was that the arming of Germany now would widen the gulf between the democratic nations and the Soviet bloc. When making this argument the speaker agreed that the west would have to negotiate from strength. If that is the case, what the speaker was really saying was that we must negotiate from strength but not from too much strength, that if the west becomes too strong the Soviet union will get cross with us and perhaps start something. The only logical conclusion I can draw from this position is that in the opinion of the speaker the west is strong enough now, and that any further addition to our strength must be opposed because it is likely to offend the Soviet bloc.

I cannot see the question in that way. I am quite satisfied that the only argument the people in the Kremlin understand is strength, and that the stronger we are the more likelihood there is of getting them to negotiate. Last year there were for the first time, I believe, in the history of the United Nations assembly, unanimous decisions on two issues. One was the resolution proposed by the United States with respect to atoms for peace, and the other was the resolution on disarmament initiated by the Canadian delegation. At the time the discussion and vote on the disarmament resolution were taking place, there were conferences in London and Paris in an effort to bring about the agreements that we have been discussing for the last few days. It seems to me that if we show that we are strong enough the Soviet union, instead of refusing to negotiate, will be more reasonable and negotiate with us.

I want the house to understand that I am in favour of negotiation. The unanimous votes in the United Nations assembly this year must have been a really cheering sight. I was at the assembly in 1947 for a while as parliamentary adviser to the Canadian delegation, and I can assure hon. members that there was nothing more depressing than the fact that on every issue that arose the Soviet union was on one side and the western powers were on the other. Surely it must have been a heartening experience for those who were privileged to be at the last meeting to see unanimity achieved at least on those two points.

I come now to the second argument, that the German people are not to be trusted, that they are still the Germans who were responsible for Hitler's atrocities and consequently they are not fit to associate with us. That is an argument I cannot accept. I agree with what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) the other evening, that this is the master race doctrine in reverse. We may not be setting ourselves up as the master race, but we are certainly denouncing the Germans as a race of criminals.

I was—I hope you will excuse the word, but it is the kind of proletarian word you would expect from me—flabbergasted tonight to hear the statement that the Germans must wait until they have purged themselves of their national brutalities. If that is not setting ourselves up as something quite superior, I do not know what it is. But in any case I reject the idea of a criminal Germany with all the force of my being. I gave some years of my life to defending another people from the charge that they could not be trusted because of their race, and at this date I am not going to replace the Japanese with the Germans.

Let us admit that the Germans carry a very large share of the responsibility for starting two world wars. I have been walking around in this vale of tears for quite a long time—perhaps some people would say too long—and I remember some of the discussions that took place between the two world wars. The hon. member for Vancouver South will know quite well that most people with whom he and I associated at that time took the position that the Versailles treaty was responsible for Hitler, and that was the reason advanced by many responsible people as to why Canada should not enter the second world war.

I think in the last few days we have overlooked altogether the part that Russia played in bringing about the second world war. Does anyone in this chamber tonight believe that if Stalin had refused to make an agreement with Hitler in 1939, Hitler would have marched on Poland? Of course he would not. If we are going to begin to apportion blame, if we are going to name criminal peoples, let us include them all.

However, let us agree that Germany must accept a very large share of the responsibility for starting two world wars. They have suffered for what they have done. I think I could say they have been punished for it. But it seems to me that if we want to give them an incentive for starting another world war the best way to do it is to ostracize them, to say to them that they are not fit to associate with other people, that they must be kept as a second-class nation. Let me repeat; if we want the Germans to start another world war, that, in my opinion, is the quickest way to get it started.

It also seems to me that those who are advocating such a course are overlooking the principles of modern psychology. In dealing with individuals guilty of crimes we have found that not only in their interests but also in the interests of society we must rehabilitate them as quickly as possible and bring them into association with other people. A sure way to have an individual guilty of an offence against society repeat that offence or another of its kind is to keep continually reminding him that he is different from other people because he once committed an offence.

I believe the same principle applies to peoples and nations. I think it is wrong to make every German responsible for the atrocities of the nazis. We know that hundreds of thousands of Germans refused to accept nazism. We know that thousands of them died because they refused. Thousands more rotted in concentration camps because they would not bow the knee to nazism.

As a matter of fact, a whole lot of people share the guilt for the rise of Hitler. I am going to read statements made by two prominent people, not communists, not socialists, not even Liberals, I believe. One of them was a former leader of the opposition in this house, the late Dr. Manion. Speaking in this chamber on the 8th of September, 1939, before war was declared by Canada, he said, as found at page 14 of Hansard:

> One point I wish to make very clear is that to my mind we have no quarrel with the German people as a people. For generations they have given generously to the world in science and art and literature.

We have well over half a million citizens of German descent in this country, and they are amongst our very best citizens.

And mark this one:

> But, sir, Germany is controlled at the present time by an unscrupulous egoist. It is true he served Germany well, and had he stopped at a certain point he might well have gone down into history as a great German hero. He raised the German people from discouragement, gave them back their pride after a just but humiliating defeat. Had he stopped there he would have been accepted perhaps by all the world as a German hero.

That was after the Nuremberg decrees. That was after people all over Germany had been murdered by Hitler's minions. Now, Hitler could not have developed into the menace he became without assistance from other quarters. Let me read you another excerpt. The British people made great attempts to come to terms with Hitler. They sent an ambassador to Hitler in 1938, a man by the name of Sir Nevile Henderson, and his task was to bring about a working agreement between the United Kingdom and Germany. He failed. He wrote a book after he returned from Germany, when the second world war began, entitled "Failure of a Mission". This is a brief quotation from that book:

> Nor are all dictatorships even if prolonged reprehensible. One cannot just because he is a dictator refuse to admit the great services which Signor Mussolini has rendered to Italy; nor would the world have failed to acclaim Hitler as a great German if he had known when and where to stop; if, for instance, after Munich and the Nuremberg decrees for the Jews.

It was an attitude like that of people who thought they were saving their possessions that gave Hitler his opportunity to nearly destroy the world. Now, let us not make other mistakes of that kind. What has taken place in West Germany in the development of democratic institutions since 1945 is, in my opinion, absolute proof that the people of West Germany, by a large majority, want to adhere to the democratic way of doing things. If we want to help them in that resolve we should welcome their co-operation and not spurn it. My own position is that West Germany should now be taken into the western comity of nations as a full partner, with all the privileges, responsibilities and obligations of full partnership.

Those opposing this resolution say they are not opposed to Germany regaining her sovereignty, or to bringing Germany into NATO, but only to the rearming of Germany. Now, I do not think it is possible to do the first two without doing the last. If we give Germany her sovereignty, then Germany is free to do whatever she likes. And I cannot imagine—and if what my hon. friends behind me say is true, they cannot imagine it either—a Germany that would be free to be a Germany that would not be armed.

I believe it has been said on many occasions that Germany will arm anyway. The question, I think, for us is, on whose side will she be after she is armed? Of necessity, in the kind of world in which we are living, she will have to find allies. Will she be absorbed into the iron curtain bloc, or will she be co-operating with the countries of the west who have helped her to organize her democratic institutions? That is the important question I think for us here in Canada, and for the whole democratic world.

Now for the third argument against ratification, that the proposal to bring Germany into NATO, which involves the rearming of Germany, is premature; that we should first make another attempt to negotiate with the Soviet union for the reunification of Germany. Let us see what such an attempt would involve. I am all for agreements through negotiation, if we can get what the trade unionists call negotiation in good faith. But I think it should be noted that Russia's interest in negotiation for the reunification of Germany has increased in direct proportion to the approach of the time when Germany would be actually brought into NATO.

However, it may be noted that the price the Soviet union demands to enter into such negotiation is that the proposal for associating Germany with the western powers should be dropped. I think that is important. In addition to that, as far as I know Russia has never agreed in clear-cut terms to free elections in Germany. But if the western powers would agree to the Soviet union conditions for negotiation on reunification—that is the throwing into discard of all attempts to bring Germany into NATO—have we any assurance that when that was done the Soviet union would negotiate in good faith? The result, to judge by our past experience, would be that the western powers, once they had done what the Russians wanted and once free elections were refused, would be thrown into confusion, and the Soviet union would be laughing up their sleeves at the ease with which they can confuse us.

The great obstacle to negotiation with the Soviet union is that the communists never negotiate or co-operate with others in good faith. We in the C.C.F. ought to know that. In the early years of our movement numerous attempts were made by the communists for joint action on community or national projects, for a united front, for co-operation on this and that. But we always found that the communists would never stick to their agreement. Even when they called meetings to denounce nazism and fascism, as was the case before the Stalin-Hitler pact, and brought well-intentioned groups from various walks of life to take part in such meetings, they always injected a resolution or a speaker or something else that was not provided for in the arrangements, all designed to give them control of the situation. The result has been—I may say the result has been good so far as we are concerned—that in the last 15 years, ever since the beginning of world war II, the C.C.F. has refused to associate with them in any way, at any time, in any place, on any issue.

The experience of the trade union movement has been the same. Not so many years ago I heard prominent officials in the two large labour congresses say they would never allow a man's politics to determine his right to belong to a trade union, or to be an officer of a trade union. But because of the disruptive activities of the communists in the trade union movement these congresses had to change that resolve. They had to throw the communists out. That was the only alternative to having the unions torn to pieces. It is no different in international affairs.

I remember many years ago reading a book by Bruce Lockhart, who was in the Soviet union at the time of the revolution. He was there as a very young man, in the British foreign office, and I think he spent some time in jail there. In his book "British Agent" he tells the story about Karl Radek, one of the old bolsheviks preparing to go to a conference with the mensheviks. It must have been early in the revolution, because the mensheviks were liquidated shortly after.

Mr. Radek, preparing his speeches in reply to the decision taken by the mensheviks, prepared one speech in case they took position A. He prepared another speech in case they took position B. He put the argument for position A in one of his coat pockets, and he put the argument for position B in the other. He was in a great flutter for a while after reaching the conference room because he had forgotten in which pocket was which speech.

The tactics of the communist party—whether in Vancouver, Regina, Toronto or Moscow—have not changed in the slightest degree since Radek's time.

I believe in negotiation. To negotiate on every problem that cannot be settled otherwise is a part of my philosophy of life. But in negotiation we should be very careful not to give away an advantage that we now have until we are pretty sure that we are getting value in return. In other words, in any negotiations on the unification of Germany we should be sure that the soviets will agree to free elections in Germany. They have never, let me say again, to my knowledge made a categorical statement that they will agree to free elections under United Nations supervision.

Now for my fourth and last point, having to do with the argument that we should oppose this motion because there is no enthusiasm in Canada for the ratification of the agreements. I am going to overlook the fact that I think "enthusiasm" is the wrong word, but who am I to take issue on the meaning of a word with my colleagues who are university graduates? I quite agree there is no enthusiasm for ratification of these agreements. I think it could be equally well said that there was no enthusiasm for the North Atlantic treaty when it was ratified, or for entering the second world war, for that matter. But there was something else. There was determination, and that is the word we want here. We had on those occasions something to preserve, our freedom, our democratic institutions. What was happening in the world was endangering our freedom; there was a job to be done and, much as we disliked it, we did our part, if not with enthusiasm, with steady determination. We are in the same position today. If there is not enthusiasm for the ratification of the agreements, there is certainly no enthusiasm on the part of the people opposing them; that is, if you leave the labour progressive party and its fellow travellers out of the picture.

Some hon. members have referred to the delegations that interviewed them, when those people were in Ottawa a few weeks ago. None of them came to see me but I have had some letters. I have received 34 letters, 8 telegrams and 6 petitions such as those the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) mentioned in the directive, issued by the labour progressive party. Nearly all these letters, telegrams, and communications came from communist sources. There are two or three letters the writers of which I have not been able to classify. Outside of these I have not received a single communication from a responsible individual or organization, either trade union, board of trade, veterans' organization or any other organization opposing the ratification of the agreements.

Speaking for myself, as I said before I am going to vote for the resolution before us because I believe it is a step to prevent war rather than to make war. Socialist parties in the NATO countries in Europe, which are much closer to Germany than we are and who have in the past felt the full effects of German aggression, have already ratified these agreements. They have done so because they felt the only way to prevent aggression was to be strong.

Everyone regrets the necessity of rearming Germany. I can say with equal truth that everyone regrets the necessity of any armaments, that is anyone with any sense. But as I said before, Germany will be rearmed in any case. The question then is, on whose side is she going to be? I want her to be on our side; consequently, voting on this issue as a Canadian and as one who is anxious above everything else to support every move toward world peace, I am going to support the resolution.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis), and it was very encouraging to hear the soundness of his logic. This is an issue that is of solemn concern to everyone in this house and to thousands and thousands throughout the country who are stirred at times, as has been so well said, by emotion and sentiments born of days that are gone. One can look back over 40 years of turmoil in this country, filled with tragic realities of hot wars and cold wars and constant anxiety. These years have given us experience and education and I hope foresight enough to meet the future as stronger and more intelligent people, and better informed than we were before the first great war.

The dearth of information that was given to the house and the country prior to these international difficulties has been all too conspicuous. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, as we were approaching the second world war it seemed to me we never did use the experience we had or the information that was available to us to face the realities as we should. I am not going to review past events because this is not the time, when we are dealing with this solemn issue.

There is not an hon. member here who was present at that time who does not understand what I mean. In 1937 we were told that there was no danger of war with Germany. We were told by our prime minister at that time, who had visited Germany and talked with Hitler, that there was no danger of war at all. Then in 1938, when great preparations might have been made in this country in close co-operation with the old land, we were still told there was not much danger. Steps could have been taken then, Mr. Speaker. They were not taken. And what a price we paid for neglecting to face reality!

However, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to find that since these years have passed and our experience has been ripened by the hard, cold and bitter penalties for neglect, you might say, we are no longer faced with political fears at home which becloud the glaring and tragic realities abroad. We meet tonight, Mr. Speaker, and I am proud of the fact that the two historic parties in this dominion stand foursquare with their chins to the wind, as the saying is. Differences of class, race, creed, religion or party have not separated us in our determination, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) has said, that if it is within our power we shall spend the last vestige of energy we have to avoid another awful war. We must as a parliament, as Canadians, lead the way. I do not mean lead the way in world affairs so much, but lead the way in this country. We dare not mislead.

Following the first great war it will be remembered that we were told we were going to have no more war, that the old league of nations was going to solve our troubles. Then after the second world war we were told that the United Nations would save us from any such recurrence. Then we embarked on the Atlantic community pact. After each in its turn seemed to be inadequate we were sure that we had found the answer to at least a greater degree of security in EDC, which I believe was signed in Paris in 1952.

The French premier, Mendes-France, called the EDC partners together in Brussels in August, 1954 and tried to get the agreement amended so as to make it more acceptable to the French parliament. Mendes-France failed in this and the French parliament refused to ratify that agreement, and it fell through for the time being.

Again we were happy to find that the traditional British leadership, which has so often been like a beacon light in the world's darkest hours, led the way to new hope. The Right Hon. Sir Anthony Eden offered to keep the British ground forces and the Royal Air Force in Europe for 44 years. That must have convinced France as well as all our other allies among the free peoples of the west that Great Britain was facing up to realities no matter what the cost might be. No one has intimated that any one country can stand alone as an independent vacuum in the heart of Europe.

I am endeavouring as best as I can not to take up the time of this house unnecessarily by repeating speeches which have been made already, some more from emotion than logic, and with little effect upon this issue. But I do think we should review the steps that were taken, and know exactly what is before this house.

I have mentioned EDC; I have mentioned its collapse; I have mentioned how the great British foreign secretary, Right Hon. Sir Anthony Eden, representing that greatest of all world statesmen today, Right Hon. Sir Winston Churchill, led the way as that country has done so often in the past. We had the London meeting at which a new Brussels treaty was agreed upon. Remember that we were not there. The parties to that treaty were France, the Benelux countries including Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands, Great Britain, West Germany and Italy. This agreement which was signed in Paris on October 23 provided for the association of West Germany with Europe, making Great Britain a party to the arrangement and in fact settling West Germany's rearmament there and then.

The minister for external affairs made a very lucid speech on Thursday last. If some hon. members were not listening as closely as they should have been, if they read his speech again they will see that he explained that the sovereignty of West Germany was settled. We are not settling the sovereign rights of Germany tonight; we are not settling the rearming of Germany. We are deciding whether she shall be included in NATO. The aims and terms and safeguards of the agreement have been elaborately and sincerely expressed in this debate by the minister for external affairs and by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who made a splendid speech the other night on behalf of this party. The minister for external affairs presented a broad picture of the problem, and the hon. member for Prince Albert expressed our position most fluently.

We have made our choice as a party. We are going to support this resolution, confident that there is no other common-sense or available alternative at this time. In listening to the speeches made by my socialist friends to my left, the majority of whom appear to have made up their minds to vote against this resolution, I am at a loss to understand the basis of their cloudy and fantastic reasoning.

Let us suppose for a moment that my socialist friends had their way and West Germany's admission to NATO was refused. Stop and think what that would mean. In this matter as in many others they know they have no hope of having to assume responsibility. There are those of us who still hope to have responsibility in this country. I do not for one moment doubt their sincerity, but let us suppose again that their arguments are accepted and we are not going to allow West Germany to be included in NATO. What would be the obvious reality then?

West Germany is already admitted to the western European union. West Germany is already recognized as a sovereign power. West Germany's right to arm is already established. Let us strip off the cloak of unreality from this solemn issue. Let us look at what it means. We are still one of the 14 member countries of NATO. Our responsibility for the defence of the North Atlantic community still stands unaltered by any such rejection as my hon. friends now suggest. It is not to be changed by that. You would have six nations of the North Atlantic community and the republic of West Germany in one pact, while under the new Brussels treaty all six except Germany would be members of NATO. Our responsibilities would be in no way lessened; they would be still clearly defined under NATO, and our influence would be embarrassingly impaired by such utter nonsense.

The members of the socialist party to my left have expressed keen concern about the rearming of Germany, to which agreement our country was not a party. They now propose to forfeit any right to fix the terms and conditions upon which that country shall proceed with the armament program already established. Stop and think of it. They are loud in their opposition and protest against the rearming, but they propose to relinquish the only opportunity we would have for any control, supervision or direction of how they would use those armaments. I have listened very carefully to the speeches during this debate, because lately with my new responsibilities I have sat in the house more diligently than has been my habit in the past.

Mr. Rowe: Do not applaud too much, because if I did not have to I would not endure you hon. members opposite as much as I already have. But as I said, I listened carefully to the strange doctrine vigorously expressed by socialist members during this debate, and I heard their loud protests about rearmament despite the fact that we have little alternative in this matter. They refuse to accept the efficacy of the controls and supervision included in this agreement, and when I hear that I wonder what is happening.

I am amazed and shocked at such folly in reasoning. I do not wish to question their sincerity for one moment, but I would not dare suggest that their reasoning should be accepted. When I hear of the visit of Mr. Attlee to this country I think I might be pardoned if I suggest to my socialist friends that they arrange another visit for the Hon. Mr. Bevan, who has taken a similar position in the United Kingdom, so that at least half or a majority of the socialist members in this house can take the journey across Canada with him.

Who would dare say that if West Germany were refused admittance to NATO she would venture to stand alone? I believe she would be compelled to face realities in the same manner as other nations in these days. There would be only one other choice for her, and that other choice could only be toward those who would like to see her refused admittance.

To my mind the question is quite clear-cut, and it worries me when I hear that some hon. members in this house indicate their intention to register a vote against this resolution. I do not intend to take up much of the time of the house, but I hope I have said as much in a short time as some hon. members with emotional speeches have said over a longer time.

But, Mr. Speaker, I would not feel I was doing my duty if I did not underline the danger involved in this step, without indulging in emotional rhetoric. There is little need for me to review these dangers, for I see before me men who have fought in two great wars. I have heard them make speeches that would move the coldest heart and the most stolid temperament in this house. It has not been my practice to seek the indulgence of this house in order to read articles or quote the views of others because I know it is not recognized by you, Mr. Speaker, as good parliamentary practice, and in that you have my full agreement. But this solemn issue far transcends party politics—

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, ten o'clock.

Mr. Rowe: Very well, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Pouliot: No, the rule states ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, may I appeal to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). We expect that upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) it might be possible for the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to adjourn the debate so that he might conclude it tomorrow and we could then have the vote. I would hope that the hon. member for Temiscouata would be willing to accede to that request.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, I have a keen respect for my old friend the hon. member for Temiscouata, and his agreement is very important. Since he is not prepared to agree I prefer to call it ten o'clock, and I shall conclude my remarks in a very short time tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman unanimous consent to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I take it the hon. gentleman has unanimous consent?

Mr. Pouliot: By the courtesy—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Pouliot: You say that? I will not be bullied by any Tory in this house. I object.

Mr. Speaker: May I now ask what is the wish of hon. members?

Mr. Harris: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that when you asked if it was agreed that we might proceed there were no dissenting voices, and I suggest that we proceed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of hon. members that the Acting Leader of the Opposition may now continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I have full unanimity, but I am positive that I have a majority. As I said, I feel this issue far transcends party politics, and in the regrettable absence of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) for whom I am acting as substitute, I would like to read a brief extract expressing his views, which was written before this issue came before the house. The article was written on October 16, 1954, and concerned the question of admitting Germany into the western community of free nations. It outlines his views on this issue as follows:

> When I returned to Paris from Berlin the Arc de Triomphe reminded me very vividly that Wellington and his associates were confronted with somewhat the same problem after the Napoleonic wars nearly 140 years ago.
> Wellington reduced the problem to a very simple proposition. He said that if they were prepared to remove from France every Frenchman and resettle the country with other people, then this idea might make sense. But if they believed that France was going to be populated by French people, then their purpose must be to try to bring France into full fellowship with the other nations of Europe. His views prevailed and as a result of that decision one of the greatest historic friendships of all history was established between France and Britain after centuries of almost continuous war.

There are always such developments in the history of human progress. Hope springs eternal in the human breast, and all humanity must overcome emotional prejudices and bitter traditional sentiment born of days that are gone.

We can face the future with justifiable hope if we have a steadfast faith in the co-operative efforts of all who wish to be free. We must stand up and be counted. We must not turn back. We must face the issue. There is nothing so fearful as fear. But under the eternal vigilance and co-operation of free men of the western world, I do not believe we need to be afraid. If we are strong enough, honest enough and bold enough to meet as we should these respective issues as they arise, I believe not only can we avoid a third world war but can achieve the lasting hope of all, namely that we may have peace in our time.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that if the minister speaks now, he will close the debate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On motion of Mr. Pearson the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Harris the house adjourned at 10.13 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 26, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR—PRIME MINISTER OF PAKISTAN

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members, I am sure, will want me to note the presence in our gallery of a most distinguished visitor, namely the Prime Minister of Pakistan.

(Translation):

We extend to him a most cordial welcome.

(Text):

We do hope that the conversations that he had with our parliamentarians during his too short a stay in our capital will help, as he said himself upon his arrival, to further the cause of peace and freedom in the world.

CRIMINAL LAW

JOINT COMMITTEE—APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS TO ACT ON BEHALF OF COMMONS

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That Miss Bennett, Messrs. Boisvert, Brown (Essex West), Brown (Brantford), Cameron (High Park), Fairey, Garson, Leduc (Verdun), Lusby, Mitchell (London), Montgomery, Murphy (Westmorland), Shaw, Mrs. Shipley and Messrs. Thatcher, Valois and Winch act on behalf of this house on the joint committee of both houses of parliament appointed January 14, 1955 to inquire into and report upon the questions whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent; and

That a message be sent to the Senate to inform Their Honours that the foregoing members have been appointed to act on behalf of the Commons on the said joint committee of both houses.

Motion agreed to.

BUTTER

AVAILABILITY OF SUPPLIES TO CANADIAN INSTITUTIONS AT REDUCED PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether the announcement attributed to the Minister of Agriculture in Edmonton, namely that 20 million pounds of Canadian butter would soon be made available to Canadian institutions at a price lower than the present support price, is right?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): That is the intention of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Argue: May I ask a supplementary question? With the disposal of this surplus butter, is it the intention of the government to continue the present support price?

Mr. St. Laurent: The government's policy in that regard will be announced as soon as a decision has been reached.

[Later:]

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, supplementary to a question that has already been asked, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question in view of the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture in western Canada with respect to 70 million pounds of surplus butter that we have, stating that it was 20 million more than we needed and was necessary to hold, and that it was going to be sold. The Prime Minister has said that it was going to be sold, and that it was the policy of the government to sell it at less than it cost. In view of this surplus I would like to ask at what price it is going to be sold, and to whom.

Mr. St. Laurent: The matter has been under consideration, and the only decision that has been arrived at is that inquiries will be made from the institutions to see if they would be interested in taking substantial quantities of butter at a price considerably lower than the market price, for consumption in those institutions.

The policy will be to exercise very strict supervision to see that that is restricted only to public institutions and does not affect the general marketing conditions.

Mr. Rowe: I would like to ask the Prime Minister what type of public institutions he has in mind. Does he mean government institutions? Do I understand it is not going into the trade? I think the trade would be interested to know how much less it is to be sold at. This is the kind of information to which we are entitled—that is, whether it will be five cents or ten cents. It is the government's policy to purchase butter, and I think we should know that.

Mr. St. Laurent: A floor price was set for butter. I am told that because of the unusually good conditions of the pasture land throughout the last season about 20 million pounds more butter was produced than is usual. It so happens that there is now in storage about 20 million pounds more than is considered normal supply required to bridge the time between the end of January and the new season.

Now, I would not like to state at this time what price the Department of Agriculture will fix for these institutions—and these would include government institutions, hospitals, homes, and other places of that kind that are supported either out of public funds by the government or out of public funds obtained otherwise for the general welfare of those who are living in those institutions.

Mr. Rowe: I would like to ask a further question. Would the Prime Minister tell us if his government does not consider that probably the heavy importations of oleomargarine had as much to do with it as the heavy crop of grass?

Mr. St. Laurent: There are diverging views about importations of oil for oleomargarine in this country, and there are diverging views among Canadians as to the propriety of having such a high floor price for the production of butter. But I think there are a large number in this house and elsewhere who realize that the dairy industry is essential to the prosperity of the agricultural community in Canada. The advantages and disadvantages have to be very carefully weighed, and that is one of the responsibilities we have to discharge and for which we have to answer both to parliament and to the public.

SUGGESTED METHOD OF DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the minister consider recommending to his cabinet colleagues that another way of dealing with the butter surplus would be to give it away to old age pensioners, and to others who need it, perhaps on doctors' prescriptions?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister not prepared to answer?

[Mr. Rowe.]

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that other governments have dumped goods into the sea in the past, is not this government to be commended for releasing this butter to hospitals on a lower price basis?

EFFECT OF IMPORTATION OF CHEESE ON BUTTER MARKET

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question arising out of the previous question. Does he not consider that the dumping of 2,500,000 pounds of cheese on to the Canadian market will disturb the butter market?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker. the Prime Minister knows of no dumping of cheese into Canada.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question I hope it will be on a different subject. I think we have had enough questions on butter. Could we perhaps slide on to another subject?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I thought possibly the Prime Minister would clear up the mystery as to what price this butter is going to be sold at.

Mr. Fleming: The mystery continues.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

FORD STRIKE—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF EXCISE TAX ON MOTOR CARS

On the orders of the day:

Miss Sybil Bennett (Halton): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the hardships to many of my constituents and the critical state of negotiations in the settlement of the Ford strike, will the minister tell the house whether the government intends to reduce the 15 per cent excise tax on cars in order to assist in the settlement of the strike?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the question of excise taxes on motor cars has been drawn to my attention on a number of occasions recently and in particular by my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and the hon. members for Essex West (Mr. Brown) and Essex South (Mr. Clark). But I am sure my hon. friend will understand that in this context, or even in a general fiscal context, it would not be desirable nor possible to make any announcement of intention, but rather to state the fact when it occurred, if it does occur.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REDUCTION IN RUNNING TIME BETWEEN MONTREAL AND VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister noticed the story in this morning's Gazette that the Canadian Pacific Railway, commencing April 24, is about to lop 16 hours off the run from Montreal to Vancouver? Will the minister indicate why our publicly owned railway has not been in a position to make a similar announcement earlier, in view of the statement of the former president, Mr. Vaughan, to the railway committee of parliament some years ago?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I received the hon. member's question only a few minutes before coming into the house. However, I think my hon. friend must have failed to notice that, almost side by side on the same page of the same issue of the Montreal Gazette as the article he mentioned, there is an announcement by the Canadian National Railways to the effect that on April 24 a new fast transcontinental passenger train will considerably reduce the running time of the Montreal and Toronto sections of the Canadian National Railways run to Vancouver.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Why is it, then, that the Canadian National Railways has not inaugurated a schedule earlier, when the former president said that was quite practicable and possible on the transcontinental run.

Mr. Marler: I do not think I can add anything further to what I have said on the subject.

FURTHER LAY-OFFS OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport in regard to lay-offs of section and maintenance men on the Canadian National Railways. How many have been laid off during the last week or so, and is it expected that the numbers that have been laid off will cover the situation?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): While the hon. member was good enough to give me notice of a somewhat similar question, I submit with deference that this is the kind of question that ought to be placed on the order paper. I think it will be well understood that details of the current employment position in a country-wide organization the size of the Canadian National Railways must be obtained from the different regions, and it seems to me only reasonable that the management could not be expected to have immediately at hand complete information from which they could, on short notice, determine the answer which might be given. In any event I hope my hon. friend will allow his question to go on the order paper, so that it may be duly answered.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; this is a matter of great importance to the men working on the railways.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And it is a matter of immediate importance.

Mr. Speaker: Inasmuch as the debate on this particular point might be of interest to some hon. members, I would point out that of course answers to questions on the orders of the day are not debatable. Perhaps the hon. member would allow this matter to stand for the time being.

CHEESE

REGULATIONS APPLYING TO IMPORTATIONS FROM NEW ZEALAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture or, in his absence, the parliamentary assistant. Is cheese imported from New Zealand and other countries subject to the same strict inspection as Canadian cheese, in the matter of water content and the like?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Any imports of cheese are subject to the same import restrictions as cheese that is exported.

[Later:]

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): May I ask a supplementary question of the parliamentary assistant. In answering my question he said that the imported cheese is subject to the same regulations as our exported cheese. Is that the same as the inspections made of our cheese for home consumption?

Mr. McCubbin: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to answer that, but I think it is. However, I shall find out and let the hon. member know.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ALLEGED DISAPPEARANCE OF MONEY AT BRITANNIA BEACH, B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, has the Postmaster General had an opportunity to investigate and to report upon the disappearance of $44,000 from Britannia Beach post office?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Every case is investigated in the department, and this one is actually under investigation. I have asked for a report, and when I receive all the details I will be glad to inform the house about it.

FINANCE

REPORTED EFFORT TO EQUALIZE CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES DOLLARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance, and in doing so I apologize for not having given him notice of it. According to an article in this morning's Gazette it is indicated that the government may be contemplating bringing the Canadian dollar into conformity with the United States dollar. Would the minister care to enlighten the house on that?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not happen to read the Gazette this morning. I was interested to see editorial comment on what someone thought was going to be government policy. But I think the answer to the hon. member's question would be that government policy will be announced when it is announced.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO FLIGHTS FROM WINNIPEG TO COPENHAGEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the government consider allowing Canadians and others to travel to Europe via Scandinavian Airlines from Winnipeg to Copenhagen?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall take my hon. friend's question as notice and answer it at a later date.

[Mr. McCubbin.]

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

APPROVAL OF PROTOCOL ON ACCESSION OF FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany, signed by Canada at Paris on October 23, 1954, and that this house do approve the same.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege and my responsibility to wind up the debate which we have been having now for more than four days, and to try to deal, as best I can, with some of the points that have been raised in the course of this debate.

In order to assist me in the discharge of this responsibility the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) has just reminded me that it was six years ago today that he, and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), whose absence we have all regretted during this debate, and I took our seats for the first time in this house.

This debate has not merely been prolonged, it has been far-reaching in its importance, and has been characterized, if I may say so, by a great sincerity of purpose displayed on the part of those who have contributed to it. I believe it is not unfair to say that emotion and fear have determined the viewpoint of some of the hon. members who have indicated they are not in favour of the resolution; while on the part of others, and I am thinking particularly of the hon. members for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) and Spadina (Mr. Croll), there has been a demonstration of the mastery of those feelings, of emotion and fear, which are so insecure and dangerous as a basis for policy and action. Those two members—with others—made their case for the resolution solely on the basis of reasoned evidence and of their own sober, realistic judgment.

In dealing now with some of the points, critical and otherwise, raised in this debate, I might say that there have been two criticisms of a general kind which have been levelled against the government; I am not dealing now with the substance of the resolution.

One has been repeated by a good many of my hon. friends opposite and it is that the government has failed to educate the people to the importance of the issue which we are now discussing, and failed also to inform parliament adequately on this and on foreign affairs generally.

The second criticism in this category is that the government is confronting parliament with a fait accompli and should have consulted it previously on this matter.

With regard to the first criticism, the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken) said there is a great vacuum—if I may use that scientific expression—of ignorance in the country despite, as the hon. member put it, the millions spent on publicity by the government.

But the truth is, Mr. Speaker, that the government through the Department of External Affairs spends less than $80,000 per year for publicizing the activities of Canada at home and abroad in so far as international affairs are concerned. Of that sum $21,000 alone is spent in the dissemination of information about foreign affairs in Canada. So much for the "millions" spent on publication.

It has been alleged that the people are ignorant about the issue with which we have been confronted, but if that is so—and I am far from admitting it—I would point out that this particular issue of whether West Germany should or should not be brought into the association of western democratic states as a fully sovereign nation has been before the people and the parliament of Canada since 1950. There was very little opposition expressed by this parliament at earlier sessions on the association of Germany with the west in this manner.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the house committee on external affairs has had, I think, adequate opportunity in those years to discuss this matter, and has indeed done so.

In June, 1952, in the debate on the ratification of the NATO EDC protocol we talked a long time in this house about German rearmament. Yet some hon. members opposite speak as though this were the first time this subject has been under discussion. I would also point out that in the earlier discussion in 1952 the resolution to which I refer was passed in this house without a division.

Now, what are the facts regarding the information which has been made available to members and to the country concerning this particular issue of the admission of Germany to NATO? As soon as the London and Paris decisions were taken and as soon as the texts of those agreements were received in this country by immediate air mail from Paris, 500 copies were made available at once, without request, to all the members of the external affairs committee of this house and to all the members of the NATO parliamentary committee. Copies were also made available to public libraries throughout the country, to 93 editors of newspapers, to labour and educational organizations, to private citizens who were on our mailing list or who requested it and to the educational branches of the defence forces.

Furthermore, in the first number of the external affairs bulletin after these agreements were signed, the one issued in November, the text of the final act and an explanatory article was made available to a large mailing list. In the December number of that bulletin a 5-page article was included on the association of Germany with NATO and dealing in a factual way with the matter before the house today. There were distributed 6,283 copies of that bulletin, including 74 to members of this house; indeed copies were distributed to all who have asked to be placed on the mailing list for that bulletin. The only reason it was not sent to more members of this house is that, on grounds of economy, we have asked members who wished to receive these publications to let us know so that we will not waste money in sending out publications to members who do not desire them. We could spend a great deal more money on information about these matters if we had it, but we have tried to keep our expenditures in that regard down to a minimum. If members who are on the committee on external affairs will recall past experience, they will realize that in that committee the government—and I am not complaining a bit about this fact—has been subject to searching criticism for expenditures in this regard.

As the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) stated in his interesting speech, it is not only the responsibility of the government to inform public opinion in Canada on these matters but it is also the responsibility of members and of the press of this country. So, dealing with this point which was raised first by the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken), I would suggest that if EDC is not, according to a Gallup poll, understood by people in this country and if the initials mean very little to most of them, that is a matter to be regretted, but I hardly think it is a matter which can be laid on the doorstep of the government. Probably the reason why EDC is not better known is that in this country there has been a fundamental unity in connection with matters associated with EDC and NATO; and matters on which we are united rarely catch the attention of the people of the country. I would ask the hon. member not to worry too much about the importance of this Gallup poll because just the other day I read the result of another

Gallup poll which said that only one in three Canadians can name a member of the Ottawa cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: That is not surprising.

Mr. Pearson: Human nature being what it is, I doubt that EDC or NATO will ever command as much interest among the readers of newspapers as do initials such as N.H.L., C.B.C. or even C.O.D.

As a mild reproach to the government, it has been suggested also that we do not take parliament enough into our confidence on matters concerning foreign affairs. I have looked into the record and I found that in each of the years 1952, 1953 and 1954 we devoted seven full days to the discussion of international matters; and in the committee on external affairs in 1952 we had eleven days, in 1953 twelve days and in 1954 thirteen days. I may repeat that we have had more than four days debate on this resolution in this house at this time, when the United Kingdom parliament—and I think we will all agree that the United Kingdom has as deep and immediate interest in this matter as we have—managed to dispose of its resolution in two days.

I feel, however, that the criticism made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) of the manner in which the pertinent documents in respect of this matter were tabled and were made available when the house opened was undoubtedly justified. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I apologize to him and to the house for the rather sloppy and indeed inadequate way in which that was done. I hope that we shall do better in the future.

The second criticism which I have mentioned, and which was stressed particularly by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) and the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis), is that in this house members have been confronted with a fait accompli, that they have no alternative in the matter, that they can do nothing about it, that the decision is already made. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that criticism is nonsense. In this matter—as the hon. member for Saskatoon must know; he is a student of constitutional matters—this government has followed not only the correct legal procedure—which indeed would not have required submission of the matter to the house as, legally, ratification is an executive action—but has followed also the correct constitutional practice and the one which has been followed by every other government which has the same kind of parliamentary institutions that we have; I refer to the United Kingdom and other NATO governments. Indeed it is the same practice that will be followed by the United States, which has not yet even submitted this matter to congress. At least, I should say that it has been submitted to congress, Mr. Speaker, but it has not yet been considered or discussed there.

The hon. member for Saskatoon must know what this practice is, namely that the government takes the responsibility for signing an agreement, then brings that agreement to parliament for approval before ratification. Ratification is not given—this is now constitutional practice—without such approval.

I think it was suggested by him and indeed by others that we might have brought this matter to parliament before signature. In reply I claim that such a procedure would have been an impossible way to conduct diplomatic negotiations. In this case, indeed, it would have been even physically quite impossible. What would we have brought to parliament before signature?

The principle involved in this matter is the same—whether Germany should or should not be associated with the west—that had already been discussed in this parliament, as I have pointed out; not only had it been discussed but it had been approved by parliament when we approved the EDC protocol. The principle having been approved, we are certainly on good, sound, constitutional ground in taking part in these discussions, in signing the agreement and in afterwards bringing the agreement, as we have done, to parliament for approval or otherwise. That is exactly the course we have followed since the war in the case of every important international agreement. To argue, as a legitimate explanation or excuse to justify refusal to support the resolution, that any hon. member is being confronted with a fait accompli, is to advance a proposition that does not hold water in the slightest degree.

It has also been said that we should have called parliament after the agreements were signed. More than one hon. member on the other side felt that we should have done that in an emergency session. I would ask hon. members what was the emergency in connection with this resolution which would in the circumstances have justified the summoning of parliament last autumn? I can understand the necessity of taking that course if inaction on our part would have held up the implementation of these agreements, but there was no possibility of that happening and we in the government knew it, as did hon. members generally. So here again we did what the other signatories to these agreements have done, what the United States did, what the United Kingdom did, what France and the other governments did, submitted them to their legislatures in ordinary session, and I am sure hon. members will agree that the agreements in question were quite as important to those countries, especially the European countries, as they are to us.

The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has stated that the result of this delay is that Canada is among the last of the signatory countries to take action in this matter. With respect, I suggest we are among the first, for if he will consult the records he will find that at the present time there are only three signatories to these agreements that have completed the process of legislative approval—the United Kingdom, Norway and Iceland.

Mr. Fleming: What about Greece?

Mr. Pearson: Greece has not yet, as I understand it, approved these agreements.

Mr. Fleming: Last week.

Mr. Pearson: If I am wrong I will apologize to my hon. friend, but my information is that only three legislatures have approved these agreements.

Mr. Fleming: Belgium, too.

Mr. Pearson: If we approve this resolution this afternoon, as I hope we will, then to the best of my information Canada will be fourth of the countries concerned to take the necessary legislative action.

Now, Mr. Speaker, some questions have arisen in the course of this discussion concerning Canada's commitments and how they might or might not be affected by the action we are proposing to take. I thought I had covered that in my earlier statement, but the house might like me to deal with some specific points which have been raised in the course of the debate since that statement. Some of these questions are questions for information and some of them are rather in the nature of critical observations with regard to our commitments.

So far as the first category of questions is concerned, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) asked me whether we had undertaken any new commitments in the resolution before the house. I would merely ask him if he would be so good as to read my earlier statement when I said we had not, that in fact we have undertaken, in so far as guarantees in the resolution are concerned, exactly the same kind of obligation that we undertook when the house gave approval to the EDC-NATO protocol. I would, however, like to add that if these agreements are made effective, and I hope they will be, the Federal Republic of Germany will become a member of NATO and as Canada is a NATO area that will have, I suggest, a beneficial effect on existing commitments because the obligation of assistance under the North Atlantic treaty pact is reciprocal.

This point, Mr. Speaker, may strike home with greater force if we remind ourselves that with modern weapons and long-range aircraft full-scale war today would be quite a different matter from that of the last world war when this continent was safe from attack. Hon. members are aware, or they soon will be, of the large sums of money which will be necessary to be found on this continent to create an effective continental warning system. Surely that emphasizes the necessity of keeping our defences flexible and the necessity of continuing to examine with our friends in NATO the best and most effective way we can allocate our resources for the general security. We would be irresponsible indeed if in that examination we did not take into account changes in the vulnerability of various areas of NATO as they occur.

That does not, Mr. Speaker, in any sense involve a weakening in our interest here in the defence of western Europe or any other NATO area. It does, however, I think, involve an increasing European interest in the continued security of North America as a NATO area. Anything that makes less possible a knock-out attack on the main centres of western strength, which are on this continent, increases the deterrent and thereby, I suggest, diminishes the risk of aggression anywhere.

As to the second category of questions about our commitments, there were—I say this in no captious sense and I would not be dealing with the matter if it had not been raised by hon. members opposite—critical observations about the extent of the commitments which we have undertaken. But in this case, if I may say so, the criticism of the two wings of the Conservative party, if I may put it that way, with respect to this matter tended, as has been the case before, to cancel each other out.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes), in what I thought was a very useful and indeed important contribution to this debate, asked me if I was satisfied that Canada was doing enough under NATO. My answer to that question is yes. Having regard to all the circumstances, including the one I have just mentioned, I think that we do not need to apologize in any way for our contribution to the common defence under NATO.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre when talking about the London conference said, as found at page 427 of Hansard of January 21:

> I had hoped that Canada might have made as forthright a statement with regard to her forces in Europe as is implied in the commitment of Great Britain. . .

I would point out to the house that the commitment of Great Britain was to keep its forces, four divisions, I think, and the second tactical air force, on the continent of Europe for 44 years. I confess—indeed, confess is the wrong word—I said the other day and I repeat that Canada did not give any such pledge at the London meeting and was not asked to give any pledge of that kind because the United Kingdom pledge was given as a member of the western European union. That omission, if you like to call it an omission, on our part should please the hon. member for Three Rivers because, taking issue with his colleagues, he did state, and I am sure I am not misquoting him, his opinion that we had done and were doing rather too much in Korea and, indeed, in Indo-China and that we are overextended in these matters. He certainly overextended our figures with regard to the brigade in Europe because he nearly doubled them. He is on the record as having said, and that is the only reason I mention it, that we should not have been at the London conference. Indeed, he went a little further and said that we—I think by "we" he meant me—forced our way into that conference, a point that has been dealt with very effectively by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis). That is an interesting argument, Mr. Speaker, when you compare it with the other argument that this matter was so important for Canada that we should have called a special session. He said also, and I quote from Hansard for January 21, 1955, page 413:

> But Canada had no more business to be there than Greece, . . .

Greece is an important and respected member of NATO. I would point out, however, that Greece does not have, and did not at that time have, any forces in Germany. Greece was not giving any mutual aid through the arrangements which were under consideration at the London conference. The sovereignty of Germany was under consideration also, which was a matter of real and immediate importance, not only to Canada generally but to the forces which we had in Germany. The hon. member's suggestion, however, was that notwithstanding all this we should have stayed away and allowed these matters of very direct concern to us to be decided by others. I do not myself, Mr. Speaker, approve of that form of new colonialism.

The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) expressed his worry over our defence expenditures, and that is certainly a legitimate worry. He felt we should be very careful because our existing commitments were so heavy that we should not increase them. Well, I share his preoccupation with defence expenditures, but I was mildly surprised at his worry, because just a few minutes before he made that statement he said, and he may or may not be right, that a sense of realism and an examination of what is going on should convince us that war is all but on us at this time. Then he added that we should, therefore, adopt the appropriate measures now open to us. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, they do involve expenditures on defence.

Mr. Dufresne: I was speaking on the resolution.

Mr. Pearson: There was another question raised in this debate about our commitments. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Quebec West asked, and it is a good question, what would we do if the West Germans attacked Berlin? Are we involved? The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) went farther than that and said, at page 410 of Hansard for January 21, 1955:

> I state also as a fact that there are unscrupulous groups in Germany who will go to any lengths in an attempt to unite East Germany with the west. Then what will we do?

Then he went on:

> What if the United States decide that they are going to support this war against communism and communist barbarism in eastern Europe?

I thought I had answered that question in my earlier statement. It is such an important one that I do not apologize for repeating the answer. I said then, and I repeat now, that any aggressive action of this kind by the West Germans or by anybody else in NATO, but especially by the West Germans because they have undertaken a special obligation in this regard, would break the London and Paris agreements and would break the NATO agreements. In the case of the Federal Republic of Germany, such action would also break their own special undertakings, which they voluntarily assumed in London, not to use force. Far from there being any obligation or commitment on our part to go to their help, there would be an obligation on our part—it is written into these special undertakings to which we have subscribed—to consult under article 4 of the North Atlantic treaty as to what action we should take against an aggressor, whether or not he were a member of the NATO organization. I am sure this is a purely hypothetical question, but it is just as well that the answer should be plain and unambiguous.

Several members, and particularly the hon. member for Prince Albert, wondered why the limitation imposed on the Federal Republic of Germany in regard to the production of certain weapons should be restricted to, the phrase used is, "in its territory." I assure the house that there was no ulterior purpose, nothing sinister about these qualifying words. I would point out also that there were other clauses in these protocols which cover the level of stocks of the member governments, the level of stocks to be permitted, and which were to be controlled by a majority vote of the western European council. The German level in these special arms is zero.

I would point out also that the arms limitation agency set up by the western European agreement has power to control imports into Germany and exports of these armaments from other countries to Germany. This power relates not only to exports and imports of what we call the ABC weapons, but also to heavy warships, mines, aircraft and certain other types of weapons. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization command can inspect these levels—and equipment—of the German forces, amongst others, at any time. I feel that in the circumstances we have established rather firm safeguards, not only in regard to production but the provision and use of armaments.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister a question? What is the explanation, then, for the establishment by the Dornier aircraft company of a plant in Spain?

Mr. Pearson: Well, there is nothing in the agreement, as I have just said, which would prevent a private German company from establishing a factory in Spain, Canada or any other country for the manufacture of aeroplanes. But there is something in the agreement which would prevent the German federal republic forces from equipping themselves with heavy aeroplanes.

The hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl), in a statement which moved us all, made a very interesting suggestion that our new partner, the young Federal Republic of Germany, as I hope she will be, might subscribe to some of the international conventions which have been worked out under the United Nations charter, and more particularly the genocide convention. This thought, if I may say so, is one which I feel sure would have a genuine appeal for the German federal republic, as it has for other countries which have subscribed to similar agreements based on similar principles.

I would point out in this connection, Mr. Speaker, that the federal republic has already agreed upon a declaration incorporated into the final act of the London conference, to abide by the obligations set forth in article 1 of the United Nations charter, which all members of the United Nations are pledged to follow in the pursuit of the purposes of the United Nations. One of the most important of these purposes is, and I quote from the charter:

> . . . promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

This declaration of the federal republic is an aspect of the agreement which I admit has received very little attention, either here or elsewhere, possibly because we have directed so much attention to that part which turned on the rearmament of Germany.

Now, on the rearmament side of this agreement, which seems to be the only one attracting a great deal of attention, emphasis has been laid on the statement—not in this case a fact—that nobody wants these agreements.

It is quite true, Mr. Speaker, that the communists do not want them, and it is also true that they are bending every effort in every country concerned to destroy and defeat them. We do not hear as much sometimes about this Russian pressure as we hear—and we have heard it in this house—about American pressure in respect of these matters. I would like to ask any hon. member opposite to point out any such unfair pressure by the United States since these agreements were negotiated in London early last autumn. The attitude of the United States administration in respect of these matters during these months has been wise and understanding and characterized by no pressure of any kind.

In an effort to illustrate the seriousness and indeed the importance of this communist pressure which I think, notwithstanding what has been said by my hon. friends opposite, has had some effect in this country, my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) read into the record last Friday a directive of the communist party of this country which showed very conclusively the length to which that party was prepared to go in defeating these agreements. In commenting on that statement of my colleague, the hon. member for Regina City, reflecting a sensitiveness in this matter which I suggest is almost morbid, saw fit to say this. First, Mr. Speaker, I had better read exactly what the Minister of National Health and Welfare did say. I quote from page 434 of Hansard. He said:

> I think the people of the country should know—

I am making a horrible mistake. I am reading from the statement of the hon. member from Saskatoon (Mr. Knight). I will come to him in just a minute.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare said this, as reported at page 420 of Hansard:

I would suggest that if there is no enthusiasm on the part of the people of Canada, it could be because this directive has already been acted upon.

That is the communist directive. I continue with the quotation:

But we are not unfamiliar with this technique,—

He was talking about the members of this parliament. He goes on:

—and none of us in this house is going to be in any way influenced except, as the hon. member who has just spoken has said, by the dictates of his or her own conscience.

That seemed to me, Mr. Speaker, to be a perfectly proper observation to make, but it did not seem proper to the hon. member for Saskatoon, because this is how he described it at page 435 of Hansard:

I refer to the rather snide remark—I do not like the word but I cannot think of a better one at the moment—of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who suggested that there might have been some softening of our opinion or the opinion of the country in this regard on account of certain propaganda from the handful of communists in Canada. It is true that the minister immediately withdrew that inference in so far as members of parliament were concerned. I have heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare do that sort of thing before. I believe, however, that inferences, accusations or slander once indulged in can never be completely withdrawn.

In view of what the minister did say and the careful and courteous way in which he put it—and he was applauded by hon. members opposite when he said it—I suggest that that commentary on the minister's remarks by my hon. friend was unfair and unwarranted.

I approach these agreements, and this proposal in particular, in no defeatist or defensive attitude at all. Like hon. members, I regret, indeed I lament, the circumstances which make this kind of agreement necessary; but I am happy that this kind of solution has been found to meet those circumstances and I rejoice when I think what might have happened and what nearly happened last autumn when we were in danger of not finding any such solution, when we were in danger not so much of losing 12 divisions but of losing NATO itself, and when we were in danger of seeing the disintegration quickly rather than slowly of the coalition for peace which we had been building up. It has been repeated over and over again that nobody wants these agreements. Well, Mr. Speaker, this government and the people of Canada want these agreements. The government of free Germany wants these agreements which, quite incorrectly, are characterized as being forced on them. That of course is quite absurd, because the agreements themselves merely give the Germans the right, if they so desire and accept these agreements, to rearm up to a point. They can accept—and I hope they will, notwithstanding what has been said in this house—or they can reject them.

It has been said over and over again by my hon. friends opposite—I am sure they are quite sincere—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a question of privilege. My hon. friend keeps referring to his hon. friends opposite. He looks in the direction of the C.C.F. but the record does not show that.

Mr. Pearson: I am grateful to my hon. friend for giving me a chance to correct the record in that regard, because when I talk about my hon. friends opposite who are opposed to these agreements I am referring not to his own party but to members of the C.C.F. party, not all of whom have spoken against the agreements, as they have every right to do.

Now, I would like to know the evidence, which they have not yet produced to my satisfaction, to support the statement that the German people are opposed to these agreements. Certainly, the German people, through their elected representatives, accepted EDC by a vote of 224 to 165 in the Bundestag. They have said that the leader of the socialist party, Herr Ollenhauer is unalterably opposed to these agreements and the rearming of Germany; but this German socialist democratic leader said at Dortmund in 1953, and I am quoting from his speech, and I believe he was speaking for his party:

We believe that co-operation in a shape which is acceptable also to Great Britain and the Scandinavian nations and associated with NATO will provide better conditions for the effective security arrangements than the EDC treaty. The S.P.D. would accordingly welcome new negotiations on this basis.

And that is the basis on which we have been negotiating. Furthermore, in the social democratic conference late in 1954, the same leader said:

Nor does our rejection of EDC signify the refusal of a military contribution to the defence of the free world in all circumstances so long as Germany remains divided.

It has been said that France is opposed to or accepts these agreements with the greatest reluctance. I know what the vote was in the French lower chamber a few weeks ago: 287 for and 260 against. I also know—and this was pointed out by others who support this agreement—I also know that 99 communists voted against it. But, more significant—because communist votes in these matters have only a kind of significance—more significant is the fact that 53 members of the M.R.P. party who voted against this agreement did not oppose rearmament when it was introduced in EDC. Indeed, they were the chief supporters of EDC.

Also I know—and this has been pointed out—that 86 socialists in the French house voted for the agreement. I would also like to mention now that so much has been made of the way these agreements have been forced on European parliaments that the legislature of Norway, which incidentally has a socialist majority, approved them by 126 to 7. Three or four of the seven were communist members.

I note that the socialist government of Denmark has signed these agreements and is submitting them to its parliament for approval. I note that the lower house in Belgium, in which also the socialist party is the largest, voted—and there was a considerably bigger majority than that which they gave EDC a couple of years ago—last week to approve these agreements by a vote of 181 to 9. And in the 9 were 4 communists.

Mr. Speaker, these socialist parties and socialist governments are led by men who are very close to the danger from Germany and the danger from Russia, who have experienced that danger, who have an understanding of these European forces which are moving now—an understanding which may, I suggest, be greater than that of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron). And these men and parties did not hesitate to express their approval in the way I have mentioned for these particular agreements.

I know that much has been made in this house, by those opposing this resolution, of the vote in the House of Commons in London. That vote was 264 for and 4 against. The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden), and indeed also the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis), said that this constituted a silent protest by a majority of members who could only signify their protest by not voting for it.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is a complete—though I am quite sure unintentional—misrepresentation of the political situation reflected in that vote. And I suggest to my hon. friends that they look up the circumstances of that vote. Indeed, to save them the trouble I shall tell them. In the United Kingdom the small vote—and it was a small vote—registered in support of the agreement was the result, as I am sure some hon. members know, of a last-minute refusal on the part of six pacifist Labourites—and I honour them for their views in that regard—to support the agreement made between the two parties that there would not be a division on this matter. The Labour party leadership had realized that if a vote were taken notwithstanding the support of these agreements by their leaders and by their front bench and by a majority of their members—indeed Mr. Morrison, Mr. Attlee and others spoke in favour of them—the Bevanites and perhaps some others would decide to abstain. And therefore for the purpose of the public record they did not desire such a vote.

To avoid it the Labour leaders decided that the party as a whole should abstain since the agreement that there should be no division was made null and void when these six Labour members forced a vote. But a great many of the members in that house who did not vote on that occasion, including the bulk of the Labour party, by the speeches they made and the decisions they had reached, would have supported it. And indeed there were also 40 Conservative members absent from that vote because they assumed there would be no division. That is the correct situation in regard to the United Kingdom vote, and it is not the same as that which has been put forward by some hon. members opposite.

Now, my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in a very sincere contribution to this debate, said that he opposed it because, among other things, it meant an irrevocable step—because it meant, as he put it, I think, that we would reach the point of no return.

The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), and some others who feel as he does about these matters, said that this agreement is futile, if not worse, because it will be met by increased arms on the other side, and that because of that competition we will end up in a worse condition than when we started.

On the basis of that logic, Mr. Speaker, we would never have built up NATO, about which exactly the same arguments could have been but were not used in the house at that time. I suggest that this step is not irrevocable at all, in the sense that it will determine the path to war. On the contrary, I think it will give us a chance to find a better path than the one we are following now, which might indeed lead to war.

It has been said that there is lots of time, that time is on our side in these matters. Well, time is on our side only if we use it. It has been said, "What's the hurry?" Well, Mr. Speaker, we began trying to make an arrangement with the Soviet union on these matters affecting Germany years ago, and only after repeated attempts in that direction had failed did the western powers, reluctantly, decide that this was the only course and the best course.

Why do the opponents of this resolution keep on forgetting, or misrepresenting, the Berlin conference which was held a year ago? Why do they go on with the tendentious and one-sided interpretation which we heard last night in the statement of the hon. member for Nanaimo? I am not trying to prove that everything that was put forward by the western delegates at that conference was perfect—or at any other conference with the Soviet union—but I do know, and I have read the record from beginning to end, and I hope my hon. friends have too—that at that time the western leaders pleaded for free elections. And, more important, when they were pushed by the Soviet union they agreed that any all-German government which might result from such elections could contract out of EDC, and that it would be free to accept or reject the arrangements of EDC. That is something that the Soviet delegates, Soviet representatives, indeed Mr. Molotov at the conference itself, deliberately refused to recognize. The other day in the House of Commons in London Sir Anthony Eden gave us the assurance that the position in that regard is exactly the same today.

He said—and I am quoting from his speech on that occasion, in answer to a question:

> Of course, the federal republic, as long as the federal republic exists, is bound by these agreements as long as these agreements are in force. There is no doubt about that at all. But we did make it abundantly clear during the Berlin conference . . . that if a new unified German state were to take the place of the German republic she would have the right either to assume, or not to assume, the previous obligations of the federal republic.

And he went on to add that the converse also was true. We all hope of course—that is, those of us who support these agreements—that that would not happen if all-German free elections took place. But we have to take our chances in that regard.

And so, Mr. Speaker, the question, then, is not that these agreements are being forced on Germany as something irrevocable. That is not the case at all. The question is not primarily one of German rearmament, and whether she will or will not have the right to arm up to 12 divisions. The question is whether she will be given back her sovereignty. I believe we all admit that this must include the first right of sovereignty, the right to defend oneself. The question is whether she will be given permission to associate herself with the west as one of a defensive group, including the United Kingdom, the United States, and France, and in the process accepting certain limitations and controls.

In view of that I ask the hon. members who are opposing this agreement how they can possibly argue that the situation now is exactly as it was in the twenties when the nazis were working their way to power?

The hon. member for Saskatoon, at page 436 of Hansard for January 21, made what I thought was an extraordinary statement in view of the arguments he had been putting forward. He said:

> If conditions do not change, Germany is going to arm herself. Let us make no mistake about that. She will rearm, and that rearmament will be limited only by her own desires. But we need not thrust arms upon her.

But no one is thrusting arms upon her. She has the right of decision as to whether she will accept this agreement. The alternative, however, in the words of the hon. member, is that if she does not accept the agreements "she will rearm, and that rearmament will be limited only by her own desires."

Is that a better alternative than the controls which are embodied in these agreements? I suggest that if he and others who feel like him believe that rearmament will be limited only by Germany's own desires and that it is inevitable, then they have no basis for opposing this resolution.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) echoed similar views when he said, at page 411 of Hansard:

> . . . Germany is going to be rearmed in any event. I believe that to be the case.

Why then does he not support us in this matter? He gave us a reason and I hope I will be able to remove its validity. He said we had not gone far enough in the political and economic integration outlined under article 2 of NATO.

But, Mr. Speaker, if that is his only argument I ask him, and others who think as he does in this matter, to consider what would happen if these agreements were rejected. What would happen to the European union? What would happen to NATO? In my opinion, both would go. What chance would there then be of realizing the ideal which I share in this regard with the hon. member for Winnipeg North, of a closer Atlantic community and union?

The hon. member states, and others who oppose this agreement have echoed this sentiment, that, and I quote from page 410 of Hansard:

> Germany must be brought back within the comity of nations and as rapidly as possible, though not on Russian terms.

I could not describe our objective any better than that. I say in all sincerity that that is what we are trying to do, namely bring Germany back into the comity of nations, but not into the cominformity of nations. There is very little chance of doing that if we scorn her now; if we reject her offer of association with the west, or if we treat her as a second-class nation, and refuse her the first right of sovereignty, which is participation in her own defence.

This will never be done if we think only of —and it is hard to forget it—German savagery and her misdeeds. I suggest that the hon. members on the other side of the house from the C.C.F. group who are opposing this resolution are adopting a purely negative attitude in this matter. They are looking back only and they are filled with fears that this course will lead to war and will stop negotiations. I do not share those fears. I think this course if it is operated in the right manner will lead away from war, and I think it will make our negotiations more effective.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in dealing with my point that we had made 16 efforts to negotiate German unification, said, "Let us make 16 more if the alternative is war." I agree, but as I see it the alternative is not war, and I am quite sure that if these agreements go into operation we will be able to negotiate as we must with those whom we have some right to fear.

I deny these agreements will stop the process of negotiation and bring about war. I think the experience of the last four or five years, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) said last night, bears this out. The Economist put it very neatly in this manner:

> Russia wastes no concession on the weak and a policy of negotiating from strength—however fiercely denounced by the Russians—is the one thing that gets results.

As I see it, it is far more dangerous to peace, far more likely to provoke ultimate conflict, if we refuse to accept these agreements.

I wish to conclude by summing up the reasons why I say that, and I hope my remarks will make some impression on those who are opposing these agreements.

My first reason is well expressed by Sir Anthony Eden when he said:

> The only alternative to the Paris agreements would be to plunge the world into confusion and despair.

Would that be a good basis for negotiation? Would it be better to negotiate now and abandon or drop our policies as the Soviet union is begging us to do? We were asked last night, and indeed during the debate on Thursday and Friday, to look at new Soviet offers and particularly at Mr. Molotov's of January 15. I have looked at it, like the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) and others, and I find it a very stale carrot indeed. I am quite sure I am correct in saying that it is a transparent and rather clumsy effort to bring pressure on the Germans on the eve of their debate. It has not deceived the German people, but it may have deceived some hon. members in this house. The hon. member for Mackenzie at page 488 of Hansard referred to this matter. I checked with the text of the proposal and I would like to give a translation of the paragraph on elections which I think, and he agrees, is most important. The translation is as follows:

> "The Soviet government deems it possible in the event of the consent of the government of the German democratic republic and the federal republic to come to an agreement on appropriate supervision.

This has been interpreted by some as an advance on the part of the Soviet union. But I would point out that it reads ". . . in the event of the consent of the government of the German democratic republic and the federal republic . . .", and one is a communist state.

It might give some indication of what German communists and the Russians mean by "appropriate supervision" in this connection if I state what Herr Ulbricht, the communist leader in East Germany, had to say on this issue, almost at the same time. I think it is a lurid commentary on the January 15 offer. He described how the elections should be conducted if they ever got around to holding them. He advised the communists in East Germany to carry out:

> The setting up of joint lists of candidates for the national front as a preparation for what we wish to extend to the whole of Germany later.

That has a very ominous ring, Mr. Speaker. We have had experience with that kind of procedure in East Germany, in Korea, and in other parts of the world where the communists have been in control or have been trying to get control. The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson)—and he quotes the London Times in this respect—feels that this new offer has created a great deal of confusion. I think it has done so; but I think it has created more confusion in some minds in this house than it has created elsewhere.

Then the second reason why I asked for unanimous support of these agreements is that if they were rejected they would be a rebuff to the peaceful democratic forces in Germany which now form a great majority of the members of that legislature. In this respect I cannot refrain from saying that I have been amazed at the attack made on these governing forces in the Federal Republic of Germany at the present time. My friend the hon. member for Yorkton, dealing with this matter, talked about nazi leadership. At page 493 of Hansard he is reported to have had this to say:

> I refuse to support a nazi German army forced upon a reluctant German people who know the real nazis.

The same feeling was expressed by the hon. member for Regina City and the hon. member for Nanaimo. Let me quote from someone who knows this government in Germany and these people probably better than most of us know them in this House of Commons. I refer to an experienced and responsible journalist, Mr. Theodore H. White. This is what he has to say—and it was written last week—about the Bonn government:

> There are certain important points to note about Bonn. Here, in the Bundestag, sit 487 representatives of the people, put there by an election in which 86 per cent of all Germans eligible to vote went freely to the polls. . . Yet among all these elected representatives of Germany there is not one latter-day nazi, not one communist. These men of the Bundestag, together, have given Germans the freest, most decent government in their history.

This is the government that asks to be admitted into our partnership. This is the regime against which remarks are aimed when some of my hon. friends opposite talk about nazi leadership. If we rebuff these forces in Germany and if we discourage and make cynical Herr Adenauer and the men around him, I suggest we shall play right into the hands of the right and left extremists; and there are some of those in Western Germany today.

Who are these so-called nazi leaders responsible for German defence who would organize the German army at this time? They would be under the leadership of a great European, as I have characterized him, namely Herr Adenauer, a man who was on the SS blacklist and was arrested by Hitler. The four top men who would have charge of the defence organization they are permitted would be Herr Blank, a trade union leader; Adolf Heusinger, never a nazi; Hans Speidel, a German general who was in the plot against Hitler and who was tortured in nazi prisons; while the officer in charge of military education and indoctrination has been described as a man of "glowing conscience" who truly wants to make a new democratic army that belongs to the people.

My third reason, Mr. Speaker, is that if we defeat this measure, the move toward European unity would be stopped and France and Germany would once again drift apart. My fourth reason is that NATO, on which our hopes depend for so much more than defence, would be seriously, indeed I think fatally, weakened. I am absolutely convinced of this and not merely, as was suggested last night, because of United States policy in this matter. How could NATO forces remain in Germany indefinitely without that country being a member? How could that country be a member without sovereignty, unless it became a second-class member? And it would rightfully not accept that status. How could it exercise sovereignty if it were refused any share in the collective defence? These, Mr. Speaker, are the imperatives of the situation and not, as I say, United States pressure.

This is not an act of war but of faith; faith in the better forces in Germany, and that includes the social democratic party in Germany; faith in our own increasing strength, under increasingly collective controls, used for pacific defence purposes; faith in our ever-widening system of collective action; faith in European union and the Atlantic community. It is also an act of faith that the Soviet union, when it faces the reality of our determination to proceed steadily on this course, will decide to negotiate realistically for a solution of those European and world questions which will help to heal some of the ills and evils that now plague our distressed world.

Before I left Paris at the last meeting I had a conversation with a leader of one of the NATO countries, one who had suffered such cruelties from the nazi forces in his country during the war that it would make the blood run cold to hear about them. As we parted I said to him, "In the light of your experiences, it is not going to be easy for you personally to support these agreements". His reply was more or less in these words: "Not at all. Indeed, it makes me more anxious than ever to get these agreements through, because I believe they can help to bring about a European and Atlantic unity in which national madness and cruelty of this kind will be prevented and which will give us a better chance for peace".

Mr. Speaker, a vote against this resolution will not defeat it in this house but it will be a declaration of support for such defeat in other countries as well as in this country, with all the unhappy and dangerous consequences that would, I am certain, flow from that defeat. There may be risk in the course we are advocating. There is risk in every international action. But there is more than risk involved if this were defeated; there is a very real and immediate danger to European unity, Atlantic co-operation and peace in the rejection of this course to which we have set our hand. I therefore hope that no member in this Canadian House of Commons will vote against this proposal.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, January 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, we shall now descend from the high level of international politics to the lower plane of domestic issues and the needs of the Magdalen islands.

When I adjourned the debate on Wednesday last I was suggesting that the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) should state in this house where his party stands on the issue of whether armaments should be reduced in Canada in order to increase family allowances. This is what I said at the time, as reported at page 356 of Hansard:

I should like the leader of the Social Credit party to tell the house and the country—because I say the country is entitled to a declaration from the man who is leader of a party that claims to be a national party—whether or not he is in favour of Canadian armament, whether or not he is in favour of Canada living up to the obligations it undertook with the rest of the western European nations to resist communism, whether he is in favour of Canada living up to the obligations that it undertook under NATO. I say that if he is in favour of these things the Social Credit party cannot in good faith tell the people of my county or of any other county that this country ought to reduce military expenditures in order to double family allowances.

I say that if the Social Credit party is in favour of our living up to our obligations under NATO and our obligations to the other free countries allied with us, its leader should denounce in the house and repudiate what has been done in my constituency in the name of the Social Credit party. I shall look forward to hearing him make a statement on that point.

I am pleased to be able to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and to tell the people of my county that at the first opportunity that arose after that, the leader of the Social Credit party made the following statement in the debate on the motion to admit Germany into NATO, as reported at page 387 of Hansard:

I say to him, the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon), that I have supported NATO right from the beginning, because I have felt that Canada must be strong, and that Canada must stand with the other free nations of the world to resist communism. I believe we must continue to spend for defence purposes and keep ourselves strong and, certainly so long as the present situation continues, we must give high priority to defence. That is where I stand.

He goes on to say:

I took a note of what the hon. member said last night and I felt that under the circumstances I was obligated to state where I stand. And by the way, I am speaking at this time for the Social Credit association of Canada, of which I have the honour to be leader. I am sure all the members of that association, and those affiliated with it, will stand by what I have to say.

That was a very satisfactory answer for me to get, and I ask the people of my county to take particular note of it. I ask the people who have been telephoning me during the last few days to protest against the remarks I made last week, who state that they are members of that party, to take note of what their leader said in the house. I hope that will settle the matter.

Mr. Hansell: May I say for the record that the Social Crediters my hon. friend refers to are not affiliated with the Social Credit association of Canada. Therefore the leader of this group is not their leader in that sense.

Mr. Cannon: I am not familiar with the internal organization of your party. I can assure you they use your name in their propaganda.

An hon. Member: So does Bennett.

(Translation):

Mr. Cannon: Mr. Speaker, I want to call your attention and that of the members to an item which appeared in the Vancouver Province, reporting a statement of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) which aims a blow at the rights of French-speaking members of the House of Commons as well as the rights of all French-speaking electors. This article, which appeared in the said paper on September 15, was sent to me by a friend of mine in British Columbia. It is entitled:

(Text):

Winch hits use of French language in the house.

(Translation):

The article goes on:

(Text):

"I have yet to meet a French-Canadian M.P. who does not understand or speak English," he explained. "Yet this minority group insists on using French in the house. We have to wait twenty-four hours for a transcript to find out what they said."

(Translation):

The hon. member for Vancouver East said at a meeting held in Vancouver North: "I have yet to meet a French-Canadian M.P. who does not understand or speak English. Yet this minority group insists on using French in the house. We have to wait 24 hours for a transcript to find out what they said."

He also said:

(Text):

It is their God-given right to use the French tongue but why do they insist on it when they know the majority of the members are English-speaking and can speak it themselves?

(Translation):

He also said:

It is their right, he says—how nice of him! —to use French, but he wonders why they do so, when they know the majority of members are English-speaking and cannot understand French.

Mr. Dufresne: That is socialistic fanaticism.

Mr. Cannon: I could not let this attack go unchallenged. I deem it my duty to register a strong protest against what the hon. member said in North Vancouver. Mr. Speaker, this is the kind of thing that hurts national unity in this country.

Vigilance, we are told, is the price of freedom. So it is, and it is also the price of the safeguard of our rights. We must ever be on the watch, especially when certain people make statements of that kind three thousand miles away, in the hope that no one will ever hear about it in our province. But we did hear about it in the province of Quebec because a former Liberal member, a friend of mine—Liberals can always be counted upon to defend Quebec—sent me the article in question just in time so I could bring it to the attention of the house.

Mr. Langlois (Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere): That is better than the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne).

Mr. Cannon: Mr. Speaker, members from both sides of the house, including the member for Quebec West, will certainly join me in this strong protest against this denial of the privilege of the French-speaking minority in this house and in the country.

And so, Mr. Speaker, French-speaking members would be penalized for having had enough brains and gumption to learn English. Because they are able to express themselves in the language of the other members of this house, they would be penalized and prevented from speaking their own tongue in this house?

Mr. Dufresne: Besides, French is an official language in this country. Maybe he does not know that.

Mr. Cannon: He probably did not. In any case, we will let him know about it, and French-speaking members of this house will continue, in future, to speak French. Not only will they continue to speak French as they have in the past, but I think they should, in protest against this unwarranted attack, speak French more often than they have up till now.

Mr. Dufresne: You can count on the member for Quebec West.

Mr. Cannon: I wondered if I should continue in English my remarks in connection with the needs of my constituency, but I need not tell you that after such an attack, and to mark my sincere indignation at this attack, I shall speak French.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the Magdalen islands are always in need of federal help in the field of air services. At the present time, for instance, we need a new airfield at House Harbour. Ever since aircraft have been coming to the Magdalen islands, they have been landing on the beach. However, this beach cannot be used as a landing strip.

The weather is at times severe, specially in winter, and when ice accumulates on the beach, aircraft cannot reach the Magdalen islands. In fact, quite often and for long periods of time, our aircraft cannot land on the beach.

Only yesterday, I received a letter from one of my constituents stating that at the time of writing it was a week since the aircraft had come to the Magdalen islands. I point this out to show that we are in need of an airfield in the Magdalen islands. I am happy to tell the house that, before his resignation as minister of transport, the Hon. Lionel Chevrier had agreed to the building of an airstrip at House Harbour. I mentioned this to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) and I am sure that the electors of my constituency of Magdalen islands can count on him to fulfil the promise given to me by his predecessor.

We should not forget, however, that, in order to permit construction of this landing strip, the municipality has to purchase the required land. It had therefore to present a private bill in the Quebec provincial legislature and, as a lawyer, I personally undertook to introduce that bill in the provincial house. I am glad to be able, through you, Mr. Speaker, to tell my constituents that I am assured that the authorities to whom I presented the bill will pass it, and every obstacle will thus be removed.

Mr. Dufresne: With a co-operative provincial government.

Mr. Cannon: In this case, yes. We need something else too, with respect to air communications. At present Magdalen islands enjoy a tri-weekly air service with Charlottetown. However, if we want to travel from Moncton to Quebec city in T.C.A. planes, we have to go via Montreal, because those planes do not go directly to Quebec city. With a delegation from the chamber of commerce of Quebec city, I asked the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who have control over T.C.A., that steps be taken to provide us with a direct air service between Quebec city and the islands. I feel that the citizens of Magdalen islands are entitled to direct connections with the capital of their province, without having to detour through Montreal. I will not insist overly on that point since the delegation was well received and I am confident that our request will be granted fairly soon.

We should have a direct air service with Gaspe. At present, when the sick from Magdalen islands have to go to the hospital at Gaspe, they have to travel by way of Charlottetown, Moncton and Matapedia, and then come back to Gaspe. Our need of air transport service in the area is evident. This time I am suggesting to the provincial government that it make a grant to the airline operating at Rimouski, for example, to enable the company to establish an air service linking Magdalen islands more directly with the province of Quebec, of which they are part, as you know.

We also need fishing harbours. For some time, the fish have been going farther and farther away from our shores, and we have to use larger ships to go farther offshore. To use those boats, we need deeper fishing harbours and proper wharves. Two places in my constituency have been brought to my attention: the bay of Portage-du-Cap and the bay of Bassin-aux-Huîtres. In those two bays, water is deep enough and those ships which have a much larger draught than the ones we use now could come in and stay anchored when there are great storms. However, a channel should be dredged to enable the ships to use those bays. I am submitting this request to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), and I am sure it will receive full attention.

Now I would like to see an extension added to the wharf at Etang-du-Nord and the construction of a slip to serve as a shelter for fishing boats of Ile Brion. The breakwater at Aurigny should also be lengthened.

Mr. Speaker, it was announced in the speech from the throne that supplementary benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act were to be provided. I am pleased to note this, and I want to thank the government on behalf of my constituents who draw benefits under the act. Unfortunately a great number of my constituents do not benefit therefrom, because the fishing industry does not come under the act.

I have mentioned more than once in this house that the fishermen should benefit from the Unemployment Insurance Act. In England and in the United States fishermen benefit from that act and I cannot see why it should not be the same here in Canada. It is said that there are certain administrative difficulties, but, Mr. Speaker, difficulties are there to be overcome by a good administration. As the Department of Fisheries and the Department of Labour are in charge in this case, I am sure that they will be able to overcome these administrative difficulties.

I would suggest, as a first step, that fishermen drawing wages should be allowed to benefit under the Unemployment Insurance Act. True, a small percentage of fishermen work for wages but their case is particularly difficult from two points of view. First, the personal point of view, since they are the only people working on a salary basis who do not come under the Unemployment Insurance Act and, secondly, from the point of view of their prospective employers. The latter have great difficulty in finding people who will work for wages, since those day-labourers refuse to take up work which deprives them of unemployment insurance benefits. And so, the owner of a fishing vessel who has no grown-up son to help him has a hard time finding helpers. The obvious result of all this is that we have a very valuable natural resource which is very inadequately developed, while if those owners of fishing craft were in a position to employ the men they need, they could bring back a lot more fish.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before going any further, may I ask how much time I have left?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time I have left?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time expires at 4.53.

Mr. Rowe: About 15 seconds.

(Translation):

Mr. Cannon: Mr. Speaker, I had more to say but, as my speaking time is running out, I shall immediately come to a part of my speech which I should not want to omit.

This year will mark the bicentenary of the dispersion of the Acadians in 1755.

I wish to join with the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) in mentioning this event.

Ninety per cent of my electors in the Magdalen islands are of Acadian descent. They have preserved the customs and traditions of this valiant people. They are hospitable, hard-working and respectful of religious and civic authorities. One of their most touching traditions is their devotion to the Blessed Virgin. Their national day is celebrated on Assumption day and it is truly touching to hear them sing "Ave Maris Stella" at the end of their meetings.

One hears of the miracle of French survival in America, of the remarkable fact that the 60,000 Frenchmen who remained in Canada in 1759 have left millions of descendants who remained faithful to their tongue and to their religious beliefs in this land of America. But I believe that the survival of the Acadians is even more remarkable, more worthy of mention, because they were not only conquered and separated from their mother country, but also dispersed in foreign lands from which the ancestors of the ones now living in Canada came back after overcoming obstacles that would have disheartened men of lesser courage and perseverance.

I join with the hon. member for Gloucester in expressing the wish that, not only the federal government, but also the government of the province of Quebec, will make a substantial contribution to ensure the success of the Acadian celebrations.

(Text):

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, following the pleasant custom which obtains in this house I would like to begin by congratulating the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and by expressing the hope that they did not feel as apprehensive about their maiden speeches as I did about mine. Why we should feel so apprehensive I am not quite sure. It is not the custom to hang on our words. It is not because there are surging crowds waiting to hear what we say. But there is something about the first speech in this house which has an alarming effect, and I hope they came through with less wear and tear than I did.

Being of a pacific turn of mind and fearing that during the long recess I might lose whatever offensive spirit I have, I decided it would be a good thing to take the Winnipeg Free Press daily in order to keep myself alive, shall I say, to irritating things. I was greatly interested when I got the issue of October 4 to read the first editorial, which began "Mr. Drew is right and Mr. St. Laurent is wrong". I thought this surely was "something for the book". I read further and found that the issue on which Mr. Drew was right and Mr. St. Laurent was wrong was on the time of the meeting of parliament. I shall read briefly from the editorial.

> Mr. Drew is right and Mr. St. Laurent is wrong about the time for parliament to meet.

Later it continues:

> By starting the session next month, ministers would from their point of view merely be giving themselves more work sooner; and they would risk grumbles from their back-bench supporters, many of whom probably prefer to stay at home and tend to local political fences or other business.
> To state these motives should be enough to make the government change its mind. They are poor motives.

The Free Press goes on to use words which are interesting and I think sound a little bit surprising if we reflect on what actually takes place:

> The business of a parliamentary government, under our constitution, is to govern through parliament, subject to the public discussion for which parliament is the only satisfactory focus.

Let us consider what has happened in the light of these words. We have had six months' recess, six months during which matters of tremendous importance came up, six months when parliament was ignored. The Free Press goes on to make the point that there were vital issues:

> There are plenty of issues—foreign policy in both Europe and the east, the seaway, foreign trade, the state of business at home, employment prospects, labour relations, immigration, parliament's own procedures—

And so on. I stress again that what has happened is an almost complete negation of this principle. It is a kind of erosion of parliamentary rights. If we look at it clearly it is really a conspiracy against the principles of our constitution, and the Free Press is quite correct in what it states.

We are told there is to be a further invasion of the rights of the minority. We are told that the rules are to be amended so that the rights we have had in the past will be drastically cut down. If this is attempted I can only hope that every member of the opposition, to whatever party he belongs, will resist to the utmost. I agree with facilitating the business in a sensible manner, but I think we should be astute to resist strongly anything which savours of merely cutting down the rights of the opposition, and I think we should do our very utmost to make the general public feel how important this is.

It is interesting to observe that even in Britain, which we always recognize as the home of parliamentary democracy, they are beginning to worry about this issue. In a book on parliamentary procedure edited by Campion at page 120 this is stated in an article by Sir Arthur Salter, who I believe should be regarded as a great parliamentarian:

> Our destiny turns largely, I think, upon our ability, without making the executive impotent or ineffective, to restore the traditions and the authority of parliament so that it can be once more the effective guardian of our liberties.

It so happens that in the motion we have just discussed we have before us crystal clear evidence of the evils which have followed from this six months' recess. In the debate which has just been concluded it was made painfully clear that because there had been no parliamentary discussion the public had not been educated, and the field had been left open to the most insidious propaganda.

I shall not take up the time of the house to dwell on that, but it must be clear to all of us. We might even have voted unanimously on that resolution if it had not been for the fact that a great many people were undoubtedly led away by this propaganda. It was quite within the truth for members to say that many in Canada were not in favour of the resolution. That is quite true, but it need not have been nearly so true if parliament had been in session last autumn.

As regards unemployment, it has already been mentioned that the measure of relief which we passed since the house came together has been delayed for months because this house was not in session and the unemployed have suffered accordingly.

A most important matter which has not been discussed and which could have been discussed before Christmas, and could be even now if there were any desire to do so, is the question of the commonwealth conference. With respect to this we have been denied any discussion, and we have been denied any information. A pamphlet issued the other day by the Canadian Institute of International Affairs says: "As the date for the commonwealth conference on January 31 approaches there is a deepening silence on the plans and prospects, and some of the prospects seem to be clouded in an almost surreptitious air".

I think that is a fair statement. It is almost as though the government wished no one to know about it. The attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on this matter has been perfectly astonishing. I would like to read a brief extract from what the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 34 of Hansard of January 10, in answer to the suggestion that there might be a discussion on trade with regard to the commonwealth conference. He said:

> Those are not things which can be achieved by agreement between any two individuals. They are things that must be the result of the operation of economic factors that depend upon a multiplicity of different shaping trends.

There may be some truth in that, but surely we would also say that these events have to be shaped by the actions of men in public life.

There has recently been a certain amount of information emanating from Great Britain as to what is taking place. In the Ottawa Journal of January 22 there appeared in a Reuters dispatch the following:

> Full sessions of the commonwealth meetings presided over by Prime Minister Churchill will be devoted mainly to international affairs and a review of the prospects for peaceful east-west coexistence. Other topics to be discussed at the full sessions are the economic, financial and trading problems of the sterling area, to which all of the commonwealth countries except Canada belong.

We now find that this meeting is going to take place, and that we are to know nothing about it. It was suggested that there might be an opportunity for discussion here. At one stage the Prime Minister almost seemed to go along with that suggestion, but no action has been taken with respect to it. I wish to point out that on a previous occasion, in the year 1930, when a former prime minister went to London, a completely different practice was followed. There is a certain similarity about the situation we were facing then and that which we are facing now. The sale of wheat was in question then as it is in question now. As reported at page 600 of Hansard for the special session of 1930, Mr. Bennett said:

> During the last week I have communicated also with western premiers and indicated that it was thought desirable that those who might be able to speak with some authority in connection with the great wheat branch of our industry should be represented. It is thought perhaps Mr. McPhail, who represents the pools of the three prairie provinces . . . Professor Swanson, of Saskatchewan university, and Mr. John I. Macfarlane , , , should proceed to London at this time.

Then he adds:

> The gentlemen I have named, who are specialists in their lines of business, will be able to speak with some definite authority in connection with these matters, not only in London but on the continent of Europe.

Mr. Speaker, compare that situation with what we have here, naught but impenetrable mystery. Our commonwealth relations can be more important than ever because, if GATT fails, we may be back in a trading situation where the whole relation of the commonwealth will assume an importance it has not had for years.

We have got past the time when people are ready to write off the commonwealth as a second-class association of nations. Not only did the commonwealth save the world in 1914 and in 1940, but last summer we had Sir Anthony Eden coming to the rescue of a distracted Europe. Again we owe it to the commonwealth, and in this case particularly to the United Kingdom, that the situation was restored. There is now no talk about Britain being a second-class power.

When we look at the commonwealth, we see that it spans the world. It bridges the gap between east and west. India is to come to the commonwealth conference; India, which can have such a great influence on the east as well as on the west. India is most important. We remember the help which India was able to give in the Korean matter when it came to the question of the truce. We remember that while the southeast Asia treaty organization —SEATO as we call it—is in the course of development, India can be of great help there.

Happily the fear of colonialism—the almost inferiority complex—that we used to find occasionally in Canada is entirely a thing of the past. Owing to the work of Sir Robert Borden and those who followed him our autonomous position is well understood. It had its beginning with the signing of the peace treaty in 1919. We have gone on and established it, so there is now no question whatever as to our position.

Trade organization in the commonwealth can also be of great importance. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has warned us that GATT is in danger. We are not accustomed to regard the Minister of Trade and Commerce as a prophet of evil. He is the professional optimist usually. When he tells us that GATT is in danger, we should believe it is in danger. Yet at this time the Prime Minister goes off without any mandate and without telling us anything about what he is going to do, having refused to entertain any suggestion of discussion.

What a world of difference there is between the situation as it is and the situation as it might have been. What we should have had is a vigorous approach to the question from our own point of view, so that instead of leaving trends to shape themselves we should have had vigorous statesmen shaping the trends. After all, years ago in this country there was a great trend to the United States in our economic development, but we decided that we wished to be ourselves, and by strength of statesmanship events were moulded to that end.

This time are we going to be merely an onlooker? Are we going to do what we were reported to have done at Colombo, namely be a kind of friendly gadfly? It does not seem to me to make sense. Yet so far as we can discover from the Prime Minister there is no reason to believe that our Department of Trade and Commerce has taken an active interest in this forthcoming conference. The communication apparently has been, according to the Prime Minister's statement, purely between the external affairs department and, in London, the commonwealth relations department.

Are the Canadian people too juvenile to be consulted about this matter? Are their representatives too unworthy to be allowed to express their views? The news we have from England indicating that the sterling bloc members of the commonwealth are going to discuss their trade relationships makes us keener than ever to take a prepared part in the conference, but we have seemed to have little interest in it in spite of our vast moral and material resources. By maintaining this strange detachment I would fear that we may have far less influence than we might otherwise have. You get out of anything only what you put into it. If we have not prepared carefully and thoroughly, what can we expect from this hesitating, mysterious, unco-operative and unexpectant attitude? As I say, we may get only what we put into it. How can we expect results to accrue when we seemingly have so little to put into it ourselves?

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit me to ask one question?

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. member really consider it unco-operative for the Prime Minister to go off for two weeks at the very beginning of what is going to be an extremely busy and difficult session of parliament in order to take part in this conference?

Mr. Macdonnell: What I am complaining about is that the Prime Minister will have gone off having completely neglected parliament; having refused to allow parliament to discuss the matter at all; having refused to give it the slightest indication of what his own attitude is to be. Having appeared earlier in the session to get near the stage where he was going to allow discussion, he then entirely backed away from that position. That is what I complain about.

Mr. Harris: What is this debate for, except for hon. members to express their opinions about things?

Mr. Macdonnell: I am suggesting that we might have had a debate on this subject.

Mr. Harris: You are free to do so.

Mr. Macdonnell: The Prime Minister has not granted it. That is what I am complaining of.

I now come back to consider the question of, as I say, the neglect of parliament. I refer to the Free Press which speaks about the ministers not wanting "more work sooner".

I ask what the ministers have been doing. It is interesting to follow the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill). He has been down in his constituency. It is a good thing sometimes to let your constituents see you. He gave a charming picture to the Rotary club, I think it was, in St. John's, of a pleasant political family party which they had in Newfoundland. According to the St. John's press:

> He gave full credit to Premier Smallwood for his decision to enter the political field. He had not the remotest intention of entering it until the premier persuaded him to do so. One of his constituents remarked that while it was nice to see Mr. Pickersgill visit his riding, he might as well have stayed in Ottawa. He would be elected anyway if Joey supported him.

That is an extremely pleasant relationship.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I make just a slight correction? What he said was: "so long as you are Joey's man".

Mr. Macdonnell: That is even more interesting. I was going to say that one was delighted to see this picture of personal relations at the dominion-provincial level, and I wondered whether there were perhaps equally intimate and pleasant relations between other members of the cabinet and other provincial premiers. However, I will leave that particular point just there.

Mr. Harkness: Pocket borough, Canadian style.

Mr. Macdonnell: I must say it is very interesting to hear the minister describe himself as "Joey's man"; nevertheless—

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): It is a wonder he did not say "Joey's boy".

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) interrupted and said something about a pocket borough.

Mr. Fleming: No, I did not. Mr. Speaker, I said no such thing.

Mr. Pickersgill: I beg the hon. member's pardon. It was the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness). I just thought the house ought to know that the opposition had a Conservative candidate in my riding, and since the election he has joined the C.C.F.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not hear me. I said, "pocket borough, Canadian style", and I meant "pocket".

Mr. Macdonnell: May I go on now, Mr. Speaker? I am able to qualify the statement the minister made in St. John's because I followed him farther west, and in Manitoba he divided the credit for his being in the house. He said it was because Prime Minister St. Laurent was prime minister that he was in public life, and that he would not have accepted the career under other circumstances. When I read that I could not help wondering whether the former prime minister, if he by chance interests himself in the small affairs that go on in this house, might have thought that perhaps he could have done the persuading job himself if he had got around to it, but after all that is something we will never know.

I had hoped also to follow the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), but he is not here today and therefore I do not think I shall. We are all delighted that the minister is back addressing the house in his ringing tones and nursing his glass of water. I often wonder what the minister would be like if instead of a glass of water he had what the great Disraeli used to have, a glass of gin; what the tones of the Minister of Agriculture would be like if in fact he were permitted to have gin instead of water. I can only imagine; but in any event I am sure it is water.

Mr. Harris: None of you would be elected.

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to say a word about the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), though he is not here either. We are all delighted that he was honoured by the medal which was given to him for his services to aeronautics. I always like to think of the minister as a strong, silent man. I like to think of him as coming into his office in the morning, selling 10 or 12 million bushels of wheat, going on to build two or three pipe lines, then perhaps buying some super aeroplanes for Trans-Canada Air Lines before lunch, and then coming in here and telling us how foolish anybody is who thinks there is the slightest flaw of any kind in the ministry of trade and commerce.

I like to think of him that way, but that is not the whole story of the minister. During the course of the autumn when speaking somewhere he mentioned that at that time he had 11 speeches facing him which he was to deliver. So we can see that ministers are not entirely tied to their desks while we are away. They do get around a bit, and it is difficult for them, of course, to have us here. I am sure that life is much easier for them when they keep us away, and it will need all our efforts to make them change that attitude.

My time runs on, Mr. Speaker, and I want to stay well within my time today. I want to say a word about unemployment. If you read the speech from the throne carefully you will find that unemployment is mentioned. It says:

> Some unemployment of a regional and seasonal nature is being experienced.

These words should not have been put into the mouth of the Governor General. They are so unequal to the situation that they might have choked him. In a narrow sense I suppose everything is seasonal and regional. I would imagine, for example, that the people of the maritimes would be very ready indeed to agree that there is regional unemployment down there far worse than in most of the rest of the country.

I am going to deal with this matter very briefly by making one comparison. I have here figures showing unemployment in Great Britain during 1954, and I shall refer to them very briefly. In January, for example, unemployment in Britain was 1·6 per cent. In Canada unemployment of unplaced applicants amounted to 10 per cent, and of persons without jobs and seeking work amounted to 5 per cent. I shall not put the whole statement on record. It is taken from a recent number of the London Economist, and shows that our percentages of unplaced applicants are roughly five times greater than the percentage of British unemployed, and our percentage of persons with jobs and seeking work is roughly three times greater.

That seems to me a very poor record for us to show. After all, Britain has only her skills to sell and we have not only our skills, of which we are so fond of talking, but natural resources in a big way. Our unemployment would have been much worse if it had not been for the fortunate speeding up in the base metals last year.

What is the government's attitude in the face of this situation? There are really three schools of thought. There is first of all the Minister of Trade and Commerce who, speaking of unemployment in the neighbourhood of 200,000, said he thought that was getting down to the "hard core" of unemployment. It will not be very comforting to the people unemployed to know that they form part of the hard core. In other words the situation is really taken almost as normal. Then we have two different attitudes taken by the Prime Minister. The first is what one might call the attitude of unlimited liability. The Prime Minister is reported to have said in September:

> We have a country where there should be work for everybody and if we are not smart enough to organize the economy of the nation to provide work for everybody we are incompetent.

That is a strong statement, but the Prime Minister made it; and certainly on the basis of that statement there is every evidence that they are incompetent at the present time. There is another approach which the Prime Minister took the other day and which one might describe as the "let nature take its course" approach. After agreeing in his speech on the address that unemployment is deplorable and expressing small faith in expenditures on public undertakings—how different from the shelf of projects we used to hear about—he said, as found at page 33 of Hansard of January 10:

> What is required is something that stimulates the economy generally and does not to any unnecessary degree interfere with the display by our Canadian citizens of their own initiative and skills.

There you have three different views. "You pays your money and you takes your choice". Surely we can fairly expect the government to help reduce unemployment by creating a climate favourable for business, and in particular to do something in the way of decreasing taxes. I shall also have something to say later on the failure to economize. I should like to say in passing that it is still extraordinarily unsatisfactory to have two entirely different unemployment returns, one from the Department of Labour and the other from the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Unemployment is of course closely associated with overseas trade, and I wish to say a word at this point about GATT. The Minister of Trade and Commerce told us the other day that GATT was going badly, and according to the Winnipeg Free Press when the minister uses any but the words of optimism we should treat them very seriously indeed. The Free Press of December 29 last contains the following:

> Few things in Canadian politics or business are more stable than the optimism of Mr. C. D. Howe. No one expects him ever to talk gloomily. And Mr. Howe is not quite a Cleopatra; custom has somewhat staled the variety of his ways of looking on the bright side.

Later in the paragraph it says, after commenting on his outlook for the year:

> And his restraint about next year may therefore be read almost like a cry of despair . . .

Now I want to come to GATT. I want to remind the house that we in this party welcomed GATT, and supported it. As we look back over seven years we realize that GATT has made a substantial contribution to the creation of a world in which goods move with some degree of freedom, the kind of world in which an exporting country like Canada can prosper.

It is true that we have had to take the bitter with the sweet. It is true that of late there seems to have been more bitter and less sweet, especially in our relations with the United States. The sweet has been in what I have indicated; that is, that GATT, particularly in its early years, did do something to create that kind of world in which an exporting country can prosper. But we have found more and more evidence, as time has gone on, that the escape clauses lurking in GATT have been used more and more, particularly by the United States; that it has played false to its own child by running away from the spirit of GATT.

Canada, on the other hand, has supported it and has had an almost unique record. We must face the fact that in our support of GATT we have injured some of our own people. I feel it is reasonable to hope that our negotiators will take a firm stand in the matter of these escape clauses. I hope we shall not get, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce seemed to indicate the other day he expected, a weaker agreement. There is one encouraging sign. There is a sign that a less restrictive trade policy may be adopted by the United States. Unfortunately that is in the government area, and perhaps has not yet reached congress itself.

I want to say a word about economy. But first I want to say just a word about the speech delivered in Montreal by the Minister of Finance. There are two schools of thought on this speech, as set out in the Free Press. One is what you might call the barefoot boy school, which would indicate that the minister went down to Montreal and talked out of turn because he did not quite understand what he was saying. I do not subscribe to that school. The other school of thought, also expressed in the Free Press, is that he did not say anything at all; he just said what any reasonable man would say. I do not subscribe to that school, either, because I think it is true the minister did raise hopes of a reduction in taxes. I want to say that while the speech, whatever else it was, was good, clean fun, taxation is a dreadfully serious business to a lot of people. I feel it is not really the proper place at all for fun.

There has been much talk in this house of economy. We were told by the ex-minister of finance that the duties of a minister of finance consist largely of a continuous search for economies, and that the effort to achieve economy and efficiency is never relaxed. In the light of that, Mr. Speaker, I want to read a statement in the Winnipeg Free Press, from its Ottawa correspondent. I ought to be very grateful to the Winnipeg Free Press for helping me so much with this speech. I want to read what he has to say about the government efforts at economy. It is an astonishing statement. It reads:

> Careful study of the federal civil service indicated that the cause of the hitherto uncontrollable growth was simple. Whenever there was a need for expansion, the departments expanded. They did not search within themselves for surplus personnel and meet the need for expansion by making better use of their existing staff. They invariably added to it.
> To illustrate: if a bridge is built across the St. Lawrence, there would have to be a customs house at the Canadian end of it, staffed by customs and immigration officers. The opening of the bridge would greatly reduce the number of people entering the country by ferries. But instead of transferring men from the ferry ports to the bridge, the tendency would be to add to the payroll by appointing additional staff at the bridge.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would that not depend on whether the ferry was still there?

Mr. Macdonnell: I am reading from the Free Press. The article continues at another point:

> Hitherto, the treasury board has only dealt with proposals for increases. There has never been, until now, a consistent effort made to employ the existing staff more efficiently or to reduce the civil service.

That seems to me to be a most astounding statement. If private enterprise were run in that way it would not last any time. There are two great evils in it. It not only wastes the money of the people, but it wastes the efforts of the civil servants. If this report is correct, and it is written by a man who certainly does not go out of his way to criticize the government, we are not only wasting money but we are wasting the efforts of civil servants because good new jobs are not going, as they should, to the men presently in the service.

The writer says the present Minister of Finance is turning tough, and things are going to be better. This leads me to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, a cartoon in the Winnipeg Free Press. It depicts the Minister of Finance as Hercules, and a very fine Hercules he makes. It depicts the civil service as the many headed serpent known in mythology as Hydra. The minister is wielding his sword and has just cut off the head of the Department of Justice, shown as quite small, but that is the only one. I do not know why the Department of Justice has had its head cut off. Perhaps it is because it does not spend much. This one head has been cut off and is on the ground. But the Department of External Affairs with three heads, reaching up very high; the Department of Transport with three heads and the Department of Agriculture with one enormous head, are depicted as having their heads still in place. Up to the moment, therefore, the minister has made very little progress, according to this cartoon. According to the fable, as some hon. members may know, in the end Hercules did kill the Hydra. I am not able to tell you how many years he took to do it.

I have tried to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that we have had a very unsatisfactory opening this session; that it is quite clear that much has been lost by the long delay; that the unemployment situation is entirely unsatisfactory and that the government took two or three different attitudes but pursued none with any vigour; and finally, that in the realm of economy we have this fantastic situation which I have disclosed to you by reading the extract from the Free Press. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the amendment with enthusiasm.

(Translation):

Mr. R. E. Reinke (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, on the very day the session opened, the member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In an admirable speech, which we listened to with the greatest attention, he, among other things, asked Providence to grant us peace, happiness and justice. Even though this is no easy task, as far as I am concerned, I do wish to congratulate him in his own tongue on what he said and on the way in which he said it, even though, hearing me, he might have some trouble recognizing the lovely tongue of Racine and Molière.

(Text):

Now, Mr. Speaker, having congratulated the mover (Mr. Leduc) in his own tongue, I shall now revert to my own. I have too much respect for the French language to continue murdering it for another half hour or so. I should like to extend congratulations also to the seconder (Mr. Carrick). While I know this is customary, I do it with sincerity, not of course suggesting that those hon. members who spoke before me were not sincere. But I can assure hon. members that I have very carefully read their speeches, and appreciate the thoughtfulness and eloquence of each speaker.

Although I had the privilege of piloting through this house at the last session of parliament, on behalf of my friends of Slovak origin, a bill to incorporate the Canadian Slovak League, I still consider this to be my maiden speech, and that being so I should like to refer briefly to my constituency of Hamilton South.

There is no doubt in my mind that you, sir, and other hon. members have heard of that garden spot of Canada and the hub of Canada's industry, the city of Hamilton. If you have not, it is no fault of my friend the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross), who has sat in this house since 1940 constantly extolling the virtues of this wonderful city. Hamilton has a population of approximately 220,000 people. The riding of Hamilton South was first established at the last redistribution of parliamentary seats, and I have the honour and privilege of being its first member. On the escarpment rising some 250 feet above the level of lake Ontario, which we call our mountain, we find a city within a city of approximately 40,000 people. From this vantage point we can look out over all that part of the city lying below with its fine residential sections, commerce and heavy industry. Then farther to the north one may view Hamilton harbour, which ranked second only to Montreal in tonnage shipped in 1953 and third to Montreal and Vancouver in tonnage shipped in 1954. Finally farther north are the Burlington canal and the blue waters of lake Ontario, and on a clear day we can see Toronto about 30 miles in the distance.

This mountain portion of the riding comprises about one-third of the population. The other two-thirds begin at the foothills and reach from Hamilton bay. In this portion you find residential and commercial sections, and near the bay front we have such well-known firms as Canadian Westinghouse, Dominion Foundries and Steel, C.I.L., National Steel Car, Firestone and others too numerous to mention.

You will realize from my description of the industries there, Mr. Speaker, that our prosperity depends upon the existence of many industries which employ thousands of people. Hamilton is a workingman's city. It is gratifying to know that Canada is governed by a party that appreciates the cause of the workingman, just as I do, having been associated with the steel industry for a number of years. I am proud that our government enacts legislation with a view to improving the conditions of the people as a whole, giving them security, improving their health and living conditions, not infringing upon their right to be free citizens nor infringing on the system of free enterprise which is part of our democratic way of life.

Although no reference was made to a tax reduction in the speech from the throne, we shall all look forward to the day when reductions can be made safely. Up to the present time there has been no final agreement on the Korean issue. Our preparedness program must go on to act as a deterrent against communist aggression or until that ominous cloud which hangs over our head has been dispelled. The Canadian people would want to pay taxes, knowing that any reduction would have to come from our defence budget, which consumes nearly 50 per cent of our tax dollar, or from our welfare program which accounts for approximately 25 per cent of our budget.

My congratulations, sir, go to the government for the fine start we have made on the St. Lawrence seaway. The appointment of such a capable man as the Hon. Lionel Chevrier to head that authority is to be commended. In passing, I would like to pay my respects to the late Robert Saunders, who was the chairman of the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission. I am sure the St. Lawrence seaway power authority will miss his help during the days ahead. We are proud to live in Hamilton. The completion of the seaway will further strengthen our prosperity and renew activity to build up our wonderful land-locked harbour.

Although the legislation was passed at the last session, I am happy to make reference to the change in the Unemployment Insurance Act which permits the payment of benefits to those who become ill while unemployed. Many of my constituents had advocated that this legislation should be introduced, and were very pleased to learn of its adoption by this parliament. My friends in Hamilton representing labour will be pleased to know that the representations that were made to us in Ottawa last year did not fall on deaf ears. Responsible groups asked for an increase in the scale and duration of winter benefits, which measure has already passed this house this session. In addition local governments, labour and other agencies have asked for greater financial support to assist unemployed workers. I am pleased that our government will take action on this matter through an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

A great deal has been said in this house about unemployment. The Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe), that great prophet of gloom, has said that before 60 days have passed 600,000 people will be unemployed in this country. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said in his speech, at page 93 of Hansard:

> We are in tremendous need of the production of wealth to provide an adequate base for a proper, full-fledged social security program.

I am wondering what the hon. member referred to. Did he mean that the Bank of Canada printing presses should put on an extra shift at the mint? Then the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) said, at page 315 of Hansard:

> I am positive that those who sit on the treasury benches today know that the big problem is to equate consuming power with producing power. If there is an equation of production with consumption in terms of purchasing power and prices you will have no difficulty, and you will solve the very grievous problems that are facing the people of Canada today.

I do not think Einstein himself could have given us a more comprehensive statement than that. "Equate consuming power with producing power." There again I am wondering what the hon. member has in mind.

I could go on quoting speeches made by hon. members of all the opposition parties. "Blast our way into world markets." "Injurious fiscal policies." "Waste and extravagance." In all these speeches I have listened to I have not heard any good, constructive advice. Their one hand does not know what the other hand is doing. They compliment the government on the public works program, the building of the causeway to Cape Breton island, the removal of Ripple Rock, the St. Lawrence seaway development; then in the next breath they suggest that taxes are choking industry and the workers of this country.

Responsible labour, or the people of Canada in general, are not advocating tax reductions. All they ask is the chance to earn a decent living. All they ask is that when taxes are levied everyone should pay his or her rightful share. I am sure the opposition would not suggest cutting the corporation tax on profits which is close to 50 per cent, and raise the tax on the smaller wage earner. I am sure they would not suggest cutting the excise tax at the expense of the small wage earner.

I hold in my hand a clipping from the Hamilton Spectator of January 22, 1955. In it I find that those seeking work in Hamilton numbered 11,361 men and 3,902 women. A year ago the figures were 8,652 men and 3,410 women. There is an increase; but the total claims paid for men and women are less than 100 higher than in the same period a year ago. As the Prime Minister explained, there is no cure-all for unemployment; but everything possible must be done to relieve the situation. I refer to another clipping from the Globe and Mail of January 24, in which the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) is reported as having said:

> Is it any wonder that the government offers no adequate proposals to meet the problem of unemployment when they know and care so little about it?

If that is not an irresponsible statement I do not know what it is, to suggest that this government knows and cares little about unemployment. It is entirely untrue. The British North America Act leaves responsibility for welfare with the provinces. After all, the federal government must consider the needs of all ten provinces. It is a provincial responsibility to heed requests made by municipal governments and welfare agencies. I do believe that the responsibility of this government is to reinforce the ability of the provinces to meet their constitutional responsibilities. The provinces must develop public assistance for those in need who are not covered by other measures. Our responsibility is to assist the provinces by helping them pay for the cost of administering these measures.

I am pleased that it is proposed in the speech from the throne to ask parliament to consider amendments to the Blind Persons Act to lower the age of eligibility and raise income ceilings. While this measure will not entail too heavy a burden upon the taxpayers of this country, nevertheless it will be a godsend to those seriously handicapped people. I am looking forward to the day when the means test will be removed entirely. Its removal would not be too much of a burden, as the recipients of this pension number somewhat less than 8,300.

I was greatly amused to hear the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, when enumerating these proposals by the government in the speech from the throne, giving credit to each of his colleagues in turn. He suggested that at last the government had heeded the pleas of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) regarding war veterans allowances. I would like my hon. friend to know that all of us to your right, Mr. Speaker, have advocated amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act to raise the basic rates as well as the ceiling on permissible incomes of recipients. I have made several personal appeals to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe), as have my colleagues.

I think the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was right when he suggested that it was more important to the health of the Canadian economy to have things done, rather than to discuss in the House of Commons who was the promoter. However, there is no group more deserving than these burnt-out pensioners. I am sure they received the news with much rejoicing.

I should like now to refer to the last clause of the amendment offered by the official opposition. It is as follows:

> (f) in co-operation with the provinces to develop an effective contributory plan which will assure that every Canadian will have adequate hospital and medical services.

I am quick to admit it would be very difficult not to support an amendment of this type. I personally will rejoice the day a workable health insurance plan is introduced in this House of Commons. Most hon. members on this side will support such a plan; and you may rest assured that when health insurance legislation is introduced and presented, it will be by a Liberal government. When the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King, as prime minister of Canada, announced the beginning of the health program in 1948, he indicated that before health insurance could be established on an adequate basis another development would be essential. He was referring to a nation-wide health program. Let us then glance at the picture after six years of operation.

Since the inauguration of the national health program in 1948, no less than 650 individual hospital construction projects have been undertaken. Twenty-five per cent of these are in Ontario. Then, $60 million in federal grants have gone toward hospital construction projects, and have assisted to provide new accommodation for 61,453 patients. I do not have the figures for 1954, but in 1953 there were 300,000 chest X-ray examinations given to Canadians. I could go on and enumerate specific achievements under the national health program as they affect Canada as a whole; new services established, special drugs provided free of charge, scientific equipment purchased for hospitals and public health units.

I feel it is somewhat significant that of all the moneys allotted under the national health program for Ontario, only a little over one-half has been used by that province. As hon. members know, the province must apply for these grants. As an example, in the six-year period $958,000 was allotted for crippled children, but the province has applied for only $517,440. For professional training in that six-year period $1,233,000 was allotted, but the province has applied for only $831,862. For hospital construction the amount allotted was $23,981,816, and Ontario has applied for $15,024,099. For mental health the amount allotted was $9,789,911 and Ontario has applied for only $5,201,715. So the picture goes, and a similar situation applies in connection with tuberculosis control, public health research, general public health, cancer control and so on.

This is what the national health program has meant to the city of Hamilton:

Hospital construction grant

1. Hamilton General hospital:

A grant of $672,000 was made for the construction of 189 active treatment beds and 322 chronic beds to this existing active treatment hospital.

Mr. Pallett: How big was the grant from Ontario, as well?

Mr. Reinke: I am not suggesting that the province has not helped.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): The province gave the same.

Mr. Reinke: To continue with the information I have been giving to show what the national health program has meant for the city of Hamilton in the matter of hospital construction grants:

2. St. Peter's infirmary:

A grant of $132,000 was made for the construction of 88 additional chronic beds to this existing chronic hospital.

3. St. Joseph's hospital:

A grant of $9,500 was made for the construction of 19 additional nurses' beds to the existing nurses' residence of this hospital.

4. Mountain sanatorium:

A grant of $110,961.12 was made for the construction of 64 additional tuberculosis beds and 42 nurses' beds to this existing sanatorium.

5. Norah Frances Henderson hospital:

A grant of approximately $506,000.

Mental health grant

1. Mental health clinic, Hamilton:

Extension of services to this clinic—Expenditure 1948-53, $35,687.65.

2. Assistance to Ontario hospital, Hamilton:

Technical equipment—Expenditure 1949-53, $18,504.48.

Tuberculosis control grant

1. Streptomycin and P.A.S. for all Ontario sanatoria including Mountain sanatoria.

2. Under hospital admission chest X-ray program, X-ray equipment has been purchased for the Hamilton General hospital and St. Joseph's hospital in Hamilton.

3. Chest clinic services were provided through the purchase of equipment for the centre in Hamilton.

4. Technical equipment has been purchased for the Mountain sanatorium. Expenditure 1951-53, $27,597.49.

[Mr. Reinke.]

Research

1. Study of diagnostic procedure at the Mountain sanatorium—Expenditure, 1948-52, $13,413.76.

2. Limnobiological study of Hamilton bay—Expenditure, 1950-53, $13,547.95.

Venereal disease control grant

Maintenance of a clinic at Hamilton.

Crippled children grant

1. Orthopaedic services for crippled children through the employment of a nurse at Hamilton.

2. Cerebral palsy training centre, Hamilton—Expenditure, 1951-53, $19,350.

Professional training grant

Grant to nursing school—Hamilton College—McMaster University—Expenditure, 1949-53, $44,710.30.

General public health grant

1. Equipment for arthritic clinic at Hamilton.

2. Respirators for Hamilton General hospital.

3. Vision-testing services in schools for Hamilton.

Cancer control grant

Maintenance of a cancer clinic at Hamilton General hospital, $39,000 for installation of cobalt 60 beam therapy unit (cobalt bomb).

Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the Minister of National Health and Welfare for the remarkable achievements he and his department have accomplished. His genuine concern for the health of every Canadian is apparent, and progress has been swift and orderly. I believe Canadians generally realize that this plan has brought us nearer to our objective, the highest possible standard of health for Canadians.

Since the vote on the speech from the throne constitutes a vote of confidence or lack of confidence in the government, this amendment has been introduced to embarrass private members on this side. The opposition know that we on your right, Mr. Speaker, are anxious for national health insurance; but I can assure hon. members of the opposition that we on this side have the utmost confidence in our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his government.

This brings me to a point which I believe should be brought to the attention of the house at this time. On July 27, 1954, I had the privilege of speaking at a rally to which all ethnic groups had been invited, sponsored by the Ukrainian Canadian committee. It was organized under the slogan "Independence for Ukraine." The object of the manifestation was to inform the public about the underhand work of the Kremlin with respect to the exploitation of the Ukraine and its enslavement. This enslavement has been referred to by other speakers in this house on previous occasions, and reference has been made to the fact that in 1919 the Ukraine, having escaped the czarist yoke, proclaimed a free, independent, and democratic republic. Then the bolshevik government in Moscow declared war, the red army invaded the Ukraine and along with the fifth column succeeded in its conquest.

Then followed the terrible famine of 1932-33, which took about 5 million lives. The Russian communist leaders were responsible for the destruction of Ukrainian science, tradition and learning. Both Ukrainian Orthodox and Catholic churches were destroyed. Priests were imprisoned, subjected to forced labour, or killed. To sum it all up, the Ukraine was "liberated". The truth is that communists first create chaos and prepare the groundwork for a puppet government by international and internal upheavals. That is their method in every country.

However, getting back to my story, the rally was attended by hundreds of Canadian Ukrainians who openly showed their true feelings toward Russia by displaying anti-communist banners. A few weeks later while driving from Hamilton to Toronto through a small town called Palermo I noticed a huge crowd assembled on a large picnic ground. There must have been four to five thousand people. I drove into the grounds, stopped the car, and inquired about the reason for the huge picnic. I was informed that this was a large international Ukrainian picnic, and people had come to it from all parts of Canada and the United States.

In one part of the ground set aside from the actual picnic area I noticed a rather large and impressive looking monument with well kept paths leading up to it, and upon getting closer I found it to be a large bronze statue of a man. There were two inscriptions on the monument, one in English and one in Ukrainian. The one in English read:

"T. Shevchenko—in commemoration of the 60th anniversary of Ukrainians in Canada (1891-1951)".

For the information of hon. members I might mention that Shevchenko was a famous poet of the Ukraine greatly revered by the people and representative of the culture of the day. He is regarded much as Shakespeare is regarded by the English. He was born in 1814 and died in 1861. Then I inquired about the Ukrainian inscription. Normally one would assume the translation would be the same as the English version, but this is how the translation read:

From the Ukrainian Soviet people to Ukrainians in Canada—Kiev 1950.

The English inscription was put there simply to mislead English speaking Canadians. This is nothing new to those who know communists. The monument was not sent to Ukrainians in Canada by the Ukrainian people. It was sent to communists in Canada of the labour progressive party, and was sent by a communist government. The communists have laid claim to the United States poet Walt Whitman and the Scottish poet Robert Burns, as they have with Shevchenko.

As far as the Ukrainian national federation is concerned, it was the first organized body in Canada to fight communists and to draw the attention of Canadians and the Canadian government to the dangers of communism. As a matter of fact Saturday, January 22, was the 36th anniversary of the proclamation of the independence of the Ukraine.

I wish to make it perfectly clear that I am not criticizing that group of loyal Canadians or any other loyal group of Ukrainian or other origin. Nor am I embarking on a crusade of McCarthyism or trying needlessly to alarm this government and the House of Commons. But we do have a situation which requires a great deal of consideration.

This 22-foot bronze and granite monument was sculptured in the Soviet union. For their work the two sculptors each received Stalin awards, one of the highest awards of the Soviet union. This was reported in the Moscow Literary Gazette of March 27, 1951. It was forwarded to the national executive committee of the association of united Ukrainian Canadians from the Ukrainian society for cultural relations with foreign countries. These communists own over $1 million in property with 100 assembly halls across Canada, and they operate a $3 million insurance company and a $1 million co-operative. At Palermo they have 18 acres of parkland for rallies, picnics and camping. This is a serious affair.

We are fairly certain that an all-out atomic war with the Soviet union is not imminent. We also know that communism is sworn to world domination. This is what Stalin had to say in "Problems of Leninism" published in Moscow in 1941:

The victory of socialism in one country is not a self-sufficient task. The revolution which has been victorious in one country must regard itself not as a self-sufficient entity but as an aid, a means for hastening the victory of the proletariat in all countries. For the victory of the revolution in one country, in the present case Russia, is the beginning of, and the groundwork for world revolution.

That is a statement by Stalin himself. How can all this be brought about? Only by affecting small groups here and there, all under innocent sounding names. They speak about the great depression that has hit the United States and Canada. They constantly sow seeds of unrest. They capitalize on unemployment, and they capitalize on the misfortunes of their fellow men. One man in my riding, having received what he felt was unfair treatment at the hands of a government board—not necessarily this government—told me, "I am turning to communism."

Did he know what it meant? I dare say some who are in difficulty due to unfortunate circumstances might be inclined to say "Communism is better than this." But is it? Do they know they will be subservient under communism to the worst possible government domination? Do they know they will not be able to worship as they please? Do they know they can vote only "yes" or "no" for one candidate on the ballot? Do they know they cannot voice opinions against the state or its leaders? Do they know they will read only that which the state allows and listen only to what the state-operated stations broadcast?

In Canada we are spending nearly 50 per cent of our tax dollar on a defence preparedness program to stop aggression. That aggression could come tomorrow or it could come ten years from now. But rest assured it will not come from the free nations, but will come when the communists think it will be to their advantage. This has been stated very clearly in the writings of both Lenin and Stalin. When will they feel they have the advantage? Only when the communists in their insidious way have infiltrated into our governments and societies. I realize we are a long way from that situation now, but let unemployment or hardship spread and this evil would spread with it.

I am not suggesting that we outlaw communism in Canada and by so doing drive communists underground. I am not saying that we should round them all up and send them to their Russian paradise, though sometimes I think it would be better to do so. But I would like to suggest this to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), whose duty it is to administer the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill), whose department is responsible for the national film board and for the education of new Canadians in some aspects. Could we not provide money in our budgets to bring to the attention of the Canadian people the purpose, effects and results of communism? Surely if we can spend $2 billion for the defence of our democracy, we can spend some money for preventive purposes. The Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission, which now employs 104 persons in a public relations department, has a budget of $996,314 to keep the public informed.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

Mr. Reinke: With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I shall be through in a matter of one minute, probably.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Reinke: I am not criticizing or condoning this expenditure, but how much more important it would be to remind Canadians to guard their freedom. Under our democratic freedom you are at liberty to come and go as you please; there is no iron curtain. Freedom is like a bag of sand. If there is a hole anywhere in the bag, all the freedom will run out.

On motion of Mr. Holowach the debate was adjourned.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 27, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

PERSONNEL OF DELEGATION TO CONFERENCE OF PRIME MINISTERS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will know that I am proposing to leave tomorrow for London to attend the meeting of commonwealth prime ministers. As I have said previously in the house, this meeting will give an opportunity for an exchange of views on some very important questions, and it underlines the value of the commonwealth association as a medium for such exchanges. In turn these exchanges will make possible, I hope, more effective policies and actions for the attainment in our respective countries of the objectives of peace and greater human welfare which are basic for all the peoples of the commonwealth.

At this particular meeting questions of foreign affairs, and more particularly those concerned with Far Eastern matters, will occupy a great deal of attention. Recent developments in the Far East have underlined the seriousness of these issues. Because of that, and after certain messages to and from London, I have decided to ask my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to accompany me to this conference. Of course it will be possible for him to return to Ottawa before the end of the conference if the situation here should appear to make that desirable.

As is customary I will also be attended at these meetings by the high commissioner for Canada in London. The under-secretary of state for external affairs, Mr. Leger, will be one of our advisers. I had hoped to include Mr. R. B. Bryce, the secretary to the cabinet, in that capacity, but because of his regrettable illness his place will be taken by Mr. Ross Martin, assistant secretary to the cabinet.

On economic matters we will be in close touch with our top economic advisers who are now attending the GATT meetings in Geneva, and it will not be difficult to have at least one of them join us in London when we reach the stage in the London meetings where we are dealing with that aspect of the agenda.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made by the Prime Minister I should like to ask him if he expects to discuss trade matters at this conference. Perhaps he might include the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in his party.

Mr. St. Laurent: I should like to include all my colleagues in the house, but it so happens that that is not possible. In view of recent developments I would expect that much of our time will be taken up with a discussion of the international situation which we all look upon as being quite grave at this time. All of us appreciate the opportunity of taking counsel together as to what might best serve the interests of peace in the world.

The conference was not intended originally to operate as a continuation of the economic conference of two or three years ago, but I expect that that aspect of the world situation will also be under review. After the agenda has been settled at the first meeting we will know what time will be available for the consideration of that aspect of our affairs.

Mr. Rowe: Is no one from the Department of Trade and Commerce going?

Mr. St. Laurent: Top advisers of the departments of trade and commerce and finance, Mr. Mitchell Sharp and Mr. Plumptre, are already overseas.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Are you taking a member of the opposition also?

An hon. Member: Are you available?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sure that might be quite helpful, but it has not yet become one of the traditions of these conferences between governments.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED QUESTION OF VALIDITY OF FEDERAL LABOUR CODE

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to press dispatches reporting that questions have been raised as to the validity of the federal labour code, and in view of that would he be prepared to report to this house the progress which has been made with respect to the revision of labour legislation which, he advised a committee, was under consideration two years ago?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take that question under consideration and make a report to the house in due course.

REPORTED LAY-OFFS IN AIRCRAFT INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the government received protests from labour bodies in Winnipeg concerning lay-offs in the aircraft industry, and also concerning reports that a large number of employees in this industry will be laid off soon, including a large number to be laid off by Trans-Canada Air Lines? Will the minister make a statement on this matter, and can he assure the workers affected that the reported lay-offs will not take place?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes; representations have been received from Winnipeg. With regard to MacDonald Brothers Aircraft Limited, by January 31 MacDonald Brothers will have laid off approximately 100 people. Some two-thirds of the lay-off has resulted from cutbacks in the turbo department which supplies parts to A.V. Roe. A further slight reduction will take place in February or March, after which we expect that employment will be reasonably steady for the next year.

With regard to Trans-Canada Air Lines, may I say that T.C.A. now employs some 632 people in maintenance work for the R.C.A.F. By late summer this work is to be transferred back to the services. In other words the R.C.A.F. intends to do its own maintenance work. In the meantime the Viscount program is expected to employ some 300 additional men at Winnipeg. Therefore the total lay-off between now and next June should be of the order of 332 people.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REFERENCE TO ACCUSATIONS AGAINST DEPUTY POSTMASTER GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether he is now in a position to make a statement about the accusations made against the deputy postmaster general by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau)?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have completed my inquiries about the matter the hon. gentleman mentioned, and though it will take me some few minutes to make a statement I shall do so now because it appears to be the wish of the house.

A few days ago, speaking in this debate, the hon. member for St. Boniface made complaints about two changes in post office personnel. I have made inquiries into these two cases, and I would now like to bring the facts before the house. The first complaint was levelled against the procedure followed by the Post Office Department in connection with a promotion to the position of post office inspector, in Winnipeg, a few years ago. The procedure adopted was as follows. The position was advertised—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the Postmaster General, but some hon. members seem to be looking at me and questioning whether what the minister is now doing is in order. I would not wish to allow this if it is not, but I would like to be told on what ground it is not in order for the minister to make a statement at this moment in reply to a question asked on two occasions by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer).

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Since you seem to be looking at me, Mr. Speaker, and since I was shaking my head, I might answer your question as I see it. It strikes me that since the complaints which the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) is now about to answer were made by the hon. member for St. Boniface when speaking during the throne speech debate, and particularly in view of the fact that that debate will be resumed today, I believe it would be better if this statement were made in the course of that debate. If the minister makes a statement now there will be no opportunity to reply, as no one can debate a statement made on the orders of the day. I do not imagine the Postmaster General would take exception to that course.

Mr. Speaker: Was it along that line that the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) was perhaps indicating that he had something to say?

Mr. Fulton: No, I had no comments to make at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for having indicated what he meant by looking at me so persistently; and while I believe it is a matter on which the house will wish to accommodate itself, it is quite true that the hon. member for St. Boniface made his remarks with respect to post office personnel during the course of the throne speech debate. However, it is also true that the hon. member for Three Rivers has asked this question on two occasions on the orders of the day, and one might say that at this moment the Postmaster General is replying to the hon. member.

It may be that he is prefacing his remarks by pointing out what was said by the hon. member for St. Boniface. But are we, on the one hand, asking the Postmaster General to reply to the hon. member for St. Boniface during the ensuing debate on the speech from the throne, or, on the other hand, should we not allow him to reply to the question put by the hon. member for Three Rivers? What is the position now?

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I could suggest a very simple answer, Mr. Speaker, and that is that if the Postmaster General felt so disposed he could inform the hon. member for Three Rivers that he is going to deal with the matter when he speaks during the course of the debate on the speech from the throne. That would be answering the question asked by the hon. member, and at the same time it would provide an appropriate opportunity for the hon. member who raised the question originally to perhaps question the minister.

Mr. Speaker: It strikes me there is some merit in the observations made by the hon. members for Kamloops and Winnipeg North Centre, particularly in view of the fact that the Postmaster General has indicated that his reply may be somewhat lengthy. If it is lengthy he might deal with the matter during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and I am sure hon. members will allow him to take the floor at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Cote: That was my intention in the first place, Mr. Speaker, but since I was invited to make my statement by the hon. member for Three Rivers, that is why I started to do so.

ALLEGED DISAPPEARANCE OF MONEY AT BRITANNIA BEACH, B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Can the Minister of Justice inform the house whether the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are investigating certain happenings in the post office at Britannia Beach, British Columbia?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps at this moment I might indicate to hon. members that once a question has been asked and the matter is said to be under advisement by the minister for a reply at a later time, one should not rise every day and ask the same question. Whereas one has the right perhaps to press for an answer, I think on the other hand one must be patient enough to wait until the minister has had time to consider the matter, to have the investigation made and to make a report to the house. I think the hon. member will agree with me that he has been quite insistent on this particular question for the last three days. Perhaps he might be patient until the question is answered. Of course he is directing his question today to a different minister.

Mr. Fulton: It is also a different question.

Mr. Speaker: One could anticipate that the answer of the minister will be that he will consult the Postmaster General and that they will get together as to who will give the answer; but in principle it is the same question that was asked yesterday and the day before. I suggest that if we are to spend our time usefully during this question period, we should give all members a chance to put various questions during that time, and not come back to the same question again and again.

[Later:]

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): With all due deference, Mr. Speaker, with respect to what I understood to be a ruling of yours there is something that I should like to point out, if I may be allowed to do so, because I think there is the possibility that it may put some of us on this side of the house in a difficult position and one which is not intended by the rules of the house.

As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, your ruling or your suggestion implies that once a question has been asked, nothing relating to that matter should be asked of the government until such time as the first question has been answered. In a case such as this where a member—as in this case—has quite a legitimate reason for approaching this matter and asking information from two different ministers on two different aspects of the subject, your ruling makes it extremely difficult for us to get adequate information. I think that fact is evident, Mr. Speaker, from the tenor of the original question which asks whether the Postmaster General was aware of the disappearance of this money and whether he was able to place the responsibility for the loss. The second question was designed to find out whether the matter had been considered serious enough to call in the Department of Justice and what action, if any, was being taken by that department. There is no reason whatsoever why the Postmaster General should have given us such information in his answer to the original question. That is why I point out, with all due deference, that such a ruling could react very unfavourably to the rights of the opposition on many occasions.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member be good enough to give me the page on which his first question appears?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Page 501, sir.

Mr. Speaker: Would he be good enough to give me the page on which his second question appears?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I just asked it a moment ago, and Hansard is wonderful but not quite that effective.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. I thought the hon. member had asked the question previously.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I asked the question originally as it appears at page 501 of Hansard of January 25. On the following day, which was yesterday, I simply asked whether the Postmaster General had had an opportunity to investigate and report upon this matter. However, as I have pointed out, the question today was quite unrelated to either of the preceding questions.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will realize that I could have risen earlier, told the hon. member that my rulings are not debatable, and not allowed him to proceed. However, he prefaced his remarks by saying that my ruling was curtailing the rights of the opposition, and of course I do not want to be accused of doing that. That is why I listened to him. Another reason I could have stopped him is that he should have risen immediately after my ruling was given. Instead he let other questions go by and now he comes back to this matter. But that is quite all right, and I am very grateful to him for having done so.

If he looks at the first question he will see what I might call the order of progression of his question. First he asked if the minister was aware, and one must look at the answer the hon. member received. The minister said:

I shall be glad to investigate the matter . . .

The hon. member has asked the question a second time, and seems to think that perhaps an investigation is being carried on by the Minister of Justice. He has asked the Minister of Justice if an investigation is being carried on and if there is any result. That is what I gather. The matter is being investigated now, and until the report of the investigation is submitted to the house is it the intention of hon. members to repeat their questions every day just to remind the minister that they asked the questions the previous day? That is my point. The hon. member had a perfect right to ask his question, but he does not appear to be quite satisfied with what the Postmaster General is doing and he wants to find out if the Minister of Justice is also investigating.

Mr. Fleming: Through the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Speaker: Or the R.C.M.P. or whatever it is. I merely made a suggestion to the hon. member, and I am asking his co-operation. The hon. member seems to think his rights are being jeopardized, and if the Minister of Justice wants to tell him whatever he feels like telling him at this time in answer to his question it is quite agreeable to me. It is not only the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace who has repeated a question. There have been other instances when, on two or three separate days, the same questions have been repeated by other hon. members.

I have not the cases in point in my mind at the moment, but I am sure hon. members will realize that sometimes, quite understandably, they are quite persistent in trying to get answers quickly to their questions. I am merely suggesting that the time that is set aside for questions and answers should be used for a great variety of different questions, and not for hon. members to rise and ask if they can get the answer to a question asked previously. One case in point is the question asked of the Postmaster General on perhaps two or three occasions by the hon. member for Three Rivers. He has asked the minister if he had any reply to make with respect to the matters raised by the hon. member for St. Boniface. That is another case in point. I was merely making a suggestion. If the hon. member wishes to pursue his question perhaps he might do so tomorrow and perhaps the minister will have his answer ready at that time.

PRISONERS OF WAR

REPORTED COMPENSATION FOR CANADIANS HELD BY JAPANESE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State. Has his attention been drawn to a newspaper clipping which indicates that Japan has agreed to pay $12 million in compensation to 13 countries, including Canada, whose soldiers it held prisoner during the second world war? Could the minister also indicate what portion of this amount will be passed on to the Hong Kong prisoners of war?

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of this question yesterday. I have read the newspaper report to which the hon. member refers. It is correct that negotiations have taken place between a representative of the Japanese ministry of foreign affairs and Sir Norman Robert, the special representative of the executive committee of the powers whose nationals may benefit under article 16 of the peace treaty with Japan.

The news item to which the hon. member referred deals with the understanding which was reached at the conclusion of these negotiations on November 30, 1954. The implementation of the agreement is dependent upon ratification by the Japanese Diet.

If the agreement is ratified the sum of £4,500,000 sterling, which corresponds to the figure mentioned in the newspaper report, namely $12,600,000, would be placed at the disposal of the international committee of the Red Cross not later than the end of May, 1955. It is not yet possible to assess the value of the share which would then accrue to Canada, since all the beneficiary countries have not to my knowledge submitted a complete list of potential beneficiaries.

However, it should be stressed that in anticipation of this settlement, and also in order to avoid too long a delay in the payment of compensation to military personnel interned in the Far East, the government in 1952 modified the recommendation of the advisory commissioner on war claims. The commissioner had proposed that an automatic award of 75 cents per day be granted to former prisoners of war, and that an additional 25 cents per day be retained in the fund in a suspense account until such time as the value of the benefit received under article 16 of the treaty of peace with Japan is ascertained.

Under the modified formula adopted by the government former prisoners of war were granted an award of $1 per day, with the provision that such payment would include any benefit to which the recipients may be eligible pursuant to article 16 of the treaty of peace with Japan.

Under this arrangement $2,055,000 has already been paid by way of compensation for maltreatment from the war claims fund, of which $500,000 has been granted by way of an advance of potential benefits accruing under article 16 of the peace treaty with Japan. It follows that the proceeds once received as a result of this understanding with the Japanese government will serve to reimburse the war claims fund for the money advanced to individual claimants.

BUTTER

AVAILABILITY OF SUPPLIES TO CANADIAN INSTITUTIONS AT REDUCED PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): In view of the repeated statements in the press with regard to government plans for the disposal of surplus butter and the uncertainty of the response to my question yesterday, I should like to direct a question to the minister.

I notice that the Minister of Agriculture is back in his place in the house. He mentioned at Winnipeg that it was not a permanent policy of the government. Yesterday we heard that the price was not fixed. I noticed by yesterday's press that a new butter disposal plan is referred to, that the principle had been adopted by the government and that they were selling it at 20 cents a pound less.

An hon. Member: What is the question?

Mr. Rowe: My question is this. Is it true or is it not true? Is it true that we are selling butter for 20 cents a pound less? I do not consider that this is a laughing matter, because yesterday we were told distinctly that there had been no such decision.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Rowe: My question is this. I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether we are giving away one pound for every two that is purchased, as indicated by the report?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): If that is the question, the answer is no. But in view of what has been said by the Acting Leader of the Opposition, I think possibly I should read what I said. What I said at Edmonton was this:

> We have a floor price based on 58 cents a pound Montreal and Toronto on butter. This has stabilized the price to the producers at 58 cents in the summer and it may rise to 61 cents in the winter. It has stabilized the wholesale price at 61 cents in the winter to the consumer. We have over 20 million more pounds in storage at present than we think necessary. It is there because of good grass last summer. We do not know how much grass we will have next summer but believe we can safely market 20 million pounds. My last act before leaving Ottawa was to recommend that some be sold to institutions in Canada at a lower price. I understand the recommendation has been accepted. When I get back to Ottawa on Thursday I hope to find the plan in operation.

That was my statement at Edmonton. As to the other things that have been said in the press, when I had finished and when the meeting was over the press naturally asked me this question: "What is the price?" I said, "I do not know and I will not know until I get back to Ottawa and discuss the matter". They said, "Will it be 5 cents less?" I said, "I think a better term to use would be to say it would be considerably less if the plan went through". "Considerably less" is what I understand has been in the press. I made inquiries this morning, and the officials are not in a position either to tell me or to announce to the country what the price will be. The matter is still under consideration.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Agriculture. Am I correct in taking from the latter part of his statement that the decision with respect to the disposal of 20 million pounds of butter and the price is within the jurisdiction of the department, and is to be made by the department and announced by the department rather than by the minister and the government?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I understand that there are about 1,500 of these institutions. The officials of the department are naturally discussing the matter or taking the matter up with those different institutions. Until those discussions have been brought to a conclusion there is not much possibility of announcing a price here. But when the time comes to announce the price, if I am here—and I expect I shall be—I will probably announce it here.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO FLIGHTS FROM WINNIPEG TO COPENHAGEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg South asked the following question:

Will the government consider allowing Canadians and others to travel to Europe via Scandinavian Airlines from Winnipeg to Copenhagen?

Scandinavian Airlines system has no traffic rights at Winnipeg under the bilateral agreements made with the Scandinavian countries. The government is not considering making any change in this situation at the present time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, January 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne offers private members an opportunity to direct the attention of the government, if that is possible, to serious grievances within our respective constituencies, and to express our views on outstanding problems in the life of this nation. This debate follows in the wake of the debate on external affairs which, in its high tone, its tense and dramatic moments, was certainly in keeping with the seriousness of the controversial problem being dealt with at that time.

The present debate is equally important because it comes closer to home and touches on problems that face our people every day of the week. I think we should remember that modern history records many nations have collapsed not so much from outside forces as from growing inequities, both social and economic, within the country, and failure to resolve those problems.

As a relatively new member of the house I have learned that a member's responsibilities to his constituents are varied. In this chamber, where we come together to reason and to give calm and considered study to the proper way in which to resolve our problems, it seems to me that the first responsibility of a member is to indicate objectively and honestly his views on the shortcomings of the government. Our nation's business, involving as it does the expenditure of some $5 billion of the taxpayers' money, involving decisions in domestic affairs affecting each and every one of us, involving decisions in external affairs as was indicated the other day during the external affairs debate, on matters which actually mould the destiny of our country—such a nation's business calls for more than obedient approval of each and every measure presented by the government.

It seems to me there is little value in repeating pleasantries and being overcomplimentary in regard to past accomplishments. We certainly admit that the government has made some excellent moves in the past and that there are good men on the government side of the house. But no man is without fault and sometimes even good men following wrong policies lead us nowhere. I think democracy is sometimes cumbersome, but it does get things done; and if we are to achieve progress it can only be by continual prodding and constructive criticism in order that we may reach that perfection which is, after all, the objective and ultimate destiny of civilized man.

We are living in grave times and there are serious problems facing the country, such as the long, enduring and heavy burden of direct and indirect taxes and the general business recession, as evidenced by the business failures in our country during the first six months of 1954, which were 56 per cent higher than during 1953. The farmers' problems result from unsaleable crop surpluses that have accumulated. The drop in trade has been a sad development, resulting in an adverse balance of trade for the first six months of 1954 almost equal to the entire adverse trade balance for 1953. The colossal amount of credit buying that has taken place in our land recently indicates that our people are mortgaging their future earnings in order to acquire things which they need today. The growing high cost of government, the obvious trend toward centralization, and above all the lack of evidence that our present policies are capable of solving some of these problems, are matters for serious consideration. I believe that in the light of all this evidence there is no reason for any of us to consider all our activities here as being sacrosanct. Certainly we are proud of our accomplishments, and we have many of them in Canada. Surely, however, the credit goes to all of the people and not to one particular party. I believe that the progress that is being made in Canada is due, in the first place, to the courage of the early pioneers and the farsighted aspirations of people in an abundant land. Our progress has been made despite the small inducements offered in some of the government policies.

I wish to be fair in expressing my views. There are serious problems facing my constituents, and they are fresh in my memory. As I travelled around my constituency conversing with people I was led to believe that they look for a proper solution to some of their problems through the action of this house. With one or two exceptions the problems of my people are an integral part of the problems facing all the people in Canada.

I refer to the situation wherein there are hundreds of thousands of men and women in our country willing and able to work but unable to find employment. I refer as well to the hardship and distress that is the result of such a situation. We certainly were glad to see the speedy introduction by the government of measures to help alleviate the unemployment situation by the extension of unemployment insurance benefits. I believe we all agree that an increase in unemployment insurance benefits is not the solution to the unemployment problem. A proper solution would be the maintenance of conditions under which all hands and all machines in our country would continue to produce wealth. Real prosperity comes only when the people have the means of acquiring the things which they need to sustain themselves. Inner contentment can only come when the people are employed in productive effort.

Is it not thought-provoking that in a country such as this, with over four million square miles inhabited by only 15 million people, there should be unemployment? One would normally think our real problem would be to secure enough workers to handle the many tasks that have to be undertaken. I was disappointed as I stood, with others from this house, before the bar of the Senate and listened to the speech from the throne. Instead of a call to action, we heard a subdued review of past actions. In that speech, unemployment was referred to as some strange regional phenomenon. We all know it is more than that, Mr. Speaker. If unemployment has become a measuring rod of the seasons in Canada, then all I can say is that our seasons are becoming longer and longer and more depressing all the time. Blaming mother nature for our mistakes is, to my mind at least, a surprising new theory.

Then, of course, there are those who blame the newly arrived immigrants in our country as the ones who are responsible for unemployment. I believe there is little connection. These critics fail to realize that although some 174,000 people were admitted to Canada during 1954, many of them were dependent on those already in this country and did not replace anyone in a job. In addition, many of them have already returned to the countries from which they originally came. It is interesting to note also that some 50,000 Canadians emigrate each year to the United States, many of whom possess technical skills acquired through higher learning. With the unemployment situation as serious as it is I believe that exodus will become even more marked. We are thus losing human material which I believe is inexcusable.

What then are the real facts? I believe that unemployment is the result of various factors, not the least of which is our faltering economy resulting from the lack of sufficient purchasing power in the hands of our people to enable them to acquire the goods which they have produced and need. Much of this purchasing power is being arbitrarily removed from their hands by heavy taxation in order to sustain what I believe is the high cost of an ever-growing government.

I do not believe the Canadian boom was ever traceable to our policies alone, but was the result of other factors. In an article appearing in The Challenge, a magazine issued by the Institute of Economic Affairs, New York University, volume III, No. 3, there is an interesting analysis by Frank A. Tinker, writing from Toronto where he served as United States vice consul. It reads as follows:

> The Canadian boom was the result of a variety of factors: the backlog in consumer demand created by the war; the savage depletion of natural resources in other countries; the accompanying discoveries of, and investment in, these industrial materials in Canada; the creation of an industrial machine to meet the extraordinary demands; and the resultant population shifts.
> . . . Much of the prosperity of Canada's citizens, which has not been as outstanding as the over-all picture suggests, is due to these artificial stimuli.
> Today the factors which spurred the Canadian build-up no longer operate. Wartime scarcities have been eliminated. Industrial production in devastated countries has risen; recovery from war has filled the domestic gaps and has invaded those fields which previously were open only to the more fortunate, unscarred economies—like Canada's. The Korean and other Asian wars have been settled.

A little farther down this interesting comment appeared:

> A large part of the difficulty lies in the tax program. The sound fiscal government of which Canadians have heard so much has been bought at the cost of assessments which a United States resident would consider outrageous and under which industry would suffer. The solvency of the government may be little solace to the Canadian who finds himself unemployed today partly because of it. This is not to say that a solvent government is bad. But a high-cost government which insists upon being supported through high taxes can be discouraging to say the least.

Perhaps some of us will not agree with all the statements made in that article. But I am sure we will agree that it is a disastrous human experience for us to realize that in time of war and blood-spilling we have prosperity, while in time of peace we always have a faltering economy.

What, then, are some of the answers? I am not one who knows all of them or even a large portion of them, but I think I know where to start. We start now by realizing that science and the inventive genius of man have been able to create an ever-increasing abundance of goods and services of every kind and variety. We have been able to solve the problem of production. Now the problem is to try to bring these goods within the reach of those people who need them.

I believe the real problem is for us to devise economic policies whereby these goods may be brought within the reach of those people whose incomes are being reduced because of the replacement of manpower by machines. It seems odd, Mr. Speaker, that on the one hand we all agree the progress of science is a good thing, we pass legislation in this house advocating shorter hours and better working conditions, and we do this to eliminate the toil and hardship of the labouring group. Yet on the other hand in our fiscal policies we consider employment the only means of securing income to acquire the things people need. We are able to produce more, with fewer hardships and worries, but the paradox is that while on the one hand we are fostering scientific advancement which, after all, is aimed at the elimination of employment, on the other hand, we sustain an economic policy founded on the principle that the only way people can have incomes is by being employed.

There is proof that in modern civilization there will be increasing and ever-growing unemployment. I think attention has been drawn to this by farsighted statesmen and public leaders. Here is an interesting article which appeared in the New York Times of January 17 and, while we may not agree with Mr. Reuther's political philosophy, I believe there is much food for thought in what he says. It is headed "Reuther Decries Brake on Output" and states:

> He predicted that this year's output would fall $50,000,000,000 short of what it could be if there were enough customers to buy all the things our factories had the capacity to make.
> He reiterated the C.I.O.'s support for maximum technological progress, but he warned that this progress could become a source of great suffering and social unrest unless the country applied "the same jet propulsion" to its thinking about human problems that was being focused on "automation", atomic energy and other scientific advances.
> As evidence of the speed with which automatic methods were taking hold, Mr. Reuther told the unionists that the new Ford automatic engine plant at Cleveland already had been rendered "obsolete" by designs for even more efficient facilities.
> "They can make a Ford engine block in only 15 minutes without a human hand touching it," Mr. Reuther declared, "and I am told they have on the drawing boards a plant that can cut the time down to 10 minutes."
> He said the imbalance between what we could produce and what we could buy was becoming so acute that the manufacturers might find it necessary to set up plants to turn out "plastic consumers" to use the products for which there was no market.

My point is that this entire question must be faced realistically, and ways and means must be devised to make goods and services available to the people who are unable to find employment. At some future date unemployment may be inevitable. I do not think this necessarily implies idleness. It might spell out a new era wherein humanity will have longer rest periods and more leisure time to be devoted to physical and cultural pursuits, education and study, so as to enjoy a fuller and richer life.

Frankly, under our present fiscal policy there appear to be few remedies, unless the monetary reforms advanced by the Social Credit movement are given full and earnest consideration. There might be some temporary alleviation of the problem by undertaking public projects. That should not entail going on a spending spree for the building of every project required in our country. In western Canada it should imply further financial assistance by the federal government to the respective provincial governments in order to induce them to undertake larger road building programs. This would absorb some unemployment, and certainly serve the needs of the country now and in the future.

I believe roads benefit the entire nation. Federal assistance in the matter of interprovincial roads is especially needed. On previous occasions I have drawn the attention of the government to the advisability of undertaking with the provincial governments the building of a road from Winnipeg by way of Saskatoon, Edmonton, Jasper park and the Yellowhead route, to the west coast. The rewards, both in times of war and peace, could not be measured in dollars and cents.

Second, I think we should design our policies to encourage consumption and production. In order to meet these requirements I submit that an early reduction in our taxes merits consideration. I believe the removal of many of the hidden taxes on commodities would bring these articles down to a level where people would be able to acquire them, thereby inducing consumption and production.

Apart from other benefits, it would restore some of the basic rights of the people to spend their own money instead of having governments spend it for them. I certainly disagree with those who believe that only by high taxes can we have high revenues. The reverse is often true. High taxes do not necessarily imply high revenues. I do believe that by a sensible reduction in taxation the government might well receive, through greater volume, what it now depends upon receiving through a high level of taxation.

Of course there are those in the house who indicate that because of our commitments by way of social services and defence costs, a reduction in taxation at this time would be improper. The movement to which I have the privilege of belonging is founded upon and dedicated to the well-being of the people. We look upon social services as the first responsibility of government. We consider it is the duty of government to protect our citizens against certain avoidable hazards of life and old age.

In the matter of defence it is true that we have no alternative but to carry on with our defence spending, in order to be secure in an uncertain world. However, let us remember that during 1953-54 the cost of national defence was reduced by some $126 million. However, that amount was absorbed by other departments. My point is that even if defence costs are reduced and if other government expenditures are not reduced accordingly just where in the world are we going? During 1952-53 these expenditures were $4·6 billion, and in 1953-54-55 they were approximately $5 billion. There is no denying that this government is growing larger and larger all the time.

Surely sizeable reductions in taxation could be brought about if the government would institute stringent policies of frugality to slice away some of the fatty tissues of government which are a consequence of the war years. I understand that at the present time some 22 crown corporations are being sustained by the taxpayers of Canada. The duties performed by many of these monopolies could well be performed by private enterprise if some incentive were given. In many cases the services performed by these corporations overlap the services offered by private enterprise.

Never before in our history have liberty and freedom had such meaning. We should realize that sometimes liberty and freedom disappear gradually through centralization and an ever-growing government until we reach a point where there is no turning back.

The forecast in the speech from the throne of increased basic rates and an increased permissible income under the War Veterans Allowance Act is commendable. So are the amendments to the Blind Persons Act to lower the age of eligibility and to increase income ceilings, and the conclusion of necessary arrangements with the various provincial governments in the matter of the Disabled Persons Act. They certainly deserve support from all members of this house. As the records indicate, we in this group have consistently fought for these measures. We realize that they have come late, but better late than never. We know they will be of assistance to many.

I regret that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) is not in his seat, because I want to tell him how pleased the people of Edmonton were to hear that his department had decided to relocate and build new airport facilities in Edmonton. We trust that these measures will be undertaken with dispatch, as existing conditions certainly justify this move.

I regret the absence from the chamber of the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote), because I want to draw to his attention once more the need of an improved, enlarged or new post office building in Beverly, Alberta. The present building is no more than a shack, which if dismantled would hardly bring more than a few hundred dollars on the used lumber market. On previous occasions I have drawn the attention of the minister to the need of further improvements to the building, or the erection of a new building. In no sense are these people asking for something which is unfair; they are asking for something which is completely justified in view of the limited facilities now available.

I am rather disturbed when I read statements which imply that a member's political affiliation determines the decision as to needs such as this being looked after. A report of this kind appeared recently in one of the Alberta papers. I quote from the Medicine Hat News of Saturday, January 15, 1955, as follows:

> New Post Office Opened at Taber
> Mayor Harry Veiner of Medicine Hat was master of ceremonies for the event, with Senator W. J. Stambaugh of Edmonton, the chief speaker, and representing the Minister of Public Works, the Hon. Robert H. Winters.
> The senator read a telegram of regret from Mr. Winters for his inability to attend due to parliamentary duties, and congratulating Taberites on their patience in awaiting completion of such fine accommodation for an essential service.
> J. Harper Prowse, leader of the Liberal party of Alberta, and a native of Taber, also sent regrets for his inability to attend.
> Senator Stambaugh said the new federal building was a direct tribute to the prodding and enterprise of the late Senator W. A. Buchanan of Lethbridge.
> "Without his interest I doubt if the contract for such a fine structure would ever have been let," observed Senator Stambaugh. "There would have been a new post office some day, but not such a fine building as this one. And then after Senator Buchanan passed to his reward, you had Mayor Veiner of Medicine Hat to carry forward demands upon Ottawa. He was largely responsible for having the post office section rushed through last fall and opening in time for some of the Christmas rush. Harry Veiner is well thought of in Ottawa and has been responsible for winning the government's attention to the needs of Medicine Hat constituency."

It was never my pleasure to know the deceased gentleman who is mentioned in this article, but I do know the high esteem and reputation which he enjoyed. I know the people of Canada looked upon him as a man of outstanding integrity and possessing statesmanlike qualities. If the late senator fought for a post office in Taber it was simply because Taber merited a post office. I am sure that were he alive, he would not approve his name being brought into a message such as was delivered recently at the opening ceremonies at Taber. Surely the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) and the Postmaster General look with disfavour on this type of political drum-beating at the opening ceremonies of a public building in Canada.

I do believe that this newspaper report justifies a statement denying the assertion that political affiliation or political pressure determines the decisions in connection with the erection of public buildings.

Who is this man Harry Veiner who allegedly commands such tremendous influence in Ottawa? Is he not the same Harry Veiner who on two occasions was the Liberal candidate in that constituency and who, not once but twice, was rejected by the people of Alberta? It is stated that he is well thought of in Ottawa, and no doubt that is the reason for his rejection by the people of Alberta. Since when has he more authority to speak of the needs in that constituency, or to act as master of ceremonies at the opening, than the lawfully elected Social Credit member of that riding who, incidentally, was not even invited to attend the affair?

With such obvious political partisanship is it any wonder the people of Canada sometimes clamour for the reform of the other place? I believe such irresponsible statements are unfair to many hon. members in that other place who are more interested in Canada than in the well-being of any particular political party. I would suggest that if the hon. member from the other place is so interested in these matters he should be directing his efforts toward the construction of post office buildings in other places as well, and in this connection I would particularly direct his attention to the construction of a post office in the town of Beverly, Alberta.

I enjoyed listening to the speech by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) a few days ago. He mentioned the need for the exercise of moral principles in our national life, and I believe all of us will agree that unless the men in high office in our national life adhere to moral principles there can be little hope of real progress in the future, because it is moral principles and decisions based on them that are the only valid and true measure of human progress in this country.

As we stand at the beginning of another year in the second half of this century, a century which has seen bloodletting, violence, wars, depressions, recessions, booms and busts, and which on the other hand has witnessed scientific advances without parallel in human history, we should bear in mind that our individual responsibility as members of this house is not entirely to the political parties to which we belong but to the people of this country. It also involves an understanding that there is poverty in our midst and that we must conquer unemployment.

It involves in external affairs the realization that there are many economically poor nations and others who are subjected to enslavement yet cry out for liberty and freedom. To champion their cause is to champion the cause of practically the most powerful allies the free world can muster, and to be indifferent to their plight would be completely unworthy of our Canadian heritage.

Toward the ultimate objective of securing a sound and prosperous Canada, and making Canada's contribution to a world condition in which there shall be peace, security, and the blessings of political freedom for all, the Social Credit movement is dedicated. We do not consider ourselves as having in any way a monopoly of virtue; we look upon all hon. members of the house, irrespective of their political faith, as having a role to play in meeting this challenge and in the achievement of peace throughout the world.

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both hon. members are certainly worthy of the compliments which they have received from their colleagues in all parts of the house since this debate opened. In the discharge of their assignment they have both won an invaluable reputation for themselves and have proved to be a credit not only to their constituencies but to their respective cities of Montreal and Toronto, and to this parliament as well.

The subject matter which I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members at this time is one which has not been dealt with very often in this house in the past. It is also one which, in my estimation, deserves to be widely known to the Canadian public generally if it is to win the support of well informed Canadian public opinion.

It will be recalled that the eighth general conference of the United Nations educational, scientific and cultural organization, in other words UNESCO, was held at Montevideo, Uruguay, from November 11 to December 10, 1954. This was the first time a UNESCO general conference had met in South America. The choice of Montevideo was a fortunate one because it is the capital city of Uruguay, a country which rightly enjoys a reputation for its high standard of freedom and democracy.

The Canadian delegation which attended the conference was deeply impressed by the charm of that country and its people, and by the friendly warmth with which the Canadian representatives and the delegates of the other 71 member states were received.

Our delegation consisted of Mr. Sydney D. Pierce, Canadian ambassador to Brazil, who was chairman; the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, Newfoundland (Mr. Carter); Dr. Philippe Panneton, of Montreal, widely known author and writer of many outstanding books on art, history and culture; Dr. Garnet T. Page, of Ottawa, a scientist and general manager of the Chemical Institute of Canada; Mr. F. K. Stewart, from Toronto, executive secretary of the Canadian Education Association; Dr. A. Vibert Douglas, a very distinguished lady and dean of women at Queen's University; Mr. Fulgence Charpentier, the Canadian chargé d'affaires at Montevideo; Mr. Malcolm N. Bow, adviser from the Department of External Affairs; Mr. C. F. W. Hooper, from our Canadian embassy in Buenos Aires, who acted as general secretary of the delegation; and myself.

As I was designated vice-chairman of the Canadian delegation I had the privilege of serving as acting chief of the delegation during part of the conference. This was due to the fact that the economic conference of the organization of American states was held in Rio de Janeiro at about the same time as the UNESCO conference at Montevideo and the chairman of our delegation, Mr. Pierce, attended the Rio de Janeiro conference as an observer. May I express my gratitude to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and to the other members of the government for this assignment which I found to be an extremely valuable experience.

The Canadian delegation to Montevideo was a hard-working one. It was one which took an active part in all phases of the important tasks carried out by the general conference. Seldom in the past have I had the privilege of co-operating with a group of people so conscious of their responsibility toward Canada and so eager to discharge, to the best of their knowledge, competence and ability, the important and sometimes extremely tiresome duties which were assigned to each of them.

Members of our Canadian delegation participated with delegates from other member states on most of the committees or commissions set up by the plenary session of the general conference. Besides the plenary session, where Canada had five seats, members of our delegation sat on the program and budget commission, on the administrative commission and on the advisory committee, which are the four main working bodies of the general conference. The advisory committee to which I have just referred is a committee which is advisory on any question on which the program and budget commission wishes to receive technical advice. This advisory committee met two weeks before the official opening of the general conference and was attended by one of our delegates.

Canadian delegates have also been elected to the contribution committee and to the legal committee. This legal committee examines the constitutional and legal aspects of any resolution which involves constitutional or legal issues. A member of our delegation was also elected to the headquarters committee, which supervises matters pertaining to the new UNESCO headquarters which are to be erected at Paris, France. During the conference one of our delegates, Dr. Philippe Panneton, from Montreal, had the honour of being elected chairman of a working party.

The performance of the Canadian delegation at the recent UNESCO conference was, in my opinion, second only to that of the major powers. Yet in some instances when highly controversial issues were under consideration the Canadian attitude, and even our intervention as mediator upon the request of other nations, bestowed upon our delegation responsibilities which could not be more adequately discharged by any of the major powers, so great is the prestige that Canada enjoys today at the international level.

Having had the opportunity and the privilege of witnessing at close range the high consideration, the true confidence and the sincere esteem that other nations of the world have for Canada, for our Prime Minister and for our democratic government, I have returned from this UNESCO conference much prouder of our Canadian institutions and our sound administration, and much prouder to be a Canadian.

Before outlining some of the important decisions reached by the last conference of UNESCO at Montevideo, may I refer briefly to the historical background of UNESCO for the benefit of the readers of Hansard and that of the Canadian public generally. UNESCO, which is the abbreviation for the United Nations educational, scientific and cultural organization, was founded in London, England, in 1945 and the first general conference was held in Paris in November, 1946. Canada had joined UNESCO a few months prior to that time, on September 6, 1946.

In its early years UNESCO's energies were directed toward post-war rehabilitation, but in 1948 the organization turned toward the task of eradicating ignorance and illiteracy in the world. Dr. Jaime Torres-Bodet of Mexico, an international authority on mass education, was then appointed director general. He advocated an expanding program and budget for a sustained attack on urgent international problems; but he resigned in 1952 when the general conference did not then approve the increased program and budget which he presented. Dr. Torres-Bodet, as we know, is now Mexican ambassador in Paris.

In July, 1953, Dr. Luther H. Evans of the United States was elected director general of UNESCO. One of his first endeavours was a reorientation of the organization's program. UNESCO now has an executive board of 22 members appointed by the plenary session. All candidates to the executive board must now first have the approval and the support of their respective governments. At this last UNESCO conference it was decided that 1955 and 1956 should be transitional years, and that the remodelled program should come into effect in 1957.

Mr. Dufresne: Will the hon. member permit me to ask a question?

Mr. Arsenault: Yes.

Mr. Dufresne: I have been greatly interested in his remarks. A few moments ago he spoke about a reorientation of UNESCO's program, and just now he spoke about a remodelling of UNESCO's program. Would the hon. member be kind enough to give us some further explanation?

Mr. Arsenault: If I have not made myself sufficiently clear I am sorry. By reorientation of UNESCO's program or the reorientation of UNESCO's activities and by the remodelled program which will come into effect in 1957, the director general of UNESCO and the secretariat as well have in mind a program which will concentrate on major projects of international importance, large projects, rather than on small projects of local interest.

Mr. Dufresne: Could the hon. member give us a few examples of some of those projects?

Mr. Arsenault: Yes, I shall be glad to do so, Mr. Speaker. As examples of major projects of international importance I think I could probably mention measures devised to eradicate, for instance, racial discrimination, measures to sponsor better international understanding; or scientific research, for instance, to improve the standard of living. As an example of a small project of local interest I might perhaps mention assistance in the erection of a library or an archive somewhere in Asia or in the Middle East.

UNESCO, as we are all aware, is a specialized agency of the United Nations which has the task of bringing about a truly international appreciation of the various educational, scientific and cultural contributions of each country, and of the ways in which the people of the more fortunate lands may share their techniques with and assist those in less developed areas. UNESCO's basic objective is to build the defence of peace in the minds of men through education, natural sciences, social sciences, cultural activities, mass communication, exchange of persons, and scientific assistance, which are made available to its member states and especially to the underdeveloped areas of the world. As is stated in the preamble to its constitution, "wars first originate in the minds of men". It is in the minds of men that the defences for peace must be erected. Therefore above all UNESCO is much concerned with what originates in the minds of men.

The entry to UNESCO in 1954 of the U.S.S.R., the Ukraine and Byelorussia, and the return of Poland, Hungary and Czechoslovakia to active participation brought the total membership of UNESCO to 72 nations. Some 1,200 delegates and technical advisers from all parts of the world attended the last UNESCO conference held in Montevideo. On the first day of the conference the Soviet delegation unsuccessfully urged the admission to UNESCO of Rumania and Bulgaria, and the rejection of the credentials of the representatives of nationalist China. However, the comparatively restrained and moderate statement of the Soviet spokesman was indicative of the attitude taken by the U.S.S.R. throughout the conference.

I must not forget to mention that the United States delegation also avoided provocation and concentrated on supporting increased technical aid to underdeveloped countries. Three resolutions on atomic energy offered another opportunity for political argument on such questions as banning atomic weapons, disarmament, the harmful effects of radiation, the control of nuclear energy and so forth. However, thanks to the co-operative spirit of all concerned it was possible to combine the three resolutions into one which authorized the director general of UNESCO to extend full co-operation to the United Nations on questions concerning the peaceful use of atomic energy. The joint resolution was, therefore, approved unanimously.

A Soviet resolution on measures to prevent the use of mass communication for the propaganda of war seemed certain to create real trouble until the Soviet delegation finally joined Canada, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, France, India, Lebanon, Mexico, the United Kingdom and the United States in sponsoring an alternative resolution on freedom of information. The resolution was approved unanimously, but the various interpretations of the operative paragraph, which invited the member states "to take the necessary measures to ensure freedom of expression and to remove barriers to the free flow of undistorted information" somewhat circumscribed the enthusiasm with which this Soviet concession had been greeted.

Throughout the conference there was an insistent demand from underdeveloped countries for a substantial extension of UNESCO's program and a large increase in the budget. The contributions of new members provided additional revenue and made possible expansion of the program and budget without an increase in the individual contributions of member states. By an overwhelming majority vote the conference approved an assessment level of $20 million for 1955 and 1956, an increase of approximately $2 million over 1953 and 1954. The redistribution of contribution percentages, as new members joined UNESCO, caused Canada's percentage to decline from 3·54 per cent to 2·77 per cent. The amount of the Canadian contribution for 1955 and 1956 will be approximately $554,000, compared with more than $600,000 in 1953 and 1954.

Mr. Dufresne: Will the hon. member permit another question? What is the basis of the contributions of the various members of UNESCO?

Mr. Arsenault: The contributions of member states of UNESCO are established on the same basis as the contributions of member states of the United Nations. The population and national income of each country are taken into account. There are other factors which are considered, such as loss sustained during the last war and so forth. As I have just mentioned, our percentage of contribution was reduced this year to 2·77 per cent, while our percentage of contribution to the United Nations is 3·60 per cent, if I recall correctly.

Mr. Balcer: What was the reason for the decrease in our contribution?

Mr. Arsenault: The reason for the decrease in the percentage was the new members that joined UNESCO. I think I can answer the question of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) by saying that there are 60 nations of the world which are members of the United Nations, while there are 72 countries which belong to UNESCO. The entry of the U.S.S.R., Byelorussia and the Ukraine, bringing with it their contributions, caused Canada's percentage to decrease from 3·54 per cent to 2·77 per cent. Of course our contribution to the United Nations is higher than that to UNESCO because the budget of the United Nations is in round figures $40 million, with our contribution being about $1,500,000, while the total budget of UNESCO is in round figures $10 million and our contribution is approximately $300,000 a year.

Some of the projects which have been approved by the conference and that are of greatest interest in Canada have to do with matters pertaining to education. There is the continuation of the international fundamental education centres at Patzcuaro, Mexico, and Sirs el Laiyana, Egypt. A regional conference on compulsory education will be held in Latin America during 1956. Teaching about both the United Nations and human rights will be stressed. Assistance to member states in the development of adult education, toward better international understanding, was authorized, and special consideration will be given to selected summer schools in underdeveloped areas, and those for women students.

In the development of youth education for social responsibility and international understanding, a system of associated youth enterprises will be instituted during 1955 and 1956. Subventions to 11 international educational organizations were approved.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question at this point. I was interested in his reference to centres of international education where fundamental education was taught. He mentioned these schools as being in Mexico and Egypt. Could he tell us something of what is taught at these schools?

Mr. Arsenault: I shall be glad to. The international fundamental education centres at Patzcuaro, Mexico and Sirs el Laiyana, Egypt, deal with the general form of education, education in the broad sense of the term. The centre at Patzcuaro, Mexico, alone takes care of the whole of Latin America, while the one at Sirs el Laiyana, Egypt, serves not only the Egyptian area but the whole of the Middle East. The population of those areas of the world are taught at those two centres, for example, how to maintain health; how to use their natural resources to best advantage in order to raise their standard of living; how to develop their agricultural resources, etc. In a broad sense that is what we mean by fundamental education.

Under the heading of natural science, the conference agreed that arid zone research should be accelerated. A substantial increase was voted in the budget for this activity. Surveys of the arid zones in Latin America, the Middle East and south Asia will be examined by committees of experts in an effort to co-ordinate research on this subject.

[Mr. Arsenault.]

The proposed campaign against cancer was one of the most controversial items in the entire UNESCO program. It was first approved, then rejected, and finally accepted under the new title of "basic research on cellular growth."

The conference expressed keen interest in the work of the international council of scientific unions. A study conference on science teaching will be held in south Asia in 1955.

Subventions to the council of international organizations of medical sciences, to the union of international engineering associations, to the general assembly of the international union of biochemistry and to the international geophysical year were approved.

Under the heading of social sciences, it was decided that the development of social science teaching will be encouraged, with particular attention being given to direct aid to member states and the teaching of economics at universities.

The conference decided to intensify its work in the field of human rights and minorities, and to initiate a world-wide campaign to eradicate racial discrimination. Subventions were granted also to eight international social science organizations or institutions.

Under the heading of cultural activity, the conference authorized an analysis of the use of radio and television in cultural programs and a study of traditional cultures in southeast Asian communities which are undergoing rapid technological changes.

It authorized also an inquiry into the teaching of the humanities. Comparative studies of methods used in education through arts and crafts in industrial and rural areas will be conducted in Sweden, Germany and the U.S.S.R.

Underdeveloped countries that have requested assistance will be aided in establishing libraries and archives, the education of librarians and the microfilming of library or archival materials. During 1955 a seminar on public library development will be held in India, and a regional conference on the exchange of publications will be held in Latin America. The aid to member states such as Burma, India and Pakistan, for example in the development of museums, was approved and assistance was authorized to the international council of museums for the international exchange of exhibitions.

The conference recommended maintenance of the necessary services for the implementation of the universal copyright convention as well as for the protection of cultural property in the event of armed conflicts. Subventions to 11 international cultural organizations were approved.

Under the heading of mass communication, such as the press, radio, television, the continuation of all UNESCO's activities for the promotion of international understanding was authorized. Continued efforts to procure support for proposed international agreements on the free flow of information were urged, and the preparation of a recommendation to member states on the free movement of persons was authorized. A substantial appropriation was provided for expert missions and fellowships. Under the heading of exchange of persons, priority will be given to the underdeveloped countries in the awarding of fellowships.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, under the heading of general resolutions; the conference considered the development of national commissions to be one of the most important questions on the agenda. A study of the structure and methods of work of existing commissions, the resources at their disposal, and the difficulties they were encountering was authorized. All member states were urged to improve the operation of their national commissions.

At this point may I recall, Mr. Speaker, that in chapter 25 of the report of the royal commission on the arts, letters and sciences which was tabled in this house in June, 1951, the commission summarized certain disabilities which, in its view, seriously handicapped arts and letters in Canada. One of the gaps in our national equipment in relation to the arts, letters and social sciences which the royal commission cited was the following, and I quote from pages 372 and 373 of the report:

> Although Canada is a member of the United Nations educational, scientific and cultural organization, there is not yet established in Canada any form of national commission for UNESCO; an undertaking to create such a commission or an equivalent forms part of the UNESCO constitution, which Canada has accepted.

Canada has been a member of UNESCO since 1946, and has not yet established a national commission such as that prescribed by the UNESCO constitution and recommended by the royal commission. It will be recalled that the royal commission recommended the creation of a council for the arts, letters and sciences which, together with other varied and complex duties, would act as a national commission for UNESCO. Many of the duties of the proposed Canada Council would be concerned precisely with those matters of greatest concern to UNESCO, so that by the creation of a single body wasteful duplication would be avoided.

It seems obvious that the circumstances and considerations which led the royal commission to make this recommendation are still valid. As at September 1952, out of the 65 member states of UNESCO only three countries in addition to Canada had not established national commissions. They were Arabia, Korea, and Czechoslovakia. So long as we do not have some kind of national body, organized for the purpose to which I have just referred, we shall be failing in our undertaking to UNESCO, and we shall be taking only a very inadequate part in the UNESCO programs.

Mr. Dufresne: There may be a reason for that. Perhaps Canada has not recommended that because she wants to protect the rights of the provinces in matters of education.

Mr. Arsenault: Is this a question, Mr. Speaker? We contribute each year about $300,000 to UNESCO. In addition there are the costs of the delegations to the general conferences which are now held every two years. From this substantial investment we are not getting an adequate return, for the very reason that there does not exist any suitable equipment in Canada whereby the programs and the purposes of UNESCO can be made known to the Canadian public generally and, more particularly, to those special groups in Canada which are so deeply concerned with the objectives of UNESCO. As a result we are continuing to play less than an adequate part in the activities of UNESCO.

Mr. Balcer: Would the hon. member permit a question? May we take from his remarks that if Canada has not raised its contribution to UNESCO, it is strictly due to the fact that we do not have a Canada Council?

Mr. Arsenault: We decreased our contribution; we did not raise it.

Mr. Balcer: If we decreased our contribution, then I imagine other countries must have put pressure on Canada to have our contribution raised.

Mr. Arsenault: May I answer by saying that the member states have nothing to do with deciding what the contribution to UNESCO will be, because we first establish a budget. Then each member state is assessed according to that budget and according to certain rules and bases established, as I explained earlier.

Mr. Balcer: Was there not any pressure—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Arsenault: No, there was no pressure.

Mr. Balcer: I am asking a question. If the hon. member does not wish to answer, then all right.

Mr. Arsenault: There is no pressure whatsoever.

Mr. Balcer: No pressure from other states asking Canada to increase its contribution, do you say?

Mr. Arsenault: There is no way whereby we could increase our contribution, even if we wanted to, except by way of an outright gift to UNESCO.

Mr. Dufresne: We are good at that; we are good at gifts.

Mr. Arsenault: As a result of this we are continuing to play less than an adequate part in the activities of UNESCO, since the Canadian attitude in general conferences is not supported by a well-informed Canadian opinion.

Further, the successive Canadian delegations to UNESCO suffer a severe handicap in that there is little or no continuity in the Canadian delegations which, however well disposed and enthusiastic they may be, do not take up their duties at these conferences with adequate background information or knowledge of the problems which face UNESCO from year to year.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Arsenault: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: He appreciates the fact that our questions are being asked because we think he is making a very important speech on a very important question. He has just said something about the desirability of Canada having a Canada Council, or some national commission related to UNESCO. Does he happen to know, as a member on the government side, whether we can count on the appointment of the Canada Council being made at an early date?

Mr. Arsenault: Official policy, as a rule, does not come from backbenchers.

Mr. Pearson: Don't be too discouraged.

Mr. Arsenault: The announcements of official policies do not generally come from backbenchers.

Mr. Knowles: I take it that the hon. member favours it.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Arsenault: One at a time, please.

Mr. Knowles: In any event, it is a good speech.

Mr. Arsenault: I hope something is done along those lines very soon.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Balcer.]

Mr. Arsenault: If the Canadian government is in agreement that a national commission for UNESCO should be associated with or dependent upon the Canada Council, as proposed by the royal commission, it seems quite obvious that herein lies a strong argument for the immediate establishment of the Canada Council, quite apart from any other useful functions which the council might be required to assume.

Mr. Knowles: I told you that you were making a good speech.

Mr. Arsenault: Thank you very much; it is a non-political speech.

The formation of the Canada Council, with the added responsibilities of a national commission for UNESCO, would certainly have great advantages. Canadian delegations to UNESCO conferences would be composed, at least in part, of members of the national commission for UNESCO, who would be familiar with the policies and objectives of UNESCO and who would, over the years, provide a much-needed continuity in our delegations which in the present circumstances is sadly lacking.

Through the national commission for UNESCO, which would represent Canada as a whole, as well as the various literary, artistic and scientific organizations in Canada, the Canadian people would become much better informed of the achievements and purposes of UNESCO and, it seems quite clear, would be better prepared to advance, both within this country and internationally, the objectives of the UNESCO constitution, which Canada is under obligation to foster.

Through the active participation of a very considerable number of Canadians in UNESCO enterprises we should be getting a substantial return for our present investment which, as things stand at present, I am sorry to say is producing very little for us.

UNESCO has occasionally been subjected to some criticisms for spreading its activities too thinly over far too wide a range of subjects. If Canadian delegations to UNESCO general conferences are to be able to suggest more immediately useful and constructive programs, they should have behind them the authority of the informed and interested bodies in Canada which, through their interest in the work of a national commission for UNESCO, undoubtedly would see to it that their considered views were made known, and were expressed by the competent Canadian delegation.

And this, Mr. Speaker, must be considered without taking into account the heavy task which remains to be fulfilled by any UNESCO member state during the two-year period which elapses between one general conference and another, such as the diffusion to interested bodies and the general public of information as to the result of UNESCO enterprises; the organization of international study conferences; recommendations on the choice of qualified experts to the various educational or scientific missions, and to see to it that UNESCO recommendations are properly carried out.

This can be performed adequately only by a permanent organ of liaison with UNESCO, such as a national commission, or its equivalent. Undoubtedly all important matters of policy would still be determined by the government, but on a very considerable number of matters the advice of the interested voluntary organizations in Canada would be of the greatest value. This advice cannot be secured adequately, failing the existence of a national commission for UNESCO, however we may wish to organize it in Canada.

Mr. Balcer: Would the hon. member permit a question? I did not wish to interrupt earlier in his speech. Was a Canadian flag flown at the conference?

Mr. Arsenault: There was a Canadian red ensign, yes, standing with the flags of the other nations. Unfortunately, may I add, it was often confused with the flags of some other commonwealth nations, and British colonies or territories. And I might add that members of our delegation were not too happy about it.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, this opportunity to take part in the debate on the speech from the throne gives to a member an occasion at the beginning of each session to survey the position of parliament, to survey the issues to come before parliament, and to reach some conclusions and form some opinions on the role which parliament generally is playing in the affairs of Canada. This opportunity is the more significant since Canada is assuming an important place in the affairs of the world. Therefore I think it appropriate that when taking part in this debate a member should make some remarks in relation to the position of parliament and the relationship between parliament and the government. Speaking for myself at any rate, I find considerable cause for deep concern in the present relationship between the government and parliament and in the attitude toward parliament shown by the present government over the years in which I have been here.

Very often—and perhaps more so on this side than on the other—we members object to the way in which the government seeks to control parliament, and to the way in which it ignores parliament. At the beginning of this session when there is confronting us a revision of the rules of the house, a committee for which has been set up, I think we should express some conclusions and indicate some objections to the way in which this process has been going on.

I do not wish to open my remarks in too partisan a spirit, but nevertheless I feel I am justified in saying that by and large the manner in which the government ignores parliament and the way in which the government attempts to control parliament is unfortunately approved of by the majority on the government side. For instance, I refer to such incidents in the past as the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that the government will give to parliament only such information as it sees fit to give unless the decision as to what should or should not be given to parliament is disagreed with by the majority. As I have stated, unfortunately the government controls that majority and the majority appears willing to accept that control. As a result the government is enabled to carry out its policy of refusing information to parliament, of refusing to take parliament into its confidence and of refusing to bring before the representatives of the people for discussion those matters upon which we are entitled to be asked to form a decision.

Indicative of this trend was the refusal to call parliament last fall when there were important issues affecting the country which were giving cause for great concern on the part of our people. I am not going to revive the debate which was concluded yesterday, but I cannot fail to refer to the fact that parliament and the people were kept in ignorance of the real facts with respect to the German treaty.

There are further grounds for the objections which I now make in that when the government does call parliament it treats it with what amounts to contempt. Their attitude is a reminder of the principle behind the statement made on one occasion in this house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who said, "If we want to get away with it who can stop us?". No minister in a government which had a proper appreciation of the position of parliament and of the relations of a government to parliament would have dreamed of using such words.

This attitude of the government toward parliament is further demonstrated by the numerous interruptions which have taken place already in this debate. It is an accepted principle, which unfortunately is not followed by this government in practice, that the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne affords to members of parliament an opportunity to indicate whether or not they have confidence in the government. For that reason the normal business of the session is not proceeded with until that debate has been concluded.

I am not in any sense criticizing the laying before the house of the details of the government's program for the session while the throne speech debate is in progress. We are in complete and thorough agreement with that new practice. What I am referring to is the interruptions which have occurred in this debate for the purpose of taking up other matters. Several such interruptions have taken place at this session, and they have had the effect of reducing the significance of this debate, which in effect is an affront to parliament and an insult to its rights.

One can see in this interference with the throne speech debate the natural outcome of the government's attitude to parliament. The Prime Minister and the government said that there was nothing urgent enough to warrant the calling of parliament last fall. That argument was repeated yesterday. And yet already the throne speech debate has been interrupted because it was said that now we are here there are matters of such urgency that they require immediate attention and the government insisted upon laying aside this debate in order to have the other matters dealt with.

Only yesterday we heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) tell us that the consideration of the matter of the German treaty then under discussion was not really of sufficient urgency to warrant an earlier calling of parliament; yet he was speaking in the course of a debate which he had asked to have held at this time and which could only be held by interrupting the proper and normal business of parliament. In the same way this throne speech debate was interrupted earlier for the purpose of considering amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

There is not one of us who would deny the urgency of that matter in the light of the situation which the government has allowed to come about. But it is nothing short of absurd, it is nothing short of an affront to parliament, and is an indication of the government's attitude toward parliament to say, on the one hand, that there is nothing of such concern that parliament should be called early to consider it—to indicate in effect that parliament could not make much of a contribution to the matter in any event—and then to get us down here and say, "Now you are here, these matters are in fact of such urgency that we have to interrupt the proper and normal process by which parliament proceeds in order to take up these emergency matters".

In the same way in this session we have already seen a departure from another principle the preservation of which, I submit, is essential if parliament is to be in a position and have the authority whereby it is enabled to deal effectively with the government, which after all is or should be its responsibility. I refer to the principle of ministerial responsibility and cabinet solidarity. After all, if this parliament and the country are to be confronted with a series of statements by ministers, each of which is at variance with the other, it becomes impossible for parliament to decide the government's stand on a particular issue and thus to debate the merits or demerits of that stand.

We have seen increasing indication over the past few years of a serious departure from this principle of cabinet solidarity. I do not think it has been more conspicuously revealed than it was a couple of years ago in connection with the payment of $65 million to the wheat farmers of the prairies. At that time we had the Minister of Trade and Commerce saying one thing and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) saying diametrically the opposite in connection with the government's policy in that regard. When those two gentlemen found themselves in such an absurd position, they finally had to scramble out of their fix as best they might by saying, "Well, we have what we regard as a good Prime Minister; we will leave it to him and he will save the situation".

We have had an almost exact repetition of that absurd position this session. That was in the discussion of an important matter, the construction of the dam on the South Saskatchewan river. On the one hand, the Prime Minister has said the government does not feel it can conscientiously recommend to parliament that it is in the national interest to proceed with this matter; but on the other hand, we have the Minister of Agriculture out there carrying on negotiations with the government of Saskatchewan. What are the people to conclude the government believes? How are the people of Canada, or the parliament of Canada as representatives of the people, to arrive at any understanding of the nature of government policy in the light of confusion resulting from the fact that the government no longer speaks with a consistent voice?

We see another example of the government's overbearing attitude to parliament in the further refusal of information by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) with respect to the subjects which are to be discussed at the forthcoming conference of the commonwealth prime ministers. As has already been stated, apart from recent very pressing and immediate problems of international relations, there is no more important problem for this country than the question of intercommonwealth trade, and our trading relations within the commonwealth and the orientation of our trading channels generally.

Yet the Prime Minister refuses to afford parliament the opportunity of discussing the policies Canada should follow, refuses to give any indication of the position he intends to take on behalf of this government at that conference. Parliament is refused an opportunity to express its agreement or disagreement with those policies, to which however, we shall no doubt be committed. All that the Prime Minister tells us is that he, after all, is not going over there to make things any worse. The result of that attitude, Mr. Speaker, certainly means—if that is his attitude—that even if he tried he could make things no worse but he certainly is not going to make them any better. I suggest the Canadian parliament have a right to expect of their government and of their Prime Minister the expression of a more realistic concern with the problems which are exercising the Canadian people.

Then when the government, having treated parliament not only on this occasion but over past years with contempt, finally got around to calling parliament, they laid before us a throne speech which, by its conspicuous failure to deal with more pressing problems, is itself a further affront to a legislative body claiming any measure of independence and discretion.

In my view the most conspicuous failure of the throne speech is the failure even to mention one of the most outstanding and vexed problems of the day, the problem of dominion-provincial relations.

But perhaps on reflection, Mr. Speaker, it may be concluded that it is after all not surprising that there is no mention made of this subject, because in no respect has the record of the Liberal party and of the Liberal government been more shameful than in this field. There is no field in which that party has done more by playing politics to endanger national unity and bring relations between the various parts of our country almost to the breaking point.

It is a record in which unfortunately the Prime Minister, by his recent deliberate and calculated reversal of policy and attitude, is now shown to have played a leading part, and in which he has had the enthusiastic backing of several members of his cabinet.

It has, of course, been for many years a deliberate part of Liberal policy to exploit the differing sentiments of differing parts of this country—always under the guise of fostering national unity. They have brought relations between the dominion and the provinces to the breaking point; they inflame the passion of one section of the country against another; they encourage resentment by the provinces against the dominion; they play off one part against the other and all the parts against the whole—then at the last moment, when the situation has reached a position of imminent disaster, they make a concession to avert a disaster which they themselves have created. Then they and their spokesmen, and the propaganda sheets which so assiduously foster the Liberal cause throughout the country, cynically seize upon the very concession they have made and boast that they have made another contribution to national unity thereby.

We have seen this process repeated once more and carried to the very ultimate just recently. We have seen a subject vital to the welfare of the nation—we have seen the welfare of the nation itself—used for political advantage by this Liberal government. In this whole process the Prime Minister has unfortunately played a leading part.

I refer, of course, to the method by which this government has dealt with relations between the dominion and the provinces, and particularly with the province of Quebec, over the taxation problem. There we see revealed in the most startling manner the way in which the Liberal government, under its Prime Minister, has been playing politics with a national issue for partisan political advantage.

To establish the truth of this assertion one has but to compare the statements and attitude of the Liberal leader last summer and fall with his actions in January of this year.

Last fall—and he must have known that six by-elections were in the offing in various parts of Canada in English-speaking or largely English-speaking ridings—the Prime Minister embarked on a course which constituted an appeal to English-speaking Canada, by attacking the premier of Quebec. So we had the sabre-rattling speech at the Reform club in the city of Quebec on September 16.

Then we were told there could never be one arrangement with one part of Canada and another arrangement with the others. Then the principle was enunciated that the whole was greater than any of the parts. Then we were told that the Prime Minister had thrown down the gauntlet, challenged the premier of Quebec, and embarked on a battle to the death for the sacred principle of Canadian unity.

And how the ruse worked! For it was a song that has an appeal in many quarters—the battle song of the Liberal party which has led them to so many election victories: the song of national unity over-all while provoking national disharmony in all the parts. And nowhere, of course, does the sort of appeal made on September 16 have a greater attraction than in quarters where the feelings of the province of Quebec are not understood, and where the people have been exposed to years of the Liberal propaganda—the propaganda which states in one part of the country that Uncle Louis and his Liberal government are the saviours of the country from the wiles of the Conservatives, who are prepared to co-operate too closely with the premier of Quebec, while at the same time saying in Quebec that Uncle Louis—Papa Louis—is the saviour of his country from the wickedness of the Conservatives who will rob them of their heritage.

And so, to the advantage of the by-elections, and of the Liberal party, there was sung by the Prime Minister the battle song of anti-Duplessis; anti-tax concession; and the preservation inviolate and unchanged of the existing tax deals. And the ruse worked again.

Up until now, Canadians have taken the Prime Minister at his word and at the evaluation placed upon him by the Liberal party and its propagandists. I believe the Canadian people, even yet, are hardly able to realize the extent to which they were misled and misinformed in their appreciation of him and what he was doing.

Today, the by-elections being safely over, a completely different and diametrically opposite position has been taken by the Prime Minister. The very things we were led to believe he would never do are now being done.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman just said, "the by-elections being over" and he left the implication that a speech made in September was made for the by-elections. Does he not know the Prime Minister met Mr. Duplessis in Montreal on October 5. Surely you cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Fulton: That is perfectly true. But perhaps the hon. gentleman's elevation to and his assumption of a position of greater responsibility has affected his memory. I do not know. But I suggest to him that he exercise his memory and that if he does so he will recall that nothing was said publicly between September 16, the date of the Reform club speech, and January 14—January 17, in fact—when the correspondence was tabled in this house and the announcement was made, an announcement which outlines a diametrically opposite course to that which we were led to believe was government policy on September 16; for the very things we were then led to believe he would never do are now being done. A different song is being sung now. The political purpose has been served, so the tune has been changed and the tone muted. The rousing battle song is now the sweetest of harmonies, and St. Louis the valiant knight has become once again Uncle Louis, the kisser of babies. No longer do you hear the rattle of sabres or the gnashing of angry teeth. Instead, honeyed words are flowing and the sword is sheathed. The Prime Minister has returned to parliament and on January 17, instead of St. Louis the Bold unfurling aloft the banner of righteous indignation, we saw the spectacle of Uncle Louis coming into the house and brandishing an all-day sucker—giant size—Liberal brand.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: I see that my hon. friends do not like this very much. I did not suppose that they would. But we should look at what was said before and compare it with what is now being done. You will find, Mr. Speaker, that the proposal now made does involve the payment of different rates of federal tax by people in receipt of the same income residing in different provinces. To appreciate the extent of the hypocrisy of the Liberal party in dealing with the question of national unity, one has only to consider the extent to which the passions and prejudices of the rest of the nation were influenced by their spokesmen before the by-elections, and compare their earlier statements with their present actions. In 1954 the actions and proposals of the Quebec premier were everywhere ridiculed and condemned. In 1955, after the by-elections, they are in large part accepted, though in a different form. It should be noted that the premier of Quebec never went so far as to suggest that federal taxpayers in Quebec should have a lower federal tax rate than those living elsewhere, which will now be the case.

Let us compare some of the statements made. In 1954 the then minister of finance said in this house on April 6:

> The principle underlying the suggestion that provincial tax should generally be allowed as an offset against federal tax strikes at the very root of the system of federal-provincial tax agreements which have been developed in this country.

But in 1955, on January 14, in a letter to the premier of Quebec the Prime Minister says:

> . . . we intend to propose to parliament a reduction of the federal tax for all taxpayers of a province having a provincial tax, whether or not they have to pay the provincial tax.

In 1954, the Prime Minister, in the speech already referred to—a speech which could only appeal to those parts of Canada where the Quebec premier was not popular, and in a speech deliberately insulting to the premier of that province—based his appeal on the principle that he and his government would never offer to the people of one province any concession or benefit not available to the people of another. But in 1955 the Prime Minister does exactly the opposite; for in 1955 he says this, and these words can be found at page 230 of Hansard:

> We also intend to propose that income tax payers who have actually paid a provincial income tax on their 1954 income—

And this applies only to the taxpayers of Quebec.

> —be allowed a deduction up to 10 per cent of their federal tax.

You will recall further, Mr. Speaker, that in 1954, before the by-elections and in this house the Prime Minister told us—and he was echoed in this by certain of his colleagues, one in particular—that no good purpose would be served by holding a further dominion-provincial conference. But in 1955, after the by-elections, he tells us that a conference will be a good thing and that he proposes to call one at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Speaker, seen now in this light, seen now in its true perspective, seen after it has served its purpose for the political advantage of the Liberal party, this Reform club speech and the whole attitude and conduct of the Prime Minister stand out as one of the sorriest examples of conduct the only result of which was to fan the flames of racial prejudice and to sow the seeds of national discord and disunity—although it may have resulted in a temporary political advantage.

Then what of that other exponent of Liberal political principles, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). This great emancipator—you will remember, Mr. Speaker, how he was going to free us from the bonds of servile colonialism which he said still bind us with respect to our constitution, and how he called a conference of the dominion and the provinces to find ways and means of amending the constitution; you will recall how he dropped that proposal like a hot brick back in 1950, when he found that once again the interests of his own party and those of the nation did not coincide, and how he once again subjugated the national interest to his party's political interests—in respect of this matter of the tax deal the great emancipator has found himself reduced to the position of a third-rate slave trader.

Only three short months ago this gentleman was roaming the western prairies, arousing western Canada against Quebec by a straight narrow appeal to racial prejudice. The Liberal party, he said, is prepared—and is the only party that is so prepared—to defend the present tax deals in exactly their present form against the onslaughts of those who think a better arrangement could be found. And he whipped up racial sentiment against anyone who, whether conscientiously or not, felt that some better arrangement could be made.

Well, the deals have now been changed; a new arrangement has been proposed by the very party which, for political advantage, was arousing the sentiment of the rest of Canada against Quebec. The very thing that this minister said could not and should not be done has been done. So, in order to remain where he is, the Minister of Justice—

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, anticipating an attack from the quarter from which it comes of the precise character of the one that is now being made—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind an interruption—

Mr. Garson: I took the precaution of obtaining the text of what I said. I should have said that I am rising on a question of privilege to affirm the statement that I actually made. The hon. member has said—

Mr. Rowe: That is not a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman is just making a speech.

Mr. Garson: My friend is attributing to me certain statements that I made in the province of Manitoba in the by-election there.

Mr. Fulton: I have not yet quoted the minister. I am going to do so, but I have not yet done so. I suppose he is so proud of his speech that he wants to quote it in anticipation—

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend just finished saying a few moments ago that I said that we were unwilling to consider any other proposal and that our position was that we were affirming the tax agreements. I have here the statement that I did make and this is it—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Garson: I said:

But notwithstanding these facts, Prime Minister St. Laurent, with that patience and fairness—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Kamloops apparently quoted the minister, and as I understand it the minister is now rising on a question of privilege to say what he did say on the occasion in question. I do not think I can interrupt the Minister of Justice on a question of privilege of that kind.

Mr. Fulton: With respect, I have pointed out I did not quote the hon. gentleman, although I am going to, to his discomfiture, I think.

Mr. Pickersgill: You did not quote him. You paraphrased him.

Mr. Fulton: I stated the effect of what he said. If the hon. gentleman takes issue with my interpretation of the effect of what he said, then I suggest he is perfectly at liberty to rise and correct me in the course of another speech; but unless I misquote him when I come to the quotations I suggest to you, sir, it is not a question of privilege for him to rise and disagree with my interpretation of the effect of what he said.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I listened very carefully to the hon. member for Kamloops and I understood him to say that the Minister of Justice had said such and such. If that is not the case, I am glad to be corrected, but if that is what the hon. member for Kamloops said then I think I must hear the Minister of Justice on his question of privilege.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, what I said was this:

But notwithstanding these facts, Prime Minister St. Laurent, with that patience and fairness and statesmanship which are so characteristic of him at all times, has taken the position in this instance that he is willing to consider, on its merits, any new plan which Premier Duplessis has to offer at the present time.

That was stated in the Selkirk by-election campaign on October 15, 1954, and all these suggestions that any misrepresentations were made by me are quite without foundation.

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister forgets that he has made more than one speech. I think the minister also forgets that even in the one speech he has shown the ability in the past to contradict himself and say things capable of different interpretations. The minister may have said what he has just read. I have not had the advantage of having the text, but I do have with me and shall be reading a Canadian Press dispatch and what his good friend, the Winnipeg Free Press, says that he said.

Mr. Argue: That is more official than Hansard.

Mr. Fulton: Be that as it may, the fact remains that the very things with respect to the present arrangements between the dominion and the provinces which the government said would not be done have been done, and so in order to remain where he is this Minister of Justice—this upholder of the constitution—is forced to accept the very reverse of the principles he himself enunciated. In order to remain in office he barters his declarations of policy for a further brief and inglorious tenure of his ministerial position.

Let us look at a few of the things he said during the by-election campaign and compare them with the deal he is now prepared to swallow. Last fall, what a brave and outspoken critic he was of any who suggested any modification of the existing taxation arrangements in order to accommodate the views of a large and important segment of our population. Enemies of the federal system, he termed them, although there is some doubt whether there is in fact any greater enemy of the federal system than the present government. The Minister of Justice portrayed the issue as a fight between Ottawa and Premier Duplessis over the tax deals, and he did not hesitate to fan the latent flames of race prejudice.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the statement which the hon. gentleman has just made concerning any position which I took in the by-election campaign to the effect that I portrayed the issue as a fight between Premier Duplessis and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is absolutely without foundation.

Mr. Hodgson: People did not believe you anyway. They voted for Scottie Bryce.

Mr. Fulton: I think, Mr. Speaker, that as I proceed with my reading I shall persuade even the minister that he is wrong. I have a clipping here from the Toronto Daily Star of September 24.

Mr. Knowles: More Liberal than the Free Press.

Mr. Fulton: As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says, more Liberal than the Free Press.

Mr. Argue: How could it be?

Mr. Knowles: With a big L.

Mr. Fulton: The heading is: "Drew, Duplessis Both Out to Kill Pacts on Taxes, Garson Says." The dispatch is dated September 24, captioned "Special to the Star," and is from New Poplarfield, Manitoba. It reads:

The fight between Ottawa and Premier Maurice Duplessis of Quebec was made the issue of the by-election Nov. 8 in Selkirk by Hon. Stuart Garson, Minister of Justice, here Wednesday.

As I have mentioned, for his peculiar political purposes the minister went out of his way to link the Hon. George Drew, my leader, with the people of Quebec, against whom the minister was arousing the sentiments of western Canada.

But the hon. gentleman went further. He said in effect that the Liberal party would never make any concessions or changes. I know the minister does not now agree, but I will quote him in a moment. Why, he exclaimed, there could not possibly be anything better than the present arrangements exactly as they now stand. No better scheme could be devised, he said, and those suggesting changes or concessions must be imbeciles, because the best brains in the Liberal party could not find any other arrangement. The Canadian Press quotes him as follows—

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, no member of the house has to sit in his seat and have words put into his mouth by which he is accused of calling other people imbeciles when no such words ever passed his mouth. If my hon. friend wants to read newspaper clippings of that sort and for that purpose, I suppose within the limits of the rules one cannot stop him, but I do not think it is a very creditable practice upon his part. I want to add that at no time during the course of that campaign did I call any persons imbeciles, not even my hon. friends of the Conservative party.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has said that it is discreditable. Let me tell him that I think that the campaign of himself and his party in connection with these tax deals has been the most discreditable thing the people of Canada have ever seen. I am amazed that this minister uses the word "discreditable" in connection with a matter of this kind and applies it to somebody else.

Here is what the Canadian Press quotes him as saying. Mr. Speaker, we have had experience of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) saying that he was misquoted. If the Minister of Justice wants to say he was misquoted, let him say so. It would be to his credit if in fact he was misquoted. But the Montreal Gazette of October 16, 1954, carried a Canadian Press dispatch of a speech at Stonewall, Manitoba, made by the minister on October 15, and these words are in quotation marks as having been used by the minister:

One does not need to be a skeptic to doubt that a plan which is being advanced in 1954—

The plan requested by the premier of Quebec.

—has either been considered and rejected in the seventeen years of consideration which this subject has had since 1937, or that it has not been considered because it was not thought to be worthy of consideration.

Those are the words the minister used to describe the attitude of those who suggested there could be some modification made in these taxation arrangements. The same report continues, not quoting the minister verbatim, but reporting the effect of what he said:

Mr. Garson said it is likely that every possible alternative had been considered since the study of federal-provincial fiscal relations began in 1937.

Yet the same gentleman now sits there, continuing in his ministerial position, when an arrangement giving in large measure effect to that request for deductibility is announced by the Prime Minister.

And the hon. gentleman went further still for the sake of his party and the by-election campaign. His own friend, the Winnipeg Free Press, reports him as saying that no one who had the interests of the country at heart would ever propose a new dominion-provincial tax conference at the present time. The Free Press of October 16, 1954, just three months ago, reports the minister as follows:

Hon. Stuart Garson, Justice Minister, charged here Friday that the proposed new federal-provincial conference on tax rental agreements is being fostered by old enemies of the agreements—"The same old opposition but in a new form".

That is the minister who sits there, quite willing now to accept the statement of his leader—now that the by-elections are over—that it would be a good thing to have this conference at the earliest possible moment. Having joined with his leader, the Prime Minister, in denouncing those who said that for the sake of Canadian unity we should have a new conference to re-examine the dominion-provincial fiscal relations, he now sits in silent but eloquent approval of this complete reversal of position.

And so, for political advantage, the minister described those who felt that a new conference should be held to consider some other approach to the problem of dominion-provincial fiscal relations as enemies of the agreements. He described them as enemies of the western provinces and he fanned the flames of racial prejudice, resorting to an appeal to sectionalism to further his political purposes. Now, however, a new deal is being made.

The position under the tax agreements is being modified. On January 14, his leader, the Prime Minister, who a few months before had joined him in fanning the flames of racial prejudice for Liberal political advantage, is advocating, and in fact is taking, the necessary steps to call a new dominion-provincial conference.

Yet this same gentleman, who only three months before had described those who suggested such a conference as enemies of the western provinces and enemies of the agreements, continues to sit there, although I suggest to you, sir, with respect to him and others who have joined in such a campaign, that any sense of political principle, any sense of shame, any proper sense of political responsibility, would have prompted them long ago to depart from the offices to which they so desperately cling.

National unity is too precious an objective to be played around with for political purposes the way this Liberal government has played with it. Dominion-provincial fiscal relations are too important, too difficult, to be made a political football to be kicked and muddied the way these Liberal cabinet ministers have kicked and muddied them.

After what we have seen, I am satisfied that never again will the people of Canada be misled by the concerted efforts which have been made to portray the serious and consistent suggestions made by my leader and others across this dominion for improving those relations and reviewing the present arrangements, as attacks on the federal system or as representing an attitude of hostility to the poorer provinces. Those very gentlemen who delighted in attacking and vilifying—yes, vilifying—the leader of this party for his stand are now doing the very things which he advocated.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Fulton: I think my time has very nearly expired. I am anxious not to impose upon the house further a speech which is so very clearly unpopular with the hon. gentlemen opposite. If the minister does not mind, therefore, I shall just conclude.

What we have seen lately is the clearest proof that the attacks made on my leader, whose absence from this house is regretted by all, over the past years for his suggestions and requests for a conference, have been nothing but the lowest form of politics. Now the people of Canada have seen the truth of the situation, and have seen that in order to restore national unity and the relations between the dominion and the provinces to the harmonious position in which they should always be, the very things he advocated are having to be done.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy and proud to conclude by suggesting to you, sir, what I think all members of this house and the people of the nation will now agree with, that is that in this field, misunderstood though he has been, and deliberately misrepresented though he has been, the Hon. George Drew has once again rendered outstanding service to the people of Canada.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I should like, sir, if I may, and I shall do so very briefly, to clear myself of the imputations which have been cast upon me by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, in the statement which he says that I made in the Selkirk by-election. I believe I can do it quite briefly and quite conclusively by virtue of my having taken great pains to keep a manuscript of my remarks at Stonewall, Manitoba. These are the portions of it which are relevant to the selection which my hon. friend picked out of context and which, in certain other cases, he quoted from newspaper reports. For that I perhaps cannot blame him, because he did not have the actual text of my speech.

This is what I said on that occasion:

> From these few facts then,—and there are many others—it is clear that the continuance of the principle of these tax agreements is absolutely vital to the people of Manitoba. In this game of dominion-provincial relations, the tax agreements are the ball upon which we must never cease to keep our eyes. For with good financial management upon the part of the provincial government of Manitoba, this province, under these tax agreements, is moving rapidly out of debt into prosperity.
> It therefore does not bother me in the slightest to have certain newspapers in Canada, including the Winnipeg Tribune, say that I am flogging a dead horse in this tax agreement controversy. This controversy over the tax agreements is by no means dead. It is still very much alive; and it will remain alive as long as those who are strongly opposed to the tax agreements still want to find some way of getting rid of them. Some of the opponents of the tax agreements want to call a new dominion-provincial conference. These people seem to think that such a conference would reach a new dominion-provincial arrangement which would cancel the tax agreements. Thus, the controversy over the tax agreements would continue to remain very much alive as long as there are in Canada influential public men and newspapers seeking to replace the tax agreements with something which they regard as a better alternative.

Is there any suggestion in these words of devious plans, or of schemes, or the imputation of wrong motives to those who have opinions which differ from ours? I think not. "For example", I said:

> For example, certain newspapers which do not support either the Liberal government at Ottawa or the Manitoba government are now hinting that as a result of the present discussions between

Prime Minister St. Laurent and Premier Duplessis, some new plan is already on the way which will embarrass us in Manitoba. Mr. Blakely, the Ottawa press gallery representative of the Montreal Gazette is reported in its issue of October 6, 1954, as saying that in my request for support for the Liberal candidate, Mr. Shanski in this Selkirk by-election, I had stated that the Liberal party was the only party in Canada which is both able and willing to defend and perpetuate these tax agreements. It is quite true that I did make such a statement, and it is a true statement.

I say on the floor of this house, Mr. Speaker, it is a true statement. All that our friends of the Conservative party have ever contributed to this matter, going back through the years, is to muddy the waters and obscure the issue.

Mr. Fleming: It was all too clear for you this afternoon.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has to explain his own speech.

Mr. Garson: I continue to quote:

Then Mr. Blakely goes on to imply, and clearly imply, that I had been left high and dry by the Montreal developments between Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Duplessis.

Now, Mr. Blakely is one of the ablest members of the press gallery at Ottawa and his paper, the Montreal Gazette, reflects in an authentic manner the viewpoint of large business interests in the city of Montreal and is also a strong supporter of the federal Conservative party headed by Mr. Drew, and of the Union Nationale government of Quebec headed by Premier Duplessis. The voice of the Montreal Gazette often speaks with eloquence and carries weight. Yet, in the present instance, the impression which Mr. Blakely has sought to convey in the Montreal Gazette is not up to his usual standard of accuracy. In what he has said, he ignores the fact that the tax agreements are sound contracts in writing, entered into between the federal government and nine of the provincial governments of Canada; and that they do not expire until March 31st, 1957.

Unless the provinces who have signed these agreements are prepared to agree to their cancellation now while they still have two and one-half years to run, the tax agreements are bound to remain in effect and to cover the relationships between the federal and provincial governments to which they will apply until March 31st, 1957.

The Montreal Gazette and other newspapers which have supported the Hon. Mr. Duplessis and the Hon. Mr. Drew in their opposition to the negotiation of the tax agreements—

And there was that opposition. If we have tax agreements now it is not thanks to the present leader of the Conservative party.

Mr. Fleming: If we have a conference coming up now we can thank him for it, and you know it.

Mr. Garson: To continue:

The Montreal Gazette and other newspapers which have supported the Hon. Mr. Duplessis and the Hon. Mr. Drew in their opposition to the negotiation of the tax agreements, are now showing their continued opposition to them in their hints and veiled prophecies that what they refer to as "the Montreal developments" have left western Liberals, to use their words, "high and dry". The best short reply to these kindly speculations is Mark Twain's remark concerning a false report of his deatn. He said that this report was greatly exaggerated. So are Mr. Blakely's fears concerning the continuance of the tax agreements.

For having had the honour of meeting most of the premiers and provincial treasurers of the Canadian provincial governments, I have formed quite a high opinion of their ability. I am confident that they are not going to throw away the benefits of the present tax agreements except for an alternative that will leave them at least as well off as they are under the agreements.

Long years of effort upon the part of able and experienced men have been put into the formulation of the tax agreements. It is, therefore, not surprising that these agreements have proven to be by far the best method of dealing with dominion-provincial relations in the field of public finance. During all of these long years of discussion and deliberation, first of all by the Bank of Canada in 1937, then by the Rowell-Sirois commission, then by successive conferences between the federal government and the governments of the provinces of Canada in 1941, again in 1945, and 1947, and then again in 1951, it seems likely that all the available alternative methods have already been considered for meeting the problem which is being solved by the dominion-provincial tax agreements. One does not need to be a skeptic to doubt that a plan which is being advanced in 1954 has either been considered and rejected in the 17 years of consideration which this subject has had since 1937, or that it has not been considered, because it was not thought to be worthy of consideration.

Mr. Fulton: Then you turn around and adopt it.

Mr. Garson: To continue:

It would indeed be rather strange that such large numbers of able and experienced men in the field of public finance and dominion-provincial relations would in all these years of consideration have overlooked some really practicable solution to this problem. But notwithstanding these facts, Prime Minister St. Laurent with that patience and fairness and statesmanship which are so characteristic of him at all times, has taken the position in this instance that he is willing to consider, on its merits, any new plan that Premier Duplessis has to offer at this present time.

Now I want to ask my hon. friend from Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), who ordinarily is a fair debater in this house, if he can find in these remarks the least semblance of the picture that he tried to portray fifteen or twenty minutes ago. This was a statement made in the Selkirk by-election in an endeavour to lay before them all the facts, both pleasant and unpleasant, in as frank and candid a manner as possible.

Mr. Fulton: I would answer the minister. I thought it was a bad speech when I read about it, and I still think it was a bad speech, after the hon. member has repeated it. Neither it nor its contents improve with repetition.

Mr. Garson: I have never worried very much about my hon. friend's opinion as to whether my speeches are bad or good, provided he does not misrepresent them.

Then I went on to say—

Mr. Rowe: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Rowe: In fairness to some who are not able to answer in this house, I would like to know if the minister could tell us if the release that he kept so carefully was released to the press—because there is such a variance between what appeared in the Montreal Gazette and the Winnipeg Free Press and the Toronto Daily Star, and the release he is now reading—and when he has kept the release so carefully—

Mr. Garson: It was not only released to the press but it was mimeographed and sent around to an even wider audience. But I am sure my hon. friend, with his long experience in public life, knows that when any public man supplies the press with a copious release, a complete release, in many cases the press has not room in its paper to publish all of the speech, and they make extracts from it, and write headlines and they editorialize upon it. I am not complaining in the least degree about this—about the treatment by the press of this speech—not in the least. I am amazed that, with the space they have available, they can do as good a job as they do with these remarks.

Mr. Rowe: I would like to ask the minister if he read it as carefully in Selkirk as he is reading it now.

Mr. Garson: Yes, I did. I did not read it word for word, but I used fully its substance.

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: When the minister now speaks of the variance between his remarks and those attributed to him in the press, why did he not at that time correct the erroneous newspaper reports, instead of waiting to do it three months later?

Mr. Gardiner: Did you ever try that?

Mr. Fleming: Yes—every time.

Mr. Garson: Because I was then engaged in an election campaign, travelling long hours every day, and making at least two speeches a day. And in many cases I did not see the newspaper report of this or any of these other speeches until several days after; and I was too busy then to bother about the exact wording of them. And I certainly never thought that they would be put to such use as the hon. member for Kamloops has put them in this chamber this afternoon.

[Mr. Garson.]

Then I would like to read now a further quotation from my concluding statement, to indicate the spirit and the basic meaning of these remarks at Stonewall. I said this:

> Mr. St. Laurent, long before he entered political life, was appointed by Prime Minister Mackenzie King as the leading counsel of the Rowell-Sirois royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, of whose report on dominion-provincial relations the present tax agreements are largely the outcome. It is therefore not surprising that the Prime Minister with his great grasp of this whole subject matter, with his adherence to principle and his desire to promote the interests of the whole of Canada, is not departing from the principle of the present tax agreements when he offers to consider some new method. The end of the tax agreements remains the same. The tax agreements are the means to that end at the present time. If those who were opposed to the tax agreements from the beginning and are still opposed to them can, even at this late hour, submit a better means to that end than the tax agreements, the Prime Minister has stated that the federal government is willing to consider that means. But it is not willing to change the end. The end is, as the Prime Minister has stated, to build up a prosperous Canada from coast to coast by equalizing the tax revenues of the 'have' and 'have-not' provinces.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, having waited for some time to get the floor while the Minister of Justice was reading the speech he made in the Selkirk by-election I am not surprised that the Liberals lost that election.

It was my intention to sit out this debate, not because I had no questions to raise or because there was nothing in the speech from the throne that I disagreed with. The unemployment situation, however, is so serious in my city and province that I am sure the people, particularly of Vancouver, would think it strange if I did not raise my voice in regard to it. Most of what I shall have to say will be in regard to unemployment.

Before I deal with that there are one or two matters I should like to refer to. First I want to comment on a statement made by the hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming (Mr. Proudfoot) when speaking in this debate on January 17. He was referring to the educational system of British Columbia and was replying to some statements made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). I am not coming to the defence of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam; if he needs any defence he is quite able to make it himself; but I do come to the defence of the educational system of the province of British Columbia. This is what the hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming said, as reported on page 274 of Hansard:

> Why does not the hon. member take time off to compare the rights of minority groups in his province of British Columbia with those in Quebec. At this time I have in mind a place called Maillardville, British Columbia, and if I am not wrong I think possibly Maillardville is in the constituency of Burnaby-Coquitlam. I would ask him to examine the school laws of his province before he launches an attack on my province, and before he assumes to give advice to the people of Canada.

May I tell the hon. member, and any other hon. member who does not know, that under our constitution in British Columbia we have a free, non-sectarian public school system. No questions are asked of a child entering a British Columbia school as to whether he is Jew or Gentile, whether he is Roman Catholic or Protestant, whether he is Baptist or Witness of Jehovah. All that is nesessary is that he be a resident of British Columbia and of school age.

Not only is our school system free and non-sectarian, it is also compulsory. If a child is living in an outlying district where no educational facilities are available he gets his education by correspondence. Children living in localities where there are schools must attend them. On occasion we have taken parents into court in British Columbia in order to force them to send their children to school. I have never known of a parent coming to courts in order to get a school to accept his children. This is something for those who would criticize the British Columbia school system to inform themselves about.

If there are people in Maillardville or in any part of British Columbia who do not think the school system is good enough for them, who set up their own schools, then they are the people who are creating minorities; they are the people who are creating double taxation in British Columbia.

Mr. Dufresne: How many Roman Catholic parents have to pay in order to keep their own schools in British Columbia?

Mr. MacInnis: We have no—

Mr. Dufresne: Is there any difference between the minorities in Quebec and those in British Columbia?

Mr. MacInnis: We have no minorities in British Columbia as far as our school system is concerned except those who purposely make themselves a minority. British Columbia provides an education for every child in the province, elementary and high school.

Mr. Dufresne: What about the minorities in Quebec?

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member asked a question and I answered it. I may tell my hon. friend that in British Columbia we provide a school system which is in perfect conformity with the British North America Act and consequently we are not discriminating against anyone. If people set up their own schools and subject themselves to double taxation it is not done under the laws and regulations of the school system of British Columbia. If a private school is set up the parents whose children attend such schools pay for their upkeep. They must also pay the public school taxes.

I want to say a few words with regard to the subamendment moved by the leader of this group when he spoke on the address. This subamendment reads as follows:

That the amendment be amended by inserting therein immediately after the words "Your Excellency's advisers" the following words:
"have deliberately returned to the policy of uncontrolled and unplanned private enterprise which resulted in the depression and unemployment of the pre-war years, and that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to undertake the economic planning necessary to cope with the serious problems now facing the Canadian people, and"

I shall undertake from government publications to show that the government has departed from that. First, may I say a word with regard to a comment by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) when referring to this amendment. This comment may be found on page 103 of Hansard, and it reads as follows:

May I say also that when I heard the mixed laughter and cheers I felt just a wee bit sorry for my good friend the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) because he seemed to me for just a moment to be like one of those fellows who went to swim in English bay at Vancouver on New Year's day. As he was just about to take the plunge somebody got away with his swimming trunks and for a moment he was in a rather embarrassing predicament.

I think what the hon. member for Vancouver South was trying to say was that the Conservatives were cribbing from the C.C.F. program. Probably that is true enough, but the Conservatives are not the only people who have been cribbing from the C.C.F. for years. I should like to read a statement by a prominent Canadian which appeared in Maclean's magazine of August 1, 1953. The man being interviewed was Mr. Hugh MacLennan, a noted Canadian author. Along with some other people he was giving reasons why he voted Liberal in the 1953 elections. Mr. MacLennan voted Liberal and in part this is what he said:

As I live in the province of Quebec, it is pointless even to consider the claims of Social Credit. They will run no candidate in my riding. Nor is the C.C.F. likely to do so either. In any case the C.C.F. is in the position of a man whose store has been robbed, and robbed consistently, for more than ten years.

By whom? Not the Conservatives. At least not according to this Liberal.

The Liberals have lifted so much of Mr. Coldwell's stock and sold it under their own trademark that he has been left with little of his own that would tempt me to buy.

If the Liberals did not get away with his trunks that was, I imagine, an oversight. Personally I am proud that other political parties have had to pilfer from the C.C.F. because it demonstrates two things. It shows that we have something and that as far as policies are concerned the other parties have very little. You have never heard of anyone breaking into a poor house. You have often heard of people breaking into a bank. Well, the C.C.F. has a bank of good ideas.

The unemployment situation has been referred to by many speakers during this debate, and that is quite proper because it is a very serious question in this country today. However, some speakers on the government side when referring to unemployment always draw attention to the fact that though there is considerable unemployment there are over five million people working. I believe the last person to refer to this was the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer). I always feel that when a person deals with the unemployment situation in that flippant manner you may be certain of three things, namely that he has a full belly, a warm back, and a decent place to sleep. If they themselves were unemployed it would be little comfort for them to know that others were employed.

The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek had this to say, as reported at page 336 of Hansard for January 19:

> When we hear the people who have no hope and who live in despair speak, they talk about unemployment—and there is unemployment. It is an evil that should be eradicated. Yet, there are well over five million people employed in Canada, five million people who are able to earn their own living at perhaps as high wages as earned by any people in the world.

And we all agree.

> That is not done as a matter of course; it did not come about on account of any socialist party or policy in Saskatchewan or anywhere in the world. It came about because of Liberal principles that have been in evidence not only in Canada but throughout the whole world. Those Liberal principles reflect themselves in free trade throughout all of the world, which bring us to a united front and a united attack upon the evils that may exist not only in Canada but throughout the whole world.

There is not very much you can make out of that except that the hon. member is saying the Liberal party is responsible for the conditions that prevail in this country, or have prevailed up until now. But if they are responsible for the relative prosperity of the last decade and a half they are also responsible for the unemployment of today. They cannot take the credit for one without taking responsibility for the other.

But I would like to draw the hon. member's attention to a government publication in order that we might determine exactly who is responsible for the prosperity we have had for some years and which is more or less still with us. I am quoting from what we usually call the "green book" proposals of the government of Canada, August 1945. In outlining national problems and objectives the "green book" has this to say:

> The preparations must be undertaken against the background of severe depression and the enormous dislocations of war. Under the conditions which existed for nearly a decade prior to 1939—

During which time the Liberal party was in office for at least half that period.

> —the Canadian economy did not provide adequate opportunities for employment and enterprise; the deficiencies in the provisions for social welfare became strikingly apparent; the structure of government finance in our federal system developed basic strains and weaknesses. The war came before solutions to these problems were reached.

Is the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek saying that the government brought about war in order to find a solution to unemployment in 1939? That is what appears to be the case, though I do not contend that for one moment. I am saying that the war came in spite of the government and it was war, fear of war, and preparations for war, that put an end to our difficulties in 1939 and has kept our "prosperity" going from 1939 until the present time.

An understanding of these simple facts should be kept in mind by people who try to give us lessons on how things happen.

I wish now to refer to the unemployment situation in my own city, but before doing so I want to draw the attention of hon. members to the statistics which are available with regard to unemployment. I imagine most hon. members get a copy of the press release on unemployment each month. I have it now. This press release is issued jointly by the Department of Labour and the dominion bureau of statistics and covers the employment situation for the month ending December 9, 1954.

There are two estimates of the number of unemployed. One is made by the dominion bureau of statistics on the basis of sample questions. But another, and in my opinion a much better one, is that issued by the national employment service. I think it rather confusing to have two estimates of the unemployment situation placed before us each month.

The dominion bureau of statistics states that unemployment for the period—I believe up until December 9—was 247,000 or 4·6 per cent of the labour force. The national employment service, however, puts the unemployment figure, based on the applications for employment at national service offices, at 362,700. I believe in all the circumstances that the latter is the best estimate. Let me show why I say that. The labour force survey estimates, according to this press release, are subject to sampling error. It adds:

> In general, the smaller the estimate the larger is the relative sampling error.
> Statistics of applications for employment at the national employment service offices of the unemployment insurance commission are derived from a count of the applications on hand in every office at the close of business on a specified day.
> The count excludes registrations from persons known to have a job and applying for another one. Measures are also taken to exclude as far as possible persons who have secured work on their own since registration. Nevertheless, the figures inevitably include a number of persons who have found employment or who have left the labour force by the time the count is made. On the other hand, not all persons who are looking for work register at the employment offices.

In view of all these circumstances, when you rule out those that the employment service know have jobs and when you take into consideration the number of people who are not registered, you are likely to have something fairly close to the right estimate. I therefore suggest to the minister that the people of Canada should have one figure, one estimate, as to the number of unemployed and that that estimate should be as accurate as possible. I believe that the estimate of the employment service of Canada is the best.

I maintain that the situation is extremely serious and that it cannot and will not be remedied by what we have done so far in the matter of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I have in my hand a news item from the Vancouver Province of October 22—that is three months ago—and I just want to draw the attention of the house to some of the facts given in this news item:

> Salvation Army is finding the problem of unemployed men too big to cope with at its hostel here and thinks the government should step in now and help out . . .
> Red Feather donations are a vital aid to the operation, but the job is just too big to cope with adequately, he says.

That is the superintendent of the Salvation Army hostel for the unemployed. Then he says this:

> "The number of unemployed employables in Vancouver is growing daily. We are more than twice as busy as we were at this time last year."

May I draw the attention of the house to the fact that, according to the registration in the employment service bureaux, unemployment increased by over 3,000 a day in the 21 days from November 18 to December 9. The superintendent continues:

> "Our big hope is that the government will step in early and help these men."

That big hope is gone because the government has not stepped in early and the situation is daily getting worse. One of the sad things about this situation is that many of the men who are unemployed are young men. This is what these people say about the situation with regard to them:

> The men, many of whom are in the younger age group, have been employed in casual jobs during the summer months but have not enough stamps in their unemployment books to be eligible for jobless benefits.
> "When they come to us they are really suffering, have no place to stay and have often gone some time without food." . . .

These are young men. When the war was on, every young man was working if he was not in the army; and if he was in the army, he was well dressed, well fed and had a decent place to sleep. But now that we do not need these young men for that purpose, —these young men who in a few years will be mature men in charge of Canadian affairs—they have to go around this rich country without food, without proper clothing and without a place to stay. The article continues:

> "We try to give them emergency aid quickly and then make every effort to find jobs for them."

Then reference is made to the fact that their biggest difficulty is with those in the 50-65 age group. Then there is another thing that is rather strange to which I want to draw attention:

> There are few immigrants in the unemployed employable category.
> "Most of them seem to be doing all right and the Canadian immigration department does step in to provide room and board if required," he explained.

If the government, through its department of immigration, can provide assistance for people who have come here overnight, surely they can step in and provide that service for people who have been resident in the country for years. I never heard of anything quite so unfeeling as the sort of treatment that has been accorded. I suggest to the government that what has been done so far is not good enough.

I have in my hand an editorial that appeared in the Vancouver Province a month later than the news item to which I have just made reference, namely on November 15, 1954. The heading of it is "Empty Stomachs Can't Wait". I am not going to quote the whole of this editorial, but part of it is to the point. It states in part:

> But we, in Vancouver at least, have a special problem on our hands, a problem that we hope is only temporary but which is nonetheless extremely grave while it lasts. Because of our mild climate we have inherited not merely a local unemployment problem but the unemployment problem of many other western communities as well.
> Our problem is becoming a problem that should be shared by the national government and our civic and provincial representatives should make sure Ottawa is made fully aware of that fact.

I have no doubt that the civic government of Vancouver and the provincial government have made the federal government aware of the facts, but to no avail. That is the reason I am obliged to take up the time of the house now in order to try to make this government aware of the problems confronting many Canadians not only in Vancouver but throughout Canada.

I see that it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED SETTLEMENT OF FORD STRIKE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Miss Sybil Bennett (Halton): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, may I ask a question? In view of the fact that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) was kind enough to send me a message saying that the Ford strike is reported to have been settled, may I return that kindness by asking him if, on this memorable occasion tonight, he will make some comment as to what this will mean to the people of Canada?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): If I understand the hon. member rightly she is suggesting that, by consent of the house, the Minister of Labour be granted permission to make a statement. Does she mean at eight o'clock or now?

Miss Bennett: As the matter is so important, I would suggest that it be done right now, if possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is it the unanimous wish of the house that we revert to motions in order that the minister may make a statement?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I think it had been agreed with all groups in the house that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) would ask at eight o'clock that we revert to motions in order that he could make an important statement. I suggest that if the Minister of Labour wishes to make a statement on the Ford strike, he could do so after the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys has made his statement to the house. Would that course be agreeable?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I thank my hon. friend for her courtesy. I think I should say this before six o'clock. I think I should remind hon. members that this industrial dispute at Ford has been a matter that has been constantly within the provincial jurisdiction. In saying that, I say too that I know that as it has gone on Hon. Charles Daley, minister of labour in Ontario, has done, time and time again, his utmost to bring the strike to the happy conclusion which has been reached today, according to the press. I have not at this time the details, but if it is the wish of the house, I could make a statement later, having made these provisional remarks indicating that I as federal Minister of Labour cannot and do not wish to take any credit whatsoever for the settlement of this strike. Nevertheless I can tell the house that it fills me with a great degree of satisfaction because of the effect it will have upon a great industrial portion of Ontario, a portion of Canada which has been experiencing the difficulties referred to a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis). But I will discuss the matter with my colleagues during the dinner hour and one or other of us will convey to the house any information that may be available regarding the terms of the settlement.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Gregg: At six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, at the suggestion of the hon. member for Halton (Miss Bennett), you asked for unanimous consent for me to make a statement regarding the reported settlement of the Ford strike. I hope, sir, I have unanimous consent so to do.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gregg: I then reminded the house that this long labour dispute was in an industry which comes under the jurisdiction of Ontario labour legislation and that the various efforts at government conciliation had been conducted by the Hon. Charles Daley, Ontario minister of labour, and his department. During the dinner hour I made some inquiries and learned that the negotiating committees representing the two parties will be making, or perhaps have already made, their own official announcement. I feel, therefore, we should wait until that is done to learn the details of the settlement which, I understand, are to be considered by the members of the union at a meeting called for next Sunday.

I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that all in this house rejoice at the prospect of work being resumed in this great enterprise. We sincerely hope that today may have marked the beginning of a long period of industrial peace in Canada's automobile industry.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF AMENDMENT TO CHANGE RATE

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement at this time, preliminary to the resolution that is now on the order paper affecting the gold mining industry.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Prudham: The government proposes to extend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act for two years, 1955 and 1956. Payments will be made on a different basis than formerly. The formula for assistance payments to gold mines consists of two factors. The first is the rate of assistance, and the second the portion of the production to which the rate of assistance applies. The proposed new bill maintains these two parts, but they have been somewhat simplified.

The rate of assistance has been revised and will be the amount that is two-thirds of the amount by which the average cost of production of gold from the mine during the year exceeds $26.50 per ounce. The rate of assistance in any event will not exceed $12.33 per assistance ounce. This leaves the ceiling at $45 per ounce allowable costs, the same as it was before, but raises the lower limit to which costs apply from $18 to $26.50 per ounce. Under the new proposal payments will be made on two-thirds of the production during the current year.

A resolution supporting this proposal, as I have said, is already on the order paper and will be before the house at an early date. I have extra copies of this statement here if any hon. member wishes to have one.

Mr. Michener: This procedure, Mr. Speaker, is perhaps a little difficult to understand. I take it that the minister does propose to introduce a resolution to make the introduction of the bill possible, but at this time I feel it would be proper to ask when it is intended to introduce the resolution so that the matter can be the subject of a debate. I should like to ask the minister as well the reason for the necessity of making the statement in this way at this time. It is an interruption of the debate, and members who are interested in the effect of this resolution will not wish to debate it on such short notice and knowledge of its terms as we have been given tonight. I would appreciate an answer to the questions I have asked.

Mr. Prudham: I cannot say exactly when it will be brought before the house, but I expect it will be at an early date. I believe the reasons for making the announcement in this way are obvious. We purposely did it at this time because the stock exchanges across the country are closed. In recent years it has been the custom for the Minister of Finance to make an announcement at this time of day for the reasons mentioned.

Mr. Michener: I appreciate the reason to some extent, but the stock exchanges are closed every night. Why should it be made at this particular time, instead of being introduced in the usual way? I feel that question is worthy of a more complete explanation than we have had from the minister.

Mr. Rowe: Can the minister tell us when it will be brought up?

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister wish to explain further?

Mr. Prudham: Someone has asked me to state more specifically when it will be brought up. I expect it will be after the termination of the debate on the throne speech, but I cannot say exactly what day. I hope it will be in the near future.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. MacInnis: I wonder if I could say a few words, Mr. Speaker, on the statement the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) has just made. First of all, I should like to say how glad I am that the great industrial struggle is over, as I am sure every member in this house is. During the time of this strike I have been thinking that huge industrial strikes of this kind, long drawn out, are perhaps in the same position as modern wars, that nobody wins.

Having had a settlement of this dispute after it has cost the parties concerned so much, possibly this would be a good time for some sort of committee—I do not know what you would call it, public relations or something of that kind—to continue explorations into the possibility of finding some way of dealing with these disputes after they have gone through the usual procedure and before a strike is called. I do not know whether or not I have made my idea clear to the minister, but I cannot think of anyone better than the minister himself to approach the leaders of the trade unions and industry to discuss the possibility of avoiding long strikes of this kind in the future.

Shortly before my remarks were interrupted by the dinner recess I referred to the fact that newly arrived immigrants to Canada were provided with board and room if they were unemployed. I hope I did not give the impression that I objected to that being done. Certainly I do not, and I hope it will continue to be done as long as it is necessary. We should not bring people to this country unless we are sure there will be work for them. If there is no work for them, we should look after them.

What I have been complaining about is that we seem to be doing more for the newly arrived immigrants than for the residents of Canada. During my remarks I mentioned conditions in Vancouver. I have here a pamphlet issued by the Canadian Welfare Council urging that something be done to provide a public assistance program for the employable unemployed. I want to draw to the attention of the minister and the house some of the conditions mentioned by the Canadian Welfare Council. As I said—and I mentioned the city of Vancouver—the first paragraph in this program says:

> Appeals by the Salvation Army in North Bay "for donations of soup-bones, vegetables, and bread to feed transient men and their families", the re-introduction of used clothing drives in Windsor, the opening of soup-kitchens in Vancouver, and similar reports reaching the Canadian Welfare Council in recent weeks from many parts of the country, are evidence of the fact that there are still a great many unemployed workers in Canada whose essential needs are not being met.

I was wondering why the words "there are still a great many unemployed workers in Canada" are in here; but I imagine they are here because of the optimistic reports made from some government sources that the unemployment situation is on the up and up, although it is on the down and down.

Commenting further on the situation, this pamphlet goes on to say:

> The head of a family who is denied help by municipal authorities on the ground that he is "employable" may be referred from one organization to another to beg for clothes, groceries for his family, or money to stave off eviction. He may stand in line for a bowl of soup to relieve the pressure on the food supply at home. Even though he can manage to keep his family alive, the loss of morale due to stop-gap measures, the need to seek help from several agencies, each meeting only part of his need, tend to discouragement and weakening of family ties.

I submit that these are the conditions which now prevail in this rich country, where so many of us are so well provided for and so happy. And it is, truly, a sad commentary on our social organization and our social outlook that we should allow people to have to beg for soup bones and to have to beg for other people's cast-off clothing. Surely when they have to do those things it must leave scars on the human personality that will take many, many years of good living to eradicate.

The Canadian Welfare Council is suggesting that the various governments—municipal, provincial and federal—should organize a conference at which this situation could be discussed. And may I draw attention again to what I said quite recently in this chamber on another occasion, that how quickly and how effectively we act in this matter should not depend upon whether there are 20,000 unemployed or 200,000 unemployed. The needs of 20,000 are just as urgent, and it is just as necessary to look after their needs in a humane and civilized way as it is to look after the needs of 200,000 or 300,000, or whatever it may be.

Now I shall read a very short paragraph summing up the view of the Canadian Welfare Council. It says:

> The Canadian Welfare Council urges all governments in Canada, federal, provincial and municipal, to take such action as may be required to bring about a conference on the subject of public assistance for the employable unemployed, in order to determine the most appropriate allocation of governmental responsibilities for meeting the needs of those unemployed persons not protected by the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act and to ensure that a program for this group is established with the least possible delay.

I give my support to that; but I submit that it is not enough at this time. We cannot wait now. As the editorial in the Vancouver Province says, empty stomachs cannot wait. We cannot wait now for a conference of this kind. We want something done now, done today, in order that we may eradicate this shame from our country.

The federal government in 1945 gave a firm commitment to the people of Canada that it would take the responsibility for dealing with this matter of employable unemployed. After learning the lessons of the depression, and after learning the lessons of abundance during five or six years of war, the government came out with an analysis of that situation, and a program to meet it.

I am going to put it on the record again and, although it has been done before, I make no apology for doing so now. Before the dinner recess I read a short paragraph from this book "Proposals of the Government of Canada, August 1945", where they pointed out that the war came before solutions to our main problems were reached. Let me read just a little more:

> The difficulties of the depression were quickly submerged in the great national effort against aggression abroad.

Now there is aggression at home, the aggression of unemployment. It continues:

The winning of the war became a single dominant purpose to which all lesser demands and objectives were subordinated. The obstacles to united effort were removed by the willingness and patriotic desire of all groups to accept sacrifices and restrictions in order to ensure victory.

Now, I do not expect people to act in peace just the same as they do in war, even if the need is to relieve the distress of their fellow man. But people who stand in the way should be exposed by the government of this country, in the same way as they would have been exposed if they had stood in the way during the time we were at war. That is the government's responsibility; and unless they are willing to do that, there will always be selfish people who will stand in the way of progress.

I continue to read:

The federal government was responsible for the organization of the national effort and there were no limitations upon its power to do so. These circumstances and the co-operative spirit of the provincial governments made it possible to overcome, or temporarily to set aside, the factors which have impeded the development of solutions to difficulties of the past.

Let me draw the attention of the house to this next sentence—and it is not ten years yet since this was said. It represents the government's opinion in 1945. The people of Canada were looking forward to this, and the day of disillusionment comes in 1955:

The accomplishment of our aims in the post-war period must, no less than in war, be an object of national endeavour.

I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), and any other minister sitting in front of me, if that is what they are doing today. Is that what they are doing?

The accomplishment of our aims in the post-war period must, no less than in war, be an object of national endeavour.

Well, I am sure, if it were, they would get a lot of help from the people of Canada. As I said before, there might be some selfish persons who would stand in the way; but the help and co-operation they would get from the rest of the people of Canada would be so great that those obstacles would be insignificant.

Then it continues:

Success in the attainment of high levels of employment, increased welfare and security, is dependent upon the fruitful co-operation between all governments and groups in the country. It is the responsibility of government to pursue policies that create conditions in which the initiative, energy and resourcefulness of individual citizens can achieve rising standards of life.

And if that is not accomplished, then it logically follows that it is the duty of this government itself to do those things which private enterprise fails to do. That is its responsibility, either to do that or to abdicate.

Let me draw the attention of the house to the commitments which the government gave to the people of Canada in 1945, to be found on page 7 of the "Proposals of the Government of Canada" which I have mentioned already. These are:

To achieve the large objectives we must set for export trade, domestic consumption, private and public investment will require a closely integrated effort. The general principles guiding this effort must be explicit and clear as they will form the framework within which the specific plans and arrangements must be worked out. To this end the government briefly sets forth the basic principles underlying its proposals.

In familiar terms, our objectives are high and stable employment and income, and a greater sense of public responsibility for individual economic security and welfare.

Who is taking responsibility today for the more than 300,000 unemployed?

Realization of these objectives for all Canadians, as Canadians—

Not just Canadians who are employed or in business, but all Canadians, which would mean Canadians who are unemployed.

—is a cause in which we would hope for national enthusiasm and unity.

I have pointed out to the minister and the government that they will have national enthusiasm and unity the moment they start to do something; but they will not have any enthusiasm or unity as long as they just sit and look at the problem and hope that something will happen to solve it for them. I continue to quote:

The government has clear and definite views on how these objectives can be attained.

I hope the ten years which have intervened since 1945 have not dimmed that clear and definite view.

These views may be summarized very briefly as, first, to facilitate private enterprise to produce and provide employment; secondly, to promote bold action by the state—

Just think of this government promoting bold action to provide for Canadians.

—in those fields in which the public interest calls for public enterprise in national development; thirdly, to provide, through public investment, productive employment for our human and physical resources when international and other conditions adversely affect employment;

I say that those conditions are here now; international and other conditions are adversely affecting employment and this is the time when the government should act as it committed itself to the people of this country in 1945 to act. I continue:

fourthly, to provide, on the basis of small regular payments against large and uncertain individual risks, for such hazards and disabilities as unemployment, sickness and old age.

I turn now to page 42 of this book and then I will be finished with my quotations. The government went on to say how these things could be done. It outlines the necessary requirements of a dominion scheme of unemployment assistance. I shall leave out (a), which is not particularly necessary at the time, although it is very good, and go on to (b), which reads in part:

The principle of dominion policy on the other hand is not the provision of relief, but the assurance of either a job or of a subsistence income in lieu of a job,—

I think subsistence income means a living income to provide an ordinary decent standard of living.

—if necessary for a substantial period of time, available to employable persons who are able and willing to obtain a job whenever possible.

Does the government think that it is fulfilling that condition when it provides a paltry $24 a week in the form of unemployment insurance for 60 days? It is not. Then I go on to (c), which reads:

(c) A further requirement is that the dominion plan should not attempt to establish differentials in rates of benefit between provinces, or between localities in a province, or between rural and urban areas as such; national action of this sort must be based upon a uniform national system.

(d) The plan proposes acceptance of dominion responsibility for unemployed employables, and provincial and local responsibility for unemployables, but it is recognized that this division presents problems of definition in some individual cases, and that in operating practice the only final test of employability is ability to get and hold a job.

I think my time is about up, but I do want to draw attention to the fact that in 1945, as outlined on page 43 of this book, the government plan proposed the acceptance of dominion responsibility for unemployed employables. I freely admit that unemployment could be much worse in the country than it is, but why wait until it gets worse. Why not deal with it now? It is the government's responsibility to provide either work or a subsistence income for those unemployed who are capable of working and who are willing to work. I hope that this commitment will be honoured, because I believe it was made in good faith. I would hate to see the government renege on it now.

(Translation):

Mr. Fernand Girard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take up again the question of bilingualism in Canada. It is a delicate subject, I admit, but so essential to good understanding between the two great races of this country that I feel I must come back to it. Even at the risk of hurting some feelings, the subject will have to be discussed time and time again until such time as true bilingualism is equally respected by the two great racial groups in this country.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

I base the expediency of dealing with this matter on a statement made in this connection by His Excellency the Governor General, Right Hon. Vincent Massey, who stated in his book, "On Being Canadian", at page 20:

(Text):

There are expressions of bonne entente on both sides, but one cannot build national unity simply on an exchange of compliments. The real compliment between friends is an honest expression of views in the light of mutual understanding.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I doubt if anybody would deny that bilingualism is the main link between the two great races which give this national unity of ours its bicultural character. It therefore follows that the vitality of national unity in this country is largely dependent upon the healthy state of this bilingualism.

May I be allowed to quote certain figures that will illustrate the present state of bilingualism and the condition of that highway to national unity. The figures I am about to quote are from the federal census of 1951, and I find them in an analysis published in the April 1954 issue of Relations, page 111 and following. According to those figures the bilingual population of Canada in 1951 was 12·3 per cent of the whole, as against 12·8 per cent in 1941.

It appears, therefore, that bilingualism is inadequate in this country, in spite of the bilingual character of our constitution. Then, too, it has shown a slight decrease in the last ten years, a fact which contradicts the too frequent statements we hear to the effect that bilingualism is gaining ground in Canada.

In addition, 60 per cent of those few bilingual people are from the province of Quebec and the great majority of bilingual people in other provinces are of French descent. Again according to the federal census of 1951, 3·8 per cent only of Canadians of English descent are bilingual.

These few figures lead to the sad conclusion that there is, properly speaking, no true bilingualism in Canada as conceived by the spirit and letter of confederation, since, barring a few exceptions, the only bilingualism practised has been purely and simply a concession on the part of the minority towards the majority. According to the same census, French Canadians, 31 per cent of whom are bilingual, supply 77·5 per cent of all the bilingual people in the country, whereas Anglo-Canadians, of whom only 3·8 per cent are bilingual, supply 14·6 per cent of all bilingualism in Canada.

The tragic conclusion to be drawn from this situation is that the only effort towards genuine good understanding has been made by French Canadians, who make up the only group to have practised a bilingualism worthy of mention.

Well, Mr. Speaker, instead of rejoicing over our worthier effort, we should perhaps feel sad because, when it is a one-sided practice, bilingualism becomes a neat form of assimilation. Before continuing to preach bilingualism among our compatriots, we have reached the point where we have to demand it from our English-speaking fellow citizens; otherwise, I repeat, our bilingualism will become a polite method of anglicization.

Some might bring forward the oft repeated cliché that our bilingualism has given us a practical superiority in the social development of the nation. There again, Mr. Speaker, figures deny this statement which has so often misled our French-speaking compatriots.

To convince us, let us see what bilingualism has brought us, in the very heart of Canadian life, namely in the federal civil service.

Setting aside gratuitous assertions, I have endeavoured to compile some figures which would give as accurate an idea as can be given of our representation in our federal civil service. For that purpose I took the public accounts for 1954, and went over the list of high officials in the various departments, taking those who earn more than $5,000 per year. Taking down the total number of high officials in each department, I counted every French Canadian name and established the average for each department. One may object that such a method cannot be accurate since, very likely, there are French Canadians with English names and vice versa, names which I must have missed in computing my average. I will answer immediately that argument with a reference from the 1951 federal census, which gives us the proportion of people in both ethnic groups who changed from one language to the other.

In 1951, there were in Canada 61,291 people of British origin who gave French as their mother tongue, and 342,678 people of French origin who stated that English was their mother tongue. That shows that any trend toward assimilation is more than five to one against us, which proves that the margin of error resulting from possibly misleading names, when I counted those high officials, works against the French-speaking group.

Here we have, then, according to the public accounts published by the Department of Finance for 1954, the way in which French Canadians are represented in each department.

Proportion of French Canadians in the Federal Civil Service

Salaries over $5,000.00
(Public accounts figures—1954)

Transport	613	46	7·5%
Veterans Affairs ..	563	58	10·3%
Total	7466	979	13·1%

It should be noted that the high percentage in the Department of the Secretary of State is due to the large number of translators.

So, Mr. Speaker, that is what being bilingual has meant to French Canadians. There is the share which our people get: 13·1 per cent. Do we not have ground for concern when we consider that French Canadians represent 30 per cent of the whole population in this country, that they are the only group fairly bilingual, and that they are given only 13 per cent of the higher positions within the very administration which is responsible for watching over both cultures in this country and for fostering our constitutional bilingualism?

Moreover, did you know that, again according to the 1951 federal census, English-speaking Canadians of British origin represent but 47·9 per cent of the Canadian population? Although they represent only 47·9 per cent of the whole population in a country which is constitutionally bilingual, our English-speaking fellow citizens hold more than 83 per cent of the higher positions in the federal civil service, while French Canadians, who represent 30 per cent of the Canadian population, account for only 13 per cent of those positions. The margin is but 17 per cent as far as the population percentage is concerned, but when it comes to the distribution of the higher positions there is a margin of 70 per cent. I say that our English-speaking fellow citizens get over 83 per cent. I say that English-speaking Canadians are getting more than 83 per cent, because I am leaving a margin of 4 per cent for positions that may be filled by Canadians of other origins, although when I compiled my figures, there appeared to be very few of those, not more than 1 or 2 per cent, but I preferred to stick to conservative figures—and I use "conservative" in the right sense of the word.

Is that the standard of justice by which the federal government intends treating the two racial groups who have equal rights in confederation, with people of British origin who account for 47 per cent of the population holding more than 83 per cent of key positions, and people of French origin, who make up 30·8 per cent of our population, getting only 13·1 per cent of those positions?

In all other fields of Canadian life, outside the government, the situation is not any better as far as the rights of the French language are concerned. If bilingualism is to be taken into account only in the case of those who wish to become elevator or telephone operators, and so forth, it is insulting for us to even mention it. I shall say nothing about bilingualism in the army, where our compatriots are systematically anglicized, as they are otherwise condemned to an aimless life and are subjected to unfortunate statements, like that made last year by navy officer E. Adam, at Quebec, who went so far as to state publicly that French-speaking Canadians could not hope to reach the higher ranks in the navy if they did not know the English language.

Has the proportionate importance of the two racial groups been respected in the choice of immigrants brought to our country? No, in spite of what is stipulated in the Canadian constitution. Yet, Mr. Speaker, every time someone is accused of destroying national unity, we become the scapegoat.

[Mr. Girard.]

When we protest against the English designation of the Queen Elizabeth hotel, being built by the Canadian National at Montreal, in the very heart of Quebec, kingdom of 30 per cent of the citizens of this country, we are destroying national unity. When we declare ourselves astonished that the position of chairman of the civil service commission is entrusted to an English-speaking Canadian, while that office should have rightfully gone to Mr. Boudreau, who had proved his worth, we are destroying national unity. When we require French in this bilingual country of ours, we are injuring national unity. When we protest against a matron who demands that English alone be spoken in a hospital which is mostly French-speaking, and located in Quebec besides, it is we who are bigots and are injuring national unity. When we demand a national flag—not one with a fleur de lis, but a distinctively Canadian one, whereas a certain number of our fellow citizens insist upon the union jack—it is we who are injuring national unity. When we request the appointment of an ambassador to the Vatican, on behalf of nearly half the population of this country, which happens to be Catholic, it is we who are injuring national unity. When we request an investigation into bilingualism, it is refused us because it would be harmful to national unity.

But what is this national unity, Mr. Speaker? Would justice and truth be incompatible with it? Or is it merely a smoke screen which serves to quieten our enthusiasm every time we march towards recognition, not of our own particular wishes, but of the very conditions of confederation?

Some of our English-speaking fellow citizens seem to look upon us as a necessary evil to be tolerated only with ill grace. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) gave expression to this way of thinking last week when he made remarks unworthy of a member of this house on the subject of Quebec. Will he allow a member from this "other nation" to tell him that he will find, in his own constituency, at Maillardville, proof of our broadmindedness! It happens to be money from Quebec which has allowed his French-speaking constituents to build themselves a school.

Mr. Dufresne: Hear, hear.

Mr. Girard: Mr. Speaker, the only bilingualism practised in this country may be summarized in this fashion: be bilingual in Quebec and unilingual everywhere else.

In case there should be any members here who feel that the people of Quebec are too particular about those matters which affect the legislative powers of their province, let them meditate on the figures related to our efforts towards bilingualism and their reward in the civil service.

If there are members who are concerned because Quebec is up in arms against all the measures of the central government, which they call political interference, let them ponder over the way our equal rights are exercised.

If there are members who think that we are ultra-nationalists, who wonder what could have given rise to the Bloc Populaire, what brought independents into this house, let them ponder over the way our two racial groups enjoy equal rights. If there are members who find rather touchy the newspapers Le Devoir, in Quebec, Le Droit, in Ontario, La Liberté and Le Patriote, in western Canada, and many other courageous upholders of the rights of the French language and the French race, let them ponder also over the way our two great races enjoy equal rights.

If there are members who wonder why French Canadians are reluctant to rejoin our armed forces, although they fought gallantly in those forces when the situation called for it, let them ponder over the way the French language, which is an official language in this country, is treated in the army.

Too many politicians consider the fait français as an unfortunate precedent which they have to put up with, mainly because it means a large number of votes; they begrudge us the exercise of our rights and they think they have gained a victory whenever they have succeeded in depriving us of any of our prerogatives.

They pour oil in all the nooks and corners of our national characteristics and then take us to task for setting fire to it. We ask favours of no one, and we have had enough of that humiliating sufferance, contrary to the spirit of confederation. It is unfortunate that the Canadian government makes it necessary for us to fight in this house to get bilingual cheques, as was done many times by my hon. colleague the member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin), and it is a pity to find that we hold only a small number of the higher positions to which we are entitled.

Bilingualism and national unity have become academic terms, broadcast far and wide in fine speeches, but which are denied when it comes to issuing a mere cheque.

How can the country have respect for the bilingual character of our culture, which constitutes the only great asset of our national heritage, if the government is party to this cold war gradually undermining the constitutional rights of the French language? Who are the real separatists, Mr. Speaker? Those who are making confederation unbearable to us or those who demand that it be respected? Who hurts national unity? Those who betray the bicultural character of our country, or those who demand that it be preserved after meeting the others more than halfway through bilingualism?

There are, happily, a few of our fellow Canadians of another tongue who have understood the French situation and who have not forgotten it. There are others who have helped us, who have made commendable efforts in that field. Let me congratulate them and urge them to continue in their efforts. Those of us in the government or elsewhere who use their influence to help the preservation of the French language deserve all our congratulations. They contribute to the recognition, once again, of our rights, but their efforts are isolated and require the expenditure of so much energy. May I be allowed to quote the words of a true Canadian, Mr. Murray G. Ballantyne, of Loyola College, as taken from the newspaper Le Soleil of May 7, 1954:

> Canada is the country of the French Canadians and they have the right to feel at home from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

These words were spoken before a service club in Montreal, namely, the Lions Club.

> We should recognize the fact that Canada is, by reason of her historic mission, basically a bilingual and bi-ethnical country.

Mr. Ballantyne added that:

> Great Britain had never claimed the right to deny the French their natural origin, but had given, in the British North America Act, the safeguards necessary to their survival. French Canadians do not trust us.

And again:

> They feel that we do not accept them as equal partners in the building up of Canada. That is why they cling stubbornly to the only safeguard they know, the constitutional rights of the province of Quebec.

Our English-speaking fellow citizens should understand that the proximity of the United States, a country which has such close ethnic relationship with them, would have soon influenced them owing to the force of circumstances, if our French mentality, that other determining factor in the ethnic set-up of Canada, had not come into play and participated so loyally in the creation of a distinct Canadian culture in spite of the proximity of 160 million Americans.

I do not hesitate to declare that none of the citizens who play a part in the life of our nation, that no member of the house can claim to be truly a Canadian if he cannot express himself in the two languages which our constitution has left us as our heritage. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I request from the government the establishment of a board of inquiry to determine the situation of bilingualism in our country. We can be sure that if the French-speaking group are shown to be remiss in their duty, they will soon conform to the spirit of our constitution since they claim to be the most anxious of all to be faithful both to the letter and to the spirit of the confederative pact.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to quote another sentence from the book written by the Right Hon. Vincent Massey, "On being Canadian", at page 17:

(Text):

Certain profound questions which naturally spring to our minds when we talk about our future, come from the relation between the two great communities which have made Canada, and which must share her future.

(Translation):

Yes, Mr. Speaker! If we are so jealously eager for the respect of the rights we were guaranteed by confederation, it is because we want to share in the future of our great country, which will grow only when the right of existence for each of the two ethnic groups which give a bicultural character to our Canadian culture is truly recognized.

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, the refusal of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) in this debate a few days ago to follow the customary practice of congratulating the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne—

Mr. Winch: I did no such thing. I said I had no congratulations to extend to the government.

Mr. Trainor: I must have misunderstood the hon. member. As I understood it, it was a refusal to congratulate these gentlemen, and I thought it was a trifle harsh. While I agree with his reason, I think it unfair to visit condemnation on the hapless heads of these two estimable gentlemen. Therefore I should like to congratulate them on their creditable effort to make so much out of so little.

Mr. Winch: You are making it worse than I did. I ignored them.

Mr. Knowles: Wouldn't they like to be on an operating table under your knife.

Mr. Trainor: The hon. member for Vancouver East appears to object strongly to the work of the propaganda section of the Liberal party in their coinage of the sobriquet "Uncle Louie" as descriptive of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). This is merely mildly amusing, but I would suggest that if the hon. member finds the appellation inaccurate he might suggest "Foxy Grandpa" as an alternative. While I am on the subject, may I suggest to some hon. members opposite that adulation poured on the unresisting head of the right hon. gentleman may eventually prove cloying to his palate.

One appreciates an occasion, Mr. Speaker, when it is possible, conscientiously, to congratulate members of the government on opinions they have expressed. I find myself in that happy position. I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) on the opinions he expressed in a speech to the Canadian Tax Foundation on the Canadian tax structure. One is encouraged to observe the fact that constant reiteration of a point of view by opposition members may eventually penetrate even the mind of a cabinet minister. I should also like to congratulate the Prime Minister on his belated discovery of the Canadian constitution. It is a discovery which some of his ministers do not appear to have yet made. The house is indebted to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier), the Dean Swift of the C.C.F., for that delightful satiric review of the political situation across Canada. Gulliver at his best never encountered more incredible situations.

In the program of research into the Canadian tax structure on which the Minister of Finance is engaged, I suggest he take a look at the situation in the automobile industry. In the United States the federal manufacturers' tax on automobiles is scheduled to be reduced on April 1, 1955, from 10 per cent to 7 per cent. Contrast that with the 25 per cent Canadian tax and you have an explanation of the major reason why a car costs so much more in Canada than in the United States. The Canadian automobile industry used to enjoy a substantial export market which has now practically disappeared owing to high production costs, of which taxation is an important element, thereby reducing employment to Canadian workmen. Here is one positive way whereby the government may extend that assistance to the unemployed referred to by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) in reply to my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees).

I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to a facet of the Canadian tax structure which exemplifies the grossest discrimination and utter disregard for the principle of ordinary fairness in respect of a particular group of Canadian citizens. In 1953 the automotive distributors of Canada paid to the manufacturers the sum of $162,765,000 on the 483,821 motor vehicles produced in Canada, which in turn was paid into the federal treasury. This means that to get their cars dealers had to put up an extra $162,765,000 over and above the actual cost of the cars, on which amount no profit was taken. This cost had to be met, usually by financing, which meant that the dealers paid out, over and above the amount of the taxes, a very large amount in financing charges to obtain the money to pay these taxes. Surely no fair-minded person would maintain that there is any element of justice in this situation.

If the government is determined to maintain these iniquitous sales taxes, and the adjectival description is not mine but that of a former Liberal prime minister, then why not apply them at the consumer level where the ultimate payment is made rather than at the producer level? I grant you that this would mean informing the consuming public of the real impact of these iniquitous taxes on the price structure. It may be that the minister lacks the necessary courage, as did his predecessor. We Canadians, Mr. Speaker, are a law-abiding people, but we demand that our laws reflect the principle of strict, impartial justice. In the case to which I have referred I charge that this principle is being violated, and on behalf of these citizens I demand a recognition of the principle of equality before the law, implicit in our constitution although not guaranteed by a formal bill of rights.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to comment on an economic trend which may appear to be fortuitous to many, but in reality is in large part the result of deliberate government financial policy. I refer to the steadily declining purchasing power of the Canadian dollar on the domestic market. It will be understood that I am approaching this question from the point of view of the man in the street, humbly seeking information. I make no pretence of expert qualification in economic theory, like my friend the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and others in his party who seek to persuade us on the merits of a rather revolutionary economic theory on evidence no stronger than their own unsupported opinion.

I have obtained from the dominion bureau of statistics some information about the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar as measured by the consumer price index over the last 25 years, taking the year 1930 as representing 100, which I should like to place before the house. In the year 1931 it was worth $1.11; in 1932, $1.22; in 1933, $1.28; in 1934, $1.26; in 1935, $1.26; in 1936, $1.23.

An hon. Member: Is that a good thing for the country?

Mr. Trainor: I do not know; just wait until you hear the rest of it. In 1937, it was worth $1.19; in 1938, $1.18; in 1939, $1.19; in 1940, $1.15; in 1941, $1.08; in 1942, $1.03; in 1943, $1.02; in 1944, $1.01; in 1945, $1.00.

An hon. Member: Sold.

Mr. Trainor: Do not buy it so quickly. You will get it cheaper in a short time. In 1946, it was worth 97 cents; in 1947, 89 cents; in 1948, 78 cents; in 1949, 75 cents; in 1950, 73 cents; in 1951, 66 cents; in 1952, 65 cents; in 1953, 65 cents; in 1954, 65 cents.

It seems obvious, Mr. Speaker, to one without any qualifications as an expert in this field that a 1954 dollar which will purchase only 65 cents of the necessities of life is just as valuable to the individual as the dollar when it was worth 100 cents or more provided he has enough of the depreciated dollars to compensate for their deficiency in purchasing power. In other words, those in the fortunate position of being able to vary their income to keep pace with the fluctuations in the purchasing power of the dollar are in a preferred position. But what of the individual with a fixed income, expressed in dollars, which he is unable to vary either upward or downward?

In this category, we must include all those who must live on a pension, be it provided through the investment of their own savings or as some return for past services to public or private enterprises. We must include all those who are trying to pass their declining years on the proceeds of government bonds which, when purchased, were represented to them as being exchangeable at all times for 100 per cent of the face value in consumer goods. If that does not hold true, then what of the expression "as good as a government bond"? This implied guarantee was the reason they were purchased in preference to more speculative issues with prospects of greater returns. I am certain that if victory bonds had been offered in 1939 for dollars that were then exchangeable for $1.19 of consumer goods, on the understanding that they would be redeemed in 1954 in dollars exchangeable for only 65 cents in terms of consumer goods, there would have been few if any purchasers, except on the basis of pure patriotism. How many government annuities would have been sold by the Department of Labour in 1939 if the purchaser had been told that the annuity would be paid in 1954 in dollars worth only 50 cents in purchasing power.

What about the case of the farmer who in 1954 must buy his operating supplies on this inflated market, where his dollar would buy only 50 per cent of what it would in 1939, while his product will not bring a corresponding inflated price when offered for sale on the markets of the world?

Mr. Argue: He needs parity prices.

Mr. Trainor: That is another question.

I am not offering a solution to this problem, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: That is obvious.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Trainor: Because the main responsibility for the depreciation of the currency rests with the government. It is a result of their fiscal policy. Consequently, it is up to the government to devise a method of dispensing equal economic justice to all its suffering citizens who are condemned to live on a fixed income in terms of dollars. In this connection I am led to paraphrase a sentence from a famous speech by the late William Jennings Bryan, a man who always manifested a concern for the victims of injustice. The government is pressing on the bleeding brows of these suffering people a crown of thorns and they are being crucified on a cross of paper.

I would suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) that the plight of these people is becoming desperate and that desperate conditions breed desperate remedies, which might conceivably embrace even a change in the government of this country.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trainor: I mean desperate for the government. Members of this house are being inundated by pitiful letters from old age pensioners, war veterans, civil service and C.N.R. pensioners, all stressing the inadequacy of their stipend to sustain life. This inadequacy is traceable in large measure to the depreciation of the currency. What remedial action does the minister propose? I suggest he must announce immediate constructive action to alleviate these conditions or suffer the consequences.

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Last week while speaking on the address, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau) complained particularly about two changes which were made in post office personnel. I have made inquiries into these two cases and I desire now to briefly bring the facts before this house.

The first complaint is against the procedure followed by the Post Office Department in connection with the promotion to the position of a post office inspector in Winnipeg a few years ago.

The procedure was the following:

The position was advertised and the candidates were examined by a rating board consisting of seven senior officials. Mr. R. J. Emerson was the leading candidate.

Two candidates appealed and the civil service commission appeal board which met in Ottawa recommended that a local appeal board be set up in Winnipeg to deal with the matter.

The Winnipeg appeal board recommended that the candidates be re-examined by another rating board, giving as the reason the closeness of the original ratings.

It was not possible to obtain another rating board of entirely different officials, as the first board comprised most of the senior officials who were conversant with the duties of the position and the qualifications of the candidates.

The second rating board was under the chairmanship of the regional director who is the senior postal official for the prairie provinces. He was assisted by the district director of postal services for Manitoba and the postmaster of Winnipeg. This second rating board also rated Mr. Emerson first.

Appeals were then filed by three candidates, and a civil service commission appeal board was again set up in Ottawa. This board decided that there were no grounds for the appeal and confirmed Mr. Emerson's appointment.

At no time were ratings made by any headquarters officials. All ratings were made by local ranking officers who are conversant with the duties of the position and the qualifications of the candidates. The appellants were represented by officers of their own selection on each appeal board.

Discussing the procedure followed in this first case, the member for St. Boniface made some statements which are not borne out by the actual facts.

At page 300 of Hansard, it is stated:

> The successful candidate was not one who pleased the unelected depository of power.

Whatever interpretation is given to this statement, the fact remains that the employee finally promoted by the civil service commission is the same individual who was selected by both rating boards comprised, in both instances, of officials of the Winnipeg postal district.

At page 300 of Hansard, it is stated:

> A board of appeal was set up, consisting of three members. Two members of the civil service commission refused to accept the application of the protégé of this unelected depository of power in the Post Office Department, and the third member submitted a minority report.

The fact is that there was only one representative of the civil service commission on the appeal board. He did not refuse to accept the rated candidate. The Winnipeg board, which comprised a representative of the commission, a representative of the department and a representative of the employees, suggested that the ratings be reviewed locally in Winnipeg. To this the department agreed.

At page 300 of Hansard, it is stated:

> The result was that the protégé was immediately selected to fill the position of inspector for the Post Office Department, over and above the heads of more qualified civil servants.

Again the fact is that the candidate mentioned here as a "protégé" is the same candidate mentioned before as not pleasing the "unelected depository of power".

Not one of the officials in Ottawa mentioned in the remarks of the member for St. Boniface has even a casual or personal acquaintance with the employee who was recommended for promotion and eventually certified by the civil service commission.

The second complaint of the member for St. Boniface refers to a position of area superintendent in Winnipeg made vacant by the resignation of Mr. Vermander.

The procedure was the following:

The department recommended that this position be filled by the transfer of the area superintendent at Brandon to the position of area superintendent in Winnipeg.

This transfer has not yet been completed.

The action is one of transfer rather than promotion. Nevertheless, the right of appeal was granted to any employee who considered he had a better claim to the position.

Discussing the procedure in this second case, the member for St. Boniface also made some statements which are not borne out by the actual facts.

It is stated at page 300 of Hansard:

> He (Mr. Vermander) was ill last year, and it was said that because of his illness he was requested to tender his resignation.

The fact is that Mr. Vermander was not requested to tender his resignation. Mr. Vermander applied himself for retirement on the 1st of October, 1954, for reasons of health. He was at that time almost 65 years old.

At page 300 of Hansard, it is stated:

> ...that a regulation of the civil service commission had been discovered which stipulated that when there was not 20 per cent French-speaking or English-speaking there was no need of bilingualism in any area in this nation of ours.

In this connection, I would refer the member for St. Boniface to section 19 of the Civil Service Act, which provides that candidates must be qualified by examination in the knowledge and use of the language of the majority of persons with whom they are required to do business.

The reference to 20 per cent which the member for St. Boniface makes relates to a formula adopted by the department—not a civil service regulation—whereby we not only observe the provisions of the Civil Service Act but in cases where there is a minority of English-speaking or French-speaking patrons, the department endeavours to provide good service by the appointment of assistants who can speak the language of the minority, in cases where the postmaster or senior official is only conversant with the language of the majority.

At page 302 of Hansard, it is stated:

> But on December 1, 1954 a sign in French and English was posted in every office in Manitoba with the following ultimatum to all civil servants employed by the Post Office Department. It is headed "Appeal Notice" and then comes the following: "The department has approved of the following transfer without advertising a formal competition subject to no appeals being sustained."

Evidently the hon. member misunderstood the sign. This, of course, was not an ultimatum as indicated, but was for the purpose of giving those employees who consider they had superior qualifications for the position a chance to appeal, and some have taken advantage of this opportunity.

At page 302 of Hansard, it is stated:

> This is contrary to the Civil Service Act which states that if there is a vacancy the deputy head of the department must advise the civil service commission which will take the necessary measures to formally advertise a competition.

The fact is that the Civil Service Act provides for transfers, where such are in the interest of the public service.

At page 302 of Hansard, it is stated:

> A short time ago I mentioned a certain protégé of the deputy assistant to the Postmaster General, and he in fact was the man who was railroaded into the position over the heads of fully qualified members of the civil service in the province of Manitoba.

No official in Ottawa made, either directly or indirectly, any recommendation or suggestion to the board which made the selection.

As a matter of fact this transfer has not been completed yet. Appeals have been received against the transfer of the area superintendent at Brandon to the position in Winnipeg and these appeals will no doubt be heard, in due course, by a committee presided over by an official of the civil service commission.

As for the other statements made by the member for St. Boniface, who is entitled to his own opinion and interpretation, the result of my inquiry is that in dealing with these two cases nobody was given assurance of any procedure other than the one followed; that nobody has been ridiculed by the postal officials; and that no Canadians of any ethnic group have been called mediocre.

Everybody may peruse the Woods-Gordon report which did not find any postal official inefficient. On the contrary, the report states the company was impressed by the over-all efficiency of the department and the basic soundness of its organization and administration.

Finally, whether a letter registered and prepaid for special delivery, posted in Winnipeg late on the evening of one day and delivered in Ottawa the next day, is or is not good postal service, and whether the zoning system could apply elsewhere but not in Winnipeg, are questions of opinion and interpretation.

Mr. Speaker, I have replied to the complaints of the member for St. Boniface by giving the facts in order of sequence, in so far as possible, and only with the purpose of informing the house adequately.

Mr. Viau: Will Mr. R. J. Emerson remain in the position of district area superintendent in Manitoba?

Mr. Cote: I ask my hon. friend to read the statement I have made. The matter of the position of area superintendent is not settled, as an appeal is now under consideration by the civil service commission. I would not like to prejudge and I am not able to prejudge what action will be taken by the commission.

Mr. Charles Yuill (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate it is not my intention to needlessly take up a lot of valuable time. I feel however that in the interests of the people of the Jasper-Edson constituency whom I have the honour to represent I am obligated to comment on some of the legislation forecast in the speech from the throne and also the lack of legislation to deal adequately with some of our most serious problems in my part of the country.

I should like to compliment those who have taken part in this debate thus far. The seriousness and high standard of the debate thus far is indicative of a sincere desire on the part of all members of this house to seriously and honestly appraise the proposed legislation and do something about it. I need only mention the dispatch with which the emergency legislation relating to the unemployment situation was carried out. There are many who felt that this was not the answer to this problem, but they know of the serious plight of those who depend upon the take-home pay of a husband, a father or brother. They know also of the worry and fear and privation that always rears its head in homes where the breadwinner, through no fault of his own, is unable to provide the necessaries of life. Many of us feel that with a proper economic policy this would have been unnecessary, but nevertheless, when an emergency arose, with a minimum of political drum-beating we applied the milk of human kindness and did the only thing possible under the circumstances.

We in the opposition groups are supposed to be ever critical of government policy; we are expected to condemn the government for both their sins of commission and omission. I should like to say that I for one would like to be a little more realistic in my approach to these things. I believe in giving credit where it is due. I can see for instance some very humanitarian legislation in the Disabled Persons Act that is to take effect as of January 1 this year, and in the amendment to the Blind Persons Act, and the proposed amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act, and others which I hope to deal with at some future date.

I was somewhat disappointed, however, in the very restricted application of the Disabled Persons Act. I sincerely hope it will not interfere with the welfare of those already enjoying more generous consideration by our Alberta provincial government. To the possible recipients of these benefits in other provinces I am sure it will be welcome news to know that nearly all of the provincial governments are setting up the necessary enabling legislation to make this assistance available at the earliest possible moment.

I am sure we are all very happy with the proposed amendment to the Blind Persons Act which allows a reduction in age to 18 years and a higher permissible income for all recipients. This is very commendable.

It is very gratifying indeed to know that at last the war veterans are going to receive more generous consideration. I would strongly urge the government to adhere to the requests of the veterans for an increase in pension to $60 per month for single men and $120 per month for married men, and to allow a permissible income of not less than $1,200 a year for single men and $2,000 a year for married men. It is not indicative of the generosity of the Canadian people to pay tribute on November 11 in such glowing terms to our glorious dead and then go home and forget about the welfare of the veterans still alive and trying to exist on a pension whose purchasing power has shrunk to 50 per cent or less of its original value. I appeal to the government to give the veterans a better deal.

I would urge the government to give serious thought at the same time to the plight of our senior citizens, and do everything possible to improve their standard of living. I have in my possession a list of comparative prices of commodities in 1927, when the old age security pension was set up, and 1955, compiled for the senior citizens association of British Columbia. This list contains 30 different items and includes such items as tea, coffee, sugar, flour, vegetables, meat and the rest of the commodities that make up the basic standard of living in the average home. In checking over the list I find that the cost of these commodities has increased by 238 per cent in the period between 1927 and 1955. Surely this alone would urge the government to give their kindest consideration to the plight of our senior citizens.

My constituency of Jasper-Edson is basically an agricultural area. This year the farmers in this area have had one of the poorest crops in their history. To start with, the rivers, I think without exception, all overflowed their banks, in some cases cutting new channels through farms and depositing on summer-fallowed fields huge deposits of gravel. When the water receded it gave the fields the appearance of a gravel pit.

This was bad enough in itself, but many of the farmers had their livestock drowned. I know of one man who lost eleven of his best cows by drowning.

Again, as if to add insult to injury, it rained almost every day all summer, either preventing the sowing of any crops or that which was seeded to mature before a very early frost came along and froze everything. As if that were not enough, we had an unusual amount of hail.

The ironical part of it all is that in many instances these same farmers have been contributing to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act since 1939 and now when misfortune overtook them they found they were out of bounds or did not qualify for one reason or another. It is not very comforting to those who have lost everything to be told that because of this technicality or that they do not qualify, and then look a little farther south or east and see their neighbour enjoying at least the minimum P.F.A.A. benefits. They feel that they have been paying money into P.F.A.A. since 1939 under false pretences. It may be that they do not understand the mechanics of P.F.A.A., whatever they might be. I say that these people deserve a better deal and I urge the government to do everything possible at the earliest possible moment to help these fine people.

We have heard of the merits of NATO and the desirability of international co-operation in world affairs, and we recognize this as desirable; but I would remind the members of this house that charity begins at home, and until we have learned how to manage our own affairs and look after our own people we are not setting a very good example to those we desire to help.

Mr. Georges Villeneuve (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I will have to ask the indulgence of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) because I am going to speak in French.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I want to add my voice to the hon. members who have spoken before me to congratulate the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply for their brilliant speeches.

I wish also to welcome my new colleagues and especially the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Marler), the new Minister of Transport, to whom I think I should extend a special welcome as I anticipate that the constituency I represent will certainly owe a lot to him before long.

I hope that the tax issue will soon come to a final settlement. I am one of those who consider the Canadian constitution, called the British North America Act, as something more than a sort of ark of the covenant of the Old Testament which would have been half patched, although Canada is entirely different from what it was in 1867.

I was rather taken aback by the statement made in this house about a week ago by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). I venture to think that my hon. colleague was sincere and that he did not want to hurt the justifiable pride of the French Canadians of the province of Quebec. Since I believe him to be sincere, I suggest that he return to the province of Quebec during the next recess and that he spend a little more time there during his visits. He might even try to learn a little French in order to better understand our people. I am sure that after a few visits he will come back delighted with the spirit shown by the Quebec people and that from there on he will become the upholder of such a noble and attractive cause as that of national unity, which should be well understood by the different racial groups in our country. I invite the hon. member particularly to come to the constituency of Roberval, one of the preeminently French constituencies in Canada. I will be happy to have him meet our people and he will come back delighted, I think, with his stay in our province.

For my part, I hope that the members from British Columbia will invite us again to take that trip over the Rockies in order that we may better understand the mentality of the people in that part of the country, for when we know and understand each other better national unity will be practically a fact in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I find that in my constituency unemployment does not cause as much concern now as it did last year. However we have seasonal unemployment and it is a problem which requires our attention as well as all our ingenuity if we want to solve it.

The government brought in amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which will bring some relief to those people out of work, especially this winter. May I however be allowed to draw attention to some connection between unemployment and public works. The unemployment insurance benefits paid to those who are entitled to them must not constitute an encouragement to idleness. It is said that the devil finds work for idle hands to do and that is why I think that we should implement some public works project which would bear some relation to the payment of benefits. We might see to it that these people are paid the benefits to which they are entitled and ask the Department of Public Works to make up the rest of their salary. Our people like to work. In all our constituencies there are lots of things to be done and it is a pity that those people who would like to work should be unemployed.

Another point worth mentioning, I think, is that of assistance to small industries. We could certainly improve their position by amending the Industrial Development Bank Act. This legislation is somewhat too rigid for my liking. It should not only help in the expansion of industries operating at present, but it should more particularly assist in the establishment of small new industries with a view to diversifying the Canadian economy. In fact, if, in every community of any size at all, there were one or two small plants I feel sure that that would improve the labour and agricultural situation with consequent benefits to our working classes as a whole.

The 1954 housing act has had excellent results so far. I must point out though that these advantages have not been visible in my own constituency since the banks have not seen fit to give it all the desired attention. I would, however, like to say a word about one class of people who are in an unfortunate position as far as housing is concerned. I am thinking of our large families. I think it may safely be said that no group of people in this country is as badly housed as our large families. Yet, as has often been pointed out, are they not the best human asset a country can have? In what way, then, could we bring special attention to their plight in the matter of housing? I know, of course, that it is much easier to advocate ideas than to solve problems. But I think that it would be a good thing, especially in semi-urban constituencies to come back to the general idea of the joint loan, with one-half being advanced by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the other by a recognized lending institution.

Central Mortgage and Housing would lend at an interest rate equal to that of government bonds, whereas the approved lending institution could lend at prevailing rates. Thus, in due course, the interest rate would probably fall to 4½ or 4¾ per cent. Then, by continuing the mortgage insurance and promoting low cost housing, we could probably house a high proportion of the large families of this country who are particularly in need of shelter. This could be done only if benefits of the act were made available to all, everywhere in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, ten years ago, a Liberal government—and I think it can be said Liberal governments were always those to alleviate suffering in this country through social security measures—instituted family allowances. Since then, this same government, having remained in power, have improved matters by enacting other measures equally appreciated by the people of this country.

I can say that in my particular constituency families are generally large and greatly appreciate family allowances. In view of the high cost of living, they are under the obligation of asking that these allowances be increased, without further affecting the pocket book of the Canadian taxpayer. As large families are an asset to the country, I ask the government to be more generous to the heads of these families in granting them increased allowances and to give them very special consideration.

I wish the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) were in his seat at this time. However, I know that he will take notice of the particular request I want to make on behalf of my constituents.

In fact, for some years, numerous Canadians have been asking, in the name of national unity and to further adorn the crown of national unity through understanding and justice, that cheques issued throughout the country be bilingual. We acknowledge that much has been done up till now, because all cheques issued in the province of Quebec are bilingual. That is, so to speak, only a beginning. I should now like to see the government continue its work and the Minister of Finance give favourable consideration to this request, which I believe to be quite fair and reasonable, namely, bilingual cheques throughout the country.

To my knowledge, bilingual stamps and currency have caused no social or racial disturbances likely to injure national unity. I should rather say that these measures have contributed to the consolidation of national unity. I am convinced that the hon. Minister of Finance will give serious consideration to our request and make a favourable decision. Besides, I have read a letter he wrote to an organization fighting for this cause and it is my belief that we shall soon hear good news about bilingual cheques.

I have a further request to make, regarding the simultaneous translation of the debates of this house. I think it would be an improvement. I can hardly lay claim to perfect bilingualism. On the contrary, I have much to do before I reach that point. However, I am trying real hard to get there and I am glad to realize that many English-speaking members are doing the same. They deserve congratulations and encouragement, for the sake of national unity.

The more bilingual Canadians there are in this country, the easier it will be for the two racial groups to understand each other better and to be in greater sympathy. They will be glad to live together in the same country, enjoying the same freedom and mutual understanding.

I understand that in such countries as Belgium and Switzerland, where they have two or three official languages, there is simultaneous translation of debates, as at United Nations headquarters. To my mind, this system would help give justice to all.

Yesterday, I heard the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon) refer to a statement reported to have been made in Vancouver by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). I am of the opinion that if a system of simultaneous interpretation were established in this house, the hon. member for Vancouver East would not have complained of the fact that we speak French here and that he has to wait 24 hours to get the translation of a speech made in French. With simultaneous translation, we could all convey our ideas to one another, our speeches would be understood immediately. Moreover, we could all give our full measure here since, if I am not mistaken, out of 265 members of the house only about 15 are perfectly bilingual. Simultaneous interpretations would certainly increase, not reduce, our incentive to learn both languages. Such a system would help us also to grasp the meaning of everything which takes place here, since it is especially hard in this corner to catch certain statements and certain speeches, a condition which bars us from maximum efficiency.

We must also consider the visitors who understand only one language. They would be able to listen to the translation of the speech being made. They would get more satisfaction and be more interested in the proceedings, as would too the members themselves.

May I be permitted now, Mr. Speaker, to come to the main topic of my speech, agriculture.

In the constituency of Roberval, which it is my privilege to represent in this house, 60 to 65 per cent of the population devote their time to agriculture. This agricultural activity, I believe, constitutes the very backbone of the riding from the economic point of view.

Numerous individuals and organizations from my constituency have asked me to request that the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the government maintain at 58 cents a pound for two more years the support price for butter.

That request is exceedingly important for all the farmers in my constituency as well as for all the farmers of Quebec. In this regard I would like to quote from a speech made by the dairy industry commissioner for the province of Quebec:

> Too little thought, perhaps, is given to the importance of the dairy industry of the province of Quebec with its capitalization reaching one and a quarter billion dollars, including $225 million for herds, aggregating about a million head of cattle, which produced, last year, five and a half billion pounds of milk, the gross worth of which on the farm was $168,569,000, or $11 million more than in 1952 and $18 million more than three years ago.
> In 1952, 33 per cent of the total agricultural income of the province of Quebec came from the dairy industry. In 1953, that proportion had reached nearly 40 per cent. It should be noted that Quebec is the province most dependent on its dairy industry for its general agricultural prosperity. Indeed, except for Nova Scotia and British Columbia, the percentage of farm income derived from the production of milk in all other provinces including Ontario, is under 20 per cent.
> One cannot stress too strongly the fact that half a million people derive their living directly from the dairy industry; to that number must be added those who depend on it indirectly, such as people employed in the processing, transportation and distribution of dairy products, the manufacture of machinery and accessories and those who provide essential services to the dairy industry. It all adds up to the fact that one-third of the people of Quebec depend on the prosperity of the dairy industry. It is therefore the source of an enormous purchasing power for one and a quarter million consumers of the province and it has a major influence on our economy as a whole.
> The market value of dairy products, once they have been processed and have reached the market, jumped from $193 million in 1951 to $207 million in 1952 and $222 million last year, an increase of more than $25 million in three years. It should be pointed out that as far as the gross value of production is concerned, the dairy industry ranks second in the province of Quebec, after the pulp and paper industry. It contributes nearly 40 per cent of the total dairy production of Canada. It produces:

34% of the butter manufactured in Canada,
21% of the cheddar cheese made in Canada,
27% of the other kinds of cheese,
33% of the concentrated products made in Canada,
20% of the ice cream made in Canada,
32% of the whole milk sold in Canada.

I have here other statistics which are no less staggering on the importance of the problem for Quebec farmers. In 1953, 302,606,000 pounds of creamery butter were produced in Canada, of which 112,179,000 pounds came from Quebec.

Now, as for the effect of the support price of butter on the Quebec farmer's income, I must say that the farmer received 75 per cent of the retail price of butter. The farmer very seldom gets such a large share of the retail price of a consumer product. That is why the support price on butter has been more or less a lifesaver for the farmers. And it is to enable our farmers to maintain a decent standard of living and improve their position, especially as far as Quebec farmers are concerned, that I am asking the right hon. Minister of Agriculture and the government to maintain the support price on butter at 58 cents a pound for two more years.

Besides, from the Canadian standpoint, it is said that one out of six Canadians, or 17 per cent of our people, depends directly or indirectly on the dairy industry for his living. I believe that figure clearly shows the importance of the dairy industry for us.

Mr. Speaker, as I have only one more subject to discuss, may I ask this house, if it is possible, to allow me an extra five minutes after the ten o'clock bell.

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreeable to hon. members that the hon. member who has the floor be allowed to proceed?

Some hon. Members: How long?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I inform hon. members that the hon. member for Roberval has requested not more than five minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Villeneuve: Mr. Speaker, we are told, today, that more and more farmers are leaving the land to settle in cities. If we have to deplore an ever-increasing unemployment, seasonal unemployment, in particular, it is because our farmers are going to the cities where they add to the number of labourers who, unfortunately, have to rely on temporary jobs for their living.

It is our duty to help keep the farmers on the land, and in so doing, we help maintain the stability of the Canadian economy, because agriculture has always been and will always be the soundest basis of society, and that is needed in this country probably more than elsewhere.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word or two on the subject of the building of the Chibougamau-St. Felicien railway. Last summer, I made numerous representations together with my colleague, the hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Gauthier), in order to bring the matter to a head. Guarantees were put up by the lumber companies, and we have not yet given up hope that the Canadian National will accept these guarantees. I plan to deal with that subject again, when this house discusses the motion introduced by the hon. member for Lake St. John. However, I think I always did my best to bring about the implementation of that project which, in my opinion, is of capital importance for the future of the economy, not only of my constituency, but also of my whole district. It has always seemed strange to me to note that those who never work for the cause are always the first to take the credit. They give us the impression they are trying to keep alive the tradition of the fly on the wheel.

Incidentally, I would like to ask the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), whose absence is so often noticed in this house, to kindly read again what was said last year in this house and at the railway committee, in order to find out what the hon. member for Lake St. John and myself have done, within our party and outside, to have that project carried out one way or another.

I would like to tell him again, in conclusion, that I am confident the Chibougamau-St. Felicien railway will soon be built; I will continue to rely on the spirit of understanding of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler), of all the members of the cabinet, and of the Canadian National authorities for the construction in the near future of the St. Felicien-Chibougamau section of the Chibougamau railway. No doubt it will be built in my constituency, and I undertake to promote this project to which we could never give too much importance.

Mr. Speaker, I shouldn't like to overtax your patience, and I thank you for the forbearance you have shown me.

On motion of Mr. Harkness the debate was adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DEPARTURE OF PRIME MINISTER FOR COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): I am just reminded, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is leaving tomorrow to attend the British commonwealth conference, and will not be back in the house. I should like to say to him through you, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the members of this party, that we wish him a safe trip overseas.

Good Wishes to Prime Minister

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On this occasion the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe), Mr. Speaker, might well have spoken for all members on this side of the house. We, too, wish the Prime Minister well, and a safe journey both ways.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am very happy in the privilege of having these good wishes from all my fellow members in this house.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

50433—40

Friday, January 28, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1955-56

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1956, was presented by Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED QUESTION OF VALIDITY OF FEDERAL LABOUR CODE

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) asked a question to which I will now reply. I assume the question refers to the reference made by the governor general in council to the Supreme Court of Canada under the provisions of the Supreme Court Act of certain questions of law relating to the application and validity of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. This reference has been set down by the supreme court for hearing during the current week and I understand the hearing is being proceeded with at this time.

Hon. members are probably aware that disputes arising in connection with the employment of longshoremen and stevedores in the loading and unloading of ships have been handled by my department under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act since its inception, and prior to that for many years under the earlier Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

However, in 1954, upon an application made by district No. 50 of the united mine workers to the Ontario labour relations board under the provision of the Ontario labour relations act, that board accepted jurisdiction and certified the applicant union as bargaining agent for employees of the Eastern Canada Stevedoring Company employed in the loading and unloading of ships at the docks in Toronto harbour.

The validity of this order of the Ontario board was challenged by a rival union which had theretofore exercised bargaining rights for these employees, namely the brotherhood of railway and steamship clerks, freight handlers, express and station employees.

The attorney general of Ontario intervened in these proceedings and gave notice to the Attorney General of Canada that in the proceedings the constitutional validity of the federal statute, the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, would be brought into question by the province on the ground that the act is ultra vires to the parliament of Canada because it is legislation in relation to property and civil rights in the province.

Since the validity of the federal legislation was thus raised in the proceedings, it was considered advisable by the government to have the application of the federal legislation in respect to the employees settled with the least possible delay by reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, and at the same time to obtain the opinion of the supreme court on the question raised by the attorney general of Ontario, namely the jurisdiction of parliament to enact the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. The following questions of law have therefore been submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada for hearing and consideration, namely:

(1) Does the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, chapter 152, apply in respect of the employees in Toronto of the Eastern Canada Stevedoring Company Limited employed in connection with the loading and unloading of ships?

(2) Is the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act ultra vires to the parliament of Canada, either in whole or in part and, if so, in what particular or particulars and to what extent?

Decision on the matter of amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act will be deferred pending receipt of the report of the supreme court on this reference.

With regard to the second part of my hon. friend's question, hon. members will also be aware that the railway unions representing non-operating employees of the railways have indicated that it is their intention to undertake an early study of the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act relating to conciliation and to thereafter make appropriate representations to the government. Naturally, we would want to have the benefit of such representations and to have the opportunity of studying them when they are forthcoming. Consequently, for this reason also, we are postponing any further amendment to the act for the time being.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question supplementary to the question I asked yesterday by now inquiring of the minister what other progress has been made within the department with regard to the revision which I understand was under way two years ago at the time when certain amendments were referred by this house to the industrial relations committee. At that time the minister said that a study and revision of the act was under way.

Mr. Gregg: Very good progress has been made with those suggested amendments, but in view of the facts I have just submitted I feel we should withhold the recommendation of those amendments until these other matters have been dealt with.

Mrs. Fairclough: I wonder if the minister is in a position to say how long that is going to take?

Mr. Gregg: No, I cannot say.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. When the non-operating railway unions are ready to make the recommendations to which the minister refers, would he consider having the industrial relations committee convened so that the union representatives might make their representations to the members of that committee as a whole?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, I will take that question under consideration when the time comes.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ALLEGED DISAPPEARANCE OF MONEY AT BRITANNIA BEACH, B.C.

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) may I say it is now possible to make public further details in this regard.

The department is well aware of the disappearance of a money packet containing $44,500 from the Britannia Beach, British Columbia, post office on December 17, 1954, which coincided with the disappearance of a clerk of the Britannia Mining and Smelting Company, who acted as assistant in the post office.

The money package was dispatched by the Royal Bank of Canada, Vancouver, to the branch of the same bank at Britannia Beach. We are informed that the bank had fully insured the parcel. The post office has not suffered any financial loss.

The post office is in a company town and the general manager of stores and purchasing agent for the company has been postmaster since his appointment in 1923 by the civil service commission. The company pays some of its employees to act as assistants in the post office.

The suspect who worked in the post office under the name of John Clealand Wallace Black has been identified as being John Keith MacDonald.

The extensive investigation which has been conducted by the Post Office Department and the R.C.M.P. since the day the loss of the package was discovered is still proceeding in co-operation with the United States postal authorities and the F.B.I.

[Later:]

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, arising from the statement made a while ago by the Postmaster General in answer to a question of mine, I should like to ask him whether the theft at Britannia Beach, British Columbia, post office may have been committed by a person who was not a post office employee but was handling Her Majesty's mails with the approval of the Post Office Department?

Mr. Cote: Well, Mr. Speaker, I could not give all the details as to how it happened because, after all, I was not on the scene of the crime when it was committed. But again, if—

Mr. Speaker: The minister does not have to answer a hypothetical question.

Mr. Fleming: It is not hypothetical.

Mr. Cote: That is why I am not in a position to answer it. I have to rely on the information given me, and if further information can be obtained with respect to the question asked by my hon. friend I will be glad to report all the details to him, which may be from the file, of course.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Is it permissible to remove the hypothesis from the question and present it to the minister again in order to get an answer?

Mr. Speaker: I suppose that the hon. member is not addressing his question to me. If he is, may I say that I settle points of order as they arise and I am not to be questioned from the floor on matters of procedure. But it is a very well known rule that hypothetical questions are not in order because there is no limit to the number of questions which could be asked in that way. I am sure the hon. member has enough resources of his own to frame his question so that it will bring about the results that he would like to get.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether the missing person referred to in his report earlier today was a person who was not a post office employee but was handling Her Majesty's mails with the approval of the Postmaster General?

Mr. Cote: I think I have already answered the question at least partly. The hon. member has only to look at the answer I made today in Hansard, but if my hon. friend wants to see the file—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cote: He may on one condition, that he comes to my office without any recording machine.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES LIMITED—REPORTED PROFIT TO COMMON SHAREHOLDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to a report that was published in the Vancouver Sun of Wednesday this week to the effect that, whether under private or government-guaranteed financing, the common shareholders of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited stand to make from 20 to 40 per cent profit annually. If so, is the minister in a position to advise the house of government policy on this matter and of any provisions that will be made for the protection of the Canadian public?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no to all phases of the question.

[Later:]

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister considering any policies for the protection of the Canadian people as a result of the situation with regard to the pipe line which I have just mentioned? Is the answer to that question also no?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the answer is that the minister spends nights and days considering the welfare of the people of Canada.

Mr. Winch: I should like to have a direct answer to this specific question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FORMOSA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the day of his departure. I should like to ask him two questions in connection with the Formosa situation today. Is he prepared to say anything today with regard to this matter? In particular, is he prepared to say whether the United States has given any indication that, as far as Chiang is concerned, he will not be permitted to conduct operations against the China coast?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): To answer the first part of the question, may I say that I do not think I can at this time usefully add to what I said in the house the other day. In answer to the second part of the question, I do not know of any undertaking or any understanding that the United States government has reached with regard to action which necessarily prevents Formosa from being used as a base of operations against the Chinese mainland. I said the other day that I thought that would be an important part of what I at that time called the neutralization of Formosa which I indicated in my view should work both ways, namely that Formosa under neutralization should be protected from invasion from the mainland and should be prevented from being used as a base for invasion against the mainland.

BUTTER

AVAILABILITY OF SUPPLIES TO CANADIAN INSTITUTIONS AT REDUCED PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Further to my statement in the house yesterday in reply to a question by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe), I should like at this time to outline in somewhat greater detail the proposed plan for the sale of butter at a reduced price to hospitals, orphanages, and such institutions.

In the first place, the butter is being offered to all Canadian institutions on the list published by the Department of National Health and Welfare for the purposes of the Excise Act and the Excise Tax Act. This list of approved institutions is available to all hon. members, and runs to more than 1,500 names, I understand.

To all of these, letters are today going forward from the agricultural prices support board, accompanied by a questionnaire and application form for return by institutions wishing to avail themselves of the offer of butter at the reduced price.

As stated in the letter, the actual method of supplying the butter has not as yet been finalized, but the reduction will be about 21 cents per pound below the price which the institution is now paying to its supplier for the same grade of butter.

It is expected that the institutions concerned will secure their butter through their trade channels, the suppliers then being reimbursed by the board for differences in prices involved.

As has already been stated, the general objective in offering butter at the reduced price is to increase the total quantity of butter used in the approved institutions throughout Canada. This could be brought about by approximately the same expenditure for the purchase of butter.

Interested institutions are being asked for their comments on this objective and on the most suitable method of servicing their own requirements, although the board reserves the right to standardize the method to the greatest possible extent.

Institutions are being advised as well, I may add, that the board may find it necessary to limit the time for which this offer can be held open. It is not, of course, intended to be a permanent operation.

Mr. Rowe: Would the minister tell us how much of that butter is being sold in that way, or how much of the surplus?

Mr. Gardiner: All that we can get a market for. The total amount that will be disposed of will not be 20 million pounds which is the total we wish to dispose of.

Mr. Rowe: You have no idea how much?

Mr. Gardiner: No. I really cannot make a guess at it.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should like to ask of the minister a supplementary question that has a bearing on the sale of butter. With regard to the consumption of margarine in Canada, has any effort ever been made to find out how much of it is because of preference by the consumer and how much of it is because it is cheaper than butter?

Mr. Gardiner: Efforts, of course, have been made to find out what the consumption of oleomargarine is, and I think that fact is fairly well known; but it is almost impossible to determine what portion of it is for spread and therefore in competition with butter and what portion of it is for cooking purposes and largely in competition with lard. It is extremely difficult to estimate what that division is.

[Later:]

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture regarding the butter situation. If the butter is to be sold to institutions at about 20 cents less than the actual price, according to the statement made by the minister a while ago, what will be the margin between the price paid by the institutions and the price paid by wholesalers?

Mr. Gardiner: The present wholesale price of butter is 61 cents. Take 21 from that and it is 40 cents.

Mr. Dufresne: This statement is not an answer to my question and I knew that 21 from 61 makes 40.

An hon. Member: Go to school, professor.

Mr. Dufresne: The schools I attended were as good as those attended by the minister.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members to please give me a chance to hear what is the question that is being asked. Order.

Mr. Dufresne: I knew about the difference, but I should like to ask this question. I should like to ask the minister what would be the difference between the price paid by the institutions and the one paid by wholesalers who obtain such butter from the government?

Mr. Gardiner: The statement which I read indicates that the hospitals will get the butter for 21 cents less than they were paying for it under conditions now existing.

Mr. Dufresne: That does not answer my question.

Mr. Gardiner: The price might be different at different places in Canada. The floor price is 58 cents at Toronto and Montreal but it is different at Regina, at the coast and down in the maritime provinces. No one answer would do for that.

Mr. Dufresne: That does not give any answer to my question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member should be satisfied with the answer given.

Mr. Dufresne: Not quite, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Let us say that perhaps it is difficult to satisfy the hon. member in this instance.

HEALTH INSURANCE

ONTARIO BLUE CROSS—ENROLMENT OF TWO MILLIONTH SUBSCRIBER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to a news item in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that the Ontario Blue Cross is about to enrol its two millionth subscriber? Is the minister not gratified to learn that as many as two million Canadian citizens are able and willing to protect themselves against the hazards of illness without requiring any government handout?

An hon. Member: What about your amendment?

Mr. Coldwell: What about the amendment?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I was just about to tell my hon. friend what has already been uttered from the bleachers. My hon. friend perhaps has not taken fully into account the very important amendment which stands in the name of the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe). I will also tell him of course that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is naturally gratified with any action that is taken to improve the health standards and services of the people of this country. That is only consistent with what the Department of National Health and Welfare always does.

Mr. Knowles: What steps is the minister taking this year to bring in national health insurance so as to cover all the citizens of Canada?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend ought to know the answer to that question.

Mr. Knowles: Then, what is it?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RECENT OCCURRENCE ON H.M.C.S. "MAGNIFICENT"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) asked me if I could give any further information beyond what had appeared in the press with respect to a number of cases of methyl alcohol poisoning, which had occurred on H.M.C.S. Magnificent. I replied that as a board of inquiry was sitting to establish the facts, I felt that I should not make any further statement until it had completed its task.

The board of inquiry has now completed its investigation and is forwarding its findings to naval headquarters. While the report is, of course, a confidential report for the guidance of the naval authorities in taking whatever action may be warranted, I can give the house briefly the facts as to what took place.

Briefly the facts are that three cans of duplicating fluid, used in the ship's communication duplicating machines, were removed from a locked storeroom by a member of the ship's company, who had access to the key in the course of his normal duties. One can was removed during the early afternoon of Friday, January 21, and two further cans in the early evening of the same day. These cans were kept hidden and were passed around to several groups of seamen who surreptitiously drank the liquid mixed with soft drinks or grapefruit juice from cups and soft drink bottles. The cans, incidentally, were clearly and distinctly marked "poison" and bore other words of caution. When emptied they were thrown overboard during the night. There was no large party at any time during the day or night, but as I have mentioned, small groups of two to five men drank the mixture in widely separated places throughout the ship. There was no outward evidence of drunkenness on board during the time in question. There was no indication, therefore, to the officers making rounds that anything was amiss. The first evidence that anything was wrong was the sudden severe illness of a number of men. It is evident, I might add, that a great number of the men did not know what they had been drinking.

Great credit should be given to the ship's duty medical officer and to the staff of the Royal Canadian naval hospital at Halifax, as well as to civilian consultants, for the fact that due to their combined and prompt action the nature of the poisoning was quickly diagnosed and suitable treatment applied. Had this not been so, the consequences to the men involved would have been much more severe and in several cases would probably have proven fatal.

Following study of the report of the board of inquiry at naval headquarters, disciplinary action will be taken where appropriate, as well as such other steps as may appear desirable to prevent a recurrence of this regrettable incident.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, January 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): In view of the general desire to save time and expedite the work of the session, Mr. Speaker, I shall forgo the usual compliments and make my remarks as short as possible. I am glad to see that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is so sharp in his arithmetic today. He is much sharper than he was when he was speaking in this debate some two weeks ago. At that time his figures did not work out nearly as neatly as they did in his reply today.

I believe the earlier speech delivered by the minister calls for some comment. He took up nearly two full pages of Hansard, and I am told that means approximately 2,000 words, explaining the continuation in office of Dr. Thomson, head of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, during the time he was running for the position of leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan. Most of this so-called explanation was taken up with a long discussion of Dr. Thomson's suitability for this post. This is a question which, to my knowledge, no one has ever raised. In other words, the minister was raising a straw man and knocking him down. Throughout this lengthy explanation there was no mention of the real point at issue, the real reason for raising this matter here. The minister passed it over as though it did not exist.

The main point is very simple, Mr. Speaker. It concerns the propriety of a civil servant running for political office before he has ceased to be a civil servant, and following his defeat for that office continuing in his job as though nothing had happened. This is directly contrary to the whole concept of our civil service. It is contrary to the idea of the civil service being outside of politics, and being a body which serves the state rather than the political party which happens to be in power at any particular time. A few instances of this kind would soon destroy the morale of the civil service. The divorce of this body from politics would be at an end and, in effect, we would see the restoration of the old patronage system. The Minister of Agriculture is perhaps one of the few people in this country who would have a thing of this sort carried on, and then try to make out there was nothing out of the ordinary taking place; that he could not understand why people were raising the question.

The minister, having attempted to confuse this issue by interjecting irrelevant side issues, went on, and by the misuse of statistics tried to persuade the country that agriculture was in a very flourishing condition rather than in the somewhat depressed state the actual statistics reveal, and as I am sure the personal experience and knowledge of most members here would confirm. In regard to the reduction in farm income, which the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and others have brought to the attention of the government at this session, the minister said, and I quote from page 199 of Hansard for January 14, 1955:

> What is the reduction in income in these three provinces—

Meaning the prairie provinces.

> —because of wheat reduction in 1954 compared with the top year in that three-year period? . . . All told it is $440,900,000. That is the loss that has taken place in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba because of the fact that they had poor crops last year and low returns because of rust and low quality wheat.

I should like to emphasize that last phrase:

> . . . because of the fact that they had poor crops last year and low returns because of rust and low quality wheat.

In other words, the minister was attempting to blame the weather for the reduction which took place in farm income in 1954. This is almost completely at variance with the facts. The reduction in farm income because of the poor crop of 1954 will show up chiefly in 1955. It did not show up last year to any extent. This is the year in which we are going to suffer from these poor crops last year.

Mr. Gardiner: You have not followed very well the system of marketing in western Canada.

Mr. Harkness: It is quite clear. Up to date the deliveries of the 1954 crop have been quite small. They amount to 300 bushels per farm, plus a two-bushel quota and in some cases a little more barley where farmers had barley. That is all the farmers have been able to deliver so far. Anyone who had any crop worth threshing at all, no matter how poor the crop was, has not been able to deliver it all as yet. All he has been able to deliver is that small quantity. The situation is that the hundreds of millions of dollars lost as a result of bad weather in 1954 is going to be realized in 1955 rather than during the past year. Therefore, it had little effect on last year's cash farm income. The situation is exactly the reverse of that which the minister outlined in his speech, and upon which he built all his subsequent remarks.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the real reasons for the reduction in farm income are, first, the inability of the wheat board to sell a large proportion of the crop of the preceding year, that is of 1953. That is the first and main reason for the reduction. We were not able to sell the major portion of the crop taken off in 1953, and part of the crop taken off in 1952.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask a question?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: Is not the same fact true with regard to 1953 as compared with 1952?

Mr. Harkness: To some extent, yes. The cash income of the farmer in 1953 was smaller than in 1952 because he had not been able to sell as much wheat.

Mr. Gardiner: Then a further question: Is not the difference which has been stated throughout the whole debate, the difference in income as between 1954 and 1953? If you back that up another year, you get much the same thing?

Mr. Harkness: I do not know what the minister is trying to prove now. Certainly he is not trying to prove what he was trying to prove in his speech, that the weather was to blame for the reduction in cash farm income, and if it had not been for that the farmer would have been better off than ever before. Now, he is trying to bring in some irrelevant side issue.

Mr. Gardiner: The weather is responsible for the increase in butter, too. The weather does regulate farm income in this country.

Mr. Harkness: The Minister of Agriculture of course always tries to find something to blame in these situations.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not blaming anything; I am just stating facts.

Mr. Harkness: He is trying to blame the weather for the butter situation, the cheese situation and so on. I shall have something to say about that later. The main point is that the deficiencies or defects shown in the government's agricultural policy have been largely to blame. The minister tries to find some other scapegoat, and apparently the weather is the one he can think of most readily.

As I have said, the real reason for the reduction in farm income in 1954 is our inability to sell a large proportion of the crop in 1953. Another reason was the lower price which was realized for the portion of the crop that was sold, plus higher storage charges because the grain had to be kept in storage for a much longer period. Those are the two chief reasons for the lower farm income in 1954. The weather had very little to do with it.

Having quite incorrectly attempted to blame the weather for the reduced cash returns to the farmer, the minister then went on to say, and I quote again from page 199 of Hansard for January 14, 1955:

> The total cash income in all the provinces of Canada in 1954 was $2,408 million and when you add to that the $444 million which the three wheat provinces lost last year because their crop was down and of a poor grade, you get a net return of $2,849 million. That is what the income would have been if they had had a good wheat delivery year and that is $23 million more than the farmers of this country ever had in any one year.

Before I go on to comment on that I must say that I do not know where the minister found this extra $4 million, because just a few sentences before he said it was $440 million and here he says it is $444 million. He suddenly found about $4 million more. Of course it is nothing for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to lose or find $4 million; he can lose or find hundreds of millions in his speeches depending on what he wants to say.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not use the figure $444 million, but it would be very easy for the typist to make that mistake.

Mr. Harkness: The minister should have corrected it. I would be inclined to think that Hansard is correct because this is so typical of the sort of carelessness the minister exhibits so far as the use of figures is concerned.

This statement of the minister's which I have just read is a blatant attempt on his part to make this house and the country believe that the sales and prices of farm products are better than they ever were before. In other words, he is saying that the government has done its part and if only the weather had co-operated the farm population would never have been so well off. That is just another example of the well known "if" statement. In other words, if your aunt was not a woman she would be your uncle, and other statements along that line.

To put out nonsense of that kind, to say that if we had not had this crop failure, which I have demonstrated already had nothing to do with it, we would have had $440 million more of income and therefore the farmers would have been better off is doing no service to anyone and it certainly is doing no service to this house as it merely confuses the issue. I find it difficult to understand why the Minister of Agriculture persists in making statements of that nature.

The reduction in farm income to which the minister devoted his attention was cash income, that is gross receipts. He did not touch on net income which is a much more important figure as far as the farmer is concerned. Just to take an example in another field. If you are running a store it is far better to have gross receipts of $100,000 and a profit of $10,000 than it is to have gross receipts or sales of $1,000,000 and a profit of only $5,000. It is exactly the same situation as far as the farmer is concerned.

It is not the gross receipts that he is primarily interested in. He is interested in them naturally, in the prices he gets and so forth, but the reason he is interested is that that is going to determine his net income to some extent. The thing he is really interested in, just the same as any other businessman, is his net income, the amount left over after all expenses, to be used to meet the needs of himself and his family for food, clothing and other necessities of life, to buy the luxuries which we all desire and to which it is considered we have some entitlement, to replace broken down or worn out farm machinery, to improve his farm and so on. The income he is interested in is his net income.

In dealing with this matter of farm income the minister said nothing about the farmers' net income. The reason he said nothing about it is that the figures are very grim indeed.

Mr. Gardiner: I gave the reason in my speech why I did not use the net figures. You should read it.

Mr. Harkness: That speech was just the same in that regard as most of the others: it was a sidestepping speech. As a matter of fact the minister did the same thing last year and the year before. He spoke of the cash income of the farmer but he carefully avoided going into the net income of the farmer.

I have the figures with reference to net income of our farmers. In 1951 it was $2,154,527,000; in 1952 it was $1,900,779,000, down $254 million. In 1953 it was $1,656-564,000, down some $500 million from 1951. The figures are not out for this year but the general estimates of the farmers' net income that I have heard this year place it at no more than $1,400 million, and more likely it will be $1,200 million.

You can make a computation which will enable you to arrive at that pretty well from the figures of the past three years. Last year the difference between farm net income and cash income was $1,084,688,000. The spread has been getting worse every year as the difference in 1951 was only $661,934,000. The spread this year is going to be more than $1,000 million, and most likely it will be about $1,200 million, leaving the farmer with a net income of about $1,200 million.

What that means is that the income which the farmer will have left over after expenses in 1954 will be just a little more than half of what he had for the same purposes in 1951. In other words his position is nearly 50 per cent worse in 1954 than it was in 1951.

However, the minister still tries to paint a rosy picture and he tells us that if it had not been for weather conditions our farmers would have had the biggest income this past year that they have ever had. With this situation confronting us it is no wonder that general business conditions last year were not as good as the year before. I would think that it is most doubtful that the rosy predictions of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that things are going to be better than ever this year are likely to be realized with this very considerable reduction in farm net income with the consequent reduction in the amount of money which goes into the general stream of spending to provide employment and so forth.

After his speech in the house two weeks ago the minister went out west in the course of a few days, and demonstrated that he had by no means exhausted his ability to try to make black appear white, or at least a very pale grey. Even he admits that we have an oversupply of butter and cheese, but our surplus position was made worse by the importation of large quantities of New Zealand cheese. The only logical reason which might have been advanced for this importation was that it would help the forgotten man, the consumer, by giving him cheese at a lower price. However, the minister assured the dairy farmers that that would not happen. He said that the processing firm would be glad to make the difrence of five cents a pound between the price they would probably get that cheese at and the ordinary price at which cheese is selling. I can believe that the importing firm would be glad of that much extra profit.

But if this will be the result of this importation, what a ridiculous situation we have, Mr. Speaker. The price of butter is being supported by the taxpayers' money, and surpluses are being built up as a result of that to quite a large extent. Then this New Zealand cheese is imported to increase the surplus, because it can have no other effect than to increase the surplus of dairy products in this country. The minister goes on to say that the importing firm will make an extra one-eighth to one-quarter million dollars, and that money is essentially to be paid by you and me, Mr. Speaker, and our fellow Canadians as taxpayers. The whole thing just does not make sense. If we are going to support the dairy industry by floor prices and sell the surplus, when we have a surplus as a result of that policy, at reduced prices to hospitals here, or to people in other countries, surely we should not let large amounts of dairy products from abroad come into the country at the same time. As a matter of fact, when we do that we in effect subsidize our competitors and the importing firm, so that we are taxing ourselves in order to subsidize our competitors in other countries and the importing firms which import these products.

As I say, the government just has no policy in regard to the dairy industry which makes sense. What it is doing is following the course of drift and bungle.

Mr. Fulton: Mostly bungle.

Mr. Harkness: The farm income situation I have outlined is one of the main reasons for the large amount of unemployment we have had this winter. There are of course other reasons also. I am not one of those who make speeches, the purport of which is that the government can wave a magic wand and cure unemployment. I do not believe that the socialist wand would be effective in this regard, nor do I believe that the financial wand of the Social Crediters would be effective either. However, the government has done nothing in regard to the matter. They have just sat on their hands. Following the warning of last winter, which surely was stern enough as far as unemployment was concerned, the government has made no changes in its fiscal or financial policies which might have improved the unemployment picture, nor has it done any of the smaller specific things which might have helped, so far as I am aware.

As one small example of this failure, I was surprised to learn a short time ago that the government buys a considerable amount of its stationery requirements from the United States, all things which I believe are made in Canada, or if there are a few items which are not made in Canada they could certainly be purchased in Great Britain and thus help on the one hand to reduce our adverse balance of trade with the United States, and on the other hand to decrease Britain's adverse balance with us. I hold in my hand two forms used by the income tax branch of the Department of National Revenue. They are complicated looking things. One of them is called an assessors' statistical report, and so forth, and the other has to do with instructions and the amount of adjustment. Hon. members can see that they are quite complicated looking forms, but they are a straight printing job; that is all they are. In each case, on the form in very small letters, so small that I can hardly read them, appears: "Printed in U.S.A." Why should the Department of National Revenue be making use of printed material of this sort which they import from the United States rather than having it printed in this country? As a matter of fact, that is not the end of this thing. In addition to these particular forms, I find that the government uses a large number of stationery items which are made in the United States. Some examples are staplers, staple pullers, Scripto pencil erasers, rubber finger pads, Scripto pencil leads, sensing leads, pencil sharpeners, and so on. As a matter of fact, if you go up to your office and look at your equipment which they supply us right in this building, if you look at the desk pen sets you will find stamped on the bottom—at least it is true of mine—"Made in U.S.A." The staplers are made in the U.S.A. too.

It seems to me this is something for which there is no excuse. It is carelessness on the part of the government. It is a lack of effort on their part to find small ways in which they can help to cure unemployment in this country. The total volume of Canadian employment which is lost this way must be quite large. This is only one small example of it. I know there must be a large number of items in which the same sort of thing is going on. If the government would devote some of its attention to plugging some of the small loopholes through which employment is lost in this country it might add up to quite considerable totals. Those are things which are entirely in their own hands.

To turn to another matter, I should like to reiterate the request made last year by the late Mr. Rodney Adamson that the committee on mines, forests and waters be given some work to do. This committee has been set up every year for a very long period, and within the memory of all hon. members here, with perhaps the exception of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), it has never done anything. It is just wasted motion setting up the committee and appointing members to it. It never meets in spite of the fact that the conservation and development of our natural resources are perhaps the most important things one can think of for the future of this country. I would suggest that this year the committee be given the task of investigating some important matter in the line of conservation or development. I would mention just two examples which they might investigate and report upon. One would be forest conservation and reforestation and the other would be the control and development of rivers.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, last fall I spent several weeks visiting our Canadian forces in Europe. I took occasion at that time to visit NATO headquarters in Paris as well as the supreme headquarters of allied powers in Europe or SHAPE as the military headquarters of NATO is commonly known. Again, in December last I attended the annual NATO council meeting in Paris. As a result of these experiences, which were in each case new experiences for me, I should like to give the house very briefly a few of my impressions of NATO and of Canada's relations to NATO.

I should think that NATO represents the greatest and most far-reaching attempt ever made in peacetime in the world to weld the military and economic forces of 14 sovereign nations into one cohesive, co-ordinated defence force for the defence of all. I think we may sometimes overlook the magnitude of the problems which NATO has undertaken. It is, from the very nature of the problem, a long-term project, and it is beset with very many difficulties: the language difficulty, for instance, the impact of national prejudice and misunderstanding, the differences in military outlook of the component nations, the variability of the strategical and tactical conception of the military forces and the lack of standardization of military equipment.

These are only a few of the practical factors which combine to slow up and to complicate the achievement of NATO's goal. And yet I believe that great results in fact have already been attained by NATO. Slowly but steadily we are evolving a strong, united and well integrated defence force in Europe.

I was tremendously impressed with the manoeuvre "Battle Royal" which I attended last fall in north Germany. There were 140,000 troops, British and Dutch, on the one side, and French, Belgian and Canadian on the other side, each side working together as a team and doing so very smoothly and successfully. It constituted, to me at least, a very vivid commentary on the progress being made in the welding together of NATO forces.

On the planning and organizational side, too, steady progress is in fact being made. Greater mutual understanding is being engendered and formidable obstacles, one after the other, are being steadily overcome.

I believe it is very fortunate for us all that NATO had a few years in which to set and become seasoned before we were faced by the full impact of the power of atomic and thermonuclear weapons. If this had not been so the organization would hardly have been complete enough to make it possible for the supreme allied commander to make the very careful and far-reaching analysis of the thermonuclear threat which, through the military committee, he gave to the NATO council last December when it met in Paris, together with the outline of necessary plans to enable the NATO military forces to meet that threat.

These plans, of course, do not derogate in any way from the responsibilities of the governments of the countries comprising NATO in regard to the decision which is theirs alone as to how and when military action is to be authorized. This forward-looking report was only the first of such reports to be made in sequence as the military studies continue.

My general impression of the defence side of the NATO council meeting was that of steady progress in all fields of military endeavour. There is, of course, much to be accomplished. There are many unsolved problems still remaining, but the fact that these difficult and intricate defence questions are being tackled and solved in a clear, vigorous and orderly fashion is to me very encouraging indeed.

The analysis of the planning which went to make up the report to which I have referred is, of course, secret, and therefore its contents cannot be disclosed. However, as there has been considerable speculation in the press about the matter I would like to assure the house that we do not contemplate any immediate drastic reorganization of our Canadian forces as a result of these studies. Nor do we contemplate any increase in our commitment to NATO forces.

There is no doubt that there will be certain shifts of emphasis and some new developments, but nothing of a revolutionary character. Obviously, the introduction of new weapons and new techniques has greatly increased the pace and the destructive power of future warfare, and priority, therefore, is being given to the raising, training, and equipment of forces described as "forces in being," that is, forces which must be immediately ready to take their place in the battle line.

Increased emphasis, too, is being placed on the air arm, but as hon. members are well aware this increased emphasis on air power is and has been for some years past a feature of our own Canadian defence program.

In this regard the military committee of NATO has been continually stressing for some time past the need for increased air defence in Europe, particularly in the field of all-weather fighters. We have been pressed for some time past to assist in this regard by reason of the fact that we in Canada are producing, in the CF-100, what is generally regarded as one of the very best all-weather fighters in NATO.

The government, after careful consideration, has decided that as soon as our regular air defence squadrons in Canada are completely equipped with CF-100's, which will be during the present year, we will be able—that is next year—to take steps toward meeting the pressing need of NATO for all-weather fighters.

We do not propose to provide any over-all increase in the number of squadrons in our air force in Europe, which will remain at 12 squadrons as at present, but we are prepared to replace the aircraft in four of our day fighter squadrons in the air division in Europe with CF-100 all-weather fighters. This step will very materially strengthen the all-weather defence capabilities of the NATO forces and thus help to meet one of NATO's most urgent needs.

It will also, by having the same types of aircraft in operational squadrons at home and abroad, make for maximum efficiency and economy, and will enable the R.C.A.F. to gain the broadest possible experience in all-weather operations.

As a component nation of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization Canada has carried out her commitments in detail and on time. That should be a source of justifiable pride to all of us.

I cannot refrain from a brief word of comment on the quality of the forces we have supplied to NATO. Last fall, as I said, I spent three weeks in Europe, during which time I visited every unit of our first infantry brigade and each of the 12 squadrons which make up our air division. They are both a credit to Canada.

There is, I feel sure, no finer, more modernly equipped, better trained fighting air force in Europe today than the Canadian air division, equipped with Canadian-built Sabre jet planes powered by Canadian-built Orenda engines. When the squadrons have all been equipped with Sabre mark VI, they will be still more effective.

The men of the first infantry brigade are well trained, healthy, and of high morale. Their relationship with the German civilian population is exemplary. They won high praise from the umpires of "Battle Royal" for their initiative, for effectiveness and for endurance.

Notwithstanding the increased emphasis being placed on air development, there is, I believe, no question but that the army will continue to play an important part in our defence picture.

The emphasis may have changed, but the importance of the army's function remains. Changes in organization and tactical disposition may well become necessary. Devastating thermonuclear weapons may lead to a greater dispersal of manpower, smaller units, different types of weapons, and streamlined lines of communication. But an effective defensive barrier on the ground will always be needed where there is a threat of ground attack.

The advent of mass destruction weapons does not eliminate the need for conventional forces in all forms of warfare, great and small, and the army will continue to be required to play its historic and important role in any war of the future.

The same reasoning will, I believe, continue to apply to our naval forces. The supply line between North America and Europe must be kept open. That is of vital importance to all of us. The submarine menace which has so often nearly defeated us must in any future war be mastered and kept in check. The days of the battleship may be numbered, but the comparatively small very fast submarine killer will be more necessary than ever.

We in Canada are therefore, in keeping with our undertaking to NATO, building the most modern destroyer escorts we can devise, and we are modernizing our frigates, minesweepers, and other small craft to provide a fast powerful fleet for convoy duty and to meet the new Snorkel submarines being built in such great numbers by our only prospective enemy.

Thus we must maintain and keep modern and effective our conventional forces on both land and sea. The necessity of strong conventional NATO forces is fully exemplified by the importance we all attach to the 12 divisions we expect West Germany to provide for NATO when the protocol which was approved by the house a few days ago has been fully ratified and becomes effective.

The defence of Canada—indeed of North America—has suddenly become almost as important to the other NATO nations as it has always been to ourselves. This fact arises, of course, from the emergence of an improved Russian nuclear weapon delivery capability against North America. Under such circumstances it becomes essential that greater efforts be put forth immediately to strengthen the defences of this continent because North America is the only great base from which operations for the defence of Europe can be supported, and also because of the necessity of protecting the thermonuclear retaliatory capacity of the United States, something which provides at the present time probably the greatest single deterrent to war.

And so what we have come to term "continental defence", that great joint effort of Canada and the United States to protect and to defend both countries against aggressive attack, is at the same time a very real and vital contribution to NATO's effort as well. Thus every dollar we spend on "continental defence" has a double value. It has value first and primarily, of course, for our own defence and, second, for the preservation of the defence capacity of NATO as a whole.

"Continental defence" is an expensive business. The so-called "Pinetree" radar chain now in operation, supported by the fighter squadrons of air defence command, along with the mid-Canada line which Canada is proceeding to construct and the distant warning line to be constructed in the far north, together form a comprehensive air defence system and will cost many hundreds of millions of dollars. A large portion of the cost of this system is still to be paid. This cost will entail a very considerable drain on Canada's resources during the next few years.

In passing I should like to express to our friends to the south our appreciation of the very fine spirit of co-operation and understanding shown in the development of this great defensive system, on the construction of which we are jointly engaged.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow a question at that point, in connection with continental defence?

Mr. Campney: Certainly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister or the Department of National Defence given consideration to giving assistance to the provinces in the building of defence roads into the north in order to make our defence the more flexible?

Mr. Campney: Some consideration has been given to the problem.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the decision?

Mr. Campney: As far as my department is concerned, the decision is that the value that would be obtained defence-wise would not justify the cost of the project as compared with other defence projects. We have turned this suggestion down, as far as defence is concerned, on several occasions.

Our relations with our neighbour demonstrate how easy it is for peoples with like ideals and with common incentives to work closely and effectively together in peace and harmony to their mutual benefit. I was deeply appreciative of defence secretary Wilson's statement yesterday in Washington which I think bears out what I have just said.

In concluding these few brief remarks I should like to emphasize the fact that Canada's military effort is motivated solely by considerations of self-protection. We have no aggressive designs against any other nation. We covet no nation's territory. We have never initiated a war against anyone. We are, in fact, not a warlike people, though we can fight if we have to. Our present effort is a defence effort only. It is an effort which we are making in the hope that it will contribute to the joint strength of the NATO nations whose only aim is peace.

I have mentioned how much I was impressed when I was in Germany last fall with the close and friendly relations which existed between our troops and their families and the German people of the area in which they are stationed. I might give one small incident to illustrate what I mean. Pending the completion of our married quarters in Westphalia, many of our soldiers' families lived with Germans in German homes. As an example of the co-operation which existed, I might mention that while I was there I met the burgomaster of Soest and his school officials at a German school in which they had crowded together the German children, voluntarily, so as to empty several rooms for the children of soldiers while our schools were being completed. I visited the children in those schoolrooms and saw them being taught by our Canadian teachers operating in the German schools. This is merely an example or an indication of the friendly and co-operative feeling which was generally evident. Yet less than 10 years ago these people were our bitter enemies, and we were their bitter enemies.

It seems to me that all of us might derive a lesson from that example. If we could only establish with the Russian people as individuals such personal contact and understanding as our soldiers and their families in Germany have established with the German people, perhaps the prospect of war might rapidly fade. Probably history will record as the greatest of all the crimes which the Russian dictatorship has perpetrated against humanity the forced isolation of its people from contact with the rest of the world. Perhaps one day this monstrous imprisonment of a whole people can be overcome. If it is ever possible to overcome that imprisonment, I believe that the fear of war might rapidly abate.

In the meantime, the maintenance of peace is dependent on the continuing build-up of effective military strength of the free nations. We must become so strong collectively that no one will attack us. That is the goal of NATO. What the 14 nations which comprise NATO—and we hope the admission of Western Germany will soon make it 15—could not hope to do individually, we can, I believe, accomplish by determined collective effort.

It is the function of NATO leaders to develop and fully to integrate that effort so that it may attain the highest possible degree of effectiveness alike in immediate availability of defence and in retaliatory capacity. From my own observation I believe that those directing NATO will measure up to the requirements of that most important task.

Mr. Pearkes: Will the minister permit a question before he resumes his seat?

Mr. Campney: Certainly.

Mr. Pearkes: Are there available enough CF-100's to equip the four squadrons to which the minister referred as being changed to being armed with that type of aircraft in Germany, without withdrawing that type of aircraft from the squadrons already committed to the continental defence of Canada?

Mr. Campney: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member will note, I said that we would have all our regular air squadrons for the defence of Canada completely equipped with CF-100's this year and that we would then be in a position to equip the four squadrons of the present air division in Europe with CF-100's next year. I think that sequence is quite easy to fulfil.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Mr. Green: The minister said nothing about Korea. Is it the intention to withdraw the Canadian forces from Korea?

Mr. Campney: We should of course like to withdraw our remaining forces from Korea as quickly as we can. As the hon. member knows, we have withdrawn two-thirds of our forces from Korea already. The remaining troops are under the direction of the United Nations and associated with other commonwealth forces so that we cannot really withdraw them out of hand, but we are hoping to withdraw them as soon as we can with the approval of the United Nations.

Mr. Dinsdale: Might I ask the minister a question? I was interested in his remarks dealing with the necessity of maintaining defences against conventional weapons. In that regard is any one of the NATO countries assuming responsibility for maintaining the tactical air force defence strength? Canada has no responsibility in that regard and I was wondering whether any one of the NATO forces was doing so.

Mr. Campney: It is my understanding that the tactical defence force of each nation is governed by that nation.

Mr. Dinsdale: The tactical air force.

Mr. Campney: Yes, but I believe that steps are being taken to bring such national forces into closer relation to each other.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to ask the minister a question although I realize there are many questions in which we are all interested and we could probably keep him answering them all afternoon. I do wish to congratulate him on having been appointed head of the department and to wish him every success. May I say that I agree entirely with what he has said with reference to NATO because I am sure our hopes and the hopes for peace in this world are bound up to a very great extent with the success of NATO.

Many members have already spoken in the debate on the speech from the throne. Many subjects have been discussed and perhaps there are few left, but it does not seem to be out of the way to repeat things in this debate. While many subjects have been discussed, we still have the problems with us and I am sure we all realize that speaking on these questions does not in any way solve our problems. As usual the throne speech this year mentions many of our problems, both world-wide and national. Unfortunately, we do not find in it very many solutions for the problems we have.

One of the first matters dealt with in the house was the ratification of the Paris agreements. This was mentioned in the throne speech. While I did not speak on the ratification of these agreements, may I say now that I am in entire accord with the solution contained in them that was approved by the house. We also discussed the serious unemployment situation in Canada, and while no solution was put forward during that debate the problem was nevertheless very thoroughly discussed.

We have, as usual, more than our share of unemployment in the maritime provinces. I am not going to discuss that now except to mention and pay tribute to the efforts made by two towns in the province of New Brunswick which were faced over a year ago with very serious unemployment. I refer first to the town of Marysville in the province of New Brunswick where Canadian Cottons closed their cotton mill over a year ago. The people of the town derived almost 100 per cent of their employment from the cotton factory. After the factory was closed these people did not move away to other parts of Canada or other parts of our own province. They undertook to try to solve their own problems. They were faced with heavy taxes. Marysville has splendid schools, and anyone who has been there knows that it is a splendid up-to-date town.

The people sought employment wherever they could find it, and I might tell the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) that many of the men found employment at the Gagetown camp. However, they have to travel 25 to 30 miles morning and night in order to work at the camp, and they deserve great credit for doing so.

The other day an hon. member said that it was up to the people of the maritimes to try to solve their own problems. The town of Milltown is an instance of where that has been done. When the factory there was closed hundreds of men were thrown out of employment. They decided that they would solve their own problem. Instead of going to other parts of Canada they decided to try to open the factory and run it on a co-operative basis, which they were successful in doing. I am proud to say that as the result of this co-operative effort the workers of Milltown have employment today.

Much has been said in the debate about our loss of markets. This of course is one of the great problems of Canada. Loss of markets means loss of employment. Comment has been made here on the fact that after the war Canada and the United States had practically a clear field so far as the markets of the world were concerned. It was no effort for Canadian manufacturers or producers to sell their products in the markets of the world. It was no effort for the people of the United States to do so. The factories of Germany were destroyed and she had to go about securing new machines. The same was true to a lesser extent in Great Britain and was also true in France, Italy and Japan.

But today we have to face competition from all these countries and there is a grave fear in Canada that we are not facing up to the competition. I am reminded of a story I heard the other day of a South American country that was seeking certain heavy machinery to instal in a plant in that country. The owner of the factory wrote to Great Britain, France, the United States, Canada and Germany. The story is that from Great Britain there came a letter saying that they had the best and finest machinery in the world. France did not make any reply. The United States and Canada sent catalogues. However, in a short time two engineers from Germany arrived with the machinery and asked where they might instal it. That story may or may not be true, but we do know that today the German people are taking over the South American market to a great extent. We also know that what is true of South America is true of many other parts of the world. Canada and the United States are losing markets which they so easily held during the post-war years.

If I may say so, it does seem to me that the time has arrived for Canadian manufacturers, producers, labour leaders and government officials to get together, because unless they do so I am satisfied that many of the markets which we have had will be lost to us for one reason or another.

The speech from the throne also gave a detailed statement of many undertakings. There was mention of the St. Lawrence seaway and hydro development. So far as I can see, this will be of no great benefit to us in the maritime provinces. As I said last year, and as I repeat now, the maritime provinces have no objection to the development of the St. Lawrence seaway. They have no objection to the great benefits which will be derived by the people of Ontario and Quebec as a result of the development of hydro power in the international waters.

The speech from the throne mentioned the Canso causeway. This is a good thing for Nova Scotia. They have waited for it for many years, and no one is more pleased than the people of New Brunswick that it is now an accomplished fact. It will be of very little benefit to the people of New Brunswick. We have heard of the Bar Harbor ferry and that also will be of benefit to Nova Scotia. We rejoice that Nova Scotia has received this recognition which will result in a great increase in the tourist trade of that province. As one of the Nova Scotia members said the other day, it will unquestionably mean more trade between Nova Scotia and the New England states. No benefit will be derived by New Brunswick; as a matter of fact I believe it will take away much of the tourist trade we now enjoy, coming in through St. Stephen and going through to Saint John and the various parts of New Brunswick.

Again the speech from the throne mentions the Sydney-Port aux Basques ferry. This also is a good thing. I could go on through the long catalogue of these many things. Mention was made of Ripple Rock in British Columbia, about which I have heard ad nauseam, I might say, from the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I congratulate him and the other members from that province on the fact this rock will be removed.

All these undertakings, Mr. Speaker, will not relieve the unemployment situation in this country, nor are they going to provide markets for our people. A short time ago I was interested in reading in the Labour Research a long account of the economic trends in the Atlantic provinces. The author posed many questions and supplied many answers. The first question which he asked was, what has been happening to the three old maritime provinces since the end of the war, or the four Atlantic provinces since Newfoundland became a member in 1949? He answers the question by saying that everyone knows they are less prosperous than the rest of the country. He then asks, are they catching up or falling farther behind or just holding their place in the race?

The dominion bureau of statistics gives the answer for the three maritime provinces. In 1946, personal income per head was $177 or 22·3 per cent below the national average. By 1949 it was $287 or 30·2 per cent below the national average; 1953, $406 or 32·3 per cent below the national average. At the end of the war, the gap was already considerable. Last year, it was about 50 per cent worse.

Another question was, are they getting a larger or smaller share of the national income? This question is easily answered. According to the bureau of statistics we are about 27 per cent lower than the Canadian average. Is employment keeping pace with the national indices, or better or worse? Nova Scotia with 45 per cent of the employment in the maritime provinces has never kept pace with the national index since 1946. New Brunswick, with 30 per cent, has lagged behind the national figure every year. Taking the three maritime provinces together, there can be no question that the increase in employment since the end of the war has been very small, far smaller than the country as a whole. Wages have fallen below the national average.

As I said a few minutes ago, when there is unemployment in Canada unfortunately the percentage of unemployment is always greater for the four Atlantic provinces than any other section of the country. According to the dominion bureau of statistics the figures for 37 dates, from October 1949 to November 1954, show that on every date the percentage of unplaced applicants was above the national percentage, usually considerably above. For 1950, it averaged over 60 per cent higher; for 1951, almost 36 per cent; for 1952, almost 31 per cent; for 1953, almost 47 per cent; and for the first 11 months of 1954, almost 28 per cent.

The article also takes up the question of farming, fishing, mining, etc. I shall not take the time of the house to discuss those industries this afternoon, except to say that in only one instance, that is fisheries, had the maritime provinces more than held their own during the past few years.

Now, I come to one of the recommendations in the amendment offered by our acting leader (Mr. Rowe). It reads as follows:

> (e) To facilitate and encourage the processing of our natural resources in Canada, and thereby increase opportunities and employment for Canadians;

I am 100 per cent behind that recommendation, Mr. Speaker. I have been advocating that for a good many years in this house. We in the province of New Brunswick believe implicitly in it. We believe that there are great potentialities, great opportunities in our province today. I do not wish to weary the house by repeating what has been said by members from New Brunswick during the last two years about the great natural resources, the great mineral deposits which have been found in the Bathurst area of New Brunswick. Last year in the Little River area north of the town of Newcastle they discovered even greater mineral deposits, including over three million tons of base metals, rich in copper, zinc and lead, etc.

Recently there has been a find near Woodstock which is reported to contain 150 million tons of manganese. I know, as other members know, that manganese is a very important mineral so far as the steel industry is concerned. I can recall during the first war, when we received most of our manganese from across the water, every effort was made to find manganese in this country. Little pockets here and there were dug and used. In the second great war efforts were made to find more of this mineral. Today, in the province of New Brunswick, we have 150 million tons of manganese which will be of great importance to a country so interested in the development of steel. I believe all hon. members will agree that minerals in the ground are of no value; they have to be mined. There have been millions and millions of tons of iron ore in Labrador for millions of years. A railroad has been extended into that area and those millions of tons of ore will be brought out and smelted. This means riches, not only for that part of the country but for the world in general.

There is not much benefit to any province or any locality if minerals are simply dug out of the ground and moved to some other place to be smelted. When that is done you are simply being hewers of wood and drawers of water. What we would like to have and what we should have in New Brunswick are smelters which will process these great rich finds of minerals which we have.

When I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) why it was that we did not have decentralization of industry or more industry in our province he has told me on more than one occasion that the one essential was cheap electric power. We have suffered in New Brunswick in the past because we did not have cheap electric power in order to develop our resources or to manufacture in competition with other parts of Canada.

Now that these great mineral deposits have been found, our province will suffer even more unless cheap electric power is developed in New Brunswick. It will be noted from what I have said that New Brunswick is facing both an opportunity and a dilemma. Until cheap electric power is developed the maritime provinces, and New Brunswick in particular, will lag behind the rest of Canada. We have had neither the power nor the resources to do otherwise.

We know that there is enough undeveloped power in our province to make it potentially and economically sound and prosperous to exploit fully these newly found resources of mineral wealth as well as to develop the future manufacture of our raw materials. But we must have cheap power in relative plenty. This is now known to be available in the Saint John river and possibly on the Passamaquoddy.

I refer to the Passamaquoddy because the state of Maine wishes to have an investigation made of the possibility of using the tides for power development. I hope that it will be found practical. I hope that the Dominion of Canada will join with the United States in endeavouring to find out whether the development of the Passamaquoddy is a practical proposition. If power were to be developed there it would assist not only New Brunswick but all of the maritime provinces.

There is a great opportunity to start an industrial revolution in our maritimes economy. There is the usual problem, particularly for a small and poorer province like New Brunswick, which is ill equipped to finance the development of cheap power which is necessary for this other development. Our public debt has reached proportions where it absorbs nearly one-quarter of the provincial government expenditures just for service charges. Our population is small, it being hardly half that of the city of Toronto, but it is bearing this burden with a per capita income which is less than 60 per cent of that of Ontario.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Because we have not cheap power, industry has ignored our province for a great many years. As I said a moment ago, we have been asking continually for the decentralization of industry. We have been told repeatedly that there cannot be decentralization of industry until cheap power is available because industry will not go where there is no cheap power.

As I stated in the house at the last session, I believe that the immediate answer to our power problem is the development of power sites on the Saint John river, particularly at Beechwood. If there was a proper financing of the development at Beechwood it would start a downward trend in power costs and would affect the whole provincial industrial picture.

The provincial government has undertaken the development of Beechwood but it will cost $45 million or more. To go to the money market to finance this project would mean almost prohibitive power costs. It would not then be possible to attract the industrial development we desire in the province. I understand that the provincial government has come to Ottawa and said in effect, "Will the nation as a whole help us with this difficult problem? Once we have taken this big step we feel we will be able to go on by ourselves."

I understand that the provincial government is seeking a loan from the federal government for a period of years at a small interest rate. It is not seeking a handout, it is seeking a loan that would be repaid and which would be used for something that would be of great benefit to us. I have not seen any of the correspondence between the federal government and the provincial government but my understanding is that Ottawa feels it is not right or proper to give help along these lines for the development of provincial resources.

No doubt that is technically right, but on examining many of the activities of the federal government over the past year in different parts of Canada I find that assistance has been given to certain projects in areas which had no better claim than this, and, I feel, not as good.

As I said a few moments ago, we are assisting in the development of the St. Lawrence seaway which will not be of any direct benefit to the maritime provinces. We have paid out millions of dollars under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) may reply that we have had assistance in connection with our marshlands, but for every dollar we have received for the repair of our dikes I venture to say that $100 has gone to the western provinces.

I spoke about the Canso causeway a few moments ago and how pleased I was that Nova Scotia had received this great benefit. That is another proposition which is more or less akin to this assistance in the development of hydro power in New Brunswick.

A few years ago when the situation was so serious in Great Britain, they had what were known as depressed areas. I was pleased to read reports indicating that the government of that day decided to help these sections in Wales and Durham and other parts of England by bringing in industry, thereby attempting to bring those areas up to a level of prosperity with the rest of the country.

I think something of that kind should be done in Canada. The Minister of Agriculture mentioned the South Saskatchewan dam the other day. I understood him to say that perhaps it would go through some day. Power development is needed more by the maritime provinces than is the South Saskatchewan dam, in the west, but we in New Brunswick and the maritime provinces will raise no objections if he desires to go ahead with that proposition.

I do not think it is necessary, but the house may be interested in a few newspaper articles I have here dealing with what I have been saying. In the Maritime Merchant of January of this year there is an editorial headed "Power is the Key to Industrial Expansion", which reads:

> The paper mill of the New Brunswick International Paper Company at Dalhousie, New Brunswick, is said to use five times more power than the city of Saint John.
> The problem facing the Hearst newspaper organization in considering establishment of a $10,000,000 mill on Nova Scotia's eastern shore is said to be largely one of power supply.

Think of what that would mean to Nova Scotia. Mr. L. R. Riggs, the manager of the Brunswick Mining and Smelting Corporation Limited, when speaking before the Gloucester county council at Bathurst the other day, had this to say:

> The problem of whether or not there is to be a refinery in New Brunswick depends largely on the availability of cheap power in large quantities. Mr. Riggs gave as an example that their zinc smelter owned and operated by St. Joseph's Lead in Josephtown, Pa., used more electrical power in 1954 than was developed by the New Brunswick hydro commission in the same year.
> He stated that he was informed that Beechwood and the entire Saint John river proposed development would not have sufficient firm power to operate a similar type smelter in addition to the normal growth of the power demands for the province.

Professor William Y. Smith, head of the department of economics at the University of New Brunswick, when speaking to the council of the Saint John board of trade a short time ago said:

> From being one of the depressed or "have-not" provinces New Brunswick can expand and take its proper place as one of the provinces with a high and rising standard of living.

He mentioned the great mineral deposits and discoveries in the province and went on to say:

> The development of these mineral deposits can work a revolution in the provincial economy provided that they are developed in such a way as to be of maximum benefit to the province. The more refining and smelting of the ore which can be done within the province the greater will be the increase in incomes which will accrue to the people of New Brunswick.

This is the important part:

> To take advantage of our opportunity we need but one thing—large quantities of relatively cheap power. Almost one-quarter of all electricity consumed in Canada is used by mining, smelting and refining industries. New Brunswick must have more power; cheap power, together with proper use of our known resources, is the key to our future. By 1957 estimated normal demand for power will exceed the installed capacity of the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission.

I am not going to labour that point any further, Mr. Speaker. I should now like to say a few words about the army camp in New Brunswick.

The Minister of Labour spoke to the Fredericton retail merchants association a while ago and is reported in the press as follows:

> Mr. Gregg said the business section and the whole camp area was to become not only an integral part of the life of this immediate community but of New Brunswick as a whole.

Perhaps he had been receiving pressure from the city of Fredericton and other areas for special consideration. Gagetown camp is mostly in my constituency. Of the 1,100 people who were displaced and scattered over all parts of New Brunswick and Canada, over three-quarters of them came from the county of Queens, which is part of the constituency of Royal. These people are very well settled at the present time. I have discussed the matter before, but what I wish to impress upon the government, and especially upon the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), is that while we in New Brunswick cannot supply the millions of dollars' worth of clothing, boots and shoes, vehicles, guns and all that sort of thing that will come from Ontario and Quebec and from other parts of Canada, we can supply most of the food that is needed in this camp. For instance, there is no need to go to other parts of Canada than the maritime provinces to get the fish that is required for the troops who will be stationed there. My constituency is a great dairy constituency and all the milk and butter required for Camp Gagetown can and should be obtained from the surrounding area.

I am pleased indeed to know that the heating apparatus for the different housing units is of such a nature that it will use New Brunswick coal. I suggested that in this house on several occasions and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) nods his head in affirmation of the fact that we are to use Minto coal. I congratulate the Department of National Defence on this. It will be a great boon to the coal-producing area of New Brunswick, which is partly in my constituency and partly in the constituency of the Minister of Labour.

Take fruits. You never hear very much about New Brunswick apples in this house, but I am sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), if he has eaten New Brunswick McIntosh Reds—and if he has not he has missed a lot—will say that in the Saint John river valley we grow the finest apples that are grown anywhere in this Dominion of Canada. There is no reason why the fruit that is necessary for Camp Gagetown should not all be purchased in the surrounding area. The same thing applies to small fruits, berries. Large quantities of strawberries and other berries are grown in and around the camp area.

Instead of being pessimistic in my speech I like to be optimistic. I was pleased to see a report a few days ago that the coal industry in New Brunswick had been prosperous last year. The answer is in the fact that the New Brunswick government is using as much provincial coal as possible. I commend them for it; I commend the federal government for its intention to use New Brunswick coal in the army camp. The pulp mills in New Brunswick have become extensive users of coal, and they have also purchased equipment so they can use our own New Brunswick coal. For this I commend them. The result is that that industry is on its own feet and is in a prosperous condition in New Brunswick.

I have some other notes but I see that my time is nearly up. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) was down to our province last summer, and we are very glad to have members from other parts of Canada visit us. We have had a great many of them, and I am sure they are always welcome. Some praise us but most tell us how we should run our province. I should like to say this. We do not tell the other provinces how to run their business; what we do is send our people there who run it for them.

As an instance, the premier of British Columbia—this may not be popular—was a pupil of mine when I taught school in New Brunswick. At least three other premiers of the province of British Columbia came from the province of New Brunswick. The chief justice of British Columbia, the province from which this gentleman came and told us how to run our province, came from my constituency. The chief forester—and these are only a few that I can think of at the present time—came from the province of New Brunswick. The head of the Roman Catholic church in British Columbia, Archbishop Duke, is a New Brunswicker. Three of the six senators came from the province of New Brunswick, and two of them from my own constituency, I could go on, Mr. Speaker, and name many more notables who have come from our province and helped look after the government not only in British Columbia but in other provinces in this dominion. We also sent a prime minister to Great Britain, the only one, I believe, to come from any other part of the commonwealth. He came from New Brunswick.

Mr. Michaud: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brooks: I have now completed my remarks, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to thank hon. members for their very kind attention. I hope the government will take under serious consideration some method by which they can help us to help ourselves without costing the taxpayers of this country any considerable amount of money.

Mr. F. G. Robertson (Northumberland, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with other hon. members in extending my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I also wish to congratulate the government for foreshadowing legislation having to do with increases in the war veterans allowance and the income ceiling, as well as the liberalization of the Blind Persons Act. Both these measures will be much appreciated by the vast majority of Canadians, and I know the veterans themselves will indeed be thankful to the government for this action. As one member who has felt that this action should be taken as soon as economic conditions would permit, I am happy to see that this has now been done.

As the parliamentary representative for the county of Northumberland, wherein one-half of the people derive their income from agriculture, I naturally have great concern for the welfare of our farmers. It is a matter of note that the income of farmers during the past ten years has been the highest on record. While we regret that there has been some falling off in income during the last two or three years, we believe this is not nearly as serious as some opposition members would have us believe. In fact, farm leaders themselves would be quite satisfied, in most cases, if present conditions could continue. I realize that the income of Canadian farmers as a whole is down, but I am happy to point out that, upon checking the income of Ontario farmers, I have found there was an increase of $49,233,000 in their income for 1954 over their income for 1953. This was largely brought about by increased prices for hogs, cattle, tobacco and similar products.

One branch of agriculture which has some reason for concern at the present time is the dairy industry, and I am happy to note that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) a few days ago brought to the attention of this house the importance of the dairy industry to agriculture as a whole in Canada.

I am pleased to note that the government has continued its support program, because this has been most helpful not only to the Canadian farmer but in bolstering economic stability throughout the country. At the present time we have a support price program for eggs, butter, and hogs, and that program has played an important part in stabilizing our economy. I would point out that the cost of this program has been relatively low. On the support of farm products we have spent $80,163,658.71, of which some $69 million was spent because of foot-and-mouth disease in Canada. If we subtract the latter amount it will be seen that by the expenditure of some $11 million we have done much to stabilize agriculture in this country.

No part of our Canadian economy is more dependent upon international trade than is agriculture. The government is continually doing all it can to stimulate international trade and I would commend the government for its efforts in this regard.

Mr. Winch: In what manner?

Mr. Robertson: I wonder if the hon. member has read what the government did at the recent GATT talks, where it gave world leadership in promoting freer trade among the nations of the world. I would suggest to you, sir, that if you follow the importance of increased trade you will realize what it means to agriculture in this country.

Mr. Winch: Where has there been increased trade in Canada?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. member is not quite so well informed on agriculture as he may be on labour matters, and even there I question whether he is very much of an authority.

International trade, however, is not a one-way street. We cannot expect to export unless we import, and I think the government realizes this fact and that is the reason for the action they have taken.

I would ask the government to continue their assistance to the dairy industry, and I would also urge them to continue the support price for butter. I was very pleased indeed to learn today that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has recommended to the government that some of the surplus butter be taken off the open market, and that action will be taken in this regard. I think this will do much to stabilize the dairy industry in Canada. I would also ask the government to continue the support price of 58 cents per pound for butter after the termination of the present plan. I know it is not necessary to ask them to continue their efforts in promoting world trade whenever possible.

I should like now to say a few words regarding civil defence in Canada in the light of the knowledge which has recently become available, particularly with regard to the development of the hydrogen bomb. Let me say at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that I do not envy the task of those who are burdened with the responsibility for the development of a civil defence organization, whether it be on a federal, provincial, or municipal level. Those who are working in this field face extraordinary problems at all levels, and they must, I am sure, suffer extreme frustration.

I suggest though, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has made good progress in developing a civil defence organization. We have a well organized civil defence system on the federal and provincial levels, and in many of our larger cities and even some of the smaller communities. I think we can say it is comparable with the best of any other nation, though I do not argue for one moment that there is not yet much to be done. It is interesting to point out that the federal budget for civil defence has grown from $872,000 in the year 1951-52 to over $7 million during the present year.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has enunciated two basic principles having to do with civil defence in Canada. The first is that civil defence is essentially a civilian activity, quite separate and distinct from the national preparations which are necessary to defend this country by military action in the event of war. The second is that civil defence is the general concern of all levels of government. There is an important role for every level of government in developing measures for the protection of their civilian populations, measures which must draw on the federal, provincial and local facilities and services. I should like to quote President Eisenhower's inaugural state of the nation address in 1953, when he discussed the last mentioned question:

> Civil defence responsibilities primarily belong to the state and local governments—recruiting, training and organizing volunteers to meet any emergency. The immediate job of the federal government is to provide leadership, to supply technical guidance and to continue to strengthen its civil defence stockpile of medical, engineering and related supplies and equipment.

Our federal government takes the same view, and in my opinion this is the only course possible. The federal government is acting as the planning, the guiding and the co-ordinating agency, but I think everyone agrees that the operational responsibility rests with the local authorities. Any other approach to this matter would be inconsistent with our conception of jurisdictional rights in Canada. It would represent an unwarranted intrusion upon provincial and local rights and would make for inefficiency if the federal government, for instance, should try to take charge of a community's fire, police and health services.

The financial arrangements have been changed within the last year. Under the new regulations federal aid can be given to municipalities undertaking civil defence projects regardless of whether provincial assistance is available, and it can be increased to double the basic amount for any project for which provincial assistance is available.

I should now like to give you some of the highlights of the federal program, which I feel is full of worth-while accomplishments. More than $2 million worth of civil defence training supplies and equipment have been provided to provincial and local organizations. This includes 15 fully-equipped rescue vehicles, 50 fully-equipped mobile fire pumpers, and 100,000 service type respirators. An extensive series of training manuals, films, exhibits and other educational material has been produced and made available without charge to provincial and local civil defence organizations.

A number of operational exercises have been carried out, of which the most far-reaching, "Operation Alert", was undertaken in co-operation with the civil defence authorities in the United States, to test the effectiveness of civil defence organizations in some 50 cities in our two countries.

[Mr. Robertson.]

A permanent civil defence college capable of training 2,000 instructors and key workers each year has been established at Arnprior. Special committees are engaged in working out detailed plans for the most effective use of transportation facilities, communications, health services, welfare services and so on.

To ensure co-operation with other friendly nations, Canada has become a member of the NATO civil defence co-ordinating committee, and federal civil defence officials meet regularly with their United States counterparts on the joint United States-Canada civil defence committee.

Agreements to share in providing compensation for injury to civil defence workers have been entered into with three provinces and the offer of federal assistance is still open to all the other provinces. Over 400 air raid sirens have been supplied to target areas exclusively at federal expense, and most of these have been installed with the federal authority sharing in the cost of installation under certain conditions.

The defence research board and other federal agencies are actively engaged on a number of research projects related to A B C defence, including the use of blood substitutes, shock therapy, weapons' effects and radiation detection.

The federal government has spent in the neighbourhood of $400,000 as a contribution of one-third of the cost of standardizing hose couplings in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. Every encouragement is offered to the other provinces to take advantage of this standing offer of federal assistance.

We live today in a hydrogen bomb age and there can be no doubt that if atomic science can be used for the betterment of mankind, we face a period of great happiness. If, however, it is used for war, then we face a period of unknown tragedy. I should like to quote to you what Senator Brien McMahon had to say with regard to this problem. He said in part as follows:

> It is our solemn obligation, I think, to lift our eyes above the lesser problems that seem to monopolize our time and to discuss and act upon what, by any standard, is the supreme problem before our country and the world.

It has been suggested by some people in this and other countries that the hydrogen bomb has made civil defence obsolete. Nothing could be further from the truth. I should like to bring to your attention the opinions of such men as Sir Winston Churchill, who said the hydrogen bomb made the need for civil defence even greater than ever; Sir John Hodsoll, who is director of the NATO civil defence committee; Sir Sidney Kirkman, who is director general of civil defence in the United Kingdom; and General Gruenther, commander in chief of the NATO forces. All these distinguished and able men say that the need for civil defence is as great as or greater than ever. I should like to quote part of what the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) had to say, writing in the special supplement of the civil defence bulletin in January, 1955:

> We have all heard people say that because of the hydrogen bomb civil defence is obsolete. This to me seems like a hopeless and thoughtless attitude that can only mean greater destruction and loss of life if war should come. True, the hydrogen bomb is a terrible weapon. True, its use would mean many casualties and great suffering but it seems to me that this vastly greater destructive power calls for vastly greater effort, not for a hopeless attitude of defeat.

When anyone considers the problem which civil defence authorities are supposed to be trying to deal with, it is not too difficult to see the reason for the confusion, the apathy and the frustration which seems to surround this subject in some areas of Canada; for civil defence, by its very nature, in this cold war period can have no fixed or accurate terms of reference. We are trying to build up some protection against a risk the nature of which has, through force of circumstances, very many unknowns. We do not know if an attack will take place. We do not know when an attack will take place, whether it will be a year from now, ten years from now or twenty years from now. We do not know what part of Canada is likely to be hit, or the nature of the weapons that are likely to be used, or the probable frequency or intensity of the attack.

When it comes to a consideration of the terrible new weapons which are likely to be used in any future war—the atom bomb and the hydrogen bomb—we have access only within limits and in rather secondhand fashion to such information as may be supplied to us by the military and scientific authorities of friendly countries.

We have little or no means of establishing the detailed nature of the problems that we have to face by resources which we have at our own disposal, and even the information which we obtain from other friendly sources is in a sense theoretical because in fact, with the exception of the atomic bombs which were dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki in 1945, no atomic or hydrogen weapon has ever been used on military forces or on the civilian population in any other part of the world. In view of these facts it is not surprising that military, scientific and civil defence authorities of this and other countries should find themselves in a position where they have not yet all the answers to the question, how do we protect ourselves against the atom or hydrogen bomb?

I suspect that few members of the house and an even lower percentage of our general population have yet absorbed the full significance of the reports which have been published on the effect of the hydrogen bomb. Once the Canadian public learns the extent of this threat and the size of it, I am sure we will have an end to such incidents as we have witnessed in the cities of Victoria, Peterborough and Montreal. As you know, within the last year the civic authorities in these three centres have said they would discontinue their small civil defence organizations. I am happy to know, however, that on second thought the civic authorities in Victoria and Peterborough reconsidered this decision and are now carrying on their civil defence organizations in a much firmer way than before. I have reason to hope and I am confident that the civic authorities in the great city of Montreal, once they have had an opportunity to learn all the aspects of the problem, will reconsider their decision, and that we will see their civic defence organization established on an even firmer basis.

It is, I believe, the responsibility of each member of the house to support the development of a strong and alert civil defence organization in that part of Canada which he represents. In order to do so effectively it is necessary that each member have a clear understanding of the destructive power of the hydrogen bomb. I firmly believe that if we can get, on the part of all governments, a clearer understanding of what the hydrogen bomb can accomplish in the way of death and destruction, we will then have no more uncertainties and no more arguments as to whose responsibility it is to provide a civil defence set-up. This is not the time for provincial and local governments to think of withdrawing their support. No government can do this job alone, not even the federal government.

I am one who believes that responsibility for the survival of its own citizens is part of the responsibility of every form of government in Canada. It clearly requires the moral and financial support of every level of government in Canada and, more than that, it requires the participation not only of governments but of the citizens themselves.

I should like to give you now a few facts as to the destructive power and after-effects of hydrogen and atom bomb explosions, to illustrate the size of the potential danger which we must understand and communicate to the people whom we represent. My information comes in all cases from published sources, particularly the bulletin of atomic scientists, the issues for November and December, 1954, and from a release on the effects of the hydrogen bomb issued by the United Kingdom home office and appearing in the British magazine Civil Defence.

In this last-mentioned magazine there is an interesting and awe-inspiring table giving the terrific increase in the destructive power of thermonuclear weapons since August 1945, when the first bombs were dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Those bombs are now known as nominal atomic bombs, and in their destructive power represented that of 20 kilotons of t.n.t., which is 20,000 tons of t.n.t. I do not believe that the general public has yet begun to appreciate the destructive powers even of the outmoded nominal atomic bomb of 1945. These bombs, carried in a single plane, encompassed as much destruction as was encompassed by our 1,000-plane raids over a number of German cities during the last great war.

We cannot really grasp even yet what it would mean if one of these bombs should be dropped on one of our Canadian cities. There would be an area of total destruction one mile in diameter in which every building and every individual would, in a single instant, be destroyed or killed. However, the nominal atomic bomb is now the water pistol of the thermonuclear age. Atomic bombs grew to 1,000 kilotons. They grew until we knew that there were atomic bombs of a striking force equal to one megaton or 1,000,000 tons of t.n.t.

The giant hydrogen bomb first appeared in the United States tests of 1952 and in the Russian tests of 1953, and then on a larger scale again in the early part of last year. It is reported by the magazine Civil Defence, to which I referred a few minutes ago, that the United States now possesses bombs of the nature of 20 megatons in strength. This means that one bomb has the striking force of 20 million tons of t.n.t., 1,000 times as strong as the nominal atomic bomb first used in 1945.

Let me refer again to Hiroshima and Nagasaki. A nominal atomic bomb was dropped killing some 45,000 people in one city and 25,000 in another, and producing an area of total destruction about one mile in diameter. Today we know that we have hydrogen bombs 1,000 times as powerful. How can we measure the destruction certain to be created if one of these bombs should be dropped? I turn again to the British home office article, and I read there that the area of total destruction would be a circular area some five miles in radius and 10 miles in diameter, within which everything would be totally destroyed. We know that the cities of Hull and Ottawa could be encompassed in such an area. That means that if a bomb were dropped at ground level in this area the whole of metropolitan Ottawa and Hull would be destroyed.

But that is not all of this terrible story. Extending for another seven and a half miles in all directions would be an area of irreparable damage in which every building would be, for all useful purposes, destroyed, and most of the people in that area would be likewise killed or injured. Extending beyond that again for another seven and a half miles would be another area of extensive damage in which the buildings could possibly be repaired for future use.

I have described in some detail, Mr. Speaker, the area of destruction covered by this largest in the family of hydrogen weapons to date because I think it is important to impress upon the house and upon the people generally the large city and suburban areas which can be blasted into oblivion by the hydrogen bomb.

I have dealt principally with the blast effects of the hydrogen bomb, and have said nothing about the equally devastating effects of heat and fire. I do not propose to go into this phase of the subject because time will not permit. I should like to say, however, that Dr. Ralph E. Lapp, one of the United States' greatest atomic scientists, writing in the November issue of the bulletin for atomic scientists, in an article entitled "Civil defence faces new peril" said that the 10-megaton bomb—about one-half the size of the bomb to which I referred a minute ago—had a fireball measuring some three and one-quarter miles in diameter.

Anyone who has seen the film of the United States hydrogen bomb explosion of November 1952 entitled "Operation Ivy" can testify as to the awe-inspiring nature of the fireball resulting from that explosion. There was a mass of angry, seething, burning gases which literally consumed all the air and destroyed, in a single instant, everything that had not already been devastated by the explosive force in an area some three and a quarter miles in diameter. If you compared all the fires which would take place in Canada over the period of one year with the fireball resulting from this explosion, the fireball would dwarf the sum total of those fires.

But fire and blast are not the only death-dealing or destructive weapons resulting from the explosion of a hydrogen bomb. We have to deal with a new element, namely radioactivity. In the past we have had to deal with explosive and fire effects, but never on the same scale as we would have to deal with them following the explosion of a hydrogen bomb. We have never, however, had to deal with the problem of radioactivity. If war should come this could very well be one of the problems facing civil defence workers in this country. Much has been said and written about the radiation that exists at the time of the bomb explosion. We know that then large quantities of alpha, gamma and beta rays are set free, and that unprotected persons exposed to these rays within a few miles of the point of explosion might be subject to lethal doses of radioactivity even though the time taken for this radioactive flash is only a relatively few seconds.

More serious than this, however, is the radioactive fall-out which takes place. Large quantities of debris and dust are sent upward into the mushroom cloud resulting from the explosion. They become impregnated with radioactive materials, and they are forced into the upper air by the nature of the explosion. This material is carried by the wind and may produce very serious damage in areas many miles from the point of explosion. We have all read of the serious illness which affected the fishermen on a Japanese fishing vessel, and the death of one of these fishermen, as a result of being subjected to this radioactive fall-out.

There is plenty of evidence coming out of the experience of these tests, and now appearing in published form, which suggests that not only the very large area directly affected by blast and fire as the result of an H-bomb explosion, but also a much larger area extending many miles downwind from the target city itself will be equally subjected to the danger of this lethal radioactive fall-out.

What does all this mean, Mr. Speaker, so far as civil defence is concerned? Clearly it means that the dimensions of the problem are greatly increased over what they were a year or two ago. When the bombs were dropping over the cities of England during world war II, it was possible to think in terms of standing fast and fighting it out. Dr. Ralph Lapp, in the article to which I have already referred, clearly indicates the existence of a new state of affairs when he says that distance is now the best defence against the bomb. What does this mean? It means surely that our best hope of saving lives in the event of an attack with atomic or hydrogen bombs is to take advantage of any advance warning we can get. We should plan to move as many people as possible out of the target area before the bomb lands. It has to be recognized that there is no hope whatever of survival for those people caught in even our largest cities at the moment the bomb is dropped. Their principal hope of survival lies in the possibility of getting several hours advance warning, and getting them away from the danger point. It is for that reason that civil defence in Canada is giving, and I believe should continue to give, attention to the possibilites of traffic control, planned evacuation of our cities and the development of ways and means by which people can be housed, fed and clothed in reception areas 50 or perhaps even 100 miles away from their normal place of abode. Experiments have shown that large cities can be evacuated in a relatively short time. If there is time after a strategic alert, evacuation can be on a gradual basis and only those people required to stay in the city would have to be removed on short notice. Wide exit lanes can be built out of our larger cities which would allow the swift removal of the people from them.

This problem is difficult and complicated indeed. It involves careful planning of the quickest and best means of getting large numbers of people moved rapidly out of our crowded urban areas. Each city will present its problems. Each city must have its own individual plan. Above all, the co-operation of the people themselves in remaining disciplined and obeying the instructions given them by their authorities during test exercises and on other occasions is essential to the successful operation of such plans. Fortunately the expense of such a plan, of such an organization, of tests and practices designed to increase the efficiency of such an operation, need not be very great. Knowledge of local traffic conditions already exists on the local level. Municipal authorities already have, in their police and traffic forces, a nucleus on which to build an excellent plan for their own population. Much can be done with a well thought out plan based on detailed knowledge and supported by the local civic authorities as well as the population of the community itself.

It is clear that the number of people exposed to death and injury from hydrogen bombs is very great indeed, but it is also true that sound civil defence planning can possibly save more lives than ever before. Because of the wider areas of damage that are now possible, mutual aid among communities large and small takes on added importance. In certain localities mobile columns should be organized which could come to the assistance of neighbouring communities. Shelters located at the periphery of target areas would provide some measure of protection to people who must remain there. Radioactivity can kill people many miles removed from the explosion centre, but shelters that would provide an earth cover of three feet would give a great measure of protection against radioactive fall-out. High intensity radiation meters and people trained in their use would be invaluable to indicate when it is safe for people to leave their shelters. Inhalation or ingestion of radioactive debris is a matter that requires further study, but there is much hope that proper respirators can afford great protection against inhalation of these poisonous substances.

Plant location is another matter which should be considered in the light of our present knowledge of hydrogen bomb warfare, in order that our ability to wage war should not be impaired by the destruction of our industrial capacity and the death of our industrial workers.

I do not suggest that civil defence has reduced itself to this single, simple formula. That is far from being the case. We have, of course, to contemplate the possibility that other kinds of weapons besides the H-bomb may be used, and for these alternative possibilities we must continue to carry out the kind of civil defence operation and organization that we have been accustomed to in the past. We cannot discontinue our training in the fields of fire fighting and rescue training; we cannot discontinue our planning in the medical field. We will certainly under any conceivable form of attack need a sound system of warning and communications.

All these are elements in our present program of training and preparation. All these will be needed under the new circumstances which have developed out of the hydrogen bomb tests of the last few years. But what has emerged more clearly than anything else is that in terms of the use of these largest weapons of destruction only those who prepare their plans ahead of time, only those who remain disciplined and calm and cooperate with the proper authorities in removing themselves from the point of danger as far as possible in advance of the actual incident, can have any hope of survival. It is well for us to recognize this now, because only by recognizing it and co-operating at all levels of government to bring the importance of these facts home to the people can we begin to think through the kind of constructive civil defence plan and program which will be just as essential for our survival as the armed forces themselves.

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted, at the beginning of this speech, to add my congratulations to those extended by previous speakers to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, for the ease with which they both carried out their task. I am sure they will leave their mark in this house and that their voice will add to the interest of the debates in which they will take part.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, the comments made by some of the opposition members who have spoken in this debate have sometimes ranged far from the subject under discussion, which may be the natural result of their finding little or nothing to criticize. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier), for instance, gave us an interesting summary of the opinions he formed of his fellow Canadians following a trip across Canada last fall.

I agree with him that we would all benefit by adding to our knowledge of our own country by visiting each of our ten provinces, and that is an opportunity which I am sure each one of us would be happy to grasp.

Like the hon. member from British Columbia I too have been pleased to travel across this dominion. Just two years ago I visited his home province for the first time, and I was greatly impressed by all I saw there. I found the people of British Columbia extremely kind and hospitable. As a French Canadian I was received with the warmest kindness. While I was able to spend only a few days in Vancouver, I must confess that I found there no disturbing signs which would indicate any immediate danger of an outbreak of communism or of any other "ism" which would imperil our country. I found British Columbians to be much the same as Canadians in every other province I have visited, very much the same as the people I meet and see in Montreal or Quebec city.

However, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam had an entirely different experience in the province of Quebec. It makes me wonder who were the people he met during his sojourn there. Historically the province of Quebec has always been an honest, industrious and God-fearing province. Rich in natural resources, it is equally rich in the quality of its people. It enjoys to a greater degree than any other province, with the possible exception of New Brunswick—the state of which the hon. member also found disturbing—the benefit of two great cultures, French and Anglo-Saxon. More than any other, too, it has found out how to blend these two cultures so that instead of being antagonistic to each other they are complementary.

Quebec, too, is prosperous. Possessor of more than 50 per cent of Canada's developed water power, it is home to many of this country's greatest industries. Capital from many parts of the world, as well as from other parts of Canada, has found a safe field for investment in Quebec, and millions of tourists each year come to visit that oldest section of Canada.

This surely is not the background for a communist revolution. Nor could the great majority of Quebec people, who are faithful adherents of the Catholic church, be considered likely recruits for the godless forces of international communism. Throughout the world the Catholic church is recognized as the great bulwark against the red peril, and in Quebec its members are not all French-speaking. It is the church of people of many races, loyally supported by Canadians of many different origins.

A province so wealthy, so long noted for its industry and thrift, so successful in promoting harmony and happiness among its people of differing languages and culture, is not a very logical hunting ground for the sowers of hatred and discord. I am surprised that the hon. member found among our many hundreds of thousands of loyal and contented citizens the few who would seek to foment trouble even if they lived in paradise.

When he refers to the fact that the communists in Montreal polled more votes than the C.C.F. party to which he belongs, the hon. member, I am afraid, was not pointing up the menace of communism as much as he was demonstrating the failure of his own brand of socialism, which has not yet succeeded in electing a single member from the province of Quebec.

At the conclusion of this session the hon. member might be well advised to spend more time in his own constituency, where the voters have already taken the first step in the direction which the member fears and have moved away from the political parties which gave this country birth and have brought it to its present stage of development. There he is more likely to find the measure of his discontent.

Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to read in the Financial Times, issue of January 21, 1955, the statement of Mr. H. D. Scott, superintendent of foreign business for the Imperial Bank of Canada, who has just returned from a three months, 40,000 mile trip, which took him to Australia, New Zealand, Japan, India and Pakistan, as well as the United Kingdom. He said:

"Canada's record has never stood higher in the estimation of foreign countries than at the present time", he said, "and Canada's trade and diplomatic officers were doing an exceptionally fine job wherever I met them. These government officers working overseas are a tremendous help to the Canadian businessman visiting foreign countries. I cannot speak too highly of their help and service.

"Canada is greatly respected throughout the free world", Mr. Scott said, "and there is absolutely no doubt that countries in the Far East and in the western hemisphere admire the manner in which we have conducted our economy during the post-war years and are amazed at our industrial and business development. Wherever I went I was told that Canada is truly a remarkable country."

To return to the outline of the legislation contained in the speech from the throne, I should like to refer briefly to two specific items. The first is the amendments which are to be made to the Blind Persons Act; the second is this government's support of the rearmament of Germany. To the first I give my wholehearted support. The second I support, as I suppose many of us do, as the lesser of two evils. I fear it, but I see no alternative.

The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Cavers) expressed the hope that a greater measure of help will be given to the blind, and referred to those in his constituency who suffer from this great affliction. For many years I have been keenly interested in the welfare of the blind in the province of Quebec, and have been an active supporter of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. My work with these people has been one of the most inspiring and most heart-warming experiences of my life. I have visited and talked and worked with many who live in a world of perpetual darkness. Seldom if ever have I heard a word of complaint. I have heard of their difficulties in making a living, and of how they have overcome those difficulties. I have heard, too, of the petty criminals who take advantage of blind people in the course of their day to day business.

These people deserve all the help that can be given them, because they do not depend upon help but are eager to serve themselves. Any more generous provision for their care and assistance that this government can give them will, I am sure, be warmly supported from all sides of the house. This is not a political matter; it is a humanitarian action which we all approve.

The question of rearming Germany is an entirely different thing. Just as many of us during our lives have come in contact with the blind, so have many of us seen the horrors of war which have been visited upon us twice during a quarter of a century. We know personally the victims of German oppression and German atrocities. We recall all too clearly the days of the 1930's when a rearming Germany once more became the scourge of the world. For six years we fought a rearmed Germany in defence of freedom and human decency. As we laid down our arms we hoped fervently that we would never be called upon to pick them up again, and in our wisdom we decided that the power to destroy should never again be restored to Germany's bloodstained hands.

Just a few days ago I was reading in my copy of Hansard for April 17, 1951, the maiden speech in this house by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl). He declared, in much stronger terms than I could, his opposition to any move which would result in the rearming of Germany. "We are now considering," he said, "placing weapons in their hands once more. What can we expect in 1952, 1953, 1954 and the years that will follow?" he asked.

Well, the years 1952, 1953 and 1954 have come and gone, and the great German problem which the hon. member for Cartier feared at that time has given way to an even greater problem. How can we defend our freedom and our democracy against the menace to the east without the aid of our former enemy? History does not always permit us to be logical and almost never permits us to be sentimental. England fought for many long years against the tyranny of Napoleon. No greater enmity in the world existed than that between England and France. Yet in the face of new perils the two nations became allies and, even more important, friends.

Had Britain determined that her ancient enemy, France, should be forever disarmed, who would have stood by Britain's side against the Hun in 1914-1918? Then there might not even have been a second world war in which France, weak as she was, would once more face the German horde and give Britain at least a little time to prepare her defence.

We who have lived through two great wars can have little love for Germany and little desire to restore her might. But we must live with history; we must realize that self-preservation is sometimes more important than sentiment, and that allies cannot always be chosen for reasons of affection. During the war we had the Soviet union as an ally, though many of us accepted her with grave doubts. Even Sir Winston Churchill, Britain's wartime Prime Minister, greeted this unexpected and new-found friend with considerable lack of enthusiasm. "I will accept aid from wherever it comes", he said, "satisfied that Germans killed by Russians would be just as successfully removed from the war as Germans killed by Englishmen or Canadians or anyone else."

Today I am pleased to see that the hon. member for Cartier, realizing that conditions existing in 1955 are different, like all of us has put aside his personal emotions and decided to accept the lesser of two evils. I am sure he agrees that we are in much the same historical position. West Germany is necessary to our defence, necessary perhaps to our survival.

[Mr. Bourque.]

Represented as we are in the councils of Europe by our able Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) we receive our information at first hand. We have no experience in foreign intrigues, and we want none. We are prepared to face facts, however distasteful they may be, and the facts as presented to us by the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate that as members of the western community, as defenders of western ideals, we will be better served if we approve this rearmament policy than if we oppose it.

My support of this policy, I must admit, has been strengthened by the volume of mail and the number of petitions that have reached my desk in opposition to it. The communist friends of Soviet Russia in this country are against rearming West Germany. They are doing everything they can to prevent it. They have succeeded in convincing me even, I must say, against my wishes, that it is our only salvation.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. gentleman who now has the floor is reviving the debate which concluded a day or so ago. Will you rule on that point?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may not, of course, refer to a debate which has been concluded, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) has so correctly pointed out. However, I was following the hon. member and his remarks are of a somewhat general nature, though I would ask him to refrain from referring particularly to the debate which was concluded.

Mr. Bourque: In these perilous times, the speech from the throne delivered to this parliament revealed much for which we can be thankful. We are far removed from the immediate and devastating threats of war. We are enjoying a prosperity which is built upon sound foundations. Even some of our good Tory newspapers do not hesitate, from time to time, to report news which tells us how fortunate we are to live under this good Liberal administration.

Arthur Blakely, parliamentary correspondent for the Conservative Montreal Gazette, reported in his column on January 13:

> Canadian housewives, irritated by high coffee prices, would be more so if they were on the other side of the curtain. A pound of coffee goes for the equivalent of $4.78 in Russia. The Rumanian price tag is even higher, $6.47. Further west, in Hungary, the price is $13.54 per pound. And in coffee-loving Czechoslovakia, it is $18.85. Poland, reports here indicate, places the highest price tag of all on coffee. The asking price: $45.45 per pound.

In Canada prices have remained at reasonable levels and earnings have been reasonably high. The proof is to be found in the possessions of the average Canadian family acquired since the war. More people own their own homes, drive their own cars, have television sets, radios and even record players than ever before. More students are enrolled in our colleges and universities. More people of all ages crowd our winter and summer resorts and go to our moving picture theatres and sports events.

Opposition members have made much of the reports of increased unemployment, but unemployment is not cured by unemployment insurance or even by public works which, necessary to a degree, are an important part of government policy.

The amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act reveal the government's acceptance of its responsibility for those who are without work. They provide an increase in unemployment benefits from $2.15 to $2.85 a day in the case of a person without dependents, and from $2.80 to $4.00 a day in the case of a person with dependents. This involves a maximum daily contribution of 9 cents for the insured person. At present a person in class 2 who has the minimum number of qualifying contributions, namely 90, is entitled to 16 days' benefits. The amendment increases this minimum to 60 days or 10 weeks, and will not affect those who qualify for more.

This provision will allow every recipient in the supplementary benefit period of 1955 to benefit for the minimum period of 60 days, and if they have exhausted their entitlement they will receive the difference between the number of days already obtained and the 60-day guarantee. A review of the situation as it exists in Canada today will, I believe, satisfy any hon. member that this phase of government policy is fair and reasonable. But the real remedy lies in hard work, increased production and sound business. It is those qualities which this government seeks to encourage and promote, and I wholeheartedly support those policies designed to create a climate in which the economy of this nation can successfully operate.

Many serious problems will face hon. members during this session and in future sessions. I believe we are all prepared to give these problems serious, fair and honest consideration. To those who criticize us for increasing our salary to $10,000 a year I would refer to a recent newspaper heading: "Bob Hope Gets $100,000 as M.C. for T.V. Hour," or to the newspaper reports which carried the story that Jackie Gleason, an American comedian, signed a three-year T.V. contract for $7 million per year. Surely, by comparison, we in this house are not overpaid.

Mr. Hayden Stanton (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in the throne speech debate I would like to congratulate the hon. members for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) and Trinity (Mr. Carrick) on the able manner in which they moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They did an excellent job, particularly when we consider the small amount of material with which they had to work. I am sure they did their best to make a lot out of a little.

They and other Liberal speakers have tried to make the people of Canada believe that milk and honey flow from this Liberal government, but if that is the case I would suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that he extend that pipeline across Canada as speedily as possible, so that some of that milk and honey will flow into the homes of those who are unemployed in this country at the present time.

The government, we are pleased to note, has at long last reviewed the plight of many of our war veterans, and is considering ways and means of relieving their burdens. This is exactly what the different Legion branches across Canada have been urging. We must realize and admit that the members of that body of service men and women have never been, nor are they now, unreasonable in their demands. The legislation they asked for last session received favourable consideration from the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) but somewhere, somehow, after the presentation of their brief to the minister, something went wrong within the cabinet and they did not receive the support that was justly theirs.

In formulating legislation for veterans and blind pensioners, the government seems inclined to place them in the same category as those receiving old age assistance. This should not be. I believe that when we are considering the welfare of our returned men and women we should throw aside any hint of party politics and consider every request from the dominion command of the Legion, and all legislation pertaining to their welfare, strictly on its merits, to give them whatever benefits we can which will contribute to making brighter the lives of those who are maimed, or who are discouraged by adversity in the sunset of life. They have it coming to them and I hope the government, now that it has announced consideration of the veterans' request, will not do as it did in 1954 and forget about them before the session closes.

Nearly every item that has been mentioned in the address has been suggested or sponsored by members of the opposition in the last few sessions. The government are past masters in the art of availing themselves of constructive legislation based on suggestions of opposition members. They were prodded all last session for additional benefits for the disabled men and women of the army, navy and air force; they have been prodded for more generous treatment to the blind. No doubt they would never have thought of either of these matters if it had not been for the opposition members bringing this much-needed social legislation to the attention of the house.

Now that consideration, which is long overdue, is being given to the extent of $5 million for the removal of hazardous railway crossings, which are taking a greater toll of human life every year, I hope the expenditure will be distributed evenly across Canada where it is most needed, and not where political pressure is greatest.

I must at this point deviate from my address in order to bring to the attention of the government, and especially of the departments concerned, a situation that exists at Brockville. Trains that stop at this station cut across the main avenue from the north, which consists of highways No. 42 and No. 29. This is not only inconvenient because long lines of traffic are held up for long intervals; it is also dangerous, as two schools are now situated north of the tracks. Neither Brockville nor any other place can afford to lose even one of its children. I am sure the people of this county town would greatly appreciate a subway or overhead pass to take care of the ever-increasing traffic.

I was much amused to read in some of the old Hansard reports the remark made by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) to the effect that the old station in his constituency had bedbugs, and that a new one was needed. Our station at Brockville has not yet reached that stage, but it is far from adequate for a thriving town and community of nearly 20,000 people; it is more suitable for a small town or village.

There are three major improvements that the town of Brockville must have if it is to keep its place in the expansion of eastern Ontario. The first is a subway or overpass at the northern limits of the town. This is a necessity at the present time. The second is a more modern station to take care of the ever-increasing population which the building and completion of the St. Lawrence seaway will bring. Third, and perhaps most important, is dockage that will be adequate to accommodate the freighters that will be plying the St. Lawrence and the great lakes when this project is completed.

I cannot be unmindful of the unemployment which exists at the present time, and which is growing week by week. I shall not take time to deal with its many complexities. That has already been done by other members of this party. However, I should like to draw the attention of the house to the situation in which the employees of our two railways find themselves. In the early part of January of this year it was announced that 50 men would be laid off from the division between Cornwall and Gananoque. This is only what is happening to the railway employees all across Canada. The minister has admitted these lay-offs, and still the government is not putting forth any effort to effect a remedy but rather is sitting smug in the knowledge of its large majority. Many of these railwaymen have their homes in communities in which they have always lived, and it is not easy for them to pull up at a moment's notice and move to a place unknown to them.

You may ask what is the remedy. There are few ills for which there is no remedy. In 1934 the then minister of public works had inserted in all departmental contracts a clause which read as follows:

> Transportation of material and plant: All material and plant used in connection with the execution of this contract must be transported over railways operating in Canada to the greatest possible extent.

The Department of Transport construction contract forms contained a similar clause. Recently the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) and the former minister of transport caused the deletion of this clause from their contracts. Surely this clause, which has served such a useful purpose through all these years, could still serve in diverting to the railways much valuable traffic which they formerly enjoyed. Surely the government should be anxious to divert as much traffic as possible and as large a volume of business as possible through the channels of its own railroad.

We must realize that the railroads must work under many restrictions and conform to many regulations laid down by the board of transport commissioners, who have no jurisdiction over international and interprovincial highway operations. Although the supreme court and recently the privy council held that the federal authorities had jurisdiction over these highway operations, the government has lamely taken steps to hand these powers over to the provinces. So often when there is a decision to be made on some controversial question the government backs away, meekly says "This is not our baby", and immediately tosses it over to the provinces. It is an old habit of the government when it does not want to face up to an issue.

Representing as I do a constituency that is 50 per cent rural, I would be remiss in my duty—indeed, I would feel myself to be a poor representative of that grand old riding of Leeds which produces an abundance of milk and milk products, especially cheese—if I did not at this time bring to the attention of the government the situation in which the producers find themselves at the present time. This situation will become far more acute as time goes on if New Zealand cheese continues to be imported into Canada.

It is an impossibility for Canadian dairy farmers to compete against their neighbours in the southern hemisphere in the matter of producing milk and milk products. We must realize that in Canada, on the average 100 acre dairy farm, the capital expenditure for buildings in which to house the cattle in the winter and for implements to produce food for those cattle for nearly seven months of the year, is at least $15,000. Furthermore, it will take one man to care for and to produce the feed for the winter months on a farm that will accommodate 15 dairy cows; and if he works only eight hours a day, or 40 hours a week, that number of cows will be materially decreased. How then can the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the government expect the dairy industry here, under these conditions, to compete with the dairymen of New Zealand who do not have to provide winter accommodation for their cattle, except a milking shed; where they do not have to provide any winter feed because the cattle have the advantage of pasture the year round; and where each farmer, by not having to provide winter care or feed, is able to milk and care for an average herd of 40 to 50 dairy cows? Again I say it is impossible for a dairy farmer in Canada to produce milk and milk products on a competitive basis with New Zealand. It just cannot be done.

While high tariffs and import quotas are unwise, perhaps, in the long run, Canadian industry is protected by substantial tariffs—and perhaps rightly so—running in many cases from 20 to 35 per cent and as high as 40 per cent. At the time the Minister of Trade and Commerce offers to balance New Zealand's trade budget by taking 2¼ million pounds of cheese, Canadian farm products are shut out of many world markets by embargoes. New Zealand has carefully restricted imports since 1938, yet our government is allowing cheese to come into Canada after the Ontario cheese producers have contributed over $1 million of their own money to stabilize cheese prices and permit them to offer a more acceptable and attractive price to the importers of Great Britain. The government apparently has no constructive trade policy regarding farm products, more especially with Great Britain which has always been our most stable market. Now we have 2¼ million pounds of imported cheese, and no assurance from the minister that there will not be more. He has intimated to the house that he does not expect any more for six or nine months. I suppose he thinks that by that time the farmers will have forgotten.

I consider this is a real slap in the face to the dairymen of the dominion. It hits at the very economy of our agricultural industry, in which dairying plays so important a part. When the purchasing power of the rural district is lowered, the economy of the whole country suffers. No truer words were ever spoken than those of that celebrated finance minister, Sir Thomas White, when he stated that the economy and prosperity of a nation lie in the top six inches of soil.

Farm incomes have been materially reduced during 1953 and 1954, and the effects are already being felt across Canada. There is not at the present time the purchasing power there was some three years ago, and as a consequence there has been a serious unemployment situation at the Cockshutt plant at Brantford and the Massey-Harris works at Toronto. Worst of all, that grand old firm of Frost and Wood, later a subsidiary of Cockshutt, which has been the backbone of Smiths Falls through all these years, I believe since 1892, has ceased to operate on account of decreased sales. This will be a serious blow to the employees, many of whom are past middle life and have established homes for themselves and their families.

Agriculture, I contend—and I want to bring this to the attention of hon. members—should be thrifty enough and have an income sufficient to be able to compete with urban industry in wages. By so doing it would supply employment instead of furnishing employees for the urban centres. There are thousands of cars and buses commuting daily from the rural districts to the larger towns and cities. Why do they do this? It is only natural that people go where the remuneration for their labour is highest. Therefore it is plain to be seen that if the agriculturists of this dominion—and you will take notice that I use the word "dominion"—were able to compete in the wage field this labour trend would not be so pronounced. Indeed, I believe it would not be half what it is at the present time. It is simple mathematics. If there are not enough jobs for all, then for every 100 men who commute to work from the rural areas there will be 100 unemployed in the town or city.

Knowing that New Zealand cheese will soon be on sale in our grocery stores, it is indeed hard for me to take part in the debate regarding this situation without using words most unbecoming to the dignity of the house. I wonder what the Minister of Agriculture would have said if 2¼ million bushels of wheat had been dumped into Canada from the Argentine, Australia or some other wheat-producing country. I wonder what the hon. members on my left, the socialists, would have said if their wheat market hung in the balance. I am sure they would have protested so loudly, and rightly so, that the sound barriers of this house would have been broken.

I cannot understand how so many hon. members on the government side of the house who represent dairying constituencies can be so patient at this time when the economy of their people is threatened. They must be a well disciplined group, quite content with the decision of their superiors even if it does distress and make the going more difficult for their people. That is what the present government is doing, making it as impossible as it can for the dairy farmer. However, I must congratulate the hon. member for Glengarry-Prescott (Mr. Bruneau) for his outspoken address on the subject that is uppermost in the minds of his people at the present time. He and the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau) must have more courage than their associates.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce, by stating that he did not think there would be any more shipments of New Zealand cheese for the next six or nine months, has created a very uncertain and shrouded situation for the coming year. The Ontario cheese marketing board, the cheese producers' association and the farmers who produce that commodity do not know at the present time just where they are at.

I hold in my hand a portion of Canadian cheddar, which is not one of the finest but the finest and most appetizing cheese to be found in any country. It is a crying shame that we have to be subjected to the importation of an inferior quality of cheese when we have in storage now over 41 million pounds with a surplus of nearly 12 million pounds for which we have no market at the present time.

I should like to draw to the attention of the house and the people of Canada just what this shipment of New Zealand cheese means in pounds of milk. An amount of 2,250,000 pounds of cheese is equivalent to 28,125,000 pounds of milk or, to break it down again, is equal to the yearly production of 3,515 average dairy cows. We may then readily understand that the importation of this cheese means that hundreds of Canadian farmers will have decreased incomes.

I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture, who gave the previous shipment of New Zealand cheese his blessing and who should be near the people whom he represents so far as their problems are concerned, will give to the house and to the dairy farmers of Canada some definite statement as to the importation of cheese. I am sure that any future shipments can be suspended by embargoes or import quotas which the government has the authority to impose, as it did in the case of Japanese shirts and many other articles that were about to come into the country, or by higher tariffs which give adequate protection to many of our other industries.

Why let one of our major industries suffer while others benefit? If there are any future importations of New Zealand cheese while we have such large surpluses of this product as we have at the present time—and cheese is the most logical way of disposing of our surplus milk—I hope the menu of the two hon. ministers will consist of nothing more than limburger cheese, and I am sure that all the cheese producers join with me in this wish.

GRAIN

REGULATIONS RESPECTING FREIGHT ASSISTANCE ON WESTERN GRAINS AND MILLFEEDS

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): If I may have the privilege of reverting to motions, I should like to make a statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, the tabling of the estimates earlier today makes it necessary for me to make an announcement in connection with the freight rates on grain. The regulations affecting freight rates on grain have been changed somewhat and the changes come into effect on Tuesday next, the 1st of February. With unanimous consent I would ask that the regulations be printed in Hansard. If necessary I shall read them but it will take a little time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreeable to hon. members that these regulations be printed in Hansard as requested?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: As an appendix?

Mr. Gardiner: Either at this point in Hansard or as an appendix.

(For text of regulations, see appendix, page 667.)

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

(Translation):

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by congratulating the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is also a pleasure to congratulate the new members and the new ministers. I offer them my best wishes.

(Text):

I should like to take a few moments, Mr. Speaker, to outline some of the needs of the riding which I have the honour to represent in this house, and to inform the house of the feelings and opinions of the majority of my constituents in regard to certain questions relating to our national policy. Indeed, I deem it the duty of a member of parliament to devote himself, first of all, to the general interest of his country in accordance with the principles advocated by the political party under whose banner he was elected in his constituency, to inform the house when possible of the opinions of the majority of his constituents on the various topics of current interest, and to acquaint the government with certain legitimate needs in his constituency.

The riding of Dollard may be subdivided into two sections. Ville St. Laurent, located northwest of the city of Montreal, and the northeastern part of Montreal, which extends from Guizot and Fleury streets to the limits of Ville St. Michel. In the last few years a tremendous development has taken place in these two sections of Dollard. The population has doubled, many new parishes have been organized, and hundreds of new industries large and small have established themselves there. In the circumstances it is readily understood that the needs of the population have increased. I could describe the riding of Dollard in detail and speak of its greatness and beauty, but I need not do so. All I have to say is that to me it is a good place, a beautiful and progressive district. In short, it is a great place to live because it is part of Canada, and it is the part of Canada that I have the honour to represent in this house.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that I was going to stress some of the needs of my riding. There is one need resulting from the railroad track which crosses the constituency from end to end. The constituency of Dollard is crossed by several railways. These tracks provide a great service to the population and to industry, not only of the riding of Dollard but the island of Montreal as a whole. On the other hand they greatly inconvenience the residents of my riding. In the section of Montreal which is included in Dollard riding the railway track is elevated, thus dividing it into two parts in so far as road traffic is concerned. In order to facilitate north-south traffic it has been necessary to build subways under these railway tracks to allow the traffic to flow through the main arteries of Montreal.

Most of the important arteries are open to traffic, but with the rapid development which has taken place it is urgent that others be opened, and more particularly De Lorimier street. Before long this street will be one of Montreal's most important thoroughfares, crossing the island from north to south. There is already a temporary subway at that point, but it is too narrow and dangerous. It should be enlarged immediately and finished permanently.

Another problem raised by these elevated tracks is the smoke-belching steam locomotives passing thereon. The section of the city which this elevated track crosses is strictly a residential district, occupied by families who have built beautiful homes. When this railway was built a few years ago the residents understood that nothing but diesel or electric locomotives would be used. To that end the Canadian National had the necessary trolley wires installed when the line was constructed. However, the Canadian National, despite repeated representations by the citizens of Montreal North, and by members of this house who preceded me, persists all too often in routing steam locomotives over this track. These locomotives belch smoke and soot, making the whole district dirty and being harmful to the health of the citizens.

Irrespective of any promises which the Canadian National may have made, I strongly protest against what in my opinion constitutes an abuse, because the smoke coming from these locomotives not only prevents the residents from keeping their properties as clean as they would like but is also injurious to the children's health. In the name of my fellow citizens of Dollard I urgently request the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler), the board of transport commissioners and the Canadian National to take the necessary steps to put an end to this practice. As the member for Dollard I shall not rest until justice has been done the families who live along these tracks.

In Ville St. Laurent the railway tracks are at ground level, which causes great inconvenience and constant danger to the population because of the numerous level crossings. I was pleased to note that according to the speech from the throne the government proposes to amend the Railway Act in connection with the elimination of level crossings, in order to implement the report of the board of transport commissioners in that respect. I am hopeful that in the course of the next few months it may be possible to eliminate several crossings in Ville St. Laurent, and also to provide protection in other cases.

During the course of last session the Ville St. Laurent council sent a delegation to Ottawa to present to the then minister of transport, Hon. Lionel Chevrier, a memorandum listing all the reasons in favour of building a subway on Decarie boulevard. This thoroughfare is the one most often used by Montrealers bound for the Laurentians. Because of increased railway traffic at this point not only has the ordinary traffic been slowed down, but a situation has developed which constitutes a very real danger in emergencies. In case of fire, for instance, the firemen would be delayed in getting to their destination. In case of accident the same considerations would apply to ambulances having to go over level crossings.

In the past these conditions have been the cause of catastrophies, to avoid a repetition of which it is urgent that action be taken on the just request of the Ville St. Laurent council. When the representatives of Ville St. Laurent met the minister of transport they were most graciously received and assured by the minister that he would do everything to grant their request. I take the liberty of submitting this question anew to the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) who, I am sure, understands the problem perfectly and will do everything in his power to remedy the situation as soon as possible.

I would point out to the Minister of Transport also that adequate protection is urgently needed on Cote Vertu, O'Brien boulevard and Persillier boulevard. During the last few months we have been grieved by several fatal accidents at those level crossings.

[Mr. Rouleau.]

(Translation):

We have not looked upon these accidents with equanimity, Mr. Speaker. We took the matter up with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) who understands the problem. And we went to the board of transport commissioners, at the request of the municipal council of Ville St. Laurent, which is quite ready to help solve the problem.

The Minister of Transport understands the situation and the board of transport commissioners is ready to correct this anomaly as soon as possible.

I can appreciate the request made by the municipal council of Ville St. Laurent and bodies of its citizens, as well as the publicity given to this question by the newspapers of my constituency, such as the Saint-Laurent News. There is no one that does not wish to prevent a recurrence of the tragedies that have occurred within the last few months. Again, yesterday evening, a man was killed at the level crossing at Cote Vertu.

I offer my most sincere sympathy to the family of Mr. Adrien Lamarre, aged 36. I express the wholehearted wish that this situation may be corrected as quickly as possible. As far as I am concerned, I will take all steps necessary to prevent a recurrence of these tragedies. A human life is worth more than the money necessary for its protection.

(Text):

During the summer months the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) honoured us by being present at the inauguration in the eastern part of Montreal of a new postal station at Youville, the construction of which had become necessary because of the rapid development in the area mentioned earlier. This is a very modern building which will be most useful to the population and for which I extend my most sincere thanks to the minister, to the officers of his department and to the Department of Public Works.

There is need for the same kind of building in Ville St. Laurent. The postal substation here was built at the turn of the century, when Ville St. Laurent was nothing but a village of a few thousand people. In 1947 there were 10,000 people in Ville St. Laurent, while today there are 40,000. Several hundred new industries have moved there.

Trade is keeping pace with industry and as a consequence the present substation is inadequate. Notwithstanding all their efforts the post office officials are unable under existing conditions to give the population and the industries satisfactory service. It is not only necessary, it is most urgent that a new postal station be built if the population are to be provided with the postal services to which they are entitled.

The Postmaster General and the officials of his department know the situation. At this time I should like to thank the minister, who was kind enough last summer to come with some of his officials to see what the situation was at this station. I am aware that the Postmaster General, along with his officials and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), is trying at the present time to work out a solution for the problem. On behalf of the citizens of Ville St. Laurent I wish to thank him.

Ville St. Laurent is privileged to have within its borders an airport of which it is proud. However, this airport which is located entirely within the limits of Ville St. Laurent is called Cartierville airport. The authorities of Ville St. Laurent have asked me, and I am in complete agreement with them, to submit to the Minister of Transport and to the board of transport commissioners that it would be logical for this airport to be known as St. Laurent airport. I take pleasure in submitting this request to the Minister of Transport, and I hope he will see his way clear to make the appropriate change. In addition to meeting the request of the authorities of Ville St. Laurent, I submit that it would honour the great Canadian who is the Prime Minister of Canada.

Such are some of the needs of Dollard riding. I hope the government will give them the consideration they deserve.

During the parliamentary recess I had the good fortune of meeting many of my constituents, and I would like to pass on to the house some of the opinions expressed to me and which seem to represent the wishes of the majority on a few questions of current interest.

My fellow citizens were gratified at the government's decision to locate the national film board in Dollard riding, and are pleased to see that a building is going up which will soon house its services. On their behalf I wish to thank the government and especially the Minister of Public Works, who is responsible for its construction.

It is also a matter of satisfaction to us that work on the St. Lawrence seaway has begun, convinced as we are that once the waterway is completed the whole country will benefit by it. However, I would support the authorities of the city of Montreal in their request to the government and to the St. Lawrence seaway authority to take the necessary steps to see that the interests of the city of Montreal, the metropolis of Canada, are protected.

As Canadians we are rightly proud of our metropolis, and it is our duty to ensure that the construction of the seaway will not hinder the development of Montreal, or cause it to lose its place as the metropolis of Canada. Many of my fellow citizens are concerned about this question; this is why I take the liberty of drawing the attention of this house and of the government to this matter, expressing the wish that in the development of the St. Lawrence seaway the interests of our metropolis will be considered as well as those of the whole of Canada. We shall be very happy if this new achievement, while being of great benefit to Canada at large, gives commercial impetus to the city of Montreal.

During the parliamentary recess I was often asked another question with regard to restrictions imposed by the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on privately-owned radio and television stations. Most of my fellow citizens whom I have met, not only in Dollard riding but also in Montreal and elsewhere in Canada, are opposed to the fact that this organization which competes directly with private enterprise should be at the same time the organization that controls and grants permits to private stations.

We know that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation through its radio and television networks renders a great service to our country, but we would prefer that it be treated on an equal footing, or nearly so, with stations belonging to private enterprise. Such a practice would be more consistent with the democratic principles of Liberalism, and furthermore it would comply with the resolutions passed by the advisory council of the national Liberal federation at its meeting held in Ottawa on the 27th and 28th of October, 1952, and also by the federation of young Liberals of Canada during their biannual convention held in May, 1954.

Before resuming my seat I wish on behalf of my fellow citizens of Dollard to thank the Prime Minister of Canada for everything he has done and continues to do to prevent an important group of our fellow citizens from being taxed more heavily than others. We are grateful to the Prime Minister for giving his attention to the problem of double taxation which exists in the province of Quebec, and I take this opportunity to protest vigorously against the astounding statement made on January 12 last by an hon. member of this house to the effect that the Prime Minister of Canada had lowered himself in going to meet the premier of my province in an effort to find a way of settling the fiscal problems between Quebec and Ottawa.

Judging from his speech I am strongly under the impression that my hon. friend has some difficulty in understanding the facts and conditions that exist in his own country. This is why, lest he should misinterpret my words as he has misinterpreted the happenings in his own country and especially in the province of Quebec, I shall direct my remarks particularly to him and I shall speak in my mother tongue. He will have the opportunity, if he so wishes, to read them in the official translation of the debates of the house.

(Translation):

I will say to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) that, as a Canadian citizen and as a Liberal, I did not feel humiliated in seeing the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) go to Montreal to meet the premier of one of the oldest provinces of my country, in order to find in a friendly atmosphere a solution to the problem existing between Quebec and Ottawa.

The Prime Minister of my country thus showed once more that he can raise himself above party politics when the welfare of the Canadian people is at stake.

With all the inhabitants of the province of Quebec, I read with a sigh of relief the report released by these two heads of governments following their meeting in Montreal, which allowed us to expect that the dispute which had lasted too long would be settled. By his unfortunate speech, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam obviously showed that he lacks the broadmindedness required to fill a responsible position.

After a brief journey through the various provinces of our country, he found nothing better to do than to attack each one of the provinces which form the Canadian confederation, including the province where he lives. As far as I am concerned, I had the advantage to travel from coast to coast on three different occasions and, since he mentioned in his speech that he spent more days in the province of Quebec than six French-speaking members have spent so far in his own province, I would say to him that I had the pleasure of spending many weeks in the magnificent province of British Columbia and in the marvellous city of Vancouver. In every province of my country, I always found a cordial welcome and on my return to Montreal, I was always pleased and charmed with my fellow citizens and dazzled by the beauty and wealth of my country.

The hon. member could do no better than to find fault with each one of the provinces of confederation and it was with a violence full of hatred that he attacked the province of my birth. To dare predict that my province would be the first to turn communist, he must understand very little the feelings of its inhabitants or he must have met the rare exceptions who share his ideas. When he made his accusation, it struck me as so absurd that for a moment I wondered what was the reason for his attack and what he meant to achieve.

If there is in the Canadian confederation a province that is against communism it is indeed the province of Quebec; I am convinced that in this respect it shares the common feeling of the vast majority of the Canadian people. In describing his trip, the member for Burnaby-Coquitlam reminded me somewhat of certain characters created by Voltaire: disillusioned, cynical characters who could see nothing but afflictions, vices, faults and ugliness. I do not wish to devote any more time to a speech so harmful to Canadian unity, towards which all Canadians of good will have strived and especially the right hon. Prime Minister. If the member for Burnaby-Coquitlam thinks he can win votes by saying that the province of Quebec will be the first province to turn communist, he is greatly mistaken, because, to my mind, it is precisely the fear Canadians have of communism that prevents the C.C.F. party from obtaining the success it anticipates in Canadian politics when an appeal is made to the country.

I have respect for the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell), but I am deeply worried over the opinions expressed by certain members of his party, especially after having heard their speeches. In conclusion I wish only to quote an extract from an article published in the Labour Review, volume 2, No. 3, page 43, under the heading: "Comrades in the C.C.F.", by Herbert Anderson. It proves that our fears are justified in regard to the communist tendencies of certain members of the C.C.F. party. I quote:

> Those west-coast CCF people pretty well tipped their hand when they held their annual meeting in Vancouver. To put it bluntly, far too many of them showed up to be communist. A recorded account of their meetings, plus what got into the papers, indicated that between a third and a half of the British Columbia crowd are communist-minded.

The C.C.F. party has not yet disclaimed that article; therefore, I beg Providence to preserve us from the calamity that the C.C.F. party in power would visit upon us.

(Text):

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I expect to have some critical remarks to offer as I proceed. Before proceeding with them I should like to express my appreciation to the government for having announced that the war veterans allowances will be increased during the present session. I am sure I speak for veterans in all parts of Canada when I say this legislation is very much appreciated.

I should also like to thank the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) for the very good news he gave my constituency this afternoon. I mentioned last year that although Mackenzie is a very old constituency it is unable to boast of a single federal public building, and all in one year the minister is proposing to erect three public buildings. In view of the fact that this is our jubilee year in Saskatchewan the people in three communities, Carrot River, Kelvington and Porcupine Plain, will appreciate this very much. Of course the three combined will not cost as much as the national film board buildings which are being erected in the constituency of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. Those three buildings will cost less than $100,000; nevertheless they will be appreciated.

At this time I am sure I speak for all my colleagues in Saskatchewan when I extend an invitation to all members from all provinces of Canada to visit our province during the recess. Saskatchewan is not the richest province in Canada, but as far as hospitality is concerned we will put out the red carpet for members who can manage to visit us any time during our jubilee year.

The brief which was placed in the hands of members of parliament by the interprovincial farm union council points up a problem which is very real in all parts of Canada. They deal with the crisis which is confronting agriculture. I listened with close interest to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stanton), who spoke before the dinner recess and said that members of our group have not discussed the problem which confronts the cheese producers in Ontario. It certainly is not because we are not in sympathy with them, but we have not this industry developed to a very large extent in our constituencies. The problems of the cheese producers are the same problems that the wheat producers and the livestock producers in all provinces of Canada are experiencing.

This brief points out that Canadian agriculture as a whole during the last three years has suffered a most serious setback because of declines in farm product prices, while farmers' costs remained at high levels. They point out that the net farm income in 1951 ran about $2,188 million. Next year it was down to $1,949 million and the following year to $1,667 million. The estimate for 1954 is $1,200 million, a drop of nearly $1 billion during those three years. They admit that there are places in Canada where agriculture is in quite a healthy position, and there are individual farmers here, there and everywhere who are in a comfortable position; but the whole brief supports the case—and it is well established—that agriculture is facing a major crisis.

In one of his latest bulletins the Minister of Trade and Commerce points out that the farm income is down about 12 per cent for 1954 from the previous year and down about 15 per cent from the all-time high in 1952. The bulletin mentions that the decline in farm income can be attributed in large part to the substantial reduction in returns from the sale of wheat. It is true that the returns from the sale of wheat do bring down the over-all average, but I submit that those of us who live in portions of Canada where our income is from wheat find that this drastic reduction is having most serious consequences.

According to this release, in the province of Saskatchewan the cash income from the sale of farm products in 1953 amounted to $743,352,000 and last year to $465,612,000, a reduction of almost 35 per cent. I need not explain that this is having a most serious effect, and not only in that area where wheat is produced.

The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stanton) mentioned the calamity which has befallen the people of Smiths Falls, which is a few miles from here, involving a very old industry. He said the Frost and Wood Company had been compelled to close its doors and turn a large number of people into the ranks of the unemployed. That is a direct result of the fact that the farmers' income has been reduced so drastically, particularly in western Canada.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture also analyses what is happening to the farmers' share of the national income in a release dated April, 1954. This gives the share of the national income which went to the farmers in 1926, 1946, 1951, and 1953. In 1926 the farmers' share of the national income was 14·8 per cent; 20 years later it went down to 11·3 per cent; in 1951 it was 12·3 per cent and in 1953, the last year for which the federation have figures available, it was 8·7 per cent. They point out that 13 per cent of the Canadian people are involved in agricultural operations.

One might expect that 13 per cent of the people would receive 13 per cent of the national income. We often pay tribute to the farmers as being the salt of the earth, and we recall people in this and other countries getting their start on a farm. If we really mean what we say about the importance of agriculture I think we will readily admit that 8·7 per cent of the national income going to 13 per cent of the people represents a very critical situation indeed.

I received a copy of the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations from the queen's printer the other day. This is a reprint of the material that was prepared by the Rowell-Sirois commission just prior to the outbreak of world war II, and on page 150 of the first volume they present a table showing what happened during the period 1928 to 1933, when conditions such as we are witnessing now developed much more rapidly and all Canada felt the impact. In Saskatchewan the average per capita income fell from $474 to $135, a drop of 72 per cent; in Alberta there was a drop of 61 per cent; in Manitoba 49 per cent, and in Canada as a whole 48 per cent. Other provinces felt the impact as follows: British Columbia, 47 per cent; Prince Edward Island, 45 per cent; Ontario, 44 per cent; Quebec, 44 per cent; New Brunswick, 39 per cent, and Nova Scotia, 36 per cent. The wheat-producing areas were the first to feel the impact and, of course, they felt the consequences much more severely than any other province.

On page 100 of this report there is a very interesting paragraph, and perhaps I should add that this was not written by the present government. It was prepared by the government of which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was a cabinet minister some years ago. It states:

> The people of Saskatchewan have suffered a reduction in income during the last decade which has probably been unparalleled in peacetime in any other civilized country. Net agricultural income averaging some $200 million a year in the late twenties fell to an actual negative amount in 1931 and 1932, and was only about one-tenth of that average in 1937. Total provincial income (after including federal relief payments in the province) fell in the thirties by more than half, and in the worst years by two-thirds of the 1926-29 annual dollar average.

I am not suggesting that conditions out there are as they were during the thirties, but I am suggesting the drastic reduction in the income of the wheat farmers is having a serious effect on all sectors of our economy, and it is going to require action by the national government to stop this trend and see to it that the agricultural producers in the prairie provinces and in all parts of Canada get their fair share of the national income.

The situation in my own corner of Saskatchewan is more critical than anywhere else in the province, for a variety of factors. We were in the fortunate position of never having had a crop failure during the years of drought when other sections of the west went through year after year without seeing rain. But the last three years have been unparalleled in our history in that we have had so much rain each year that a great many farmers have not had any crop at all as a result of floods and excessive moisture.

I have received reports from ten municipalities in my own constituency; the Minister of Agriculture will be familiar with them. They are Bjorkdale, Buchanan, St. Philips, Sasman, Porcupine, Kelvington, Invermay, Hazel Dell, Livingston, and the L.I.D. office at Hudson Bay. These ten municipalities report to me that at the end of December a year ago they had arrears of taxes totalling $591,096, and at the end of December this year the arrears of taxes were $895,421.

Hon. members will agree, I am sure, that all Canadians wish to pay their taxes first of all, and they are conscious of the vital importance to them of sound municipal government. They are interested in keeping their schools running, in maintaining roads and bridges and other essential services, and therefore an increase in the arrears of taxes in a very productive area in Saskatchewan, to the amount I have mentioned, indicates that the farmers living in that area certainly have not been able to build up bank accounts during prosperous years.

I think the paragraph I read from this publication indicates that there were very good reasons why the farmers in the wheat-producing areas of Canada were unable to build up reserves during the thirties and during the war years when farm commodities were pegged at low prices. The farmers thus were not able to get in as favourable a financial position as many other people in this country.

I also have returns from four of the larger school units in my constituency. These are Tisdale, Canora, Kamsack and Nipawin, which report that they have $789,770 owing to them from municipalities in their area in arrears of taxes, and they in turn owe the banks $429,000 in overdrafts and loans, or an average of over $100,000 per unit at the end of December 1954.

The two sets of figures which I have presented to the house suggest that conditions in that area are certainly very serious. I do not think there is any easy solution for it, but I think we should recognize that the 15 million people in Canada somehow or other should be able to organize our economy so that those who produce food for our own nation and for our other customers would be able to get a fair share of the national income so they could have some reserves to put away for bad years, so their arrears of taxes would not pile up as these figures would indicate, and so they would be able to pay their school teachers and give their children all the advantages that are available in other parts of the country. I am not suggesting that there is any easy solution, but I think we can solve it.

During the summer when I was in Europe I took time to visit some of the countries that are facing problems like ours. In Great Britain, at a meeting at the Labour party conference, I was interested to find that one of the best economists there drew their attention to the fact that in Great Britain the farmers are not getting their fair share of the national income, and that if and when labour should form a government again, one of the tasks they must undertake immediately is to see that the farmer in the United Kingdom gets a fairer share of the national income. They said that is not going to be very popular with a large number of trade unions who do not want food prices to increase but, they said, "We want to be fair and we want to make sure that those who are producing food for us get a fair share of the pounds, shillings and pence which are available in Great Britain".

They are embarking on a policy that could easily have fairly serious effects on our economy. They are providing a substantial wheat subsidy. If my figures are correct, something like 65 cents a bushel is being provided as a subsidy to their wheat producers. I pointed out that Canada produces and exports the best wheat in the world. They did not deny that. However, there is a real danger of war and they must give some consideration to what would happen if war broke out and they were entirely dependent on overseas countries, for their foodstuffs, particularly their cereals. Even though it is costing their treasury a good deal of money to increase their production of wheat, they consider that it is in the best interests of the country to provide these subsidies. Something like $6,500,000 is being paid to the 21,000 growers as a result of the policy they are carrying out to encourage the production of their own cereals.

In Sweden I find that once a year the government meets with the representatives of the farmers. They review the general economy of the country and decide on what sort of a deal should be established for the next year for agriculture so the wheat producer, the butter producer and the hog producer will all have, for one year, prices which bear a fair relation to the wages and salaries that other people get. The Swedish farmer, when I was there, was being paid $2.28 a bushel for his wheat. This price was some 15 to 20 per cent higher than they would have been paying if they had bought Canadian wheat, but they consider that it is good policy for Sweden to have a healthy, flourishing agricultural industry. The farmers pay something like 75 cents per 230 pounds into a fund to make up for the losses that are involved in connection with the export business. If I remember correctly, they consume about 500,000 tons of wheat in Sweden, but as a result of the policy they have been following since 1947 they have built up quite a substantial surplus. Nearly as much wheat seemed to be on hand as they consume in one year. But the government has been paying $75 million into the fund to support agricultural prices. Sweden has about half the population we have in Canada. Similar support would cost about $150 million in Canada.

In France the price paid to the farmer, as I recall it, was $2.57. I wish we could get international agreement at some time so the metric system could be used all over the world. It is extremely difficult, as you travel about, to figure out the relationship between kilometers and miles and between ounces and grams. The price paid to the French farmer for his wheat was something like $2.57, which seemed to be a reduction of about 15 cents from the price which was paid the previous year. Part of this reduction was as a result of increased productivity in the country. Part of it was as a result of the reduction in prices in France.

There too they take into account the prices the farmer has to pay for his machinery and his fuel oil, and all the other costs he must meet. The prices are reviewed from time to time and they go up or down, depending on a number of these factors. They also are building up quite a large surplus and are reducing the price with a view to discouraging the building up of such a large surplus.

They also have a policy there—I am not sure that it is too sound—of paying a higher price to smaller operators. Those who deliver quintals—I have forgotten what the relationship is between quintals and bushels—are paid according to the number they deliver. If they deliver between 1 to 25 quintals, the net price to the farmer is 3,570 francs. One who is selling from 100 to 200 gets a price of 3,440 francs. If you are selling over 1,000, your price is down to 3,315 francs. This policy has been worked out, no doubt, to encourage the smaller farmers in France to keep up their production. The assumption is that the larger operators are able to cut down their operating costs.

In West Germany there was an agricultural policy that was extremely favourable to the farmers. The wheat farmer had a price of about $2.63 to $2.73 a bushel. The prices for barley were much higher than those in Canada. Barley prices were from $1.76 to $2.20, and $1 to $1.26 for oats. In Germany they have another policy—one that we have been trying to persuade the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture to adopt—to encourage farm storage. For wheat there is a payment of about 12·6 cents per bushel extra to the farmer on condition that he keeps his grain on his farm rather than filling up the elevator space, and about 11·7 cents for rye.

I do not wish to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that I should like to live in any of these countries I have mentioned, or that I should like to farm in them. I have said repeatedly that while I was away I did not see any country that I liked as well as Canada and that farming, as I saw it in these European countries, does not appear to me to be as attractive as does farming in Saskatchewan, even with the low prices we are getting and the other problems that we want to solve at some time. But I think it is significant that in these countries I have mentioned they are devoting a great deal of thought and effort to increasing the production of foodstuffs as part of an over-all national policy.

I am aware of the problem we might have on our hands here if the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce guaranteed prices, such as we did in the past. Canada has a tremendous capacity to produce agricultural products. In this world in which we live, with all its tensions, I think we should recognize that producing food is one activity that should be encouraged and that Canada should go all out first of all to see that every Canadian citizen is able to obtain maximum quantities of food.

I received a letter today from the old age pensioners in British Columbia containing a table showing the increase in the cost of foods over a period of years, and they suggest that the pension should be increased. I cannot think of any good reason why, with this large surplus of butter, every old age pensioner in Canada should not have the benefit of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. In the United States they worked out a stamp plan some years ago when they had these problems. Everybody in a certain category got stamps entitling them to butter, fruits and a wide variety of surplus products they had at that time in the United States.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Last year I put some figures on the record showing how our milk consumption had gone down over a period of years. How was it that during the war, with more than a million of our young people in the services and another large group in war industries, we increased our consumption of milk to an all-time high, to over one pint per person per day? During the thirties it was ·80 pint per person per day; then it rose to 1·02, and it has been going down ever since. In 1953 we were down to ·88 pint per person per day.

During the war the minister of finance emphasized again and again that whatever is physically possible must be made financially possible. I submit that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture, together with their colleagues in the cabinet, can work out ways and means if they want to so that we can increase tremendously our consumption of foodstuffs in Canada in order that no section of our people will ever be short of butter, eggs, meat, potatoes, fruits and all the foods that are available in Canada.

There is another important plan that I should like to suggest. I think the cabinet should give consideration to the suggestions made at the time of the Rowell-Sirois commission investigation regarding the importance of the federal government sharing with the provinces the costs of many of our essential services. I refer to services such as health, education and roads, which are very costly now but very necessary. I am indebted to the Canadian Bank of Commerce for the information they provided in their commercial letter of March, 1953. They give the total amounts that Canadians pay in taxes to federal, provincial and municipal governments. To the federal government they were paying $3,732,000,000, to provincial governments $756,000,000, and to municipalities $547,000,000.

It is not easy for us to remember billions and millions. Let us break these figures down into units that we can remember. If we take each dollar the Canadian citizen pays in taxes, he gives 74 cents to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), 15 cents to the province in which he lives, and 11 cents to his municipality. With the very high cost of conducting government I think it is obvious that the municipality cannot possibly fulfil its responsibilities to the people on the 11 cents out of the taxpayer's dollar that is available to the municipality. Likewise the provinces cannot discharge their responsibilities on the 15 cents that they have available. I realize that the federal government has a great many demands, but I have never known a federal government that has gone bankrupt or has been unable to carry out a desirable program.

There is not a member in the house who will not agree with me when I say that if war should break out again Canada would immediately embark on such a program that the records we established between 1939 and 1945 would be surpassed. There is no doubt about that at all. We have the resources, and we have the men and women who would be willing to respond. Therefore I submit that it is the responsibility of the federal government now, with a very large unemployment problem, with a very serious condition confronting the farmers of Canada from Newfoundland to British Columbia, to come to the assistance of the provinces and the municipalities by giving first of all real assistance in the fields of education, health and transportation.

In one of the British Hansards I saw some time ago that it now costs £25,000 to train a pilot for the air force. Taking the pound at $2.80 that works out to around $70,000 in Canadian funds. I presume that is approximately what it would cost. If a young chap is to qualify for aircrew he must have grade 12 or grade 13 education. I submit that it is not fair to ask the municipality and the province to provide that very necessary education for 12 to 15 years, and then for the state in a very short time to spend $70,000 on what is also necessary education.

In the field of health we find that assistance is needed by the provinces. In Saskatchewan a medical college is being opened very shortly. I am told that the taxpayers of that province are going to be taxed at least $10,000 for every student who graduates. We are not complaining, but I imagine that for some time the situation will continue that doctors can make larger incomes more easily in Ontario and Quebec, and probably in other provinces, and certainly we cannot keep these graduates in Saskatchewan when the life and the returns in other provinces are so much more attractive. I submit that the federal treasury should be carrying a very large share of the cost of health services.

In the field of transportation I think the maintenance of good roads is more than the municipalities and provinces can stand. In the state of Montana, just south of where I live, I find that in 1952 the United States government spent $6,045,000 on federal roads. In a General Motors showroom in my constituency I saw some time ago a breakdown of where your money goes when you buy a Pontiac car. On the cheapest Pontiac model you pay $405 in sales and excise taxes to the federal government. When one considers the large number of cars that have been manufactured in Canada and the revenue the federal treasury has derived in sales and excise taxes, I think it is not unreasonable that the federal government should share the cost of building not one trans-Canada highway but a network of highways across the country.

Finally, I hope the federal government will do two things. I hope it will meet the very reasonable request of the interprovincial farm union council for the establishment of parity or fair prices for all agricultural products in Canada, so that farmers in all parts of the country can have a fair share of the wealth produced by all the citizens of the country. In the second place, I hope that this session the government will make adequate provision for generous assistance to the provinces in the fields of education, health and roads.

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): My first remarks, Mr. Speaker, will be to offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I would say that both discharged their task in a manner that promises well for their future as members of this house.

I believe that the speech from the throne justifies us in feeling that this session will be a very fruitful one. I particularly underline certain measures which will help to alleviate the burden now on the shoulders of a large number of Canadians who are totally or partly dependent upon public assistance in solving their personal and family problems. Every member of this house learned with great satisfaction of the decision taken by the government to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide an increase in the duration and scale of supplementary benefits, as well as other amendments intended to make unemployment insurance of greater benefit to the unemployed.

The National Housing Act of 1954, adopted during the last session, will be broadened to enable landlords to obtain loans for home improvements. I hope this will pave the way for a full rural loan measure, similar to that existing in some provinces, for farm owners. At this point I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) upon his timely suggestion that the national housing scheme be amended to give home owners the same protection as that given to the lending institutions. This would be provided by means of equity insurance, at a premium the prospective owner could pay, to protect him against the loss of his initial investment.

After a splendid exposition of the many reasons militating in favour of his suggestion, and the procedure which could be followed if it were carried out, our learned colleague went on to say at page 110 of Hansard for January 12:

> I believe it is the duty of the government, which is encouraging him to invest his all in a national housing home, to offer him a measure of protection. At the present time the government is protecting lending institutions by insuring the amount of the mortgage. With that I am in full accord and agreement. You can believe me that the lending institution, with its funds spread over thousands of investments, and secured in each case by property, is far less in need of protection than the national housing owner, who has all his eggs in one basket.
> At the present time, and quite properly, the government protects the national housing mortgagee, and it is my view that it should protect the national housing owner, at least to the extent of his initial down payment. Every owner is far more vulnerable than the lending institution. No matter what happens, the lending institution cannot lose. In the event of a foreclosure it will look first to the property, and then to the government for repayment. But the owner may very well be wiped out.

I sincerely hope the government will give consideration to this timely suggestion. This will be another opportunity to show that this party has always been concerned with seeing that the small owners get the security to which they are justly entitled.

The government is to be praised also for increasing the basic rate, as well as the ceiling on permissible income, of the recipients of war veterans allowances. These veterans already derive benefit from the generous War Veterans Allowance Act. Other changes will be proposed to the national defence and defence services acts. I welcome also the fact that consideration is being given to the request to lower the eligible age for blind pensions, and to raise the income ceilings for these unfortunate people. Fishermen ought to be equally happy to learn of the decision taken by this government which will enable them to obtain loans on a similar basis as that provided in the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

The government, having taken into account the regional and seasonal unemployment which now exists, and which we all deplore, is endeavouring to help this situation by accelerating public construction projects already approved and assuring financial provision for the construction programs of various departments and agencies on an enlarged scale. The proposed amendment to the Railway Act to provide for the elimination of level crossings must not be overlooked. This might help to eliminate tragic accidents and accelerate traffic at these points.

These good measures have been the objects of laudable comments not only by members on this side of the house but also by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) and some of his followers, as well as other members sitting on the opposite side of the house. According to the Conservative party's spokesman, many of his followers have reason to be thankful to the government for the realization of projects or measures they had advocated in the past.

The Acting Leader of the Opposition said the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) would certainly have read the speech from the throne with a little chuckle to himself and would be glad that at last the government had heeded his pleas on behalf of the war veterans. He went on to say that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) also had reason for being happy because of the blasting, in the near future, of Ripple Rock, an improvement that hon. member has ardently advocated.

The hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean), still according to the Acting Leader of the Opposition, would also be justified in rejoicing when he heard that steady progress was being made toward the inauguration of the new ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of Nova Scotia, and that the project would be undertaken this year. Another observation by the acting leader was to the effect that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), who is very moderate in distributing compliments to the government, along with her colleague the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), should be delighted to note that supplementary benefits would be extended to the unemployed during the winter months.

Of course the acting leader intentionally failed to mention the efforts made by members on this side of the house in favour of the measures now lauded by the government antagonists. Nevertheless, we of this party are particularly proud to receive these testimonies, and to use the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) I will say: "although it is somewhat of an exaggeration to suggest that anything of which we are supposed to be boasting as an achievement is due to pressure put upon us by suggestions from the other side of the house, nevertheless we will be happy to give serious consideration to any constructive suggestion, whatever its source. The genuine welfare of the country is, or should be, of more concern to all of us". These words illustrate the sense of duty of our leader. On all occasions he has manifested his firm determination to serve the best interests of our country in a non-partisan manner.

Now let us study the amendment moved by the Acting Leader of the Opposition and seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). It reads as follows:

We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take or to recommend the necessary measures: (a) to retain and expand Canada's markets abroad for our production, particularly of wheat and other products; (b) to solve the urgent problem of unemployment; (c) to relieve Canadian taxpayers from the burden of excessive taxation and thereby enable Canadian producers to lower their cost of production and to meet increasing competition; (d) to eliminate waste and extravagance in government and improve its efficiency; (e) to facilitate and encourage the processing of our natural resources in Canada, and thereby increase opportunities and employment for Canadians; (f) in co-operation with the provinces to develop an effective contributory plan which will assure that every Canadian will have adequate hospital and medical services.

As to the first paragraph, I leave it to those who are better acquainted with the problems of international markets to supply the information, which in my opinion will show the efforts made by this government to retain the advantages deriving from our commercial relations with other countries, especially with the commonwealth nations. I thought representatives of the opposition would offer suggestions to improve our situation in this connection. If they have not found a better solution than this government has, they ought to be rather bashful about inserting such a paragraph in the amendment.

On the other hand, if members of the opposition have in mind ways of bettering present conditions, they should let us hear them. It is their duty to do so. They may have the intention of taking adequate steps to blast their way into the overseas or the United States or South American and other markets, as the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett said he would but was unable or did not have the ability to carry out. At all events let them tell us how they would tackle and solve this problem.

The Acting Leader of the Opposition must know a lot about blasting into the international markets, as he was a member of the government at that time. In the meantime I prefer to place my confidence in the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is well aware of the situation and whose competence is a safeguard that no opportunity will be neglected in order to find the best possible solution to this problem, with all the unexpected changes to which it is subject.

The second paragraph of the amendment states that the government has failed to take necessary measures to solve the urgent problem of unemployment. All of us in this house deplore that unemployment exists at any time of the year, especially in the wintertime. As I have said previously, this government has taken the necessary steps to help those who are affected by unemployment by extending the period and increasing the rate of the allowances during the winter months, and also by making large appropriations for public works. I represent a constituency whose population is composed almost entirely of workingmen. Anything done to increase the possibilities of employment will receive my approval. I shall discuss this matter at greater length on another occasion.

Let me refer now to paragraph (c) of the amendment, in which the opposition blames the government for not relieving Canadian taxpayers from the burden of excessive taxation, thereby enabling Canadian producers to lower their cost of production and meet increasing competition. Like every other citizen I would like to see a reduction in the heavy taxes we are paying. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) seems to be of the same opinion. He made a declaration recently, although he did not commit himself. Let us hope that we can expect a move in that direction. Like everyone else I am anxious to hear the next budget speech.

I am not blaming my hon. friends of the opposition for making such a popular suggestion, but I would like them to be a little more logical. On the one hand members of all the opposition parties demand the lowering of taxes and, on the other hand, they are asking constantly for higher expenditures in connection with welfare allowances and public works.

I favour the execution of public works on a large scale, especially in seasons when unemployment is high, but I think all will agree with me when I say that public works after all are disguised taxes because the money required is taken from revenue, from the money the government has to dispose of, which consists almost entirely of funds raised through direct taxation on the individual.

As far as increasing welfare allowances is concerned, I shall later analyse what has been done in this connection by the party which has received the support of the people for a longer period of time than any other party since confederation.

There is one timely suggestion in the amendment which in my opinion should be given further consideration by the government. I refer to the paragraph which reads:

To facilitate and encourage the processing of our natural resources in Canada.

I have on several occasions, in this house and elsewhere, expressed my opinion on this matter. A larger proportion of our national resources can be processed here. I know this government has encouraged this policy, as have some of the provinces, but there is room for greater improvement in this regard.

Paragraph (f) of the amendment relates to the provision of adequate hospital and medical services. Everyone knows that such services are mainly the responsibility of the provinces. However, let us see what this government has done in the sphere of social assistance during the period from 1948 to 1953, leaving aside the achievements of other Liberal governments in this connection. During that period of time subventions or grants paid to the provinces by the federal government amounted to $167,407,831 for crippled children, professional training, hospital construction, venereal disease treatment, mental hygiene, tuberculosis and cancer control.

Mr. Dufresne: That is paid by the province.

Mr. Dupuis: That is not paid by the province. The province has to put up an amount and the federal government equals it.

Mr. Dufresne: The larger share is paid by the province.

Mr. Dupuis: If the hon. member cannot understand what I say perhaps I should express myself in French so I may be understood. What I mean to say is that the province puts up a sum and the federal government spends the same amount as the province advances. That is for the hon. member's information.

Mr. Dufresne: It is wrong information.

Mr. Dupuis: It is right information, and I defy my hon. friend to prove the contrary.

Mr. Dufresne: I certainly will.

Mr. Dupuis: I am at my hon. friend's disposal any time. I did not think I could teach anything to an hon. member who has been in this house so long.

Mr. Dufresne: The hon. member has been here too long and he does not know.

Mr. Dupuis: It is not the hon. member's job to decide whether I have been too long in this house. That is a matter for the electors to look after. I feel sure that I know enough that when I advance a point I am sure of it. Otherwise I would not mention it.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Would the hon. member permit me a question?

Mr. Dupuis: Certainly.

Mr. Dufresne: Was that his platform during the last electoral campaign, which brought him such excellent results?

Mr. Dupuis: What a proof of intelligence on the part of the hon. member! What stupendous genius! What relation can there be between the amount spent by the federal government for hospitals in the province of Quebec and the electoral mayoralty campaign I launched with no success, unfortunately? That remark of his confirms my opinion; I have seldom met such a genius!

(Text):

A total of $94 million was paid during the same period to provinces which had spent an equal amount under the terms of the agreement between the federal government and the provinces.

I might also mention other forms of subsidies or contributions made by the federal government to the provinces for such purposes as the training of health workers, the training of nurses, the training of nursing assistants, mental health, and the employment of health workers. To this we must also add the salaries paid to the persons trained or undergoing training under the national health program, such as physicians, dentists, nurses, sanitation personnel, technicians, statisticians, and many others specialized or specializing in various other fields of public health. The number of those on the payroll totalled 4,947 during the period 1948 to 1953.

We have learned with great satisfaction from the report issued by the department of health and welfare that the federal government will offer additional financial aid to the provinces to help create (a) better health care for the disabled; (b) better health care for mothers and children; (c) better facilities and services to help doctors diagnose their patients' illnesses. The amount to be voted for that purpose is $42,000,000 for the next five years. These figures can be obtained because they are published by the department. All this does not take into account other sums spent by the Department of National Health and Welfare for special studies and research in laboratories, in the food inspection division and in many other items.

This is proof that the federal government, contrary to what the opposition claims, has accomplished a great deal in assuring adequate medical services. I understand that the plan for national health insurance is still being considered, and that negotiations are under way between the federal and provincial authorities. I hope they will lead to a mutual understanding between the interested governments which will be to the advantage of the people, especially the working class who cannot afford to meet the prohibitive cost of hospitalization. Incidentally I will say that in Montreal last year $695,000 was given to the neurological institute. That shows that a lot has been done to provide adequate medical services.

Before concluding my remarks on this subject I wish to draw the attention of my colleagues to the fact that out of the $167 million which was allotted to them during the period 1948-53, the provinces have used only some $94 million. It is up to each province to make full use of the federal contributions to expand hospital accommodation and medical services. Much more can be accomplished in that direction; and referring to the province of Quebec only I will say that there is a very great need for more hospital space, especially for those afflicted with mental illnesses. What more do our friends opposite need to prove that adequate hospital and medical services are receiving the attention of this government?

Mr. Dufresne: Change sides and you will have the answer.

Mr. Dupuis: I do not have to change sides to be right. I am right on both sides. Must I deduce from the words of the member for Quebec West that he would be talking differently if he were on this side? Unless one is as blind as a bat he must recognize the splendid work accomplished by this government in the sphere of public health. I wish to seize the present opportunity to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who at all times has proven his ardent desire to ensure the best health and welfare conditions for our citizens. He has accomplished a wonderful task for which the people of Canada are grateful; that is, excluding the opposition members.

Now let us see what else has been done in the last 20 years under different Liberal governments in the field of public welfare, leaving aside the unemployment insurance scheme which has been so profitable to the workers of this country. In 1927 old age pensions were paid at the rate of $20 a month to people 70 years of age and over. The rate was raised to $25 a month in 1943 and the means test scale broadened. The allowance was again raised to $30 a month in 1947, and to $40 in 1949. This was a Liberal measure enacted by a Liberal government. In 1952 the age at which a person was entitled to old age pension was reduced to 65, and old age security and old age assistance guaranteed to every citizen 70 years of age and over. In the first case the means test scale was maintained. Let us bear in mind that not only have the aged people been given assistance at an earlier age than that requested when this measure was first put into force, but the monthly allowances have been doubled since this party has been in power. That is not such a bad record.

It was in 1945 that the government, under a Liberal administration, instituted family allowances entirely at the cost of the federal government. I am sure nobody ever thought that $5 or $6 a month was enough to maintain a child. The intention of the sponsors of such a good social measure was to alleviate the burden entailed in bringing up a family. Some are asking to double this allowance. I certainly favour this suggestion, although it would mean an extra expenditure of $400 million. Incidentally, the number of families in receipt of this allowance at the present time is around two million, representing five million children. I hope when the situation created by the menace of war disappears, which necessitates the spending of huge sums to assure our national safety, more generous allowances in all spheres of social security or welfare will be provided by this government.

As I just said, the whole cost of family allowances is borne by the federal government. I realize that doubling them would be a great help to a large number of fathers and mothers. Even $10 a month will not be enough, mind you—and every member in this house knows that as well as I do—to look after the necessities of life and the education of a child. However, I would favour such an increase. I do not want to pass the buck to someone else, as we commonly say, but I sincerely submit that the different provinces should make it their duty to allocate to their residents a monthly allowance at the same rate as that granted by the federal government.

My friends of the Social Credit party in my province have launched a wide campaign in favour of the doubling of family allowances. I hope they succeed. However, I want to say this to the hon. members of the Social Credit group. Their friends hold power in two provinces. I suggest that the federal members belonging to that party take the necessary steps to have their friendly governments in British Columbia and Alberta make up the difference existing between the actual rate of family allowances and the increase suggested.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): They do more than that, I want you to understand.

Mr. Dupuis: That sum of $5 or $6 or $8 that you want added to the present family allowances could be paid by your province, and if they did that we would be very glad of such a gesture.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I am sure they will, too.

Mr. Dupuis: Let those who organize delegations make the same request of the provincial authorities who have the same moral obligation as the federal government to contribute to the welfare of the families.

Mr. Dufresne: They have not the same amount of money, though.

Mr. Dupuis: I shall come to you in a second. I will show you what the budget of our own province is at the present time, and you will be surprised at the difference between the present budget and the one that existed in 1939.

Mr. Dufresne: It is a fine budget.

Mr. Dupuis: You can defend the provincial government as much as you wish, but you are going to let me speak. I am coming to you now.

Mr. Holowach: May I ask my hon. friend a question? After listening to a review of the accomplishments of the Liberal party I should like the hon. member to tell us whether the Liberal party has left anything undone.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Not much.

Mr. Dupuis: They have had the interest of humanity at heart.

Mr. Dufresne: Absolutely perfect and complete.

Mr. Dupuis: My hon. friend for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne), who like myself and others favours the increase, could use the strong influence he has with the government of the province of Quebec and ask that government to contribute in the same manner the federal government has for the past ten years, and allow another $5, $6, or $8, as the case may be, as a supplement to the allowance now received by the heads of families for their children. My hon. friend knows as I do that the annual budget of the province of Quebec is well over $360 million, compared with some $60 million in 1939. Perhaps by cutting out some possible extravagances, of a type similar to that which he reproaches this government with, and which may exist even in that province, it would be possible for the province to contribute to social welfare of this type.

Mr. Dufresne: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Dupuis: Does the hon. member wish to speak in my place? I am very short of time, Mr. Speaker, and I hope these interruptions will be taken into account.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: I will use my influence so that you do not lose time. Would the hon. member be so kind as to say in what way the provinces could co-operate?

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I will not answer the question since the hon. member who is now addressing me is repeating exactly what I have said. I will only explain a little further; I will provide him with the necessary explanations. Let me speak.

Since I have no wish to be called unpatriotic by speaking English to one of my French-speaking colleagues, I will repeat, substantially, what I have just said. I suggest he accompany me to meet the authorities of our province. We will ask them to provide the children with family allowances at the same rate as the federal government, at a higher rate, even, if they feel like it. I am offering my services to the hon. member and do so in all seriousness.

Mr. Dufresne: That will not be easy.

Mr. Dupuis: I have no doubt that such a trip in the company of my colleague will be excellent, and I hope that, with a $360 million budget, the government of our province will have a few millions available to grant the request that my colleague and I approve, namely, the family allowance increase.

Mr. Dufresne: Will the hon. member permit me to lay down one condition?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to have to interrupt, but I feel that I have given enough latitude to hon. members since the beginning of the speech now being made. It is permissible to interrupt, to ask questions, but I think it is contrary to the decorum we want to maintain in this house to indulge in repeated obtrusions while the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis) is delivering his speech.

I should then ask hon. members to allow the representative of the St. Mary constituency to continue his speech without further interruptions.

(Text):

Mr. Dupuis: Others, Liberals, C.C.F., and independent members representing constituencies of different provinces, can certainly do the same in order that family allowances be doubled. I sincerely believe it is the duty of all provinces to contribute to the increase in family allowances in the way I have just suggested. They have a moral obligation similar to that of the federal government. We have seen this government's action with regard to old age pensioners, the blind, and other deserving sections of the community, and there is no reason why the provinces should not spare a few dollars or even a few million dollars to look after our children. I shall view their actions in this regard with some interest. I will then be able to observe the sincerity of those who are calling for increased assistance, particularly the Social Credit members who seem to look in only one direction for help, and that is to Ottawa.

I shall watch the actions of the Social Credit representatives in British Columbia, Alberta and the province of Quebec, together with their responsible governments, in order to see whether they will do as much for the people there as has been done for them by the federal government.

An hon. Member: When we get a new tax agreement we will do something.

Mr. Dupuis: You want additional allowances. The thing to do is to go ahead and get them from the provincial governments you support, if you can.

If the provinces are willing to assume their part of the responsibility the federal government, after reducing the cost of national defence in view of a calmer international situation, could easily use the sum of $400 million, representing the suggested increase in family allowances, in reducing the income tax and improving other measures in the field of social welfare. Relying on what this government and other Liberal administrations have done toward helping the heads of families, and also the attention it has given to the security and welfare of Canadian citizens, I feel I have some ground for hoping that serious consideration will be given to all suggestions the aim of which would be to help those who need financial aid.

I would like to look at some other welfare measures, Mr. Speaker, providing I have sufficient time to do so, and I would hope that in this regard you would take account of the interruptions I have had to endure. Let us take a glance at a few other security and welfare measures adopted by this government and those who have had the responsibility of administering our affairs for the past 20 years. Among these I should mention the allowances to the blind and handicapped. The speech from the throne indicates that these two measures will be modified in order to lower the age of eligibility for those who fall within that category, and also raise the income ceilings in the first case.

I must also underline the generous help landlords will eventually receive—and many have already done so—under the provisions of the National Housing Act. I also note that this government will introduce the necessary legislation to "provide facilities for loans to fishermen similar to those provided to farmers by the Farm Improvement Loans Act." All this, added to what I have already mentioned, is a record any government can be proud of. The policy of the Liberal party has proved itself at all times to be more efficient and constructive than that of the Tories. In the last few years they have found it wiser to change their policy with the sole object and hope of attracting public opinion in their favour.

I shall not vote for the amendment nor the subamendment because I have great confidence in the present government which directs the affairs of our country so efficiently. Although I realize there is ground for improvement in all spheres of our political economy, I do not hesitate to say that this government, and the preceding ones for the last 20 years, have efficiently solved the many problems that have arisen during their respective terms, or certainly as many of them as it was humanly possible to solve.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will realize that at the speed he is now speaking—

Mr. Knowles: Reading.

Mr. Speaker: I avoid mentioning that expression—it might be quite difficult if not impossible for the reporter, no matter how efficient he may be, to take all the words the hon. member is enunciating so rapidly. For the hon. member's information I might mention that only two minutes remain before his time expires.

Mr. Dupuis: I shall now turn to the question of national unity, and I wish at this time to comment upon and briefly challenge the statement made in this house by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). Other hon. members have already done so in appropriate terms. I shall limit my remarks on this ridiculous and fallacious declaration —and I suppose those words are permitted in this house, Mr. Speaker—by saying that I am at his disposal to supply him with documents, briefs and books, if he desires to avail himself of them, containing the appreciation of prominent English-speaking citizens of the province of Quebec who laud the fair treatment received by minorities there. I will also refer him to the magnificent address delivered in this house on January 17 by the hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming (Mr. Proudfoot), whose declaration is another proof that our province has always been broadminded. As reported at page 273 of Hansard he said:

> I want to point out that the minorities have been fairly treated in the province of Quebec. Most certainly that is so when compared with the treatment of minorities in some other provinces of Canada. I would say that in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, 75 per cent of the people are of a different religious faith from myself, and at least 65 per cent of the people in that constituency are of French-Canadian origin. In the last two general elections, the voters of my constituency were willing to and did support me, and I believe those who opposed me did so not because I was of a racial religious minority group but rather because I happened to be of a different political faith.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): You are reading too fast.

Mr. Dupuis: As to the assertion made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that there is no part of Canada that is as ripe for advances by the communist party as the province of Quebec, I just want to tell the hon. member—I will soon be finished with these remarks, Mr. Speaker; I require your indulgence for just another two minutes, no more—who uttered such an erratic statement that he will not live to be old enough to see a situation in Quebec justifying such a stupid prophecy. Generations will go by and Quebec will continue to be the safeguard of Christian and democratic principles in this country. Let that hon. member not forget that communism is the descendant of socialism, which is the creed of the C.C.F. party and its supporters. The more we keep away from socialism, hence C.C.F. ideals, the further we are from communism and its subversive methods. Our institutions, our schools in Quebec, and the clergy of all Christian denominations will always be the bulwark of our democratic liberties.

I am finishing, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member is not yet convinced, I will tell him this. Come east, young man; and if he wishes it, I will accompany him on his tour. I am ready to accompany many members as long as it is for a good purpose. I will accompany him on his tour, but he will have to stay long enough this time in the province of Quebec to become familiar with the way of life and the ideals of its population. He will then find out for himself how foolish and unjustified were his remarks and will, I am sure, seize the first opportunity to make a retraction.

It was my intention to talk of several other subjects—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dupuis: —but I realize that my time has expired. I really thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the indulgence you have accorded me. In the meantime I will just say one thing. I want to assure my constituents that I shall lose no opportunity to justify the confidence they have placed in me and in the party to which I am so happy to belong.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate, after it has gone on for so many days and after so many speeches have been made, I shall endeavour not to be guilty of too much repetition. After listening to the previous speaker, may I say that if the committee on procedure of this house can cut the length of speeches to 30 minutes, I think it would meet the desires of most hon. members.

The speech from the throne is a document that is prepared by the government and is handed to the Governor General to read at the opening of parliament. At this time I want to congratulate the two new members who moved and seconded the address in reply for the effort they put into the preparation of their speeches. From what I have learned from reading the speech from the throne and from listening to the previous speeches, this document is a fairly calm one. In it there is nothing about securing trade or markets for Canadian farm products. There is not even a reference to the pilgrimage to Washington of the three cabinet ministers a few weeks ago for the purpose of securing trade. They must have come back empty-handed because this government is so boastful about things they do that, if they had received any extra trade agreements or things of that sort, we certainly would have heard about it long before now. In the speech from the throne there is not even a reference to that pilgrimage to Washington.

The employment situation is treated as though it were seasonal and unimportant. I think it was the Minister of Trade and Commerce who said it was regional. It is regional all right, because it has permeated every region and every part of Canada. Then someone said that the 600,000 unemployed were an unimportant matter. It may be unimportant to this government, especially to the cabinet, but it certainly is not unimportant to the people of Canada, especially those who are out of work. When 600,000 are out of work it means 600,000 families who are unhappy at this time.

We have had the promise of public works projects, but no indication is given as to what they are or how much is involved. I may be of an unduly suspicious nature, but I suspect that too much has been made of them already and that not half the projects we anticipate will actually be undertaken. There are, however, two proposed matters of legislation that are welcomed. One is the increase in the war veterans allowance, for which the Conservative party has fought for years. The other is the proposed reduction in the qualification age for blind pensions. That is something that is all to the good.

I also recall a recent speech by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) advising the people of Canada to be calm. Calmness has a place, but it is asking much of Canadians to be calm in the face of unemployment which is steadily rising, and to be calm with the continuing loss of export markets. Incidentally, the raising of unemployment insurance payments and the granting of winter bonuses will be appreciated by the people who are out of work, and will tend to alleviate but will not solve the problem of unemployment.

Are the labour forces to be calm in the face of increasing unemployment? Are Canadians to be calm in the face of being subjected to super-heavy taxation which is far above that which is needed to maintain our defences and other branches of government, and which bears so heavily on the lower income families? Are Canadians to be calm when they know that super-taxation has done its part to place prohibitive price tags on the goods they have to buy and on products for which markets have to be found abroad? Shall Canadians be calm when they know that corporate taxation at present super-high rates is killing the goose that lays the golden egg? Without fair profits there cannot be jobs. That statement applies to government-owned industries as well as to private business, as has been proven by the the province of Saskatchewan's experiment in socialist enterprise.

All of us will welcome the expected reductions in taxation this session, although no reference is made thereto in the speech from the throne. This is a course the Progressive Conservative party has advocated for years, but these reductions are several years too late. What of the farmers and other primary producers who are caught in a vise-like squeeze between falling prices for farm products and rising costs of the things they have to buy? Are they to be calm? What of the pensioners whose pensions have been greatly devalued by the cost of living? Are they to be calm? These are but a few of the problems affecting Canada's economy at the present time.

A few days ago the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) said he had more amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to bring before this house. As I said before, everybody appreciates the amendment that was recently passed, but we would welcome other amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I do not see why he is waiting. Why does he not bring them in now instead of telling us that he is going to do so later on in the session? If it is going to be for the benefit of the workers, and if it is going to help the unemployment situation, they should be introduced now. The people need them now.

Then as to the matter of unemployment insurance benefits, even with the benefits that have been added for the winter months these benefits are running out fast in many places. What happens when the benefits run out? You know what happens. The people line up at the relief desks in the municipalities. Who pays the relief? The municipality, to be sure. Does this government help the municipality to pay its relief costs? Not one iota. Is unemployment in Canada the responsibility of this government? Why, certainly it is. Everyone knows it is the responsibility of the federal government. Therefore the federal government should dig down into its pocket and come to the aid of the municipalities in paying their relief costs.

In my own constituency 30 per cent of the labouring men are out of work. In the northern half of my constituency 50 per cent of the men are out of work. The reason is that it is a tourist and lumbering district, and when the tourists go in the fall there is nothing for the people to lean upon except the lumbering industry. Many workmen from other parts of Canada drift into the Haliburton area looking for work in the winter months. They have drifted there this year, but there has been no work for them. The only thing they have done is to increase the number on relief. There are more lining up for relief every day at the municipal offices.

What has happened to the economy of the lumbering industry in Canada? I can tell you. We have lost the British market. When Canada lost the British market for lumber, British Columbia lumber started to come into Ontario. British Columbia lumber producers cut the price and competed with our producers on the 8, 10, 12, 14 and 16 foot lengths that we produce in Ontario. In British Columbia their lumber is produced in longer lengths, and when their yards are piled full with short lengths they become a drug on the market and they can afford to ship them to Ontario and undersell us so far as price is concerned.

There must be something more than that behind the situation. I saw in a newspaper a few days ago that New Zealand has recruited 100 Canadian lumberjacks to work in that country. The government of New Zealand is considering coming to Canada to get more forest labourers to go to their country to work in their lumber industry. How is it that they can manage to produce lumber in New Zealand? Their market must be the same market as ours. That is the situation at the present time so far as my riding is concerned. We cannot sell any lumber.

There is one other point about the unemployment situation that I think I should mention, and it has to do with the Canadian National Railways. The Belleville division is in my riding, and the Canadian National Railways have sent out an order laying off 60 section crew men in that division. That cuts that labour force right in two. You had an average of four men to a section taking care of and maintaining 7 miles of track and now there will be four men taking care of 17 miles. The order is to become effective on the 1st of February.

Snow removal costs have been twice as great this year as in any of the last ten years. The idea of cutting the number of sectionmen is not new. The present set-up in the Belleville division has been in operation for 30 years to my knowledge. The same crews have been taking care of the same mileage, maintaining the same number of miles of track. But now the C.N.R. has seen fit to knock off 60 men and cut the number right in two. Hours of labour are shorter now than they were 15 years ago. Men do not do as much hard work as they used to, but the C.N.R. is going to ask these men to do twice as much work with half as many men.

It appears to the employees that this move is simply retaliation by the C.N.R. on account of the fringe benefits awarded the men by Mr. Justice Sloan in the arbitration of a few months ago. In 1951 the Canadian National Railways came forward with the very same program at about the same time of year. I spoke in the house on the matter at the time. The order went out, but for some reason or other it was not put into effect; the situation was left unchanged and has remained that way up until the present time. In 1951 there were 6 roadmasters on the Belleville division and today they have 21. There are to be fewer sectionmen with more miles to cover and there is more snow to remove, but there are three times as many roadmasters. I think certain types of work on the C.N.R. could stand to be investigated, because it seems to me that the railway is overloaded with officials from top to bottom.

Men are being moved all over the system. Men with 40 years of service are affected and are going to be moved about from one part of the country to another if they wish to hold their jobs. The younger men of course are the ones who will be laid off. The C.N.R. has 50 per cent more officials than the C.P.R., on the basis of the number of labouring men. No wonder the Canadian National comes back to parliament every year and wants more money to operate the road. It is no fault of the men. There are just as good men on the Canadian National as there are on the Canadian Pacific or any other railroad on the North American continent. It is a question of too much officialdom and too high salaries in the top brackets of officials.

Some few years ago I put a question on the order paper in an endeavour to find out what were the salaries of some of the top men of the C.N.R., but that question was never answered. I think I shall try again this year. It may only be a try, but sometimes it is worth it.

I should like to do a little advertising of my own riding. Several things are happening there that I hope will produce a lot of work and be of value to our country. I refer to the discovery of uranium. It is not a new find. Dr. Hugh Spence, the head of the metallurgical service of the department in Ottawa, wrote an article on it in 1932. It was fresh in the minds of the government at that time. Plenty of people asked the government to do something about it, but instead the government spent a billion dollars at Eldorado when there was uranium at the back door of their Chalk River plant.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): In 1932?

Mr. Hodgson: That is being proved now by diamond drilling, and nobody knows it better than the minister.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I ask what government was in power in 1932?

Mr. Hodgson: Yes, but you have been in power ever since 1935. The same thing has been before you. The article was written in 1932, but there certainly has not been anything done about it since.

An hon. Member: The Conservatives found it and you would not use it.

Mr. Rowe: You built Chalk River. We did not need it then. You were the only ones who needed it.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

On motion of Mr. Hodgson the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: I think it is almost two weeks since I appealed to the house to try to wind up this debate. I know there are still a number of speakers who are anxious to participate, but I should point out that there is really no other work being done except in the rules committee, and I would hope that we could wind up the debate early in the week so we could get on with legislation and other work.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister indicate which items of legislation would have priority if we did reach that stage which he regards as so happy?

Mr. Harris: I would not be able to do so at the moment but I could on Monday night, and I would hope that having done so my hon. friend would wind up the debate.

Mr. Rowe: I do not think you will finish it Monday night.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

Regulations respecting the payment of freight assistance on western grains and millfeeds shipped into eastern Canada and British Columbia

Eastern Canada

1. The Minister of Agriculture is authorized to pay freight assistance on:

(a) Western wheat, oats, barley, rye, wheat bran, wheat shorts, wheat middlings, No. 1 feed screenings and No. 2 feed screenings, shipped or transported by rail or boat from Port Arthur, Fort William or Armstrong, Ontario, to destinations in Canada east thereof and distributed for use exclusively as feed in Canada for Canadian livestock or poultry;

(b) Wheat bran, wheat shorts and wheat middlings milled in western Canada, or milled in eastern Canada from western wheat shipped or transported from Port Arthur, Fort William or Armstrong, Ontario, to port elevators or flour mills in Canada east thereof when such bran, shorts, or middlings are distributed from the manufacturing mill for use exclusively as feed in Canada for Canadian livestock or poultry.

2. The payment of freight assistance authorized pursuant to section 1 shall be as follows:

(a) On all rail shipments to destinations in northern Ontario the payment shall be the actual carlot rail freight charges but not exceeding $4.50 per ton;

(b) On all shipments to destinations in Ontario, except northern Ontario, the payment shall be $4.50 per ton;

(c) On all shipments to destinations, other than those in Ontario, the payment shall be $4.50 per ton if the destination is within the Montreal freight rate zone and $4.50 per ton plus the remainder of the through carlot rail freight rate in excess of the Montreal freight rate zone rate if the destination is beyond the Montreal freight rate zone provided that such destination has a through carlot rail freight rate below 80 cents per hundredweight; if the destination of the shipment has a through carlot rail freight rate of 80 cents per hundredweight or higher the payment shall be $6.00 per ton plus the remainder of the through carlot rail freight rate in excess of the Montreal freight rate zone rate;

(d) The rates of payment under paragraph (c) shall not be increased while this order is in effect irrespective of any increase in all rail through carlot rail freight rates which would result in the balance of such rate over the Montreal freight rate zone rate being higher than it is at the time this order becomes effective.

British Columbia

3. The Minister of Agriculture is authorized to pay freight assistance on:

(a) Western wheat, oats, barley, rye, corn, No. 1 feed screenings and No. 2 feed screenings, wheat bran, wheat shorts and wheat middlings, shipped from points of origin in the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and in that part of British Columbia known as the Peace river district, to destinations in British Columbia and distributed for use exclusively as feed in British Columbia for Canadian livestock or poultry;

(b) Wheat bran, wheat shorts and wheat middlings milled in British Columbia from western wheat, shipped from points of origin as designated in paragraph (a), and distributed as designated in paragraph (a).

4. The payment of freight assistance authorized pursuant to section 3 shall be $5.00 per ton less than the carlot short line rail freight charges from Calgary or Edmonton or the point of origin in Alberta, whichever is the lowest, to destinations in British Columbia, and to pay the coastal water carlot shipping charges from any coastal point in British Columbia to any other coastal point therein but not exceeding the balance of the through rail carlot freight rate if the said coastal point is served by rail, provided that if the carlot rail freight rates are increased while this order is in effect the unpaid portion of the charges shall be increased by an amount equal to the increase in the said rail freight rates.

General

5. On all grains and feeds shipped and distributed in accordance with the provisions of this order, evidence satisfactory to the minister must be produced to show that the sale price to consumers of such products has been reduced by and takes into account the payment of freight assistance as herein prescribed.

Bill No. 9, respecting the Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation.—Mr. Mitchell (London).

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES LIMITED—REPORTED REQUEST FOR GUARANTEE OF BONDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that newspapers across Canada, and particularly the financial papers, are reporting that an application to the government has been made by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited for the guarantee of their bonds, will the Acting Prime Minister inform the house if such an application has been made and whether he has any report to give on the details of it?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of a question from the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) and in reply prepared an answer which I can give at this time.

Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited has made representations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and to myself regarding problems associated with financing of the pipe line from Alberta to Ontario and Quebec. These representations are now being studied by the Minister of Finance. No action is being or will be considered by the government until such time as the Minister of Finance is prepared to report to the cabinet in this regard.

HARBOURS

NEW WESTMINSTER AND FRASER RIVER—PRIORITY AND DIRECTORSHIP RESPECTING DREDGING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, notice of which I sent him earlier in the day. Will the minister indicate with whom the authority rests to establish priority and directorship of dredging in the New Westminster harbour and on the Fraser river as between the New Westminster harbour commission and the federal Department of Public Works?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): The Department of Public Works is the authority for dredging in the Fraser river. There is close co-operation between our district engineers, the harbour board and the pilotage authorities. A yearly program of maintenance dredging is laid out, but if a particular or unforeseen need at any point is found by our engineers or is brought to their attention, steps are taken to remedy it at the first opportunity.

MEAT

IMPORTATION OF LAMB PRODUCTS FROM NEW ZEALAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): In view of inquiries made of me over the week end, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he is aware of the fact that New Zealand lamb products in considerable quantities are being brought into Canada at the present time?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I was aware of the fact that lamb was being brought into Canada. I am not sure whether it is still continuing to come, but it has been coming for some time.

Mr. Rowe: I should like to ask a supplementary question, if I may. Has the suggestion been made to the minister that the importations be held in storage until say the middle of April or May so that they may not disrupt the market as much as many livestock men presume they will?

Mr. Gardiner: I shall look into the question. But so far as I am aware, lamb has been coming for some time and I have had no complaints.

Mr. Rowe: I should like to ask one further question, if I may. Is it a fact that a large boatload is coming in or is on the way at the present time? It is rumoured that a much larger quantity than usual is on the way.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not aware of the amount that is coming in at the present time, but it has been coming for some considerable time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF FIRST PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct to the Minister of Agriculture a question arising out of the critical shortage of purchasing power amongst western farmers. Can the minister inform the house what progress has been made in the making of prairie farm assistance payments and when it is expected that the first payment will be made?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I presume that, by the first payment, the hon. member means the 60 per cent, which we try to pay in December.

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: I have a statement of the payments made up to date. The total amount that has been awarded up to date is $3,548,000. As to the 60 per cent payment, the amount that has been paid out is $2,126,154. The delay in making payments this year as compared with other years is due to the fact that rust has caused most of the difficulty and it takes a much longer time to estimate what the payment ought to be. However, it will be put through just as rapidly as we can possibly do it.

[Later:]

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the minister in connection with his reply with reference to Prairie Farm Assistance Act payments in order to remove any suggestion or feeling that is held to the contrary. Is there a differential being paid today between northern and southern Saskatchewan on the basis of a like number of bushels per acre, or is the same payment per acre being made in both areas based on the degree of crop failure?

Mr. Gardiner: It is the same on a bushel per acre basis wherever payment is made, whether it is in any one of the three provinces or any part of any one of the three provinces.

LIVESTOCK

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION PROVIDING FLOOR PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that both the interprovincial farm union council and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture have now requested floor prices under livestock and poultry, is it the intention of the minister to recommend legislation during the course of this session to bring floor prices for these products into effect?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet seen the request which is being made by the federation of agriculture. I have, of course, seen the request made by the interprovincial farm union council. That was made here some time ago. But in so far as I have seen reports in the press, the Canadian federation has asked for approximately what we are doing, with the further suggestion that we should have a formula upon which to base what is being paid. The question is:

> . . . is it the intention of the minister to recommend legislation during the course of this session to bring floor prices for these products into effect?

The legislation we now have does make provision for floor prices being put into effect on any farm products excepting wheat if it is thought wise to do so.

Mr. Zaplitny: May I ask the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Dauphin wants to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Zaplitny: Is it the opinion of the minister that the present legislation provides for floor prices for producers?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. It is not intended to provide floor prices for anyone else but the producers.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DISPOSITION OF QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, was it not understood that we would take order paper questions on Mondays?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): No, I do not recall that it was. It was done last Monday but I do not recall that it was agreed that we would do it every Monday. However, if my hon. friends want to have questions and notices of motions for production of papers dealt with some time this week, we will arrange it.

Mr. Coldwell: Wednesday?

Mr. Harris: Probably.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, January 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, on Friday night just before the house adjourned I referred to a paper written by some of the departmental heads in Ottawa in 1932. I was speaking from memory and I made a mistake of two years because the paper was written by Dr. Hugh Spence and R. K. Carnochan in 1930. The first part of the paper reads as follows:

This paper deals with an occurrence of radium ore near Wilberforce, Haliburton county, Ontario, upon which development work has recently been undertaken and which seems more likely to prove of commercial grade than any other deposit of radioactive minerals hitherto found in Canada. This occurrence is sometimes called the Richardson property, after Mr. W. M. Richardson, the discoverer, and will be so referred to in the present paper.

The ore is referred to in the paper as radium. At that time not much had been heard about uranium. Nothing was known about it so far as atomic energy was concerned. I want to bring it to the attention of the government that the ore was found some years ago. Then there is this passage in the paper:

The first discovery of radium ore in the Wilberforce district was made in 1922 by Mr. W. M. Richardson, a prospector and miner with Alaska and Yukon experience, who had come to Wilberforce in connection with the finds of molybdenite that had been made near that place . . . In the course of prospecting the district, Mr. Richardson found a heavy, black mineral in surface outcrops of pegmatite at different points on the property, and having obtained a sample of . . . pitchblende, identified this mineral as uraninite. He, therefore, took up the mining rights on lots 4 and 5 in concession XXI, and on lot 4 in concession XXII, and proceeded to open up a number of small prospect pits and trenches.

A sample of uraninite sent by Mr. Richardson to Ledoux and Company, of New York, for assay, was reported by them to contain 58·35 per cent of uranium oxide . . . , equivalent to a radium content of 147 milligrams of radium per ton. Late in 1922, Dr. W. G. Miller visited the property and described it briefly in The Canadian Mining Journal of January 11th, 1924.

I mention that to show the house that what they were looking for at that time was not uranium. What was in their minds was radium which they wanted for medical purposes. Then I read the following from the paper:

In 1926, Dr. G. E. Richards, director of the department of radiology, Toronto General Hospital, had visited the property and secured samples of the ore and spring waters. With respect to the latter, Dr. Richards reported that three samples of water taken at various points all showed distinct radioactivity.

In 1927, Mr. M. D. Kennedy made a report on the property to the present company, who in 1929 commenced their first development work. Up to this time, attention had mainly been focussed on several outcrops of pegmatite that represented the points of original discovery of uraninite. . . . It is upon this lead that attention has since been centered and upon which work is proceeding at the present time. All of the three shipments of ore made to the mines branch in 1929, and upon which tests were run, came from this vein.

Since that time this paper was written, and late in the 1930's uranium was discovered there. As I said on Friday night, I do not think these people had very much encouragement from the government so far as uranium was concerned, but in spite of the government and the mines branch that property has been developed until today there are some 2,600 odd claims staked in a township and a half of that area. A lot of diamond drilling has been done and as soon as the snow goes in the spring much more diamond drilling will be started.

I might say that the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Eyre), who is interested in supplying diamond drills and equipment for hard rock drillers, took a stroll through that area last fall. Inasmuch as he has some experience in other mining areas, he certainly was not there to see me. At least, he did not call me. However, he did go over the area, and starting on the first day of April his company is supplying 7 different hard rock diamond drilling outfits in that area.

We have also had there some of the best geologists and engineers in the Dominion of Canada. Many of them come from the northern part of Ontario. There have also been many surveys made, maps prepared and so on. I hold in my hand a map of the district. You will see many other claims staked on it besides those in colour, but the coloured parts will give you some idea of the mines that are ready to operate. Some of them have already started and the rest are ready to begin in the early spring. I could not begin to give the names of all 2,600 companies but these are some with which I am familiar: Rare Earth, Tyson, Blue Rock, Homer Yellowknife, Faraday, Denfield, Croft Uranium, Centre Lake and Canadian Radium.

Quite a few of these mines are subsidiaries of other mines in Ontario. There is no doubt about it that the diamond drill holes now show that we have the goods in that area. Rare Earth has found three distinct rare minerals there, thorium, zirconium and hafnium. Columbium has also been found. These minerals are in quite large quantities and good percentages. That company is a private concern. Nobody is helping it, but it has 37 diamond drill holes below 1,000 feet and they have proved they have enough there in any one of these three claims to almost pay for operating the mine.

So far as uranium is concerned, there is a tremendous potential demand for uranium being created throughout the free world by the present research work on the applications of atomic energy both for military uses and industrial developments such as ship propulsion, electric power, etc. Present production goes exclusively to defence requirements and consumption figures are not available.

So far as other rare minerals are concerned, zirconium and hafnium, they are both newcomers to the industrial field and demand for both of them is expected to increase concurrently with the development of nuclear reactors. Zirconium has no substitute in the construction of nuclear reactor power plants on account of its physical properties, resistance to heat and corrosion, and low thermal neutron absorption cross-section. It is also very much in demand as a metal that can withstand the high temperatures in the combustion chambers of jet engines. According to the United States bureau of mines, as a structural metal, zirconium has tremendous potentialities.

Then we come to columbium. Columbium oxide also appears in appreciable quantity in the assay report. The most important use for columbium is the manufacture of high temperature steels and alloys used in jet aircraft engines. Other uses include electronic tubes, low voltage rectifiers, electrodes for welding stainless steel, and as an oxide in ceramics. The United States is entirely dependent on foreign supply for this metal, and over 97 per cent comes from eastern hemisphere sources, largely Africa.

I believe I am safe in saying, Mr. Speaker, that in Haliburton we have the makings of the greatest mining development that has ever occurred in Canada, as a result of the tremendous amount of uranium ore concentrates that have been found there as well as these rare metals. Whether or not these mining ventures have received very much encouragement from the atomic energy commission or the Department of Mines of this government, matters not. I am not going to argue about it. The people concerned seem to think they have had no encouragement whatever. If no consideration has been given to this company up to the moment I ask the minister, in all seriousness, to give some consideration to it because uranium cannot be mined without the approval of his department. This mineral has to be sold to the government according to the laws of the land, and an export permit cannot be obtained without the approval of the Department of Trade and Commerce. In all sincerity I ask the minister to once more look over the situation. I am sure he will give it some consideration when he sees the assay reports from that area.

There is only one more thing about which I should like to say a word in this debate. When the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) was speaking a few days ago, he linked the trips made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to Quebec to those made by Sir John A. Macdonald at the time confederation was under consideration. I believe everyone will agree with me that the meetings attended by Sir John A. Macdonald resulted in Canada becoming one of the greatest countries in the world. I do not see how one could liken those trips to the trips made by the Prime Minister, and especially the last trip the Prime Minister made in September when he made a sword rattling speech. The Prime Minister took a different attitude when he went down to deal with Mr. Duplessis on the tax situation. Much to his credit, he is trying to do an about-face now. He is trying to patch up some of the mistakes he made in September. I hope the government will call a provincial conference as soon as possible, so that we may have more unity in Canada in the future than we have had in the past.

(Translation):

Mr. H. J. Michaud (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate on the speech from the throne, I feel highly gratified to share the opinion of those of my colleagues who have seen in this speech an important document, a harbinger of measures favourable to the stability and happiness of this country. It goes without saying that not everybody can attempt an analysis of the subject from the same point of view. Some see in this debate an opportunity for assailing the activities of the government of the country in order to promote the interests of their own party.

Such being the case, since the beginning of the debate, we have had occasion to hear the most surprising statements indeed. I was particularly struck by the description given of such an historic document as the speech from the throne by one hon. member who spoke of it as being a "desert of ideas in a flood of words". The hon. member felt justified in thus describing the speech made by His Excellency the Governor General on January 7 last.

Of course, it could not be given to all to possess to the same degree as the hon. member the art of striking out of a speech all needless, superfluous words. For my part, I find in this document the outline of a concise doctrine that has been familiar to all of Canada for almost 20 years. Indeed, one only needs to reread the same speeches, made over the past 20 years, including that of 1955, to find in them the political philosophy which has made Canada one of the great countries of the world. I am happy to belong to the political party which has been the initiator of this philosophy of security and progress.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to concur in the splendid appeal made in this house by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) in favour of the bicentenary celebrations, which have started, in order to commemorate the deportation of the Acadians. I heartily endorse his invitation to all Canadians to join in those celebrations.

In order to further stress the character of these celebrations, I should like to quote briefly from a recent news item on the subject:

> At first people might wonder that our friends in the maritimes should choose such a painful anniversary as an occasion for great rejoicings. On second thought, however, no occasion could be more proper. In the first place, this celebration has the great advantage to show all Canadians that there is no ill-feeling left among Acadians.
> If they faithfully recall the past to honour the heroism of their forefathers they do not drift into sentimental memories. They prefer to study the present in the light of the future.
>
> Acadians have faith in the future; they know from experience that they carry within themselves the necessary resources of courage, tenacity and clear vision that will promote their development.
>
> While they are proud of their religious and national beliefs, they are not at odds with the present. On the contrary, they are striving to achieve a significant position. Because of their devotion to their small Acadian motherland, theirs is an efficient contribution to the greatness of Canada as a whole.

(Text):

In a speech made during the last session, Mr. Speaker, I mentioned that the economy of my constituency revolves around three important industries, namely, farming, fishing and lumbering. I would like at this time to refer again to these subjects. Figures of the 1951 census indicate that at that time we had in Kent county 2,328 farms. It is therefore evident that much of the economy of the country depends upon agriculture.

Farming conditions for 1954 were only fair. Unusually wet weather hampered farming operations considerably, and farm returns were greatly affected. These conditions were additional factors hastening the trend toward the desertion of the farming profession. I have had farmers come to me who were abandoning farms on which they had brought up large families, and who were going out to seek ordinary, unskilled labouring jobs.

In further analysing the above statistics we find certain classifications in connection with the farms in Kent county. We see that out of 2,328 farms, 538 are occupied by part-time farmers. We see that 604 farmers have incomes of less than $250 and that 622 have incomes between $250 and $1,199. Then, there are 405 farms on which the incomes are between $1,200 and $2,499, and 100 farms with incomes between $2,500 and $3,749. There are 30 farms with incomes between $3,750 and $4,999; there are 21 farms with incomes between $5,000 and $7,499, and three farms with incomes between $10,000 and $15,000. On only one farm is the income over $20,000. In the light of these figures it is apparent that the greater number of farms in Kent county are in the low income bracket.

I had suggested last year that, because of the peculiar local economic conditions, the Department of Agriculture should conduct an economic survey to ascertain the possibility of improving present conditions. I still believe that survey to be essential, and I wish now to renew my request, hoping that it will receive from the department the most earnest consideration.

May I voice to the government the hope of the farming population in my constituency that the policy of supporting the price of butter will be maintained. The dairy industry is basic to farming in Kent county, and we would view with apprehension the possibility of discontinuing this policy. We feel it would have an unfavourable effect upon the economy of our rural communities.

I would also express concurrence in the remarks delivered on January 12 by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy) with regard to the course followed by the Canadian farm loan board in our area. It would seem that this board has lacked on numerous occasions the flexibility required to fulfil its purpose. Too often loans which are really needed are refused because of a too-rigid system of assessment. More leniency therefore seems desirable in the application of an otherwise beneficial farm credit system.

I was pleased to learn in the speech from the throne that legislation is to be introduced to provide loans to fishermen similar to those provided farmers under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Although the full extent of this proposed legislation is not yet known, I earnestly hope that following its enactment loans will be made available to lobster fishermen, such as are found along the eastern shores of New Brunswick. Lack of credit facilities is often a serious handicap to many of these fishermen. Capital is sometimes required to build a new boat, buy a new engine, or provide new fishing gear, but it is not always available. The establishment of such a loans system would close the gap in the economic network of our fishing population.

The Department of Fisheries last year initiated programs which, I contend, have great value for our fishermen. These programs consisted of a series of lectures held in the fishing centres of Kent county by experts from the Department of Fisheries. I am pleased to be able to announce that the meetings at which these lectures were delivered were well attended and deeply appreciated. It would be advisable that these educational programs be maintained, for the benefit of our fishing communities.

Last year I indicated in the house the urgency of restoring the oyster industry in Kent county. A few years ago this was a flourishing industry, but it has now completely disappeared. The economic loss which resulted was seriously felt throughout the whole county.

I have here a report from the Department of Fisheries from which I should like to quote. This report applies to the Buctouche-Cocagne-Grande Digue area only. In 1929 there were 11,590 hundredweight of oysters landed, with a landed value of $33,821. Then for the next ten years oyster production remained at about the same level, but in 1939 a decline in production began to appear. The following table will show the weights of oyster landings, beginning in that year:

	Oyster Landings (Hundredweight)
1939	8,420
1940	5,250
1941	4,214
1946	3,300
1952	1,116
1954	nil

The industry suffered a similar decline in the Richibucto district.

I am aware of the excellent reputation enjoyed by Kent county oysters among connoisseurs. Their superior quality is not disputed. I am also aware of the initiative taken by the department to bring this oyster territory to its earlier state of productivity. Because of the economic importance of this industry to the area, I would urge that the efforts of the fisheries research board in this respect be fully maintained, and that a program aimed at the restoration of the industry be pursued with full vigour.

The lumber industry in Kent county is of major importance. Wood cuts are chiefly in pit props and pulpwood, which, for the greater part, are shipped to outside markets through Buctouche and Richibucto harbours. Some 42 boats, carrying approximately 53,000 cords, were loaded at Richibucto, and 28 boats, carrying approximately 42,000 cords, were loaded at Buctouche, during last season. These totals do not include, of course, the amounts shipped by rail, or through ports outside the county, nor the long lumber operations of the county. These different aspects of the industry give us an estimation of its importance to the economy of Kent county. Farmers, settlers, truck owners, stevedores, in large numbers, depend upon this industry.

I had good reasons, therefore, to be deeply interested in the speech delivered in this house last week, by the hon. member from Gatineau (Mr. Leduc), on the alleged price-fixing methods practised in the lumber trade in his area. I have had many people in my constituency complain about the abnormal situation of falling prices for the pulpwood or pit prop cord, beside an increased cost of living. The local producers, for the last four or five years, were compelled to accept steadily decreasing prices for their wood; this year again, they will receive $1 less than last year; $9 a cord compared to $10 a cord last year. I submit that this is barely more than the value of the labour involved for cutting a cord of wood, and the stumpage value. Newsprint, on the other hand, during the same period, remained on the upgrade. I was further interested in the declaration made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that an investigation into this matter will be pursued. In view of those circumstances, this investigation should also be extended to the part of the country I represent.

I want to express my satisfaction with the amendments recently brought to the Unemployment Insurance Act, Mr. Speaker. I know that this will be of great benefit in many instances. May I also express to the Department of Labour my hope of seeing the benefits of unemployment insurance extended to the fishermen of the country. This measure would prove of great assistance to many fishermen of my constituency.

In listening to the speech made in this house last week by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), I was delighted by his reference to a native son of New Brunswick who became prime minister of Great Britain. If New Brunswick feels proud of this distinguished son, we, in Kent county, feel doubly proud, because it was in this county, in the town of Rexton, that Bonar Law was born in 1858. He went to Scotland when still a boy. Today a cairn in the town of Rexton perpetuates the memory of a great man who, as a boy, lived in those quiet surroundings.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, when the speech from the throne was about to be read a little more than three weeks ago, all Canadians listened with anxiety to what it might contain. Although some of us were pleased with some aspects of it, we were disappointed with others. For my part, I wish to say that it did contain several items which were pleasing to me, and it would be fair to say probably pleasing to most of the people in the maritime provinces. To begin with, it was noted that plans are under way to commence the building of a new ferry to connect Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia for the service which now exists between Wood Island and Caribou. It was also noted that a new ferry would come into operation this year between North Sydney and Port aux Basques, Newfoundland. Notice was also taken of the fact that a new ferry service will be inaugurated between Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and Bar Harbor, Maine. We are all pleased to see these improvements in the transportation set-up in the maritime provinces. They should react beneficially on our economy generally because, if the cost of transportation can be reduced, markets will become more readily available for the producers in that area. It was also noted that very shortly the Canso causeway joining the island of Cape Breton with the mainland of Nova Scotia would be completed. That is a remarkable engineering achievement. It is perhaps unique in this country. But it is a thing that carries with it not only a blessing but also some disadvantages that will cause some inconvenience to groups of people as economic readjustment will be necessary when this new type of more rapid transportation between Cape Breton and the mainland comes into use.

However, we in Prince Edward Island, in common with the people of Britain, Bermuda, Newfoundland and various other places, are conscious of the peculiar advantage we have in being able to say that we live on an island, because living on an island has definite advantages. Island people all over the world have been leaders in their fields, generally speaking.

Mr. Fulton: Does that apply to St. Pierre?

Mr. MacLean: Yes, that applies even to St. Pierre and Miquelon.

Mr. Pearkes: And Vancouver island.

Mr. MacLean: Therefore, we on Prince Edward Island are especially appreciative of the consternation that will rise in the breasts of the people of Cape Breton island when they wake up some morning and realize that they are physically as well as politically a part of Nova Scotia. Between the island of Cape Breton and the mainland there has been rather good-humoured competition that goes back a long way, to the time when Cape Breton was a separate colony. In that connection I should like to quote briefly a statement which will bear that out. This refers to the time when Cape Breton was a separate colony:

> By the end of 1785 he found himself in difficulties,—

This refers to the then governor of Cape Breton island. I continue:

> —there being an insufficient supply of provisions for the supply of the inhabitants during the winter, he applied to the Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia, John Parr, for supplies, and was refused. DesBarres in reporting this to London says that this was because Parr "had an aversion to the measure of erecting Cape Breton, formerly included within the jurisdiction of his province into a separate government, and, together with some of the officers of his civil establishment and mercantile men long used to a monopoly of trade in Nova Scotia, seemed hurt by its dismemberment, expecting that their perquisites and exclusive profits would be reduced."
> "Accordingly, in order to frustrate the measure, they depreciated the natural advantages of the island, discouraged the accession of settlers, intercepted the supplies for its support, and predicted that the infant colony would be broken up the first winter". There is little doubt that the government of Nova Scotia and the leading merchants were greatly displeased at the establishment of Cape Breton as an independent colony, and they might well be expected to rejoice at DesBarres' embarrassments, which they would not help to ameliorate.

Perhaps that is typical of the way in which large political units tend to try to push smaller political units around if they have the opportunity to do so. Perhaps that accounts for the fact—I think it is a fact; I am told it is—that for many years it has been customary in the homes of Cape Breton island to say a long grace before meals. In doing this they usually recited at great length the benefits which the people in that island enjoyed, and then they ended up by praising the Deity and saying: We especially thank Thee for the strait of Canso that separates us from Nova Scotia. I think a twinge of regret will accompany the great sense of achievement and progress which the Cape Breton islanders will have when the new causeway comes into operation.

There has been a long historical connection between Cape Breton island and my own province. During the French regime Prince Edward Island came under the protection of the great fortress at Louisbourg. It was during that time that the capital of my province was founded. For a special reason I should like to ask your indulgence to permit me to quote from a book written by Professor Harvey, a native islander, who is now the archivist for Nova Scotia. I hope

I will not embarrass him by bringing this statement of his to your attention. He says:

During the spring and early summer of 1720 preparations were pushed on by the new company. Every encouragement was given the partners by the royal officials and at least three ships set out from Rochefort bearing the new colonists, the fishermen, and their supplies. On the last of the three ships to set out was the Sieur de Gotteville de Belleisle, lieutenant in the navy and chevalier of the order of St. Louis, who was given charge of the new establishment and destined to become commandant throughout the concession on March 9, 1721. The ships touched at Louisburg where they secured pilots and went forward on the great adventure. Although the island offered considerable choice as to harbors the respective merits of these were still unknown, which confirms the view that the various fishermen who had hitherto resorted there had made no charts and had been concerned only with suitable moorings for comparatively small craft. But the enterprise of Comte de Saint Pierre was much more pretentious and now a harbor was to be selected suitable for the capital of a colony and capable of admitting ships of heavy burden.

While in Louisburg de Gotteville had requested St. Ovide de Brouillan, governor of Ile Royale, to allow Denys de La Ronde, an officer of much experience in the founding of such establishments, to accompany him to Isle Saint Jean. The request was granted, although de La Ronde had been expected to report at Quebec, and together they proceeded to the island. Here they found the other ships which had preceded them already well advanced with the work of unloading supplies, having been conducted by the pilots to Port La Joye. Together they chose the site on which were erected the first official buildings. Though later subject to much criticism because it was comparatively poor in natural resources, Port La Joye remained the capital throughout the entire French period, and under the English the city of Charlottetown was erected on the same harbor, not far from the original site so hastily selected by de Gotteville and de La Ronde. In this sense the capital dates from 1720, twenty-nine years before the founding of Halifax.

I bring that to your attention because this year the capital city of my province is celebrating its centennial. I do not want anyone to be confused by thinking that Charlottetown is only 100 years old. What it is actually celebrating is the centennial of its incorporation as a city. I think it could be forgiven for this anyway because Charlottetown is named after a lady and perhaps allowance should be made when there is a discrepancy of 130 years between its actual age and its nominal age.

This centennial celebration will be going on for the entire year and I should like to extend on behalf of the people of Charlottetown a very hearty welcome to all to come down and enjoy themselves this summer and also to steep themselves in some of the early history of the maritime provinces.

I noted with satisfaction a reference to the bringing into force of the pensions for the totally disabled. I think all hon. members of this house will agree that that is a beneficial thing. Reference is made also to an amendment to the Blind Persons Act which would lower the age limit at which persons are entitled to receive pensions.

In this connection I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) something of which I know he is well aware. There is a gap between the date when family allowances are no longer paid and when a blind or completely disabled person becomes eligible for benefits under either act. A family which is burdened by having a completely disabled or blind child receives no benefit in connection with that child between the ages of 16 and 18 years. I do not understand why those two years have been left out in the social security program of the government which they usually boast of as providing security from the cradle to the grave. I am afraid that they have missed two years.

I notice with satisfaction that it is intended to introduce legislation to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act in order to raise the ceiling on permissible income. This is something which is long overdue. With the permissible income as it was before, a hardship was imposed on those veterans who were able to earn small amounts of money on the side. I am pleased indeed to see that it is intended to improve that situation a little bit.

I am pleased also that legislation will be brought into being to make it possible for fishermen to borrow from the bank in the way that farmers are granted loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I now want to turn to some of the things that were glaringly missing from the speech from the throne. Little reference was made either to trade or to unemployment. I want to refer first to the question of trade. The party from which this government gets its support, when talking out of the western side of its mouth, usually prates about free trade. We in the maritimes are quite conscious of the fact that it does not practise free trade. I am not criticising that fact on principle, but while this government talks in the west of free trade, I should like to recall to mind the fact that it does not practise it. When a Canadian is born in this year 1955, when he is first bathed he is washed in soap on which there is a 22½ per cent tariff and a similar sales tax. Then he is wrapped in baby clothes on which there is a 25 per cent tariff. He is put in a bassinet on which there is a 15 per cent tariff; and in each case the sales tax is the same.

Mr. Rowe: Some free-trade baby!

Mr. MacLean: When he gets a little bit older he is pushed around in a baby carriage on which there is a 22½ per cent tariff. When he is baptized, even the baptismal certificate has a 17½ per cent tariff on it; and so he goes on through the whole of his life until he eventually shuffles off this mortal coil, when he is placed in a coffin on which there is a 17½ per cent tariff and is taken to a cemetery in a hearse on which there is a 17½ per cent tariff.

An hon. Member: Secondhand at that.

Mr. MacLean: His grave is filled in with a shovel on which there is a 15 per cent tariff. Just so that I will not be in error here, I want to point out that there is a 20 per cent tariff on the shovel handle. Hence we should be quite conscious of the fact that we are not by any means living in a free-tariff or free-trade nation.

We in the maritimes do not, I think, contend for one moment that complete free trade would be practical because we in the maritimes have seen, from bitter experience, what happens when a small economic unit is thrown in, on a free trade basis, with a larger one. We have seen, following confederation, our small industries largely go bankrupt or quietly die or be bought up by their larger competitors in central Canada, to be carried on for a short while, for a few years, so that it would look good, and then disappear. A branch would be kept on and then suddenly some night this branch of the main factory or of the main head office which would be usually somewhere in Ontario or Quebec, would fold its tents like the Arabs and silently steal away overnight. This would not even have any publicity, but there just would not be a plant there any more. That is something that has happened time after time in the maritimes. There are in the maritimes certain towns that at the time of confederation had dozens of small industries whereas now their only industry is that of showing tourists around some historic site in the neighbourhood.

If those who speak of free trade tried to apply it to the North American continent, on the same basis, I am quite convinced they would find that the smaller economy of Canada, when tossed into the same economic market as that of the United States, would share the same fate. For instance, there would be no reason to carry on branch factories of automobile companies in Canada. The branch factories in Canada of the large automobile manufacturing companies in the United States would be closed down. It would not be economic to continue them; and so it would be with a great number of industries now existing in Canada simply because they have a measure of protection from their larger competitors south of the border.

I point out that situation, Mr. Speaker, because I did not want you to have the impression that we in the rather cool, moist, lush, rolling maritimes were starting to see this free trade mirage which I am told is sometimes seen across the hot, level plains of the prairies. When we in the maritimes went into confederation we realized that the economy of our country as a whole would need to be protected, and we were willing to accept that fact. We were willing to buy automobiles, for instance, which have on them a sales tax and a tariff, made in central Canada. Of course there were no automobiles at the time of confederation.

An hon. Member: Horses and buggies.

Mr. MacLean: Yes, horses and buggies; buggies at any rate. We were willing to accept that proposition but we were under the impression that it was going to be a two-way bargain. We were under the impression that we in turn would be protected with regard to the things we produced in the maritimes so that we would sell our products in the larger markets of central Canada.

I have searched through the tariffs of this country and I have failed to see any instance where an industry which is peculiar to the maritimes has any worth-while protection. For example, let us consider the situation with respect to coal. Anthracite coal comes into this country free. Bituminous coal has a tariff of 50 cents a ton, which is negligible. Gypsum—another product of the maritimes—in its crude form comes in free; there is no duty on it whatsoever. There is little protection for dairy products. Of course dairy products are not peculiar to the maritimes but they are extremely important to the economy of the maritimes. At the present time we see cheese from New Zealand coming in almost free.

I do not want to discuss this problem in terms of generalities. I want to give my attention for a few moments to one product in particular, namely potatoes. I realize that I run the danger of being accused by members from other parts of the country of just complaining because I am from the maritimes; and maybe that is understandable because the maritime members of parliament ever since confederation have been complaining about the deal which the maritimes got in confederation. I imagine it is a topic that is getting worn a bit threadbare, but I want to repeat it once more. In all sincerity I want to say that I believe that if the members of parliament from central Canada especially would make a practice of coming to Ottawa at least once a year via Whitehorse or Victoria or St. John's, Newfoundland, they would have a broader outlook with regard to the problems of this country which impinge especially on the economy of the extremities of the country.

I want to refer to the situation arising from the lack of protection for the Canadian potato market. I first want to point out that nine-tenths of the potatoes exported from Canada to other countries come from the maritimes. They come almost entirely from New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Probably that is the explanation why the market is not protected. It is conceivable that, at a tariff conference taking place between Canada and the United States, Canada wanted a concession so far as the United States market was concerned for a manufactured product from some other part of Canada, and the Americans said, "Yes, fair enough, we will give you the concession if you will give us a concession on something else." Then someone said, "Surely, we will give you a concession on potatoes. They are only exported by the people down in the maritimes and if they complain about it we will just accuse them of grousing and let it go at that."

But this is the situation. From 1906 to 1919 there was a duty of 20 cents per bushel on potatoes coming into Canada from the United States. From 1923 to 1930 there was a duty of 35 cents a hundredweight on potatoes coming into Canada. From 1930 to 1935 the duty was 75 cents per hundredweight. Since 1935 to the present time potatoes of all kinds come into Canada from the United States duty free except for a period of six weeks, and I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members the period when there is a duty. The six weeks are from June 15 to July 31 when it is pretty nearly impossible to find a Canadian potato offered for sale. At that time the duty on potatoes coming into Canada from the United States is 37½ cents per hundredweight.

Let us look at the position with respect to United States tariffs on potatoes. The tariff on seed potatoes entering the United States is as follows: On the first 2½ million bushels of seed potatoes the tariff is 37½ cents per hundredweight. On amounts imported above this quota the tariff is 75 cents per hundredweight. In the case of table stock potatoes the United States tariff is 37½ cents per hundredweight on the first one million bushels imported and then the rate is doubled to 75 cents per hundredweight on all potatoes imported above the million bushel quota. However, the Americans protect their consumers by increasing the million bushel quota in poor crop years by the amount by which American production falls short of 350 million bushels.

I think it would be fair for us to examine what effect this tariff set-up is having on our trade. I have the figures here for the last four years, and I must say that they are startling. In the last four years Canada imported about three times as many table potatoes from the United States as we exported. Even if you add exports of seed potatoes, with respect to which we have a favourable balance, we find that we barely have a favourable balance so far as all potatoes are concerned, and only because we have a large favourable balance in the case of seed potatoes.

But when you take the dollar value we have an unfavourable balance. Although we did not buy quite as many potatoes from the United States as we sold to them we paid more for them. If you look at the figures for the first eleven months of last year you will find that Canada exported slightly over half a million bushels of table potatoes to the United States while we imported approximately 3½ million bushels, about five times as many. That, I contend, is a very unfortunate state of affairs.

The same sort of thing applies to potato products. Taking potato starch, the story is just about the same, and so on down the list through glucose and other products of potatoes. We have no protection and the Canadian market is being supplied to a large extent by United States producers. I am not contending that the most desirable thing would be for us to slap a duty on their potatoes equal to the duty on Canadian potatoes going into the United States, but I think this is a matter to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) should give his attention. When the trade agreement between Canada and the United States is being framed it should be pointed out to the United States that if Canada is going to import large quantities of potatoes from the western part of the United States then an equal amount of Canadian potatoes should be permitted into the markets of the eastern states on the same basis. As imports from that country are now on a free basis, I think it would be only fair that such an agreement should be recommended.

It may be said that the Americans will probably not agree and will want protection for their growers to the extent of 37½ cents per hundredweight for the first million bushels and 75 cents per hundredweight for the remainder. In that case I think we would be justified in imposing a tariff on American table stock potatoes coming into the Canadian market. It is true that Canadians from Ottawa westward would have to pay a little more for their potatoes. Perhaps all Canadians would have to pay more for their potatoes by reason of such a tariff, but I do not see that Canadians living in central and western Canada should complain about that when we in the maritimes have to pay more for manufactured products than we would have to do if they were not afforded tariff protection.

What would be the effect of imposing a tariff of 37½ cents per hundredweight on United States potatoes? It would mean that the maritime producers could compete against American potatoes as far west as Regina as easily as they can now compete as close to the source of supply as Ottawa. I point out this most undesirable situation to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I hope that he, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will take some notice of the plight of the producers of potatoes in the maritimes.

The effect of the potato industry being chronically depressed is of course to depress our economy generally with the result that unemployment is very high in the maritimes at the present time. We have a chronic unemployment situation there. For years past it has been necessary for young people of the maritimes to go elsewhere to seek employment.

I do not want to take up the time of the house with a lengthy discussion of this problem at the moment. I merely want to point it out to the government. The seriousness of the situation will be realized when it is pointed out that maritimers are now forced to go as far away as New Zealand to seek employment. According to a news report the other day about forty maritimers left to seek work as lumbermen in the woods of New Zealand.

In my own city of Charlottetown the unemployment situation is almost as bad now as it was at its worst point last winter. It is expected it will even pass the point it reached last winter. I should like to quote a news report which I read this morning dealing with the unemployment situation in the Charlottetown area. It reads as follows:

> The total number of claims registered at the national employment office, Charlottetown, rose considerably during the past week, reaching a total of 2,265. Of this total 813 are residents of Charlottetown and vicinity, and 1,452 live in various parts of Kings and Queens counties. The local office serves Kings and Queens counties, while Prince county claims are handled by the national employment office at Summerside.
> Though the figures released by the Charlottetown office are quite high, they are not as great as they were on the same date a year ago. In January, 1954, 2,309 people were drawing benefit through the Charlottetown office, 44 more than at the present time. Officials of the local office say, however, that the registration of claims has not yet reached its peak, and may eventually mount to 2,500.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that is a state of affairs that cannot be allowed to continue indefinitely. I would strongly recommend to this government that they take action to change the economic atmosphere in which we in the maritimes exist so that we, ourselves, can improve our economic position. I believe the obvious place to start would be by making more equitable and reasonable tariff arrangements with the United States on potatoes, coal and other products from the maritimes.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) is prepared to dig the grave of the Conservative party he would obtain some concession from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) on the purchase of shovels. Some of the speeches I have heard since this debate commenced have left me cold, while others perhaps deserve some reply.

There was one speech that intrigued me, and that was delivered by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Holowach). He seemed concerned about the fact that a supporter of the government appeared at the opening of a public building in the city of Taber, in the riding of Medicine Hat. It occurred to me to ask him the obvious question, how many times has the leader of the Liberal party, Mr. Prowse, opened a provincial public building in Alberta? I believe there would have been very few occasions on which he was so honoured. When one looks through the estimates that were tabled the other day, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that there has been very little patronage or favouritism towards members of the Liberal party in the matter of buildings.

I note that about $4 million is being expended in Alberta, but I doubt if there are more than one or two buildings to be erected in Liberal ridings. The same situation prevails in British Columbia. The opposition ridings seem to have been given every consideration. I should like to tell the hon. member that the men on the treasury benches are responsible for raising the money to take care of these public works, and almost invariably the opposition, including the hon. member, oppose the raising of taxes.

Mr. Hansell: Go on, spin it out.

Mr. Byrne: If the hon. member wishes further illustrations, I could accommodate him. There have been statements from some of the members of the C.C.F. party as well upon which I should like to dwell, but before I have finished I believe it will be discovered that my remarks will cause some considerable opposition from the other side, so I shall ignore the statements that have been made in condemnation of the government.

I should like to speak about some of the things that do not appear in the speech from the throne. I do not consider them sufficiently important to make them the subject of a motion on going into supply which would require a vote of confidence. There are, however, three matters that I should like to bring to the attention of the government at this time. The first concerns the superannuated civil servants whose rate of superannuation was set at the time the superannuation act was adopted in 1924. These civil servants have since retired on a pension that is much below the amount required to ensure them a reasonable standard of living.

Most of the large industries that have had pension plans in effect for a similar length of time, or even less, have made concessions to their pensioned employees and are now granting supplementary payments based on the cost of living as well as other factors. The government has, of course, introduced the Old Age Security Act which provides $40 a month for everyone over 70. However, those who are receiving a pension and supplementary payments based on the cost of living receive the benefit of that payment, but the retired civil servant has been given no compensating consideration. I would urge the government to give this matter serious consideration.

My next point concerns a similar subject, and I refer to the old age pensioners who are living on the basic grant of $40 per month from the federal government. Of course, in the three western provinces those in need receive a supplementary payment. In British Columbia it amounts to $15; Alberta, $15; and Saskatchewan $2.50. I do not say this in condemnation of the government of Saskatchewan, nor do I think that it is particularly praiseworthy when applied to the other governments. It might be noted that the former coalition government in British Columbia was the first to institute such a program of supplementary allowances.

The senior citizens association in British Columbia includes not only those who are in receipt of old age pensions, or pensions from corporations, but also those who are interested in promoting the welfare of the senior citizens. From a convention held in Vancouver last fall there was circulated the suggestion that there should be some way to give further assistance to those who do not have any other means of sustenance. That horrible expression, "the means test" was again brought into the limelight at the convention. It may not be wise politically for me to suggest that there should be some way of determining the relative incomes of people between the ages of 65 and 69 and after the age of 70, who are on means test pensions. It is pretty hard to tell people who are otherwise destitute that this is all they can receive while at the same time others are in receipt of fairly substantial incomes as well as the $40. When we ask for increased amounts for pensioners in need we now include all those affected, or about 800,000 people. Naturally this runs into a very large sum of money, no matter how small the increase may be.

I think we must face the fact however that there are people on whom the present situation works a very great hardship. I believe that in Newfoundland those who qualify under the means test receive $30 a month. While in western Canada persons may receive $55 a month, the difference in the ratio of the cost of living is such that perhaps those who are living in the western provinces are not as well off as those in Newfoundland.

The association in British Columbia has approached this question, and the Calgary branch of the old age pensioners society has written to all members of parliament. If I read their communication correctly it seems to indicate that they favour some way by which those who are in great need would be given further assistance.

The provinces have their responsibility, and any such program should be carried on in conjunction with them, leaving it to the local authorities to state who should receive further assistance.

The request has also been made that the age limit be reduced to 60 years. This would be highly desirable, of course, but it would add another 200,000 persons and bring the total to over a million. I am not prepared to go along with that suggestion at the moment, but I do believe that all pensions should have effect at the age of 65 years at which time most employees are being pensioned off, or retired without pension at this age.

I am not presenting a firm program. I am simply saying that, despite the fact that in the House of Commons any type of means test has been soundly condemned, and while it is highly desirable and gratifying that we should take this position, still there are people who are attempting to exist on $40 a month.

I believe the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) is indicating that it is a means test. I do not see how it could be interpreted any other way than as a means test. And of course this is what was indicated by the senior citizens association of British Columbia.

Mr. Thatcher: If that is what you said, I agree with you.

Mr. Byrne: The senior citizens in British Columbia have said that for those in need something should be done, and certainly the inference is that help should be given to those who are destitute.

Mr. Martin: I think my hon. friend would wish to make clear that he is of course in favour of the government's scheme of old age security on a non-means test basis—because the interruption has come from a quarter that holds another view.

Mr. Thatcher: Just the same view.

Mr. Byrne: Because of the war, and the subsequent inflation, those who had set aside some savings, shall we say, or had small incomes, have seen those savings depreciate in value. This has now been supplemented to the extent of $40 and, for the moment, I believe we have gone far enough in this respect. Certainly that would be my position, if I am to be consistent. I make no suggestion that a change should be made in this regard; but I do say that inasmuch as we have a means test in some of the provinces, those who have not benefited from this legislation should be given further consideration.

The suggestion may be made that this is a retrograde step—and, if it is, I am sorry. I do feel however that there are some who are in great need and we should do something to study their plight.

I was about to quote from a letter sent by the Alberta old age pensioners society, Calgary branch, to each of us. It states:

> We still place before you our goal of an adequate pension for those under the means test only, for those from sixty years of age. With present high prices, $40 monthly hardly keeps body and soul together. We believe the amount of pension should be increased to the really needy.

I have one other matter to discuss, and I warn hon. members opposite that this is something that has been on my mind several years, actually since becoming a member of this house. It is something to which I have given considerable study, although the way in which I express myself may belie that fact. It is entirely my own opinion, but I am substantiated by a very distinguished gentleman by the name of Chief Justice Sloan. Chief Justice Sloan was appointed to arbitrate the differences between the railway employees and the railway. I am sure this renowned judge is highly regarded in all parts of the house. I know he is highly regarded in British Columbia. Since he handed down his report, Chief Justice Sloan has been asked to head a royal commission investigating the forest industry in British Columbia. He is again acting to resolve one of the outstanding issues between railway employees and railway management.

If hon. members have not a copy of Chief Justice Sloan's award it is available to them. The whole tenor of his report is based on the fact that inequality has been caused by the maintenance of the Crowsnest freight rate agreement. Chief Justice Sloan recognized that in so far as the present grain rates assist the economy generally, the losses should be made up by the federal treasury rather than on the narrow basis that exists at the present time. He says that compared to comparable industries the railway employees lack a great deal in fringe benefits and that within reason the disparity should be removed. In the forthwith paragraph of his award he has this to say:

> A major factor contributing to the present serious decline in rail revenue is the distortion and imbalance of the freight rate structure due to the direct and indirect but consequential effects of the Crowsnest pass rates covering grain and grain products.

He points out that the railways have found it necessary, because of their greatly decreased earnings, to lay off 20,000 men. I think that is not entirely the picture. No doubt their attempt to modernize and bring in dieselization has had some effects, but the over-all effect has been as follows, according to Chief Justice Sloan:

> In 1940 net railway operating income for all Canadian railways (was) $74·1 million. In 1953 the same figure dropped to $55·9 million, a decrease of $18·2 million.

There was a 71·5 per cent increase in the freight traffic, but there was a revenue loss of 24·6 per cent. We all know that freight rates on other products, and certainly on consumer goods, particularly in British Columbia, have greatly increased. Our jobbers are paying greatly increased freight rates, yet, that is the picture. Chief Justice Sloan certainly had a point when he suggested that these losses should be made up from the general revenue of the country.

It might be interesting to note that in a recent statement Donald Gordon, chairman of the Canadian National Railways, said that 9 per cent of the freight traffic was handled by trucks in the last year, but they took in 25 per cent of the revenue. Therefore it is quite obvious that the railways are being required to carry the great bulk of the low rate goods, thereby suffering a loss.

It has been said to me since entering the house that there is one way to be assured of being elected, and that is never to vote against a grant and never vote for a tax bill. I believe there is one other way of being elected, and that is always be prepared to condemn the railways. If you do that you will be assured of being elected. I would just as soon be right as to be elected. So far as the railways are concerned, I look upon them as I do any other industrial organization. They are made up of human beings, shareholders and employees. As Chief Justice Sloan has done, I am pointing out that the railroad workers have not enjoyed the same standard of living enjoyed by workers in other industries. He went to some particular pains to point out that this fixed rate was the main cause.

I think it goes a little further, in that the railroads have an additional handicap. They know that when they grant a wage increase they must ask for rate increases. They have to go to a board which is answerable to parliament, and certainly the political implications from all sides of the house are not just what hon. members would want them to face.

Be that as it may, I should like to run over the history of the Crowsnest agreement to show that it is not, as is commonly presumed, an agreement under which the railways are absolutely hidebound to maintain these rates. In doing this I am not presenting an argument to have the rates abolished. I am simply indicating that there should be some assistance from the treasury to make up what losses are incurred as a result.

It is all right for people to say that the railroads made this agreement, let them stick by it; that the railroads were subsidized when they were built across Canada; that they received land grants and millions of dollars. But the fact still remains that commodity rates do fluctuate on these lines and they must fluctuate, otherwise the railroads would be out of business. They are a very important part of our national economy and they must continue to operate. We should be ready to give them some consideration.

The historical background is that by agreement with the government of the time in 1897 a railroad was built between Lethbridge and Kootenay Landing. A subsidy of $11,000 a mile was paid, amounting to some $3,630,000, not a large amount. There is a fallacious argument currently being spread about that the Canadian Pacific obtained the great Sullivan mine as a result of their agreement to build the Crowsnest pass railroad. But that is not so. Shares in the Sullivan mine were purchased with the funds that would have been otherwise used for expansion or for the payment to the shareholders of the railroad. It was not until about 1920, I believe, when the Canadian Pacific got into the mining business. From my point of view, and from the point of view of many, it was a good thing that money was available at that time to develop this great industry of the east and west Kootenays.

At that time the company agreed to reduce rates on a great variety of articles moving eastward, articles such as farm implements, wire nails, fresh fruits and so on. Had this remained so, then perhaps we in British Columbia would not find our freight rates as high as they are today. Those rates were to be in perpetuity, but of course that was absolutely impossible.

The Canadian Pacific was of course the only railroad operating in the west at that time, and it agreed to lower the cost of shipping wheat to Port Arthur-Fort William by 3 per cent, so in reality the present rates are 3 per cent below what they were in 1897. Certainly in the face of rising costs this could not go on, and in July, 1919, the Railway Act was amended. The board of railway commissioners, as it was then known, was given the power to adjust rates when it was considered necessary. They did adjust rates. Grain was then part of their jurisdiction. Three years later, in June, 1922, a new act was passed and it was then that the rates on grain were set to conform with the Crowsnest agreement.

My time is short and I simply want to say that there is no use putting our heads in the sand and ignoring facts in order to justify something that is quite obviously incorrect. I am just asking the house to consider this proposal by Chief Justice Sloan. I realize that grain is an important factor in our national economy and that we must compete in world markets, but I fear that unless we do something like this to effectively reduce freight rates British Columbia will be almost excluded from the eastern markets. It is my opinion that the beneficiaries of this particularly low rate are the consumers of eastern Canada and consumers abroad.

In the few minutes that I have left I should like to compare these rates with rates in the United States and I shall take stations of about equal distances from the great lakes. The rate from Maple Creek to Fort William is 23 cents per hundredweight whereas the rate from Havre, Montana, to Duluth, which is within a few miles of the distance, is 73·4 cents a hundredweight. Not that this is part of my argument, but I think it should be remembered by some of the members from the prairie provinces when they compare the price of grain in Canada with the Chicago price. They should remember that they are not giving a true picture as to the relative prices. Those are just two shipping points, but similar comparisons apply to westward movements. I do not say that the rates should be identical to those in operation in the United States, or that a subsidy should be based on these rates. I say that we should be prepared, from the federal treasury, to make up the losses so that the freight rates in British Columbia will not suffer, so that the commodity rates will not have to be measurably higher to make up for those losses and so that the employees of the railway companies may enjoy the same amenities of life as are enjoyed by those who are employed in other industries.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in disagreement with several points made by the last two hon. members who have spoken. For instance, the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) this afternoon came out for a tariff on potatoes. From his constituency's viewpoint no doubt his arguments were reasonable, but I must tell him that we in western Canada can never get very sympathetic toward tariffs of any kind. As a matter of fact we think our present tariffs are too high. We should like to see them reduced. We feel that our cost of living is perhaps 25 per cent higher than it otherwise would be because of the tariff level. Thus while my friend the hon. member for Queens made an extremely interesting speech, I must say that I could not agree with that aspect of it.

As to the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), I noted his remarks with regard to the Crowsnest pass agreement. This subject is extremely contentious out west but, by and large, regardless of politics, I think most westerners would oppose any change being made in the Crowsnest pass agreement. After all, it was an agreement. When the contract was signed between the railroad and the federal government, substantial concessions were given to the railroad, including not only the cash grants mentioned by my hon. friend but also land grants, natural resources and the like. For instance, today there are oil wells that the C.P.R. own and from which they are securing revenue, because of this particular agreement.

Mr. Byrne: Not that one.

Mr. Thatcher: There is also to be considered the fact that today the C.P.R. is dieselizing. No doubt in the next year or two, they will be able to haul, with their diesel engines, about twice as many carloads of grain as they were hauling previously with the old steam engines. Thus I hope in the future the railroads will find that their costs have been cut so substantially that they may be able to continue this agreement. Certainly before agreeing to any change I should like to see more tangible evidence produced by the railroads that they are operating under impossible circumstances.

This afternoon I should like to deal briefly with two specific subjects. On January 6 last, over the city of Moose Jaw, we had another near collision between an R.C.A.F. training plane and a Trans-Canada Air Lines plane. On January 10—I was not in the house at the time—the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) in answer to a question said he felt that reports of the incident had been greatly exaggerated. He went on to intimate, as I understand it, that he deemed our present air safety regulations to be fairly satisfactory. I feel that I must take exception to such a view, Mr. Speaker, and there are several facts I should like to lay before hon. members.

The house will recall that last spring the most terrible air tragedy in Canadian history took place over the city of Moose Jaw. The planes involved were precisely the same two types that were involved in the incident on January 6. Despite the fact that about 14 such incidents have been reported since the fatal crash a year ago, the minister still feels that the air regulations are satisfactory. It seems to me, however, that they could and should be improved.

As to the last incident, I notice that the view of newspaper editorials, as well as the official view, seems to be that the R.C.A.F. was largely responsible. The T.C.A. people particularly seem to take such an attitude, including the captain of the ship which was involved. Perhaps the R.C.A.F. was partly to blame. But personally I cannot help feeling that Trans-Canada Air Lines is not going to ensure the safety of its passengers over the Moose Jaw area, or over any other training area, simply by blaming the R.C.A.F. Certainly it cannot do so at least until the company itself has taken every possible precaution.

I should like to say this afternoon that in my opinion Trans-Canada Air Lines and the officials of the Department of Transport have been lax in taking certain elementary safety precautions. I admit quite frankly that in these matters I am a layman, but I have discussed them with R.C.A.F. officials in the Moose Jaw area. As a result of those discussions I have several proposals that I should like to give to the minister for his examination and consideration. If they are not feasible he will perhaps tell me why they are not.

In the first place I fail to understand why Trans-Canada Air Lines planes, when approaching the Moose Jaw area where there are sometimes dozens of military planes in the air at the same time, do not notify the control tower. If they would notify the R.C.A.F. control tower, the military planes could immediately be alerted. When the recent near-crash took place on January 6, the T.C.A. plane was flying four and a half hours late. As one R.C.A.F. official to whom I was speaking put it, "As far as we knew, that plane was somewhere over Vancouver". How can Trans-Canada Air Lines—whose primary consideration I know is the safety of its passengers—neglect to give such notification?

In the city of Moose Jaw for two and a half years Canadian Pacific Air Lines flight 61 has actually used the same airport as the R.C.A.F. When a C.P.A. plane approaches the airport, the control tower is notified. Immediately all military planes go south or north; they clear the air and they clear the runways. This system has worked out so well that since the airport was founded at Moose Jaw there has not been a single complaint from any C.P.A. pilot. I know that R.C.A.F. officials are willing—indeed anxious—to have a similar type of arrangement with Trans-Canada Air Lines. I therefore respectfully suggest to the minister that our safety regulations should be amended to require that Trans-Canada Air Lines pilots coming into a military training area notify the military control tower. That procedure is particularly necessary if the flight is delayed.

A second suggestion which has been put forward to me, and which seems sensible, is that Trans-Canada Air Lines planes, which normally travel at an altitude of about 6,000 feet, should go up to 8,000 or 9,000 feet when over a training area. I am given to understand that Harvard planes, or planes of that type, ordinarily do not fly at such a height. If this suggestion were adopted I think the possibility of a crash would be greatly lessened.

I would make a third suggestion, even though some of the authorities may not agree with it. On night flights some of the military authorities tell me it would be much safer if Trans-Canada Air Lines had more lights on the exterior of their planes. The blinker lights are sometimes a little hard to see, particularly if the weather is stormy.

Trans-Canada Air Lines is a wonderful company. However we are obliged to train NATO pilots and, whether we like it or not, I suppose we shall be obliged to continue to train pilots in the years ahead. While no regulations can be airtight, it seems to me that someone should tell Trans-Canada Air Lines that we expect their pilots to do more than just set their course and then fly in a straight line. Until that something more is done I do not feel that Trans-Canada Air Lines are taking all possible safety precautions. I think if these steps were taken, it would increase the safety of air travel.

The second matter I should like to discuss this afternoon has to do with the announcement made last Thursday by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to the effect that the government is now prepared to sell butter to hospitals and other institutions, up to 20 million pounds I believe, at 21 cents per pound less than cost. I take it that this action could mean that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) may have to find about $4·2 million, if the whole quantity is sold. In many ways I think the Minister of Agriculture is to be commended for such an ingenious scheme. After all, butter is a perishable product and we cannot keep it indefinitely.

I notice that the Americans have been trying to dispose of their surplus by giving it away to foreign countries at cut-rate prices. I like the minister's proposal better. In this manner Canadians will get the benefit of the subsidy, particularly institutions which need it. At the same time I feel that this emergency step, which after all will be quite costly to the Canadian taxpayers, should cause us to re-examine our price support program for butter. I know that one hon. member after another taking part in this debate has urged the government to keep the present floor price on butter. I think the hon. member for Kent, New Brunswick (Mr. Michaud) made such a plea this afternoon. I also know that most members of the group to which I belong favour the government policy.

I wish I could be convinced in my own mind, Mr. Speaker, that the present floor price of 58 cents is a good thing for the producer. I may be wrong but, speaking only for myself, I fear that the floor price of 58 cents, which was originally introduced in good faith to help the producers, is not actually having that result. I ask hon. members to look at the facts for a moment. For the past several years our population has been growing by more than 400,000 people per year, but despite that fact the consumption of butter has been going down. In the same period of time the consumption of oleomargarine and other substitutes for butter has been going up by leaps and bounds. In other words, as I see the problem the dairy producer is gradually being squeezed out of the domestic market.

What about our export market? Our export market for butter seems to have completely disappeared. I suppose the main reason is that the Canadian price is about one-third above the world price. I understand that New Zealand is laying down butter in Great Britain at approximately 40 cents a pound. I also understand that the Americans are considering dumping their surplus on the world market. Of course if they do that the world price will go down even further. To sum up the present situation, it seems to me that by virtue of our floor price the Canadian butter producer (a) has already been priced out of the export market and (b) is now being gradually squeezed out of the domestic market.

I fully realize that the dairy industry is very important. I think it employs about 17 per cent of our working people. I also realize that any sharp drop in the floor price of butter at this time would cause hardship. Yet the fact remains that the government's artificially supported price is today discouraging butter consumption at a time when we have a large surplus, and at the same time is encouraging the use of substitutes.

What should be done? The present government program has been quite costly to the taxpayer. I would not object to that if the dairy producer were actually being helped. Under these circumstances I think it would be a good thing, because I believe in reasonable support prices for farm products. But, as I see it, giving away butter to foreign countries or giving it away to hospitals and institutions can only be justified as an emergent, temporary solution to a difficult problem.

I think our dairy producers and the government simply must face certain hard economic facts in the country today. If our producers are to regain their market for butter, I do not see how it can be done other than by a reduction in price. I point out that last year President Eisenhower reduced the American butter floor price by a few cents, yet consumption of butter increased almost immediately by 7 per cent. As I say, speaking only personally, I believe that if a similar step were taken in Canada it would have the same result.

I wish to reiterate that I believe in reasonable floor prices for agricultural products. I believe that such floor prices are necessary for a stabilized agricultural economy. But where butter is concerned, the existence of substitutes has completely complicated the picture. I favour the retention of a sensible floor price for butter; but I believe if butter is to compete, the level of that floor price must be reduced in the not too distant future.

Mr. A. J. MacEachen (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish at the outset to associate myself with those speakers who preceded me in this debate in extending congratulations to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

The contents of the throne speech have been fully discussed, and it is not my intention to repeat the deserved tributes paid to the measures it proposes for the consideration of the house. I derived satisfaction from the features of the proposed legislation which have as their object the strengthening of those safeguards against insecurity experienced by citizens of this country. Those of my constituents who make their living in the fishing industry will be gratified at the most welcome announcement that a new system is proposed for the improvement of the loan facilities available to fishermen.

Attention has been focused in the course of this debate on the impressive growth in the Canadian economy in the past decade. This growth has been reflected in a growing labour force, in an increased willingness to invest and, indeed, in an expanding volume of international trade and other signs of economic advance. Canada has a dynamic and expanding economy, and we all agree that continuous growth is essential not only to maintain the present standards of living but to provide for higher levels of income and employment opportunities for the Canadian people.

But it is also clear that an economy of growth is an economy of change; change through the appearance of new products which take the market away from older products, the discovery of new and more economic processes, the development of new resources and the putting into production of new inventions. This type of change has been termed in a broad sense technological development. But while technological change or development promotes the economic growth of certain industries, it does not occur without convulsive repercussions on other industries which must attempt, sometimes unsuccessfully, to meet new threats to their existence. Workers find their former skills no longer useful, and industries find their products no longer in demand. A dynamic economy will generally exhibit, simultaneously with rapid growth in certain sections, rapid and painful declines in other sections of the economy.

It should be the object of all interested in human welfare to attach greater importance to the undesirable effects of technological change. We should try to consider the most desirable methods to use to overcome the painful readjustments, and if possible to incorporate such measures into social and economic policy. Unless such efforts are undertaken, certain groups will be called upon to shoulder the chief burden of progress which is of benefit to the community as a whole.

As a member from Nova Scotia I wish to take notice of two cases where technological change, in a general way, is placing strains, and may place further strains, on groups and communities. The report of the dominion coal board, recently tabled in this house, painted a very disheartening picture of the Canadian branch of that industry. Members of the coal board expressed their concern in several passages of that report. One quotation, however, will be sufficient to illustrate the awareness of the members of the board of the present stress on the coal industry. The board states:

> To all concerned or interested in Canadian coal mining it has become forcibly evident that the industry is presently facing conditions which threaten the very basis of its existence.

Those conditions threatening the very basis of its existence, in so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, can be briefly summarized. The first of these threatening conditions is the rapid rise in the pithead cost of mining coal in Nova Scotia. This rise is very disturbing. It amounts to $2.25 per net ton since 1949 for the major producer. Increasing production costs are, in my judgment, the principal problem to be faced in reaching proper stability in this industry.

It will be recalled that following an investigation into the coal industry conducted by the federal government, the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act was adopted by this parliament. It was the purpose of this legislation to reduce production costs to the industry through the provision of loans for mechanization purposes. Much confidence was placed in this program as a means of permanent rehabilitation of the coal industry. Not only have the results of this program been disappointing but the chief operator in Nova Scotia, Dosco, has expressed doubt as to whether this program should be continued in view of deteriorating market prospects.

If mechanization, the installation of machinery, cannot be expected to lower production costs in the time and at the rate required, then an acceptable alternative must be found. The industry depends for its future on arresting the trend toward higher costs, and if possible effecting substantial reductions in present production costs. Otherwise coal will be unable to meet the competition of fuel substitutes, and will be clearly unable to improve its market outlook. It is to these acceptable alternatives, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to direct a few remarks.

The predominant characteristic of Canadian coal mining is that the labour bill makes up the major part of the total production cost. At the moment the wage bill or, if you wish, the income to the worker is such that about 53 cents of every dollar spent on coal production goes to the working force. If a wider definition is taken of the wage bill, then 60 cents of each dollar goes to the working force.

I am not suggesting that wages in this industry are too great; far from it. This fact, however, namely the proportion of labour cost to total production cost, is suggestive of a solution. This means that the working force in the coal mines, if properly organized and activated, could effect substantial reductions in total cost through their ability to control the wage bill which is such a large share of the total operating costs.

I am convinced that if coal miners were given an opportunity to influence production decisions, improvement would definitely result. The miners and their families are those most vitally concerned with the welfare of this industry. Seldom, however, is any thought given to the best method of harnessing this great human resource for the rehabilitation of the industry. I suggest that the dominion coal board, management and trade unions could examine with profit those instances, of which there are now a growing number, where this approach has brought about the kind of atmosphere that is conducive to improving production efficiency.

Turning now to the demand side of the industry, there are a number of hostile factors in operation. First, the United States coal industry, our historical competitor, is succeeding in bringing down production costs. Second, there is the competition afforded by residual oil and natural gas. Finally, there is the dieselization of the Canadian National Railways which, according to the dominion coal board, will have reduced this market for Nova Scotia coal by 600,000 tons in a period of four years, and will have dissipated it completely in a short period thereafter. This policy, undertaken in my opinion without careful assessment of its effects on the Nova Scotia economy, and without satisfying the public fully as to the source of fuel supplies in the event of war, will take away a large number of jobs in the coal mines when it reaches its culmination.

It may be that the future will vindicate the type of industrial statesmanship that has unremittingly pursued this policy in order to effect internal business economies. I am sure, however, that the coal miners of Nova Scotia and the communities dependent upon this industry are also correct in their claim that this program should have been undertaken more gradually. If it must be regarded as an inevitable policy, it should have been undertaken more gradually and not at a time when the industry was meeting adversity from several other directions. Here is a plain case where a technological change is imposing a burden on one sector of the economy, though it is to be sincerely hoped that the over-all effects will be thoroughly beneficial.

Faced with rising pithead costs on the supply side, the industry is meeting this stiff competition on the demand side for the reasons I have outlined, and all of them are attributable to the technological change occurring in our dynamic economy. While it is possible to separate the supply and demand side of this industry for the purpose of analysis, both features are closely interrelated if only for the reason that the chief determinant of the ability of the industry to compete successfully is this very important factor of cost of production.

Very telling evidence of the rapid changes that have overtaken the coal industry is the fact that the royal commission which examined this industry so exhaustively some years ago did not foresee the new technological and economic developments. The dominion coal board takes notice of this situation by the following comment:

> However, new economic and technological development began to affect adversely the situation during 1952. It became evident that the Canadian coal industry was faced with problems which could not have been foreseen by the royal commission.

If new directives and new policy are to be shaped to meet new conditions—and I am not overlooking the important contribution the dominion coal board can make—then it might be useful to consider a new investigation of this industry, taking into account developments which began to become pronounced in the past two or three years. The only reassuring feature is that at the end of 10 years, so the experts claim, the fuel requirements of Canada can only be satisfied through increasing dependence on coal as a source of supply.

The interim period, from the present to that time of greater fuel requirements, will continue to be most difficult for this industry and the persons dependent upon it for a livelihood. The measures of government now in effect—the subvention policy and the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act—may require strengthening to aid the industry over this period.

I now turn to another subject which is also in the category of change, in this case brought about to improve transportation facilities in Nova Scotia. This improvement was noted in the speech from the throne by the statement:

> Since you last met Cape Breton island has been linked with the mainland by the new causeway which will be ready for service as soon as the ship canal has been bridged.

I am sure my constituents in Cape Breton island would have been more pleased if His Excellency had chosen to say:

> Since you last met the mainland has been linked with Cape Breton island by the new causeway.

The completion of this project marks another step in the improvement of transportation facilities in the province of Nova Scotia. Though on official opening day its chief promoter in Nova Scotia, the late Premier Macdonald, will not be present to lead his 100 pipers into the county of Inverness, which was his birthplace and mine, there will be real satisfaction in the province as a whole to see his dream come true.

However, this new advance will affect detrimentally the three communities of Point Tupper, Port Hawkesbury and Mulgrave, contiguous to the causeway area. The chief source of employment in these communities at present is the rail and highway ferries operated by the Canadian National Railways and the provincial government from Cape Breton to the mainland. When these ferries are eliminated jobs will be lost, and unless quick action is taken a fatal threat will exist to the future of these communities. As the day approaches for the cessation of operation of these ferries, there is growing apprehension among the people concerned.

I do not believe that it was the intention of this government nor the intention of the government of Nova Scotia, when this project was inaugurated, that the citizens of these communities should bear the chief burden of an advance that will bring great benefit to the people as a whole. I believe further that when the action of any government is such that it threatens the jobs of any group of citizens, there is automatically created for that government an obligation and a responsibility toward those adversely affected.

I take note that the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway project will cause property damage or property loss, and I understand that it will be the desire to compensate for such loss. In our type of society job rights are as important as property rights, and on behalf of my constituents in the Canso area I must urge upon this house and the government the need for action.

However, the impression should not be left that the citizens in these areas have been reluctant to face up to the challenge presented by this problem. Some time ago the residents of the four counties affected organized themselves into the Antigonish-Guysborough-Inverness-Richmond development association and have undertaken a study and investigation of what industry would best replace the jobs now threatened.

The most promising project now under consideration is the establishment of a paper mill. At present I understand that several firms are interested, and the fruition of this idea depends upon the availability of wood supply and electric power. The forest inventory undertaken jointly by the federal and provincial governments is now nearing completion, and it is to be hoped that its findings will be favourable for this area. Such an industry would solve in large measure the problem of these communities. It would provide stability for the agricultural industry of the adjoining counties, and would usher in a new era of forest conservation.

I had the opportunity just recently to discuss this problem with the premier of Nova Scotia and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler), and on previous occasions with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters). I think it fair to say that all these hon. gentlemen expressed a real concern over this problem, and if I raise the matter again tonight it is because it is a matter of urgency where government responsibility must be recognized.

Mr. Speaker, I began these remarks by saying that the growth of our economy through technological development is necessary to maintain income and employment in Canada. Our search for further economic growth should proceed hand in hand with a full consciousness of the needs of those communities that will be affected adversely by developments that are in the general interest.

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I would draw attention to the fact that some hon. members have taken on new responsibilities and assumed heavier tasks. I extend my congratulations to them and express the hope that they may be blessed with good health and divine guidance in the performance of their high office.

May I extend my congratulations to those hon. members who sit in the House of Commons for the first time. I trust they will enjoy their labours in parliament and their association with other hon. members. I would extend congratulations, too, to the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) upon the excellent job he is doing.

While the hon. member for Kent, New Brunswick (Mr. Michaud) is not in his seat, I would congratulate him upon his remarks this afternoon, because in them he set out clearly the agricultural picture in his constituency. I assure him that the picture he painted with respect to the county of Kent is one that could be painted for the whole of New Brunswick. I would stand behind him and support him in the advice he has given the government, particularly when he says that the Department of Agriculture should review why the agricultural economy of New Brunswick is at such a low ebb.

I would also like to back up the hon. member in what he said concerning the farm loan board, and that applies also to what the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy) said a few days ago; that when our farmers run into difficulties such as we have had in the past year, that just seems to be the time the farm loan board is not at hand, and the farmers cannot meet the regulations. In that connection the regulations concerning the farm loan board should be reviewed.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the speech from the throne did not fill me with a great deal of enthusiasm. I did not detect anything in it that would be a shot in the arm for our agricultural industry, which seems to be in such a disheartening condition. I did not see any change in policy by which the declining incomes of our agricultural workers are to get any relief. There was encouragement, of course, in the speech from the throne, which I was glad to see, for certain groups and I shall refer to some of them. For instance, I fully support the amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act, and I hope they will meet the requests of the various members who have spoken in this house in the past, and of the Canadian Legion. The same remarks apply to the proposed amendments to the Blind Persons Act.

Another important piece of legislation was mentioned, namely the amendments to the Railway Act concerning the elimination of level crossings. I trust that these amendments, when they come down, will be broad enough to include underpasses, because there are many such in the country. I have some in my constituency, and there are several in New Brunswick, that are dangerous when one considers the number of vehicles and the amount of traffic on the roads. I hope these amendments will include underpasses as well as level crossings.

There are other items that I do not propose to take time to mention. However, in passing

I wish to say a word concerning unemployment. It is not a big problem in my constituency. The amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which were passed recently will be helpful, and we are thankful for them. But I refer to a certain group of people, labourers, in my constituency and in other constituencies in New Brunswick, who are now unemployed and for whom no provision is made. When he spoke the other evening the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario (Mr. Hodgson) referred to this group.

I refer to that labouring group who depend upon farmers in the summer and who cut pulpwood and wood by the cord in winter. They do not seem to come under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Through no fault of their own they find themselves out of work, and there is no place to which they can apply for relief except directly to the municipality. I can assure you that the rural municipalities are not adequately equipped, nor are they in any financial position, to handle this problem satisfactorily.

Rural municipalities that depend upon agriculture are facing a gloomy year. Costs of production have not declined, but the incomes of those groups have been declining, and in addition to the normal trend in the decline of prices, owing to the excessive rain we had in New Brunswick last year a great deal of the crop that was planted last spring has never been harvested. That applies to hay, grain and potatoes, and a large percentage of the crop that was harvested was below average.

Therefore our farmers are not too happy about their position. This is naturally reflected in the financial position of the rural municipalities. All you have to do is read the papers and you will see that the financial reports of those municipalities at the year end invariably showed increased bank loans, increased tax delinquent lists, and larger budgets to take care of health, education, hospitalization and relief.

The labouring group to which I referred gets no assistance from the federal treasury. There is no way at the present time for the municipality to be reimbursed from the federal treasury. Judging from various speeches that have been made in this house we can all agree that unemployment is chiefly and primarily the responsibility of this federal government. But here is a group who are discriminated against, if you wish to put it that way. It does sound like a harsh word, but they make their living by labour. They do not come under the Unemployment Insurance Act, but they do get hungry when they get out of work. They need help, and they have to go to the parish and the municipality has to levy taxes directly on the people, which in rural agriculture areas are not easy to pay.

Some method should be worked out between the Department of Labour and the provinces so the municipalities, especially the rural municipalities, could be reimbursed for this type of relief. I just mention that casually because, while it is not a large problem in my constituency, there are quite a large number of people unemployed for whom there is no statistical record, and no record of which this house or the country generally has any knowledge.

I should like to pass on to another matter concerning the farmers. I do not think I am using harsh words when I say that the farmers in general are not getting their share of the producer's dollar, or of the consumer's dollar, whichever way you wish to examine the situation. A good many of them do not hesitate to say they feel that this government's trade policies are neglectful of their needs.

Many products have been mentioned, and I have a favourite one, too, which is potatoes. The hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) covered that ground very well; therefore I am going to curtail my remarks about potatoes. However, I do wish to say that I concur in what he said because I know he spoke in the interests of the potato farmers and agriculture in general down east. The potato farmers in the maritimes feel that they are in unfair competition with their United States neighbours.

I would like to go one step further than the hon. member went. I will give the house an example of just how unfairly the Canadian potato farmer is being treated under our present trade policy, in comparison with his United States neighbour. Within the last few days potatoes have been selling in Montreal for $2.60 per hundredweight. The American takes that $2.60, and because the Canadian dollar is at a premium it is really worth $2.67 to him. As the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) has explained to the house, it costs the United States potato grower nothing extra to produce potatoes for the Montreal market, but he receives 7 cents per hundredweight more than the Canadian farmer.

That may not seem much, but this is how it works out. It means an extra 4·2 cents on every bushel of potatoes. There are two different sizes of cars used to ship potatoes, one taking 700 bushels and the other about 550 bushels. In the case of the larger car it means $30 per carload which the United States farmer can take out of the Montreal market as a premium over and above what the Canadian potato producer receives.

I ask hon. members of this house if such a policy is fair to our Canadian farmers. By that type of policy the United States farmer is receiving protection on the Canadian market. We cannot expect the Canadian farmer to compete under those circumstances. I ask in all seriousness, as did the hon. member for Queens, that when trade agreements are being considered the eastern farmer and the potato farmer should not be forgotten. We do grow the best potatoes in Canada down there.

I am going to pass on to another subject, which concerns the obligation of the federal government to assist provincial governments in the development of natural resources. In speaking the other day the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) made out a strong case for assistance to New Brunswick in the matter of power. There is no need for me to review the case he made out concerning the immediate need of having cheap power available in New Brunswick in order that the people of our province may reap the greatest benefit from the development of our recently discovered base metal bodies, which are among the greatest on the continent.

Speaking in this chamber a little over a year ago I tried to impress upon this government the urgent need of having power available in New Brunswick at a lower cost. This province is already burdened with a debt which is beyond our ability to pay. What I said on that occasion still stands, except that I can now add the encouraging fact that surveys in my constituency, to which I referred, have shown that we have one of the most important manganese ore bodies in Canada or the United States. The latest information is that within the next 15 or 20 months a concentrate mill will be ready to go to work. They are going to develop that mine.

I am not speaking now about my own constituency, as this is a matter which cannot be confined to any particular area. It is our desire in New Brunswick, and I think I can fairly say that this applies to the maritime provinces, that we get the most out of what we have in the way of raw materials. It is our belief in New Brunswick that great advantage will be derived from these ore bodies if power is made available at a reasonable cost. If such power is available there is a possibility of a large smelter being erected in the Bathurst area. I am sorry the hon. member for Northumberland, N.B. (Mr. McWilliam) is not here, as I think he would back me up in this. If that smelter is established it is going to attract other industries such as producers of fertilizers, ammonium products, sulphur phosphates, potash products and others. But the one thing that is needed more than anything else is power. We need assistance in order to be able to develop our natural resources.

I should just like to add that any national policy of assistance in the development of natural resources should permit a province to develop those resources which are the most beneficial. The only large power potential in New Brunswick is in the Saint John river basin. Although we hope there will be others in a few years, at present nothing else has been surveyed. The most important site there is the Beechwood site.

The most important item in connection with the development of this site is the cost, because that is what will determine the price to the consumer. I think it can be said that New Brunswick has lagged behind in industrial growth. We were one of the original partners of confederation. Without New Brunswick and the leading part played by the outstanding public men of that day there might never have been confederation. Whether it was right or whether it was wrong is not the question; the fact is that this original partner has not fared too well as a result of confederation. As a representative from that loyal and grand old province I feel that I need make no apologies when I come before this federal government and plead for help.

I am not asking for a handout on behalf of New Brunswick. Assistance does not necessarily mean a grant. But I would like the house to consider what central governments have done for other provinces during past years and what the present government is doing today for other parts of Canada. In the light of that, a grant toward capital expenditure would be nothing less than fair.

Especially is this evident from a survey or a perusal of the projects in which this government has helped other provinces, as enumerated by my friend the hon. member for Royal the other day. Others can be added. There was the St. Mary's dam. There was the large write-off to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta in the agreement writing down their debts in 1947. There was the assistance given to the railroads of this country to open up mining areas. There is also the big expenditure toward the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway, which was also mentioned by my hon. friend. Indirectly, if not directly, this assistance has helped to develop the resources of those provinces. It seems to me there is all sorts of precedent for it.

I agree, of course, with what the hon. member said the other day. I am not objecting, and we in New Brunswick do not object, to the people in these other provinces getting this help because we can see that, by getting that help, they have become better; the provinces have become bigger; they have grown faster; their industrial life is now of a higher standard. All we say is, give us some aid in the same way you gave them aid.

As I said a few moments ago, assistance may be given in various ways. If assistance is given to a province so it can develop its natural resources, it becomes a better member of the federal union; more revenue comes back to the dominion treasury; more work is provided. Just a few minutes ago we heard from the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen), who told us that the situation in his province, as a result of technological advancement, is not good and that he is looking to this government to do something. I think he has a right to do so. We in the small provinces must get assistance or we cannot afford to develop. It seems to me that one of the main functions of the central government is to look over the family in the union and help it here and there in order to keep all the members prosperous and keep the federation of provinces in something of a fair balance.

During the past two years our province has regained the confidence of the investing public. Nevertheless, for a small province such as ours to finance a large power development such as that which we need, at a reasonable cost, is a handicap. At the present time our capacity is approximately 105,000 kilowatts. I am informed that reliable engineers estimate that by 1959, just a mere four years from now, if we are to have development of these mines which we want to get, together with the natural growth of domestic use we shall require 215,000 kilowatts. I might add that those estimates were made before the last announcement of the discovery of this manganese ore.

There is just one thing more I want to add, and that is this. There is no secret about the fact—and it is accepted—that hydro can be developed at a cheaper rate than can thermal power, which is the only alternative. This so-called Beechwood site will develop 135,000 horsepower. It has been thoroughly investigated not only by our own competent hydro engineers but by such outstanding authorities as the Power Corporation of Canada, the consulting firm of H. G. Acres Company Limited and the Shawinigan Engineering Company Limited. It has been found to be feasible as a good power site, and a recommendation for its development is on paper.

This is not the only site that will need to be developed. Our power requirements are going to grow. Thermal plants will have to be built. If the Passamaquoddy project ever becomes feasible the power produced will be needed by the state of Maine, the province of Nova Scotia and ourselves. Someone has said, "Why not wait for power to be developed by atomic energy?" I may say that I am reliably informed that it will take 15 to 20 years to develop power from atomic energy that will compete with hydro.

In the meantime what are we going to do? Are we going to sit down and allow all our raw materials to be shipped out for processing in the United States and other places? We need power now. We want it available in large quantities by 1957. We want that smelter in the Bathurst area. We want that sulphur extracting plant in the Newcastle area. We want those other factories that go along with them. We also want manganese to be mined and smelted in the Saint John river valley.

The other day my friend the hon. member for Royal pointed out that manganese is extremely important in the manufacture of steel. But what makes this ore body more important than others in Canada is this. Without the close proximity of sulphur for the processing, manganese cannot be smelted at reasonable rates. At the present time I understand that sulphur has to be brought in, and that the two minerals cannot be found close together. In New Brunswick we have them in close proximity. In my hon. friend's constituency of Northumberland, N.B., there is sulphur and in my constituency, which is a mere 50 miles away, there will be the manganese.

The fact that those two minerals are found so close together is going to make the project profitable and worth while. That is the information I have. This is why we want to be able to provide power for the smelting of those minerals. It is going to help our railroads and it is going to help our ports, not only on the Saint John but in the Newcastle-Bathurst area on the Miramichi. It is going to give many people work. It is going to make us in New Brunswick feel as though we have a rightful place in the economy of this country. Above all, it will provide many markets for our agricultural products here at home.

I see that not all the members for New Brunswick are in their seats, Mr. Speaker. I wish that they were, because I am going to extend an invitation to all hon. members from New Brunswick who sit in this house to speak up for their native province, to get behind this request on behalf of the people of New Brunswick, and to convince this federal government that we need this power and that we need their backing in order that the initial capital expenditure will not be too great. I am satisfied that the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Gregg), New Brunswick's representative in the cabinet, is doing all he can, but let us not leave it all to one man. I do not think he can do it alone, but by the united efforts of all members from New Brunswick, supported by members from our sister province, I am satisfied that the government will not only be convinced of the justice of our cause but will grant our request without delay. I am a bit surprised at the silence until now of hon. members from New Brunswick.

An hon. Member: Including the minister.

Mr. Montgomery: I ask them, do you not want to see the people of New Brunswick share in the progress of Canada? Do you not want to see our resources developed to the greatest possible extent within the boundaries of our own province? Do you not want to see important smelters and other industries established at home? Do you not want to help our railroads and ports? Above all, do you not want to give the same opportunities to our young people at home as, in the last few years, they have had to seek in other provinces or foreign countries?

I am satisfied, if the request for assistance from the people of New Brunswick is not favourably considered by the government, that the people there will look upon the silence of hon. members from that province and the lack of a united front as one of the reasons such assistance was not forthcoming. Mind you, every consumer of electric power is interested in this matter, because the price at which power can be delivered to the consumer is going to mean a great deal to these people in the next few years. Everyone is an interested party.

If assistance in a material way in the initial stages of our power development is favourably considered and immediately advanced, in the next five years it will benefit nine out of ten families in our province. Not only will it do that, it will also benefit a great many people in our sister provinces because work will be provided for them too. It is no secret that negotiations have been in progress between the provincial hydro commission and officials of the federal government. I hope such negotiations will be satisfactory and helpful to our province, and that our people will be treated as people in other provinces have been treated in the past when assistance was needed. You know, it makes no difference under what name the aid is given. It all adds up to the same thing—assistance.

Finally, I join with the hon. members for Royal and Saint John-Albert, and those other members who I hope will rise and take a stand on this matter before the debate is over, in sincerely and respectfully asking the federal government to give favourable consideration to New Brunswick's request for assistance in the initial development of hydro-electric power at Beechwood, which has been found feasible and has been recommended for immediate development. I am satisfied that a favourable capital set-up in the development of this project will be a means of helping the people of New Brunswick help themselves; and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that if they get that help they will be willing to go on.

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) as well as the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Carrick) on the fine speeches they delivered while moving and seconding the address in reply to His Excellency's speech. I do wish however to congratulate more particularly the electors of these two constituencies for choosing, as their representatives in this house, men who are so highly qualified and I have no doubt that they will fittingly represent their respective constituencies and render them, and their country, great service.

I am pleased to be in a position to congratulate the government and especially the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for the decision to sell, at reduced prices, the surplus 20 million pounds of butter to approved institutions such as schools, hospitals, old folks' homes, etc. I would like the same offer to be made to the Red Cross, to women's institutes, to houses of refuge or Sisters of Charity so as to help all these organizations which are of such great importance for the aged, the sick or the needy. After all, the government has to help them in any case. In this way, these less fortunate citizens would enjoy good butter, a product of superior quality which would replace all those substitute products they are being served now. You will no doubt have read with the same surprise as I did some statistics published in the January 26 issue of the Citizen. It was mentioned there that the Ottawa Civic hospital buys about 4,000 pounds of butter and 30,000 pounds of margarine annually, butter being served only to private room patients or those on a special diet. As far as I am concerned I should prefer that no margarine be used in hospitals. If they must use that product, then it should be in the proportion of 4,000 pounds of margarine and 30,000 of butter. In this way all the sick, the aged and the needy could enjoy butter.

Mr. Speaker, I have a suggestion to make to the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), which I believe would supplement the happy initiative that he has taken about butter. Here it is: he should buy five million pounds of cheese at the present price and resell it to these institutions, granting them a rebate of approximately 18 to 20 cents a pound, and then request that they serve good Canadian cheddar at all meals.

This same food product, together with a glass of milk, should be served free of charge twice a day in all our teaching institutions. For that purpose, I call upon our devoted and distinguished Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), who could negotiate agreements with provincial governments inviting them to pay 50 per cent of the expenses this would involve, while the federal government would pay the other half. This would improve the health of our school children.

To the right hon. Minister of Agriculture, to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), to our Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), as well as to the whole cabinet, I have another suggestion to make, one I have made in the past. In my opinion, the government should levy a sales tax of 10 cents a pound on oleomargarine and on all other butter substitutes. In return, the government could grant to all creameries a 10-cent subsidy per pound of butter and maintain the ceiling price, of 58 cents a pound, for butter, to dairy farmers. With the storing costs, which average about one cent a pound, butter would then sell to wholesalers from 48 to 50 cents, according to the cost of transportation and storing, and the latter would have no right to retail butter at more than 51 to 55 cents a pound, according to costs of transportation and storage.

In this way the consumer could get butter at 10 cents less a pound. This tax on margarine would serve to cover part of the expense and the less fortunate among us could buy good butter very cheaply. Canadians could buy an excellent product while helping the farmers of this country and the charge on the government would not be excessive. That is very important, for it must be remembered that, if our agricultural class is not prosperous, the effects are felt throughout our economy. Our farmers are the heaviest buyers, per capita, of manufactured goods, for example of building materials or materials used in the repair of houses, barns, sheds, pig sties, chicken coops, garages, silos, fences and bridges, or again of farm machinery, automobiles, tractors, furniture, etc.

Certain hon. members would no doubt be surprised to learn that $6,000 worth of agricultural machinery of all kinds is required to farm 100 acres, and that any farmer who wants to buy a complete set of modern machines, such as combine, baler, ensilage cutter, milking machine or refrigerator, must part with $12,000 and more. Then too the farmer needs house furnishings like any village, town or city dweller.

If I am saying this, it is not because the constituency of Russell, which I have the honour to represent, is rural. On the contrary, though it has been rural, it has become 75 per cent urban. No, I am speaking in this way because I think that it is for the good of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage). We are proud of him and of the fine work he has done so far.

I think too I should congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for his acumen in choosing his ministers.

Like other members, I regret the departure of some ministers, these most distinguished and qualified men, such as the Hon. Lionel Chevrier, former minister of transport, the Hon. D. C. Abbott, former minister of finance, and the Hon. Brooke Claxton, former minister of national defence.

However, our great and noble Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), guided by divine Providence, made a choice of other ministers who, in my opinion, will prove to be an asset to the whole country.

I should like to suggest to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) that he step up his reforestation program. In my opinion, the amounts devoted to this purpose by the federal government should be increased fourfold, and provinces should be requested to do likewise, besides getting county and township councils, as well as individuals, interested in reforestation and water conservation. I previously explained this here when I suggested a plan for the conservation of the water of the South Nation river which flows through about 15 counties in the eastern part of Ontario, making what is called the Ottawa valley.

I wish people who practise reforestation were exempt from land taxes; further, the money they spend on reforestation should be deductible from income tax, when they are called upon to pay it. These forests should be inspected by experts appointed by both federal and provincial governments and when time came to fell the trees these experts would point out the trees to be felled, as well as the trees to be replaced at that time. The owner of timber land could be taxed on the cutting, according to a reasonable standard laid down as well for land taxes as for income tax purposes.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

(Translation):

Mr. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I would feel remiss in my duty if I did not call attention to the insult uttered against the province of Quebec by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). Although I do not live in Quebec, my constituency is adjacent to that beautiful province and I have several relatives, even brothers and sisters, among those charming Quebec people.

I have visited that province from one end to the other, as I did for all the rest of Canada, except for Newfoundland, where I would like to go shortly, because judging from the congenial and intelligent members sent to Ottawa to represent that province, I know that I shall not be disappointed.

I must tell my hon. friend from Burnaby-Coquitlam that he is completely ignorant of the character of the Quebec people, because there are no better, more intelligent and hospitable people in Canada. True, there are always some black sheep and I am wondering whether a few such from his own province are not now in Ottawa. If the present premier of Quebec has chosen to stress different points or give different interpretations of autonomy in order to have his candidates elected, a tactic of which I personally disapprove and which is certainly detrimental to good understanding and nefarious to the province of Quebec, it does not mean that he is a bad Canadian.

Does not each province and each political party have its own way of conducting elections and of submitting its program? Yes, Mr. Speaker, even the province of Ontario, one of the finest, not only in Canada but in the whole world, is inhabited by honourable, peaceful, intelligent and honest citizens, the great majority of whom are of English descent. I recognize that there are also some black sheep among them, just as there are in the maritimes and in western Canada. During my trips across Canada, I met honest, kind and intelligent people everywhere. This is not the place to disparage one province or another. We are indeed fortunate in living in the greatest country in the world. In fact, we are truly privileged in having good citizens, from Vancouver to Halifax, and in Newfoundland—people who are the descendants of almost every race in the world, and who wish to live in harmony. The good I have to say about the other provinces, I also wish to apply to Quebec, where racial and religious matters, school rights and the rights of minorities are treated with more fairness than anywhere else in Canada. I would ask all hon. members to urge their own provincial governments to imitate Quebec as far as justice towards minorities is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, I would be angry with myself if I did not speak of the matter so often discussed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), namely divorce, to which I am absolutely opposed. Marriage cannot be likened to an exchange of houses or automobiles. Divorce is the ruin of the family. What happens to the children of divorced people? Divorce is a moral evil which is greatly detrimental to the country. Married people should learn to put up with each other, to live together and bear their cross. Of course, when people do not want to understand each other, it is easy to find means and ways of divorcing. Most often, men are the guilty parties.

But, since our legislation permits divorce —and I congratulate Quebec and Newfoundland for not accepting that legislation—and since as Canadian citizens, people in those provinces are entitled to submit their case to the federal government, in my opinion no court could settle those cases better than the Senate and the House of Commons. The Senate committee, where the requests are first dealt with, is made up of Canada's most honourable citizens, lawyers, notaries, doctors, businessmen and farmers, men devoted to public service, who have wide experience as far as race, religion and all classes of society are concerned. They know the laws and customs of the land, and are, in short, honourable men, since they have been chosen to sit as senators, independent for life of politics and the powers of finance. No abler group of men could be found to pass on matters of divorce. They have all the time they need to review such cases, since we sit from six to eight months a year. For my part, had I a case to be tried, I would be happy to submit it to the senators. I am convinced that those who apply to them obtain justice.

I would also like to thank the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) and the government for the improvement made to the airport at Uplands and for their decision to spend over $3 million to make this an ultra-modern airport, something which is quite called for in this national capital of ours.

I also wish to thank the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) for his decision to build a military hospital at a cost of about $9 million at Billings Bridge. As it is the location of the Rideau health centre for ex-servicemen it is extremely well chosen. It provides all the necessary comforts to our convalescing veterans. Canada owes them all that can be done for their benefit.

While I have brought this matter to the attention of the Hon. Brooke Claxton, then minister of national defence, and of the present minister (Mr. Campney) on more than one occasion, I wish to come back to it today, in the house. I repeat that there are no better locations, with all the required space and protection from atomic attack, for the proposed national defence headquarters than the township of Gloucester, in the constituency of Russell. There are so many favourable sites that I shall refrain from singling one out. I am of the opinion, in any event, that in addition to the factors I have already mentioned, there is there all the space necessary to build houses for the employees who would like to live close to their work. This could be done at reasonable prices and I am sure that lots there would sell at one-tenth the price of those in centre-town.

We are certainly in need of housing, as evidenced by the fact that in 1954 the population of the constituency of Russell increased by 5,000, including 3,605 in the section annexed by the city of Ottawa.

I wish to congratulate the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) for the great improvements he has achieved in his department by providing a much better postal service. We are glad to have so well qualified and devoted a minister. However, I should like to make a couple of suggestions to him. First, he should so change the regulations that where 10 per cent of the population is English-speaking or vice versa, the postmaster be bilingual. At the present time, the regulation lays down 20 per cent for this privilege. This change would make for better understanding and facilitate the harmony existing between the two great races in this country. My second suggestion concerns postmasters, who receive salaries ranging from $500 to $900 annually, while supplying the premises and catering to the public for 8 or 9 hours a day during 6 days of the week. I suggest they be given better salaries. Employees of the Post Office Department and myself will have great difficulty in finding premises and employees ready to accept such employment in my constituency. At the present time, some of these offices have been closed for two or three months in my constituency. In fact the last one closed has been so for more than three months and we could find no one to accept the salary offered by the department.

In conclusion, I should like to ask the Postmaster General and all the other ministers who have to decide on sites for the construction of buildings for their departments to pick sites in the constituency of Russell where they will be welcome and where they will find the localities best suited from all points of view.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DUPUIS—REFERENCE TO NEWSPAPER ITEM

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the hon. member is rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Dupuis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would like—

Mr. Hodgson: He spoke for 45 minutes the other night.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: I will not make another speech; don't worry. I would like to make a correction with respect to a speech I made in this house on January 28 last. In a news item appearing in a Montreal paper, I was reported to have said that provincial governments' spending does not exceed the amount of the federal grants for hospital construction and medical services. I say, as I said before, that the subsidies granted by the federal government to the provinces amounted to $167 million for the period from 1948 to 1953, and the provinces were to spend an equal amount of money for the same purpose. I don't know what the other provinces' expenditures were, but I do know that, as far as the province of Quebec is concerned, the amount earmarked for that purpose was, in that province, greater than the amount granted by the federal government.

I only wanted to straighten out the matter, so that there will be no misunderstanding as to what I said.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, there is one matter with which I wish to deal briefly before saying anything on the speech from the throne. This is a matter which I am sure will have the support of all hon. members from the province of Saskatchewan, irrespective of where they may sit in this house. I refer to the jubilee celebration of the entry of Saskatchewan and Alberta into confederation.

Fifty years ago these two prairie provinces were admitted as constitutional members of the Dominion of Canada. We are proud of Canada, proud of its record, proud to belong to Canada and to be counted as citizens of this great dominion. Our story of the prairies is one of the moulding together of a cosmopolitan group of people from almost every country of the old world, from Europe and Asia. It is a story of how they pioneered that land together, met and overcame the difficulties and the problems of developing it into great provinces making a great contribution to the Dominion of Canada.

This year we are celebrating the fiftieth anniversary, and I merely want to say that Saskatchewan invites everybody in Canada, including all hon. members who can possibly come to that province this year, to visit the prairies and help us pay tribute to the great pioneers, those people who through their toil and courage have given to the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta, and Canada as a whole, a great heritage and a great example.

The throne speech of 1955 has been called many names. It was aptly described by one journalist as a rather dull chronicle of stale news. As a matter of fact it is, I believe, a masterpiece of evasion and indifference in so far as basic remedies for those economic problems which face Canada today are concerned. It seemed also to be studied in its efforts to pass over lightly some very important problems such as unemployment and the declining farm income, things which face the Canadian people as a whole and which so often seem to be so far from this chamber.

Last year the same attitude was evident, and we attacked that attitude. At that time we asked that steps be taken to take care of the situation. We were told that unemployment was just seasonal and would rectify itself when summer came and the ice moved out of the great lakes and the St. Lawrence river. But this winter unemployment is even worse. In that portion of Canada from which I come the unemployment situation is at least 50 per cent worse than it was a year ago. The 60-day extension of unemployment insurance benefits, which everyone in this house supported and endorsed, is just a salve to help those unfortunate unemployed people through a couple of bad months in the winter time. It is no substitute for employment.

The people are eagerly looking for something to be done to assure them of some possibility of exchanging their labour for a living. Every trade union brief presented to the government in the past year has emphasized the matter of unemployment, yet no effective measures seem to have been taken. As a matter of fact, I personally am beginning to doubt whether this government has a cure for the problem short of a threat of war.

Policies dealing with trade and price control, which affect the cost of living, the problems of taxation and immigration—all these things affect the Canadian economy. They are the responsibilities of the federal government. The provincial governments can do very little about them; but if as a result of these policies half a million people are unemployed, then the responsibility for employable unemployed rests upon this government whose policies to a large extent have created the situation.

Instead of accepting that responsibility, what do we find? The government says to the municipalities, "We take no responsibility for the unemployed employables beyond the Unemployment Insurance Act". Is it going to be a repetition of the old story; that the municipalities are going to be asked to share this burden, with small grants from the provincial government, and they shall have to carry it?

That is just not good enough. The federal government receives approximately 72 per cent of the taxpayer's dollar. This government is responsible for the policies which largely cause unemployment in this country; and I repeat, this government must accept that responsibility. The convention of mayors of Canada pointed this out to the officials of this government. I can assure the government that unless they take more effective action to restore employment in this country there will be a storm of protest from all parts of Canada, and it will be a united protest. Half a million unemployed is not a healthy sign in a country such as Canada, with all its resources. Since the war we have brought a million people to this country. We heard members this afternoon tell of young men in their province going as far away as New Zealand in order to obtain employment in the lumber camps of that country.

When people are unemployed for any length of time they are confronted with serious problems. A man may have invested his life savings in a home, or he may be building a home. If unemployment strikes for a few months he can carry the burden, but when it continues beyond that length of time and he finds he must move away from the district in order to get employment, —if he can find it—he stands to lose his whole investment. It is a much greater loss than just being unemployed. It is too serious a thing to be taken lightly. It is a serious reflection on our economy that people can enjoy prosperity and employment only in wartime. If our economy cannot provide employment for the Canadian people it must stand condemned.

In the field of agriculture we have the same problem. In the presentations made to the government by various farm organizations, by the federation of agriculture, by the farm union organization, which is a growing, young and vigorous organization trying to unite the farmers so that they can speak with one voice, reference is made to some of the things which are basically wrong. They ask the government to take steps to remove some of the injustices and give some stability to the agriculture industry of this country so they can look forward to making a living in that industry. This is an industry upon which a large percentage of Canadians depend for their existence.

There is one thing common to all these protests. They state that their costs of production are continuing to rise while the returns for the things they produce and sell are constantly and rapidly declining. There can be only one final result if there is a continuation of that trend. When your returns keep lessening and your costs of operating continue to rise, as soon as they cross one another you are facing bankruptcy. They are facing this problem seriously; they are looking for some effective solution.

In many provinces of this dominion agriculture is the main industry. I believe it is safe to say that in our province over 80 per cent of the people obtain their living from agriculture. Unfortunately during the past year we were faced with a serious problem created by rust, and then frost. The income of the farmers of that province was reduced last summer by some $300 million. This is bound to have its effect upon the whole economy. Taxes cannot be paid; the provincial government is going to suffer from lack of income, it and municipalities are going to be unable to provide services to the degree they have in the past.

The farmer is trying to obtain some stability. He does not mind facing the ordinary difficulties with which nature may confront him. He has been brought up on that kind of thing, and he does not mind facing it. But he wants to know that if and when he does produce a crop as a result of his efforts, he can look forward to obtaining a proper return for his labour. If that is established, then he can weather the storms of a year or two of difficulty.

I was interested in reading the recommendations contained in the submission to the government of Canada by the interprovincial farm union council. They made reference to the difficulties which the western farmers were having in making both ends meet, and on page 3 of their brief they stated:

> According to the federal bureau of statistics, from July, 1951 to October, 1953, the wholesale price index of manufactured goods declined by 15·6 points (1935-39=100). But the farm products wholesale price index dropped by 68·6 points in the same period—a difference of 53 points. This trend of falling farm prices has continued in a lesser degree during the remainder of 1953 and for 1954.
> Farm people themselves, and those who are familiar with agricultural conditions, cannot help but be disturbed by diminishing farm income compared with abnormally high operating costs. Measured in terms of purchasing power—as represented in cash obtained from the sale of farm products—the farm dollar is worth less than it has been for a good many years.

It is to this that the farmer looks. He wants it done now, rather than having to wait. Each year creates new problems and makes it more difficult. A man finds he is going deeper and deeper into debt as a result of his operations. Unless there is some assurance of the forward pricing of commodities, unless there is some hope that he can plan his production so as not to lose more by going into production, the farmer will find himself in difficulty at almost every turn.

He is told that with hogs bringing 32 cents he should be feeding his grain to hogs. He goes into the raising of hogs; then a few months later when he brings the bulk of his hogs to market he finds there has been a decline in price and instead of 32 cents it is down to 20½ cents. The price is below what was supposed to be the floor price. A break of 30 per cent is just not good enough. That drop of 30 per cent wipes out any possibility he may have of getting some return for his labour.

There are floor prices but many of them are too low, as was pointed out in this brief. Frequently a price is fixed for A hogs, but there is no floor price under the others. The spread between them constantly varies, and becomes so great that the production of second and third grade hogs means practically losing money. This is also pointed out on page 10 of the brief, where it states:

> The government guarantees 38 cents per dozen at point of storage to those who store eggs, and for all practical purposes this is the end of the guarantee. Consequently, the producer receives whatever price is paid by the egg stations and we doubt very much if the country dealers will pay 32 cents a dozen to producers, as the Minister of Agriculture suggests they should.

The thing that is needed here is a guarantee to the producer, not just the packing company. Consumers know this as well, but farmers note that in spite of the deep decline in the prices they are getting for livestock—in 1951 you got $240 or $250 for a good steer which today can be bought for $100, a drop of almost 60 per cent—there is no corresponding drop in the price the consumer pays in the butcher shop or which the butcher pays when he buys his meat from the packing company. It is quite evident that the packing companies are able to manipulate prices for their own benefit.

The farmers' union have been unanimous in their requests that these injustices be removed. The request has been made year after year that a livestock marketing board be established to remove these injustices. This livestock marketing board should contain proper representation of farmers. The failure of the government to take more effective action along this line contributes a great deal to the discontent among the farm population. The trade unions have shown in their briefs to the government that they realize that a healthy agricultural economy is the best guarantee they can have that there will be a home market for the goods which they are producing. It means work for them in the farm implement plants. Automobile, truck and motor plants will continue in operation, and there will be work for them only when there is farm demand.

For some years now the Canadian farmers have been watching with envy the achievements of the United States farmers in the field of forward pricing, what they call 90 per cent of parity. They recognize that there are difficulties in following the same kind of program in Canada where we export such a large percentage of our wheat. There is, however, one thing they realize. That is that if in other countries some floor can be placed under agricultural products to the extent that the farmer is given stability, through this system of knowing what his price will be when he goes into production, it is something he is after in Canada, taking into consideration the problems that face him in this country.

There should be some more adequate stabilization of farm products in a forward way so that, for instance, when the farmer starts into production in raising a herd of cattle, if that is going to be his business or if that is the business for which his land is best suited, he can go into it with some assurance that there will be a floor price below which his commodity will not fall; and that floor should be high enough so he will not be forced to spend years working on his product and then, when he comes to sell it, find that everything has dropped and that he is losing out.

The farmers in Canada are realizing their position. There is a new idea growing among them. That idea is that if our great neighbours can work together with their farmers so that all political parties support a program that will guarantee stability to the agricultural industry, then we in Canada can do the same thing. The farm organizations are asking the farmers today—whether they are in Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario or Quebec—to come together in one organization so they can speak with one united voice to guarantee stability to an industry which I believe is the greatest in Canada, and upon which the prosperity of this dominion depends more than any other.

The importation of millions of pounds of cheese into Ontario at this time, without adequate steps being taken to protect the cheese producers, is just the type of thing that aggravates the farmer to the point where he is willing to kick over the traces. He wants to know where he stands with regard to policies of this kind. He wants to know where he will be with guarantees; if guarantees were given, would the government then assure him that if they import this cheese—if through some negotiations on the exchange of goods and trade this is necessary—he will know long enough ahead so he can take steps to adjust his production and the matter can be taken care of.

The farmers of Ontario who are raising stock find the same kind of problem facing them that faces the stock grower in western Canada. As these farmers get together they notice that they too are being stymied every time they attempt to work together to stabilize the production of hogs or to get their commodity to the market. In some parts of Ontario the farmers, endeavouring to get truckers to haul their hogs from their own farms to their own packing plant, have found that the truckers, who are apparently under the control of the packing houses, refuse to haul their hogs to the market which the farmers designate. There are always the boys on top, one move ahead of the farmers, always keeping in control. They are afraid that the farmers, through their organization, in some way might be able to meet the kind of competition presented by the methods the packing companies use to beat them down.

The farmers of Canada are resolved, united and determined. They are not going to give up this battle until there is a proper program of stability for agriculture. You can hardly blame them. Certainly the people who for their own prosperity are dependent upon the farmers' prosperity, are going to support the farmers 100 per cent. The people who are in the farm implement business, the people who are dealers and merchants in the towns in areas and communities where their whole livelihood depends upon the prosperity of the farmer, are going to support him in getting a solution to this problem.

There is every indication that this country will be facing a tremendous bill for relief if the present trend continues with regard to unemployment. There is nothing today to indicate that the government have solved the problem. It is our contention that it would be much better for the government to spend money upon this farm industry in order to give it stability so these people can then get employment. Then they will not have to be paid for sitting idly and doing nothing. The money spent on a properly established price support program for farm products will, in our opinion, be much better spent than money spent on unemployment relief.

A healthy agricultural industry will do more to bolster the Canadian economy than will millions spent in a niggardly way in order to feed unemployed people. The farmer with income purchases farm machinery, furniture, automobiles, trucks, fertilizers, gas and oil, and equipment for his farm operations. His farm production provides work for railways, the meat packing industry and steamship lines. Canada will never sink into a serious depression as long as the farm industry has stability. The objective of all organized farmers in Canada is stability. They should have the support of all in this house in this demand for justice.

To refer to my own constituency, may I say that the average farmer in my area operates a farm of about half a section or about 320 acres. His income this year will not begin to cover his 1954 operations. It is not unusual for the Canadian farmer to face calamity such as rust and frost and he is taking it without much complaint. But one thing the farmer demands is that there shall be stability next year when and if he can produce a crop. In the meantime some interim and final payments on the 1953 crop will help tide him over. It will not meet the costs. The farmer was in debt last year.

One year ago I pointed out the dangers facing agriculture, with declining income and increasing costs. At that time I told the house that the farmer had only one way to go and that was into debt, and that the farmer was going into debt. My statement was questioned here. I made personal contact with some of the people concerned and obtained corroboration from the local merchants, bankers and municipal officials. My own findings were that over 80 per cent of the farmers engaged in the agricultural business in my part of the province were in debt, some of them seriously. The situation will probably be worse next summer because the effect of the loss of the 1954 crop will not be felt until this next summer. This is the cause of the demand of the farmers.

In studying their problem the farmers see that they face an impossible situation by reason of this present situation. They have borrowed money to buy implements. The Farm Improvement Loans Act has been of some assistance to them, but they now find difficulty in meeting their obligations. One hope they have is that there is going to be some stability behind their operations in the future. Through their organizations, united in the western provinces at least and growing in the east, they have put forward to the government the things they feel to be necessary to achieve that stability. They are going to continue that fight, and the people who represent them here will be negligent in their duties if they do not support them.

Another thing that adds to the aggravation of the farmer is the continuance of the control over the allocation of box cars. When the farmer goes to deliver his grain it makes him very angry to find that he is faced with the necessity of delivering his grain to the opposition line elevator company merely because there was no allocation of cars to his own elevator. Every farmer should have the right to deliver his grain to the elevator of his choice. Surely that can be arranged at this time, when the heavy box car congestion is largely over. Any farmer who wishes to deliver to the line elevator company should have the right to do so. The farmer saw that last year his wheat pool lost some 8 per cent, or 32 million bushels of grain in the handling operation because of the allocation of box cars.

This was an injustice which cut him very deeply. He fought for years and years to establish his own co-operative pool organization to fight against the organized grain trade and the grain exchange in Winnipeg which exploited him for so long. He finally established his own wheat board, and it disturbed him no end to see that these people he has fought against are now again gaining sufficient influence in high places to carry on this kind of campaign against his organization. He is going to continue to fight for his right to deliver his grain to his own elevator.

I should like to turn to another matter which is important to my constituents, and which was not mentioned in the throne speech. I refer to old age pensions. Our senior citizens are experiencing hardship and suffering which to say the least is disturbing. Before the present session is finished the government will be urged to increase the old age pension and the pension to the blind in keeping with the cost of living in Canada. When the old age pension was increased to $40 a month that was a good thing. We thought we were moving forward, but at the same time the government removed price controls and the increase in the cost of living just about wiped out the increase in the amount of the pension. Today $40 scarcely buys what $20 did 12 years ago. Surely something should be done to increase the amount of money paid to our old age pensioners, our senior citizens who are unable to earn a living any longer themselves and who have to depend entirely on the old age pension.

The pension should be related in some way to the cost of living in Canada, so that if the cost of living rises the pension will be increased by a proportionate amount. Thus these people would have some guarantee of their ability in the future to live on the pension which is paid to them. It is surely only right to these deserving people. Surely we can tell them that they will not be allowed to suffer as the result of a fluctuating cost of living. Canadians cannot be proud of this condition existing among the older citizens today.

Finally I want to refer briefly to the international field. In our efforts to win the world for democracy we must consider the hungry peoples of the world. It is necessary for us to prove by our actions that democracy is better than any other form of government, that democracy means more to the people of the world than any other way of life. We now have the opportunity to help the hungry peoples of the world, particularly the millions of Asia. It is my belief that providing these people with food, and helping them to develop their own resources, is at least as good a way of wooing them to democracy as a show of military strength. In the world of today a police force is necessary, but at the same time a larger share of the expenditures of the government should be made for humane purposes. We should be helping to feed these people and expand the Colombo plan in order to show the world that the democratic way of life is the best way of life.

Since war is now the way to complete destruction it is evident to people that there must be some alternative to war. If there is, we have to change. Let us see that we change in the right direction toward tolerance and human brotherhood, rather than showing the mailed fist as one means of forcing our will upon our fellow men.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate with the intention of using most of my time to take advantage of the opportunity which this debate offers to discuss some of the problems of my own riding.

I represent the riding of Humber-St. George's, which in the last parliament was represented by Mr. W. R. Kent. I should like first to give you some facts about my riding. It comprises practically the whole west coast of Newfoundland, or that part of the province which faces the gulf of St. Lawrence. This riding includes three of the provincial electoral districts, namely St. George's, Humber and St. Barbe. It has a coast line of about 300 miles as the crow flies, but taking into account all the bays and indentations it is more nearly 1,000.

The St. George's area, which is in the southern part, is one of the beauty spots of the province, in fact one of the beauty spots of the whole of Canada. Farming is the main industry here and has been for a number of years, for here are situated some of the finest farms in the province. It may well be that with a progressive farm policy and fuller use of existing farm legislation on the federal level, a more vigorous marketing scheme could be encouraged as well as an increase in dairy and meat products. Logging and fishing are important to the area.

The fishing industry is one that has a potential well worthy of consideration. Cod and halibut are in abundance a few miles offshore, with the inshore fishing consisting of lobster all along the coast and with great quantities of herring and scallops in Port au Port bay. But the task of the fisherman here, on a straight bluff shore with few harbours, is indeed one of many hazards. I hope we are not too far away from the time when facilities will be installed at Codroy harbour, Grand Bay, Port au Port bay and St. George's bay, not only for the sake of the fishermen in the area but also as a haven for the many small boats which ply their trade along the hazardous coast line. The middle section of my riding is known as the Humber, named after the Humber river which flows down the beautiful and fertile valley between thickly wooded hills to empty into the bay of Islands.

Here in this valley is another of the really good farming areas in the province. My previous remarks concerning farming would apply to this area, too. While farming has never been the major industry of Newfoundland I believe it could still play a greater part in the economy of the province than it has heretofore.

Along the shores of the bay of Islands the fishing industry has been successfully carried on for many years. Harbour facilities have greatly improved since the entry of Newfoundland into confederation. I am sure they will continue to be improved for the benefit of those who seek to take their living from the sea.

Here at the mouth of the Humber river and 30 miles inland from the gulf of St. Lawrence is the modern town of Corner Brook, site of the great Bowater's pulp and paper mill. It is the largest integrated newsprint mill in the world. This plant has an annual production of over 350,000 tons of newsprint and sulphite, and employs over 6,000 workers. It is an efficiently operated unit with an enviable record of relations between management and labour. One can surely appreciate the impact which this mill has had on the economy of the province since its construction in the early twenties.

While talking about the pulp and paper industry in my riding it might be well for us to have a look at this industry throughout Canada as a whole. It has been the leading industry in Canada for many years. In value of production, in exports, in total wages paid and in capital investment it is the largest of all Canadian industries. It is Canada's largest consumer of goods and services, including transportation. The newsprint industry in Canada has five times the output of the industry in any other country, and supplies one-half the world's newsprint needs. The expansion of this industry must naturally take into account the fact that raw material is the prime factor.

Canada's forests, totalling nearly 1·5 million square miles, are amongst the largest in the world, with over 800,000 square miles capable of producing continuous wood crops. In this house we have been hearing a great deal in the last few days about the reduction in exports and loss of foreign markets. Such is not the case so far as this industry is concerned. Shipments from Canadian mills in October last set a new record, which was again broken in November. Shipments in November, 1954, showed an increase of 10·5 per cent over shipments for the corresponding month in 1953. Newsprint Data, 1954 edition, published by the newsprint association of Canada, states that Canada is rapidly regaining its overseas markets and estimates that shipments to the United Kingdom in 1955 will very nearly equal the pre-war level.

Coming back to a description of my riding, the area extending north from the bay of Islands along the west coast of the northern peninsula, toward Labrador, is known as St. Barbe. For many decades the men along this coast have fought to earn a living from the sea. In many places wharves and breakwaters have been built, but much still remains to be done if those who live in the area are to be enabled to earn their living from the sea. Logging and lumbering offer employment as a supplement to fishing. Here again, from the scenic Bonne bay to the wave-lashed shores of the strait of Belle Isle, are long stretches of straight coast line with very few harbours, inhabited by people whose resolute sturdiness is excelled only by their hospitality.

From the early days of its discovery Newfoundland has been recognized as a fishing country. For many years it flourished as a result of the great demand of the European and South American markets for fish. During the 1920's large quantities of Newfoundland cod were sold to Spain, Portugal and Brazil. Following this period the markets open to us were gradually closed. Spain and Portugal expanded their own fishing industries to the point where the demand was considerably reduced. Methods of fishing other than those normally used produced a quantity of small fish not acceptable in some markets, particularly those of Portugal. Then there were the difficulties presented by countries willing to barter, as well as those presented by countries in the sterling area. Added to all this was the difference in standards of living, which resulted in the seller's minimum price sometimes being higher than the buyer's maximum price.

In Canada the fishing industry is one of the country's oldest, but over the years it has lost some of its relative importance. In the coastal regions it is still of paramount importance, a fact which is particularly true of Newfoundland. Today 19,000 fishermen in 1,000 small hamlets scattered over 10,000 miles of coast line strive to eke a living from the sea. It has been done successfully in the past, and I believe it can be done again through the introduction of better methods of catching, curing and marketing a quality product. Figures for 1946 to 1952 show that the maritime provinces have pretty well maintained their share of the national total, and while comparable figures for Newfoundland are not available I believe the same statement is virtually true.

For those who would build dungeons in the air I would point out that the Canadian fishing industry, too, had a favourable year in 1954. For the first ten months of 1954 the catch was 11 per cent higher in volume and 8 per cent higher in value than for a similar period in 1953. Larger sales of fillets to the United States and of canned salmon to the United Kingdom resulted in a 12 per cent increase in export value over the previous year. In Newfoundland there were indications of the result of negotiations carried on last year by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) in an effort to reopen European markets which were formerly big buyers of Newfoundland products.

The fishing industry in Newfoundland has always been, and very likely must continue to be, very dependent upon foreign trade. Newfoundland, along with the other maritime provinces and the prairie provinces, must be deeply concerned with any trade policy this government may adopt. Certainly a policy of protective tariffs would not be conducive to the best trading possibilities at a time when, due to conditions over many of which we have no control, we are already having difficulty in competing in foreign markets.

Here in Canada we are in quite a different position with regard to export trade than is the United Kingdom or the United States. England, with its relatively large population and consequent large domestic market, has an export trade of 17 per cent of its total trade. Similarly in the United States, where a tremendous interstate trade is carried on, only 6 per cent of its total trade is on an international level. Here in Canada we have a relatively small population with a proportionately high degree of production, and an export trade of approximately 25 per cent of our total trade.

The future of this country depends upon the high volume of our export trade. Our economic future is dependent upon our strong competitive position in world markets. I believe that to hide behind higher tariff barriers at this time would be to mortgage that future. In my opinion this policy is the correct one for Canada in general to follow. Certainly it is the correct policy that will breathe life into the fisheries of Newfoundland.

Many improvements have been made there, and I am sure others will come. But in the final analysis success will depend upon being able to sell our products at prices which will give a living wage to 19,000 fishermen whose homes now dot the shores of an island that was recognized as a great fishing province when the wind was still blowing through the forests on the sites of every major industry on the Canadian mainland. But I do believe that for the industry to be attractive it must not only offer opportunity for making a living, but must also be able to offer some of the benefits now granted to workers in other occupations.

In the speech from the throne we were informed that the government proposed this session to introduce legislation granting loans to fishermen similar to those granted to farmers under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. This, I believe, is a step in the right direction, and I commend the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) for his action in this regard.

During the last session of parliament, and again early in this session, there has been mention of unemployment insurance for fishermen. Although I am not unmindful of the many difficulties to be overcome before such benefits could be extended, I believe it is possible, and would give my support to such a measure. In commercial fish establishments those who are engaged are eligible for unemployment insurance, yet the initial producer who makes these jobs possible is denied this benefit.

In my constituency there are many fishermen who, in order to earn a living for their families, are forced to supplement their low incomes from the fishing industry by work in the woods when employment is available, during part of the winter months. Many of these do not qualify for insurance benefits. If, however, by some formula they could be given credit for summer work, then they would be eligible for benefits during the winter months. I would join with my other colleagues from Newfoundland who have made reference to this matter in recommending to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) that consideration be given to such a measure.

Now, while discussing the fisheries of Newfoundland there are two other points I should like to mention. In my riding within the last few years, the lobster industry has assumed such proportions as to become of major concern to the fishermen in the area. Lobsters are caught in the conventional lobster traps, held in pools and shipped to the United States markets by boat. Fishermen who during the past summer prosecuted this type of fishing had a better than average year, so far as the quantity caught was concerned, but did not receive proportionate returns due to the fact that a large percentage of the catch was unsuitable upon arrival at the market. Too large a percentage was either dead, weak or maimed.

I have no figures which would suggest the average loss, but I did see individual accounts showing, in extreme cases, a loss of over 20 per cent. Whether these losses are due to improper care during the pre-shipment period or due to faulty methods of shipping is difficult to determine. But it is a problem which is causing some concern, and is one that needs some attention, not only from the standpoint of the return to the fishermen but also in the interests of conservation. In 1953 the federal Department of Fisheries completed experiments on the commercial holding of live lobsters. I believe these experiments are important to this industry in avoiding the causes of mortality among lobsters during the pre-shipment period.

The province of Newfoundland will not only be known as a great centre for commercial fishing, but also for sport fishing at its very best. In my riding are some of the finest trout streams and salmon pools on the North American continent. Here is a sportsman's paradise that even the expert on fish stories need not hesitate to describe. We in Newfoundland believe that this is our greatest tourist attraction, and it is our hope that with the new ferry on the gulf of St. Lawrence and the completion of the trans-Canada highway, visitors and sportsmen will be encouraged to come to our province during the summer months. In this instance there is little need for me to emphasize the importance of conservation methods. On some rivers the federal Department of Fisheries has conducted experiments, and on others improvements have been made. May I suggest a continuance of this program.

I believe that Canadians have a very healthy respect for conservation. In a land so bountifully blessed with natural resources it augurs well for the future that some thought is given to posterity's welfare. But our thoughts for tomorrow must sometimes be expressed in regulations to ensure that conservation is not only a mental attitude but also a practical reality. In the case of which I am speaking—the salmon rivers—I trust that present regulations will be enforced by river guardians and others who are concerned with such matters, and that other regulations will be designed if necessary so that this resource, which I say again is our greatest tourist attraction, will not only continue to bring visitors to our province but will also continue to afford to Newfoundlanders the joy of "fishing on a river on a morn in mid-July".

The Disabled Persons Act passed by this parliament last session and proclaimed on January 1 of this year has already received wide approval. I feel it will be welcomed as a needed addition to our present social security program, when it comes into effect in the different provinces. In my own province of Newfoundland this allowance for totally and permanently disabled persons will go into effect on April 1 of this year.

I was pleased to note in the speech from the throne that amendments are to be made during this session of parliament to the Blind Persons Act of 1952. It will be remembered that by that act the basic pension had been doubled, the residence requirements reduced by one-half, the income ceiling approximately doubled and the minimum age reduced to 21 years. It is now proposed to lower still farther the age of eligibility and to raise the income ceiling.

I am sure these amendments are understandable and welcome. While only a small number of Newfoundlanders will be affected, yet the percentage involved will be the third highest of all the provinces and nearly double the average for the whole of Canada. For the year ending March 31, 1954 the report of the department of welfare of Newfoundland records 335 persons as recipients of blind persons' allowances, which is 0·183 per cent of the population from age 20 to 69 years and 0·086 per cent of the total population of the province.

Here again is evidence of the ever-expanding social services of this nation to include within its scope not only the majority groups but also the smaller minority groups that form a part of the population of this land.

During this session of parliament amendments are to be made to the War Veterans Allowance Act. The proposed improvements to increase the basic allowance and raise the income ceiling will not only prove to be very acceptable to the 42,000 veterans and widows of veterans at present benefiting under the existing act, but will also be recognized by the citizens of Canada as another worthy advance in a program already recognized for its distinction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we do have our problems in my riding, as they do in the other ridings in Newfoundland and in the other 258 ridings on the mainland of Canada. Some of these are problems of recent origin. Others are problems that have been handed down to us by a very severe history. We have those problems discussed sometimes by one group and sometimes by another. Sometimes we have people who spend an hour or two in the province, or in my riding, and without any knowledge of the historical background or of the local setting proceed to pronounce what the policies ought to be. I fear, Mr. Speaker, that I shall have to classify those people as itinerant victims of a midsummer night's dream. But we do have our problems, sir, and on the most important we usually reach solutions that are fairly satisfactory, even though sometimes the majority be small.

It has been said in this house that the fortunes of Newfoundland are at a very low ebb. With that statement, Mr. Speaker, I would have to very sincerely disagree. If we were to compare the lot of Newfoundlanders 20 years ago with the lot of Newfoundlanders now we would find a tremendous difference; and even if we were to take that 20-year period and divide it into four five-year periods, we would find that there is not only a difference between now and 20 years ago but there has been a successive improvement over those four five-year periods. We have today in Newfoundland, for example, a standard of living that may not be as high as in some places on the mainland, but that is immeasurably higher than it was 20 years ago. The year 1953 was a good year for Newfoundland; 1954 was not so good, but still a good year. Even at this present moment, for example, the unemployment situation in Newfoundland is better than it was at this time last year.

No, Mr. Speaker; the fortunes of Newfoundland are not at a low ebb, for I believe that the fortunes of any people are not manifested only in the material things which they bless and which they are blessed by. The fortunes of a people are also in the things for which they have some respect, in the things in which they have faith. We as new Canadians come to this mainland of Canada and bring with us a respect for the institution of Canadian democracy, a faith in the future of this great land, that if excelled at all will be excelled only by those who have always had the privilege of calling themselves Canadians.

(Translation):

Mr. Robert Perron (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, several members having congratulated the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, which is quite in order and well deserved by the members in question, have proceeded to criticize the speech from the throne for several reasons. As far as I am concerned, since it is not up to me to eulogize it, I would like to say a few words on a matter of interest to the economy of this country as a whole. This question has been raised several times since the beginning of this debate, though no mention has been made of it in the speech from the throne, a fact which is somewhat surprising. I refer to the question of agriculture, which is certainly the most important at this time, in the west as well as in the east. Since I have been here, I have heard it said repeatedly that the western farmer is not in an excellent position, and that he even has wheat surpluses of which he cannot dispose. On the other hand our eastern farmers complain that their revenue has considerably diminished this year again and that they view the future with some misgivings.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, if this be not a serious depression it is something rather similar; we are moving in that direction. In order to satisfy everyone I could say that our farmers are at present in the midst of a disturbance which the government claim to be temporary but which shows signs of going on indefinitely.

Still, if we read the speech from the throne all we see there with regard to agriculture and to the urgent problems which the government have to solve is this. I am quoting from page 3 of Hansard:

> Although the national economy is in a generally healthy condition, the relatively poor wheat crop is being reflected by a small decline in the total national income.

Mr. Speaker, that is absolutely all there is in the speech from the throne to solve what the government call a disturbance, but what you and I would call a depression. There is no clear remedy proposed.

And moreover, this single sentence from the speech from the throne which hardly touches upon the problem at all, bears no relation whatever to the facts. It is simply not true that the relatively poor wheat crop has brought about a slight decrease in national revenue, since this crop has not yet been sold. We still have to sell enormous surplus stocks of wheat before marketing the 1954 crop. Whether that crop has been good or bad can in no way bear upon the national revenue for 1954.

What might have had an adverse effect on this revenue—a fact which is not mentioned in the speech from the throne—is that the eastern farmer, besides having had a poor crop, has sold his products at lower prices, failing a proper market, so that his personal revenue has decreased as much as 15 per cent, and much more than that in certain areas.

There is unquestionably an urgent problem to solve, and the fact that the speech from the throne makes no mention at all of the steps the government intends to take to help the farmer is not easy to explain.

There is no hiding the fact, farmers are concerned and expect from this government the assistance required by the situation. The only stable income they have been able to rely on for the past few years has been the income from the dairy industry, thanks to the support price of 58 cents a pound for butter.

However, the government have not yet announced the policy they intend to adopt in this connection this year, which keeps the farmers in a state of concern.

It appears to me necessary that the government maintain the price support at the same level.

This price of 58 cents was set in April, 1951 and I think it can safely be said that, since that date, production costs have increased. However, the price has remained the same. The only reason which would justify a reduction of the support price would be a reduction in the production costs. According to estimates, production costs this year will remain the same as in 1954. Such, at least, are the conclusions reached by experts of the Department of Agriculture in the course of a recent federal-provincial agricultural conference.

As another argument, I must say that, from March 1949, when it was put into effect, to January 1, 1955, price support will have cost the taxpayer, if I am rightly informed, less than $2 million, that is to say an average of about $300,000 a year. It involves a relatively minor expense to ensure a bit of security to a class of society which is the most important in the country and whose other sources of income at the present time, barring the dairy industry, are influenced by all sorts of risks, making them uncertain and precarious.

The poor crop of last year, due to bad weather, not only caused farmers to lose some income, but, in 1955, they will be faced with a shortage of seed which will entail the additional expense of a few hundred dollars for each one of them, come sowing time. Serious difficulties are anticipated, at least in the province of Quebec, next spring, to the extent that the government may have to help by means of subsidies. Were the support price of butter to be abolished, at a time when farmers will be faced by these extraordinary expenses, that would no doubt spell disaster.

In order to face the seasonal unemployment crisis, the house recently amended the Unemployment Insurance Act with a view to increasing unemployment insurance benefits. This was a humanitarian measure that the house approved unanimously. However, this measure will involve considerable outlays and it seems to me that the government should not be stingy when it comes to helping the farmer who, also, is entitled to a minimum of security.

As far as the consumer is concerned, I do not think that he is affected by the support price. Because of the support price the consumer always pays the same price for his butter, whereas he would pay, let us say, 45 cents during the production season, when there is plenty of butter, that is during the summer months, but during the off season, that is in the winter months, he would pay 75 cents, which in terms of money paid out amounts to exactly the same thing, that is 60 cents the year round. Therefore the support price has the merit of saving that commodity from the ups and downs of a market which can easily be made to fluctuate.

For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I ask the government to maintain the 58 cents a pound support price and to announce such a policy as soon as possible so as to put an end to the uncertainty now prevailing. The price should be set at 58 cents for the next two years as called for by all farm organizations throughout the country.

By so doing the government will assure a minimum revenue to every farmer in eastern Canada where farming is the principal industry.

If it were announced immediately, such a policy would make up for the silence kept on that score in the speech from the throne.

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I represent in this house a county with a mostly working class population, and I would briefly like to comment on certain legislation mentioned in the speech from the throne that bears upon employment.

It would be well to consider first the degree of economic activity in the past year, in order to comfort our friends in the opposition, for, in spite of their claims, the general position is a good one, and I have always thought that official statistics give better information than speculations and near-truths.

The gross national product for 1954 amounts to $23·9 billion whereas it attained $24·3 billion in 1953, or a mere 2 per cent variation, which shows an appreciable stability in our production.

Consumer purchases reached a higher total in 1954 than in 1953, a fact denoting a still very high level of national purchasing power.

At the end of October industrial production in general shows only an average 2 per cent recession with regard to the year before. It should be noted, however, that the total amount for October, 1954 is higher than the corresponding figure in 1953.

And, if it is otherwise true that employment in the manufacturing industries is slightly down, employees in those industries have, on the other hand, had an hourly wage increase of 3 cents an hour in 1954.

These various glimpses of our economy therefore illustrate that business in Canada is, on the whole, good; if there have been recessions in some sectors they have been compensated elsewhere by a fuller activity.

Yet I have to admit that as far as employment is concerned, the position is still difficult, and I shall try to discuss it as objectively as possible. I do not want unduly to minimize certain figures mentioned by opposition members with regard to the number of unemployed in this country, but we must admit that statistics in this respect are incomplete and do not always give a true picture of the facts.

But, whatever might be the correct number of unemployed and the nature of that unemployment, whether it be seasonal, local or otherwise, the number of unemployed is large enough to warrant the government to take without delay important legislative measures, because private industry is now unable to absorb the unemployed.

These measures, as forecast in the speech from the throne, will no doubt give to the industry the necessary priming. I would like to say a few words about some of those measures.

Public works are required to supplement private enterprise and provide here and there urgent improvements. We have to remember that the purpose of taxation is to provide services, and it is to be hoped that those public works will be soon under way. I would like here, in passing, to suggest to the government to take into consideration the building of a new bridge on the St. Lawrence river at the end of Pie IX boulevard; when I am suggesting the building of this additional bridge for Montreal, what I have in mind is the speeding up of traffic. As a matter of fact, all the traffic coming from the eastern part of the city must now go through the centre part of the town in order to cross Jacques Cartier bridge; this Pie IX boulevard bridge would link the south shore of the river with eastern Montreal, and would connect directly the Laurentian highway with Pie IX boulevard at St. Vincent de Paul.

But the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterways will bring about a situation which will make the building of that Pie IX bridge still more urgent. Experts of the Montreal town planning committee anticipate that, as a result of the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway, Montreal will cease to be an island town, and the south shore municipalities will lose their rural characteristics and become industrial and residential districts. We must, therefore, increase the number of bridges spanning the St. Lawrence river, and I believe that the present conditions warrant the government to build a bridge at the Pie IX boulevard without delay.

The amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act was urgently required. The duration and rate of supplementary winter benefits are increased from now on, and the working people are now in a position to appreciate fully the wisdom of that legislation; approximately 80 per cent of salaried people are eligible for unemployment insurance benefits, and, in case of unemployment, municipalities will not have, as before, to feel the main impact of unemployment.

This amendment to the act will be beneficial, but it will be necessary to keep a close watch on the development of our national economy in order to bring down new amendments if conditions should make it necessary, and the future will prove no doubt that this beneficial act will remain among the major achievements of the Liberal party.

May I repeat the request I made last year to the government for the opening of an unemployment insurance and employment office in the east end of Montreal in order to accommodate the workers in that part of the city.

The west, north and south ends of the city of Montreal are well served at the present time, but I do not think that the Delorimier street office in Montreal is very convenient for our workers who live in the east end of the city. Moreover the eastern part of Montreal is surrounded by small industries and the opening of such an office there would be well justified. I repeat this request and hope that it will be acted upon this very year, thus sparing me the obligation of renewing my request.

Another piece of legislation forecast in the speech from the throne and which will help relieve unemployment has to do with loans for home improvements. The National Housing Act has brought results in line with the government's expectations, in spite of the pessimistic predictions expressed at that time by the opposition. With this important improvement, it is logical to foresee a new high for 1955.

The riding of Maisonneuve-Rosemont is perhaps among those which benefited the most from that legislation. From the projects for 1955, we can anticipate a substantial increase in house building which will turn that part of the city into one of the finest residential districts. It must be admitted that in enacting this act the government has been equal to its responsibilities and, on behalf of the thousands of new home owners of my riding who have taken advantage of that legislation, I do want to thank the government.

The speech from the throne mentions also the meeting of the commonwealth prime ministers, which is now taking place in order to discuss certain common problems which are facing the peoples of that great association of nations. This conference is being held at a particularly important moment, and it will no doubt favour an exchange of views that might lead to an increase of our exports, even though it is not the immediate purpose of this meeting.

Our foreign trade is closely related to the prosperity of the Canadian people, and all efforts must be directed to the finding of new markets. But, let us be realistic, and the views expressed by the right hon. Prime Minister on January 10, 1955, are shared by the majority of Canadians. International trade must work in both directions, and, at a time when the most important nations are trying to find the way to facilitate trade, it would be suicidal to raise tariff barriers as some members of the opposition seem to want.

It is the duty of the government to organize production and to find markets. But Canadian industry also has its responsibilities, and it is up to industry to revise its means of production, in order to be able to compete with foreign goods, insofar as originality, quality and price are concerned.

I believe that the present employment difficulties in certain fields stem mainly from the new methods of industrial adjustment and from the necessity for employers to lower their cost of production by saving on manpower.

I am satisfied that the unemployment situation is but temporary. Although the government is determined to find a solution to the problem, we must be grateful that it acts cautiously, because the economy of a country is not like an automobile which can be stopped or put in motion at will. Canadian electors have shown that they understand this because at the recent by-elections they have again supported us.

Now I would like to speak about seasonal unemployment. Owing to the weather conditions in our country, we experience a shrinkage in employment every year as soon as winter sets in, but the situation improves slowly until spring.

It is not easy to find a solution to that problem. Members of the house who know the working people, who live with them, know very well that our painters, carpenters, masons, bricklayers, diggers and day-labourers may be without work for a few months each year; it is an unfortunate situation to which we should strive to find a solution. Moreover, the problem becomes more acute because several industries tend to lay off some of their employees in November and December and then hire them back towards the end of January each year.

I have studied the situation and discussed it with several workers. I believe that the practical solution rests more with the public than with the government; the time has come when everyone should realize that the government is not the only one which has a responsibility in the matter, but that it is the responsibility of the nation as a whole.

I am satisfied that, at the very moment I am speaking, work could be found in Canada for more than 100,000 unemployed if everyone assumed his share of responsibility for the solution of the problem.

It is a matter of co-ordinating the well known sense of citizenship and co-operation of all Canadians and it is in that spirit that I would like to offer a suggestion to alleviate seasonal unemployment which afflicts us and I offer it for study to both employers and organized labour.

I would like to see the setting up of an agency which would undertake, each year in January, a national eight-day employment campaign across Canada. It would surely be patronized by the Department of Labour and in all provinces, either through the press, radio or television, an appeal could be made to the public, asking everyone's co-operation to promote employment during that season.

A campaign such as this would undoubtedly receive the support of all the provincial governments as well as the wholehearted support of all municipalities, and there are more than 14,000 in Canada. Since they are directly interested in promoting employment in their locality, in all those centres a proclamation by the mayor would invite all citizens to co-operate in the campaign, which would be everybody's business, as everyone would benefit from it.

We have in the country a tremendous commercial and industrial potential of over 100,000 industries of all kinds. If such a national movement were well organized, how many industries, manufactures, plants or businesses of all kinds, how many citizens, who are postponing various kinds of undertaking, even in their home, could not then become employers of labour?

And we have the necessary set-up to serve as intermediary between demand and supply, because our employment offices are scattered all over the country. The requests for labour coming from industries, business firms and private citizens would be filled by our employment offices and workers would be called to work, each according to his own skill.

Many agencies organize each year public drives to collect millions of dollars for deserving causes and their campaigns are always most successful. Why not then invite the co-operation of all Canadians to such a national employment campaign, which would no doubt be as important as all the other ones? A national employment campaign is a suggestion I make and possibly it deserves consideration.

I should now like to comment on the deplorable situation created for workers who are being rushed into retirement when they reach 65. Since I became a member of the house, I have very often had the opportunity to discuss with them and to appraise the extent of the injustice of which they are very often the victims.

Our society entertains a prejudice concerning the worker of 65 years of age, and I have noted in the papers that the British ministry of pensions carried out a survey in this matter. I believe the lessons taught by this survey would apply here as well as elsewhere.

As it appears from that survey, the majority of workers who took their pension at the age of 65, were compelled to do so at a moment when their employers were still benefiting from their energy, their good will and, especially, their experience. At that age, no doubt, physical strength wanes but any deficiency in that respect is largely offset by knowledge and experience. We are here the victims of a preconceived idea. As a matter of fact, some men are already old at 40, while others are still young at 65.

Would it not be possible for us to take the leadership, as far as our own civil servants are concerned, and set an example for industry to follow? And if such a survey were made here, the perpetration of a great many injustices might well be prevented.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I regret to be under the obligation to comment on certain remarks made in this house, January 12, by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). These remarks were strongly objected to by members from Quebec sitting on either side of this house. I feel compelled also to object in like manner to the statement made by that hon. member, as reported at page 121 of Hansard:

> ...there is no part of Canada that is as ripe for advances by the communist party as the province of Quebec.

Travel broadens, we are told, and it is to be hoped that this hon. member, a new incarnation of the political commercial traveller, will take the first opportunity to return to the province of Quebec so that he might get to know it as it really is, a province securely rooted in traditions of religion, culture and hospitality and, above all, respectful of authority.

On January 17 he made an attempt to clarify his speech of January 12, stating that he had . . .

> . . . the greatest regard for the religion, language, heritage and culture of the people of that province.

This clarification bears no relation, however, with the astounding statement he made on January 12, to the effect that no part of Canada was so ripe for advances by the communist party as the province of Quebec.

And that is why, on behalf of the 50,000 constituents of Maisonneuve-Rosemont whom I have the honour to represent, I indict this statement as false and I dare hope that the leader of his group will dissociate himself from this false and humiliating statement about the province of Quebec.

Since then, other unfavourable remarks have been made by members of the C.C.F. party against the province of Quebec. Nothing could be more harmful to national unity than such remarks which only serve to stir animosity and mistrust.

Last year, I asked what good purpose was served by all these speeches on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Experience shows me now that the Canadian electorate can derive benefit from such speeches because they help remove a good number of masks and, most of all, they prove to the electorate that they were right in showing confidence in the Liberal party which traditionally has respected the rights of minorities in Canada and treated all groups and all provinces with fair play, not for the purpose of fostering their policies but for laying the foundations of a united and prosperous nation.

(Text):

Mr. A. B. Weselak (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to join with other hon. members in congratulating the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne for the splendid contributions made by them on that occasion.

In the course of the debate we have heard members of the opposition denounce the government, and if one were to take their speeches alone one would be left with the impression that the present government had little interest in the future of Canada or the welfare of its people. I do not agree with this view and I take issue with those who adopt this attitude.

Before coming to the house I felt that the Liberal administration was doing a very good job of governing the country, and my short experience in the house has not changed my opinion in this regard. The mandate given the government in the last election by the people of Canada clearly indicates that I am not the only one of this opinion, but that many people throughout the length and breadth of the nation are of the same opinion.

This government has a responsibility to all the people of Canada with its various sectional regions and economies. It is not an easy matter to reconcile the various groups who have varying interests and whose demands upon the government are of such a conflicting nature. I submit that the policies of the government have been such that these interests and demands have been met in such a way as to keep all sections of our economy at a reasonable level.

It has been said in certain parts of the house that the throne speech is significant for what it did not contain. To me it is significant for what it did contain. The approval of the protocol for the restoration of sovereignty in West Germany and its rearmament is now history in the house. My support of this resolution was given in the belief that it was a step in the right direction and, above all, that it would demonstrate to the countries behind the iron curtain dominated by Russia that the western nations do not want to subjugate other peoples but desire to see that the peoples in these countries live democratically, with the dignity which is rightfully theirs.

The announcement of the meeting of the prime ministers of the commonwealth nations in London was also welcomed. These meetings of the commonwealth contribute toward a better understanding of the British peoples; and our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), with his wisdom and the respect which he commands both at home and abroad, will no doubt make a substantial contribution to the deliberations of that conference.

My people welcome the progress being made on the St. Lawrence seaway. We in the west, being a considerable distance from our markets and our sources of supply, are very conscious of the costs of transportation which so directly affect our economy. It has been estimated that when the seaway is built transportation rates on grain sold in the overseas markets will be reduced by 5 cents per bushel to the benefit of the producer, and it naturally follows that imports for the west will also benefit from the reduction in transportation charges.

The proclamation of the legislation providing for disability pensions, the proposed amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Blind Persons Act, all will be welcomed by the people of my constituency. When people are in need and no provision exists at the federal or provincial level for their relief, the responsibility for their maintenance and welfare falls upon the municipality. Having been associated with municipalities for a considerable number of years, first in an administrative capacity and then in an advisory capacity, I can appreciate the relief this legislation will give to the municipalities in Manitoba.

The demand for services, particularly with respect to roads, drains and education, has increased substantially in the past few years; and the municipalities, with their restricted base of taxation, have found it increasingly difficult to provide the essential services required with the limited funds available. A town, village or municipality with half a dozen disability cases would have to provide from $4,000 up for these cases, and in their municipal budgets I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that to the average municipality this is a substantial sum of money. It is estimated that in Manitoba 1,200 people will benefit at a cost of approximately $600,000, shared equally by the provincial and federal governments.

The amendments to the Railway Act are also particularly welcome. Both transcontinental lines pass through the constituency of Springfield, and hardly a year has passed when a tragedy has not occurred. The municipalities have tried to cope with this problem, but the cost of providing safeguards has been prohibitive. Greater federal participation in the cost of installation and maintenance may make it possible for these municipalities to provide the necessary safeguards, thus saving the lives of many people and preventing tragedy in many homes. The additional provisions regarding housing will also be of benefit in providing additional living space and the modernization of existing homes, thus contributing to the comfort and health of our people and our children.

I note that reference is made to the Meat and Canned Foods Act, and that measures are to be introduced for the inspection of meat and for the establishment of standards for agricultural products. From a reading of this portion of the speech it would appear to me that the standards referred to would be applicable at the retail or export level. At this time I would ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to give consideration to establishing a grading system for beef at the local marketing level similar to the rail grading of pork. The experience of my constituents has been that when deliveries to the yards are high, buyers generally offer lower prices than those usually offered when deliveries are slow and do not meet current demand. My impression was that while certain individuals did not approve the rail system of grading, yet the majority felt that this system was preferable to the existing system in regard to beef. I would therefore ask the minister and his officials to give this matter their serious consideration, and devise some system whereby this situation can be rectified.

On this occasion I wish to compliment the government, and particularly the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), on their continued confidence in our export trade and foreign sales. In the face of falling prices, a carryover the second largest in our history, and a huge surplus in the United States, the initial price of wheat was set at $1.40 per bushel, which in effect is a floor price for the 1954-55 crop year. We recall that in 1929 the Saskatchewan pool set their initial price at $1.25 per bushel, and they suffered enormous losses. These losses were guaranteed to the banks by the federal government, and in the following year the provincial governments put up security against the money lost by the western pools. In Saskatchewan alone, including interest paid, this amounted to over $20 million. At the time the initial price was set on July 16 of last year, the board held wheat unsold to the value of over $100 million and the carryover stood at over 587 million bushels.

In addition to these factors, crop conditions on the prairies were fairly good and it appeared that a good crop would be harvested. Farmers in the west were aware of the situation and had resigned themselves to the expectation that the initial price would be substantially reduced. The announcement of the floor price came to the west as a ray of light and hope in the darkness of uncertainty which had previously prevailed. The Winnipeg Free Press, which has almost always been critical of the present system of marketing grain, had this to say on January 19, 1955:

> At the same time, the west should recognize that the unchanged initial price was a hard decision to take. It may reasonably be interpreted to mean that Ottawa is genuinely confident about sales immediately ahead. But everyone is now aware that a further reduction in selling prices may become the only way to keep wheat moving out of Canada, and to reduce a surplus that certainly should not be allowed to go on piling up.
> In those circumstances, it would become apparent that the wheat board was operating at a loss, which would inevitably be chargeable to the federal treasury. The taxpayers of the rest of Canada would have much to say about that. The maintenance of the initial price in this one uncertain year cannot, therefore, be taken as in any way establishing a precedent. If real disaster should come in the world wheat market, the western farmer will certainly be entitled to look for some support from the rest of the country, but he would be very foolish to expect it to be given at the level of the present initial price. The plain fact is that wheat farming represents far too large a part of the Canadian economy for any such blanket guarantee to be politically or economically practicable even if it were desirable—which, as a long-term measure, it certainly is not.
> As a short-term measure, however, the stability of the initial price is, for this year's crop, a practicable policy and a legitimate means of helping the farmer through an adverse turn of circumstances. The relief of one uncertainty will make the others bearable, and everyone in the west can rejoice with the farmers that what is, in the circumstances, justice has been done to them.

On this occasion I should like to refer to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) on January 19, who had this to say at page 344 of Hansard:

> I say that the attitude of the Canadian government as expressed in its treatment of the wheat producers is shameful. No wonder the farmers of western Canada, through their farm unions and other organizations, are considering once again a mass movement on Ottawa to try to impress upon this anti-farm government the need to increase the support price on Canadian wheat.

I am sure that last July the hon. member expected a reduction in the initial price. I am sure that he, along with others, was relieved to find that the government had more confidence and faith in the farmers of this country than he did, and that it did not pay too much attention to the gloomy prophecies and forebodings which emanated from the socialist benches during the last session.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nicholson: Will you read it more slowly? We cannot catch it.

Mr. Weselak: You cannot? Further, I do not believe the hon. member used the term "anti-farm government" seriously. If he did, I would suggest that he review the record of this government and its farm policies. I believe he would find that practically all the legislation on the statute books promoting stability in agriculture, and for the assistance of agriculture, were put there by the government now in power. He will find also that substantial sums are expended from the federal treasury for the assistance of agriculture. All this is in addition to the sums expended by the Department of Agriculture and other departments of the government in agricultural research, and in obtaining and retaining our world markets. There are also many other policies which have been adopted and maintained by the government that have been of incalculable value to the farmers of this country.

An hon. Member: The people of Selkirk did not think so.

Mr. Weselak: The people of Springfield did, and they are next door to Selkirk.

At this time I should like also to extend a word of appreciation to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) and the Minister of Agriculture for their reassuring statements concerning the government's stand in regard to the Crowsnest freight rates.

Before leaving the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) I should like to refer to another phase of his department's activities which directly affects the farm economy, and that is the matter of international trade. We must not forget that we are an exporting nation, dependent upon world markets to a considerably greater extent than many other trading countries. We must not forget that we cannot find sanctuary behind tariff walls and that we must be prepared to compete with other countries in the world markets. The minister's work at the conference called for the purpose of revising the general agreement on tariffs and trade, commonly known as GATT, where he advocated the removal of import restrictions as an essential condition to a secure and prosperous world economy, is in our interest and is to be commended.

The economic trading strength of other countries is steadily increasing as they rehabilitate themselves after the ravages of war. Surpluses in the United States threaten us, and in such a world atmosphere a better and a stronger GATT should be our goal. Reports indicate that considerable difficulty will be experienced in plugging the loopholes in GATT, particularly with the United States. With their large farm surpluses, apparently the United States insist on the right to set import quotas and subsidize the export of farm products. The mission to Washington by three of our ablest ministers early this session to discuss these matters with United States officials was timely, and reports indicate that some progress has been made toward salvaging GATT which, early in December, appeared in jeopardy. In the interests of our economy this government is rightfully doing everything it possibly can to avert a crisis which could possibly destroy GATT, under which 80 per cent of the free world's international trade is regulated.

We are not without our own internal pressures for protective tariffs. Recently the tariff board heard requests from the manufacturers of antifreeze for an increase in protection of about 5 per cent. This board heard briefs also from the Canadian textile industry which, if given effect to, might well boost the price of men's suits by $2.50 to $5, and boost the price of finer woollens, such as women's skirts and suits, by as much as $10 a garment.

We hear complaints about the unbalance of trade with Britain and the loss of British markets. What could be more damaging, Mr. Speaker, in this connection than Britain's loss of her largest single item of export to Canada, which has provided her with an average of $30 million of Canadian currency each year? These are only two industries that have recently been openly asking for increases in protection. If increases are granted, we can surely expect others to get on the bandwagon and follow suit with similar demands.

On motion of Mr. Weselak the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Earlier today, Mr. Speaker, we were asked about questions and notices of motions for the production of papers. We shall call those on Wednesday, if that is agreeable to hon. members.

On Friday I was asked what the order of business would be should this debate wind up. Without being too specific now, because it would appear for the moment that my appeal has been in vain, sir, we would begin with the legislation standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and particularly the bill having to do with the maintenance of international river improvements. When second reading has been given, that will be sent to the standing committee on external affairs for consideration.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 1, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSING

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING—MAXIMUM SELLING PRICE POLICY

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform hon. members that the maximum selling price policy Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been following in one form or another since 1946 will be discontinued effective today. As hon. members are aware, when a loan under the 1954 National Housing Act to a merchant builder was approved in respect of a house built for sale, a condition was imposed to the effect that only 90 per cent of the amount of such approved loan was advanced unless the house was sold at or below a price determined by C.M.H.C.

This policy was introduced to protect prospective home owners against unduly high prices which might otherwise have resulted under pressure of economic conditions which were encountered from time to time almost continuously since 1946. Conditions are now such that the continuation of this policy seems no longer warranted. In 1954 housing starts, including conversions, numbered 117,800, and completions 106,400. These are all-time records. As of January 1 there were approximately 71,000 houses under construction. New supplies of housing are such that competition itself can now provide a good measure of price limitation.

Our statistics show that approximately 70 per cent of the houses built by merchant builders under the National Housing Act are being sold at the maximum price as determined by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, 25 per cent are being sold below this price, and 4 per cent to 5 per cent above it. There has been a tendency since the new act came into force for the proportion of houses selling below the maximum sale price to increase.

The percentages that I have just mentioned are on a national basis. They vary somewhat from one locality to another. There are indications that in some areas the so-called maximum selling price has ceased to be a maximum and has become in effect a floor price. In other words, the ceiling price set by the corporation is susceptible to representation to purchasers as being the price at which the house must be sold.

I should not like to leave the impression that the discontinuation of the maximum sale price policy will at once reduce prices all across the country. In some areas and for some types of houses there may be a moderate tendency towards higher prices for a short period. However, the removal of control generally will stimulate competition in the house building industry and the home owner will in the long term, I believe, get more value for his housing dollar. That is the purpose of this move.

It is desirable that the maximum sale price restriction should be removed before the commencement of the building season. Therefore, as of today the policy will be discontinued. This will have application not only to houses to be started in the future but in respect of houses that are now subject to the price limitation but which have not yet been sold.

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION IN SALE PRICE OF HOUSES IN PETERBOROUGH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): In view of the minister's statement that Central Mortgage and Housing is trying to give the home owner a little more for his money, has any consideration been given to lowering the sale price of Central Mortgage homes that are for sale in the city of Peterborough? I understand that there are some six or seven of them now vacant?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Central Mortgage has endeavoured to make very reasonable arrangements for the sale of these houses. I am not aware that a revision of the sale price is under consideration at the moment.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): They are priced too high at the moment.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO 1955 AND 1956

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to extend its application to the years 1955 and 1956, subject to certain modifications.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSOLIDATION OF LEGISLATION—AUTHORIZATION FOR OPERATION OF TELECOMMUNICATION SYSTEM, ETC.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to consolidate the various enactments relating to Canadian National Railways into one statute, also, to provide that the Canadian National Railway Company may operate a telecommunication system, to authorize officers and employees of the Canadian National Railways to act as directors of partially-owned companies, to authorize the company to construct short lines without specific parliamentary authority and to operate motor vehicles and further to make provisions for extinguishing charters of constituent corporations.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Fraser (Peterborough).]

SHIPPING

SINKING OF ICEBREAKER "LADY GREY" AFTER COLLISION WITH FERRY "CITY OF LEVIS"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister been informed of the unfortunate accident on the river between Quebec and Levis this morning involving the C.G.S. Lady Grey and, if so, has he any comment to make?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, at 6.35 this morning the C.G.S. Lady Grey, a small icebreaker operated by my department, was breaking ice to facilitate the crossing of the river by the ferry City of Levis which operates between Quebec city and Levis. While this was being done the ferry collided with the Lady Grey striking it heavily on the port side. Because of the extensive damage the Lady Grey took water rapidly and the master was obliged to abandon ship. I understand that all hands on board were picked up by the ferry and are reported safe. I am also glad to be informed that there was no loss of life, nor were there injuries among the passengers of the ferry or among the crew of either vessel. The Lady Grey has sunk in approximately 100 feet of water off Beauport shoal which, however, is not in the navigation channel.

It has been customary for my department to provide icebreaker services of this kind at Quebec city in order to assist the ferry; in fact, just this week I received representations from the operators of the ferry asking for additional help because of ice conditions this winter. My officials are making a preliminary investigation pending a decision as to the establishment of a formal board of inquiry. I regret that I have no further information at the present time.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GATT AND MEETING IN WASHINGTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when we may expect to receive from him the statement on Canadian trade policy which he promised to the house on January 10 in his statement appearing at page 20 of Hansard. Will he be prepared soon to give the house some report on the negotiations for the renewal of GATT, and also of that meeting of the ministers held with United States officials at Washington on January 5 and 6?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Owing to the length of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, it seemed to me that I could contribute more to the expedition of the business of the house if I refrained from speaking. I have heard no great interest in trade matters displayed in this debate, and perhaps in the circumstances the statement could be deferred until an appropriate bill is before the house or until later in the session.

Mr. Fleming: I ask the minister if he would not take into consideration the fact that a number of members in this house, in speaking in the debate on the address, have drawn attention to important matters pertaining to the condition of Canadian trade, and the consequent effects on the Canadian economy, particularly with the important conference on GATT, now proceeding, and that no report has yet been given to the house on the conference of ministers at Washington on January 5 and 6? Will the minister not now undertake to give the statement which he promised to the house on January 10?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have a speech prepared, Mr. Speaker, but on rereading it I find that the facts as disclosed by the bureau of statistics and otherwise are so favourable that I fear that I would again be accused of being an optimist.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask if the minister is not going to make—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does not the hon. member for Eglinton think he has been given full latitude to ask his question? Not only did he ask his question but after that he made a plea that the minister should change his mind. What is he going to do now, ask another question?

Mr. Fleming: Yes, ask another question.

Mr. Speaker: I would say that, in certain instances, members are abusing the leniency of the Chair.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the other question? It necessarily arises in view of the statement which the minister has made. Will the minister now give the house a report, first of all on the conference at Washington, and second, on what progress is being made in the negotiations for the renewal of GATT?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I shall be glad to consider the hon. member's remarks and let him know later.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

OAKVILLE—ARRANGEMENTS FOR EXCHANGE OF SITE

On the orders of the day:

Miss Sybil Bennett (Halton): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the fact that the estimates show that some $400,000 has been set aside for a new federal building in Oakville, would the minister state the position of the negotiations with the town of Oakville for an exchange of land to obtain a new site for the proposed building?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): These are rather complicated arrangements, so perhaps I had better give a few details. With the knowledge and approval of the local authorities, plans were prepared for a new building on the site of the existing public building at Oakville. We were on the point of calling tenders when the city asked us to make the site available for local purposes and build on another site. This we agreed to do if the city would undertake to provide us with a suitable alternative site and pay the costs involved in making the change. A suitable site has now been designated and appraisals are being obtained. In the meantime, we are proceeding with the redevelopment of plans for a building on the new site.

GRAIN

FREIGHT ASSISTANCE—REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF CHANGE IN POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Would the Minister of Agriculture consider postponing the change in policy respecting freight assistance on western grains and millfeeds, effective today, in view of the depressed conditions of the poultry, hog and dairy producers industries of British Columbia, with a view to changing this reduction in British Columbia to the same basis of reduction as Ontario and Quebec, namely $1.50 per ton.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. In reply, I would state that before the reductions were made in the payments on freight, full consideration was given to the situation which would exist following that reduction. I cannot see my way clear to suggesting that there will be any change.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Hahn: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is the minister aware of the losses the poultrymen of British Columbia have suffered during the past two years?

WATER RESOURCES

CONSTRUCTION OF DAMS ON ASSINIBOINE AND SWAN RIVERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the dispatch in Friday's Regina Leader-Post to the effect that two dams on the Assiniboine and Swan rivers are being planned at a cost of about half a million dollars? Could the minister indicate when work might commence on these projects?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): My attention has been called to the article in the press. It arises as a result of an address made by the supervisor of P.F.R.A. for that district at Kamsack, to a service club. It does outline the plans which are being made for the construction of dams, and they have been under consideration for some time. They are to control the flow in the Assiniboine river.

BUTTER

REPORTED CONSULTATION RESPECTING CONVERSION OF BUTTER TO GHEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Would the Minister of Agriculture care to comment on the report that the United States government is considering converting a large quantity of butter into a product called ghee, and that officials of his department have been in consultation with United States officials in Washington toward that end? Ultimately the product is to go to India and Pakistan.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member gave me notice of his question yesterday, and I wish to make the following answer. With respect to the newspaper story originating in the United States, relating to the conversion to ghee, as far as I am aware Canada has not been invited to any meeting to discuss any such plan. The agricultural counsellor at the Canadian embassy in Washington, with whom we communicated by telephone, had no knowledge of any proposed meeting.

FISHERIES

NEW BRUNSWICK—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF SMELT FISHING SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries, or in his absence to his parliamentary assistant. Have any representations been made to the Department of Fisheries for an extension of the smelt fishing season in eastern New Brunswick? If so, has any decision been reached in that regard?

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. Representations have been received by the department from fishermen and other interested parties, urging that the smelt season in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island be extended. Representations have also been made to me by the hon. members for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Boucher), Northumberland, N.B. (Mr. McWilliam) and Kent, N.B. (Mr. Michaud).

Since the catch this year is substantially lower than in previous years, and since unusually mild weather has curtailed the fishing of smelts through the ice, it has been decided to extend the season in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island for a period of two weeks, which will bring it up to and including February 28.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS IN INTERLAKE COUNTRY, MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Will the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker, tell the house what the government intends to do for the farmers in the interlake country where the Prairie Farm Assistance Act does not operate?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I have received notice of the question, Mr. Speaker, and I presume what the hon. member refers to is not the Prairie Farm Assistance Act but the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Mr. Bryce: No, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. Gardiner: But the Prairie Farm Assistance Act applies all over the settled portion of the province of Manitoba, and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act does not.

Mr. Bryce: Not in so far as the interlake country is concerned; it applies to the rest.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, the fact is that whatever is going to be done will be done by the provincial government, if they make application to us for assistance.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Speaker, may I have the privilege of answering the minister?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bryce: That is passing the buck.

Mr. Gardiner: Maybe for the benefit of the hon. member I should say a little more. The question of a five-year program between the government of Manitoba and this government with regard to the interlake country has been under consideration for some time. The proposal was that they should spend an amount which would figure up to about $300,000 a year, for five years, and this government has considered the matter and has agreed to co-operate with the provincial government who will actually spend the money for this year. The amount they propose to spend this year is $300,000, of which $150,000 would be paid by this government.

Mr. Bryce: Who spends the money?

Mr. Gardiner: The provincial government does the work.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CIVILIAN USE OF LONG BRANCH RIFLE RANGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): May I ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. What progress is being made in freeing the Long Branch rifle range for one or other civilian uses which are under consideration, or have been under consideration?

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) I shall take the question as notice.

MEAT

IMPORTATION OF LAMB PRODUCTS FROM NEW ZEALAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the rapid drop in the price of lamb on the Toronto market I would like to know if the Minister of Agriculture would give us something further, as he intimated yesterday he would, when he said he would have more information today regarding the importation of New Zealand lamb.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Leader of the Opposition asked his question yesterday and at that time I could only say that the matter had not been brought to my attention. When I returned to my office I found there a letter, which I presume is similar to the one he received, from the livestock people in Toronto. I have checked up since that time, and I wish to give this information to the house.

The Canadian lamb market has been steady to strong at $23 to $23.50. The average price for good and choice lambs at Toronto for January a year ago was $23.26.

Canadian lamb prices are substantially higher than prevailing prices in the United States. The price for good and choice lambs at Toronto was from $2 to $3 higher than Chicago prices. During the week ending January 27 the average price for good and choice lambs at Chicago was $19.90 as compared with $23.21 in Toronto. Owing to the strength of the Canadian market and the difference between Toronto and Chicago markets for lamb, some 450 head of live lambs have been imported from the United States this year to date.

In view of the strength of the Canadian lamb market it can hardly be argued that the importation of New Zealand lamb has seriously depressed prices, but it would seem inevitable that there would be some softening of Canadian prices to bring them into a more comparable level with U.S. prices.

If necessary it may be noted that the trade in lamb and mutton as between Canada and the United States is of a reciprocal nature. While some lambs are being imported during the period of seasonally low marketings, last year some 2,248 head of feeder lambs were exported to the United States and in addition almost 100,000 pounds of dressed mutton and lamb was also exported to the United States.

There is no prohibition on the importation of lamb into Canada. The only government regulation is the imposition of a duty—½ cent per pound for New Zealand and Australia—and anyone may ship lamb into this country who is able to do so over the duty. Since there is no government control there is no occasion for the government to seek or obtain advice from exporters or importers as to their operations or intentions with respect to lamb shipments.

Imports of New Zealand and Australian lamb and mutton for recent years are as follows:

1951	3,385,587 lb.
1952	2,402,712 lb.
1953	2,942,489 lb.
1954 (10 months)	6,555,618 lb.

Inquiries of the Ministry

During the early part of January of this year one shipment of about 250,000 pounds of New Zealand lamb was imported.

Mr. Rowe: I would like to ask a supplementary question. Was the minister not aware that the market had dropped from 23 cents to 19 cents in Toronto?

Mr. Gardiner: This report indicates that the price in the United States is $19.90 a hundredweight in Chicago and $23.21 in Toronto. There would naturally be a levelling off of the prices of lambs here on account of imports from the United States.

Mr. Rowe: Why? We do not need to have our prices fixed there.

Mr. Gardiner: There is a duty of 7·5 per cent. It would come in over that duty.

TAXATION

REQUEST FOR COMMENT BY MINISTER ON SPEECH IN WESTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask two questions of the Minister of Finance. Was he correctly reported as saying in a speech at Weston last Thursday or Friday, referring to the tax rate:

> Unless we can find ways of lowering the defence expenditures there won't be much change.

Second, if so, do the estimates he tabled last Friday indicate a sufficient lowering for this purpose?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Speaking at Weston I made the point, made by many persons discussing the financial position of the government of Canada, that the two large items of defence and welfare were the ones which gave the greatest possible scope for reduction in spending. I drew no conclusions as to which could possibly be reduced, or should be reduced. And, so far as the future is concerned, the budget will no doubt disclose whether these cuts have been sufficient for the purpose of cutting taxes.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister if he would be good enough to answer my questions?

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, January 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. A. B. Weselak (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, when I moved the adjournment of this debate last night I was discussing the matter of tariffs and their effect upon our economy, and had pointed out that if the United Kingdom lost her wool markets in Canada she would lose $30 million annually in Canadian currency with which to buy our products.

Reference in this debate has been made by opposition members to the decrease in exports to the United Kingdom, particularly in relation to farm products. In this connection I believe consideration should be given to the prices at which these products are laid down in the British market by various countries as compared to the relative wholesale Canadian prices of these products.

The figures I propose to quote are for the month of February 1954, and the prices in England are landed cost excluding duty.

UNITED KINGDOM AND CANADA

Prices of Specified Commodities

	February 1954
	¢ per lb.	¢ per lb.
UNITED KINGDOM	England	Montreal
Beef and Veal fresh from:
Australia	17·6
New Zealand	17·1	33
Uruguay	19·7
Argentina	21·4
Bacon
From
Denmark	28·4
Poland	28·3	68
Netherlands	28·4
Butter

Australia	24·5
New Zealand	24·2	32
Eggs
From
Australia	50·6 per doz.
Ireland	44·6	52·4
Denmark	49·8

These figures I believe illustrate that this problem has not arisen as a result of the marketing policies of this government, but has arisen as a result of increased competition from countries where production costs due to natural conditions are comparatively lower.

I have been much more disturbed recently by certain muted murmurings which have emanated from certain sections of our farm economy, indirectly asking for sectional protection or advocating policies which only can be made effective by the provision of embargoes and restrictions on imports which I believe, certainly as a general policy, are contrary to the interests of our farming communities. The advocates of these policies may by their schemes ease a temporary difficulty, but in many cases their ultimate effect and the problems arising in the course of their administration will give birth to policies which eventually may be of tremendous consequence and of detriment to those who advocated them in the first instance. I would like to quote briefly from a statement made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in regard to tariff policy, where the position of agriculture is ably stated:

> Like the Canadian economy as a whole, Canadian agriculture is in the last analysis dependent upon a strong and growing export market for its products. The relatively high level of tariff protection which has over many years been afforded to Canadian manufacturing has always been a burden upon the Canadian farmer dependent as he has been for the most part on the level of world agricultural prices. While it is realized that a policy of tariff protection creates patterns of economic activity that cannot be discarded over night, Canadian agriculture strongly supports the broad policy of gradual tariff reduction, and liberalization of trade, which the government of Canada has followed over the past number of years.

I believe this statement concisely and aptly expresses the views of agriculture on the tariff problem. In my constituency, the farming community is passing through a very difficult period. We did not have the exceptional crops in the past three years which were experienced in many parts of the west. This year, owing to excessive rains, seeding was delayed and in many cases flooding and wet conditions prevented crops being sown. The crops which were sown suffered severely from rust damage and army worms, with the result that quality and yield were very low. The exceptionally wet fall defied the heroic efforts of the farmers to salvage what little crop there was, with the result that while it was gathered in some areas, in others over 50 per cent remains in the field, hammered into the mud by rainfall and wet early snows. The farmers in Springfield, while they have prospered in past years, this year are faced with a serious problem.

The agricultural community was settled largely by the influx of immigration at the turn of the century, and the people who settled this area came to this country with very little wealth and settled lands which required considerable clearing, draining and works before it could be brought under production. However, they by sheer hard work have evolved one of the finest farming communities which now has largely passed to their children, the first generation of native Canadians. These people who developed our farming communities knew little of agricultural stability, knew nothing of parity or floor prices, but nevertheless banded together in marketing associations for their own benefit and protection, a movement which eventually gave rise to the establishment of the three large western grain pools and other co-operative marketing agencies, and the eventual establishment of the wheat board. At the same time, however, farming was not the mechanized operation it is today. Horses were commonly in use and, if oats were not available, a horse could do a fair amount of work on hay though he usually lost weight in so doing.

The point I am trying to illustrate is that in order to farm today the farmer to operate efficiently must have cash, and if not cash then credit; otherwise he cannot operate. Every farm operation on today's mechanized farms now requires the farmer to pay out cash, and the net result is that cash revenues are today far more important than they were in the past. As a result the farmers in Springfield, apart from those who have been established and have reserves, face an immediate cash situation which is of serious proportions. I realize that the prime responsibility in this case lies with the municipal and provincial authorities and not with this government, but it is nevertheless a problem which will recur and perhaps some study should be given toward evolving some method of alleviating these temporary hardships. It is true that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act provides certain benefits where crops fail, but unfortunately in our area crop conditions vary almost from farm to farm, with the result that the qualifying patterns under the act debar farmers from receiving any benefits under the act even though their individual cases warrant aid. In addition to this the cost of operating and cultivating land in the fertile heavy soils of the constituency are substantially higher than those in many parts of the west, and correspondingly yields are generally higher than the western average yields.

The net result has been that Manitoba farmers have not benefited as a whole from the scheme to any substantial extent, with the result that in the past few years considerable agitation has been evident among grain growers for some amendment or alternative which would meet Manitoba's peculiar problems. For every dollar paid into the fund, Manitoba farmers have received 30 cents, Saskatchewan farmers $2.50 and Alberta farmers $1.70. The province of Manitoba was keenly aware of this problem and at the last session a committee was set up to study the matter and report to the government. This committee has held hearings at many points in the province and has heard several hundred briefs submitted by individuals, farm organizations and others. The magnitude of the problem has not been minimized by the provincial authorities and the multitude of schemes proposed by interested individuals and organizations indicate that there is no easy solution to the problem. The one definite fact that has emerged from the hearings is that the present inflexibility of P.F.A.A. is not satisfactory in Manitoba and that it will have to be either modified or replaced by some other measure which will operate to the advantage of the Manitoba farmer even at extra cost if necessary.

In view of the fact that the report of the committee is expected this year, I do not propose to draw any conclusions or suggest any remedies at this time. I do not feel that an increase in payments, as suggested by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), while desirable and necessary, will solve the problem in Manitoba; the problem goes much further and we in Manitoba await with considerable interest the findings of the provincial committee.

A great deal has been said in this debate regarding the drop in farm income and the price squeeze which is presently causing difficulty in our farm economy. I do not propose to deal with the detail as it has been put on the record by government and opposition speakers who preceded me in this debate.

In the course of the past year, the wholesale price index for farm products dropped from 212·9 to 203·8 and the index of farm costs rose from 231·1 to 238·7 in August of last year; the indications are that this has risen since August. The spread last January was 18·2 points and this has now increased to over 34·8 points.

I believe this illustrates a trend which has continued for the past year and which ultimately if continued even with average production will destroy the small margin between cost of production and cash returns. In my opinion the index figure, being a related price figure, is generally more significant than total income decline figures which are affected by decreases in volume of production, generally due to natural conditions over which no control can be exercised.

Since the inception of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, a total of $80,163,658 has been expended by the government in the utilization of the revolving fund of $200 million provided for at that time. Of the sum of over $80 million expended nearly $69 million was expended in connection with the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan in February of 1952, with the result that the actual cost of the program has been approximately $11 million or an average of approximately $1¼ million a year over the past eight years.

The result of this program has been, and it has had that effect, of stabilizing the prices of farm commodities. It has worked particularly well in the case of butter, which prior to the application of price supports suffered wide fluctuations in price, with the result that when the producer had the product to sell his returns were comparatively low.

At the comparatively low cost of $1¼ million a year, a measure of stability to agriculture, and as a result to the Canadian economy as a whole, of inestimable value was achieved, far outstripping its relative cost.

The act as passed by parliament provides, in subsection 2 of section 9, that:

> In prescribing prices under paragraphs (a) and (c) of subsection (1), the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture, by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions, and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the return from agriculture and those from other occupations.

Steady and continued increases in labour income can be largely attributed to the continued expansion of the national labour force; but nevertheless, we are all aware that substantial increases in return for the individual efforts of labour have occurred in past years, which is as it should be.

However, the farmer has as a general rule been required to purchase the commodities he requires at a price related to Canadian production costs, while a substantial bulk of his production has been sold in Canada and abroad at prices related substantially to the world economy, with the result that a disparity has existed and is now being accentuated.

The intention of parliament in 1945 was obviously to provide a fair return to the farmer. Owing to exceptional conditions in the past few years, farm production in general was well above normal, with the result that the farm economy remained fairly buoyant despite declining prices. Conditions have now changed, and immediate study will have to be given to the situation. The government has at its disposal competent economists and statisticians who are quite capable of analysing the situation, getting down to the bottom of the problem and recommending remedies to alleviate this situation.

I appreciate the action on the part of the government in the past in maintaining price support on butter, providing it for hogs and eggs when prices fell substantially, and in March of 1953 under the Fisheries Prices Support Act of purchasing one and three-quarter million pounds of fish from fishermen in Manitoba for which there was no apparent market.

I realize that support of prices in this country creates a problem in the disposal and sale of our products in world markets, and therefore their application cannot be indiscriminate. Nevertheless I feel that continued and more extensive use of these provisions will have to be made in accord with the intention of parliament as expressed in the statute by the government to bolster a declining farm economy.

Since our agricultural problems are not of a static nature but are changing ones, I believe that the remedy lies, not in inflexible price supports but rather in flexible supports which can take into account existing factors which vary from time to time. The experience of the United States in this respect and their present attitude are stated by Mr. Ezra Taft Benson, secretary of agriculture, in the Atlantic Monthly for July 1954, at page 53. Regarding inflexible price supports he had this to say:

> Our problems today center in the necessity of shifting from an agricultural economy of practically unlimited wartime demands to the more moderate demands of peacetime, while providing reasonable protection for farm income. The present farm program employing emergency, wartime, rigid price supports for a few important commodities is impeding such a transition. To a marked degree it is making an orderly transition impossible.
> The present program has a number of flaws—
>
> It results in unbalanced production through rigid supports on some commodities for which demands are decreasing.
> It encourages a build-up of surpluses which in turn depress prices.
>
> It discourages sound soil conservation practices by maintaining artificial demands for some soil-depleting crops.
> It tends to price certain commodities out of both domestic and foreign markets and thus stimulates use of less expensive substitutes.
>
> It destroys the function of price as a brake on overproduction.
>
> It fails to provide reasonable protection for 60 per cent of our annual farm marketings which are not under price supports.
> It provides the greatest help to those who need it least—the low-cost, big-volume producers—the least help to small marginal producers.
>
> It creates the complex problem of what to do with land taken out of production because of severe acreage controls.
> It provides for such drastic production restrictions that even with high price supports income is seriously jeopardized.
> On top of all these disadvantages, the present program has not prevented a decline in net farm income for five out of the past six years. Under this program the government now has between 6 and 7 billion dollars invested in commodities whose prices are being supported. More than 2·5 billion of this amount is represented by commodities whose prices are being supported. More than 2·5 billion of this amount is represented by commodities actually held in government storage. The balance has been loaned on commodities a large part of which will eventually wind up in government hands. These surpluses hang over the market. They depress prices. They drain off taxpayers' dollars day in and day out. The cost of storage alone is running more than half a million dollars a day.

On the other hand, regarding flexible price supports, his observations were as follows:

> Flexible supports provide for some price fluctuation to keep supply and demand in better balance, while at the same time placing a strong floor ranging between 75 and 90 per cent of parity under the prices of basic commodities.
> They produce greater stability in farming operations and in farm markets.
> They encourage sound farm management practices.
>
> They create better price equality in relation to other commodities.
> They assure abundant food supplies for consumers at reasonable prices.
> They stimulate expansion of market outlets at home and abroad.
>
> They hold production controls to a minimum.
> They give added incentive for conservation and soil improvement.
>
> They encourage efficient use of agricultural resources.
> Flexible price supports will promote these goals with a maximum of reliance on the co-operative and competitive efforts of free men and a minimum of dependence on government control.

In conclusion, I would like to briefly discuss another aspect of the farm problem and that is the need for a scheme of long-term credit for the rehabilitation of young farmers on farms. The amount of capital required today to establish and equip an economic farm unit has been estimated from $15,000 upward. The farm unit as it exists today is generally a family farm and as a rule forms all the worldly assets of the head of the family. In the event of the death or retirement of the head, the problem arises as to who shall carry on the farming operations. In the event of death, debts have to be paid and as a rule interests of other heirs settled. In the event of retirement, sufficient moneys have to be provided for the security of the retiring head who has through many years of labour established his equity in the farm.

The young farmer is faced with a serious problem; as a rule he is a competent, well-trained farmer who, in the majority of cases, through devise or devolution in the case of death, or by gift in the case of retirement, has a small equity in the farm, but the bulk of the money required to settle remaining equities must come from somewhere.

The farm improvement loans do not meet the situation; the limitations applied by the Canadian farm loan board, which has not been designed for this purpose, do not permit a solution to the problem. Loan and insurance companies do not either; in fact in Manitoba they have practically withdrawn from the long-term credit field in agriculture. The net result is that in many cases the farm is sold to a neighbour, or neighbours, a competent farmer is lost to agriculture and to Canada and he drifts into the labour stream in which he must re-educate and re-adapt himself as best he can.

Following the last war this government embarked on a scheme which has had singular success, and I refer to the work that has been done under the Veterans Land Act. Dealing with full-time farmers alone, 25,938 were approved for settlement and the record shows that only 2 per cent paying annually or semi-annually are in arrears in excess of $200. The success of this scheme encourages me to urge the government to give consideration to the advisability of providing long-term credit loans to young deserving farmers, with proper and adequate safeguards, thereby providing a solution to a problem which is plaguing our younger farmers throughout the country.

Mr. R. W. Mitchell (London): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate hon. members will be glad to know that I will not keep their attention for more than a few minutes. I say that for two reasons. The first is that the speech from the throne was so devoid of anything of a constructive nature that there is little to be said about it. The second reason is that I deplore repetition and any repetition which I may make of previous remarks will be purely for the purpose of emphasis.

I should like at the outset to conform with tradition by congratulating the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) and the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Carrick) upon their addresses to the house. I feel that both expressed foresight and progress which seem to be sadly lacking once members of the machine have been in the house long enough to be suppressed and made to conform.

The speech itself was a masterpiece of double-talk. It was full of sound signifying nothing. This government has looked back into the past and has failed entirely to forecast or foresee any sound measures for dealing with the economy as we face it today. I submit that we are committed to a policy of bungling along without any plan or program and without any rhyme or reason. We are destined, for another year at least, to be governed by a self-satisfied government with neither initiative nor vision. Order in council is still senior to the will of this house. Without planning, each crisis has to be faced in a spirit of crisis, met with catch-as-catch-can remedies, and without preparing any ground for the future. Shakespeare put into the mouth of Lear the words: "Nothing will come of nothing." I submit that that is a suitable epitaph with which to bury and forget the speech from the throne on this occasion.

The subject of unemployment was conspicuous by its absence. Much has been made of the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act, which, I submit, is nothing more or less than a sedative or palliative and is much the same thing as administering morphine to a person who is suffering considerable hurt. It does not go to the root of the trouble. It does not cure the ill.

We are told there is no problem. But, Mr. Speaker, I submit that examination of the figures produced by this government itself indicates that the unemployment situation in this country is not only severe but is growing worse. We are told it is seasonal and sectional. We are told that we have a greater working force than ever before. There may be and probably is some element of truth in these statements, but they are half-truths at best, and half-truths are dangerous.

The basic problem, however you clothe it, is to provide an opportunity for work for every Canadian who is able and willing to work so that he may be able to play his part in the development of this great country.

I was gratified to note that amendments will be introduced to the War Veterans Allowance Act, and to the Blind Persons Act. We have been pleading for these on this side of the house for some considerable time and it is our hope that the remedies offered will be neither too little nor too late. It is our hope that they will not be merely temporary stopgap remedies but that they will go to the root of the problem and solve the misery and the troubles which have faced these classes of persons for many years.

I was also personally gratified to note that amendments are to be introduced to the Railway Act and to the Municipal Grants Act. I say that not only because of the relief which will be offered to municipalities, but also because they point up a much broader picture which I wish to discuss. During the last session it was my privilege to speak in this house with respect to the continuing problem faced by municipalities in the raising of sufficient taxes to enable them to carry out the purposes and objects of municipal government.

I am not naïve and accordingly I do not believe that these remedies, these pieces of legislation, are to be introduced as a result of what I said. There must have been many others from all sides of the house clamouring at the cabinet door to produce this sudden about-face.

We have learned to be grateful for small morsels which fall from our master's table, and these measures, if and when they are introduced, will we hope be something more than small morsels.

Referring to the Municipal Grants Act, may I point out specifically as an example that the total assessment in the city of London is some $146 million and that the assessment of federally-owned property is some $4 million. I have heard, and seen in the press and elsewhere, various suggestions as to what form the amendments are to take, but on any basis there is going to be some relief for municipalities, such as London, which have a high proportion of federally-owned property.

The Railway Act amendments will be welcomed, particularly by those hon. members who represent large cities. The government apparently has finally seen the necessity of curbing the damage and destruction which is wrought by level crossings in our cities and towns. They also apparently have finally seen the necessity of maintaining an even flow of traffic rather than creating and continuing the bottlenecks which tie up our cities many hours during the day.

May I once again be specific about London. London is fortunate in that it is served by the two major railways. It is unfortunate in that these two railroads divide the city into three almost equal parts, and in the centre of these parts is located the bulk of the industry and business life of the city. It is apparent from that that the bulk of our working force must at least twice a day cross one or the other of these railways. It is also apparent that those who wish to go to the business area or to the shopping area are in the same position.

May I say that on the C.N.R. there are only three major north-south routes on which there are overpasses, and on the C.P.R. there are none. For verification of my remarks with respect to the hold-ups with which traffic is faced I would refer hon. members to Mr. Donald Gordon, with whom it was my pleasure and privilege to sit at a major London crossing for 15 minutes last summer while he witnessed one of his trains being made up.

These temporary measures do not answer the problem. They simply perpetuate the inroads which this government has made into the tax dollar. The provinces and indeed the municipalities continue to be the victims of the tax grab and they have lost the right or the opportunity to govern or maintain themselves financially. Only so much of the dollar which is earned can be put out in taxes. The field has been exhausted and the municipalities are faced with a complete inability to increase their mill rate and therefore must accept the charity of this government. This is a policy of self-perpetuation. The municipalities cannot bring themselves to bite the hand that feeds them, particularly when that hand controls the larder as effectively as does this government.

It is therefore my earnest hope that the government will enter into conferences in a spirit of co-operation and not of domination so that out of them may come a new tax formula as a result of which the provincial and municipal bodies will be able to enter into the field themselves.

I suggest there is no person more capable of governing his house than the master of that house. I am at times the master of my own house and I do not welcome advice or influence from outside. But I suggest that municipal councils and mayors are the persons in the best position to decide how and where municipal funds shall be spent. They are on the spot. They have the firsthand knowledge but they must have the money. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the government that as a measure of good faith instead of making grants in lieu of taxes they pay taxes to the municipalities on federal holdings. Second, I suggest that they reduce their taxes thereby enabling the municipalities to increase theirs and avoid the necessity of municipalities coming to the federal government for grants.

May I now refer for a moment or two to one of the depressed industries about which we have heard. I refer to the textile industry of which I have some little knowledge, but I am satisfied that at least some of my remarks will refer to other industries in the same boat. I presume that as soon as one mentions that hateful word "tariff" one is branded as a high tariff man, and I refer to the word "tariff" as a means of protection, not of taxation. I suggest to the house and to the government that it is high time that we took a realistic view of tariffs and thereby protect our Canadian industries and our Canadian workers.

We have tariffs and we may as well accept the fact. My colleague, the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean), illustrated that most adequately yesterday from the cradle to the grave. These tariffs apparently are designed for two purposes. One is protection and the other is taxation. With the latter I cannot agree. A tariff for the purpose of protection, to be adequate today, must be examined in the light of today's conditions.

By way of example may I refer to tariff item 523b which deals with woven fabrics, wholly of cotton, printed, dyed, or coloured, and I will touch only the most-favoured-nation column which provides that these fabrics, if valued at more than 80 cents per pound, are subject to a tariff of 17½ per cent and 3 cents per pound, if valued at 50 cents or more but not more than 80 cents per pound, a 22½ per cent tariff, and if valued at less than 50 cents per pound, a 25 per cent tariff. I suggest that these tariffs were designed to enable our Canadian manufacturers to compete in the range of low priced cotton goods. We recognized the fact that we probably could not compete economically in the higher priced range of cotton products, and therefore certain protection was given.

But, Mr. Speaker, we must now examine these particular tariffs in the light of changed conditions. The price of cotton has risen. What was formerly 50 cent cotton, and accordingly given some measure of protection, is now in the bracket of high priced cotton and does not receive the same protection as it did. Second, let us not forget the fact that the value of the Canadian dollar compared with the value of the United States dollar has drastically changed.

Another problem of the textile industry has to do with the marking regulations passed under the National Trade Mark and True Labelling Act. Perhaps I should say that the problem has to do with enforcement and the additions which should be made to these marking regulations. That it is not a small problem may be indicated by the fact that imports of certain types of hose from and including July of 1953 until and including June of 1954 amounted to 1,169,025 dozen pairs for a value of $5,710,935. There are two particular aspects of this imported hosiery to which I wish to refer. The first is that so far as I can find there is no requirement that the country of origin be stamped on these items. Yet I have with me, Mr. Speaker, a pair of white ankle stockings which were sold over the counter of a store as being made in Canada. They are not made in Canada; they are made in the United States.

The failure to stamp the name of the country of origin in the case of the United States, Spain and Japan is enabling certain people to sell foreign products to Canadians who are conscious of the need to buy Canadian and desire to do so. We are defeating our purposes. We are trying in one breath to educate Canada and Canadians to buy Canadian, and then we permit certain of our citizens to sell products made in the United States with the statement—oh well, they are made in Canada; you prove me wrong.

The second aspect of these marking regulations requires that I refer to the hosiery marking regulations issued on the 14th January, 1953. Paragraph 5 provides in brief, and I will not quote it, that if there is more than one item contained in a pair of hosiery they must be marked equally if the hosiery is stamped, with the largest component being named first. They also provide that where there is less than 5 per cent of the material content in the hosiery, excluding toe and heel reinforcing, they may not be marked or described in any manner whatsoever.

This particular pair of white stockings which I have in front of me has in the centre of the marking in large capital letters the words "combed cotton". Immediately beneath that in the same size lettering is the word "nylon", and if you look very carefully and have good eyes you can see below the word "nylon" the words "reinforced toe and heel". The first reaction in looking at that is that they are "combed cotton nylon". That would be my reaction, but I am not a shopper. The second reaction would be that there is certainly nylon there, and even if you read all the words you see it is "combed cotton nylon reinforced toe and heel". To which part of the stamping does the word "nylon" refer?

These stockings have no nylon whatsoever except in the reinforcing of the toe and the heel. My plea is that we assist one of our staple industries to assist itself by enforcing and, if necessary, expanding these regulations so that Canadians who are conscious of Canada's future can be in a position to buy articles properly marked.

Lastly, I wish to say simply one word about the centennial the city of London is celebrating this year, to which reference has already been made in the house, and to extend a most cordial invitation to members of the house and to their constituents to visit us and help us in the celebration of our one hundredth anniversary.

Mr. J. M. Dechene (Athabaska): In rising to ask for the privilege of speaking in this assembly, Mr. Speaker, I wish to immediately assure this audience that I have a special reason for doing so, otherwise I would not inflict a speech upon them. Today, sir, I believe I am qualified by age and by experience—

Mr. McIvor: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dechene: —to speak on a matter of very great importance to the province from which I come. During the year 1955 we shall celebrate the golden anniversary of the entry into this confederation of the great province of Alberta. I feel it is proper for me to speak because, in looking over the records, I find that of the men who took part in the development of Alberta, those who were there from the beginning and who contributed to its success, there are only two left in public life. I refer to the Hon. Senator MacKinnon and the member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene).

As I looked back upon those fifty years, I felt that I had a duty to perform and an obligation to fulfil to those people who made it possible for members to come here to represent Alberta. There is some history attached to this which I believe, unfortunately, has been overlooked. During the last few weeks and months competitions have been held in the schools of Alberta. Students have been asked to write about the province, and prizes have been offered to those who write the best articles. So far as I have been able to discover, however, no one has made any reference to how this province came into being or to the men who were responsible for this great development in the west. If I mention Alberta particularly, it is because other men better qualified than I am will speak for Saskatchewan and also because the territorial government had its headquarters in Regina for many years. The people in that province were used to government, but we in Alberta were in the outlying area near the Rocky mountains.

We did not have any experience in government, but we were proud to achieve the population which warranted this House of Commons passing the Alberta Act in 1905, declaring that on September 1, 1905, Alberta would become a province. A lieutenant governor was named and appointed. He chose a temporary government which, later in the fall, had to go before the public for either support or rejection. May I mention the names of some of these men who did so well? The first premier was the Hon. A. C. Rutherford, from the town of Strathcona on the south side of the river Saskatchewan. He handled also the portfolios of education and finance. He had experience because he had sat in the assembly at Regina for a number of years. He chose as his cabinet colleagues the Hon. W. T. Finlay of Medicine Hat, minister of agriculture; the Hon. W. H. Cushing of Calgary, minister of public works; the Hon. C. W. Cross, Edmonton, attorney general; and Mr. De Veber of Lethbridge, as minister without portfolio, a very able man who later became a member of the other house and who, of course, has long since departed.

As I said, there are only a few left to bring back the memory of this great achievement, and it was an achievement. In 1892, 63 years ago next April, my father went west as a homesteader with a family of ten. After the construction of the Canadian Pacific, the west became stagnant. Up to that time, there had been some advancement, some settlement, and then it died out. Many of us, and I was one, had to come back east to try to find employment. There was nothing in the west for a young fellow to do. We sold our oats for 15 cents a bushel. Sometimes we got 17 cents and we were very happy. We had to put the oats in sacks and carry it up to the warehouse where we emptied it into bins. There were no elevators in those days, and I did that.

Then Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into office. At that time he chose as his minister of interior and minister of immigration one of the outstanding public men in the west—although I did not always agree with him—Clifford Sifton of Brandon, later Sir Clifford Sifton. He initiated a new policy of immigration designed to bring about progress in the west. We had tried to get people from Ontario. We got some, the best, because they had the spirit of adventure of their ancestors. We got some from Quebec and from the maritimes, but only a few.

The government therefore opened the gates to settlers from other countries. These people saw the possibilities in the rich soil of the west, and they were looking for freedom and liberty. They promptly accepted the invitation to come to this land, where they could in a few years become Canadians and enjoy prosperity and freedom. I recall very well when they started to come. I went back to the west in those days because my father wrote and said there was something to do; there was a new deal in the west and prosperity was coming back. He said we were going to build more railroads, and we were going to bring in a lot of people.

How well I remember all this. If I recall these events to the house, it is only because of the historical value. Thousands of people poured in from central Europe, the British Isles, from the Scandinavian countries and from across the line. Some came from Ireland, some of the best. They took advantage of what we had to offer, our fertile soil, our freedom and our laws. They came by thousands.

In 1903 I went back to the west. My father said: "Now, there is a new deal here; come on home, son. There is work for you here." I went home on the train with immigrants because it was cheaper and it was more interesting. I recall leaving Montreal, and I believe it took us eight days to travel to Calgary. We then had to take a small branch line—I forget the name of it—which ran from Calgary to Edmonton. The train was loaded with immigrants, most of whom came from central Europe and the Scandinavian countries. There were a couple of carloads of people from the British Isles. They were happy. I recall walking through the train watching these people and thinking how far away from home they were. They came from Galicia, a province in Austria, from Bukovina, some from Germany and from Scandinavia. They had been told by those who came in the advance guard what we had to offer in the west. It took eight days to travel to Calgary, and then I had to take this train to Edmonton. If I recite these facts, it is only because I have something on my mind. I bow to my friends from the west, who were there in those days—and they were important days for us. We landed in Strathcona, on the south side of the river. There was no bridge at that time. Well, perhaps that is not quite correct, because there was an old river bridge. Most of the people went down by tallyho—four horses going along at about 25 miles a hour. It took a good man to ride with them; in fact most people did not dare to do it, because it looked dangerous.

Then, there was a little train, a little railway—and perhaps it was the shortest railway with the longest name that has ever been known in the world. It was the Edmonton, Alberta, Yukon, British Columbia and Pacific Railway, and travelled about five miles. It just had to go down a hill, and up again. And I say all this because I think there is something of great importance attached to it.

Instead of taking the tallyho, as we called it, which ran downhill at breakneck speed—although I was not afraid of it; I was almost a cowboy in those days—I rode the train. It consisted of four wooden cars, loaded to the roof. And as we went down that hill we could see the lights across the river on the heights of Edmonton.

On that occasion I saw a man up at the end of the car. He was a tall man, a fair man, evidently a Scandinavian, and he began to sing. Mr. Speaker, it has been my lot at times to hear some fine singers. I have listened to Caruso, on gramophone records; and yet I must say that I never heard anything finer or better than that Scandinavian—although, unfortunately, I could not understand a word he said.

It was obvious however that he was singing a song of farewell to the country he had loved, and from which he had come, and at the same time a song of welcome to the country to which he had come—a country so vast, with its limitless prairies. But this man was pleased; he felt strong—a regular Viking, coming to a new land. And he sang all the way along, until everyone was spellbound.

As I say, I did not understand a word he said; but one could understand his feelings. Here was a land of liberty, a land of plenty, a land that gave scope for his strong arm and for his will, he was singing to it. Those of us who were there never said a word, all the way along. We just listened to that magnificent song. No speech could have expressed better the meaning of his song.

And when we got to the top of the hill—and, Mr. Speaker, it took us a long time—we got off at Edmonton. My folks were there to meet me—and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I am not wearying the house, because I do not speak in this way simply to relate a personal matter but rather to illustrate the development that has taken place out there. Immediately I told my father about the man I had heard singing. It seemed, I said, as if he loved this land, and I said that I believed I loved it more since I had heard him sing. I did not realize the value of what we have, did not realize as well as this man who had come all the way across the seas, and who sang about the wonderful things we have here—the size of it, the breadth of it.

Everybody was so happy in those days. That was a time when there were no strangers: we were all brothers in the west. The old-timers from out there will remember that.

Then some years later I happened to be electioneering north of Edmonton, not for myself but for the great architect of Alberta's destiny, the late Hon. Frank Oliver. And, away beyond Edmonton, perhaps some 30 or 35 miles, I called at a nice, tidy little shack which had been placed in a clearing in the bush at a place then known as Independence. It was clean as a whistle, good buildings, well kept fences. The man came out to see me, to welcome me. I looked at him and at once recognized the same man I had heard singing on the train. But now he could speak English. That man was still singing, but singing louder and better than ever. He was singing about the possibilities of this great land. And when I speak today I do so to draw the attention of hon. members in the House of Commons and to those who come from the west to the fact that in those early days we were happy; we were proud of ourselves. We did not ask for any government favours. We would have been insulted if anyone had offered us something for nothing. And that was the feeling throughout the land.

I mention this because, as a result of a great immigration policy, the land of the west became cultivated, villages were built across the prairies, and railways were constructed. And, referring to railways, I can remember Frank Oliver repeating day after day and year after year the necessity for railway competition, because we were then at the mercy of one line. If oats went up a cent a bushel in British Columbia, then the freight rate went up by that amount. We could sell nothing at a profit.

And then the Canadian National Railways came along, and the Grand Trunk, and there was competition, bringing hope to the land. The population increased rapidly, and two new provinces were cut out of the prairies—Saskatchewan, and the one in which I am more interested, Alberta the sunny.

Then the first war came along and created a condition over which no government, provincial or otherwise, had any control. In many areas there was dissatisfaction among the people; there was division and discord. The west was ranged against the east. Then in 1921 I believe I was the only survivor in the northern part of the province of the Liberal legislature which went to the people in the month of July of that year. I believe there were nine in the whole of the province who survived, five of whom were in Edmonton—and I recite these things, Mr. Speaker, because in the minds of some people both here and elsewhere there appears to be the idea that Alberta was born either in 1921 or 1935.

Alberta has been looked upon right in this House of Commons, sometimes through the eyes of a banker whose name I will not mention, as something quite different from what it is. I do not need to mention his name, because some of my friends over there have named him often, and have recited his opinions to the house. Of course we are talking about a province in which everything had to be done—the building of the legislative buildings, the erection of normal schools and public schools, the building of roads and bridges—all those things. The entire province had to be covered by a brand new government, and the revenue to do this had to be found. We did not listen to the banker, because if we had done so we would not have a province out there, even yet. But as public men we knew it was our duty to provide facilities for the settlers, those who had had the courage and the fortitude to go out there and carve out a little kingdom for themselves.

Perhaps I should say in passing that I am not speaking from notes, but that I am freely asking you to join us in our golden anniversary celebration in Alberta the fair, which has contributed so much to the advancement and the welfare of this country. And we have only begun, as everyone knows.

In a few months at most enough gasoline and oil will be produced in Alberta and Saskatchewan to supply the entire Canadian market.

Millions and millions of dollars' worth of new wealth has been created by the people of our provinces of the west for themselves and for the people of Canada; but I want to pay a tribute through you, Mr. Speaker, to a class of our people in that land who in some parts of the country are referred to as immigrants. Well, there is nothing wrong with being an immigrant. We are all immigrants; we emigrated from somewhere in this country or from some other lands not so long ago.

Take that country north, east, southeast and northeast of Edmonton, all around Edmonton clear up to the Peace river. In that area you will find men and women who came from Europe, from the Ukraine, from Germany, from Poland, from the British Isles, from Scandinavia and from other countries. I hope some of you will have the privilege of visiting Alberta next summer when we celebrate our jubilee. If you do you will see miles and miles of countryside, right up to my section, a distance of 175 miles, which 50 years ago was wild but today is a garden of Eden growing everything under the sun. You will see the sod shacks and mud houses have disappeared and now there are the finest of homes to be found anywhere. You will see silos and thoroughbred cattle in the fields. I admit to you, sir, that I resent the picture that is often painted of my province of Alberta. From 1921 to 1930 we were called the I.O.U. province. They cannot call us that any more because we have paid off all our debts at a high interest rate.

I want to pay this tribute to the Ukrainians. It is not a matter of politics. Do not worry; I am not going to bother you again after this parliament, but I should like to also pay this tribute to the Poles, the Germans and the Scandinavians who are all far away from home. I should like to tell you a story about them. I should like to tell you what they have done. Today in the public life of the west you will find men of the second and third generation in important positions. You find them in the judiciary; as you know, you find them in our parliament. You find them in our legislatures, and you find them in our cabinets in the western provinces. The mayor of Edmonton, the booming and greatest city in the west, nobody can deny that, is a second generation descendant of a pioneer settler. His ancestors, whom I knew very well, came from a part of the constituency of Athabaska. I want to praise them publicly for the tremendous achievements they have made.

It was easier for us from old Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes. I admit we were pioneers in the development of the west, but it was easier for us. They were great men and women but it was easier for us because we were in our own country. We knew the rules and the languages. I am proud to say to you this afternoon, sir, there are thousands of those Ukrainians, Germans, Poles and Scandinavians in the constituency of Athabaska. We have the greatest respect for one another. I say to you publicly in this house that these men and women have done a wonderful job in the west.

When we talk about 1903 I want to show you how the policies, politics and the vision of public men influenced the people of the country. You could find the same feeling all over the land, ambition, belief in the country, confidence in its future. Sometimes some men in public life have made it their business to try to destroy that confidence, to destroy in the souls and in the hearts of these men and women the spirit of Canada, the spirit of the pioneer. I can boast that I was one of them, and I can boast, sir, that I never had to ask any favour from any government. I am proud and pleased that God gave me life to be able to make these remarks today without any preparation. I did want to pay tribute to that valiant population.

I want to describe to you this afternoon the visit of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. When the western provinces entered confederation, Laurier did not send a messenger to Regina or Edmonton; he came himself. I do not think there was any greater public man. There may have been others with more ability but I am not going to make comparisons. Comparisons are odious. What I wish to say is that there was no greater lover of Canada, no greater advocate of its possibilities, no greater friend of the western prairies—that spirit still lives in our Minister of Agriculture—than Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Frank Oliver would wake up at two or three o'clock in the morning to go to meet a settler coming from the country to see what he wanted, and what he could do to help him out. That was the spirit we had in those days in the west.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier came to Edmonton, and I should like to remind the house of this because I think it is worth-while. Crowds came from all over the countryside. There were perhaps a dozen cars in the city of Edmonton those days; there were none in the country. People came from all over the country with the horse and buggy and the wagon; some came with oxen and some walking in order to hear Wilfrid Laurier, the champion of western Canada's advancement, progress and settlement. If I should live a thousand years I shall never forget the speech he made. It was a masterpiece not only in eloquence but in patriotism. I well remember the welcome he gave us. He knew them all. Thousands were there and many came from other lands. I should like to repeat some of the words he used in his welcome. He said: Many of you came here from other lands, from central Europe, from the United States, from the British Isles. You know now how welcome you are in this land of the free and the brave. I want to give you some advice. I give it to you as an old man getting on in years and as prime minister of this country. We are not asking you in Canada to forget the land of your ancestors. No, do not do that. We know that every nation in the world has many things to be proud of. Nobody has a monopoly of courage and of intelligence in this world. Remember the land where your ancestors lived, struggled and died, because if you remember the land of your ancestors you will be better citizens of the land in which you are now making your home and where your children will take your place and carry on. He said: "Remember the past, remember your land, remember the old country; but I am asking you today, when this land is becoming a province, a new jewel in the crown of confederation, which is today the most brilliant with its tremendous resources, to think of the future. Remember the past, but think of the future. Think of your children. Be grateful to the people of Canada who spent money and who granted you the privilege of coming to live in a land where you can be free."

There may be lots of good lands in the Ukraine, some as good as any that can be found anywhere in the world, but there was one thing lacking, namely, freedom, liberty of expression, liberty of thought, liberty of religion. They found that, sir, in Canada. This year we are celebrating our golden jubilee in this fair land of ours.

I am not sorry that all through these years it has been my first love. I say to you Canadians through this forum of the Canadian people, through this parliament, that this celebration, which will run from June to September next, is worthy of the sons and daughters of Saskatchewan and Alberta who came into this confederation on September 1, 1905. I have argued very often in this house, not through ill will, that we should never forget what we have contributed to the wealth of this nation, although sometimes we are accused of asking for too much. Unfortunately there are speeches made to gain some local advantage, some political kudos, because of the great majority of people on the western plains, but we are not asking for any favours.

I know I will be pardoned if what I say at this stage is said without any more preparation. I do not write my speeches. I have some notes with me that have been made hastily. I do not write my speeches, first because it is a rule of this house and, second, because I believe that I know enough about this country of mine to speak about it without having to write or having somebody else write notes for me.

So on that September 1 we did see a wonderful picture up that hill. I think I have said this once before. I do not think that anywhere in Canada you will find a more magnificent setting for a celebration than those flats down the river below that big hill on which is situated the hotel Macdonald at Edmonton. The spectacle is magnificent. You have the Saskatchewan river flowing through there to lake Manitoba and lake Winnipeg. There is the magnificent site on which the city is built. The trees across the river were in their full early fall foliage. The people gathered, on what was called the Ross flats. They were settled first by an old Scottish Liberal named Ross and they still carry the name of Ross flats. There was no city then, it was just a garden. I do not think that I ever saw a better show anywhere in the world than I saw that day.

May I say in a spirit of unity and not at all as a partisan that as a Canadian I do not ever want to hear a word about our immigration policy. I know the wealth it has produced because there were no other hands available. They could not get them anywhere else.

I want to end with this message. You will find courage and fortitude in the west. It has been said that the soil is fertile in the west, that everything will grow there. We have had some bad years, but is there any country in the world which has not had bad years? That soil will grow grain; it grows flowers to that height, and it raises the finest livestock. It even grows ideas. People think it will grow money. The only way I found to grow it was by earning it.

I say to hon. members of this house this afternoon that, from their hearts and souls, they say to their constituents throughout this country when June 1 comes around and Alberta begins its celebration of its golden anniversary of joining this great country, they have a thought for Alberta and to those who are so inclined to raise a toast to the people of the province of Alberta.

Miss Sybil Bennett (Halton): Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate we have heard much about the greatness and magnitude and intrepid nature of this great land to which we belong, and not the least of these have been the words of the hon. member who has just spoken. But after all we must return to the more practical consideration of conditions as they exist in this country. Listening to the speeches that have been made over the course of days and weeks it seems to me that hon. members of this house, particularly those to your left, Mr. Speaker, have set out most clearly the conditions as they exist today in this country.

I think there is only one conclusion and one deduction that can be drawn from what has been said, that is that the speech from the throne no longer performs the function and purpose it was originally intended to perform. The speech from the throne should contain a forthright, honest, down to earth statement of conditions as they exist, these conditions as they relate economically and socially to this nation. In a like manner this government should set forth in clear and concise language how they intend to deal with conditions as we find them today.

Judging from what I have heard in this distinguished house there are four or five problems with which the people of this country and this government in particular must deal. There is the problem of unemployment. There is the problem of the loss of our markets internally and externally. There is the reduction of national income, nationally and individually. There is the question of the development of the natural resources of this country and the reassessment of their potentialities. There is the question of overtaxation as it relates to unemployment, loss of markets and the shrinkage of national and individual income.

I say that this government should forthwith and without delay make an honest and thorough examination of the basic causes underlying unemployment in this nation as we have it today. In the same forthright manner, after this examination has been made remedies should be suggested and brought forward in order to cope with the situation.

I realize that the government has provided legislation for additional unemployment insurance benefits and we welcome it. Projects are provided for public works. In my own constituency $400,000 has been allotted for a new federal building. But these things do not go to the root of the matter. They are only palliatives. They do not deal with the situation of unemployment in this country. As has been said by other hon. members, the unemployment situation is far from being seasonal and regional in character.

In a like manner this government should consider the reason for the loss of our markets. At the same time they should consider and set forth a policy whereby we shall retain, regain and find new markets. This government should examine the whole situation with regard to our natural resources and their potentialities in order that we may be able to increase our productivity and produce more in this nation without increasing costs of production, and thus be better able to meet competition. We must reduce the cost of production and in that way compete more favourably in the markets of the world. In that regard I think there should be a complete overhauling of taxation in this country so that it will improve the lot not only of the provinces but of the individual throughout Canada. This house and this government must give the leadership so that men and women in industry and in every profession and business will know what this government intends to do and how it intends to cope with the problems facing this nation at the present time.

What we need is a national policy and that national policy should be conveyed to the people of this country so that they realize what we are trying to do. I know that in the last 10 or 15 years this nation has enjoyed great prosperity and it is easy to coast along on the tide of that prosperity. But, with all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the prosperity we have enjoyed has not been provided by this government nor has it been provided by any single hon. member in this house. We have enjoyed that prosperity because we have, as the last hon. member who spoke pointed out, magnificent natural resources and potentialities, added to which we have a people of genius, of great inventive resource who have worked hard to turn out the products which this nation has been selling on the markets of the world.

On the other hand, the countries which have bought from us have, for various reasons, now developed their own productive capacities so that the situation is now entirely changed and we no longer find we have ready markets throughout the world. We no longer find we have places in which to sell our products and we are now forced into the open market and indeed a highly competitive market. These countries are now selling in the open market at prices with which we cannot compete, with the result that we now face a problem of unemployment while so many of those countries are enjoying total employment and renewed prosperity.

As all other hon. members in this house, I must examine the policy, or shall I say the lack of policy, of this government in the light of business conditions and unemployment in my own constituency. I have the honour to represent one of the finest constituencies—and perhaps I should say the finest constituency although other hon. members may not perhaps agree—in the whole of Canada. In the county of Halton we live in the very heart of the greatest industrial development to be witnessed in this nation, and what I have to say about the county of Halton and its needs directly or indirectly applies, I presume, to every other constituency across this country. In the past two or three years we have seen a tremendous and unprecedented development. We have, I believe I can safely say, hundreds of new industries, large, medium, and small, coming into our county, and following this we have had a great development in the construction of new homes. With the entry into our constituency of hundreds of families fine rolling areas of land there have been turned into great suburbs. Municipal governments all over the county have had to provide for this great new development by building roads, providing water and sewage facilities, and providing the schools and other facilities which are required to meet this new development. They have had to do this despite the lack of proper tax arrangements and only through which it would be possible to bear the brunt of the development which is taking place.

In this regard I wish to again emphasize to this government that what is required immediately is an entire new revaluation of the taxation system in this country so that at the federal, provincial and municipal levels we can have a more even distribution of taxation, and so that those municipalities which are responsible for and are really guiding the development of this nation at the present time will have sufficient means through taxation to carry the brunt of the development now taking place.

If that is not done the fact is that the small home owners—and not the large property owners—who have built their little homes in thousands all across the country will have to bear the brunt of the cost. At the present moment they are bearing the brunt of this tremendous and expensive development, but they cannot continue to do so indefinitely and a redistribution of taxation is now required so that the average home owner will receive assistance perhaps through the provision of additional income tax exemption which will compensate him for the extra taxation he is now paying. It must be remembered that through this industrial development a great deal of benefit will accrue in the ultimate analysis to the federal treasury of this country.

I would now like to say a word to hon. members from the western provinces and from farming communities throughout the country. We too are a great farming county and we are very proud of our record in that respect in the county of Halton. Indeed, we have the wheat king of the world, Mr. W. E. Breckon, living in that county, and last year Mr. Breckon who farms 300 fine, rich, rolling acres down in Burlington was adjudged at the royal fair to have grown the finest wheat in the world. I therefore say, with all due respect, but with a great deal of pride that I, as the representative of that county, can take my place with hon. members from most of the great western provinces in Canada.

In addition to that we are a great dairy industry county. We have one of the very finest milk producing herds in the whole of Canada. But for our farmers in that county, and indeed all across the country, there are many difficulties to be overcome, despite what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) may have said in this house, for they are now receiving less income today than they have received at any time during the last seven years. They cannot find markets for their cattle, hogs, sheep, cheese, or butter and one of the facts that we tend to lose sight of is that over two million people in this country are directly or indirectly dependent upon farming income.

That does not take into consideration the literally hundreds and thousands of men and women who derive their living supplying various needs and necessities to farmers. Over two million people in this country have had their incomes reduced. They are not able to buy the things they are accustomed to buying. In that connection it must be remembered that the average farm family, being almost an enterprise within itself, buys four times the amount bought by a family living in a city. We must remember that if the farmer does not have the income, if he does not have the purchasing power, then that very fact is going to be and is being reflected right across this country and is one of the reasons for the present unemployment.

Turning back to industry, may I say that we have many large electrical industries in my constituency making heavy equipment, and industries making small electrical wares. In every instance these industries are on short time. They are laying off men because they are unable to compete in the markets of the world. They are not even able to compete in the markets of their own country, because wares produced at a very much lower cost are coming into Canada and are being sold in our markets.

That is just one instance where we must decide what we can do along the lines of research, along the lines of bringing about greater productivity at lower cost in the industries of Canada and increasing our efficiency in order that we may be able to compete. Of course there are the textile industries, and they are in a most unhappy and unfortunate position. Everywhere in the county these textile industries, some making cotton goods and some woollen, have either closed down or are on short time. The same is true of the leather industries. They are not able to compete. The men and women who worked in these little industries have had to find work elsewhere. They have not been able to meet the mortgage payments on their homes or pay their municipal taxes. They have not been able to go to the storekeepers and buy what they used to buy.

In every part of the dominion we see the result of the loss of markets in the decrease in individual incomes. As all hon. members know, I am always asking questions about the Ford plant. I have been making remarks about the Ford strike, and have been talking about the 15 per cent tax on cars. The Ford plant in my constituency is the largest in all Canada under one roof, and in that plant are employed at the very least 2,700 men. As other hon. members will know, the loss of income to these men was felt very deeply. It has been estimated that during the strike each man lost $1,250. He has not had that money with which to pay his taxes and meet the interest on his mortgage.

Let me say here that I have talked to a good number of these men, and they tell me they have mortgages under the National Housing Act. They tell me they have not been able to meet their mortgage interest for two or three months, and the minister who is in charge of these matters should give consideration to their plight. There are 9,000 men affected in the automotive industry in Canada, and many more thousands in subsidiary industries. It is to be hoped that these men will be given an opportunity to catch up on their payments now that they have returned to work.

The foolish part of the whole thing is that the government should consider that the 15 per cent tax levied on cars should be imposed because motor cars are a luxury. That is unrealistic, improper and not in keeping with the business outlook of this nation. It is not in keeping with a proper economic outlook, and does not take into consideration conditions in this country. I want to remind every hon. member that 83 per cent of the motor cars driven on any given day in Canada are driven for necessary purposes and not as a luxury. One in 15 of all men and women employed in Canada today is employed in the automotive industry. What greater opportunity could there be for leadership on the part of the government at this time, what greater example could they set, than to announce that the 15 per cent tax on motor cars will be removed? After all, the luxury tax has been removed from mink coats and many other things which are really luxuries.

If the government want to set an example, if the government want to give leadership they should announce at once, when the automotive industry is trying to get back on its feet—an industry that is so important to this nation—that this tax will be removed. That in itself would give confidence and an impetus to the industry and would give notice to every other concern in the industrial life of the nation that the government intend to lead the way in lowering the cost of production by lowering the taxation that is being borne by industry and by individuals today. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we have come to the point of too heavy taxation and diminishing returns, and throughout the country we see the results in unemployment, loss of markets, loss of national income, indeed in the very development of the natural resources and great potentialities of our nation.

I ask the government to consider this matter and take action without delay. I ask them to give leadership so that workmen, industrialists, men and women in every walk of life right across the nation will be given ambition and a sense of responsibility.

(Translation):

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join those who have already congratulated the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I particularly wish to refer to the mover who, with wonderful rhetoric, told the house about the special culture which we receive in the province of Quebec.

(Text):

On this day I should like to recall one historical fact. On the 1st of February, 1882, there was born in the eastern townships of Quebec a man who was marked by Providence to become one of the greatest men we have known. This man today is away from our country working for the betterment of the world. He is absent from the country, but we want to tell him that not only the members on this side of the house but all members desire to wish the Prime Minister of this country a happy birthday.

[Miss Bennett (Halton).]

On January 27, after listening to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) refer once again to the question of minorities, in answer to a speech previously delivered by the hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming (Mr. Proudfoot), I decided to place my name on the list of speakers. I have noticed that many members in certain parts of this house seem to be completely lacking in any historical knowledge of this country. The subject of minorities was injected into the debate on January 12 in a speech by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) who decided that after spending a few hours in Montreal, with his super intelligence, he had seen enough to speak for the people of Quebec.

In case anyone might think I am not speaking the truth, I shall quote the hon. member's words from Hansard for January 12, page 120:

> This province—

Meaning the province of Quebec.

> —seems to be the sore spot in the matter of Canadian unity.

All these remarks seemed to be made in the name of national unity. Why did the hon. member say that Quebec was the sore spot in national unity? At the end of that paragraph he went on to say:

> We do not want to handle divorce cases in the parliament of Canada.

On the same page he said:

> . . . "What about this question of divorce?" The people of Canada are getting sick and tired of it. There is one man who can help us out of this situation and that is the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I feel that if he does not do so, he will have failed in one of his greater responsibilities.

The hon. member believed the Prime Minister should establish divorce courts for Quebec and Newfoundland. For the people of Quebec, who are mostly French Canadians and Catholics, the question of divorce is more than a question of breach of contract. We still believe there is a moral question involved of much more importance than the material question. We still believe that we were placed on this earth not only to live happily, not only to earn money, not only to earn honours but also to obtain the goal for which we have been created, eternity.

It is for this reason that we oppose divorce. In our opinion marriage is not only a civil contract but is a sacrament, and we have no right whatever to touch a sacrament. This question is not the property of the governments of this country, it is the property of those who have responsibility for the morals of the people. I am in agreement with the hon. member when he states he believes these cases are not studied fully by the Senate or the House of Commons committees.

I am in agreement with him when he states that many of the witnesses brought before those committees are fake witnesses who have built up a case that does not represent the true facts.

I recognize those facts, but there is another aspect of the matter. These hon. members do not want to study divorce cases from the province of Quebec, so I feel the only thing for them to do is to make it impossible for divorces to be granted by parliament. Then if people from Quebec want a divorce they will have to move to some other part of this country. In that way everybody will be happy. We will not have to discuss this matter any more in parliament. The people of Quebec do not want divorce courts in that province and will never accept them. We believe that this is a matter for the religious authorities, not for the civil authorities.

This hon. member went on to speak about national unity. He said, as recorded at page 121 of Hansard for January 12, 1955:

> My forecast is that when that tide turns in the province of Quebec it is going to turn mighty fast. My greatest concern is that it may turn to the communist party. I contend that there is no part of Canada that is as ripe for advances by the communist party as the province of Quebec. In the city of Montreal the communist party polled about as many votes as the C.C.F.

So far as the polling of votes is concerned, I believe that is proof that the population of Quebec is not ready for communism. If there is one party in this house that has never clearly explained its views on private property, it is the socialist party. They have never given the complete facts concerning their intentions toward private ownership, and it is for that reason that the people of Quebec are afraid of the C.C.F. party.

Furthermore, I believe that when the hon. member says Quebec is ripe for communism he completely ignores the history of that province and the principles of those living in that province. If there is one province that will stand against communism as long as there are moral values, it will be the province of Quebec. Attached as we are to our religion, which from the beginning of time has been the opponent of new doctrines that have come into the world from time to time, we will be the last to accept any ideas which even resemble communism.

This is one of the reasons the socialists are not accepted as yet in Quebec, even if they are not communists. We are afraid of their ideas. We are afraid of the way they are treating the question of national unity in this house. I really believe, Mr. Speaker, that there is no more danger of the people of other provinces turning to communism than there is in Quebec. There is always a minimum number of people who believe in trying any new thing that comes into the world, but those people do not form the majority in this country. Certainly they do, and always have, formed the minority in the province of Quebec.

What are the facts that prompt the hon. member to think in this way? It is because he believes the educational system is so poor. He said:

> The people of Quebec are suffering. They are subjected to double taxation and they are not enjoying the facilities in the field of education which they would like to have, which they ought to have and which they deserve as Canadian citizens. They are not receiving adequate health services to which they are entitled.

Mr. Speaker, in the field of education we have plenty of proof that our system is not as bad as some would have you believe. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway said, speaking to the hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming:

> May I tell the hon. member, and any other hon. member who does not know, that under our constitution in British Columbia we have a free, non-sectarian public school system.

And then again:

> Not only is our school system free and non-sectarian, it is also compulsory.

And later on:

> I have never known of a parent coming to courts in order to get a school to accept his children.

First of all he speaks about non-sectarian schools. That is exactly what we do not want to accept; and in the province of Quebec we do not want the Protestant minority to be forced to accept non-sectarian schools. We believe in the Almighty, and we believe that the most important thing in life is to get ready to go to heaven when the time comes. Even the greatest of riches in the world cannot gain us that privilege, if we have not prepared for it.

That is the reason we believe that Christian education should have its beginning in the schools. It should begin in the lowest schools, and should be kept up as long as a person goes to school. We believe there should be the same privilege for the Protestant minority; and in the province of Quebec they have and they use that right to have Christian education given the children in their schools. This is the first thing the Catholic does to prepare himself for that great voyage. And that is what we want to do, not only in Quebec but wherever we have a certain number of French Canadians or Catholics.

If the hon. gentleman had stayed in the province of Quebec long enough to make a study, he would first of all have studied the history of that province, a province which in history is the backbone of the whole country. He would have come to the conclusion that in the province of Quebec the system of education is divided into two committees. There is, first, the Catholic committee which looks after all the Catholic schools in that province. This committee is composed of bishops and an equal number of Catholic laymen who are there to study the situation. They meet three or four times a year and decide what the Catholic schools require in order to function and give moral education, as well as physical and intellectual direction.

In addition to that, and completely independent of the Catholic committee, there is the Protestant committee of education. It is composed of some of their ministers and an equal number of laymen of the Protestant faith. It is they who decide upon the training they require in their schools. The Catholics do not vote whatsoever to tell them what to do.

And, even though they are divided into two committees, the provincial government gives just as much to the Protestant schools as they need—just as much as they give to the Catholic schools. In the school system of Quebec there is no double taxation whatsoever, because the money comes from the same source, and we want to use it for the children, whether they have Protestant or Catholic parents. It is not the Catholics who decide what kind of education the pupils will get in every school in Quebec. That is something the hon. member would have learned if he had stayed more than two hours in the province.

To develop the subject a little more, let me say that in the city of Hull, on the other side of the river, 6 per cent of the population was Protestant, but with the increase in population their school was a little too crowded. They needed more space. Well, the government of Quebec has given them a good Protestant school, one which could serve as a model for any province in the Dominion of Canada. The government bought the school the Protestants had and gave it to the Catholics, who are now using it for a classical course. It is known as ecole Marie-Mediatrice.

This was given so the Protestants would have a bigger school, and at the same time it gave the smaller school to the Catholics because they were smaller in number. And this has been done throughout the province of Quebec, particularly in the eastern townships, where conditions have changed. There was one place where there was a big Protestant school, much too big for the population, and a small school for the Catholics. The Catholic population was increasing, so the government gave the small school to the Protestants and paid them the difference between what they had spent on the larger school. Then the large school was given to the Catholic population.

[Mr. Caron.]

That is the way we understand national unity in Quebec. That is why we do not like people from outside, people who have not stayed long enough to know what is going on, coming to this House of Commons or to any part of the country and making speeches in which they tell us that we are in danger of becoming communist partisans in this country of ours. Education in the province of Quebec has been given fairly to Catholics and Protestants. Lately the government in that province has given grants to universities—Laval, Montreal and McGill. And let me say that the biggest grant was given to McGill, a Protestant university, because they were in greater need than Laval or Montreal.

This is what I call fairness; this is what we call British fair play, in the true sense of the word. Is that practised throughout this country the way it is practised in Quebec? Catholics want to have their schools so they can teach the love of God from the very beginning of the school years. They do not want non-sectarian schools, in the name of national unity, and they say they give everyone the same chance. We hear of people speaking before the United Nations and in other places about the rights of man, freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of choice, freedom of all those things.

Mr. Thatcher: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Caron: Yes.

Mr. Thatcher: I think he wants to be fair. I wonder if he realizes that it was his own party that was in power in British Columbia until a year and a half ago. While I have sympathy for the viewpoint he has expressed concerning schools, I think he should realize it was his own party that has prevented that very thing.

Mr. Caron: I will admit that. But even if my own party is at fault, then my party is at fault and I admit it. Would my hon. friend do the same?

Mr. Thatcher: The hon. member has asked me a question. Speaking personally, I would not.

Mr. Caron: I am glad the hon. member realizes that sometimes we can be fair. Well, I would not accept this treatment from any party, whether it be Liberal, Conservative, C.C.F., Social Credit or anything else. It is not fair; and I claim that we need fairness everywhere; not only in the province of Quebec, but in the whole country. As they said during the French revolution, "O liberté, que de crimes on commet en ton nom!" And one might say here, "Oh, national unity, what crimes were committed in thy name."

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up too much of the time of the house. I hold in my hand clippings from English language newspapers in which citizens have been writing in favour of the province of Quebec. One of them, Mr. Arthur G. Penny, had this to say in an article which he wrote:

> Because they feel that they have too often been misrepresented unfavourably, Quebecers who have a keen self-pride, are eager to be known as they really are.

Further on he says:

> Accordingly, the columns of Concord, a French language publication, have been thrown open to the present English article, the writing of which has been entrusted to a Quebecer of English origin in the person of myself.
>
> The Quebecer is religious, imaginative, cultured and artistic.

He goes on to say:

> Other obsolete but wounding disparagements had it that Quebecers were "backward" in such matters as education and public health. Today they take second place to no other part of Canada in their attention to public health: infantile mortality has been drastically curtailed and the scourge of tuberculosis has been brought under control. The educational system was never so much inferior to as it was different from that of English Canada and the United States, being designed to serve the distinctive needs of Quebec's chosen way of life.

I should now like to refer to a social bulletin which came to my attention and which has the following heading: "French-Canadians and Confederation". The bulletin was written by Murray Ballantyne. If hon. gentlemen would read this bulletin through to the end they would learn a little more about the province of Quebec. It is a fact that once in a while we may have disagreements with our provincial government, but we have to know the background of the province of Quebec to understand them clearly. I do not agree with everything that has been done, but I have to admit that in some parts of this country the French Canadians have been treated in such a way that we have a certain reluctance to accept anything that comes from elsewhere. It may be a mistake, but we have to be clear on these questions.

I have spoken in English this afternoon because I wanted to be understood. It would be much easier for me to speak in French. I hope this will be clearly understood. In the province of Quebec we are doing everything we can to help Canadians become more friendly. I try to learn more about others. We try to listen to what they are saying and we try to understand them, but it is practically impossible for us to do so in certain parts of the country.

I do not want to accuse all members of the C.C.F. party of this, because I admit that the leader of the party seems to be a man of great knowledge, but he is like a man trying to ride a pair of broncos. He is having a great deal of trouble. I sympathize very much with the leader of the C.C.F. I sympathize also with some other people. They tell me the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is a school teacher. Well, if he teaches school in the way he tries to teach the House of Commons I really feel sorry for his pupils.

Mr. Dufresne: We have learned a lot from him anyway.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I left the province of Alberta in 1918 with my parents. After listening to the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) this afternoon, I was almost tempted to let the Alberta blood in my veins dominate to the point of going back; until of course I recalled some of the items I have been reading in the local press of Comox-Alberni about the snowdrops that are blooming out there and the spring flowers that are now coming forth, and I must confess that in spite of the eloquence of the speaker I decided that I would remain on Vancouver island. However, I shall be quite happy, if the opportunity affords itself, to accept his invitation to see Alberta celebrate its golden jubilee next summer. I did have the privilege of seeing Alberta in its greenery last summer, and also some of the other parts of the great country which the hon. member for Athabaska so eloquently described.

Consequently I have been quite interested during the session to hear some of the speeches that have been made by hon. members from the province of Newfoundland, such as the speech made last night by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten). Had they waxed as freely and as eloquently about their province and some of its problems during last session as they have this session perhaps I would not have needed to travel four thousand miles or so to realize some of the things I learned about it, or perhaps would have had a little more background prior to my arrival.

One of the phrases used by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's in his speech last night rather intrigued me. If I caught him correctly he made some reference to what he called "itinerant victims of a midsummer night's dream." Just for a moment I thought he intended to throw some bouquets in my direction. However, I quickly realized that I was in error in that assumption, and that undoubtedly he must be intending the reference to apply to that ex-Winnipegger who now sits in this house as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill).

The thought occurred to me, while he was speaking, that it would really be quite interesting if at some time the minister would tell hon. members the full story of what I will call the Bonavista gunpowder plot. I am informed on reliable authority that the surplus of gunpowder from that particular operation undoubtedly puts Bonavista among the major arsenals of democracy, and I am sure the citizens of that town could, if the necessity should arise, create quite sufficient noise to scare away any stray gunboats or submarines that might chance to roam into that part of the Atlantic ocean.

Speaking purely as an impartial observer I will say that the remarks of hon. members from Newfoundland come fairly close to expressing some of the needs of the people as I saw them there. I realize that they were exercising that delicate restraint which hon. members on the opposite side of the house always use when they are drawing the attention of the government to the fact that there are a few unsolved problems among the people back home.

Last year when we were discussing the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act I made reference to what I termed the patchwork policy which the present government adopts. Since that time summer suns have come and gone, rains have fallen and some of those patches and the fabric to which they were attached have become a little more bleached, a little more soil-worn in the course of the normal usage that has been given to government policy by the exigencies facing our economy.

From such indications as we have had so far I must say it would appear that the government is going to continue with a similar policy. I am quite willing to concede that the government is capable of some very fancy stitching when attaching the patches; in fact, by and large it is a most competent seamstress. In other words, at times some of their patches seem to be attached with what I would term rather fancy feather-stitching. Nevertheless this patchwork policy seems to be continuing, and I have been wondering why this is so.

Hon. gentlemen opposite appear to be sincere and at times intelligent, and I am rather puzzled why they appear to be content with this hit and miss type of policy. A possible explanation appears to be that the government has fallen victim to what I would term a defensive attitude; they seem to be always on the defensive. I think this would apply equally to their policy on national or international level. In doing so I suppose they are only falling in line with an attitude which appears to have become all too prevalent in what we call the western world.

From time to time I meet people who say to me rather proudly that they like to call themselves liberals with a small "l". I have been reflecting on the fact that I cannot recall having met anyone who said to me in that same proud tone of voice that he called himself a conservative with a small "c". I have come to the conclusion that probably the reason is that the people who might call themselves conservatives with a small "c" are afraid that by so doing they might be labelled Liberals with a large "L". In other words the government sitting opposite is a Conservative government regardless of its label, and has adopted a Conservative defensive sort of attitude.

I listened last Friday to the speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) in which he gave a summary of his visit to Europe and his inspection of some of the operations of the NATO forces on the continent. I have no quarrel with the minister for making the sort of speech he did. He reported to us, as is his responsibility as a minister of the crown holding the portfolio which he does. But to me that speech of his was typical of this defensive attitude. The brief reference he made to the fact that as a result of certain actions that were being taken we were shortly to have some German divisions to me seemed to indicate a certain smug satisfaction that everything was all fixed up and that was all there was to it; that we have these divisions and our defensive mechanisms are once again well in order.

Regardless of the merits or demerits of the facts he was mentioning, I submit that it is not sufficient if we tend to have that same feeling as a result of actions which are being taken at the present time in the western world. The other day I came across a publication put out by the Department of External Affairs entitled "Canada and the United Nations 1953-54". My eye caught some of the lines in the general survey which commences on page 1, and I should like to quote these words:

> Nine years ago, when the United Nations charter was drafted at San Francisco, it was hoped that the new organization might be saved from the weakness and failure of its predecessor, the league of nations, by the frank acceptance of political realities which entrusted the principal responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security to the five great powers.

Then it goes on to say:

> The realities have proved to be other than they seemed in 1945.

During the period when the United Nations charter was being drafted and signed some of us were engaged in some rather bitter political infighting with the Canadian section of the communist party at the trade union level. The political realities of 1945 seemed very much what the political realities appear to be in 1955. I recall to mind only too vividly the feeling I had in my heart in 1945, that within ten years we would be in the sort of situation we are in today. I only hope that in 1965 our Department of External Affairs will not be turning out a general survey which says that realities have proved to be other than they seemed to be in 1955. This article goes on to say:

> The unity of purpose among the designated great powers, which was a major premise of the charter, has proved to be a vain hope.

And again:

> Nevertheless, though the division of the world into two major power groupings has continued and has so far defeated our expectations that the lessons of two world wars would smooth the path to the achievement of world peace . . . the United Nations has not diminished in importance. Rather, so long as its purposes remain our purposes and so long as it continues to afford the best, indeed the only near-universal, forum for multilateral discussion and negotiation, the need to retain and safeguard its position increases rather than lessens.

I would submit, Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that from the very outset of the establishment of the United Nations and in the policies and attitudes adopted by various political groups in this and other countries of the western world it has not been recognized that if the United Nations is to have any real and practical value in the world of today then it has to be a universal forum.

The discussions that are taking place across the water today in reference to what has been termed a grave situation in the Formosa area would, it seems to me, have been carried on in a very different context if the principle that the United Nations should be a universal forum had been recognized at the outset, so that the question of the admission or otherwise of certain peoples to that forum would not have been determined by the political complexion of the governments in existence from time to time in those countries. Had that been the case we would not now be debating whether red China should or should not be invited to participate in a discussion which everyone agrees cannot be fruitful without her participation. In addition, we would not now be debating that issue had Canada and some other nations been willing to follow the lead offered by Great Britain in regard to the recognition of communist China, and followed through with her admission to a universal forum.

This defensive attitude, Mr. Speaker, is not enough. One of the lessons I learned very early in my experience in fighting the influence of communists and communism is that you do not get very far simply by calling them nasty names. We have to recognize that we cannot be content simply to be on the defensive and be pushed back all the time. We have to recognize that we have to be on the offensive and have to maintain that offensive consistently. We must never lose sight of the fact that the conflict in the world today is not one of arms or even atom bombs but a conflict of ideas for the loyalty and the hearts and minds and souls of great sections of humanity. The only way in which the western democracies are going to win this battle is by influencing the great masses of the people across the world that they recognize we have something better to offer.

I believe that is just as true in the realm of international affairs, in which I certainly do not consider myself an authority, as it is in the sort of dealings one has in a large industrial trade union. Unless you can offer leadership which is positive and dynamic and which holds forth a better program designed in the interests of those concerned, then you might as well give up the battle before you start. You might as well recognize that any sort of defences which can be devised in this context are going to prove futile and unavailing. So much, Mr. Speaker, for the defensive attitude on the international level.

What about the situation on the domestic level? The leader of this party introduced an amendment to the motion which is before us in which he suggested:

> . . . that Your Excellency's advisers have deliberately returned to the policy of uncontrolled and unplanned private enterprise...and...have failed to undertake the economic planning necessary to cope with the serious problems now facing the Canadian people.

Actually that is a very kind amendment as far as the government is concerned because it assumes that at one time the government did have some idea of adopting a positive program which would involve the necessary economic planning. I suppose it is based upon the assumption that the proposals set forth in the green book in 1945 and enunciated in the first flush of post-war enthusiasm were seriously in the mind of the government at that time. But the amendment points out what is only too evident, that since the first flush of post-war enthusiasm died away the government more and more seems to be returning to an acceptance of uncontrolled free enterprise; that more and more the sense of unity and cohesion in a common purpose which characterized the war efforts of this country has faded away; that more and more the mind of the government is influenced by those who worship at the feet of the golden calf of free enterprise. More and more they accept this propaganda which is trumpeted forth day after day in some of the great publications of this country and the country to the south and which displays—and here, Mr. Speaker, words almost fail me in attempting to describe it in parliamentary terms—an absurd preoccupation with the petty desires and ambitions of small-minded individuals which is allowed to hold sway across our whole national life. But above all, more and more, to use the colloquial phrase, the government is yielding to the pressure of those whose only concern is to make a fast buck.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when various hon. members in this and other debates mention such things as growing unemployment the matter is shrugged off. There seems to be no disposition on the part of the government to take a longer look when it comes to analysing their own figures. They are content simply to refer to a certain amount of seasonal and regional unemployment. I am no statistical authority, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure that if some of the figures I have here are wrongly interpreted by me the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) or someone else on that side will set me right. But if I read the figures correctly in September, 1953, the Canadian labour force stood at 5,398,000, and in the year that followed it grew by 85,000. Again, if I interpret the figures correctly the number of claimants on the unemployment insurance list increased in that period by 68,000. What these figures mean to me is that with an increase in the working force of 85,000 there are 68,000 claiming unemployment insurance, which means that only about 17,000, or 19·6 per cent, of the increase in the working force of Canada during the year September, 1953, to September, 1954, found opportunities for suitable employment.

I would suggest this disregards the fact that not all of the working force were in categories eligible for unemployment insurance. Therefore the figure of 19·6 per cent should actually be somewhat lower. If that is a trend it seems to me it should be a matter of serious concern, and is the sort of situation that calls for some real economic planning. It has become almost trite to suggest that during the war we had no unemployment problem in Canada. All that the C.C.F. group are proposing in their amendment, all that we have been trying to suggest, is that basically there is no more reason why people should be in the bread lines in Canada today than there was back in 1943, 1944 and 1945, and that the same kind of planning which went into the productive effort involved in prosecuting the war could very well be devoted to developing the resources of the country and the facilities that we all need.

However, I suppose it is a little futile to expect that at this stage of the debate the government is going to change its mind and recommend to its supporters that they vote for the amendment proposed by the leader of this party. Therefore I am going to be very conservative and merely attempt to suggest to the government that if they are not prepared to go along with the sort of thinking I have been suggesting, perhaps they would consider the idea of using a somewhat larger patch than they have been using heretofore.

Last year I had a resolution on the order paper the effect of which was that the government should consider the advisability of establishing a national insurance plan to cover individuals against dislocations caused by technological advances, changed marketing conditions and other related causes. In listening to this debate I have heard hon. members mention the problems now being faced by the producers of cheese. Some time ago I heard the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) tell us the story of what is happening to the coal mining town of Nordegg. I also received a brief from the fisheries council of British Columbia putting forward a certain position with respect to an increase in the tariff on wool fabrics, inasmuch as they recognize that such a move will be in conflict with their own economic interests. As a result I became more and more convinced that this is the kind of patch the government could very well accept. In other words, if I were to launch into oratorical tones I would say that what this country needs is bigger and better patches.

I of course recognize that even though I say I am speaking conservatively, with a small "c", the government may well say that this is just another of these wild-eyed socialists over here holding forth. I thought perhaps I might be able to impress my point a little more effectively if I went to a more conservative source to support the suggestion I have been making. I have in my hand a copy of a bill introduced in the Senate of the United States last year, known as bill S.3650. The bill was introduced on June 22, 1954, and was also introduced in the House of Representatives as bill H.R.9652. The bill was introduced in the Senate by Mr. Kennedy. I do not know the gentleman, but I know enough about the political situation in the United States to realize that he is certainly not of my political persuasion. The purpose of the bill is defined as follows:

A bill to provide assistance to communities, industries, business enterprises, and individuals to facilitate adjustments made necessary by the trade policy of the United States.

The purpose is further defined in section 2 as follows:

(a) It is recognized that the maintenance of a sound domestic economy and healthy international relations requires that the United States engage in trade among the free nations of the world. Further the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of 1934 reflects the congressional desire that the President be authorized to negotiate with the other countries of the world with a view to lowering trade barriers. The Congress has also recognized in enacting the peril point and escape clause provisions of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951, that there are situations in which the reduction of trade barriers, although redounding to the benefit of the nation as a whole, may have serious adverse effects on particular domestic industries. These provisions provide mechanisms for determining at what point reductions in trade barriers, either in prospect or already accomplished, will have such adverse effects. They provide no method by which greater prosperity and security for the nation as a whole can be secured by the reduction of trade barriers, while avoiding or ameliorating the economic losses which particular communities, industries, enterprises, and individuals may suffer in the adjustment of their productive activities which may be made necessary by such reduction. It is the purpose of this act to resolve this problem by providing assistance to communities, industries, enterprises, and individuals in the adjustment of their productive activity to the economic conditions created by the national trade policy. It is not the purpose of this act to provide a permanent subsidy, but rather to provide the means by which those affected by lowered trade barriers may be assisted in the period of their adjustment.

(b) It is the intention of Congress that, in determining eligibility for the assistance provided for under this act, the act shall be construed liberally and that any doubt regarding eligibility shall be resolved in favour of the applicant.

Section 3 says:

The president shall appoint a five-member board to be known as the trade adjustment board . . . appointed from among the officers and employees of the executive branch of the government and shall serve without compensation in addition to that otherwise received as officials or employees in the executive branch . . .

Then later on, in section 5(b), it says:

After the notification by the president provided for above, the board shall, upon application by any community, industrial development corporation, business enterprise, employee or organization representing employees, determine whether the applicant is eligible, or represents persons eligible, to receive the benefits provided for in this act.

In making this suggestion, Mr. Speaker, I feel that at least in principle it has the approval of a certain body of thought in the United States where, as speakers are often fond of saying, the economy and conditions are in many ways parallel to our own. Certainly the principle set forth in this bill introduced into the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States presents food for thought. It is a policy that might be adopted by the government of Canada to get away from dealing with some of these problems, as they have in the past, in little bits and pieces.

I might further suggest that if the government does not consider the Senate of the United States to be a sufficiently sound and conservative source from which to take this sort of idea, it is reported that in Spain, where most of us consider they have a fairly conservative government, plans have recently been introduced for a somewhat similar scheme to be carried on in conjunction with the unemployment insurance plan.

So, Mr. Speaker, in supporting the amendment which is being introduced by the leader of this party—and as I have already stated, without too much hope that the supporters of the government are going to change their minds and endorse it wholeheartedly—I would suggest that in the proposal set forth in this bill I have mentioned there is at least an idea which could lead the government to a more effective method of dealing with some of the problems that have been raised by the members during this debate, even within the framework of their own announced adherence to that grand and glorious system of free enterprise.

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): In taking part in the debate on the speech from the throne I should like first to welcome and congratulate the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. All hon. members will agree that they performed their task in the fine manner to which we have become accustomed, continuing the tradition to which we look with expectation at each opening of parliament.

As a member of parliament and one who is intensely proud of the British Empire, I feel I should pay my respects to that great statesman, Sir Anthony Eden, for the honour he has brought to the commonwealth. As a Canadian, and particularly as a veteran, I shared with most citizens of this country the deep concern which all of us felt at the breakdown of the European defence community arrangement. I am sure I am expressing the feelings of most Canadians when I say that Sir Anthony Eden was primarily responsible for the happy conclusion that has eventually been reached with regard to the relationships of the free nations in western Europe and the North American continent. His knighthood was a fitting tribute, and was approved by all free people regardless of national background. The new agreement which he sponsored recognizing Germany is possibly the most important event that has taken place since the last session of parliament.

Another important event taking place is the meeting at Geneva on the general agreement on tariffs and trade, which everyone has learned to recognize as GATT. Our representative, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), should be commended for the job he did during the opening sessions in trying to promote trade. Everyone knows that next to Great Britain, Canada has the largest export problem of any of the important trading nations. In 1953 our gross national productivity was $24·3 billion. We exported $4·1 billion or 16·9 per cent of our production. In 1954 our gross national productivity was $23·9 billion. We exported $3·9 billion or 16·3 per cent of our production. Thus we see that the decline of ·6 per cent in export trade was felt right across the nation, causing a slight decline in employment.

Let us compare our exports with those of that great self-contained nation to our south. In 1953 they exported 4·3 per cent of their gross national productivity. Thus in order for us to live and maintain our high economy, external trade is almost four times as important to us as it is to the people of the United States. It is no wonder that the minister says our welfare depends on our ability to trade, and that he is out making agreements to stimulate that trade.

The farmers of this country have always recognized the value of freer trade. A great deal of the food they produce has to be exported at prices competitive with other countries. Thus they have always approved this government's policy of allowing them to buy commodities necessary for the agricultural industry, free of tariffs. They should view with alarm anyone who does not support this policy or who is being critical of it, because it represents their very lifeblood. The labouring people of this country should stop and think about who buys the commodities which they produce. About 83·7 per cent of the national production of this country is used in Canada. Since the farming section uses one-third of that, they need to make every effort to see that this home market is not disturbed or unemployment might follow.

Then, too, we should remember that Canada is a growing country and trade is our lifeblood. I can remember when the United States had a population of only 65 million, at which time our population was 7·5 million. Today the population of the United States has been increased by 100 million and ours has been doubled. Everyone agrees that our natural resources are comparable to theirs, and that today we are facing a growth similar to that which the United States experienced 40 years ago. Unless we make mistakes our people have every right to expect a long period of opportunity. We are indebted to our Minister of Trade and Commerce for the effort he is making to ensure that this will happen.

It has been suggested by the opposition that we should be processing more of our natural resources before they are exported. If this could be done it would mean more employment, and that is a policy with which I could not agree more. Let us look to the record on this matter to see what the Liberal party has done and is doing to bring this about.

In 1953, 32 per cent of everything we exported went out as raw materials. The best example of this would be wheat. Everyone knows how difficult it would be to export bread, which would be one example of a manufactured product of wheat. The transportation and handling charges would be prohibitive. Twenty-nine per cent went out in semi-manufactured form, including paper, nickel, copper and the like. In this field we can show marked improvement, if we have the capital investment to build the plants to process these materials. The largest proportion of our exports, 39 per cent, was fully manufactured. That is not a bad record for a country which has doubled its national productivity in the last seven years. No other country in the world can boast of such a record. Let us continue to make every effort to increase our trade, which is an effective means of increasing employment.

Let us take a look for just a moment, Mr. Speaker, at how this wonderful record has been built up. The Liberal government's sound fiscal policy of a balanced budget during the prosperous years since the war has attracted to this country large capital investments. The larger these investments are, the more we will process our exports before they leave this country, because this supplies the means for the processing. Everyone will agree that by balancing our budget and by showing a sound business policy to the world we have encouraged foreign and Canadian capital to be invested in Canada, which in time will help us to decrease more and more the percentage of raw materials exported. This will aid in employment and help to keep our workers busy.

In the remainder of this speech I wish to turn attention to my own riding, Mr. Speaker. I would deal for just a moment with the housing situation in Canada. Ever since I entered this parliament in 1949 I have supported and encouraged our government policy of assisting the building of homes. This has been one of the major post-war problems we have had to face. I think it is now time, however, to take a second look at the situation before we promote the building of so many houses that they will become a glut on the market. It is possible that areas like Toronto, Hamilton and Ottawa may still be short of houses. If this is the case, then we should make every effort to assist in providing our citizens with the opportunity to own their own homes in any crowded area, if they have the facilities to purchase them. There are other areas where so many houses have been built that we are close to the saturation point.

Since I have been watching this situation very closely in my riding, I was amazed to learn of the recommendations which have been made by the provincial government to the dominion government with regard to the purchase of land in my riding on which could be built some 600 houses, as a government project. I would like through you, Mr. Speaker, to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) to give a great deal of consideration to the position into which Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation might get our government. I understand it is to be one of those projects arranged between the province and the city, in which the federal government pays 75 per cent of the cost, the province 17½ per cent and the municipality 7½ per cent, and managed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

We have one of these projects in Guelph now, known as Green Acres. Let us look at it for a moment. In 1951 we bought 273 lots, built houses on 70, and have offered for sale the remainder, most of which have been bought by contractors. By January 1 of this year only three houses had been built on these spare lots, though permits have been taken out to build houses on some 20 of the 200 remaining.

At that time I promoted and assisted in every way possible the completion of this project because I thought it was necessary. I think today it is time to take a second look before we embark upon another project of this kind, for two reasons. 1. Do we need 600 additional houses, most of which would be outside the city limits? 2. The people of Ontario will expect us to look carefully into any recommendations by the provincial government after their experience with road scandals. You know, Mr. Speaker, the provincial government of Ontario has had unfortunate incidents occur which would tend to undermine the public's confidence in their judgment and the honesty of their operations. I would ask the minister to look into every recommendation by that government with the greatest of care.

I wish to thank the minister for calling to my attention the fact that the government of Ontario had recommended that we buy 165 acres of land, of which only approximately 65 acres are within the city limits of Guelph.

I should mention now that the city of Guelph found it necessary to double its size two years ago. When they made this expansion they took in hundreds of acres which are not built upon, leaving many fields within the city limits for future expansion. Now we have the provincial government recommending that we go out into the township again, which of necessity would cause the city to expropriate further land in order to service this property for a future housing development. Surely that is not necessary, with all this space available for building. I am informed by the city engineer that there are at least 2,000 vacant lots within the city limits which the city is prepared to service if and when it is necessary.

Let us look further into this deal. The province recommends to us that we jointly purchase this farm land—most of which is outside the city—at $650 an acre, or at a total price of some $107,000. I took the trouble to find in the registry office some information about this farm. It has been bought and sold several times, and the last sale price recorded in the registry office was at $17,500, in 1948.

Mr. Speaker, I would not expect the people of my riding who pay taxes ever to allow me to return to this house as their representative if without protest I permitted this type of operation to take place in that area. We happen to be blessed in my riding with the finest type of honest citizens to be found anywhere in Canada. Their principles are such that they would not condone this squandering of money in such a fashion. Certainly we want houses, but we want them built in an honest and proper way.

I would suggest to the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that if this is a typical example of the methods of the provincial government in recommending housing programs to our government, we look with the greatest of care into every recommendation of theirs. I would never want it to be said that the dominion government had any part in such squandering of the taxpayers' money. I would not want it to be said that the dominion government was legally correct, but that its dealings were not ethical. Mr. Speaker, through you I would recommend to the minister that before any agreement is made with the province, this project be held in abeyance until representatives of the city and our government, and I, can look into all the details.

I was particularly interested last year, Mr. Speaker, to hear from our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that he was considering setting up a Canada Council for the arts, letters and sciences as recommended in the Massey report. I was disappointed at the conclusion of the speech from the throne to realize that inadvertently it had been omitted and was not among the proposed legislation. I trust that this omission will soon be corrected by a suitable government bill.

When this bill is introduced I would like to recommend to this house a most suitable member for that council. Everyone knows that my riding is the home of a Canadian who has brought great honour to Canada in the cultural field. I refer to Dr. Edward Johnson, who not only has been outstanding as a singer with the Metropolitan Opera Company, but who also has had the business ability to act as general manager for that company. It should also be remembered that he holds an executive position at Toronto university, in the Royal Conservatory of Music. Thus in Dr. Johnson we have an outstanding citizen with both a cultural and executive background, and I am certain he would be willing to give further of his efforts in any position which would benefit Canada's cultural growth.

This appointment would be very well received by citizens of the royal city for two reasons: one, he is a native son; two, he is now, in conjunction with a patriotic group of citizens, promoting the establishment of a civic symphony and choral group in Guelph. Canadians need to be encouraged to take part in cultural activities, and the proposed Canada Council would give leadership in this direction.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, through you, I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Public Works the need for a new public building in Guelph. As I have said before, the city doubled its size two years ago. This was necessary because during the last few years we have been one of the fastest growing cities in Canada. Guelph literally burst at the seams, and this situation is carried over to our public buildings. We now have offices in four separate buildings in the city, which is not a very efficient way to carry out the dominion government's work.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister to look into the economies which would be effected by such a new building; and I know, now that this situation has been brought to his attention, that as soon as the money is available we will have the building in Guelph which is so badly needed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Hosking: Mr. Speaker, I have just one more point which I felt should be made and which I did not have time to make before the house adjourned for dinner. The whip of our party has suggested that we on this side of the house should limit our speeches to something under 20 minutes. As I treat his wishes as I treated those of my colonel, as a command, I shall try to conclude my speech in the next few minutes.

I should like to say, through you, to the members of this house and to all citizens of Canada that all the opposition parties have done great damage to the farmers of this country through the lengthy questions and debate in connection with the butter situation. Throughout the country among those who buy butter the feeling has been created that our country is loaded down with stale butter. By their continual harping on this question I am certain many people have been led to believe that it would be better if they did not buy butter at this time.

I can remember, when the foot-and-mouth disease was being discussed in this house, going home and finding that for the first time since I was married we did not have a roast of beef on the table for our Sunday dinner. I just could not believe it, because I knew my wife felt that at a Sunday dinner we should have a choice cut of beef. We had a nice roast of pork, and I jokingly asked what was wrong with beef. My wife replied that with all the talk of foot-and-mouth disease she did not think we should be eating beef. I laughed and said, "You know that pork has the same trouble as beef with regard to foot-and-mouth disease." When I came home at the end of the following week after there had been a further debate in this house I found that we were having chicken for dinner.

I do not think my wife is different from any other housewife in the country. If she was influenced by the controversy that went on in this house regarding an agricultural product, then I think great damage is being done to our farmers by the present controversy over butter sales that is going on at this time. I should like to suggest through you to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that he make a statement to the house that we have the finest butter for sale, that it is in excellent condition, that we will have no stale butter to put on the market. We will then have the public of this country buying the best food they possibly can buy.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): Mr. Speaker, like all other hon. members who have taken part in this debate I wish to congratulate not only the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, but all those who have taken part in this debate. I think it is the privilege and duty of every hon. member who feels he has something to contribute to get up and make a speech.

I represent perhaps the best riding in Canada. The people of my riding are certainly the most intelligent in Canada. I rise tonight to make a personal protest against the importation of New Zealand cheese at a time when we have a surplus in Canada. I make this protest because of the pressure which has been brought to bear on me by my constituents, and the cheese producers and dairymen in my county. They have expressed dissatisfaction at the importation of cheese at a time when we have a surplus of 10 million pounds or more.

The cheese producers of Canada deserve better treatment from the government. During the past two years they have done their best to help themselves. They have relieved the government of the necessity of paying a subsidy on their product. They set up the necessary machinery to look after the sale of their product. Now they feel that the government has let them down. If this cheap New Zealand cheese was going to benefit the consumers of Canada it would not look so bad, but such is not the case. The processors who are importing this cheese are the only people who will receive any benefit. I understand that this cheese will be sold not as New Zealand cheese but as processed cheese, and at a straight profit of 5 cents per pound over Canadian cheese. Five cents per pound for 2·25 million pounds amounts to $110,000 which is a sizeable benefit for one organization.

One wonders sometimes where the nigger is in the woodpile. Farmers, especially dairymen who have tried to assume responsibility for their product by taking it out of the government's hands and doing a better job than the government in getting rid of their surpluses, now find that a quantity of cheese is being imported to disrupt the Canadian market. We just do not understand these things; we do not know what are the answers.

The farmer sometimes gets blamed for the high cost of food, but he is not responsible for the spread between the price he receives and what the consumer pays. Take eggs as an example. The government put a floor of 38 cents under eggs not so long ago, but what do we find? We find the farmer getting 26 to 28 cents for his eggs. If we are going to have a floor price why not give the benefit to the producer rather than to the retailer, or the middleman who steps in and takes all the profit out of it? If the government are going to interfere they should interfere right down the line and see that the producer gets his fair share of the price his eggs bring on the market.

Prices of farm products have dropped 13 per cent over the past two years on the overall cash production, with the price of some articles dropping as much as 40 per cent. Yet we find that the prices of the necessary things the farmer has to buy have gone up. I know of no government which can balance an economy with one important group of the population being imposed upon. I contend that the responsibility of the government is to find a remedy. Just the other day a carload of lamb was dumped on the Canadian market. Perhaps these things cannot be avoided; but when our farmers are getting such a small proportion of the national income, much less than is rightly theirs, I think it is time the government took some steps to protect their industry. It is not protecting their industry by permitting the dumping of quantities of food on our market when we cannot get rid of what we have.

I should like for a few minutes to refer to the great loss of life and property through "Hurricane Hazel". We all felt very sorry for those who suffered loss and destruction, but there were other parts of the country where loss was sustained through storm and wet weather. The bean growers of my county lost many thousands of dollars because they were not able to harvest their beans. Losses as high as $10,000 were incurred by single farmers, yet you did not hear very much about it. "Hurricane Hazel" hit certain portions of the country and damaged property, but it also showered rain on a great part of western Ontario. The land was so wet all fall that people were unable to harvest their crops. Many growers in my part of the country never got in their beans at all. Some were earlier and were more fortunate in getting some of them off, but in many places the beans were never harvested. We did not hear very much about it; we heard little complaint.

The losses they suffered were almost unbearable. They lost not only the crop but the cost of planting and cultivating it prior to harvesting. In many places this almost ruined some of the younger farmers who had just started up. The older men who have been in business for some years do not perhaps deserve the same degree of pity, but the younger men do not quite know what to do with themselves. They cannot meet their responsibilities, and the fact is that they will have to wait a full year before they can redeem themselves. They have not asked for government support nor do they expect any, but in many places there was as much loss, apart from loss of life, as was suffered during "Hurricane Hazel".

Much has been said about the question of unemployment, and I believe a great deal of that must be the responsibility of the government. Two years ago I drew the attention of the then minister of citizenship and immigration to the fact that a great number of immigrants were coming into this country who were supposed to work on farms, but after they arrived here they stayed a short time on the farms before migrating into industry in the towns and cities of this country. The farmers could have employed that labour and would, but for certain reasons, still be able to do so.

I emphasize the fact that those fellows had no intention of staying on the land. According to regulations they were supposed to remain on the land for 12 months after their arrival in Canada, but some stayed less than two weeks. It is my contention that if the policy had been changed and the regulation had specified that these immigrants would have to stay on the land two or three years, then many who did not intend to work on the farm at all would never have come here in the first place. Then we would not now have them on relief.

The government also could have helped to avoid the present unemployment situation by insisting that no one be allowed here unless he or she had a job. This, combined with firmer regulations as regards the land, might well have resulted in thousands upon thousands of farmers being able to absorb a greater labour force. The fact that the farmer is not getting his fair share of the national income and is not getting sufficient for his products has meant that he has been priced out of the labour market and cannot afford to employ assistance at the prevailing rates of wages. The result has been that the farmers have been compelled to carry on without that much-needed assistance and some of them, 60 years of age and over, are trying to farm 100 acres of land without assistance.

It seems to me regrettable that in a country where there are thousands of unemployed the farmers cannot get any help. Some might ask themselves why they should go to work on the land for 12 or 15 hours a day when they could work in industry for $1.50 or $2 an hour, and they may have some justification for doing so. But after all, if they have no jobs the money stops coming in, and they start getting hungry. Then I think they will find that working on the land is not quite so bad after all. As I have already said, farmers could absorb thousands of these men providing they could be hired at reasonable rates of pay.

High taxation is another reason we have so much unemployment. This government has taxed industrialists out of business in some places, for their taxes are so high they have no cushion left to enable them to keep men employed in industry for any reasonable length of time, with the result that these men are added to the growing number of unemployed. If taxes were not so high and industrialists were allowed to accumulate some surplus for a rainy day I think we would find that many of these men would be kept at work. The fact that they are not is again the fault of the government.

The government must also take responsibility for high wages. I can remember, as no doubt most hon. members can, that when the war broke out we drafted men into the army at $1.29 a day. But when munitions plants were set up and started working at full blast the government found they had to assist in the running of such plants, and advertised for men at twice or three times the pay the soldier was receiving, instead of drafting them into the plants as other men were drafted into the forces. This policy started the spiral of high wages which has been continued ever since, until we now find ourselves in a very difficult situation. That is another reason we have unemployment. I might say in all fairness that when everything goes well the government is fine, but when everything goes in reverse the government gets the blame, and sometimes they deserve it.

Before closing I want to express the hope that when the government submits amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act, designed to raise the basic rates as well as the ceiling of permissible income of recipients of allowances, these men will receive not less than the Canadian Legion has requested from time to time over the past few years. In my opinion ex-servicemen are fine citizens, and should receive much more consideration than they have in the past. I for one hope that this time they will be properly looked after.

Mr. H. P. Mang (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, in rising to offer a few words in this debate I am quite conscious that we are nearing its close and that therefore if I should attempt to use all the notes I have in front of me it would be a very fine method of becoming unpopular in this house. Not that I want to become popular, but I have some respect for your listening powers; therefore I am not going to tax them for any length of time.

Before making my few remarks I think I would be lacking in courtesy if I did not extend congratulations to the newly-elected members of this house. In particular I want to congratulate the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I wish to do so for a particular reason and not merely as a matter of courtesy, for I think I should express my personal satisfaction at the prospect of sitting in the company of two such fine gentlemen on this side of the house.

I seemed to sense in their remarks that they were sitting on this side of the house for certain reasons having to do with the principles underlying the party which they represent. After all it is the principles upon which a party is built that are the important things. It is not the party that is the most important thing in our political set-up, but the principles upon which that party is built. The political party is merely the instrument through which certain principles are applied to the conduct of the affairs of the country. I congratulate them most warmly because I feel that they are men who will help to make the Liberal party live for a long time and be the government of this country for quite some time to come.

As this will be, I think, the only appropriate opportunity to tell the house something about the constituency of Qu'Appelle, perhaps I may tax your patience for a few moments while I introduce you to that pioneer constituency of Saskatchewan. It extends from the city of Regina to the Manitoba boundary south of the beautiful Qu'Appelle valley, and comprises some 6 million acres with a population of about 40,000. Through it runs the original line of the Canadian Pacific Railway and also the trans-Canada highway. Because it is the area where the first main line across Canada, that of the C.P.R., was built, it is the pioneer agricultural area of the province. The first large-scale shipments out of that area were made from the town of Indian Head in Qu'Appelle constituency.

Because of the location of the C.P.R. the first settlers were those who pushed into that wheat-growing country from Manitoba, but later came the pioneers from Ontario. We have a great many MacPhersons, Macdonalds and MacDougalls, all kinds of "Macs", along that line, and Saskatchewan had its beginnings in that particular area. After the region around the main line was settled as a result of the building of the railroad the great immigration policy, so dramatically dealt with this afternoon by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene), resulted in a great flood of immigrants in the seventies, eighties and nineties settling some 20, 30, 40 and even 50 miles from the main line. They came from all over Europe. We have Scandinavians. There is a place called New Finland. We have people from southeastern Europe, a great many from the Volga river basin in Russia, people from Hungary and practically every part of Europe.

At this point I want to give voice to a sentiment which I have often hoped I would be able to express. With this great influx of people from all parts of Europe the greatest Canadianizing influence was derived not from the laws of the country or the different political set-up here, but from the Canadianism taught them by the pioneers from Ontario who had settled along the main line. They accepted them and called them by name, sometimes "Big Jim" or "Black Joe" and so on because the European names were unpronounceable. They learned from this British stock what it meant to be a Canadian. From the way the implement dealer dealt with those people, giving them a good or a bad deal, they learned how life in Canada would be of benefit to them.

Qu'Appelle is also a constituency which has had its celebrities. It is the birthplace of General McNaughton, the great scientist and soldier. He was born at Moosomin, where his father's store is still in operation. The first native-born lieutenant governor of the province of Saskatchewan, Lieutenant Governor Patterson, was also born in Qu'Appelle constituency. We also have Father Murray's Notre Dame college south of Regina, which has become internationally known. I could name many more people. We have had our Olympic champions and have produced other personalities. Perhaps some of you will remember that the constituency was at one time represented by the late Ernie Perley who for so many years sat as Conservative member for Qu'Appelle in this house, and a grand fighter for the west he was.

Then too we have some 18 branches of the Legion. Last year I was privileged to attend the opening of the armouries in the town of Grenfell by the Hon. Brooke Claxton, then minister of national defence, and we were told then that the town of Grenfell holds the record for the greatest percentage of voluntary enlistments in all wars since the Boer war. It had the greatest percentage of voluntary enlistments in the Boer war, the first world war and the second world war. The town is therefore most deserving of the armouries, and we want to express our appreciation to the department for assisting in the construction of that building.

Farming conditions last year in that great cattle and grain producing area were not good. We were hit by rust, as were other portions of the province. Where the year before we had 20, 30, 40 or 50 bushels to the acre, this year we had 2, 3, 4, or 5. In the eastern part of the constituency there was a very poor crop. A good deal of the land was flooded out after some 40 inches of rain, something that is almost inconceivable on the prairies.

Conditions are not too good. We have in that area—and I mention this for a particular reason—a drainage problem with which we hope the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who has control of P.F.R.A., will assist us. The precipitation was so great there this year that water which should have drained into the Pipestone river to the south actually changed its course and flowed into the Qu'Appelle river to the north. This resulted in the flooding of municipal roads and many thousands of acres of land in that area.

As the member for Qu'Appelle I do want to express our appreciation of the work done under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act under the direction of the Minister of Agriculture and Dr. Thomson. Last year a dam was completed on the Pipestone river which will create a lake some nine miles long. This will help with the drainage problems and alleviate the flooding in the Souris valley. It will provide also a water level for the many wells that this stock-producing area needs so much. We want to express our appreciation for that undertaking. I hope that next summer when some of you go along the trans-Canada highway you will stop off at Moosomin, go nine miles south and see some of the work the P.F.R.A. is doing in the west.

The speech from the throne contains many features, most of which have been dealt with rather thoroughly. I find that some people have dealt with features which they claimed were not in that speech. However, it is only to be expected that there would be differences of opinion expressed in this house. What interested me particularly in the speech from the throne was the recognition of the definite influence the western economy has upon the national economy as a whole. The total production of the country this year has suffered in proportion to the smaller crop in western Canada. This reflects to a definite degree the important place of the west in our national economy.

[Mr. Mang.]

I have noticed that not only in this house but throughout the country there is a tendency to assess an immediate situation without regard for the past. Whether it be in connection with wheat sales, wheat production, production in other lines of Canadian endeavour or the problem of unemployment, we do not take account of what has gone before. Mr. Wes Ball, who is vice-president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, made what I thought was a very significant statement when he said that Canadians have a habit of never thinking back beyond twelve months in assessing a situation. I know that last year a great deal of time was spent, and more time might be spent this year, emphasizing the wheat surplus.

This year we have not heard quite so much about it. Discussion has centred more around the lack of cash in the west, and the unemployment problem. It is well, however, to keep Mr. Ball's statement in mind because no proper plans for the future can be made unless we take account of the past in assessing the situation at the moment.

In connection with the wheat surplus of last year there is something I ought to mention. It has not been mentioned in this house, and perhaps I should have drawn it to the attention of hon. members, but being of a timid nature, one who would sooner listen than speak, I was too diffident to do so. This illustrates what I mean. One would have thought, from listening to the discussions we had last year, that the wheat surpluses were something new. When you look at the story of wheat surpluses you find it most fascinating. For example, you find that within the last 30 years our wheat surpluses have followed a very regular pattern. The first great surplus of recent years was in 1933. The next huge wheat surplus, and this was the largest on world markets, was in 1943, ten years later. The next huge wheat surplus was in 1953. I am speaking of the wheat going into international markets.

We find these figures fascinating because they have a recurring pattern. The surpluses have not always occurred for the same reason. In 1933 it was because of the depression; in 1943 there was a disturbed economic condition because of the war, and in 1953 it was largely due to huge crops. These facts merely serve to emphasize the importance of assessing the whole situation when attempting to make some plans for the future. These surpluses have always disappeared, and they are going to disappear again. Probably they will rise again and fall again.

In my opinion that is an illustration of what happens in our economy. If one listened to some of the speeches, as well as some of the talk out in the country, one would think that progress was something that went on continuously from year to year. We know, in our own personal lives, that sometimes we feel fine and other times we do not feel so well. This is true in the economic life of the country as well.

If we look over the period of years so aptly described and so dramatically presented by one of the hon. members from Alberta, we find that progress is not sudden; it is gradual. No situation remains static for all time. We are experiencing situations which the policies of this government will regulate and are regulating at the present time. Naturally throughout the country differences of opinion are expressed but, in the main, a policy is being followed that is going to have no other result but an upward trend.

The twin problems of markets and employment have been stressed over and over again. Many suggestions have been put forward as to how to deal with the situation, but there is one thing we must bear in mind in assessing the unemployment situation or the world market situation. That is that no one factor in our economy is responsible for the conditions we may be experiencing at any particular time. If we look back over the past ten years we realize that during that period we have enjoyed a higher standard of living than we had before. Today our unemployment problem is tied very definitely to the problem of selling the goods we are making. It is also tied to the recovery of the nations of the world from the last war.

It is well recognized that during the war the economies of European countries were smashed. Physically, economically and from a monetary standpoint those countries were destroyed. We on this side of the Atlantic kept our whole production machinery intact, and after the war was over a great many of those nations had to be helped in their recovery. We in the United States and Canada had piled up our production machinery and, immediately after the war, this was geared to the reconstruction of Europe.

It is important to note that during this time we were continuing to fill the needs of the economic vacuum that had developed, for the reasons I have mentioned, and at the same time we were supplying the hungry home market. Consequently we were kept busy in our economy, and developed a standard of living which was quite out of line with that common on the other side of the Atlantic.

As soon as recovery began to take place, and Europe was setting its house in order, we found that not only were those nations beginning to supply their own needs but they were also beginning to encroach upon the markets of the world. Inasmuch as they had not become used to our standard of living, the wages their workers were willing to accept were on a much lower scale than the wage schedules of this country.

Our problem today is to try to keep on the world market and remain competitive in a situation where the goods of our competitors can be produced and delivered to the market at a lower rate than we are able to offer. I hold in my hand an illustration of what I am attempting to show. This is a memorandum from the Canadian shipbuilding and ship repairing association, and with it I shall attempt to bring out the point that Canadian workers are competing with lower wage rates in countries producing goods for markets in which we must be competitive. It says:

> A British shipyard worker receives an average hourly wage of approximately 60 cents whereas a Canadian shipyard worker gets an average hourly wage of $1.50. A British sailor employed on a British-registered vessel engaged in Canadian coastal trade receives a bonus equivalent to £6 a month over and above his basic monthly wage of $70, making his monthly pay $87, as compared with a Canadian seaman who is paid $204 a month.

One could quote many examples to show this difference in wage rates. Our problem is that of finding out how we can meet wage rates of that kind and remain competitive in the world market. We have built up a very high-cost economy as well as a high standard of living, and I am not saying we should lower it. But we are also faced with the fact that we must remain in world markets. How to reconcile the two is a matter that is being considered by large numbers of people in this country and by some political parties, who seem to feel that it is the sole responsibility of the government. Certainly a number of delegations have urged this view.

Last Thursday the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) offered this quotation from the green book of 1945:

> Success in the attainment of high levels of employment, increased welfare and security, is dependent upon the fruitful co-operation between all governments and groups in the country.

I suggest that the words "and groups in the country" are just as important as those having reference to governments. Who are these groups? Well, they are farmers, workers, investors and managers, to name only a few. I have always been puzzled by the fact that as soon as something goes wrong with any industry, whether it be the textile industry or any other—and we can include farming, if you like—it comes to the government asking for a solution of its problems. Yet the green book stated in 1945 that the entire responsibility could not be placed upon the government, but rather that all these groups must accept a share of it.

What do we see today? In western Canada, as well as other parts of the country, agriculture is being asked to reduce its wages. Let us keep in mind that we from western Canada have had to take a reduction in the price of our wheat, not because we wanted to but because we had to if we were going to trade in the highly competitive markets of the world.

On the other hand what do we see in respect of labour? In this evening's paper I see where a group is asking for more wages and shorter hours, and with greater benefits all the way around. How the agricultural community in this country can stay in business in the face of the high wages received by those who build their combines, motorcars, trucks and their other machinery of production, it is difficult to see. I believe these other groups to whom I have referred will have to do some very hard thinking on their own. It is not just a matter of coming to the government and saying, "Here is our problem; you solve it."

I do not know how many more Ford cars and trucks are going to be sold in western Canada as a result of the wage rates obtained recently. But the fact remains that while the rate of agricultural income has been going down—and some people say it has decreased as much as 12 per cent in the last few years—the production costs of certain industrial concerns has been going up. As a matter of fact a few business combines have been disclosed—and I am not now referring to the combine used in harvesting grain. The situation disclosed demands the full co-operation and consideration of all.

Last winter I received a delegation from the farm machinery association; and when discussing the matter they tried to make the point to me, a western farmer, that if we would only be satisfied with lower prices for our wheat and other grains we would be able to sell more of them and thus obtain more money to buy their machinery. I said, "Well, how can this thing work if you are constantly asking for more and we are supposed to take less for our grain?"

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Will the hon. member give the name of the petitioners who made the request to him that western farmers take a smaller net return for their grain? Will he name the labour union that he said represented the workers—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

[Mr. Mang.]

Mr. Mang: It was a point that came up in the discussion. I do not just remember the names.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): It is not right.

Mr. Mang: Well, I would not say that. I can check it. I will talk it over with the hon. gentleman because, among other things, I think I can straighten him out in his thinking in that regard.

Mr. Noseworthy: You made the charge. Substantiate it.

Mr. Mang: I shall look it up; I shall get the details, but it came out of the discussion. It may not have been a responsible individual, but the idea was—.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): You are wrong.

Mr. Mang: You say I am wrong; I say I am right. The idea was that we should sell our grain so that they would be able to sell more of their machinery. It cannot be denied that in western Canada today we are short of cash. A lot of other people in other parts of Canada are also short of cash, but that does not mean the western farmer is broke. We have grown billions of bushels of grain. For that grain we have received billions of dollars. What have we done with them? We have paid off mortgages; we have improved our farms; we have bought combines, cars, trucks and we have even gone into rural electrification. When you ask "Where is all your money?" I reply that a great part of it is in Oshawa, in Windsor, in Toronto, in Montreal and in Hamilton. I am not saying that it should not be there, because those people were good enough to make for us all those assets that we now have on our farms.

These things should be kept in mind. I am not expressing it adequately, I know, but you can charge that up to my inexperience. The point I am trying to make is that we should not in this house or even in the country keep on asking the government to reduce taxes because they are one of the causes of unemployment. We should not be asking the government to pay subsidies all the way down the line, though the pressure for subsidization is beginning to grow even in western Canada in one way or another. The two do not go together. How can you raise subsidies and social benefits which are costing us today $1,250 million? How are you going to do all that if we do not have taxes? To me it is a very peculiar way of approaching the economic problem which faces Canada today to say in the one breath, reduce taxes and in the other, increase all these government services. To me it just does not add up, and when the Canadian public realize it they will come to the same conclusion.

There is confusion in the country today. These various groups in our country should examine their position with regard to world markets. They should co-operate with each other. I said to the farmers' union the other day, "You should be meeting with the government, but you should also meet with the two large labour unions and thresh out the problems as you are trying to thresh them out with us."

Mr. Ellis: They are doing that now.

Mr. Mang: It is no use for one group to operate one way and another group another way. If we are to have and maintain a unified country and a high standard of living, then we had better have a royal commission. It would be a good thing to appoint a royal commission to investigate the whole Canadian trade position, both in the export and the domestic markets. This investigation should determine the relative cost factors in the Canadian economy which create a high production cost level. It should report on the relative influence on the high cost of production level in Canada, first, of company profits; second, investors' returns; third, labour costs; fourth, transportation costs and fifth, taxation. If we had a royal commission we would get away from these "black is white" and "white is black" statements. Hon. members know what I mean. Too many statements are being made today that are confusing the public. If a royal commission did what I have outlined it would bring all these groups together and we would be able to get somewhere.

At the present time our government is doing everything possible along that line. Our government realizes that we must have international markets. We should give credit to our government for being in the forefront of the battle for freer international markets. All these factors are involved. Let me emphasize that it is not just the responsibility of the government. I want a royal commission appointed to show where every group in the Canadian economic picture fits in. It is only by that co-operation that we can get anywhere.

In conclusion I want to congratulate the government on its efforts toward world peace. I read in the newspapers today about the meeting of the prime ministers in London. They represent 585 million people. Of those 585 million people our delegation represents 15 million. I was struck with the fact that, compared with the size of our population, our influence in world affairs is tremendous. That is something of which we should be proud.

We are on the brink of very important decisions. I do not think international relations will deteriorate to the point where we shall have a thermonuclear war, which could only mean the destruction of civilization as we know it. We must realize that unless peace is established we shall not have very much to worry about in this or any other parliament. We must realize that we are living in an era when, unless we have world peace, we shall all be doomed. We can only have world peace by establishing trust in the world.

That is our difficulty today. One of our difficulties in discussing the protocol last week was that we did not trust those people with whom we are associated. As soon as you establish trust in the world you will have peace, and you will not have it any sooner. I hope the government will continue to press forward, on the economic front and on the world peace front, in the direction they are pointing. When that goal is achieved we shall have the prosperity and peace that we all desire so much.

Mr. James A. McBain (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this throne speech debate I, as one of the comparatively new members of this house, feel like various other hon. members who have so ably spoken before me and expressed the view that much has been said already in this debate. May I also extend my congratulations to the hon. members who have expressed themselves in moving and seconding this motion.

As this is the first session at which I as a member have had an opportunity to express my opinion and offer suggestions to this house during the throne speech debate it will be my desire to follow the path set by other hon. members. Being born of Scotch ancestors, as my name would indicate, and as my forefathers from the highlands of Scotland were known for their thrift and saving habits, I shall endeavour to do what other hon. members have endeavoured to do at this session, that is make my remarks as brief as possible and thus save the time of this house.

The constituency of Elgin which I have the honour to represent is steeped in history, as are many other ridings in this part of Ontario. The name Elgin was chosen in honour of the late Earl of Elgin, the grandfather of the present Earl of Elgin who periodically pays visits to his namesake county. The hon. member for London (Mr. Mitchell) extended an invitation to hon. members to join in the celebration of their centennial anniversary, but I cannot do the same since Elgin celebrated its centennial in 1952.

I represent a riding which is partly rural and partly urban. The rural areas are engaged in many phases of agriculture, such as livestock production, both dairy and beef, fodder corn, soybeans, white and yellow-eyed beans, potatoes, sugar beets and flue-cured tobacco. Elgin orchards are known for the fine quality of apples they produce, and as proof of their high quality they recently were awarded the horticultural trophy at the Royal winter fair.

St. Thomas is known as the railroad city of Canada by reason of the fact that within its boundaries are some six railways, namely Canadian National Railways, Wabash, Michigan Central—known as the New York Central in the United States—Canadian Pacific, Chesapeake and Ohio and the London and Port Stanley, an electrified road.

During the expansion of railroads in Canada these numerous railways operating through the riding of Elgin established repair shops in St. Thomas which gave employment to several hundred people, and at the peak employment was well over the thousand mark. Today the situation is vastly changed due to many factors. In my opinion one of the main factors is the almost complete dieselization of three of these railroads. These three were American-owned roads, and they found it more economical to haul longer trains from border to border across western Ontario without the necessity of stopping at St. Thomas to have the engines and trains serviced and repaired.

This resulted over a period of years in the almost complete shutdown of the repair shops in St. Thomas. This in turn forced the railways to release many men who had long years of service and in many instances were very near the pensionable age. They were forced to seek employment in other lines of industry. I have a brief presented and signed by the committee chairman of practically all the railway committees in St. Thomas. This has to do with a clause deleted some years ago from the contract forms, to which the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stanton) has already referred. I should like to read into the record a few of the clauses in this contract form which the employees wish to have reinstated:

> Individually and collectively, we the railway employees of St. Thomas hold a very dim view of the action of the government in the deletion from its public contracts in the departments of public works and transport of certain clauses which give to the railways and their employees a measure of well-merited protection. In the past the government has, through the operation of the departments of public works and transport, recognized the merits of the claims of all the railways in Canada by inserting in the specifications of contracts involving the transport of goods and equipment. In 1934 the minister of public works inserted in the contract forms in the Department of Public Works the following clause:
> "Transportation of material and plant:— All material and plant used in connection with the execution of this contract must be transported over railways operating in Canada, or waterways, to the greatest possible extent."
> We feel that this action was sound, just, fair and worthy of the highest commendation. The Department of Transport construction contract forms contained a similar clause except that the transportation of goods and materials was directed over Canadian National Railways, which should have been amended to include all agencies of transportation under the jurisdiction and control of the federal government. It is with keen regret that we have learned that the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport have caused the deletion of the above-mentioned clauses from their contract forms directing the movement of goods and materials. This action will unquestionably deprive the railways of much valuable traffic they formerly enjoyed and, with the passing of jurisdiction, the railways will continue to be subject to government regulations and control which will not be applicable to the highway competitor.

Therefore I submit that in the interests of all railway employees across Canada this clause should be restored to the contract forms of the departments of public works and transport. I can see no objection to having the clause revised to include all transport agencies operated by or under the control of the government of Canada.

Elgin produces, as I have mentioned, many kinds of cash crops, and I just wish to note a few of them and the value they represent to the riding. The cash value of production in 1953 was as follows: Grain corn, $2,081,900; soybeans, $1,013,700; potatoes, $232,800; fodder corn, $542,600.

Elgin is the second largest flue-cured tobacco producing county in Ontario. Last year over 24,000 acres of this type of tobacco were grown in Elgin, approximately one-fifth of the entire acreage for Ontario. As in many other counties, tobacco acreage was substantially increased in 1954. In 1927 only 500 acres were grown in our county, while by 1937 this had increased to 7,229 acres, which had again expanded to 21,476 acres in 1950. Today flue-cured tobacco is the largest cash crop of this county. The gross returns from this crop in Elgin county for 1954 can be estimated at approximately $15 million. In Ontario and Quebec the flue-cured tobacco acreage amounts to around 120,000 acres, producing in 1954 some 170 million pounds of tobacco. Of this larger than average crop less than 8 million pounds remain to be purchased from the grower.

This crop is processed by the tobacco plants during the winter months, and at the present time the Imperial Leaf Tobacco Company at Aylmer gives employment to between 700 and 800 persons, operating 24 hours a day, alleviating to some extent the seasonable unemployment situation in this district.

By this I do not mean that we do not have unemployment at the present time, for we have over 700 registered unemployed at the office in St. Thomas and I know there are many others who do not register, who are temporarily unemployed and cannot collect unemployment insurance.

I am very glad to note that in the estimates $100,000 is being revoted for a new post office and public building in St. Thomas; but I regret, and I know many of my constituents regret also, that no additional funds are provided in the 1955-56 estimates. This is a building that has been needed for a great number of years. I know the employees of this postal department strive to give the very best service possible, but owing to their very cramped quarters and outmoded methods by reason of lack of space, they find it very difficult to give the service they would wish to give. Therefore I ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) to give his utmost consideration to making a start on this new building this year. This project would give some relief to the unemployment situation in the area and assure the constituents of St. Thomas that they are at long last going to have a new post office and public building, not just some election propaganda.

Before I endeavour to turn to a few of the problems of agriculture, as I see them, I wish to refer to a petition I have in my hand. This is from the cheese producers in Elgin county, protesting the importation of New Zealand cheese. It is signed by practically 100 per cent of our cheese producers, and also by the heads of the dairy production industry and various other organizations in the county of Elgin. The news that 2,250,000 pounds of cheap New Zealand cheese was on its way to Canadian markets came as a distinct shock to Canadian farmers, especially to those in the dairy industry.

Several hon. members have already spoken in this house on this importation, and we have received the reply from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that no more shipments of this cheese will come to Canada for at least six months. It is my opinion that other companies which are in the cheese processing business will be seeking cheaper cheese; therefore I can assure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce that similar petitions will be sent to them if they have not already received some. I will also see that they receive the petition I have in my hand.

Agriculture is the oldest profession, for it began when Adam and Eve were expelled from the garden of Eden; the other profession did not begin until at least one more woman entered the world. It should be remembered that both these professions sprang from two fundamental urges of man, the necessity to eat and the urge to propagate, whether illegitimately, indiscriminately or otherwise, since to exist at all man must eat, and to ensure his continuance on this earth he must propagate.

There are still many things in the realm of agriculture we do not understand. As we discover new laws and facts and gradually penetrate the fog of mystery we make strides toward improving the conditions of the human race, its health, its happiness and its living standards, and also the possible realization of the hope of a continued peace. In this complex modern world peace and war are largely determined by the world's supply and distribution of food, raw materials, and markets. As the population of the world increases at the rate of over 25 persons a minute the food sources in many countries appear to diminish. Food, therefore, becomes a dominant factor.

During the debate we have heard the word "surplus" mentioned many times, but I believe we should not be misled by such references. For a thousand years there has been no real surplus of food produced on the farms of the world, but there has been poor and inefficient distribution, added to which there has been exploitation by the buyer causing higher prices for this distribution. This inefficient distribution, in addition to causing higher prices, creates artificial surpluses which have no reality in a world where half the people suffer all their lives from malnutrition and associated diseases, and where at least 500 million are born and die without ever having had enough to eat at least one day of their lives. Some farmers, pointing to accumulating surpluses of certain foodstuffs in Canada, and fearful of dropping prices, suggest a slow-up of production, but while half the world is hungry any overall curtailment of production looks like a shortsighted policy.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urgently request this government to consider ways and means of regaining and retaining a healthy economic position for agriculture, not necessarily through subsidies that postpone but do not correct, not through restrictions that stifle, but through sound policies designed to promote a freer movement of agricultural products within Canada and to the needy people of the world, and at the same time to institute policies which will provide adequate protection for our most important resource, the soil.

Canada is one of the few countries capable of producing foodstuffs to help feed the hungry peoples of the world. Our farmers are willing and anxious to do their part, but they cannot do the whole job without irreparable damage to the soil. We therefore look for national and provincial policies that will protect and conserve for continuing use our renewable natural resources. It is a strange paradox that we must, by law, pay all other debts ahead of our debt to the land, yet our debt to the land is more important than any other. Morally, and according to the laws of economics and nature, the payment of debt to the soil ranks first, because over the years only by maintaining a balance of soil fertility in nature's bank can we continue to pay all other debts. Legally, however, and according to man-made laws which so often ignore the laws of nature, all other debts must be paid ahead of our debt to the soil. Indeed, our law permits us to borrow at will from nature's bank with no compulsion to repay the loan or even to pay interest. Of course, nature has her own penalties. Slowly but surely she withdraws credit from those who misuse her resources.

Let us turn back the pages of history to where once the Babylonian empire flourished. Let us take a look at the Gobi desert which has crowded millions of Mongolians into the corners of its once rich and fertile land. We well remember Rommel's advance and retreat across the Libyan desert during the last war over land that once fed the Roman empire. All these lost empires tell precisely the same story of vanishing forests, overgrazing, fertility losses, and finally erosion and loss of top soil. They all tell a story of man's failure to come to terms with nature. In every case nature withdrew her credit, and in every case the people starved or moved on to exploit new lands, and now there are no longer any important land areas left to exploit.

In Canada and the United States it is true that we are only in the early stages of exploitation. We still have a long way to go to achieve the complete destruction of the Romans. On the other hand we have only been working at it for a hundred years or so, while the Romans had a thousand years to achieve complete soil depletion. But it is now quite possible for us to wear out soil 10 times as fast as a generation ago, when only horsepower was available, and a hundred times faster than the Romans whose main power was that of their slaves and oxen, and their main tools the hoe and the wooden plow.

[Mr. McBain.]

Fortunately there is a sunny side to this picture of the decline and fall of man-made civilizations. This same efficiency and technological advance that enables us to destroy soil so quickly also enables us to accomplish the almost miraculous in maintaining soil fertility at highly productive levels, in reviving tired, worn-out soils and even, on occasion, reclaiming deserts. More and more we are learning to look at the land as the major source of real wealth, and to farming as a high art. We are learning that while soil fertility is highly perishable it is also a renewable resource, and herein lies the art of good farming, namely how to extract a living from the soil in such a manner as to be able to pass on the farm to the next generation in a more fertile condition than that in which we found it.

What we need most for Canada is a readjustment of basic values so the dollar will once more be the servant of man, not his master. Half the world's population is hungry and needs our surplus food, but we have priced ourselves out of world markets. Over half our soils are hungry, but we have put such a high value on the services of labour, industry and commerce that there is seldom enough left over to feed the soil. The crux of the whole matter today is that our greatest natural resource, the soil, must subsist as best it can on the scraps left over from the banquets of our highly artificial way of life. This was the way of all vanished civilizations of the past, and we are travelling along the same road but at the speed of jet propulsion.

This is my plea to this government and its leaders in agriculture, not only in their own interests but in the interests of private citizens, that they make room for agriculture at the first table so that our grandchildren and great-grandchildren may not have to join the ranks of the half-fed.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that the government should give more consideration to aiming at a balanced economy by widespread recognition of the importance of conserving our natural resources, the most important of which is the soil, especially that valuable top six inches. It should also give more consideration to establishing a joint federal-provincial land use policy designed to perpetuate and improve our renewable resources, and to the further education and application of Christian principles at all levels among all peoples at home and abroad.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the subamendment to the amendment I moved at the beginning of the debate on the speech from the throne is rather surprising. It was moved by those who said our amendment was already too long, but in spite of that they moved a negative addition to it. It is negative because it proposes a philosophy of socialism that would make impossible the amendment I had already put forward. Therefore I feel it incumbent upon me to make a few observations about the subamendment at this stage of the debate.

I do not agree that private enterprise has done in the past what my socialist friends have intimated. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, as one looks back over the history of this North American continent it would be very difficult to accept such a novel philosophy in this day and age. I would say to my friends on my left, who seem to believe in state ownership and government control, that all they need to do is look at this great young country and the North American continent itself to realize just how the reverse is true. Can anyone read the history of the progress of the North American continent, the greatest free enterprise continent in the world, and say that we are going backward and that industry, production and government are stifled by private enterprise? Why, Mr. Speaker, the historical facts stream past the eyes of the most stupid in Canada to show what really has happened.

In 1900 not one out of 100 of the urban people of the North American continent had a horse and buggy to ride from place to place. Yet today on this same continent, which has been such an outstanding example of free enterprise and initiative of the individual, we now have an automobile for every four people. Just imagine the difference.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rowe: Probably my hon. friend never even had a horse and buggy, by the sound of it. But, Mr. Speaker, to my mind that is evidence, and there is plenty of other evidence. During that 50 years we have had two hot wars and a cold one which is probably getting hotter than it should be right now. This North American continent participated in those two hot wars and did more in the four or five years of each of those wars than any socialist state in history did in 50 years previously. It was the free enterprise and the pioneering spirit of those boys who flew the Lancasters and manned the ships that crossed the English channel; it was the initiative and incentive born and bred into them that saved the day when old Britain stood almost alone in 1940. It was that spirit of enterprise that made our industries hum. Where would those industries have been had it not been for private enterprise in this country?

Yes, I am proud of the fact that I and the party I represent stand foursquare for private enterprise. We are making no apology. My socialist friends to the left can call it what they wish. They can call it the capitalistic system or they can call it the profit system, though I am sure there are not many of them who like to work for no profit. The profit system is after all the very essence and lifeblood of the free enterprise system. We are all too timid, too chicken-hearted to say what we mean in politics these days. We are all too chicken-hearted to say that we believe in the profit system, that we believe in the capitalist system. That is what made this country so strong. If this country had not been quite so strong where would we be standing tonight, when the world does not understand anything but power in the negotiations that are going on?

No, Mr. Speaker, there is no other energizing force that has ever stirred human beings like reward based on results. Let us not kid ourselves. The spark of our whole free enterprise system is that there is a profit in thrift, a reasonable recompense for reasonable endeavour, and that competition is the life of trade. These are among the incentives that prompt the farmer to toil early in the morning and the business executive to study plans late into the night. These are the things that have made the country what it is. These are the principles that give employment. These are the principles that give national strength. These are the principles that make national character. We do not need to restrict free enterprise, Mr. Speaker. We do not need to apologize for the capitalistic system. We should be proud of it. It is the newest system.

My friends to the left are talking as if what they are putting forward is the newest system in the world, but it is the oldest and it has never worked any place. Rather than restriction we need more enterprise. We need more incentive for enterprise. We need more production. We need more gadgets, more tools, more capitalistic expenditures, more consumer goods, and they can be secured if we have sound economic policies.

As far as the labour unions are concerned, a system such as is suggested by my friends to the left, who pretend to be friends of labour, would leave labour in a futile position. Labour would never need to sit across the table from employers, for they would have nothing to talk about. Why, Mr. Speaker, the only way labour can bargain for real wages is by a system that stirs the inventive genius of people who will risk their capital and build plants to give people employment.

Yes, I know my friends would like to have a socialist state. They never ran anything before, but they believe they could run such a state. They want a state, evidently, where everybody owns everything and nobody owns anything. They want a state where no one has any authority except the politician. You would have a situation where everybody would be going to the politicians or the government with an empty dinner pail in one hand and a state coupon for a government dole in the other.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the initiative and genius of our people must be given more incentive rather than less. It must if we ever hope to maintain and increase that dynamic leadership that stands behind our economy, if we are going to support the great structure of social services with their tremendous cost that has been established in this country, to say nothing of the great cost of defence.

An hon. Member: Family allowances.

Mr. Rowe: We call that a social service. I do not know what you call it.

Mr. Knowles: That is not what you called it in 1944.

Mr. Rowe: Oh, Mr. Speaker, we have no apologies to make to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) about 1944 or any other year in the history of our progress in this country. It is always interesting and amusing, in fact it is often more amusing than a picture show, to hear these men assert what they will do for this country when they know they have not a hope in heaven of ever assuming responsibility.

The progress that is necessary to keep those services going that we have already established and paid for out of the production of our people cannot be maintained by placing our economy under the shackles of government ownership and state control. History will show that our national progress is still in its infancy, although it has already been great under a private enterprise economy. Our people will not risk, and do not intend to risk, the folly of state ownership and control. The strength we have shown in meeting what we have met in the past was established under that very system. I do not think anyone who pauses to think about what might happen if some of these wild suggestions were put into practice would want to see that done.

If you place the economy of this country in shackles of that kind you are going to place every social service in the same kind of strait-jacket. Just as our economy would be curtailed and doomed if that happened, so would our social services. Those who want the social services most are usually the ones who have contributed the least. It is for that reason that I believe my hon. friends to the left have lost all hope of ever being called upon to form a government. By reason of the nature of their socialistic philosophy, their theory of state ownership and control, they could never become a government in this free enterprise country. In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, they are not even good in opposition because of their reckless advocacy of state ownership. Their only contribution to the political life of this country, to this free enterprise country, unconscious though it may be, is to perpetuate the life of this rather dead government that is in power.

Mr. Knowles: Now tell us what your contribution is.

Mr. Rowe: Now, Mr. Speaker, freedom of enterprise and political freedom go hand in hand. History has shown that neither can stand alone. Wherever they have fallen, freedom of religion has also tottered in slow, tragic succession. We talk about world peace, but can you imagine for a moment what it would be like if you built state controls and state monopolies? You would be pitting one state against another instead of encouraging world peace as you do under a sound economic policy of trade and fellowship. It is a wrong philosophy, Mr. Speaker, in every respect.

I am not going to give any more reasons than I have given, and my hon. friends can expect me to vote against their subamendment. I can assure you now that we on this side of the house have no intention of voting for any such economic folly. I know my friends—

Mr. Knowles: So you will vote with the Liberals.

Mr. Rowe: You have voted with them oftener than I have. I am always interested, however, when I hear those from the other side of the house being so doubtful about our stand on this and that. When I noticed a lull and heard a whisper and looked at them, I found some of their faces were as long as a clock when we moved the amendment concerning health insurance. No, Mr. Speaker, even those to your right say, "Oh, it is a terrible thing." Even the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) twisted and squirmed—

Mr. Martin: I have not said a thing to you.

Mr. Rowe: No, that is why I knew it bothered you. The minister was afraid to say anything. I am rather amused because we find these same gentlemen who are always trying to help us, the same element in both classes of political society in this country, always condemning our leadership. They are always finding fault with our leader, not our leader who is absent—

Mr. Argue: Just the acting leader.

Mr. Rowe: I know you do not like him either. I must say that from almost every member on all sides of the house I have had messages of sympathy and good wishes for my absent leader, which I have passed on to him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: Whether or not some hon. members would rather have me here than him—they are more afraid of him than they are of me—he is going to be back soon anyway. It is rather amusing to me that these same gentlemen find a peculiar objection to anything we might move. They seem to be afraid they might be hurt a little bit. Whenever we bring in something new they find the same objections they keep finding about our leadership. I have sat in this house now for well over a quarter of a century, and we never had an effective leader since I have been the member for Dufferin-Simcoe—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: He laughs best who laughs last; just hold on. We never had one as effective as our present leader—we have never had any leader that the same element in political society did not find fault with, just as they find fault when we suggest something on which they think they have a monopoly. It seems to me my socialist friends to the left think they have a monopoly on everything that is good for humankind. They are past masters at giving away somebody else's money. They have shown no indication of economic soundness on how to get the money.

Some of these large corporations that my hon. friends dislike so much pay the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris)—he does not keep it long because he spends it rapidly—about 50 per cent of everything they make. My hon. friends to the left are all the time talking about how much we can give away.

I have no apologies to make on behalf of this party for the last clause in our amendment. Surely it cannot be said to be too long, for those past masters in parliamentary procedure have added another paragraph to it and suggested we should adopt the whole thing. I know that Mr. Speaker has some doubts about it. I know there are some members in the house who think it is a little long. I know some would rather have several parts of it left out.

I know that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, since you come from my own county, are a student of parliamentary procedure. I would suggest to you that despite the fact Mr. Speaker has some doubts about it, you should make a careful study of the amendment. I submit that if the amendment reached from here to you it would not be too long in principle. We are not moving a motion to ask that something be done; we are asking for a recommendation.

I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to see the rules of the house being enforced.

I have said I have no apologies to make, and neither I have. May I remind those hon. members who do not understand the Conservative party as well as they think they do that as long ago as 1942 we had passed at our annual convention an exactly similar policy. And may I remind my friends across the way that we are ready to do something about it. Even though they passed their resolution in 1919, ours has grown more in 13 years than theirs has in 36 years. Now, this is nothing new.

An hon. Member: Don't apologize.

Mr. Rowe: Oh, I am not apologizing. On the contrary, I am trying to apologize for you. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is nothing new when we suggest a policy such as this. It is nothing very spectacular. Surely my hon. friends who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, those old champions of free enterprise, those old, dusty free traders of the one wing and high protectionists of the other wing, those men who all down through the years have brought far more spectacular things to parliament, will not say this is new. But the Liberal members have not said a word about it. What the Conservative party has said I will say now, that while we do not expect to come into power tomorrow, you would think the socialist members thought they were going to come into power tomorrow. Certainly we can say that there is no alternative to the present government except this party.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to worry the Minister of National Health and Welfare tonight.

Mr. Martin: Don't worry him too much.

Mr. Rowe: I like him, and since he has reduced he seems to be in such good health that I do not want to hurt him. My health is not so good tonight. I thought at one time I would not have to speak until tomorrow, and if I had waited until tomorrow perhaps I could have been better than I am tonight. But I do feel that I must make it clear that while some no doubt are worried as to what this will do, my hon. friends to your right do not expect that we will have the opportunity to put it into effect until after the next election, at least. But I assure you that it will not take us 36 years.

And, Mr. Speaker, when we do I assure you and my friends to my left that it is not going to be state medicine, or a socialistic plan. It is not going to interfere with the splendid services of the Blue Cross or other insurance plans.

Mr. Knowles: Will it be compulsory?

Mr. Rowe: Oh, we will look after you fellows after a while. It will not be interference with the provinces, but it will be in co-operation with them.

There seems to be some confusion, but everyone knows that this party I have the honour temporarily to lead stands for the very opposite of state socialism. We do not believe in state medicine; but down through the years we have just as much to our credit in the matter of social welfare and social services as any party in this country. We do not take second place to anyone in that regard. I have just as many friends among the labour movement; in fact I have more friends among the labour movement than I have among you fellows who champion it. And I have just as much concern as anybody in this house over the man who lives by the side of the road, who works hard and toils into the night to keep his family, and who shudders at the very thought of hospitalization. Our aim is to provide for those men who have not had a chance to protect themselves. And it is just as important to have a careful plan of that kind—careful, sound, successful and more or less non-political assistance—as it is to give—

Mr. MacInnis: More or less.

Mr. Rowe: My hon. friend would not understand that. He would only understand "more".

Mr. MacInnis: I did not understand "more or less".

Mr. Rowe: Well, I cannot help it if my hon. friend is slow in understanding these things. I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the house—

An hon. Member: Eleven minutes to go.

Mrs. Fairclough: And all day tomorrow.

Mr. Rowe: Well, perhaps my hon. friend would be satisfied with 11 minutes. However, Mr. Speaker, the members of our present government, those who are responsible for the management of our affairs, claim to be the champions of private enterprise. They are the other private enterprise party. They are the other traditional party. And they are the only party likely to be in power when the Conservative party is not in power. I believe that, too.

I believe that, so far as splinter parties in this country are concerned, unconsciously they contribute to keeping the other major party in power, but they have never contributed anything to keeping our party in power. We always went into power on our own when we did go, and we did not get help from either of them.

I have noticed in connection with those who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, that after the necessity for certain controls developed during wartime, they developed a queer appetite for state control, and they have controlled a lot of things they should not control. They cling to the control of things to which they should not cling. I am not going to enlarge upon that point tonight. I shall do so on some other occasion, when I shall mention a list of the things they seem to like to control.

When they control so much I would not be cruel enough to say—I could not if I would and would not if I could—that they control the press. But they control so much of the air, transportation, radio and everything else, I have heard it said that once they control those it is not hard to control the press. But I believe they still have a semblance of free enterprise inclinations; I would put it that way.

I know it is the desire of every member in this house that we should encourage production. I have heard hon. members to your right, Mr. Speaker, say many things about those who sit here, but after the years I have spent in parliament I have never doubted the integrity of purpose of hon. members, not even my hon. friends to my left. It is not any doubt of their integrity of purpose, it is only the road they travel that bothers me.

I believe it is the common desire of this whole house to encourage production and encourage employment. I heard an hon. member speaking the other day who went so far as to say that he did not know how we could have more employment, more manufacturing and so on, without increasing tariffs. But to him, as a free trader—he did not say this, but I could see him twisting and squirming in his seat—of the two he would rather have unemployment. But, Mr. Speaker, if we are going to have expansion in agriculture and in industry, which is vital for our future welfare, I just wonder how it can be brought about by the conduct of the present government. There is a vast difference between the method proposed by the government sitting to your right, Mr. Speaker, and that proposed by the official opposition sitting to your left. Speaking without repetition—

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Rowe: Well, I explained before, but my hon. friend was so busy getting his own speech ready that I noticed at the time he was not listening to me. I shall not explain at length at this late hour, except to say that he must know that we in this party to which I belong stand tonight as we stood in the past for fiscal policy which will be adequate to encourage the development of our own resources and our own country.

Some of my friends say, "explain that". Some of my friends say I did not explain it. Some said it means high tariff walls. I ask some of you younger members to stop using that term, because it is 35 years old. It was used by old-time free traders before some of you young men were born. It was used by members of the party of Sir Wilfrid Laurier at the very time he was imposing higher tariffs than Sir John A. Macdonald had imposed before him. As the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) so eloquently said the other day, you now maintain tariffs on everything, and no one says anything about it. It seems to me that it is time we got our sight cleared.

I can show on the records of Hansard of this parliament that one of the most outstanding leaders the Conservative party ever had moved for a lowering of tariffs on farm implements, and every member of the Liberal party opposed him. Where are the champions of free trade? Where are they tonight?

Mr. Martin: Who was that?

Mr. Rowe: If you read history you will find it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: Don't laugh it off. It was the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen in 1911. Where are those champions? We have those agriculturists from western Canada. We hear them talk about free trade. I saw some of my friends from western Ontario crying crocodile tears last year for higher tariffs on buttons, bones and bottles in this house. You cannot have it both ways. Before radio came in I can well remember you people blowing hot and cold across this land. I can remember the Right Hon. Mackenzie King preaching free trade in western Canada while at the same time his cohorts were making protectionist speeches in Montreal. That has been the pattern of your party down through the years. What do we find now? What has been said here and in the United States. Some of my hon. friends laugh. It would be laughable if it were not tragic in the present circumstances.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Let us have a vote.

Mr. Rowe: No, you are not going to have a vote for a few minutes.

Mr. Dufresne: They seem to have had enough.

Mr. Rowe: I thought you were sitting in here to listen to me. I see you are just sitting here to vote. If that is the way the Minister of Trade and Commerce feels about it he might as well retire, because he is not doing any good here anyway. We are not going to have a vote tonight. I am not any more generous than you were at six o'clock. I noticed today what Mr. Benson of the United States said they were going to do at GATT. He said that no matter what they do over there they have not yielded one bit on section 22 of the agreement with reference to their agricultural products and their support plan in the United States. In other words, they are going to GATT, but they are not going to reduce the tariff one iota. The same thing was said by Mr. Dulles of the United States.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, our great champions of international trade not only go to GATT but they make all sorts of treaties. My hon. friends are laughing, Mr. Speaker, but I want to tell them that the dairymen across the country are not laughing tonight; the livestock people of this country are not laughing; the half a million unemployed are not laughing tonight, because they see the action of this government, which is one of expediency and no fiscal policy. I ask my hon. friend who looks so smug to rise and tell me whether he stands for free trade. I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he will rise and say whether he stands for free trade.

Mr. Martin: Will you permit me?

Mr. Rowe: No. Do you stand for free trade?

Mr. Martin: I stand for a policy that will produce peaceful relations with other nations of the world. That is the policy this government stands for.

Mr. Rowe: I am glad we are not to have a vote tonight, because at last we have found out that they stand for a policy that will mean peace with everybody. That brings to my mind the remarks of the late Mr. King, who said that we should not provoke the United States of America. Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is the type of policy they have. Will any of the other hon. members rise and say that they stand for free trade?

Mr. Gardiner: We have free implements coming into Canada.

Mr. Rowe: And you charge 90 per cent on bay rum and toothpaste that the little girl uses to clean her teeth. Will you rise and tell me that you are a free trader when you are charging the farmer 35 per cent on dairy machinery such as power churns, milk coolers, milk can washers and so forth in the dairy barn, and at the same time allow cheese to come in in competition with ours at a tariff of half a cent a pound? Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce rise and tell me that he is a free trader? He never was before he came here, when he lived at the head of the lakes.

My friend from western Ontario will not rise and tell me that he is a free trader. If he does he dare not go home until the end of the session. We have a government with an unstable fiscal policy, yet they drag out this old, duty-free trade label with which they try to fool the consumer as well as the producer, and sometimes one would imagine that they are trying to fool themselves.

When I look over the tariff list that the government maintain under the recent trade treaties I feel that they must be fooling themselves. Can you tell me what kind of a sound fiscal policy that is? Where is the soundness in the fiscal policy that charges a tariff all the way from 40 per cent to 90 per cent on articles the consumer uses? Why do you charge tariffs, for instance, on ginger, nutmeg and coffee? The tariff on coffee is 7 cents a pound. Why do you charge a tariff on bananas coming in here? Why do you charge twice as much on bananas as you do on cheese? Are you going to start a banana belt in this climate? Why do you charge 35 per cent on oranges, grapefruit and lemon pulp, while you allow mutton and lamb to come in here at half a cent a pound, a reduction from 7 cents a pound? That is what I mean by fiscal instability, if you want to know. You have a tariff of 40 per cent on mouth organs and 35 per cent on ping pong tables and 90 per cent on bay rum and toothpaste. At the same time you allow products to come in that we are trying to sell. You say we must buy if we are going to sell. My mother taught me that I had to sell before I could buy.

What fiscal stability is there in telling us that we must buy before we sell; that we must lower the tariffs on things we have to sell and raise them on things we have to buy?

Mr. Gardiner: We are making mouth organs.

Mr. Rowe: If you make any more music like that you will ruin the basic industry of this country.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, Mr. Speaker, call it ten o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Rowe the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 2, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

INCOME TAX

STATEMENT ON DEDUCTION OF PROVINCIAL TAX BY QUEBEC RESIDENTS

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): In view of the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in this house on January 17 last following the exchange of correspondence which he had with the premier of Quebec, I think that both hon. members and residents of Quebec would appreciate receiving from me a statement regarding the filing of income tax returns in the coming few months.

Approximately eight million income tax forms have been made available in the province of Quebec through post offices and employers. These forms were printed last fall, and therefore indicate that the allowable tax credit in respect of the Quebec provincial income tax will be the amount paid to the province of Quebec or 5 per cent of the net federal tax, whichever is the lesser. As these forms are now in the hands of the public, it is not my intention to print and distribute new income tax forms amending the maximum credit from 5 per cent to 10 per cent. Residents of Quebec should use the forms already provided, but calculate their provincial tax credit as the lesser of the amount paid to Quebec or 10 per cent of the net federal tax.

As the taxation division must commence processing the 1954 income tax returns when they are received, the revised amount of tax credit will be allowed in the expectation that the house will retroactively enact legislation on this basis for the year 1954. Furthermore, with respect to the year 1955 I am recommending an immediate change in the income tax regulations to permit employers to reduce the amount to be deducted from the remuneration paid to employees working in the province of Quebec by 10 per cent.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FORMOSA—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I beg leave, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis), to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the critical situation in Formosa, and the need for a clear statement by this House of Commons in support of the position taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on January 25, 1955, when he declared that the final disposition of Formosa should be dealt with by international negotiation, and that pending such a decision consideration should be given to the neutralization of Formosa both in order to prevent any assault upon it by communist forces and also so that it will not be used as a base for invasion of the mainland.

Mr. Speaker, may I just add that the occasion for seeking leave to discuss this matter is that news from London today indicates that a position differing from that taken by our government on January 25 is being taken by our representatives at the commonwealth conference in London.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) I might be permitted to make just a brief comment on what my hon. friend has just said.

Mr. Coldwell: I have no objections to that —if I am allowed to proceed with the debate.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: In order to help me make a proper decision, would the hon. member care to hear just as brief a comment from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) as that which was made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he explained why he was making his motion?

Mr. Coldwell: I am not going to object to that. But I do wish to make my own position clear, that if it is going to be debated I want to have the right to speak on my motion.

Mr. Martin: I do not think I would be fair to the hon. member if I indicated it was my intention at this time to debate the proposition, but rather to offer a suggestion or two which I believe, upon reflection, he might agree deserve consideration at this time, and that is that in view of the admittedly important current situation, this house would not want to engage at this time in a discussion which, I am sure, would not help the situation. I am not saying this by way of criticizing my hon. friend's initiative in the matter, but just to impress upon him that I believe, from the opportunity I have had and the government has had of perusing dispatches which have come to us, that what I have just said is a fully responsible statement.

The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) had given me notice of his intention to ask a question dealing with this matter. Perhaps I might anticipate his proposed question simply by saying that, in answer to what he was going to ask me about the situation, I was not going to be able to say very much more than to observe, as the house has already noted, that there have been important developments in the Formosan situation since the Secretary of State for External Affairs made his statement on January 25.

On Saturday last the President of the United States signed the joint resolution which has been passed by the House of Representatives and the Senate by very large majorities, as the house knows.

The security council of the United Nations met on Monday to consider communications from New Zealand and the Soviet union both relating to the current situation in the Formosa strait. It was decided to take the New Zealand item first, and the security council decided to invite representatives of communist China to take part in the discussion on this item. The government is glad that this invitation has been extended, and hopes that the Chinese communists will agree to participate in security council attempts to arrange a cease-fire.

Since these suggestions were made to me in written form by permanent officers in the Department of External Affairs I have noted that on January 25 my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, said, in part:

> I think I can say that any move or proposal within the United Nations or through diplomatic channels which could serve to achieve the purpose as stated in the President's message "to improve the prospects of peace in the area" will be warmly welcomed by the parliament and by the people of this country.

My final observation is this. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did make reference to the press reports of meetings that are now current in London. Those meetings are private. But I can say to my hon. friend that I am quite satisfied, as I am sure he would be, that in view of the discussions that are taking place in London, and also in view of the fact that the security council is currently in session on this very matter, I do not think anything I could say, or, if I may say so with great respect, anything anyone else could say at this time, would help in the matter.

The subject as I said is now before the security council. Discussions are in progress there, and an attempt is being made to try to bring the parties together; I would therefore urge that this House of Commons cannot really and profitably add or do anything useful at this time.

Mr. Coldwell: May I just say that I wish to thank the minister for what he has said. But all these considerations were carefully thought of before I introduced this proposal. What I am afraid of is that we are doing exactly what we did in the years between the two wars, in not demanding that this House of Commons express its opinion on grave matters which may involve us in catastrophe later on.

My request is based entirely upon what was said by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the house on January 25 and the fact that authoritative statements from London today indicate that there has been a change of attitude by our representatives there.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): As the minister has indicated, I had intended to ask a question. In view of what he has stated, we in this party do not want to do anything that will aggravate the tense situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: While usually I assert the supremacy of parliament, in this case, in the interests of all of us, I adhere absolutely to what my hon. friend the minister has said, that at this time it might be dangerous to discuss the matters that are being considered both before the United Nations and also at the commonwealth prime ministers' meeting.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, may I interject a word or two which may be more in the nature of a point of order. I appreciate what has been said, and also appreciate the attitude of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, when he suggests that the situation might be aggravated by discussion. But my point of order is that the matter is not now being debated.

As I listened to the minister it appeared to me that he was debating the issue. I would urge you, Mr. Speaker, to consider this matter, not on the basis of whether it will aggravate or alleviate the situation but purely on the basis of whether or not it is of urgent public importance.

Mr. Speaker: I am grateful to hon. members who have taken part in the debate—one which obviously has taken place with unanimous consent. In what they have said they have helped me to make up my mind.

Hon. members realize of course that this is a delicate duty for me to perform, when I am asked to decide whether a matter submitted in this way, by virtue of standing order 31, is of urgent public importance.

There is no question that the matter is one of importance, but as hon. members know—and several decisions have been rendered in the past by my predecessors and I have had the occasion to decide likewise myself in the course of the last session—what must be examined when we decide whether a matter is of urgent public importance is to see whether there is urgency of debate. Hon. members will agree with me that whenever a motion of this type is moved, when the debate on the speech from the throne is currently taking place, in the course of which they may talk about anything they wish—they have done so and perhaps will continue to do so today and tomorrow—full opportunity might be given to all hon. members to discuss the very matter that is mentioned in this motion.

I do not want to deliberate too long. Hon. members can very well see that my decision is against the motion being debated at the moment. I do not think there is urgency of debate such as that which is contemplated by standing order 31 and our practice with respect to it. I just want to add this comment to which I do not want hon. members to attach too much meaning, but perhaps give some thought to. In this instance the matter which is being brought forward is one which consists of asking a clear statement by the house on a certain problem. It strikes me when I read this that the definite matter of urgent public importance is said to be the critical situation in Formosa. Well, the papers inform us about the circumstances relating to that and we have had statements on that in this house. The second part of the motion strikes me as being unusual in motions of this kind. It refers to the need for a clear statement by this house in support of the position taken on a previous day by a minister in this house. I do not know really what could be achieved. Usually it is a matter which is defined. A certain set of circumstances are outlined and the order of reference is spelled out in a more detailed way. As it stands now, what is being asked for is another debate on external affairs. That is what we would have today, because there would be no way in which I could restrict the debate to the situation in Formosa. Hon. members may decide that whatever has taken place recently in respect to NATO has relation to the Pacific and the conditions under which we live being what they are, the world being just one, we would have a general debate on external affairs.

Anyway, as I said, the question is certainly one of importance; but in view of the fact that a debate on the speech from the throne is currently taking place, hon. members will have ample opportunity to debate not only this question but any one that they feel is related to it. Therefore, with much regret, I must reject the request of the hon. member to move the adjournment of the house at this time.

QUESTIONS

G. M. FERRIE

Mr. Nicholson:

1. Has G. M. Ferrie, of Invermay, Saskatchewan, been employed by the Department of Agriculture?
2. If so, what work has he been doing?
3. What has been paid to him (a) as salary; (b) for expenses?

Mr. Gardiner:

1. Yes, since April 1, 1954.

2. Agricultural supervisor, P.F.R.A.

Questions

ONTARIO AND QUEBEC—LUMBER IMPORTS, 1954

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How much British Columbia lumber was delivered to Ontario and Quebec, by provinces, in 1954?

2. How much oak, if any, was imported from the United States in 1954?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Shipments of lumber and sawn ties during January 1-November 30, 1954, reported to dominion bureau of statistics by British Columbia saw mills, totalled 3,276,584,000 feet board measure of which 144,798,000 feet went to Ontario and 27,609,000 feet to Quebec. In addition, shipments totalling 622,938,000 feet have been estimated for non-reporting British Columbia mills during the same period, destination of which cannot be determined. The above figures refer to shipments to first destination only. Figures for December, 1954 are not yet available.

2. Imports of oak from the United States during the period January 1 to November 30, 1954 amounted to 33,357 thousand feet. Figures for December 1954 are not yet available.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How many miles of the trans-Canada highway were completed by December 31, 1954, by provinces?

2. How many miles were built in 1954, by provinces?

3. How many miles are under construction, by provinces?

4. How many miles have been completed through the national parks?

Mr. Bourget: 1, 2, 3 and 4.

STAMP VENDING MACHINES

Mr. Fulton:

1. Does the Post Office Department own or lease any stamp vending machines?

2. Does the department authorize the use of such machines in stores or similar locations for the sale of postage stamps to the public?

3. Is it the policy of the department to discontinue over the counter sales of stamps in stores and substitute sales through vending machines? If not, what is the policy with respect to such machines?

4. Does the public receive from such machines stamps of a face value fully equivalent to the amount of money they have inserted in the machine? If not, what are the details of the rate of profit on such sales of stamps?

5. How are such profits divided?

6. What steps are taken to ensure that the public is made aware that they will not receive from the machine stamps of a face value equivalent to the amount of money they have inserted?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare):

1. Yes—owns but does not lease.

2. Machines owned by the department are located at post offices and airports only. The department issues permits for the sale of stamps through privately owned vending machines at approved locations.

3. No—vending machines supplement sales over the counter.

4. Machines owned and operated by the department vend stamps at face value. Operators of privately owned machines may sell stamps at a profit of 1 cent on each 5 cent sale; 2 cents on each 10 cent sale, and 5 cents on each 25 cent sale. Some owners sell at a profit of only 1 cent on their 10 cent sales.

5. Owners of machines purchase stamps from the department at face value, and financial details respecting division of profits are arranged between owners of machines and occupants of locations.

6. Operators are required to indicate clearly above each slot the number and value of stamps which will be received for the coin inserted.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE PAYMENTS

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. How many farmers in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, respectively, were eligible for prairie farm assistance payments for the crop years of 1953 and 1954?
2. How many were in the various categories of payment?

Mr. Gardiner:

1. Crop year, 1953, Manitoba, 5,025 farmers; Saskatchewan, 5,733 farmers; Alberta, 5,547 farmers; total, 16,305 farmers.

Crop year, 1954, information not yet available.

2. Crop year, 1953, 0-4 category, Manitoba, 373 farmers; Saskatchewan, 369 farmers; Alberta, 1,011 farmers; total, 1,753 farmers.

Crop year, 1954, information not yet available.

4-8 category, Manitoba, 4,652 farmers; Saskatchewan, 5,364 farmers; Alberta, 4,536 farmers; total, 14,552 farmers.

Crop year, 1954, information not yet available.

BURNABY GENERAL HOSPITAL

Mr. Goode:

When the provincial government of British Columbia decides to approve an addition to Burnaby General hospital of 100 odd beds, will federal funds be available to aid in the capital cost of that addition?

Mr. Robertson: If a formal submission of project is received from the province asking for assistance toward the construction of additional beds at the Burnaby General hospital, the submission will be considered within the terms of the federal hospital construction grant.

R. R. 2, OMEMEE, ONT.—TENDERS

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How many tenders were received by the Post Office Department in connection with the courier service, rural route No. 2, Omemee, Ontario?
2. What were the names of those submitting tenders?
3. What was the price of each tender?
4. Who received the contract?
5. Why was this mail route put up for tender?
6. Is it departmental policy to put all mail routes up for tender at the expiry date?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare):

BURLINGTON BEACH BRIDGE

Mr. Houck:

1. How far are the plans finalized in connection with the bridge at Burlington Beach cut-off, connecting the Queen Elizabeth highway?
2. When will construction work begin?
3. What is the expected date of completion of this bridge?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. The plans for the new Burlington Beach bridge are being prepared by a consulting engineer working under instructions of the Ontario department of highways.

2 and 3. Information not available.

Questions

VANCOUVER GENERAL HOSPITAL

Mr. Goode:

1. What area in acres is occupied by the Vancouver General hospital?
2. How many patients may be accommodated in the hospital?
3. How many private pavilions are contained in the hospital proper, and containing how many beds?
4. How many private and semi-private wards are contained in the main buildings?
5. What is the total capital construction cost of the Vancouver General hospital?
6. How much money has been spent by the federal government to aid in this construction cost, before 1949 and since January 1, 1949?
7. Is federal money allocated on advice of the provincial government of British Columbia?

Mr. Robertson:

1 to 5. As this is a matter which comes within the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities it is suggested that the inquiry be directed to them.

6. Before 1949—nil. January 1, 1949 to date—$494,090.62.

7. Yes. Federal assistance is calculated and approved on the basis of information formally submitted by the provinces.

VANCOUVER GENERAL HOSPITAL

Mr. Goode:

1. How much in federal funds remains unspent on capital construction in connection with Vancouver General hospital?
2. How many registered nurses work at the hospital?
3. How many student nurses are training at the hospital?
4. How many nurses live in?
5. How many patients have been accommodated at the Vancouver General hospital in 1949, 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953, 1954?
6. What is the federal expenditure in aid, allocated to this hospital since 1949 in surgical and research equipment?
7. How many stretcher patients and patients entirely bed-ridden, on an average day, are accommodated in the Vancouver General hospital?

Mr. Robertson:

1. $62,000.

2 to 5. As this is a matter which comes within the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities it is suggested that the inquiry be directed to them.

6. Nil.

7. See answer to Nos. 2 to 5 above.

ANTIBIOTIC DRUGS

Mr. Huffman:

What have been the results in Canada of treatment of tuberculosis by the new antibiotic drugs?

Mr. Robertson: During the last few years, treatment with the new antimicrobial drugs, streptomycin, P.A.S. and isoniazid, has become the basic treatment for pulmonary tuberculosis. The death rate from tuberculosis in Canada in 1953 was one-third the death rate in 1948; 1948, 37·3/100,000 population; 1953—12·3/100,000 population.

Outstanding among the factors contributing to this striking decline is the fact that since 1948 the federal government has provided over $3,500,000 under the national health grants program for the free treatment of tuberculosis by these new drugs.

SAINT'S REST RIFLE RANGE

Mr. Bell:

1. Has the land known as the Saint's Rest rifle range in Lancaster, New Brunswick, been sold by the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation or the Department of National Defence?
2. If so, when and at what price?
3. Was this sale by tender?
4. If so, was the highest tender accepted?
5. What were the amounts of the other tenders?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Yes, by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

2. On August 3, 1954, for $1,000—subject to covenants by the purchaser at his own expense to reclaim the land by the repair and replacement of a dike and sluiceway, and to indemnify the crown against all claims arising out of impairment of the said land or adjoining lands by reason of damage or destruction of the said dike and sluiceway.

3. No. In order to meet the conditions outlined in No. 2 above, the sale was negotiated with a purchaser approved by the marshlands commission for the parish of Lancaster county.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Answered by No. 3.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Lennard:

1. What has been spent to date on the restoration of the library of parliament?
2. Is the restoration being done by contract?
3. If so, what is the contract price?
4. If not, what is the estimated complete cost?
5. When will the restoration be completed?

Mr. Bourget:

1. $702,554.95 as of December 1, 1954.

2. Yes.

3. The original contract was based on an estimated cost of approximately $1,000,000. As demolition progressed, it became clear that the work of rehabilitation would be considerably more extensive than was originally estimated with consequent greater cost. It is now estimated that the final cost will be $2,398,000.

4. See answer to No. 3.

5. It is estimated construction work will be completed by April 1956.

POST OFFICE BUILDING, SELKIRK, MAN.

Mr. Bryce:

1. What are the plans of the Post Office Department regarding a new post office at Selkirk, Manitoba?
2. Has the site been purchased?
3. If so, when will construction start?

Mr. Pinard:

1. The present accommodation at Selkirk is not considered adequate for the proper operation of this post office. Consequently the Post Office Department has recommended that the public works department give consideration to the erection of a new building.

2. No.

3. Answered by No. 2.

INFLUENZA

Mr. Carrick:

What, if anything, is being done by the federal government to develop methods of protection against influenza?

Mr. Robertson: The Department of National Health and Welfare has taken steps, under the national health grants program, toward developing and testing a vaccine which it is hoped will confer immunity to influenza.

With funds provided under the public health research grant influenza vaccine has been produced at the institute of microbiology, University of Montreal, and is being tested this year in 8,000 human volunteers in the province of Quebec, by the staff of the institute of microbiology, and members of the Department of National Health and Welfare. A special objective of this study is to compare the effects of aerosal-booster doses, with vaccinations given in the conventional manner.

PUBLIC BUILDING, NELSON, B.C.

Mr. Hansell:

1. What progress has been made to date in the erection of the public building at Nelson, British Columbia?
2. What kind of heating equipment is being installed and what is the estimated cost of this equipment?
3. If the equipment is coal burning equipment, what is the estimated yearly cost of this fuel?
4. If the equipment is oil burning equipment, what is the estimated yearly cost?

Mr. Bourget:

1. The contract for the construction of the building was awarded on September 27, 1954. About 20 per cent of the work has been completed.

2. (a) Oil burning equipment; (b) approximately $1,550.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. Approximately $3,500.

ASSOCIATED AIRWAYS—FREIGHT SERVICE TO NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Harkness:

1. Did the Associated Airways Limited apply for a licence to operate a scheduled freight service from Edmonton to various points in the Northwest Territories and/or the Yukon?
2. If so, on what date or dates was this application heard by the air transport board?
3. What was the decision of the board and what was the date on which this decision was made?
4. If the decision was in the negative, what were the reasons for the refusal of this licence?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. Yes.

2. July 19 and 20, 1954, at Edmonton, Alberta.

3. The board denied the application on November 30, 1954.

4. The reasons for the board's action can be found in the board's decision of November 30, 1954, which is a public document.

FARM PRODUCTS IN STORAGE

Mr. Thatcher:

1. As at January 1, 1955, what farm products did the government, including any branch, corporation or agency thereof, have in storage?
2. What was the total original cost of each such product?

Mr. Gardiner:

1. Butter and eggs.

2. Butter—$42,156,820.93; eggs—$925,297.20.

INCOME TAX APPEAL NO. 227

Mr. Knowles:

1. When did the appellant company in income tax appeal board case No. 227, heard in November, 1954, actually purchase the property referred to in the judgment of the board concerning this case?
2. Were any contracts awarded by the federal government, or any department or agency thereof, to the appellant company or to its subsidiary, as referred to in the said judgment, at any time prior to the purchase of the property in question?
3. If so, what was the nature of such contracts?
4. Are any contracts between the appellant company or its subsidiary and the federal government, or any department or agency thereof, now under consideration?
5. Have any members of the federal government, or any officials or representatives of the federal government or any department or agency thereof, been entertained at the property referred to in the judgment, at any time?
6. If so, who?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, this question calls for an oral answer. The answer to the first part of the question is May 13, 1952.

With respect to the second part of the question, I would ask that the words "at any time" be clarified. That could go back to the beginning of time or to confederation. There should be some limit within which we would have to make an inquiry as to whether or not there had been any contracts. If the hon. gentleman would signify a reasonable time we shall attempt to give an answer.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister go back to the time when the company was incorporated?

Mr. McCann: Do you know that?

Mr. Knowles: I take it that the minister does; he was the respondent in the case.

Mr. McCann: No, I do not know when it was incorporated.

Mr. Fulton: The minister can find it out quite easily.

Mr. Fleming: The Secretary of State can tell him that quite easily.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps that part of the question can stand and the minister and the hon. member may get together in order to define what they mean by "at any time".

Mr. McCann: The answer to the third part of the question depends upon the answer to the second part.

The answer to No. 4 is "no."

Then as to Nos. 5 and 6, we have made a great number of inquiries and so far have not been able to find anyone who has been entertained at this place.

NARCOTIC DRUG PROBLEM

Mr. Philpott:

1. What has happened with respect to the conference which the attorney general of British Columbia proposed to convene with the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the federal government to discuss the narcotic drug problem?

2. Has the federal government made any suggestion for consideration with the province of British Columbia respecting the establishment of a treatment centre for narcotic drug addicts?

Mr. Robertson:

1. The attorney general of British Columbia wrote to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on November 18 enclosing a copy of a letter which he had sent to the attorneys general of Ontario and Quebec and to the Minister of Justice. In this communication he suggested a conference to be held in Toronto or in Ottawa prior to the end of 1954 to consider a joint study of the drug problem for the purpose of developing an approach to the treatment of narcotic addiction on what would be virtually a national scale.

On November 30, the Minister of National Health and Welfare advised the attorney general of British Columbia that he would be very glad to have representatives of the Department of National Health and Welfare attend any meeting he might arrange. The minister also took this opportunity to point out that even though federal responsibility would seem to lie in the field of legal distribution and enforcement, the federal government had felt for some time that the solution of the drug problem was one that would not wholly be met by enforcement. The minister pointed out the steps that he had initiated some two years previously in which he raised with the ministers of health of all the provinces of Canada the desirability of some study of the narcotic problem with a view to the establishment of suitable treatment facilities and procedures.

2. On December 3, 1954, the Minister of National Health and Welfare again wrote to the attorney general of British Columbia suggesting that the federal government would be prepared to consider arrangements whereby the William Head quarantine station on Vancouver island could be made available to the province for operation by it as a treatment centre for drug addicts in the province of British Columbia. The minister also suggested that some financial assistance might be provided under the federal hospital construction grant to take care of part at least of any alterations that might be required in order to make the premises suitable to the province for the purpose of a treatment centre.

The minister has had no reply to either communication and is still waiting word from the attorney general of British Columbia with respect to the date and place of the conference suggested, as well as with respect to the proposal made respecting the William Head quarantine station.

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—TRANSFER OF FISHERIES SERVICES

Mr. Bell:

1. Has the Department of Fisheries transferred during the past year, and/or does it contemplate transferring any of its services or facilities from Saint John?

2. If so, how many employees are involved?

Mr. MacNaught:

1. No service or facility has been transferred from Saint John during the past year, nor is such action contemplated in the immediate future.

2. Answered by No. 1.

POST OFFICE SITE, NORTH BATTLEFORD

Mr. Campbell:

1. Has the Department of Public Works acquired a site for a post office in North Battleford?

2. If so, will the building be proceeded with this year?

Mr. Bourget:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

IMPERIAL OIL COMPANY—FEDERAL SUBSIDY

Mr. Argue:

1. Is any federal government subsidy paid to the Imperial Oil company?
2. If so, what is the amount and purpose of the subsidy?
3. Is any part of the subsidy paid to the Imperial Oil company on its Norman Wells operations?
4. If so, what is the amount and nature of such subsidy?

Mr. Pinard:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. No.
4. Not applicable.

CONSTRUCTION CAMPS—SANITARY CONDITIONS

Mr. Buchanan:

Is there any control by the federal government over sanitary conditions in construction camps on federal projects?

Mr. Robertson: Yes. The public health engineering division of the Department of National Health and Welfare is responsible for administering the Public Works Health Act and regulations. All major construction camps of federal projects are examined frequently by the department's engineers to ensure that the requirements of the act and regulations are fully met.

POST OFFICE BUILDING, TEESWATER, ONT.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce):

1. Has the government purchased a site for a new post office in Teeswater, Ontario?
2. If so, on what date was the purchase made?
3. What was the purchase price?
4. Has any work been done on the site purchased? If so, what type of work?
5. Have plans yet been made for erecting a post office on the site purchased?
6. If so, what size and type of building do such plans cover?
7. When do such plans call for completion of the building?

Mr. Bourget:

1. Yes, two properties purchased.

2 and 3. One property purchased from Milby A. McDonald on March 4, 1953, for $2,000. One property purchased from the trustees of Teeswater Presbyterian church on February 24, 1953, for $800.

4. No.

5. No.

6 and 7. Answered by No. 5.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

HOSPITALS, BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Goode:

1. How many beds are available in hospitals from the eastern boundary of Vancouver to the city of Chilliwack, including the Fraser valley?
2. What is the allocation of federal funds for these hospitals before 1949, since January 1, 1949?
3. How many nurses are being trained in these hospitals?
4. Is federal money allocated to these hospitals on advice of the provincial government of British Columbia?
5. Has any provincial request for funds for these hospitals, for capital construction, been refused since 1949?

Mr. Pinard: Return tabled.

RENTALS CHARGED, CHARLOTTETOWN

Mr. Matheson:

What rentals were charged by the government to the various tenants on the federal building site at Charlottetown from the time possession of the buildings was gained until they were razed for the construction work on the new building which is underway at the present time?

Mr. Bourget: Return tabled.

TENDERS FOR PRINTING

Mr. Harkness:

1. When tenders for printing are asked for by the queen's printer, what means are taken to inform printers that tenders will be received?
2. During the last six months how many invitations to tender have been sent to printers: (a) in the province of Ontario; (b) in the province of Quebec; (c) in the maritime provinces; (d) in the four western provinces?

Mr. Pinard: Return tabled.

COST PLUS CONTRACTS

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Since March 31, 1954, how many contracts, if any, have been let by the Department of National Defence, the Department of Defence Production or the Department of Public Works, (a) on a basis of "cost plus a per cent"; (b) on a basis of cost plus a fixed fee?
2. What was the dollar value of each such contract, and to what company was it given?

TELEVISION AND RADIO SETS—EXCISE TAX

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough):

1. What was the total number of television sets sold in Canada, during the last ten months of 1954?
2. What was the total amount of excise tax collected on these sets, during the last ten months of 1954?
3. What was the total amount of excise tax turned over to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on the sale of these sets, during the last ten months of 1954?
4. What was the total number of radios sold in Canada, during the last ten months of 1954?
5. What was the total amount of excise tax collected on radio sets, during the last ten months of 1954?
6. What was the total amount of excise tax turned over to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on the sale of these sets, during the last ten months of 1954?
7. What was the total sale value of television sets sold, during the last ten months of 1954?
8. What was the total sale value of radio sets sold, during the last ten months of 1954?

SHELLFISH

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte):

What protection is given the consumer in Canada of shellfish in respect of the sanitary quality of shellfish?

Mr. Pinard: Return tabled.

NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE

Mr. Knowles:

1. Since January 1, 1954, how many organizations, if any, in briefs or submissions to the federal government, or to any minister or ministers thereof, have urged the enactment of national health insurance?
2. What are the names of the organizations which have made such a request?
3. What has been the government's reply to these requests?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WATER POLLUTION, NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, since the 1st day of February, 1954, which have passed between any department of the provincial governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and any department of the federal government, relative to the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river, and any recommendations which have been determined upon to meet the situation on the said river or, in general, on interprovincial rivers.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): With the usual reservation.

Mr. Speaker: Motion agreed to subject to the reservation made by the minister.

PURCHASE OF PROPERTY, SARNIA

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Department of Transport and/or the Canadian National Railways and Messrs. W. C. Nelson and D. F. Stonehouse, since May 1, 1953 to date, with respect to property in Sarnia or Point Edward purchased by W. C. Nelson and D. F. Stonehouse.

Mr. Marler: The files of the Department of Transport have been searched and no record can be found of any communication between the department and Messrs. W. C. Nelson and D. F. Stonehouse with respect to property in Sarnia or Point Edward purchased by W. C. Nelson and D. F. Stonehouse. With respect to the Canadian National Railways, in accordance with the established practice consistently approved by parliament the management take the position that they should not be called upon to make public correspondence or any other documents which relate to the internal management of the railway. In the circumstances, perhaps the hon. member would be agreeable to withdrawing his motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreeable?

[Mr. Fraser (Peterborough).]

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Yes; we will get the information in another way.

Mr. Speaker: Motion withdrawn.

TABER, ALTA., POST OFFICE BUILDING

Mr. Wylie:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents which have passed between any department of the federal government and any person or persons, from January 1, 1949, to date, in connection with the building and official opening of the Taber, Alberta, post office.

FRUIT

BRITISH COLUMBIA APPLES—REPORTED POOR CONDITION ON SCOTTISH MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of recent newspaper reports that one sad highland shopkeeper at Inverness, Scotland, has discovered a few damaged apples in a box of British Columbia apples, and in view of the minister's interest in the sale of Canadian apples in Great Britain, could the minister inform the house if he has had any investigation made into the handling of Canadian apples after they leave Canada? If so, can the minister give the house any information on this question?

Mr. Nowlan: Buy Nova Scotia apples.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The first shipments arrived early in December in good condition and brought premium prices at auction. Shipments arriving later in the month showed some evidence of bruising and, as a result, brought lower prices at auction.

On receipt of this information the shippers were contacted in an effort to trace the individual shipments, with a view to ascertaining if the bruising resulted from rough handling in transit. This investigation is still continuing.

It should be pointed out that this is not a government to government transaction, but a private sale between Canadian exporters and wholesalers in the United Kingdom. Both the Canadian apple packers and the British distributors are vitally concerned with finding an explanation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN NAVAL REGULATIONS RESPECTING USE OF ALCOHOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence in connection with the investigation now going on into the recent occurrence on H.M.C.S. Magnificent. I should like to ask him whether or not a report was made in 1949 following the Mainguy commission with reference to the use of intoxicating liquors by ratings and officers in the navy and whether, instead of punishment being given to the naval ratings in this case, consideration might be given to equalizing the regulations so those that now apply to ratings will be made equally applicable to officers.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I thank the hon. member for intimating something of the nature of the question he intended to ask. With reference to the first point, there was a recommendation in the Mainguy report that consideration of the terms under which the use of alcohol on shipboard would be permitted should be reviewed by the naval authorities in the light of present conditions. I understand that subsequently a naval board did review the conditions and the regulations and the members of the board indicated that they felt that the situation as it then existed was satisfactory and recommended that no change be made.

I may say that the regulations are of long standing. There are regulations governing the use of alcohol by ratings. There are other regulations governing the use of alcohol on shipboard by petty officers. There are still other regulations with respect to the use of alcohol by officers on shipboard. These regulations have been in effect for a long time and following the review by a naval board and the recommendation to which I have referred they have remained unchanged.

With respect to the second question as to the remission or otherwise of punishment, with all due respect to the hon. gentleman I think the question is premature because service tribunals will first have to deal with these matters if and when charges are laid. Their decisions must then be reviewed by naval authorities. It would be only after any punishment that might have been awarded had gone through this process that it would come before me. I do not think that I should commit myself or make any comment on a punishment that is so far from being a fact.

If I recollect the last question correctly, it had to do with amendments to the regulations in order to make the same regulations applicable to officers, petty officers and men. I am told that these regulations were based on a careful appraisal of all the facts. One of the factors upon which the regulations dealing with the men were based was the difficulty of stowage and supervision of a certain amount of liquor on shipboard. Of course the men have their wet canteens ashore, so that what I have said only applies to ships.

The use of alcohol by officers on shipboard is most carefully supervised. As a matter of fact a record has to be kept of each officer and they are strictly under the captain's jurisdiction. I do not think it would be advisable to consider changes in the regulations in effect in view of the fact that they have been so long established and of the added fact that they have been reviewed comparatively recently.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How long have they been in effect?

Mr. Campney: I have not been able to get the exact date, but it is a great many generations.

CIVILIAN USE OF LONG BRANCH RIFLE RANGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he can now give an answer to my question in regard to the use of the Long Branch rifle range.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend's question was brought to my attention just a short while ago and I will try to give an answer within the next day or two.

GRAIN

FREIGHT ASSISTANCE—REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF CHANGE IN POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the corrections which he has made on pages 716 and 717 of Hansard, and in view of the further representations which have been received from the poultrymen of British Columbia, would he correct the statement he made on page 715 in view of the finality there given regarding the removal of freight assistance to feed grains going into British Columbia?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Unfortunately for my hon. friend, that is not subject to correction.

[Later:]

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question relating to the matter of feed grain assistance. He was asked yesterday if he would consider offering a reduction as it applies to British Columbia and he gave the answer that unfortunately that could not be done. I would like to ask him whether, in view of the shortage of feed grain which exists, particularly for the cattle industry in the interior, he would at least consider postponing the effective date of reduction in order that the cattle growers there can get their cattle through the winter without an increase in cost.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, as was said at the time the announcement was made, this is a matter which comes within the same category as announcements with regard to changes in tariffs, and there are too many opportunities for persons to take advantage of any delay in the matter of bringing it into effect. As a matter of fact, if it had not been for that we probably would not have taken action as of February 1, but because of the many ways in which people could take advantage of a decision which was only going to come into effect at a later date we found that impossible.

EGGS

ALLEGED PURCHASE FROM PRODUCERS AT LESS THAN SUPPORT PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the floor price on eggs now stands at 38 cents, is it permissible for egg dealers in central Ontario to buy eggs from the producers at 26 to 29 cents?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to have information on which I could base some action before giving an answer to that question. I have been following the press very carefully, and I have not noticed that price for grade A large eggs listed in any particular area.

Mr. Hodgson: I have that information and I will see that the minister gets it.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

BELL ISLAND, NFLD., REPORTED DIFFICULTY IN SECURING PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour, notice of which I hope he has received. In view of the reported difficulty in securing unemployment insurance payments which is being experienced by many of the 500 miners laid off at Bell island before Christmas, can the minister assure the house that an immediate investigation will be made into this situation and all possible assistance given to those in need?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, after I received the hon. member's question at noon today I asked the unemployment insurance commission to investigate the complaint and, if the situation is as stated, to correct it as soon as possible.

CHEESE

REGULATIONS APPLYING TO IMPORTATIONS FROM NEW ZEALAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, on January 26 I asked the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. McCubbin) a question in regard to the effects of the importation of cheese. At that time I asked if cheese imported into Canada was subject to the same regulations as cheese for home consumption, and I was promised an answer. I wonder if the minister can give that answer now.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but my assistant has been in hospital since the day that question was asked, but I shall look into the matter.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Thank you.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last night, after I had been given the privilege of speaking for a few minutes, I was dealing with the uncertainty created in different branches of our primary and secondary industries throughout Canada by the unsound and unfair tax and tariff policies of the present government.

In fact, I do not know whether that is a proper description because I think earlier in my remarks I said they had no fixed policy in either regard. However, that adds to the uncertainty which no one doubts, who has an interest in the basic industries of this country.

It is not my intention to speak at any length today because the government seems to be in a hurry—the first hurry I have seen them in for a long time—and wish to get to the vote. I know they are anxious to get at least one vote over. In fact, I believe I observe that they would rather vote than listen to me.

There is no doubt that there are some very important matters deeply concerning the people of this country at this time. It seems to me that when a person does not know where he is going he usually asks directions from someone. Since this government has shown such a lack of direction in policy I have often wondered—

An hon. Member: —why they did not ask you a long time ago.

Mr. Rowe: If they had listened to my suggestions we might be in a better position now.

An hon. Member: You might have volunteered.

Mr. Rowe: Evidently, in view of their lack of action. It seems to me that in trade matters the government has just been blind-flying. But, as I mentioned, if a person is doubtful of his way he usually asks someone the direction, and I wondered whom the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) or his twin commercial traveller, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), asked in our great agricultural industry before he reduced the tariff under New Zealand and Australian treaties from seven cents to one cent per pound on New Zealand cheese. I wonder whom he asked before he reduced the tariff of 35 per cent on meat to a tariff of half a cent on mutton and lamb, or allowed free entry from 35 per cent on canned pork, canned beef, canned poultry, and other meats not otherwise provided for.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask whether the hon. member is referring to the duty against New Zealand and Australia or the duty against the United States?

Mr. Rowe: The general tariff duty is what I am now referring to. I am not trying to give the Minister of Agriculture a lesson on tariffs. I only want to tell him that there is not a farmer or farmer's representative within the sound of my voice that does not shudder to think of what it will do to the agricultural industry of this dominion.

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend does not understand, I might point out that the duty on lamb coming from Australia and New Zealand is half a cent per pound, and the duty on lamb coming from the United States is 7½ per cent.

Mr. Rowe: I knew that and I am glad I obtained some information from the government. I do not know that the way tariffs have been juggled is in the interests of the farmers. For instance, can anyone in this house advise me whom it is going to help or how many consumers it is going to help? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in western Canada the other day stated that he did not believe that these friends of the government who are handling 2½ million pounds of New Zealand cheese would lower the price of New Zealand cheese, that he thought they would keep it up, even though that very morning the same New Zealand producers were selling cheese in Britain for 10 cents a pound less than we were trying to get for our cheese in Canada. The price of 18½ cents and 19·1 cents was quoted as the price in London, England, for the very same grade of cheese, from the very same country.

The Minister of Agriculture out west stated that the farmers need not worry too much or that the dairymen need not worry too much because there is only 2½ million pounds coming in and he did not think they would lower the price. If they are not going to lower the price, it will not help any consumers; and if you are going to put 2½ million pounds or 2¼ million pounds of cheese on the market that now has more cheese to sell than they have ever had before—

Mr. Gardiner: That is not correct.

Mr. Rowe: They are your own figures. You said there were 41 million pounds; there are 10 million pounds in the province of Ontario alone and we know that the cheese producers in Ontario—not your government but the cheese producers of Ontario—have put up $1 million of their own money to try to get rid of the surplus they now have. So you are not helping them very much. Judging by their remarks recently, I do not think they are very happy about your throwing 2½ million more pounds on their market. You do not help the consumer. You do not help the cheese producer. Whom do you help? The single company that is handling it.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Rowe: By 2½ million pounds.

Mr. Gardiner: To answer that, Mr. Speaker, may I say that it was not any company here that asked for the cheese to come into Canada. It was New Zealand.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, that is a very bright remark.

Mr. Gardiner: It is a bright remark.

Mr. Rowe: Yes; it is brighter than some you have made but still it is not very bright. But, Mr. Speaker, we know that the dairymen of Ontario did not ask you to do that. That is why I mention the point that when you do not know where you are going, why do you not ask somebody? Did the dairymen or the cheese producers ask you to do this?

Mr. Gardiner: It was not Americans who asked us who want to ship cheese into the United States. We asked them for the right. We raised objection to the United States trying to keep it out and it was the New Zealanders who asked us for the right to send this cheese in here. If we had taken the same position with regard to them as the Americans are accused of taking with regard to us, they would have made the same criticism of our actions as we make of the Americans.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, that is another interruption but it still does not add much in the way of light, especially in view of the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said they did not need to give them that right because he said they could send it in under the ordinary practice.

Mr. Gardiner: No ordinary duties kept it out, but we ask them to keep out cheese.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Since my name has been brought into the discussion, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might make a statement. The duty on cheese was the duty fixed under the British Empire preferential trade agreement in the period when the Conservative party was in power. That has never been changed since. Any suspension of shipments was due to requests from us to New Zealand to help us over an emergency. The reasons that created the emergency had passed and we reverted to the tariff imposed by the Bennett government in 1932.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce had better get his own customs indexes and books out and get them corrected because that is not the case with reference to the articles to which I have referred—mutton, lamb and meat products.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You were talking about cheese.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, the whole picture is an example of the uncertainty of the fiscal policy or an example of the lack of fiscal policy of this government.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You are dodging the question.

Mr. Rowe: That is why today we are left in this position, where the dairymen have just as much uncertainty as ever as to where they are going next year in production, or whether they should get rid of their milk cows and export them to the United States or some place else, in many cases. As the minister said the other day, the only hope he could give, so far as surpluses were concerned, is that the grass might be shorter next year than it was this year. In other words, if we have a big crop of grass, and if the grass grows strong next summer, we might have surpluses again. Our wheat situation is more or less in the same position. If the weather is good and if we have a bumper crop of wheat, the government has not offered any new policy with regard to what they are going to do with it. Not only should consideration be given to the agricultural industry—and I think it is an important one. I think the Minister of Agriculture should take into account the fact that Australia and New Zealand have the cheapest production of livestock products of almost any country in the world. The fact that they have 167 million sheep—just about 80 times as many as we have in Canada—gives one some idea as to what a threat that can be to the livestock industry in this country; the fact that on your minister's own statement yesterday we have now imported, in just the year past, at least three times as much cheese as we did the year before from New Zealand and Australia.

Mr. Gardiner: Three times as much lamb.

Mr. Rowe: Three times as much lamb; that is right. Yet the minister thought it was not going to make much difference to the farmers who produce lamb. The farmers who had lamb to sell last week noticed that the price went down about 20 per cent of the total price, while the minister and I were talking about it here in parliament.

Mr. Gardiner: It was 22 cents yesterday and today.

Mr. Rowe: It was 19 cents yesterday morning and there is still more coming. We cannot find out how much is coming but the report is that there is a large shipment coming.

I think the uncertainty as to a fiscal policy has done little to encourage agricultural production or to encourage employment. The proposals which have recently been made do little to help the gold industry of this country, which is another basic industry. Employment generally throughout this country has not been improved by the importation either of cheaply produced agricultural or industrial products.

If I have done nothing else, I hope that I have intimated that our party stands for the development of our own resources here in our own country. I know that we shall hear out on the hustings the rumblings from those who still cling to the old free trade doctrine that that policy means high tariffs. I know we shall hear these people, for the purpose of convenience, saying that we are against the export of raw products. Let me say this, Mr. Speaker. Any child in school who knows anything at all about the history of this dominion knows that we have large quantities of raw products such as iron ore, forest products, minerals and other resources that we must sell to the world. We all know very well that there are many articles we should buy.

I am not going to repeat what I said last evening about the uncertainty of tariffs that are kept in effect by the fiscal policy of this government. The record shows exactly where they stand. We have unnecessary tariffs against products that we do not produce in Canada at all. I would therefore hope that some of my free-trade friends some day, in the quiet of one of their caucuses, would urge upon their government—if they are so greatly concerned about the consumer—to take some of the tariffs off the articles that the consumers want to buy but that we do not produce in Canada at all rather than urge them to take off tariffs or lower duties in order to encourage the importation into Canada of products that we are trying to sell and whose production is giving employment. It is just as plain and as simple as if one said that you have a tariff against what you want and you have freedom to import foreign employment and leave unemployment in this country. I think it is just about as simple as that.

No matter how this government argues, they have not changed this situation. No matter how much they argue that their trade policy is so broad and free that nobody should even state it or no matter how they argue that they are the farmers' friends, we know that, so far as the dairy industry is concerned, never before in the history of this country have we had such a large importation of substitutes for dairy products. Never before have we had as large a surplus of dairy products as we had at the beginning of this year. These facts stand clearly before the dairymen of this country.

I know what the government believes. They have said they do not believe we are going to have any more importations; they hope not. Perhaps there will not be any for a while, but we do not know whether or not there is a boatload or a carload of lamb coming in now. I have asked the government if they would not give consideration to holding those lamb shipments off the market until the months when it would affect our market the least. I hope they will take that into consideration.

I realize that today the government is trying to broaden the markets for our products. But when we find our unfavourable trade balance increasing, when we find that our favourable trade balance of a couple of years ago has disappeared, when we see what is happening to these basic industries, then I believe we might be pardoned for drawing the attention of the government to these factors. We should not be labelled as apostles of gloom if we do not pat this government on the back every time we speak.

I am not an alarmist, Mr. Speaker, but I am quite concerned when I think about what is happening under these policies. If our economy were not supported by the defence program which demands so much production for destruction rather than production for distribution, I wonder what would happen. This government has been fortunate in that regard in so far as trade is concerned. It is true they have been faced with many problems, and I am in full agreement with the government's attitude today, as has been so well expressed by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he said that we do not contribute anything by discussing certain matters at this critical moment.

It does often bother me, however, when after appeals have been made to the government to cut down some expenditures to ease the burden on industries and taxpayers generally, I see increases in civil expenditures. Then the government almost frightens us with talk about the terrible destruction with which we may be faced. We all share a common concern about that. Never have we in this house faced more critical days than we are facing now. In spite of that, we see that the largest reduction in expenditures lies in the area of defence expenditures. We have never at any time criticized defence expenditures as a general principle; in fact we have encouraged them. We have been in full agreement with the government about the necessity of being ready. It does seem strange that economy should be practised in our defence expenditures at a time when the situation is growing more tense and more critical, while extravagance continues in civil expenditure which we have all been pleading with the government to reduce.

This great big government is today the silent partner of every enterprise in Canada. They take the first bite out of every bit of our people's profit; they take about 50 per cent of practically everything a corporation makes. They take a large percentage of every hour's endeavour in Canada. I believe it is highly desirable that they try to prepare for peace as well as build for war. In the meantime, if conditions continue as serious as they are, we must economize in our civil expenditures; economize everywhere we can, in order that we may have money to spend for our very survival. If we do not have to face that awful day, and we all pray that we will not have to do that, if we can avoid the heavy expenditure involved in a period of war, then we are going to have to have sound fiscal policies, sound taxation policies as well as free enterprise, so that the people will be prepared to take the risk and build for peace and a higher standard of living. At that time we hope we can get back to normal, producing things for a good standard of living rather than implements of destruction.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that I have not been unfair to the government because I realize they have heavy responsibilities and I notice they are growing more weary as the time passes.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): I fully realize that brevity is the soul of wit, Mr. Speaker. I am therefore very happy to say that I too shall try to be brief. I do not wish at this time to take up too much of the time of hon. members. However, I have one or two remarks that I think are of some importance. I certainly heard one observation the other day that was news to me, and that is that there is some timidity in the Liberal party. I found that in my good friend, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Mang), when he said that he was of a timid nature.

The other day the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) told us he was going to make some remarks which might make him unpopular, and then he went on to say something about the premier of British Columbia, who it appears was a pupil of the hon. member. I do not know why that should prove to be particularly unpopular with the people of British Columbia, because certainly the hon. member was an apt instructor. He was able to teach the premier that progress comes to those who search for a way to improve static or retrograde conditions. The premier of British Columbia took advantage of such excellent instruction and drifted away from that static or retrograde condition.

The hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis) has indicated that while he may know a great deal about the province of Quebec, apparently he knows very little about the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia. In order that the hon. member may learn more about these provinces I am going to send him a blue pamphlet published by the Social Credit League of Alberta entitled "Do you know?". This tells about Alberta. Also a publication entitled "Two Years of Progress by Social Credit in British Columbia". I am sure these will prove most enlightening to the hon. member and his colleagues if they will just take the time to study them. I notice the hon. member is not in his place, so I shall send these to his office.

I would be remiss in my duty if I did not congratulate the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They did an excellent and commendable job, and deserve to be congratulated.

I have other congratulations to offer. I want to congratulate the government upon the announcement which was made by Senator Reid that the breakwater at White Rock would be extended. You may be sure that announcement was enthusiastically received by the people of my area. I have another item here upon which I want to congratulate the government. The article dealing with this is short and I should like to read it, as I think it will prove interesting to some people. This article appeared in the British Columbian of December 7 and reads:

Tenders in January on Federal Building

Tenders for New Westminster's big new federal building-post office will be called in January, Bill Mott, former Liberal MP, told the Columbian today.

The bids originally were to be called this month, but Mr. Mott said he was advised by R. O. Campney, minister of defence, that steel work plans, being drawn in Vancouver, have been delayed for a month.

I want to congratulate the government upon making that formal announcement, and more particularly for seeing to it that this was done with such expedition. Then there is another item about which I should like to congratulate the government, having to do with a mail carrier service at North Surrey. In this connection I want to say that I place no blame on any minister, on any member of the civil service or anyone else; I blame only those parties who are, let us say, embroiled in making this announcement. This particular announcement appeared in the British Columbian of December 8 and reads:

Carrier Delivery for North Surrey Okayed

Federal post office officials in Ottawa have approved carrier delivery service for 2,918 homes and businesses in the North Surrey area.

Former member of parliament Bill Mott said today he learned through the Hon. Ralph Campney of the approval.

We are only too happy to have such approval given to this and other projects. The government should be commended for seeing to it that these things are done, and I might say well done under the circumstances. I should like also to congratulate the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) upon the opening of the Cloverdale post office this year. This new post office is a credit to the community, and everyone is most appreciative. I might say that the senator opened it, and it was an auspicious opening. I thank the Minister of Public Works for asking me to attend, and I might add that I was there.

But the people of my area would be much happier if certain other things were done, apart from those covered by these particular announcements. I think I could lay down an 11-point program which would make everybody in the community fairly happy. My first item concerns agriculture. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is aware of the representations he has received. If he were to reinstate the feed allowances as they were previous to yesterday he would make a lot of farmers in my community very happy.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) would make us very happy if he would announce that the government was going to move the penitentiary away from New Westminster. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) would make many fishermen happy if he would only announce that fishing would continue as it was previously above the Pattullo bridge in New Westminster. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) could make the old age pensioners of British Columbia, as well as the provincial government, very happy by announcing that this government would assume a greater share of the expense of caring for our aged citizens.

The Minister of Public Works could help the thousands of people who are trying to add to their homes by revising the housing legislation so it would be possible for them to get assistance. The Minister of Public Works could make me doubly happy by inaugurating a new system of dredging in my area. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) could make me particularly happy by arranging to erect a new armoury building in New Westminster. The present building is a ramshackle affair and everybody in the city would be very happy to have a new building.

The Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) could make the people in British Columbia very happy by announcing that this government would spend many more dollars in contracts in British Columbia than they are spending at the present time. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) could make us happy by adopting the suggestion I made last year that a national park or national monument be created in the region in and around Point Roberts. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) knows of the representations which have been made by myself and the airport officials at Langley and he could make us happy by carrying through the suggestions they make.

I shall be magnanimous. I think the important thing is to have things done. I believe that is necessary if Canada is to progress. I do not care who makes the announcements. I would even be quite happy if the announcement that these things were being done was made by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton).

An hon. Member: Make it Kootenay East.

Mr. Hahn: That is right. I have some fault to find with the government; it is not all good. One fault I have to find is the government's policy toward provincial governments. A dominion-provincial conference is long past due. It should be realized that members of parliament are elected to manage national and international affairs, but it should not be forgotten that the people in the provinces elect the provincial governments as their representatives. They feel, and rightly so, that the provincial government should be held responsible to them, as the Liberal government has been held responsible to the people of all Canada in respect to dominion administration. They are answerable for their deeds in the same manner that we are. If British Columbia or Quebec, or any other province in Canada, passes legislation with which possibly we do not agree, then perhaps the reason is that it is just a bad egg from an old Liberal batch. There is only one way of curing it and I believe that is through a dominion-provincial conference.

An hon. Member: In a hotel room?

Mr. Hahn: The second fault I have to find with the government is not novel, I am sure, because it has to do with the question of high taxation. The Conservatives have told us taxes are too high. The socialists have told us the same. The Social Credit members and independents also claim they are too high. Even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has said they are too high and, if it will help any, I shall say also that they are too high. That pretty well makes us unanimous.

But the question is, "What makes them too high?" There are probably two particular reasons. One is that we are a social welfare state to a degree, and the other is defence expenditure. I cannot devote too much time to this question, but in the matter of the social welfare state I would say I do not believe there are many hon. members in this house who are opposed to the social welfare legislation now on the statute books. I think I am right in saying that most of our social welfare legislation was born of the depression years or during a period of conflict. In view of that fact I believe it is time we stopped and assessed the situation.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has indicated on more than one occasion that he would be only too happy to assist the aged and others in need if he could only find the ways and means. It is evidently agreed, then, that they need this assistance and the government is prepared to supply it but does not know exactly how it can be done. I would suggest it is time that a committee or some other such organization were set up to determine the means whereby we can correct our existing legislation so as to make it possible to assist those who are in need of help. Each party has different ideas in this regard, and it might be well to take that factor into consideration. It is not a case of being indifferent to the need for this legislation, but there may be a considerable difference of views among hon. members as to the amount required and the means of implementation.

One might take for example the discrepancy now existing, whereby we have wealthy people of 70 years of age and over who are receiving $40 per month, while at the same time we have those younger people who are very poor indeed and are not receiving the required assistance. Some of them are even denied the right to work. Our own civil service regulations do not permit some of them to take on particular types of jobs. In fact the only thing they can get is the air. That is pretty cheap, but there was a time when we had to pay for it, and I am referring to the old radio licence.

But seriously, Mr. Speaker, it is highly important to this nation that we see to it that there is no one in want, whether he be aged, blind, crippled, or in any other position that makes it impossible for him to live in the manner in which he is entitled to live. In saying that I do not mean that an individual should become a charge on the state. He should rather be one who has the privilege of doing something if he so wishes and thereby supplement his allowance if he is in need. However, that is just a thought as to a method of modification.

I believe the people who do most for the economy of this country are those who spend everything they earn. If we have senior citizens in this country or disabled or blind and they need more money in order to live, and through government assistance receive that money, they will do more for the economy of this country than any half dozen wealthy men who do not spend their money, because these people spend every penny they can earn and it is put back into circulation so that it becomes part of the bloodstream of the state.

I would therefore consider that it is most important for us as a parliament to urge this government to meet these needs if it is at all possible, and in this regard I would again emphasize that it is time to reassess our social welfare legislation. I shall probably have more to say on these particular items as they come up in the estimates later.

I have quite deliberately neglected to include war veterans allowances in this group, largely because I was pleased to note that the question is dealt with in the speech from the throne. I hope the impending legislation in this regard will meet the requests made by the veterans last year when they submitted their brief with respect to the amount of the allowance and the permissible ceiling. In this regard I wish to congratulate the hon. members for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) and Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. White) for joining me this year in putting on the order paper a resolution similar to the one I submitted last year, asking for consideration of this matter. The reason I congratulate both these hon. members is that their action indicates there is some uniformity of view among hon. members in this house, and that many of us are anxious to see that the war veterans receive the consideration which is their due.

Before dealing with the question of fisheries I would like to congratulate the government for including the removal of Ripple Rock in the speech from the throne. This has caused us many worries in the past in British Columbia, and it has been of particular concern to the wives of fishermen and others employed on boats.

I would particularly draw to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson). Speaking earlier in this debate the hon. member asked for an extension of fishing rights above the Pattullo bridge. I recall that last year the minister changed his ideas to a degree, and I was quite enthusiastic. However, the change was not sufficient. I applauded his action last year, and I would be very happy to continue that applause if he would only see fit to increase the period of time during which fishermen can fish above the Pattullo bridge.

In that regard, much has been said about the quality of the fish and the need for conservation. In this connection I should like to read some evidence taken from the Sloan report of 1940, pages 110 and 111, as given by Charles Lisson Smith, who was the production manager of Edmunds and Walker. I know the report is a few years old, but at the same time the fish are the same fish; they use the same river; the bridge is the same bridge, and I think the same situation holds good today. At least the fishermen are convinced that it does. I read from the report:

Q. Will you repeat again what you were telling us as to what is the business of the company?
A. We buy all British Columbia fish for the purpose of freezing, selling fish, and curing.
Q. In that connection what variety of salmon do you buy?
A. Spring salmon mostly.
Q. And from whom are these purchases made?
A. From anyone offering; for instance in the river, we take them from any fisherman bringing them in, but mostly it is from collectors who buy the fish and resell to us.
Q. Do you buy gillnet caught fish?
A. Yes.
Q. And purse seine caught fish?
A. Not very much.
Q. Will you tell us why?

I want you to note this answer particularly.

A. Purse seine fish are not very suitable for our business.
Q. You are speaking only of spring salmon, aren't you?
A. Yes.
Q. Tell us why they are not very suitable?
A. They seem to be damaged in the process of fishing or in the collecting. In any case before they reach us they are of inferior quality to either the trolled or gillnetted fish.
Q. Damaged in what way? Can you give us that more particularly?
A. Presumably in the brailing.
Q. In what way is this damage apparent?
A. The fish are smashed, the scales are off and they are bruised, broken.
Q. And does that render the fish of an inferior quality or grade for the particular purpose you require these fish?
A. Most certainly.
Q. In what way does it affect them?
A. No one will buy a battered up fish if you want to sell them fresh. If you want to spend money and put them in cold storage or dress and process them in the way of curing, why naturally no one will take on an article that is all broken and battered; it is not a fine fish any more.
Q. Do you find the same condition where you purchase from the gillnet fishermen?
A. Sometimes, but not so much so. Up river the fishermen have been educated that way for some considerable time, at least the fishermen selling to us. We get a very good quality from the gillnetters up the river.
Q. Up the river from where?
A. From New Westminster bridge.

That is the Pattullo bridge. It indicates that the quality of fish is just as good as that of any that are caught by the seine vessels, or more so. In respect of conservation I would quote Major James A. Motherwell, chief supervisor of fisheries in British Columbia under the federal government from 1921 until at least 1940. At page 105 they were speaking about competition and he was asked this question:

Q. Is it—

"It" meaning competition.

—controlled from an economic standpoint or from a conservation standpoint?
A. Conservation is not affected because we can control any kind of fishing.

[Mr. Hahn.]

There we have a case not of quality but a case of conservation. We have the same fishermen, the same people, who are quite capable of looking after the fishing industry. The fishermen themselves can do the conserving. They are just as co-operative as they were at that time. Undoubtedly the only regulation that needs to be changed is to have the conservation of fish controlled in a progressive manner from the gulf right on up the Fraser past the Pattullo bridge and on into Mission and the area where they do their spawning.

From my studies I find that the prosperity of a nation can be traced to its basic industry; or I might put it this way. The prosperity of a nation is directly proportionate to the prosperity of the basic industry. Our prosperity therefore comes from our hinterland. This applies federally, provincially and, to a lesser degree, locally. When the returns from production do not equal the cost of consumption, then our enterprise begins to fail.

In this respect I find that the dairymen and poultrymen have long known their stock, and that it produces properly only when it consumes properly. They realize that in order to have a cow give sufficient milk, or as much as they think it should give, they must first feed that cow well. In other words it is what the cow consumes that makes the milk. The same thing applies to poultry or any other product.

Today we see certain signs of breakdown of this economy. We have the poultrymen, the dairy producers, the grain growers, the stock raisers, the potato growers, the fishermen and others who complain and have complained, not just this year but last year as well, of the conditions with which they are confronted. For instance, the price of eggs was discussed in this house. We were told that the price is too low, that we should have a higher floor price under them.

One of the causes behind this situation is the price of feed. As I mentioned earlier, the Minister of Agriculture could make us happier at the coast if he were to raise the contribution in respect of feed rates and give us back the $5 he deducted, and make it possible for poultrymen to buy their feed at a lower cost. Another question in respect of eggs is the price spread between the A quality and the B quality. That matter was also mentioned.

Then as to the turkey raisers, I had the privilege of indicating to this house last year that there was a problem. At that time some people in the business called it dumping. It was not dumping in the true sense of the word because United States birds were selling for the same price in the United States as they were selling in Canada. However, the difference was this. The United States poultry raiser was the owner of a large feed plant and he was interested only in getting the price of his feed out of these birds, with the result that he made no profit on them. That put the Canadian producer in the awkward position of trying to compete with him.

As to the economic policy of this government—if there is such a thing as a policy in respect of some of these things, of which I am rather doubtful—let me say this. There has been much talk about butter and cheese and so on. It is a matter of argument as to whether or not there is a policy in respect of agriculture that is not just as loose as the minister's talk, when he says from time to time, "I did not mean that; I meant something else".

That is the essence of the whole thing. The only result of the increase in the price of feed is that the cost of production goes up, and with that increased cost of production we have, of necessity, an increase in the price to the ultimate consumer, whether it is eggs or whatever it may be. As to the wheat producers, they have their difficulties just as have the butter and cheese producers.

Therefore when you come to consider agriculture, what is the policy? Is the policy going to be that the government will pay for butter until it has a certain accumulation, then give it to hospitals? Is this to be a continuing policy? We should know these things. Certainly the merchants in this country are entitled to know something with regard to what they may expect.

The grain grower certainly has real cause for complaint. Here we have 19·5 per cent of the population receiving about 9 per cent of Canada's income. It is not enough that he is the backbone of the country but of necessity, because of our trade policy, he must be dependent only on the export market. This is true to a degree, but there is a domestic market over which we can have a certain measure of control. Because of this method of handling these things, he runs into difficulties. The same conditions apply to the hog producers. I know the Minister of Agriculture has received a telegram similar to the one I received concerning the effect of the feed situation on the hog raising business.

We all heard the excellent speeches by the hon. members for Queens (Mr. MacLean), and Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery) with regard to the potato growers. The same question was discussed last year in this house. I do not believe the solution lies so much in a tariff as in a change in the implementation of these regulations. It may be a matter that could be presented through our Minister of Finance. I would not be so ready to agree that we should increase the tariff. I am opposed to that in principle. I would rather see our tariff dates made more flexible, so they might come into operation at a time when they would be of much more assistance.

I realize that my time is getting short. I realize, as well, that the financial and economic policies of this government today are the same as they were when our good friend Adolf Schicklgruber, or Adolf Hitler as he was called, took us out of the last depression. I would, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), that the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following:

> We further regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take or to recommend the necessary fundamental economic and financial measures to place Canadian producers and workers on a sound and prosperous basis, and to ensure our economy against recurring recessions.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on a subject which is of special interest to the rural constituencies of eastern Canada and that of Beauce in particular, that is, the support price of butter. Every local of the Catholic farmers union—of which, I am glad to say, there is one in each parish of the constituency I represent—has expressed its views to the government on this problem, which is of great importance to these people.

Indeed, the dairy industry, being the main source of revenue for eastern farmers, constitutes the very basis of their economy. They may possibly—I am speaking here of the farmers of my own constituency—accept some lowering of the price of eggs, for instance, or beef or pork. Only a very few would be seriously affected by anything of this kind. However, at least in my constituency, I know very few who could withstand the shock of a sudden and prolonged drop in the price of butter.

The right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated in this house on January 14, 1955, as reported on page 186 of Hansard, that the present support price for butter will be continued until May 1 and that he was not in the habit of making decisions for a more distant future. This is no doubt an excellent reply as far as the right hon. minister is concerned, but it is somewhat disturbing for the farmers.

Some day soon the minister will have to make a decision, and it is precisely in an attempt to influence that decision, if possible, that I wish to state now the point of view of the farmers.

This year, there is a further reason to maintain a fair price for dairy products, in addition to reasons that already existed. Because last season was very wet, the hay and grain garnered last fall are of very poor quality, and the health of the livestock will be affected. Pastures will also be in poor condition this year, since the grazing on very wet ground has injured the grass roots. For these two reasons, which spring from the same cause, the yield from dairy herds will be much smaller next season. At least that is the opinion of reliable experts whom I had the advantage to consult these last few weeks. But that is not all. Farmers in my part of the country—or at least a great number of them —usually prepare their dairy cattle feed from their own grain. This year, they will not be able to do it because, as I say, the quality and the quantity of that grain will be inadequate. So, in order to get a reasonable yield, they will have to buy that feed, but its price is prohibitive at the present time, especially if we consider that the general farm income started to decline in 1953 and that this decline was still more pronounced in 1954.

Moreover, and also for the same reason, that is bad weather, all sorts of grain usually produced, to some extent for their own seeding, by the farmers of my district will not be of any use this year, they will have to buy it elsewhere. Now, the federated co-operatives of Quebec announced about a month ago the probable prices to be paid for this grain, which represent a very considerable increase, amounting to 100, and in certain cases even 150 per cent, even when compared to last year.

In order to cope with that contingency, the farmer must count on a reasonable and assured revenue.

Indeed, the present butter surplus, which seems to worry certain people, is not so large after all, for the very reason I have given just now, namely that owing to the very probable decrease in production during 1955, this surplus will, as could be said most appropriately, melt like butter in the pan.

And this difficult situation in the dairy industry—a situation which, I admit, must embarrass the government—might give us a good opportunity to examine our conscience, and review briefly the situation as to the margarine problem, that famous substitute to which the Department of National Health and Welfare devotes full pages of advertisement in their publications, though they are unable to say whether its food value is higher or lower than that of butter itself, or equal to it.

Some might think that the working people of our cities and towns are entitled to a low-priced product. I hope it won't be necessary for me to repeat here the argument that in order to supply jobs to our working classes the buying power of our population must be kept at a reasonably high level. And I don't know a more efficient way of lowering the buying power in general than to tolerate a drop in the price level of our farm products and, especially, of the dairy products and by-products of eastern Canada, and even, as a matter of fact, the price level of wheat in western Canada. That is an old familiar story which once more proved to be true, as late as 1953 or 1954.

Last year I congratulated the government for setting a floor price on butter. I pointed out, among other things, that not only had this policy protected the farmers, but that it had also protected the workers in that, besides maintaining the general level of purchasing power, it had prevented the shameful exploitation to which these people had been subjected throughout the winter of 1951-52. At that time they had to pay 90 cents or even a dollar a pound for butter stored by dealers a few months earlier, which had been bought for as little as 60 cents a pound.

I would fear that, unless the government maintain the 58 cent floor price beyond May 1 next, we shall see a repetition of this scandal. What would the good workers of our cities and towns say next winter if they had to contend not only with an unemployment problem, which shows no signs of abating quickly, but also with a fabulous rise in the cost of butter, or even that of margarine which, in similar circumstances, may well rise in the same way?

I wish to congratulate the government for their intention to offer 20 million pounds of butter to institutions at a price 21 cents lower than the ordinary price. Nevertheless in the statement which the minister made to the house in this connection, on January 28, there is something which rather puzzles me. This is what the official report has to say, on page 622:

> As has already been stated, the general objective in offering butter at the reduced price is to increase the total quantity of butter used in approved institutions throughout Canada.

The minister does not tell us the reason for wishing to increase butter consumption in these institutions. Could it be that he considers margarine as an unsuitable product? Could it be that, as I believe, butter consumption does not reach a reasonable level, having regard to the production of the same commodity?

In either case, there is a very simple way to reach the objective aimed at by this measure. It would consist in taking the necessary steps to restrict the use of margarine. In this, the government of the province of Quebec has given leadership and that is an example that other provinces and the federal government should follow. According to some experts, the policy of the Quebec government in this matter has led to the consumption of 50 million more pounds of butter than if the use of margarine had been allowed within the boundaries of that province, as is done elsewhere. At any rate, I believe there is no risk for anyone in the government maintaining its present policy of price support for butter.

On another subject, I should now like to tell the house and in particular the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) of the urgent request made by the great majority of my constituents of Beauce. They urge the government to increase family allowances. Like everyone else, I realize how easy it is to play politics about such a question. So, I shall not indulge in such ways, either in this house or in my constituency. On this question, I must say that I do not share the views of those who claim that we must increase family allowances to meet the unemployment situation. Family allowances were not established as a source of income for the needs of families; they would never be adequate for that. Their purpose is to make up for the inadequate wages of the family head. Consequently, when he gets no wages at all, as is the case in a period of unemployment, they cannot be replaced by family allowances, but rather by the unemployment insurance benefits, or again, which is much better no doubt, by work, whether regular or special.

The fact remains that, even if there were no unemployment, we would still have a very good reason to ask for an increase in the present rates, because, due to the high cost of living, these rates are far from being worth what they were when that excellent social welfare act was passed some ten years ago.

If the principle of the act was good ten years ago, it must still be good today, and if the rates set for its administration met, to a considerable extent, the needs of the times, we have to admit that it is not so today, for the cost of living has gone up quite a bit. Therefore I think it is only fair and reasonable that the government grant the requests of practically the whole population in the county of Beauce.

I wish to discuss briefly a somewhat more delicate problem and to dwell for a few minutes on certain statements made in this house on Wednesday, January 12, by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier).

I do not want to make too much of his speech but I do want to help this good member, and others like him if there are any, to get a better understanding of the province of Quebec. And I am sure that when he knows it better and when he sees it as it is, he will show the people of Quebec more sympathy than he did in his speech.

There are certain parts of that speech which I did not like but I will not dwell on them today. There was however one feature to which I took exception and which I want to take up here. The hon. member said that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) had gone to meet "the master of that other nation". These words appear on page 120 of Hansard. He meant by that the people of Quebec and their present leader. As far as the leader is concerned, I do not need to defend him for he usually defends himself pretty well, but I cannot accept, Mr. Speaker, the words "other nation" as applied to the racial group to which I belong.

As Canadians of French origin, we certainly belong to another nation vis-à-vis an American, a German, a Frenchman or an Englishman; but, with regard to another Canadian of English background, I won't admit it. And if my hon. friend insists that we are not of the same nation as he is, I shall have to maintain that he is not a Canadian. I, for my part, have many grounds to claim this title.

My first known ancestor was living in Canada 320 years ago, or, rather, he landed in Quebec in 1636. Since that time, most of his descendants, in unbroken lineage, have not left Canadian soil. I could, without leaving the house, find dozens of similar cases, and I apologize for having mentioned my own. If I do, it is because it is more accurately known to me.

Could, or would the hon. member who claims to belong to another nation than ours, tell us when his forefathers came to Canada? When mine arrived here, Quebec had scarcely been founded, and the district where my hon. friend resides was covered with virgin forest and inhabited by natives. If, today, he has the privilege to live in one of our most beautiful, wealthiest and most promising provinces, he can thank our forebears of French and Catholic origin. For they had enough courage, grit, self-denial and faith in Providence to risk — and sometimes to give — their lives in their adventurous westward quest, to row up or down dangerous rivers in their frail crafts, and boldly roam in the remote and boundless wilderness, forever apprehensive of the treacherous Iroquois, often allying themselves with the natives they subdued by their kindness and their charms, calmly accepting all setbacks and difficulties they met with, while marking their path with countless crosses, symbolic of their feelings and intentions. And my hon. friend would refer to the descendants of this group of pioneers as "another nation"?

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to inveigh against someone who utters such things; I pity him and feel sorry for him for knowing so little about the history of his country!

But, that is not all. This first group of Canadians, who opened up this country to civilization, also prevented its annexation to the United States, and that was the first step towards the independence which all Canadians—including, I do hope, the hon. member —enjoy today.

Another reason why I may rightfully consider myself a member of the Canadian nation is that the group to which I belong played a leading part in the economic, scientific as well as in the cultural and social development of Canada. If my hon. friend, while travelling through Quebec, had tried to see what constitutes an asset for this country, he would have met other people than a small group of socialists, communists or hare-brained people, as are found everywhere, but no more in Quebec than in British Columbia or in any other part of Canada. Such being the case a longer stay would have enabled him to discover that within this group which he calls "another nation" there are good farmers whose land was cleared 220 or even 300 years ago and which never fell into the hands of any other but the lineal descendants of the first occupants. He would also have seen thousands upon thousands of workers who are devoted to work well done and are in no way inferior to the skilled craftsman of other provinces. He would also have seen, built by members of this same group, large industries and businesses which contribute in no mean degree to the prosperity, not only of the province of Quebec but also of Canada as a whole. He would also have seen large hospitals or clinics of which some are unmatched in this country. He could have seen too three large universities, two or three smaller ones and a large number of colléges with an enrolment of 75,000, which annually confer degrees on those who have merited them in all branches of human endeavour.

Among these teaching institutions, he would have noted a great university and several colleges and schools directed by Anglo-Protestants enjoying the greatest freedom to teach according to the principles, beliefs and language of those directing and attending these institutions. He would have been greatly shocked, no doubt, to find out that in this part of the country in which, according to him, lives another nation, the taxpayers are never called upon to pay double tax for a double educational system, but instead choose freely to pay once only for the system they prefer. And his amazement would have reached a peak upon seeing that, moreover, of the money collected in taxes from a population, which is 82 per cent Catholic and French, a good part is turned over to Anglo-Protestant teaching institutions. His amazement would undoubtedly have been complete when he would have found out that the people of Quebec merely consider this a fair and normal situation.

The hon. member should then have been in a position to examine his conscience and ask himself whether the same thing could not be done at Maillardville, in his own constituency, where Canadians, and I underline that word, Mr. Speaker, where Canadians are compelled to pay a double or triple tax when they want French or catechism taught to their young children. If the hon. member does not know it, he shall have to learn that Canadians of French descent are at home at Maillardville, in Burnaby-Coquitlam, and everywhere in British Columbia, just as Canadians of English origin are at home in the province of Quebec. It is on this condition only, on this essential condition that we may expect to achieve the national unity upon which he delights to expound.

The hon. member has stated that the people of Quebec are deprived or do not benefit in the fields of education and health of services they would like to get. I do not see the need of replying to that. It is quite obvious that we do not have in Quebec everything we would like to have, but the same applies everywhere else. However, I feel at least a little reassured when I find that in the last budget brought down at Quebec for the year 1955-56, $60 million are earmarked for health services, $46.5 million for education and $28 million for social welfare. I think that Quebec, for another year at least, will not need help from the province of British Columbia to settle her problems.

Those are a few of the remarks that came to my mind after the speech delivered by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

In spite of everything, I believe he is a gentleman, a man of good will who wants to increase his knowledge about his own country. Under the circumstances, I hope that my humble remarks will help him to understand better the group of Canadians who were the pioneers in Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to take part in this debate. However, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) having raised a question which is highly important, and I should add vitally important to national unity, I feel I should express my thoughts on the matter. I shall do so objectively, making no attempt to lay blame on any provincial legislature in particular. I think this is hardly the place to stir up resentment against any government which owes its existence to our constitution.

Here is the part of the speech which gives me serious concern. It was made in this house on January 27 by the hon. member, as reported at page 597 of Hansard:

> May I tell the hon. member, and any other hon. member who does not know, that under our constitution in British Columbia we have a free, non-sectarian public school system. No questions are asked of a child entering a British Columbia school as to whether he is Jew or Gentile, whether he is Roman Catholic or Protestant, whether he is Baptist or Witness of Jehovah. All that is necesary is that he be a resident of British Columbia and of school age.
>
> Not only is our school system free and non-sectarian, it is also compulsory. If a child is living in an outlying district where no educational facilities are available he gets his education by correspondence. Children living in localities where there are schools must attend them. On occasion we have taken parents into court in British Columbia in order to force them to send their children to school. I have never known of a parent coming to courts in order to get a school to accept his children. This is something for those who would criticize the British Columbia school system to inform themselves about.

The hon. member went on to say:

> If there are people in Maillardville or in any part of British Columbia who do not think the school system is good enough for them, who set up their own schools, then they are the people who are creating minorities; they are the people who are creating double taxation in British Columbia.

From these statements we infer that the school system of British Columbia is non-denominational in character. In other words, it is non-sectarian on the one hand and compulsory on the other. Therefore it takes no account of the race, religion, faith or language of the people. Before going more deeply into the problem which the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) raises for each and every citizen in this country I should like to introduce into this debate other relevant utterances which have been made. On January 12, 1955, as reported on page 120 of Hansard, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) spoke as follows:

> I also spent a fair amount of time in the province of Quebec. This province seems to be the sore spot in the matter of Canadian unity. I was raised in the west. For years the late Mackenzie King told us how he was building national unity, and for years most of us believed him. "Yes, that is the man to build national unity." How is it, Mr. Speaker, if the late Mackenzie King was really and truly building national unity that, after such a long premiership, almost the moment he disappears from the scene we have less national unity than we have had in Canada for ages and ages?

Then on January 17, 1955, as reported at page 274 of Hansard, the hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming (Mr. Proudfoot) had this to say:

> Why does not the hon. member take time off to compare the rights of minority groups in his province of British Columbia with those in Quebec?

At this time I have in mind a place called Maillardville, British Columbia, and if I am not wrong I think possibly Maillardville is in the constituency of Burnaby-Coquitlam. I would ask him to examine the school laws of his province before he launches an attack on my province, and before he presumes to give advice to the people of Canada.

On January 26, 1955, as reported on page 556 of Hansard, the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon) quoting excerpts from the Vancouver Province denounced a statement attributed to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), who is alleged to have said on September 15, 1954:

Winch hits use of French language in the house.

The article quoted the hon. member as saying:

"I have yet to meet a French-Canadian MP who does not understand or speak English", he explained. "Yet this minority group insists on using French in the house. We have to wait 24 hours for a transcript to find out what they said."

The article continues:

It is their God-given right to use the French tongue but why do they insist on it when they know the majority of the members are English-speaking and can speak it themselves.

Coming back to the statements made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, he sought to answer the hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming. In so doing he went far beyond the bounds within which the debate should have remained. The statements made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and the hon. member for Vancouver East would seem to be motivated by feelings far removed from what the fathers of confederation had in mind when together they drafted the imperial statute we know as the British North America Act. Whether that statute be a pact or a legislative provision enacted by the United Kingdom of Great Britain, it cannot be argued that it is not in any event the result of a compromise reached with difficulty and a great deal of apprehension at the Charlottetown conference, at the Quebec conference and during the debates in the provincial legislatures in 1865 and in England immediately prior to the adoption of the imperial statute. Here is the preamble of 30-31 Victoria, that is to say the preamble to the British North America Act:

Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one dominion under the crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom:

And whereas such a union would conduce to the welfare of the provinces and promote the interests of the British Empire:

Then the last paragraph reads:

And whereas it is expedient that provision be made for the eventual admission into the union of other parts of British North America:

[Mr. Boisvert.]

There was provision in that act to cover the entry of other parts of the country into confederation. In 1867 British Columbia was not yet a part of the Canadian confederation; it was only in 1871 it became such.

Those who worked toward the elaboration of the British North America Act found that the main stumbling block was the problem of the duality of origin, of language and of religion. For a great many years this proved to be the main obstacle to the expression of their good will. A formula had to be found, and this consisted of joining the three provinces of Canada in a confederation with certain powers being vested in the federal government and certain powers being vested in the provincial legislatures.

Those Canadians who were of French origin were desirous of retaining the rights that had been granted them in the instruments of capitulation, guaranteed by the treaty of Paris, and recognized by subsequent constitutions when Canada was a colony of the United Kingdom of Great Britain. Never from that day have they retreated from this stand and they never will. It seems to be forgotten in some quarters that the King of France by the treaty of Paris of 1763 ceded to His Britannic Majesty all the French possessions he held or claimed to hold in North America. Here is the relevant part of article 4 of that treaty:

His Most Christian Majesty renounces all pretensions which he has heretofore formed or might have formed to Nova Scotia or Acadie in all its parts and guaranties the whole to it, and with all its dependencies, to the King of Great Britain: Moreover, his Most Christian Majesty cedes and guaranties to his said Britannick Majesty, in full right, Canada, with all its dependencies, as well as the Island of Cape Breton and all the other islands and coasts in the gulph and river of St. Lawrence, and, in general, everything that depends on the said countries, lands, islands and coasts, with the sovereignty, property, possession and all rights acquired by treaty or otherwise, which the Most Christian King and the Crown of France have had till now over the said countries, lands, islands, places, coasts and their inhabitants . . . . . His Britannick Majesty on his side, agrees to grant the liberty of the Catholick religion to the inhabitants of Canada: he will in consequence give the most precise and most effectual orders that his new Roman Catholick subjects may profess the worship of their religion according to the rites of the Romish church, as far as the laws of Great Britain permit. His Britannick Majesty further agrees, that the French inhabitants or other who had been subjects of the Most Christian King in Canada, may retire with all safety and freedom whenever they shall think proper, and may sell their estates, provided it be to the subjects of His Britannick Majesty, and bring away their effects as well as their persons without being restrained in their emigration, under any pretence whatsoever, except that of debts or of criminal prosecutions.

According to this treaty, sovereignty over that territory which became the Canadian confederation has been transferred step by step since 1867 from the British crown to the government of Canada. The whole of the Canadian territory, from east to west and from north to south, became the common possession of all Canadians, that is of all those who, by birth or naturalization, are Canadian subjects. In other words they may come and go from one province to another, they may settle in any province, whether they be of French origin, Roman Catholic, of English origin, or Protestant.

This is an inalienable right by virtue of the very constitution under which we live. The boundaries between the provinces are imaginary, and are solely designed to limit to a given territory the jurisdiction granted provincial legislatures in certain matters set out in sections 92 and 93 of the British North America Act. These boundaries are by no means such as to prevent a Canadian citizen from exercising the right he has of settling down, earning his living, and bringing up his family in whatever province he may choose.

To that right of living in any province must be added the natural freedom that parents enjoy with regard to the education they wish to give their children. This natural right implies that they may, if they so wish, bring up their children in their own language and faith, that is the culture, language and faith they have themselves. Obviously every Canadian citizen must conform to the laws of that part of the country in which he lives, in any matter which, under sections 92 and 93 of the Canadian constitution, comes within the jurisdiction of the province. I am however of the opinion that any Canadian of French origin has the right and the duty, in whatever province he may be, to see to it that his children receive an education which subtracts nothing from their soul, unless he so desires. Liberty of choice does exist, and it is quite possible that a citizen may choose another language.

The problem of education in Canada, before the enactment of the British North America Act and ever since, has never ceased to be a really sore point with regard to national unity. Lord Carnarvon, in presenting the British North America bill to the House of Lords in 1867, had this to say with respect to section 93 of the bill:

> Lastly, in the 93rd clause, which contains the exceptional provisions to which I referred Your Lordships will observe some rather complicated arrangements in reference to education. I need hardly say that that great question gives rise to nearly as much earnestness and division of opinion on that as on this side of the Atlantic. This clause has been framed after long and anxious controversy, in which all parties have been represented, and on conditions to which all have given their consent. It is an understanding which, as it only concerns the local interests affected, is not one that parliament would be willing to disturb, even if in the opinion of parliament it were susceptible of amendment, but I am bound to add, as the expression of my own opinion, that the terms of the agreement appear to me to be equitable and judicious. For the object of the clause is to secure to the religious minority of one province the same rights, privileges, and protection which the religious minority of another province may enjoy. The Roman Catholic minority of Upper Canada, the Protestant minority of Lower Canada, and the Roman Catholic minority of the maritime provinces, will thus stand on a footing of entire equality.

With respect to Lower Canada, now the province of Quebec, Lord Carnarvon goes on to say:

> Lower Canada, too, is jealous, as she is deservedly proud, of her ancestral customs and traditions; she is welded to her peculiar institution, and will enter this union only upon the distinct understanding that she retains them.

What is section 93 of the B.N.A.A.? It reads as follows:

> 93. In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:
> (1) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union:
> (2) All the powers, privileges, and duties at the union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects shall be and the same are hereby extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec.

It must be recognized that it is incumbent upon the provinces, which after 1867 were united under the confederation, to determine the school system which shall prevail. That is a right which could not be challenged, and I have no intention of denying the provinces their constitutional right to adopt the school system they prefer. But I surely have the right to ask the racial majorities in provinces outside Quebec to achieve a compromise in order that Canadians of French descent and of the Roman Catholic creed in any province of Canada may give their children the education which they consider it their duty to give.

Why should it be impossible to find a compromise? Now that Canada has progressed toward greater unity, why not give the minorities the same rights, privileges, and advantages with regard to education of their children, in view of the fact that these minorities are made up of Canadian citizens who, anywhere they elect to live, have the right to bring with them and retain the treasure of their traditions, their religion, the language they cherish, and the culture which constitutes their background.

In the province of Quebec the majority, made up of Canadians of French descent, has its educational institutions at all levels, as have the minority, made up of Canadians of English descent. The government of the provinces of Quebec gives grants to our colleges and our universities, regardless of the language and religion being taught in these institutions, which serve to educate the children of both the majority and the minority. This year English-speaking McGill University will receive a provincial grant of more than $1 million. No one in the province of Quebec complains about that. On the contrary, everyone is happy in the light of the fact that this situation is based on justice, freedom and natural right.

By finding a solution to the problem of education in Canada we would also settle for good and all the problem of national unity, and Canada would then set an example that other countries would follow. By virtue of the constitution, the majority may have the right to do one thing. Before the common conscience of a young nation, it could exercise this right so as to place all children on an equal footing, without discrimination as to their race, language and religion.

On January 7, 1955, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) gave notice of motion of the following resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this house, consideration should be given to the taking of whatever steps are necessary to amend the British North America Act so as to include therein the following heading and sections:
>
> "Human Rights
> 148. Notwithstanding anything in this act, it shall not be lawful for the parliament of Canada or the legislatures of any of the provinces to make laws:
> (a) Abridging freedom of speech and expression, or freedom of religion, or of the press or other means of communication or the right of lawful assembly, association or organization.
> (b) Depriving any person of life or liberty by arbitrary or abusive measures, or denying to any person the equal protection of the laws . . ."

I am in full agreement with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar as regards the principles involved in that resolution. Among the liberties most precious to the individual are the ones concerning his tongue, his religion, his faith and his traditions. The school has been the first medium of transmission of human thought. Can it be claimed, as has been the case in this house, that Canadians of French origin living in British Columbia must suffer their lot because they constitute a minority? They might as well be told, "If you are not satisfied, move out. Take your belongings, your children and go wherever you want; it is no concern of ours". It amounts to denying them the fundamental right to live in their country and to live wherever they choose on our Canadian soil.

Canadians of French origin are stubborn but at the same time they are excellent Canadian citizens. They love their country; they love the laws governing them; they love to live in society with their English-speaking compatriots. The best proof of this is that all of them are making efforts to learn the language of the majority in order to be able to entertain better relations with all their fellow Canadians.

It is being said that in British Columbia Canadians of French descent cannot legally have the same rights they would have, by virtue of the constitution, in some other provinces. That is no doubt the reason they have to build their own schools, pay for the cost of these schools and pay for the education they want for their children. They have, moreover, to contribute, by paying school taxes, to the education of Canadian children of other racial origins who are obliged to attend public school. It is contrary to human rights that there should exist somewhere in our country a system which forces children to receive an education which their parents cannot recognize and which destroys in their souls both appreciation of liberty and love of country.

All governments in the world must adopt wise laws. It is the enactment of these wise laws—laws respectful of natural rights—which makes just governments. A state is great in so far as it respects the rights of man. On May 6, 1954, in Montreal, Mr. Murray Ballantyne stated:

> We must accept the fact that Canada is called by history to be basically bilingual and bicultural. Our national destiny is difficult but enriching. Canada is the French-Canadians' home, and they ought to be able to feel at home in it from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Together we French and English speaking Canadians can build a great nation. Apart, neither can succeed.

I therefore say to those who, in this house, have expressed opinions which to your humble servant are contrary to the spirit of confederation, that they should seek a formula which will cause provincial legislatures, where education is subjected to the weight of the majority, to put the minorities on an equal footing so that double taxation may disappear. Majorities by themselves have no rights. Rights are attached to the individual. True it is that in a democracy individuals, subjects by right, vest the state with the right to legislate. Law then becomes an obligation for all. If law becomes unfair to a group of citizens, it is then proper to revise it with a view to the disappearance of inequality before the law. It would only be fair that all should benefit by law on an equal basis. It would only make for a greater, finer country and Canada would see her already world-wide reputation further enhanced.

What I wish for with all my heart is that the principle of equality of rights in matters of labour be accepted in the field of education. On May 14, 1954, we passed an act stating that no employer may discriminate against any person in regard to employment because of his race, colour, religion, or national origin, and no trade union may exclude anyone from membership or discriminate against anyone in regard to membership or employment on these grounds.

We have welcomed that legislation of non-discrimination as a further step toward national unity. Let us promote the application of the same principle with respect to education, without infringing upon the rights of the provinces to determine their school laws, but by good will, good advice and good understanding. What succeeded in 1867 could surely be attained in 1955 if all wished together to pursue the same aim.

For our part we shall always persist in the way set for us. Our ancestors from France opened this North American continent to colonization, trade, agriculture and industry. After the treaty of Paris our ancestors demonstrated more than four times their love of Canada and their attachment to the British crown. After 1867 they co-operated with their English-speaking fellow citizens to the edification of the Canadian nation, and their descendants will continue to follow their destiny despite wars, times and crises. They want to see in the hearts of their children the blossoming of the love of Canada, and in their minds the development of a sense of and desire for her moral, political and economic greatness, so they may always breathe the incense of liberty and cultivate, as free men, the joy of living. Nothing shall alter their determination. Neither "Attleeism" nor atheism shall find room in the depths of their souls as Canadians.

It is often said that history repeats itself, but it must be repeated more often if we want it to be retained by men, who pass rapidly, history keeping only what is lasting: faith in God, faith in ourselves, faith in our country which makes men capable of building an imperishable progress.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate in French the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, like all previous speakers, I would like to offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The complimentary remarks I would like to make would never be good enough for what they deserve. I shall therefore simply say "very well done" and "all honour to them."

(Text):

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): On the first occasion on which it is possible for me to do so this year, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) very much indeed for the shining, new and bright post office which was opened in our area of Notre Dame de Grace just a month or two ago. It shows the co-operation that exists between the Postmaster General and myself.

Those of us who come from Montreal, and who are Conservative, would be perhaps saying something hypocritical if we said we were happy to see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) come into this house. We would have been happier had it been someone on this side. But if they had to choose from amongst the group of Liberals in Quebec to fill that post I believe they made a good choice, because he is a very fine man. I am sure, too, that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Richardson), who has just come into this house, will make quite a contribution to our proceedings because in the Herald for Tuesday, November 9, he said:

> My experience and background and ability show that I can speak for this riding far better than my three opponents combined.

This statement was made just after the election.

During the summer I was happy to see that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) was spending his time travelling in Canada. I believe he is a little bit out of place with the other cabinet ministers, but it is a good thing that at least one of them is staying at home and examining that tremendously important territory for which he is responsible.

One of the advantages of this debate, Mr. Speaker, is that it allows us to put forward ideas or suggestions which may occur to us which we could not otherwise encompass in the course of the debates on the legislation which comes before this house. We in this house must concern ourselves with the problem of democratic government, purely as democratic government, to ascertain whether the government is continuing to fulfil its democratic responsibilities. There is little opportunity to discuss that in detail under any specific piece of legislation; therefore I should like to take a few minutes this afternoon to examine this particular aspect of our parliamentary and political life in Canada.

The other day the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) suggested that this whole question of our democratic operation is the most important problem of our free world, because it matters very little if we strike off the encircling chains of captivity from others if, in the process, we bind ourselves. We do not have to go to the hon. member for Oxford for that suggestion. We can go back almost a century to Abraham Lincoln, who put it quite succinctly when he said:

> Must a government of necessity be too strong for the liberties of its people, or too weak to maintain its own existence?

This challenge to the ability of free men to develop a means of restricting certain of their activities in the interests of society while still remaining free has been met at different times in different ways. Essentially free governments everywhere are patterned after one or another of the three parliamentary democracies of Great Britain, France or the United States. Each of these systems has its strength and each its weakness. Sir Arthur Salter, whose record in the British house is known to most of us here, has made the following comment:

> Each of these three systems has its distinctive merits and each of them has a distinctive inherent danger. The danger of the French system is instability. The danger of the American system is deadlock. The danger of the British system is cabinet tyranny.

Under the British system, which is the one we follow in Canada, such cabinet tyranny can be cloaked in many ways. It will depend largely on the cleverness of the party in power in dissimulating its intentions and misleading the public as to whether or not the people generally realize the dangerous course their government may be following. When you have a government that has the political morality of an alley cat and the lust for power of a Genghis Khan, it behooves those of us—and that includes all of us Conservatives on this side—who hold democracy precious to be on guard for all the people.

It is well to remember, Mr. Speaker, that the existence of the ballot itself and some form of free election is no indication of either political freedom or freedom of the individual. The Germany of the thirties had an elective parliament sitting concurrently with the Hitler regime; Russia today has an elective parliament which meets from time to time for the discussion of public affairs.

In our society in Canada, government is a living organism. It is a dynamic, not a static part of our existence. Its role, its responsibilities, its way of operation and, to some extent, its entire function must change from time to time to adapt itself to changing conditions. This I admit. But I do not admit that in this changing process we need to, or should, surrender those democratic privileges that men have fought and died for all down through the centuries.

There are those who do not agree with this thesis. These people are prone to argue that the adaptation of government to our changing society must of necessity mean the invasion of our rights as free men and as free legislators. For example, in a speech on the role of government delivered by Monsieur Maurice Lamontagne, then of Laval University in Quebec, we find this statement:

> The society of tomorrow will have to face the problem of bureaucracy. To solve it, it will be necessary to create new methods of democratic control and perhaps also to revise our concept of democracy.

Here is a clear-cut case of the sort of confused thinking to which I refer, the suggestion that to deal with the changing role of government in our society we must revise our concept of democracy. I noted with interest that the author of this suggestion, shortly after making it, moved from his university in Quebec to a senior post in our government bureaucracy at Ottawa. I predict a brilliant future for him. His pathway has been blazed by a number of other civil servants, including the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill), the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney), all of whom came into the cabinet from the civil service.

Amongst Canadians it is commonly assumed that the nature of our government, and the way in which the democratic process operates in our Canadian parliamentary system, has not changed in the period since 1935 when the Liberal party began its long tenure of office. This misconception is fostered by the fact that things are done very much as they used to be done. The Speaker still presides; resolutions and bills are still proposed, debated, and with almost complete uniformity passed. All the trappings of a parliamentary democracy are observed. But this does not necessarily mean that democracy and parliamentary control extend below the surface. Appearances can sometimes be deceiving, as they are in this case.

For those who would claim that this is not so, let me remind them of the evolution of the message we are today debating, the message of His Excellency the Governor General which we term more popularly the speech from the throne. There was a point in British parliamentary history when this message was just what it purports to be today, direction from the monarch to his parliament regarding legislation. Today, though couched in the same archaic language and using the same pronouns, even the schoolboy knows that the speech is conceived and written, exactly as delivered, by the cabinet of the day. Yet outwardly there is no change; and this simple example, plus many others from our procedure, proves to us beyond any doubt that the realities can undergo great change while surface appearances remain constant.

The fact that these subsurface changes are taking place is generally admitted, and has been for many years, even among the stauchest adherents of the Liberal party. Senator Roebuck, the former Liberal member for Trinity, said in a debate in the other place in 1947:

> The direction in which we are travelling is a regulated society in which the rights of the individual are set aside, purportedly for the good of the public, but the final result is next door to a controlled society or a police state in which the private individual and the business of the country are bossed by a few civil servants.

Later in the same speech he remarked:

> I know we are drifting towards the abolition of government by legislation and the substitution therefor of government by order in council.

The member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) made the following statement, first in an article in a national magazine and later before the national Liberal convention in 1948:

> From the ideology of the C.C.F. we have lifted the worship of bureaucratic controls, leaving parliament—and the reference is to the present, not to wartime—little more than the role of a debating society, controlled from outside, not by the people who elect its members, but by minor czars and petty dictators.

We all know what happens to such free thinkers in the Liberal party and in this government, and the hon. member for Quebec South is an example; he got bounced from the cabinet by those who have "a new concept of democracy". These are not isolated quotations. They have been echoed time and time again by Liberals of every rank, and from every part of this country.

The judiciary of our country has warned time and time again against the increasing abuse of government powers. In 1948, for example, in reporting a judgment of Mr. Justice E. R. Angers of the exchequer court, the Canadian Press said:

> A justice of the exchequer court warned today that uncurtailed use of discretionary powers placed in government officials could lead to a dictatorial government in Canada. There are, in my judgment, far too many encroachments by ministers, deputy ministers and functionaries in the judicial as well as the legislative field.

Said Mr. Justice Angers:

> If they are not curtailed, the country may in a not too remote future be ruled by a dictatorial government.

Last year, in a case where the Department of National Revenue had refused to reveal certain information to a British Columbia court, Mr. Justice Rand of the supreme court said:

> To eliminate the courts in a function with which the tradition of the common law has invested them and to hold them subject to any opinion formed, rational or irrational, by a member of the executive to the prejudice, it might be, of the lives of private individuals, is not in harmony with the basic conception of our policy.

And a few sentences later he said:

> What is secured by attributing to the courts this preliminary determination of possible prejudice is protection against executive encroachment upon the administration of justice; and in the present trend of government little can be more essential to the maintenance of individual security.

Thus apparently two of Canada's top jurists distrust the present trend of government, and many similar judicial observations could be cited. The press of Canada has an acute awareness of the dangers facing us. The Winnipeg Tribune, in an editorial on March 6, 1954, said in part:

> The decline of parliament's power, prestige and control is real and distressing. The encroachment of the executive on parliament's traditional functions has brought parliament to the status of a sounding board and a place in which grievances may be aired. The authority of parliament is rapidly disappearing.
> What's more, there is considerable danger that the cabinet, which has done much to undermine parliament, is now in serious danger of itself becoming captive.
>
> The cabinet is becoming more and more reliant on anonymous civil servant policy-makers, who are not responsible to parliament or the courts for their actions. The senior officials of government departments have acquired wider and wider powers of law making and law breaking.

Newspaper after newspaper across our country has pointed out these facts, in editorial after editorial.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in developing my argument to this point I have attempted to show three things: first, that under our British and Canadian type of parliamentary government the inherent danger to democratic processes is the chance of power passing from the legislative body to the cabinet or, beyond it, to the bureaucracy; second, that such a transition of power may well take place without any definable change in the parliamentary process and without the public becoming aware of the change; and, third, I have attempted to show that such a change is taking place in Canada, and that we have entered upon a period of cabinet tyranny and bureaucratic control.

Given these facts, we have to ask ourselves what can we do about it, or whether we propose to do anything about it. The situation reminds me of a story of two friends who were up in the gallery of the house when a cabinet minister was making a speech during the presentation of his estimates. In that speech he was extolling the virtues of his government, and also making a vigorous attack against suggestions put forward by the Conservative party. His attack became more vigorous by the moment, and one man turned to the other and asked, "Are the Conservatives going to take this lying down?" The friend replied, "No, that is what they have Hansard for." Well, we Conservatives are not going to take this change in democratic government principles lying down, either.

Earlier in this address I pointed out the fact that government is a living organism which must adjust itself to the needs of a dynamic society, but that in the process of such adaptation we should be constantly on guard against the surrender of any of our democratic rights, both as individuals and as a legislature. One of the ways in which we can lose these rights is to delegate certain of our powers and then, having delegated them, not keep continuous control of and inspection over those powers and over those to whom the powers have been delegated.

Lack of action such as that represents a very large part of the menace of delegated legislation. Years ago, when government was a comparatively simple matter, parliament could go at great length into all the details of its legislation and the implementation of that legislation. The rules under which it would be carried out could be brought before the house for discussion and debate. But the growth of government activities makes it no longer possible to do such detailed work in this house. In a great many cases all parliament can do is to set up the framework and basic principles by means of a bill, and then leave to the cabinet and to the bureaucracy the detailed working out of the provisions, which are then regularized and given the force of law by orders in council.

The theory behind this method of operation is that such actions, being available for inspection and study by individual members of this house, may be brought before the house in certain ways if it is considered they are not consistent with the desires of the house.

There are two weaknesses with such a procedure as it presently exists. First, the volume of such delegated legislation has grown to a point where its voluntary review by members of this house is almost an impossibility; and, second, no organized committee of members of this house has been set up for such review. For example, the last two volumes of the Canada Gazette, part II, one of which appeared on December 22, 1954 and the other on Wednesday, January 12, 1955, totalled 1,462 pages. That gives some idea of the volume of this work which should be subject to review by this house.

This government, in debates at the end of May, 1950, indicated its position, that it considers parliamentary review of such delegated legislation unnecessary. My position on this attitude may be summed up in the words of Professor Mallory of McGill University who, in the Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science for November, 1953, says:

> Evidently, in the Prime Minister's mind, careful ministerial consideration could be regarded as a substitute for parliamentary review. There are perhaps not many persons outside of ministerial and official circles who would agree with him.

In the field of the financial activities of the government there is provision for such a review, independent of the government of the day, with the report on the legality and correctness of these actions being made direct to parliament itself. I refer, of course, to the activities of the Auditor General. I think every member of this house looks forward with considerable interest to the arrival of the Auditor General's annual report—the opposition with anticipation and the government with trepidation.

If we accept, as we must, the fact that every action of this government is done in good faith and with every intention of complying with the wishes of this house and the laws of the land, the annual report of the Auditor General indicates quite clearly that none of us, whatever our intentions, is perfect. I do not know how hard the government tries to be perfect; I suspect sometimes not very hard. Each year we receive a report which points out numerous mistakes on the part of the bureaucracy. This year, for example, they ranged from highly questionable accounting procedures on the part of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation through highly questionable uses of public funds in a number of cases, to highly questionable rental arrangements for officials of the government at various points in Canada.

Such a review of government activities tends to act as a check on irregular activities, and to bring to the attention of this house much information which we otherwise would not receive. This information is supplementary and additional to all that which comes to us from our inspection of the estimates and the discussions we engage in during their examination. I think most of us, certainly on this side of the house and perhaps with the exception of the cabinet, would agree that the function of the Auditor General is highly important and one which is of tremendous value to us in our work of governing this country efficiently and well.

In the light of these remarks and this demonstrated tendency for delegated legislation and actions to be concentrated in the hands of a comparatively small and select group of people outside this house, I would like to put forward for the consideration of the house the thought that a similar office to that of the Auditor General might be established to deal with activities of the government in the field of delegated legislation, with special reference to orders in council and rulings made by various departmental heads as the result of powers delegated by this house in its legislation.

Within this field such an officer should be on a status comparable with that of the Auditor General. He would be an officer of this house, reporting directly to this house in his own right, with the same protection against interference as that enjoyed by the Auditor General. In this respect he would differ greatly from the present departmental solicitors and Department of Justice; for while we must realize that activities in the field of delegated legislation are reviewed by these gentlemen, we must also realize that their responsibilities fall in the line of command of departmental organization, and it is logical to expect that their reasoning may be influenced to some extent by this fact.

The function of this officer of the house, as I have indicated, would be to review orders in council and departmental rulings with the force of law, to determine whether in his opinion they complied with the provisions of the bill authorizing them. As with the Auditor General, he would have the power to investigate and study subsidiary material and to enter governmental files in order to determine the circumstances surrounding a particular item of delegated legislation under study, because goodness knows they have great reservations about making adequate material available to us.

The report of this officer, made directly to this house, would be similar to that of the Auditor General. It would point out particular circumstances in which he felt that action on the part of the cabinet or its subsidiary officials transgressed the provisions of legislation of this house.

I do not propose to develop in any further detail the functions and responsibilities of this particular official, because I think I have gone far enough to show rather clearly the value of such an undertaking to hon. members. I make this statement very definitely; this is not a super-bureaucracy; it is not setting up a man to check on others which will grow and grow as many of those bureaucracies have done. It is a function parallel to that of the Auditor General, serving this house directly, and not a servant to the government.

However, I do suggest that this is the type of thinking which the government should have undertaken a long time ago. All of us are aware that both in the business field and in the governmental field conditions are vastly changed from those of a generation ago. We cannot set back the clock, nor would we wish to do so in some respects. Rather, we must work out ways and means of dealing with circumstances as we find them in the changing life which we are facing today.

One of these circumstances is the increased responsibility of government and the increased volume of work being handled by this house. I think it has been obvious since the advent of world war II that we had to find ways and means of keeping democratic control in this house and still delegating some of the details with which in the late 1800's and the early 1900's the house could deal.

On motion of Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace) the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 3, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—APPROVAL OF REPORT RESPECTING A CERTAIN POSITION

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the report of the civil service commission respecting compensation for the position, chief of orders and notices, of the House of Commons, laid on the table of the house January 31, 1955, be now approved.

Motion agreed to.

FLAGS OF CANADA

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR A NATIONAL FLAG OF CANADA

Mr. A. H. Hollingworth (York Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 21, respecting flags of Canada.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Hollingworth: The explanatory note simply says that as it is desirable that Canada should possess a distinctive national flag, this bill suggests a procedure for accomplishing that purpose.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BRIDGES

MARPOLE, B.C.—REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister received a request for financial assistance from the government of British Columbia, the city of Vancouver or chambers of commerce in the Vancouver area for the building of a high level bridge across the north arm of the Fraser river at Marpole, British Columbia? If requests for financial assistance have been received, what decision has been made in the matter?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Since I received notice of this question I have had the opportunity of having a word with the hon. member. There has been confusion in some minds as to just where this bridge is to be located.

As I understand it, the initial request came to us for a bridge to replace the present Marpole bridge, and this government after due consideration agreed to pay up to a maximum of $400,000 toward a suitable bridge to replace the inadequate one now existing. The government of British Columbia, I understand, has decided to go ahead with a bridge at the foot of Oak street. I believe it is referred to as the Oak street project, and tenders have been called; but this government has not decided to participate in that project.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): May I ask a supplementary question? There was an offer from the federal government of an amount of $400,000. Does that offer still stand?

Mr. Winters: That offer was based upon the federal government's interest in having traffic proceed with the greatest facility between the mainland of Vancouver and Sea island. This present Oak street project involves a new large bridge from Vancouver to Lulu island and another smaller bridge from Lulu island to Sea island. To the extent that this new project is in keeping with the federal government's aim in making the $400,000 offer, I assume it will be available for this new project.

SHIPPING

TRANSFER OF SHIP FROM SAINT JOHN TO ST. LAWRENCE SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Is the S. S. Walter E. Foster being transferred from Saint John to the St. Lawrence at the height of the winter port season and, if so, why?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is a temporary reallocation for the balance of the winter, due to the sinking of the Lady Grey. The ship will return to Saint John as soon as the ice season is over.

Mr. Bell: May I ask a supplementary question? Would it not have been possible to get an icebreaker from some other place, or to have used the old transport vessel in Saint John? This vessel is necessary for navigational aids in that harbour.

Mr. Marler: The department did not consider that that would be convenient.

GRAIN

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF ACT—BOX CAR ALLOCATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will producers be given the right to deliver grain to the elevator of their choice through an amendment to the Canada Grain Act, as requested by the three wheat pools?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have to give the obvious answer, that the government's intentions with regard to legislation will be made known in due course. I have noticed that my hon. friend has a notice of motion in Votes and Proceedings intended to bring this about, and I cannot prejudge the opinion of the house on the resolution.

Mr. Argue: May I ask a supplementary question? Is there any method for allocating box cars at present in effect that is different from the method that prevailed a year ago?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the matter of allocating box cars is subject to the car order book, and after that it is by arrangement between the railways and the elevator companies.

[Later:]

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with car allotment. Is there anything his department can do to secure a greater allotment of cars for those areas of northern Saskatchewan served by the Canadian Pacific lines? On those lines there is always a smaller number of cars available.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The allotment of cars on branch lines is under constant review by the wheat board. Calls for grain are issued for cars for particular lines. I cannot believe that there is any discrimination against northern lines. However I shall call the attention of members of the wheat board who are in Ottawa at the present time to my hon. friend's question in order to make sure that if there is any discrimination it is removed immediately.

[Mr. Bell.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CIVILIAN USE OF LONG BRANCH RIFLE RANGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last when the orders of the day were called the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener) inquired as to what progress is being made by the Department of National Defence toward making the Long Branch rifle range available for civilian use.

Long Branch rifle range is the only outdoor rifle range operated by the Department of National Defence in the whole Toronto area. It has been so operated for over 40 years. The range serves 17 militia units of battalion or equivalent size, 6 militia units of company size, the regular army troops stationed in the area, personnel of the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force, members of the R.C.M.P. and Ontario provincial and local police, as well as military and other rifle associations.

Use of the range has been increasing steadily throughout the last few years both in numbers of personnel using the range and in time occupied. In 1954 approximately 9,000 personnel shot at the range. The range is therefore of very considerable importance in the field of military training in the Toronto area.

Continuous and very rapid growth of population in the Toronto area during recent years has gradually enveloped the range, and increasing pressure is now being brought to bear on the department to move out. We recognize this situation, but the difficulty has been to find a suitable alternative site. For the past few years we have been making every effort to find an area large enough and close enough to Toronto to develop into a suitable range. We have not met with any success whatever. The whole district around Toronto for many miles is being subdivided and developed, and any prospective site we have found is subject to the same objections which are being directed to our continued occupancy of Long Branch.

On the other hand it must be recognized that the department is obligated to provide shooting facilities for the numerous military units in the Toronto district, either at Long Branch or some other area reasonably accessible to Toronto. In view of the lack of success which is meeting our efforts, we are at present considering the possibilities of Camp Borden which, though 60 miles from Toronto, might, in view of the construction of a new super highway, serve to meet our military need, though at considerable inconvenience to Toronto units.

In the event that Camp Borden is found practicable, I assume that the lands which we own at Long Branch would be turned over in the usual way to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Was it not the intention of the Department of National Defence to release the Long Branch rifle range by October 1, 1954? If it was the intention to release the range as of that date, what circumstances or what facts have caused the department to alter its original intention?

Mr. Campney: So far as I know there was never any intention to vacate the Long Branch rifle range by October 1 of last year.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MARKING OF TOYS WITH NAME OF COUNTRY OF ORIGIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister received from Canadian toy manufacturers complaints that section 16(1) of the Customs Tariff, which provides that the governor in council may order that goods imported into Canada be marked with the country of origin, is not being observed? Will the minister tell the house that this provision of the Customs Tariff with respect to toys will be observed in future? If not, why not?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): That is a pretty large question. I have no knowledge of any complaints from this particular manufacturing concern, but I shall take the hon. gentleman's question as notice and have it looked into.

CHEESE

REGULATIONS APPLYING TO IMPORTATIONS FROM NEW ZEALAND

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): In answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Peterborough yesterday regarding imported cheese, I may say that cheese imported into Canada is subject to the same inspection and must comply with the same regulations as cheese made in Canada.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Do the regulations that apply to cheese consumed in Canada apply to cheese imported into Canada?

Mr. Gardiner: Exactly the same regulations apply to cheese used in Canada whether it is imported or produced here.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED LEASE OF NEW HOTEL IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? Has the arrangement for the Hilton hotel chain to operate the new C.N.R. hotel in Montreal been finalized? In view of protests against this arrangement, can it be reconsidered?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I would remind the hon. member that the announcement was made by the management of the railways in November last, at the time the arrangement was concluded with Hilton.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): May I direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production? In the light of news reports to the effect that President Eisenhower might call a conference of the nations on peacetime atomic energy, is it the intention of the government to set up a committee on atomic energy this year?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): The government of Canada works very closely with President Eisenhower on atomic energy matters. It is closely associated with the discussions at the United Nations, and I can assure my hon. friend that if those discussions are carried further Canada will be represented.

Mr. Hansell: My question was, is a committee of the house to be set up this year?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am sorry, I did not understand the question. Yes, it is the intention of the government to propose a committee to study atomic energy as well as research generally.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, February 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Hahn.

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, in the course of my remarks yesterday I used the phrase or expression "a government that has the political morality of an alley cat". I notice that in the report in the Gazette this morning, attributed to the Canadian Press, that has been translated and attributed to me as follows: "the morals of an alley cat." I prefer to stand on my original phrase, which restricted it to the political field. The press gallery and the Canadian Press, who are so much better acquainted with the government and have known them so much longer than I have, can make any extension of it they wish.

Mr. Lapointe: It might extend to the other side.

Mr. McCann: You would be included.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): This, Mr. Speaker, is the time of the false prophet. Our progress has been so rapid, the changes around us so great, that many of us have lost sight of those accepted and objective standards by which mankind has been guided for so many generations. This is the age of grotesque and perverse fanaticisms, of bigotries which would be contemptible if they were not all so dangerous. This is the generation of the big lie, the mass delusion. Only the obvious seems not worth saying, only the truth remains in want of publicity. All too often the good is despised as sinful or corrupt and every kind of evil is permitted to parade under the name of virtue.

In this time of change the signs and symbols which have guided the lives of men for centuries have suddenly become unreliable and obscure. In the universal deluge of ideas and mechanical advances men swim about amid the intellectual wreckage of their culture like torpedoed seamen clinging to different coloured bits of straw, not one of them sufficient to support a man.

The cause or occasion of the revolution in our time has been the coming of the machine. But its real challenge, like that of all such periods, is not political or economic so much as it is spiritual. This is the challenge that this government has failed to meet more than any other, the spiritual challenge, the challenge which has brought Canada ever forward. Oh, they have been aided by economic conditions, and they have stayed in power. They have had assistance from various factors, national and international; but as a government and as a party I suggest that they are spiritually gutless and intellectually bankrupt. They have hoped and groped their way through the past 20 years, calling on the civil service for ideas, intelligence and brains. They have been raiding the same civil service for cabinet material when they could not produce it within their own party. They have been digging into provincial Liberal parties for cabinet material when those same provincial Liberals found they had no future in their own party.

An hon. Member: We have never called on you yet.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): My call will come from the people of Canada, not from men who have descended so far that in recent months we have seen them dig into this same civil service, take a man out of it for a preliminary canter in politics, and then when that did not work out put him back into the civil service again. In this respect they treated some of our most cherished traditions of service to this country as they would a box of candy from which you take out one piece, eat it, take out another piece, bite a corner off and put it back into the box.

They have been astute politicians, as leaders they have been lucky; but any government that could produce and support the document which was presented to us a short time ago as the speech from the throne, a document devoid of imagination or of any challenge to the people of this country, a document which refused to accept the facts of economic life in Canada as we find them today, a document which skated around the important issues of the day in order to make reference to matters which are of comparatively minor significance; any party which produces such a document should have nothing but shame in their souls at this point. I for one will vote against any recognition of that document, and without reservations about the party that has brought it into being. I shall be able to do that with great satisfaction.

There are one or two brief points I should like to refer to in passing in case the government has overlooked them. I would remind the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) that the St. Lawrence seaway which is going to have a tremendous effect on our city of Montreal is also well on the way to strangling the traffic passing from the island of Montreal to the south shore. There is one solution and one solution alone which is agreed upon by those who have an intimate knowledge of the situation, and that is a tunnel under the river.

I remind the minister of the need of proper harbour facilities at Montreal, where the passenger sheds are in many ways inferior to our air terminals. You all know what I think of the air terminals of Canada. They bring no credit whatsoever to the great country which is ours. I would remind the Minister of Transport of our need for a fireboat at the island.

Finally, I remind the Minister of Transport that Canadians from one coast to the other have hung their heads in shame at the news that the Canadian National Railways has not sufficient trust and confidence in this country to operate their hotel which is being erected with public funds. That is a blot not only on the record of this government but on the record of all Canada. I think the government should look back on this with shame.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon I endeavoured to get leave to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely the Formosa situation. I have no criticism to make of the fact that you denied me that request. I think the matter is of urgent public importance, but it is your prerogative to decide whether there is sufficient urgency and whether there is a debate in progress which would permit one to discuss such a matter. This afternoon I want to say something of what I was going to say yesterday.

First I want to say I believe that from San Francisco right up to the present time Canada has had many opportunities of speaking out when she has refrained from speaking clearly. I believe that at San Francisco and subsequently Canada was looked upon, because of our situation, because we were not beholden in any way to any other country for the financing of the war or for assistance in our participation in that war, as a country which could speak for that group of nations which is below the level of the five great powers, I do not care whether you call them middle powers or smaller powers.

I am of the opinion that this is the time when Canada should speak with a clear voice regarding the Far Eastern situation. I am going to say that I shall respect the suggestion made yesterday by the acting minister of external affairs, for I am quite certain that what I am going to say this afternoon will create no difficulty or be in any way of an inflammatory nature.

I must confess that I was surprised at the attitude taken yesterday by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he expressed opposition to my request for leave. It is only a few weeks ago since the hon. member stated that he hoped we were not returning to the days of Mackenzie King, when external affairs were kept more or less under close cover. I might add that I can recollect speeches by the late Gordon Graydon, when he was spokesman for the Conservative party, and in his absence speeches by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), criticizing the government because time and time again in this house we found ourselves faced with accomplished facts in relation to external affairs.

It seems to me, as I said in my proposed motion yesterday, that this House of Commons should have an opportunity of discussing and expressing an opinion in connection with the grave matters in the Far East. At noon today I heard the one o'clock C.B.C. news broadcast. I regretted exceedingly to hear that the premier of the people's republic of China is refusing the invitation to attend the meeting of the security council, but I understand the reasons for that refusal. It was stated that the premier said he would not be willing to send representatives to the security council until the government on the mainland of China, governing the overwhelming bulk of the Chinese people, was recognized and until the representatives of Chiang Kai-shek were removed both from the United Nations and the security council.

Now, one does not have to agree with the ideology of the government of China to say that that government is in fact the government of China, and has been for several years. Nor does one have to repeat what has been so often repeated in this house, that that government was recognized in 1950 by the government of the United Kingdom, with the expressed public support of the present Prime Minister, Sir Winston Churchill, and the present foreign secretary, Sir Anthony Eden. In other words the British people, through their political leaders of all parties, recognized the fact of a new government in China long ago. So far as this and other countries are concerned, we recognize all kinds of governments, governments that cannot by any stretch of the imagination be classified as democratic and are often totalitarian.

Nor can we hide behind the fact that the government of China came into being through revolution. How often do we recognize the governments of Latin America when constant changes are made in those governments by assassination and by revolution. One can look over the list of the South American governments and see that a number have come into being by revolution and sometimes by assassination, yet we have recognized them. One does not have to agree with the ideology of a government to recognize it as, in fact, the government of a country.

This whole situation regarding Formosa is of course very dangerous, dangerous to the peace of the world; and, should war develop, very dangerous to the security and safety of our own country. It is said, of course, that China's claim to Formosa is based upon insecure grounds. It is said that the claim of the government on the mainland of China to Formosa has failed to recognize the fact that for 50 years Formosa was controlled by Japan, and a century or so before was for 30 years under the government of the Netherlands.

If that is so may I ask, Mr. Speaker, by what right is Chiang Kai-shek there? Chiang Kai-shek says he is the government of China, and claims Formosa on behalf of his regime as the government of China. You cannot have that argument both ways. If Formosa is not in reality a part of China, then why is Chiang Kai-shek there? Why are we recognizing him as the government of China if that is the argument that is used? I heard it used last night by a United States newspaperman speaking from New York during the course of the mid-week review. I say then why is Chiang Kai-shek regarded by us or by anybody else as the government of China if it is true that China has no claim to Formosa?

Of course one cannot overlook the fact that both at Cairo and at Potsdam it was agreed that with the cessation of hostilities Formosa should again become a part of China, as it was before the Japanese conquered it 50 years before. I am not going to say that is the correct disposition of the country. In 1950, when I had the great privilege and pleasure of being associated with our delegation as an observer at the United Nations in New York, I made the suggestion that I thought a proper disposition of Formosa was to neutralize it under the United Nations and let the Formosan people decide what the future of that island should be. I am not arguing that it should be returned to China. I am arguing, however, that the difficulties that have arisen in the Far East, and which now threaten the peace of the world, are largely due to the fact we have failed to recognize that there is a new government in China. We cannot hide behind the argument that that government came into being by revolution or that it has an ideology we do not like. When we look around the world we can see many countries with ideologies we do not like and with governments we do not like, which came into power by revolution.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I believe the policy of the United States in the Far East is just as dangerous, and just as wrong, as I believe the association of Canada with and the strengthening of NATO is right. Just as I believe the one thing, I believe the other. I believe the one thing because I feel that if we drift along we shall drift into a situation which will bring about a catastrophic war, and I believe the other is a move in the direction of peace. When we look at some of the statements that have been made recently, such as President Eisenhower's message to congress or the President's news conference of yesterday, we see the dangers that may ensue.

Some of the great newspapers of the world have clearly seen those dangers. Here is a statement by the Manchester Guardian. I do not suppose anyone will say the Manchester Guardian is a socialist newspaper, a communist newspaper or other than what it is, one of the great Liberal newspapers of the world. I have in my hand the issue of January 27, and I should like to read one or two paragraphs from what they say about President Eisenhower's message. They say this:

> The ambiguities of President Eisenhower's special message to congress on Formosa are deplorable. The message is so clumsily constructed that it appears to contain a veiled threat of American attack upon the Chinese mainland. It says that the United States must be prepared to "take appropriate military action" against "any concentration of Chinese communist forces obviously undertaken to facilitate attack upon Formosa."

As I pointed out to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) when he was referring to this particular speech, President Eisenhower failed to say that he would take the same steps to prevent an attack by Chiang's forces on the Chinese mainland. Then after setting forth the situation as they see it, they say this of the speech:

> It gives apparent credibility to some of the communist propaganda claiming that the United States is planning an attack upon China. It is a gross blunder.
> The damaging effect of these phrases cannot be undone by saying that their aim is no more than to assure the security of Formosa and the Pescadores. The threat to the mainland and the implicit American commitment to defend Quemoy remain. It does not help to declaim about "the free world's stake in a free Formosa." Nine-tenths of the free world has grave doubts about the kind of freedom provided by Chiang's regime (even if it has graver doubts about the communists).

Those are not my words. Those are the words of the Manchester Guardian. If I may I should like to quote one of our own Canadian papers which has had the respect of a large reading public in Canada over the years, particularly in western Canada. I refer to the Winnipeg Free Press of January 31.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Coldwell: Someone says "oh, oh". He may not like some of the political views of the Free Press, but I want to say this. As a rule, the Free Press in the past has been served by extremely able writers on international affairs, whatever we may think of their views on domestic issues. The Free Press says this:

> So long as the United States insists upon defending Quemoy and the Matsus, it is plainly and undeniably an interloper in the Chinese civil war. Mr. Dulles may believe, as Washington reports suggest, that he can use these islands as bargaining counters to induce the communists to accept a cease-fire. But it should be clear that he can do this only at the price of jeopardizing his moral position, embarrassing his allies and lending a ring of plausibility to the propaganda from the other side. The overwhelming support of the American congress is inadequate in this crisis to the needs of the Eisenhower government. It is important that the United States should also have behind it the preponderant support of the United Nations. To this end, President Eisenhower should make it clear that he recognizes the distinction between Formosa and the coastal islands and is prepared prudently to limit the American custodial role.

I read the report of the press conference yesterday, and one thing the President refused to do was admit the difference between Formosa and these islands. I try to follow events as closely as I can and as objectively as I can. Every morning before I come down to this house I try to read the international news in the newspapers which carry a good summary of international affairs. I was impressed by one article which appeared in one of our papers that I always read. It is an article by a rather conservative gentleman in many respects. I refer to Walter Lippmann, who had this to say yesterday morning in his article:

> If eventually there are to be negotiations for a cease-fire, it is evident that they cannot deal with the ultimate issues. We cannot expect Peking to sign any kind of truce which implies the surrender of her claims to Formosa. Nor should we at this time confuse the juridical issues by recognizing in a formal treaty Chiang's claims to Formosa. The only sound and the only safe position is to treat the ultimate disposition of Formosa as a matter which cannot be settled now even by negotiations much less by force.

That is what Walter Lippmann says. My plea this afternoon is that our representatives in London at the present time will speak clearly on behalf of the Canadian people; for I am certain that the fears I express with regard to the outcome of this situation in the Far East are shared by my fellow citizens across the length and breadth of Canada. I am sure of that. I am also sure that these fears are widely felt outside the borders of this country. I think a good many people in the United States share those fears with us.

In spite of any criticisms I may make of United States foreign policy I want it to be clearly understood that I am not criticizing Americans as such, for I know of no people who in the past have been more generous, or who are kindlier, or who are in most respects more democratic than are the majority of the citizens of our great neighbour to the south. However, we should make this point clear, and we are in a position where we can make it clear. We were independent of United States aid in the war we just fought. We are carrying on our own defence and are making our own contribution to NATO and other defences. We are not beholden in any way to the United States of America for equipment or for finances with which to defend ourselves. I should therefore like to see us speak out.

Yesterday I was disturbed because, as I read reports from London, I thought the statement made by a high governmental authority in Great Britain, speaking of the conference, indicated that our representatives at the commonwealth conference had agreed to what seemed to me to be a change of attitude from that expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he spoke in this house on January 25. May I say that with what the minister said then I had no quarrel. With what the minister said then I was in full accord. But it seemed to me that yesterday's dispatch indicating support for the United States also indicated a change in attitude. I have been assured by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) that there has been no change in attitude, and I hope he will make that point clear to the house later on this afternoon should he decide to say a word on this matter.

Our government, and this house supporting that government, made it crystal clear during the Korean affair and subsequently that we were taking no part in the Formosa situation. Let us make it crystal clear again that we are taking no part in this Formosa situation. Let us make it crystal clear again that if, as a result of United States policy in connection with attacks on the coastal islands or on the mainland of that country, war develops, we are not responsible in any way for the onset of that war or the consequences of that war. Let us make that point quite clear while we may.

I notice that Mr. Eisenhower said yesterday that one of the reasons for the statements he was making at this time was in order that the Chinese communists might know, without any peradventure, where the United States stood in this regard. Let Canada make it clear without any peradventure where we stand in this matter. Settlement of this problem can be made only through the United Nations. That is the only way in which a settlement can be made. It cannot be made satisfactorily by force of arms, bringing catastrophe upon the rest of the world.

May I say here I am convinced that what our great neighbour to the south is doing at the present time is alienating the vast millions of people upon whom we must rely in Asia for support in building up democracy all across the world. That is one of the factors in this situation which is most disturbing; the alienation of India, the alienation of Burma, the alienation of Indonesia, the alienation of those teeming millions who look upon the United States as an interloper in a civil war attempting to refasten upon China a form of western imperialism. That is a factor I think we should not overlook, and one reason we should make our position clear while there is yet time. I think the only way this can be done is by negotiations through the United Nations; and if we have to pay the price of recognition of the present government in China, that price is not too high to preserve the peace of the world.

Mr. Fleming: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend will realize that it is asked seriously. First, does my friend advocate recognition of the so-called people's government at Peking as the government of the mainland of China and, second, does he advocate that it be recognized as the government of Formosa?

Mr. Coldwell: To the first question I answer yes. I have urged recognition of the people's government of China in this house on a good many occasions over the last several years. I did not advocate it during the Korean war. I did advocate it before that war broke out. I said during the Korean war that as long as that war lasted we could not recognize the people's government of China. The Korean war ended, and I believed there was an opportunity to make that recognition. Earlier in my remarks this afternoon I made it very clear, I believe, that as far as Formosa is concerned it should be placed under the United Nations. It should be neutralized and subsequently the people of Formosa, after the elimination of Chiang and his armies, should decide the future of their own country. That is my position, and I want to make that very clear.

These very negotiations in which we are engaged today do of course involve in effect recognition of China. We negotiated with them directly at Geneva. We negotiated with them on the Korean matter, and it is very difficult to see how you can negotiate with a government you do not recognize. If the price we have to pay is recognition, it seems to me that price is well worth paying.

Mr. Hees: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Coldwell: May I say I was courteous enough to sit down when the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) rose, but we are not in committee and I do not propose to enter into personal debate. I want to put the view I hold before the house, and if the hon. member disagrees with me I should like to hear his views subsequently.

Mr. Hees: I just want to ask a question.

Mr. Coldwell: All right.

Mr. Hees: I should like to ask the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) a question in all seriousness, as did the hon. member for Eglinton. The hon. member used the phrase "after Chiang and his army have been eliminated from Formosa". What did he mean by that?

Mr. Coldwell: I did not mean elimination by war. If the island were placed under the United Nations I think the United Nations would of course eliminate Chiang as the ruler and governor of Formosa. That is what I mean, to eliminate him as the governor and government of Formosa.

I said that the very negotiations we have undertaken from time to time have involved recognition, and I say that Canada should speak up today because other nations look to us to speak on some of these matters, and we have not always done so. I should like to refer to a statement of the leader of the opposition in Great Britain, and in this regard I am certain that he is speaking for more than the people within his own party. I have here an Associated Press dispatch from London, dated January 31, reading in part as follows:

> Clement R. Attlee, leader of Britain's Labour party, declared today that Chiang Kai-shek and his top nationalist officials should be exiled from Formosa.

That is one step beyond what I suggested a moment ago. It would seem to be quite necessary to do that. The dispatch continues:

> The island's people should then decide by plebiscite whether they want to join red China, Attlee said in a copyright interview in the Labour newspaper, Daily Herald.

I may say I am not following Mr. Attlee here, because I made this suggestion in 1950 when I was associated with the Canadian delegation at New York.

> In any case, the United States should drop forthwith the claim that Formosa is part of its Pacific defence ring.

"I cannot see myself that the island of Formosa is an essential part of the defence of the United States of America in this era of the hydrogen bomb", Attlee said.

"It is clear that the Peiping government won the civil war against Chiang Kai-shek. It would then have occupied Formosa but for the intervention of the United States fleet. The American action taken at the same time as the United Nations action in Korea, in 1950, had nothing to do with the United Nations but was dictated by an American policy of security."

As I indicated earlier, the Secretary of State for External Affairs made it abundantly clear in the house at that time that we were in no way involved in that particular policy. I continue:

"Since that time the forces of Chiang Kai-shek have constantly attacked the Chinese mainland. It seems to me quite unreasonable that under the shelter of American forces the Chiang party should be able to carry on a civil war."

I think that sums up the situation very well. I do not want to say much more, Mr. Speaker. I think I have made my point. The point I am making is that Canada at this time should make it very clear where we stand. I should have liked to see the house yesterday support the statement made here on January 25 by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I do not expect, of course, that the minister, conducting the external affairs of this country, could rise in his place and say all that I have said this afternoon, but I am in a somewhat different position. I am not responsible for the conduct of external affairs, but I am responsible for expressing the views of what I believe to be a very large section of the Canadian people and, more than that, a very large section of public opinion throughout the democratic world.

I think I have quoted sufficiently this afternoon. I could have quoted the London Times and other papers to the same effect but, because we have a Liberal government in power in Canada, I chose to quote from a good British Liberal newspaper, the Manchester Guardian, and from the Winnipeg Free Press, which is an equally well known Liberal paper in our country.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I express my wholehearted support of what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said in the house on January 25 in dealing with this particular aspect of international affairs, and plead with our government to use its influence to see to it that a peaceful settlement of the trouble in the Formosa area is negotiated. If the price we have to pay is recognition of a fact, recognition that a government does exist on the mainland of China—even though, as I said, it exists like so many other governments, South American, Spanish, Russian, governments in many parts in the world, because of revolution—

An hon. Member: The United States.

Mr. Coldwell: Someone suggests the United States, but that was a long time ago. I did not intend to mention it, although of course it was not out of my mind that the independent government of the United States was established by means of a revolution. Fortunately those days are past. I do not presume there is any danger of another revolution in the United States at the present time, or in this country, either.

So, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask our government to stand for peace, to stand for negotiated settlement, to stand for the neutralization of Formosa, through the United Nations; and then to endeavour to see to it that the people of Formosa, who are so often forgotten in these discussions, are given at the right time the opportunity to choose their own form of government.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said there was a difference between the role which he plays on that side of the house and the role of the spokesman for the government in the matter of foreign affairs at this time. That affords me the opportunity of saying that he will not misunderstand if I confine myself, in the brief observations I wish to make today, to the basic question he has put this afternoon, and which he mentioned on two occasions yesterday when he intervened in the deliberations of the house.

The government of Canada is anxious that all possible steps should be taken to stop the fighting in the Formosa strait; and it is because of that consideration that I do not want now to say anything that might interfere with important negotiations now going on. I can only reiterate with even greater confidence than yesterday the wisdom of the course suggested for us in the House of Commons at this time. At the moment the security council of the United Nations has this question before it, but discussions have been adjourned pending a reply to the invitation to the communist Chinese government to attend the council sessions.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said he had heard over the radio at noon that a reply in the negative had come from the so-called Chinese people's republic. By telephone and subsequently by wire, I have been in touch with our ambassador, the permanent delegate at the United Nations, and as a result

I am not in a position to give an unqualified statement as to the nature of the reply that is now, I understand, on its way to the Secretary General of the United Nations. From what has been sent to me in the house, since I have entered the chamber, I would not be justified in making any comment as to the nature of this reply.

I think the situation at the moment is such that in any event one could characterize the news services account as not justifying final observation. Notwithstanding that, undoubtedly, whatever be the nature of the communist reply, the security council, which has adjourned its session to await the reply, will be convoked within the next day or so, and consideration will be given by that body to what course should be followed. I would hope that the security council will still find it possible—I know they will find it desirable —not to lose control of this matter.

Canada is not of course a member of the security council; but our ambassador, the permanent delegate there, is following the deliberations of the council closely, and is in constant touch with its members. The security council has had success in the past in a mediatory or good offices role and we hope, as I am sure all members in the house hope, that it will be able to bring about a cease-fire in this instance, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out last Friday it has done in a number of other instances.

Meanwhile the prime ministers of the commonwealth countries who have gathered in London have obviously been preoccupied to some extent with the Formosa situation. I have had the opportunity of learning the nature of their discussions, but the house would not expect me at this time to make any further observations about the full character and scope of those discussions, except perhaps to say that there have been some general exchanges of views on the subject at the meetings of the prime ministers. It is not the normal practice at conferences of commonwealth prime ministers to take decisions on questions like this. There have also been some informal discussions among those attending the conference, directed to the same objective as that of the security council, namely the stopping of the fighting.

The view of the Canadian government during the Korean hostilities was that Formosa should be neutralized. This idea of the neutralization of Formosa is still applicable in the present situation. As the hon. member who has just spoken pointed out, the government's view was stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on January 25.

Yesterday the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made this observation:

> Mr. Speaker, may I just add that the occasion for seeking leave to discuss this matter is that news from London today indicates that a position differing from that taken by our government on January 25 is being taken by our representatives at the commonwealth conference in London.

Later he reiterated this observation, when he said:

> My request is based entirely upon what was said by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the house on January 25 and the fact that authoritative statements from London today indicate that there has been a change of attitude by our representatives there.

On January 25 my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs said this in the house:

> Pending such a decision—

That is, a settlement about the future of Formosa.

> —I think that a strong case can be made for the neutralization of Formosa both in order to prevent any assault upon it by communist forces and also so that it will not be used as a base for invasion of the mainland.

I have read carefully the other observations of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the text of the speech which last Friday night he made over the network of the national broadcasting system. I think I may say that what he said, in substance, was as follows. A clear distinction must be made between Formosa and the Pescadores and the small islands along the Chinese coast. Formosa and the Pescadores have not been part of the territory of China for a good many years, and their present status is not very clear. The small islands along the coast are, however, indisputably Chinese territory. The views on neutralization expressed in this way do not necessarily apply to the coastal islands. Because of these circumstances it would be a great disaster if incidents in the small coastal islands were to lead to a general war.

These are not my colleague's actual words, but rather my paraphrasing of them. And he went on—again paraphrasing what he said—what is needed at the moment is to stop the fighting, without prejudice to the claims of either side or to an eventual political settlement. If this can be brought about and if the Chinese nationalist forces now on the coastal islands can be withdrawn, the resulting truce might go on for some years, as have similar truces in other parts of the world. In the resulting atmosphere a more permanent settlement might be reached by negotiation or perhaps by an international conference. Such a settlement should, of course, take into account the wishes of the inhabitants of Formosa.

The action which the United States government has taken in the Formosa area does not commit Canada or other countries. Any obligation we might have in regard to the Formosa strait could arise only from our responsibility as a member of the United Nations. Although we are not committed by United States policies, we are certainly affected by them. That is why we welcome the assurances which President Eisenhower gave on January 27 that the United States forces in the Formosa area would be used purely for defensive purposes. We are confident that the United States government will exercise a moderating influence also on the Chinese nationalist government. In connection with the mutual defence treaty which the two governments signed, there was an exchange of notes between Mr. Dulles and Mr. Yeh, the foreign minister of the republic of China, on December 10. These notes provided that the use of force in the treaty area by either power would be a matter of joint agreement except for self-defence in an emergency.

I can assure the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the house that the policy of the Canadian government concerning the Formosa situation has not departed in any way from the principles laid down in the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in this house on January 25, and again in the statement he made over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation network last Friday. So there can be no doubt about that, I quote now directly from a communication that I have had from the Secretary of State for External Affairs in London, who is there associated with the Prime Minister at this time. His message to me is as follows:

> There is no foundation at all to any report or suggestion that in regard to Formosa the Canadian policy has departed in any way from the principles laid down in my statement to the house on January 25 and in my broadcast of last Friday.

Mr. Knowles: What is the date of that?

Mr. Martin: February 3.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): In order to bring the attention of the house back to the discussion which was proceeding yesterday may I read the amendment moved by the Social Credit party during the speech of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn)? It is as follows:

> We further regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take or to recommend the necessary fundamental economic and financial measures to place Canadian producers and workers on a sound and prosperous basis, and to ensure our economy against recurring recessions.

I have read that, Mr. Speaker, because I want you to know that I am going to phrase my remarks as carefully as I can in order to follow the wording of the amendment.

One of the most important problems that faced Canada last year, the year before that and the year preceding that, was the distressing position in which agriculture found itself. That is important to us as a nation. It is important to us as members of this house because the prosperity of Canada depends directly upon the prosperity of our agricultural industry. That is only natural when one remembers that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada. Despite the progress we have made in other lines, agriculture still remains of prime importance.

Agriculture is a big industry. Because that is so it is necessary that we give it due consideration. It is so important that anything which affects agriculture directly affects all other industry in this country. We experienced that last year. It has become more noticeable because of increasing unemployment. Farmers were not able to buy; therefore industry felt a slackening off in business and as a result, we are heading for an economic depression, or some might prefer to call it a recession.

There is growing concern among the farmers not because agriculture has failed—it has not—but because of accumulating surpluses. To me, Mr. Speaker, that is not a reason to become panicky; in fact we should rejoice that Providence has permitted us to have surpluses. If we are in such an economic position that we do not know what to do with our surpluses, surely we cannot blame the good Lord for that. We must accept our own ignorance as being to blame. To me the matter of surpluses has always been something of which we should be proud. I have always taken the stand, and have so expressed myself in this house on other occasions, that what we should have in Canada is sufficient storage capacity so that we could have our supplies stored in, as I call it, an ever-ready granary, one that we could call upon in time of emergency.

It has been the experience of those of us who have lived in this country for any length of time that over a period of time nature pretty well takes care of any surplus. The surpluses we have on hand now would not be more than sufficient to take care of our needs if we were to have a crop failure or, certainly if we were to have two crop failures. Under those conditions we might find ourselves in very difficult straits. Therefore, because we have a surplus we should not become panicky. The thing that is disturbing to the agriculturists is that they have no money. I would not assume that we can blame anybody else but ourselves. We have fallen down in this house as legislators in our endeavour to provide sufficient money, which is the means of distribution. Of course, everybody in the country is looking to us or more properly to this government for a solution.

I said a moment ago that when we have adverses in agriculture they are reflected in all the industries in this country. The cash registers stop ringing and we have disasters in industry. We have found that condition in the smaller industries. It is now taking place in the larger industries. Last year retail sales in this country have fallen by over $260 million. They fell by a similar amount in 1953, and we shall find that they will fall a greater amount in 1955 unless our policies are changed.

There is another indication that this will take place; that is the tremendous increase in credit buying. One has only to pick up the newspapers to find that industry is trying to develop all sorts of ingenious ways to get people to buy beyond their means, even to the extent of forfeiting their future pay. I noticed in the paper the other day that a television set was offered by a firm in this town. They had what I thought was a rather clever way of getting people to pledge their future earnings. They agreed to put this television set in a person's house without any down payment. On the machine was a money meter, and every time the person used that television set they would put 50 or 75 cents in the meter. At the end of the month the agent would come along and collect the money for the month's payment. That was a rather ingenious form of credit selling.

If we could put an equal amount of energy into trying to find an economic solution to this problem I am sure we would reach some solution. In connection with credit buying I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of January 7. It is rather long, and I shall read only two short paragraphs as follows:

> Consumer Credit at All-Time High of $1,885,000,000
> The amount of money Canadians owe for the things they buy on credit has reached an all-time high.
> The Bank of Canada estimates the outstanding consumer credit bill rose to a record $1,885,000,000 at September 30 last, an increase of $19,000,000 from the previous quarter and a jump of more than $100,000,000 from the previous year.

If we follow the same trend it will not take much imagination to see what is going to happen to our business concerns. In 1954 there was a total of $1,885 million of credit buying, which does not take into consideration any of the money loaned through the farm loan board or under the National Housing Act. If those amounts are added you have a colossal amount of credit buying. It seems to me that should be sufficient warning for us to encourage, even to demand, that this government take drastic steps in order to make it possible for the farmers to realize something as a result of their labour. These are forerunners of disaster which cannot be denied.

If we look at the farm income for 1954 we find that it was $2,408,600,000. Things are not improving. We must recognize that in 1954 there was an income drop of over $300 million. That was the estimate given in a report to the federal-provincial agriculture conference held not long ago. In 1953 net income was down 18 per cent from 1952, and 21 per cent from 1951. In 1954 net farm income was down 12 per cent from 1953. There has been a continually decreasing farm income. In three years there has been a decrease of over 40 per cent in agricultural income. If we recognize that agriculture is the basic industry of this country it takes no stretch of the imagination to see what is going to happen unless something is done.

I suggested a moment ago that any slackening off in the income of agriculture will be reflected in business conditions in this country. I have in my hand the Monetary Times of December, 1954, a very reliable financial paper, and speaking on this matter they say:

> The rate of business failures in Canada is continuing its post-war rise, but still has a long way to go to match pre-war figures, it is indicated in Dun and Bradstreet's report for the first nine months of this year. Up 42 per cent from 1953 figures, failures in the first three quarters of 1954 reached the 1,024 mark.

And again:

> This factor is reflected, too, in the rate of increase of liabilities involved in failures reported. At $8,479,000 in the third quarter they are up nearly 13 per cent, but at $41,238,000 for the nine-months period are up 106 per cent. This would seem to indicate that bigger firms with greater liabilities are being involved, suggesting the shake-out of smaller businesses has been completed.

It would seem to be clear from that report that small businesses have already collapsed, and now the axe is about to fall on some of the larger businesses in this country. Surely these signs cannot be ignored, and the government is bound to take these matters into consideration.

There is another matter I must draw to your attention, a matter which has been referred to on one or possibly two occasions during this debate. I refer to the position of our farmers in respect to the Crowsnest pass freight rate agreement. There have been one or two who have sponsored the case of the big railroads in an endeavour to chisel the western farmer out of his rightful claim in regard to this agreement. Some speakers in this house have taken that attitude, along with the president of the Canadian Pacific, and have gone so far as to quote Chief Justice Sloan.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I will tell you why not in a minute; just keep your shirt on. They seem to think that because Chief Justice Sloan, who was investigating the dispute between the railroads and the unions in regard to contracts, found it to his convenience—why I can only guess—to go beyond his terms of reference and refer to the Crowsnest pass agreement, saying that the low rates under that agreement created a distorted and unbalanced freight rate structure, they should quote him. It would appear that he was giving that as one of the excuses why the Canadian Pacific was not able to pay a higher wage to its workers. With all due respect, it does seem to me that Chief Justice Sloan would do better to keep his mind on his own business rather than going into something with which he had no concern.

The president of the railway, together with some hon. members of this house, particularly the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne)—the hon. member has been interfering with me when I have been speaking, and I think I should say who he is so the record will be clear—seem to be doing everything within their power to create an adverse public opinion against the western farmer.

An hon. Member: Oh, nonsense.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): They claimed that this Crowsnest pass freight rate agreement was unprofitable to the railroad, that it was outdated and therefore that some change should be made. Of course that is not true. The statements which have been made in that respect are not borne out by the facts. For a long time the Canadian Pacific has been endeavouring to solicit support from any direction in order to build up adverse public opinion against the western farmer. It was not long ago that we had a debate in this house in connection with the transcontinental rate. We in western Canada were allowed what was called the one and one-third rate. That meant that we in Alberta could get our freight moved to that province by paying 33⅓ per cent more than anyone else in Canada.

An hon. Member: Scandalous.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It certainly was scandalous. I did not hear the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) criticize that at all. They have claimed that the Canadian Pacific was not properly compensated for the construction of that pass. It should be remembered, Mr. Speaker—and I do not recall the hon. member for Kootenay East giving us these facts—that when the Canadian Pacific undertook to build that railroad they were given a subsidy of $3,404,720. Then as a further subsidy to offset any losses which might occur they were given 250,000 acres of land, together with the oil and mineral rights. The oil and mineral rights alone have amounted to millions of dollars, and there is no saying how many more millions the company will derive from that property as the result of that gift.

It should not be forgotten, either, that only a year or so ago this government gave the railways a subsidy of $7 million a year to compensate them for any loss in handling freight north of the great lakes. In all, I feel it can be fairly said that the railways of this country have been very generously treated. In fact they have been so generously treated and their revenues are up so well—if you consider all the revenues which they receive from their different enterprises—that they do not need to interfere now nor at any time with this Crowsnest pass agreement. I am in hopes that the new Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) will not be as easily influenced by railway propaganda as was the last minister of transport.

Speaking in this house about a year and a half ago I made a prediction, Mr. Speaker, and I feel I should draw it to your attention now. I never claimed to be a prophet, but this prophecy came true. I said then that the minister of transport was going to be relieved of his job and given a greater reward; and that has come to pass. He is now chairman of the St. Lawrence seaway authority. I am not questioning his ability to fill that position at all. I say without fear of contradiction that he was one of the best supporters the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National had in this country. It did not seem to matter whether or not the interests of the ordinary man were in the way.

I should like to refer to another aspect of agriculture, and to the way in which I feel this government may be able to be of some assistance. I believe we should have a definite support price for agricultural products, not because of any situation in which we find ourselves right now, although that would be sufficient argument, but because this government promised such support to the farmers of this country. We all recall quite well that during the war the government agreed to see to it that the farmers would not lose in the long run because they were forced to take controlled prices at that time. It is well known that because of the controlled prices of agricultural products in Canada during the war, particularly wheat, Great Britain was able to give her people cheap bread. It will be recalled that during the same period western agriculturists were once again asked to finance low cost bread for our own Canadian people. This is the only instance of which I am aware where one particular industry in a nation was asked to subsidize low cost living for the rest of the people in that country.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) assured the farmers of this nation that they would not lose because of that. It is only right, therefore, that the government should honour that pledge and institute a complete policy of agricultural prices support. It is true that shortly afterward the farmers were given $65 million to compensate them for a loss of $350 million. It must not be forgotten, either, that there was quite a debate at that time, and it was the Conservative party that refused to vote that $65 million for the agriculturists of western Canada.

Then, too, I believe the government should approve the suggestion made here last year by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), which took the form of a resolution in these words:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of enacting legislation at this session of parliament to provide for a system of approved farm storage under which the wheat board may make advances to farmers on grain held on the farm.

As I said a moment ago, the situation in which the farmers find themselves is not the result of too much grain but is the result of the fact they have not received the money for the grain they have grown. I recognize immediately that there has been some difficulty in the sale of that wheat. There should be no difficulty, however, in the way of the government making advances to farmers for grain in approved storage on the farms. I would go so far as to say that the government itself should make these advances through the Bank of Canada, perhaps with the assistance of the wheat board. If the government took advantage of this suggestion they could certainly give the farmers loans at a very low rate of interest.

I feel, too, that the government could make quite a few tax cuts in order to give the farmers and others some relief. The taxes being extracted from the consuming public of this country put the people in a position where they can no longer buy the goods that are being produced. This is affecting not only agriculture but all the other industries in this country. I would suggest that the income tax exemption should be set at $1,500 for single persons and at least $3,000 for married persons. The government might consider also the elimination, in part at least, of the exorbitant excise and sales taxes now being imposed upon the people of this country.

Let me turn my attention for a few moments to another aspect of the matter which needs some consideration. I am still dealing precisely with the amendment which I read a moment ago, Mr. Speaker. I want to say a word or two about the unemployment problem. This question has been dealt with before, but I feel it needs repeating. In the speech from the throne the government made reference to unemployment as being of a regional and seasonal nature. Of course we all know that the government was somewhat ill-informed on that occasion, because neither then nor now could unemployment be termed regional or seasonal. Even if it were, it would be so important that this government should take some steps to see to it that no one was in dire need in a country with such vast wealth as we have. It was not so long ago that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made a plea to labour to knuckle down and produce more. They did that with such efficiency that they have now produced themselves into the soup kitchens. They have been producing so much that industry cannot sell it, and as a result they have had to lay off men. These men are now unemployed.

It is well to remember that 75 per cent of the people of this country are earning less than $3,000 a year. In the light of that fact we can readily understand why the standard of living of the majority of the people of this country is not too high. I am not exaggerating when I say that at least 50 per cent of the people of this country are living on less than $2,000 a year, and that is pretty low.

We realize that their standard of living is not too high. There is only one reason the people of this country do not have a higher standard of living. It is that they have not the purchasing power with which to buy the goods they desire. It is not a case of getting more jobs. It is not a case of what the Prime Minister said a year or so ago, "Get out, work harder and produce more". They have worked so hard that they have worked themselves right out of a job. Surely that is an economic fact that even the most elementary student can grasp.

An hon. Member: Oh, we have heard that before.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I hear one hon. member say, "Oh, we have heard that before". I do not know where that remark came from, but let me tell him this. That is exactly the mental attitude that was taken during the hungry thirties, and the same situation resulted. We dare not sit back on our haunches and say, "Oh, we have heard that before", when we have thousands of people going hungry in this country. It may be said, "Oh, maybe there are not so many as that going hungry". Those who say that had better look to the facts and find out what they are before making such remarks. Right here in Canada, down at Sault Ste. Marie on July 14, 1954—and this was not seasonal nor regional—we had this situation, according to the Calgary Albertan:

> Claim Unemployed Close to Starvation
> Sault Ste. Marie—Two aldermen said there was so much unemployment in this city that some persons are literally starving because they have no money to buy food.
> Alderman King said he has received 588 separate appeals for assistance, including "some cases of actual starvation".

Then we have someone in this house with the audacity to say, "We have heard this before".

Mr. Nixon: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I happen to be the member for that riding, and I want to say that there is no one starving in Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The hon. member had better go and tell that to his alderman. I cannot see any point of order there, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nixon: I agree there is unemployment there, but there is no one starving in Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I hope you are not counting these interruptions in on my time, Mr. Speaker. I would hesitate to contradict Alderman King. The hon. member had better see his alderman down there and see what is the matter.

An hon. Member: Rather weak.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): However, I would believe that statement.

An hon. Member: He probably talks too much too.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Maybe so, Mr. Speaker. We will just assume for the moment —and I use that word advisedly—that what the hon. member has just said is true. But let me turn to another publication that just came in. It is dated January, 1955, and comes from the Canadian Welfare Council, a widely different source. They say:

> Appeals by the Salvation Army in North Bay "for donations of soup bones, vegetables, and bread to feed transient men and their families", the reintroduction of used clothing drives in Windsor, the opening of soup kitchens in Vancouver, and similar reports reaching the Canadian Welfare Council in recent weeks from many parts of the country, are evidence of the fact that there are still a great many unemployed workers in Canada whose essential needs are not being met.

Then down further they say:

> The demoralizing effect of unemployment on family life is a social danger we cannot ignore, whether there be 1 per cent or 10 per cent of the labour force out of work and without any source of income. The least the community can do is make sure that no unemployed person is allowed to be destitute.

Then down a little further they say:

> The noticeable increase in transients reported by our member agencies from coast to coast is a reflection of this unfortunate situation.

I suggest that this situation is not seasonal and is not regional. They are appealing for soup bones and used clothes. That situation is not in keeping with our ability in this country to produce goods and services. We have that condition existing at this time.

Let me point out to you that the circumstances are different entirely from those that were in existence during the 1930's. We now have unemployment insurance. Just the other day we amended the Unemployment Insurance Act in order to increase the supplementary benefits. We also have the family allowance, which was not in vogue during the hungry thirties. We also have the universal old age pension, and we have increased public works. The other day the minister told us that a greater number of housing starts were made this year than ever before. Despite all these things assisting in the distribution of purchasing power—and I admit that—we have more registered unemployed in this country now than we had during the hungry thirties.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): We have more registered unemployed. According to the December 7 national employment service statement, at that time there were 362,678 registered. Those are the ones who are eligible for unemployment insurance. Then, according to the dominion bureau of statistics, the number of unemployed was 247,000. Those also are the ones who are registered. But according to the Canadian Congress of Labour there are 550,000 and by March they say there will be over 600,000. That is their estimate, but they were not so far out last year when they gave an estimate of what unemployment would be at that time. I therefore think it is fairly safe to assume that their prediction is fairly close to being right.

Mr. Campbell: What was the figure in the thirties?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): In the thirties I think the figure for those registered and others was about half a million. But it should be pointed out again that these people are unemployed during a time of so-called prosperity. As the welfare council points out, the number does not make any difference; if there is only one unemployed person in this country who is destitute something should be done in order to see that that family does not suffer. Particularly is that true, Mr. Speaker, when we have in this country so many goods that we cannot dispose of. When we have a surplus of almost everything, nobody should be in want.

From what I have pointed out to you, Mr. Speaker, it would seem clear that this country is in need of increased purchasing power. I am not at the moment going to enter into an argument as to the way in which that increased purchasing power can be obtained. Social Credit have what they believe to be the solution for the difficulty, but they are not the ones who are burdened with the responsibility of seeing that purchasing power is put in the hands of the people to buy the things that are being produced and that cannot be sold. That is the responsibility of the government. If they cannot discharge that responsibility, then in due course the people will have to take what action they deem to be necessary.

It should be clear that whenever there is this economic downtrend, the government needs some sort of mechanism in their policy which would put purchasing power in the hands of the people, and that purchasing power should become effective demand, so the people can buy the goods which are being made but which cannot be sold. How they are going to do that is their business; but it should be understood—and I do not think anybody will contradict this statement—that the act of buying makes jobs. Whenever you get the public in the position where they cannot buy, then you just cannot give jobs. When industry cannot sell the goods they are producing, then of course industry must close.

In my judgment it is not proper to blame private enterprise for the unemployment we have amongst us today, because private enterprise has excelled itself. It has so excelled itself that it is producing goods that cannot be sold. Therefore it must let the men go. Even the labour unions themselves recognize that fact. Let me refer to the Canadian Congress of Labour submission to the government on November 12, 1954, when they had this to say at page 4:

> What we ought to do is put money into the hands of people who will buy what we can already make and can't sell.

That is the crux of the situation. It is up to the government to see that that is done.

There are other matters I should have liked to talk about today. I wanted to speak about the coal industry, an industry that is indeed sick and needs something done about it. Their difficulties should not be shrugged aside as the minister did a year or so ago, when he said he knew that the coal mining industry was in a bad position but that it would do them good to have a little squeeze. Well, they are certainly being squeezed. If that was the solution they should now be on the road to recovery, but unfortunately that was not the solution. I want to speak about coal but I cannot do so on this occasion because my time will not permit.

On another occasion—and I shall take advantage of my privileges in this house to do so—I want to speak about one of our greatest national parks in Canada, not one of the greatest but the greatest as statistics will indicate; that is, Banff national park. I want to speak about how the government has neglected to do what should have been done for the greatest national park in Canada. I shall take advantage of the privileges that are mine in this house on another occasion, and I shall continue to put forward arguments for both these interests.

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to associate myself with my colleagues who have taken part in this debate in extending congratulations to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. There is one matter with which I intend to deal briefly before coming to the main remarks I wish to make on this occasion. As a Canadian born in the province of Quebec, I find it rather hard not to express my regrets at the unwelcome remarks which have been made in the house by a few members of the C.C.F. party against the province of Quebec to which I have the honour to belong and where I live.

It is not my intention to repeat what other members have already said in reply to the unfair reflections that have been made on my province. Too many serious Canadians from all parts of this country have devoted their lives to make Canada great and united for me to use at this time, or at any time, unworthy remarks in answer to the few who have seen fit to promote their publicity by trying to picture the province of Quebec as a threat to Canadian unity or as a land ripe for communism.

As a young Canadian with little experience in the House of Commons I was sorry to hear some of the comments uttered by members of the C.C.F. party, for I was brought up and educated by people who taught me all along to love my fellow citizens of British Columbia just as well as my fellow citizens of the maritime provinces. Furthermore, I am proud to share the views of Canadians imbued with the spirit of fair play and freedom, and for this reason I can say that in spite of different views expressed in the house lately Canada will travel the path of glory, freedom and prosperity if the two great races which form the majority of the population of our country have respect for one another.

I once heard a remark which may very well apply to some of the members of the C.C.F. party. A farmer in my riding told me one day that some people specialized in demolishing what others had built or tried to build. If you want to destroy a monument or tear down a building which has been a landmark you can call on practically anyone, as demolishing is an easy job. On the other hand, if you want to erect a monument or a nice building you have to call in experts such as architects, engineers and skilled labour. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that the contrast between the two is greatly similar to some of our friends in the C.C.F. group?

(Translation):

I will now speak of shipping, and of some of the related problems in the hope of bringing about some change in the present situation.

I shall not deal today at length with the complex and difficult problem of deciding whether Canada should have a sea-going merchant navy, but I shall limit myself to coastal shipping on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence.

Nobody can deny the vital part played by water transport in a country in the geographical position of Canada, whose limits extend as far west as the Pacific ocean, north to the Arctic ocean and east to the Atlantic ocean. In addition, it is connected with the latter ocean by a waterway extending over some 2,000 miles, if we include the great lakes, along which are located, more particularly from Montreal to Port Arthur, the greatest industrial centres of the country.

That long waterway has undoubtedly been the main factor in Canada's economic development and it continues to facilitate the unprecedented industrial expansion we have seen for some years past. It is rather difficult to assess in terms of dollars and cents the volume of products shipped by water, from the great lakes to various points on the St. Lawrence and outside the country, but a fair idea of the importance of that waterway can be gathered from the fact that more ships pass through the Sault Ste. Marie canals in seven months than through the Suez canal in a whole year.

According to the statistics I have obtained, more than 200 million tons of goods were shipped through that waterway in 1953. From a further breakdown of the statistics, showing a comparison between the present volume of traffic and that of preceding years, it appears that the shipping activity on the St. Lawrence gives a good idea of our country's economy.

In 1932, at the worst of the depression, only 3·5 million tons of ore were shipped through that waterway, while in 1953 nearly 95 million tons passed through it.

Although it is hard to get exact percentages regarding the nature of the products usually shipped, certain facts indicate that the tonnage of goods shipped may be divided as follows: grain comes first among the goods shipped, accounting for 36 per cent of the total; then oil and related products, with approximately 19 per cent. Pulpwood accounts for 8 per cent, coal 6 per cent, lumber in general, except pulpwood, 4·5 per cent and iron ore, about 2·5 per cent.

Those few figures pertaining exclusively to water transport on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence give us a good idea of the importance of coastal shipping for the economy of our country, and give us an insight into the expansion that will follow the deepening of the St. Lawrence and into the developments it will mean for the north shore.

Not only will that activity of Canadian shipping in the vital field of transport increase the number of ships sailing on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence shipping but it is part of a national industry made up of skilled labour, experienced crews, technical apparatus, shipyards and tremendous capital investments.

It is therefore not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that the seamen of my constituency, situated on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, have expressed their fears and apprehension at the difficulties which seem to be increasing as a result of our legislation and of international agreements. The deepening of the St. Lawrence, which is now underway, will open up the whole great lakes district to unlimited shipping and will give access to the most industrialized part of the country. That is why Canada's merchant marine is getting more and more apprehensive, and the position of our ship owners will become unbearable unless more adequate measures are taken to help them.

The shipping act of 1934 contains nearly all the necessary provisions for the protection, control and regulation of Canadian ships. Certain international conventions, to which we have become a party, supplement that legislation. I do not hesitate to say that much of the trouble now experienced by our merchant marine results from the legal freedom enjoyed by the British merchant marine under the 1931 convention pertaining to the British commonwealth merchant marine, to compete here in Canada with our own ships for the transportation of goods.

At present, ships of all nations have access to the navigation facilities of the St. Lawrence, as far as the great lakes, but Canadian coastal trade is exclusively reserved to ships of British and Canadian registry.

Thus a ship built in Great Britain and flying the British flag can engage in coastal trade in Canadian inland waters. In other words, that ship may carry goods from port to port within Canada. This freedom of the British merchant marine to engage in coastal trade in our home waters is such as to place our own inland waters shipping in a difficult position. I am not speaking here of our high seas merchant fleet, since it is now practically non-existent. When a British seaman receives a monthly salary of $80 as against $200 for the Canadian seaman in a similar occupation, it is easy to understand the kind of unfair competition which any ship flying the Canadian flag has to face from her British competitor. Besides, any British built ship is far cheaper to build and repair in British yards where salaries are again far lower than our own. This also adds substantially to the operating costs of a Canadian vessel as against that of a British vessel where the wage scale is far below that of the competing country.

Due to such low operating costs, several small ships of British registry are now plying the St. Lawrence river, and the competition our smaller shipping companies have to put up with in that respect is unfair, because they cannot carry that freight at the same rate.

We are now earmarking millions of dollars for the St. Lawrence seaway so that ocean shipping might more easily reach the great lakes. That project enables us to foresee still greater opportunities for our coastal shipping, and we know already that British ship owners are seriously considering an increase in the competition that we have to meet from their ships along the large seaway that the St. Lawrence river will be a few years from now.

Not later than last year, the inland shipping trade of Canada lost to British ships part of the transport resulting from hydroelectric power developments on the north shore of the river, with the help of Canadian capital.

If this situation is allowed to continue, the sacrifices made by the people of Canada in developing the world's longest seaway within our country will have served to dig the graveyard of what is left of the Canadian merchant marine.

Consequently, I ask the government that governments of all other parts of the British commonwealth of nations be notified with the least possible delay, and under article 24, part X of the convention, that Canada intends to amend the terms of the convention relating to the merchant marine of the British commonwealth and establish certain requirements regarding all coastal trade carried out in Canadian waters by any ship of other than Canadian registry.

Australia and New Zealand have already taken steps to protect their respective coastal trade by providing that foreign vessels would have to pay their crews salary rates in accordance with those already in force in their country, with the result that Australian coastal trade is practically limited to Australian ships.

The United States goes further by limiting that trade to truly American ships, built and registered in the United States.

Besides, our merchant shipping is the only industry to face such unfair competition.

Our aviation is fully protected, and Canada was one of the first nations at the Chicago convention in 1944 to provide for the introduction of section 7 entitled "coastal navigation" and accepted at the international civil aviation convention.

This clause reads as follows:

Each contracting state may refuse to allow an aircraft of another contracting state to pick up passengers or cargo within its own territory and to carry them on a paying basis to another point of this territory.

The clause goes even further, by forbidding any contracting state to make arrangements or conclude treaties with another state, when the advantages and benefits allowed under the agreement are not shared by the other countries on the same basis.

Mr. Speaker, if it were possible to protect Canadian airlines, I fail to understand why our merchant marine could not also be given protection in the best interests of Canada.

(Text):

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the first subject I wish to discuss this afternoon is the need for cabinet representation in that great industrial belt extending from Chatham on the west to Cornwall on the east, then northward for 50 miles from the St. Lawrence river, lake Ontario and the United States boundary.

In reality this area is the heartland of Canadian industry. In it live about three million people, which is about one-fifth of the total population of Canada. Yet there is no cabinet representation for this vast and important area of our country. It is an area that needs representation so that the problems of industry can be brought before the cabinet continuously, and so that the cabinet may be made constantly aware of the problems which industry and those who work in it are facing.

Had that been the case, I am confident the government would not have been making the attempts it is now making to brush off as something merely seasonal and regional the unemployment situation which, last year, month by month averaged 70 per cent more than in the corresponding months of the year before. I make this statement from figures supplied by the minister's department which I have checked and know to be correct.

If this great industrial area was represented in cabinet discussions I believe there is a good chance that the government would be far more inclined than it is today to consider reducing the high commodity taxes many of our goods are carrying; taxes which are helping to price many Canadian goods out of both the domestic and export markets.

I believe there is a very good chance that if this area was represented by a minister who, because of his location in the area and his connection with its industry, was familiar with the problems of industry and the people who work in it, he would be able to explain to his colleagues that the cutting of commodity taxes does not necessarily mean a reduction in tax revenues.

The reduction of commodity taxes makes it possible to sell more goods; and if the correct balance can be struck, the total tax revenue may easily be greater when commodity taxes are reduced than at a time when high taxes are stifling the sale of products, as we see today.

A very good example of that was given to the government a while ago when they foolishly, and over our objections, raised the tax on cigarettes. The minister of finance found that when the tax rose, a lot of people stopped smoking cigarettes, and the sales fell off so badly that the total tax revenue was reduced considerably below what it had been when the tax was lower. The government had to reduce the tax to where it had been before. The sales of cigarettes picked up, and the total tax revenue went back to the higher figure, a figure considerably higher than when the tax was raised.

With that example before us, I hope the government will give consideration to reducing many of our high commodity taxes, because they are playing a very important part in pricing goods out of the market and making it impossible for many of our workmen to work full time. Often those workmen are laid off completely, and that is one of the main causes of the serious unemployment situation which exists, but which the government refuses to face in its true reality today.

Another thing that happens when you reduce commodity taxes is that more goods are sold. You have more people working and earning an income on which they pay an income tax to the government, instead of drawing on the government for unemployment insurance benefits when they are unemployed. Mr. Speaker, there is a lot of plain straight arithmetic which this government has to consider because of the serious situation existing in our economy today. They have to stop pretending the situation does not exist; they have to stop brushing unemployment aside as seasonal and regional, and face the facts and examine this whole problem as an economic one and not as a political one which should be dodged and ducked. This government owes it to the country to face the facts and come up with concrete, constructive and economically sound plans for getting at and curing the basic causes of unemployment and lost markets.

It seems strange to me that with the many Liberal members in the house who live in the area that I have described, it is impossible for the Prime Minister to find one whom he considers capable of holding down a cabinet post. When we form a government we shall have no trouble at all forming an excellent cabinet to run the country far better than this government is running it. It seems strange that the Prime Minister is having this difficulty in picking a cabinet minister to represent an area which is, as I say, the heartland of Canadian industry.

In that area about one-fifth of the total population of Canada live. There is one member in this house who, as hon. members know, has had the experience of being the mayor of one of our large industrial cities. He has had the experience of being a cabinet minister in a Liberal provincial government of one of our large provinces. He has been the chairman of the defence expenditure committee, and is now the chairman of the banking and commerce committee, the most important committee of this house. I ask the Prime Minister—I wish he were here, but I hope he will give us an answer when he comes back—why it is, if he considers a member good enough for such important positions as I have just outlined, he is not capable of holding down a position in the cabinet.

In refusing to appoint a cabinet minister from inside this house, as the Prime Minister has done twice within a year, he has in effect said to the 150 members of his party who are not in the cabinet: You just do not have the ability to sit in my cabinet and I must go outside and choose a minister from outside of parliament. In effect he has said to them: I cannot have confidence in you. And twice, as has been said today, he has had to go outside. I think it is a pity.

Mr. Bennett: Is that what you are going to do with your new leader?

Mr. Hees: When we form a government we shall have a great deal of difficulty in deciding from among our very able members who should form the cabinet. That is what our problem will be.

Mr. Bennett: You will be an old man.

Mr. Hees: I again ask the Prime Minister to reconsider his refusal to give this important industrial belt of Canada, in which one-fifth of the population of the country live, and in which is concentrated a very important segment of the industry of this country, cabinet representation so that the problems of industry may be brought continually before the cabinet in its discussions and that we can start to have a plan laid before the country of how we are to combat lost markets and rising unemployment, which we are experiencing today, instead of dodging the issues. Let the cabinet face the issues and lay before the country a plan instead of its usual policy of hope and grope.

I should like to draw to the attention of the house a matter which indicates to me the attitude of the government toward people for whom it has a direct responsibility. A short time ago the wife of one of my constituents, who is a leading aircraftman and has gone overseas to serve his country, wrote to me and asked me if I would approach the government and obtain for her a marriage allowance and separation allowance which she understood was due to wives of servicemen who serve their country overseas. I wrote the minister and asked if he would have the matter looked into. A few days later I received his letter and I should like to read it to the house because it is very interesting. He said:

> I wish to refer to your letter of November 23 concerning (one of your constituents) and the possibility that she might be entitled to dependents' allowance by virtue of the service of her husband with the Royal Canadian Air Force.
> Present regulations provide that a married airman, 21 years of age or over, may be paid a marriage allowance, provided he assigns at least $60 a month of his pay to his wife. This amount may be increased voluntarily. However, there is no provision for allowances for children.
> (The LAC mentioned in your letter) will not become 21 years of age until December, 1956 and, therefore, he has no entitlement to marriage allowance. Furthermore, as he is not entitled to marriage allowance, he has no entitlement to separated family's allowance by reason of his posting overseas.
> There are provisions within the regulations, however, for the voluntary assignment of a man's pay in favour of anyone he may wish to designate. The amount of this assignment is usually left to the man to work out with his wife. Inquiries of (the L.A.C.'s) unit have shown that he has now voluntarily assigned $80 a month in favour of his wife.
> In view of the foregoing, I trust this matter will now have been concluded to the satisfaction of everyone concerned.

The wife of this man is expecting a child. I advised the minister of this fact when I sent along the woman's letter to him so he could be completely advised of all the facts in the case.

She must stop work at the end of this month because her baby is expected in April. Between the end of this month, when she must stop work, and the time she has her baby, she will have $2.58 a day on which to live. From then on she will get an additional 16 cents a day through children's allowance, so she will have $2.74 a day for food, clothing, shelter, doctor's bills and all the necessities of life she will have to provide for herself and her child. The minister knew of these facts when he added the last paragraph to his letter in which he said:

> In view of the foregoing, I trust this matter will now have been concluded to the satisfaction of everyone concerned.

It is obvious that the government is satisfied with this arrangement; with the fact that this woman will have $2.74 a day with which to bring up her child, but I wonder if the minister or any other member of the government would be willing to go overseas and leave his wife and child to get by on $2.74 a day. Of course the answer is that he would not. But by the minister's own letter, by his own expression of opinion, this government is perfectly willing to see somebody else do it.

It is obvious to anyone in this house that this serviceman's wife cannot bring a child into the world on $2.58 a day, neither can she bring up that child on $2.74 a day, but that is what the government says she must do. Perhaps it is easy to understand that, when you realize that this government does not think in terms of human beings who have stomachs to feed, and who have bodies to keep warm, and who must provide for sickness. This government simply thinks of people as names in a file whose needs do not require attention unless their numbers are sufficient to cause trouble at electiontime.

The minister announced in his kindly way that arrangements have been made to have part of this leading aircraftman's pay assigned over to his wife. If this man was 21 years of age or over he would be assigning $60 instead of the present $80, and this would be in addition to the marriage allowance of $91 and the separation allowance of $30 which the wife would be receiving. This would give his wife $181 a month instead of her present $80 and the husband would be able to keep $47 instead of the $27 under the present arrangement.

By the declared policy of the government in this matter, the government expects men who are in the service and legally married to postpone having children until the government decides in its great wisdom that they are old enough to have children. If it was not the government's intention to make this decision for the young members of its armed forces, it would have made the same provisions for them as it does for couples where the man is over 21 years of age.

During the past war the government realized and recognized its responsibility toward the wives and dependents of servicemen, irrespective of age. It provided allowances for wives and children, even common-law wives. There was no question of age, there was no question of whether a man was legally married. If he had a common-law wife she was provided for as well.

Now the government turns around and by an arbitrary decision says that even though a man is old enough to serve his country, is old enough to go overseas, is old enough to take a chance of being killed or maimed, until he is 21 years of age he is not old enough to get married and have children. He is old enough to fight but he is not old enough to become a parent. Of all the arbitrary decisions I have ever heard, that is the worst! I ask by what power does this government or any other government say that a man who is of a legal marriageable age cannot get married and raise a family? Who determines what is the ideal age?

By law a man can be married when he is 18 years of age and can raise a family, but the government says that if he serves in the armed forces, if he goes overseas and takes a chance of being involved in a hot war and being killed, he is still not old enough to become a parent, to have children and raise a family until he reaches the arbitrary age of 21 years. I never heard anything more ridiculous in my life.

By withholding marriage and separation allowances from couples where the husband is under 21 years of age, the government is in effect saying to these servicemen, "It is up to you to see that you do not have children until you are 21 years old." When the government tries to dictate the most personal decision to be made in a man's life, I say that it has reached a new high in autocracy.

Only a short time ago the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) told the unemployed of this country through another arbitrary decision that until January 1 they did not have the right to become cold, hungry, sick or wet; that they must somehow or other go into hibernation until that magical date of January 1, decided upon by the government in its great wisdom. After the date of January 1 they would be allowed to eat, clothe themselves and get warm for 3½ months, and then on another arbitrarily decided date, April 15, they must stop having human feelings and must again go into hibernation. This government seems to try to decide everything for everybody. It shows how absolute a bureaucracy and autocracy can grow.

I think it is obvious that a man should not be asked to go overseas and leave his wife to bring a child into the world on $2.58 a day, and to know that when his child is born, his wife and child will have only $2.74 a day on which to live. I repeat, the minister had those facts before him when he wrote in the last paragraph of his letter:

> In view of the foregoing, I trust this matter will now have been concluded to the satisfaction of everyone concerned.

I think it is becoming more clear every day by the attitude of the government in matters like this; the attitude of the government toward the unemployed; the attitude of the government toward people; that this government, as I said before, does not think in terms of human beings, that it thinks in terms of people simply as names in a file, people who are on the books, people who must be paid attention only when they become dissatisfied in sufficient numbers to bother the government at electiontime.

When I asked the Minister of Labour about people being cut off the unemployment rolls on April 15 he said: "Oh, well, there are not many of them by that time." Everything is quantitative with this government. If 100,000 people are suffering, well perhaps that is not too bad, but if they turn into 500,000 then they might bother the government at electiontime and perhaps they had better do something about it. I think it is pretty clear that it is about time this country became governed by people who are a lot closer to the needs and aspirations of the people who elected them. As there is no indication that this government is approaching the people, and there is every indication it is getting farther and farther away from them, getting more and more out of touch with them, I think it is about time this government was replaced by people who are far closer to the needs and aspirations of the people of this country. I refer, of course, to the members of the official opposition.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I appreciate the fact, Mr. Speaker, that under the procedure of this house an hon. member may speak more than once during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Officially, of course, we are now discussing the subamendment moved by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn). Unofficially, of course, we can speak on any matter that comes to our mind. However, because we are officially discussing the subamendment I want to say that I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster. I have read with a great deal of interest and studied the amendment that he moved. I am, therefore, going to vote for it. I cannot do anything else.

The subamendment could be put in this way. Are you in favour of better weather in Ottawa? I certainly am. Now, economically and politically, that is the meaning of the amendment moved by the hon. member. I would say the amendment is one that you cannot vote against. It is something indefinite. I am going to vote for it because if those principles were put into effect there might be some improvement. It is in no way specific in its terms. My friend on my right says, "according to his ideas." Socred ideas are not specific in the amendment. The wording is general and that was known when the amendment was moved.

I want to speak on three points this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, two of which have been already mentioned. Although these two have been raised, I feel it is important that those who support these two suggestions make their position known, because if only one person speaks perhaps no attention will be paid to him. First of all, I want to speak on a matter that was mentioned in this debate and this afternoon was the subject of questions, that is the financial contribution of the federal government to a bridge over the north arm of the Fraser river. It has become known as the Marpole bridge, but actually that is a misnomer. I cannot understand the position of the federal government on this issue.

On going over the records I find that on October 15, 1946, a committee was appointed to examine into the question of a bridge in that area. The committee was composed of seven engineers, including two dominion government engineers, and had representatives from the city of Vancouver and province of British Columbia as well. On November 14, 1947, this committee, which I repeat included two dominion government engineers, made a report recommending a new bridge but not at the present location of the Marpole bridge. There have been developments and negotiations since 1946. I, personally, was a member at some of the conferences held, at which at least one of our present cabinet ministers was present. We were given to understand that we would be assisted.

I have been reading with a great deal of interest some of the statements that have emanated from the Department of Public Works in Ottawa during the past few months. They are very contradictory. They would lead one to believe that the government had no idea of the plans for the bridge, and that no application was made by the British Columbia government for financial assistance. I was interested in this matter, so before I came to Ottawa I went to Victoria. I found that on March 25 of last year the Department of Public Works was sent all the plans of the proposed new bridge. I found also that on May 11 a letter was sent to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) requesting federal assistance up to one-third of the cost of that bridge. I am sorry that the Minister of Public Works is not in his seat, for I have on my desk a copy of the report of the 1946 committee as well as a record of the letters sent by the provincial government in March and in May.

What I am trying to do, sir, is to continue the remarks I made when I spoke first in this debate to the effect that the federal government has a responsibility for the major highways, byways and bridges in a province. There can be no question but that this bridge is required. There can be no question but that it serves one of the major international airports of the dominion. In view of the present international crisis, there can be no question but that the major international airport is Vancouver. Along with other members of parliament from all parties, I attended a meeting of the airport committee in Vancouver prior to the calling of this session. We were told that under no circumstances would the R.C.A.F. recede from its position that the Sea island airport was the station for the R.C.A.F. Therefore from the point of view of a highway proposition, a defence proposition and an R.C.A.F. proposition there is a major interest on the part of the federal government in the existence of proper access to that international airport. I just want to add my words to those that have already been spoken, and to the questions that were asked only this afternoon on the orders of the day, urging that the federal government reconsider its position and, in the light of all the circumstances, make a major contribution to the cost of this $10 million new bridge which is now almost under construction, or at least for which tenders have already been called.

There is one other point I wish to make. Unless the federal government does so Vancouver, the third city of Canada, will again be hemmed in by toll bridges. I am not going to say any more on that matter. I spoke on it last session and I am just adding my words to those which have been spoken on it at this session.

On my second point, I again am only adding my voice to those of other hon. members who spoke at this present session asking the federal government to reconsider its policy on the age limit of those who can get a government job. I admit that I am now rapidly approaching the age of 50. Nevertheless, at least my constituents think that I have not reached a point where I am past the age where I can be a member of the House of Commons. Yet, Mr. Speaker, there is no question whatsoever that throughout Canada in industry there is a growing requirement to the effect that you cannot get a job if you are over 45, and unfortunately now it is over 40. I understand there is a similar regulation with respect to employment by the federal government.

I believe that the Vancouver Daily Province under date of January 14 had a most interesting editorial which I should like to quote in part. It draws our attention to the fact that in British Columbia—which I think I can safely say is one of the most rapidly growing provinces of the Dominion of Canada and has perhaps the greatest potentialities for future development—in the past few weeks it has been found necessary to form a brand new organization. That organization is being called "Experienced Employables over 40".

This is the first time that I have discussed this matter on the floor of the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, but it was my privilege to discuss it more than once in the British Columbia legislature. I should like to repeat what I said a number of years ago, and what I still believe to be true, namely that it is wrong for industry or government to ignore the years of training and experience of those who are over 40. I believe it is wrong that the impression should be given abroad, either by government or by industry, that a person is useless after 40. If that were true, there would not be many of us on the floor of the House of Commons, and there would not be any Senate at all. If that were true, the answer is that you must go where it is not true, namely in the Commons and the Senate, and there you can only find one vacancy in the House of Commons and 21 in the Senate. That procedure would not solve the problem at all. May I quote from a part of this editorial in the Southam press and may I say that I agree with it:

> Only in jobs where straight muscle work is needed does the age factor play a big part. But in the machine age "muscle" jobs are not in the majority. This is an era for highly trained personnel, the technicians, mathematicians—skilled workers who can design machines or operate them.

Then it says this, Mr. Speaker, and with this I also agree because upon more than one occasion I have been approached by those under 40 and told this, "Why do you speak on behalf of those over 40? We young men need jobs". I think the Daily Province answers that question very well when in their editorial they said this:

> This isn't a problem that concerns only those who are over 40. It concerns every Canadian, for young men and women who are now looking for their first jobs will one day be 40.

In the last paragraph the editorial also says this:

> We hope the forties will be able to roar loud and long enough to bring this country to the realization that if it isn't willing to let these people work for their living it will have to pay for their keep in discontented idleness.

I am making these remarks, as I said, because I want to support the members of this house who spoke a few days ago in opposition to the government policy and the government lead to the effect that you are useless after you are 45 or after 40. I should like to add my words in support of the contention that this criticism also applies to industry. One's capability of work is not measured by his age: it is measured by his mental and physical condition. There are many men and women who are many years over 40; yes, there are quite a few of us right here in the House of Commons who, I hope, demonstrate that mentally and physically they have a contribution to make.

In conclusion I just want to say, on that one issue, that I sincerely hope it will not be necessary to have, as a complement to the provincial organization now started in Vancouver, a national organization to try to find jobs for those turned down by government and industry because they are over 40 years of age. If they were useless, the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) would not be sitting in his seat today. Our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) would not be holding his job today. Ninety per cent of us would not be holding a job in the House of Commons. I hope the government will give some thought to this matter and will give a lead to industry. I hope they will give a lead to industry not only by the enunciation of policies but also by legislation such as some countries of the world have whereby there must be not only a percentage of those over 40 but those who are disabled in the employ of every employer.

I come now to my third point. It concerns a matter that has not been discussed in the house but I desire to raise it in this debate because I feel that it is of such importance that consideration should be given it by the government before they make a reply. I know that I could raise the matter when we come to the estimates but I should like a study made of it. While I was still in Vancouver before the house met I was interviewed by a number of men who were employed by the Canadian government on a weather ship which operates off the coast of British Columbia. The ship is the C.G.S. St. Catharines.

Here, sir, is the consensus of opinion of experienced seamen on board that government ship. I was told that the policy with respect to the hiring of men on this weather ship operating off the coast of British Columbia is to engage men with no seagoing experience in preference to men with discharge books proving their ability and conduct at sea. I was told by those who interviewed me that promotion on this boat, at least in the deck department, is by favouritism without regard to experience and ability. I was told, and I am repeating only what I was told by those who met me, that cooks and waiters are constantly placed in seamen's berths and in an emergency would prove not only useless but even dangerous to other seamen and themselves. I was further told that proper types of life jackets for emergency boat work have been considered unnecessary by the local authorities although they were recommended by the master and the officers.

I was told by seamen on the boat that if a conscientious seaman found himself hampered by the type of life jacket supplied by the government in lifting a person or in pulling an oar he would be tempted to disregard the life jacket and endanger himself and others by taking it off. I was further told just before I came down here that all the personnel of the ship are concerned that the first aid facilities available on that weather ship are only of the most elementary nature, that on previous voyages cases of broken bones, acute appendicitis and severe eye injuries had occurred and the only treatment available was aspirin and laxatives.

These men made a recommendation which I want to pass on to the government. The recommendation was that they believed that a great improvement would be made if a fourth officer could be appointed on weather ships whose duties would not concern in any way the operation of the ship but who would give first aid training and proper boat and emergency training to enable the crew to deal with emergencies which might occur at any time during the operation of the ship.

I felt that this interview was important and that I should convey what was said to hon. members and to the government. But it became even more important in the light of a story carried in a Vancouver paper in September of last year which seems to confirm what is taking place on ships operated by the government of Canada. I am very happy that the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) is in his seat when I am going to refer to this article. It is my only source of information, although I have tried to check it since coming here for the session.

It is a report by a member of the fourth estate, a member of the press gallery of the House of Commons. When we members of the house speak we speak from our knowledge and with the conviction that what we have heard or read is true to the best of our belief. I feel that the same applies to the members of the press gallery of the House of Commons. Although they may, quite naturally, do a little bit of guessing on occasion, when they are at a particular place and see things they write their reports on the basis of what they have seen, and we can therefore accept them as depicting exactly what they saw.

A member of the press gallery of the House of Commons wrote this article on September 10 setting forth his reactions and views while he was on board the C.G.S. C. D. Howe at sea. I am not speaking politically. I am not saying that C. D. Howe is at sea.

Mr. Lesage: You are at sea.

Mr. Winch: He was on board the C.G.S. C.D. Howe at sea. What did this reporter have to say? May I state very briefly what he had to say. But first of all let me say that in the article this reporter says that he spent three years in the navy and had deep-sea service as a crew member on a merchantman, as well as considerable time knocking around the British Columbia coast. Therefore he felt that he knew what he was writing about. His account of his three weeks spent on the C.D. Howe to the best of my knowledge has never been repudiated or answered by the department of government concerned.

While I have the actual article before me I shall put in my own words what this reporter had to say. He said that, at a time when there were 5,000 Canadian seamen who had been pulled off the high seas, and when hundreds were on the beach in every port and looking for ships, the Canadian government mans its ships with inexperienced political appointees.

Then this report said:

> I hate to say this because she's a friendly ship with a few good seamen aboard, but she's dirty, inefficient and no credit to the blue ensign of the Canadian government.

This is the account of an experienced seaman aboard a Canadian government ship named after the Acting Prime Minister, in which he states very definitely that every year this ship bearing the name of C. D. Howe heads north with a brand new crew of political appointees, the recognized source of government crews. As a man aboard the ship when he wrote the article, he said:

> Smoking is permitted within six feet of several thousand gallons of high-test aviation gasoline and diesel fuel stored on deck.

This was written by an honoured member of the press gallery, written in September and not yet repudiated.

An hon. Member: Did he get back safely?

Mr. Winch: His statement is not repudiated, that he found gasoline on board the C. D. Howe was stored under the helicopter landing platform, where it could easily be set off by a crash or fire aboard the helicopter. On board this ship the reporter wrote that discipline is only casual.

And he wrote something else which I cannot understand and about which I would like to have a very careful explanation. He writes that on September 10 all the victualling of the ship was done by the chief steward under private contract, and that he was not required to submit a statement showing his profits or expenses. It states that the chief steward did not have to bid competitively for the contract, and that he could make his purchases of certain commodities as though they were being made for a naval ship of war. In other words, to name only one commodity, he could buy cigarettes without paying the government excise or other taxes. According to those on board he could not have been making less than 100 per cent profit.

I do not wish to become involved in any argument at this moment about bilingualism, but I must point out that the C. D. Howe is trilingual—French, English and Eskimo.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I am quoting from a statement of a House of Commons reporter who spent three weeks aboard that ship—because the article is headed, "Aboard C.G.S. C. D. Howe at sea". To quote further:

> The Howe is a trilingual ship, a situation which leaves her wide open for panic in case of emergency. The working language of the ship is French and a large part of the crew, including some officers, speak nothing else. Passengers are mostly English speaking. Eskimos speak only their own tongue.

Mr. Lesage: It hurts you.

Mr. Winch: It does not hurt me at all. I am raising a very important question, and it is not a matter of French or English. If the hon. member would be as honest as I am there would not have been some of the misunderstanding that has taken place within the last two weeks. I am quoting from the article written by this reporter who states that among those on board the ship there are those who speak French, those who speak English and those who speak neither, only Eskimo.

Mr. Lesage: What do you wish us to do—fly the Eskimos, instead of taking them on the ship?

Mr. Winch: Would you mind if I continue reading this report? Perhaps I should begin again. It states:

> The Howe is a trilingual ship, a situation which leaves her wide open for panic in case of emergency. The working language of the ship is French and a large part of the crew, including some officers, speak nothing else. Passengers are mostly English speaking. Eskimos speak only their own tongue.
> Little seems to have been done to anticipate a language crisis. Instructions, for example, for operation of good but complex fire fighting equipment are in English which is unintelligible to most of the crew. With high-test gasoline and explosives aboard, there isn't much time for translation.
> There are no emergency instructions in Eskimo in either the Eskimo quarters or the ship's hospital. Most Eskimos are travelling in a ship for the first time and would have little idea of what was happening in an emergency. Eskimo is spoken only by a handful of "old Arctic hands" aboard, mostly officials who would not be competent to issue emergency orders.

It is not a question of English, French or Eskimo. According to the writer of this report there is confusion, and no translations. I have spoken personally to the man who wrote this article who told me that officers give instructions in one language, and they could not be understood when he was giving them because of the language difficulty. He also told me that he actually saw an Eskimo sitting on top of a drum of gasoline smoking a cigarette.

I am drawing this to your attention, sir. I have only one minute left. These matters are important. This story, written by a press gallery reporter who was on board the ship for three weeks, is of importance. It is our responsibility to know whether it is right or wrong. If it is wrong, then correct it. If it is right, has the government taken any action to correct the situation outlined in this article? Because the information in this article is so close to the information given me by seamen on the weather ship off the British Columbia coast, we should know whether an investigation is being made. I think, sir, that this matter of our Canadian ships, the conditions of their complement, is of such importance that it merits a full investigation by the members of the House of Commons.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, following the speech which I made in the house on January 14, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) spoke briefly. My speech is recorded on pages 208 to 214 and his speech is recorded on pages 222 to 225 of Hansard. I thought the hon. member made a very good speech. He touched upon three matters which, it seemed to me, he has a right to have me deal with. First, would Social Credit require a dictatorship?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: Positively no! When I hear an elected Liberal on the floor of the house give utterance to an absolute lie, as hon. members persist in telling in a nation like this, it is something I just cannot understand! His second point was: what was the story and significance of the Alberta prosperity certificates? His third point was whether or not Social Credit believes all the problems of the nation could be solved by just printing money. We have one or two making that statement. I suppose that if ten thousand speeches were delivered right in their presence they would still persist in their lie, which amazes me beyond all measure.

To make sure that the position of the hon. member in relation to my position as expressed in my speech be accurately before us, may I read certain extracts from my speech and from his? I will read a portion of my speech as recorded on page 210 of Hansard. I am not finding any fault with the hon. member. I do not want to be harsh in any way. I just want to put the facts so that people can get them. I said:

> Opponents of Social Credit have always endeavoured to show that it would establish a dictatorship. But quite the contrary is the case. Social Credit would establish the freest state and the most fully democratic government the mind of man can conceive. Did Sir Thomas White establish a dictatorship in developing and employing the Finance Act of 1914? Even to ask that question is to be unfair to his memory and to shock almost any hon. member into serious thought.
> The opponents of Social Credit will ask: "How could prices be maintained without iron controls?" I think it was the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), speaking some time ago in connection with Social Credit, who asked that question. The answer is that prices on the whole would be maintained by a scientific use of the law of supply and demand. It is the law of supply and demand that is supposed to affect prices today. By having and exercising ready, effective control over financial policy the minister of finance would be readily able to increase the supply of almost any commodity in Canada, thereby dealing with the tendency of prices to rise. Some will ask, "But how could he increase the supply quickly enough to offset an inflationary tendency?" After a Social Credit government had been in operation for a certain length of time we would find that it would probably have on hand a considerable supply of many commodities, just as we find today the dominion government of Canada has on hand a considerable supply of butter, eggs, and other commodities.
> I have stated several times in this house that it would be greatly in the interests of this nation to store up a good supply of different kinds of grain, sugar, honey, and other commodities of that nature so there would be reserves available in case a need arises to free certain commodities upon the market when there appears to be sufficient shortage to cause a price rise.

The minister of finance could manage tendencies toward falling prices by a policy of price support wherever necessary, much as we are doing in Canada today through the agricultural prices support program. He could buy and take temporary control of and withdraw from the market all unmanageable surpluses, especially of non-perishable goods such as wheat, sugar, and so forth.

I would not think that any person with more than age 13 intelligence, after hearing a speech of that kind, would say the kind of things that the hon. member said.

We now go to page 212:

Mr. Hanna: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Blackmore: Gladly.

Mr. Hanna: Will he please explain what effect the Social Credit technique would have on taxation?

Mr. Blackmore: In the first place I would say that it would so greatly increase the well-being of the nation that the tax burden we are now bearing would seem to be relatively easier. Everyone knows that in times of buoyant revenues, buoyant incomes and so forth, as at the peak of prosperity in the war, it was easier to bear taxation. But the answer I would give, without going into too much detail, is that Social Credit is opposed to high taxation and would endeavour, just as rapidly as the goods and services produced in the country would justify, to remove the debt.

May I stop there to point out the fact that I mentioned goods and services. You will never find a responsible Social Credit speaker mentioning money without mentioning goods and services to indicate that the money supply must be in accordance with the goods and services. That is certainly clear in my remarks. I continue:

The debt can be easily paid off. Sir Thomas White could have used any $100 million that he created to pay off $100 million in bonds just as easily as he could have used the money to buy $100 million worth of wheat and other commodities in the war.

The result is that if the time came when a Social Credit administration felt that the wisest use to be made of a given amount of money obtained by monetizing goods and services was to pay off the debt, then by degrees it could do so by simply monetizing, as Sir Thomas White did, the goods and services of the country and paying off the debt. Taxes would thereby slowly be reduced until the time would come—I will not say how many years it would take; it would depend on conditions, but I would say within a rather comfortable period—when taxation could be abolished entirely.

Those expressions are so plain that I am sure the hon. member could easily understand what was said; consequently it is pretty hard to suppose that he did forget what I said when he made his speech.

On page 224 of Hansard the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is reported as follows:

This evening we have all enjoyed, because some hon. members gave evidence of it, the exposition of the Social Credit technique by the financial spokesman for the Social Credit party. I think we can take it that the views expressed by the hon. member for Lethbridge represent the official views of the Social Credit party, since I have never heard any of their members deny those particular views that were outlined this evening. I wonder how the party leader, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), reconciles the views we heard this evening with his statement the other day that his party is the real free enterprise party. How can he reconcile a government-dictated price structure with free enterprise? I should like to hear him deal with that subject. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that he can only have a government-dictated price system under a dictatorship.

That in the face of what I had said just a short time before! Then again:

The theory outlined by the hon. member could only be made to work under a dictatorship.

We heard a great deal this evening about tickets, and that there were not enough tickets to go around. I should like to display a real Social Credit ticket, Mr. Speaker. It is called a prosperity certificate. These prosperity certificates, so-called, were issued by the Social Credit government of Alberta. This one is dated August 5, 1936. I should like to read into the record what it says on its face:

"The provincial treasurer will pay to the bearer the sum of one dollar on the expiration of two years from date of issue hereof upon presentation hereof provided there are then attached to the back hereof one hundred and four one cent certificate stamps."

On the back there are 104 spaces dated for the 104 stamps.

The hon. member did the country a service by reading that because it is important that people know what the prosperity certificates were like. Then he went on to say:

I think it will be apparent to most hon. members that it was really a gigantic taxation scheme. These prosperity certificates were used to pay civil servants. You gave a dollar's worth of service and you got one of these; and then, according to the face of it, you got a dollar when you had paid 104 cents over a two year period. Needless to say these were not in circulation for the expected two year period. They were rejected entirely by the people of Alberta, Social Credit and non-Social Credit.

That is not correct, but I shall not go into the details. Then again:

I would like to complete my speech; then the hon. member for Macleod can continue and tell the house the rest of the story, if I have omitted anything about the Social Credit certificates.

I am telling the story tonight. The hon. member continued:

I am not one of those who, like my Social Credit colleagues across the way, think all we have to do is print the money.

That is the most puerile thing in the face of what I have said already and after all the explanation that has been given and after the hon. member having lived in Alberta and seen the various devices which have been used by the government of Alberta to bring about prosperity in that province. However, nonsensical things like that are to be expected from people. Then at page 225 he is reported as saying:

> I would like to congratulate the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) on his appointment. I am sure all hon. members earnestly wish him much success in the very difficult job he has in hand. The hon. member for Lethbridge certainly makes it look easy for him this evening. We would print enough money to pay off the national debt—

No mention is made of goods and services, which is the dishonest thing in the matter.

> We would print enough money to pay off the national debt and we would eventually abolish taxation. It is a neat trick if it can be done.

I do not think for a minute that the hon. member deliberately intended those discrepancies in what he said. I think his speech was prepared a long time before he delivered it, and probably it was prepared by somebody else at a time when this speech of mine had not yet been delivered. I should like to give the house a little background on this matter of prosperity certificates.

Mr. Byrne: I do not think it is becoming for an hon. member to say that another hon. member's speech was prepared for him. Speeches are made in this house by hon. members. While I am on the point of order I should like to say that I do not think it is appropriate to quote a speech made by an hon. member in this house during this debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), I listened carefully to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and I do not think it would be fair to interpret his remark as a definite accusation that the speech of the hon. member had been written for him. I think in fairness to the hon. member for Lethbridge it should be said that equally plausible suggestions have been made on the floor of this house on more than one occasion that, to put it mildly, hon. members had had some assistance in preparing their speeches.
